Mr. DOHERTY. As I understand, the regulations already made under the Lands Act must not only be submitted to parliament, but must be approved by parliament. These regulations approved by parliament have become law, and it does not seem to me desirable that what parliament has approved and made law should be susceptible to alteration not only in details, but in entire principle, as the minister says in 1907 these regulations were altered by the Governor in Council alone. I do not know how long these regulations had been in force before they were altered, but I fail to see any reason why the power should remain in the hands of the Governor in Council. There does not seem to me to be anything to indicate that there was such urgent need to make changes in the regulations that parliament had sanctioned that it was necessary to give that power to the Governor in Council. I have had occasion to look at some of the regulations made by order in council under the Lands Act which are before the House now.

It appears that a number of the regulations changed had been in force for a long period of years. If that is true, what is the necessity of placing the power to amend those regulations, which have become law by the action of parliament itself, in the hands of the Governor in Council? We have an annual session of parliament, and surely the few months that would elapse while the government would wait to submit to parliament any proposed alterations in those regulations, would not be a matter of vital importance. We are dealing here not with pure questions of administration. They may be questions of administration if you look at these lands as the property of the government; but you are going quite beyond that when you make a law to determine how rights in that property may be alienated and become the property of individuals; and the minister has, I think, conceded that when you are making a law for the purpose of determining how the public generally may acquire rights on certain property, the first essential is that that law should secure perfect equality of right between all citizens who are subjected to it. Now, we are asked, because it has been done in the past with regard to this immense tract of property, to surrender our legislative power to determine how one may acquire rights in or upon it, over to the Governor in Council; and I can see no reason for that except that between sessions of parliament there might arise a necessity for amending these laws. I have entire sympathy with the position taken by the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), that parliament ought to keep control over legislation that is to govern the transmission of this particular kind of property, just as fully as it should keep control over any other matter that is subject to its legislative competence. It seems to me that the continuance of the system under the Lands Act is difficult to justify in itself; but to go a step further, and to say that because it does exist under the Lands Act, we must continue it here, when there is no substantial reason advanced to establish the necessity of our doing so, seems to me to be very far from conclusive. In the perusal that I have had occasion to make of the regulations passed under the power conferred by the Lands Act, it has seemed to me that many of the matters there dealt with would have been more properly dealt with by parliament itself; and it is a most undesirable system to create and maintain throughout a large section of country, under which not only the executive but the legislative power is exercised by one body, that body being properly speaking the executive branch of parliament, which we are taking out of its functions and delegating to it functions which properly speaking belong to us. That seems to me to be in principle a most undesirable state of affairs, and one which should call for some more serious reason than any that has been advanced to justify it. This is not the only instance we have had of legislation of this kind. We have had this session quite a number of Bills in which parliament has been called on to hand over its legislative powers to the executive government. All these instances, while they may be cited as precedents for our doing the same thing again, are instances of the growth of a very serious abuse. I do not profess to be familiar with the precise details of how the rights here in contemplation ought to be dealt with; but I do think that the government, which has been administering and dealing with this kind of property throughout all these territories for a long period of years, ought to be in a position to lay before us a statute that would determine how these properties ought to be disposed of. If that were done, I can realize that it might be a proper thing with regard to the details, to confide some power of making regulations to the government. Before I sit down, I would like to point out what seems to me to be a difference between these regulations and the regulations provided for in the Lands Act. While the latter regulations become law when made, they only continue in force if approved by parliament at its next session. But under section 18 of this Bill, the approval of parliament is not required. All that is required is that the regulations shall be laid before parliament at its next session. Of course, it is competent for any member to raise the question then whether these regulations should not be abrogated, but there is a substantial difference between the requirement that regulations shall be laid before parliament without parliament being required to take any action and the requirement that they must be submitted to parliament for approval. The minister has said that the position taken by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) differs materially from that taken by the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve). No doubt in moving an amendment my hon. friend from North Grey is accepting the principle of the section, but he moved that amendment on the assumption that the minister had closed the door to any possible consideration of the very conclusive reasoning made by my hon. friend from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) in support of the position he took, namely, that at all events before parliament should act the minister ought to submit the regulations which are to govern the disposal of these rights.

Mr. MACDONELL (South Toronto). I had hoped that the hon. minister would remove the anomaly that exists between the land regulations, which require parliamentary sanction, and the regulations under this Bill, which have the same force and effect as if enacted by this parliament, provided they are published in four consecutive issues of the 'Canada Gazette.' There is no more objectionable legislation than legislation by delegation or reference. that is by passing an Act giving the Governor in Council power to make regulations which will have the force of law and concerning which the approval of parliament need not be asked. That is what is being done here; and when we have regard to the scope and the intent of this measure, one can see at once how particularly objectionable is such legislation. Taking up the Bill as a whole, it has a very commendable object. that of setting apart forest reserves and parks. And it is certainly necessary that some immediate executive power should have the making of regulations for the proper governing of these reserves, such as the preservation of game, the prevention of fires, the prevention of unauthorized business and traffic, the removal and exclusion of undesirable persons and trespassers, &c. But when you come to subsection (b) of section 16, you find that it gives the Governor in Council power to alienate all the reserves. And he can do this without any authority from parliament, without any Act being passed. He has practically the power to sell and dispose of the whole park property at his discretion, without the intervention of parliament. The cutting and removing of timber, the working of mineral deposits and forests, the removal of sand, gravel, or any other material, the pasturage of cattle, the use of hay lands, the establishment of reservoirs, water-power sites, power transmission lines, telegraph and telephone lines and the granting of leases and permits therefor—all these things can be sold by the Governor in Council free from any interference by parliament, and without any authority from parliament. So that with the exception of alienating the fee simple of the land, we are asked to give the Governor in Council power to dispose of the entire park property.

Reference has been made to park reserves in Ontario, but in Ontario they are dealt with very differently. There, in the various Acts dealing with timber, or minerals in park reserves, you find provisions as to how these shall be disposed of, if dealt with at all, and in the Acts there are schedules containing the regulations, so that all who run may read, and the public knows just what its rights are.

The minister justifies this general clause by saying that the same power was given to the Governor in Council with regard to the public lands in the three western provinces, and that what was good enough for the public lands of this Dominion, situated in these three provinces, ought to be good enough for these park reserves. But the way in which the public lands of the Dominion, in these western provinces, have been dealt with, has not been altogether satisfactory. Regulations were framed in such a way as to allow certain persons to obtain most valuable concessions at very trifling prices. The minister took office in his present position in April, 1905. It will be recollected that during the months of April, May, June, and July of that year some very large grazing leases were granted, aggregating 580,000 acres. It is true that in the course of that year the regulations were changed, and no further irrevocable leases, as we may call them, were granted. But during the early months of the minister's occupancy of his present office, these immense grants were made of grazing leases in that country. Much the same thing happened with regard to the timber leases. It will be recollected that a very large number of timber licenses were granted in 1903-04. Then they were changed. History may repeat itself here. In this case there should be the double safeguard. This property is set apart for posterity—for recreation, for health, for the reforestation of the country, for the preservation of the scenery and of game.

Therefore, it does seem that double safeguards should be cast about it. The minister has said that these regulations are in a formative condition. I think that a year or more ago a similar Act to this was passed setting apart a park reserve. The minister will know better than I, but I should think there must be regulations with regard to that park reserve. If there be these regulations, why not incorporate either in the Bill itself or in the schedule those that have been found workable and let them be adopted here? But to say that we shall give the Governor in Council complete power to deal with these matters by order in council is going very much further than this parliament should go. This is a matter of very great importance. The minister takes his own view, and no doubt he has a strong opinion on the matter. He may have full confidence in his own administration of the department and may feel that he has personal knowledge of the needs under these regulations. And he may be right. But he cannot be in his place forever, and these regulations, in future, may be enforced by some person in whom he would not have the same confidence as in himself. If he will take a broad view of this question I think he will see that it is desirable to have these regulations put in as part of the Bill, or delay the Bill until these regulations can go through their formative period or condition, and come to the stage of maturity where they can be dealt with by parliament.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). I approve this Bill so far as it means the conservation of natural resources, but it requires but little thought to understand that the legislation is of a very serious nature. Until this Act is repealed, we divest ourselves of the power of governing a kingdom—over sixteen millions of acres—not only lands, but minerals, timber, and all the wealth contained in those lands. We have to look forward perhaps, to that kingdom becoming greater in another way. Cities and towns may grow up in it. And it is all to be governed by whom? By the Governor in Council—in name; by the minister, in name: but rather by some official appointed to carry out the work in this department, such as the gentleman who rules over the timber department. This Act is to be supplemented by regulations that are to have the same power as if they were contained in the body of the Act. The Act says the regulations are to be published in the 'Canada Gazette,' and are to be submitted to parliament. There is not even an averment in the Bill that regulations will be null and void until approved by parliament—they are to be submitted, that is all. This kingdom we are giving over to an official, a hired official, perhaps a political official, who would be appointed to take charge of it. We divest ourselves not only of the power we have at present for the direction and control of all its wealth, but we are giving to this official all the powers, for all this territory of municipal governments. He is to make rules and do everything that a municipal council could do in a very much smaller land. He is to arrange how even the fee simple is to be disposed of, and the mining rights, the timber rights, the removal of stone, gravel, or sand, the pasturage of cattle, the use of hay lands and the establishment of and use of reservoirs. There may be an agricultural community there, and I suppose that even grain growing would go with the pasturage rights in the land. I think if the minister would stay his hand and afterwards come to the House with something more definite so that we might know what sort of a government the country and the people were to have, we might assist him. But I think the House would be making a mistake in passing the Bill in its present shape.

Mr. GOODEVE. I want to reiterate and make very clear my position on this matter. I would like to take up the argument of the minister when he was trying to show that a difference in principle existed between the position of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) and my own. I think the minister did not well sustain his contention. Both the hon. member for North Grey and I contend for the one principle of absolute publicity and absolute equal rights in the disposal of these natural resources. I will take the minister's own argument. In dealing with my position, he referred to the mining law. That is the principle I have contended for. In every province of this Dominion we have statutory enactments, or mineral laws. Every prospector knows exactly the conditions under which he can stake out a mineral claim. It does not lie in the option of the minister or of the Governor in Council to say whether he shall or shall not receive that claim. The law has fixed all the conditions. That is exactly the principle I am contending for, so that when a man applies for a grazing lease he shall know the conditions under which he can obtain that lease. I think the minister scarcely realizes that he is asking in this Bill to be made a king over 25,000 square miles of territory, even a man above the king. Practically he is given power to say to one man, Go, and he goeth; and to another man, Come, and he cometh, because he will be given power to refuse that man a right or to give him a right. He will control everything except the fee simple to that land. He becomes an absolute czar of that great kingdom of 16,000,000 acres of land. I think even the Minister of the Interior should hesitate before he asks this parliament to grant him such absolute power. All I am contending for is that which has been so well advocated by the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell), and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Haggart). We want the regulations brought down in a schedule and put in this Bill. We want to know what are the conditions under which the minister proposes to dispose of these valuable assets. We are not opposing this Bill, we are supporting the minister on the principle of this Bill, but we want to make it, if possible, of such a character that it will conserve the great natural resources of this country. I would ask the minister to allow that section to stand for further consideration, and give us some idea of the regulations he proposes to make.

Amendment (Mr. Middlebro) negatived: Yeas 17, nays 39.

On section 17: Dominion parks.

Mr. DOHERTY. Are we to understand that the word 'reserves' in the section means the reserves that are specified in the schedule as forest reserves, and are these parks to be taken exclusively out of the forest reserves?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY. I think it might possibly be made clearer because from the wording of the section it looks as if the minister were empowered to make such reserves as he liked into Dominion parks. The section says that he may 'designate' such reserves or areas within reserves as he sees fit.' I do not insist upon it, but it seems a little ambiguous, and it might suggest that he could make any reserves he liked.

Mr. OLIVER. Suppose we insert the word 'forest' before the word 'reserves'?

Mr. DOHERTY. Yes, I think that would make it perfectly clear.

Mr. OLIVER. I move that the word 'forest' be inserted in the second line of section 17 between the words 'within' and 'reserves'.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 18: regulations to be published and laid before parliament,

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is it the intention of the minister that parliament shall have any legislative authority over these regulations when they are laid before parliament?

Mr. OLIVER. It is not the intention as expressed in the section.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. What is the use of laying them before parliament?

Mr. OLIVER. For the information of parliament.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Suppose they are not satisfactory to us, what remedy have we?

Mr. OLIVER. There will be an opportunity to express an opinion with regard to them, and I presume that if the opinion be well founded it would be for the government to try to meet the opinion so expressed and if the majority in parliament should disagree with the regulations it would be for the government to step down and out.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Would not the minister adopt somewhat the same principle as that which he adopted in his Indian Act the other day when he gave the judge of the Exchequer Court power to do certain things, but he must lay his report on the table of the House, and it must receive the assent of this House before it becomes operative? Would it not be fair that these regulations should not become operative until assented to by parliament. Surely, when a minister is going to make regulations under which he has power to dispose of millions and millions of dollars worth of the assets of this country, we should have some say as to the manner in which they should be disposed of. Under the sections that we have passed already he will have absolute authority, and this parliament will have nothing whatever to do with the matter of disposing of these assets. Surely the minister will not prevent parliament from having some say, from giving consent to the manner in which these assets shall be disposed of. It is merely to give the House an erroneous impression to say that these regulations shall be laid before the House, but that we shall have no legislative authority to deal with them. The whole substance of the Act is that this parliament shall have the right to say how these assets shall be disposed of.

Mr. OLIVER. The larger part of the regulations would be of such a character and for such a special purpose that I do not think it would be for the dignity of parliament to require parliament's consideration of or assent to them. If my hon. friend will read sections 16 and 17 he will see that regulations are required for a very large number of what might be considered trivial matters, and I would hardly think that it would be necessary or desirable that these matters should be subject to the approval of parliament. I do not think it would add to the dignity or prestige of parliament that it should be so. With regard to the regulations for the disposal of natural resources, these are the important ones, and I have no doubt these are the ones that my hon. friend had specially in mind. With regard to regulations such as already exist, and which are applied to Dominion lands generally under the control of the Dominion government, these regulations are subject to the approval of parliament, as my hon. friend desires. The application of these regulations to the forest reserve area will only mean certain restrictions or modifications so as to bring them into line with the special purpose for which the reserve is set apart. The basic principle of the alienation of the public right in these resources will already have been approved by parliament as being embodied in the original regulations which are general in their application throughout the country, and therefore it would seem to me unnecessary that the adaptation of these regulations to the park reserves should, in the same degree, be submitted to parliament.

Mr. PERLEY. The minister does not say that the regulations regarding the forest reserves will be the same as those provided under the Dominion Lands Act with regard to other sections of the country. We have a Bill before the House now with regard to orders in council that have already been passed under the Dominion Lands Act. These regulations are all submitted to, and approved by parliament. The minister might put in force a certain regulation under the Dominion Lands Act which might have been approved by parliament, and then he might turn around and put in force an entirely different regulation under the Forests Reserves Act, with which he does not require to come before parliament at all. If he puts it in this Bill that these regulations are to be the same as those under the Dominion Lands Act, which are already approved by parliament, that is one thing, but to take to himself authority to make entirely different regulations without the approval of parliament is something with which we cannot agree.

Mr. OLIVER. It certainly is not the intention to make different regulations. I have already explained that it is the intention to adapt the regulations that are generally applicable to the special conditions which prevail in the parks and reserves. If these regulations have already been approved by parliament it does not seem to me necessary that the adaptation should also require the approval of parliament. It is true, as my hon. friend says, that the Act does not say the regulations shall be the same. The Act cannot say that the regulations shall be the same and yet may be different. I can assure the House there is no intention to exercise the power my hon. friend suggests may be exercised. Our idea is to have the regulations throughout the country, whether in or out of reserves, conform as closely as possible in their general principle, but we have to vary them, for instance, in the case of school lands, which are a trust, and in the case of park reserves.

Mr. PERLEY. I quite appreciate that there must be differences, and the minister personally is naturally bound by his statement that he intends to make the regulations under the Forest Reserves Act similar to those under the Dominion Lands Act, but a succeeding minister would not be bound by that statement as we all understand. In the Dominion Lands Act, 1908, section 77, there is a very wise provision, and I would ask the minister what objection there could be to inserting it in this Bill? That section reads:

> Every regulation made by the Governor in Council, in virtue of the provisions of this Act, and every order made by the Governor in Council authorizing the sale of any land or the granting of any interest therein, shall have force and effect only after it has been published for four consecutive weeks in the 'Canada Gazette,' and all such orders or regulations shall be laid before both Houses of parliament within the first fifteen days of the session next after the date thereof, and such regulations shall remain in force until the day immediately succeeding the day of prorogation of that session of parliament, and no longer, unless during that session they are approved by resolution of both Houses of parliament.

That is a reasonable section, and I would ask the minister what objection he could have to inserting it here?

Mr. OLIVER. I have explained that many of the matters calling for regulations under this Act are not of sufficient importance to deserve the careful scrutiny given to a legislative enactment. The transactions covered by the Dominion Lands Act are of a much more important character than the regulation of the conduct of persons in a park for instance. While my successor might not be bound by what I say, if he should place before the House regulations in regard to parks not conforming in their basic principles to the regulations existing, he would lay himself open to strong criticism by the House.

Mr. PERLEY. Is there any difference between the powers given in this Act in regard to the alienation of public property and the powers given in the Dominion Lands Act, except that under the Forest Reserves Act the fee of the land cannot be sold or alienated?

Mr. OLIVER. That is a stupendous difference, and is one of the great reasons why we do not need to look at one in exactly the same light as the other.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). A license to cut timber or remove ore is as much an alienation as the issue of a patent. The timber is the land, so is the ore.

Mr. OLIVER. I would not like to become involved in a dispute with my hon. friend in regard to law, but in administration under the Lands Act we do not recognize that timber is land. Where a timber license is granted we retain the right of entry on the the land for mineral or other purposes, the licensee has only a right of access to the land for the timber, and for the beneficial use of that timber for his own purposes.

Mr. PERLEY. There are places where the timber is worth many times the value of the land on which it grows, and the real estate consists of the land with the timber on it. If there is $9 worth of timber for every dollar's worth of land, the minister could alienate and dispose of the $9 worth of timber under this Act without submitting it to parliament, whereas he cannot deal with a dollar's worth of the land itself. What objection can there be to his laying before parliament orders in council that may be made under the Forests Reserve Act at the same time that he brings down the regulations made under the Dominion Lands Act?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know that there is any objection to it, but I am arguing in defence of the Bill as drafted, that there is no reasonable necessity for doing so. What my hon. friend said about the alienation of the timber is not the question, the alienation of the timber does not have to be laid before parliament, it is the regulations under which that alienation takes place.

Mr. DOHERTY. If I followed the minister rightly, none of these regulations, either in the respect in which they would be identical with the regulations under the Lands Act nor in the respects in which they may differ from them, would be submitted to parliament for its approval.

Mr. OLIVER. Not as the Bill stands.

Mr. DOHERTY. As pointed out, the alienation of the right to cut timber or to extract minerals may be the alienation of a very much more valuable thing than the fee simple in the land itself, and if it was considered desirable under the Lands Act that we should make regulations to govern the alienation of land, if it was a proper thing that these regulations should only continue to have force after having had the approval of parliament, why is it not just as important to have that requirement with regard to regulations governing the alienation of rights which in a large number of cases are of much more value than the land itself? I admit that there is force in the statement that it might be beneath the dignity of parliament to be dealing with regulations on trivial matters; but that would not prevent a provision being made that would require regulations made under the powers conferred by subsection (b) of section 16 to be subject to the same requirement that is made with regard to the alienation of land under the Lands Act. Apparently every regulation made under the Lands Act requires the approval of parliament. Even if the minister, by a general regulation under this Act, should make the regulations made under the Lands Act applicable, and later on should proceed to alter those regulations under the Lands Act, the alterations would have to be submitted to the approval of parliament; but that would not necessarily apply to the provisions of this new Act. So that you would have a situation in the future where the minister, if he took the regulations under the Lands Act and made them the regulations under this Act, would have to submit them to parliament for approval, whenever he allowed them as regulations under that Act, whereas as regulations under this Act, they would not require the approval of parliament. Is there any reason for that distinction? Whereas you refuse to make a law that will last longer than the next session of parliament of any regulation under the Lands Act, you give the minister absolute carte blanche to make regulations governing every matter coming under this Act, without coming to parliament at all. If parliament is going to dispossess itself of legislative power over these matters, it ought at least to do it in accordance with some consistent system, and upon some basis that will indicate that we are not doing it by pure haphazard. Apart from that mere argument of inconsistency, it does seem that the power to deal with these important rights is such a wide power that it would be only proper, if parliament should have nothing to say before the regulation is made and goes into force, it should at least be given the power to sanction or refuse sanction after it has been done, unless for some reason it is considered desirable that the government should be put in a position where in regard to these matters it shall be absolutely beyond the control of parliament, even though parliament is in session and is in a position to deal effectively with them. I would submit that it would be only a proper recognition of parliament that the regulations should at least, after they have come into force, be submitted to parliament for approval. Moreover, this would put us in the position of being consistent with previous legislation.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no serious objection, from my point of view, to adopting the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Anne. To my mind it is not necessary either to maintain the dignity of parliament or to preserve the public rights in the matter; but there is no objection to it, and I would be quite willing to add to this section such a provision as my hon. friend has suggested. I still think that the Act would be just as well without that provision and the public interest just as well served, but I am quite willing to defer to my hon. friend's view.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I move in amendment:

Every regulation made by the Governor in Council in virtue of the provisions of subsection 'B,' section 16, shall have force and effect only after it has been published for four consecutive weeks in the 'Canada Gazette.'

Then add the terms of the Dominion Lands Act.

Mr. OLIVER. Perhaps it would be just as well to let this section stand, and I shall have a section drafted to be placed before the committee later on.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 19,

19. Any person violating any provision of this Act or any regulation made thereunder shall, in addition to any civil liability thereby incurred, be liable on summary conviction to a penalty of not more than one hundred dollars, and in default of immediate payment of such penalty and of the costs of prosecution such person may be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding six months.

Mr. HERRON. I would like to draw attention to a question regarding the boundary between Southern Alberta and British Columbia. I think it is generally conceded that it is not laid down correctly in the maps. A person convicted within the province of Alberta might be found later to have been in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. OLIVER. The boundary between Alberta and British Columbia is not well defined, and in process of time we shall no doubt get a better definition. Generally speaking, however, the best guide as to what constitutes the boundary is the flow of water. The map is wrong, but on the ground the flow of water would be the best direction to ascertain whether an individual was in British Columbia or Alberta.

On section 21.

Chapters 56 and 60 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, are repealed.

Mr. PERLEY. In the schedule there are two reserves left out, namely, the Donald forest reserve and the Lake Manitoba forest reserve. Why are these left out?

Mr. OLIVER. The reason why the Donald forest reserve was left out was because it has a very considerable quantity of land suitable for settlement, and the timber on it is not of much value; and instead of occupying an elevated wood area, which would be a source of water supply, the reserve is chiefly in the vallev of the Columbia river. In the case of Lake Manitoba forest reserve, the reason it was left out is because it does not occupy any watershed but is low land near the lake and has not much timber. It also has land desired by settlers, and a railway is being constructed close to it.

I desire to add to the schedule a reserve which has been asked for by the corporation of the city of Prince Albert. There is a tract of woodland immediately opposite the city. It is not suitable for settlement, and the city authorities have asked that it be declared a forest reserve, and given the name of the Nesbitt forest reserve in commemoration of the first missionary to establish a mission at Prince Albert. I would therefore, move to add to the schedule the Nesbitt forest reserve.

Motion agreed to.

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FIELDING presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1912, which, on motion, were referred to the Committee of Supply.

CHINA AND JAPAN STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES.

Bill (No. 103) relating to steamship subsidies—Sir Wilfrid Laurier—was read the second time and the House went into committee thereon.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Chairman, when this Bill was before the House some two months ago, I had occasion to state to some extent the character of the line which it proposed to subsidize.. The subsidy is an old one, a subsidy of twenty-years ago, which has been maintained by the joint efforts of the Canadian government and the Imperial government. A contract was made with the Canadian Pacific railway for a subsidy of £45,000, the Canadian government contributing £25,000 and the Imperial government £20,000. The service is altogether a mail service, not at all for carrying goods, though of course carrying goods is of some importance. But the principle object is to provide a direct service, not between Vancouver and the Orient, but from Liverpool across the Atlantic, across the continent, and across the Pacific to Hong Kong and Yokohama. I was asked the last time, when the subject was under discussion, if it was proposed to have cold storage on board these ships. That is not the intention; we do not see that there is much opportunity to have cold storage. I was asked also to state whether the trade had justified the expenditure, and if there had been any improvement in our trade with these oriental countries. I may say at once that it is not so much a question of trade, and if it were only a question of trade, I doubt if we would renew this contract. The object is rather to secure the carriage of the mails from Great Britain to the Orient, and to give Canada the advantage of direct communication. Trade has not grown perceptibly either with China or with Japan. The trade with China last year, 1910, was, imports, $802,198; exports, $1,450,000. The chief items of imports from China are silk, $125,000; rice, $67,992; hides, $124,967; tea, $265,648. The chief items of exports to China are manufactures of cotton, $265,000; manufactures of lead, $123,000; silver, $553,000. Our trade with Japan shows in imports, rice, $266,000; silks, $275,000; tea, $743,000. The exports to Japan were fish, $212,000; iron, $182,000, leather and manufactures of, $72,000. I may say to the committee that since the last discussion we had of this item, we have been notified by the Imperial authorities that it is not their intention to renew the subsidy after the present year. They agree to renew the present subsidy of £15,000, but only for one year, and then we will have to decide ourselves whether we shall continue the subsidy alone, which we intend to do if we can make terms with the Canadian Pacific railway. I will give a communication which we have received on the subject, in the shape of a letter from the general post office in London, to the Colonial Office, dated January 27:

With reference to your letter of the 30th of November last relative to the determination on the 6th of April next of the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the conveyance of mails between Liverpool and Japan and China via Canada, I am directed to acquaint you for the information of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, that in view of the development of steamship services between this country and Canada and the probability of considerably improved facilities for the conveyance of the mails in the near future, the Postmaster General is of opinion that the period of any fresh contract for the service of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company via Vancouver should be limited to about a year. The first of May, 1912, would be a suitable date for its termination. In these circumstances, the Postmaster General suggests that an extension of the existing contract to cover the period in question would be the best arrangement; and if the company would be prepared to accept these terms, he would not press for any material modification of the present conditions.

The Postmaster General understands that the managers of the company are approaching the Canadian government on the subject of the renewal of the contract. As the Secretary of State is aware, the Canadian Post Office has raised the question of sharing with this office the receipts from foreign countries for the conveyance of mails by this service in proportion to the contribution by Canada and the United Kingdom to the subsidy, i.e., 5-9 4-9; and I am to acquaint you that the Lord Commissioners of the Treasury have now agreed to the Postmaster General's view that the claim of the Canadian Post Office should be conceded under the new contract now proposed. The amount which would be so payable to that office under existing circumstances would be about £15,000 a year. Perhaps the Secretary of State will think it well to acquaint the government of the Dominion with this decision.

The Postmaster General proposes to communicate with the Canadian Post Office on several points of detail relating to the proposed extension of the contract.

I have to observe that though the service has not given as much trade as we expected, still, I hope that every member of the House will agree that it would not be advisable to drop it, and that it should be continued, even if we have to maintain it alone, although we have not lost hope that we shall yet prevail upon the British authorities to contribute in the future as they have done in the past.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand from the premier's reading that there is not a definite statement that they will not continue, they simply ask that the arrangement be made for one year, so that if further arrangements are not made, they will be in a position to drop it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes. I had an opportunity of discussing it with the Imperial authorities four years ago when I attended the conference. The present passage from Liverpool to Hong Kong in 25 days does not give a sufficiently rapid service for the requirements of the British people. I think the Peninsular and Oriental service is shorter, but our aim is to have a service via Canada in a shorter period than the Peninsular and Oriental can give us. We are not without hope that we shall be able to accomplish that, especially since we have not renewed our contract yet for the Atlantic service. But we have reason to believe that an offer will be made to us for a much faster service on the Atlantic than we have at the present time.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if it is not a fact that by subsidizing these steamships they will bring eggs from China into the Canadian market to compete with our farmers, and if he thinks it is wise for us to subsidize steamships for that purpose.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think that I would risk the service. I think I would risk the eggs rather. I think that I would keep the service even if we had a few more eggs for ourselves.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will not this interfere with the proposed all-red route?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Quite the reverse. If we had the all-red route it would materially assist us in having a shorter service to the Orient. We would have a service of five days at most on the Atlantic and this would shorten the passage so much from Liverpool to China.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will it not at the same time assist the people of China to bring their products over and compete in our markets?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly. These subsidies are given in the hope of facilitating trade between country and country.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand that it is permanently arranged that on account of the mail service there will come to the Dominion treasury £15,000?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, about £15,000.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be that much to recoup our outlay on account of the subsidy?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that run retrospectively?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems that there is good ground for demanding that payment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think so.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, the corrollary from that is that there has been equally good ground for years past.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Well, yes, but it was not done; better late than never.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

Miscellaneous—To meet expenses in connection with the International Conference for the suspension of pelagic sealing, $10,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We have at the present time a treaty with the United States for the suspension during a term of years of pelagic sealing. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) remembers that in 1894 Sir John Thompson attended a conference between Great Britain and the United States for the regulation of pelagic sealing. The origin of this discussion was that the United States had seized certain of our vessels engaged in sealing operations in the northern sea, pretending that the northern sea was a mare clausum and that the sealers were fishing in American waters. We contested that contention and succeeded. At the same time it was represented to us that pelagic sealing was destroying seal life in this that the females were liable to be killed on their way to the rookeries and that the life of the seals was very much in danger because for every female that is killed two lives are sacrificed. Whatever may be said of this contention, which seemed to me to be founded in fact, we agreed to two things, first, that pelagic sealing, which is sealing on the high seas and which has been engaged in principally by sealers from Victoria, should be restricted to certain seasons. I think it was from February up to a certain time in June, but I forget the months. At all events, there was to be a close season during which our sealers were prohibited from sealing. They were prohibited from using shot guns and were compelled to use only the harpoon. Then, they did not have the right to seal up to the three mile limit around the Pribyloff Islands but they were restricted to a zone of seventy miles from the islands. This has gone on for some years. Now, a new class of sealers has come into existence carrying the Russian and Japanese flags and these Russian and Japanese sealers can seal at all times without observing any close season, they can use all sorts of weapons and they have the whole field to themselves without any restriction.

Mr. FOSTER. Not restricted to any zone?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. They have no zone to observe. They have been destroying seal life and there is a possible danger of the seal disappearing as the buffalo has disappeared. We are to have a conference which is to open on the 11th of this month at Washington between Great Britain, the United States, Russia and Japan and in the meantime we have made an arrangement with the United States by which it is provided that if the operation of killing seals on the Pribyloff Islands is carried on within fifteen years we shall have 20 per cent of the catch. If the Americans killed on their own territory 100,000 seals or 50,000 seals we would have 20 per cent of the catch and other considerations which will be found valuable but which I would not like to disclose at this moment. Mr. Bryce is to be the chief commissioner of Great Britain and we have appointed as our chief commissioner Mr. Joseph Pope who is quite familiar with the whole subject having accompanied Sir John Thompson and Sir Charles Tupper to Paris in 1894. He has already left for Washington and he has taken with him Mr. Found of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Macoun, of the Geological Survey, who was at Paris in 1894 and who knows the subject thoroughly from the point of view of the naturalist. Capt. Byers represents the sealers of Victoria.

To provide expenses of the ministers attending the Imperial Conference and coronation, $6,000.

Mr. FOSTER. How many ministers are expected to go.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Two besides myself, Sir Frederick Borden and Hon. Mr. Brodeur.

Allowance for expenses of Senators and members of the House of Commons forming the parliamentary delegation to the coronation of His Majesty, 18 at $1,000 each, $18,000.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand that members of parliament who are invited to go are merely invited by a committee of members of parliament in England, and that they are to be entertained privately or in some semi-official way by members of the English House of Commons. Had this been brought before the House before the selection of members I certainly should have opposed any limited number of men going in this way. There will be more than 18 members of the House of Commons and Senate of Canada in England, and with all due regard to the gentlemen selected—and I may say a number of the names especially, of my good friend on my left (Mr. Foster), and the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), and the gentleman who represents the west on our side are very good names and the maritime province representative—but I have no hesitation in stating that had this been understood at the time as it is now understood there would have been a different story to be told. I do not think, in the first place, that any number should have been selected, but that every man who goes over there should be on an equal footing, and if he pays his own expenses I think he should be as highly regarded in the old country as here. I am not speaking personally, I am going under other auspices, and possibly it is invidious for me to take this stand, but I am doing so on principle. I do not know what attention will be paid to these gentlemen over there. There are five members from the Conservative side and seven or eight from the government side who are to go over on this delegation. Those not on that delegation will have the privilege of paying for seats and watching the performance from a fence corner while others will be entitled to certain favours. More than that when this matter was discussed, it was distinctly understood on this side of the House that each man would go at his own cost. Now a number of gentlemen are quite disappointed. Had this $1,000 grant been known then I am satisfied a number of gentlemen would have consented to let their names go in for selection, who did not see their way clear to pay their expenses. Were the invitation official from the imperial government to this, for these members to go I would not hesitate. I do not see why the country should pay the expenses of gentlemen who are not invited officially. I do not think the item should be asked for.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As has been stated by my hon. friend the invitation that was sent to us was not official, it was simply an invitation of a committee of members of the House of Commons addressed to us. We would have preferred that they should have made their own selection and sent them their invitation, but the invitation had to come through some channel, and it came through the channel of the Canadian government. When we received the invitation we had to follow strictly the terms in which it was couched, and the request was to invite 18 members of our parliament.

Mr. HUGHES. Could we not have courteously told them that we respectfully regretted having to decline their invitation inasmuch as many more than 18 would be there and the government could not take it on themselves to make any invidious distinction?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think we could do that, they might have invited 18, or 20 or 45, but they invited 18 and I do not think we should have made any observations, we could not say we will not accept that unless you invite all our members. The invitation having been received and being meant to be courteous we accepted it as courteously, and we think that under all the circumstances it is better that the Canadian parliament should provide for their expenses. I do not agree with my hon. friend as I have sometimes the pleasure of agreeing with him.

Mr. HUGHES. At the time word was passed around it was stated there would be no cost to the country, that no members were to be paid.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It was rumoured; certainly it was not officially stated.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). I was asked if I wished to go to the old country on that occasion or not, and I was led to understand I would have to pay my own expenses. I accepted and said I would go at my own expense.

Mr. PERLEY. I find myself in a rather awkward position about this vote, and would like to put it as right as I can. Last fall when it was first rumoured that some of the members of parliament would be asked specially to go to the coronation it was said that some allowance would be made by this parliament towards their expenses, in the same way that Australia and New Zealand were doing. Later in the session it was stated in the corridors that this idea was given up and that no vote would be asked towards the expenses of the members of the House of Commons and the Senate, who might go to the coronation. One day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) sent for me and said that the Prime Minister had called at his office and told him that an invitation had been received from a committee of the House of Commons in England, asking that 18 members of the Canadian parliament should be named to whom this committee in England would simply show courtesy. This was not an official committee of the English parliament, but as I understood it a certain number of the members of the House of Commons who wished to show some attention to the members of parliament from overseas, had decided to ask them in this way, and it was proposed to give them trips into the historical portion of England, and I suppose some dinners and other entertainments. The Prime Minister then, as I understood, told the leader of the opposition that the selection of names had to be made within a day or two. The leader of the opposition asked me to try to find out what members from our side of the House intended to go to the coronation. He said there were no expenses to be paid by parliament, and no allowances to be made, and I took it that he got this understanding from the Prime Minister himself. Therefore, we went to the various members on our side of the House, and asked them if they intended to go to the coronation. I was asked by some members, as were other whips, why we were asking this question. We told them that the arrangement, as we understood it, was that no expenses were to be paid or allowances voted by this parliament, but that this private committee of the House of Commons of England were to have certain names of members given to them who would be more or less official and to whom these courtesies would be shown. After we got the names of those who on our side of the House intended to go to the coronation anyway, the leader of the opposition took the list and chose the ones from each section who had been the longest in the House. That was the way the selection was made. A few days afterwards it was rumoured that the government intended to ask for a grant for an allowance to these gentlemen, and I might say that it placed us all in a very awkward position, because, although the names given in by the leader of the opposition are representative and satisfactory names, at the same time I happen to know of one or two of our older members who would have liked to have gone to the coronation, and might have done so if they had known that there was going to be a grant by parliament for that purpose. They did not feel able to go at their own expense entirely. While I have no desire to make any objection to this vote, I want to say to the Prime Minister that I think the way this matter has been handled has not been a fair deal at all, because if it was the intention of the Prime Minister to ask for a vote from this House for this purpose, it should have been communicated to the leader of the opposition at the time that he asked him to give the names of five members on this side of the House for that purpose. I wish simply to make this explanation in order that I may put myself right in the matter.

Mr. LENNOX. I differ a little from a good many who have spoken. I am pretty well satisfied with this matter. I think it is a matter that we should leave altogether to the responsibility of the government. They propose to pay what would be equivalent to the expenses of these gentlemen if they are not too extravagant, and I think we can leave that to them, to do as they like about it. I was asked if I would like to go, and when I was asked that I took for granted that the expenses would be paid. I said no. I did not want to go; so I am not at all disappointed. I did not want to go when I thought my expenses would be paid. I would not give any different reply if I were asked now. If we were at the beginning of this affair, I am not at all sure that I would be in favour of having the expenses paid; I rather think I would not. I am satisfied with the gentlemen who have been selected, for a very good reason, that I do not know exactly who they are, with the exception of two or three, and I have not gone to the trouble of finding out. But in this parliament I think we could hardly go wrong in making a selection of men who would be well qualified to represent us on this occasion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would be very sorry if my hon. friend from Argenteuil thought that the manner in which this matter had been conducted had not been fair. Certainly nothing was more removed from my intention. I wanted to be absolutely fair to everybody. I cannot recall minutely what passed between the hon. leader of the opposition and myself. I communicated to him the parliamentary communication which had been received by us from the parliament of Great Britain. I have no recollection that at that time the matter of expenses was mentioned at all. Later on it was mentioned, and there were opinions expressed pro and con as to whether the expenses should be paid or not. There were divided opinions on both sides of the House. For my part I took the liberty of consulting a few personal friends both on this side and on the other side of the House, and having got the opinions of several members on which I thought I could rely, I submitted the matter to my colleagues, and here is the result. I think on the whole the action was well taken, and should receive the approval of everybody.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The item under consideration is not a very large item in itself. To my mind, however, it acquires an additional significance by reason of the fact that the beneficiaries are members of this House. The question before us has a double aspect: First of all, the aspect so far most commented on in the debate, namely, the manner in which the recipients of this grant were selected from among ourselves. That to my mind is not a very important feature of the case. It may be that unfairness has been the result of the method adopted. To my mind we should fight that out, if it has occurred, among ourselves, independently altogether of our relationship as members of parliament.

That is to say, it should not be a subject for discussion in the House. The feature, though, in which the country is and should be interested is this: Is it a proper principle to vote the money of the country for this purpose? That to my mind is all that is open for us to discuss here. Now, it seems that the invitation has arisen at the instance of certain citizens of the British Empire who are members of the British parliament. Those men got together, and determined that their hospitality as private individuals should be extended to certain members of the Canadian parliament. It is to be noted that they have no official position in extending that hospitality. They are merely private citizens who happen to be members of parliament. The British government does not come into the matter at all, or ask that this country be officially represented by members of this House. The Prime Minister states that although that is the case, they chose the channel of the Canadian government to carry the invitation to the members of this House, and he assumes that that puts a different aspect on the invitation, gives it a semi-official character, and justifies the government in voting the money of the people to pay the expense. I am at a loss to understand how they could have communicated the invitation in any other way. It was simply a method of communication. It did not change in any way the character of the communication. It did not lift it out of the category of a purely private extension of hospitality, and make it in any way official or semi-official.

That was the method they chose, but the invitation remained all the while just the private invitation of members of the Imperial House. That being the case, it became, to my mind, the duty of members of this House to decide whether or not they should respond, and not the duty of the government. The members of this House did respond. Surely at that point the matter should end. I do not see any justification for voting the people's money to pay the expenses in any degree whatever. It does not matter what the understanding was, the reason of the trip is of a personal and not a public character, and I do not see how this invitation differs from that which many citizens throughout Canada are accepting from their friends across the water. I cannot see the distinction. If a distinction can be pointed out, I am open to change my mind, but until it is, I must oppose the vote. It appears to me utterly indefensible. It is not pleasant to take exception to a vote of this kind. Nobody would take exception to the members who have been selected, and I hope no one will imagine that I had any expectation of going myself. I could not go no matter who paid the expenses, and further it would not be a great object to me in any event. I take more pleasure meeting the common people in my constituency than those by whom perhaps I would be entertained over there. But I would like any member of this House to show me what there is in this invitation, and its acceptance that will justify this vote or place those who accept the invitation in a different position from other Canadians attending the coronation. The representatives of the government are in a different position, because they go as the official representatives of Canada, and it is only right that the Canadian people should pay their expenses, but this item is of an entirely different character, and I can see no defence whatever for the vote.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to say a word with reference to this item. I think I have stood for some 25 or 30 years in this parliament as a fair defender of economy; and in this instance I have no hesitation at all in saying that under all the circumstances I should defend the vote. But I also feel it is my duty at present to move myself entirely from the category of those who will benefit by it, and I shall, therefore, tomorrow morning hand in my resignation as one of those selected by the hon. leader of the opposition. I shall support the vote. Nothing would have made me happier than to have had visited the old country under these circumstances, but I am not able to pay my own way and shall therefore forego that pleasure, and under the circumstances shall remove myself from the list of those who were deputed to attend.

Mr. FIELDING. I trust my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), will reconsider his decision.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING. While I realize that this, like every other expenditure of public money, is a legitimate subject for public discussion, and consequently have no fault to find with the views of hon. gentlemen who oppose it, I do not believe there is a citizen of the Dominion who, on serious reflection, will object to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), receiving this small allowance. He has been in the public life of Canada a long time. He is one of the oldest members of this House, and occupies a distinguished position in it, and I do not hesitate to say that it is right and proper he should go, and the government, as a government, are entirely prepared to assume the responsibility of this vote, to say it is a proper vote, and not hold any hon. gentleman opposite responsible for it at all. I hope, therefore, that my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), will reconsider his judgment and consent to be one of the delegates.

Mr. HUGHES. The great objection, to my mind, in this matter, is this: Here are 18 members selected from this House of Commons, and these gentlemen, when they cross the water, will be the guests of the members of the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England. The invitation is a private one. I do not know what favours will be shown them, but I do protest, and shall continue to protest, against any member from this House or another citizen from this Dominion who crosses over the water, not having the favours shown him that these gentlemen will have. Here is my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Smyth) going across and paying his own expenses. He will stand among the crowd, and he is equally a representative of the people, and what I object to is that any member who goes across and pays his own expenses should not have the same recognition as any other member whose expenses are paid. That is the ground I take. I am not begrudging the money, I have never been a cheese parer, but I do not see why any member of parliament should be entitled to any special favour over there because he happened to be chosen as a delegate on the invitation of a number of gentlemen on the other side, and be given prominence over his brother members here who also attend the coronation and pay their own expenses. I am surprised that such a proposition should be made, knowing it would certainly bring hard feelings into the hearts of men who pay their own expenses and have to take pot luck, while these hon. gentlemen are given the favours. If the right hon. the Prime Minister will see that any favours that may be conferred on these 18 gentlemen will be extended to the others who pay their own expenses and are not costing the country a dollar, I shall make no opposition. With me it is a question of principle, a question of giving fair play to all, and that is the reason why I am opposing, not the vote, but the principle on which it is based.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend is altogether under a misapprehension. The matter which he discusses has nothing to do with the payment or non-payment of the members chosen to represent parliament. Whether they be paid or not, they have been selected by the two sides as those who should accept the invitation from the committee of the Houses of Commons and Lords. With that I have nothing at all to do. I shall be in England as the official representative of the Canadian people, if I may say so, and every member of parliament, invited or not, is the same to me. Anything that I can do to have the favour shown to him to which he is entitled I shall be most happy to do, and I shall not make any distinction between those members and the other 18. It will be my pleasure to see that all are treated alike and on the same footing. But as to these 18 members, that is a different matter. These 18 members were chosen, but they will not be there officially any more than the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Smyth), who says he will go and pay his own expenses. These 18 members will be the guests, not of the whole parliament of Britain, but of a committee of members of the House of Commons. That is altogether a private affair. With regard to the other question, I hope that my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) will follow the advice given by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), and that he will consider himself invited. I think it would be a pity if my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) was not there. Some time ago, speaking publicly, I expressed regret that Mr. Deakin, who was Prime Minister of Australia at the time of the last conference, had not been selected as one of the members to represent Australia. I hope he will be there, as I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Foster will be there.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). At his own expense, while the others are paid.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The eighteen members from Australia have their expenses paid by the Australian government, as the expenses of the eighteen members from Canada are to be paid by the Canadian government. I hope that my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) will be there to represent that portion of the Canadian people whom he represents so ably.

Mr. DOHERTY. I desire, in the first place, to join most earnestly in the observation of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) and the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) so far as they urge upon the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) the desirability of reconsidering the decision he has made. I am sure there was no intention on the part of any hon. gentleman who spoke, whatever opinion he may have expressed, to convey any impression of objection, or that there could be objection, to the hon. member for North Toronto, as one of those who accepted this invitation.

Mr. LAKE. I did not even know who composed the delegation.

Mr. DOHERTY. Nor do I; and I trust that the hon. member for North Toronto will accept the suggestion already made to him by more authoritative voices than my own, and that he will see fit to withdraw the statement he has made with regard to his intention of not accepting the invitation. I have no desire whatever to make any objection to this vote. I would like, however, to offer a suggestion in regard to the terms in which it is set forth. I make the suggestion, in view of the statement of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) with regard to the misunderstanding that seems to have occurred concerning the nature of this invitation, and which misunderstanding may possibly have had something to do with the method of determining who should be the gentlemen to accept the invitation of the committee of members of parliament on the other side. I notice that the vote is provided for the expenses of the 'parliamentary delegation.' I think, under the circumstances, that it is not absolutely correct to speak of these gentlemen as a 'parliamentary delegation.' I understood the First Minister to say a moment ago that these gentlemen will not be there in any more official capacity than any other member of the House who might be in England, and desire to attend the coronation. They are going, as I understand it, as accepting an invitation from certain members of parliament on the other side, not, properly speaking, as an official delegation from this parliament. I do not understand that this parliament, as a parliament, took any official step to delegate them. I would suggest that there might be found a modification of the wording of the vote which would make it clear that there is not sought to make any official distinction between gentlemen who may go, other than that these gentlemen who accept the invitation given. I am not prepared, perhaps to express it exactly as it ought to be expressed, but my idea would be met if, instead of saying we were voting money to pay the expenses of a parliamentary delegation, we should say that we were voting money to pay the expenses of members of the Senate and House of Commons attending the coronation, and accepting the invitation of the committee of members of parliament on the other side. I suggest that simply to make it quite clear what I think everybody understands, that there is no intention to make these gentlemen any more official representatives than any other member of parliament who may attend. I think that is no offence to the gentlemen—if I thought it was, I would not make the suggestion. I suggest this as putting on record exactly the facts and leaving no room for misunderstanding as to the relative positions of the members who have been fixed upon to accept this official invitation, and other hon. members who may attend the coronation.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I have the honour to be one of those nominated on this side of the House on this delegation, and, in case there should be any misapprehension about the matter, I wish to state that, so far as I know there was no information given to the delegates on our side of the House which was not given to the delegates on the other side. I did not know anything about whether there would be money provided to pay expenses or not, and the first news I had of it was when I saw it in print in the estimates brought down yesterday. No pressure came from the delegation on this side, so far as I know, to have the vote put in the estimates. If I understand my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) the objection seems to be that it was not known on the other side that provision would be made to pay the expenses and that if it had been known they would have made a different selection from that which they did make.

Mr. HUGHES. May I correct the hon. member?

Mr. SINCLAIR. That is what it appeared——

Mr. HUGHES. Might I offer a remark? The statement was made to the members when the question was brought up, and each member was told: You will have to pay your own expenses. I think it went further than not being brought up, and that it was brought up in the way I state.

Mr. SINCLAIR. There seems to have been no authority on the part of anybody to make that statement. If there was any misunderstanding it must have grown up among hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. It should not be too late to rectify it. They ought to be able to agree on five gentlemen on that side to attend this delegation, and if there is any difficulty of that kind, I do not see why it could not be rectified yet, or why they could not make some selection that would suit them all. It is unfortunate if any hard feelings with regard to the selection on that side should exist. There are no such feelings on this side. I believe everybody is quite cordial, and I am glad to say that I was congratulated by nearly every friend around me when my name was given as one of those to go. I will vote against the motion when the vote is put.—I presume my hon. friends on the other side are not talking for the sake of talking, and that they intend to do something more than merely object. In that case, I will join my hon. friends and vote against it. I feel delicate about making any motion, for I do not know how it will affect the gentlemen who have accepted this invitation. I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes). If I understand this matter, the invitation comes from members of the imperial parliament, it is not a general invitation from the House of Commons of England, but from individual members, of whom Lord Rosebery is chairman. It would be natural to suppose that everybody who goes from Canada would receive attention. I suppose there will be thousands of people from Canada in London, and it would be impossible that these can all obtain seats in Westminster Abbey to witness the coronation. It would be impossible to grant the same privilege to everybody going from Canada. For my part, I would be inclined to move that the item be struck out.

Mr. MILLER. The hon. member has spoken about hard feeling among the members; I do not think there is any hard feeling upon the part of any one member against any other member on either side of the House. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) has spoken his mind as he had a right to do, honestly and frankly. But I do not think there are many members in this House, or many people in the country, who will agree with him. I do not think that the manner of the invitation from certain members of the House of Commons in England to the members here, and the fact that the representatives from Canada will be entertained by members in England, is a matter that is of any concern to us at all, or that we have a right to discuss. All we have a right to discuss is whether this parliament shall or shall not pay the expenses of eighteen members of this parliament to go to England. I think that had there been no invitation at all from the old country, it would have been proper for parliament to pay the expenses of a limited number of members of the House of Commons to go with the members of the cabinet who represent Canada in England. I do not think that all the ability that is in this House of Commons is contained in the cabinet. It would have been impossible for all the members of this House to go and for their expenses to be paid by the public; no one would have expected it. As a matter of course it did place those who had to make the choice in a delicate position. No doubt many members of the House who were not selected would have filled the positions equally well. But all could not go. The member for Algoma (Mr. Smythe) is one of the newer members of the House, and he and others will perhaps have an opportunity to attend a similar occasion at a later date. One of the reasons why I justify this vote is that some of the older members of the House of Commons are going. I quite agree with all those who have spoken, that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) are certainly two men who ought to be included in any list of those who go; I think we all agree in that. I do not think there will be any bad feeling either in the House or in the country, but that there will be good feeling all round. I think the people generally will be satisfied to see this vote carried.

Mr. PERLEY. I do not wish it to be understood that I object to this vote, I think it is a right and proper vote, but I do not think it has been managed in the right and proper way. I should feel badly if the hon. member for North Toronto, on account of the discussion this evening, did not take his share of this vote.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it possible to do so after the statement that the chief whip has made in the House to-night.

Mr. PERLEY. All I can say is that if the hon. gentleman feels hurt at any words I have uttered, it is because I have not the same power of expression that he has.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. member knew what he was saying.

Mr. PERLEY. I certainly had no intention of hurting the feelings of anybody in this House. I simply wanted to put myself right in regard to this matter. I have no objection whatever to this vote, I think it is right and proper. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) said that we had no reason to think there would not be a vote. For myself I think that when the Prime Minister asked for the names of five members, and did not say anything about a vote, anybody would take it for granted that there would be no vote. That is why I felt justified in saying to the members by whom I was asked that the selection was to be made from those members who intended to go to the coronation any way. I simply rose to put myself right, and to say that a mistake was made by the Prime Minister weeks ago, or months ago, when he failed to say that he intended to bring in a vote for this purpose.

Mr. LAKE. I wish to say that in my opinion the attitude taken by the member for Portage la Prairie is a perfectly correct one, and I entirely agree with what he has said. I think that the official representatives of Canada in this parliament are the members of the government who are going to the conference and the coronation.

Mr. BEST. I was pleased a week ago last Friday when I heard the Prime Minister say that he had changed his mind, and that he was going to the coronation. I believe that the Dominion of Canada has a perfect right to pay his expenses. But it was distinctly understood, at least I so understood, that any other member who went would have to pay his own expenses. I think that any member of parliament who goes to England and has his expenses paid by the people of Canada, is not doing the right thing. If the government offered to pay the expenses of all the members of this House, I think they would all volunteer to go. I did not know who were the members, with the exception of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who were selected to go until he stood up here and said that he was one of them. I was not aware who they were. I do not think this government has any right to pay the expenses of these men.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I regret very much that this discussion has taken a personal turn. Members on this side of the House hold George E. Foster, of North Toronto, in the highest personal regard. There is certainly no one that we would rather see go there to represent the Conservative party and the parliament of Canada than the hon. member for North Toronto. It is not in my mind a question of the personality of the members of parliament who will go. That is not the matter under discussion. It was somewhat unfairly stated by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) a few minutes ago, that the discussion arose from any dissension with regard to the selection of the individuals. I hope he will reconsider those words, because, speaking for myself, I did not know who were chosen on either side. I want to emphasize what the right hon. Prime Minister said that these hon. gentlemen are going entirely in their private capacity, and they are accepting a private invitation. They are not representing Canada in any way, they are simply going to the old country to take part in the coronation, accepting for a certain time an invitation tendered them by gentlemen who have been members of parliament. They are not representing Canada; then, why ask the people of Canada to pay their expenses? It is the principle to which I object most strongly, and if I have an opportunity I will vote against the proposal. If it carries I sincerely hope that my hon. friend from North Toronto will reconsider his determination.

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not know that I can agree in every particular with my hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Campbell), who has just taken his seat. Inasmuch as members have been selected from the respective parties and the Senate to go as the representatives of these two Houses to the old country, I cannot agree altogether with the view that they in no sense will represent Canada. As I understand an invitation has come to this country from the members of the parliament of Great Britain.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, from private members.

Mr. EDWARDS. I am stating it as I understand it, and if I am wrong, somebody can correct me when I get through. As I understand it an invitation has been sent here from the members of the British House of Commons to a number of men to go from these two Houses and be their guests while in the old country. If that is correct, then they would to a certain extent be the representatives of Canada. But whether that is true or not, I do not agree with the principle of making this grant. I have not one word to say against the personnel of the gentlemen selected from the two parties, because I doubt if you could get a better representation of the House of Commons and the Senate, but I do not think that the principle is a right one, and I wish simply to put on record my protest against the vote.

Mr. MADDIN. As I understand the situation, an invitation having come from the Imperial parliament to send 18 representatives from the parliament of Canada, a selection was made in the best judgment of the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition. They go to represent Canada whether they were invited to go or not, which is neither here nor there. They are directed by this parliament to go there for that purpose, they go with the permission of this parliament to represent this country, and if that is so why should their expenses not be borne by this country.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). How does this parliament direct them?

Mr. MADDIN. They are directed by this parliament when we pass this estimate. We directed them when the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition agreed upon the matter, and this being the case I cannot understand why hon. members in this House will permit votes to go through for such matters as the Newmarket canal, and then rise and protest against an expenditure of $18,000 to send a delegation from this parliament to appear at the coronation of our gracious Lord, the King. To say that this is a private invitation is not meeting the situation fairly. His Majesty is not issuing invitations personally. The authority is vested in certain members of the Imperial parliament. It may be as informal as you wish, but when that invitation arrives here, and when our representatives are selected with the best judgment of the leader of the opposition and the leader of the government, I cannot understand why the country should not assume the obligation of paying their expenses just as they pay the expenses of hon. members for serving here throughout the session. No one on this side of the House deplores more than I do the discussion that has taken place here to-night. In my judgment it would have been perhaps a proper subject for a caucus to have discussed, and I am quite certain that hon. members upon reflection will realize that this is not a matter to be dealt with in the manner in which it has been handled to-night. Some of us might like to have gone ourselves. There is nothing to debar any of us from going. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Smyth) deplores that he will be obliged to pay his own expenses.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). I did not deplore that, because I had agreed to do it.

Mr. MADDIN. Then he deplores that he will have to stand behind the line and look through.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). I deplore that I am not put on the same standing as some of my fellow members. I represent Canada just the same as they do.

Mr. MADDIN. Another hon. member wonders, if an invitation were offered, and if $1,000 were contributed to pay their expenses, how many of them would go? The same could be said of members of the bar on the opposite side of the House. If the question were put, how many of them would take a seat on the Supreme Court bench at a salary of $7,000 a year, I do not think there would be one member of the bar sitting on the other side of the House who would not hold up his hand for it. I think that if the House were asked how many members would go if the country offered them $1,000 to pay their expenses, probably every member who could afford the time would go. But that is not the course that has been pursued. When the leaders of both parties have exercised their best judgment in the selection of representatives of this parliament I think it is only fitting that the country should bear their expenses.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). Seeing that hon. members on both sides are taking a fling at myself, I think it due that I should say a word with regard to the matter. When I was approached and asked whether I would go to England it was emphasized very strongly that I would have to pay my own expenses. I said: Yes, I will go and when I was asked: Are you sure to go?—I said: Yes, I will go. I was under no misapprehension at all, I knew that I would have to pay my own expenses, and I was willing to pay my own expenses. I do not see why any one else should have his expenses paid when I was ready and willing to pay my own.

Salaries and expenses of the Paris agency—Further amount required, $5,500.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We have appointed a new agent at Paris. My hon. friend knows that Mr. Fabre, the late agent, was paid by this parliament $6,500 and $2,000 additional which was contributed by the Quebec government. We have not thought it advisable to accept any contribution from the Quebec government, and we have made the salary of Mr. Roy, the new agent, $8,000. Mr. Fabre received no allowance whatever for contingencies; everything came from the sum of $6,500. It is now proposed to provide $5,000 for office rent, and such contingencies as are necessary to carry on the work.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 12.41 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WEDNESDAY, May 10, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LANCTOT, M.P.,

Mr. LANCTOT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I read in the Ottawa 'Free Press,' dated the 8th inst., the following:

It is stated, however, that there will be a revival of the charges against Mr. Adelard Lanctot, M.P. for Richelieu, who was exonerated the week before last. This time the charge is understood to be one of having obtained lumber and shingles from the government.

The same statements and insinuations have, in substance, been published in various newspapers in the province of Quebec, more especially in 'Le Devoir' and 'La Patrie.' With reference to the statements, or insinuations, contained in what I have just read, I wish to say that there is not one word of truth in them, or foundation in fact for them. There has never been, to my knowledge, or so far as I am aware, one five cent's worth of government shingles, timber, or lumber used in my building, or otherwise for my benefit.

BANK ACT AMENDMENTS.

Mr. LEWIS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 297) respecting bank officials, employees and creditors. He said: It is obvious that at this date of the session it will be impossible for any one to put this Bill through the House without the consent of the government. But the purpose I desire to serve in introducing this Bill is to lay before the government and the people, in concrete form, certain remedies for certain grievances which have been found to exist in the Bank and other Acts, to be considered during the adjournment, and the feeling of the people respecting same ascertained. They are not contained in the old Bank Act of 1890, or in the proposed new Bank Act. I have conferred with the counsel who had charge of the criminal prosecutions in the province of Ontario in reference to the Sovereign Bank and the Farmers' Bank, and it is at their request that some of these clauses have been put in this Bill. The first clause is in reference to punishment for any person forcing or coercing a bank manager to give a fraudulent preference. There were two men charged with having aided and conspired, in the Farmers' Bank case, with the manager and other officials, to give a fraudulent preference, who were released because the Act at present does not render the creditors of any bank or any other person liable in such cases. The first clause reads:

Every one is guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years who, being the president, vice-president, director, manager, cashier or other officer of a bank, wilfully gives or concurs in giving any creditor of such bank any fraudulent, undue or unfair preference over other creditors, or who, being a creditor, forces or assists in forcing, coerces or induces any president, vice-president, director, manager, cashier or other officer of a bank to give any creditor of such bank any fraudulent, undue or unfair preference over other creditors.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that it goes further than the new Bank Act. It is a concrete statement. I think that a provision like the following has been asked for by the people of this country. There was a strong feeling in the province of Ontario, and particularly in the city of Toronto, when the president of one of the banks who was charged with an offence like this, was not found guilty simply because it was not proved that he knew the document he signed was untrue.

2. The president, vice-president, director, manager or other officer of a bank who makes or assists in making any false or deceptive statement in any account, return, report or other document respecting the affairs of such bank, is guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, whether or not he knew such account, return, report or other document to be false or deceptive.

3. Any official or director of a bank is guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years who, by himself or through any other person, accepts a loan, discount or other accommodation from the bank of which he is an official or director.

I think it should be provided, as it is in the Independence of Parliament Act, in reference to accounts with the government, that any one who is connected with a bank, or who is an official in a fiduciary capacity, should have no power to accept accommodation from that bank. If he is a private person and desires accommodation, he has a right to go to other banks, so should a bank official. But his hands must be clean.

4. Any director, manager or other official of a bank or other corporation is guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years who, by himself or through others, assists in the creation of what is commonly known as watered stock for the bank or other corporation of which he is such director, manager or other official.

I have conferred with the law officers of the Crown in drawing that clause, and we discussed the question as to whether we should put in a definition of watered stock. I hope that the government will take charge of this Bill, or draft legislation in reference to it, and will then make the necessary definition as to what is watered stock, although we all know what it is.

5. Any director, manager or other official of a bank who makes a loan on the security either wholly or partly of a mine or mining company, or on the stock of such mine or mining company, which has not been listed, is guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

2. In case of a loan on security on listed stock, the value of such stock shall be taken at the listed value up to par.

I think that the clauses I have read are in the interest of the commercial integrity of the business people, and of the plain people of Canada, as well as the banks, and will be welcomed by bank managers. I have added another clause in this embryo Bill, and that is in reference to employees of a bank. Formerly, as was well known to the public, the young bank clerks were supposed to have what is known as an easy situation. They went to work at half past nine, and left their office by half past three or four o'clock. But to-day things have changed absolutely. The banks are making money much faster than formerly, and as, like other corporations, they have no soul, they have contracted miserly habits, and are reaching out after the dollar. To-day there are hundreds and hundreds of young men being worked to death in the banks at $300 or $400 a year, and are doing the work of men who usually draw $1,000 or $1,200; and they are being injured materially, mentally and physically. Almost every day we see in the daily papers that Mr. So-and so, the manager of the bank in the Northwest, or somewhere else—I have a number of such items in my possession—has committed suicide, but his accounts were all correct, &c. What has been the cause of it? What has been the cause of that? Why, overwork and worry, and long hours in close confinement. So much has this been the case that the banks have been unable to procure enough young men in this country, and they have had to go to the old country for them. Not long ago one of the chief banks brought fifty young men from the old country to take the places of our own young men, and I am credibly informed by a bank manager that these young men brought out from the old country receive $600 a year, while our young men get only $200 to $300 to start with, and the young men from the old country are not as capable as our own young men. I do not say anything against these young men, but, not having been brought up in this country, and not being familiar with the ways of the country, they cannot be as capable as our own young men at first. I have drawn a clause to this effect, and I think it will be welcomed by young bank managers and old bank managers too, except probably those in the head offices of the banks:

6. Any manager, agent or directing officer of any bank, or of any agency, of a bank, who causes any clerk or employee under him to work within any office or building longer than eight hours in any one day, such eight hours being divided by one hour, between the hours of noon and two in the afternoon, during which such clerk or employee may go outside of such office or building, is guilty of an offence and liable to a fine of not less than $200.

2. The provisions of subsection 1 of this section do not apply to tellers, nor on the day upon which the monthly return is made up.

While it may be hard enough for the labouring man to work eight or ten hours a day in the free open air, it is very much harder for a clerk in an office where a large number of these young men are assembled together. Go into any office in Toronto or Montreal, and you will find probably 200 young men from 16 to 20 years of age, white faced and anaemic, toiling over their ledgers. I was in the city of Toronto the other day and, passing the banks and similar institutions, I saw these young men, although it was not at the end of the month, grinding away at half past eight in the morning and the same hour in the evening. They have no intermission. Unlike the civil servants with their hour and a half in the middle of the day, these bank clerks are given fifteen minutes to go downstairs and get a cup of tea and a bite to eat. I am merely stating the facts, and I would ask the Minister of Finance, who has the Bank Bill in charge, why such things should be. The banks are granted their powers by this parliament, they are making money, and they should not interfere with the health and physical well-being of any persons in their employ.

Mr. SPROULE. My hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Lewis) has been very industrious in introducing Bills into this House to remedy grievances, and no doubt many of them, if they became law, would be valuable. He has made several very good suggestions in these Bills with the object of providing remedies for certain evils which exist, but he has missed a very important one, and I have been expecting a Bill from him on that subject for some time. I have noticed that for a great many years, under the system as carried out in this country, many bankers put an embargo upon marriage. I think this ought to be made a punishable offence, and that provision should be made for its punishment by an amendment to the Criminal Code. If a deserving young man in a bank desires to get married although he may be in a position, according to his own judgment, to settle down in life, he is not allowed to get married unless he has $1,000. This is a very improper, a very unwise and an almost criminal interference with the personal right and personal liberty of our young men, and it is a great injustice to many deserving young ladies as well. I think that when we amend the Bank Act we ought to take notice of this condition and provide a very severe penalty for any bank manager who interferes with the rights of young men in this way. I was surprised that my hon. friend from West Huron did not include this point in his Bill, because it is an important matter. The only objection I would have to including it in his Bill is that, according to his own statement, he never expects that these Bills will become law. It seems that he merely puts them out as kite fliers, and then buries them in potter's field or else they are still-born and we never hear any more of them. I would like to see an amendment to the Criminal Code in order to provide a remedy for this condition. In my judgment, and I have thought carefully over it many times, it is a great injustice, and it is something that should not be allowed to exist in any country. It is an interference with the personal liberty and personal rights of young men.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. CROCKET:

Who is the census commissioner for the county of York, N.B., and when was the appointment made?

Mr. FISHER. Mr. W. S. Hooper was appointed Census Commissioner for the county of York, N.B., by order in council under date the 31st March, 1911, but he has since resigned, and no one has yet been appointed in his stead.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY — GUARANTEE OF BONDS.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that to-morrow the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Whereas, having regard to the growth of population and the rapid development of the production and trade of that portion of Canada lying west of the Great Lakes, and to the rapidly expanding trade and commerce of the Dominion generally it is in the interest of Canada as a whole that another line of railway designed to assist in the direct and economic interchange of traffic between the eastern and western portions of the Dominion, to open up and develop portions of Canada as yet without railway facilities, to promote the internal and foreign trade of Canada, to develop commerce through Canadian ports, and to afford the government system of railways in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and interchange of through traffic, should be constructed from the Pacific Ocean to the city of Montreal: and whereas the projected line of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company extending from Port Arthur to the city of Montreal will provide the uncompleted portion of the said through line lying east of the Great Lakes.

It is, therefore, resolved that it is expedient to provide as follows:—

1. That His Majesty, on behalf of the Dominion of Canada, hereinafter called the government, may aid and assist the construction and completion by the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company (hereinafter called the company) of a line of railway extending from the city of Montreal in the province of Quebec to the city of Port Arthur in the province of Ontario, including the mileage of the line (lying between the said points) already in part constructed by the company and by the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company, extending from a point in the province of Quebec opposite the town of Hawkesbury to Rideau Junction, west of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario, by guaranteeing the principal and interest of the bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other securities, hereinafter called the guaranteed securities, of the company, to the extent of $35,000 per mile of the said line of railway so aided; interest on the guaranteed securities to be at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum, payable half yearly; the principal to be payable in fifty years hereafter. The government may, subject to the provisions of an Act to be passed for such purpose enter into a contract with the company fixing the terms and conditions upon which the guarantee is given and of the security to be taken therefor.

2. That the guarantee securities shall be secured by deed of trust by way of mortgage or charge to a trustee or trustees approved by the Governor in Council, granting a first mortgage or charge upon a line of railway extending from Montreal to Port Arthur, excepting the portion, above described, between a point on the Canadian Northern Quebec railway opposite Hawkesbury and Rideau Junction, about sixty-two and a half miles in length, and about ten and six-tenths miles of the company's Hutton branch, south of Sellwood Junction, and the right-of-way, station grounds, and other real estate, and interests therein, buildings and other structures and improvements, rolling stock and equipment (subject only to equipment bonds), plant, machinery, tools, supplies, materials, and other personal properties, present and future, acquired and to be acquired for the purposes of the said line, and in connection with the operating, repairing and maintaining thereof, and the tolls, incomes and revenues of the company arising and to arise therefrom, and the rights, privileges, franchises and powers of the company now or hereafter held with respect to and in connection with the said line, and the operation, maintenance and repair thereof, such deed of trust shall also grant a mortgage or charge upon the said ten miles of the company's Hutton branch, and upon the properties of the company thereto appertaining, ranking after the mortgages and charges created by two trust deeds made by the company to the British Empire Trust Company, Limited, and National Trust Company, Limited, dated July 12, 1906, and June 24, 1908, respectively, and after the thirty years 3½ per cent debenture stock issued under such trust deeds, in so far as such debenture stock may from time to time be unexchanged and outstanding, and such deed of trust shall also grant a first mortgage or charge upon the bonds or debenture stock deposited under the next following paragraph.

3. That the company shall deposit with the trustee or trustees of the said deed of trust, bonds or debenture stock issued under the trust deed dated June 28, 1909, made between the company and the British Empire Trust Company, Limited, and National Trust Company, Limited, to an amount equal to $35,000 per mile of the said line between a point on the Canadian Northern Quebec railway opposite Hawkesbury and Rideau Junction, and to $35,000 per mile of the said ten and six-tenths miles of the Hutton branch (being approximately $2,558,500 of such bonds or debenture stock); and the bonds or debenture stock so deposited shall form part of the mortgaged premises under the deed of trust, securing the guaranteed securities; and there may be included in the last mentioned deed of trust provisions respecting the interest on the bonds or debenture stock so deposited, and respecting the return to the Company (upon and after the discharge of the said trust deeds dated July 12, 1906, and June 24, 1908), of the bonds or debenture stock deposited in respect of the said ten and six-tenths miles of the Hutton branch freed and discharged from the mortgage or charge under the trust deed securing the said guaranteed securities.

4. That in the said deed of trust there shall also be included a general charge, ranking after and subject to the mortgage or general charge created by the said trust deed dated June 28, 1909, (and subject to the powers of further issue therein reserved or contained) upon the line of railway of the company extending from the town of Hawkesbury to a point on the Niagara river, and upon the properties of the company thereunto appertaining.

5. That the kind of securities to be guaranteed hereunder, and the forms thereof, and the form and terms of the deed of trust securing them, and the times and manner of the issue of the guaranteed securities, and the disposition of the moneys to be raised thereon by sale, pledge, or otherwise, pending the expenditure of such moneys for the purposes of the line of railway so aided, and the forms and manner of guarantee or guarantees shall be such as the Governor in Council approves, and such terms, provisions and conditions may be included in said deed of trust as the Governor in Council deems expedient or necessary.

6. That upon the said guarantee or guarantees being signed by the Minister of Finance or other designated officer, the government shall become liable as guarantor for the payment of the principal and interest of the securities so guaranteed according to the tenor thereof, and such payments shall form a charge upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund; and the said guarantee or guarantees so signed shall be conclusive evidence that the requirements of the Act respecting the guaranteed securities and the deed of trust and all matters relating thereto have been complied with.

7. That the line hereby aided shall be constructed and completed according to the following specifications:—Bridges over rivers and large streams are to be of concrete and steel construction and to be built to the classification of the Heavy Standard Specification of the Department of Railways and Canals, dated 1908. Bridges of pile or frame trestle may be constructed over small streams which can be taken care of by culverts, such culverts to be constructed within a reasonable time after the line is put in operation, of which time the Governor in Council shall be the sole judge. The line of railway shall be laid with steel rails, not less than 80 lbs. to the lineal yard—with standard fastenings. The maximum curvature shall not be of less radius than 716 feet, and the grades against eastbound traffic shall not exceed five-tenths of one per cent, or 26·40 feet per mile, or six-tenths of one per cent, or 31·68 feet per mile, against the westbound traffic, provided that under exceptional conditions, with the consent of the Governor in Council, less radius of curvature and heavier grades may be allowed, on the recommendation of the Minister of Railways and Canals and approved by the chief engineer, but in no case shall the curvature exceed 573 feet radius or gradients of 52·80 feet to the mile.

8. That the decision of the Governor in Council as to the length of the above mentioned lines shall be final.

9. That subject as herein provided, any moneys paid by the government under any guarantee given in pursuance of any Act founded upon these resolutions shall be held to be paid of discharge of the liability of the government and not in discharge of the liability of the company under the guaranteed securities or under the Deed of Trust securing them, and the moneys so paid shall be held to be still secured by the guaranteed securities and Deed of Trust, and the government shall be subrogated in and to all the rights of the holders of the guaranteed securities, the interest upon or the principal of which has been paid by the government, and the government shall, with respect to all moneys so paid, be in all respects in the position of security holders with respect to whose securities default has been made in payment to the extent of the moneys paid by the government.

10. The government may, at the request of the company, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, pay all or any portion of the first four half-yearly payments of interest on the guaranteed securities falling due after the opening for traffic of the whole of the line so aided, but in such case the government shall not enforce the repayment thereof against the company under the said Trust Deed, or against the Canadian Northern Railway Company under its guarantee as provided for in paragraph 12 hereof until the maturity of the principal of the guaranteed securities pursuant to the terms thereof. The company shall, however, pending the repayment of the interest so paid by the government, pay to the government half-yearly interest on such interest at the rate of three and one-half per cent per annum; and such interest, upon interest, until so paid, shall form a charge upon the mortgaged premises under the said Trust Deed.

11. That the books of the company shall at all times be open to inspection for and on behalf of the government by any person named in that behalf by the Governor in Council, or by the Minister of Finance.

12. That the Canadian Northern Railway Company shall, by covenants included in the Deed of Trust, referred to in paragraph 2 hereof, or in some other instrument agreed to between the Governor in Council or the Minister of Finance and the Canadian Northern Railway Company, in such form as the Governor in Council approves, guarantee to the government the due payment, by the company of the principal and interest of all securities issued and guaranteed by the government, under the provisions hereof, according to the tenor and effect of such guaranteed securities respectively, and in accordance with the terms and provisions hereof; and shall also guarantee to the government the due payment by the company of the deferred interest, and of the interest upon interest, if any, which may be payable by the company under paragraph 10 hereof; and shall further guarantee to the government the due payment by the company of all loss or costs which the government may sustain or be put to in enforcing, after default, the provisions of the said Deed of Trust against the line of railway and premises thereby mortgaged and charged.

13. That it is hereby declared that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government for the express purpose of encouraging the transportation of goods through Canadian channels. Before such aid is granted the Governor in Council shall require the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company to enter into an agreement undertaking that all freight originating on the line of the Canadian Northern Railway Company or its branches, or on the line of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined to points in Canada, be carried over the Canadian Northern railway, or the Canadian Northern Ontario railway, or the connections of either, or over any railway within Canadian territory; and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports; and that the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company shall not in any matter within their powers directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use their utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which public aid is granted, namely, the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

14. That the company shall enter into an agreement with the government to secure or establish or cause to be secured or established, suitable terminals for the company within the city of Montreal and agreeing on the request of the government to enter into arrangements with the Intercolonial railway for the interchange of traffic between the company and the Intercolonial railway at Montreal, for such period as the Governor in Council may determine and upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the parties, and should the parties fail to agree, terms shall be fixed by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

He said: I may add that His Excellency the Governor General has been apprised of the subject matter of this resolution, has given his assent thereto, and commends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ADJOURNMENT FOR CORONATION.

On the orders of the day being called:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I would crave the indulgence of the House for a few minutes to discuss what should be the course of the House and its business in consequence of the fact that I, as Prime Minister, have to absent myself from the country in order to attend the Imperial Conference which is to be opened in London on the 23rd of this month, and afterwards, the coronation ceremonies.

Some days ago, my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden), alluded to this fact, and to certain rumours which had been circulated in the press, and he suggested that one of three courses might be followed. The first was that the House might continue to sit in my absence, which he said, was more for the convenience of the Prime Minister and his colleagues than for the members of the House generally; the second was that the House might be prorogued, and the third was that the House might adjourn, sufficient supplies being previously voted to carry on the business of the country in the interim. As to prorogation, I think the House will agree that, to say the least, it would be inconvenient without parliament having carried through any important part of its business. As to the first suggestion, that the House might sit in the absence of the Prime Minister, there are I think three precedents to my personal knowledge. There is the precedent in 1894, when Sir John Thompson attended the negotiations in Paris between the United States and Great Britain on the question of pelagic sealing. Then, the first year this government was in office, in 1897, I absented myself from the House to attend the jubilee of her late Majesty, Queen Victoria; and in the third case, in 1907, I left the House in session to attend the Imperial Conference of that year. In these instances, the business of the House was practically at an end; no contentious matter was left over, and practically the end of the session was at hand. In the present instance I must say that I felt somewhat loath to leave such a heavy burden upon my colleagues in my absence, because practically very little of the work of the session has been done, and very much remains to do. There are some important matters as to which there is contention between the two parties; there are other important matters on which the parties can agree with more readiness. My colleagues kindly undertook to relieve me of the burden of attendance, each one of them expressing his willingness to do my share of the work, and after full consideration I saw no objection to my being absent, leaving the House to go on with the business. But while it would be well to carry on the business of the House to a conclusion, if it could be done, there was another feature which was lacking altogether in the three precedents I have cited, and that is, this being coronation year, there is, I believe, a unanimous opinion in the House that there should be an adjournment so that the Canadian parliament may be represented at the coronation. Action has been taken in that respect already, but apart from that representation, many other members of the House are anxious to attend such an historic event. We will, I believe, be meeting the views of all the members of the House if we resolve that parliament shall adjourn a sufficient length of time to permit its representation at the coronation. The question, therefore, arises as to what the adjournment should be so as to give members of the House opportunity to leave in time to see the festivities, and to come back. I have thought, after conference with some friends on both sides of the House, that we should sit until the end of May and adjourn in the first days of June, but it has been represented to me that in the last days of May there are two holidays on which the House does not generally sit, namely, the 24th of May, Victoria Day, and the 25th of May, Ascension Day. It will, therefore, be inconvenient to have members come here on the first of the week and be idle during the two holidays, and on the whole, after conference with my friend's opposite, we thought it well that the House should adjourn not later than the 23rd of May. Then, on considering when we should resume our sittings, I came to the conclusion that it would be practically impossible to meet before the 18th of July. I, therefore, give notice to the House that that is the programme we intend to carry out, namely to adjourn about the 23rd of May, to resume about the 18th of July. In the meantime, until the 23rd of May, the House will continue in session advancing the business as far as possible, and, I believe there may be a good deal of practical and useful work done in the meantime. Then, there remains the question of supplies to be voted. We have had supplies voted to the first of June, and after consultation with friends on both sides of the House, we think that supplies ought to be advanced until the first of September. There are, however, some items of supply which must be voted in full, independent of such agreements. There is the vote for the military and Northwest Mounted Police contingents, which are to attend the coronation, and with respect to them a partial vote would not be sufficient. There is also in this category the vote for the Festival of Empire, which although a private enterprise, has been contributed to by all the daughter nations, and our contribution, therefore, must be paid immediately. Then, the Minister of the Interior has some Indian annuities, which have to be paid to the Indians regularly and expeditions to pay them have to be started in advance. Such expenses must be voted in their entirety.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). They are treaty obligations, I suppose.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. They are treaty obligations. There may be some other items which it will be necessary to vote in full, and at once, but there are others as to which it will not be inconvenient to vote in instalments. These are the views which I have to submit to the House for the carrying on of business consequent upon the present conditions.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Prime Minister has already mentioned to me, privately, many of the matters he has spoken of. As to the date of adjournment, I have already told him, as I tell him now, that in view of what I have already said across the floor, I consider it a matter which should be left pretty much to his own judgment. I am, therefore, perfectly willing to concur in the dates he has mentioned. It may perhaps be suggested that it would be hardly worth while to come back over Saturday and Sunday, and meet for two days of the following week, namely, the 22nd or 23rd, but I merely throw out that suggestion, and I leave it entirely to his own judgment. As to the date on which the House should resume, I am willing that the Prime Minister should have his views carried out in that respect as well. With respect to the Supply that is required for the military and Northwest Mounted Police coronation contingent, the Festival of Empire, and the Indian annuities, which, as I understand, are treaty obligations, there will be no objection whatever to voting them in full. It is perfectly proper and right that they should be voted in full under the circumstances. In conclusion I can only say that I am very happy indeed that the Prime Minister will be able to attend, both the Imperial Conference and the coronation.

Mr. GOODEVE. I have no desire to offer any criticism to the suggested programme outlined by the First Minister. I would like to emphasize the suggestion offered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) that as the 23rd of May will be a Tuesday, by adjourning on the previous Friday, the 19th of May, there would not be a great deal of time lost, none that could not be made up by sitting a little later at night. A large portion of the time of the western members will be taken up in going to and coming from our several homes, six days each way, and to some extent the same thing applies to the eastern members. We have already had two adjournments in this long session, at Christmas and Easter, and with this third adjournment each western member will have lost 36 days in travelling during these recesses.

The date fixed for the reassembling of parliament is in the middle of the very hottest season in Ottawa. We have had a strenuous session owing to illness during the hard and unusual winter, and I know that our western members rather enjoy our own mild climate and consider it quite a hardship to have to come back here in the intense heat. For that reason I would again suggest that instead of Tuesday, July 18, the Prime Minister should make the date two weeks later, Tuesday, August 1.

Mr. HUGHES. As I may not be present when the items to which the Prime Minister has referred are under discussion I take this opportunity of saying that I have recently been through portions of the Northwest territories, and if ever men earned a trip to the coronation, the Mounted police during the past winter have earned it. From scores of sources I learned that every new homesteader in the Canadian Northwest, so far as could possibly be ascertained, and they were well looked up, was visited once or twice every month during the stern winter endured in the Northwest and they were asked if they were in want of food or fuel. I take this opportunity of mentioning to the First Minister that this was very highly appreciated all through the Northwest.

Mr. RHODES. Coming from the extreme east, I would endorse the remarks made by my hon. friend from Kootenay, who speaks for the extreme west. A large number of the members of the House live comparatively near Ottawa and can return home almost any time by a few hours' rail journey and one day is the same to them as another; but to those who live more than a thousand miles away every day counts, and if the House would adjourn on Friday, May 19, many of us could spend Sunday at home and gain practically 5 days with a loss of only 2 to the service of the House. As has been suggested we could sit later on the last two days to make up for the time. With respect to coming back on the 1st of August instead of the 18th of July, if the government could see its way clear to meet that suggestion, I am sure it would be approved of by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, who have to come extreme distances.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Coming from a point close to Ottawa I certainly have no reason to complain at the House sitting until May 23 and resuming on July 18, but I think there is another reason why we should try if possible to adjourn on Friday, and that is the 24th of May is a public holiday. There is not a constituency I believe in Canada in which there will not be a celebration of some kind on that day, and I think every member would like to be present if possible at these celebrations. Personally I am willing to do everything to hurry the work through so as to adjourn on Friday. As to resuming on July 18, the Prime Minister will agree that July is generally the holiday month of the year. Every person endeavours to go for a holiday in that month, and the very fact of having to come back on the 18th of July will interfere not only with the members but with their families. We could also perhaps help to rush the work through after we came back on the 1st of August if we adjourned until that date. So far as I am concerned I really think that if the right hon. the Prime Minister can possibly see his way clear to adjourn until the 1st of August it would be much better. It would certainly be of great assistance to members by enabling them to give their families the usual benefit of the summer vacations. I hope the Prime Minister will see his way to an adjournment to the 1st of August.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). In case an endorsement from this side should add force to the suggestion from my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I should like to add my very frank approval of it. There is no need for me to add anything to what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite on the point. It is apparent that those of us who come from very great distances in the west have great advantage to gain by getting away from here on Friday night instead of having to remain until the following Tuesday. There is very much force also in what my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid) has said as to the desirability of our being at home for the various functions to be held to celebrate one of the most important holidays not only in this country but in the empire.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is convinced as to the desirability of an earlier adjournment in May; but looking at him intently, I cannot come to the conclusion that he is convinced of the desirability of our reassembling later than July 18. But there is one argument which I would like to adduce what might have some weight with him. The Prime Minister has on previous occasions been over on functions something similar to the one now facing him. He knows the difficulties, the troubles, the menaces, gastronomic and otherwise, which he will have to face; and though his robust constitution may enable him to live through it all and resume work on the 18th of July with his usual vigour, his less robust colleagues, who are to accompany him, will probably not find themselves in as good condition in a sanitary sense. I submit therefore as an unanswerable argument, that, after these functions on the other side are through, he should provide them with a fortnight's rest at some good cure where they can renew their vigour, and so be ready for work.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I am sure that I speak the sentiments of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) when I say that those of us who live among the Thousand Islands do not want to be dragged away from them on the 18th of July. I am satisfied further that the Minister of Railways requires some rest as he has been under the weather lately. For myself if the Prime Minister wants to bring us back in the dog days I can stand it, but I would much prefer that we should meet on the 1st of August.

Mr. SPROULE. There is just one other argument that might be advanced. I noticed a cartoon in one of the papers the other day which depicted the Prime Minister as being troubled concerning the nurse he was leaving in charge of an infant called reciprocity, which was bawling with mouth open from ear to ear. The only way to keep it asleep during his absence from parliament was for the nurse to dose it with chloroform and paregoric; but if the House adjourned on the Friday instead of the Monday following, there would be three days less time during which that infant would be required to be kept asleep.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think the infant is vigorous and kicking, and in no need of paregoric. I have listened carefully to everything that has been said. I am only the servant of the House, and want to consult the views of the House as much as possible. We are here, however, to do certain work, and that work must be done. My hon. friend from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) suggests that we should adjourn on the Friday preceding the 23rd of May. I shall not be here at that time, and if any modifications are to be made to the programme I have suggested, there is nothing to prevent their being made if the House will sit late and begin business early. Perhaps it would be well that we should begin morning sittings immediately, say next Monday, and in that way get through the work quicker. But there is certain work to be done as to which we cannot agree. For instance, if we were to discuss reciprocity at present, my hon. friends opposite would not be disposed to facilitate the business of the House. There is, however, other business as to which we can agree, and which can be disposed of. If it be found that the legislation on the programme is advanced sufficiently, the House might agree to advance the adjournment from the 23rd to the 19th. With regard to the other suggestion, that we should not meet again until the 1st of August, that is a matter largely in the hands of the House. If the House will agree to vote sufficient Supply to carry us on a decent time, we might meet later, but if we have Supply voted only to the 1st of September, we shall have to resume business on the 18th of July.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT—AMENDMENT.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act and the Acts in amendment thereof, and to provide as follows:

1. As section 39, subsection 2. That a person who has served over three years as a clerk in the outside service of the Customs may be appointed to the rank of senior clerk, subject to such examination on the duties of office and other qualifications as is prescribed by the deputy head in a report to be concurred in by the head of the department. The salary of such senior clerk shall be from $1,200 to $1,600 per annum.

2. That the part of Schedule 'B' of the Civil Service Act which relates to Customs be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). $1,200 is now the maximum of those clerks who come under the 1st resolution. There are many in the service who have been there many years, and have attained to their maximum, and to whom we cannot grant any increased salary. Considering their position and responsibilities, it is thought desirable that those who have been in the service some time, and have proved themselves qualified under examination, might be promoted to a new class, to be called the rank of senior clerk, with a maximum of $1,600.

Mr. SPROULE. The trouble is that this includes those who had been employed in this capacity for only three years. It seems to me this might result in bringing into the service men of limited experience and equally limited knowledge. It might be used as a scheme to transfer men from one position in the service to another, giving them a much larger salary than their qualifications would entitle them to. I could understand this applying to men who have been for a considerable length of time in the outside service, but three years is only a limited time.

Mr. PATERSON. Many of these have been in the service for far longer than three years. This will apply to those who, besides having had the length of service provided for, have the necessary qualification, to be ascertained by an examination. Without this amendment we could not advance these clerks though some of them have been for years at $1,200.

Mr. SPROULE. But the limit should be made greater than three years.

Mr. PATERSON. I would rather the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) would not take exception to that. For it might exclude some who should not be excluded, and three years is a fair test.

Mr. BLAIN. What will be the system of examination?

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) will see that it is to be an examination on the duties of office, and that there are to be other qualifications as prescribed by the deputy head in a report to be concurred in by the head of the department.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the deputy head be the exclusive examiner?

Mr. PATERSON. He would set the papers. I think it is his intention that the papers be examined by the commission. But it will be an examination peculiar to the position.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the minister give us an idea of the number in the outside service who might take advantage of this, and who have been there only three years, together with the salaries they are receiving at the present time?

Mr. PATERSON. I could give it with reference to the salaries. They are at the maximum, and that is the reason for introducing this clause.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the maximum?

Mr. PATERSON. It is $1,200. But I could not give the exact number of clerks who would come under this provision. It would apply pretty generally to those who have been there for the length of time stated. They would not get the whole advance at once; $1,600 would be the maximum, and they would reach it by degrees. Many, especialy in Montreal and Toronto, have remained at $1,200 for some years, and we could not do anything for them though we felt they deserved higher remuneration.

Mr. SPROULE. I recognize the justice of doing something for these men, and am not raising the slightest objection to this provision as it applies to them. But, if the service has been loaded up with a number of young men who were started at a much higher figure than their predecessors in the service, and who have obtained the $1,200 in a short time, and if this provision gives them a raise at once without their having had more experience—and probably with no more than common qualifications—it seems to me there is danger that either you are doing less than justice to your older employees, or more than justice to the new ones. If it would apply only to a few it would not be so bad; but if it applies to many, it might be an abuse which we should not favour. That is why I asked the minister as to the number who could take advantage of this arrangement.

Mr. PATERSON. Of course, some of those to whom this would apply have not been so long in the service as others have been. But look at it in this way. Would the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) consider that $1,200 was as much as a man engaged in clerical work is entitled to after years of service and experience? If their services are worth more than $1,200, no abuse could arise even if, after examination, they were given by degrees advances to $1,600. Would the hon. gentleman think that $1,200 is all that a clerk is worth, especially in large places where the work requires quickness, correctness and other important qualities?

Mr. BLAIN. How many years would it take for an officer having $1,200 to reach the maximum of $1,600?

Mr. PATERSON. The rule that applies to the inside service of increases of $50 or $100 according to classification does not apply to the outside service. It is left to the department to recommend by order in council the advances to these officers. Their fitness is ascertained by reports of collectors and inspectors, and by the work of the clerks as it comes before the department. I am asking this year two or three hundred thousand extra, but when this is divided among 2,000 of all ranks from the Atlantic to the Pacific it means that we are able to give only about $50, or, in some cases $100, and to some of the higher officers may be $200. You will observe that in this new classification we are raising the maximum of the examining and preventive officers whose duties are not chiefly clerical. The deputy thinks that men doing the work they do should reach a larger maximum, and that a thousand dollars should be the maximum. If there were any very deserving officers capable of going higher, we would ask them to pass an examination, in which they might pass out of that class into the class of clerks where they might go to $1,200.

Mr. LALOR. Does this affect the ordinary collector of customs, or the examiners of ports of entries such as Fort Erie?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, it would affect them all. The collectors used to run from $300 to $4,000, a very wide range; now they will go from $300 to $4,500. A year or two ago an Act was passed by which we were permitted to raise the maximum of collectors to $4,500, to meet the case of two or three collectors at the largest ports, such as Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. The collector at Fort Erie gets, I think, about $1,800. We might find it necessary to give him a little increase. In the hon. gentleman's town the revenue has increased, and I said to the deputy that I thought we were hardly compensating the collector there for his work. Cases of that kind have been taken into consideration. We are asking for $300,000 or $400,000 more, but when it is scattered over so large a number we cannot give a large increase.

Mr. LALOR. I appreciate very much the remarks of the Minister of Customs with regard to the increase in the salary of the collector in my own town—I was going to mention him particularly. He is an old and efficient officer, and the collections at that port have increased to such an enormous extent that his salary is not at all in proportion to the revenue. I hope the minister will take his case into consideration. He is a careful officer, and has not been properly paid at all. I think his salary now is about $850 a year. He has to keep a family, and when we consider the increased cost of living, that salary is not nearly enough. Fort Erie is not in my constituency, but I want to say the same with reference to the subordinates at Fort Erie, some of whom I understand, are getting a salary of $700 a year. On this salary they are expected to keep up a family. and to maintain a certain respectability. As a member of this House, I would be glad to see such officers as I speak of receive an increase in salary. They are just as deserving, and in many cases more so, than the higher officers and collectors of ports. I would like to see the minister take into consideration such officers as I have mentioned, in view of the increased cost of living. Their salary has not been increased in the same proportion as the salaries of officers in almost every other capacity.

Mr. FOSTER. I would have been much better pleased if the minister had come to a decision to place these outside men under the Civil Service Act, and under stable conditions. The minister has left himself a three years' limit. Now for four or five years, if I understand his procedure aright, he has been appointing men at better salaries than usual; properly so, because the cost of living has increased, and he has recognized the necessity, in order to get good men, of giving them at least something to live upon, and probably also he has felt the reasonableness of it. But we have in the outside service, as the minister knows well, a large number of old servants, who were appointed a great many years ago, who have not had increases, but who have to maintain their families, and carry on the expenses of a home. Now, it is harder on such a man than it would be on a young man. A young man is more hopeful, and his resiliency is greater, he is better able to come back again after feeling depressed. But an old servant who has reached a more advanced period of life, who is still at a small salary, with no hope of promotion—that is the class of men to whom I want to call the minister's attention particularly. Whilst I would rather see the three year limit maintained, because I think that enables the minister to make those provisions for all the younger men who were lately appointed at large salaries, we must remember that the minister is a party man, and is at the call of the party to a large extent, and he is bound to listen to patronage claims. I think he has human nature enough in him to listen to them. But there will be great injustice done if, when parliament grants these possible increases, the minister does not set himself to work to ameliorate the condition of these old servants at small salaries. I want to make a plea to the minister for that class of men. If I talked for an hour I could not make the plea any stronger than I am making it.

Mr. PATERSON. Even under this three year limit, before they can get into this other class, in all the branches of the service that the hon. gentleman alluded to we have the power now either to grant an increase or not, according to circumstances. Length of service is one of the circumstances that should not be overlooked, and efficiency is another, and a good deal depends upon corresponding salaries in other ports. Collectors examine closely what changes are made, and what is paid collectors working beside them at other ports. Consequently we have to establish a kind of rough rule, which, however, cannot be a rule, because one collector might have just as much work to do, though his revenue might not show so large as that of another. Perhaps there may be a large amount of shipping, and much work in entering and clearing vessels at a certain port. But we are trying to advance them all. As I said before, parliament has been very kind to us. I think in the last three or four years parliament has given us over half a million dollars, some of which has gone to establish new ports, but most of it has gone in salaries. When you consider that we have to provide for a numerous staff from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we have to ask for large sums, which sometimes have appeared to me a little startling. But the House recognizes the fact that the salaries ought to be higher than they were a few years ago, and I think I can say honestly that I have done something in that direction. I suppose I have the feelings that actuate others and that reasons may be shown, perhaps, other than those of sufficiency, or efficiency, or duties, but I do try, as far as I can, and I think my officers try as far as they can, in the distribution of these moneys, to act fairly. I think I can honestly say that the fact as to what the political complexion of an officer may have been in days gone by does not count against him, and it ought not to.

Mr. FOSTER. No, it should not.

Mr. PATERSON. If a vacancy occurs and a suitable persons to fill it is recommended to me, if that person happened to be of the Liberal faith, he would not be rejected therefor. I am speaking with reference to new appointments. But men who have been in the service, no matter when they came in or what they may have been before, if they are doing their duty faithfully and well and it is possible to give a general increase, there will be full consideration given to their cases on their merits. That is the way we try to do. Of course, we cannot satisfy everybody. Some officers think that they are worth more, perhaps, than my chief officers or inspectors report, and we are not able to satisfy them. But, I think, as a rule, the service is pretty well satisfied that they have been fairly dealt with. Their only complaint would be that those in the service are not paid as they should be, and really, if you take the whole customs service and divide it up, putting the low and high salaries together, you will find that the average salary is considerably under a thousand dollars. I think it is only about $800, and that will not be considered extravagant payment for them.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the outside service?

Mr. PATERSON. That is the outside service.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to ask the minister if there is any general increase to be granted to the clerks and landing waiters? These are officers who are receiving what I would consider to be small pay—about $700 or $800 a year. Are they to get an increase in their pay this year?

Mr. PATERSON. My deputy has a memorandum prepared of some hundreds of increases taking the Dominion altogether. I have not that under my hand at the present time, and I do not know that it would be advisable to read it publicly in the House.

Mr. RUSSELL. You do not know the amount of increase that each will receive?

Mr. PATERSON. No, but if the salaries of these officers are $800 or thereabouts, I do not know whether there would be much of an increase to them. It may seem that this is small enough to pay men, but the highest they can go up to in the service is $1,000. There are a great many who are receiving $700 and $800. If they were getting an increase it would probably be about $50. An increase can only be given as the money is appropriated; there is no automatic increase as in the inside service. A great many men have been in the service for years and years, and perhaps, until within the last two years, have not received any increase at all. I have in my mind one efficient officer who is now holding a high position, but who was for eighteen years precisely at the same salary of $1,000. He is receiving a higher salary now. But the increases are not rapid. I sometimes wonder at the pressure there is from capable men to enter the Civil Service, and young men at that, because it does seem to me that there are far better opportunities for men with their abilities in other walks of life than in the Civil Service. There are so few prizes in the Civil Service. It has this advantage, that it is permanent, it is a respectable position, the hours are not very long, and that has its attraction for certain people, but to the energetic young man my personal advice would be to try and see if he cannot do better somewhere else. One of the great difficulties in advancing the salaries of these officers is that if a vacancy takes place in one of the offices drawing a salary of $700 or $800 you will get over a dozen applicants for it all eager to get the position. You know that in your own business, things are kind of regulated by the law of supply and demand, and in a public office, as a trustee of the people, you have to be guided somewhat by the same principle. It is the very multiplicity of the applications to get into the public service that makes it difficult. When they get in it is not an unusual thing for them to ask for an advance.

Mr. HENDERSON. About the first thing, is it not?

Mr. PATERSON. I will not say that in every case, but it is so.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before this carries I would like to observe that I appreciate very much some of the considerations that the minister has brought forward, but I would like to say to him that there has been a good deal of complaint, and I might almost add scandal, in connection with the treatment of some of the men in the Halifax custom office. These men, who are men of very great capacity and of very long service, have been overlooked. According to statements in the press, for which I do not vouch, but which the minister can put right if they are not correct, these men have been overlooked for a great many years, while men who have entered the service within the past ten or twelve years have received salaries that are much more adequate in relation to the amount of work done than the salaries of the men to whom I allude. I can give the minister some illustrations of this, as I have them here right under my hand. I can give him the case of men who entered the service within seven or eight years, and who have salaries as high as men who have been thirty years in the service, and I venture to say that he could not get a report from the collector of customs at Halifax which would indicate that there is any good reason for that discrimination. It has been stated in the public press of Halifax that three of these men, who have been a long time in the service, were recommended for an increase by the collector of customs of Halifax, Mr. Mitchell, a very capable man, who was appointed by this government, and that the recommendation of Mr. Mitchell in that regard was entirely overlooked. This is said to be due to the fact that the gentleman who represented the county between 1904 and 1908 put in a very strong objection and protest to the increases being granted. I do not know whether that statement is correct or not, but I do say that, if the minister permitted the recommendation of the collector of customs at Halifax to that end to be overlooked upon such a protest or objection, I do not think he was doing his duty. I know Mr. Mitchell very well; he was a strong Liberal before he was appointed to the position which he now holds, a very strong and a very active Liberal, and I do not think that any one in Halifax objected to his appointment. I congratulated him myself upon his appointment, and I think he has discharged the duties of the office there with a great deal of efficiency. If these recommendations were made for increases of salary they ought not to have been passed over for any such reason as has been stated in the public press.

Mr. PATERSON. If that was the reason.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, if that was the reason. I am not asserting that it was the reason.

Mr. PATERSON. Of course, our officers do not feel bound to take the recommendations of collectors in all cases, but they are bound to give them due consideration. You can understand that the collectors quite naturally would like to see all the officers advanced, and, therefore, we are not able to meet their views in all cases. But if there is any case overlooked without good reason, I would be pleased if the hon. gentleman would give the name.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will give the names at once. The first one is Mr. W. A. Garrison. I had no communication from Mr. Garrison, directly or indirectly, and all I know about his case I gather from the public press. He is surveyor of the port of Halifax; he has been acting collector during the illness of Mr. Harrington, the predecessor of Mr. Mitchell; he is a man of ability, and of long experience, and I have not heard that there ever has been any complaint against him; he entered the service forty-one years ago as tidewaiter, became clerk in the long room, and was promoted to the vacant surveyorship about twenty years ago. When this newspaper article was written two years ago, his salary was $1,500, and I think it remains at that still.

Mr. PATERSON. I see it was that a year ago.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The man who fills the same position in Quebec gets $2,000; in St. John, $1,700; in Ottawa, $1,650, and in Vancouver, $2,000, while Mr. Garrison, with forty-one years service, and with the ability to act as collector, receives only $1,500. Another officer mentioned in the Halifax 'Herald' of 21st June, 1909, is Mr. J. O'Brien. I have had no communication from him, and I know nothing of his case except what is to be found in this newspaper article. He has had forty years service, he has been chief clerk for twenty years, his present salary is $1,200, and he has had no increase since 1893. In an interview I had with the minister, at which was present the Commissioner of Customs and two other officers of the department, I mentioned the case of Mr. John R. Power, and I would remind the minister that the salary of Mr. Power, after thirty years service, is only $950, although there are several men performing similar duties, having not more than six or seven years' service, who receive higher salaries. I am not complaining of the salaries given these men of recent appointment; I do not say that any one of them is receiving more than he should; I would not be surprised to learn that some of them are receiving less than what might properly be paid to them; but I do say that the apparent discrimination between these gentlemen and Mr. Power ought not to continue, and that some recognition should be given to long and faithful service.

Mr. PATERSON. Your comparisons are between officers in other ports, and not the officers in Halifax.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax.) In the other cases, but not in this case. I am saying that these men have been overlooked in salary increases for a great many years; I am calling the attention of the minister to the statement that these men have been recommended over and over again, for an increase of salary by the present collector, Mr. Mitchell, and that in no case has an increase been granted to any one of them. I hope the minister will take these individual cases into consideration.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not say anything against Mr. Garrison, but he is an aged man now, and there does exist this discrepancy between the same officers at different ports, and St. John and Halifax watch each other very closely when comparisons are made. We have found, in order to get good men, that it is necessary to start them at a higher salary than was the case in years gone by. In the earlier years of my administering the department, as a rule we started a new officer at a lower rate than had been attained after years of service by the officers he was replacing, but lately we have had to give higher salaries.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not think the minister's explanation is borne out by the facts, because I can give him the names of men who have been appointed six or seven years ago at salaries of $600, and who are now receiving as high as $1,100.

Mr. PATERSON. That would be an exceptional case.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There are quite a list of them.

Mr. PATERSON. Will the hon. gentleman give the names?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not wish to mention the names of these gentlemen in public, because I am taking no exception at all to the salaries paid them, but I will send the minister a private memorandum.

Mr. PATERSON. I will look into the matter.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It does not conduce to a good feeling in the service if it is considered that these advances are made for reasons that cannot properly be described as in the public interest. There ought to be some explanation of these apparent discriminations when they are brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. LAKE. While the Civil Service Act was under discussion, the members of the government expressed the hope that in the near future it would be possible to bring the officials in the Customs and Post Office outside service under the Act. Has the minister gone into this question, and when does he think he will be able to submit a proposal of this kind to the House.

Mr. PATERSON. I have discussed that question with the officers of the department frequently, and we desire if possible to bring about such an arrangement, particularly in larger cities. There are, however, difficulties in working out a scheme owing to the nature of the work and the classifications now existing in the inside service. I do not believe it would apply to small places at all because a man who passed the examination, say in Ottawa, would not care to be appointed to a position in some small and remote port. In the large ports it would be a great benefit to the department. Men would be sent to us by the Civil Service Commission because they had taken the highest examinations. Whether we can accomplish this next year I do not know, but we would like to have something of the kind. It would be a great relief. The appointment of clerks in the inside service by the Civil Service Commission has been a marvellous relief in the work of the department.

Mr. BLAIN. How are such officers appointed to the outside service?

Mr. PATERSON. We try to find out as well as we can how they are fitted for the positions.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If this is such a marvellous relief for the inside service what objection would the minister have to having appointments made by the Civil Service Commission to the outside service?

Mr. PATERSON. There is no objection except the difficulty of working out a scheme which we are trying to overcome.

Mr. JAMESON. How many clerks will be affected under this arrangement, and how will it money out?

Mr. PATERSON. My deputy is in Montreal to-day, and so I have not with me any calculation of this kind. Of course we could not tell how much money would be involved as we could not say how many would pass the examination. The increases would be made in the regular yearly instalments of $50 or $100. The increases will not be very great in the aggregate and individually they seem very small.

Mr. JAMESON. When was the last increase given to the officials in the outports?

Mr. PATERSON. I think there was a very general increase last year, where the salaries were low. In certain ports in the maritime provinces, the department gave only $300 to $350. That seems a very small sum, but there is very little work. In the outports from $300 to $500 is the usual payment. In Manitoba and the other provinces the salaries are higher. Last year we tried to bring all the low paid officials to about as high a salary as we intended to carry them.

Mr. JAMESON. The minister will not suppose that I wish to oppose increases to any one in the service of the department, because I entertain no such idea. I think that in many instances they are underpaid. I thought that it would have been well for us to know just how many persons would be affected by this legislation. If a large business house were proposing anything of this kind, a memorandum would be submitted to the directors or shareholders showing just what burden would be involved. I understood from the minister that an increase was provided for the outport officers last year. I find by referring to the Auditor General's Report for the year ending March 31, 1910, that a number of officers of customs in the outports are paid very small salaries. Take the county of Digby in which I am more particularly interested.

Mr. PATERSON. Is that the port of Digby?

Mr. JAMESON. The outports of the port of Digby, and the port of Weymouth. Some of the officers are paid as low as $200 per year, and some $300. These officers have to be always ready to discharge the duties devolving upon them. These duties keep them at home to a certain extent as they must be on hand when required, and they discharge their duties very faithfully. The trifling salary of $200 is absolutely insufficient for any man supposed to discharge the important duties which devolve upon a customs officer. I should be very glad to know that an increase had been given them, but on referring to the last Auditor General's Report I see that their salaries remain the same. Many of these officers have been in the employ of the government for years. I am not speaking of any one county or province, because the salaries in general of these men are insufficient. If substantial increases, as proposed by these resolutions, are to be given, to clerks who may have been in the service only three years, something should be done for these other officials who have faithfully discharged their duties during five, ten or fifteen years, and who have had no increase, although the cost of living has increased in these outports in the same ratio as in the cities and towns. When the minister brings forward a resolution of this character, he should be prepared to give information as to the number of officers who will participate in the increase, and the exact sum to which these increases will amount in the way of an additional burden on the country.

Mr. PATERSON. As regards the class to which my hon. friend has referred, I could not give them any expectation of any increase. The view we take is that they are at their maximum.

Mr. JAMESON. From him who hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath, and to him who hath shall be given.

Mr. PATERSON. No, but there must be some regard for the work done. At many of these outports, the salary of $350——

Mr. JAMESON. Some have only $200.

Mr. PATERSON. Perhaps if these men were given the revenue they collect instead of a salary, they would prefer to take the salary. What is the department to do in a case of that kind? The revenue is not large, but pressure has been brought time and again to have officers at certain places to enter and clear vessels. Perhaps in some of these places there are not over ten or twelve entries and clearances in a year, and the revenue is not as large as the salaries paid. These men were simply appointed for the convenience of some shipper, and they have scarcely any work to do. In some cases, the customs officer will be a farmer. When a vessel is loaded with timber, its master goes to this officer and gets a clearance from him, and it may not take half an hour to give it. These ports are simply for the convenience of very few people, but once you establish an outport, you cannot close it without arousing great feeling. Of course these outports are a great facility to some shipper. Instead of having to sail ten or twelve miles to a port where we are able to pay a collector a proper salary, the shipmaster can get his papers on the spot, and that is why he wants a man there. These men do not live on what we pay them. They are engaged in other duties, and their duties as customs officer probably do not take up an hour of their time. In the Dominion we have more ports of entry, not relatively, but absolutely, than the whole 90,000,000 people in the United States have. We are beset on all hand to open up new ports; and when my hon. friend talks about the $300 man, and the $200 man, and what a hardship that low salary is, there are plenty of men in these places only too glad to take the job at the same money if the present incumbents would resign. What is a business man to do under these circumstances? There are men who would be only too glad, if they would send in their resignation, to take their job at the same money. What is a business man to do? You must conduct things on business principles.

Mr. JAMESON. That is exactly what I suggested—the minister should do things in a business way, and let the committee know what the effect of this will be in dollars and cents, and number of officers affected.

Mr. PATERSON. It will not affect these men.

Mr. JAMESON. But it will affect the people who have to put their hands in their pockets and pay the bills. The minister speaks of there being such a large number of ports in Canada compared with the United States. Of course there are more; we have more coast line on the Atlantic alone than the United States have on both Atlantic and Pacific. The minister knows that. But the minister does not go further and make a comparison of salaries paid. In the seaports of the maritime provinces, where we do a large amount of shipping, it is necessary to have customs ports and to have fairly capable officers in charge of them, men who are capable of discharging their duties, who will be on hand—and, so far as my information goes these officers are on hand when required. It may be that they engage in some other occupation; but they must confine themselves to occupations which will not take them so far away from their offices that they cannot discharge their duties with reasonable dispatch. And, when all the rest of the service are receiving increases of salaries, I draw the attention of the minister to the fact that, as I believe these men are receiving the same salaries as they have received for years. It is only right that their case should be taken under advisement, and if it is fair—as I believe it to be—that they should be given an increase, then, that increase should be provided for. And I do not think the people of this country will be in any way disposed to criticise it.

Mr. PATERSON. I am afraid I cannot promise that with reference to that class of officers.

Mr. CROSBY. I understood the Minister of Customs, when answering a question put by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) with regard to Mr. Garrison, to intimate that there was some reason for Mr. Garrison's salary not being increased. Mr. Garrison is a very competent and able man. He went into the customs house as a very young man, and to-day when the minister calls his collector of customs from Halifax, Mr. Garrison must take his place and take charge of the port. Halifax, I think, is the fourth in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. PATERSON. You are an important port, but not the fourth.

Mr CROSBY. Perhaps the minister will tell us what position Halifax takes?

Mr. PATERSON. A very good position.

Mr. CROSBY. It would be a good position whatever position we took. I said we were the fourth port in the Dominion, and unless the minister shows I am wrong——

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The minister means that Halifax is in the third position.

Mr. CROSBY. We are certainly well up on the list. But we are not well up so far as the payment of our men is concerned. Mr. Garrison has been receiving $1,500, I think, for fifteen or twenty years. I believe that Halifax occupies a higher place than two of the ports whose surveyors receive higher salaries. Not only is that the case, but last year we had more business than in any previous year, and next year we expect to have a great deal more. In fact, the day is not far distant when every passenger steamer that crosses the Atlantic between the mother land and America will be compelled by the condition of things to come to Halifax. Now, Mr. Garrison is also a comparatively young man. It is only a few months ago, when in the city of Halifax, I saw my gallant friend in his military uniform—in fact, he looked like Colonel Hughes. Therefore, there can be no question so far as his physical condition is concerned. And I know he stands in high reputation with the citizens of Halifax. It would be a sufficient recommendation for him if he stood high with the collector of customs. Our collector of customs, Mr. Mitchell, has been spoken of by the leader of the opposition. He is an excellent man and I have no hesitation in saying that the port of Halifax is fortunate in its collector. The only thing wrong in his case is that we are not paying him enough. He is getting the same salary, I think, that the collector of customs of Halifax got at confederation or very shortly after. Before his appointment he was at the head of a very large and remunerative business. I think it was only with great persuasion on the part of his friends that he agreed to take the position, and the citizens of Halifax were delighted when he was appointed. We claim that he should have a salary of $4,000. We do not ask for $4,500, because there are one or two other places that do a little more business than Halifax, and we leave the $4,500 to them. But the next man to the collector is the surveyor, and he only gets $1,500. I see that the minister (Mr. Paterson) can hardly credit that because he is looking up to see what Mr. Garrison receives.

Mr. PATERSON. The minimum was $1,200, and he is only getting $300 over the minimum.

Mr. CROSBY. He has been getting that a long time. I am sure that when the minister has visited Halifax he has found Mr. Garrison a man thoroughly competent for his position. It is only fair that he should receive a better salary. Other men have been referred to. I could quote a dozen appointments within the last six years of men who are receiving larger salaries than Mr. Power who has been in the custom house a long time. He went into the custom house a very young man—he seems to be a young man to-day. Living in Halifax keeps him young. And there is Mr. O'Brien whom I know well, and who is a very competent man. The Minister of Customs referred to the number of ports in the maritime provinces at which he has collectors and he also referred to the United States. Well, I may say that in the United States, even a foreign vessel coming from a foreign country, before she reaches her destination, can call at half a dozen ports, and if there is no collector she is not called upon to enter. In the maritime provinces a vessel cannot call at a port and remain even twenty minutes without going to the customs officer and making an entry. Consequently, when a vessel goes from one port three or four miles into another port, the captain is bound to go to the collector and report and get a clearance. Our customs laws are different in that regard from those of the United States, and if we make stringent laws in that respect we must provide some way by which these men may be accommodated. The master of a vessel entering a port is always averse to going to the customs, although he knows he has to do it. As the minister knows, it is always an inconvenience to the captain. In the United States a vessel goes into a port where there is no collector of customs and does not have to report; and even if they go into a port where there is a collector, unless they stay there over 24 hours, they are not called upon to make entry. So that in the United States the ship has greater convenience than it has in our ports. Even if a little fishing vessel goes to one of our fishing ports and spends a few hours, she has to report to the customs officer and get a clearance, and she cannot go fishing again unless she has a clearance. If the master of a vessel violates that law, she can be seized and fined up to $400. So that when the Minister of Customs complains of the number of ports, he must remember that his department and his government are responsible therefor. I think it would be better to have fewer ports, and thereby give the ship some relief. The collector of customs gets twenty-five to fifty cents, as the case may be, for writing out an entry; consequently he will take good care that the ship master comes to his office, and if he does not, he can be fined. Now, the minister said that no man should be expected to confine himself wholly to customs work unless he was getting a salary of $1,000.

Mr. PATERSON. I say that is forbidden if he has $1,000 or over.

Mr. CROSBY. That is the position I have always taken with regard to our large cities, that we should have no man working in the customs with less than $1,000 salary. There should be no man working in any of our large cities where the trade is heavy, at a less salary than $1,000 a year. I hope the time will soon come when the Minister of Customs will see his way clear to make such a rule in all the cities. As a matter of fact, no man who is working in that department could attempt to do any business outside of his office; if he did, the minister would be in hot water all the time with complaints coming to him about that man. Now, with regard to the service, I can see no reason why the outside service, in the cities at least, should not be brought under the Civil Service Act and run the same as the inside service. If the Postmaster General and some of the other departments would do that, it would save them a great deal of trouble. All the cities can be fairly well taken in under the Civil Service Act, and it would always be possible to get efficient men for the department, after passing an examination to qualify for whatever positions might become vacant. I hope the Minister of Customs will turn his attention to that matter. He has a large department, and it is difficult for him to please everybody with regard to appointments. I have no objection to the minister taking the recommendation of his friends in a particular district, when he wants to make an appointment in the Customs Department, and I do not object to his appointing a friend of his who is well qualified in all other respects. But it is the meanest kind of a thing, it is the most contemptible thing, for any minister to hamper and harass a man who has been appointed by some other government. I think when a man enters the Civil Service he should be protected by every member of this House in his rights. He has a perfect right to vote as he pleases; as long as he does not make himself obnoxious in any way he has a right to proper treatment as regards his salary, irrespective of his politics.

Mr. BLAIN. I would ask the minister why he does not introduce the policy of promotion in his department. For example, I have in my mind a customs office which became vacant the other day by the death of the occupant. My hon. friend has, in the province of Ontario, many officers who have had considerable experience and who would like very much to be promoted to that important place, with a very much higher salary. But the hon. gentleman instead of adopting the policy of promotion, takes an outside man who has no experience whatever, and very little qualification, puts him into this important office, and by doing that he gives no inspiration to those who are engaged in the service. They have no opportunity or expectation of promotion. Why does my hon. friend not adopt the policy of promotion? Would it not be in the interest of the public instead of taking, shall I say, a politician, and putting him into that office, without any qualification, and over the heads of men who have devoted the best of their lives to the service of the government.

Mr. PATERSON. Does the hon. gentleman mean to take an officer who has been in the service in some other port or in the same port?

Mr. BLAIN. In some other port, if necessary—some worthy officer.

Mr. PATERSON. I have not been able to carry it out under the present circumstances. If we were adopting the system of competition and they were proving themselves by examination and all that—

Mr. BLAIN. Would not that be a good policy?

Mr. PATERSON. Well, there is the question; it would have its good points. I perhaps, need not say that it would probably have some opponents. The old system has been going on so long that I suppose it would be objected to, but perhaps, with respect to efficiency, if it could be worked, it would produce the effect that the hon. gentleman says. I think I will have to leave it to be worked out by my hon. friend some day.

Mr. LALOR. It would be a little bit hard on defeated candidates.

On paragraph 2: Schedule 'B' Customs,

Mr. SPROULE. Does that cover all the outside service or are there others in the outside service who will not receive consideration?

Mr. PATERSON. This is simply increasing the maximum as fixed by the old table that has been in existence for, I do not know how many, years. But, I would like it distinctly understood that if officers get the idea that because there is an increase of $400 proposed in one class they are going to get $400 as soon as this Act passes they are all wrong; they may not get a dollar, or they may get $50 or they may get $100.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is very misleading then.

Mr. PATERSON. They will not get it all at once, but this is to give power to the department to give an increase to a deserving officer, who is at the old maximum. He may get an advance, not of the full amount, but of $100 or of $50.

Mr. SPROULE. Take the first class mentioned in the schedule:

Collectors—Salaries per annum from $300 to $4,500.

No increase. What do you mean by that? Suppose an officer is geting a salary of $600; is he not likely to get an increase? Why do you say from $300 to $4,500. If you do not propose to deal with all those between those limits?

Mr. PATERSON. This does not deal with the increase; this simply gives the power.

Mr. SPROULE. But you have the power already.

Mr. PATERSON. We have the power to increase the salary of a man who gets $600 now, but because we have the power to increase his salary, it does not necessarily mean that it will be increased.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the sense of taking the power to do what you have already power to do, if you desire to exercise that power?

Mr. PATERSON. There is only one reason for it; when we were changing the table with reference to senior clerks we thought it was well that the whole table, which has been in existence for a long time, should be changed and therefore we propose to deal with all classes. The great bulk of the officers who are in the service now would not require to have this table altered for their sake at all because there is plenty of latitude to give them an increase under the old table. But, in changing this item we thought it well to change the whole table so that it would not have to be changed again. I want to make that point clear, because I do not want to have the officers disappointed. It must not be imagined that because the maximum is increased so many hundreds of dollars that they are to get the full amount. It only means that the department may be at liberty by degrees, and as the officers on their part deserve, to grant them increases in order that they may ultimately reach that point.

Mr. SPROULE. You want to be at liberty to do what you already have liberty to do. Are we to understand that you only intend to increase those who are at the maximum?

Mr. PATERSON. This relates to those who are at the maximum.

Mr. SPROULE. Are those officers who are to-day receiving a salary below the maximum entitled to understand that there is a probability of their salaries being increased or, on the other hand can none expect to get an increase who are not already at the maximum?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). As I understand it the minister is not pledging himself under this proposition to increase any salary, but he is taking power to grant increases. The first class mentioned is that of collector at salaries from $300 to $4,500. Then the salaries of inspectors at ports were, minimum, $2,100 and maximum $2,500. He is now increasing that maximum to $3,200.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, there will now be two inspectors who are at the maximum and under this we can raise them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am speaking of the minimum and maximum. Assistant inspectors $1,500 to $1,800; the minister now makes the maximum $2,000; chief clerks, $1,200 to $2,000. He now makes the maximum $2,100, and so on all through.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the first item?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In the first item there is no change at all. He has left that as it was, the second he has left as it was, and the two near the bottom of the page are left as they were before. In the others he makes some increase in the maximum salary which can be granted to these officers.

Mr. PATERSON. That is it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to ask the minister if he does not consider that a man who has been for from three to five years at the head of his class and drawing probably the maximum salary of that class should get the maximum if that maximum has been raised by $200 or $400. I believe that would be a fair way to treat these officers. They should hold the same position in their class after the maximum has been increased. A man who has been at the top of his class should, under the new regulations, be placed at the maximum again. That is the only fair way to do it.

Mr. PATERSON. It took him some years to get to the maximum.

Mr. RUSSELL. As the Irishman said when he complained of the landlady's cooking: 'There's raisins in everything,' and the reason given for the increase to the inside service was the high cost of living, and that is just as good a reason for increasing the pay of the outside service. These officers are entitled to a substantial increase right away. If a man is at the head of his class for say eight years as it happens in some cases, I do not think they should now be compelled to work up to the maximum when they have been kept for so many years on starvation wages. At $50 a year increase, it would take them eight years to go to the maximum.

Mr. PATERSON. That is the idea.

Mr. RUSSELL. And it is a very bad idea. I do not think the minister should take advantage of the fact that he has more applications for positions than he can take care of, to keep down salaries to the starvation point. The minister should pay an official what would be considered a living wage on which to maintain himself and his family decently. Hope is a very cheap commodity, and while men are not satisfied with the pay they get when they enter the service still they hope that in the future they will get a decent salary.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not see myself how some of these men can live decently, and support their families on the pay they get, and we are trying to bring them up to about the same recompense they would get in other similar occupations in life. A minister cannot allow his feelings to sway him in such a matter. The hon. member (Mr. Russell) is a large employer of labour, and he pays his men well, and I have no doubt that his experience is the same as mine, and that he can get other men to work for a lower wage than he is paying his employees, but, because I thought I was paying more than I could get another man for, I would not allow the old employee to go. At the same time, if a business man found that when he was filling a vacancy there were fifty applications for it, and that they all were willing to work for less than he had been paying the former employee, would not that fact influence him in determining the wages that would be given? It is said that a minister should conduct the public business as he does his private business, and would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) feel that he was doing justice to himself if he paid higher wages than dozens of equally competent applicants were willing to take the position at? I know that if an employee of his were getting higher wages than he was absolutely certain he could get a man to do the same work for, he still would keep on the old hand, and usually business men are just and generous, and they follow that principle. But, if a vacancy occurred, the hon. gentleman would not feel it incumbent upon him to pay more wages than he was asked to pay. I think I am right in saying that there are many applications in for every vacancy as soon as the news can get out, and one cannot be insensible to that fact.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the government should set a good example in a case like this.

Mr. PATERSON. I think so too.

Mr. CROTHERS. The minimum salary of a collector is $300, and the maximum $4,500; what determines whether a man shall be paid $1,000 or $4,000?

Mr. PATERSON. The maximum amount mentioned by the hon. member is paid only at Montreal, and while we may advance the Toronto collector to $4,500 yet, the collections are larger at Montreal, and the collector there has been a greater number of years in the service. The collector at Toronto may be entitled to $4,500, but I thought I would not give it to him for a year or two at any rate, because I think a distinction should be made on account of Mr. White's longer service, and the larger port at which he is collector. The port of Winnipeg, and I think the port of Vancouver will by-and-by have to be considered. Ports like Hamilton and London and Halifax and St. John, and Quebec, perhaps, are pretty nearly all on the same range. Take, St. Thomas and Chatham and Guelph and Galt, and towns of that size, and the salaries range from $1,200 to $1,600, while at Brantford and Niagara Falls it goes up to $1,800. The revenue guides us in a measure at the inland ports, but in some maritime ports we may have no revenue at all, and yet the officer has a lot of work to do in entering and clearing vessels. There are outports established for preventing smuggling and so on. We may possibly, by and by, be able to get the salaries in ports such as the hon. gentleman has in his county up to about $2,000, but there is no maximum fixed. The department try to do justice between one port and another and are guided by the revenue, &c.

Mr. CROTHERS. There is no fixed principle on which salaries are determined?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. CROTHERS. The collector in my city, St. Thomas, receives a salary of $1,600. The revenue there is now $300,000, and there are a number of outports. I think a man with the responsibility of handling that amount ought to get a larger salary than $1,600.

Mr. PATERSON. If this is allowed to pass, these questions, which are quite proper, can be answered when my estimates are up, and my deputy is here.

Mr. DOHERTY. I was slightly disappointed with these figures. Last year I made some observations with regard to the salary of the collector at the port of Montreal, and I quite acknowledge that there was an increase of $500, although I do not pretend that this was in consequence of my remarks. The minister, by this resolution, is tying himself up so that for a long time to come he cannot increase that salary above the present figure. I understood last year that the minister felt that the increase he was making in the salary of the collector at Montreal hardly adequately met the case. I do not wish to repeat what I said last year about the importance of Montreal and its immense business and revenue. It must be remembered that previous to this increase the salary had stood at $4,000 for a long period of years during which all the expenses of living had increased in a very great degree. I think I am not being importunate in urging upon the minister that the increase of $500 hardly met the requirements of the case. The increased cost of living is not felt more keenly in any place than in Montreal, and the officer having the responsibility of handling the immense business at that port should be in receipt of a salary that would not be so utterly, and absolutely disproportionate to the salaries received by men in charge of large businesses, which would still be small when compared with the business to be supervised and controlled by the collector of customs. I need say nothing of the qualifications of the present incumbent, they are well known, and fully recognized, and I must add that what I am now saying, I say absolutely without any communication from him. I urge on the minister that the present salary of the collector at Montreal is utterly inadequate even to-day, and as this resolution will bind the department probably until a longer period of time than the lifetime of the present incumbent, I beg to respectfully urge on the minister the desirability of reconsidering this maximum amount which a collector may receive. I am sure that in this request I would be endorsed by the business community of Montreal generally without party distinction, and by hon. members of this House representing divisions in Montreal, or that neighbourhood. I understood the minister last year to say that the increase then given was the best that could be done for the moment, but that he did not take the position that that settled as a finality the proper remuneration of the office of collector of customs at Montreal. This is a glaring case of remuneration quite inadequate to the service rendered and out of all proportion to the office, and to its grave responsibilities. I certainly would be glad if the minister could see his way, if not to an immediate increase, at least to reconsider his decision to tie himself up so as to make it impossible for a long time to increase this very inadequate salary.

Mr. GERVAIS. I think I am in duty bound to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), as to the salary which is proposed to be paid to the collector of customs at Montreal. The importance of that port cannot be compared with any other port, and the efficiency of the services of the present incumbent is too well known for me to venture to add anything to what has been said of the character of the work which has been performed for years past by the present incumbent. On account of the importance of the port of Montreal, on account of the efficiency of the service which has been done, and which is being done by Mr. White, the present incumbent, and on account of the cost of living in Montreal, I think that a salary of $6,000 should be considered the least which should be paid to the present collector. It is all very well to propose general rules and general schedules of salaries for all over the country, but I think that the case of the port of Montreal is a very exceptional one, and the general schedule should not be made applicable to that port. There should be a proviso added to the resolution under which by way of order in council, the government could, after due consideration, in some way increase the remuneration of the present collector of customs at Montreal to at least $6,000. This view is held by all the people of Montreal, especially by the large importers. It is well known that the imports entered at the port of Montreal exceed $16,000,000 per year, which certainly warrants our paying a salary to the collector of that port of at least $6,000.

On that question, I would ask the Minister of Customs if he intends this session introducing legislation for the purpose of creating the office of deputy or assistant-collector. The creation of such an office has been asked for by quite a number of the large importers of Montreal, and it would go a long way to expedite the business of the port, and meet the convenience of the city. I think that a petition was sent to the Department of Customs asking the minister to create such an office, and I would like to know if he proposes doing so this session. I would again urge on the hon. minister to add another resolution to those proposed which would enable the government by order in council to grant to the collector of customs in the port of Montreal a salary somewhat adequate to the important position he holds, the efficient service he is rendering, and the increased cost of living. Such increase, I am sure, would prove to be fair and popular.

Mr. PATERSON. As regards an assistant-collector, I am not disposed to regard with favour the proposal to establish such an office, and do not intend doing anything in that respect this year. As regards the collectorship the difficulty is this. I have nothing but words of commendation for Mr. White, the collector of customs at Montreal, and I heartily endorse everything that has been said in his favour. His record stands well with the department. In his conduct of the public business, the geniality with which he meets customers, and his ability in other respects make him a very efficient officer indeed. I think he has some of the most valuable traits a customs officer should have, and personally I would have no objection to making his salary larger. But there is one objection which seems to me insuperable. The commissioner of customs, who has to do with all the ports of the Dominion, Montreal included, gets $5,000, and I cannot see my way clear to put one whose work has to be supervised by the commissioner on an equal plane with the deputy head of the department. If the deputy head of the department were receiving a higher salary, that difficulty would largely vanish. It may not strike my hon. friend as important, but it does me. I do not feel that I could recommend the placing of any individual officer of any one port, however important—and Montreal is a very important port—on a par, so far as remuneration goes, with the commissioner who is responsible for the administration of the Customs Department throughout the Dominion.

Mr. DOHERTY. That only goes to show that the salary of the commissioner ought to be increased.

Mr. PATERSON. But I cannot do that.

Mr. DOHERTY. If we are to assume that the commissioner of customs is to be paid more than any collector—and the minister apparently admits that the collector of customs at Montreal ought to have a great deal more than he is now getting——

Mr. PATERSON. I do not admit that now.

Mr. DOHERTY. Well, the minister says that the one insurmountable obstacle is the fact that the commissioner is only getting

$5,000. We must conclude that if that obstacle were out of the way, the collector of customs at Montreal would be given a larger salary. If the minister's reason be well founded, that the commissioner of customs necessarily should be paid more than any collector——

Mr. PATERSON. Do you not think he should?

Mr. DOHERTY. That is a reasonable proposition, but it only follows that we ought to begin by increasing the commissioner's salary. It is not logical to say that you cannot raise the salary of the collector of customs at Montreal simply because you must keep it under what the commissioner gets. The reasonable way to remedy the situation would be to give the commissioner of customs what he ought to get.

Mr. PATERSON. But I have not the power to put that in here.

Mr. DOHERTY. Possibly, but there are other ways in which that can be done. We are getting supplementaries every day or two.

Mr. PATERSON. In the different departments there are more deputy ministers than one.

Mr. DOHERTY. In some departments there are deputies who get more than $5,000 per year.

Mr. PATERSON. Only technical officers.

Mr. DOHERTY. At all events the position taken by the minister does not appeal to me. It seems to me an extraordinary position to take that because you do not pay a gentleman occupying a higher position more, you cannot do what is just to another officer, and you must keep him at a salary below what he is entitled to. I must confess that I had hoped for better things. I recollect last year that the same objection was made, but I thought that after some reasonable period of time the situation with regard to the commissioner would be rectified so that he should no longer stand as an insuperable obstacle to our doing what is merely justice to the important officer whose case we are considering. After all I think that the public interest demands proper remuneration for services of this kind. Dropping for a moment the consideration of any particular occupant of the office, I do not think it is becoming the dignity of this country that officers should occupy such positions at salaries which put them, having regard to the positions they fill, on a footing of inferiority towards the bulk of the people with whom they are carrying on their daily business. That is a most unfair and undignified position for this country to take towards gentlemen who have given years of faithful service, and by that very fact have placed themselves in a position where they have no longer any liberty of choice, but must remain where they are instead of seeking other positions which might give them better remuneration.

I do not wish to use language that might be supposed to be stronger than the occasion requires; but I must confess that I think that to lay down the absolute principle that, because the commissioner does not happen to have a larger salary and because it is not convenient to attend to the question of whether he ought to have a larger salary, therefore, other claims must not be even considered, involves actual injustice—I do not think the expression is at all too strong—and furthermore, puts this country in a position that is not creditable to it, and puts the officer, occupying this highly responsible office, as I said, in a position of inferiority in relation to the bulk of the people with whom he does business. To justify this by saying that at the moment it is not convenient to increase the salary of another officer seems a very inadequate justification for persistence in maintaining the salary at the rate now provided. But I would like to point out to the minister that we have now a resolution passed with a view to making an enactment which the minister says he desires to make permanent or to provide for a long period. May I point out that it is not desirable that by this enactment which is to remain effective over the long period, he should tie his hands so that he will not be able to make this increase even if the insurmountable obstacle should disappear. After all, I am only urging the minister at the moment to take a larger power than he wants to take. Surely, he cannot say that any harm could be done by that. Surely the minister may trust himself. If he had the power, and realized that he had the power, might be able to appeal to him more effectively.

Mr. GERVAIS. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the low salary proposed to be paid to the appraisers. The increase of salaries to the appraisers is proposed to be made $400 per year. I think the appraisers for the port of Montreal should have a salary of at least $3,500. If I had time to quote from the statistics of American ports, I should be able to show that ports of less importance in the United States of no greater importance than Montreal have collectors who receive salaries as high as $10,000 a year, and some of these American ports have appraisers whose salaries are as high as $6,000 per year. I repeat, then, that the salaries of the appraisers of the port of Montreal should be made at least $3,500.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPROULE. What I desired to ascertain was how far this measure was bringing the outside service under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. PATERSON. Not at all.

Mr. SPROULE. But it does. We have here introduced the schedule system to regulate salaries, then there would be increases following that system, and the clerks would be entitled to superannuation. Under part of the schedules we provide for an increase from the minimum to the maximum, the same as under the Civil Service Act. Then you provide that a person who has served over three years as clerk in the outside service may be brought into the inside service after passing the departmental examination, and then he must be entirely under the Civil Service Act. Will it affect their superannuation, or will it provide them a graded increase of salary?

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman will remember that there is the old Civil Service Act, and there was an amendment to that. This is an amendment to the old Civil Service Act, it is not an amendment to the amendment of the Civil Service Act, under which outsiders were brought in. This does not change their position in the least, except as regards the schedule which was in the old Act. That we are amending, and we are increasing the maximum in the table that was in section 39 of the old Act. That is the only change.

Mr. SPROULE. Under the old Act they could come in without passing a qualifying examination.

Mr. PATERSON. This is no step at all in the direction of bringing them into the inside service.

Mr. SPROULE. When they come in under this Act, is there any annual increase to which they are entitled?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. PATERSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 208) to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 153) to amend the Inspection and Sale Act as regards the weight of a bushel and a bag of certain articles.—Mr. Fisher.

Mr. FISHER. When this Bill was before the committee the other day, I was asked who recommended these weights. I find they were recommended by two organizations in the province of Quebec, and in the province of Ontario, which are composed of vegetable growers. The weights have been examined by the officers of the experimental farm, and have been reported upon as the correct weights for the articles mentioned in the Bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The only change is in regard to potatoes.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, 80 lbs. was the weight in the province of Quebec, and this makes it general throughout the Dominion. In Ontario the practice has been 90 lbs., but there has been no law fixing it at 90 lbs.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What means will the minister take to acquaint the people of Ontario of the change?

Mr. FISHER. I will see that it is published in the agricultural papers generally.

Mr. BLAIN. Has there been any general request from the province of Ontario for this rather drastic change? The minister says that it has been asked for by certain organizations. I may point out that this will make a great change, and I cannot see what advantage it will bring either to the buyer or the seller. For many years it has been the custom in Ontario to buy and sell a bag of potatoes at 90 pounds. Perhaps the minister will say that it is desirable there should be uniformity. I am not so sure that they would support so drastic a change. I am not sure that if it were submitted to the agricultural societies the minister would receive their sanction generally.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think the farmers would object to selling 80 pounds for a bag of potatoes instead of 90 pounds.

Mr. BLAIN. I think they would. Men have grown up to do business in potatoes with 90 pounds to the bushel. That is the general custom, and when the hon. gentleman introduces a measure to change that to 80 pounds, it will create a good deal of confusion. In the first place, almost all the bags used by the farmers in every part of the province are made to hold 90 pounds. In future they will have to take a 90-pound bag and put 80 pounds of potatoes into it. It is a very great disadvantage to the farmer and no advantage to any class of people that I know of. I am quite confident that if the minister will consult his friends and the people of Ontario they will not endorse a proposition of this kind. I would like to enter a protest, mild as it may be, against the very drastic change that will be introduced by the passage of this measure into the potato market in Ontario. I do not think that the suggestion that because it is 80 pounds in Quebec it should, therefore, be 80 pounds in Ontario, will be sufficient for the farmers in the latter province. It will make a very unsatisfactory condition of things if after a custom has grown up extending over half a dozen generations it is suddenly changed without any very strong demand for it. There may be some reason for changing it other than the reasons that are mentioned, but I do not think my hon. friend will find any class of farmers or those interested in the potato business in Ontario who would consent to so great a change that will cause the greatest inconvenience to the people of that province.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it is distinctly a mistake to change it to 80 pounds, because all over the country a bag of potatoes is a bushel and a half, and a bushel of potatoes is 60 pounds. A bushel of potatoes here is stated to be 60 pounds. What is understood by Dominion standard pounds?

Mr. FISHER. I think there is a Dominion standard pound in the Weights and Measures Act.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox and Addington). I quite agree with the minister that the weight of a bag of potatoes should be the same in every province, but I remember that when the change was made to 80 pounds in the province of Quebec, it was to accommodate certain dealers and farmers around the city of Montreal. I see no reason why the weight should now be changed all over Canada to 80 pounds. I do not know how you will fix the number of pounds to the bushel. A bag of potatoes in our province has always been understood to be a bushel and a half—that is 90 pounds—and while the minister is anxious to make the weight of a bag of potatoes the same throughout the whole country, I think he should adopt the standard as 90 pounds.

Mr. FISHER. This Bill has been prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I shall be glad to allow the committee to rise in order that I may consult my colleague, and see if he approves of that suggestion.

Mr. LALOR. I had an opportunity of going with the deputation that was here in connection with this matter, representing the vegetable growers and fruit growers, not only of Quebec, but of Ontario as well, and I listened to their arguments before the minister. There was a representative of the association from my own county. Their argument was that in the city of Toronto, for instance, potatoes were sold by people who put them into smaller bags, and disposed of practically 70 pounds of potatoes as a bag. Thus they were able to undersell the legitimate dealers in potatoes who were selling 80 or 90 pounds to the bag. They suggested to the minister that he should make it uniform with the province of Quebec in order that the public would not be deceived, and that there would be a standard weight for a bag of potatoes, so that the consumer would know, in buying a bag of potatoes, that he was entitled to get 80 pounds.

Mr. KIDD. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain), that it would be a great inconvenience to change the weight of a bag of potatoes from 90 pounds to 80 pounds. Sixty pounds to the bushel has been a standard measure, I suppose, ever since we commenced to handle potatoes in Canada. I think it would be very much better if in the province of Quebec the standard were made 60 pounds to the bushel or 90 pounds to the bag, or even to provide that potatoes shall be handled by the hundred pounds. I think that to adopt a standard of 80 pounds to the bag would cause inconvenience. If it were made 80 pounds to the bag, there being 60 pounds to the bushel, how could you be sure that you were putting the specified weight into the bag, because you would have to get it down to the proper number of pounds?

Mr. SPROULE. It would be a bushel and a third.

Mr. KIDD. Yes, a bushel and a third. I think it would be better to change the standard in Quebec to 90 pounds, and make it equal all over the country. It would be a great convenience to have a standard bag of potatoes all over the Dominion as it would also be to have a standard bag of oats. It would be better to have it 34 or 32 pounds to the bushel throughout the whole country.

Mr. FISHER. There is no standard weight in Ontario, or anywhere else except in Quebec. A man might sell a bag of potatoes, and sell any quantity he chose.

Mr. KIDD. What does the minister mean by saying there is no standard in Ontario?

Mr. FISHER. There is no standard in Ontario, or anywhere else except Quebec.

Mr. KIDD. If you sell a bag of potatoes containing 80 pounds in Ottawa you will find that there is a standard before you get away. You would find the market inspector after you, and he would take the potatoes and you along with them.

Mr. FISHER. That is the practice. I do not know what the law courts would say, but there is no standard.

Mr. BLAIN. My understanding is that originally 90 pounds was the standard whether by law or practice or custom. Certain representations were made to the government some years ago and a change was made for the province of Quebec. I have nothing to say about that; possibly it was a good thing then. The complaint comes now, not from Quebec alone, but from Ontario, that there is no uniform bag. There is now an interchange of products between Quebec and Ontario. Quebec potatoes find a market in Toronto, for example, and I can understood that it is not in the best interests of either the buyer or seller that potatoes coming from Quebec should be a bag of 80 pounds and coming from Ontario a bag of 90 pounds. But I do say that the original practice was to sell 90 pounds to the bag of potatoes and if a change was made reducing it to 80 pounds for one province it does not occur to me that it would be very much in the interest of the people, particularly the province of Ontario, that 80 pounds should be adopted for the rest of the country. I repeat——

Mr. FISHER. I do not seem to be able to give my hon. friend to understand that there was no standard weight in Ontario. A bag of potatoes in Quebec was 80 pounds by law, and there was no law with regard to a bag of potatoes in any other part of Canada.

Mr. BLAIN. When was it made 80 pounds by law?

Mr. FISHER. It was made 80 pounds by law in Quebec by Edward VII, chapter 26, section 1. That would be in 1901, I think.

Mr. SPROULE. I think there must be something wrong about that, because my impression is that the provincial authorities have the right to make a law, and that such a law has been in existence for a long time. Why, I say that is because I remember very well many years ago I was in Toronto with a neighbour who was selling potatoes. They were weighed and sold by the bag. The total weight was divided by 90 to get the number of bags. At the same time there were potatoes sold by the bag that were not weighed at the time, but afterwards they were found to contain less than 90 pounds. My recollection is that he threatened to lodge a complaint before the police magistrate, and the party was obliged to settle up. If there was no law I do not see how he could prosecute. Whether it was law or custom it was the common practice for the municipal authorities to make market regulations.

Mr. NESBITT. All are agreed that the weight of the bag should be uniform, but all are not agreed that it should be eighty lbs. I have dealt in potatoes a great deal in my time, and there was no law that I know of governing the weight of a bag of potatoes, although in buying large quantities of potatoes by the bag we always specified that they should be taken at 90 lbs. to the bag. That was the custom when I was in the business, and the reason we did that was that we bought from various provinces. I do not see that any harm can be done by making the weight of a bag of potatoes 80 lbs. because the people will soon get accustomed to it. As a matter of fact, we do not as a rule weigh potatoes.

Mr. SPROULE. In my part of the country everybody weighs the potatoes.

Mr. NESBITT. In taking them into stores in Ontario they weigh them and estimate them at 90 lbs., but a great many potatoes are delivered direct by the farmers to the houses of the people, and not once in a thousand times are they weighed.

Mr. BLAIN. Each bag contains a bushel and a half.

Mr. NESBITT. It is supposed to, but they are mighty short for a bushel and a half. Sometimes if you make the weight 80 pounds uniformly, the people will soon get accustomed to it, and there will be no trouble.

Mr. BLAIN. What reasons would the hon. gentleman give in the interests of the people of Ontario that such a change should be made?

Mr. NESBITT. None, except the advantage of uniformity.

Mr. BLAIN. Why not make it uniform the other way?

Mr. NESBITT. I have been buying seed potatoes this year by the hundred weight, so that it is not absolutely the custom to buy potatoes by the bag in Ontario.

Mr. SPROULE. The reason for making the standard 90 lbs. is simply that two one-half bushels of ordinary potatoes will weigh 60 lbs., and, as the ordinary two-bushel grain bag will hold a bushel and a half of potatoes, that made 90 lbs., and it became the standard. It is not the part of wisdom to change the custom of half a century unless there is strong reason for it. There is no more reason why Ontario should be made to conform to the Quebec custom than that we should ask Quebec to conform to the Ontario custom.

Mr. LALOR. I do not know that the vegetable growers are insistent on the weight being 80 lbs., but what they want is a uniform weight. I would point out that a bushel of measured potatoes at this time of the year will not weigh as much as a bushel of the same potatoes would last fall. The proper course is to make a uniform standard weight throughout the country whether it be 80 lbs. or 90 lbs. In listening to the argument of the vegetable growers before the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I thought their demand was reasonable for a uniform weight for a bag of potatoes, and not so much in their own interest as in the interest of the public, because notwithstanding what the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) says they stated that in Toronto and other places potatoes were sold by the bag at less than 80 lbs. I do not believe there is any law governing it.

Mr. SPROULE. I should doubt that very much.

Mr. TALBOT. The fewer changes we make the better, because changes always lead to confusion. At one time in the province of Quebec, we had a bushel measure, and at another time we had a barrel which was supposed to be three bushels. That was the barrel measure that we interfered with. The barrels have since been made straighter and contain less. Now this bag proposition is made to us. We have no such a thing as a one-third bushel measure, we either have a bushel or a quarter or a half, and that is understood by everybody. We use a bag that is supposed to hold 90 lbs., whether it will hold 90 lbs. or not, that is the kind of bag that will be used. I think, therefore, that on all accounts it is better to leave the present system alone. At present a bag is supposed to hold a bushel and a half and to weigh 90 lbs.; leave it as it is.

Mr. EDWARDS. The minister has spoken positively with regard to there being no law in the province of Ontario fixing a standard weight for a bag of potatoes. I do know, however, that in the city of Kingston potatoes are marketed by the bag, and a bag is supposed to contain a bushel and a half, and to weigh 90 pounds. The market clerk has the right, and has exercised the right, of seizing from the farmers any bags which are supposed to be short of weight, weighing them, confiscating them, and bringing the farmer before the magistrate and having him fined. Now, if there is no law in the province of Ontario fixing the standard weight at 90 pounds, it seems strange that the market clerk should exercise that authority. It may be possible that the general statute gives to municipal corporations the right to pass by-laws governing the weight of potatoes sold in their respective markets. I have always understood that the weight is governed by a general provincial law; the minister says that is not the case.

Mr. FISHER. What I said was that there was no standard fixed by federal law. I think what the hon. gentleman says there is perfectly correct; it may be that municipalities have the power to pass regulations for their own markets, and, therefore, to fix a weight. I said there was no federal law, and under the Inspection and Sale Act there is no standard of weight for a bag of potatoes except in the province of Ontario.

Mr. EDWARDS. I am under the impression that there is a law in the province of Ontario fixing the weight of a bag of potatoes at 90 pounds. I can see that it would be a nice thing to have a uniform standard for the whole Dominion. But I think if the weight is changed from 90 to 80 pounds it will cause a great deal of confusion and inconvenience in the province of Ontario. There is another thing that strikes me. Suppose you fix the weight at 80 pounds. People have been accustomed to look upon a bag of potatoes as containing a bushel and a half, and in a bushel and a half there are six pecks. Now six pecks divides readily in 90 pounds, giving 15 pounds to a peck, and merchants who frequently sell potatoes by the peck would be put to inconvenience if the weight was changed to 80 pounds to the bag.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Now that the minister has fixed a standard weight for all the articles mentioned in the Bill, and in section 2 has fixed a standard for potatoes sold by the bag, I would suggest that he amend section 2 to read as follows:

Any article mentioned in this subsection, if sold by the bag, shall contain one and a half bushels of the standard weight of the article.

Then people will know what they are doing.

Mr. FISHER. That is a reasonable proposition, but I would not like to accept it without consulting with the officers of the department. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

Civil Government—Privy Council office—to provide for one clerkship, second division, subdivision A, $1,600.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The explanation for this addition to the number of clerks in the Privy Council is found in a letter from Mr. Parmelee, the King's Printer, to Mr. Boudreau, Clerk of the Privy Council. It is dated March 22, 1911:

Dear Mr. Boudreau,—The experts who were called upon to investigate conditions at the Bureau have laid great emphasis upon the abuses prevalent in connection with the translating of copy for the printers. They point out that the Bureau has for many years gone beyond the scope of its duties in employing its own proof readers to do translating and to make corrections in connection with translated copy, and for this work the proof readers receive extra pay in addition to their regular salaries.

Speaking of the difficulties created for the Bureau by differences of opinion as to correct translation the experts state as follows:—'Whole sentences are recast after the matter has been put into type for no better reason than that in the opinion of the changer, they are more suitable translations than were given in the original manuscript. It is safe to say that the composition of the publications translated into French cost twice as much at it would were it properly translated and legible copy furnished.'

A full report of the conditions in this connection, by the experts, will be found in the report submitted to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, by the Hon. Mr. Murphy, page 27 and appendices C and D following, and I shall be grateful if you will do me the favour of reading these sections of the report in order that you may be fully impressed as to the abuses therein indicated.

Upon this Mr. Boudreau sent the following memo:

Memo. for the president of the Privy Council.

The King's Printer, in a letter dated the 22nd of March inst. with reference to the translation of orders in council published in the official 'Gazette' says that he is 'directed to state that in the light of the report of experts, his department will no longer assume responsibility for errors in translated copy, and that hereafter no translating of any kind will be done at the Bureau.'

Every week an average of about 15 columns of the 'Official Gazette' will have to be translated by the Privy Council office, which would require the services of a well qualified translator.

The Clerk of the Privy Council could not undertake to do the work himself as he is often absent on official business. There is no other clerk in the office who could do the work. Consequently it would be advisable to create a position in class A of the second division.

Respectfully submitted,
RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Ottawa, 24th March, 1911.

Upon the following recommendation made by myself to the Privy Council, an order was passed:

The undersigned has the honour to recommend that the of the Privy Council office as fixed by order in council of the 25th January, 1909, be further amended to add an additional clerkship to subdivision A of the second division, provision to be made by parliament at this present session.

This recommendation was approved and this was the reason for this item.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. SPROULE. This is for the whole year, of course?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. This is one of the items the right hon. gentleman mentioned this afternoon as requiring to be voted for the whole year?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, that is not one.

Royal Northwest Mounted Police—Coronation contingent—required to meet the transportation and other expenses of the R. N. W. M. Police, $30,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is to provide for a contingent of 75 men and horses at $400 per head.

Steam service between Annapolis and London or Hull, England, or both, $5,000.

Mr. LENNOX. I understood from a statement which I heard the leader of the opposition make at six o'clock that the understanding between the right hon. gentleman and him was that only such items as were mentioned this afternoon would be submitted to the committee to-night. On account of a ball at Government House there is a very slim attendance here, and the impression this afternoon was that we would only sit until about nine o'clock.

Mr. SPROULE. That was my understanding. The right hon. gentleman mentioned certain items which required to be granted in toto, and said that only a proportionate amount of the others would be voted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I said this afternoon that I had an understanding with my hon. friend on the opposite side that the estimates should be advanced. The question was how much. It was understood that certain items would be voted in full and that the others would be voted to at least one-third of their amount. We have received already two-twelfths. My impression was that if, on the 23rd the estimates had not been passed, of what remained, we should get three-twelfths to carry us to the 1st of September. Whether we take the whole or three-twelfths does not matter much to me. But I said that, in any event, some estimates would have to be passed entirely or we could not carry on the business of the country. For instance, the payment of the treaty Indians. We have to start parties north very soon and the Indians must be paid the whole of their indemnity. The coronation contingent must be paid the whole of their indemnity. The full amount for the Festival of Empire must be paid. Whether my understanding of the arrangement is correct or not is of little moment to me at the present time. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is not in this House, and he has entrusted me with carrying his estimates. This is the only time I can give to explanation for the committee so as to have these passed.

Mr. LENNOX. The First Minister has gone far beyond what I mentioned. With a great deal of what he has said I can entirely concur. I mentioned that I had overheard, as I passed, my leader make a statement from which I understood that, so far as to-night is concerned, the Prime Minister would not wish to take up any items except those mentioned that would have to be passed in toto. I called attention to this as we were asked to take up the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. As to the broader question what we should do between this and the 23rd, I was not at all referring to. But I may say that if I thought we were going through the estimates generally to-night I would probably have brought up the matter we were speaking of yesterday. But I understood the Prime Minister wanted to go on with some things before going away and I did not wish to block him. But I do not need to deal with that matter, as my leader (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is here and he will know what to do.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think the Prime Minister is right in his understanding of what the general programme is to be. We are to give one-fourth, or three months' supply to September 1. But between now and the day of adjournment we are to go on with Supply, and with the business of the House as usual. I quite agree with that understanding. So far as the business to-night is concerned, there may be a little misapprehension—not between the Prime Minister and myself, but between myself and my hon. friends on this side—who thought that other items were to be taken up. I do not think that the hon. member from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), expected that the items of trade and commerce would be taken up to-night. However, we might do something at it, for a while anyway.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have been wanting for two or three days to take up the trade and commerce estimates, because I have been charged with it by my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I would not take the House by surprise, and if there were objections I would not press the matter. But if I might, I would like to reserve any points for further consideration later on.

Steam service between Annapolis and London or Hull, England, or both, $5,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This and succeeding items, down to and including 231, involve nothing new except in one or possibly two cases. The others are as they have been for some years past. Therefore, I do not think they are contentious matters at all. In the item:

Steam service between Bonaventure river, Quebec, Petit Rocher and Bathurst, N.B., triweekly, during the season of 1911, $5,000.

There has been an increase of $2,000. The reason is that we have not been able to keep the service alive for the former subsidy of $3,000. The next is:

Steam service between Canada and Australia on the Pacific ocean, $180,509.

The most important item of change is here. I move that, instead of reading as it does now, it should read:

Steam service between Canada and New Zealand or Australia or both.

The reason is that we are not able to make any agreement yet with Australia in regard to this subsidy. We have made a contract with New Zealand, that Dominion contributing an amount in proportion to our own. We expect that Australia will come in later. As I said, I do not think any of these items are contentious.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The first item is for steam service between Annapolis and English ports. That, I understand, is the continuation of an existing service; how frequent in the service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The contractor for this service is the Acadia Steamship Company, Annapolis Royal. The steamships are: 'The Atlantis,' 704 tons net, 1,170 tons gross, ten knots; 'The Katinka,' 702 tons net, 1,162 gross, ten knots; 'The Katie,' 634 tons net, 1,099 gross, twelve knots; 'The Ada,' 639 tons net, 1,100 gross, ten knots. The contract calls for five voyages, $1,000 for each voyage.

Mr. CROSBY. Who receives this subsidy?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Acadia Steamship Company. The boats I have just mentioned—'The Atlantis,' 'The Katinka,' 'The Katie,' and the 'Ada.'

Mr. CROSBY. Are they British boats?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there any control over the rates for freight?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Under all these subsidy contracts we have control of rates

Mr. CROSBY. Who are the directors of this company?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sure I do not know. I have not that information at hand.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I suppose these boats are not fitted up with cold storage accommodation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. They have cooled air ventilation and fruit decks.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Has the service been satisfactory?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand it has been fairly so. It has not been as frequent as it might have been.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Have there been any complaints of the conditions of cargo landed on the other side?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, occasionally.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Have they been investigated?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Always.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). With what results?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Sometimes it has been found that the fault was with the company, and sometimes with the shippers themselves—the fruit not very good when shipped. But the service has been fairly well performed.

Mr. CROSBY. It seems to me strange that we should grant a subsidy to a company of which we do not know even the president, or the directors. It also seems to me strange to grant a subsidy to a steamship company to go to Annapolis and load apples when we have at the same time a company running from Halifax to the same port to which we grant a subsidy. I can see no reason for granting a further subsidy. I am not conversant with the boats just mentioned, but I think we ought to have time to see whether these boats are British or Norwegian boats. We know that subsidies are being paid to foreign boats running from Canadian ports to the West Indies. Therefore, I say we should be careful, before we grant subsidies, to know something about the company, and something about the boats. The boats referred to as having a subsidy from the city of Halifax particularly for this trade, are boats of the Furness Line, but the boats of that line are all British boats. That subsidy is granted to assist this particular trade, and amounts to $25,000 a year. I think that boats can be had to carry apples from Annapolis to the other side without any subsidy at all. I think a subsidy granted to a line running from St. John to the West Indies which I do not think was very successful, and that subsidy was largely given to a Norwegian boat.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I dissent altogether from the statement that we have given a subsidy to Norwegian boats. We do not pay any subsidies except to British boats, no subsidy is given to any boats except they are on the British register. With regard to the directors of the company, I have the contract in the office, and it is easy to get the information the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crosby) asks for. But the question is not who the directors are, but whether the service is well performed, and if it is well performed, it is of no consequence who the directors of the company are. This subsidy is not a large one, the boats only make five trips in the autumn, and the object is to ship the apple crop of the Annapolis valley. I think that object is one which commends itself to the judgment of parliament.

Mr. BLACK. The shipping of apples from the port of Annapolis is one of great moment to the people of the whole of that valley. Halifax is situated quite a distance from the fruit belt, and the haul to Halifax is a long one for Nova Scotia. Annapolis is right in the fruit belt, and the difference in freight means a good deal to the apple raisers. There is about 125 miles of a haul from Annapolis to Halifax, while the quantity of fruit produced near Annapolis, with a very short haul, will load a steamer. It is of great moment to the fruit growers that their apples should be shipped direct from the port of Annapolis rather than from Halifax, after making a long haul.

Mr. EDWARDS. The First Minister stated in regard to this line that the government had control of the rates. Am I right in assuming that that control applies to all lines to which subsidies are granted?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does that control of rates apply only to goods going from Canada, or does it also apply to goods coming in?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is chiefly on the export traffic.

Mr. CROSBY. The First Minister stated that it did not make much difference who the companies were.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Who the directors were.

Mr. CROSBY. The only way to get at a company is to know the directors. The only way to indentify a company is through their board of management. I should think it very essential for parliament to know to whom we are granting this money. We want to know what the character of the company is, and whether this company has a line of boats or not. My own idea is that you are handling this money over to some so-called company, and that that so-called company charter a boat to go to Annapolis and load a cargo of fruit. They charter that boat whenever they have a cargo of fruit ready for it. The right hon. Prime Minister shakes his head; if he can give me some information on that point I will be very glad.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The names of the vessels that are to carry the fruit are mentioned in the contract. This contract has been made with the Acadia Steamship Company of Annapolis Royal. I do not know the board of directors, but I have a statement in my hand that in the contract the company bind themselves to carry out its terms, and to ship these fruits by the steamships 'Atlantis,' 'Katinka,' 'Katie,' and 'Ada.' The boats are not merely hired for this purpose; the names of the boats are mentioned in the contract itself.

Mr. CROSBY. I do not know anything of the Acadia Steamship Company of Annapolis. I have sent for Lloyd's Register, and we will be able to ascertain in a short time whether they have any such boats or not. But, in the meantime, I will undertake to say, from my knowledge of shipping, that the Acadia Steamship Company of Annapolis do not own any such boats, and I do not know any company which does own any boat which can be used for the transportation of apples from Annapolis to the old country. Therefore, the company must charter boats to go and make a trip at certain seasons of the year when boats are available for that work. This money can only be handed over to a company, calling themselves by what name they may, and if we hand it over to them we ought to know to whom we are handing it over even if we do not follow the money any further. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden), who is right beside the First Minister, must know the Acadian Steamship Company of Annapolis. I have some men in my mind. For instance there is Mr. Chase who is a large exporter of apples and potatoes from that country. If you could say that Mr. Chase is at the head of any such company I would say it was all right because I know Mr. Chase as everybody does. But not knowing the names of any of the men associated with this company, we are simply voting money when we do not know exactly for what purpose it is going to be used. It may be done with all good intentions.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We do not pay the money in a lump sum, but we pay $1,000 a trip. The money is paid only when the conditions of the contract have been fulfilled. It is only paid when it is earned, each trip.

Mr. CROSBY. If the First Minister would grant me $5,000 or $1,000 a trip I would be very glad to supply steamers to carry these products to the old country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We will do that.

Mr. CROSBY. Then we had better arrange so that I can get that $5,000. I do not know that I am particularly anxious to have it. But, we should know who is going to get this money. To whom did you pay it last year? There must be some man who received this money, and gave a receipt for it. If you give us the name of somebody who got it last year we will have somebody to talk to.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The principal thing we should be anxious about is as to whether this service is a deserving one, whether the people who are performing it are earning the money and whether it is in the public interest. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Crosby) has referred to me. I know there is such a company. I think that one of the men interested in it is Mr. Whitman of Annapolis, and the company is duly chartered. Mr. Whitman is one of the most respectable business men in Nova Scotia, if he is interested, and I think he is. The people in the western part of the Annapolis valley are very much interested in this service. It is beneficial to them. I cannot understand why my hon. friend is so strongly opposed to the people of western Nova Scotia getting some benefit from it.

Mr. CROSBY. I am not opposing this; I am asking for information, and I think I have a right to ask for it. If we are going to give $5,000 to somebody, certainly we ought to know who is going to get it.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Then he is supporting the vote, not opposing it?

Mr. CROSBY. I do not think that my hon. friend should be permitted to say that I am opposing it. I certainly did make inquiry with regard to it. But, it is not necessary——

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I do not know why I should be interrupted. I never interrupted the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CROSBY. All right, Sir, you may have the floor, but I will be after you in a moment.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I believe this service is in the interest of the people of the Annapolis valley. I believe that the money paid is earned, and I wish to say that not a dollar of it is paid until it is earned. A contract has been made, that contract is open to tender and it is open to other companies, if they wish to perform this service, to put in tenders. I cannot quite understand why this item should be opposed.

Mr. CROSBY. I am neither supporting nor opposing it. I believe in subsidies if they are in the right direction, and if the results are such as to benefit the trade of the country. I see the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Pickup) here; he certainly must know who is behind this steamship company. I hold in my hand Lloyd's Register of shipping which has all the ship owners of the world in it. I will hand it over to my hon. friend, and see if he can find this company registered or if he can find them registered as owning any steamers. As a matter of fact I know they do not own any steamers, and I am saying that in the presence of the Minister of Militia, and the representative of the county of Annapolis, and I say without fear of contradiction that this company do not own a single steamer. If that be so is it not fair that we should ask to whom we are paying this money, and to whom this company are going to pay the money. In making reference to the conditions in Halifax I have no desire that anything shall be done detrimental to any other part of the Dominion. I am desirous that everything shall be done to facilitate trade in every part of the Dominion. I referred to the Furness line of steamers which runs from Halifax. I have no doubt that that company could send a steamer to Annapolis to accommodate the apple trade of Nova Scotia, and the western part of Nova Scotia particularly. I know Mr. Whitman to be a very decent and respectable man, and I have not a word to say about him. The Dominion government have bonused more than one man to form a company, but it is not a fair thing to us to vote $5,000 to a so called company. The First Minister tells me that he does not know anything about it although this subsidy has been given for a year or two past. Still, we cannot tell anything about the company.

Mr. PICKUP. Perhaps it is well I should explain that this company is composed of farmers, with Mr. Whitman as their secretary, and they charter boats during the season and have done so for the last ten years, on which to ship their apples to Europe. Only a proportion of the subsidy is drawn each year, there being $1,000 allowed for every boat that comes in under charter, and in consequence of this subsidy the farmers in western Nova Scotia, including the counties of Kings and Annapolis are enabled to obtain a cheaper rate for the apples they ship from that part of the country. As low as forty and fifty cents a barrel have been paid as freight, when the rate from Annapolis and Kings county by rail via Halifax to English market was 85 to 90 cents per bbl., thus saving the farmers who avail themselves of the opportunity 30 to 40 cents per bbl. on each cargo of 10,000 barrels which, I think, would justify granting this subsidy. This subsidy is for the purpose of assisting the farmers of that part of the Dominion to get a cheap rate to the old country, They have chartered one or two vessels during the season,—I think four boats is the greatest number they have used in any one year,—and they draw $1,000 for each boat they charter—to the old country. Under this system they have shipped as many as 8,000 or 10,000 barrels on each boat, so that it only has cost the government ten cents a barrel to grant this very valuable assistance. I do not think any objection can be made to this vote at all. It is as justifiable a subsidy as is granted by this government to any service whether it be from Halifax or St. John or anywhere else.

Mr. CROSBY. That confirms my statement that this is not a company owning boats.

Mr. PICKUP. What does it matter whether the company owns a boat or whether it charters a boat to carry on the business they undertake so long as it affords the people a satisfactory and cheap service to get their products to the market?

Mr. SINCLAIR. It is the commonest thing in the world for steamship lines to charter boats, and my hon. friend (Mr. Crosby) knows that very well. The Furness line charter tramp boats from Halifax that they do not own at all. The contract with them is that they shall send a boat out at certain periods of the year to carry the freight, and it makes not the slightest difference to the farmers or the community generally whether the company owns the boat or not so long as their freight is carried.

Mr. CROSBY. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) knows as well as I do that there is no steamship company in the world that does not own some boat. While the Canadian Pacific railway and other big lines charter boats at times, they have some boats to start with and they have something to offer when they ask for a subsidy. But here we have a company asking for a subsidy that has no boat at all, and that does not propose to own a boat, not to speak of having her registered in the Dominion. I know Mr. Whitman very well. Something has taken place within the last year that will alter the whole conditions of trade with Annapolis. I am as anxious to see facilities for trade provided at Annapolis as at Halifax or anywhere else. The Canadian Pacific railway have recently bought the Western Counties railway, and they will no doubt make a strong bid for the apple trade from the Annapolis district. They will, I believe, give every advantage to the people of Annapolis and Western Nova Scotia to get their fruit to the old country not only at a low freight rate, but in such an excellent condition that tramp steamers cannot compete with them.

Mr. PICKUP. These are not tramp steamers; they are freight boats that come from Spain and southern European ports, with fruit to the United States, and on their way back they call at Annapolis and carry the fruit and land it on the other side in good condition.

Mr. CROSBY. I think I will be able to show that these ships come from Spain and Norway.

Mr. PICKUP. They are English and Norwegian.

Mr. CROSBY. I know what I am talking about, and I am satisfied that I will be able to show that they are more Norwegian than English. I am quite sure that one of the main objects of the Canadian Pacific railway in acquiring that railway was to capture the apple trade of Western Nova Scotia, and in doing that they will not only give cheap transportation but the very best facilities. The subsidy is not large, it is true, but large or small we should not grant a subsidy without knowing why we are doing it. The Canadian Pacific railway will run their boats to Annapolis if they find it convenient, or they will take the apples to Halifax or St. John and send them to England from one of these ports. I do not mean to accuse the First Minister of naming boats that are not such, but I doubt very much that these are British boats, and the time has come when whatever subventions we give should be given to British boats only.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend is a doubting Thomas, but I will try and convince him that his suspicions are without foundation. We have the information from the hon. member for Annapolis that the company is composed of farmers, and that they charter boats for the purpose of shipping their own fruit, and an inquiry made by the Auditor General brought out a reply which is to be found in the report of the Trade and Commerce Department for 1909-10, which will give the history of the service. The hon. gentleman will find the correspondence in the Auditor General's Report for the year 1909-10. The correspondence is as follows:

Audit Office, Ottawa, December 21, 1909.

Sir,—In the contract with the Acadia Steamship Company for steamship service between Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia, and London or Hull, England, the payment of the subsidy of $1,000 for each voyage is made dependent on evidence being submitted to the department, sufficient to show that the 'fruit or other perishable produce shipped on such voyage was carried and delivered at the port of destination in good and satisfactory condition in so far as proper storage and ventilation thereof were concerned.' Have you received the necessary evidence in the way of certificate or otherwise that the fruit carried on the voyages for which you ask payment in your application of the 16th instant reached its destination in good and satisfactory condition?

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
J. A. FRASER, A.G.

The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Trade and Commerce Department,
Ottawa, December 23, 1909.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of December 21, I beg to send you herewith evidence submitted by the Acadia Steamship Company showing that the fruit and other perishable produce carried on the above service was delivered at port of destination in good and satisfactory condition in so far as proper storage and ventilation thereof were concerned.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
F. C. T. O'HARA, D.M.

The Auditor General.

Audit Office, Ottawa, December 28, 1909.

Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23rd instant inclosing temperature charts of the steamers 'Atlantis' and 'Katinka' which performed the voyages between Annapolis, Nova Scotia, and London, England, during the apple season, 1909, the subsidy for which you have asked payment in your application of 16th instant.

Were the fruit cargoes of these steamers examined in the interests of the department at the port of destination, by any person in a position to certify that the fruit was in good condition at the end of the voyage?

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
J. A. FRASER, A.G.

The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Trade and Commerce Department,
Ottawa, December 29, 1909.

Sir,—Referring to your letter of December 28, I beg to state that the fruit cargoes on the steamers referred to were examined at the port of destination, and this department was advised that the receivers in Hull had wired the company in Annapolis that the 'Cargoes 'Atlantis.' 'Katinka,' with regard to proper stowage, ventilation, delivered in good condition.'

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
F. C. T. O'HARA, D.M.

The Auditor General.

That ought to satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. CROSBY. The First Minister must think I am very easy to satisfy if he thinks that will satisfy me. I could not hear one word to indicate that they are British boats.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is a stipulation of the contract that they must be British boats. If they were not it would be a fraud on the government and they would get no subsidy.

Mr. CROSBY. That may be. I have not had time to look the boats up, but I think we should have that. Would the member for Annapolis state what Mr. Whitman has to do with this?

Mr. PICKUP. He assembles the fruit.

Mr. CROSBY. What I want is information as to the company. A steamship company or any other company cannot have less than three members.

Mr. PICKUP. The Acadia Steamship Company, I suppose, has 100 shareholders.

Mr. CROSBY. Could the hon. member name some of them?

Mr. PICKUP. Mr. Whitman, Mr. Spur and Mr. G. R. Jones.

Mr. CROSBY. It strikes me that whatever reason there may have been for giving the subsidy in the past there is no reason for giving it to-day. We are subsidizing a line to go to Annapolis and one to Halifax, two lines for the one character of trade. Then the Canadian Pacific railway has acquired this road, and I am satisfied that they will give as good a rate on fruit from Halifax, St. John or Annapolis as will be given by any steamship company or tramp steamer, and in addition to that they will give accommodation and storage for that fruit such as has not before been furnished.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Then no one will ship by this line, and no subsidy will be paid.

Mr. CROSBY. If my hon. friend will grant a subsidy of $5,000 he will find some one to take it off his hands.

Mr. PICKUP. It is only $1,000 a trip, and she carries 10,000 barrels, so that the farmers are saving $4,000 on each trip.

Mr. CROSBY. If the Prime Minister will let this stand over until to-morrow, I will be able to prove that there is nothing in the statement of rates, that the rates offered by other companies to take the freight of Halifax will be equal to the freight from Annapolis. Of course if it goes through I have nothing further to say.

Steam service between Baddeck, Grand Narrows and Iona, $5,825.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What boat performs this service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The contract is with the Victoria Steamship Company of Baddeck, and the steamer is the 'Blue Hill.'

Mr. CROSBY. Can you give any information about the directors of this company?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, I do not know.

Mr. KYTE. One of the directors and the manager is Mr. A. H. Sutherland, of Baddeck, another is Mr. J. E. Hamilton, retired merchant of Baddeck.

Mr. CROSBY. Can you assure me that Mr. Young, of Sydney, is not one?

Mr. KYTE. Mr. Young has nothing to do with it whatever.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is it a weekly service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No; two full round trips are run daily during the season of navigation.

Steam service between Bonaventure river, Quebec, Petit Rocher and Bathurst, N.B., triweekly, during the season of 1911, $5,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No service was run under a contract on this route during the last year, but a contract was entered into on January 9, with Angus McLean for a service to be performed from the opening of navigation, 1911, to March 31, 1916, by a steamer of not less than 1,000 tons register, with accommodation for 100 passengers. Mails are to be carried, and the annual subsidy is $5,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the reason of the increase?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No company would take it for the subsidy, and there was no service last year.

Steamship service between Canada and Australia on the Pacific Ocean—Five-sixths of $180,509.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This service was performed for a number of years by the Union Steamship Company of New Zealand. There are six steamers in all with speed varying from 14 to 16½ knots per hour. They make four-weekly trips from Sydney and return, calling at Brisbane, Fiji, Honolulu, and the outer wharf of Victoria. The subsidy is £37,090 15s. 2d. per annum. A new contract is being prepared with the same company for service between Canada and New Zealand for five years, calling at Honolulu and Fiji, beginning August 1, 1911. The contractors are permitted to extend the voyage to Australia. The contract is based on the present Canadian-Australian service.

Mr. DANIEL. Is the tonnage gross or net?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have given the gross only.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How long is the contract for?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Five years.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. In what position is the All Red Route system at present?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That depends very much on whether the imperial government are ready to contribute or not. New Zealand has always been ready to contribute handsomely; Australia has not been so ready. Unless we have the good will of Australia, I have no hope that we shall have an All Red Route. The matter no doubt will be taken up at the next conference. If we can prevail on the British government to give us a subsidy also on the Atlantic ocean, whether they contribute to the Pacific ocean service or not, that would mean a good deal. A good deal of the success of the All Red Route depends on what service we would obtain on the Atlantic. If we could obtain a fast service on the Atlantic for a reasonable sum, no doubt we could have a service which would go far to make the All Red Route an accomplished fact.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It is entirely left with the British government and the government of Australia to do their part towards the maintenance of such a service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We would expect that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. But in passing this vote, will we not be interfering in some way with the carrying out of that proposition? We are entering into an arrangement for five years.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The All Red Route is not in such a position of certainty that we should neglect the opportunity of having a good service on the Pacific ocean. Moreover, to organize the All Red Route service and secure the proper steamers would take nearly five years.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. We are about to expend £37,000 on the inauguration of this system, and enter into a contract for five years right in the teeth of the fact that the Prime Minister is going to a Colonial Conference which will take up this very subject, and bring it probably to some satisfactory conclusion. Would it not be wise to let this matter stand until after the conference? £37,000 would be a considerable amount to give toward the subsidy Canada would be likely to grant for an All Red Route.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sorry to say that I do not see such an immediate prospect of realizing an All Red route as would warrant us with not keeping the service we have in hand.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would it not be possible to enter into a contract for the present year only?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think that any steamship company such as this one—a respectable, strong company—would undertake a service of this kind for one year only.

Mr. DANIEL. Is it not a fact that at the last Imperial Conference the Prime Minister of Australia said it would be impossible to do a freight service by the All Red Route over Canada on account of the transhipment of goods, and that they could send freight just as quickly, and cheaper by way of the Suez canal?

Mr. EDWARDS. On a previous item the right hon. gentleman said that this government regulated the freight rates of these companies to which subsidies were granted chiefly on the goods exported from Canada. I would take that to mean that to a certain extent the government also regulated the freight rate on the goods coming in by these lines.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand that we cannot regulate these rates absolutely. We run up against what is known as the North Atlantic Conference. As to the goods that are shipped out of the country, we control the rates absolutely, but as to the goods coming in we do not.

Mr. EDWARDS. The main object of these subsidies, I should think, would be to facilitate the outgo of Canadian products. But when we consider the figures in the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce as showing the amount of our produce sent to Australia and New Zealand, we cannot but have some doubts as to the advisability of granting $300,500 a year—that is what this item and the next, covering the trade between the Canada and Australia and New Zealand, both on the Atlantic and Pacific amount to—to facilitate that trade. Another point that suggests itself is that all the time we have been granting these subsidies and so endeavouring to facilitate the outgo of Canadian products to Australia and New Zealand, these countries have maintained pretty high tariffs against the goods from this country. But it is quite possible that if the agreement now pending before the House is ratified we shall be paying these hundreds of thousands of dollars of subsidy to bring goods into Canada to compete with our own products. For instance, take the item of mutton from Australia. There is a very remarkable growth of the amount of that product brought into this country in recent years. It grew from 60,000 pounds in 1905 to over 1,000,000 pounds in 1908, and in 1910 it was 1,377,270 pounds. I do not know what it was in the fiscal year just closed, but the indications in the answer given to questions were that not only the amount of mutton, but the amount of other products, coming from these countries to Canada is increasing, notwithstanding the duty they have to pay at the present time. At the same time, our exports to Australia and New Zealand have grown comparatively little. In 1908 our exports amounted to $992,442. That is the sum total of the goods shipped from this country, both home and foreign, for Australia and New Zealand. In 1909 it was only $996,901, and in 1910 it dropped to $890,549. There does not seem to be any very great growth in the outgo of our products to New Zealand—it seems rather declining. This makes me doubt the advisability of the subsidy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No doubt my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) is right; we have received very small returns indeed for the large outlay we have made in providing steamship accommodation between Canada, Australia and New Zealand. Trade has not grown correspondingly. New Zealand has given us a preference, as we have given her, but Australia has not, up to the present time, gives us a preference. But we have a promising trade in Australia, chiefly in agricultural implements. Notwithstanding the very high tariff against it, this trade has grown and is still growing. The subsidy for which as we are now asking the approval of the House is not confined to Canada alone, but is correspondingly maintained by New Zealand. The question simply is: Are we to have communication with the sister colony, New Zealand, or not? These steamers are chiefly mail and passenger steamers. We expect, in the course of time, if we cannot get the whole of the freight trade of New Zealand and Australia, we ought to have a very large and increasing proportion of the passenger trade. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) advise us, in the face of the fact that we have on this continent a British Dominion, and that there are on the other side of the world two British Dominions, that it is not worth while to pay to have steam communication between them? The matter is not only one of business. There is a question of sentiment, and more, one of high policy that we should keep steamship, telegraphic and any other communication possible with our fellow subjects on the other side of the world. That is partly the reason we have the subsidy. And if we pay these subsidies, we must expect that the steamers will carry goods into Canada also. We sell some of our goods to the British subjects in Australia and New Zealand, and we must expect that they will send in return what goods they can sell us. I think the policy a wise one. It is not a new one, and I have never heard it seriously challenged up to the present time.

Mr. PORTER. Are these steamships subsidized by New Zealand and Australia as well as by Canada?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. They are subsidized by New Zealand. Formerly they were subsidized by Australia also, but Australia refused to go into the last contract.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is their reason for refusing?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is more than I can say.

Mr. EDWARDS. Of course, if the granting of these subsidies is to be considered on sentimental as well as economic lines, it opens up a very different field. I may be wrong in my recollection, but I think I have heard somebody say, or have read somewhere that some person said, in this House, that very little consideration ought to be given to sentiment in the matter of trade relations. However, I have no wish to sever the connection between Canada and other parts of the empire. If the link can be made stronger by subsidizing steamship lines all right. But it occurred to me that as a business proposition, it would be quite right to consider the possibility of goods coming in on these subsidizing vessels as well as going out on them. And, in view of the growth of the importation from Australia and New Zealand into Canada, and notwithstanding the present rate of duties, it would seem to me that if the agreement which has come up for consideration in this House for some time is ratified, there would be still greater importations of their products into this country to compete with the farm products of Canada; and so the subsidy we grant will not be so much to facilitate the outgoing of Canadian products as the incoming of the products with which Canadian products will have to compete.

I would not for a moment advocate that these subsidies be discontinued. They have been granted for many years, and I would feel like subordinating my own view to the views of men of greater experience in such matters. I would like to know the character of our export trade to Australia and New Zealand. I know that a great part of it consists of agricultural implements, and I have no hesitation in saying that I do not feel like facilitating the exportation of agricultural implements. I feel that the agricultural implement people have had the big end of the stick in this country for a long while, and if we are granting subsidies to take so many hundred thousand dollars of Canadian produce, chiefly agricultural implements, to Australia and New Zealand, the return cargoes being the produce of these countries coming into direct competition with what our farmers produce, then it seem to open up another field of consideration as to the advisability of continuing to grant extensive subsidies for that purpose.

Mr. REID (Grenville). To whom are these subsidies paid?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is paid to the Union Steamship Company.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Have we any communication with Australia by the Canadian Pacific railway?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. On the Atlantic, but not on the Pacific.

Mr. REID (Grenville). This is the only communication with Australia?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister at the coming conference to urge the importance of carrying out the All Red Route proposition? Has any effort been made to secure control of telegraph lines across the country to assist in carrying out that project or to build telegraph lines?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know that we have attempted to have our own lines on the continent. One of the objects of the conference will be to discuss cable service across the Atlantic. On this subject the government has already had a very voluminous correspondence with the imperial government.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I asked whether the Prime Minister intended to urge upon the conference the importance of this All Red Route system?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly, and I am very glad to have the assistance of my hon. friend.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. In reference to the cable system the Prime Minister is well aware that unless we do our part in carrying messages across our own country, we can hardly expect in the near future to have a cable system carried to any successful conclusion, and if the Prime Minister or his government have not taken any action in the matter I would be very much surprised.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We have had numerous conferences with the Canadian Pacific railway with regard to the improvement of the service on the continent, and I am glad to say it has been improved, and I have had no complaint of late upon that subject. We now have the Pacific Cable which is owned by the four governments, Great Britain, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. We have communication by the Canadian Pacific railway wire across the continent. Now the one question which is of greater moment is communication between Canada and Great Britain, and this is one of the subjects to be taken up at the conference.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The rates of the Canadian Pacific railway are under consideration as well, are they not?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIN. The question of steamship subsidies does not receive much attention in this House. The right hon. gentleman to-night suggests that a very large number of items might pass without much discussion because they have passed the House for many years. In my opinion these matters should be gone into very closely. Every one of these subsidies should be carefully investigated, taking into consideration the development of trade between Canada and these other countries, the changed conditions of the carrying trade and commerce generally. I believe a special commission should be appointed to secure better and fuller information upon this matter, so that it might be placed on a better and more substantial and more Canadian basis. The goods brought in by many of these lines come into competition with our own goods. It is very important, as the right hon. gentleman points out, that we should have communication with all parts of the British Empire, but I do think that these matters pass the House without much consideration and I venture to say do not receive proper consideration by the government; there is a tendency to take it for granted that, having passed, they should pass again. When we ask what the results have been we are generally told by the ministers that the increase in trade has been disappointing. We hear that year after year. I think the appointment of a commission in order that this whole matter should be revised would be in the best interests of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Has the government control of the rates on goods exported from Canada on subsidized steamers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes; they are subject to the approval of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and if the rates are not approved, the subsidies can be cancelled.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It seems strange that this arrangement should be entered into without the assistance of Australia. Australia receives the greatest benefit from this subsidy, yet this country and New Zealand are practically bearing the whole cost of the subsidy. The Prime Minister seems to be unable to give any explanation why Australia is not assisting in this subsidy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As far as I can understand the reason, it is this: The steamship service is perfcrmed by the same company with Australia and New Zealand. If we had a service direct to Australia I think Australia would contribute, but the fact that the steamers going from Vancouver to Australia call at New Zealand, lengthens the journey, and therefore the service is not as speedy as it might otherwise be. That is my own surmise. We shall know more when I come back from the conference. If my hon. friend will then question me I will perhaps be able to give him a better answer than I can at the present time, because this is certain to be one of the subjects that will be discussed at the conference. At the present time I have no information except that Australia has refused to participate. We have wired, telegraphed and written and at last the matter could not be delayed any longer, and we concluded to make an arrangement with New Zealand in the hope that Australia will come in. Since it has been done, I understand that Australia may perhaps come in.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That seems an additional reason why this vote should stand over until the Prime Minister returns. It certainly seems a reasonable question to ask, because Australia is one of the colonies that is going to receive the greatest benefit from this very same source, and at the same time we assist them to bring goods into our country to compete with our own. If the reciprocity deal should ever happen to pass this House their goods will be coming in here in direct competition with our farmers' products and do an immense amount of injury to our people. That we should grant this subsidy in order to assist them to do it seems rather unfair.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend is all wrong. This subsidy is for a service between Canada and New Zealand, and not between Canada and Australia.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes, but Australia benefits by it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The steamers may call at Australia; that is they have permission to go there. I may say to my hon. friend that Australia was ready to contribute if we were willing to ignore New Zealand, but we would not do that, and Australia retired.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. These same boats call at Australia, and collect the products that will come to our country and compete in such large quantities.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The boats leave Vancouver and go direct to New Zealand. Then, the company have the privilege of extending their trip to Australia.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to add one word as to why the item attracted my attention. I could not help but compare it with item No. 174, for a service between Canada and Great Britain, costing us $600,000. When one considers that we are granting a subsidy of $600,000 to facilitate the exportation of our products to our best customer, and granting half that amount for an exceedingly small trade, in so far as anything we have to sell is concerned, with Australia and New Zealand, it did strike me that one subsidy was entirely out of proportion with the other.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Does my hon. friend compare the subsidy for the New Zealand service with the subsidy to the Allan line for the service to London? The things are not comparable.

Mr. EDWARDS. I was comparing them purely from the standpoint of the trade figures. The amount that we sell to Australia and New Zealand is exceedingly small. For instance, to New Zealand, we sold in 1910, of home products, $887,058. I understand that New Zealand reciprocates in this matter of the subsidy, but that Australia does not. We sold to Australia $3,561,075 of home products, and we admitted from Australia $403,484 and $774,166 worth in 1910. It is true that the balance of trade is in our favour, but the amount of the subsidy for the amount of the trade seems to me to be large.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have nothing to say of the result in so far as trade is concerned. We have not obtained what we had reason to believe we should obtain from this service. The question is whether we should maintain it or drop it. I have stated the reasons why I think the steamship service ought to be maintained even if it does not give us as much trade as we should receive.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the position of the Prime Minister not be stronger at the colonial conference when he was arguing with Australia in order to induce them to enter into this arrangement if the item was not passed?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, I think not. I think the item must go through, because we must have a service on the Pacific ocean with that colony.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I would like to ask the right hon. First Minister if there is any subsidy granted for a steamship service between Canada and the Argentine republic?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. None whatever.

Steam service between Canadian Atlantic ports and Australia and New Zealand, $120,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is for an Atlantic service, and the subsidy is voted to the New Zealand Shipping Company. The following steamships are engaged in this service:

Name.	Tonnage. Net.	Gross.	Speed. Knots.
Rakaia..	3,660	5,628	11
Whakatane..	3,786	5,902	11
Wakanui..	3,751	5,824	11
Waimate..	3,629	5,610	11
Turkistan..	2,899	4,505	11
Tokomaru..	4,072	6,238	11½
Kumara..	3,907	6,034	12

These boats sail on or about the 15th of each month. The summer service is between Montreal and Auckland, Wellington, Lyttleton and Dunedin, in New Zealand, and the ports of Melbourne and Sydney in Australia, while the winter service is from St. John and Halifax, to the ports mentioned in New Zealand and Australia.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to know if the right hon. gentleman has the figures indicating what proportion of our trade between Canada, Australia and New Zealand is carried through Atlantic ports and what through Pacific ports?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No I have not. This was a new service which was inaugurated a little more than a year ago, at the instance of the merchants, chiefly of Toronto and Montreal, on the representation that unless we had a steamship service from the Atlantic all the trade we have with Australia would go by New York. We have inaugurated this service to keep in British channels the trade of the St. Lawrence. We have yet no statistics to enable us to distinguish between the trade done by the Pacific service and the Atlantic service.

Steam service between Canada and Great Britain, $600,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is the well known service of the Allan Line. The steamships are the 'Victorian', 10,629 tons gross, speed 18 knots; 'Virginian' 10,764 tons, speed 18 knots; 'Corsican', 11,436 tons, speed 15 knots; 'Grampian, 9,603 tons, speed 15 knots; 'Hesperian, 9,599 tons, speed 15 knots; 'Tunisian', 10,576 tons, speed 15½ knots. By an agreement between the Allan Line, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Line the service is performed also by: 'Empress of Britain', 14,189 gross tons, speed, 18½ knots; 'Empress of Ireland', 14,191 tons, speed 18½ knots. There are ten complete round voyages per annum by each steamer. The winter service is Halifax, St. John, and Liverpool, and the summer service, Montreal, Quebec and Liverpool. This contract is about to expire and we have not renewed it. We think that at the present time the service on the St. Lawrence can be performed without any special subsidy. This is chiefly for the carriage of the mails—and that the mails can be carried on the poundage system as far as the summer service is concerned, although it may be different in the case of the winter service. We have reason to expect that the time has come when we should look forward to a far better and speedier service than we have had. We believe we should have a service of at least twenty-one knots as compared with 18½ knots now, and we have expectation that we may receive offers for such a service.

Mr. SPROULE. Why are you voting a subsidy if you have not renewed the contract?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The contract is for five years, and we do not propose to renew it, although we may have to continue it for one or two years. This vote will carry us over one year, and meantime we are expecting offers for a better service.

Mr. SPROULE. Do those who use the cold storage on these ships for their dairy products, &c., get better terms on account of this subsidy? Some years ago when the cold storage arrangement was entered into, we provided that those who use it should get a better rate than the ordinary rate, but I think of late years that arrangement has not been adhered to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. All the rates are under the control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The contract reads:

It is further understood and agreed that the tolls to be charged in the way of either freight or passenger rates between ports on both east and westbound trips shall always under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be charged equally to all persons, and at the same rate, whether by weight or otherwise, in respect of all traffic of the same description and receiving in carriage the like accommodation; and further, that no toll shall be charged which discriminates against Canadian merchants or shippers or against emigrants to Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. That is all right so far as it goes, but originally there was a provision that the cold storage rates on these subsidized steamers would be less than on unsubsidized steamers. I think that that arrangement was dropped some time ago. As the First Minister says, this service ought to be self-supporting without a subsidy, but when we give a subvention ostensibly for the mail service it ought to help to stimulate the exportation of these perishable products and secure a larger return for the farmers of the country by enabling them to ship at lower rates.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. All these are valuable considerations for the next contract.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am glad to know that the Prime Minister has not renewed this contract. Might I suggest to him a point worthy of consideration, that, while the rate from Liverpool to Halifax is, I think, seventeen shillings, the rate from Liverpool to New York is only nine or ten shillings, and, steamers receiving this large subsidy should be practically forced to compete in freight rates with the port of New York. If that were done, it would help our land transportation systems.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. I agree with the First Minister that we ought to have a much faster Atlantic service. We have for years past engaged in a childish effort to negotiate with these people who are providing boats for the service which are away behind the age, if not in comfort, certainly in speed. It is time we should have a faster Atlantic service than we have had.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Steam service between Canada and Cuba, $25,000.

Mr. DANIEL. What are the details of this service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The contractors are Wm. Thomson & Co., Limited. The date of the contract is December 1, 1909, and it expired on the 7th of January, 1911.

The steamships are the following:

Name.	Net. Tons.	Gross. Tons.	Capacity. Tons.
'Trongate'	1,619	2,552	2,700
'Ottringham'	1,698	2,679	5,100
'Gogovale'	2,038	3,097	5,250
'Leuctra'	1,950	3,207	5,032
'Benedick'	1,581	2,440	.....
'Bencliff'	1,385	2,210	.....

In addition to the above steamers, the 'Felix,' 'Snestad' and 'Haakon' were also employed.

They are all ten knot steamers, and no cold storage provided. It is a monthly service from St. John to Havana, and the subsidy is $25,000 per annum.

Mr. DANIEL. Is that a direct service both ways or are the vessels allowed to call at American ports?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is a direct service down, but on the return journey when the contractors show that they cannot get sufficient cargo they are allowed to proceed to American ports to complete.

Mr. DANIEL. In calling for tenders was it not stipulated that it should be a direct service both ways?

Mr. SPROULE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, this change has been made by the minister since the contract was let.

Mr. DANIEL. Are all the vessels named, British vessels?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Some of these which were used at first are not. We now pay no subsidy except to British boats.

Mr. PORTER. Is the trade with Cuba growing satisfactorily?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. I cannot understand on what basis the amounts of these subsidies are fixed. Comparing the trade with Mexico and Cuba for the past four years, I find that our imports from these countries were:

Year.	Mexico.	Cuba.
1906..	$297,516	$445,100
1907..	492,299	475,319
1908..	919,826	515,163
1909..	315,334	496,485
1910..	559,122	841,209

Our imports from Cuba into Canada have almost doubled since 1906. Our exports to the two countries were:

Year.	Exports to Mexico.	Exports to Cuba.
1910..	904,957	1,737,385

It will be seen that our trade with Mexico is very much smaller than our trade with Cuba, and yet the subsidy granted to the steamship lines running between Canada and Cuba, is $25,000 while the subsidy for the steamship service between Canada and Mexico on the Atlantic is $50,000, and on the Pacific $75,000. That is, our subsidy for the steamship service between Mexico and Canada on the Atlantic is twice as large as our subsidy for the steamship service to Cuba, yet our trade with Cuba is very much larger than our trade with Mexico. I do not understand on what basis the subsidies are granted. If they are granted to facilitate trade one would naturally expect that there would be some proportion between the subsidies granted and the amount of trade. The subsidies seem to be in inverse ratio to the trade.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps that is the reason we pay the larger subsidy to Mexico, because the trade is in its infancy and has to be encouraged more than the trade with Cuba. Another reason is that the service with Cuba is from St. John to Havana, whereas the trade with Mexico is from Montreal to Mexico, a much longer voyage. The trade with Mexico is of very recent growth, it did not exist ten years ago, while the trade between the maritime provinces and the West Indies is very old, in fact has been carried on as long as these countries have existed. It, therefore. does not require such a large subsidy to carry that trade on as to carry on the trade with Mexico, where the business has to be created.

Mr. CROSBY. The trade with the West Indies has been carried on for many years but only in the last few years have the government undertaken to give a subsidy. When the subsidy was granted the trade was being carried on successfully from Halifax, and there was no necessity for the subsidy. I cannot see any reason for giving it, it is simply subsidizing one port in Canada to compete with some other port. This subsidy is largely for the carrying of potatoes from New Brunswick, and the first year the subsidy was granted, I think in 1908, it did not help the farmers in New Brunswick, in fact it caused disaster. It would be better for them if there were no subsidy. I am confident that it does not help the exporters of potatoes, it only helps those who are interested in chartering the boats. This is another case where boats are chartered as in the case of the Annapolis subsidy. Thompson & Company charter boats during the time that trade is active in the fall. They frequently carry our lumber. Sailing vessels carry freight from the port of St. John, and all along the coast of New Brunswick. We have a fine class of vessels there able to handle this trade. Of course there is no difficulty in getting a steamer to load in the autumn at St. John, Halifax, or Annapolis for Cuba, but these steamers do not bring any cargo back, because there is none to bring. This is a subvention which is not in the interest of trade and commerce generally or of trade with Cuba at all.

Mr. PERLEY. Has the Prime Minister any figures to show the amount of freight carried under this contract?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In 1910 there were 5,888 tons of general merchandise, chiefly potatoes and fish.

Mr. PERLEY. It seems to me that the argument used by my hon. friend from Halifax must be a good one in view of these figures. In 1910 5,888 tons of freight went out and none came in. That shows conclusively that the change which the government made in this contract was not a good one because the outer trip is the direct trip to Cuba, the steamers could not stop anywhere else; but on the inward trip they stop at other ports which get the freight while Canada pays the subsidy. There were no passengers carried either in or out. The Prime Minister says that the estimates are the same as last year, and he thinks that is a good reason why we should pass them. But because a subsidy has been granted several years is no reason why it should be continued. That company was started in 1908, and in 1910 it took out less than 6,000 tons and brought none in. If this freight can be shipped by steamers from St. John, Halifax, and Annapolis that have no subsidy, there is no reason why we should grant a subsidy to this particular line.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This subsidy was first asked for by the merchants of St. Johns, who were convinced that a valuable trade could be developed between the two countries, and the government acceded to their representations. Tenders were advertised for, and it was only after ample publicity that a subsidy was given. I do not know that any protest was ever made by any one or that there was any rival steamship company plying between those two points. When the hon. member for Halifax made the complaint that there was no necessity for the service, that it would compete with other companies, I remember distinctly that this point was challenged by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) who insisted that this service would be of very great benefit to the farmers and fishermen.

Mr. DANIEL. I think that this service was inaugurated for the purpose of transporting farm products, and working up a trade with Cuba in those goods. As a matter of fact these steamers have been carrying large quantities of potatoes, especially in clearing from New Brunswick and the adjoining state of Maine as well, because the prices of potatoes in the United States are lower than in New Brunswick. But the trouble has been that there is very little return freight from Cuba to Canada, and there is preferential treatment between Cuba and the United States, so that the shippers from Cuba can do better in the United States.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many companies tendered for this contract?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have not got that information.

Mr. CROSBY. It seems that the Prime Minister has the idea that this was brought about by the government advertising for tenders. If he will inquire he will find that this was brought about early in 1909 by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) and the Minister of Public Works making a strong demand for a subsidy of $20,000. In the session of 1908-9 we discussed this matter, and it was shown beyond the shadow of a doubt that the subsidy was due to the demand of the hon. member for Carleton and the Minister of Public Works, who had been asked by some people more particularly interested in getting a subsidy and putting on the steamers. And it was proved conclusively that the steamships the Thompson people put on were practically all Norwegian boats. The first year, I think, one was a British steamer. And the fact remains that we were doing as much business before as we are doing to-day with this subsidy. The only import business we had with Cuba at that time was in molasses and sugar. In the changed condition of affairs, that trade goes in another direction; we seldom import sugar from Cuba to be manufactured in Canada. We have a regular service of boats running via New York to Cuba. In the fall during the season of the potato crop and when exports of potatoes take place to Cuba and other markets, there is no difficulty in chartering all the vessels that there are cargoes for. In the city of Halifax, any one looking over the returns will see that a great trade is done with Cuba during the autumn, yet quite without a subsidy. In the city of St. John, they can get all the steamers they want without the subsidy. When they have a cargo, all they have to do is to put a demand on the market and they get a steamer at once. A great portion of the export to Cuba is in lumber, and this is carried from our ports to Cuba by sailing vessels quite as satisfactorily as it can be carried by steamers. The voyage by sailing vessel from Halifax or St. John to Cuba is 12 to 16 days, and the voyage of a steamer is 7 or 8 days. With a cargo of lumber the difference in time is of little importance. So, the effect of this subsidy is to interfere with the carrying of our own products in our own Dominion bottoms, to the injury of our own seamen and ship owners. I, therefore, protest, as I have done on former occasions, against subsidies of this kind. I do this not with the desire to interfere with the trade of any port, but because I can see no good reason for this subsidy. I do not want to see a subsidy granted that will interfere with the business of our own Canadian sailing ships as well as with steamers.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall the item pass? Carried.

Mr. CROSBY. I would like to have some reason given for granting the subsidy, and we have not heard any reason for it yet. The Prime Minister has told us that advertisements were sent out and that sort of thing, but the fact is that this subsidy was first granted on the demand of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., and the Minister of Public Works in 1909. The government granted it by minute of council, and the vote was brought in in the session of 1909. Therefore, in the start, there was the demand, not of any farmers of New Brunswick or of the vicinity of St. John, but a demand by some hon. gentlemen in this House. I understand that Mr. Thompson and some other gentlemen are connected with it, and they desired to get $25,000 to charter some boats which would take trade, that, as I have said, was already done by sailing ships or unsubsidized steamers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no doubt that the initiation of this subsidy was as stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Crosby). It was brought to the attention of the government, no doubt, by the minister who represents New Brunswick, and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) who is a supporter of the government. It was brought in not for their own benefit, for they had nothing to do with it, but for the purpose of finding markets for the products of the farmers and fishermen of New Brunswick. As stated by my hon. friend, confirming what I have already said, there has been, as far back as memory goes, a great trade between the maritime provinces and the West Indies. But that trade was largely confined, so far as Canada was concerned, to the export of fish and the import of sugar and molasses. That trade received a very severe blow after the Spanish war when the United States got a special tariff arrangement with Cuba after Cuba had secured its independence. Efforts have been made ever since to recover our trade. It was thought that if a line of steamers were established to carry not only the only article which was then a matter of export to Cuba —fish—but also to carry agricultural products, it would be possible to develop trade. I have no doubt the project was well conceived. But, as stated by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Daniel) there has been no corresponding cargo from Cuba, and for that obvious reason the United States have a large advantage over us. That is the reason why we have opened that service. The success has been moderate, it may be that we are not getting sufficient advantage from it, but I do not think we should abandon it yet.

Mr. CROSBY. There is no reason why the subsidy should ever have been granted. Last year Cuba took all the potatoes and fish that we could send her. In the very first year this subsidy was granted it had the effect of bringing about a bad condition for the exporters who shipped their potatoes to Cuba, and they were induced to do so by those who were interested in getting the farmers to ship in order to fill up the steamers. It was a disastrous thing for the farmers in the province of New Brunswick. But there is another consideration that occurs to me. The government pretend that under their reciprocity agreement, if it carries, we are going to send out apples, our potatoes and our fish to the United States; then why are we arranging for this line of steamships to carry our stuff to Cuba? If the United States takes all our stuff what is the use of granting subsidies to steamers to carry it to Cuba or to Great Britain? The hon. gentlemen opposite claim that under reciprocity the maritime provinces will double their exports of apples, fish and potatoes to the United States, and at the same time they are arranging for subsidies to carry them to Cuba and to Britain. I claim that there is no necessity for this subvention to carry these goods to Cuba; we have all the facilities we require now without it.

Mr. DANIEL. I think the object of the subsidy in the first place was all right, and that it was a good thing, because it was given for direct voyages to Cuba and back to Canada. I think that is the way the contract should be continued, because it was for that purpose the contract was given, not to create trade between Cuba and New York, but between Cuba and Canada. These vessels find it much easier to get a good return cargo from Havana to New York. I think the idea of the subsidy is correct, but it should be carried out in the way of a direct voyage both ways.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many trips did these steamers make last year to Cuba?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Twelve.

Steam service between Canada and Mexico upon the Atlantic ocean, $50,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This service is performed by the Elder-Dempster Company. The trade has been steadily increasing from its inception. It consists of general merchandise and manufactured products chiefly.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the extent of the trade to Mexico, on the east and on the west, for which we are expending $125,000?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I cannot give that information. The customs returns do not separate between the service on the Pacific and the service on the Atlantic.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What did they both amount to, the whole trade?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This trade was begun in 1906 when it amounted to $259,000. During the nine months of the following year it amounted to $317,000; in 1908, $477,000; in 1909, $817,000, and in 1910, $904,000.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does the Mexican government pay any subsidy for this Atlantic service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The government of Mexico pays $50,000 for the Atlantic service.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And a subsidy on the Pacific also?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, on the Pacific they pay no subsidy.

Mr. PERLEY. The Prime Minister stated that the trade is increasing satisfactorily. I do not find that the figures given in the Trade and Commerce report are very satisfactory. In 1908 the total tons carried by this line were 14,855; in 1909, 16,337, and in 1910, 13,642. There was less freight carried in 1910 than in 1908. Further than that I see that in 1907 the number of tons carried was 45,811, whereas it has fallen in 1910 to 13,642. I would like to know whether the Prime Minister thinks that is a healthy condition?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend only takes the tons carried. But, there are the tons weight and the tons measurement which are very important considerations. The figures are as follows:

	Tons Weight.	Tons Meas't.
1908, In..	4,360	41,870
Out..	10,495	21,975
Total.	14,855	63,845
1909, In..	2,110	26,751
Out..	14,277	15,239
Total..	16,337	41,990

In 1910 there is a corresponding increase in respect of the traffic, and especially the ton measurement showing that the trade in lumber especially seems to have increased.

Mr. PERLEY. The minister is making a poor argument. The figures for the tons measurement show that the quantity carried in 1910 was less than half as much as that carried in 1908.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Possibly. I understand that one of the reasons why the tons weight has decreased is because they cannot get any more sisal in Mexico.

Mr. CROSBY. This is a subsidy in the right direction. It is a subsidy that is beginning to build up a trade that could not be built up by any other method. I think the merchants of Canada feel that they have benefited by this service, and that they hope some day to have a large trade. This is not like some of the other subventions in regard to which the traffic could be handled without a subsidy. This is a trade that we would get if we did not grant this steamship subsidy.

Mr. EDWARDS. Can the right hon. gentleman inform me as to the amount of duty collected on imports from Mexico in 1908 and 1910?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not at this moment. I can find out the particulars later.

Steamship service between Canada and Mexico upon the Pacific Ocean, $75,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is a subsidy that was inaugurated over five years ago. The contractor is Mr. Thomas Herbert Worsnop, of Vancouver. The steamships engaged are the 'Lonsdale,' net tonnage, 2,043, speed, 11·25 knots, and the 'Georgia,' net tonnage 1,778, gross 2,797, and speed 11 knots. It is a monthly service of 12 complete trips during each year, from Vancouver and Victoria to Salina Cruz, Mexico, calling on both north and south bound voyages at Mazatlan, Manzanillo and Acapulco in Mexico. The first contract, made September 17, 1906, allowed a period of six months to place ships on the route, and was to continue for two years from first sailing from Vancouver, which was May 1, 1907. This contract expired May 1, 1909. The new contract is for three years from May 1, 1909, and expires May 1, 1912. The amount paid is $75,000 per annum.

Steam service or services between Canada and Newfoundland, $18.000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is a well known subsidy. The service is performed by the Reid Newfoundland Company, by three steamers, the 'Bruce,' which was recently destroyed, the 'Glencoe,' and the 'Invermore.' It is a daily service except Sunday, between North Sydney and Port au Basque.

Mr. DANIEL. Do these steamers run to Sydney in the winter?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. May I ask the Prime Minister what progress has been made towards bringing Newfoundland into the confederation, and what effort has been put forth towards bringing about that happy state of affairs.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. None whatever, since the offer of Newfoundland was not accepted in 1894. We have made no effort on our part to bring Newfoundland into confederation. Not that our view upon the subject has changed, but we understand that the people of Newfoundland are not at all favourable to confederation, and no effort that we could make would induce them to come in at the present time.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Was not there a report in the newspapers the other day that they were ready to come in?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. So many things are said in the newspapers.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I cannot help but feel that it might be wise on the part of the government to at least investigate the matter, and see if it is not possible to communicate with the people of Newfoundland with regard to the question.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. FIELDING. I really think it would be a mistake on the part of the government of Canada to take any action in the matter. I am sure it would be misunderstood in Newfoundland. Newfoundland public men are well aware that it is the disposition among public men in this Dominion irrespective of party to have Newfoundland join the Dominion, and that whenever they are prepared to make the approach in the matter they will be welcomed. But, I am satisfied that any movement on the part of the Canadian government would be resented, and so long as our friends in Newfoundland know that everybody in Canada is well disposed towards them I do not think that at the present stage we could with advantage do any thing more.

Mr. PERLEY. Does the government of Newfoundland contribute any subsidy for this service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. They contribute a like subsidy.

Steam service—Canada and South Africa, $146,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This service is performed by the Elder-Dempster Company; the speed of the vessels is ten and eleven knots; the service is monthly from Montreal, calling at Quebec in summer, and from St. John, calling at Halifax in winter.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Have we a trade representative in South Africa?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Is our trade with South Africa developing?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not very much. This service was inaugurated about 1903. Since then the trade has fluctuated between $1,700,000 and $2,354,000 last year.

Mr. EDWARDS. What is the general character of the imports and exports in our trade with South Africa?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no information at hand to enable me to answer that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does the colony contribute towards this service?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Have they been asked?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This service was inaugurated shortly after the war, and the South African colonies were so disjointed that it was hardly possible to expect them to contribute. Now that a union has been formed it may be possible to have joint action, but no steps have yet been taken towards that end.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the Prime Minister take up the question at the Colonial Conference?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We will see if it may be possible to have any trade with them.

Mr. EDWARDS. In granting subsidies to steamship lines between Canada and other countries the most serious consideration should be given to the character of the products interchanged. If the products coming from these countries to Canada are such as would come into direct competition with the products of our own people, the question of the cost of production in these other countries, the rate of wages paid, &c., should be most carefully looked into.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The chief object of these subsidies is to push Canadian exports in the markets of other countries, and up to the present no one has questioned the advisability of that. If we do that we must be prepared to take what other countries send us. We have little to expect from South Africa in that respect, because the chief products are fruits and wines. Last year we imported from South Africa 24,000,000 pounds of raw sugar.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. There are a number of steamship subsidies, each for a small amount, between local points in the eastern provinces, which in the aggregate amount to a large sum. The only subsidy of such a kind on the inland waters is between Pelee island and the mainland, which of course is an absolute necessity. There are many ports on the lakes which have not communication with each other. and would the Prime Minister be willing to grant local subsidies the same as is done in the eastern provinces?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly, if the conditions are similar. For instance, if there is any place in Lambton county where the people are isolated and without railways, and where they can only communicate with the rest of the world by steamers, we would do it right away.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I have in mind places along the Great Lakes which I believe are similarly situated to those places in the eastern provinces, and which would be materially assisted by such a subsidy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If the people have no communication with the outside, they ought to have it by all means.

Steam service from the opening to the closing of navigation in 1911, between Gaspé basin and Dalhousie or Campbellton, $15,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is a case of the kind I mentioned just now. The county of Gaspé is at the end of the peninsula between the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Baie de Chaleur. It has been without railway communication, although this year a railway is to be opened up to Gaspé basin. The place has been absolutely isolated, and this was the only means of communication they had all the year round.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I quite understand that, but I have in mind places in my own riding such as Grand Bend, a village 14 miles from a railway, or Bayfield, 15 miles from one, and many others along the Great Lakes. On the Atlantic coast they are well supplied with steamboat communication, but in the inland waters there is little assistance.

Mr. SPROULE. Take Little Current or Manitowaning on the island, they have no communication at all.

Steam service from the opening to the closing of navigation in 1911, between Port Mulgrave, St. Peter's, Irish Cove and Marble Mountain and other ports on the Bras d'Or lakes, $6,000.

Mr. PERLEY. What system is there for looking over these different services each year, and seeing whether they are required? Sometimes in looking at the estimates it has appeared to me that once you had an item of this kind in the estimates, it was there for ever.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think that these services could be dispensed with. All these places are isolated, they have no means of railway accommodation or communication with the outside world except through the steamships. The population is not large and unless they are assisted in some way they will have less frequent communication or none at all.

Mr. SPROULE. In many of these places, the population grows, the industries increase sufficiently to warrant boats calling there at regular times, and getting trade. That is the case on the upper lakes. One would expect that in some of these places on the coast there would be the same development as in the inland portions of the country, and that there would come a time when this service might be carried on without the assistance of a subsidy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend is aware that the population of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia has not increased within the last 20 years, and the government has not been sufficiently long in office to get it increased.

Mr. PERLEY. The right hon. gentleman says that these are isolated communities which need this service. I am not objecting to the service, but what I want to know is whether the department has any system of looking into these different services so as to ascertain whether these subsidies are still required. What the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said with reference to the inland waters might be very true with regard to some of these services, and the subsidy alone be sufficient to sustain them. Because we give a subsidy for two or three years, should not mean that we should give it for ever.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I hope they will not go on for ever. The port of Mulgrave is on the strait of Canso and has very little population. St. Peters in Cape Breton is a small fishing village, and Irish Cove is in the same position. There has been no increase of population such as would warrant dispensing with the service.

Mr. PERLEY. I was not referring to this particular item but to the general policy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The department has to take each case by itself, and up to the present has not come to a conclusion that it can dispense with this assistance.

Mr. SPROULE. The information given us to-night does not correspond with that given us from time to time when we are asked to vote money to improve these harbours. Then we are always told that they are important places, rapidly growing, and on that account it is absolutely necessary to spend a lot of money there. But if they be growing, one would naturally expect that the time would come when it would not be necessary to give these subsidies, and the trade would be self-sustaining.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When a place is growing we ask for a wharf, and when it is not growing we ask for assistance.

Mr. PERLEY. Take the items 197 to 200. They all seem to be for service between Mulgrave and other ports.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mulgrave is the point of distribution, and is the point of connection between the mainland and Cape Breton.

Steam service between Prince Rupert, B.C., and Queen Charlotte island, five-sixths of $7,600.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This has the merit of novelty. The contractor is the Grand Trunk Pacific. In the months of November, December, January, February and March there are not less than two round trips each month from Prince Rupert, British Columbia, calling at Port Simpson, Naas Bay, Stewart and various other places and back to Prince Rupert; and during the remaining seven months in the year not less than four round trips each month upon the same route.

Mr. PERLEY.

Steamship service between Prince Edward Island and Great Britain, five-sixths of $7,500.

Mr. PERLEY. How long has this been in operation?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. For more than 10 years. It was stopped the last two or three years as we could not get any company to take it at the price. The contractors are the Manchester liners. The steamers are the 'Manchester Shipper' and 'Manchester Trader' and 'Manchester Spinner.'

Mr. PERLEY. Are there any arrangements for cold storage?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There are ventilating fans in all the vessels and cold storage on the 'Manchester Trader.'

Mr. SPROULE. How many trips do the steamers make in the year?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Three trips, sailing September 22, October 25 and November 26.

Steam service during the year 1911, between Quebec and Blanc Sablon, calling at ports and places along the northern shores of the River St. Lawrence between such terminals, $20,000.

Mr. SPROULE. How many trips are made?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There are four ships, the 'King Edward,' 'the 'Restigouche,' the 'Aranmore' and the 'Savoy.' This is the subsidy I was mentioning a moment ago. The people served under this subsidy have absolutely no communication with the outside world except by this line. They are strung along the north shore of the St. Lawrence below Tadousac and as far as Blanc Sablon on the shore of Labrador.

Mr. REID. Is this Holliday Bros.?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. It is now twelve o'clock, and I think we have done a good day's work and might ask for an adjournment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Might we not finish these this evening?

Mr. SPROULE. We are not much more than half through them yet. I think we have done a good day's work.

Some resolutions reported.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What business to-morrow?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My colleague the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) will take up railway resolutions.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 12 o'clock, midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THURSDAY, May 11, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MILLER moved:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Has the Secretary of State been communicated with upon this matter?

Mr. MILLER. The Under Secretary of State, Mr. Mulvey, was in charge of the Bill, and it is at his request that this motion is made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Has the Secretary of State recommended it?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That the recommendation of the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, laid on the table on Tuesday, the 9th instant, that the vacancy in the Library of Parliament be filled by the transfer of Mr. Oswald Soulière from the Department of Marine and Fisheries to that of the Library of Parliament be concurred in, and that a message be sent to the Senate acquainting their honours therewith.

He said: The report is to be found in the Votes and Proceedings of May 9, page 909.

Motion agreed to.

ANNUITIES TO JUDGES IN YUKON TERRITORY.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH moved that at the next sitting the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that His Majesty may by letters patent under the Great Seal, grant to each of two of the judges of the Territorial Court of the Yukon Territory, now holding office, an annuity equal to the salary of the office now held by him, to begin immediately after his resignation, and to continue thenceforth during his natural life.

He said: I have to state that, His Excellency the Governor General, having been apprised of the subject matter of this resolution, commends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. How long have these judges held their offices?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is only a notice of motion.

Motion agreed to.

NEWSPAPER STATEMENTS AFFECTING HON. MR. OLIVER.

On the orders of the day being called:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That the special committee to inquire into statements in regard to the Hon. Frank Oliver, Minister of the Interior, mentioned in the resolution of this House, passed on the 3rd day of May inst., do consist of Messrs. Clarke (Essex), Carvell, Geoffrion, Meighen and Crothers.

Motion agreed to.

BARRINGTON PASSAGE BAIT FREEZER.

Mr. JAMESON. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask when we may expect a return with reference to a bait freezing establishment at Barrington Passage ordered on 28th of February last. The minister some time ago said it would be brought down shortly, but it is not here yet, and I am anxious to get it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I shall have the matter looked into at once.

NIAGARA FALLS WATER-POWER.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to bring to the attention of the government a notice which I observed in the press of the United States respecting a fight being made by the American Civic Association against a threatened depredation and despoliation of Niagara Falls. The statement issued by that association is in part as follows, according to this press report:

The situation is peculiar. The waterways treaty with Canada, signed January 11, 1909, while apparently limiting the amount of water which might be taken from the falls, has, on the contrary, increased this diversion. The power development companies have taken advantage of the outside limitations of the treaty and to-day are demanding what will come to 68 per cent more water than is now being drawn into the tunnels for the purpose of turning the giant turbine engines.

Next Wednesday, the 10th instant, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations will have before it joint resolution No. 3, offered by Senator Burton, of Ohio. This resolution has been prepared in order to save Niagara from the interests which are attempting to wrest additional free power for their private use.

It is estimated that the failure of the Burton resolution will mean an increased income of approximately $5,000,000 annually for the companies back of the opposition. The method by which the amount of water necessary to yield this enormous return can be taken under cover of the law is simple. The treaty has established what is known as a maximum limit of diversion of 56,000 cubic feet per second; that is to say, 25 per cent of the average flow of 222,400 cubic feet per second, and 30 per cent of other ordinary low water flow of 180,000 cubic feet. These amounts were allowed for diversions for specific purpose of power production. But the treaty places no limit on the amount of water that may be taken for sanitary and domestic purposes, thus leaving the way open for still greater diversions. The new enterprises ready to start up work on this basis, together with the increasing diversion sought by the existing plants, fully warrant the general alarm least the national ownership of Niagara shall whether wholly or in part pass into untrustworthy and irreverent private hands.

I observe also that in the same statement issued by this association it is alleged that $40,000,000 worth of capital is now invested by those who desire to consummate the purposes alluded to in this statement. I think this matter worthy of being brought to the attention of the government for the reasons contained in the latter part of the statement, namely, that although the treaty restricts the maximum limit of diversion to 56,000 cubic feet per second, there is an attempt to take advantage of that provision in the treaty, which permits diversion for sanitary and domestic purposes. It is clearly, therefore, the duty of this government to make some inquiry as to whether any such attempt is about to be carried out; and if so it is desirable that this government should make a strong protest against it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have been giving some attention to this matter and have some papers bearing on the subject which I have not with me at present. I shall be glad if my hon. friend will send me the newspaper clipping he has read, and to-morrow I shall be able to make a statement with regard to the subject.

ENGLISH MAIL SERVICE TO THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would like to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General a subject that is of deep importance to the people of New Brunswick and the other eastern provinces. I refer to the deliveries of the English mails in the east. Last week a business man in Moncton wrote me, that:

The 'Virginian' arrived at Rimouski at 6.25 Saturday morning, four passengers and mails for the east. She left Rimouski at 15.12 in the afternoon on a local train for Campbellton; detention nine hours at Rimouski. Arrived at Campbellton at 20.35; transferred from local to freight train and left Campbellton on freight train at 22.15 Saturday night; difference in time makes detention there one hour and twenty minutes.

Arrived at Moncton at 6.40 Sunday morning; carried Moncton mails along with them to St. John—(we received Moncton mails at 11 o'clock Monday morning). Transferred at Moncton to another freight train on Sunday morning for Halifax. I do not know whether they have arrived there or not.

Considerable delay always occurs, but this seems to have been quite unusual. The further statement of my correspondent is to the effect, that he had letters and papers mailed to him in London on the 28th April via the Canadian route, and that they only arrived in Moncton on Monday, or about 13 days later.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). They ought to engage an ox team.

Mr. EMMERSON. My correspondent goes on to say that papers and letters mailed April 28th to him from London via New York reached him Saturday afternoon, whereas those mailed him on the 26th April by the Canadian route only arrived on Monday, 8th May and took 13 days to get to Moncton, as compared with seven and a half days via New York. He adds that he has given orders to have his mail matter sent in future by the New York route. There must certainly be something wrong on the part of the Postmaster General's Department or some other department with respect to the disribution of the English mails in the maritime provinces. The mails from Moncton and the east which arrived at Rimouski on Saturday morning last were received at Moncton and Halifax and Campbellton many hours after the mails, which had arrived at Rimouski for Manitoba and the west had reached Winnipeg. This is a matter which demands the attention of the Postmaster General. This complaint is not a new one, but one of long standing, and it seems to me that the time has come when a remedy should be applied.

Mr. CROSBY. Strong protests have been sent from the Halifax Board of Trade to the Postmaster General, and probably to the Minister of Railways, complaining of the present mail service to Nova Scotia and the east. When the steamship arrives at Rimouski there is great anxiety to transfer the mails for the west in the quickest time, and properly so, but in the rush, the east appears to be overlooked, and on many occasions our letters have been delayed for three or four days. The Board of Trade have addressed me on the subject, but having a high opinion of the executive ability of the Postmaster General, I thought the evil would be remedied without my urging him very strongly. In that I am sorry to say I am mistaken. I hope the Postmaster General will have the matter attended to at once, and that we will get our mails in Halifax via the Canadian route at least as speedily as via New York.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). I have with me a return which was asked for earlier in the session by the leader of the opposition, and which deals with the whole question of the mail service for the east. When the mail steamer arrives at Rimouski, she is met by a special tender manned by our own crew and the bags and the baskets are at once transferred to the wharf at Rimouski. I may say that this mail matter has increased six or seven hundred per cent in the last few years. There is a large quantity of mail for the east, but of course there is a far greater quantity for the west. Sometimes the steamer is delayed and, the train for Rimouski leaves for the east on time, and the mails have to be placed on the next train which causes delay. At the demand of the steamship companies, we have decided that in future the mails for the west will be landed at Quebec, taken by the Canadian Pacific railway to Montreal, and there distributed for western points. The mails for the east will be delivered at Rimouski and put on the first available train. The delay is due to the Intercolonial railway at times, and to the steamer at other times, but so far as the post office is concerned, it does all it can to expedite the mails. The return which I have here gives all information.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There is diligence up to a certain point, but in the end the question comes down to, what is the next available train? It may not come along for half a day.

Mr. EMMERSON. Nine hours in this instance.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It seems unfortunate that one million people in the maritime provinces must have important mail communications delayed in this way. I did not know that this matter was to be brought up, and I have not before me the very strong representations which have been made to me, and which I have passed on to the Postmaster General. I would be glad if the Postmaster General would make a motion so that the document he has brought down may be put on the records of the House as I purpose bringing this matter up again for discussion.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will make the motion, but perhaps I could include it in 'Hansard'.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That will answer my purpose better. Perhaps it may be included in 'Hansard' without objection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let it go as part of the answer of the minister.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The memorandum is as follows:

Ottawa, Feb. 2, 1911.

With further reference to the question of employing a special train via the Intercolonial railway from Rimouski to Halifax for the conveyance of incoming British mails during the season of navigation on the St. Lawrence route, the Postmaster General is informed that during last season, that is from 29th April to 11th November, inclusive, twenty-nine steamers landed mails for the maritime provinces at Rimouski via Allan and Canadian Pacific railway line steamers.

A form showing the number of letter bags, newspaper bags and parcel post receptacles with their respective approximate weight, and approximate total weight, time of arrival at Rimouski and Halifax, also the detention at Rimouski, is attached. (The Controller regrets that he has no typewriter large enough for this work). Also attached is a return showing the gain in time that might have been made for each mail if a special train had been employed.

The cost of a special train would be as follows: 494.06 miles at $1.50 per mile, $741.09 per trip; for 29 trips a total cost of $21,491.61 for the whole season.

It is possible that the railway might claim double mileage between St. Flavie and Rimouski on the plea that it was necessary to make up the special train at a divisional point, in which case the cost would be $27.02 more per trip, or a total of $22,277.19 per season.

The average total weight of mail per trip last season was 10,678.27 pounds.

With reference to the return showing the gain in hours effected by using a special train, it might be observed that mails would not be assorted on the special train and consequently matter for the northern portion of the maritime provinces would not reach destination in some cases as quickly as under the present system. The column showing gain in hours merely indicates the acceleration of mails for Halifax city on the basis of 16 hours running time for the special train from Rimouski to Halifax, Regular train, 200, covers the distance in 16 hours 39 minutes.

Where the gain shown is over 24 hours it will be observed that there has been unusual detention at Rimouski due to the steamer arriving shortly after the maritime train had passed Rimouski, and also the difference in the running time of a special and a regular train.

B. M. ARMSTRONG.
Controller.

If special trains had been employed no mails would be assorted in route, and allowing 16 hours for running time between Rimouski and Halifax, the mails would have arrived at Halifax as follows:

January 27, 1911.

The Controller begs to inclose herewith a return showing the number of letter bags, newspaper bags and parcel post baskets received at Rimouski for the maritime provinces during the summer, and approximate weights, hour of arrival of this mail at Rimouski station from the dock, hour of departure from Rimouski, time of detention at Rimouski and hour of arrival at Halifax, also a return in regard to the winter service showing the number of letter bags, newspaper bags and parcel post baskets arriving at Halifax for the maritime provinces, with approximate weights, also the hour of arrival of the Halifax mail at that post office.

Mail for Halifax city during winter season is sent to that office as soon as received from the steamer, and mail for Nova Scotia is despatched by first outgoing train if connection is made. If connection is not made, this matter is sorted at North street station and despatched by first available trains. Mail for St. John city and New Brunswick is also despatched by first available trains, and the latter sorted on these trains. It might be noted that during the summer season the average detention at Rimouski of mails for the maritime provinces, owing to special trains not being used, is about 7 hours and 51 minutes, and the Controller would also add that from the 19th of June to the 23rd of October, two trains per day are operated from Montreal to Halifax, and from the opening of navigation to the 19th of June, and from the 23rd of October to the close of navigation, only one train is operated between Montreal and Halifax.

Under the summer time-table on the Intercolonial railway, trains for Halifax pass Rimouski at 5.21 a.m. and 8.06 p.m., and when one through train only is operated, such train is due to pass Rimouski going east at 11.45 p.m.

THE BANK ACT.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (Simcoe). Now that we have come to a definite understanding as to when the House will adjourn, I desire to ask two questions, one of which is: Does the Minister of Finance intend to deal with the Bank Act before we adjourn? I assume it will be impossible for the minister to do so, but I shall be glad to hear from him on that point. My second question is: Can the Minister of Finance assure the House now that when we resume after adjournment the Act relating to banks and banking will be disposed of during the balance of the session? The minister pointed out before that press of business prevented it, but I would anticipate that when we reassemble in July there will be an opportunity. I trust the minister will be able to assure the House that the matter will then be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. FIELDING. I doubt if there will be the opportunity my hon. friend suggests when we reassemble in July. I would like to keep an open mind on that, but for the present I do not anticipate that we will be able to proceed this session, either during the present part of it or when we resume, with a general revision of the Bank Act. I have given notice of another Bill respecting the Bank Act, the purpose of which is to continue the bank charters for a period of one year. The charters will expire at an early date and it is most desirable from all points of view that whatever we may do hereafter these charters should be continued for that period. This Bill will be brought forward before the recess, but as to what may happen at the later stage of the session I do not wish to speak too definitely; my impression is that the House will have its hands very full at that time, and will not have time to proceed with a general revision of the Bank Act.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY—GUARANTEE OF BONDS.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that the House go into committee to consider certain proposed resolutions respecting aid to be granted to the Canadian Northern Railway Company for the construction of lines of railway therein mentioned. He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move that you do leave the chair, in order to proceed in committee with the resolutions standing in my name, I feel that these resolutions not only are of great interest to the people of Canada, but include a bargain which when consummated, will be of the utmost advantage to the entire Dominion. Those who have not visited Canada from one end to the other will perhaps not be so thoroughly seized with enthusiasm as those who have, as to the present prospects and future greatness of the country in which we live. I feel confident that the fathers of confederation scarcely dreamed of the fabric that was to be erected on the foundations which they laid. Not only are Canadians enthusiastic over our country, but those who come to us from all parts of the world are deeply enthusiastic, and I think the most loud in their proclamations of the natural wealth and advantages of Canada are those who have come to us from across the border, from the south.

When I became Minister of Railways and Canals, I set about trying to inform myself as to what were the necessities of Canada from a transportation standpoint. I was thoroughly convinced, and I have been more than confirmed in that view, that one of the most interesting problems we had to solve and one which was of the deepest import to our people was that of how to get their goods to and from market quickly and at a fair rate. The people who have quick and cheap transportation in any country, if the country be any good. are the people who are prosperous, and every farthing we can cut from the price of the carrying of a product to market adds something to the value of the labour that brings forth that product.

In travelling through the west during the past season, I endeavoured to secure and assimilate all the information I could get in reference to this great problem. I found that we had several United States lines running into the west and giving certain accommodation. I found that the pioneer road, the Canadian Pacific railway, had stretched its branches in many directions, and was giving a good service over two main lines, the main line proper and that by way of Crowsnest Pass, and that the people it reached, while sometimes complaining of what they thought were exorbitant freight rates were nevertheless pretty well served. I found too that the Grand Trunk Pacific had a magnificent line from Winnipeg to Edmonton. I think it is not exaggerating to say that it is the best line of new construction ever built on the continent of America. I might go further, but I think that is sufficiently strong. That line at present is not only stretching on to Prince Albert, but is also reaching out with its branches. This year the Grand Trunk Pacific is building as its programme in the west something like 700 miles, the Canadian Pacific railway about the same, and the Canadian Northern railway approximately the same. That is a large mileage for construction in one year, considering the population, but not a great mileage, considering the vast expanse of territory. In addition to these two I found in the Canadian west to the north that the Canadian Northern railway had a system including no less than 4,000 miles of railway. That in itself is a great system, serving largely the territory to the north; it runs through what to my mind will eventually become a centre of mixed farming and dairying for the Dominion of Canada. The Canadian Pacific railway stretches through to Vancouver. From Prince Rupert the Grand Trunk Pacific stretches out eastward, to meet the main line at Wolfe's Creek, and by an arrangement with the British Columbia government, the Canadian Northern railway is now constructing a line which will reach from the Yellowhead Pass through the province of British Columbia down to the city of Vancouver. When this is completed, the west will be pretty well served as to main lines. That great country west of the Great Lakes will be connected by two main lines, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Pacific railway, with the Canadian ports in the east. Travelling through the western country and over the systems of railway there, one could not but be struck with the fact that while the Canadian Northern railway is serving a large territory, and a large number of people in gathering the products of the west, it had no way of sending these products to the east.

And I was impressed—and I believe the people of Canada will be impressed on making the same examination—with the necessity of having that system of 4,000 miles west of the great lakes connected as soon as possible with Canadian ports on the east. The Canadian Northern, in addition to its lines west of Winnipeg—the main line runing to Edmonton, and miles west —has a line stretching from Winnipeg to Port Arthur. From Port Arthur to Sudbury, or a few miles north and west of Sudbury, it has no connection. The present resolution which I am asking hon. gentlemen to consider will, among other things, provide for the furnishing of that link. At the present time, the Canadian Northern has, under the name of the Canadian Northern Ontario, a line running from Toronto to Sudbury, and from Sudbury to Sellwood, but it has no line connection further west. The connecting of the lines from Port Arthur eastward will give the city of Toronto, and all the province of Ontario another through route to the great west. Coming east from Sellwood it is proposed that the line shall run eastward touching North Bay. Before it reaches North Bay and in that vicinity it will traverse the southern portion of what is known as the clay belt of Ontario. Now, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to hon. gentlemen coming from other parts of Canada, let me say that there is as much good land in Ontario that has never been cultivated as there is in that province now under cultivation, and in all the discussion of opening up new territory we from this province have a deep interest in seeing that this uncultivated part of our province is brought under the plough. There is in that territory, according to surveys, from 16,000,000 to 20,000,000 acres of good clay soil. The Grand Trunk Pacific runs through the northern portion of it. The Canadian Northern will run more towards the southern border of this belt. The Canadian Pacific railway practically does not touch it at all. Coming eastward from Port Arthur, except, for a few miles, the Canadian Northern will serve an absolutely new country from that now served by either the Canadian Pacific railway or the Grand Trunk Pacific. Except in one or two instances, if I remember the figures correctly, this new line will not come nearer than twenty miles to any of the existing roads, and in many places it will be from 50 to 60 miles from the Grand Trunk Pacific and from 20 to 40 miles from the Canadian Pacific railway. Coming eastward and passing North Bay, the road will proceed down through the province of Ontario, opening up a new country until it strikes the county of Renfrew. And in my native county of Renfrew, it will give railway communication to places which have never had it all these years. There are parts of the county through which I was carried on horseback, and later rode on horseback, through which I hope, before long, to ride on a first class train.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Does it go to Pembroke?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes. Coming eastward from Pembroke it crosses to the Quebec side at Portage du Fort, and then at Chats Falls crosses again into the province of Ontario, and comes on down to Rideau Junction, five miles outside of the city of Ottawa, where it joins the Niagara and Montreal line. Proceeding eastward from Ottawa it will go to Hawkesbury, the distance from the junction to Hawkesbury, if I remember well, being something like 56 miles. It will then cross the interprovincial bridge, about 1.1 miles in length into the province of Quebec. This bridge is not now of proper standard for the line and will have to be brought up to standard. Then, from a point on the Quebec side opposite Hawkesbury, it will proceed to the city of Montreal. The total mileage of this line will be approximately 1,000 miles, perhaps a little more, but I think not any less.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is the route stated in so indefinite a manner in the resolution?

Mr. GRAHAM. It will be stated more definitely, probably, in the Bill. The route has not been altogether approved by the Railway Department, but most of it has been. The company will create terminals in the city of Montreal.

Now, as to the provisions of the resolution: In the first place, it is a 3½ per cent, fifty-years bond that is guaranteed by the government. The road is to have 80 pound rails, and be a good standard road with modern bridges. The bonds are to be guaranteed by the government, but the Canadian Northern Company adds its guarantee, and stands between the government and any possible loss.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Does the government guarantee principal as well as interest?

Mr. GRAHAM. It guarantees principal as well as interest, and the Canadian Northern guarantees the government against any loss. It is really the Canadian Northern Ontario and a portion of the Canadian Northern Quebec. That portion built under the Canadian Northern Quebec charter is the 1·1 miles between Hawkesbury and Carillon.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does the Canadian Northern guarantee include all its road with rolling stock?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, the rolling stock is built under an equipment bond. After that, we will get the security, second to an equipment bond.

Mr. CROCKET. Is it equal to the standard of the National Transcontinental?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, the standard is an 80 pound rail with the bridges up to the standard required by the Railway Department, and with a grade of ·95 going east and ·06 going west.

Mr. LENNOX. Subject to a qualification as to that?

Mr. GRAHAM. Such a qualification as you must have in the case of any line. If it becomes a physical or practical impossibility to get that grade, you have to put in a pusher grade, but only with the consent of the department before that can be done.

Mr. CROCKET. Then, the standard is not that for the St. John Valley Railway Company in New Brunswick?

Mr. GRAHAM. It might be. In New Brunswick, there is a pusher grade—at least one, I think, of one per cent and over—on the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us consider what would be the benefits of this measure to the country. It is said: We are spending a lot of money on deepening waterways and harbours, we have large projects before us in canals; why then, should more obligations be taken on in reference to railways? I think it will be conceded by any person who has given the matter any attention that when you find traffic increasing by water you will find it also increasing by rail, and vice versa. There seems to be a law that where you have facilities for traffic and transportation by rail and by water, those facilities draw trade from other routes, where the double advantage does not exist; the water traffic in no way interferes with the rail transportation. Now, beginning at the west, the company gives a first mortgage on all this line, with two or three exceptions.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the minister comes to that, I would like him to say what he would care to say upon the question of the necessity of this line, and also give us his views as to the necessity of a guarantee. What I mean is, that I think these two subjects ought to be considered by parliament in dealing with this matter. In the first place, what public necessity of this country will be benefited by the construction of this road; and in the second place, what necessity is there for a subsidy, assuming that the road is not only desirable but necessary?

Mr. GRAHAM. In regard to the first point, I think the conditions in Canada, with our rapid growth, and the fact that this company now has 4,000 miles of railway in the west, is increasing it rapidly, and is gathering up traffic, makes it absolutely necessary that there should be another line for the carriage of the products from the west to the east, as well as feeding that line from the east to the west. I believe there is a day of prosperity near at hand that will extend clear through to the maritime provinces, a prosperity which I do not think will be secondary even to that of the west, although we have not so much unoccupied territory. My own conviction is that we cannot get these lines constructed too rapidly to meet the absolute necessity that will then exist for the carrying trade of our own products, to say nothing of the carrying trade we might do for any other country. As to the necessity of a guarantee, this company might in years work this line through. They have done a great deal, but they have been aided by subsidies and aided by guarantees. But in order that we may have this line constructed, and constructed without undue delay, in a way that we shall have something to say about its construction, and in order that the company may be able to finance such an undertaking in the best possible method so that the freight rates may be based on the least possible cost of construction, I believe it is in the interest of the people who have to ship goods that the government should enable the company to borrow their money at the best possible rates in the Old Country. I do not believe,

Mr. Speaker, and I do not think any other member believes, that this guarantee will ever cost the Dominion of Canada a dollar; and if we can ensure the rapid construction of this road at the cheapest possible rate, merely by lending the name of the Dominion of Canada to the company to secure its money, I believe it is in the interest of transportation, and in the interest of cheap rates as well to lend it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the estimated cost?

Mr. GRAHAM. A standard road, $50,000 to $55,000 a mile.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Does that include rolling stock?

Mr. GRAHAM. It does not include rolling stock.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Is there any clause in the contract which gives the government control of rates over this line?

Mr. GRAHAM. The control of rates will be absolutely in the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners, as it is on all other railways in Canada at the present time.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Not the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Canadian Pacific railway is under their control by consent, though I think the company does not admit liability as a matter of law. I have expressed my opinion in the House before, and though I am not a lawyer, I believe they are legally under the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. When the Manitoba government guaranteed the bonds of the Canadian Northern railway in that country there was a clause in the guarantee enabling the government to control the rates. It seems to me it is very desirable that there should be a clause in this contract, notwithstanding the Railway Commission, giving the government control of the rates.

Mr. GRAHAM. That might be a necessity in a province where they have nobody specially appointed for controlling the rates. But we have a board which, by statute, is given power to investigate the rates of all these companies.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. It would apply to that company just the same.

Mr. GRAHAM. The control of the Board of Railway Commissioners does not apply to a provincial road. A company which gets its charter from the government of Manitoba would be under the control of Manitoba, if of anybody.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. The control of the traffic.

Mr. GRAHAM. That question has been in the courts. The Manitoba government put in a clause like this which has been effective in regulating the rates.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. This is an exceedingly important matter to the west. We have two railways now running north of Lake Superior which, in all probability, will meet the necessities of traffic for some years to come. Now in view of the trouble we have in the west, the objection I would make to guaranteeing these bonds would be the fact that so far we have not been treated right in respect to freight rates. I do not care so much about passenger rates, I refer particularly to freight; and it is high time that this government, or the Railway Commission, took some steps to regulate freight rates in the western country. It does not make any difference if there are a dozen roads, unless you have competition; we want these roads to be competing lines. We have seen these roads making an agreement by which they all charge the same freight rates, and so far we have not received much advantage from the new line. The freight rates are too high, and it is time that this government, through its commission or some other means, should take steps to regulate the freight rates in that country.

Mr. GRAHAM. Of course the government of the Dominion has given a good deal of consideration to the question of dealing with the tariff of rates on railways. However, to be sure that there should be no discrimination as against Canadian ports, you will find a clause in this agreement that at no time must the rates via this line exceed the rates via lines to an American port. Now, coming to that ten-mile section, what is called the Hutton Branch, in the vicinity of Sudbury and Sellwood, I may point out that there is already on that ten-mile branch, it being a portion of the line from Toronto, certain securities for which a mortgage has been given. But in order to secure the government on that ten miles, the company is depositing with the government other securities on their Canadian Northern and Quebec line to the extent of $35,000 a mile for this 10·6 miles. Now from Hawkesbury we have a second mortgage. The security on that runs out in twenty years, and then ours becomes the first mortgage. In the meantime the first mortgage bonds on another portion of the line to the extent of $35,000 a mile, are deposited with the government. On the line from Hawkesbury to Rideau Junction, about 61·4 miles, the same thing occurs. That is a portion of the line chartered from Niagara to Montreal. Certain securities have been issued on the line, including this piece from Rideau Junction to Hawkesbury, and the company deposits with the Minister of Finance these securities that have already been issued but not sold, to the extent of $35,000 a mile. Although the mortgage is not a first mortgage on this portion of the road, under the guarantee, these bonds that the government will hold are first mortgage bonds, and the government's security, in addition to holding these, comes second on this line. The same thing applies to the 1.1 miles of the bridge. I may say that the security held by the government is, with this exception, a first mortgage from Montreal to Port Arthur, and that it ranks as a second mortgage on the entire system from Niagara to Montreal.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). What are they allowed to issue on the line from Niagara to Montreal? We require this information to understand our security, which ranks after it.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think the amount is $30,000 a mile, if I remember rightly. I am speaking from memory, but I can give that information in a little while.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is any part of the line built?

Mr. GRAHAM. The part from Hawkesbury to Ottawa, 56 miles, is constructed. The bridge is constructed across from Hawkesbury, but it will not answer the purpose without improvement or reconstruction. In addition to this, it is provided that the government may, after two years of operation, pay the interest on these bonds, and if they do this interest is added to the principal and becomes part of the guarantee for which the government has security and must be repaid by the company to the government.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Is it 'may' or 'must'?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, it is 'may.'

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). We 'may' only pay?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes. My own opinion is that we will pay it if you ask me for my interpretation of it. It generally turns out that way.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. We will pay for some time to come.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not for long, but for two years. Suppose that what my hon. friend says actually came to pass, what would be the result? In the first place, it has been said that holding the securities of the line from Niagara to Montreal in part, in order to secure ourselves, we would have to step in and buy the line or satisfy the holders of the first mortgage on that line. Supposing that were the case, we would then have what many people in Ontario think we ought to have—a line directly connecting with the Intercolonial railway, running through the province of Ontario to the city of Toronto, and we would have it cheaper than any line was ever built for. Suppose that there was a default in the interest on the main line from Montreal to Port Arthur, what would occur? The government would have the road then, too. We would have Halifax, St. John and Sydney hooked up with the Intercolonial railway, and this line clear through to Port Arthur, we would have a through line belonging to the Dominion of Canada, and that is what a lot of people in this country would like. Looking at it in every way, I come back to the point again that Canada cannot lose a farthing, because under this proposition the worst that might happen would be that the company would default, and if they defaulted it would in the opinion of some people be the best thing that could happen to the Dominion of Canada.

Then, we get to the city of Montreal, where the company engage to provide terminals. The city of Montreal is the great commercial metropolis of Canada. It must remain the gateway to a very great extent of the commerce both inward and outward for our country. It is a striking fact, Mr. Speaker, and one for congratulation as well, that the increase in the value of property in the city of Montreal has been as rapid during the last ten years as the increase in almost any city in the whole of Canada, including the western cities. It is due largely to the fact that Montreal is the commercial metropolis, and that the prosperity of Canada as a whole is reflected in the growth of that city. The Canadian Northern engages to provide terminal facilities in Montreal.

Then we come to this other proposition, and it is of some import, I think, Mr. Speaker. At the present moment the Intercolonial railway runs from Sydney, Halifax and St. John, and through intermediate points to the city of Montreal. For forty miles east of Montreal, to what is known as Ste. Rosalie, it runs over the Grand Trunk railway. We have a running arrangement with them and also an arrangement for the interchange of traffic. We pay the Grand Trunk Railway Company $140,000 a year in connection with this arrangement. Last year the Intercolonial railway made, as its share of the traffic received from and given to the Grand Trunk railway, $1,600,000. The arrangement is a good thing for the Intercolonial railway, for, without being fed with some traffic gathered up somewhere the receipts of the state-owned railway would be materially lessened. In a few years the Grand Trunk railway will undoubtedly be urging that that arrangement be abrogated. They will have the Grand Trunk Pacific, with a branch into Montreal, built by somebody, and they will have the Grand Trunk Pacific crossing at Quebec to Lévis and running eastward. They will urge strongly with some degree of reason that they ought to be allowed, as the Grand Trunk Railway Company have a deep interest in the Grand Trunk Pacific, to make connections for traffic with the Grand Trunk Pacific. That traffic arrangement is so drawn that this government, or whatever government is in power, can cancel it, but the company cannot.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, I wanted to assure my hon. friends first that there would be something left for them to do when they got in. We are not called upon now to consider the abrogation of this arrangement with the Grand Trunk, but we can see that in the future it will be urged very strongly. But even if it is not, the Canadian Northern must have an Atlantic seaboard outlet. It has none unless it builds one. We have one to offer. If it be necessary in years to come to abrogate that arrangement, then we have a clause in this contract by which we will be free to ask the Canadian Northern, and it will be compelled to give us, an arrangement for an interchange of traffic at the city of Montreal. No person in the east and no person in the west will question for a moment the advisability of having the state-owned railway in close connection with some railway that has a line through from ocean to ocean. It will help traffic east and west, and it will help Canadian ports as well. I come back to my other proposition, to reiterate, and I say it with all sincerity, that I believe the time is at hand when the eastern part of Canada is going to enter upon an era of prosperity such as it has not known for years. I hope before the House rises to lay before hon. members another small project for gathering under the wing of the state-owned railway certain lines that will bring traffic to that road and will assist under this arrangement in feeding the line, that will give traffic to and take traffic from us in the years to come.

I did not intend to speak at such length. I commend this proposition to the House in every way; I believe it is in the interest of the people of Canada; I believe it is in the interest of the people of the west, but not more so than in the interest of the people of the east. I might just say in this connection that the company is also to build a line, although it is not in this contract, from the Georgian Bay to connect with their main line so that during the summer season they will have a through lake and rail route, as the other roads have. This is a big project, but Canada is accustomed to large things. I believe it is an undertaking in the interests of the people. It will not cost Canada to my mind anything except the fact of her liability in guaranteeing these bonds, which the financial world will, I think, understand as the Canadian Northern people have not yet defaulted on bonds, and I think they will not in the future. I have every confidence that this line will be a good and paying line, and that when it is completed we in Canada will find that the government did a wise thing, and did not do it any too quickly in order to provide for the growing interests of the carrying trade of this great Dominion.

Mr. CARVELL. When will it be completed?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not for over four years.

Mr. CROCKET. Was there any proposal in connection with this scheme for the extension of the Canadian Northern east of Montreal by the construction of a new line to St. John or to Halifax?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not in connection with this scheme.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the estimated amount of the security that will be held by the government over the amount of their guarantee?

Mr. GRAHAM. We have a first mortgage on the line from Montreal to Port Arthur with such exceptions as I have mentioned. We hold first mortgage bonds to cover this. We hold a second mortgage on the balance of the company's line in the province of Ontario from Niagara to Montreal, and we hold behind that the guarantee of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The minister surely made an estimate of the value of these securities.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is very hard to estimate the value of the security of the Canadian Northern backing to a note. My own opinion is that it is absolutely unassailable. Then we have the security of the line from Niagara to Montreal, a second mortgage on that which will be at least worth say $10,000 or $15,000 to $20,000 a mile. Then we will have a first mortgage on the line from Montreal to Port Arthur, as I have mentioned, which, to my mind, will represent from $50,000 to $55,000 a mile.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is it not a fact that there is not a foot of the road built from Niagara to Toronto; is it not all in the air?

Mr. GRAHAM. There is a line under construction now from Niagara to Montreal, and there is quite a portion between Toronto and Montreal now constructed, and it is being rushed as rapidly as possible. The right of way between Niagara and Toronto has been purchased.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). In the construction of the road from Niagara to Montreal, is it the intention to utilize some old roads that have been purchased by the company? Are these given as security also?

Mr. GRAHAM. Just what old roads?

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The Rathbun road from Sydenham to Deseronto. Is that given as security?

Mr. GRAHAM. Bonds have been issued on that line and we would only hold a second mortgage on it anyway. I would like time to look into that particular thing my hon. friend speaks of, as I do not quite agree with him on it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the House goes into committee, I would like to express my regret that a measure which the minister regards as so important to the welfare and progress of the country and to the interests of transportation in Canada should have been delayed until we have been six months in session. Every one agrees that transportation is, perhaps, the very most important problem that is before the Canadian people to-day, and that very fact would seem to be a reason why this proposal should have been brought down earlier in the session, when parliament would have been able to give it very much closer consideration and attention than seems to be possible on the eve of an adjournment.

I asked the minister in the first place as to the necessity or the advisability of the road, which would appear to be a condition precedent, and the minister has not seen fit to answer me except in the most general terms. I will give him an idea of what I had in mind. We have between the east and west of Canada a certain stretch of country that has no appreciable population at present, and that is not likely to have, for a good many years. We have one line of railway, the Canadian Pacific railway, already in operation across that territory for some twenty-five years past. We have in process of construction across that uninhabited territory the Grand Trunk Pacific running farther north, and I hope it will be found that it runs through a country which may be able to sustain population. I entirely agree in the suggestion that was made by an hon. gentleman on this side during the remarks of the minister, that building two lines of railway where one is sufficient to carry the traffic is an economic waste, and never does reduce cost of carriage. I think that is an unanswerable statement. It is well known that where you have two lines of railway where one is enough to do the work, there is an economic waste, and you are not doing any good to the man who produces the commodities which are shipped over these railways. As I understand the present situation, that portion of the Canadian Pacific railway lines which extends between the populated east and the populated west of Canada is capable of carrying five times the present traffic which passes over it. In other words, before it would be necessary to double-track that road, its traffic could be increased five-fold. It does not seem to me to be possible that under these circumstances, the construction of a third road is likely to lead to any diminution in the freight charges, because the Railway Commission, or a committee of the government for that matter, in considering freight charges, must have regard to the fixed charges upon the road, and must always make the freight charges sufficient to meet the operating expenses and the interest upon the bonds, as otherwise the road would be placed in bankruptcy, or would have to be taken over by the bond creditors. I had expected that the minister would have given us some reasons why, over that stretch of four or five hundred miles of territory, a third road is considered necessary at the present time. I know it is not worth while to review what might have been done in the past, but I believe it would have been good business for the Dominion of Canada in the first instance to have brought the east and the west together by undertaking the management, and even the expense, of operating a road between the populated east of Canada and the populated west of Canada. In other words it would have been good policy to bridge over that uninhabited district which divides the east from the west and thus to bring together, so far as transportation is concerned, the east and the west in a way in which they are not now brought together. But there is nothing in that direction in the proposal before us. The proposal of the government is one which provides for the building of a third railway through this uninhabited country, where one of the existing railways is able to carry five times the traffic which passes over it at present. A condition of that kind is one which should have been adverted to by the hon. minister, and he should have presented reasons that would convince the House, in the face of these circumstances, of the necessity for building this road. I am certainly in favour of providing out of the finances of the country or putting upon the credit of the country any burden necessary to make our transportation facilities all they ought to be to meet the rapid growth and development of the country; but I believe in doing that along well considered business lines, and I do not believe in entering into a proposal of this kind or any similar proposal until it has been thoroughly worked out and considered upon economic lines. Subject to that condition, I am always ready to support the government in any proposal that will attain the end we all consider so desirable.

My hon. friend the Minister of Railways says that when this line is completed the west will be pretty well served. Six or seven years ago I said in this House that the Canadian Northern railway had even then the status of a transcontinental railway. I know that we all marvelled at the wonderful enterprise of the men at the head of that undertaking, and I for one will be disposed to go as far as any man in aiding any undertaking brought to the attention of the House, which would make their work in providing transportation facilities for the people of Canada more effective than it is to-day. But when the Minister of Railways tells us that the needs of the west will be well taken care of when this road shall have been completed, I would like to tell him that I can hardly agree with that, because the west will require, probably in the not distant future, a road through the northern part of that country, along the very line through which it was originally proposed to build the National Transcontinental, but from which it was afterwards diverted. No one who heard or read the utterances of the right hon. the Prime Minister, and of his colleague at the time, when that proposal was first under consideration, can fail to remember that the road, as originally projected, was not to be a road between the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific railway, where the transcontinental runs to-day, but a road through the northern part of that great western country which would open up an entirely new territory.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Does the hon. gentleman say that the time may come when four transcontinental railways will be required?

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Five, six or seven.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I say that the northern part of that country for the developement of which it was intended to provide by the National Transcontinental railway, and which could have been thus provided for, has not been provided for, and as that great country increases and develops, I have no doubt whatever, that another transcontinental will be necessary. But I do not say that such a proposal necessarily involves the construction of a road across five or six hundred miles of territory where there is a road to-day capable of carrying five times the traffic that passes over it. This question is one which should be considered from a sound business and economic standpoint, and the money not wasted in providing for a third line where one is capable of doing all the work.

There are just one or two other considerations, because most of the matters to which I desire to allude can be minutely noticed when we come to deal with the separate sections. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) says that the increasing traffic will make this road necessary. He will remember that about two years ago, or perhaps last year, his views as to traffic on the Intercolonial railway, after the National Transcontinental was completed, were of a somewhat gloomy character. He did not look forward with such optimism to the prospects of traffic over the Intercolonial railway, when that traffic would in part have been diverted by the National Transcontinental as far as Moncton. And I think, to use his own graphic expression, he seems to consider it as essential that the Intercolonial railway should be hooked up to some other great railway for the purpose of securing traffic. I do not know whether he is building this road for the purpose of hooking up the Intercolonial railway to it. If that be his object I think that the House is reasonably entitled to some information as to the conditions under which that hooking up is to be effected, and as to whether the Intercolonial railway is to be controlled by this proposed road or occupy a responsible position with regard to it.

My hon. friend was reminded of the necessity of control of the rates. It is true we have a Railway Commission, and I am not sure that the control of the rates afforded by that commission can be improved upon. I do not think much of the minister's idea of the control of rates by competition, if that was in his mind when he spoke; but so far as the provisions of the contract with respect to rates are concerned, in my opinion they are utterly ineffective. I do not believe that the concluding paragraphs of these proposals, paragraphs 13 and 14, will have any effective operation at all. I have examined, as well as a layman could, the effective agreements between railway companies, as to the routing of traffic, and so far as I have been able to read in books and gather in conversation from men familiar with the subject, such agreements in the end do not usually prove effective, and the traffic in the end will go just where the conditions call for it to go. I am of the opinion that it will go pretty much, if not altogether, irrespective of such agreement as is contained in these proposals. I do not want to deal with matter foreign to these proposals, but I might point to a statement made by the hon. minister himself, and certainly by his predecessor, as to arrangements made between the Intercolonial railway and the Grand Trunk railway which amply prove the truth of the statement I have just made. We find that the Grand Trunk railway—which after all is the same practically, though not technically, as the Grand Trunk Pacific—is at present enlarging its terminals in the United States, and acquiring other terminals there, and is basing its action in that regard and its arguments before the legislative bodies in the United States upon the grounds that these terminals are to be provided for the purpose of handling the traffic gathered up in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

It is perfectly obvious to any hon. gentleman who knows the provisions of those agreements that the government are helpless in that matter. They may be helpless in that matter for a reason which cannot be urged under this agreement because I observe here that the provisions as to routing traffic are to be embodied in a stipulation to which not only the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company is to be a party, but the Canadian Northern railway itself is to be a party. If that is necessary in this agreement surely it was ten times more necessary in the agreement which was made between the government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and yet my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, although he was not in the House at the time, will remember that we urged on the government the absolute futility of any such stipulation as was embodied in the agreement between the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, unless the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself was made a party to that stipulation, and became bound thereby. That we were right on that occasion is demonstrated by the action of the government at the present time, if the agreement is of any value at all, which I greatly doubt. But so far as control of rates and routing of freight are concerned, I hope I may be wrong in the opinion I entertain, but I do most thoroughly and sincerely entertain the opinion that in the end these provisions will be found absolutely ineffective, and that the routing of traffic will proceed according to conditions and influences altogether outside of any such stipulation.

The Minister of Railways made one other suggestion which indicates that this agreement is of a very remarkable character; he says that it is a good agreement for the country if the company does not default, and it is even better for the country if the company does default.

Mr. GRAHAM. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If it is an even better agreement for the country if the company does default, and fails to carry out the stipulations which the government thinks it worth while to insert in this contract, that seems to me to be a sound and strong argument why some policy other than that now suggested should have been embarked upon by the government. If the default of the company is to be a good thing for the country, what is the reason for entering upon these stipulations, a non-enforcement of which will be a good thing for the country? I venture to say to the minister himself that in making that statement he has made a very strong argument against his own proposals this afternoon. However, when we come to consider this clause by clause and paragraph by paragraph I shall perhaps have something more to say upon that particular point. In the meantime, I can only express my regret that upon some matters which I regard as of very exceeding importance, in this connection the Minister of Railways and Canals has been so reticent and silent this afternoon.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, with the former part of the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), in which he describes the magnificent country which this railway is going to serve, I perfectly agree. We take pride in the Northwest, and its development. Of that country the Conservative party have reason to be proud because it was first opened by them, and the railway development of the great Northwest is due entirely to their policy.

As to the necessity of this railway, we have had very little reason given by the Minister of Railways. When we come to look at the route of the road to be built from Montreal up to Port Arthur, we find that as far as Sudbury it is not at any point more than 7 or 8 miles from the Canadian Pacific railway, and for most of the distance it is within two or three miles of that road. Did the minister have any conversation or any communication with the Canadian Pacific railway or with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway after inducing the parties to subscribe capital for the purpose of building the road, before he agreed virtually to build a road for a rival corporation to destroy or injuriously affect the property built by these subscribers, to a certain extent with their own money?

Why does the minister ask for the building of this particular road? If the country required the transportation we would be perfectly willing to grant it. Transportation is the problem which confronts this new country at the present day. Is it a necessity to double the road from Port Arthur down to Montreal almost along the line of the Canadian Pacific railway for the purpose of developing that country? It is true that the Canadian Northern railway are a very energetic and enterprising company, that they have built with assistance or out of their own money, I do not know which, and acquired, nearly 4,000 miles of railway in the Canadian Northwest, that they have made arrangements with the British Columbia government for making connections with the seaboard on the Pacific and that they have a railway from Winnipeg down to Lake Superior, and intend to have a connection, I think the minister said, from Victoria harbour down to Montreal, utilizing the same route as the Canadian Pacific railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway intend to utilize. It may be in the interests of the country, there may be a reason, but none has been advanced by the Minister of Railways for the necessity of this new line of road. It may be that even in a country where there are no present requirements for a railway, a well managed and enterprising line can create a business which will justify the building of the road, but if there is no necessity for anything of the kind why should we injure capital which has already been invested in other roads and interfere with those who have put their money into these undertakings? The minister says that the Canadian Pacific railway passes to the south of the magnificent clay belt of northern Ontario, that this road goes through the middle of it, and that the Grand Trunk Pacific railway goes to the north of it. The proposed route of the Canadian Northern road from Pembroke up to Sudbury passes at the clay belt within six or seven miles of the Canadian Pacific railway, not more than that.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend is altogether wrong in his distances between the Canadian Pacific railway and this road.

Mr. HAGGART (South Lanark). Then the map placed upon the table by the minister is wrong. According to the map it is within a mile of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. GRAHAM. For 50 or 60 miles it is fairly close.

Mr. HAGGART. At no point is it more than ten miles away.

Mr. GRAHAM. There are points on the two lines that are 50 miles apart.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Then, the minister should lay before the House a correct map. It is impossible that they can be 40 or 50 miles apart. It may be 40 or 50 miles from the Grand Trunk Pacific, but if you are going from Pembroke up to Sudbury, you cannot be further from another line than 15 or 20 miles. And the map the minister has furnished shows that it is only 15 miles. If you want to develop the country, run your road through parts of the country that are not served already. I consider the present location of this road an injustice to existing railways. For the whole distance from Montreal to Port Arthur it is virtually a paralleling of the Canadian Pacific railway. It is a direct injury to that company and an attack upon capital which this country solicited to be invested in their undertaking. I would not care about that company, or the injury to capital if it could be shown that this scheme was necessary for the development of the country. But nothing of that kind can be shown. There might be some sort of excuse for it if there were any control of rates. The minister tells us that the Railway Commission control rates. They do to a certain extent, but far more efficient control would be gained by a direct bargain with the company giving the government the right to reduce rates without appeal to the Railway Commission, such a bargain as was made in British Columbia and in Manitoba.

There is another point. There is to be a road from Montreal to Toronto. A part of this line is built from Montreal to Hawkesbury bridge and from Hawkesbury bridge to Ottawa. You exchange securities. They give bonds of $30,000 or $35,000 a mile on a road already completed for the purpose of securing a guarantee on the part to be completed. We have had no statement as to what the cost of the road is to be. In a general way it will cost about $50,000 a mile. But you notice the absence of anything about terminals in this arrangement. Are we to have security on terminals?

Mr. GRAHAM. At Montreal?

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. It does not include the terminals at Montreal?

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). It does not include the terminals in any city—Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto or Hamilton. What is the good of the security on a road when your security does not include certain parts of the road, and also does not include the terminals? The minister says it would be a good thing if this road to Port Arthur were made an extension of the Intercolonial, and run as a government enterprise. It has long been the ambition of the east to get a connection of that kind. And it may be a good thing; but I have had something to do with the Intercolonial, and I think my hon. friend (Mr. Graham's) experience with a government managed road, before the commission was appointed, must convince him that such a thing would be a bad investment for the government. We are not only to have this magnificent line of communication with the northwest, but we are to have a new line in New Brunswick, a shortening of the road to St. John. I think that in the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, provision of this kind should have been made, because that line is the shortest line from Edmonton to St. John. It was folly, in my opinion, to build a road to Moncton and from Moncton to St. John merely to please certain people in New Brunswick. But that is not all. The statement of the Minister of Railways threatens us with the introduction of resolutions taking over two or three more railways in the eastern provinces. I would like to know what railways they are, and what is the occasion of the step thus indicated. I think the real occasion is the prospect of an election in the fall. If the hon. minister can tell me of two or three railways in the maritime provinces that are in a financial position to justify the taking of them over by the people of this country and making them part of the Intercolonial, he will do something which I hardly expect, with all his capabilities, he is able to do.

We are a prosperous country, thanks to the development of the northwest, and thanks for that largely to the magnificent showing of the Canadian Pacific railway and its development. But why should hon. gentlemen opposite encourage that road? Their policy is not to take traffic from the west to the east over our own lines, but the doctrine they preach to the farmers of the northwest is the opening up of the markets to the south of us.

Mr. STANFIELD. They will drop that.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). They dare not drop it; they have to go on with it. These are the transportation developments they promise the people of this country. I long ago stated that the principal improvement in our transportation facilities that is now needed is water communication with the northwest to a certain extent, the building of the Georgian Bay canal. The building of that route would do far more for the country than the loaning of large sums of money as this government is doing. And what is it all for? It is to make friends of certain railway contractors at a time when their friendship may be most needed. This and other indications remind us of the desperate state to which hon. gentlemen opposite have been reduced. They propose the building of new lines of railway in a magnificent scheme of communication with the northwest, they indicate their intention of taking over a lot of railways in the maritime provinces, and they have promised an enormous expenditure for public works in many parts of the Dominion. These things show the desperate condition of the occupants of the Treasury Benches, and the impossibility of their developing a policy which will in a fair, honest and upright way appeal to the people of Canada.

As to the gentlemen who are making the application, I feel sympathetically inclined towards them. I recognize that the Mackenzie & Mann interests have done a great deal for Canada, and the energy they have displayed, and the success they have achieved is greatly to be commended. I do not think, however, that is a reason for us going into this undertaking at the present time, when we are so near a long adjournment, and going into it in this hasty way. I regret that the minister did not see fit to bring forward this proposition at a time when it could be carefully considered and discussed. It is impossible that this matter should get fair consideration now, not only by reason of the state of the session, but because the minister has been so reticent in what he has said this afternoon. He has given no information to enable us to decide upon the merits of this scheme. One would think that in a matter of this kind where securities are offered to us, one of the first things the minister would tell us would be the probable cost of the road.

Mr. GRAHAM. I gave that to the House. I was asked by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), what would be the cost of the road, and I answered that a certain standard of road, as laid down in this contract, will cost at least $50,000 a mile, and perhaps $55,000.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister has not told us how that amount is arrived at, what surveys have been made. We have had a lot of experience in matters of this kind. In 1903, when the Transcontinental was proposed, we were assured that the government knew all about it then, and we are told now by the minister that it is estimated this will cost about $55,000 a mile. Is there any good basis upon which to believe that is correct? We were told that the Transcontinental was expected to cost from $25,000 to $28,000 a mile, and the expensive portion of it was in Quebec. So that from Quebec to Winnipeg it was expected to cost $25,000 a mile, and we were told that this estimate was based on ample surveys and investigation. But it turned out that that was not the case at all; it has turned out that that road, without counting a cent for interest, will cost over $100,000 a mile. Now, if it turns out that this road will cost, instead of $55,000, $100,000 a mile, where will we be at?

Mr. GRAHAM. The security will be better.

Mr. LENNOX. If it turns out that this road will cost $100,000 a mile, these gentlemen, just the same as the Grand Trunk Pacific, will come again, and when our money is invested in it we can't refuse. The minister has given us absolutely no reliable data upon which to form an opinion as to whether this is a good scheme in the sense of the security. Then the minister has made it evident, in his answer to the question of the leader of the opposition, that he has no idea as to what traffic is going to feed this road. He has pretended to tell the House that there will be such a large volume of traffic as will necessitate the building of another transcontinental line. We already have the Canadian Pacific railway, which could handle vastly more traffic than they are getting, and we will shortly have the National Transcontinental railway, which will require to handle an enormous amount of traffic to pay any reasonable dividends, or else the people will have to pay enormous rates for transportation. We will have the Hudson Bay railway opened up, which will divert traffic to Hudson Bay. We have the Georgian Bay canal scheme before us, and a promise by the government that they are going on with that, paralleling this enterprise right along. We have the Welland canal scheme, and gentlemen in that country are depending upon the government to advance that scheme and make a great additional highway for the commerce of the west. Then we have the Jim Hill roads, all with their noses upon the international boundary, waiting for this reciprocity scheme to get through, when they will come in and absorb a very large quantity of our traffic. With this divided traffic, with more roads by far than are needed if all these communications are opened up, we will have these various lines impoverished to a considerable degree, and the result will be that the farmers of the west will be paying very large additional sums for transportation. Now, I feel that the government is not to be commended in bringing this scheme in at the present time and forcing it on the House. There is no one on this side of the House, I believe, that wants for a moment to oppose any scheme that will aid in the development of Canada but every member of the House has a right to ask the government to give us a reasonable opportunity to examine this scheme. If the minister proposes to put this through before we adjourn in a week or two hence, he is not giving parliament the opportunity we should have to investigate this matter.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). In view of the fact that a section of this line traverses a portion of my constituency, I feel it my duty to make a few observations. I agree entirely with what the minister has said regarding at least that portion of the line which traverses the territory with which I am acquainted. So far as the county of Renfrew is concerned, the section through which the proposed line will be built is a very fertile section, a largely populated section, and a section which, up to the present time, has been without railway communication. I feel, therefore, that I would not be serving the interests of my constituency if I were to offer any opposition to this scheme. I quite realize that one of the great problems of this country is that of transportation. We all know what the Canadian Pacific railway has done for this country. I believe that the Canadian Pacific railway, the building of which, I may say, was opposed very strenuously by our hon. friends opposite, had more to do with the development of this country than any other scheme that was ever projected. I do not wish to support any project that is going to be in any way detrimental to the interests of the Canadian Pacific railway, but I feel that, while this road may traverse the country in close proximity for a certain distance to the Canadian Pacific railway, yet I believe that with the great prospects which we have ahead of us, and in view of the fact that a large portion of the country through which the road passes is pretty well settled to-day, there will be room for both lines. I entirely agree with the remarks of my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) as to the great importance of the water carriage routes in this country. When the Supplementary Estimates came down the other day I was very much disappointed to find that there was no appropriation for the commencement of the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. While the Supplementary Estimates amounted to some $17,000,000 and included in that amount there was some $2,000,000 for the Hudson Bay railway, however, there was not one dollar for the commencement of this great work which, to my mind, is one of the most important projects which has ever been contemplated by this country. I trust that the government will see its way clear, before the end of the present session, to bring down a further supplementary with a substantial amount for the construction of this great waterway which, in my view, would tend very materially towards the cheap transportation of the grain products from the west to the east. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to state that I am in accord with this proposition which is now before the House.

Mr. GEORGE GORDON (Nipissing). Mr. Speaker, I would not be doing justice to the constituency which I represent did I not also say a few words in regard to this railway project. The hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) has said something with regard to that portion of the country through which this road will run —Renfrew and practically as far as North Bay. I submit that from North Bay to Port Arthur, the Canadian Pacific railway, as it now runs, does not fulfil the requirements for the development of that country. The country through which this new line is to pass from North Bay to Port Arthur cannot be served by the Canadian Pacific railway as now located. A great many members of this House, I am sorry to say, are not informed with regard to the great extent of that country. They forget that although the distance on the map looks very short between the Canadian Pacific railway and where this line will go, it is not as short as it is represented to be. The Canadian Pacific railway from Sudbury to Port Arthur runs through a very rocky country, as those of you who have gone through that country are aware, and the location is too far south altogether of the great clay belt through which this new road will go to be of any service to it After passing North Bay, I understand the new line will go direct to the Sturgeon river, then up the Sturgeon river passing over to Lake Wahnapitae and from Wahnapitae into Hutton. In all that country from North Bay to Hutton there is good fertile farming land which cannot be successfully worked without railway facilities, and in addition to that there are immense quantities of standing timber. Looking upon the whole matter as I do, I cannot do otherwise than feel that it is a good thing for the country that this road is going to be built. With regard to the guarantee which the government has agreed to give to this company I have nothing to say other than this, that if the road cannot be got through that country for a less consideration, then I would have to endorse this proposition.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee on the resolutions.

Mr. GRAHAM. I was very anxious to have a first mortgage on the line between here and Montreal, as I thought it would, perhaps, be one of the most valuable stretches.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There is a good deal in the suggestion of the minister that he wants such security that if default should be made and foreclosure had, he will have a continuous line from Port Arthur to Montreal, particularly as he is stipulating for bonds of a previous mortgage issue to the extent of $35,000 per mile upon the complete portion of the line between Ottawa and Montreal.

Mr. GRAHAM. From here to Hawkesbury.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does not the very consideration which the minister mentioned emphasize the importance that the mortgage should include the terminals? The minister puts it in this way. He will guarantee bonds upon the portion of the line already completed for the reason that we want a charge upon the whole line, because a charge upon a part of the line might be less valuable if we had to foreclose. My hon. friend (Mr. Haggart, Lanark) points out that if you have no mortgage upon the terminals and you have to foreclose, your line will be incomplete until new terminals are provided. Is not that exactly the point the minister makes?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is in a way. But, the terminals to be provided in Montreal will be very, very expensive, and to my mind the company could not finance these terminals if there was a first mortgage preceding the bonds they would have to issue. I would not be surprised if the terminals in Montreal city would cost sixty per cent of our entire guarantee on the line, and I do not think that is an extravagant estimate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Twenty-one millions.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would not be surprised if the terminals in Montreal before they get through with them will cost that amount of money. I discussed the terminal situation with the company very thoroughly, and they argued that they could not finance terminals of that kind if they had a first mortgage standing against them, and that looks reasonable.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It looks exceedingly reasonable from their standpoint, but the standpoint of the country has to be considered. If you do not have a charge upon the terminals you at least should provide some means by purchase or power of expropriation to get them in case you should have to take over the road. So far as I understand it, the road would be of little use to you without the terminals.

Mr. GRAHAM. If the road became our property.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). When taking security of this kind, the only business way of looking at it is to consider the possibility of being obliged to foreclose. The minister has given a reason that appeals to me why it would not be practicable to include the terminals in this mortgage, but he has not given any reason for not providing means to acquire these terminals in case it becomes necessary to buy in the road.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not sure that there is not something in the agreement by which that can be worked out, but I have made a note of the matter and I will look into it.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Do you know the amount of prior securities issued on the road from Ottawa to Niagara, or the amount they have the right to issue?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think it is $30,000 a mile.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). And you likewise do not take security on the terminals there?

Mr. GRAHAM. We take security on all their line which is included in this $30,000 a mile. I imagine that the terminal situation in Toronto will be similar to the terminal situation in Montreal. At present they have no terminals in Toronto and they use the connection with the Grand Trunk, but I am told they are to provide other terminals that are not now in existence, and will not form part of this contract.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The first mortgage on that portion will be only $30,000 per mile.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think so.

Mr. LALOR. In addition to this, do they get land grants or subsidies from the provincial government?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think they have a grant from the Ontario government in reference to some land in the clay belt. The portion of the line from here to Montreal got a regular subsidy, but we are extending the guarantee over all the line from Ottawa to Montreal, because we want to get first mortgage security on the entire line from Port Arthur to Montreal, as it would not be a continuous line without that.

Mr. LALOR. There is no cash subsidy from the Dominion?

Mr. GRAHAM Not other than I have stated.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I would remind the minister that the Canadian Northern railway have considerable terminals in the east end of Toronto at the present time.

Mr. GRAHAM. I should not have said they had no terminals in Toronto, but what I had in mind was the larger terminals which are contemplated.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). I would like to know how much the guarantee amounts to?

Mr. GRAHAM. Approximately 1,000 miles at $35,000 a mile.

Mr. SPROULE. That is a guarantee practically forever.

Mr. GRAHAM. The principal falls due in 50 years.

Mr. SPROULE. If the principal be not paid at the end of 50 years, we would be responsible for its payment?

Mr. GRAHAM. We guarantee the Canadian Northern Ontario railway, and we are guaranteed behind that by the Canadian Northern railway parent company itself. We have two guarantees. Suppose there were a default, then the Canadian Northern railway guarantee that the Canadian government will not lose. Suppose the Canadian Northern railway then defaulted, which I think is practically impossible, the worst that could happen would be that this line would become the property of the Dominion, and we would have a line which cost more than $50,000 per mile to build, at $35,000 per mile. We have the first mortgage.

Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. BLAIN. I suppose there was some promise given as to when the railway would be constructed between Niagara Falls and Toronto, more particularly as the guarantee is to cover that part of the road, it being a second mortgage. When does the minister expect the work will be completed?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have no information as to the building of the line between Niagara and Toronto. There are certain complications, but the line between Toronto and Ottawa is under construction, and the Canadian Northern railway will have a line from Toronto to Quebec.

Mr. BLAIN. The other part is very important for that section of the country. We did suppose that when the government was coming to the assistance of a company, it would see that this section of country was served by the construction of the road. My hon. friend will understand that a second mortgage upon a railway not yet constructed is not worth much. I would suggest that the minister should see that the company is urged to construct that part of its line. He says there are difficulties surrounding it. I suppose there are, but the company is occupying a place for the construction of a railway and doing nothing practically upon it.

Mr. GRAHAM. If I remember correctly, only a few weeks ago we got certain complications straightened out as to the entrance from the west in Toronto, and by common consent a route was approved into the city from the west.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Have you, independent of those securities, the guarantee of the company on its whole undertaking?

Mr. GRAHAM. In addition to this security of the Canadian Northern Ontario Company, we have the guarantee of the Canadian Northern railway. Where there are several securities on lines, the direct guarantee of the Canadian Northern railway is as valuable as if we had another mortgage on the top of the ones now existing on the western lines.

Mr. SPROULE. So far as I can judge public opinion, the sentiment is rapidly growing that we have reached the time when it is not the part of wisdom to grant more subsidies to railways, especially through portions of country already well served. This is presumed to be a valuable piece of road to carry the trade between the east and west, but at present we are struggling with reciprocity negotiations which are calculated, if they go through, to take a large portion of that trade to the south, and probably take it all. It seems to me, therefore, that while the government are providing on the one hand to secure the trade from the west to the east, they are providing on the other to take it away. Has the Minister of Railways made any estimate of what is likely to be the traffic between the east and the west over these three roads when built? We have the Canadian Pacific railway and the National Transcontinental railway through that country, and now it is proposed to build another, and we are proposing to build this third line at the very moment when we are asked to pass a treaty which is likely to divert the traffic across the southern boundary. I am inclined to think that the people will regard this scheme of guaranteeing the bonds of a railway, to run through a section of country where it is not needed as rather profligate and an abuse of the power of parliament. If this road were to pass entirely through a new country which had no railway facilities, something could be said in its favour, but that is not the case. If I understood the remarks of the minister correctly, the intention is to run this line between the National Transcontinental railway and the Canadian Pacific railway away round north of Lake Superior. These roads are not built far apart, and the section of country is one not likely to afford much traffic, so that the road will have to depend on the traffic from eastern provinces to the west, and vice versa. Is the traffic in that new country likely to support three railways, and enable them to earn a fair return on the money invested? If it is not, we stand to lose by this guarantee. The minister should have submitted some approximate calculations showing what traffic is expected to go over this line, especially in view of the fact that the present railway running through that district is able to handle five times as much traffic as it is now getting. And he is doing this at a time, when if reciprocity be adopted, from 25 per cent to 40 per cent of that traffic will cross the boundary line, and not go over this railway at all. I do not think they are. We have it brought up in various ways in the country, and we frequently hear an expression of the opinion of the people regarding it. This is a large guarantee, and it is for a long time. It is not the sum total of what we will be forced to give because we will have to give many other railways subsidies in the future. They all tend to create an obligation on the country, and if anything should happen to the railway the country would have to make good its guarantee. I think the minister should have submitted to the House the clearest evidence that there is an urgent demand for this railway before the country would be satisfied that we were doing our full duty in supporting this proposed guarantee.

Mr. GRAHAM. Of course the data as to the future necessities of the carrying trade of Canada will be large or small according to the faith we have in the development of the country both east and west. In introducing this resolution this afternoon, I explained the situation of this railway, that it has a system of 4,000 miles of railway in western Canada, with no independent outlet to its other system in eastern Canada, and that I was satisfied that it was absolutely necessary in the interests of both the west and the east that it should have this connecting link.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister seems to base his argument on faith. He must have gone to Sunday school as a boy, and must have remembered the passage: 'If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove and nothing shall be impossible unto you.'

Mr. GRAHAM. It is not a bad thing to remember.

Mr. SPROULE. He might have faith that he could bring the moon down here, but not many would believe his faith could accomplish it. When passing through that country did the minister take the trouble to look into the situation at Duluth, Superior, and Minneapolis, to ascertain what expenditures this company propose making there in view of the proposed reciprocity pact? I am told they are preparing for very heavy expenditures to receive the freight crossing the line there. That would of necessity reduce the amount of traffic for their main line. I presume the minister paid no attention to that, however, because it was not under way when he was in the west. It seems to me that the data upon which the minister is asking us to commit the country to an undertaking such as this, are very limited. Is there any agreement or undertaking with regard to any reduction of rates or anything of that kind?

Mr. GRAHAM. The rates on this road as on all roads in Canada under federal jurisdiction, are controlled by the Board of Railway Commissioners. We have a clause in the resolution which says that the rates from a Canadian point of shipment to another Canadian point, must not in any case exceed the rate to a corresponding American point. The hon. gentleman will remember that the Canadian Northern has no eastern terminals in the United States. The Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk railway have, but the Canadian Northern have not.

Mr. SPROULE. When Manitoba agreed to guarantee this company's bonds they secured a substantial reduction in the rates for the carriage of wheat. If the company were willing to do that for Manitoba I would assume that they would be willing to do it for this government. If we were able to get the same proportionate reduction in the rates eastward from Port Arthur as this company granted on their rates in Manitoba, it would be a very great advantage to the people of both the east and the west.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend will see that there is a great difference. In the case of Manitoba there is a short line to begin with, to get to a lake port. In the second place, Manitoba has no machinery for making or revising rates such as the Canadian parliament has devised for the control of rates through the Railway Commission.

Now, the Canadian parliament, as I have stated, has established a Board of Railway Commissioners to regulate rates and has provided them with all the necessary machinery for that purpose. No rate can be put in force until it has been approved by the board, and before a rate is made everybody can be heard. There is a clause in the Bill which I now have before the House—I hope I can get it through this session—which changes the time of notice from ten days to thirty days. So, in the case of any new traffic arrangement anybody concerned will have a month's notice and an opportunity to state his case within that time. The point I make is that there are so many conditions as to rates over the whole Dominion, that unless you have some body with expert assistance and all the machinery of investigation, and with full power in the matter, any attempted protection will be comparatively futile. In Manitoba, there were certain well established rates for a certain number of miles between certain parts—

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). About three times the other rates.

Mr. GRAHAM. Pretty stiff rates;—and the Manitoba government simply made terms concerning those rates. But there are no varying conditions as there are all over Canada. You cannot make a set of rates for the Dominion which will continue to be applicable. And this parliament or the Governor in Council has not the necessary machinery to deal with these matters. So, we have established a body which has all the machinery, and I think we cannot do better than leave it in their hands.

Mr. SPROULE. We know what the Canadian Pacific railway rates are from Port Arthur to Montreal. If we got the Canadian Northern to give a reduction of 2 cents a bushel in consideration of the guarantee, it would force a similar reduction on the part of the others. We have subsidized the other roads, and if they were forced to do this, there would be no great injustice done them, provided they could do it and still earn a reasonable rate on the money invested. And it would be a very substantial advantage to the people of the west as well as to the people of the east.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The question raised by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in regard to freight rates is one of which the minister must, sooner or later, take cognizance. For instance, I think that the fifth class, commodity rate from Montreal to Winnipeg is 70 cents a hundred, and of that, the proportion from Port Arthur to Winnipeg is 40 cents a hundred. So that the getting of a special rate by the province of Manitoba on that guarantee is now working against the interest of the shippers now that we have the Railway Commission. If the commission has complete jurisdiction over this part of the route, I am satisfied that rate would be equalized a little down. The time is coming —I know it is heresy for me to say so here —when we shall give no more of these guarantees. There is no reason why this company should not get a guarantee as well as any other, because they have always acted in good faith with the country, they have built a very large mileage and have opened up a vast extent of new territory. To my mind, the most essential thing in connection with railway building in this country in the future, is the building of branch lines into territory now destitute of railway accommodation. The day of building or subsidizing competitive through lines of railway will soon come to an end. We shall then act as the older countries do, as France does, for instance, which country, years ago, took the view that the building of competitive railways was an injury to the country, a waste of capital, and that it was better to control the traffic and rates. It is plain that one road carrying all the business of three roads can carry more cheaply, and make more money than three roads, because there is only one set of fixed charges on which interest has to be earned. Some day we shall have to consider that in Canada, and then I think we shall assist in building up branch roads rather than subsidize long competitive lines across the country. The question of exchange of traffic will then come up. I did not hear the minister say that he was putting a clause in this Bill which would compel the exchange of commodity traffic. If that were in the railway law, every shipper knows, there would be no necessity for competitive railway lines. The question is not understood by the great majority of people, because they do not come in direct contact with the question. There are two rates on railways, the local rate and the commodity rate. The commodity rate is a low rate for car lots which extends over the line of that railway only, and the moment the traffic goes to another line that other line will charge local rates. So, you cannot ship over two lines without paying an excessive rate. The day will come, no doubt, when that will have to be considered. In this connection, the commission has not met the expectations of a great many people. The west to-day is clamouring for reciprocity. Why? because they say to the east: When you come to ship stuff to the west you give a preference largely to the United States lines, and send in over those roads instead of the Canadian roads. There are roads that have not connected up with the Northwest as it is proposed now to connect up the Canadian Northern, as for instance the Grand Trunk. If you ask the Grand Trunk to put a car on their siding to ship stuff to the Northwest over the Canadian Pacific railway right, they refuse to do it. They will allow their cars to go to the west except by the American route. I think that is a question that should be considered by the minister, and, if he has jurisdiction, some slight exercise of the strong arm might help, or he might use a little persuasion with the commission to get them to change their ruling on that point. This action on the part of the Grand Trunk railway is a hardship to shippers. And the people in the Northwest, when they see cars coming from the other side of the line, consider that we in the east, especially the manufacturers are very unpatriotic, because they presume that it is done because it is cheaper to send by the United States rather by the north shore of Lake Superior, when, as a matter of fact, the freight rate is exactly the same. But the Grand Trunk railway has taken that position. The question has been brought before the Railway Commission and they have ruled that the Grand Trunk railway must have their way.

With reference to these terminals at Duluth I think the hon. member for East Grey has asked a question which should be considered. The Canadian roads are quite capable of holding their own with the Canadian government, and the American government or with any other government or corporation in the whole world. That may be a pretty broad statement. But the largest and strongest corporation in the world to-day, so far as I know, is the Canadian Pacific railway. When there was talk that our traffic was liable to go to the south, the Canadian railways took time by the forelock, and the Canadian Pacific railway and Canadian Northern railway are building terminals in Duluth—spending large sums of money there. By the way, does this guarantee cover the branch line they are building to Duluth?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I did not know whether the minister's charity extended that far.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not farther than Port Arthur.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). It is well to consider these questions very carefully. Having in view the fact that from now on, it will be better for us to confine the railway business largely to the extension of branch lines into unoccupied territory.

It is far better for them to have a number of branch lines built out there, than that there should be another transcontinental line, at least for a number of years, in view of the increased earnings which these branch lines will give the main line. If you have a number of branch lines you get a large quantity of freight from them, you have more freight to carry over the main line, and in the long haul the commission will give lower rates, and the products of the country will go cheaper over one line than over two or three. There is another question affecting the northwest. A few years ago Railway Commissions were established in some of the western states; I will take the state of Minnesota as an example. The state established a Railway and Warehouse Commission, which commission under their law, was to have jurisdiction over all the freight arising from one point in the state to another point in the state. The state commission claimed they had a perfect right to that control; whereas the federal commission only had jurisdiction over freight arising in one state and going into another state. That was unfortunate to some extent. The state legislature appointed men on that commission with largely socialistic views, and they proceeded to cut all the rates in the state of Minnesota one-half or one-third of what they were previously, establishing cheaper freight rates than were known anywhere else in the west. That tariff of rates has been published, and can be obtained by the Minister of Railways on applying to the secretary of the commission in St. Paul. A large number of these tariff schedules of the state of Minnesota have been sent broadcast all over the Canadian west, and that is the secret of a good deal of the discontent up there in regard to freight rates. For instance, the tariff establishing the freight rate in Minnesota is about one-half what it is in Canada for the same distance. Now, the other side of the story is that an appeal was taken against the Minnesota Railway Commission, the matter was fought out in the United States courts, and recently a judgment was given declaring that the schedules and freight rates of the state commission were of no value, that they were confiscatory in their nature, and contrary to a clause in the American constitution which says that private rights shall be conserved. The only thing I wish to say in conclusion is that I hope the minister will take up the question of exchange of traffic. I know he has put in several good amendments in the Bill, and I hope he will consider that some time, perhaps next session.

Mr. SPROULE. Has any agreement been made whereby the traffic by this route is to be handed over to the Intercolonial. I could see an advantage in doing that, if it became a feeder of the Intercolonial.

Mr. GRAHAM. At the present time we have an arrangement with the Grand Trunk for an interchange of traffic at Montreal; the government can terminate that arrangement at any time, but the Grand Trunk cannot. As I pointed out a short time ago, it will not be long before the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific will both be urging us for some modification by which they can handle each other's traffic. We are putting a clause in this agreement which says that when the government sees fit it can demand of the Canadian Northern railway, and they must consent, to make an agreement with the government to give and receive the traffic of the Intercolonial.

Mr. SPROULE. Why don't you do it now?

Mr. GRAHAM. We could not do it without breaking the traffic arrangements we have by which the Intercolonial, last year earned $1,600,000.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the government ever considered whether it would be advisable to extend the Intercolonial to the Great Lakes?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a big question. When we got to the great lakes we would probably have to get a line of steamers and go beyond the Great Lakes.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). In the Montreal 'Gazette' of yesterday I find this item with regard to the Canadian Northern railway route:

> Leaving Ottawa the line crosses the Ottawa river at Chats Falls into Quebec, passes through Norway Bay and crosses back into Ontario at Portage du Fort. It follows the Ottawa river to Pembroke, making a short line from Pembroke to Ottawa. At Pembroke the lines to Toronto and Port Arthur will diverge.

I see the map does not put it in that way, the map shows that it diverges at Ottawa.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think the reporter has got the point wrong. As a matter of fact the dividing line will be at Rideau Junction near Ottawa, and the Toronto line will go straight up as shown on the map.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On resolution 10,

Mr. FOSTER. Are these bonds guaranteed before the whole line is complete?

Mr. FIELDING. The usual method is that the guarantee is prepared and delivered to a trust company, and after the sale of any portion of the bonds the proceeds are paid out from time to time as construction proceeds. The guarantee is actually prepared and placed in the hands of the trust company before the completion of the road.

Mr. FOSTER. And these guaranteed bonds are really to be disposed of in order to build the road?

Mr. FIELDING. Quite so.

Mr. FOSTER. How is the interest met until the time of the opening of the road for traffic?

Mr. GRAHAM. Further down my hon. friend will find that during the construction the company is to take care of the interest.

Mr. FOSTER. This really means, then, that outside of and beyond the $35,000,000 that is guaranteed the government meets the first two years' payments, making about $2,500,000, and the interest thereon, so long as it is not paid by the company itself; that is, it is an addition to the original subsidy?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. But not contemplated as a gift?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not contemplated as a gift. It becomes a part of the mortgage, and the repayment is secured by the mortgage to the government, and they pay interest on this interest for the two years.

Mr. FOSTER. These they are to pay at maturity?

Mr. GRAHAM. We relieve them of the interest for the time being for the first two years.

Mr. BLAIN. Will they be bound to purchase their equipment in Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM. Oh, yes, we will certainly put that in the agreement.

Mr. CROTHERS. What subsidies have already been granted by public bodies to any portion of these lines, and on what terms have these subsidies been granted?

Mr. GRAHAM. For the line east of Ottawa the usual subsidy without conditions, has been granted by this parliament.

Mr. SPROULE. For how many miles?

Mr. GRAHAM. The subsidy has been paid from Ottawa to Hawkesbury, which is about 56 miles.

Mr. SPROULE. At $3,200 per mile?

Mr. GRAHAM. They received a double subsidy, or nearly so. I think the Ontario government granted aid from Toronto to Sellwood.

Mr. CROTHERS. Oh, they granted a subsidy for 200 miles west of Sudbury.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not a cash subsidy. A land grant was given by the Ontario government some years ago, but just what position that is in at present I cannot say.

Mr. CROTHERS. The provincial government may have made that land grant on conditions which may have given them a previous claim upon the road.

Mr. GRAHAM. Oh, no.

Mr. CROTHERS. We surely ought to have information as to that.

Mr. GRAHAM. We will have a first mortgage; we will see there is no previous lien on the line in any way.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to get at the whole amount of subsidies, aids of any kind, that are paid, or to be paid, for any and all portions of this road that is now being bonded for $35,000 a mile. I want the amount of money the Dominion government has paid and what it is to pay, what amount has been given by the provincial governments and what by municipalities, if any, what amount in money, and what amount in lands. The minister must remember that a guarantee of $35,000 a mile for one thousand miles of railway situated as this is, is a very substantial contribution to the total cost of the road. Has the minister any estimate as to what the road will cost?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have the standard of the road here, and am told it will cost at least $50,000 a mile.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that without equipment?

Mr. GRAHAM. Without equipment.

Mr. FOSTER. We give $35,000 for each mile in the shape of a guarantee and beside that we are making two and a half millions of an advance to say the least, which will bring the total amount per mile considerably more than $35,000. We ought to know before this passes just exactly what aid this company is getting of any, and all kinds, what has been already paid on these portions built and what will be earned when the road is built.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will get all that information to-morrow.

On clause 12,

Mr. FOSTER. Does that include the whole Canadian Northern system?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, the parent company gives its guarantee.

Mr. FOSTER. It will be a company's covenant?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

On clause 3,

Mr. FOSTER. At what time was this clause drawn.

Mr. GRAHAM. This clause was drawn and redrawn. I would not like to say when it was finally completed.

Mr. FOSTER. When was it broached?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am afraid my hon. friend has something in his mind. This was finally drawn about two weeks ago.

Mr. FOSTER. When was it first broached?

Mr. GRAHAM. The first moment I discussed it with the Canadian Northern people, which must have been three or four months ago.

Mr. FOSTER. If the minister had to do it just now, I suppose that would be the first idea in his mind.

Mr. GRAHAM. No matter what else was in my mind, that would be in it.

Mr. FOSTER. Was this an after effect of conscience? It does seem odd to some of us that after doing all you possibly could do to draw traffic away from Canadian channels, in order to save your face you make a thirty-five million dollar grant to show the people how much you desire that all this transit should take place through Canadian channels. I think this clause is a pricking of conscience.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is one of the original ideas.

On section 14,

14. That the company shall enter into an agreement with the government to secure or establish or cause to be secured or established, suitable terminals for the company within the city of Montreal and agreeing on the request of the government to enter into arrangements with the Intercolonial railway for the interchange of traffic between the company and Intercolonial railway at Montreal, for such period as the Governor in Council may determine and upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the parties, and should the parties fail to agree, terms shall be fixed by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Any penalty attached to this?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, it is difficult to work out a penalty.

Mr. DANIEL. I think it is generally understood that a large railway like this can really get freight over it routed in any direction it pleases. Some time ago Mr. Loud, of the Grand Trunk railway, gave testimony to that effect before some court which was trying to find out the reason why the Grand Trunk railway did not carry out an agreement made with the Intercolonial railway. Mr. Loud said that the Grand Trunk railway or any other railway could get almost the whole of its freight routed in any way it pleased. The provision here, therefore, is not a very strong safeguard. We have not had an opportunity of testing it with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific because the road is not built, but it would look as if this provision were really not much of a safeguard. I should think that if the government decidedly wished to insist on the freight going through Canadian channels this clause might be made stricter and more of a compelling clause.

Mr. McCOLL. I quite agree with my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Daniel), that a railway company can have its freight routed as it likes.

There are six lines of railway running right along our southern border, namely, the New York Central, the Delaware and Hudson, the Rutland system, the Boston and Maine, and the Maine Central, connecting with the Quebec Central. They all terminate in Montreal. During the winter I have had an opportunity of becoming familiar with the conditions that prevail over in Vermont. In the struggle before the legislature to prevent the Central Vermont getting into Providence, Rhode Island, a great deal of stress was laid on the fact that a new trade would be gathered on the northern boundary to be carried to the seacoast, and that trade would be largely the result of the reciprocity treaty now under discussion.

We ought to have some much stronger clause to prevent Canadian traffic being diverted into American channels. I will venture the statement, without consulting any of my colleagues on this side, that the remedy for all this is a close running arrangement between the Intercolonial railway and the Canadian Northern railway. My own opinion is that if we were to lease the Intercolonial railway to the Canadian Northern railway, or have it worked by that company on a joint working contract which would insure economy in its operation, the Intercolonial railway would become a valuable asset producing annual surpluses. That would settle the future of the Intercolonial railway for all time to come. I am aware that the people of the maritime provinces in particular believe in its being a government owned road because it was built in consummation of the union between these provinces and upper and lower Canada. While I agree that it is a really national road, would it not be prudent to deal with it now for all time to come by leasing it to the Canadian Northern railway, or making an arrangement with that company for joint operation, the ownership still to remain with Canada. That would insure to the Intercolonial railway all the traffic which the Canadian Northern railroad can produce and relieve this country from a very great burden. It would relieve also the Minister of Railways from a very arduous undertaking, and we can all sympathize with him because he has not only the ordinary duties of his department to attend to, but also the duty of managing a large railway or of organizing others to manage it. If we could make such an arrangement as I suggest, it would go a long way to reconcile the people of Canada to this additional burden laid on them by the guarantee of this very large amount of bonds to the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). I think that this clause of the agreement should go back to the conveyancer. There is no penalty provided, but even if there were I doubt if that would help it. It looks very formidable, but if you had to enforce it, it would be very difficult to prove a breach; and when you did prove a breach, it would be more difficult to assess the damage.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It seems to me that it is the only provision which can possibly be made, and the effect would be this, that if the company violated its agreement parliament would be free to take any action it might think proper.

Mr. FOSTER. What action would you suggest parliament could take?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend could easily think what might be done. Parliament might take away certain privileges which the company might be enjoying.

Mr. FOSTER. What privilege for instance?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There might be many privileges. It would be easier to take action after the event than to anticipate now what action ought to be taken. If information came to parliament that this company was violating its bargain, parliament might legislate so as to impose penalties and to provide for a measure of damages, for a mandatory injunction or any other remedy which might be deemed proper under the circumstances.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why should not parliament deal with it now?

Mr. PUGSLEY. How?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If I were over there and were seeking to put this legislation through parliament, and had not any better reason than the Minister of Public Works has given, I think I would resign. It would be remarkable legislation to pass this Bill without any provision for penalty, or for a mandatory injunction or any of these other awful things the minister is speaking of, and then, after they had committed a breach of this innocuous paragraph, to come in afterwards and provide a penalty. No one ever heard of such legislation, at least I never did. If there are any penalties to be enforced, and mandatory injunctions to be asked for in the future on account of a breach of this provision, they should be set forth; any such provisions that might be made in the future by parliament, should be made now. I agree with the Minister of Public Works that it is difficult to devise a scheme to make this particular kind of a paragraph effective. We pointed out in 1903 and 1904 that a similar agreement made with the Grand Trunk Pacific would probably be wholly ineffective. In the first place it could be evaded and even if the company were proceeded against for a breach of it, I cannot see that the government could recover more than normal damages. Any railway company making an agreement of that kind need have little fear of any proceedings for a breach of it. I think it is generally understood between railway companies when they enter into arrangements of this kind, that they can be either evaded without any risk of an action, or, if any proceeding is taken, the company committing the breach has little to fear from any action in the courts. That is the testimony of people familiar with railway affairs, they are really of little use, and I think this agreement would have to be construed from the standpoint of the country very much as if this paragraph were not here.

Mr. DANIEL. The minister asked for suggestions for the improvement of this clause. I would suggest that he strike out the words 'not specially routed otherwise by the shipper' where they occur.

Mr. GRAHAM. That would take away from the shipper his inherent right to route his business wherever he likes.

Mr. DANIEL. What are we giving the $30,000,000 for.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not to curtail the rights of the shipper.

Mr. DANIEL. To provide transportation facilities for the shipper which otherwise he would not have.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is true, but if we do that and take away the right of the shipper to say how the goods shall be routed, we might as well throw the money in the river.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I cited a case this afternoon, where the Grand Trunk would not allow a shipper to route as he pleased. That is the ruling of the Railway Commission. What is the use of such sophistry as that?

Mr. DANIEL. When the late Mr. Blair was minister he would not allow freight to be routed over the Intercolonial railway, to go through St. John by the Canadian Pacific railway, he compelled it to go all the way by Intercolonial, he did not give the shipper freedom of choice as to how he should route his freight.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is my hon. friend quite sure about that?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am satisfied he is entirely wrong. I have no doubt Mr. Blair made a rate over the Intercolonial railway as compared with the rate by way of St. John, so low that it was an inducement to the shipper to ship by the Intercolonial railway all the way to Montreal. I am sure my hon. friend is mistaken when he says that Mr. Blair refused to allow a shipper to route his goods whichever way he chose.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not think my hon. friend from St. John is wrong, because I remember the matter being brought up in this House and instances being given where goods had been consigned via St. John, and the Canadian Pacific railway to a point in Ontario. They did not arrive, and a couple of weeks afterwards they were discovered somewhere on the Intercolonial railway between Moncton and Quebec, they had been sent by the other route, and it transpired, unless my memory fails me, that that was shown to have been the result of instructions by which the directions of the shipper as to the route had been entirely disregarded.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not a business man, but I know a little about some goods which have been shipped, and I know that in bringing goods to St. John from Toronto sometimes, the shipper will say: Send by such a line to Montreal, Canadian Pacific railway to Montreal, or by steamer to Montreal and thence via the Canadian Pacific railway to St. John, or by the Intercolonial railway to St. John and those instructions, I have understood, are always carried out.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have never had any trouble in any business I have had, and I have bought a good deal of goods by car lots and less, in having the man who sold the goods send them by the line I asked him to.

Mr. CROSBY. What line was that?

Mr. GRAHAM. As many and more than my hon. friend has in Halifax.

Mr. CROSBY. And as long as my hon. friend is in office we will not have any more.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am sorry he thinks so. It does not seem to be the impression of the people. I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Crosby), will help us to get more railways for Halifax. My hon. friend raises the question as between the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial, but if he had carried that out to its conclusion, he would have discovered that the arbitrators decided that in our favour, and compelled the Grand Trunk to give us the traffic that was to be ours under the agreement.

Mr. FOSTER. When was that done?

Mr. GRAHAM. A couple or three years ago. And ever since we have been getting traffic that we should not otherwise have got.

Mr. FOSTER. With what result?

Mr. GRAHAM. An increase of the income of the Intercolonial. Our exchange in traffic at Montreal last year gave us, I think, $1,600,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What happened in reference to the preceding years when they had practically denied the agreement and failed to carry it out. Has the minister received anything on that account?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not that in memory. I cannot state the facts at the moment. The situation of the Canadian Northern under this bargain is a little different from that of the Grand Trunk Pacific under its contract. I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) referred to that. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk are different entities, although identical interests. But the Grand Trunk is not a party to the agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific, so far as the routeing of traffic is concerned. The Grand Trunk Pacific has no American connection, although the Grand Trunk has. In this situation neither the Canadian Northern nor the Canadian Northern Ontario, nor the Canadian Northern Quebec has any American Atlantic seaport.

Mr. SPROULE. But they may have in the future.

Mr. GRAHAM. That may possibly be. But the agreement that may be entered into, based upon this resolution, provides for the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Northern Ontario, and it also covers the business to be done by the branch lines and connections. So, every interest identified with the Canadian Northern is bound up in the agreement that will be made on this resolution. I agree largely with the leader of the opposition, having had some experience with railroads. If they start out not to keep an agreement, I do not think all the penalties you can put on these pages would prevent them from evading to some extent—I mean as to traffic.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Routing?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes. We come to an outline in the agreement of what they agree to do, and I think that under the condition that would probably arise under this contract they will be glad to keep these agreements, and there will be a force to help them keep it, that, perhaps, does not exist in other agreements.

Now, I come to the point raised by my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. McCall). The question he raises, that of leasing the Intercolonial, I am not prepared to consider I may be wrong, but at the present moment, I would not like to consider leasing or selling the Intercolonial railway. That is my personal feeling about it. But in the resolution before us there is a provision that on demand of the government the Canadian Northern railway shall enter into an agreement for the interchange of traffic at Montreal with the Intercolonial. That is a feature of this agreement which strikes me is of great benefit to the state-owned railway. It was asked to-day why that agreement was not placed in the resolution and proceeded with at once. I will explain the situation again, as I did this afternoon. There is at present an agreement for interchange of traffic at Montreal between the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial for the term of ninety-nine years. That agreement may be terminated on notice being given by the government, but the company has no power on its side to terminate the agreement. It may be that, in a short time, the Grand Trunk will suggest—in fact, I can go further and say that the Grand Trunk is now suggesting it, and will, no doubt, continue to suggest more strongly when the Grand Trunk Pacific is completed—that, in the interests of the through traffic and the road, we ought to release them from a portion at least of that arrangement. I do not think for a moment the government will agree to do that, it will not at present at least. But, before this road is constructed, or at that time, conditions may arise under which it would be in the interest of the Intercolonial, and of the people, so far as transportation is concerned, that a proposition of that kind might be entertained. There is a clause in this resolution under which the government, if they desire, can call for the Canadian Northern to make an agreement for full interchange of traffic at the city of Montreal, and thus the Intercolonial might become the eastern connection of this great new transcontinental road. I agree with my hon. friend that, if that condition were arrived at, and if such an agreement were made, it would be stronger than any legislation you could make in order to direct traffic to Canadian Atlantic ports.

Mr. FOSTER. What are the reasons which impelled the Grand Trunk to endeavour to modify that agreement so that it might be allowed to free a portion, or all of its traffic from conditions of interchange with the Intercolonial?

Mr. GRAHAM. The reason urged—urged very mildly at present, but as I see it, to be urged more strongly in future—is that the Grand Trunk Pacific controlled by the same people, ought to have at least a portion if not all the traffic that the Grand Trunk gathers up in Ontario for distribution in the maritime provinces.

Mr. FOSTER. It is that the diversion is not to outside roads but to roads through Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is the argument placed before me.

Mr. FOSTER. They wish to give a larger portion to themselves in reality?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. But no part of it contemplates a diversion of any of the traffic towards other than Canadian routes?

Mr. GRAHAM. There has been no such suggestion.

Mr. SPROULE. I desire to say just a word with reference to the observations of my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. McCall) for fear they might be taken as expressing the sentiment of the country, and showing that we were desirous of having some company take over the Intercolonial under leasing or other arrangements. So far as I can judge, the sentiment of the country in my part at any rate, is the very reverse of that. The country, I think, desires to hold on to the Intercolonial, believing that, properly managed, on the same principle as company railways are managed, it would be a good asset of Canada. But there is another reason that would induce us to hold on to it, and what induced me to believe, many years ago, that it would be a very desirable thing to bring the road up the Georgian bay. In the first place, I think, that, as a government owned railway, its earning powers might be materially increased if, in making this contract, we had arranged that the Canadian Northern would direct its freight over the Intercolonial and allow interchange of freight. I think it would be better for the country if the Intercolonial were extended up to the Georgian bay. Here is one of the reasons which make me believe that we would be unwise to part with it. Some years ago that railway was hauling freight to an extent which gives an idea of the benefit the people receive from the Intercolonial. I am now quoting from the 'Hansard' of 1904, vol. 1, page 335. The question was asked by Mr. Kemp:

Mr. KEMP asked:

1. How many bushels of grain have been hauled by the Intercolonial railway during the six months preceding March 1, 1904, for delivery at Halifax for export?
2. What was the proportion delivered in each month?
3. What lake ports was it shipped from?
4. What was the rate per bushel from such lake ports to Halifax?
5. What was the mileage of each railway over which it was hauled?
6. What was the earnings per bushel of each railway?
7. What was the estimated cost per bushel for the service the Intercolonial railway performed?

Hon. JAMES SUTHERLAND (Minister of Public Works):

1. The number of bushels of grain hauled by the Intercolonial railway during the six months preceding March, 1904, for delivery at Halifax for export was: Wheat, 87,826½ bushels; corn, 59,611 bushels.
2. Proportion delivered each month was:

	Bushels.
November, wheat	47,836
December, wheat	23,990½
January, wheat	16,000
February, corn	59,611

3. All of it was shipped from Depot Harbour.
4. The rates from Depot Harbour to Halifax were:

	Per bush. Cents.
16,000 bushels wheat	5·15
21,836 " "	4·90
39,990½ " "	5·40
25,718½ bushels corn	4·94
33,892½ " "	5·00

5. The mileage of each railway over which it was hauled was:

	Miles.
Canada Atlantic railway	346
Grand Trunk railway	34
Intercolonial railway	828

6. The earnings per bushels of each railway was:

	Cents.
C.A.R. on 16,000 bushels wheat	2·27½
G.T.R. on 16,000 "	·60
I.C.R. on 16,000 "	2·27½

The question was asked: Was that a paying rate, and the answer was that, having regard to the return cargo, it was considered a paying rate. I have always thought that if we had the Intercolonial railway extended to the Georgian bay it might become a great lever to keep down the freight rates upon other roads. What would happen to the shippers if we parted with the Intercolonial? Any other railway, even the Canadian Northern railway, would seek to raise the rates up to the level of other roads, and the people would pay practically double freight rates if the Intercolonial railway went into the hands of the Canadian Northern railway. That is to my mind an important consideration. There are two reasons why we ought to keep that road. One is that it is a very desirable lever that we can use to regulate the freight rates on other roads through the same section of country; the other is that while that road is carrying this freight at those low rates the people get the additional advantage. I have thought this matter over many times, and I think that the Intercolonial railway should be pushed as rapidly as possible, especially to the Georgian bay, where it could share in the freight coming from the west down the lakes, and so become a paying concern, which it is not to-day. I think it would be a very unwise move for the government to attempt to dispose of that road either by sale or by lease.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). The Minister of Public Works asks us for a suggestion with reference to this clause 13. They do not often ask this side of the House for suggestions. I think if they acted upon our suggestions a little oftener it would be better for the country. Now I will offer a suggestion for what it is worth. We are creating a tribunal in this clause 13 to try questions that are likely to come up. You have created a tribunal, and you have made the finding of that tribunal final with reference to other matters. Now as to the length of the road, the decision of the Governor General, it is said, shall be final. There are only two parties to the agreement, and when they do not agree let one be the sole judge, then they are both bound by his decision, even supposing the sole judge is one of the parties to the agreement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am inclined to think that the Railway Act now provides for that. If any railway company fails to do what it has bound itself to do, the party injured may apply to the board for an order compelling a company to carry out its obligation.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that hold with reference to agreements between railways or between a railway and a shipper?

Mr. PUGSLEY. To agreements between railways, I think.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. FOSTER. If one railway made a bargain with another railway, the commission could step in and compel them to fulfil it?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think so, I think that is in the law. What I think will be the most effective remedy is this: All railway companies are greatly influenced by public opinion. At the present time, and I presume it will be so for many years to come, the Transcontinental railroads will be constantly coming to parliament for favours of different kinds, coming for steamship subsidies, for railway subsidies in connection with their branches which are to be feeders. Now if a company like the Canadian Northern railway, having with the authority of parliament, entered into a solemn obligation to transport the freight going over their road through Canadian channels to Canadian ports at the same rate to the seaboard as is given to the United States ports, and if we found them to be wilfully violating that solemn agreement, I think that parliament would very soon deal with them.

Mr. FOSTER. That would all depend upon the influence the company had with the government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A company cannot influence public opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Minister of Public Works is better at making theories than he is in carrying them out. We had a good instance of that in the case of the Grand Trunk railway. The Grand Trunk is as amenable to public opinion as any other railway company. It made a solemn agreement with the Intercolonial railway to interchange freight at Montreal at certain rates, and on certain conditions, but the pen was not put to the agreement before the Grand Trunk proceeded simply not to carry it out, and they did not carry it out, but violated it straight. Now, I would like to know just what was the question that the Railway Commission decided as to that interchange of traffic. I would like the minister to give us the basis of the question that was submitted, and the decision that was made upon it.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think I laid on the table two weeks ago the synopsis of the agreement with reference to the arbitration. It was not the railway commission that gave the decision, but the board of arbitrators—I used the word commission. The question was whether they would give us the traffic at Montreal or carry it down to certain points on their own line and then hand it to us. We contended that the substance of the agreement was that Montreal was the junction point and that the traffic should be handed to us there, and the board of arbitration upheld our contention.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes my point still stronger, that public opinion has no effect on the Grand Trunk. From 1898, when the agreement was made, down to the present time they have violated that agreement.

Mr. GRAHAM. They are not violating it now. It is fair to the Grand Trunk to say that eminent counsel on their behalf construed the agreement as they did, and advised them to that effect. Our counsel had other views, and the views of our counsel prevailed before the arbitrators.

Mr. FOSTER. Then we have nothing to hope for from the railway commission in this matter. The Canadian Northern can violate that agreement if it pleases, and the railway commission will have no authority to compel it to carry it out.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is a question of law on which I am not prepared to give an opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. So far we have no action or precedent as to what that commission would do or would not do, because they have not ruled on a question of that kind.

Mr. GRAHAM. The railway commission has no power to deal with the Intercolonial railway. It might have power to deal with a company, and still not have power to deal with an arrangement between a company and the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. FOSTER. Then it is still more powerless with reference to this.

Mr. SPROULE. What power would they have to punish?

Mr. GRAHAM. As the leader of the opposition pointed out, and I agree with him, no penalty that you could apply could help out. These companies make agreements, and the board of railway commissioners can enforce the agreements they make; but I am not going so far as to say that they could enforce an agreement in this case that they shall route their freight by Canadian ports. That is a question of law on which I am not prepared to give an opinion. There is something that will compel them to do that which to my mind is stronger than any penalty you could impose. In the first place, they could not take their traffic to an American port at an advantage to themselves. They must always give the Canadian port as good a rate as the American port. Then, they will get the long haul to Montreal, and it is to their advantage to take the traffic to Montreal. A corollary to that is that if the agreement is made with the Intercolonial railway, it will be to their interest to give us the traffic, and it will be to our interest to get it, because we will hand over to that road the westbound traffic that comes through Canadian ports. I do not think, if you covered the statute with pages of penalties, they would help you out in enforcing a routeing arrangement.

Mr. PORTER. I did not very clearly gather the manner in which the Canadian Northern might possibly benefit by routeing the traffic originating on its line by way of an American port. As I understand the situation, it is this. The Canadian Northern railway undertake by this agreement that all freight originating upon its line will be routed to a Canadian port; that is, they will not use any endeavour to divert it, but they will use every endeavour to take it to a Canadian port, and in doing that they will not charge a greater rate for delivering it at that port than the rate at which the same freight could be delivered at an American port. Taking these two things as granted, I do not see clearly how the Canadian Northern or any other railway under such an arrangement could make it an object to divert the traffic. Perhaps the minister will enlighten me as to some way in which a railway operating under such an agreement as this could evade the provisions of that agreement, and get some extra freight rate out of the freight that originated on their line and was diverted to an American port.

Mr. GRAHAM. Under the law of rebates on both sides of the line, there would be no object at all in the Canadian Northern or any of its connections sending the traffic to an American port. It could not make any greater profit.

Mr. FOSTER. Why, then, does the Grand Trunk do it?

Mr. GRAHAM. The Grand Trunk has interests in other lines.

Mr. FOSTER. Could not this company have interests in other lines?

Mr. GRAHAM. It has no interest at the present time.

Mr. BARKER. The other company could give the interest by a division of the rates.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is contrary to the law both in the United States and in Canada for a company to give an undue division of rates, and the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States and the Railway Commission of Canada have power to make the division of rates between the two companies.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Suppose there is the same rate, let us say, from Regina to Halifax or St. John that there is to Boston or Portland; is there anything to prevent the Canadian Northern getting a larger share out of that total rate if the freight goes to Boston or Portland than if it goes to Halifax?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes. It is against the law of both countries. There is a basis on which that division is made where the traffic passes over more than one line, and the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States and the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada would say what proportion of the rate should go to each company for the mileage haul.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there any law of the United States or of Canada which says that a company hauling freight 200 miles shall get just as much as a company hauling it 800 miles?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is exactly what I am pointing out. Take Regina to Boston and Regina to Halifax via Montreal, the Intercolonial railway will have to haul 840 miles to Halifax, and some other railway with which the Canadian Northern may have connection, would have to haul it six hundred miles less; I do not believe there is any law in the United States or in Canada which says that a company hauling traffic 240 miles shall get as much as the Intercolonial hauling it 840 miles.

Mr. GRAHAM. I see the point.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does it not follow that the Canadian Northern railway could make a better bargain with a road that has only the 240 mile haul, and, therefore, if it was its interest to send traffic to Boston it would be sent there?

Mr. GRAHAM. It could not make that arrangement if it had a traffic agreement with the Intercolonial railway to give the Intercolonial railway the traffic.

Mr. CROSBY. Could that agreement be made now?

Mr. GRAHAM. It could not possibly be made now.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Boston road would have its agents out in the Northwest getting people to route their freight to Boston, and the Canadian Northern railway, while not directly connected with any such effort, would look on with a great deal of approval, because it would be getting a great deal more money out of it if the traffic went to Boston or Portland rather than Halifax or St. John. We discussed at all that in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific agreement. In the Grand Trunk case it was perfectly plain, because the Grand Trunk had terminals at Portland, and it would be a far shorter haul than to Halifax and St. John, and its interest was perfectly obvious in that case. Exactly the same conditions could be created here provided the Canadian Northern railway made some arrangement with a road having terminals at Boston or at Portland. I have not the slightest doubt but that Portland and Boston and, perhaps, some other United States ports are at the Canadian Northern railway to-day with a view to having this traffic routed in their direction, because the American roads and the American ports are very keen about such matters and they look a long way ahead.

Mr. PORTER. The minister practically admits that such an arrangement is possible between railway companies, and that being so could not this agreement be so drafted as to prevent such a condition arising? If the Canadian Northern railway were prohibited from entering into an arrangement with any other company by which it would secure a greater share of the freight rate than it would by carrying it to a Canadian port, would not that bring about the object that this section has in view? Is it not possible to do that?

Mr. GRAHAM. It may be possible on paper, but it would have no practical result.

Mr. PORTER. It would have no less practical result than this clause has.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not think it would have any more. The question of routeing is so intricate that it is difficult to make a law that can control it absolutely. I look more to the fact that in the future we will probably have a running arrangement or an interchange of traffic arrangement in which it will be the business of the government to see that they get a large share of this traffic. If the Canadian Northern were going to divert in any direction it will in all probability take the long haul to the city of Quebec on its own line. I have a great deal more fear of not getting all the traffic we ought at Montreal because of the Canadian Northern using its own line for the long haul to Quebec or Lévis, than I have of it going to an American road either at Boston or elsewhere. Then, the Canadian Northern is putting on a line of steamships between Canadian ports, and it will be to its interest in every respect to carry traffic to and from its own steamships. I have studied the different phases of it, and after full consideration, and three or four months' discussion, I have come to the conclusion that to put a clause of this kind in as stringent as we can, would accomplish everything that anything else could. The interests of the Canadian Northern railway are bound up in the Canadian route by steamers, and having their line through to Quebec direct, the chances are all in favour of us getting a big share, if not all, of the traffic through Canadian ports.

Mr. PORTER. When the minister states that the railway will take advantage of the long haul rather than diverting the traffic over the short haul, is he not ignoring the fact that the freight rates to the two ports of delivery are the same? If the railway gets the same amount of money for the short haul as for the long haul, they would be saving operating expenses and it would be an inducement for them to divert the traffic.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a very intricate question.

Mr. BARKER. Surely the minister knows that it frequently pays a company, and that it is an everyday occurrence and a common sense proposition, to hand traffic over to even a rival company at a particular point rather than that the originating company should carry by the long haul. Does he not know that in the end this practice may pay both of them? The minister knows well that to talk about these agreements having any effect upon a railway company in routeing traffic is an absolute absurdity. Any gentleman sitting behind the minister who is in the habit of shipping goods will tell him that when he goes to the station agent, if it is in the interests of the company that it should go by Portland, there will be a car for Portland and there will not be a car for Halifax. We all know that. The agent will say: If you want to ship this to Portland, we can have the car here tomorrow morning; but if you want to send it to Halifax you cannot get a car until next week. The hon. gentleman knows that as well as I do. The company can send the freight in any direction it likes practically without giving any special instructions to its local agents. If the local agent is not smart enough to know what the company wants he will be dismissed. A smart sharp agent knows just where the company's interest is, and he will provide for transportation to the point that pays his company best.

Mr. FOSTER. The Canadian Northern railway at present has no terminals in Montreal, but proposes building them. Does the minister know where the proposed site of these terminals will be?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. FOSTER. But it will not be the Grand Trunk terminal.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think they will have separate terminals.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend knows of course that this contract with the Grand Trunk railway concerning the terminals of that company in Montreal runs for ninety-nine years.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. He contributes to them so much according to the terms. If he now proposes to have exchanges with the Canadian Northern railway, he will also have to arrange for terminals with that company, and will be put to similar expense. Has the minister thought about what that would cost, and is that the reason why he has not made arrangements for an interchange with the Canadian Northern railway? He could not make the interchange without having terminal facilities.

Mr. GRAHAM. I want to be sure what I am going to get in return for the Intercolonial railway before I would ask the Grand Trunk railway to consent to cancel the other arrangement for interchange of traffic. It is evident that the Grand Trunk railway will be urging for the cancellation of the arrangement, and the cancellation of the arrangement would mean its entire cancellation. I do not know that that will be done. But I place myself in a position to take every advantage if the Grand Trunk railway insists on cancelling the arrangement. We pay the Grand Trunk railway $140,000 a year rental, and we contribute a certain amount to the upkeep. If we have that arrangement annulled we would not have the double expense, but we would not make arrangements with the two companies for the same purpose. If the arrangement with the Grand Trunk railway were cancelled, we would be free to make arrangement with the Canadian Northern railway.

Mr. DANIEL. When the agreement goes into force with the Canadian Northern railway, the present arrangement with the Grand Trunk railway for sending its freight over the Intercolonial railway will cease. Is that what we are to understand?

Mr. GRAHAM. It would not be in the public interest for me to say too much about this agreement at present. Conditions might arise under which an arrangement could be made with the Grand Trunk railway, and we would handle part of their traffic, and they would handle part of ours, and also have an arrangement with the Canadian Northern railway to have their freight traffic go over the Intercolonial railway. I do not say that we could make such an arrangement with either company, but if the government found itself in the position to make just such an arrangement, the Canadian Northern railway would be compelled to make that arrangement with us.

Mr. McCALL. The discussion for the last hour has not made it at all clear that the country is protected with regard to the delivery of freight over the Canadian Northern railway to the Intercolonial railway. This company which has such enormous grants ought to state clearly what it is prepared to do. In every important centre the railway companies have paid solicitors canvassing for freight over their lines. Will it be asking too much to inquire from the minister what he proposes to do? If he will take us into his confidence, the country will be satisfied to have this other trunk line available for business, and to act as a feeder for the Intercolonial railway. I would again suggest that some arrangement should be come to with the Canadian Northern railway by which they would work the Intercolonial railway on some joint contract or lease it on terms satisfactory to Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. As regards section 14, my hon. friend could not have heard the Minister of Railways. He said that the Canadian Northern railway could be obliged to come into an arrangement at once, but that the government has now a binding agreement for ninety-nine years with the Grand Trunk railway. That agreement is mutual. Under it all the unrouted Intercolonial railway traffic bound westward must be delivered to the Grand Trunk railway at Montreal. And the Grand Trunk railway must send its unrouted traffic for the maritime provinces over the Intercolonial railway. Involved in that agreement is also an obligation on the part of the Intercolonial railway to pay a rental for the use of certain terminals in Montreal. What would be the result if parliament were by resolution to tie the hands of the Minister of Railways absolutely and definitely by providing that there shall be an agreement for mutual interchange of traffic between the Intercolonial railway, and the Canadian Northern railway? The Grand Trunk railway would to-morrow morning say that the government is at once bound to enter into a traffic arrangement with the Canadian Northern railway. Involved in that is the delivery over by the Intercolonial railway at Montreal of all its unrouted traffic to the Canadian Northern railway. The Grand Trunk railway would say: Mr. Graham, we have you now, we want you to cancel the agreement which you have with us, and to cancel it on our terms. Mr. Graham would say: Oh, it would not be in the interest of the country to do that. But the Grand Trunk railway would say: Parliament has bound you to do it, you must do it. Cannot the hon. gentleman see in what a disadvantageous position it would place the government through the Intercolonial railway, and in what an exceedingly advantageous position it would place the Grand Trunk railway? The Grand Trunk Railway Company is allied with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. They will have a road from Lévis to Moncton completed very soon. The road is now completed through New Brunswick from Moncton to Plaster Rock, and by next year it will be completed through to Lévis. The Grand Trunk railway, being allied to the Grand Trunk Pacific, is naturally desirous of handing over to the Grand Trunk Pacific the traffic which it is now obliged to hand over to the Intercolonial railway. If you tie the hands of the Minister of Railways by making a positive obligation on his part to enter into this arrangement for an interchange of traffic with the Canadian Northern railway, you simply give the whole case of the country away to the Grand Trunk, and they would demand and could exact whatever terms they might think in their own interest, and the government would be absolutely powerless to refuse to cancel the agreement on the Grand Trunk's own terms.

Mr. DOHERTY. I understand that notwithstanding the stipulations in this agreement about an arrangement, the government could enter into no arrangement with the Canadian Northern for an interchange of traffic for 99 years without the consent of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not altogether that. The government can cancel the agreement on giving notice; the Grand Trunk cannot, but the government can on giving notice. At the present time, it is a paying traffic for both the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial railway. To enter into an arrangement at the present moment would do what the Minister of Public Works says very largely, but if we could do that, so long as the arrangement with the Grand Trunk stands, it would be folly to make any other agreement, because we could not carry it out until we cancelled the Grand Trunk agreement. We got from the Grand Trunk this year of traffic both ways, about $1,600,000 and until we are in a position to say what we would get by this new arrangement, and what arrangements we could make with the Grand Trunk, and with the Canadian Northern, it would be suicidal from an Intercolonial railway standpoint to absolutely make any agreement. Leaving it as it is we have a free hand, always having it in our power to say to the Grand Trunk railway: On notice we will cancel the arrangement with you.

Mr. DOHERTY. I suppose we are to take it that the Minister of Railways speaks for the government, because there seems to be an absolute contradiction between his position, and that of the Minister of Public Works, who says that to bind the Minister of Railways to enter into any arrangement with the Canadian Northern at this time would put us absolutely into the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. GRAHAM. Would it not be notice absolutely to the Grand Trunk: We want to cancel this arrangement with you. Then the Grand Trunk railway would say: That being the case, by statute, here are our terms.

Mr. DOHERTY. I thought the minister said the government could break the traffic arrangement at any time.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, but there is another arrangement for terminals, and they are bound up together to a certain extent.

Mr. DOHERTY. If the traffic arrangement is so bound up with the terminal arrangements that although the government could cancel the traffic arrangement on giving notice that would absolutely bring about the cancellation of the terminals arrangements, which would have to be made upon the terms of the Grand Trunk itself, it seems to me that the Minister of Public Works perhaps stated the position more accurately than the Minister of Railways. But that brings us back to the fact that we are to-day in such a position that we cannot make any arrangement with the Canadian Northern about its traffic for 99 years to come unless we get the consent of the Grand Trunk, and the Minister of Public Works seems to consider that the consent of the Grand Trunk might cost us a very considerable amount, in fact he describes the situation as being that if we tried to make an arrangement to-day with the Canadian Northern we would be putting ourselves in the hands of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend will see that you cannot make a bargain for the delivery of the same goods with two people at the same time.

Mr. CROSBY. I have listened to the discussion of how the freight on this new road would be taken to the ocean ports in the east. We have listened to that on many occasions. We in the east have heard much talk of this kind. Our great hope was when the Canadian Pacific railway was being constructed. In Nova Scotia, and particularly in Halifax, we had every reason to believe that the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway was going to be a great boon to eastern Canada, that we were going to be assisted to a large extent by the traffic brought from the west through Canada to the ports in Nova Scotia. Later on we discovered that while Nova Scotia had given perhaps the strongest support and assistance of any province to the Canadian Pacific railway, nevertheless when that railroad was constructed it did not touch Nova Scotia at all. Every city and community touched by the Canadian Pacific railway has benefited and prospered, in fact that road has largely made Canada, yet it did not touch Nova Scotia. When the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme was formulated, and ratified by this parliament we were told in Nova Scotia in the election of 1904 that the whole question of transportation was solved, that the province of Nova Scotia was now to come into its own. We were told by no less a man than the Minister of Finance, and by other men contesting seats in Nova Scotia that within two years from 1904 we would have the Grand Trunk Pacific connected with the port of Halifax, and I have no doubt that in the province of New Brunswick they were promised that they would also be connected with the Grand Trunk Pacific. He said that in two years we would have a double track on the Intercolonial railway, and the Grand Trunk Pacific running into Halifax. In fact, he said it would go to Country Harbour, a harbour in Nova Scotia that is noted for its excellence, and one where a great deal of traffic could be carried on. Now we find the Grand Trunk Pacific being constructed to the town of Moncton, and no intimation of any kind that it is to run into the province of Nova Scotia. I must say that, so far as I have met public men, I have never met one who could equal the Minister of Railways in the plausible movement of the hand, the genial smile, and the pleasant word. I remember the first time I had the pleasure of hearing him I thought him one of the nicest men I had ever come across. And so he is, if there is anything behind his words——

An hon. MEMBER. Have you changed your mind?

Mr. CROSBY. He forced me to change my mind. Any one who makes statements and does not carry them out forces an honest man to change his mind about him.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the hon. gentleman give any statement that I made, and that I did not carry out, thus forcing him to change his mind?

Mr. CROSBY. The hon. gentleman then, as to-night, intimated many things that meant nothing. He tries to give the House and the public the impression that he is going to have the traffic come down to Montreal over the Canadian Northern and then that it is to go over the Intercolonial to St. John and Halifax. He knows in his own heart that he is so tied up that he could not give them a running right over the Intercolonial. His contract with the Grand Trunk prevents him from allowing the Canadian Northern to take one train load over the line.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is nothing in the arrangement with the Grand Trunk to prevent giving running rights to the Canadian Northern or any other road.

Mr. CROSBY. Does the minister tell me that he can give the Canadian Northern running rights over the Intercolonial?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, or any other line.

Mr. CROSBY. The Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. CROSBY. Then, why does he not give it to the Canadian Pacific railway? I am very glad to get that statement from the hon. gentleman, because when he comes down to the province of Nova Scotia he will not be able to get away so easily as in the past. He has been asked by every board of trade, and especially by the board of trade of Halifax, time and time again, to give running rights to the Canadian Pacific railway over the Intercolonial. Is not that true?

Mr. GRAHAM. It has been true.

Mr. CROSBY. Is it not true to-day?

Mr. GRAHAM. The proposition for running over the Intercolonial always made by the Canadian Pacific railway was that we should allow them to pick up local traffic on the Intercolonial, on behalf of the people of Canada, I have taken the ground that the local traffic of the Intercolonial could not stand to be divided with the Canadian Pacific railway. I am prepared at any time to make an arrangement which the Canadian Pacific railway, will run their trains through to Halifax and leave our local traffic alone.

Mr. CROSBY. Then, what position does the hon. minister take with relation to the Canadian Northern?

Mr. GRAHAM. The same.

Mr. CROSBY. That is what we say, that we have no way of getting a line to Halifax. But St. John is better off, having the Canadian Pacific railway, and they have benefited greatly by it. But we have the Minister of Railways rising in this House, or coming to the people of Nova Scotia, with nice words and pleasant smiles. We have been deceived right along, as we are to-night, by the statements the minister makes about the outgoing freight of the Canadian Northern. We have great hopes of the Canadian Northern. It has done a great deal for us. They brought their splendid boats to Halifax last year, even without facilities to accommodate them. And no matter what railway connection you have, if you have not the accommodation and facilities for steamer traffic the connection is not worth much. As the business of the Intercolonial is growing it is impossible for both to do the work that they must do if we are to have the western trade go through the Atlantic port of Canada. We in Halifax are not jealous of the freight going through the ports of Montreal and Quebec in summer time. The Minister of Railways asks me what made me change my mind. On many occasions I have seen him in Halifax, and have heard people speak of him as one of the finest men they ever met. He came down two or three months ago and told us one story, but he found some difficulty in the way, and now he tells us another story. And Halifax is in the same position, so far as railway accommodation is concerned, as it was in 1903. We Nova Scotians are pleased to see the west build up and improve its railway accommodation. We rejoice when some of our people come home from the west, and tell us what great railway accommodation they have there. But is it not reasonable that Nova Scotia, which stretches out into the Atlantic as if it were a wharf, put there specially by nature to facilitate the transatlantic trade of this Dominion—is it not reasonable that it should get its full share of that trade? And yet we have no better facilities there than we had 40 years ago, so far as railway accommodation is concerned. True, we have better facilities for traffic. The road has built up very good accommodation so far as the road itself is concerned. But it is impossible for any one road to handle the traffic that should come over the Intercolonial during the winter when the ports of Montreal and Quebec are closed. And there is no hope for us in Halifax or in the province of Nova Scotia by the proposition made here to-night, unless the Minister of Railways can give us something more substantial, and greater evidence of desire that the traffic of the west should come down to the Atlantic ports at least during the winter months.

The Minister of Railways says we are tied up to the Grand Trunk Pacific and to the Grand Trunk railway for 99 years. I have heard the hon. gentleman make that statement in making his railway budget speech. He has stated in this House that the Grand Trunk railway did not treat the Intercolonial as well as it expected to be treated, as well as he thought it should be treated. I thought from what he said that the Grand Trunk railway must have been sending freight to Portland instead of sending it over the Intercolonial. He did not make that statement, but I inferred as much from what he did say. Now it behooves every man from Nova Scotia to see that the port of Halifax is treated as well as the port of St. John, that it is put on the same footing as far as export traffic is concerned. But we have no effort on the part of the government to do that, although they have been appealed to time and again. The merchants of Halifax have come to interview the Railway Commission, and they were told that the Railway Commission had no control, and could not do anything for them. That is the way we have been humbugged in the province of Nova Scotia, and particularly in Halifax. Now if the Minister of Railways and the government mean to give us fair play in this matter it is time for them to do it. Let them tell us frankly how this trade of the Canadian Northern is going to be sent down to the ocean ports. As soon as the Canadian Northern brings freight to Montreal, notwithstanding that they have boats at Halifax, if they can send that freight from Montreal to Portland or to Boston, 250 miles instead of 830 miles, why, they are going to do it. As the leader of the opposition has pointed out, what are they likely to do as good business men? Are they not likely to send their freight by the cheapest route? If they can send it from Montreal to Portland or Boston at a less rate than to Halifax, which is three times the distance, are they not going to send it to an American port? Are they not going to bring their boats to Portland to take the freight from that port, although they might be anxious to go to Halifax, which is a better port and a better harbour. Would it not be natural for them to take their freight to the port that it will cost them less to reach?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would they not rather take their freight where they can meet their own steamers?

Mr. CROSBY. The minister surely can understand that their steamers can sail to Portland as well as to Halifax. He is a keen business man, and if he had vessels that he could sail, either to Halifax or to Portland, and if he found that he could deliver his freight cheaper in Portland than in Halifax or St. John, why, of course he would bring his steamers to Portland. I say that the natural conditions will force them to do that and it will prevent us from getting any advantage out of this trade. I have spoken of the election in 1904, when Nova Scotia sent a solid Liberal delegation to support this government. Why? Because they were told by every ministerial candidate and by every ministerial campaigner who came into that province, that inside of two years the whole province would be a perfect hive of business by reason of the Grand Trunk Pacific. But in 1908 things were entirely different, the bright promises that had been made were not fulfilled, and there is to-day no sign of anything of the kind. We have that promise repeated to induce us to support the resolution that is before us to-night, but all we know is that we are tied up to the Grand Trunk railway and cannot do anything to help ourselves, we cannot do anything with the Canadian Northern railway, we cannot do anything with anybody. There is no pretense of an intention on the part of the government to double track the Intercolonial railway. I am glad to see they are putting a little money in the estimates for facilities at Halifax.

Mr. PUGSLEY. How much does the hon. gentleman call a little money?

Mr. CROSBY. Not quite as much as you put in Courtenay bay.

Mr. PUGSLEY. $600,000 more?

Mr. CROSBY. If the hon. minister added up all the sums he has spent in Courtenay bay during the last three or four years, it would almost purchase a province. This may be larger than some of the individual sums.

Mr. PUGSLEY. $600,000 is not a bad amount to start with in Halifax harbour.

Mr. CROSBY. I am not complaining of that; I am complaining of the railway facilities, and I have every reason to complain of the general facilities. We have been waiting all these years for the government to do something, at the same time that the Minister of Public Works has been building sawdust wharfs and squandering money in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Will the hon. gentleman tell the House whether he is in favour of this resolution or not? I have listened patiently to the hon. gentleman for half an hour, and I do not know yet. Would he be kind enough to tell us?

Mr. CROSBY. There is one thing I can say, and that is that I have some independence in this parliament. I am not like the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), I am not prepared to swallow everything that is brought here. So far as I am concerned, I am pleased indeed to see the Dominion of Canada giving the west so much accommodation, but what I say is that the province of Nova Scotia has not benefited from all that up to the present time. I would like to hear what my hon. friend has to say about the way in which Nova Scotia has been treated, including Country Harbour that he talks so much about when he goes to Guysborough. There are some intimations now that something is going to be done, because a provincial election is coming on in Nova Scotia, but so far as my hon. friend is concerned, he has taken no action. If I had the power he has in this House, or the influence he has with the government, I would get something put into this Bill that I would like.

Mr. SINCLAIR. What would my hon. friend propose to put into this resolution that is not in it?

Mr. CROSBY. I think my hon. friend was in this House when the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme was evolved.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Answer the question.

Mr. CROSBY. I will answer any question the hon. gentleman wants to ask. I want to ask the hon. gentleman if he had a seat in this House when the Grand Trunk Pacific was proposed. The idea at first was to build it only from Winnipeg to the coast, but the members from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario said, we cannot put up with that, we want it to go farther. They had force enough to get it built to Moncton, but when it got there, there was not a member to say, bring it to Nova Scotia; and my hon. friend had a seat in this House at that time.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I asked my hon. friend a simple question. He said that if he was on this side of the House, in the position I am in, he would make some proposal with regard to the resolution that would be of greater benefit to Nova Scotia than the proposal is as it stands. I asked him what his proposal is, and he has not answered.

Mr. CROSBY. I would have it arranged that the Canadian Northern would have traffic rights over the Intercolonial railway to Halifax or to St. John. I have no desire to ask anything for Halifax that I do not ask for St. John or Country Harbour. I do not care where it goes to, but I say, let us have a share of the money that is being spent. We have not had a share of it in Nova Scotia. I ask my hon. friend from Guysborough to use his influence with the government in power to compel it or induce it to give us a fair show in the province of Nova Scotia. What is good for Halifax is good for the whole of Nova Scotia or any port in his constituency. I am not here to stand particularly for Halifax, but I stand for Nova Scotia. My hon. friend has not raised his voice to say anything. As far as we have any information in this resolution, the traffic over the Canadian Northern, when it comes east, stops at Montreal. My hon. friend is a professional man, a man of some experience in this parliament and before he came here, and if his experience is worth anything, he ought to be able to suggest some way in which that freight should be carried to the east. There is not in this resolution the slightest hope for us except in the fact that Mackenzie and Mann have to do with it, and they have treated us fairly well as far as they have gone. Although this resolution says that the traffic shall be carried through Canadian ports except when it is specially routed, there is no way provided for getting it down to the east. I challenge the Minister of Railways to show how it can be taken from Montreal to the province of Nova Scotia or the province of New Brunswick during the winter months when the navigation on the St. Lawrence is closed. He has made no arrangement whatever. It would have been only fair to the maritime provinces that he should have made that a part of his arrangement, even if it involved the construction of a new road or the extension of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the city of Halifax the city of St. John, or the double tracking of the Intercolonial railway from Moncton to Halifax to St. John, or, if you will, making a connection from Moncton to Country Harbour. I am not jealous of my hon. friend having a good harbour there, but I am jealous about the maritime provinces getting a share of the traffic that comes from the west to the east, and therefore I say it is unfair to us that some arrangement has not been made by which the traffic should have an outlet at our Atlantic ports.

Mr. BARKER. I would like to ask the minister what the object of this agreement is, as far as the government is concerned. According to the clause, the object apparently is 'to develop commerce through Canadian ports and to afford the government system of railways in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island an interchange of through traffic.' Turn to clause 13, where we look to find what it is the government is going to get for this enormous guarantee that it is entering into. We find this, and it seems to me all that the government is getting:

That all freight originating on the line of the Canadian Northern Railway Company or its branches, or on the line of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined to points in Canada, be carried over the Canadian Northern railway or the Canadian Northern Ontario railway, or the connections of either, or over any railway within Canadian territory.

Where does the government come in? What are they getting for their guarantee? According to this, the Canadian Northern may transfer its traffic originating on its road to the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific railway or any other railway in Canada. That comes within the letter of the agreement. Not a word saying that in consideration of this enormous guarantee, they must give it to the Intercolonial railway. What is the hon. gentleman getting for his guarantee, I would like to know?

Mr. GRAHAM. One can see at a glance that the main object of this is to get better transportation facilities for the people of Canada. That is what we are getting for the guarantee. If the hon. gentleman living in Hamilton, had goods shipped to him from the west, Hamilton not being on the line of the Canadian Northern, if we did not allow the company to transfer the goods to another line, how would he get them? You could not fairly compel them to hand traffic over to the Intercolonial at Montreal until the Intercolonial railway is prepared to give them something in return.

Mr. BARKER. You are giving them this enormous guarantee.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is not so much for the Canadian Northern railway as for the benefit of the people of Canada. When the Canadian Pacific railway bargain was made there was no arrangement to hand traffic over to the Intercolonial railway anywhere, and when the Grand Trunk Pacific bargain was made it was thought to be in the public interest, and there was no bargain about the Intercolonial railway traffic.

Mr. BARKER. The opposition did its best to get it.

Mr. GRAHAM. The arrangement with the Intercolonial railway is incidental, and if we can carry it out it will be of great benefit to every person concerned. There is at present an arrangement with the Grand Trunk, and we cannot make the same arrangement for the delivery of the same goods to two companies at the same time.

Mr. CROSBY. That means the Canadian Northern cannot come down east at all.

Mr. GRAHAM. It does not mean anything of the kind. The one cent per 100 pounds discrimination is part of an arrangement with the Grand Trunk, which if this arrangement goes through in its entirety and we are able to do something I have in my mind, but which it is not in the public interest to discuss in detail, would be one of the things that would be abrogated.

Mr. CROSBY. Will you abrogate it?

Mr. GRAHAM. A minister has some responsibility that my hon. friend (Mr. Crosby) may understand some time, but it will be some time. I am in correspondence with the Grand Trunk over that very matter, but the president is in the old country, and the matter will be referred to him when he returns.

Mr. BARKER. And the result is that for all this enormous guarantee you may never get one pound of traffic over the Intercolonial railway.

On section 14,

Mr. GRAHAM. The leader of the opposition made a suggestion this afternoon which to my mind is very valuable. He suggested that if default were made, and the line has to be taken over, it would not be much use unless the terminals at Montreal and Port Arthur were available. The Board of Railway Commissioners has now the power to grant one railway the right to use the property of another on a case being made out, but the board would probably refuse if a rival company asked to use the terminals of another company, and thus injure its business. I suggest that the following additional clause be added:

That in the event of default and of the consequent acquisition by the government or by any railway company other than the company of the line hereby aided, neither the company nor the Canadian Northern Railway Company will oppose any application to the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada for an order providing for the use by the government, or by such other railway company, of terminals at Port Arthur or Montreal owned or controlled by the company or by the Canadian Northern Railway Company, in so far as such use is reasonably necessary in connection with the operation of the said aided line, and on reasonable terms and compensation established by the said board.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Is this road going to have a physical connection with the Intercolonial railway at Montreal, and is there anything in the present agreement between the Intercolonial railway and the Grand Trunk railway which would prevent a similar agreement being made with the Canadian Northern railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am afraid I will have to spread the explanation on the pages of 'Hansard' again.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I have listened to you explain it several times, and I cannot catch on. You seem to try to give the impression that the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific are one and the same road.

Mr. GRAHAM. I did not try to give that impression. At present we have an arrangement with the Grand Trunk by which the Intercolonial railway is to hand its traffic over to the Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk hands its traffic for the maritime provinces over to the Intercolonial railway. To make an agreement with the Canadian Northern we would have to give a quid pro quo to the Canadian Northern railway in traffic for traffic. Our arrangement with the Grand Trunk would prohibit that because we cannot deliver the same traffic to the two roads at the same time. That arrangement may possibly, a little later, be either annulled altogether by agreement, or it might be changed so that we can make a partial traffic arrangement with the Canadian Northern. But, as I pointed out before, the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific having identical interests, there will be strong urgency brought upon the government to abrogate that agreement altogether. I do not know whether we can come to an arangement to have it done, but I am inclined to think it can be done a little later, and I want to be in a position with a perfectly free hand to be able to make interchange of traffic with the Canadian Northern on all their through business on terms which will be agreeable to us both.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). That does not quite answer the question. The Grand Trunk business arises in Ontario territory. which is not at present touched by the Canadian Northern. I see no reason why an agreement should not be made between the Canadian Northern railway and the Intercolonial railway for an exchange of western traffc, by which the Intercolonial railway will receive a certain amount of the eastbound traffic.

Mr. GRAHAM. And the Grand Trunk railway can claim, by agreement, the westbound traffic, and further the Canadian Northern railway will shortly have numerous ramifications in the province of Ontario as well as the Grand Trunk railway.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). We have made vast expenditures on the Intercolonial railway and a portion of that road which should be made to flourish, the extreme terminal at Halifax is neglected.

Mr. GRAHAM. We do not agree with that.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Anybody who has been where there is a good terminal must know that the Halifax terminal is neglected. The whole policy of a privately owned railway is to develop traffic at its extreme ends where there are terminals, and not cut it off at one half or one quarter of the way. The Intercolonial railway is well managed as regards its physical character, but no effort is made to send the traffic from one end of the road to the other. Contrast that policy with the policy of the Grand Trunk railway. The line from Midland to Montreal is a great deal shorter than the line from Sarnia to Montreal taking the lake and rail traffic, but the Grand Trunk railway chooses to send its traffic over the long haul. Why should not the government take its through traffic over the long haul and get a proportionate rate out of the total mileage moved. But when you tranship freight at St. John instead of sending it to Halifax, you are giving that much more money to the other railway out of the carriage to the sea, and doing that much damage to Halifax, which should be a participant and enjoy a proportion of that traffic. The Minister of Railways has a joint rate, for instance, from Sarnia to the sea. If the goods are sent over the Intercolonial railway and the Grand Trunk railway to St. John, the proportion of the rate claimed by the government will only be from St. John to Montreal, while if they were sent through to Halifax, even though the freight rate were just the same, the proportion which would go to the government railway would be much greater. I have no desire to find fault with the shipping of freight at St. John, but I do not think that Halifax is receiving proper encouragement. We have large elevators there which are idle most of the year, we have every convenience for shipment and transshipment, yet a great many of the docks are idle compared with those at other places. Any one who looks up the statistics of traffic to the American ports must come to the conclusion that instead of the traffic via Canadian ports increasing, and that via the American ports decreasing, the Canadian freight that goes over the American roads is increasing, and the amount of freight that goes over the Canadian roads is decreasing. Last year the total value of Canadian freight shipped through the five large ports of the United States was something like $45,000,000 out of our total foreign shipments.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is the hon. gentleman aware how much of foreign goods were shipped to the port of St. John during the past winter? Is he aware that one third of the total exports of $24,000,000 shipped from the port of St. John were goods from the United States carried over Canadian railways and shipped through the port of St. John?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). That has nothing to do with the argument.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It has a great deal.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Certainly not. What is the use of shipping foreign goods over our railways at cheap rates and sending our freight over American railways, and letting our road bear the burden of the cheap foreign traffic? The freight rate from Chicago to St. John is cheaper——

Mr. PUGSLEY. We should be glad in St. John to get all the American freight we can in that way.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Why should not Canadian traffic go through St. John?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It does.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Before this resolution is through, I will produce the figures of foreign shipments at the various ports in the United States, and they will bear me out in my statement that the amount of freight shipped from these American ports has been increasing, and is a great deal larger than the amount of shipments from the port of St. John—twice as large. If St. John is so attractive why should any goods go through Baltimore or Portland at all? It is for this House to consider whether it is advisable, considering the enormous profits arising from the carriage of our own goods, whether we should divide these profits with the American roads. There has been no attempt made by this government to keep hold of this traffic yet still we are asked to adopt a new policy which will send a great deal more traffic through the American channels. Over $40,000,000 last year of the products of the farms of Canada went through these American ports, or nearly twice as much as through the port of St. John?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will the hon. gentleman give me the figures of the total American goods that went through Canadian ports last year? Take Montreal, St. John and Halifax.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). It is absurd for the minister to ask me to furnish him with these figures. If he has any argument to give with respect to them let him produce them. But what are the figures of foreign traffic? I challenge the hon. minister to show what they are, or to show that the shipments of American goods through Montreal are as large as the shipments of Canadian goods through Portland.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was merely suggesting——

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). You merely made the statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY—that if my hon. friend thought there was any great importance to be attached to the proportion of shipments of products of one country through the ports of the other, he would naturally have studied both sides of the question, and would have been able to tell us at the same time the value of American goods shipped through Canadian ports. If, for instance, we have $100,000,000 of American goods shipped through Canadian ports and $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 of Canadian goods shipped through American ports, upon the whole we would be rather getting the better of it.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The hon. gentleman has a very fine line of hypothetical questions and reasons. He rushed madly into this discussion without knowing anything of the figures at all. He did not know, as a matter of fact, whether a pound of American goods was shipped through Montreal.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think I knew that.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The large number of American cars going eastward over Canadian roads, must be the source of his information, but they go to Portland; they are largely through meat from Chicago, and he will find that the amount of American freight that passes through Montreal is less than he thinks. Will he give any information as to the amount of American freight shipped through Quebec?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not profess to know the exact figures, but I do know the figures through St. John, and I say that it is a remarkable tribute to the ability of Canadian roads to handle western traffic, that during last winter they have been able to draw away the large amount of over $8,000,000 worth of American goods and ship them through St. John, notwithstanding the somewhat longer haul. I know that many millions of dollars worth of American goods are shipped through Montreal. All I suggested was that, my friend having given attention to the figures, I could not conceive it possible that he would think of the figures only on one side and not have seen the figures on the other side.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The minister, as I have said, injected himself into an argument on a topic about which he knows nothing. As a minister entering on such a discussion, he should be able to furnish the House immediately with these figures. Now he confesses he has not the figures, although he imagines a large amount of American goods pass through this country. That is not at all the question. Our railroad policy should be to have not only large quantities of American goods shipped through our harbours, but also to have all the Canadian freight shipped through Canadian harbours. We will need it all, we need the money, and we find that the amount of Canadian goods shipped through Canadian harbours is increasing very materially, in fact it is a large proportion of the total foreign shipments, and I understand this amount is largely credited to our trade with the United States, and that our real trade with the United States is much less than the figures in our Blue-books show. The minister should know, and I would ask him now what method is adopted by the government to ascertain the quantity and value of foreign shipments through Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not the knowledge which, of course, the Minister of Customs would have, but my information is that on the manifests of goods which are sent to a port for shipment, it appears whether they are domestic or foreign. I know this is the case in St. John, and every season we know how many millions of Canadian goods have been shipped during the winter and how many millions of foreign.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Again the minister has shown himself at sea on this question. He does not know the method adopted by his government to ascertain this, or the value of the goods.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think I have answered.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I do not think my hon. friend is capable of answering, and when it comes to a freight question, or a question of this kind, he should leave it to the Minister of Railways and the parties discussing it, because the Minister of Railways, even if he does not know the facts, generally gives an intelligent answer. Some clause should be inserted in this resolution whereby an interchange of traffic would be enforced or obtained between the Canadian Northern railway and the Intercolonial railway. Unless this is done I feel satisfied that before long the Intercolonial railway will be so starved that anybody would be glad to get rid of it while it should be the policy to encourage the Intercolonial because any one who knows anything about the history of railroads and railroad building, development and management, knows that the tendency of this age in foreign countries, is for the governments to take possession of and own and control their railways. We have France, Germany, Japan and Australia, all owning and controlling their roads. I shall not enter into a discussion of the merits of government or company ownership, but we can all recognize that it is the coming policy, and if this government is going to starve the Intercolonial railway, and especially to deprive that portion of the road between St. John and Halifax of freights, and prevent Halifax from being what it should be, the main terminal of this road, being the end of the road, that is certainly not a policy that will benefit the Intercolonial railway. The minister has not said whether the Canadian Northern will be compelled to have even a switching or physical connection with the Intercolonial railway at Montreal. That is not in the agreement.

Mr. GRAHAM. I cannot give any more explanations than I have given. I have exactly explained the situation at Montreal at least ten times.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Cannot the minister state that the Canadian Northern railway and the Intercolonial railway will have a switching connection?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend will understand that the Intercolonial railway has no line into Montreal. It runs over the Grand Trunk railway and has no power to make switching arrangements with the Grand Trunk.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Then there is no switching connection?

Mr. GRAHAM. I believe there is a switching arrangement now between the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk railway at Montreal, but it is not our arrangement.

Resolutions reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 211) respecting aid for the construction of the Canadian Northern Ontario railway.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Public Buildings—rents, repairs, heating, furniture, &c.—Rideau Hall—improvements, &c., $50,000.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). This amount is required to make the improvements at Rideau Hall which, after consultation with the equerry, of His Royal Highness, the Duke of Connaught, who is expected to arrive here in September to take the position of Governor General of Canada, we deem it desirable to make. These improvements consist of the removal of some of the buildings at present there, and the erecting of two cottages for the servants of His Royal Highness and a garage, and also decoration—some of the rooms are in special need of repainting and decorating, and improvements to the sewerage arrangements, His Royal Highness is particularly anxious as to the last. The chief architect, who went carefully into these questions with the representative of His Royal Highness, reported to me that $50,000 would be required for the improvements. We are anxious to get to work immediately, and get these improvements all made, if possible, before the arrival of His Royal Highness.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the minister say some portions of the buildings are to be removed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, the chapel is to be removed, and I think, some of the outbuildings. I am sorry I have not the documents before me giving full details, but I had not hoped to have the item under consideration to-night. I will undertake, however, to lay the report of the chief architect on the table.

Mr. BLAIN. Will this vote cover the total cost?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, that is the report of the chief architect, and after going very carefully into the matter with the representative of His Royal Highness. I may say that the Duke of Connaught sent a message to us by his representative that he was desirous that we should not go to any unnecessary expense; but it did seem as if the improvements which have been agreed to are really absolutely essential in order to give the reasonably comfortable accommodation that is required for His Royal Highness' household.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is it not a pity that this building had not been torn down some years ago and a new building erected?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it is. I do not know that I speak for many when I say that. My own view is that the present Government House is not creditable to a country of the importance and wealth of Canada. Our population is rapidly increasing, and so is the wealth of our people, and I think that Government House ought to be a building of a character which would be a credit to the country, and in which the people would take a pride. The interior of Rideau Hall is pretty good; the rooms are comfortable, the accommodation is very good. But the exterior appearance of the building is not at all such as one would expect for the Government House of a country like Canada. Four years ago, when I became minister, I found in the estimates an appropriation of $100,000 for building a façade on the present building, and making very large improvements. I think that tenders had been called for, and were pending when I became minister. The lowest tender I think, approached very nearly the sum of $300,000. I thought that entirely too much money to expend upon this old building which, I thought, even after the money had been expended, would not be just what the country would want. My own preference is for the erection of an entirely new building, and my personal view is to erect it on a different site. I would choose a site in the vicinity of Rockliffe on the high ground that overlooks the Ottawa river, and from which there is a view for twenty miles, one of the finest views, I think, to be seen any where in the world. It would be an ideal situation for a Government House. The land on which the present Government House stands could be sold, I believe, for something like $600,000. It has been valued by the Ottawa Improvement Commission, and their estimate is that, if laid out in building lots, it would bring, at a conservative estimate, the sum I have named. I think it would be very much better to take steps in the near future to acquire another site, and erect a building which would be not too expensive, but which would be suitable for the residence of the Governor General. However, of course, we cannot do that in time for His Royal Highness, and so it is necessary to make the expenditure for which we are now asking authority.

Mr. MARSHALL. I quite agree with what the minister says about this building. I do not think it is in keeping with the surroundings, or with the purpose for which it is maintained. It is a pity that we cannot avoid this yearly expenditure of $50,000, and sell that building and build somewhere else. Every year an estimate comes down for repairs to Rideau Hall. I think it is high time that we put an end to this expenditure and erected a new building. I would gladly support any reasonable amount the government might ask for a new and suitable building. The present one looks more like an old barracks; it is a gloomy place, not at all such as Canada should provide for her Governors General.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The story the minister tells us to-night is the same old story we have been hearing for the last twenty years. Every year we are asked for about $50,000 for repairs on this building. Every year we are told that something is going to be done towards a new building, but nothing is done. There has been enough money spent in repairs on that building since I have been in this House to put up a residence that would be a credit to the gentleman who occupies it and a credit to the country. I would like to know how much longer we are going to hear this story told. I do not think there is a member in this House who does not regard that residence as a disgrace to the country. There are enough unnecessary expenditures called for in the supplementary estimates to build half a dozen residences. I do not think this item should go through unless the minister promises to do something towards a new building. The present Governor General vacates the office in a short time, and we are going to have another representative from the King, a representative of whom we shall be proud. But I think when he sees this residence he will not have a high opinion, either of Canada or of its government. As for the present building, I do not think the Minister of Public Works would live in it even if it were offered him free. On this side of the House we want to see the Governor General lodged in a decent residence.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I entirely agree with what my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Reid) has said, that money would have been saved to this country if all that has been expended in repairs for the last fifteen or twenty years had been used to put up a new building. The difficulty of the situation is that the Duke of Connaught is expected here in the latter part of September, and it is only possible to make the residence suitable for him by making further repairs on a building which should have been torn down long ago. It is not an economic way of proceeding, but I suppose under the circumstances no other course is open. As I understand it, the Duke of Connaught has sent a representative here to obtain information with regard to that and other matters, and these repairs have been decided upon after consultation between the Duke's representative and the Minister of Public Works. I do not see how this proposed expenditure can be avoided, and I do not think there should be any objection to provide the money to make these repairs.

Mr. FIELDING. I think it would be a pity if the report should go out that Canada is not providing for His Royal Highness a decent and comfortable accommodation. It may be well to put up a new building. The old building is a piece of patchwork, an old homestead, which has been added to from time to time without any particular method, but I think all the Governors General who have occupied it will testify that the house is exceedingly comfortable. If it is not a thing of beauty it is at all events a comfortable home. With the improvements which the minister proposes to make, I am quite satisfied we will have an accommodation for the Governor General which will not be a discredit to Canada. Let us, however, keep in view either the enlargement or the construction of another building. I think we are hardly doing justice to the old building when we say that we are not giving the Duke decent accommodation.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I have no objection to this estimate being passed to put the building in decent shape for the Duke of Connaught. What I am complaining of is that the Minister of Public Works has been making repairs for the last twenty years which would far more than have sufficed to put up a new building. More than that, he is wasting the money of the country in various parts, such as building canals in places where there is no water, and then he says there is not money enough to build a new residence for the Governor General. He came down here the other day with $17,000,000 in the supplementary estimates, the largest expenditure that was ever known. Why doesn't the minister put something in the estimates for a new building? The minister has no trouble in finding the money for unnecessary expenditures when an election is coming on, but he has no money with which to provide a decent residence for the Governor General. The Minister of Finance, like the Minister of Public Works, is trying to make excuses. I think if the Governor General saw that building and went back to England and described it, there would not be much more immigration from England. Now, I ask, again, when is something to be done about a new building?

Mr. FIELDING. I have no recollection of ever having spoken on the subject before, but this is not the only case in which the hon. gentleman has drawn on his imagination.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The memory of the Minister of Finance is getting very short when it is necessary for him to clear himself. Before this session ends I will show him where it has been drawn to his attention.

Mr. FIELDING. That is not the point. I said I had no recollection of ever having spoken on the subject before. Possibly I did, but, if so, I have no recollection of it. My point was that this is not an indecent building, but a very convenient and respectable building, and Canada need not be ashamed of it. Let us not send out to the world the idea that Canada does not provide the Duke with decent accommodation.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Just before the arrival of the Sheffield Choir in Ottawa, a pamphlet was sent out containing cuts of the government houses in the various other colonies, and every member who compared the buildings there shown with the collection of shacks we have down at Rideau Hall would be ashamed of Canada. It would take only a year or two to erect a building that would be a credit to this country, and the time to commence it, if we have neglected to do it up to date, would be now. It is to be hoped that the architecture of the new government building would be a little better than that of the latest public building erected, that is the famous museum. For a long time I was puzzled to know the origin of that style of architecture. I had a hazy idea that I had seen a building like the museum before, but I could not place it until a short time ago when I saw a picture of the old ice palace that was put up in Montreal many years ago. I then recognized in the museum a replica of the old ice palace, even to the cracks in the wall; and I would not be surprised if the whole thing melted away some day. But, all jokes aside, there is no doubt that unless you make a beginning of a good building for our Governor General, and make a beginning soon, we shall not have one at all, because if our reciprocity policy is going to be in vogue in a few years, we shall have no need for a Governor General.

Mr. FIELDING. Would it not be a pity to spend so much money on the building if that is the outlook?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I can quite understand my hon. friend's desire to be economical on that score.

Mr. BLAIN. Evidently the government are changing their policy on this question. If I understood the Minister of Public Works correctly, he said that three or four years ago when he took office advertisements had been sent out and tenders had been received for a new building.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, for a front.

Mr. BLAIN. Evidently then the government had decided on an expenditure of about $300,000 at that time.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The government had not decided on that expenditure. The government had decided on making improvements, of which the chief architect had made a rough design, and which it was supposed could be made for about $100,000; but, after plans were prepared and tenders were called for, it was found that the cost of the work would be in the vicinity of $300,000. Then I brought the matter before my colleagues, who thought we would not be justified in going to that large expenditure to make an improvement in the present building.

Mr. BLAIN. The government had evidently decided to make some extensive improvements on the building. Since then they have abandoned that policy altogether. Whatever the Minister of Finance may say, the question of providing a better building has been discussed in this House for many years, and it has been practically decided that a better building should be provided. I am very much surprised that the halting policy of the Minister of Public Works should put us in the position we are in now, though the House is practically unanimously of the opinion that a new building should be provided because of the importance of the representative coming to occupy the premises. Some censure was due to the Minister of Public Works for having failed even to look for a site for a new building when he evidently contemplated something of the kind. During the four years since then he has done nothing except spend a considerable amount every year, and now the committee is asked to vote $50,000 again, which will not be of much service if the policy of erecting a new building is carried out. The Minister of Finance defends the old building, while the Minister of Public Works condemns it. Until we get harmony in the government in this matter, I do not think the country can expect very much.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I have heard rumours to the effect that as soon as a Governor General leaves the premises, people, not necessarily from Ottawa, flock to the house and carry off pictures, paintings, carpets, furniture and everything else, and the incoming Governor General has to be supplied with an entirely new outfit. I understand that that has been the way in which the materials, including many things of great value, have been disposed of. I would like to know if the minister has heard of this going on.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not heard of any such thing, and I would be greatly surprised if there was any truth in the statement. I understand that when a new Governor General comes, it is necessary to put in some new furniture, in which case the old furniture would be sent to the place where these things are usually sold, and disposed of at public auction, and for the public benefit. But I cannot imagine for a moment that there is any truth in the rumour which my hon. friend has heard. We have a very reliable man who remains in charge in the interim between the departure and arrival of a Governor General and he would see that nothing of the kind takes place.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I understand it is quite a custom.

Mr. SPROULE. I have heard it stated most positively more than once than when a Governor General leaves Canada parties in the House give away a large portion of the furniture to their friends as mementos, and that practically the house is pretty well cleared out. I have heard that statement made by those in a position to know.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have never heard it said by any one who knew, and I have never even heard the rumour before.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Now that the new art gallery is erected, will the minister gather in it all these valuable paintings that have been distributed around Ottawa?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some of the paintings which will ultimately go to the art gallery are in this building and possibly in some other government buildings, but I never heard that they had been distributed around Ottawa among private individuals as the hon. member's remark would imply. I would be greatly surprised if there was any truth in that statement. The hon. gentleman must be speaking from rumour for which there is not the least foundation.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Where are all these valuable paintings that are owned by the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will take occasion to ascertain.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the minister lay on the table of the House a list of the paintings and such, that have been purchased by the government and their present location?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I can probably have that done, and if my hon. friend calls attention to it again, I shall be glad to give such information as is available. Let me say in justification for my own delay and perhaps for the fact that the government have not taken action to erect a new building or to make large improvements in the present building, that the question is not free from difficulty. When I suggested a different site, I was expressing my own personal view, and not the view of the government. There are many people—and I have no reason to doubt that some members of the government are among them—who think that the present site is admirable for a Governor General's residence. The site is very beautiful, the trees are fine, and altogether the land is capable of very great improvement. But, the building would have to be erected on the site of the old one, and it would mean that for two years there would be no residence for the Governor General, and his family.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Apart from the present site, is there not sufficient room on the grounds for a new building?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know of any other available location on these grounds; in my opinion, the land would not lend itself to the erection of a large building on any other part of it.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The famous confederation picture, portraying the fathers of confederation which used to hang in the Railway Committee room has disappeared, and nobody seems to know where it has gone. There is a rumour that it has been sent away for the purpose of painting in the portraits of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works as fathers of confederation. Is there any foundation for that rumour?

Mr. FISHER. That painting has been lent to the Festival of Empire in London as the representation of a very important historical event, and no addition will be made to it in any way.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). This item should be allowed to stand until we have information supplied us as to the total amount of money spent on Rideau Hall. There seems to be a universal opinion that action should be taken towards erecting a new building right away.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will get that information for the main estimates. It is very desirable this vote should be passed as quickly as possible, because there is not a day to be lost in getting these improvements ready by the time the Duke of Connaught will arrive as Governor General. We will have to keep the whole staff working right on to the very moment of his arrival to complete the work.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I have no objection to this item going through. The minister told us that four years ago he got out plans and asked tenders for a new building.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was for an improvement to the present building.

Mr. REID (Grenville). There evidently was some discussion among the members of the cabinet regarding the unsuitability of these premises, because the hon. gentleman says that some of the other ministers thought this was a suitable site, and others thought that another would be better. I am of the opinion that the whole trouble is that the Minister of Finance will not supply the money.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He is very economical

Mr. REID (Grenville). He is until just before the elections and then it is surprising how elastic his conscience becomes. Does he intend doing anything towards getting a proper residence for the Governor General? The excuse given by the Minister of Public Works why we cannot begin another building is that in the meantime His Excellency could not use the present residence, but that excuse will prevent another building ever being erected on the present site. We might just as well start now and provide a building in another place. It is all very well for the Finance Minister to say that the present building is satisfactory. I say it is not, and I am sure the Duke of Connaught will be very much disappointed when he finds the sort of residence provided for him. If the Minister of Finance will put in an amount now to erect a new building and have it begun at once, we will agree to that. We have told him that from year to year. He has been spending $50,000 or $60,000 every year since he has been in office on the present old building—enough to supply completely new premises.

Mr. FISHER. It is not fair to saddle all the responsibility on my hon. colleague the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman has made some tempting offers, but I have a suspicion that he could not deliver the goods. We have not yet heard that he is leader of the party opposite, or can speak for his friends. I do not mean to say that his offer would influence us one way or the other, because if we should assume the responsibility of erecting a new building, we would take the whole of it on our own shoulders. I can bear testimony to what the Minister of Finance has said regarding His Excellency the Governor General's opinion of Rideau Hall as a residence. Several governors have declared it to be a most comfortable house, very well fitted for a vice-regal residence. The facade is not very prepossessing or grandiose, and some four years ago, when I was for a short time acting Minister of Public Works, the suggestion was made that we might be able to improve the facilities for a better entrance. The officers of the department prepared plans and made an estimate and tenders were asked for. But the lowest tender was so much higher than the estimate that the government decided that to spend so much money on an old house was altogether out of the question. The lowest tender involved an expenditure of some $300,000 simply on an improvement, and the government decided that that was too large an amount. That was some five or six years ago.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Then the hon. gentleman thought it was not a fit building for the Governor General?

Mr. FISHER. No, I said nothing of the kind. True, suggestions have been made for the purchase of another site, and for the pulling down of the present building and the erection of a new one on the same site. The latter would put us in this position, that for two years we would be without a government house, and we preferred to make some expenditures every year or two on improvements. Just now there will be some extra expenditure in view of the arrival of the Duke of Connaught. This is an emergency vote to a certain extent for the purpose of carrying out improvements which are required in consequence of the approaching change. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, has already said that he has no objection to this vote, and I do not see any reason why it should not go through. There are other votes on public works, in the discussion of which the House can get all the information with regard to Government House or other expenditures required, but I think it would be well to let this vote go through at once.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would ask the minister to bring down a statement of the amount of money expended for paintings, furniture and furnishings at Rideau Hall since the government came into office, and at the same time the amount received for the disposal of similar goods. Then we will be able to see just how the matter stands.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will be glad to get that for my hon. friend.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. He will then find I am justified in making the statements I have made. With reference to the new museum, and the national paintings I understand that they have been placed in a number of different homes merely for safe keeping in many instances, but that they have not been returned to their proper places.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is all news to me, I will make inquiries.

Mr. MARSHALL. What is the nature of the improvements, is it to be an addition to the present building or to improve the building as it stands?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The improvements will consist of certain painting of the building both outside and in, certain decorating of some rooms. It will include the building of a garage. There is no garage at present, and the Duke uses automobiles very extensively, and will bring a number with him to this country. It will include the building of some additional cottages for the accommodation of his servants and a thorough renewal of the sewerage arrangements in connection with Rideau Hall. It will include also the removal of the chapel erected by Lord Aberdeen, and which, by reason of additions which have been made since, is now a source of danger in case of fire. It is thought desirable to remove that chapel which is no longer used.

Mr. JAMESON. To substitute the garage for the chapel?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think it would be called properly a substitution. There will be some new furnishings also. These matters have been gone over very carefully with Major Bulkeley, the equerry of His Royal Highness, and we have concluded that these things ought to be done and the chief architect is of the opinion that the amount asked is the least for which they could be done.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then only a small amount of this expenditure is on the old building?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Except for painting and decorating.

Mr. REID (Grenville). From the statement of the minister it would appear that every Governor who comes here when he sees the building complains to the government for giving him a place of this kind to occupy. The Minister of Agriculture stated that when he was acting Minister of Public Works he decided that a new building was necessary, and even went so far as to call for tenders, but that something happened. Of course the government decided that they could not afford to spend that amount of money. That is practically what the Minister of Agriculture said, that they could not afford to spend $360,000 to erect a building that would be a credit to Canada, and he decided to go on patching away, spending $50,000 a year which has been done ever since. I have no doubt that the $360,000 has been used up entirely in patchwork. That does not appear to me to be very good judgment. I feel that the Minister of Agriculture has confirmed my opinion about this matter, that is, that the Minister of Finance is responsible for these works not being gone on with, because something happened and the money could not be provided. I have understood that when any minister lays an estimate before the Minister of Finance, if that minister draws his pen through it that ends it, and I suppose he must have told the Minister of Agriculture, who was Acting Minister of Public Works, that he could not possibly see his way clear to do anything towards erecting a new building or fixing up the premises for the Governor General. No doubt the present Governor has complained, as the others have done, but has had to submit and go through his term with the premises as they are. I venture to say that after the Duke of Connaught has been here for five years we will find the same old buildings and the same patchwork and the same promises if the Finance Minister has to decide whether the buildings are to be rebuilt or not. I am under the impression that after the general elections the present opposition will have to decide as to the building which the Governor General shall occupy, and I can assure the Minister of Agriculture, although I am only speaking for myself, that the members on this side of the House are generous enough to provide a proper building for the Governor General, although the government apparently are not. I believe the members who sit behind the government would be quite willing to join in seeing that Canada gives to the Governor General a proper residence.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wish to make a further suggestion with reference to the Art Gallery. We have many valuable paintings, I understand, in the fire trap at the Fisheries Exhibit on O'Connor street. They should be transferred to proper quarters as early as possible and we ought to have a decent art gallery for the people who come to visit Ottawa.

Mr. FISHER. Every painting in the National Gallery which was in the Fisheries building, is now in the new Museum, and has been for some weeks.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I was there within a very few weeks, and the removal had not been made then.

Mr. FISHER. I was there more than a month ago, and they were there then.

Ottawa Public Buildings — Governments's share of cost of pavements, sidewalks, &c., laid down by municipal authorities in front of these buildings, $9,610.80.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to pay our proper share towards the pavements laid down by the city.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Is the government prepared to pay its share of sidewalks in front of public buildings, in other cities? We are doing it constantly in Ottawa, but I understand it is not done in other cities, especially in Toronto.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We do the same in other cities in the case of a permanent pavement in front of a public building.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). For three or four years I have been trying to get something like this from the department in relation to the city of Winnipeg, but we have not seen the colour of their money yet. We get nice promises.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart, Winnipeg) has been looking lately to see how the matter stood. An order in council passed some little time ago for payment of the money to the city of Winnipeg. I presume it is paid. If not, it is going through the regular course of payment.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). I got a letter a week ago, and it was not paid then.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Does not the hon. member (Mr. Haggart, Winnipeg) know that it takes six months for money to go through the department?

Mr. FIELDING. There are one or two items in the way of payments of Indian annuities that it is of the utmost importance to have voted. These are matters of treaty, and we cannot explain to the Indians the rules of parliament which cause delay. One of these is an item 260. This is a group of Indian items, including the grant for annuities. But, to make the vote of the annuities effective, we have to have the whole item. Then there is No. 264, which is in the same position. I would suggest that these might be passed with the understanding that if there is anything to be discussed abundant opportunity shall be afforded later for the discussion.

Indians—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Northwest Territories, $673,186.

Mr. SPROULE. The amount for annuities in this is $170,345. The whole item is a large one and might cause some discussion and inquiry.

Mr. FIELDING. Could not we have the item passed with the understanding that there will be no limitation to the discussion of it later on?

Mr. SPROULE. When the item is passed, there is no check. It is unfortunate to put us in that position.

Mr. FIELDING. The item is a large one.

Mr. OLIVER. All that we really need is the annuity money, as $170,345, but, in order to get that, apparently, we have to ask for the whole item.

Mr. SPROULE. There is usually a good deal of inquiry about these votes, and a good deal of explanation required. It is not exactly reasonable to put through a half million in this way without an inquiry as to what is proposed, or what has been done in the past. That is hardly what might be expected of parliament.

Mr. FIELDING. I had hoped the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) would waive that objection, but if he presses it I cannot object.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). Do I understand that the annuity cannot be voted without the rest of the items?

Mr. FIELDING. As the hon. gentleman will see these items are numbered, half a dozen different amounts grouped under one item. Under the method of dealing with these items in Committee of the Whole, if only the annuity amount is passed, it will not be reported, but will stand in committee. We shall have the expression of the committee's good will, but I do not think that the Auditor General will regard the passing of the item as authority to give the money.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). Well, does the minister propose that this whole item—

Mr. FIELDING. I say that if objection is taken, I cannot press it. I think the criticism is a fair one, and I cannot object.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I think the House is willing to grant the annuity money because that is money belonging to the Indians themselves.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know how the Auditor General may view it. I think, on the whole, it will be better to take the annuity items. They will remain in committee and not be reported, but whether the Auditor General will regard that as sufficient authority for him will be for him to decide.

Mr. RUSSELL. Are all these amounts in connection with the Indian affairs?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Yes, they are all for the Indians.

Mr. OLIVER. I hope the committee understands the absolute necessity of getting this money in order to keep faith with the Indians. While we do not wish to ask the House a large item without due consideration, we do ask that the government be allowed to keep faith with the Indians in regard to their treaty money. If only the amount for annuities is adopted, I would like it to be with the idea that, if the Auditor General does not see fit to allow the payment of the money we shall have to come back to the committee and ask for further consideration.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not see why there should be any such urgent hurry. We have been sitting over six months and surely this could have been foreseen and arrangements made accordingly. It seems to me that if foresight had been exercised over the business that would have been done. I do not know what time of the year the Indian annuities are paid, but I understood it was in the fall.

Mr. OLIVER. The parties who pay treaty in northern Alberta have already started. The party for northern Ontario has to start in a few days, or it cannot make its dates. Generally speaking, the arrangements have to be made in time or we cannot meet the dates with the Indians. I am not urging the House to show its confidence in the government to the extent of passing this large vote but I am sure the House would rather show that confidence in the government than have a treaty broken with the Indians.

Mr. BLAIN. This is one of the items mentioned by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) a day or two ago, and agreed to by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). Of course the responsibility of securing the money and making the payments will rest with the government. The leader of the opposition stated in the House that he was quite willing the Indian annuities should pass. The opposition now are willing to carry out this agreement.

Mr. FIELDING. If the hon. gentleman is not satisfied, if he wants to pass the whole item, I will be happy to have it passed.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I was present when the discussion took place. The leader of the opposition asked if that was a payment of money arising out of the treaty, and the Prime Minister said, yes. Now, there is a large item here involving, with the annuities, $250,000. If it is desirable that the money should be also voted, I think the minister should give us a general statement of what that means.

Mr. SPROULE. It was a question whether we should vote these items in toto, or only sufficient of them to carry on the service until September. The Prime Minister said there were certain items which needed to be voted in toto, and among them was the annuities to Indians.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend is correct, I move that the committee rise.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FRIDAY, May 12, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 212) to amend the Water Carriage of Goods Act.—Mr. Lemieux.

Bill (No. 209) respecting grain.—Mr. Oliver.

Bill (No. 210) to amend the Water Carriage of Goods Act as regards the delivery of wood.—Mr. Sinclair.

THE BANK ACT.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 213) to amend the Bank Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to extend the charters of the banks for one year. Before this parliament shall reassemble after adjournment the banks under the existing law would be without charters. It is proposed to extend the charters for one year so that instead of their lapsing on the 1st of July, 1911, they will not lapse until 1st of July, 1912, before which time it is hoped we will have a general revision of the Bank Act. In the schedule will be found the names of a number of banks which are going out of business either by absorption or by suspension, but it is necessary to include them, not in expectation that they will continue business, but that they may have all necessary powers for winding up their affairs.

Mr. FOSTER. This Bill is nothing else than simply to extend the charters.

Mr. FIELDING. Absolutely nothing else.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MORNING SESSIONS OF HOUSE.

Mr. FIELDING moved:

That from Monday, the 15th of May instant, and until the end of the session, the House shall meet on that day and on every subsequent sitting day at eleven o'clock in the morning; and that in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p.m., there shall be also an intermission every day, including Wednesday, from one to three o'clock p.m.

Mr. FOSTER. The resolution seems to mean that Monday next will not be included.

Mr. FIELDING. It was intended to apply to Monday next.

Mr. REID (Grenville). As I understand this resolution, it applies not only to the date of adjournment, but to the sessions of the House after we meet in July.

Mr. FIELDING. That would be the effect of it, but of course when the House reassembles in July the question can be further considered.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The understanding with the Prime Minister was that in order to facilitate business we should meet next Monday morning and continue sittings in the morning until the date of adjournment. But the Minister of Finance is including in this resolution the remainder of the session after we reassemble.

Mr. FIELDING. That particular point was not discussed between the Prime Minister, who drew the resolution, and myself, but it certainly would have that effect.

Mr. FOSTER. It goes too far.

Mr. FIELDING. Does it? When we reassemble the House can then say what it wants to do. The difficulty just now is as to the exact date of adjournment, because some gentlemen have suggested an earlier day than the 23rd of May.

Mr. FOSTER. The resolution can read that we will sit in the mornings until the date of adjournment.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If it is made to extend to the 23rd inst., it would cover everything even if we did adjourn on the 19th.

Mr. FIELDING. Perhaps that would be the better way.

Mr. EMMERSON. Why should we not meet in the mornings until the end of the session? Committees are now through with their work, and when we come back in July we don't want to stay here until Christmas. I speak, not as a party man, but as a member of this House, and I know that my constituents expect me to come here in the morning and attend to the business of the country, so that, if possible, there may be an end to this session. I say it is our duty to sit here in the morning, and I strongly urge that the resolution should remain as it is.

Mr. FOSTER. There are different posts of duty, and when we come back after the adjournment, we will have duties to perform in committee as well as in session of the House, both of which are important. I certainly think we ought not to tie ourselves at this time for that indefinite period. I think it would meet every emergency if this resolution went until the time of our final adjournment in May. Then, when we come back, we can decide as a House of Commons what we will do. I am afraid that the government will then be just about as powerful, with its majority, as it is now, and can carry, if it wishes, a measure which at that time may seem suitable in order to help the government with the business.

Mr. FIELDING. If it is found necessary to revive the motion when we reassemble that can be done. For the present I accept the suggestion that it be made effective until the 23rd instant. If we should adjourn earlier, it will be non-effective.

Motion as amended, agreed to.

BARRINGTON PASSAGE BAIT FREEZER.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to give some information to my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson), who asked about a return with reference to a bait freezer at Barrington Passage, and about the cancellation of a fishery lease to Mr. Markey. I communicated with the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who received the following letter from Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister of Justice, under date of April 4:

I have the honour to acknowledge your letter of the 21st ultimo, No. 118, and in reply beg to state that as the question of the recovery of the $500 advanced by your department for the construction of a bait freezer at Barrington Passage, Nova Scotia, is now under consideration with a view to the taking of legal proceedings if it is thought that such proceedings would be successful, I do not think that any of the papers relating to the matter should be returned to the House of Commons. I am also of opinion that the cancellation of the fishery lease to Mr. Markey, being now under advisement, none of the papers relating to that matter should be returned to the House of Commons.

That explains the delay in the return sought by the hon. gentleman.

MANITOBA CENSUS ENUMERATORS.

Mr. STAPLES. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if the enumerators for the taking of the census in the province of Manitoba have been appointed.

Mr. FISHER. I think they all are; if not, with very few exceptions.

Mr. STAPLES. By whom were they recommended?

Mr. FISHER. They were recommended by men in whom I have confidence.

Mr. STAPLES. I do not think that is an answer to my question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow a debate on the orders of the day.

Mr. STAPLES. I have a further question to ask. Had the Liberal organizer in the province of Manitoba anything to do with the appointment or recommending of the enumerators for that province?

Mr. FISHER. That is a question which I decline to answer.

Mr. STAPLES. Has the Liberal organizer of the province of Manitoba anything to do with the schooling of the enumerators before they begin their work?

Mr. FISHER. No.

NIAGARA RIVER WATER-POWER.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I promised my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to make a statement to the House in reference to an article which he quoted yesterday from a newspaper relating to applications which the newspaper intimates are being made for the diversion of further water from the Niagara river. In the article from which my hon. friend quoted I find the following:

The situation is peculiar. The waterways treaty with Canada, signed January 11, 1909, while apparently limiting the amount of water which might be taken from the falls, has, on the contrary, increased this diversion. The power development companies have taken advantage of the outside limitations of the treaty and to-day are demanding what will come to 68 per cent more water than is now being drawn into the tunnels for the purpose of turning the giant turbine engines.

I may say to my hon. friend, as I have no doubt he is aware, from a consideration of what has passed during recent years, that previous to certain legislation which was enacted by the United States Congress, and previous to the framing of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, the question of allowing certain diversions of water from the Niagara river was assumed, I think by common assent, to rest with the province of Ontario and the state of New York respectively. At the present time, under the amendment to the Navigable Waters Protection Act, I think that any diversion of the waters of the Niagara river could only be allowed by the Department of Public Works of this government, because it is now provided that no person or company can erect any work in a navigable water without the consent of the Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works. That was not the case under the old law, and the province of Ontario assumed to grant authority to divert the waters of the Niagara river, and quite a number of companies did receive authority from the government and the legislature of Ontario to make such diversions. The state of New York also gave authority to companies to divert the waters upon the United States side, and power companies were formed there as well as upon the Canadian side, and did divert a considerable quantity of water. In the year 1906

Congress acted in the matter, and passed a statute which provided that no diversion on the water of the Niagara river, on the American side should take place except with the consent of the Congress of the United States, or the Secretary of War of the United States under its control. That Act was passed in 1906. It was to be in force for three years after its passage. Later on, I think in the year 1909, a joint resolution was passed by the House of Representatives, and the Senate, extending that statute for a further term of two years pending what was then in contemplation, the coming to an agreement between the two governments, and the framing of a treaty with reference to this matter. The extension provided for by that joint resolution will expire by limitation on the 29th day of next month. The joint resolution to which the newspaper from which my hon. friend quoted refers, is now pending before the Congress, having been introduced by Senator Burton. That resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution extending the operation of the Act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara river, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes.

Whereas, the provisions of the Act entitled 'An Act for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara river, for the preservation of Niagara Falls and for other purposes,' approved June 29, 1906, and extended by joint resolution (public resolution numbered fifty-six) for a period of two years, approved March 3, 1909, will expire by limitation June 29, 1911; and

Whereas, the extended date provided therein for the termination of the operation of said Act was so extended that there might be consummated a more permanent settlement of the question involved by a treaty with Great Britain and by further legislation appropriate to the situation; and, whereas, article 5 of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, proclaimed May 13, 1910, provides a maximum limit within which the United States may authorize and permit the diversion within the state of New York of the waters of the Niagara river above the Falls of Niagara for power purposes;

Therefore, be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that the provisions of the aforesaid Act be, and they are hereby, extended from June 29, 1911, being the date of the expiration of the operation of said Act, to remain in full force and virtue during the life of said treaty, save in so far as any proportion thereof may be found inapplicable or already complied with.

I may say that under the statute of 1906, the Secretary of War was permitted to authorize a diversion to existing companys to the extent of 15,000 cubic feet per second, and also to grant temporary permits for water in addition. It is important, in view of the quotation from the article in question, to bear in mind that that Act does not place any limitation on the right to divert water for sanitary and domestic purposes, but expressly authorizes that right and take it out of the other provision with respect to the diversion of water for power purposes.

After a careful consideration of the International Waterways Treaty, after examination by engineers, and seeing their report, it was decided that, having reference to the interests involved, and the industries which had been established upon the United States and Canadian sides respectively, it would be reasonable to permit a diversion on the part of the United States to 20,000 cubic feet per second, and to permit diversion on the Canadian side to the extent of 36,000 cubic feet per second, so that the right—if it may be so called—to divert water on the Canadian side is almost twice as great as on the American side—36,000 cubic feet per second to 20,000 cubic feet. That limitation is contained in article 5 of the Boundaries Treaty between Great Britain and the United States. I will just read the third clause from article 5 of this treaty:

So long as this treaty shall remain in force, no diversion of the waters of the Niagara river above the falls from the natural course and stream thereof shall be permitted except for the purpose and to the extent hereinafter provided.

The United States may authorize and permit the diversion within the State of New York of the waters of the said river above the Falls of Niagara, for power purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet of water per second.

The United Kingdom, by the Dominion of Canada, or the province of Ontario, may authorize and permit the diversion within the province of Ontario of the waters of said river above the Falls of Niagara for power purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 36,000 cubic feet per second.

Under the treaty the United States have the right to authorize a diversion up to 20,000 cubic feet per second, and the Canadian authorities have the right to authorize a diversion to the extent of 36,000 cubic feet per second, but to what extent the United States will allow the diversion on their side—whether to the full extent of the 20,000 cubic feet per second or not—is a matter entirely within their control, and with which we have nothing to do.

The resolution introduced by Senator Burton into Congress is for the purpose of limiting the power of the State of New York to grant a diversion up to the full quantity provided by the treaty.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not include what may be diverted for sanitary or domestic purposes?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, that was excepted in the statute passed by Congress in 1906, and which the joint resolution by Senator Burton, is intended to extend.

I notice that in the article quoted by my hon. friend the statement is made that the treaty has increased the diversion. That is not the case. The treaty gives no power to make a diversion, but simply limits the right to allow a diversion. If the treaty had not been passed, the state of New York might have done just as the province of Ontario has been doing—authorize a diversion to any extent. That is the right claimed and exercised by the province of Ontario. But what this treaty does is to limit the right of Canada on the one side and the United States, or the state of New York, on the other, to allow a diversion beyond 36,000 cubic feet per second by Canada, and 20,000 cubic feet per second by the United States.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understood from the minister that at one time the diversion on the United States side was limited to 15,000 cubic feet per second. If I am correct in that, it would seem that the treaty has increased the maximum amount what might be diverted, because that amount is now 20,000 cubic feet per second.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I said that in 1906, the limitation apparently, as I read the statute, for permanent diversion which would be allowed by the Secretary of War was about 15,000 cubic feet per second, but in addition he could grant temporary permits. That only extended over three years. Afterwards when the engineers made their examination and decided on what they would recommend, it was found necessary, in order not to destroy existing industries on the Canadian side, to allow Canada a larger diversion, which was fixed at 36,000 cubic feet per second, and to allow the United States a diversion of 20,000 cubic feet per second.

This article states that the power companies are taking 68 per cent more water than is at present being drawn into the tunnels. I cannot believe that that is true because the difference between what was authorized by the statute of 1906, and the treaty, adding the temporary permits, could not exceed more than 25 per cent at the outside.

Mr. HAGGART. Might I ask whether the jurisdiction over the user of the water is entirely in the hands of the Dominion and the United States, independent of the province of Ontario and the state of New York?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not sure as to that. I think that would be a very nice question. The state of New York has claimed the right to authorize the diversion. Ontario has claimed the same right on the ground that it is the owner of the soil or the riparian owner. The state of New York claims the right, I presume, because it is a question of property which comes within the definition of state rights. However, by the statute of 1906, Congress claimed their right to intervene, under the treaty the right to divert is expressly limited, and under the American constitution a treaty becomes the supreme law superseding any statute of any state. Under the constitution, the treaty becomes the supreme law of the country and supersedes any statute of the state of New York.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). It would not in our country, it would not supersede the rights of Ontario.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am speaking now of the state of New York. So far as our country is concerned, of course that point is immaterial. In reference to the point raised by my hon. friend, I am inclined to think that under our present law, as the Niagara river is, for the most part, a navigable river, no works could now be placed in the river for the diversion of water without the consent of this government. I may be wrong in that, but I think that would be the effect of the statute.

With regard to the right which was given by the treaty to divert water for sanitary or domestic purposes, as I have said, that right was recognized by the United States Congress in the statute of 1906, to which I have referred, it is recognized in the treaty and I think it is a right which each country would claim. That is always claimed with respect to boundary waters, but it is absurd for this newspaper to make the statement that these power companies could divert a large quantity of water under the pretense that it was for domestic or sanitary purposes. The water which would be diverted for these purposes would be infinitesimal as compared with the full flow of the Niagara river. They could not and they would not be permitted under the treaty to use water for creating power which was ostensibly diverted for sanitary and domestic purposes. That matter would be under the control of the Joint Commissioners to be appointed under the Boundary Waters Treaty.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Would that include the supplying of cities with water?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Possibly it would, and water for sewage purposes, but that was recognized in the Act of Congress and the treaty makes no change in regard to it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). This is not a newspaper article, it is a statement issued by the American Civic Association. The statement does make the claim that the treaty increased the maximum diversion. The allusion is no doubt to the fact that formerly the United States fixed the maximum at 15,000 cubic feet per second, and the treaty increased the diversion to 20,000 cubic feet per second. There is an increase in that regard subject, of course, to the qualification mentioned by the minister, by which it appears that the Secretary of War of the United States had power to grant temporary or special permits increasing the diversion beyond 15,000 cubic feet per second. I have not examined the statutes and regulations to which the minister has alluded, so I cannot speak with regard to that and accept his statement. However, I do think that this government has a duty to perform in the matter. In the first place, it has the duty of seeing that the diversion on the United States side is not greater than that permitted by the treaty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Secondly, this government has the duty of seeing that the provision which declares that water may be diverted beyond 20,000 cubic feet per second for sanitary or domestic purposes is not abused. I do not say that there is any intention of abusing it, but there is certainly a suggestion in this statement which has been issued by the American Civic Association that some idea of that kind is to the fore at the present time. The statement may be an absolutely inaccurate one. Whether it is inaccurate or not, the government should have it in mind and see that no pretense of that kind is made use of by these corporations of the United States which are interested in securing a supply of this water, that no pretense founded on that provision is allowed to have any such effect as would be contrary to the true intent and meaning of this treaty.

Mr. TURRIFF. When does the minister expect to take up Bill (No. 36) in connection with the appointing of the Joint Commission under the Waterways Treaty?

Mr. PUGSLEY. On Tuesday, if it is possible to reach it, I will take it up.

COPYRIGHT ACT.

Bill (No. 184) respecting Copyrights—Mr. Fisher—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1, short title,

Mr. FISHER. I gave a fairly full explanation of the Bill on the resolution, and since that time the Bill itself and a memorandum on its provisions have been very largely distributed in the country. Every one who had written about this Bill, and every member of the House has been sent a copy of the Bill and a memorandum of its provisions. The consequence has been that I have had some replies, and I am gratified to find that on the whole, rather universally, the Bill is approved by those who have taken an interest in this very important question. A good many questions have been addressed to the department indicating some misapprehension on the part of the writers. I think that those misapprehensions have been removed by our replies, and I rather gather that with the removal of these misapprehensions the writers are pretty well satisfied with the Bill. There are, however, two points on which there is some little divergence of opinion. One provision of the Bill is that only British subjects resident in Canada or bona fide residents in Canada shall have the right to copyright in Canada. Under the present law foreigners can obtain the right to copyright in Canada, by reason of the fact that the British Copyright Act is in force here. Under the Canadian Copyright Act, a foreigner cannot obtain a copyright in Canada, but by reason of the fact that the British Copyright Act has been in force in Canada, foreigners obtaining British copyright, could then obtain Canadian copyright, or have copyright protection in Canada by virtue of their copyright in Great Britain. That condition of affairs is about to disappear by the Bill introduced in the British parliament and by this Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the general rule in the various civilized countries in that respect?

Mr. FISHER. In most countries foreigners can obtain copyrights. But in the countries which adhere to the International Union that is not required, because, by the International Union, the privileges of copyright are conferred upon all subjects of the countries of the union. We now belong to the union, and it is quite probable that under this new Act we may be able to join the union, with possibly some reservations. We have been in the union for 15 or 16 years, and we hope under the new Act to be able to continue in the union. I am speaking now of the provision of our Act which applies to people of all countries which are not in the union, or to any country at all. We have made special arrangement for joining the union. We are under peculiar circumstances here, owing to the proximity of the United States, and to the fact that the United States literature is largely similar to our own. We have to be a little more careful in regard to the provisions of copyright in Canada than any other country. That was the reason why, in framing the original Canadian Copyright Act, the privilege of copyright in Canada was confined to British subjects in Canada. This Bill provides, not only for joining the union, but also for making special arrangements with countries outside the union. Possibly we may make an arrangement with the United States, if the United States is willing to make a fair arrangement. But I think this provision in our Act will be conducive to an arrangement with foreign countries.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). As I understand it, under our law as it has been up to the present time, the foreign author could get copyright in this country under the British Act; and in addition to that if the country of which he is a citizen, belongs to the union, he could get copyright in this country for the reason that Canada belonged to the union. So that he would have a double right in that respect. Now the British Copyright Act is to be withdrawn so far as its application to Canada is concerned, and the law of the country will depend upon this Bill now under consideration. This country belongs to the union, the citizens of any country belonging to that union will have rights in Canada and Canadians will have rights in those countries; those are reciprocal rights. So far as other countries are concerned, the minister proposes to maintain the Canadian law as it has been in the past, and to retain it in that shape for the purpose of making reciprocal arrangements in regard to copyright with those countries which are not members of the union.

Mr. FISHER. That is one reason, but not the only reason. I have gone so far as to say that in joining the union I think Canada ought to make a stipulation that the privilege of copyright in Canada shall only go to the citizens or subjects of a country which is in the union. In Great Britain and some other countries a foreigner who is of a country that is not within the union, cannot obtain a copyright under the law of Great Britain. If we join the union, practically it gives the privilege in Canada to the citizens or subjects of every country in the world, provided they take a copyright in one of those countries of the union. It is not confined to citizens or subjects of the union countries. I consider that that is a mistake on the part of the union. There is, under those circumstances, practically no inducement to go outside the union, because the citizen or subject of that country, by obtaining copyright in a union country, can get all the advantages of the union. I would, therefore, propose joining the union with a reservation, that the privileges of copyright in Canada shall be extended to the countries of the union so far as their own citizens or subjects are concerned; but if they choose to give to a citizen or subject of a country outside the union, copyright in their country, that will not give to the individual a copyright in Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the United States belong to the union?

Mr. FISHER. No, and that is the trouble. If the United States belonged to the union, and if we had the privilege in the United States which the union gives to all other countries, the difficulty would be solved.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It seems then that Great Britain admits the copyright of all foreigners. Great Britain belongs to the union, and a foreigner taking out a copyright in Great Britain, therefore, can take out a copyright in Canada. We joined the union unreservedly. Then the next question is this: Would it be permitted us to join the union with the reservation which the minister suggests?

Mr. FISHER. That is just what we cannot say. We now belong to the union, and as long as we continue in the union we cannot help ourselves. But under this Bill we have the right to withdraw from the union. We joined the union by the voluntary act of the Canadian government some 16 or 17 years ago, and in doing that we got the privileges of the union and gave the privileges of the union. We gave the privileges of the union then, to a large extent, because one country against which we might desire to defend ourselves had all the privileges of the union in Canada through the British Copyright Act. Now under the new British Copyright Act they will not have that privilege, and we have the power within ourselves of giving or not giving that privilege. I think it would be a wise policy for us to say that we will not give privileges where the other people do not give us privileges. I think that is a reasonable position to take. I took that position in the conference in London last spring, and I do not think I am divulging any secret when I say that the conference admitted the principle and accepted that proposition. But England is so committed to the union, and so desirous of remaining in the union, that I am not prepared to say that England will join the union with the same reservation. I believe the conference was disposed to advise that, but I cannot say what will be done. I think that Canada ought only to join the union with a reservation, and if the union refuses to accept that reservation I would be disposed to stay out of it. I would do that with great regret, but at the same time I think it is necessary, and I am free to admit that it is necessary because the United States is not in the union. If the United States were in the union, and we got the privileges in the United States which we would get if they were in the union, then I would not hesitate, but as long as an American citizen can get all the privileges and advantages in the union countries without the United States joining the union, or giving the same privileges in the United States. I do not feel disposed to join and give these privileges in Canada which they refuse us in the United States.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). What position would you be in if you withdrew from the union?

Mr. FISHER. We would be in an isolated position, very much like the United States is, but we would have the control and management of our own copyright in Canada.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). You would have to make a separate arrangement with each country?

Mr. FISHER. With each country. This Bill contemplates what I call reciprocal arrangements within the empire. I would advocate very strongly that as soon as this Bill passes we immediately give to British copyright holders in Great Britain the full privileges of Canadian copyright, on the understanding that Great Britain shall give us the full privileges of British copyright. I would also propose that we should give the same privileges to Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Newfoundland. I am satisfied that these different self-governing parts of the empire would treat us in the same way that we would be disposed to treat them. When it comes to foreign countries, supposing we were outside of the union, I would like to deal with them on a reasonable basis of mutual advantage. It may be in one way with one country, and in another way with another country, but I would like to do it on the basis that we get something for what we give. I cannot tell what our success in that respect would be, but I have hopes that to-day the Canadian market for literature, music, dramatic works and things of that kind, is becoming of sufficient importance to induce other countries to desire to have copyright privileges in Canada; in fact, I know that that is the case with many, and I have reason to believe that if we were withdrawing from the international union immediate steps would be taken by a number of countries to obtain the privileges of the union in Canada. I hope the reservation that I have indicated will be accepted by the union, but I cannot be sure of that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to ask the hon. minister whether any investigation will be made as to the copyrights that will be granted to different periodicals or books that will be printed in Canada? I merely ask that because I know that at the present time there are magazines and books coming into our country that should not be coming in.

Mr. FISHER. I do not quite know what the hon. gentleman is referring to. If he would specify perhaps I could give him a little more information.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I understand the minister is preparing a law to grant copyrights to people who wish to come in and dispose of their books in Canada. Am I correct in that position?

Mr. FISHER. I am proposing a Bill which governs the whole question of copyright in Canada, and part of that Bill proposes to give the Governor in Council power to make arrangements with foreign countries on terms of mutual advantage. That would be done by order in council, and each order in council would specify just what the privileges were, and what extent they were granted to each particular country.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the order in council specify the names of the books that will be allowed to be brought in?

Mr. FISHER. No. The order in council would have to be in general terms, not specifying books at all. I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to in that respect, but I could give him more information if he would let me know what he has in mind.

On section 2,

Mr. FOSTER. Are these the same interpretation clauses as in the British Act?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, verbatim. Most, if not all, are definitions arrived at by agreement in the union.

On section 3,

Mr. FISHER. I beg to move:

That subclauses 2 and 3 of clause 3 be stricken out and the following three subclauses be substituted therefor:

2. Every copy of a literary work published in Canada other than maps, musical, scientific and artistic charts and plans, shall be printed or made in Canada.

3. Every copy of a work published in Canada shall bear notice of copyright.

(a) If the work is a book or other printed publication on the title page or on the page immediately following; or,

(b) If the work is a literary (other than a book or other printed publication) or a musical work, engraving, photograph or cinematograph, on the face thereof; or,

(c) If the work is a volume of maps, charts, plans, tables, music, engravings or photographs, on the title page or first page thereof, in the words, 'Copyright,' Canada. 19— by A. B.'

4. Every painting, drawing or work of sculpture published in Canada shall bear the signature of the author which shall be notice of copyright.

The resolution as printed would mean that every musical work, drama, map or anything of that kind would have to be printed in Canada as well as a literary work. It has been represented that there are obvious difficulties in that, and we propose that in the case of these articles which are sometimes very difficult to print, sometimes only a single copy would be wanted, the printing may be done outside of Canada. For instance, a sculptor who made a statue would get copyright, but we would not require him to produce the statue in Canada. Frequently a Canadian artist goes abroad to study and he might copyright his painting in Canada without being obliged to paint it in Canada.

On section 5—term of copyright.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the usual term?

Mr. FISHER. That is the term that has been adopted by the International union. It has been accepted by England, and is contained in the Bill of Mr. Buxton.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the former period?

Mr. FISHER. In Canada, 28 years, with a renewal for 14 years, making 42 years. In England it was alternative—during the life of the author and 7 years, or 42 years, whichever was the longer period. The English committee which investigated this question of copyright under the presidency of Lord Gorrell, went into the matter very thoroughly, and made an elaborate report recommending this term.

Mr. FOSTER. It is very long. It might be a hundred years.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, and I must say that at first sight I was rather opposed to it; but the argument of the committee in their report, and the discussions that took place, convinced me that on the whole it was a fair proposition. Considerable exception was taken to it at first, but I see that it has been accepted by the imperial parliament, without any modification.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the longest life of your patent?

Mr. FISHER. Our patent is only for 18 years. I might state very briefly the reasons for this term of copyright. It is to give fair and reasonable reward for really intellectual work. The contention is that a work that is not of great value will practically pass out of any advantages of copyright long before this period expires, and the existence of such copyright is no detriment to the public. In the case of a work of great value, which is generally produced when a man is mature or in advanced years, it is thought that his descendants ought to have a right to some advantage.

On section 6—license to republish or perform work in public granted by minister upon petition.

Mr. FISHER. This is a provision which some authors in England have rather objected to in the English Act.

Mr. FOSTER. But the English Act qualifies it by making it after the death of the author.

Mr. FISHER. That has been done in England, and I must say that I do not quite see why the public should be deprived until the death of the author. In this country we are a little more liable to hurt if there were not this provision than they are in England, because it is quite possible that the author might not think it worth his while to publish a work for the small market in Canada, and this would give the public the right to secure the enjoyment of the work, of which we give copyright protection, and I think the public would have a right to it. In England they thought it was sufficient to do it after the death of the author, but I see no particular reason why we should wait for that. In the Act now in existence in Canada, in section 23, there is this provision, and I think it well to maintain it and continue it for the future.

On section 7, ownership of copyright, &c.

Mr. FISHER. This is the same as the British Act with the exception of the last clause, clause 6. In the British Act there is no provision for the machinery of assignment. We have a provision requiring that the assignee shall fulfil the conditions of the law the same as the original owner of the copyright.

On section 13, penalties for dealing with pirated copies.

Mr. FISHER. This corresponds practically with clause 11 of the English Act. The penalties are similar to those imposed in the Bill which this House passed two years ago, but which did not become law because not passed by the Senate. It was an amendment to the Criminal Code, and the criminal penalties are introduced into this Bill at the special request of a large number of people interested in copyright.

On section 16, importation of copyright works.

Mr. FISHER. This is different from the English Act, and involves printing of the work in this country. In England, there is no such condition, they do not object to a work being printed abroad, provided it is published in England, and publication in England means simply sale. A foreigner may print his work in his own country, and if he sells half a dozen copies in England that gives him copyright. That is not the case in Canada, and consequently we prohibit importation.

On section 33,

Mr. FISHER. I ought to explain that this section, although it gives full rights as to-day existing, if an individual having such copyright at present does not fulfil the conditions of the new Act, he will not reap the advantage of the longer period of the copyright. He would have the length of the copyright he had under the old Act. But if an author chose to fulfil the conditions of the new Act, he would then have the copyright for life and it would extend for the 50 years after the author is dead.

On section 35,

Mr. FOSTER. For the sake of a point to which I called the attention of the minister, I will say here that as regards the extension of these reciprocity arrangements, it is proposed to do it by order in council. I have no objection personally to that being the ultimate authority in case of reciprocity with individual countries. But when we come to the International Union it seems to me that the matter should be laid before parliament. I wish to state that here so that it would not be said that I had asked for it in one case and not in the other. I do not think it is of the same importance with reference to ourselves as it is to others.

Mr. FISHER. I have a great deal of sympathy with what the hon. gentleman has said. This is taken from the English Act. His Majesty in Council takes power under the English Act, as he did under the former English Act, to adhere to the union, and also to make arrangements with countries not in the union. My hon. friend knows, perhaps, that there is, not a convention, but an arrangement of an informal character between Great Britain and the United States, and that is made, not by order in council, but by a mere exchange of letters. But under the old British Act his Majesty in Council has such power, and under the new British Act, His Majesty in Council also has that power. As a matter of public policy, I would hardly think it justifiable for the government to make an arrangement on such an important question with a foreign country, without informing the House. But I think it would be well to leave that clause as it is.

On section 35, subsection 2: extent of order in council.

Mr. FOSTER I think the minister would be well advised if he would put in there a proviso which would ensure the order in council being submitted to parliament for its approval. The government does not wish by order in council to take any more of the legislative functions than are absolutely necessary, and this is quite as important in one sense as a trade treaty. I do not think there should be any objection to it.

Mr. FISHER. No, I think the hon. gentleman is quite right. An arrangement of this kind would mean a great deal to certain classes in the community, and I think the representatives of the people ought to have the final say. I did not intend to take this Bill out of committee to-day, and if my hon. friend would allow the clause to pass, before the final disposition of the Bill, I will draft a clause and add it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There are some provisions in the English Act which seem to be omitted. I suppose this has been done after consideration.

Mr. FISHER. There are a number of clauses in the British Act which apply to their conditions in various ways, and which do not apply to our conditions at all; but there is no principle involved in the British Act that is not included in this.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Section 35 stands for further consideration.

On section 36: evidence of foreign copyright.

Mr. FISHER. This is simply a provision with regard to evidence that a person has a copyright in a foreign country when an international arrangement is made.

On section 37: certified copies as evidence.

Mr. FISHER. This is the same as section 32 in our present Act.

On section 38: validity of documents.

Mr. FISHER. This is the same as section 33 in the present Act.

On section 39: registration fees.

Mr. FOSTER. Are there any changes in the fees?

Mr. FISHER. No, they are under clause 24 in the present Act, and they are the same.

Mr. FOSTER. The fees are simply nominal?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, practically nominal.

Mr. FOSTER. Do the fees that come in go any distance in meeting the expenses?

Mr. FISHER. No, there is not a great deal of expense in the administration of the Act. Beyond the civil government salaries there is nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. Why should not copyright provide for its own expenses?

Mr. FISHER. I suppose that there has been a desire not to tax the production of intellectual work. I would not like to advise raising the fees.

Mr. FOSTER. That is hardly treating them with very great respect, it seems to me.

Mr. FISHER. I think they are quite willing to endure it.

On section 43: orders in council; publication; laid before paarliament.

Mr. FISHER. I do not know whether that would be sufficient—I hardly think it would be—to meet my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. FOSTER. This had better stand as well.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Section 43 stands for further consideration.

On section 45: repeal.

Mr. FISHER. These are the copyright laws of Canada.

On section 46: commencement of Act.

Mr. FISHER. This Act is brought into force by proclamation because it cannot come into force until the British Act is put into force. The government in Great Britain do not contemplate bringing the Act into force for some time; I think they propose a year from the first of July. Of course, we cannot really bring this Act into force until the British Act goes into operation.

On the first schedule.

Mr. FISHER. This gives an explanation of the existing right.

On the second schedule.

Mr. FISHER. The second schedule contains a list of the British statutes which now apply to Canada and which, under the British Act, power is conferred upon this parliament to repeal in so far as they apply to Canada.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It should be made plain, I think, in section 44, that the Acts repealed are Acts of another parliament. The reference in section 44 is to enactments set forth in the schedule, but there is nothing to indicate in the schedule that they are the Acts of any particular parliament.

Mr. FISHER. No, I see that it is not specified, but of course on the face of the schedule it is shown that they are imperial Acts. I think it would be better to put in that they are Acts of the imperial parliament.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall section 44 be reconsidered?

Mr. FISHER. I do not think that section 44 need be changed if the second schedule is changed to show that these are Acts of the imperial parliament. I will see that the change is made in the schedule before the Bill goes out of committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The second schedule stands for further consideration.

Mr. FISHER. I feel very much gratified that the Bill is receiving such cordial acceptance and support.

Mr. FOSTER. With such a large attendance in the House!

Mr. FISHER. Still, those who are here have taken the trouble to understand a rather complex question. I trust that the Act will receive the same acceptance in the country that it seems to have received here. I have hopes that it will, because of the communications I have had. I will keep the Bill in committee in case any other members of the House wish to say anything on the matter, or in case any further representations are made with regard to it.

Progress reported.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act by providing (a) for annual increases to the salaries of the superintendents of city post offices until a maximum salary of $2,500 is reached; and (b) for raising the minimum and maximum salaries of railway mail clerks to $500 and $1,400, respectively; and making the yearly increases for all railway mail clerks $100 instead of $50 until a salary of $800 has been reached.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This is but one of the resolutions with respect to increases of salaries to Post Office employees, and if the House will permit me to explain the two resolutions now it will better give an idea of what we purpose doing for the post office employees.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There is no objection to that.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry the discussion comes up in so thin a House, but perhaps my sorrow brings joy to the Postmaster General.

Mr. FISHER. It may facilitate progress.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have brought in the resolutions at the earnest request of both sides, and I think they will meet with general public favour. The immediate increase that will be involved under the proposed Bill will be about as follows:

To inspectors	$5,100
To assistant inspectors	6,100
To superintendents of the railway mail service	3,800
To railway mail clerks	6,350
To clerks in city post offices, offices of the superintendents of the railway mail service and post office inspectors' offices	30,500
Total	$51,850

Mr. FOSTER. That covers both resolutions.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes. I may explain that we have post offices which are under the Civil Service Act, others which are called city staff offices, and then we have the rural offices. The offices under the Civil Service Act are those in which the postmasters and staff are appointed by the Governor in Council, and whose salaries are paid out of the parliamentary appropriations. The proposals now before us in the first resolution apply to such offices. In the city staff offices the postmasters and staff are appointed by the Postmaster General; they do not come under the Civil Service Act, and the salaries are paid out of the revenue of each particular office. Formerly, the postmaster was paid a lump sum, and he provided for the salaries of the clerks appointed, but it was found some years ago that the postmasters were paying their employees on the sweating system, and we intervened, with the result that certain city staff offices where the revenue had attained a considerable amount, and the postmasters were paying low salaries to their clerks and pocketing larger salaries than city postmasters, were taken over by the Postmaster General so that the clerks might be more generously treated. We gave to the postmaster a salary and we ourselves paid the salaries of the clerks; these salaries, up to $900, being the same as paid to clerks under the Civil Service Act. These city staff post offices are not important enough to be classified with the Civil Service post offices.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that these salaries are fixed by the department, and not by the Governor in Council?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, and paid out of the revenue of that particular office.

Mr. FOSTER. And the revenue turned in from such offices is the total revenue, less the salaries paid out?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Quite so.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it not time that system were changed? We ought to have the total revenues and the total expenditures of the post office on the same basis as the other departments.

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I agree with my hon. friend. I have discussed that point with the heads of the department, and later on during the session I may amend the Post Office Act in that direction.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very desirable.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In certain places where the revenue amounts to so much and where the population is so much, we have introduced a free delivery system, and we might make the same distinction in this case, and not leave to the whim of the postal authorities the payment of these postmasters out of the revenue of the particular post office.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I understand that cities of a certain size, I think 12,000 population, are entitled to free mail delivery.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The rule is 12,000, but in these days of intercommunication, I always shade it for cities between 10,000 and 12,000; that is, for letter-carriers' delivery.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Does that apply to towns as well as cities?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I see an announcement in a Brockville paper that Brockville is to have free mail delivery in the near future.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is the population?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). About 9,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have not heard of that myself.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Why should Brockville be favoured as against other towns of 10,000 or 12,000?

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is no discrimination whatever. I give letter carriers' delivery where any reasonable application is made. I will take that case up and inquire into it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Do the increases apply to all the employees of the post offices that are referred to in this resolution?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will tell my hon. friend at once to what offices the increases apply, and by elimination my hon. friend will find that an answer to his question. The city or staff offices are as follows: Charlottetown, Halifax, St. John, Fredericton, Quebec, Sherbrooke, Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, Peterborough, Toronto, Hamilton, Brantford, London, Windsor, Winnipeg, Brandon, Regina, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver, Victoria. The semi-staff offices are: Sydney, Moncton, Trois Rivières, St. Hyacinthe, Cornwall, Brockville, Belleville, Picton, Lindsay, Station 'D,' Toronto, St. Catharines, Chatham, Sarnia, Guelph, Berlin, Owen Sound, Port Arthur, Fort William, Portage la Prairie, Moosejaw, New Westminster, Nanaimo, Whitehorse, Dawson. I will give a comparative statement of the present scale and the proposed scale, for the outside service in the city post offices. Stampers and sorters at present receive from $500 to $600 a year, by annual increases of $50. This class is abolished. In the present class of fourth-class clerks, the salaries at present are from $500 to $700, by annual increases of $100. This class also is abolished Third-class clerks are at present divided into two grades, junior third and senior third. In the junior third class the salary at present is from $700 to $800 by annual increases of $50. Correspondingly, under the new scale there will be grade B, with salaries varying from $500 to $800 by annual increases of $100. In the senior third class the salaries at present range from $800 to $900 by annual increases of $50. Correspondingly under the proposed scale there will be a grade A of third class, with salaries ranging from $800 to $1,000 by annual increases of $50. In the class of junior second-class clerks, there is at present a junior second, with salaries ranging from $900 to $1,000 by annual increases of $50. Under the proposed scale there will be a corresponding grade B, with salaries varying from $1,000 to $1,200 by annual increases of $50. In the senior second class at present the salaries range from $1,000 to $1,200 by annual increases of $50. Correspondingly, in grade A of the second class it is proposed that the salaries shall vary from $1,200 to $1,400 by annual increases of $50. For first-class clerks the present scale is from $1,200 to $1,500, as the Postmaster General may determine. Under the proposed scale there will be a grade B, with salaries ranging from $1,400 to $1,600 by yearly increases of $50, and a grade A, with salaries ranging from $1,600 to $1,800 by yearly increases of $50. At present we have no chief clerks, but we propose to create a limited class of chief clerks to be appointed only as the revenue of the offices will permit, with salaries ranging from $1,800 to $2,100 by yearly increases of $50. Formerly many employees have received increases in their salaries by the good-will of their superior officers or the Postmaster General. I have framed this Bill so that in future they will be dealt with exactly as are the employees under the Civil Service Act. It will not be by the whim or the fancy of their superior officers or by political influences or by the whim of the Postmaster General that they will get the yearly increase. They will be entitled to it provided they pass the qualifying examination, and the promotion examination. Hon. gentlemen will see that all along there is an increase of $200 to the salary paid at present until the maximum is reached.

Our superintendent of city post offices receive to-day $1,800. In future they will receive $1,800, with an annual increase of $100 until they reach $2,500. In the case of Post Office Inspectors, Superintendants of Railway Mail Service and Money Order and Exchange Offices, the present scale for fourth-class clerks is from $500 to $700 by annual increase of $100. This class has been abolished. We have now third class comprising the junior third, who receive $700, with an annual increase of $50 up to $800, and the senior third with salaries from $800 to $900 by yearly increases of $50. Corresponding with the present scale, there will be Grade B with salaries of from $500 to $800 by increases of $100 per year. The committee will note that the large yearly increases apply only to the lower grades. We must help the man who starts until he reaches a decent salary. When he reaches $800 he gets a yearly increase of $50, but until then his annual increase is $100. There will be a Grade A in the third class in which the salaries will be from $800 to $1,000 by yearly increase of $50. There will also be a second class. To-day there is a junior second which gets $900 to $1,000 by annual increases of $50, and a senior second which is paid from $1,000 to $1,200, with an annual increase of $50. Corresponding to the present scale, there will be a Grade B with salaries of $1,000 to $1,200 by annual increase of $50 and Grade A, with $1,200 to $1,400, annual increase, $50. The first-class of that division, namely, the Post Office Inspectors, Superintendents of Railway Mail Service, and Money Order and Exchange Office, receive to-day $1,200 to $1,500. They will now receive, under the present scale, in Grade B, $1,400 to $1,600, by yearly increases of $50, and in Grade A, $1,600 to $1,800 with yearly increases of $50. There are no chief clerks in that branch, and they are not necessary, because there are only from six to twelve clerks employed in that special branch of the Post Office Department.

Now, I come to the railway mail clerks. Their present scale is $400 on appointment and $500 after six months with increases of $50 a year until they reach $1,200 plus their mileage. Under the proposed scale the railway mail clerks will receive on appointment $500, and go by annual increases of $100 to $800 per year. After that they will receive an annual increase of $50 until they reach their maximum $1,400. So that my hon. friends will see that the government is helping more liberally the man who starts. Instead of giving him an annual increase of $50, he gets an annual increase of $100 until he reaches $800, and he gets $500 immediately on his appointment, instead of waiting six months as at present. Then he receives $100 per year increase instead of $50, until he reaches $800, after which he receives an annual increase of $50 until he reaches $1,400, plus his mileage. That means that in many cases the railway clerks will receive salaries not far from $2,000 per year. Those who have a good run, say from Montreal to Toronto, or Ottawa to Toronto, will probably get more than $2,000 if you add their mileage.

Mr. DANIEL. How many years will it take to reach their maximum?

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend can compute that himself. A man is appointed at $500. He will reach $800 by annual increases of $100, and after that he will get an annual increase of $50 until he reaches $1,400. I am taking, not a radical, but a liberal step, in those increases. When I examine the very small increases in salaries that have been heretofore paid railway mail clerks, and clerks generally in the Civil Service, I find that I am quite liberal. My hon. friend must not lose sight of the fact that there are thousands of young men employed in banks and business offices, and insurance companies, who hardly get what the civil servant gets when he first enters our employ. I know many young men in banks who do not receive $600 a year. I know of some banks, very wealthy institutions, in which the young clerks start with salaries between $400 and $500 per year, whereas a railway mail clerk is appointed at $500.

Mr. DANIEL. At what age?

Mr. LEMIEUX. They are taken at the age of 20 or 21, and we can have them at 18 or 19. The younger they come the better for the service, and the better for themselves. $500 with a yearly increase of $100 until $800 is reached is not a bad salary for a young man. After all the man who does not want to fight his own way in the world and is satisfied to take an appointment in the railway mail service must be satisfied with that salary. He will reach $800 at an early age by yearly increases of $100. Then he will reach the sum of $1,400 by annual increases of $50, and you must add to that his mileage. Of course the mileage varies. We give to the old hands the best runs, and that is quite reasonable; but a man who is willing to do his duty, who is sober, who shows some intelligence and regard for his duties, will soon reach the maximum, and soon have a good run.

The present scale is quite a forward step and should receive the approbation of the House. It is very easy to take sides with clerks in the outside civil service. I am myself the son of an old civil servant who has been nearly 50 years in the service, and I have a great deal of sympathy with the clerks, inside or outside, but, after all, we must not exaggerate things, we must not forget that there are in the country many institutions of the highest standing where salaries lower than the scale proposed by my hon. colleague the Minister of Customs and myself are paid the employees. After all there is a certain stability in a government salary paid to a civil servant, and that is quite an item of difference in salaries paid as between a government and an ordinary institution. Therefore, under those circumstances, with the substantial increases that I gave this year, I think there should be general satisfaction. It is, of course, impossible to please every one, but I think I have dealt fairly with the outside service. The letter carriers have been exceedingly pleased with the substantial increase I gave them two years ago after a conference with both sides of the House. This year they knew this Bill would come before me. I met a deputation in Montreal the other day and they said to me: Mr. Lemieux we might also ask an increase, since you are giving a general increase, but we are satisfied with what you did for us two years ago. It is now the turn of the other clerks, and we shall not embarrass the department by our demands at this time. They did not say they would never come to me in the future, but this year they were satisfied not to make any further demand.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the minister explain why he grants increases of $100 a year to the new men from $500 to $800 while the men longer in the service who receive between $800 and $1,200 do not appear to have had any increase, and the men over $1,200 have had an additional increase of only $50 a year? What is the reason, beyond offering an inducement to them to come into the service?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The men who have been in the service for a great many years have already reached their maximum, $1,200, and it will take only three or four years for them to reach the new maximum of $1,400, the railway mail clerks, for instance, and the principle is the same with the other clerks. But does not my hon. friend believe with me that it is well to help the young man who goes into the service, to give him an inducement, so to speak, to become a good and efficient clerk. He receives $500. He cannot marry on that salary, he cannot found a home, but if he received $600 a year after, and $800 in three years' time, he could think of that very important event in his life. Therefore, we must help the man who is just beginning. But when he has reached $800 a mail clerk receives a larger mileage and in that way a greater remuneration.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What would the increase in mileage amount to?

Mr. LEMIEUX. We give them longer hours or hours of service which command a larger salary. A man on night duty is paid more than a man on day duty.

Mr. LALOR. Does the $500 man have to pass a civil service examination?

Mr. LEMIEUX. He has to pass qualifying examination. We have many difficulties in finding young men ready to pass the examination, say for mail clerks. To many the position is no attraction because it requires a certain amount of study, and in other cases young men have forgotten their school work, and they come into the service as labourers. They work for a certain period of time, five or six months, and then, having studied, and having learned their business, they can pass the examination. Then they are entered as regular mail clerks. I propose to insert a section in the Bill by which I will be authorized for the future to take young men, who have not passed these preliminary examinations, for a period of one year, but no longer; that is to partly overcome the difficulty of getting young men.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the Superannuation Act apply to railway mail clerks?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It applies to old clerks. Of course there is a movement on foot to reopen the question of superannuation. Speaking for myself only, I would view with sympathy a return to the old state of things. I believe that a man who devotes his life to the service of His Majesty's government should be provided for in his old age, and that superannuation should exist. Not very long ago a deputation met the Minister of Finance and laid before him the question of a return to the superannuation system. The question will be considered in due time by the government.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think this is the proper time to say something on the mileage question, as it is liable to be misunderstood by some of the members. I do not think that mileage should be considered in determining the salary at all. The majority of the clerks get a very small amount for mileage. There are a few runs, such as Montreal and other long runs, where they get $400 or $500 a year. But in order to do that, they have to work so much harder, and so many more hours, that in reality I think they save the department probably the use of another man. The country is saved somewhat in the salary of other extra men, because in order to make a large amount of mileage he has to work long hours and work hard. During the winter I had occasion to look into the average mileage. I took the run from Toronto to London and back, and that run pays a mileage of about $250 per year. That is what I would call an average run. When you consider that a man on that run has to pay his hotel and other expenses, and consider the time he is away from home, and the long hours he has to put in before he reaches his home again, I do not think that the question of mileage should be taken into consideration in determining the salary he is to get. I think it is no more than what he should get, in view of the inconvenience he suffers from being away from home, and the danger he runs. The scale of wage is no more than he would receive if he were working in a city post office, in some cases it is hardly as much. I think, even on the longer runs where they do get a little larger amount of mileage, we should not consider that against the man in determining his wages.

Another thing I want to speak about is this $500 class. I really think that the Postmaster General might raise that to $600. It has been a good many years since the present scale was framed, probably thirty years, when they got $400 on entry. Now there is no question that if $400 was considered an adequate salary at that time, $600 ought to be the least amount they should get to-day. Surely there must be a reason for raising the salaries and granting the increase that is proposed at the present time, or it would not be done; and I think the reason is sufficient to enable the men to benefit to a little greater extent than the Bill proposes. I am perfectly satisfied with the $200 increase. It averages up to about $200 increase all along the line. But what I contend is, that where a man has got to the top of his class, and has been here, we will say, for a few years, or has got near the top of his class, when the new order comes into effect increasing the scale by $200, he should then occupy the same position in the new class that he occupied in the old class; then he would receive the benefit of that $200 increase. Suppose he has two or three examinations to pass to get to the top of his class, I think he should be placed in the position in the new class which would bring him to the top of his class. I think in interpreting the arrangement in that way, justice would be done to these clerks, whereas in the other way I think there would be an injustice. This increase no doubt was due two years ago. The Postmaster General promised at that time that he would look into it, and do something for the mail clerks, and other postal clerks. Last session he was too busy to take it up. I think under the circumstances, if he could see his way clear to place these clerks in the same position under the new order of things, under the new classification, it would be right and just; I do not think there would be anything wrong in doing that, and the men then would receive what they are entitled to. Take a $50 increase, and take a man that is, we will say, near the top of his class under the old regulation, he has got to go along and work for four years to get the $200 increase for the last two or three years he has had to wait. If this increase were taken into consideration it would place him near the top. I hope the Postmaster General will view favourably the suggestions I have made.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have taken into consideration all the hon. gentleman has said; but I think that until the outside service in the larger post offices is brought under the Civil Service Act, we must be content with this. When they come under the Civil Service Act they will have a fair claim to ask what the Civil Service now obtains, that is to say, a flat increase. I have framed this Bill, I say it frankly, with a view to bringing the larger post offices, at some day not far distant, under the Civil Service Act. I think it is time we should take that step. The Bill is outlined, in respect to salaries, exactly in the same way as regards the various classes mentioned in the Civil Service Act.

Mr. LALOR. There is one feature of this Bill that I do not understand very well, and I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to it. Take the run from Goderich to Buffalo. The mail clerks upon that service are not permitted to remain in Buffalo over night, but must return to Goderich again in order to establish that their residence is in Goderich. I know cases where mail clerks who have been in the service of the government for many years, are compelled to comply with that requirement, at great inconvenience to themselves. Where the train service ends practically in Buffalo, they are compelled to return to Goderich in order to fulfil the requirement of residing in Goderich. Even though their family lives in Buffalo they have to return to Canada at night and remain in Canada, instead of remaining over night at Buffalo. It is a source of considerable inconvenience to them, and I think the regulation in that respect is rather harsh.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will look into this case. That matter has been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Stewart). If there is any hardship I will see that it is discontinued. If the committee will say 'carried,' and if my hon. friend has any further remarks to make, we will have a Bill based upon this resolution, and he will then have an opportunity of discussing the question.

Mr. LALOR. I just wanted to call the minister's attention to it.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

NEW ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 170) to incorporate the New Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—Mr. Gordon (Nipissing).

Mr. LANCASTER. I have offered an amendment to this Bill, and in discussing the matter with the hon. member in charge, who is not now present, he seems disposed to accept the amendment, but he said he would let me know later, but he did not. This is a very contentious matter, and as we will have to divide on the third reading anyway, I think it should be held over until Monday, when the whole day will be given to private Bills.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have no reason to suppose this is not a bona fide scheme, but if it is constructed as outlined on the map it is certainly an interprovincial road. Were the hon. member in charge of the Bill present, I would ask him to state if he believes it is a bona fide scheme, and that the entire line is to be constructed, and if he made such a statement I would raise no objection to the Bill in that respect. There is, however, an objection to the name of the proposed railway. One of the great railway corporations of Canada has financed a railway in Ontario under the name of the Ontario and Quebec railway, and the name assumed by this railway would lead to confusion. The legal gentleman in charge of the Bill has suggested that the name be changed to the New Ontario and Abitibi railway, but the promoter of the Bill not being present, we had better not go on with it now.

Progress reported.

GRAIN GROWERS' GRAIN COMPANY, LIMITED.

House in committee on Bill (No. 171) to incorporate the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited.

Section 14, subsection (b),

Mr. REID (Grenville). Why should a Grain Growers' Association want such extensive powers to provide electricity and all kinds of things that are mentioned in this clause.

Mr. RUTAN. The clause as amended is the standard clause used in all such Bills. The company had already these powers by letters patent from the province of Manitoba.

Mr. REID (Grenville). They did not have these powers under the Manitoba Act.

Mr. RUTAN. Yes, and much wider powers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My friend is under the impression that this company would take over the Manitoba charter.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They do not. All they take over is the property and franchise. The charter will lapse, and they ask a new charter from this parliament to enable them to acquire these assets.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It is quite evident to me that this Bill is to take over the Manitoba company, and get a Dominion charter with wider powers. Are they dealing in electricity at present?

Mr. RUTAN. I am not aware that they are, but they have the power to.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Will the hon. member in charge of this Bill tell me what business this Grain Growers' Association, now in existence under the the Manitoba charter, are in at present, and what they are doing?

Mr. RUTAN. So far they have been dealing in grain and the products of the farm. They have been in business some five years. They want power to increase their business, to enter into other lines, and to extend it outside of the province of Manitoba, and, therefore, they come here for a charter. It is necessary for them to have the same rights and powers as other companies if they are to engage in manufacturing or other industries.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. gentleman has not answered my question. I did not ask for an explanation of why they were coming to this parliament. What I asked was this. The Grain Growers' Association, I understand, is an incorporated company at the present time in the province of Manitoba, with certain powers under a charter obtained from the legislature of Manitoba. Will the hon. member tell me the capital of that company? Does it own any real estate? Has it any timber limits? Does it own any lands? Does it own any water-powers? Does it purchase grain and re-sell it? Where is its head office?

Mr. RUTAN. Its head office is in the city of Winnipeg. It has been buying and selling grain very largely for a number of years. If the hon. gentleman looks at the records of the grain business in Winnipeg, Port Arthur and Fort William, he will find that last year this company handled nearly half the grain in the country.

Mr. LANCASTER. Do they take delivery of that grain and re-sell it, or do they merely act as middlemen?

Mr. RUTAN. They do both.

Mr. LANCASTER. How much did they actually have delivered to them, and hold and sell again?

Mr. RUTAN. I cannot answer that question. I cannot say what the capital stock is. I did not expect that these questions would come up. The powers the company has under its Manitoba charter were stated the other evening.

Mr. KNOWLES. There is not the slightest doubt that this company is a very large purchaser and seller of grain; it is always in the market, and is probably the largest dealer in grain in the country. With regard to giving the company the right to deal in electric or other power——

Mr. REID (Grenville). Will the hon. gentleman please answer the few questions I asked: what is the capital stock, how much is paid in, and does the company own any water-power, timber limits or lands?

Mr. KNOWLES. I do not know that it owns any property, but I know that it is a very wealthy company. I do not live near enough to the head office to know what property the company owns. I know that it is a very large dealer in grain, and I have never yet heard its honesty or financial competency in the slightest way questioned. With regard to the question why it should be given such legislation as that in the clause referring to electric power, I think we will agree that it is in the interest of the public and of the great industry of agriculture in the western country that reliable and reputable men should be allowed to enter largely into general dealings with regard to grain, having their flour mills, elevators and things of that nature. We know that these things cannot be carried on without considerable power, whether water-power, steam-power or electric-power; and, as in the case of any concern that uses water or other power, they are not always able to estimate the exact amount they want to use, and, therefore, it would be in the interest of the public to make provision in this Bill by which they would be in a position to dispose of any surplus power which they may not have occasion to use, always remembering that it is under the control and the close supervision of the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada.

Mr. REID (Grenville). As far as I am concerned, I wish to do everything in the interest of the farmers, whether in Ontario or the west; but to my mind this Bill proposes to give to this company power by which a few men might injure many farmers by getting them to subscribe for stock and put their money in, and then not using it for the purposes for which it was put in. We have had many instances of that kind, and the very name of this association is likely to draw many farmers into it. There has been a company formed in Manitoba, I understand, called by the same name as this.

Mr. KNOWLES. Everybody knows the difference between the association and the company.

Mr. REID (Grenville). This is a company, but I understand that it is taking over the Grain Growers' Association.

Mr. KNOWLES. No, no.

Mr. RUTAN. I might inform the hon. member for Grenville that the name in this Bill is exactly the same as the name under which the company is working in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It is practically the Manitoba Company being taken over by this company. I would like to know the capital of the Manitoba Company, how much money has been invested in it, whether it owns property of any kind, and what are its assets.

Mr. RUTAN. It owns land in Winnipeg at present. This Bill was amended in the Private Bills Committee to enable the company to put up a building and rent the surplus floor space for other purposes and thus utilize its property. Whether it has property outside of Winnipeg I am unable to say. I will find out in a few minutes what the capital of the company is.

Mr. NESBITT. This company is only asking what several other companies have got from this House. It might go to the wall like any other corporation which we might charter, but there is no more danger in its case than in any other. This company is asking for wider privileges than an ordinary company, but not any wider than we have given other companies we have chartered here—two or three this year. So that it would be unwise to refuse this company the privileges we have granted others especially as we have taken the trouble of surrounding these privileges with all the safeguards possible under the Bill as amended. I was opposed to the Bill as it stood in the first place, but since it has been amended I think it is perfectly safe to grant this charter, and it would be unwise to refuse it.

Mr. LANCASTER. I cannot agree that there is no more danger with all these powers than if some of them were struck out. It seems to me that innocent farmers will be induced to invest in this company under the impression that it will only deal with the products of the farm, whereas nine-tenths of the powers given the company have nothing whatever to do with farming in the ordinary sense of the word or the handling of farm products. It is an omnibus company with power to deal in every sort of manufacturing and other business, which its title does not indicate, and consequently is in that way apt to mislead the ordinary farmer, who knows nothing about stock manipulating or stock jobbing operations.

Mr. RUTAN. For the information of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) I have obtained the figures he asked for. The old company have about $1,000,000 capital and $400,000 paid up. As to the fears expressed by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) it seems to me that the farmers in our Northwest know pretty well what they are investing in, and I cannot see why they should not have the same rights as men in any other line of business. I do not believe there is a farmer in the west who does not know all about the Grain Growers' Grain Company, and what benefit it has been to him the last four or five years in the way of marketing his crop and getting the best value for him out of it. Several times in Winnipeg I had occasion to be in the Grain Exchange and heard elevator and commission men enlarge very strongly on the power this company seemed to be wielding throughout the country. They appeared to look upon it as a competitor. The men on the exchange spoke of the patronage the Grain Growers' Grain Company were receiving, and they thought that company was a serious competitor. That is exactly what we want. We do not want any line of elevator people or grain men to have a monopoly of the grain business, and the people have as much right to form a company and help to make competition and get the value out of their products as lawyers, doctors, or merchants have to form associations to protect themselves. This company is only asking for powers which any one may obtain by letters patent, and which we, as a parliament, have no right to keep from them. I see no reason why the Bill should not pass.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. There is no disposition on this side of the House to block the passing of this Bill, and any remarks that have been made are with a view to safeguarding the public. If we adopted the name of the Grain Growers' Trading Company, then the title would show that they were grain growers, and that they were trading, and no one would be misled by solicitors for stock or in any other way.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I wish it distinctly understood that anything which I think is in the farmers' interest I will support. I do not wish to do anything against the wishes or interests of the farmers of the west or of any part of this country. The present name, however, I feel is misleading to the farmers, and it may mislead the farmers in the county I represent. Gentlemen whose names I see in this Bill are organizing grangers meetings all through Ontario, and it may be that at the same time they are soliciting stock for this company. In the west the Manitoba government could look after the interests of the people, and the objects of the company are better understood there, but now you are coming to the Dominion, and placing yourself in a position to solicit stock in Ontario.

Mr. NESBITT. They could any way.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Yes, but the farmers would not be so likely to go into the Manitoba Company as they would be with a Dominion company. I am quite willing to accept the suggestion of the Minister of Public Works that the name be changed, and the company be called the Grain Growers' Trading Company.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend is in error. I stated that the only difficulty I had with regard to the Bill was by reason of the name. Afterwards the hon. member in charge of the Bill declined to make a change in the name, and I said I did not see that any other name could be suggested which would not be free from objection if it were to indicate that the company was a company organized and managed by grain growers, and I understand that that was essential to them. Upon that I withdrew my objection to the name, and any suggestion as to change being made in the name.

Mr. REID (Grenville). They are forming grain growers associations throughout Ontario.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I rise to a point of order. Has not the name been settled in the first section?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Yes, the name has been settled under section 1, but as I understand the argument of the hon. member is that he will not have much objection to this particular clause if they do not insist on the title. I think his argument is applicable.

Mr. STAPLES. A lot of time seems to be taken up discussing the name of this company. It has been suggested that a company has been in operation in Manitoba for a number of years under the name of the Grain Growers' Grain Company. They are as jealous of that name as any other company operating in any province, which may come here for extended legislation as this company do. They may have vested interests in Manitoba, and while my colleagues appear to be very careful about the protection of the various farmers in other parts of the Dominion, that is their privilege and possibly their duty; but I do not think there is any possible danger in giving this grain company the name they have had, and under which they have operated for a number of years in Manitoba.

I cannot see any serious objection. But I do not think there is anything to be gained by simply holding up this particular legislation. No doubt the government have decided to give them that name. So far as I am concerned, coming from the province of Manitoba, a farmer myself, and having shipped some grain through the Grain Growers' Company, I do not see any serious objection to extending their legislation throughout the Dominion of Canada. I think other companies have been granted such privileges in Bills that have gone through this House. The other night we saw different companies given legislation by letters patent, and this company could have got this charter by letters patent, and thus saved the House some time, but they are getting it through a different channel. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the Bill going through.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is notice of a proposed amendment in subsection (j) of section 14, to read as follows:

That subsection (j) be struck out, and the following be inserted instead thereof:

Advance money to customers of the company notwithstanding the provisions of section 167 of the Company's Act, provided that in no case shall a sum exceeding $10,000 be advanced to a director of the company.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Is subsection (b) intended to give the company power to sell, and distribute electricity within a municipality?

Mr. RUTAN. Subject to a by-law of the municipality.

Mr. GRAHAM. This Bill was referred to by the Railway Committee to put in those protective clauses that were put in in Committee of the Whole. But the standard clauses of the Railway Committee controlling the sale of electricity are now in the amended Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LANCASTER. There still remains this objection, that this company under this section, is practically doing a beneficially insurance business. It seems to me we are going a long way in allowing the Grain Growers' Company, apparently a farmers' grain growing company, to go into the life insurance business.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The amendment as printed only allows for superannuation or annuities to officers and servants of the association. They cannot go outside of them. It is limited to officers and servants of the company, the same as banks and railway companies have obtained authority from parliament to grant superannuation.

On section 14, subsection (e),

Mr. LANCASTER. There should be some provision surely that anything they do under their railway authority should be under the same supervision as that which any other railway is subjected. If a railway company is carrying its freight part of the journey by water it is under the supervision of the Railway Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This company cannot build a railway for general transportation.

Mr. LANCASTER. But this company can do part of what a railway company does, and what that railway company does is under the Railway Commission. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works has forgotten it, but the other night I read the section of the Railway Act applicable to that point.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I looked at that afterwards, and I found that my hon. friend was right.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Railway Act provides that when a railway company is carrying goods by water its rates are under the supervision of the Railway Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But you have to build your railway first as a part of the system.

Mr. LANCASTER. True, but we are allowing the Grain Growers' Company to carry goods by water with no authority over them whatever while they are dealing in the same kind of transportation as other railway companies which are subject to the supervision of the Railway Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What control have we over the Midland line running steamers from Port Arthur and Fort William to Sarnia, and right down the St. Lawrence, or what control have we over the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company? The Board of Railway Commissioners has no control over their rates.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PAVEMENT IN FRONT OF GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS, WINNIPEG.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take the earliest opportunity of correcting an error, and I do it as a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER. It will have to be with the consent of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I informed the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Haggart) yesterday that orders had been given for the payment of an amount to the city of Winnipeg for pavements. I find that I was mistaken. I had recommended the matter to council and authority was obtained for the payments, but they had to be provided for by parliament. My hon. friend will find an amount in the supplementary estimates, and I have no doubt he will be glad to help me in getting these estimates through as quickly as possible.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in committee upon resolution to amend the Post Office Act.—Mr. Lemieux.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the nature of the examination provided for junior clerks upon entering the railway mail service?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have not before me the subject matter upon which the candidates are examined, but it is in the nature of the ordinary examination which civil servants must pass. There is a selection of subjects such as grammar, arithmetic, geography and literature. In Quebec the aspirants have the option of using both languages in the examination. The examinations are not very severe, but still we find it difficult to get the number of men which the service requires. The service is extending so much, with the opening of new routes, especially in the west, where the country is grid-ironed with new railway lines, that we have sometimes to take men who have not passed the examination. But, as I stated before six o'clock, I am making provision for the future in order to be within the law. Not to have to be resourceful in order to evade the law, and at the same time give the public the service required, I have a clause in the Bill which will be based upon this resolution, which will give the Postmaster General authority to employ men who have not yet passed their examination, but who may pass it within a year. Six months after having passed the preliminary examination, clerks, not only in the railway mail service but in the service generally, are subject to a promotion examination. They are examined on their special duties. A railway mail clerk would be subject to examination on his route, and on the map of the various railway lines connecting with the line upon which he travels. That is the gist of the examination which they pass.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). I am glad to observe that the prospective changes embodied in this resolution are in the right direction, and we are only too pleased to give the minister credit for them. My remarks will apply to the Post Office Act, and what I have to say will be with reference to the service west of the lakes. I will first refer to the letter carriers in the city of Winnipeg, and what I say with reference to the letter carriers, perhaps may apply also to other branches of the service. There, these humble servants of the post office are on meagre salaries. Their work is increasing every year, and under any circumstances, supposing you employ extra hands, still the increase in the business means more work for those who happen to be in the service.

We must remember, too, more especially in the city of Winnipeg and all through the west, rents are very much higher and are increasing every year; living is higher, fuel is more expensive. Many of these are married men; they live up practically to the full amount of their wage; there is very little prospect of promotion, and although we may say that there are those living in Winnipeg who would take their jobs for the same pay, that is not a fair statement because these men have had a training, and it is only after years of experience they become familiar with their work and with the district they serve. We have another minister who is a little more thoughtful of the people of the west than the Postmaster General, for on page 96 of the estimates we find that the Minister of Inland Revenue has this entry:

Provisional allowance of not more than $125 each to the officers in Manitoba and the provinces west thereof whose salaries do not exceed $1,000 per annum.

The officials of the Inland Revenue Department do not work any harder than those poor fellows who have to trudge the streets of Winnipeg in sometimes bitter weather. If you saw them with the loads they have to carry, you would think it would not be unkind for the Postmaster General to provide them with mules.

Mr. HENDERSON. Or automobiles.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). That would be better still. I call attention to the following statement in the report of the Civil Service Commission at page 28:

Before leaving this branch (the outside service) of their inquiries, your commissioners have to draw attention to the fact that while in the older provinces of the Dominion the struggle for existence is the lot of the average official, yet in the province of Manitoba and British Columbia, and in the Northwest provinces the struggle is intensified. With the long hard winters and the high prices charged for fuel, and also in consequence of the increased rentals caused by the great boom which has struck the northwest, your commissioners have had reported to them that the lot of the civil servant in that part of Canada is much more pitiable than that of the civil servant in the older provinces; and whatever may be the result of these inquiries, your commissioners earnestly commend to the attention of the government the condition of employees in Manitoba and the northwest.

I think that language applies more to the letter carriers than to any other class of persons in that province. The Minister of Agriculture was kind enough to say on the 29th of July, 1909:

I need not point out that the cost of living has immeasurably increased since that time (1857), that the work and responsibilities imposed upon the Civil Service of Canada have greatly increased, and that their relationship to, and standing in the community, has become so enlarged as to require that they shall have greater consideration in this year of grace 1909 than they had when Canada was a small, inconsiderable and cheap country in 1857.

I call the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that there is a great difference in the city of Winnipeg between the conditions in 1909 and in 1911, when these words were uttered. Sir William Mulock when Postmaster General had occasion to remark:

The duties of our railway mail clerks are onerous, responsible and hazardous, and with very rare exceptions have been performed with uniform cheerfulness, efficiency and fidelity. I feel fully warranted in saying that Canada has no more deserving and worthy officers than her railway mail clerks.

As applicable to all the civil servants in Winnipeg, not simply the letter carriers, I call attention to a letter signed by Mr. W. L. Ball, manager of the Eastern Townships Bank in Winnipeg, in which he says:

With reference to our conversation as to the cost of living here and in the east, I may say that our bank makes a special western allowance of $300 for each clerk we have in the west.

I support everything that has been proposed in favour of the mail clerks. They deserve every cent of the increase, and I believe the Postmaster General would have been justified in making the increase greater. Not only are their duties arduous, but they are thrust into a post of danger; scarcely a railway wreck but there is some poor mail clerk one of the victims, and it would be pretty hard to properly remunerate that phase of their employment. If the Postmaster General would amend this first resolution and make provision for not less than one hundred and fifty dollars a year extra living expenses for post office employees in Manitoba and the west, he will only be doing what is just and he will have the support not only of his own party friends, but of the members on this side of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I agree that the cost of living in the west is much higher than in the east, and of course the cost of living, generally speaking, has grown greater year by year for the last twenty years. The Post Office Department has recognized, just as has the Inland Revenue Department, the principle that a special provisional allowance should be paid to our railway mail clerks, letter carriers, and postal clerks generally in the west. Every year we take a vote in the estimates for that purpose. This provisional allowance is paid to post office employees commencing at Fort William and Port Arthur, and extending throughout Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. Employees in city post offices, including letter carriers, of course, employees in the post office inspectors' office and the office of the Superintendent of Railway Mail Clerks, whose salaries are $800 a year and under, are paid $15 per month or $180 a year provisional allowance. Those officials in the west get $180 per annum provisional allowance over the salaries paid in the east. Then, the provisional allowance to employees whose salaries are over $800 and under $900 is the amount required to make up a total of $980.

The allowance to employees whose salaries range from $900 to $1,200 a year is at the rate of 10 per cent of their salary. The allowance to employees whose salaries range from $1,200 to $1,320 is the difference between the salary and $1,320. The railway mail clerks are paid at the rate of $10 a month when the salary is less than $800 a year, and on salaries ranging from $800 to $1,200 the allowance is 10 per cent on their salary. That is a special provisional allowance paid to our postal clerks, letter carriers, clerks in city post offices, railway mail clerks in the west, and clerks employed in the offices of superintendents and inspectors. So that the increase is quite a substantial one, if we consider what increases have been given since 1896. I fully admit that some years ago, generally speaking, the salaries paid in the post offices, especially to the lower grade men, were a mere pittance. The lower grades in 1896 started at a minimum of $400, and went to a maximum of $800. In 1903, in Sir William Mulock's time, the minimum was increased to $500, and the maximum to $900, and under the proposed Act this maximum is being expanded to $1,000. Under the Act of 1896 the amount of yearly increase was only $40. This has been raised to $100. There is thus a material increase over the old conditions. Under the old Act a man would in ten years have a possibility of earning $5,800; under the proposed Act he can earn a total of $8,300, or an increase of $2,500, that is, 43 per cent of his salary. The second-class clerks in 1896 had a minimum of $900, and went up to $1,200. Under the proposed Act they will go up to $1,400, which gives them an increase of 11 per cent, or increased earnings of $1,250 in a period of 10 years. Under the old conditions a first-class clerk started at a minimum of $1,200, and went up by annual increases determined by the Postmaster General until he obtained a maximum of $1,500. Inasmuch as it depended upon the determination of the minister, there was no certainty of the increase being given, and a large number never received it. Under the proposed Act the $1,500 will be increased to $1,800, with a statutory increase of $50 per annum, instead of being subject to the whim or caprice of higher officials or even the will of the minister. This insures regular increases up to the maximum when a man deserves them, and gives an increase of 20 per cent of the maximum, making a difference in ten years of $2,250. The minimum of this class, formerly $1,200, has been raised to $1,400.

Mr. BRADBURY. What is the difference between the salaries allowed in the west and in the east?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The salaries themselves are not differentiated, but there is in favour of the west a provisional allowance ranging up to $180 or $200 a year. As regards the letter carriers, let me assure my hon. friend from Winnipeg that I have met several of them, and have received many communications from them during the course of this session, and generally speaking they are satisfied with the increase I gave them two sessions ago. At that time they received a very poor salary. Now they receive a minimum of $2.75 a day, plus in the west the $180 a year which I have mentioned. Besides, let us always bear in mind that much as we may sympathize with the men, and I do sincerely sympathize with them, as my hon. friend does, that they are certain of keeping their situations as long as they wish, they receive two uniforms a year from the department, including their footwear, and, in the large cities where we have tramway services, they get free transportation. This costs the government in Montreal about $8,000 a year, in Ottawa about $8,000, in Toronto about $10,000, in Winnipeg $8,000 or $9,000, and about the same rate in other cities of the west which have tramway services.

Mr. RUSSELL. Do the railway mail clerks get any uniform or footwear?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. RUSSELL. I want to make a plea for the railway mail clerk who, under the new schedule, enters the service at $500 whereas the postman enters at $600 or a little better, and gets his clothes and boots. I think it would be only fair to raise the minimum of the railway mail clerk to $600, so as not to ask them to start at a lower salary than the postmen. I think they are entitled to $600 a year to start with.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend must bear in mind that while the letter carriers receive a maximum of only $1,200, the railway mail clerks receive special treatment, getting a maximum of $1,400, plus their mileage. But I am ready to consider the question of clothing the railway mail clerks. A few days ago I received from a gentleman in Winnipeg—a good Canadian by the way and his views reflect my own—a comment to the effect that the American mail cars are splendidly equipped, beautifully painted, with the talismanic words 'United States Mail,' and the Star Spangled Banner and American Eagle blazoned on it, but if you look at a Canadian mail car, provided by our railway companies, to which we pay heavy subsidies, you will simply see the letters 'G.P.O.' inscribed on it, and sometimes nothing at all. You should, he said, urge our railway companies to give us postal cars equal to those supplied by the American companies, I replied that I thought his suggestion was very good, that we should give our mail cars a toilet equal to that enjoyed by the American cars, and equal to that given to the mail cars in every other country. I have noticed in France and Germany and England that the mail cars there are conspicuous by their external decorations. But coming to the employees inside, I admit that there is something in the suggestion of the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Russell) that perhaps our railway mail clerks should have a uniform. As regards the scale of salary, however, that is a question of policy for the government. It is not merely my own volition that I have to follow in the increases I submit to the committee, but the matter is one which pertains to the government as a whole, and we must take into consideration not only the opinion expressed by my hon. friend, but also what the public thinks about it, and what the administration of public affairs warrants. Let us not forget that besides the increases in salaries which we have given since a few years, we have also given to the public the benefit of many material decreases in postal rates. I shall not weary the House by recounting these decreases, but I think we have given the public very substantial decreases in postal rates, and we intend to follow the same progressive policy in the future. If the House will leave to my tender care the employees of the Post Office Department, the clerks will not regret it. They have been satisfied in the past with what increases I have obtained from parliament for them, and I think they will be in the future. Of course many would like a little more. That is only human nature. But we must stop at some point, and I think that on the whole the policy I have explained is in the right direction in so far as the resolutions I have submitted to the House are framed according to the Civil Service Act, and with the view of bringing the clerks in the large city post offices under the Act in the near future.

Mr. BRADBURY. I heartily concur in the legislation which the hon. the Postmaster General has submitted, but as regards the salaries of the officers in western Canada especially, I desire to point out that there is a greater difference between the conditions at Winnipeg and those in eastern cities than has been met by this legislation. A clerk in any occupation in the city of Winnipeg gets more salary today than he would in Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto, for doing the same work, and the extra allowance provided for letter carriers in Winnipeg does not make up the difference. The Winnipeg letter carriers are among the hardest worked officials of the government. Winnipeg is a very big city, the routes are long, and the mails to be carried are very heavy.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And many foreign settlements.

Mr. BRADBURY. They are a very efficient class of men and worthy of the best treatment. I believe that the Postmaster General is trying to do what is right. I believe he is trying to make legislation which will apply to all parts of the Dominion as fairly as possible, but there is a great difference between the wages in western Canada and in eastern Canada. What might be a fair salary in Ottawa, Toronto or Montreal, would not be considered at all adequate in Winnipeg. If you pay your letter carriers in Winnipeg only the same salary as you do in Ottawa or Montreal, I do not think you are treating them fairly and I do not think that the extra allowance will make up the difference, 10 per cent, I understand, is the basis of your extra allowance. I hold that the increased cost of living is much greater than ten per cent in the west over the cost in the east. These letter carriers have to be very intelligent, and the men who are doing that work in Winnipeg should command a higher salary than they are now doing. Of course, as the minister has pointed out, their position is permanent, but I do not think they come under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Under the Post Office Act.

Mr. BRADBURY. Are they entitled to superannuation?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The older men who were appointed before the Superannuation Act was abolished are, but not the others.

Mr. BRADBURY. Then there is no provision for these men after they have served as letter carriers for 15 or 20 years.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. BRADBURY. In view of that fact the government should at least give these men salaries equal to any they could command in the cities where they are employed, I fear this has not been done in Winnipeg. The minister knows well the increased cost of living in the west in comparison with the east, and must realize that the extra allowance to a man getting a salary less than $800 is not going to make up the difference between the salary he is getting and that which he would command in any other occupation in the city of Winnipeg. I would urge strongly that either the extra allowance or salaries be increased. Just a word about the mail clerks. I want to emphasize what the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Haggart) and other gentlemen have said about the mail clerk service.

There are no men in the employ of the government who are entitled to greater consideration than the men who take charge of the mails on railway trains. They endanger their lives every time they enter their cars and in addition it is a most unhealthy occupation. A mail clerk on the train impairs his health more than any other government official. I have been told by porters on Pullman cars that the average usefulness of a porter is less than 18 years, I presume owing to the motion of the car and the consequent injury to his health. If that is so, the mail clerk occupies just as unhealthy a position as the porter, and anything the Postmaster General has done for the mail clerks will be appreciated by the people of Canada. I believe he could go even further than he has done, and would still receive the support of every man who knows anything about the services rendered by these mail clerks. I would urge the minister to take the western part of Canada into consideration. He realizes that there is a great difference between the men performing these services in western Canada and all other government officials there; that they are entitled to greater pay proportionately than they receive in eastern Canada on account of the extra cost of living, and the extra work they have to do. In Winnipeg the post office officials are worked very hard, the city is growing very rapidly, and it sometimes taxes the ingenuity of the service to handle the mail matter that goes into that city. I would urge upon the minister to increase either the salaries or extra allowances of letter carriers in Winnipeg.

Mr. BRADBURY.

Mr. FRASER. I wish to endorse what has been said. The railway mail clerks of the east should also come in for some consideration if the minister contemplates an increase in pay to the mail clerks in the west. The railway mail clerk has very arduous duties, his quarters are very cramped and poorly ventilated, and all the conditions that he has to meet with tend to make his life rather a life of hardship. With all this he has a great deal of responsibility, having complete, and absolute control over all the matter in the mail car, registered mail and all other things of the kind. Besides that he literally takes his life in his hands every time he goes on the train. The railway mail clerks should receive the first consideration, because their duties are very hard, and even the post office clerks, I think, receive a very small salary to start on, $500. $400 twenty years ago was worth more than $500 or $600 to-day, and as the country progresses the government should increase the remuneration of their employees if they wish to keep up the standard of their service. The mail clerks and the post office employees have responsible duties which they perform generally very well. There are very few complaints against the post office in this country. Small payment means poor service in everything. The increase which has been made from $400 to $500 seems a very small one, and the government would find many sympathizers if they could see their way clear to raise the salaries of these people who are doing the hard work in the department. I am well aware that there are many soft snaps in the department where officials are paid relatively much higher salaries. To the railway mail clerks and post office clerks, who actually do hard work, more than $500 should be paid.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would ask the Postmaster General to try and place this salary limit a little higher. I am perfectly satisfied with the increase of $200, and I think the men will all be satisfied. It is a long time since the old scale was fixed and probably it will be a long time before this one will be changed. I think the Postmaster General should make the increase of $200 general all along the line, and should give the clerk entering the service $600 where he had $400 before, just as he has raised the $1,200 limit to $1,400. That, I think, would satisfy all concerned. I find that an increase of $50 a year amounted to 16 cents a day, or 4 per cent of a man's salary of $1,200. I consider that that increase is too small considering the increased cost of living. The poorer class of labouring men in Toronto are to-day getting 50 per cent to 75 per cent more than they got 10 or 15 years ago. This increase of 4 per cent seems to be hardly anything at all. A man in the service who is within two or three years of the top of his class will go on getting the regular increase to which he was entitled, and then he will have to work along three or four years more to get to the top of the new class, so he would have to be of a good age before he would get to the maximum of the new class. I think what I contended for this afternoon is nothing more than fair, that the increase should be general all along the line. Where a man is near the top of his class he should hold the same position in the new class with that increase of $200. I want to ask the Postmaster General if he can hold out any hope of increasing this scale?

Mr. LEMIEUX. While there is life there is hope. I have given a résumé of the policy of the government for the present year. I think the postal clerks, the mail carriers and the railway mail clerks have no fault to find with the increases I have given. Of course, as I said a moment ago, it is human nature to ask for more, but there must be a stopping point. We must advance progressively towards better salaries, we cannot expect to reach high water mark at once. All I can say is that I have taken into consideration the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, and in the future I shall certainly do my best to meet each case as it arises. Speaking about this provisional allowance for the west, although the cost of living is higher in the west, yet we must not forget that an additional sum of $15 a month, besides the salary paid to the clerk, is quite a bonus to the western clerks. Certainly they should be satisfied with that. A clerk receives $800 a year, and if he resides at Port Arthur, or Fort William, or Winnipeg, or any other point west of Lake Superior, he receives an additional sum of $180 a year. Certainly they cannot ask the Post Office Department to do more. The high cost of living is recognized, and we pay accordingly. My hon. friend says that $500 to begin with is a very small salary. Now I make an appeal to his common sense and his knowledge of business. Go to the city of Toronto, or the city of Ottawa, and you will find young men 18 or 20 years of age, unmarried, fresh from school or college, having received a fairly good education, though perhaps not a high education, and if they knock at the door of the Bank of Montreal here in Ottawa, or the Bank of Ottawa, or of any insurance company, what salary will they receive? Look at a young man in the Bank of Montreal as a clerk, with a nice dress, a high collar and nice cuffs, receiving the public with a smile behind the wicket, receiving dollars, and notes, and heaps of money from the public—what salary does he receive? Sometimes only $400 I have known cases in the best banks in the country where young clerks receive only $350. They consider the position very desirable, because they learn the business, and they come in contact with the business public. How are increases given in those banks? Are they given by the hundred, or by the two hundred? According to my knowledge they receive less than that. I know many clerks in the banks, married men, who would be glad to receive after ten or fifteen years a salary of $1,500. Now take the railway mail clerk. Of course he knows what risks he has to run on the railway trains, but he accepts those risks joyfully. We generally have more applications for the position than we can fill. After a few years, if they behave well, they receive increases in salary, and are afforded chances of promotion, and pass automatically from one class to another. The best men in the service to-day, the men who are the rock bottom of the Post Office Department, are men who came in at $500 or $400 a year. Take the case of George Ross, general post office superintendent for the whole Dominion. There is a man with twelve children, a Scotchman, with a French Canadian family.

An hon. MEMBER. No Irish?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No Irish in him except the wit, he is a very witty man. He worked his way up in the department until he became practically indispensable in the service. There is nothing to good for George Ross, in my estimation, because he knows the business from A to Z. He started at the beginning. Take the case of Mr. Gaboury, assistant postmaster at Montreal. There is a young man with a classical education, and who, for family reasons, accepted at first a very modest employment in the Montreal post office. He started at the beginning, and worked his way up until he became second only to Mr. Ross. Take the case of Mr. Green, the inspector in Quebec; take the case of the postmaster in Winnipeg. The best men in the west have all come from the east, because we were creating new districts in the west. They are all men who began at the very beginning, and worked their way up intelligently, courageously, until to-day they are receiving good salaries. But the clerk who has no ambition, who has no grit in him, will remain in his class, receiving his $50 increase, and will pester the minister, pester the members, both Grit and Tory, will pester the officials of the department, to get him a higher salary. Is not that a true picture of the existing evils in the service? The man who is willing to work, and fight his own way, to fight the battle of life bravely, that man will inevitably pass into the higher grades, and is bound to succeed. That is my experience.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am afraid I have been labouring under a delusion. I have been fighting for a class of men that the Postmaster General tells us does not exist. I was not aware until now that he was getting bank clerks to work in the railway mail service. I am surprised to hear it. There is a reason why banks employ such cheap labour. The young fellows they employ, as a rule, come from rich families whose parents can find nothing else for them to do, and who are glad to get them into some bank where they are satisfied to work for almost nothing.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Take a young man out of a high school in Ontario, who has received a very good education, and if there is no favouritism, no nepotism exercised in his favour, he will go to a bank, or an insurance company, and will be glad to take a position. They are not from rich families, far from it.

Mr. LANCASTER. They are serving an apprenticeship.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thought I was fighting for men who had reached the age of 21 or more, who had some responsibility in life, and who probably had families to provide for, or widowed mothers, or something like that. I did not know that the department could secure railway mail clerks enough at from $300 to $500 a year. If they take them at 18 years of age and can get all they need, I am afraid there will not be much room for me to argue on their behalf. But, I was under the impression that a man had to be of the age of 21 years to enter the service, that he had to pass an examination, and I thought that the department would probably require a man with some responsibility about him and with some sort of matured mind to take charge of a railway mail car. I thought that the responsibility of the position called for the engagement of men instead of boys. That is the reason I look upon the salary of $500 as being far too small. I was figuring that a responsible, intelligent man should really start at $600 and work his way up. I would ask the Postmaster General if he could find it in his heart now to amend his Bill so as to make the yearly increase, if it has to be a yearly increase, $100 instead of $50 all along the line, make it $100 up to $800, or, if he can do so, amend the Bill so as to make it $100 a year increase until they get to the top of their class, and apply it to all the men in the service who are receiving more than $800 a year up to $1,400. I think that is fair. If we cannot get the whole loaf we will have to be satisfied with a half, and I suppose we will have to be satisfied with anything we can get, but I would ask the Postmaster General if he could not see his way clear to amend the Bill so as to provide that railway mail clerks shall get $100 a year increase until they get to the top of their class, and postal clerks as well. That $100 yearly increase should be made general. When the minister considers that $50 is only 16 cents a day I think he will realize that twice 16 cents is not very much of an increase to these men who have been waiting three years for it. There is no question that if the inside service received their increase on account of the high cost of living, these other men have had to put up with the high cost of living as well. They were then entitled to an increase, and if they had received it at that time they would now have very nearly reached the top of their class. I ask the Postmaster General in all seriousness if he will not promise to make that amendment to the Act. I think I am asking only for what is fair. I am not here to boost salaries, I have the interests of the country as much at heart as anybody else, and I think I am asking for only what is just and fair. Will you promise it, Mr. Postmaster General, if you please?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not like to make promises that cannot be implemented.

Mr. RUSSELL. If you give your word I guarantee it will go through.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I know that my hon. friend is in earnest in his request, but the resolutions that are submitted to the House represent the policy of the government. As I have explained to the committee, these Bills will follow the lines of the Civil Service Act. We cannot change these increases. They will follow the increases in salaries in the corresponding classes of the inside service.

Mr. RUSSELL. How about the $150 flat increase to the Civil Service?

Mr. LEMIEUX. But these officers are not yet in the Civil Service. I said this afternoon that when the outside service, as is contemplated, is brought under the Civil Service Act, I can promise my hon. friend, if not a flat increase, at least a fair consideration of a flat increase, but I cannot say more than that.

Mr. RUSSELL. While the poor fellows who are in the outside service have the benefit of a minister such as we have at the head of the postal department, I think we should take advantage of the fact and increase the scale to what is right, because I am afraid that if they come under the Civil Service Act they will get into the hands of another minister, and they will have a poor chance for advancement. Let us try and fix this up before they come under the tender mercies of this other minister. I think that would be a fair thing to do.

Mr. BEATTIE. I have listened to the arguments of the railway mail clerks, but I think the best point was made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) who stated that the life of a conductor on a Pullman car is from 10 to 12 years. We all know that he rides on cushions in a beautiful palace car with springs, while the poor railway mail clerk has to ride in a rough box car without any springs at all. I would like to ask the minister if he knows what the average life of a railway mail clerk is.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have travelled with them day in and day out.

Mr. BEATTIE. If there is any truth in the statement that the life of a Pullman conductor is only ten or twelve years, I do not see how it would be possible for a railway mail clerk to get up to the maximum of his class if that time represents his working years, and I think that he should get the small increase that has been asked for on his behalf. I also think that the car should be improved. You might have that beautiful flag that I like so well painted upon the side of the car. It would be merely an act of justice to give more salary to the railway mail clerks. The railway mail clerks are a good class of men, and I am surprised at the statement that it is difficult to get good ones. I know that the railway mail clerks running in and out of London are first-class men, and I do not know where you can get better ones. The employees in the post office are not any better although those who occupy those positions are of a superior class. It should not be difficult to get good men to fill these places. I know that when the higher positions are to be filled it is not difficult to get men. They do not take men who have been in the post office service when they desire to fill these higher positions. I hope the Postmaster General will see his way clear to give these men the consideration to which they are entitled.

Mr. CARVELL. It is not very often that I address this House on the question of the Civil Service; in fact, I have never made any remark upon the subject, but once in my life. In my opinion there is no class of men who are paid so well as civil servants both in the inside and outside services. They are not giving anything like the service which is being given to the banks, insurance companies and commercial establishments, and I believe I am safe in saying that on the average they are receiving fifty per cent more salary than like ability and service would command in any other walk in life in Canada. Never a month goes by in this House that I do not hear members advocating an increase of salary for somebody. Why, we are granting salaries around the city of Ottawa that I am heartily glad my constituents do not know anything about. I do not send the blue-book containing the civil list home, because I do not want them to know anything about it. I perhaps feel a little bit sore about this question. It is some time since my hon. friends have recommended people for these positions, but when the time comes, if it ever does come in their lifetime, they will find that they will not have any difficulty in getting enough people to fill these positions at the salaries provided. The only difficulty now is to weed out from the great number of applicants the proper parties. I do not know that any minister will say that he has ever found any difficulty in finding men willing to take these positions. My experience is that they will apply for these positions, and you would think that they would be happy for the rest of their lives, but it won't be three months before they are back looking for an increase of salary. I believe we are responsible for that through giving in to them too much; there seems to be no man with stamina enough to get up and say: You are overpaid now. Railway mail clerks have been receiving perhaps less for their labour than do other classes of civil servants, but I think the minister has very well met the deficiency in the resolution before the House. While my hon. friend from Toronto no doubt speaks from the very best motives possible, I think he is a little unreasonable. You will find there will be no railway mail clerk resigning because he did not get a greater increase. I repeat that the civil servants of this country are paid fifty per cent more than any other class of labour of equal ability and equal service. I think we are granting clerks as much as they are entitled to, and as much as the taxpayers of Canada can afford.

Mr. EDWARDS. It was refreshing to hear the candid remark of the Postmaster General to the effect that if a man in the service, particularly the railway mail service, were to expect advancement he must have some grit in him. However, it was not any more refreshing than to hear the member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell), advocate anything in this House in the direction of lessened expenditure. That feature of the discussion this afternoon is one of the most remarkable things that has ever occurred in this House since confederation. Now, I believe there is a very great difference between a man on a railway train acting as mail clerk, and a man in the inside service or a bank clerk. We must in all fairness consider the responsibility of the position of the mail clerk, the dangers attendant on it, the long hours of labour, and the fact that for a good part of the time he is away from his family, while the inside civil servant or the bank clerk is enjoying the comforts of home. It seems to me that the minimum salary at which railway mail clerks commence is small. I would ask the Postmaster General if the retiring age is 65 years?

Mr. LEMIEUX. There are railway mail clerks who are in good health, and who are past that age limit: Under the old superannuation system, they can be superannuated when they reach the age of sixty or sixty-five, but that only applies to a few cases now. If they are in good health, they are not forced to resign.

Mr. EDWARDS. A man who has been a mail clerk for twenty years, and reaches the age of sixty-five years will not in my opinion, be in very good health. He may have been robust when he entered the service, but he will have his health pretty well shaken up by the time he reaches that age. Now, what the Post Office Department should do is, when railway mail clerks attain a certain age, put them in the inside service and let younger men get out on the road. If a man has efficiently served as railway mail clerk until he reaches the age of fifty-five, he should be given a position in the inside service where he would be able to experience the comforts of home life.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is just what happens in the service to-day.

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes, if a man has pull enough to get there.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is not a question of pull. I would be ashamed of myself if I took stock only in the pull that employees may have. The only reproach I receive is from men with pull who are disappointed in not getting what they wish. Not long ago Mr. Talbot, the Railway Mail Superintendant, at Quebec, who has been in the service for years, required assistance in his office, and I took a railway mail clerk, who had seen twenty years service, and put him in the position of Assistant Post Office Superintendant. He lost his mileage by accepting the position, and I had an order in council passed granting him the mileage he would have been entitled to had he kept his run. That man is perfectly satisfied, but other railway mail clerks, who are only thinking of the pull they could use with the minister, were very mad because I selected a gentleman who had been appointed under the old government. You cannot bluff the public that way; a man who has rendered faithful service is generally, and in my department always, first choice. I look to the men who have not simply fulfilled their duties with more or less efficiency, but men who have shown intelligence and love of their work, and I promote them, as in the case mentioned, without caring for what pull other men may have.

Mr. EDWARDS. My reason for mentioning 'pull' is because of the evidence I have in my own very county where political pull seems to be brought into play even in such a little matter as appointing a postmaster who gets $35 a year. About a week ago I called the attention of the Postmaster General to this case in my own county; the father was appointed postmaster, and for nine years his son had discharged the duties faithfully and satisfactorily, and when I asked that the son be appointed postmaster I am told that I should get a letter from the president of the Grit association of the county of Frontenac, and if I did so it would be done. Knowing the president of the Grit association, I spoke to him personally about the matter, and his reply was that it would probably take two or three weeks, as he had written to that part of the county to get the opinion of half a dozen or more people as to whether he should recommend the appointment of this man who, for nine years, had given satisfactory service, or whether he should recommend some one else.

That is the reason why it occurred to me that possibly a pull was necessary to a man to get promoted. Not only do the men who do service as mail clerks on the train have an unpleasant life, being deprived of many of the pleasures which other people have, but a comparatively small percentage of them live to say 55 years of age. It seems to me, speaking as a medical man, that their occupation must necessarily be a very unhealthy one, not only because of their cramped quarters in the mail car, but because of the constant shaking of the train, and every consideration should be given to these men. If I understand this resolution aright, the maximum salary is $1,400. This is as high as a man can expect to reach, no matter what his ability is. I do not see that a man has a great chance of making his way in the world, or is given very much encouragement at this rate. He starts at $500, and is allowed an annual increase of $100 until his salary reaches $800; that will take three years, and then he has $50 a year increase until it reaches $1,400. He will be 15 years in the service before he reaches the splendid salary of $1,400 a year, and there he stops. That is as high as he can go as far as that provision is concerned.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Plus his mileage.

Mr. EDWARDS. That makes a difference, but I think the minimum salary should be at least $600. I think the length of time for the annual increase of $100 should be lengthened from three years to five years at least.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I crave the indulgence of the committee in order that I may bring to the attention of the minister a subject to which I do not observe any reference in these resolutions. I understand that a deputation of postmasters from the towns and villages and country post offices waited on the minister last winter and urged upon him certain privileges and reforms, as well as something better in the way of remuneration. I want to emphasize my thorough accord with the request of these men. The country is indebted to the country postmaster to a very great extent, much more than to the men who are in the service in the cities. Not that I wish to make any comparisons, because comparisons are always odious; but the postmasters in the country, and in the towns and villages give services to the public for which they get no remuneration whatever from the public except their good-will, and in these days of high prices and high cost of living good-will will not go very far towards paying for a square meal or a barrel of flour. I want to urge on the Postmaster General the necessity of being more liberal in respect of the country end of his department, which I think is the largest end. I am satisfied that it is the end that gives him the most faithful service. When he is in bed sleeping the sleep of the just, the country postmaster is very often up waiting for the mail bag, and he really gets nothing for doing so. In view of the fact that the service has flourished as well as it has under the care of the present Postmaster General, I think that a little of the surplus in his department might go to ameliorate the condition of these men. I do not wish to detain the committee at any length on the subject, but I would like to hear the views of the Postmaster General while we are discussing this resolution, so that they may be a matter of record.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is true, that I met during the month of January, a large delegation of members of the House who were accompanied by members of the Association of Rural Postmasters. My hon. friend was not in the House at the time; I think he was ill; but several other members from that side of the House were present. I have in my hand the memorial submitted to me. It bears the signatures of many of the postmasters who were the officials of that association. I need not recite the various allegations of that memorial, because I think it was placed in 'Hansard' in February last. Amongst the requests made were the following: an increase in their salaries; larger light allowance; to be supplied individually with the annual report of the Post Office Department; to be supplied by the department with pencils, pens, inkstands, paper and other supplies needed in the post offices; and that instructions be given to the various newspaper offices in Canada to fold their newspapers in such a way as to facilitate the work of distribution in the various post offices. My hon. friend, who is a newspaper man, knows that sometimes, in order to rush the mailing of newspapers, they are sent without being folded, much to the inconvenience of the receiving postmaster. I answered the delegation that as regards their salaries I was quite willing within a reasonable time to consider favourably their demand. I reminded them that their minimum salary some eight years ago was only $12 a year; and that I raised that first to $25, and later to $35 a year. Of course, many of the postmasters in the rural districts receive much better salaries than that, but that is the fixed minimum. I believe the day is not distant when we can raise the minimum say to $50.

I need not come before the House with a Bill to raise that minimum because we can do it by order in council, and pay it out of the funds available in the department. As regards light allowance, whenever that increase is given to the rural postmaster, proportionately the light allowance will go up, as it did when I raised their salaries from $12 to $25, and from $25 to $35. As regards the supplies, postmasters receive special ink for stamping presses, they receive a stamping machine, some official paper for their returns and printed envelopes. If the Post Office Department should start the business of distributing supplies to something like 15,000 officers from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the polar circle to the boundary line, do you not believe that this would give rise to some very unsavoury payments, and that, with the best intentions in the world, money would be spent which ought not to be. I think after all, that the postmasters had better be paid in specie for what little supplies they require, and let them buy the supplies themselves. I would rather give them a little raise, and let them buy their own supplies than have the department keep a store. We have of course to supply the postmaster with bags, and the necessary office equipment, but I do not think it would be wise to keep a store. Although I have the greatest confidence possible in the gentleman who is in charge of the postal stores, Mr. Sydney Smith, one of the most able and obliging of officials in the service, I would not care to start a postal store for the 15,000 officers to whom paper, pencils, pens and ink would be distributed right and left. As regards blue-books the postmasters understand that their demand is out of question.

I told them that any of the postmasters who cared to see the annual report of the department might apply to the member or the minister, and he would get it. We send them the postal guide and in that they can get the information they require, but it would cost an enormous amount to distribute among 15,000 postmasters that bulky report—and for what reason? Many of them would not read it. That report contains details of expenditure which are of use to members of the House or specialists, but are not required by postmasters. However if any postmaster should require the annual report, I would be only too pleased to give it to him at his request.

My hon. friend states quite truly that the Post Office Department depends largely on the intelligence, integrity and fidelity of the rural postmasters for the service of His Majesty's mails, and I quite agree with him that in the near future we must yield to the reasonable request which they made when they came here in January last.

Mr. GOODEVE. In my constituency there is a very large mileage, and a number of these letter carriers employed, and I cordially endorse all that has been said regarding an increase of salary to them. I was somewhat surprised at the attitude taken and the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). To say that there are other men who would be glad to take the places of these men is not an answer to the claim that they should have a fair salary. There are always men ready to take another man's place, and that is a very unfair argument for refusing to pay a fair remuneration to the holders of the office. There is scarcely any position in life, no matter how inadequate may be the salary attached to it, which you will not find outsiders ready to take. While possibly down in his portion of the country these men were receiving fair wages for the labour they did, in our western country the cost of living is considerably higher, and that cost of living has gone up all over the country, so that what might have been a fair remuneration a number of years ago would not be at all fair to-day. I heartily endorse the argument of my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Haggart) with regard to our western country. The rapid development of that country has brought about a condition of affairs in which men are in some cases making very much more money than they could down east. It is apt to cause an unrest, an uneasiness among these men who feel, looking at their neighbours making larger sums of money, that their salaries look small. Therefore, it would probably tend to a better service along the lines suggested by the Postmaster General himself; there would be an esprit de corps, men would feel that they were being recognized and their good work appreciated and they would take a deeper interest in their work, and you would get a better class of service. I am glad that is the stand that is being taken, and I hope it will guide the Postmaster General in dealing with this question.

Mr. CROTHERS. I have a suggestion to make and I make it with a pretty strong hope that it will be adopted, because I have always found the Postmaster General willing to consider any reasonable proposition, and to do anything within the bounds of reason for the benefit of the public or to remedy a wrong. I would suggest that the increase of $100 a year proposed to be given from $500 to $800, should continue until the $1,400 is reached. That would take nine years. It would seem to me a man should reach the maximum of $1,400 in nine years. I rather find myself disagreeing with some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House because I pretty fully agree with the propositions made by the Postmaster General in these resolutions. I think he is making a very fair allowance for the services rendered.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The railway mail clerks and others will be satisfied to receive the increase proposed, and as occasion may arise, as it will in the future, I will certainly consider the requests made this evening by hon. members.

Mr. CROTHERS. Is this provision for the increases of $100 a year to $800 and $50 after that, in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. CROTHERS. I am glad the Postmaster General proposes to increase the salaries of the rural postmasters, but I do not think he has gone far enough, I do not know how many there are getting these very small salaries. I shall not ask anything like what the minimum salary should be, as it would be such a contrast, but just fancy a postmaster in a rural part of the country, in a little village where he is at the beck and call of every citizen in the neighbourhood, perhaps from six o'clock in the morning until nine o'clock at night for 312 days, getting $100. It seems a trifling sum for that service. They have been receiving only $35.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend must not forget that they receive at the same time a commission on the stamps sold, and of course many of these offices where the minimum is $35, do not earn the salary. For instance, the other day I opened an office at Bark Lake, in Argenteuil, for summer visitors. We had to advertise for the courier service and pay the courier, the office is open for four months and the postmaster receives $35 in addition to the commission on the stamps he sells. Where a postmaster is obliged to be on his feet for ten or twelve hours a day he receives much more than $35, and of course he has the commission on the stamps, and at such an office he receives mails at night and in the day time, for which there is an extra allowance, so they are not so badly treated. We all admit the salaries at some of the little country offices are very small, because these offices must be kept open at any cost, in order to give the public newspapers and letters. I quite agree that the fact of keeping an office open to the public, whether the postmaster is kept busy or not, should imply the payment of a decent salary, and I contemplate in the near future to give the rural postmasters another lift.

Mr. CROTHERS. Will the Postmaster General give me an idea of the additional income from the sale of stamps and from other sources, where the salary is only $35?

Mr. LEMIEUX. He receives 40 per cent on the sale of stamps, and besides, receives a fuel allowance and a light allowance. Many of those small country offices afford $500, $600 to $700 a year; it depends upon the business of the locality. But there are some offices where the business transacted does not amount yearly to $15, or even $10. But we must have an office there. Where there is a small settlement we must give them a mail service, and we pay the postmaster at least $35, plus whatever commission there is on the sale of stamps.

Mr. CROTHERS. The minister says we must have an office, and we must have a postmaster. That postmaster becomes a public servant, and he ought to be fairly remunerated for the service he renders. Now the postmaster, at these little country offices, is at the beck and call of every one from seven in the morning until nine at night. He sells $25 worth of stamps a year, which would give him $5 additional.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And about $15 extra as an allowance for fuel and light.

Mr. CROTHERS. That would be $60 for 312 days. I am not speaking of these little offices that are opened for the convenience of tourists in the summer time But I am not making an unreasonable request of the Postmaster General that, instead of making the minimum $50, he make it $60. That will only give a trifle of over $1 a week extra for six days' service. I think that is reasonable.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have to leave for home in a few minutes, and before I go I would like to make one more appeal to the Postmaster General. I know he would like to see me going home happy, and if he will promise to make that increase $100 a year instead of $50, and raise the minimum from $800 to $1,400, I would go home as happy as could be, and I know that there are hundreds of mail clerks throughout the country who would also be made happy. I want to say a word with reference to something that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) said a little while ago. It is probable he has seen some of the civil servants around Ottawa when he says they do not earn their money. But I know railway mail clerks who have to leave their homes at six o'clock in the morning and hurry off to get their trains, and who don't get back home again until ten at night. I think when a man puts in that number of hours he earns his pay pretty well.

Mr. CARVELL. Does the hon. gentleman know of railway mail clerks in Toronto who are performing a service like this every day in the week? Or is it only one day, and then he lays off for a few days?

Mr. RUSSELL. Would the hon. member expect any man to perform that service every day in the week?

Mr. CARVELL. I do not expect it. But my hon. friend is putting that forward as an argument, and one would infer from his argument that that was the case. I know that is not the case, because no man could stand it.

Mr. RUSSELL. If you divide the number of hours that man puts in throughout the week, he puts in over eight hours a day every day in the week. You can't expect him to go out every day and work 16 or 18 hours in the day. One word more. Won't the Postmaster General please, please grant that little request, and make that increase $100 instead of $50? Then I will sleep happy.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am very sorry, but if I were to grant his request which he makes so vehemently, though it might give him a happy sleep, it would give me a nightmare. Before framing this Bill, I consulted even some of the railway mail clerks. I had a visit the other day from one of the oldest of the mail clerks in the service, who declared himself perfectly satisfied with the provisions in the Bill. Why, Sir, some of the railway mail clerks, when they reach the maximum will be receiving the indemnity of a member of the House of Commons, with the mileage. Do not you think, Mr. Chairman, that it is going a little bevond the mark to insist that we should give them so much? I think they are well treated. I think to-morrow the railway mail clerks and the postal clerks will be satisfied. The work performed by a railway mail clerk, in my judgment, does not compare with that of the letter carriers, yet the letter carriers receive only $2.75 a day.

Mr. RUSSELL. They have regular hours, and the mail clerk does not.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The letter carrier has to keep walking up and down the streets, he has sometimes to go up two flights of stairs, and wait at the door, in good weather or bad weather. I think their case is a stronger case than that of the mail clerk. I do not minimize the services rendered by the railway mail clerks, but when we give them an increase of $200 over the maximum they have already had, they should be satisfied, and I think as a matter of fact they are satisfied.

Mr. CROSBY. The Postmaster General told us to leave this matter to his tender mercies. In so far as the Postmaster General personally is concerned, and as long as we have to have the government opposite I am quite willing that he should hold that position. Like many other hon. members on this side of the House I was struck with the statement of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). I have often thought I would like to see the hon. member for Carleton standing on a good solid foundation, and making a good solid argument on some honest, fair case; I believe he could do himself justice. I have heard him on a good many occasions when he has not had that advantage and he has always been able to put up a fair argument. I would like to have heard him a little over a year ago when we were passing $350,000 to distribute amongst the civil servants of Ottawa. I wonder where the hon. gentleman was on that occasion, and why he did not stand up and protest against it. I am sure he would have given us some information on an occasion of that kind, that he would have done himself justice and that he would have had a good many admirers in this House. I have nothing to say against a man getting all he can get in so far as salary is concerned, but I must express my regret that in place of the resolution we have before us to-night we have not had presented to us a proposition to place the outside service, and particularly the railway mail clerks, under the Civil Service Act. It would be a great advantage not only to the Postmaster General himself but to the old country, and to those who are engaged in that service. I would also like to say a word in connection with the argument that has been made here to-night in favour of an increase in the allowance to postmasters. I have called the attention of the Postmaster General to the case of a postmaster who has been in the service for 43 years, who keeps a post office in which a daily mail is received, and who only gets $30 a year. No allowance is made for rent for the building. He may make something on the sale of postage stamps, but that cannot amount to very much, and I am glad to hear to-night that the Postmaster General is soon to take this matter into his consideration. I hope my friend the postmaster to whom I have referred will live long enough to be able to participate in the increase which the Postmaster General is going to give these officials. I trust the minister will be able to meet the views of my hon. friend from Elgin and make it $60 if he can. With regard to letter carriers, we have two letter carriers in the city of Halifax who had the misfortune during the early winter to slip and become disabled. I understand that these letter carriers have not been paid during the time they were idle.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend might send me their names? Generally in these cases we pay them their time as if they had been at work provided they accompany their claim with the certificate of a doctor. The treasury board has to pass upon such claims, and the treasury board sits when it can. There is a heap of papers before the treasury board at present, and I think that these two cases are included in the recommendations which I have sent in. At all events, my hon. friend might send me their names.

Mr. CROSBY. I will be pleased to do that. It would be nothing but fair that a medical certificate should accompany any claim of the kind. I am glad to hear that the matter is under consideration. With regard to railway mail clerks, we have the statement of the Postmaster General very definitely that the government have come to the conclusion that they could not make the minimum salary more than $500. I regret that that is the case, but I will not take up the time of the committee upon the subject, as a good many arguments have been presented from this side of the House in support of the claim that this amount should be increased. Then, some rule has been made with regard to the age of postal clerks. As a matter of fact, the Postmaster General knows that there are not very many men 18 years of age in the railway mail service. Generally we find them from 20 years up. A very strong argument could be made to show why these men should receive more than $500. Five hundred dollars means $9 a week. Reference has been made to the high cost of living in the west, but the Postmaster General is arranging for reciprocity so that things will be very cheap in the west, and the west will be helped in that regard.

Mr. BRADBURY. How about reciprocity in the east?

Mr. CROSBY. It is not going to touch us very much down there. You are looking for cheap living in the west, and you are likely to get it. While 25 or 30 years ago a young man in Halifax could get a respectable boarding house for $3.50 or $4 a week, to-day a young man cannot get board and lodging in any respectable place in any city at less than $7 a week, therefore, we have a young man starting in the railway mail service with barely enough to pay his board. Some reference was made to young men starting in banks. There is no comparison at all, because a young man goes into a bank to learn the business. He learns how to water stock, and a great many other things, and perhaps in a short time he can go out, organize a merger, make money, and become rich, whereas the poor railway mail clerk will never make a merger unless he runs one car into another, loses his life, and leaves a widow and children unprovided for, because he cannot save much out of his $9 a week. That is the condition that the railway mail clerk faces every day, whereas the other man is exposed to no danger whatever. He has cuffs and collars, and a nice tie, and he meets nice people, and if he happens to be in the ladies branch where nobody but ladies are permitted to go he has pleasure all the day long. The banks, particularly in western Canada cannot get clerks, and they are bringing young men out from the old country and paying their passage. The other day I had the great pleasure of travelling with fifty young Irishmen who were coming out to the Canadian Bank of Commerce.

Mr. LANCASTER. Nothing too good for the Irish.

Mr. CROSBY. If there is anything good they are going to look after it. I was talking to these young men——

Mr. CARVELL. Will they learn to water stock?

Mr. CROSBY. If they get acquainted with my hon. friend he will be able to teach them something about that or about any other kind of stock. These young men had all their expenses paid, and they were starting at not less than $600 a year, and were learning a business besides. I am not an expert in physiognomy as I ought to be, I have learned most of what I know about it from looking at the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I should say that these young men were from eighteen years to twenty-one years, and they were starting out in a far better position than young Canadians could start in the post office service of the country. The banks are taking our money from the east to the west and they are sending our young men after it, but they don't stay in the banks out west, they go on farms and get rich and the first thing you know they are able to spend the winter in England. The reason you get good men in the east to fill these positions is that our farms are not very enticing, our manufacturing industries are not as great as we hope they will be, and our railway facilities are inadequate, especially in the maritime provinces, and there is lacking diversity of employment to keep our young men at home. We all know that the minimum of $500 is too small and that is admitted by the Postmaster General himself. But, now that he is proposing this resolution, he should urge on his colleagues to make the increase $100 a year until the maximum is reached. It does seem to me that with the knocking about a railway mail clerk gets on a train he has to be of pretty good stuff to live the fifteen years which entitles him to get the maximum under the proposal of the Postmaster General. When the Postmaster General spoke of a man getting promotion in the post office service if he had 'grit' enough in him, I take it that he did not mean grit in the sense we generally understand it, and I say this in case some of my friends over here who are less scrupulous than I am may use that expression against the Postmaster General when the elections come around. In view of the surplus of $750,000 in the Post Office Department, the Postmaster General should not be niggardly with his employees, and I am confident that if he uses his persuasive powers on his colleagues he can get them to assent to our proposition that the increase should be $100 per annum and should not be limited to $50 after the first three years. I trust that the Postmaster General will make provision in the Bill that the railway mail clerks, instead of having an increase of $100 a year for the first three years only, will have an increase of $100 a year until they reach the maximum of $1,400.

Mr. BRADBURY. I want to congratulate the Postmaster General on increasing the salaries of the smaller officers. I had the pleasure of attending the meeting held by the postmasters of the Dominion, and at that time, if I remember rightly, I drew the attention of the Postmaster General to the special conditions that exist in western Canada. Take my own county, for instance. It is a very large county, and we have not the advantages of good roads. It is a prairie country, and in rainy seasons the roads are very muddy, and the people who come for their mail leave the post office in a condition that it is worth almost all that the postmaster gets for the week to clean it out. I would like to impress on the Postmaster General that there is a great difference between the districts in Canada regarding the remuneration which a postmaster ought to get. In many cases it is a great sacrifice on the part of these people to keep the post office. The remuneration of the country postmasters in the country west of the lakes really ought to be more than $50 a year, though I appreciate the action of the Postmaster General in increasing it to that amount.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Not to $50, but to $35.

Mr. BRADBURY Well, I am disappointed, because I understood that this Bill was to increase it to $50. I felt satisfied that those representing the postmasters of the Dominion had made a good case.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I stated a moment ago that I was considering the question. It would not come under this Bill, because the postmasters do not come under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. BRADBURY. Perhaps it will suit my purpose to leave the question open, as it will give the Postmaster General an opportunity to deal with that phase of it which I am bringing to his attention. In addition to what I have said, a postmaster who keeps an office in an isolated situation in the province of Manitoba often has to entertain his neighbours who come to get their mail about meal time.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may say to my hon. friend that since I had that interview with the Association of Postmasters, and the members of the House, I have started to prepare a scale which the House may know of before the session is over.

Mr. BRADBURY. The postmasters also brought before the Postmaster General the question of supplies for the country post offices. That is a very small request. There are more supplies wasted here during the session than would perhaps supply half the post offices in Canada. I think the minister should provide supplies of that kind to the post offices, especially those that deal with registered letters, and things of that kind.

Mr. EDWARDS. I regret that I cannot see my way clear to add to the floral tributes which have been handed to the Postmaster General to-night, because I do not think the Post Office Department has any right to have a surplus of three-quarters of a million. I do not think there is any credit due to the head of that department for having such a surplus. Every cent of it comes directly out of the people, and should go back to the people in more efficient mail service. Therefore, I do not feel like throwing bouquets so long as there are people in my constituency, as the Postmaster General knows very well there are, who have to travel 5, 6, 7 or 8 miles for their mail. When the Postmaster General raises the salaries of the country postmasters I will throw my bouquets, but it is a little soon to do it now. The country people of Ontario are not getting a fair share of the post office revenue, and so long as that state of things exists, and people have to go down on their knees and beg facilities which should be granted to them without a moment's hesitation, and when there is a large surplus in the treasury, every member who represents a rural constituency should rise and make his protest.

Mr. SEXSMITH. I agree with my hon. friend from Frontenac that while we have a surplus of three-quarters of a million dollars many of the rural parts of Ontario are getting very poor service. In my riding there are places where there is a mail only every other day, and other places where there is a mail only twice a week. I made application for a daily mail, and I had good reason to believe that the hon. Postmaster General was going to grant it, but apparently there was not revenue enough to pay for the service, and we did not get it. If we are establishing rural mail delivery in many places, there are many others which are badly neglected; and if we have the money, there is no reason why we should not give the people better mail service. Another subject which my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Crothers) spoke of was the poorly paid postmasters in the rural parts of Ontario. $50 is absolutely nothing. In many offices, it will not pay to sweep them out. The minister says that while $35 is the minimum, the postmaster has a commission on the stamps he sells. But many of these offices where they serve many people with their mails, have a very small sale of stamps. In my county there are a couple of offices which are four miles from the village and which, while they handle the mails of four or five other offices for the accommodation of the people, have a very small sale of stamps because the people buy them in the village. I think $60 surely should be the minimum paid for any post office in the country. There is no reason why we should ask any one to keep a room for the postal accommodation of the people for less than that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am sure the Postmaster General can see that the best way out of the difficulty with the country postmasters is to increase rural free mail delivery. I am sure he will take into consideration the increase from $800 up to $1,400 at possibly $100 per year until the limit is reached if the Civil Service Act will allow it. Would he say when we are likely to have the railway mail clerks and those in the city post offices come under the Civil Service Act? Judging from the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and the minister himself, I would conclude that there are plenty of applicants; and if these applicants come under the Civil Service Commission, I am satisfied that the Postmaster General will be rid of a great deal of trouble anl have no difficulty in obtaining employees.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I could not tell exactly when the outside service in the larger post offices, such as Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, Quebec and Winnipeg will come under the Civil Service Act. In my judgment we should bring them under it as early as possible, and that is the view shared by other members of the government and of the House. But there are difficulties in the way which will have to be overcome. I hope that within a year or so I shall be able to put these large offices under the operation of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. KIDD. I quite agree with the hon. member for Frontenac, that when we have such a large surplus we should change in many places our mail delivery, and have the mails delivered twice a week or three times a week instead of once. There is nothing to boast of in a large surplus when we have such inefficient service, especially in the rural districts. Really $35 a year is scarcely sufficient to pay for cleaning out the post office room. The amount should be at least $100 or $2 a week. I have an application from the county of Carleton for a small section of rural mail delivery which I trust the minister will take into consideration and deal with favourably.

Mr. HENDERSON. I simply rise to say that I heartily endorse an increase for the small offices. I quite understand that the Postmaster General has in his mind to do something for these offices and purposes at an early date bringing the minimum up to $50. This country is big enough and rich enough to pay that. There is no reason why people living in the country should keep their houses open for the accommodation of their neighbours for the small sum of $50 and, perhaps, the minister's generosity will add something to that. I leave it in his hands and have no doubt he will be as fair as he can. With regard to railway mail clerks, they are, perhaps, entitled to more consideration than any other class in the service, owing to the more hazardous nature of their employment. I believe the Postmaster General has that idea fairly in his mind and is keeping that in view in arranging their salaries. With regard to the letter carriers, they are a class whom we do not have in my county, beyond a few rural mail deliveries which I believe are working very successfully. I am sorry that that system has not been further extended, but still I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion that the mail carriers are fairly well paid. We hear a great deal about the increased cost of living, particularly in the west, but it would be more accurate to speak of the increased extravagance of the people, and if we did that we would not have so many applications for increases in salary. The increased cost of living was one of those things that came about the time the Liberals came into power and a great deal is made of it. I trust that the Postmaster General will do justice, particularly to the smaller post offices; but there is a middle class of post offices in towns with a population of 1,200 or 2,000. In these the public are much more exacting than they were 20 or 25 years ago. For instance, if a postmaster were now to lock up the post office and go to dinner, as they used to do, the Postmaster General would probably receive a wire complaining of that, so that the postmaster is obliged to employ more help and more efficient help and he needs more revenue to do that. I hope the Postmaster General will do his best to assist this class of postmasters.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. The rural mail delivery system can be operated most properly and successfully in Prince Edward Island because that province is much more thickly settled in proportion to its area than any other in Canada, and I hope if this system is generally inaugurated we will have our full share of it. I also think the salaries to the rural postmasters are too small, the minimum should be increased from $35 to $50.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 216) to amend the Post Office Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

House in committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act by:

(a) changing the classification of the clerks in the city post offices, offices of the post office inspectors, office of superintendent of railway mail service, and in the money order and exchange offices by abolishing the stampers and sorters class and fourth class clerkships, and substituting therefor third class clerkships, ranging from $500 to $1,000, and divided into two classes known as third class 'A' and 'B';

(b) abolishing the junior and senior second class clerkships and substituting therefor classes 'A' and 'B' of the second class, and increasing the maximum of the class formerly known as junior second, and now known as class 'B,' to $1,200, and increasing the maximum of class 'A,' corresponding with the former senior class, to $1,400;

(c) dividing the first class clerkships into divisions 'A' and 'B' with maximum salaries of $1,800 and $1,600, respectively, and increasing the minimum of the first class clerkships from $1,200 to $1,400, and creating a new class of clerks, to be known as chief clerks in the city post offices, subject to certain restrictions;

(d) improving the position of office superintendents in city post offices, and changing what was formerly a fixed salary of $1,800 to a minimum of $1,800 and a maximum of $2,500;

(e) providing for the employment of temporary clerks in the above-named offices for a period of not more than one year, at a fixed salary of $500, and temporary helpers to meet the exigencies of the service, at a salary not exceeding $2.50 a day;

(f) increasing the salaries of certain inspectors, assistant inspectors and superintendents of railway mail service in recognition of years of service.—Mr. Lemieux.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We have discussed the two resolutions concurrently, but one is to amend the Civil Service Act, and the other to amend the Post Office Act.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 217) to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 11.47 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MONDAY, May 15, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 214) respecting the Sault St. Louis Light and Power Company.—Mr. Bickerdike.

Bill (No. 215) for the relief of William Francis Currie.—Mr. Pardee.

THE BAHAMAS AND CANADA.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he can give any information to the House as to the exact situation at the present time of the proposed negotiations between the Bahamas and Canada for admission to the confederation. It is stated in the press that papers have arrived at home, and that the matter is being taken up by the premier in London during his present visit.

Mr. FIELDING. There are really no negotiations whatever. We are aware from public discussion that the people of the Bahamas are interested in the matter, and it is not improbable that the question would arise in England and would be discussed between the Prime Minister and the authorities of the Colonial Office; but nothing official whatever has occurred on the subject.

PRIVATE BILLS.

NEW ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RAILWAY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 170) to incorporate the New Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—Mr. Gordon (Nipissing).

On section 7, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Lancaster.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When this Bill was last before the committee, my hon. friend from Lincoln was desirous of ascertaining the opinion of the Minister of Railways upon it. As the Minister of Railways is not able to be here this morning, he has left a memorandum with my hon. friend the Secretary of State in which he says that he sees no objection whatever to the Bill, as the gentlemen who are promoting it have given him the assurance that they intend to build the principal line proposed as well as the branches, and he is of opinion that the Bill ought to go through with an amendment changing the name to the New Ontario and Abitibi railway, so that it will not conflict with the name of another company already in existence.

Mr. LANCASTER. I must insist upon my amendment, because there is a very serious principle involved. The government and the House of course can take the responsibility of rejecting it. I cannot see any force in the minister's statement that he sees no harm in this Bill. It undertakes to incorporate three lines of railway, two of them 25 miles each in length to connect with the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, a provincially-owned and operated railway, with the assets of the province of Ontario involved in it and the taxation of the people of Ontario behind it, for the purpose of developing an undeveloped portion of the province. These two lines of railway provided for in clause (b) and clause (c) of this Bill, are purely local works, entirely within not only the province, but one electoral district of the province. The third line named in clause (a) is a line that, if it were going to be built, would have to have a Dominion charter; but the two other little lines ought not, under any circumstances, to be incorporated by this parliament. It would be in absolute conflict not only with the British North America Act, but with our own Railway Act, which provides in section 8 that a railway owned by any provincial government shall not be subject to Dominion legislation with respect to through traffic without the consent of such government.

The Ontario government sent a protest to our committee against our giving a charter to build the two twenty-five mile railways, which are to connect with the Ontario government railway now being operated and thus putting these two small lines under federal jurisdiction. If we do that our Board of Railway Commissioners cannot control the provincial line with which we connect these two little railways and the provincial Board cannot control these two little railways which we incorporate. Besides under the British North America Act we have no right to incorporate any railways which are entirely within one province unless we go the length of saying, for some special reason, that they are for the general advantage of Canada. No such declaration, however, is made in this Bill, and none such could be made because it would be utterly opposed to the facts. There is nothing to prevent these two small lines getting a charter from the province, and thus coming under the same jurisdiction as the line with which they propose to connect. I have been asked why in the railway committee I did not move to strike out these two clauses. But assuming that the company are going to build east and west and run across the boundary line into the province of Quebec to Lake Abitibi, I would not object to their having a Dominion charter in that case, because that would not be an unfair interference with provincial rights. Therefore, I moved an amendment that they should not be prevented building these two twenty-five mile branches, provided they first build their main line, 160 miles east and west, which is their only excuse for coming here. So that instead of moving to strike out these clauses, I moved that the company might be allowed to build these two short lines provided they first build the main line across into Quebec, which is their only excuse for coming to this parliament at all.

The Minister of Public Works says that the Department of Railways has been assured by the promoters of the Bill that they intend to build this line of railway mentioned in section (a) to connect with the Transcontinental. If that be the case, no harm can be done by saying: You shall do that before building these other two.

Hon. Wm. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). These two branches will connect with the National Transcontinental as well as with the Ontario and Timiskaming. Will he inform the committee how they will in any way interfere with the Timiskaming and Ontario any more than with the National Transcontinental?

Mr. LANCASTER. Clause (c) begins at the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario, runs northerly and easterly along the Abitibi river to a junction with the line described in paragraph (b), being a distance of twenty-five miles, and the line in paragraph (b) connects with the National Transcontinental.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does not that make one line connecting with the Transcontinental and running around to the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario?

Mr. LANCASTER. It would make a line connecting the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway with the Transcontinental railway if they are both built. But even so those two little lines are entirely within the province of Ontario, and within the one judicial district, and we have no right to charter them at all unless we take the responsibility of saying they are for the general advantage of Canada. But we do not say that, and it would be absurd to do so. The fact that these two lines, if built, would connect the National Transcontinental with the provincial railway does not give us jurisdiction. But because they want a Dominion charter, the company apply for a charter to build a road to run across into the province of Quebec to Lake Abitibi. The Minister of Railways implied by his statement the other night repeated by the Minister of Public Works to-day, that he had an assurance from the promoters of the Bill that the company are going to build that line of railway provided for in clause (a), which is an interprovincial railway and therefore should have a Dominion charter. If that is the case, what possible objection can there be to my amendment which simply provides that they shall be compelled to build that part of the railway before they build the two branch lines of 25 miles each, which are really the most outrageous interference with provincial rights in the sense of interfering not only with a provincially controlled but with a provincially owned railway, which is under the control of a different railway commission from our Board of Railway Commissioners. Without my amendment the assurance which the minister has received does not amount to a snap of the fingers.

Mr. NESBITT. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) has admirably argued his point, and surely he would now be willing to trust to the vote of the committee to see whether they think with him or against him. Let us have a vote and get rid of the Bill. I am not interested in the Bill in any way.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). I have just discovered that a great part of this proposed road is in my riding. It is unnecessary for me to tell the committee where I stand in regard to provincial rights, and the requirements for railways throughout New Ontario. The minitser says he has an assurance from the promoters that they are going to construct the proposed main line. The difference made by the amendment of the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara is that the amendment will compel them to build the main line first, while the statement of the promoters is that they will build the main line.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not first, they want to build them simultaneously.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). The amendment says they shall build it first, and the statement made to the Minister of Railways says simply they will build it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Where is the objection to letting them build simultaneously if they want to?

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). I know that the provincial government are opposed to this company receiving a charter from this parliament for the part of their line which is exclusively in Ontario, but if I had some assurance that the main line was going to be built, and that the project was not purely and simply a provincial matter, I would certainly favour the Bill, because I cannot see what harm it would do to the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway if this road connected both with the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario and with the National Transcontinental railway. If it opens up that country it will do great good to the people of that part. I also understand that one of the reasons for asking power to build one of the branch lines is that they want to connect some water-powers which they own with the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, and by that means, after having it completed, will be able to get their machinery and other plant into their water-powers. They should have applied to the provincial government for that right, there is no question about that. But if we are given a substantial assurance that they are going to build the main line, and you can hold them down to that assurance, I would certainly vote for the Bill because we require all the railways we can have in that northern country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I might read a letter, a copy of which has been placed in my hands from one of the promoters of the Bill to the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Gordon) who, I regret is unable to be present this morning. The letter reads:

NEW ONTARIO AND QUEBEC RAILWAY.
Toronto, May 13, 1911.

George Gordon, Esq., M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—As one of the promoters of this Bill, I desire to impress upon you that the objection which has been raised that the company should be incorporated by the provincial legislature is unfounded. It is absolutely necessary, as you will see from the map, that about twenty miles of the railway should be in the province of Quebec in order to get around Lake Abitibi. It is the intention to proceed with the construction of the railway as speedily as possible, and for that purpose the promoters desire to carry on the whole of the work, including that of the so-called branches, simultaneously.

Yours truly,
L. M. WOOD.

I do not know what stronger assurance one could have than that positive statement of what their intentions are.

Mr. LANCASTER. The letter contains a statement that they intend to do all this simultaneously. My motion is that they shall do part of the work, the part which is properly the subject of Dominion legislation, first. We know that in practice a railway in course of construction is not all proceeded with at the same time. There would be no wrench to the assurance they have given if they were required to proceed with the Dominion controlled part of the road before proceeding with the part that is purely a matter of provincial concern. Now I appeal to the Minister of Public Works as a business man. He has read here a letter; should not he put the effect of that letter in the bond where it will have some meaning and effect?—which is the very intention of my amendment. I discussed the form of this amendment with hon. members, and the draftsmanship is the result of that conference. I think the language is correct and adequate but, if it can be changed with advantage I do not object. If they are going to work on both these lines simultaneously we know, as practical men, that they do not have their derricks, their teams, their men at two points at the same time. Then why not provide that they shall begin with the Dominion railway before they begin with that part which, standing alone is a purely provincial work. They must begin somewhere, and if they begin on the twenty-five mile line and stop there—which I have not any doubt is their real intention——

Mr. EMMERSON. Had we not better knock it out altogether?

Mr. LANCASTER. No. I admit that clause (a) ought to be in the Bill. If they are going to build into the province of Quebec they have a perfect right to get a Dominion charter; but clauses (b) and (c) should not pass except with the qualification I suggest. Talk about 'assurance,' I do not want to be pernickity, as has been suggested, nor unduly uncharitable, but I want to be a little businesslike. Look at the names connected with this charter. The first is E. A. Wallberg. What does this government think of E. A. Wallberg, in view of the disclosures made on his contracts.

Mr. CARVELL. The Supreme court decided that he was all right.

Mr. LANCASTER. Oh, yes; the initials are all right. 'E. A.,' my children would probably say, were thoroughly respectable initals in view of the initials of their father's name. But it is the surname that is wrong, for proof of which I refer to the records of this House. The 'E. A.' is all right, but the 'Wallberg' is not.

Mr. CARVELL. Is not the hon. member (Mr. Lancaster) aware that the Supreme court has said that Mr. Wallberg is all right?

Mr. LANCASTER. I was speaking of what transpired in this House under the contracts Mr. Wallberg had. I have a list of them here. If the Minister of Public Works would show a disposition to be something of a business man where provincial rights are concerned, I would not trouble the House with this matter. But, he proposes to take the statement of the promoter of this Bill instead of putting the condition in the bond. He is going to take a mere letter which he knows, as a lawyer is not worth the paper it is written on, and cannot be enforced or dealt with in court. I have here a list of contracts by which this man had made thousands of dollars out of the people of the country—contracts with the Railway Department, with the Marine and Fisheries Department, and with others; a contractor working as close to the line as he dare, making all sorts of money out of the people of this country. And when this man seeks to go into the province of Ontario with a Dominion charter behind him and interfere with a railway owned and operated by the people, a provincial railway run by a business government, this government ought to establish reasonable, businesslike conditions in granting privileges. I think the more that is said on the subject the more reason there is why my amendment should carry.

Amendment (Mr. Lancaster) negatived.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In accordance with the suggestion of the Minister of Railways I would move that section 1 be amended so as to make the name of the company 'The New Ontario and Abitibi Railway Company.'

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). What is the reason for that?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is a company already chartered known as 'The Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.'

Mr. LANCASTER. Is not the effect of the minister's amendment to put this railway under an entirely provincial name?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. But the name given in this section might be confounded with that of 'The Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.' Lake Abitibi, I understand, is not wholly in the province of Ontario; there is part of it in the province of Quebec.

Mr. LANCASTER. The part that this railway runs to is in the province of Quebec. Why not, as I suggested to the Minister of Railways, leave out the word 'new'? The Timiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway is developing New Ontario—that is what it was built for. It does not make much difference what the name of a railway is in one sense, but if you are going to change this name why not call it 'The Ontario and Lake Abitibi Railway Company.'

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). Besides, the people in Northern Ontario object to the name 'New Ontario.' It is the same old Ontario.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I see; Northern Ontario will soon swing the rest of Ontario—that is the idea. I should be glad to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) I move that section (1) be amended so as to make the name read the 'Ontario and Abitibi Railway Company.'

Mr. LANCASTER. I am not objecting. But as I understand it the title of the Bill cannot be amended in committee. If the title is to be amended it should be on the third reading.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This only amends section 1 by changing the name.

Amendment (Mr. Pugsley) agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. WHITE moved that the Bill be now read the third time, and that its title be an Act to incorporate the Ontario and Abitibi Railway Company.

Mr. LANCASTER. Before the Bill is read a third time, I want formally to move my amendment, which has been discussed and turned down by the Committee of the Whole:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to add to section 7, as subsection 2, the following:—

The powers of construction granted by paragraphs (b) and (c) shall not be exercised until the line of railway authorized by paragraph (a) shall have been constructed to the respective junctions on that line to which the lines authorized by the said paragraphs (b) and (c) are to extend.

I just wish to say that in view of the provisions of the constitution with regard to provincial rights, in view of our own statute providing that we shall not interfere with government owned and operated railways in any province, in view of what I said a few moments ago and last week, and the week before, I want again to protest against the House passing the third reading of this Bill, and I warn the House that, if it does pass it, it will establish a very dangerous precedent. It is all very well for some people to say that it does not make any difference whether a railway is under the Dominion or under a province. It does make a difference, until the British North America Act is amended. I might join in petitioning the home government to amend that Act, and to place all railways under this jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament; but as the constitution stands to-day the provincial authorities have the sole right with regard to lines of railway wholly within the province; and in this case the province has a special right, recognized not only by the British North America Act, but by our own Dominion statute. In view of the fact that the lines of railway mentioned in subclauses (b) and (c) are to have connection with the provincially-owned and operated railway, this legislation is a most undue and unwarranted interference with provincial rights. Some of the other provinces, as well as the province of Ontario will be sorry in the future that this legislation has passed. We do not know when some other province may be struck at in the same way, and if we pass this Bill, as it stands to-day, we shall be making a bad precedent or else fish of one and flesh of another. The amendment I propose cannot hurt this charter if the company does what it promises to do. Under the circumstances, I ask the House to vote for the amendment, so that this improper interference with the province of Ontario will not be perpetrated.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Might I ask the Minister of Public Works what serious objection he has to this amendment?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The motion is that one part of this road shall be built first. Now, what the promoters say is that they want to proceed at different points upon all parts of the line as may be most convenient for them. This is the memorandum which has been left for me by the Minister of Railways:

Mr. LANCASTER

This railway runs twenty or twenty-five miles through Quebec (not one mile, as stated by Mr. Lancaster). There is, therefore, no doubt about the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament.

There is no reason for assuming that the Quebec part of the railroad will not be built or for questioning the good faith of the promoters. A glance at the map would show that the railroad must run through Quebec. The easterly portion serves the country south of Lake Abitibi, a country which has been surveyed by the Transcontinental and which is a very fine agricultural country. Lake Abitibi is fifty or sixty miles long and the easterly end of it extends ten or twelve miles into Quebec. The Transcontinental is to the north of Lake Abitibi and to get to it at the easterly end of Lake Abitibi it is necessary for the present railway to go through Quebec.

Mr. Lancaster's motion would have the effect of delaying the completion of the railway by about two years. It would take between two and three years to finish what is called the main line. If Mr. Lancaster's motion carried, it would mean, therefore, that the promoters could not commence the so-called branch lines for between two or three years, and it would then take perhaps two years to finish them.

The promoters are anxious to get the whole road built as soon as possible. They want to be able to commence at different points at the same time.

If the amendment of my hon. friend was carried, they could not strike a blow on any one of these branches until the portion mentioned in paragraph (a) was completed, which would take about two years. They must have in view the most convenient points to get in their supplies, and I understand that the construction of these branches is necessary in order to get in their supplies for the construction of the main line. It seems to me unreasonable that we should say what part of this road should be built first. If parliament is going to incorporate the company at all, surely it ought not to hamper them by saying that they shall first build one part of the line, which will take two years to build, and must not touch any other part of the line until that is completed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Can the minister give any reason why they ought not to go to the local legislature for a charter to build the two branch lines?

Mr. PUGSLEY. When those lines are completed they will all be parts of one system of railway. One portion of the line could only be authorized by this parliament, because it extends into the province of Quebec. Does not my hon. friend see how inconvenient it would be for the railway company to have two charters, placing one portion of its system under the jurisdiction of the province, and another portion under the jurisdiction of the Dominion? It would be under the control of two Boards of Railway Commissioners, and be subject to two jurisdictions. It would be entirely inconvenient, and I can see no possibility that any public interest could be served by putting the company in that position.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman is well aware that the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario is a provincially-owned railway, and these lines are to connect with it. This company is asking a charter apparently with the sole object of having Dominion authority to build branch lines as well as a main line connecting with the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario. Would it not be reasonable to say that, so far as the branch lines are concerned, they are a matter for the province to deal with. The provincial government are opposed to the Dominion granting this charter, and their interests should be given some consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was all thoroughly threshed out in the committee.

Mr. BLAIN. When does the hon. minister expect that this road will be begun and completed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have no personal knowledge, but I have the assurance forwarded to me through my colleague, the Minister of Railways, from the promoters, that they are acting bona fide and intend proceeding as rapidly as possible with the construction of the whole system. We have also the assurance of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Gordon) that the promoters are acting in good faith. All these assurances had weight with the special committee which dealt with this matter, and ought to have weight with the House.

Mr. ARTHURS. Is the minister aware that any application has been made to this government for a subsidy for any part of these lines, or the whole?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not aware of any.

Mr. ARTHURS. The reason I ask is this: The Ontario government has built the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario, of which these branch lines will be practically feeders. The Timiskaming and Northern Ontario was built absolutely without any subsidy from this government, and it would be unfair to assist any company in building lines, which should be practically branch lines of the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario, by giving this company Dominion subsidies.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would my hon. friend explain why?

Amendment negatived on division; motion agreed to; Bill read the third time.

Mr. PUGSLEY moved that the Bill do now pass, and that the name of the company be changed to that of the Ontario and Abitibi Railway Companv.

Motion agreed to, and Bill passed.

REVILLON FRERES TRADING COMPANY, LIMITED.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 158) to incorporate Revillon Frères Trading Company, Limited.—Mr. Devlin.

On section 8: description of property and assets transferred.

Mr. NESBITT. Mr. Chairman, you have some amendments to the Bill, have you not?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There do not appear to be any proposed amendments to this section.

Mr. FIELDING. I understand that the objection has been met by a recital which has been placed on the notice paper to make the matter clearer. With that recital, section 8, I understand, will be quite clear.

On section 10,

The majority of the directors of the company need not be residents of Canada nor subjects of His Majesty, provided, however, that at least two of such directors shall have these qualifications and a minority of the directors, being non-residents and not more than two in number, may vote by proxy at meetings of the directors.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There are some proposed amendments. The law clerk has attached to the Bill a memorandum in regard to section 10 which I will read:

Section 127 of the Company's Act, which requires that the majority of directors of the company shall be residents in Canada and subjects of His Majesty, does not apply to this company. (See clause 12). In the third line of clause 10, the words 'of such' are ambiguous. Probably any two directors are meant, and the words 'of such' should be struck out. The last two lines of the clause as amended are either ambiguous or not what is intended. The matter has been explained to Mr. Miller, chairman of the Banking Committee. I would suggest the following as clause 10 of the Bill as covering what is apparently intended:

10. At least two directors shall be residents of Canada and subjects of His Majesty. Two non-resident directors may vote by proxy at meetings of directors.

(Sgd.) A. H. O'BRIEN, Law Clerk.

Mr. FOSTER. Just what is the difference between this and the company's Act requirement?

Mr. FIELDING. Under the company's Act the majority must be British subjects. This is a company with an organization already established in Paris, and probably it would not be possible to apply the company's Act to it. This firm has been established in Paris and has been operating throughout the world for a long time, but it is a French firm.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to require a pretty good reason why the company's Act should be departed from. I do not quite understand from what the Minister of Finance says why it could not be so arranged that the majority would be British subjects.

Mr. BARKER. The proprietary interest in this company is really in France. Revillon Bros. are a French firm who started a company here to carry on business in Canada. By some mistake made in the chartering they found that they could not really incorporate themselves and the business has been going on for some years. This Act is intended to properly constitute and organize the company, it being thoroughly well known that the proprietary interest is in old France. But they propose to have an incorporation here with at least two directors resident in the province of Quebec. I would suggest, however, that if there is no danger of interfering with the Bill, we allow it to stand for another day. I was asked by the committee to take some part in revising the Bill and I did so, but since then there have been other words introduced by the law clerk and I would like, if I am to have any responsibility in regard to it, to have an opportunity of looking at them. It is very important that this Bill should be free from blunders. They have twice attempted to put themselves right, and while no doubt the law clerk may be perfectly correct in his wording, I would prefer to let it stand until the next meeting.

Mr. DEVLIN. We have tried to follow as closely as possible the wording of section 9 of the Act to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company. As the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) has pointed out, this Bill presently arises through a misunderstanding in the incorporation of the company in the first instance. Revillon Brothers sought incorporation by letters patent, and were incorporated as Revillon Brothers, Limited, and in the letters patent they are also called Revillon Frères à Responsabilité Limitée. They were also incorporated by Act of Parliament under their letters patent, but they could not organize in any shape or form, so the attorneys in charge of the present Bill have made out the Act which is now before parliament in order to regulate the whole thing, and I think that if possible it would be well for the committee to leave the clause as originally suggested, as it would save a great deal more trouble than trying to right matters here.

Mr. FIELDING. I think my hon. friend may accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker). The words added by the law clerk are probably correct, but I know that words added without much consultation in that way are sometimes found to be otherwise. This firm is of world wide fame and of the highest reputation and standing, and I am sure there is nothing in the Bill but what is there for good purposes.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think there is any objection to the matter being made satisfactory. It was the desire of the committee to meet the wishes of the promoters.

Section 10 allowed to stand.

Progress reported.

CONTINENTAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA.

House in committee on Bill (No. 196) to incorporate the Continental Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Molloy.

On section 7,

Mr. BLAIN. How far has the government control over the rates of insurance?

Mr. FIELDING. There is no such control—competition.

Mr. BLAIN. I think this question of rates should receive some consideration by the Finance Department. We are chartering companies every day giving them the right to insure plate glass. The government should have some general control over the rates.

Mr. FIELDING. The suggestion of my hon. friend is worthy of consideration; but I do not think that up to the present time abuses have been brought to our notice that would call for the intervention of the government.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest to the promoter of the Bill that before the word 'subscribed' in this section the words 'bona fide' be inserted.

Mr. FIELDING. Does that add anything to it?

Mr. FOSTER. I think so. At least, the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) thought it added so much that in his outline of the new Banking Bill the word 'bona fide' was placed. The subscription might be a fake subscription, as was actually the case in the Farmers' Bank.

Mr. FIELDING. I have no objection to the insertion of the words. They would not do any harm.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 7 as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RICHELIEU AND ONTARIO NAVIGATION COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 192) to provide for increasing the capital stock of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—Mr. Bickerdike.

On motion to report the Bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Might I ask the promoter of the Bill to give us some little idea of the reason for asking for this increase in capital?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. The reason is that several companies are getting together. Lord Furness is at the head of this company and wants to invest a few more million dollars in Canada, and we think this a splendid opportunity——

Mr. ARMSTRONG. This is in preparation for a large merger?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought mergers were tabooed under the present regime.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Only the name.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the promoter of the Bill made any investigation to see whether or not we are likely to have a repetition of such results as those of the cement merger?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. This is not at all on the same line. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company are taking over the Northern Navigation Company and the Inland Navigation Company and are about to acquire other companies as well. They have not sufficient capital stock to take them all over and simply ask for authority to make new issues.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. All right, we will take your word for it.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BOILER FLUE CLEANER AND SUPPLY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 187) respecting a patent of the Boiler Flue Cleaner and Supply Company, Limited.—Mr. Clarke (Essex).

Mr. FOSTER. We ought to have from the Minister of Agriculture an explanation of why this legislation is necessary. We should like to know that he approves it.

Mr. FISHER. I cannot give the details, but before the Senate Committee the deputy commissioner appeared and went into the matter, and he reported to me that there was no objection to it.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

TRUSSED CONCRETE STEEL COMPANY OF CANADA.

House in committee on Bill (No. 188) to confer on the commissioner of patents certain powers for the relief of the Trussed Concrete Steel Company of Canada, Limited.—Mr. Clarke (Essex).

Mr. FISHER. The reasons for this Bill are set out in the preamble. The case is peculiar. This concern has a company in Michigan and also one in Canada. They obtained a patent in the United States. The head office in Michigan thought the Canadian office was looking after the patent in Canada and the Canadian office thought the Michigan office was attending to the matter. The time expired during which they had a right to obtain a patent. The Bill was before the Senate Committee, the deputy commissioner reported to me that there was no objection.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MUNDERLOH AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

House in committee on Bill (No. 203) respecting certain patents of Munderloh and Company, Limited.—Mr. Rivet.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the explanation of this?

Mr. FISHER. The same as that of the Boiler Flue Cleaner and Supply Company, The first term of the patent expired and they desire to have it extended for a second term. The matter has been before the Senate.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CHATHAM, WALLACEBURG AND LAKE ERIE RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 206) respecting the Chatham, Wallaceburg and Lake Erie Railway Company.—Mr. Gordon (Kent).

On the preamble,

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the extension of time granted to this company?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (reading):

The said company may, within two years after the passing of this Act, commence the construction of its railway and expend fifteen per cent of the amount of its capital stock thereon, and may, within five years after the passing of this Act, complete the said railway and put it in operation; and if, within the said periods respectively, the said railway is not commenced and such expenditure is not so made, or the said railway is not completed and put in operation, the powers of construction conferred upon the said company by parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said railway as then remains uncompleted.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is the promoter of the Bill present? Could he give us any assurance that they are going on with it? My reason for asking is that there is another company that is considering extending in that direction, and I merely want to get an assurance from the promoters of the Bill that they intend to carry out the instructions contained in that clause.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I would say to my hon. friend (Mr. Armstrong) that the promoter of the Bill will not be back again before the adjournment, and, therefore, I do not think there is any one who could give the assurance which the hon. gentleman asks. From my knowledge of the road I know they are very desirous of making the extension, but beyond that I cannot go. This is a road which, I am sure, my hon. friend will be very glad to get. They have a line running from Wallaceburg to Lake Erie and it is well equipped.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I may say that in so far as Petrolea is concerned, the people there are interested in this road and anxious to have it. But, there is another company that is extending in the same direction. I was anxious to know whether these men intended to proceed with the work that would be necessary.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

At one o'clock, the House took recess.

House resumed at three o'clock.

RELIEF OF GERTRUDE MARY GRANTHAM.

Bill (No. 200) for the relief of Gertrude Mary Grantham.—Mr. Martin (Regina).

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not consider that I am charged with any greater responsibility than each other member of this House in respect to Bills for divorce, though I generally look over the evidence when these Bills come to this House. In the case of this particular Bill my attention was specially drawn to the circumstances from the fact that, as I understood it, the Private Bills Committee felt considerable hesitation as to reporting the Bill. At the first sitting, at any rate, when it was considered by that committee, the decision to hold it over for further consideration was made instead of the usual course of reporting it being followed. On reading the evidence, I must say that I was not astonished that the Private Bills Committee should have felt considerable hesitation in the matter, because, speaking for myself, after having read the evidence, I think this case is certainly going as far in the way of granting a divorce without there being any distinct evidence of any particular or specific act of adultery as any case that has ever come under my notice. I want to call the attention of the members of the committee to what the evidence exactly is, and to all that there is in the way of evidence. The application was not opposed by the husband. It is the wife's application based on the usual grounds. The evidence in support of the application consists of the testimony of three witnesses—the wife, the family doctor and the wife's father; that is all. No one of them speaks of anything within his or her own knowledge, but each speaks of occasions when the husband made to him or her certain admissions or statements in regard to his conduct. Without further preface I want to read to the committee exactly what each one of these witnesses says, and that is all the evidence presented here, upon which this Bill is supported. The wife was the first witness examined. She was not cross-examined at all, but was merely examined by her own counsel; and in reading the evidence I ask the attention of the committee to the form in which the questions are put, that the committee may consider to what extent these statements were the statements of the witness, the wife herself, and to what extent they were suggestions made to her by her own counsel. After the usual preliminary inquiries and the establishing of the marriage, which took place in 1898, and the statement that the husband and wife had lived for some years in the city of New York, the counsel says:

Q. You lived with your husband in Toronto for some time?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you continue to hear stories about his infidelity?—A. Yes.

Q. His going about with other women and cohabiting with them?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you finally challenge him about it?—A. Yes, he told me.

Q. What did he tell you?—A. He told me about a certain woman living in Buffalo.

Q. Do you know her name?—A. No, I do not quite remember her name.

Q. What did he tell you?—A. He said he met her at hotels.

Q. Slept with her, do you mean?—A. Yes.

Q. Cohabiting with her?—A. Yes.

That is the wife's testimony. The next is the family doctor:

Q. Did you attend Mr. Grantham at his home while he was living with his wife or while they were living in the same house together?—A. Yes, on Balmoral avenue.

Q. Are you able to state to the chairman and members of the committee what his habits were as to sexual relations with women?—A. Yes. I think he had very free sexual relations with other women than his wife.

By Hon. Mr. Jones:

Q. You think that?—A. I know it from his own statements to me.

Q. He said so to you?—A. Yes, many times.

Finally, the evidence of the wife's father:

Q. Did you have any talks with Grantham about his faithfulness or unfaithfulness towards his wife?—A. In the course of conversation he admitted to me at one time that he was not.

Q. What did he say?—A. That he was not and did not propose to be.

Q. That is, that he would cohabit with other women?—A. That is the meaning I took from it.

Then, a little further down:

Q. Can you tell us his language when he said he proposed to continue that method of living?—A. He said that men were different from women, that they were polygamous in their habits.

A little further:

Q. It was at that time that he referred to his past infidelity and his intention to continue those infidelities?—A. It was just a general conversation, and he said that a man was constituted differently from a woman.

That is the whole of the evidence. Now, if this were a legal proceeding, an ordinary suit between two parties, in which the one sued to collect a debt from the other, I fully concede that it would be not merely prima facie evidence of the debt, but conclusive, if witnesses deposed to the court that the defendant had admitted to them on different occasions that he owed the money. Any court, any jury, or any man would be quite justified in acting upon such an admission. But it seems to me that it is a different state of things altogether when you are considering whether or not there is evidence upon which a divorce ought to be granted by parliament. A proceeding for divorce is not in the nature of a mere private proceeding in which the parties themselves are alone interested. There is a large public interest in preserving the sanctity of marriage relations. In the old country that interest is recognized by the appointment of an officer known as the King's Proctor, who frequently intervenes under direction of the court in cases where there is any reason to suspect that the husband and the wife may each wish to be free of their marriage obligations, to that extent concurring if not actually colluding in promoting the effort to separate them. Apply that idea to the situation here. Speaking for myself, I think it is very likely that this lady is entitled in fact to be divorced, that her husband has in fact committed adultery, probably done so repeatedly; but the question for us, it seems to me, is, has that been here proved? It may be that the evidence exists, and that with a little difficulty it could be found and produced. If that is the fact, there will be but little hardship upon the parties if this measure is not passed, and they are left to apply at the next session of parliament, and then to produce the evidence which might have been, I venture to think, obtained if there had been the proper effort to secure it before the present application was made. Everything here rests upon what the husband stated to his wife, his wife's father, and the doctor. I do not question for a moment the exact truth of what these witnesses have said that he said; but if one may suppose that this husband is as anxious to be free from his wife as his wife is to be free from him, may it not have been that he said these things for the very purpose of inducing her to make the application which she has made. His statements were not made under oath. He may have been boasting—that is the language of counsel, not my language—of his exploits.

I think our experience is that a man who would boast of such a thing is not one upon whose word much reliance is to be placed, but rather a man desirous of furnishing evidence upon which his wife might procure a divorce. However that may be, here at any rate is an instance in which the House is asked to decree divorce without any pretense of being able to conclude that at a certain time, with a certain woman, the offence of adultery was committed. We are asked to give judgment simply because this husband is a man of such moral character as his statements to his father-in-law would indicate, a man who would not hesitate, upon the opportunity offering, to commit adultery, but who, even upon his own statement, in the evidence we have, is not shown to have at any particular time or with any particular woman, or at any particular place, committed the offence with which he is charged.

Mr. BARKER. I have not read the evidence very carefully, but I did read it, and it appears to me that, in the absence of any probability of collusion between the husband and the wife, there was here made as strong a case against the husband as it is possible to make, unless you can get eye-witnesses. The argument of the Minister of Justice goes almost as far as to say that unless you can get eye-witnesses of the offence, you cannot get a divorce. What are the facts here? We have three witnesses. First of all, we have the wife, who swears—and there is no reason to doubt her testimony—that her husband confessed to her misconduct and cohabitation with a woman in Buffalo at a hotel. She did not recollect the woman's name, but there is nothing very strange about that. Probably she never asked. The husband admitted to her cohabitation with this woman more than once in a Buffalo hotel. Then we have the evidence of the private doctor of the husband, who has been treating him and his family and a brother for a considerable period. Of the character and standing of this doctor there is not the slightest question, and he says that this man confessed to him—and confessed not merely on one occasion—that he had frequently given way to the commission of adultery. Any one who reads the testimony cannot fail to come to the conclusion that it was a frequent habit of this Mr. Grantham to cohabit with women in such a way that the doctor said it was impossible for his wife to live with him. Then we have Sir William McKenzie, the father of the complaining wife, who says that he spoke to his son-in-law about this, and the son-in-law not only admitted it, but claimed that as a male he had a right to do so. He distinguished the right of the husband from the right of the wife, and held the theory that what would be wrong in a wife was right on the part of a husband. He not only admitted this to the father of the wife, but he refused to say that he would reform. He boasted of his right as a man to go on and sin. So we have the wife who swears that her husband told her that he was in the habit of cohabiting with this woman in Buffalo, and we have the husband's doctor declaring that he had been treating him and his brother for some sexual or mental trouble, saying that his conduct had come to be a disease, that the man admitted again and again his offences, and made no pretense of concealing them. Then the father-in-law approached the husband to see whether there was any possibility of reform on the part of the latter, and the husband said 'No, as one of the male sex, I consider that is my right; we have our rights, and I intend to exercise them. I would think a good deal of the argument of the Minister of Justice if there were on the face of this case anything to create the suspicion of collusion between the husband and wife, but there is not. I do no see, therefore, why the evidence of eye-witnesses should be indispensable.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). I had the opportunity of being before the Private Bills Committee when the evidence given before the Senate Committee was fully considered and discussed, and I cannot agree with the Minister of Justice in the conclusion he has arrived at. While it is no doubt the right of the Committee of this House, to which these Bills are referred, to reverse the decision of the Senate Committee, that power is one which is rarely exercised. I only know of one case in a long period of years when the House of Commons did interfere in a decision at which the Senate arrived. In this matter we are very largely in the position in which a court of appeal would be in reviewing the action of a subordinate court, which has seen all the parties connected with the matter, has heard their evidence, and has arrived at the conclusion with all the advantages furnished the court in the first instance. I think that this House should not lightly overturn or interfere with a decision arrived at by the Senate Committee under these circumstances. There can be no doubt about the integrity of the tribunal which determined this matter in the first instance, and there can be no doubt that they gave it every attention in order to arrive at a conclusion in the interests of justice. The Minister of Justice frankly admitted that, in an ordinary case, the evidence submitted would be sufficiently strong to result in a judgment for the plaintiff on the question of fact, but he thinks there should be additional evidence in order to enable a finding to be arrived at. But there is a point in connection with this matter which we are apt to overlook.

The question as to the weight of evidence has nothing to do—as the Minister of Justice knows full well, and will readily appreciate what I say in that regard—with the matter of collusion. If, as to the matter of fact, we have proof here—and we have the finding on that point of the competent tribunal appointed to deal with the matter—there is evidence sufficient to warrant a separation of the parties. With the evidence that is submitted and the statement of my hon. friend, we are bound to believe we have that evidence. If that is so there is no use in theorizing as to what is possible in regard to collusion. Besides, it is shown that, after the admission of the facts made that there was cohabitation and relation with other parties, the wife never lived with her husband; and consequently there could not be that collusion between them which might exist and which if it did exist would destroy the full effect of the admission. On page 8 of the evidence given by the wife is the following:

Q. You have never lived with him since he really admitted that to you?—A. No.

Q. No collusion between you, no arrangement?—A. Oh, no.

Thus we have the admission of facts sufficient to enable the finding to be made, together with the total absence of any relation—even, apparently, speaking relation—between the parties until the time of her appearing before the Senate Committee. All possible theory of collusion is thus repudiated. Besides, we have the sworn evidence of the parties. And I do think that we should at all times hesitate in this House about overturning the decision of the Senate and its committee in these matters. That is a practice to be resorted to only in extreme cases or where it is evident that great injustice is being done to some one. My hon. friend says frankly that he thinks this is a case in which the parties ought to be separated. That being so, the general considerations of policy and duty which this House should adopt in this class of cases lead us to the position that we should support the decision of the Senate Committee and the action of the Senate.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. I have been entirely misunderstood by my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou), and possibly by other members of the committee, if it has been supposed by others than my hon. friend that I was suggesting that there was collusion between this husband and wife. The circumstances all demonstrate the contrary. I do not suppose there has been any communication between them on the subject. But I think there is a very strong probability that, without communicating with each other, and without colluding on the subject, each of them equally desired to be free from the other; and I think it is entirely possible that with that idea in each mind the husband made this statement to his father-in-law, his wife and the doctor.

Mr. LANCASTER. In this case I must agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) in the main. It seems to me this is a case where, for the sake of not doing an act of disrespect to the Senate committee, as urged by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), we are asked to strike a blow at the social condition of this country and to do a great injury to young people who have marriage in view, by granting a divorce on the grounds involved here. I have no doubt, as a matter of common sense and human nature, and after reading the evidence. that this young woman, after conniving at her husband's conduct, now applies for this divorce because she has some other man in view whom she wishes to marry. Her father's evidence shows that she must have been suffering for months and for years under the miseries she now speaks of if her story is all true. But she did not then tell her father about it at all. But on the eve of the application for the divorce for the first time, she tells him of the condition of affairs under which she says she has lived for years. As a matter of common sense, I do not believe her. When a person wants to change his or her mate, to make an exchange of one husband or wife for another —instead of trying to cure the faults complained of or to repair the character that is thought deficient, and so maintain the vows that were made, and build up the social condition of the country—when they think they can make a pretty fair exchange of one husband or one wife for another they come to this House and ask us to advise the King to dissolve their marriage. I cannot vote for this divorce, because it sets a bad example, and is a step in the direction of a most dangerous state of things for this country. We are telling people that if at any time their marriage does not please them, then on evidence of general admission of wrongdoing sworn to by the one who wants the divorce, corroborated in this case by the wife's father—if it is corroboration—parliament may be petitioned and will advise the King to dissolve the marriage. There has been in effect connivance and agreement in this case. It is not a case of disputed facts. It is not the case to which my hon. friend from Pictou sought to compare it, the case of the court of appeal feeling bound to accept the decision of the lower courts as to disputed facts because the lower courts had had the advantage of hearing the evidence given by the parties. In this case the facts are not disputed. The facts do not show that there is any bona fides on the part of this young woman in seeking this divorce. She is taking advantage of the condition of affairs, the loose way of granting divorce in the other chamber. Thirty or forty divorces are going through every session. It being the fashion to get a divorce, she thinks she might as well, while it is the fashion, take advantage of it. And as she wants to break her marriage vows, and perhaps change her mate, she petitions this parliament to grant her this divorce. I do not think that any good purpose can be served by passing this Bill under the admitted facts of the case. It is a case in which this House, if the Senate did not do so, ought to advise the King not to grant the divorce, and I shall vote accordingly.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to say a word or two in regard to the effect of the evidence. The fact in question here must be proved by admissible evidence, just as any fact would be proved in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) has illustrated the view he takes of this case by suggesting that a husband desiring to be free from his wife might make admissions the acceptance of which would be the proof of the case against him. And he has argued therefrom that such evidence ought to be sufficient to justify a decree for the plaintiff in a proceeding of that kind. If the argument of the Minister of Justice means anything, it seems to me to mean that. I never had the advantage of appearing before a committee of the Senate in any such proceeding as this. But I have acted as counsel in a good many divorce actions in the province of Nova Scotia where we have a King's Proctor as well as they have in England, where every precaution is observed; and I have never known such evidence to be refused. It always is accepted; and if it is accepted by the court or by the divorce committee of the Senate, and if it is proper evidence—as it is admitted to be—then you must either give weight to it or not give weight to it. You have to consider, in that case, whether the witnesses are telling the truth or not, and if you come to the conclusion that they are telling the truth you must conclude that the defendant in the proceedings was guilty of that particular act.

That is the law as I have always understood it, and I have never known any judicial pronouncement which is inconsistent with that view. Therefore, if it be true that this defendant did, on three different occasions, to his wife, to the physician, and to his wife's father, admit that he had been guilty of infidelity to his marriage vows, it is simply a question as to whether or not you believe that these persons were telling the truth. The Minister of Justice says you must have more direct evidence than that, that the husband may have been making this statement because he desired that a divorce should be procured against him. You could say exactly the same thing if the petitioner had proved absolutely the act of infidelity. It might be said that he had committed that act because he desired to have a divorce procured against him by his wife. The argument would be as valid in the one case as in the other. In the present case it touches only the question of collusion. So far was the effect of admission carried on in one English case, as every lawyer in the House will remember, that, in an action against a respondent and co-respondent the admission of the respondent was regarded as evidence against her, sufficient to enable the court to make a decree, although the co-respondent with whom the act was alleged to have been committed was absolutely discharged, because there was no evidence against him. That is to say, the evidence of the respondent was evidence against herself, but it was not evidence against the co-respondent. It was alleged that the act charged had been committed with the co-respondent, and it was held upon the admission of the respondent that the act of infidelity with the co-respondent had been proved as against her, but as against the co-respondent there was no evidence whatever. It was a perfectly logical deduction from the principle that the admission of the defendant was evidence against the defendant, but was not evidence against the co-respondent. Under the circumstances it is purely a question as to whether or not the persons who gave this evidence were telling the truth upon their oath, and there is, of course, the further point which the Minister of Justice has suggested rather than raised, the question as to collusion. So far as collusion is concerned I am sorry there is not the same precaution before the Senate Committee that is to be found in the courts which are charged with the decision of these matters, and I entirely agree with the Minister of Justice in one respect, that there ought to be the most careful scrutiny of the evidence, there ought to be every possible safe-guard against collusion. I do not know whether it would be practicable or not to have the Senate pass a standing order by which the taking of evidence upon all these Bills would be relegated to a judge, say the judge of the Exchequer Court, upon whose finding of fact the Senate might afterwards grant or withhold a divorce. I think that would be a better method than the one at present adopted. If that course were adopted you would have all the safeguards of King's Proctor, and everything of that kind which are usual, and most proper safeguards in proceedings for divorce before the courts.

So far as the present case is concerned, the circumstances do not seem to me to point to collusion. In the first place, the woman, after the confession of her husband ceased to cohabit with him. In the second place he was guilty not only of very outrageous, and threatening conduct towards her, but of actual violence, as I gather from the evidence, which I had an opportunity of looking over a moment ago, and the relations between the husband and wife from first to last since the confession have not been such as to justify the idea that she was colluding with him in any way for the very reason that there was no object or purpose in her colluding with him. He had made his confession to her admitting his adultery with a certain woman at an hotel in Buffalo, he had made general admissions to his physician and to her father of his infidelity on many occasions. There was no reason for collusion, because his confession and admission given in that way were perfectly admissible evidence against him in the absence of his own testimony to the contrary, which was not given. While I entirely agree that the evidence should be most carefully scrutinized I still think this is a question as to the admissibility of the evidence. The evidence being admissible, and leading to the conclusion that the husband was guilty of the offences charged, I do not see any reason why we should not concur in the view taken by the committee of the Senate in the first instance.

Bill reported, on division, read the third time, and passed.

CANADA NATIONAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 201) respecting the Canada National Fire Insurance Company.

On section 2—extension of time.

Mr. McCRANEY. I have a few remarks to make with reference to this Bill. On June 11, 1908, a company having its head office at the city of Saskatoon, was incorporated by the Saskatchewan legislature under the name of the Canada National Insurance Company. In the following year, 1909, an Act was passed by this parliament, incorporating the company which is now applying for this Act under the name of the Canada National Fire Insurance Company. The names are so similar that I am sure no one in this House will contend that, had it been brought to the attention of parliament in 1909, when the Dominion incorporation was given, this name would have been given to the Dominion company in view of the fact that it so closely resembled the name which had already been given to the provincial company by the Saskatchewan legislature. It is pointed out, I understand, by those who are applying for the present legislation that subsequent to the passing of this Act by this parliament the provincial secretary of Saskatchewan, was asked if there was any company having a name similar to the Dominion company, and the reply was that there was none. In that connection I would only point out that that inquiry was made of the provincial secretary, and the answer was obtained subsequent to the incorporation of the applicants by this parliament. The action of this parliament was not in any way founded upon the letter of the provincial secretary of Saskatchewan. The effect of the letter, so far as the incorporated, is simply nil. It could not repeal that Act nor affect any right which the Saskatchewan company had to its name. The Saskatchewan company is in the hail and fire insurance business. I understand that it obtained its license from the Saskatchewan government in the fall of 1909, and issued its first policy on the 3rd of January, 1910. I would move, Mr. Chairman, the following resolution:

That the Bill respecting the Canada National Fire Insurance Company be referred back to the committee on Banking and Commerce for amendment by changing the name of the company to one which does not conflict with the name of the Canada National Insurance Company, the head office of which is in Saskatoon.

The only reason, it seems to me, which can be urged for the pressing through of this Bill without any clause amending the name of the Dominion company is that the Dominion company have already made some considerable expenditure in the way of printing and organization. I would only point out the fact that if they have made any considerable expenditure this is only the beginning of a situation that will become more strained, more money will be spent, and now, therefore, is the time to make the correction in the name and to give this company another name before it has begun business which does not conflict with the name of the company already incorporated by the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. BLAIN. I would ask, you Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is in order?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The amendment is not in order at this stage. The amendment is that the Bill respecting the Canada National Fire Insurance Company be referred back to the Banking and Commerce Committee for amendment. That is a motion that can only be made when the Speaker is in the Chair.

Mr. LANCASTER. Was there any notice given of it?

Mr. McCRANEY. I could not give notice because the Bill was only reported this morning.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Notice is not required. Is the motion that the committee report progress?

Mr. McCRANEY. I move that the committee report progress.

Mr. NESBITT. It is quite true, as my hon. friend (Mr. McCraney) has stated, that the letter from the provincial secretary of Saskatchewan was written after this charter was obtained by the present company from the Dominion parliament. The company were chartered by the Dominion House in 1909. Before they started to sell their stock they wrote to the provincial secretary of Saskatchewan and asked him if there was any company chartered under that name, and he replied that there was not. They went ahead, sold their stock, and got the money ready to deposit. Whether it is deposited or not I do not know, but I think it is. It was only by accident that they did not get their license. They were a day late. They have prepared a very large quantity of advertising material, they have got their policies all written, they have their signs up, and their agencies all arranged for. Then, the names are not exactly similar. The name of the other company is the Canada National Insurance Company while the name of the company asking for an extension of its charter is the Canada National Fire Insurance Company, one located at Saskatoon and the other at Winnipeg. When they get doing business, one will be known as the Canada Natinal of Winnipeg, and the other as the Canada National of Saskatoon. That will be the practice if we may judge from our experience of other similarly situated companies. It is no fault of this company that they did not get their license, and I would ask that the committee do not rise and report progress, but pass the Bill now.

Bill reported.

On the motion for third reading of the Bill

Mr. McCRANEY moved:

That the Bill be referred back to the committee on Banking and Commerce to change the name of the company to one which does not conflict with the name of the Canada National Insurance Company, the head office of which is in Saskatoon.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time and passed.

TRADE COMMISSIONER TO MEXICO.

Mr. MONK:

1. When was Mr. Bouley appointed Canadian Trade Commissioner in Mexico, and upon whose recommendation was he so appointed?
2. What is Mr. Bouley's salary?

Mr. KING:

1. There is no Canadian Trade Commissioner named Bouley. Mr. A. W. Donly is the Trade Commissioner in Mexico. Mr. Donly was appointed January 1, 1905, upon the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.
2. Mr. Donly's salary is $3,200 per annum,
3. The total expenses for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1911, were $5,454.10, made up as follows:

Salary as Trade Commissioner	$3,100 00
Rent	600 00
Postage	50 00
Salary of assistant	1,200 00

In addition, he has made 68 weekly diary reports since January 1, 1910, at which date the weekly diary reports were established. This report consists of a daily record as to interviews held and notes of miscellaneous information.
5. No.

ECHO LAKE POST OFFICE.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Has any application been made to the Post Office Department for the establishment of a post office at Echo Lake, in the county of Frontenac?
2. If so, when and by whom was such application made, what action has been taken by the department, and what is the intention of the department in regard thereto?

Mr. KING:

1. Yes.
2. A petition was received from Mr. William Alport on the 27th January, 1908, and was duly reported upon by the inspector, who stated the locality was not well settled, and not likely to improve, and that, in his opinion, there was no need for another office. Recently an application was received from Mr. C. Cox, which was acknowledged, and referred to the inspector on the 9th March, but the inspector has not yet reported, and he has been instructed to make an immediate report.

CANSO AND GUYSBOROUGH MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. ARMSTRONG:

Has the contract for carrying the mail between Canso and Guysborough been let? If so, who was successful in obtaining same, what was the price paid and the number and amount of all tenders.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

(a) Yes. (b) Wm. McDougall, $2,270 per annum. (c) Three tenders received, viz.: Wm. McDougall, $2,270 per annum; James Sullivan, $2,290 per annum; John C. Myers, $2,375 per annum:

ROCKLIFFE RIFLE RANGE.

Mr. JAMESON:

1. Referring to the item of $75,000 in the further supplementary estimates for the purchase of additional land at the Rockliffe rifle range, how many acres of land does this embrace?
2. Where is each lot or parcel of this land located, and who are the present owners, respectively?
3. From whom was each lot or parcel of land purchased by the government, if purchase has been made, or from whom is it intended to purchase?
4. What is the purchase price per acre paid, or to be paid, by the government for each parcel of land?
5. How many transfers or assignments of each of the parcels of said land have been made within the past four years, on what dates, from whom, to whom, and for what consideration in each case?
6. What options were obtained from the owners on any or all of the prospective parcels of said land, by whom were such options obtained, and on what dates, respectively?

Mr. KING:

As negotiations for the purchase of the land required are still in progress, it is considered that it will be inadvisable to make public, at the present time, the information now asked for. It may, however, be stated that valuations have been obtained, but that the prices asked by the various owners concerned are so much in excess of these valuations that it will, in all probability, be necessary to take expropriation proceedings. None of the properties have yet been acquired.

MOTION AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, papers, reports and other documents in any way re lating to the proposed extension of the Rockliffe Rifle Range and the acquisition of land. —Mr. Jameson.

SUPPLY—EXPERIMENTAL FRUIT AND VEGETABLE FARMS AND TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. W. O. SEALEY (Wentworth). Mr. Speaker, before going into committee, and pursuant to my statement on the morning of April 22, that I would re-mould my remarks respecting an experimental fruit and vegetable farm for our district, and submit them to the House at a later time, I would like to say that, in view of the failure of my amendment to carry, I have hoped the hon. Minister of Agriculture would see his way clear to establish an experimental fruit and vegetable farm in our midst, as well as a pre-cooling plant, and a pest-destroyer department. The hon. minister has frequently said that the production of the highest quality of fruits, vegetables, &c., would command the best market prices under all circumstances, and it seems now to be up to him to assist in helping to produce this highest quality. True, he has done a great deal along this line, but he has done more for general agriculture, and has not particularly specialized in horticulture. He may say that this will cost money, and so it will, but not very much. However, if there is any serious complaint about expenditure in the Agriculture Department, it is not that the present expenditure is not well and judiciously made, and has not brought excellent results, but that there is not sufficient money spent along agricultural and horticultural lines, and that an increased expenditure under his department would bring greatly increased results. I notice in the supplementary estimates brought down last week, an item of $25,000 'towards the establishment and maintenance of additional branch stations.' I also notice a further sum of $25,000 'for experiments in cold storage for fruit.' I do hope that these items, or part of them at least, are intended for a beginning in our district.

This is about all I had intended saying at that time, but since the present opportunity has afforded I will explain that I am not sectional or selfish on behalf of Wentworth only in this matter, but I submit for the consideration of the Agriculture Department and the House generally that I believe a most practical thing for the Agriculture Department to do would be to establish an experimental farm of, say, 10 acres, in every county in the Dominion, and if not practicable for the whole Dominion, then I feel that it would be for Ontario anyway, as I may not be capable of speaking with personal knowledge for a wider area. This, of course, could not all be accomplished in a day, but a beginning could be made at once with that end in view.

Mr. BLAIN. May I be permitted to ask my hon. friend a question? I understand that the local government of the province of Ontario established, some few years ago, an experimental fruit farm in the county adjoining that of my hon. friend. Is that correct?

Mr. SEALEY. The local government are doing good work in that respect, but not sufficiently fast for the general good of the province or the Dominion. This government has been doing good work, but not sufficient of it and not fast enough to give the best possible results.

Now to illustrate, many farmers have planted large orchards in many parts of Ontario, and after they matured in, say, 20 years, they wakened up to the idea that they had not planted the right varieties best suited to their particular locality, and thereby suffered a very considerable loss. This has probably been the experience of 50 farmers in a single county, whereas a small experimental farm in each county would have demonstrated at small average expense the varieties best suited for the soil and climate of that particular county, and thereby saved large amounts to the individual farmer.

Now tobacco is growing very successfully in Essex and Kent, and thereby increased the value of farm land formerly used for growing grain from $75 per acre to $200 per acre for growing tobacco. Now I believe we in Wentworth are growing grain on land worth $75 that would grow tobacco and immediately become worth $200 per acre, and thereby stop a considerable part of our immense imports of tobacco and retain very large sums of money for the Canadian producers.

And so on all along the line, I believe an experimental plot in each county would do much towards raising the standard of grazing land to grain land, and grain farming to dairy farming and dairy farming to tobacco and fruit farming, and hardy fruit farming to the finer fruit and vegetable farming and horticulture generally, and so on, and I believe the character of our general products could be raised to the extent of increasing land values by from 50 per cent to 100 per cent This would surely be conservation of the most profitable character.

Then, educationally, a man or two could be kept at each of these plots under direction of a central head, and not cost any more than to have a large farm with a large staff at one central point, and the experiments would be infinitely more valuable as to soil and climatic experiments than could possibly be had at any central point.

Now, educationally, this would be a school where every farmer, young, or old, in the community could go and learn from actual observation under his own home conditions, and would be a continuation class to the Agricultural Department of the public schools, or perhaps a county model school as it were, for continued education from youth to old age, and in winter time it would be the rendezvous for progressive farmers seeking further and more advanced agricultural knowledge.

To more particularly illustrate what I mean. Canada I believe is seriously considering the adoption of more advanced technical education along agricultural lines. A Canadian technical education commission is now at work, and I will read a copy of a letter I addressed to Dr. Robertson, chairman of that commission, last fall, and a further letter more recently both of which I trust will bring useful results, and I trust may be further enlarged on by the House, for I fear that commission may give most of its attention to technical mechanical education for our industrial centres, rather than technical agricultural education, which is vastly more needed and will serve to assist a vastly increased number of people in Canada, and their report should in a very large measure serve as a text book to begin this great work of such momentous importance and profit I trust, to the agricultural community of Canada.

The letter is as follows:

Hamilton, Ont., Nov. 1, 1910.

Dr. James W. Roberston, Chairman of Technical Education Commission, Ottawa:

Dear Sir,—Pursuant to your request at the close of my examination as a witness before your commission at Hamilton, I herewith enclose you the further statements you asked for.

Pardon me if I reiterate the opinion that I firmly believe that technical education is just as important, just as necessary and just as profitable, if applied along agricultural lines as along mechanical or any other lines, notwithstanding the splendid and important educational work our agricultural departments are at present doing.

In applying the same along agricultural lines, I would suggest: first, that your commission devise a plan for transmitting agricultural information by chart, tabulated illustrations or otherwise, whereby the agriculturists could get the results of agricultural experiments, &c., at a glance, in a minute, rather than by having to read innumerable pages of blue-book reports, for time is money to the agriculturists whether in reading, managing or labouring.

I think technical education along the lines of the commercial side of agriculture, providing for the selling of agricultural products to the best advantage, is most important and necessary, and would add greatly to the profit of the agricultural business, because to a very large extent agriculture has become a business, an industry, a profession rather than slavish drudgery.

Technical education along the lines of co-operative selling or marketing would be of inestimable value, and technical education along the lines of co-operative packing and transporting to the best and most profitable markets is most important. Fruit, although now most carefully packed, is greatly damaged in transit to the markets, and a direct loss is sustained by the farmer in consequence.

Technical education along the lines of co-operative fighting of pests, noxious weeds, diseased stock, &c., is also most necessary.

Technical education could be extended by establishing more demonstration farms, where not only the technical process of growing the various kinds of crops could be demonstrated. but also the technical advantage of the various kinds of crops and stock.

Technical methods of producing and testing the various kinds of seeds could be extended.

Technical instructions could be given as to the best methods of preparing produce for market, such as wool, poultry, eggs, dairy products, &c.

Technical education in the frequent daily publication of market reports in order that pricese can be more easily compared than at present in the daily newspapers.

Technical education along agricultural lines for the new-comers to Canada so their service for themselves or their employers would be rendered much more valuable.

Technical education in preparing and marketing meats, &c., so that the farmers would come directly in contact with the dealers or consumer without their produce having to pass through the interests controlled by the packers' trusts and combines which now makes for high cost of living.

Technical education in road making, whether it be corduroy across the swamps by the new settler, properly drained and graded in the medium district or high class drainage, crown macadam and oil in the older districts, so the best markets can be easily reached with the largest loads with the least disturbance or damage to the contents and smallest amount of injury to the vehicle, and least wear and tear on the horses.

Technical education as to the many advantages and various applications to numerous purposes to which rural mail delivery may be utilized or made possible.

Technical education re crop prospects generally, and price reports in convenient and quickly readable form—simplified schedules.

Technical education along electrical lines for local co-operative telephone companies, so the average farmer can keep in repair his own telephone instrument and wires; also the running of motors, so when Hydro-Electric power is supplied to the farmers they can keep in order the lights, motors and machinery, &c., coupled with co-operative business methods of organizing and running same.

Technical education re freight rates, express rates, classification of products and shipping conditions.

Technical education in correspondence re market conditions, prices, transportation rates and transportation facilities.

Technical education in agricultural observation.

Technical education in expressing one's opinions along agricultural lines that the farmers' interests may be more effectually advocated and safe-guarded before parliament, commissions, in the public press, &c.

Technical education in drainage—a most important factor in farming.

Within a radius of ten miles of Hamilton there are sufficient apples, pears and other fruits, left on the trees and on the ground unpicked and unpacked to supply the requirements of the whole of Hamilton's 75,000 population during the winter, that annually go to waste, the same is largely true of vegetables, &c. Cannot the technical commission evolve a plan of educating at least a portion of the indifferent city population to gather these fruits on shares or some other way, so that want and downright hardship and suffering during the winter months would be unknown, or at least greatly modified, and, besides, avoiding this shameful waste of a bountiful Providence?

The same is partly true of grain and other farm products. Educate the farmer to save his 'waste,' which would make a handsome additional profit to the average producer.

Educate the public to make the tilling of the soil so profitable that the non-prosperous city population will forsake the towns and become prosperous agricultural producers, and in this way solve the most difficult of social problems. 'Back to the farm.'

Trusting the above may interest you and that your commission will evolve a system of technical education therefrom along agricultural lines, in addition to mechanical lines, that will place Canada, 'the leading agricultural country in the whole world to-day,' so far ahead of its present self that not only will our own people become more prosperous, happy and contented, but that the world will be attracted to Canada, and that millions more of the best people will flock to our fair Dominion and share our blessings, particularly in this respect.

With best wishes for yourself and the commission, yours truly,

W. O. SEALEY.

Mr. BURRELL. May I ask, from what document is the hon. gentleman reading?

Mr. SEALEY. From the letter I addressed to Dr. Robertson, the chairman of the Technical Education Commission.

Mr. BURRELL. The hon. gentleman Mr. Sealey's own letter?

Mr. SEALEY. Yes. It certainly reads well, and it is on a matter of great importance. I am glad the House is taking so much interest in it, and I hope it will benefit the House as well as the country.

I took the opportunity of writing again a few days ago, and as I believe the matter is of considerable importance, I will read the letter:

Ottawa, Ont., May 2, 1911.

Dr. Jas. W. Robertson,
Chairman Technical Education Committee,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Pardon me for again addressing you, but this is merely to mention, that if your report is published in one volume, it will be so large that distribution will be inconvenient, and readers will have so much difficulty turning to the sections specially interesting to them, that it may be little read, and not appreciated.

Now if it were published in 4 or 5 volumes it would also be cumbersome, inconvenient, and expensive to distribute. But if it were in 20 or 40 volumes, as the case may be, a volume for each heading or branch of work dealt with, one complete volume would serve to distribute to say 40 people, the sections they were particularly interested in, and they would be more likely to read that particular volume, and profit greatly by it (a few might be bound in whole for libraries or other public references), and this suggests a further idea:—

That the report be drafted with a view to educational as well as descriptive matter, re the various items of observation as well as suggestion, so when the report was printed, it would be suitable for a primary text book for schools, such as the 'Atlas of Canada,' published by the Department of the Interior, which has been adopted by many county school inspectors as an ordinary text book, and I venture the opinion, that the children in these counties, as well as their parents, have acquired more knowledge of Canada in the short space of say three years, since the Atlas was first published, than they ever learned or knew during their whole previous life, and in this way, these text books have been supplied by the government free.

Now if your report be published in small volumes, each dealing with a particular class, and printed by the million, they could be used as free text books in a temporary way, and perhaps a more suitable text book evolved therefrom, and in this way, without much expense, the principal of technical education could be adopted and initiated at a much earlier date, without waiting for the country to digest the report, and discuss for a year or two the advisability of adopting the principal (because I believe the utilizing of the report in this way would prompt the adoption of the principal), and then wait for another year to get a suitable text book edited and authorized.

Then, if adopted (which I feel certain it would be), a more suitable text book could be evolved by the joint effort of the teachers, who are daily by way of teaching, experimenting practically with it, and thereby save the usual heavy copyright royalty, on the newly authorized text book, that would belong to Canada as a whole, and also make this part of the educational system in Canada uniform throughout the whole Dominion.

Again hoping you will pardon me, and trusting you may find something of value and usefulness in the suggestions.

Yours truly,

W. O. SEALEY.

Mr. LANCASTER. What reply did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sealey) receive? Will he read that?

Mr. SEALEY. A very nice reply to the first letter—very appreciative.

Mr. LANCASTER. How about the second?

Mr. SEALEY. My letter was forwarded to the commissioner in the old country, and there has been no time for a reply as yet. I feel there is considerable merit in it, and I hope the House will feel the same way about it. If not, it is my opinion anyway.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Atlas sent out by the Dominion government has been adopted as a text-book in certain counties? If so, will he say in what counties?

Mr. SEALEY. Wentworth, anyway.

Mr. BLAIN. By the authority of whom?

Mr. SEALEY. The inspector.

Mr. BLAIN. I thought the provincial government were the only ones who had power to adopt text-books for the public schools?

Mr. SEALEY. I think the inspector has the authority——

Mr. BLAIN. No, he has no authority. My hon. friend knows that.

Mr. SEALEY. However, it is important at this time to consider this phase of the question, because I rather fear that the Technical Commission are inclined to give most of their attention to technical mechanical education, rather than to technical agriculture education which is more needed and would benefit a much larger number of people, and, I believe, result in far greater advantage to the country. However, they can serve both purposes well. I do not remember exactly what instructions they were given in the matter, but, so far as I can gather from the reports of their inquiries and from personal attendance at one of their meetings, they were giving their attention rather to technical mechanical lines than to technical agricultural lines.

Mr. KING. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sealey) is mistaken in assuming that the commission will give more attention to one industry than to another. As I understand, the chairman and members of the commission, are trying to take in all industries. And the chairman himself is a special expert in agricultural industry, and I am sure that in his hands the subject of agriculture will not lack attention.

Mr. SEALEY. I am glad to be corrected in that matter by the minister (Mr. King). I trust and feel satisfied from his statement that the agricultural side will receive careful consideration.

Mr. FISHER. I have listened with great attention and interest to what my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) has said in favour of the establishment of a branch farm of the experimental farm system in the Niagara peninsula, among the fruit and vegetable growers there. A deputation of fruit growers, introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Sealey), some time ago, laid before me two requests. One was for the establishment of a farm or station in that vicinity for the special purpose of illustrating fruit and vegetable growing, but the delegation rather laid stress upon their other proposition, that it would be well to make an experiment in what is commonly called the pre-cooling of fruit before shipment. My department has been looking into that system of pre-cooling of fruit for some time. A year ago Mr. Ruddick, the Cold Storage and Dairy Commissioner, was in the west and visited California for the express purpose of investigating the system adopted there by which the fruit when packed in the cars for shipment is thoroughly cooled, and then the cars closed up and sent forward. The system is there carried on on a very large scale at central points, the cars being brought in from the fruit growing districts to the central plant and cooled before being forwarded. The suggestion was made that something similar might be adopted in the Niagara peninsula, which is probably the largest individual fruit growing section of the Dominion of Canada. I authorized Mr. Ruddick to look into the possibilities of establishing something of this kind there and thought that the principle as to assistance which we have applied to cold storage warehouses might be applied to this service also. I am asking in the supplementary estimates for a vote for the purpose of carrying that out, I have been urged by the people there to give them early advice as to the possibility of doing this, so that they might be able to take advantage of it for this season. All I could say was that I am recommending to parliament a vote for this purpose, and that if parliament grants that vote, I shall be very glad to establish such a system.

In regard to the establishment of branch experimental stations in the Niagara district, I accept with pleasure the remarks of my hon. friend as an evidence of the value of these branch stations in the different parts of the country. I have had abundant evidence of the value of these stations, not only from the people in the different localities, but from members of the House who have been asking for the establishment of such branch stations in their respective districts. I am very glad of this because it quite coincides with my own policy and my own views. I would be glad to see branch stations of this character scattered broadly over the country. As an evidence that this is my view I would point to the fact that in the last five years or so, I have actually acquired no less than eight such stations, in addition to the original five experimental farms, which have been in existence now for about 25 years. I would be glad to go on with that. I am asking parliament this year for a vote for this purpose. I am glad to say that last year parliament accorded me that vote, and I am asking a vote in the main estimates and a further vote in the supplementaries, because the demands and requests made to me have been so general and so insistent that I did not think the amount I had asked in the main estimates, which were made up last fall, would be sufficient to meet the requirements. I trust that parliament will grant me this money, and I will take steps immediately to see that it is expended to the very best advantage. In picking out the place where one of these branch farms may be established, two or three things must be kept in mind, first, that the conditions of the situation are similar to the conditions in a pretty considerable area. We could not at once, or perhaps for a long time, establish these farms in every locality, even supposing parliament was to vote large sums of money to establish them. Therefore, we must first choose the place where the benefit from the individual station will be spread over as large an area as possible. Secondly, we ought to consider the accessibility of the individual places to as large a public as possible. I would be very loth indeed to establish any farm which would be far from a railway station, and from easy means of communication. Thirdly, I think it would be proper and right, in view of the enormous influx of people into the western country, many of whom are at least indifferent farmers, and many quite without experience, that we should try rather to give them the benefit of these examples than to place the stations in portions of the country where there has been and is first-class farming to-day. For this reason I have rather added to the number in the west in larger measure than to the number in the east. In the fourth place, I want to recognize the different parts of the country, not to devote the whole time or the whole labour, or the whole money, to one particular portion of Canada, widespread as the Dominion is, but rather to thoroughly distribute this money which comes from the whole people of Canada. It is with these objects in view that I first of all, some years ago, established such a station at Lethbridge, where there was a comparatively dry area needing irrigation, and also needing example of what is called dry farming. I also established one in Northern Alberta, at Lacombe. Then came one down in the east in Prince Edward Island, where people were a little cut off from the advantages of other farms. Then came one at Rosthern, in northern Saskatchewan, where the country is a little different from the prairie country, and where there is a considerable element of foreign population, who do not perhaps understand our agricultural conditions and methods as well as our own people. The next one was in Scott, also in Saskatchewan. The Nova Scotia government bought a property at Kentville, Nova Scotia, in Kings county, for the purpose of establishing a special station for fruit experiments, as well as for other operations. That is just now being organized. Last fall I purchased two in the eastern portion of Quebec, where agriculture is certainly backward, and where it is very desirable that something should be done. I also got an establishment in British Columbia, in the Columbia Valley, at a place called Wilmer, where we have a small area of land in that valley, which was presented by a company there, and we are now preparing to commence operations.

I have had my officer examining sites in British Columbia, in order to secure one on Vancouver Island and one in what is called the fruit belt of the interior—perhaps in the Okanagan country or thereabouts. I have been a little delayed in being able to do anything there partly because of the difficulty in the choice of a really suitable situation and partly also because of the high prices which are asked for any land which seemed at all suitable. In Ontario I also have been hoping that just as soon as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is accessible we will be able to find out where the proper situation would be to establish one or perhaps more in what is called the great clay belt of northern Ontario. I confess that in the southwestern part of Ontario, where my hon. friend lives, I have not felt so much the necessity for the establishment of these branch stations for two reasons. In the first place, from the point of view of agriculture and horticulture, that region of Canada is the best on the continent of America and the farmers there need less help or example. The ordinary farmers are thoroughly well up themselves. Secondly, the Ontario government has been doing a very considerable amount of work. As my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) said a few minutes ago, they have stations somewhat similar in character in this Niagara district and several other places in the southwestern part of Ontario. Under these circumstances, while I would not for a moment say that we should not go on in that part of the country it seemed to me that the establishment of these branch farms was less pressing, less insistent, there than it was in other parts of Canada. In view of the fact that the people represented by my hon. friend from Wentworth and others in the Niagara peninsula have pressed for this other thing, which I think will be of great value to their industry, and that we are trying an experiment which will be of service to all other fruit growing and fruit shipping parts of the country, I have rather felt that I was called upon first to do that, and doing that, perhaps other expenditures of public money would be better in another part of the country than just alongside of this experiment with regard to fruit shipping and at a place where the Ontario government have an experiment station at which they are doing very good work.

Mr. LANCASTER. Excellent work.

Mr. BARNARD. I am sure the House is very much interested and pleased at the somewhat laboured attempt of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to pull the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) out of the hole he has got into by reason of the reciprocity pact.

Mr. FISHER. No reason for it at all.

Mr. BARNARD. In the somewhat rambling remarks of the minister he told us of experimental farms in the Kootenay Valley, in the province of Quebec, in the Ontario clay belt and a number of other places, but he did not, in so far as I could hear, give the hon. member from Wentworth very much satisfaction in so far as that particular constituency is concerned. I do not wish to take up the time of the House but there is a question that I would like to obtain some light upon from the Minister of Agriculture and it is as to what provision he is making for a farm on Vancouver Island. I can assure him that if he is desirous of pulling anybody out of a hole he could very probably get busy in the constituency of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) because that constituency has been promised an experimental farm for the past two or three years. The minister has had an official of his department on the ground who has reported upon several sites. The Hudson's Bay Company offered a certain property to the minister for the purpose of establishing an experimental farm at a considerably lower price than it could be purchased for in the immediate neighbourhood and yet he has never gone on with the project with the result that the minister might find that he would now have to pay two or three times as much for the land than the figure at which he could have purchased it at that time.

Mr. FISHER. It was too high to buy for such a purpose then and I certainly could not think of buying it now.

Mr. BARNARD. Under those circumstances I suppose we are to take it that the minister does not intend to establish an experimental farm there on account of the high price of land?

Mr. FISHER. I did not say so.

Mr. BARNARD. Possibly when his reciprocity pact come into operation and the price of land has gone down he will be in a better position in regard to it.

Mr. BURRELL. I would like to say that I thoroughly agree with the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) in the enunciation of his general policy with regard to these experimental farms and I would also like to suggest to him that he rarely gets criticism from this side of the House for asking too much money to be expended in the interest of agriculture. On the other hand, it is generally for not having asked enough for agriculture. I have never noticed on this side of the House any disposition to criticise the minister harshly on account of the extravagance of the Department of Agriculture. It is rather the niggardliness of the department that we complain of. I need not call the minister's attention to the fact that two years ago I took the opportunity of pressing upon him the necessity for the establishment of an experimental farm in the semi-arid belt of British Columbia where some $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 have been invested by a large number people who are absolutely dependent upon horticulture and who are looking forward very anxiously to see the promise which the minister made on that occasion implemented. I would be very much gratified if the minister could give us an assurance that the promise which he made on that occasion would be carried out at a very early date.

TAKING OF CENSUS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. W. D. STAPLES (Macdonald). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I desire to call the attention of the House and more particularly that of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to some of the questions which I asked him upon Friday last, his answers thereto and to some others that he refused to answer. I am not Irish; therefore, I cannot assume the attitude of the Irishman who was kicked by a mule. I purpose for a moment or two to consider the impolite, undignified and unusual manner in which the minister undertook to answer my questions on Friday night. I can tell the minister that in so far as the yaps and sneers which he threw across the floor of the House are concerned they are not going to quiet any person not even myself. I pay no more attention to his yaps and barks than a locomotive does to a sky terrier as it rolls over the rails to the next station. I would suggest to the minister that it would have been much to his advantage if he had kept cool, slicked his silver beard, spoken more calmly, and not flown off the handle when I put these questions to him on Friday last. I did not ask them from mere curiosity. I had a reason for asking these questions and the constituency that I have the honour to represent had a reason in desiring that they should be asked because they wanted to know how things were moving along in so far as the census taking of the constituents I represent is concerned. I asked the minister some questions with regard to the activity of the Liberal organizer of Manitoba. He knew then and he knows now that he has been actively engaged in taking a census of Manitoba. When he made the denial he was stating what was not the fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FISHER. Order.

Mr. STAPLES. You may call order, but I will support what I am saying by evidence, and direct evidence with regard to the facts of the case. The question asked the Minister of Agriculture will be found reported in 'Hansard' as follows:

Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if the enumerators for the taking of the census in the province of Manitoba have been appointed?

Mr. FISHER. I think they all are; if not, with very few exceptions.

Mr. STAPLES. By whom were they recommended?

Mr. FISHER. They were recommended by men in whom I have confidence.

Mr. STAPLES. I do not think that is an answer to my question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow a debate on the orders of the day.

Mr. STAPLES. I have a further question to ask. Had the Liberal organizer in the province of Manitoba anything to do with the appointment or recommending of the enumerators for that province?

Mr. FISHER. That is a question which I decline to answer.

Mr. STAPLES. Has the Liberal organizer of the province of Manitoba anything to do with the schooling of the enumerators before they begin their work?

Mr. FISHER. No.

The Minister of Agriculture answered, 'No,' in a very sharp voice. I want to tell the minister that the enumerators have been going to the office of the Liberal organizer for Manitoba in the city of Winnipeg, on his invitation, and the first witness I will call to substantiate that is Mr. Perry himself, the Liberal organizer. This is a letter signed by the Liberal organizer in whom the Minister of Agriculture has every confidence, and no doubt he has reason to have confidence in him, because this man has been very beneficial to the Liberal party in Manitoba as well as in Saskatchewan, in by gone days. The letter reads:

MANITOBA LIBERAL EXECUTIVE.
Confidential circular.
Organizer's Office,
Winnipeg, Canada,
April 17, 1911.

Dear Sir,—Re census in federal constituency of Macdonald. I beg to advise you that you have been recommended as enumerator for the following official census enumeration division of the above constituency:—

Sec. 54 That part of the parish of St. Charles north of the Assiniboine river.

I inclose copy of rates as officially announced in the 'Canada Gazette' of April 15, 1911, and would be pleased if within ten (10) days of date hereof, you would acknowledge receipt of this letter.

Yours in the good cause,
H. E. PERRY.

(Whenever you are in the city, we shall be pleased to have you call.)

Catch on to the words 'Yours in the good cause.' Now, who is Mr. Perry, and what do we know about him? He has been a great actor who has played some very important parts on various political stages, always for the Liberal party, not only in Manitoba, but in Saskatchewan, and in order that the House may understand how he plays his part on these political stages, I will recall just one instance out of many which will be sufficient to satisfy the House, and it should be sufficient to satisfy the Minister of Agriculture that Mr. Perry is not a man in whom he should have the utmost confidence; that is, if he wishes to play the game of politics fairly. It will be remembered that there was an election in the constituency of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, on the 13th day of December, 1905, and the Liberal party had as their candidate Mr. Tyreman, and Mr. Donaldson was a candidate of the Provincial Rights party. Mr. Donaldson was recognized as much the stronger candidate, and the Liberals decided to beat him at any cost, and something had to be done. What was done was to call into play the Grit machine, and after it was sufficiently oiled and greased it was put into operation. The first move was to select the battlefield, and if the House will take the trouble to look at the map, they will find that the constituency of Prince Albert runs far into the wilds of the north, and so the northern wilds were selected by the Grit machine for its handiwork and robbery. Mr. Moberley, the Liberal organizer, made application to returning officer Sinclair for three polls to be opened in the north, and needless to say the application was immediately granted. It was understood that Mr. Donaldson, the provincial rights candidate, was to know nothing of it then, and in order to jockey time, Mr. Sinclair, the returning officer, rode forty miles into a little town called Shell Brook, from which the mail only leaves twice a week. On the 5th of December, after the mail had left, Mr. Sinclair, the returning officer, mailed a notice to Mr. Donaldson that there would be three polls opened up in the north, and it was absolutely impossible for Mr. Donaldson to get this notice until the 7th of December, or six days before the election.

when he could not possibly get there himself or send a representative on that short notice to protect these three polls. The next move was for Mr. Sinclair, the returning officer, to select three deputy returning officers and he procured the efficient services of a Mr. McLeod, a Mr. Neilson, and a Mr. Sutherland, and they started on the northern trip. After journeying for some time they came to a desolate and lonely spot, and they concluded that they had travelled far enough, so they also concluded that it was a most ideal place to do the work they had gone out to do, and to set the Grit machine working. Therefore, they made a camp fire and sat down. They had some liquid refreshments and although the narrative does not say what foodstuffs they used, it is supposed it was the standard Grit machine grub namely pickled pigs' feet and beer, and no doubt they smoked the Laurier brand of cigars from the good ship 'Arctic.'

After having a hearty supper, they decided that they would go to work. The first thing to be done was to make a list. So they got their pencils and paper out, and sat down and began putting down all the names they could think of. Finally their mental ability, and capacity of thinking of names became exhausted; yet they had not in their opinion quite sufficient names on the list to defeat the provincial rights candidate. At that moment, fortunately for Mr. Tyreman, but unfortunately for Mr. Donaldson, a rabbit went jumping by. The incident suggested the name of a new family that they might register, so they began registering the Rabbit family. They entered on the list Tommy Rabbit, Jack Rabbit, and I was told Jennie Rabbit, and all the rest of the Rabbit family. After they had got the Rabbit family all entered up, they counted up the list, and they found 151 names on the list, and they concluded, after a little consultation, that that was sufficient to do the trick. The next move was to open the polls. So they unlocked the ballot boxes, took out the poll book, took out the pad of ballots, and they got up, I suppose, behind the back log for a table, and began work. Now, Mr. Speaker, can you imagine the scene? Just imagine that you see those men at work, away up there in the north, at a poll constituted as I have said, and imagine you see Tommy Rabbit, and Jack Rabbit, and Jennie Rabbit, stepping into the poll announcing their names and demanding ballots; and there Mr. Sutherland, and Mr. Macleod, and Mr. Neilson hand out the ballots, and the Rabbits go back and mark them, fold them, and come back and drop them into the ballot box. Then I suppose they got their usual glass of beer and pigs' feet, and cigar, and went home to await the returns of the poll. After they had got the 151 ballots in the box, the time arrived to close the poll. The poll was closed. The ballot boxes were unlocked, the marked ballots taken out and counted. It was found that there were 151 ballots, and every one of them had voted right, they were all marked for Mr. Tyreman, the Liberal candidate. Then they gathered up their traps, and whatever little provision they had left, and started back to Prince Albert. When they arrived at Prince Albert they handed in their ballot box and made the solemn declaration to the returning officer, Mr. Sinclair, and he declared Mr. Tyreman, the Liberal candidate, elected by about 60 majority. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the way that incident occurred. But Mr. Donaldson decided that he was not going to stand for all that. He felt that he was entitled to some degree of justice. So he immediately took action against the three returning officers. They were taken to court, and were fined as follows: Mr. Sutherland, deputy, Mr. Macleod, another deputy, and Mr. Neilson, $200 each, and Mr. Moberly, $100. That quieted things for a time. But Mr. Donaldson was not satisfied with that. He then instituted proceedings against Mr. Sinclair, the returning officer. The charge he made against Mr. Sinclair was conspiring to defraud in the matter of the list. This somewhat alarmed the Liberal machine, and the Liberals throughout the country, and immediately they advised the deputy returning officers to skip out. After they were supplied with the necessary cash, and the assurance that they would be looked after, the deputies went across into the United States. And now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the point where I want to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the beautiful letters that were written by his friend Mr. Perry, in whom he has every confidence, and see what the House and even the minister himself think of them. These poor fellows were in the United States for a time. They were running short of cash, and they were anxious to get back. They had to be administered to, and Mr. Perry administered comfort to their souls, and cash in their pockets. I will read to the House extracts from some of his letters to Mr. Neilson. I hold in my hand facsimiles of all the letters that passed between Mr. Neilson, Mr. Perry, Mr. Sutherland, and the rest of the gang, so that they cannot be disputed. Some of them are rather spicy. This is from one dated June 10:

> Nothing new in the Sinclair case. Appeal to be heard by full court at Calgary, July 11.
> Moberly should have requested protection of court; as it is, it seems there is nothing for him to do but plead guilty.
> Tories threatening further prosecution.

I have heard it said that the missing deputies would be as well to keep out of sight. I think this is undoubtedly correct.

On June 11th, he writes further:

Ere this reaches you, no doubt you will have heard that Moberly was fined $100.

Tories are talking of other prosecutions, and are, of course, pleased with the results so far.

Prudence would, I should judge, suggest to the absent deputies that their safety lies in their remaining away.

These were written by Mr. Perry to Mr. Neilson. Here is another one:

Box 723,
Regina, Oct. 24, 1906.

Dear Mr. Neilson,—I write to inform you that the Tories are still threatening. You see if they lose the case against Sinclair it will make them hostile, while if they win they will be in good shape to prosecute further. That is the way they look at it, so I would advise extreme caution. I shall try to keep you advised. Am going up to Prince Albert shortly to see how things look. The 'Standard' here last night published a story that if the case went against Sinclair, he was going to squeal, but I don't believe that, as he would never do anything to help the Tories, he is a sore on them. Kindly consider this as absolutely confidential and done in your interests.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) H. E. PERRY.

This is the man in whom the Minister of Agriculture has every confidence. Here is a note at the bottom of this letter:

I heard that Pete Paul was trying to play private detective and had gone to the States for that purpose. He was a juror.

Neilson was the deputy returning officer who was up operating in the wilds of the north. Here is another letter written by H. E. Perry, the chief Liberal organizer of Manitoba, in whom the Minister of Agriculture has every confidence, to Mr. Neilson:

Box 723,
Regina, Sask., Oct. 29, 1906.

Dear Sir,—I enclose for your information and guidance copy of header of this day containing complete text of judgment of the full court in the Sinclair case, and which disposes of the conspiracy phase of the Prince Albert district election cases. It does not, however, dispose of the two counts against the deputy returning officers and poll clerks, namely:

Making false returns and stuffing ballot boxes, for which they are liable under sections 128 and 131 of the Territories Election Ordinance. Section 128 reads: Any person appointed a returning officer, election clerk, deputy returning officer or poll clerk, who fails to carry out any of the duties imposed by this Ordinance, or who contravenes any of its provisions, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 and costs or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or both.

Section 133 reads: Penalties under this Ordinance may be recovered on summary conviction before two justices of the peace.

The three deputies were fined on only one charge, that of not holding the poll at the proper time and place.

Moberley, a poll clerk, was fined for writing the word 'voted' after the names of parties in the poll book, his fine being $100, while that of each deputy was $200.

The Tories are naturally disappointed and sore over the decision of the full court, and I am informed that Moore, editor of their paper, 'The West,' and Macdonald, the organizer, are going to Prince Albert the beginning of the next week.

I am also informed on the best authority that the Tories say that any or all of the fellows who are away will be arrested immediately on their return, which quite bears out what I have understood all along, they were threatening to do.

I, therefore, cannot hold out any hope for your early return. Things will settle down after a while, when the by-election is over and after the end of next session of the House. I shall be pleased to give you any further information, if possible to obtain it, and you so desire.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) H. E. PERRY.

This was the Liberal organizer for the province of Manitoba in whom the Minister of Agriculture has the utmost confidence. Here is another one of Perry's racy epistles, written by him to John Neilson during the latter's exile in the United States. Neilson was evidently getting very lonely and restless:

Drawer 804,
Prince Albert, Jan. 17, 1907.

Dear Mr. Neilson,—I came here a little over a month ago not intending to remain for any such length of time, however, it became necessary to do so.

I arrived December 13, got hold of Jim Sinclair, president of association 1905-6, and 14th prepared to call to executive. I went to Sturgeon Lake lumber mills and got Jim Wilson, secretary of the association, to also sign the call. Returned 16th, and 17th got Wilson to go out to Shillingworth with notice, while I went through Down Hill and Hales, 18th and 19th. Executive meeting on 20th. Decided to hold annual meeting some time about January 9th. Got notices for same out on 22nd. Started out for Shillingworth district, which I covered by the evening of December 31st. Did some short drives following week. Convention held on 9th. A. Turgeon received the nomination. The Tories, when they found out we were calling a convention, scambled out and called theirs for the 8th, the day previous to ours. S. J. D. received their nomination. The fight promises, according to some, to be pretty hot. I do not entirely agree with that opinion, but do not propose to take any chances, as I shall have good organization all over the district. After December convention the 9th, the city Liberals banqueted the delegates and friends from the country. We had a fine turnout and a fine time. The weather has been very severe so much so that there are very few moving around. The train service is badly demoralized. Premier Scott has been very low with pneumonia, and indeed may not be past danger yet. I understand he will shortly, when able to be moved, take a trip to the south. His illness has thrown arrangements to the calling of the legislature, &c., all out. Trust your health and that of Archie is good.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) H. E. PERRY.

A note at the bottom reads:

The Senator returned to Ottawa on the 11th. He never came near me. I only saw him merely to shake hands and once when he was going into the banquet. I had no conversation at all. If you have any private matter with him, you might write him direct to the Senate, Ottawa. He keeps clear of me, as we cannot agree. You will get further particulars regarding convention and banquet from the 'Advertiser,' which I trust you receive regularly.

There is another letter written by Grit Organizer Perry to John Neilson, one of Mr. Perry's friends and possibly a friend of the Minister of Agriculture also:

July 18, 1906.

Dear John,—Received your letter this a.m., and I am sending the other along at once.

I wonder what that other was?

Having forwarded everything that came here just as fast as it arrived. The court has not given a decision yet, but will let you know as soon as we hear what they do. This may come along any day. The other boys have settled down out west, but have not heard from them for some days. You had better stay there for a while, as we may get some news for you and it would not pay me to move just now. There is absolutely nothing to tell you about this thing as they are just keeping still and waiting a chance to get hold of some of you fellows. Sutherland's wife and family have gone to him and intend to stay there. I may be in Chicago in a week or ten days and will let you know. Write me the same as usual here, and mail the same and it will be looked after even if I am away for a few days.

Yours,
(Sgd.) M.

Here is another letter, apparently from a kind of go-between Chicago lawyers, possibly counsel for the criminals in their exile:

January 28, 1907.

Alex. Scott.
Mark Sands.

Sands & Scott,
Lawyers,
218 La Salle Street,
Chicago.

Mr. John F. Neilson,
600 W. 62nd St., City.

Dear Mr. Neilson,—Please find herewith a letter sent you in my care by Mr. Perry. This came one day last week, but I kept thinking that you would be in and so did not forward it to you. I did not call you on the telephone because I have been knocked out with grippe about ten days. Drop in when convenient as I also had a letter from Mr. Perry, although I presume it practically covers the same subjects as yours.

Very truly yours.
SANDS.

Here is another letter written by Murray to John Neilson concerning things at home:

Dear Jno,—Have been very busy, but have intended to write you for the past few days. Have been in province of Quebec and have seen all of the parties interested and can assure you that everything is going along all right and all that can be done is now being done. All the matters that you spoke to me about will be attended to in proper time, so you need have no worry about them. Expect court to give decisions to-day and will let you know how they turn out. Have had several interviews and when this case is over it may change the whole thing, but all feel sure that if you return before the warrants are withdrawn it will mean trouble at once. Everybody is prepared to stand by their guns and do what is right by you, and what I ask is that you hold steady for a while longer until all can be arranged.

See Mark and he will fix things up with you. Thought best to send it that way.

I may have to make another trip south in a week or ten days and will let you know and see you then. You can depend upon it that I am doing all I can to hurry things along. You will hear from me again in a few days.

Yours,
M.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are some of the letters that have come to light that have passed between Mr. Perry, the Liberal organizer, the man who is taking an active part in conducting the census of the province of Manitoba, the man whom the Minister of Agriculture claims is a very warm friend—

Mr. KNOWLES. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Staples) mind passing these letters over? Would he mind letting me see them?

Mr. STAPLES. I will be pleased to do so. I would advise the hon. member (Mr. Knowles) that the paper I have here and the facsimiles of the letters are from the library. So he will be sure he has the real thing in the letters.

Mr. KNOWLES. Will the hon. member please send me what he read?—

Mr. STAPLES. They are there; the facsimiles, too.

Mr. KNOWLES. Those the hon. gentleman read to the House? I think he read what is lying on his desk. Will he show me that?

Mr. STAPLES. Yes, if the hon. gentleman wants them,—in a moment; I want to use them.

Mr. KNOWLES. I will pass them back in five minutes. Let me have what the hon. gentleman read or nothing at all.

Mr. STAPLES. Certainly, let him have it. I have no objection to letting the hon.

gentleman from Moosejaw having these letters. He will find they are indentical with the facsimiles.

Mr. KNOWLES. I have no doubt they are.

Mr. STAPLES. I was telling the Minister of Agriculture that these are some of the letters that have passed between these men and his friend, Mr. Perry, in whom he has great confidence, the man who is taking an active part at the present time in taking the census in the province of Manitoba. And, in conclusion I ask the acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to discipline the would-be supreme Minister of Agriculture, just a little, and see if he cannot get him to withdraw his confidence in Mr. Perry, the Liberal organizer of the province of Manitoba who is very actively engaged in taking the census of that province.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). I had placed in my hands a motion this afternoon which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Staples) said he was going to move—

Mr. STAPLES. I beg pardon. I want to move the motion. But my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has my copy of the motion.

Mr. KNOWLES. I will send it over to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Staples).

Mr. STAPLES. Mr. Speaker, I will appeal to the hon. member from Moosejaw to play a little fair and not try to appear so cute and clever, but to send me back my papers to which is attached the motion I purpose moving.

Mr. KNOWLES. Is it—

Mr. STAPLES. I asked the hon. gentleman to send back the paper I was kind enough to let him have.

Mr. KNOWLES. I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Since sending it over—if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Staples) does not wish to take my word for it, it does not matter—I found this attached to the paper. I had no idea that these letters were attached to the motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Send it over.

Mr. KNOWLES. I will send it over I had no idea it was there.

Mr. STAPLES. I beg leave to move in amendment:

That in the selection of public officers the government is exercising a public trust and should be guided by considerations of the character and capacity of the persons whom it proposes to appoint. That the delegation of such public trust to a local party committee or organizer is a public scandal and deserves the censure of this House.

Mr. STAPLES.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) began his remarks by alluding to some answers I gave to questions he put, and I gathered, I think correctly, that if the answers had been to his liking, nothing further would have been heard of the matter.

Mr. STAPLES. No, you are wrong.

Mr. FISHER. I am very glad, indeed, that the answers were not to the hon. gentleman's liking, because it has given him an opportunity, of which he has been pleased to take advantage, to show a vein of facetiousness, and to tell some pretty stories about a camp fire, a journey in the northwest, and so on, which I have no doubt, interested a large number of members, and evidently created great amusement amongst his friends around him. I confess I was not particularly interested in them, and I do not think that they are of particular value in regard to the motion before the Chair. As to the first part of the motion, that in the selection, and appointment of public officers the government is exercising a public trust, and should be guided by considerations of the character and capacity of the person whom it is proposed to appoint, this is very true, one might perhaps think it a platitude because it has been, as far as I know, the guiding principle of governments in Canada for some time past, how long past I would not like to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Long past.

Mr. FISHER. Well, for 15 years past. Then the hon. member goes on and says that the delegation of such a public trust to a local parliamentary committee or organzation is a public scandal, and deserves the censure of this House. If my hon. friend had changed this a little and said that the delegation of such a public trust to a local parliamentary committee or organization would be, if done, a public scandal, and deserve the censure of this House, I might not greatly object to it, but the implication here is that that has been done.

An hon. MEMBER. So it has.

Mr. STAPLES. What does the letter which Perry has issued to the returning officer show? If the minister will look up his official and private correspondence in connection with this Mr. Perry he will find a good many other letters.

Mr. FISHER. I do not hesitate to say that Perry has made recommendations to me just as others in Manitoba have done, and these recommendations have been considered by me, and sometimes they have been acted upon, and sometimes not.

Mr. ROCHE. Why did the minister refuse the other day to say who had made recommendations?

Mr. FISHER. Because I never do say, I never divulge the recommendations on which I act, and I do not propose to. The recommendations to a minister in regard to public appointments, as to other things, are confidential in their nature. I look upon them as recommendations, I act upon them, or do not act upon them in the exercise of my judgment in the administration of my department. Whether they are turned down or not turned down I do not propose to tell hon. gentlemen opposite. It is a matter between the people who make the recommendations and myself, and I decline to answer such questions.

Mr. STAPLES. Does the minister still think, in view of the exposures that have been made in regard to Perry, that he is a fit and proper person to recommend any officer to the government?

Mr. FISHER. I do not know exactly what these exposures are. My hon. friend has read certain letters. I do not know whether these letters have appeared in any court or trial.

Mr. STAPLES. They have all. They are——

Mr. FISHER. It is the first time I have heard anything about it.

Mr. STAPLES. What I said was that the parties with whom this correspondence was carried on by Perry were in court and were fined.

Mr. FISHER. And were these letters filed in court?

Mr. STAPLES. I do not know whether or not the letters had come to light then.

Mr. FISHER. I do not know either, and I do not propose to accept anything except records of trials.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. Because an hon. member of this House reads letters I am not going to accept them necessarily as correct.

An hon. MEMBER. Good.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend's party accepted the counting of the ballots which put his candidate in.

Mr. FISHER. I think it must have been the returning officer who accepted the counting of the ballots, and that was an official action which that gentleman was called on to perform. I do not know anything about the trial referred to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Don't want to know, either.

Mr. FISHER. I do not care particularly. I have not studied the matter, I never looked into the trial, and I know nothing about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You had better look into it.

Mr. FISHER. That is the opinion of the hon. gentleman. I do not intend at present to enter into the study of it.

Mr. LAKE. Is it not the case that in 1906 the minister issued orders for the recall of this man Moberly mentioned this afternoon, from being employed in the Census Department because he had been involved in these Prince Albert scandals?

Mr. FISHER. I remember recalling a Mr. Moberly, because he had been proved in a trial to have been guilty of improper practices. I would do the same thing under similar circumstances to-day, but I have not any proof that Mr. Perry has been proved guilty of anything. There is a difference between a man being proved guilty of an improper practice and an assertion on the part of people that another man is unworthy of confidence. Mr. Perry is not an officer of this department. He has no connection, official or otherwise, as far as I know, with the taking of the census, and I have nothing to do with Mr. Perry except, when I receive a letter from him, to answer it in accordance with my judgment. My hon. friend, says and I believe that Mr. Perry has been appointed the manager or organizer of the Liberal party in Manitoba. That, to me, is a recommendation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. That, to me, is a recommendation of the man. I do not believe that the Liberals of Manitoba would deliberately choose a man to do work for them who was disreputable or unworthy of their confidence. I venture to say for myself and I think for the government that we have confidence enough in the Liberals of Manitoba to believe that they will do what is right.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the minister say what Liberals in Manitoba recommended Mr. Perry, as he says?

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend has not been listening. I did not say that Mr. Perry had been recommended. He has never been recommended to me in any respect, but an hon. member has said that he has been appointed by the Liberals of Manitoba to be their organizer in political affairs. He is not an officer of my department, and he has nothing whatever to do with taking the census in Manitoba or anywhere else. Mr. Perry has written to me on various occasions respecting appointments in connection with the census. I have taken these recommendations and these letters into consideration, just as I have done with the letters of other gentlemen in Manitoba and elsewhere. I have judged the recommendations and acted in accordance with my judgment.

Mr. STAPLES. What authority had Mr. Perry to issue that letter to the enumerattors?

Mr. FISHER. He had no authority as far as I know. I gave him no authority.

Mr. STAPLES. I suppose then the minister will look after Mr. Perry?

Mr. FISHER. Certainly not; I had nothing to do with Mr. Perry. He can write as many letters as he likes. The hon. member himself can write a letter if he chooses and I shall not refuse him the privilege, nor shall I refuse Mr. Perry the privileges if he chooses to write letters. But Mr. Perry does not use any authority in that or anything else in regard to the census, and, knowing a little about Mr. Perry and judging from the correspondence, I venture to think that he will not say he has any authority from me or from the government or from the department to deal with the census in any way whatever.

Now, let me say a few words further. The hon. member for Macdonald calls Mr. Perry my confidential adviser, or something of that kind. He assumes that all the recommendations that I have received from Manitoba in regard to the census have come from Mr. Perry. Although I told him the other day that I had acted upon the recommendations of people in whose judgment I had confidence, he assumes that these recommendations were all from Mr. Perry and nobody else. In that respect he is entirely in error. I have received a number of recommendations, some from ex-members, some from present members and some from other people in the different constituencies in regard to the census enumerators. I am sorry to say, as a matter of convenience to myself, that I get, I suppose, several hundred letters every day in regard to the census and the appointments to it.

An hon. MEMBER. Read a few of them.

Mr. FISHER. No, I am not going to read any because I look upon them as confidential; I look upon them as matters between the writers and myself and I am not going to divulge them any more than I will other recommendations in regard to official appointments in this country. The hon. members mentioned Mr. Neilson, or Mr. McNeill,—I do not remember which it was.

Mr. STAPLES. Mr. Neilson.

Mr. FISHER. I do not know the gentleman and I never heard of him till now, I want to say here clearly and distinctly that when I receive a recommendation relating to any appointment and questions are asked about it in this House or elsewhere I hold that recommendation confidential and I do not reply to those questions. That is a principle which we have laid down as members of the government and I have acted upon it in this case as in many others. My replies to the hon. member the other day were no shorter and were no more based on an inclination to refuse to answer his questions than they have been on other occasions of a similar character. That was threshed out many years ago, here, it was thoroughly considered, and I believe the House thoroughly agreed to the principle that recommendations from various people in the country with reference to appointments to offices are not to be divulged and certainly I do not propose to divulge them.

I noticed one letter which was quoted there and I caught the statement that certain returning officers were fined. I noticed that two or three men were fined because they did not open their polls at the right time in the morning.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. LAKE. It was because they did not open them at all.

Mr. FISHER. Well, that had nothing whatever to do with the census or the taking of the census or anything else I know of. I understood that another man was fined for some other trivial offence of that kind in connection with——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend derides the statement that it was a trivial offence That is the impression that I got at the moment when hearing the letter read. It struck me that it was more an error of judgment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FISHER. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I never heard of it before. I listened to the letter when it was read and that is the impression I got from it. Three or four men, I judged from the reading of the letter, have been fined in the courts.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. They were fined for voting rabbits.

Mr. FISHER. No, that is not what they were fined for. I do not think that the hon. member will find in any of the records of the courts any fine imposed for that reason. In order to convince me he would have to show the record of the court, but I do not believe it for a moment.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. You say you do not know.

Mr. FISHER. I do not know, but I do not believe it all the same. There are certain things which, when stated, appeal to my reason as being possibly correct; there are other things which, when they are stated, do not appeal to my reason, and I do not believe them. I do not think the hon. member will state on his authority as a member of this parliament that these men were fined for voting jack rabbits or anything of that kind.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Well it was jack rabbit.

Mr. LAKE. It was rabbit skins.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I did not say anything about jack rabbits.

Mr. FISHER. I do not know whether it matters very much whether they were jack rabbits or rabbit skins. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) has referred to a matter which justifies my action. During the taking of the census of 1906 a gentleman called Mr. Moberley was recommended as a guide to take some enumerator away to the north part of the country. I did not know Mr. Moberley from Adam. I took the recommendation. I cannot remember at the moment who made it. It was certainly not——

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). It did not matter; you would fill it any way.

Mr. FISHER. No, I would not. But, as a matter of fact I found out after that Mr. Moberley had been concerned in some fraudulent transaction in connection with an election.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But you say you did not believe it.

Mr. LAKE. The trivial offence you mentioned just now.

Mr. FISHER. I do not remember what the offence was. If the hon. member for Qu'Appelle can tell me I will accept the statement from him, because I do not think he would make a statement which is not correct, but I do not remember what the offence was. It was sufficient that when my attention was drawn to it I immediately recalled him, I did not allow him to have anything to do with the taking of the census, and if to-day I find that anybody is connected with the taking of this census who has been guilty of any improper practice, and has been convicted, therefor, or who is shown to me to be guilty of having acted in an improper way, I shall immediately cancel his appointment and recall him as I did Mr. Moberley from the far north. Moberley and those who were with him had started, had gone beyond the range of civilization, and I sent a special officer from the Mounted Police to cancel his appointment, to make him give up his papers and to take another man, and put in his place.

Mr. BLAIN. On whose recommendation was Moberley appointed?

Mr. FISHER. I cannot remember.

Mr. ROCHE. Would the minister take all that pains to recall a man guilty of only a trivial offence?

Mr. FISHER. I do not remember Moberley's offence. The offence I took as being a trivial one was that quoted in the letter read by the hon. member for Macdonald. I did not know that the men he referred to included Moberley.

Mr. ROCHE. Yes, Moberley.

Mr. FISHER. Moberley was one of these four?

Mr. ROCHE. Yes.

Mr. FISHER. I did not catch the name, but I did not understand Moberley's name was amongst them.

Mr. STAPLES. I might advise the minister that this man Moberly had made an application to the returning officer, Sinclair to have three polls opened in the north. The three men who went to the north were McLeod, Sutherland and Neilson, but it was Moberley who arranged the whole affair. He was the ringleader.

Mr. FISHER. I may have been mistaken, and, therefore, my statement of its being a trivial offence may not have been correct, but my impression was that these men were fined because they had not opened their polls at the right hour.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. FISHER. That may have been incorrect.

Mr. STAPLES. It was for holding a poll at the wrong time, and in the wrong place. Nobody voted but themselves.

Mr. FISHER. I gathered that it was a matter connected with the opening of a poll. It depends altogether upon what the facts are, which I do not pretend to know.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). As a matter of fact, they were not punished for all of these things. The facts are beyond dispute. They were guilty of eight or ten offences under the Election Act. In addition to that they were guilty of the trifling offences of forgery and perjury, that is all.

Mr. FISHER. I know nothing of what they were guilty of. The only thing I know about the case was the letter read by the hon. member for Macdonald, and in which these statements were not included.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The minister can understand himself: this was the case of two deputy returning officers going out and holding a poll, and returning 151 electors as having voted when there was not a single man appeared before them to vote at all; putting down fictitious names, putting in bogus ballots and making a solemn return under the Election Act that these men had actually voted and that a poll was held and then bringing that return back and having the votes counted for one of the candidates; surely the minister can understand what the offence was.

Mr. FISHER. None of these statements were contained in the letter to which I have referred, and this is the first time I knew in any shape or form of what these men were supposed to be guilty. But I want to point out that these men had nothing to do with the census. Mr. Moberley seemed to be connected with the transaction, and in the case in court was found guilty of something, when I found he was proven guilty I sent after him and recalled him, and refused to allow him to continue as census officer.

Mr. SMYTH. What is he doing now?

Mr. FISHER. I do not know what he is doing, but he is not acting in connection with the census in any manner, and if I found out to-morrow he was acting, I would cancel his appointment.

Mr. BRADBURY. What about Perry?

Mr. FISHER. Perry has never been proven guilty of anything.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FISHER. Does the hon. member say he has?

Mr. BRADBURY. I do not say he has, but I do say that as Liberal organizer in the province of Manitoba, he is sending out circulars inviting your agents to come into his office for instructions, and he was shielding these people who were guilty.

Mr. FISHER. Was that proven in court?

Mr. BRADBURY. I would think so.

Mr. FISHER. The statement is made that Perry was shielding these men who were guilty. Was that proven in court?

Mr. STAPLES. His own letter shows it.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Perry has nothing to do with the taking of the census for the Department of Agriculture. If Mr. Perry wishes to write to a census enumerator or commissioner, I have nothing to do with it. He is not doing so with my authority; he has no authority from the department or from me to do it, and he has nothing to do with the taking of the census.

Mr. STAPLES. Has Mr. Perry the patronage of the constituency of Macdonald at the present time? Will the Minister of Agriculture answer that?

Mr. FISHER. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Perry has no patronage of any place at all. But——

Mr. STAPLES. And so far as I know he has.

Mr. FISHER. Pardon me; the hon. gentleman asked a question, and he must let me answer it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Call it six o'clock.

Mr. FISHER. I will not call it six o'clock until it is six o'clock. The hon. member (Mr. Staples) asked me a question, and I stated in answer that Mr. Perry has not the patronage and nobody else has the patronage of any particular place so far as I am concerned. If Mr. Perry or any one else makes a recommendation in regard to patronage or to an appointment I listen to these recommendations and I judge of them, and in accordance with my own judgment I make the appointment. I will now call it six o'clock, and leave hon. gentlemen opposite to think over that.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle) Mr. Speaker this is not the first time that the history of the notorious Prince Albert elections has been given in this House. It was given by myself a good many years ago, in less eloquent and picturesque language, perhaps, but with the facts substantially the same throughout. The minister must have heard it on that occasion, as I am pretty certain he was in the House, and it was notorious throughout the whole of Canada, being printed in the public press from one end of the country to the other. The main facts are that there was a conspiracy to obtain illicit votes in favour of the Liberal candidate in the Prince Albert election. Three men started out into the wilds with the avowed purpose of opening three polls. They did not open any polls at all. They went to a secluded place, opened their poll booths and filled the poll books with fictitious names.

Mr. FISHER. Was that a provincial or a Dominion election?

Mr. LAKE. A provincial election. Amongst the fictitious names occurred very frequently the name of Rabbitskin. It was shown at the time that after the three deputy returning officers had exhausted the names they could recall to mind, the ordinary every-day names, Mr. Moberley, who was with them, suggested that he had heard of a family of half-breeds in that neighbourhood called Rabbitskin. So they filled out a large number of the entries with the surname of Rabbitskin, with many different Christian names attached to them. Then, having filled the poll books with names, they filled the ballot boxes with bogus ballots, brought them back from the wilds into the town and produced 151 ballots, sufficient to elect the Liberal candidate. The minister will remember—in fact, he remembered to-day—that Mr. Moberley, the man who was very active in connection with that affair, who acted as poll clerk, and was fined for his connection with the business, was appointed to a job in connection with the census. The minister must have understood that the case was a very bad one, because he took summary proceeding, after the matter had been repeatedly brought to his notice in this House, to have Mr. Moberley recalled at some expense to the country. Two of the three deputy returning officers who were concerned in this notorious business were government officials. Both of them lost their jobs. I presume that even the present administration did not consider it safe to retain them in government positions. The third was a homesteader, and the government in his case was kind enough to protect his homestead, and grant him an extension of leave during his enforced absence in the United States, as a fugitive from justice. The case indeed was so bad that Dr. Tyreman, who had been declared elected by the returning officer, refused to take his seat in the legislature, and did not take his seat. Subsequently the Committee on Elections and Privileges in the Local House, having exhaustively inquired into the case, awarded the seat to Mr. Donaldson, the Provincial Rights candidate. The minister speaks of these men as having been guilty of a trivial offence. The leader of the opposition put the matter clearly and tersely this afternoon when he declared that these deputy returning officers, who were subsequently fugitives from justice, had been guilty of perjury and forgery. The minister says that he can see no connection between the Prince Albert election case and the appointment of census officials for the province of Manitoba. The connection is that Mr. Perry is proved by the correspondence which has been read in the House to-day to have been guilty of conspiring to defeat the ends of justice by assisting these men to become fugitives from justice and advising them to keep out of the way. Let me read Mr. Perry's own letter, a facsimile of which was subsequently published in the press of the country. This is what Mr. Perry himself said:

Box 723,
Regina, Sask., Oct. 20, 1906.

Dear Sir,—I inclose for your information and guidance copy of 'Leader' of this date containing complete text of judgment of the full court in the Sinclair case and which disposes of the conspiracy phase of the Prince Albert district election cases. It does not, however, dispose of the two counts against the deputy returning officers and poll clerks, viz.: Making false returns; stuffing ballot boxes; for which they are liable under sections 128 and 133 of the Territories Elections Ordinance.

Section 128 reads:—Any persons appointed as returning officer, election clerk, deputy returning officers or poll clerk, who fails to carry out any of the duties imposed by this ordinance or who contravenes any of its provisions shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 and costs, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or both.

Section 133 reads:—Penalties under this ordinance may be recovered on summary conviction before two justices of the peace.

The three deputies were fined on only one charge, that of not holding the polls at the proper time and place.

Moberley, a poll clerk, was fined for writing the word 'voted' after the names of parties in the poll book, his fine being $100, while that of each deputy was $200.

The Tories are naturally disappointed and sore over the decision of the full court, and I am informed that Moore, editor of their paper, the 'West,' and McDonald, their organizer, are going to Prince Albert the beginning of the next week.

I am also informed on the best authority that the Tories say that any or all of the fellows who are away, will be arrested immediately on their return, which quite bears out what I have understood all along they were threatening to do.

I, therefore, cannot hold out any hope for your early return; things will settle down after a while, when the by-election is over and after the end of next session of the House. I shall be pleased to give you any further information, if possible to obtain it, and you so desire.

Yours very truly,
H. E. PERRY.

So that by the letter of Mr. Perry himself he stands convicted of aiding and abetting the escape of criminals from justice. And yet the minister appears to treat him as quite a fit and proper representative of the Liberal party in the province of Manitoba, and apparently he sees no harm in consulting him as a representative Liberal. Well, if ministers of the Crown consider such men fit representatives of the great Liberal party, we are content that they should do so. The Minister of Agriculture went on to say that he had numerous recommendations, many of which were from Mr. Perry for appointments to the census, but he refused to say upon whose recommendations he acted with regard to the different cases. All the evidence, however, points to the fact that in a number of cases he acted on Perry's recommendation. At any rate the confidential circular issued by Mr. Perry, and which was read by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples), shows that whether the appointments were made on the recommendation of Mr. Perry or not, it was he who was entrusted with the duty of notifying the successful candidates of their selection by the government.

Mr. FISHER. The enumerators were all notified by the Department. No one else had any authority to notify them.

Mr. LAKE. Apparently this Liberal organizer considered that he had the authority.

Mr. FISHER. He had none.

Mr. LAKE. Allow me to read the letter which he wrote, which will show that he acted as if the appointments came from him and from him only. This circular letter, which I am about to read, is headed:

Liberal Executive Organization Committee,
Winnipeg, April 17, 1911.

Dear Sir,—Re census in federal constituency of McDonald. I beg to advise you that you have been recommended as enumerator for the following official census enumeration division of the above constituency:—

Then follows a typewritten slip with these words:—

64. That part of the parish of St. Charles, north of the Assiniboine river.

Mr. Perry goes on to say:

I inclose copy of rates as officially announced in the 'Canada Gazette' of April 15, 1911, and would be pleased if within ten days you would please acknowledge reception of this letter.

Yours in the good cause,
H. E. PERRY.

P.S.—Whenever you are in the city, we shall be pleased to have you call.

Does the minister repudiate that letter?

Mr. FISHER. I say that Mr. Perry had no authority to give any intimation to the enumerators of their appointments. I had nothing to do with that letter and knew nothing about it.

Mr. LAKE. It is very strange this Liberal organizer should have known the persons who were recommended.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman must accept my statement that Mr. Perry had no authority.

Mr. LAKE. I am not disputing the statement and I take it that the minister repudiates this letter. This is a circular letter with the blanks filled in in another handwriting and with a slip attached in another kind of typewriting, which indicates that a number of different letters were written to a number of different individuals, and a rubber stamp is used for the signature. One cannot doubt therefore that Mr. Perry was cognizant of all those who were recommended for these appointments. Whether he was so informed by the minister or not is another question; but that he was absolutely personally cognizant of all these recommendations this letter fully establishes. It was the first notice that each person appointed had of his appointment.

Mr. BARKER. The minister should explain.

Mr. LAKE. Then the person recommended is asked to acknowledge within ten days the receipt of the letter notifying him of his appointment. Why was he asked to do so if Mr. Perry was not in some way connected with the official recommendation? The minister repudiated the idea that the enumerators were to go to the Liberal organizer for instructions. He may say that they were not to go to the Liberal organizer for instructions with regard to their work as enumerators, but the postcript attached to the letter shows clearly that they were to go to the Liberal organizer for instructions as to the side work and the canvassing they were to do in the interests of the Liberal party. I have no wish to detain the House any longer. Mr. Moberly was appointed on the recommendation of some one. On whose recommendation the minister cannot remember. Probably it was on the recommendation of Perry himself. The minister made the appointment and then subsequently had to put the public to considerable expense in order to send for this man and get him back from the wilds of the far north. Mr. Moberly had been convicted and fined and the time had come for the Department or the Liberal executive to reward him, and they apparently recommended him for this appointment in the census. This man, Perry, is convicted, according to his own letters, of endeavouring to keep fugitives from justice out of the reach of the strong arm of the law. Does the minister consider that such a person is a proper man from whom to accept any recommendations? Is he prepared to say that he did accept the recommendations of Mr. Perry for appointments as census eumerators? I pause for a reply.

Mr. FISHER. I am not ready to say that I have not accepted any of his recommendations.

Mr. LAKE. Then I hope the minister will now take steps to see that the persons who were recommended by this man are promptly cancelled. It seems to me that these recommendations were improperly made, and I sincerely hope that this House will not endorse the action of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. G. H. BRADBURY (Selkirk). I do not intend to take up much time, but as this is a question which affects the whole province of Manitoba, I consider it my duty to give my views with regard to it. It is a question that deserves most serious consideration. Charges have been made against a gentleman ocupying the prominent position of Liberal organizer for the province of Manitoba. This gentleman is practically repudiated by the Minister of Agriculture, yet he assumes power and authority to write the letter that has been read by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. (Mr. Lake) addressed to the enumerators throughout the province advising them of their appointment and asking them to call at his office for instructions, and I hold that this calls for some action by the minister who is responsible for the census. The minister says this man has no authority; he repudiates him, as I understand it. I ask him what action he is going to take. Is he going to remain silent in the face of this circular letter sent out by the Liberal organizer in Manitoba to the enumerators, asking them to call at this man's office. In view of the record of the Liberal organizers in Manitoba, and the experience of the Conservative party with these men, it becomes imperative for the Conservative members of this House to discuss this matter with the minister who is responsible, for the conduct of these men. I cannot conceive that any crime could be committed by any man occupying the position this man occupies greater than the crime which has been brought home to him in relation to this Prince Albert election. It is one of the most scandalous affairs that ever took place in Canada. These men manufactured three polls where there was not one soul living. According to the history of this case over 160 ballots were made up in a little bluff. These men sat down and deliberately manufactured a list. Yet this Mr. Perry, the Liberal organizer, is the man who shielded these men from justice, and when they were fugitives from the country, this man remained at home advising them that it was dangerous for them to return, that the Tories were threatening to prosecute. This is the man who organiezs the province of Manitoba for the Liberal party. History repeats itself in regard to these organizers. We have had other cases about as bad in that province. But we thought the Liberal party had been taught a lesson and that they would hesitate before they would again employ a man with a record as spicy as that of this man Mr. Perry. There is no question that this gentleman, in that Prince Albert election case, stood between these men and justice, that he shielded them, and that he was a party to the crimes they committed in relation to these ballot boxes. I do not suppose for a minute that the minister knew who this man was when he accepted his recommendation to appoint enumerators, but now that he does know, I ask him, is he going to confirm his appointment?

Mr. FISHER. I certainly will not change appointments until I find that the appointees are not worthy of their offices.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would ask the minister this question: What is he going to do in regard to this circular letter which this gentleman sent out?

Mr. FISHER. Nothing whatever. The gentleman has a right to write a letter, just as the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Bradbury) has.

Mr. BRADBURY. I take a very different view of this question. The minister (Mr. Fisher) is responsible to this country for the proper taking of the census.

Mr. FISHER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADBURY. He is bound to safeguard the men who take that census. Put aside the fact that this man is a Liberal organizer. It might be any other man who would write a letter of that kind addressed to the enumerators, asking them to come in for instructions——

Mr. FISHER. May I see that letter?

Mr. BRADBURY. Certainly. I will read it to the House, and send it over to the 'Hansard.'

Mr. FISHER. It has just been read by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake).

Mr. BRADBURY. It is so good I want to impress it upon the minister.

MANITOBA LIBERAL EXECUTIVE.

Confidential circular.

Organizer's Office, P.O. Drawer 2076,
Winnipeg, Canada, April 17, 1911.

Jno. Colnin,
Dickens' P.O.

Dear Sir,—Re census in federal constituency of Macdonald. I beg to advise you that you have been recommended as enumerator for the following official census enumeration division of the above constituency:—

No. 54. That part of the parish of St. Charles, north of the Assiniboine river.

Mr. FISHER. I understood the hon. member for Qu'Appelle to say that this gentleman was telling these people that they were 'nominated.' The letter as read by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr.

Bradbury) is that they had been recommended.'

Mr. BRADBURY. I think the letter was read very clearly:

—of the above constituency No. 54, that part of the parish of St. Charles, north of the Assiniboine river.

The minister has repudiated this man, but I would ask him: How is this man in a position to give these minute facts in regard to what each enumerator was recommended for? It was not from the minister——

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. BRADBURY— it must have been from some of his officials. This was not manufactured.

I inclose copy of rates as officially announced in the 'Canada Gazette' of April 15, 1911, and would be pleased if within ten (10) days of date hereof, you would acknowledge receipt of this letter.

Yours in the good cause,
H. E. PERRY.

(Whenever you are in the city, we shall be pleased to have you call.)

Mr. FISHER. May I interrupt my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury)? I understood him to say a few minutes ago that Mr. Perry had asked these men to come in for instructions. There is absolutely nothing in the letter to indicate that.

Mr. BRADBURY. I do not know why Mr. Perry should invite these enumerators into his office if it was not for consideration, consultation or instructions.

Mr. FISHER. That is gratuitous assumption on the hon. member's part. There is no foundation for it.

Mr. BRADBURY. We need not split hairs as to why he was asking them to call. But it is the duty of the minister to see to it that the public are safeguarded from a man like this taking upon himself the authority to write such letters to enumerators appointed to take the census of this country. If this man was not authorized, where did he get his knowledge of the number of the district which each man was to take charge of? Why, Mr. Speaker, it is as plain to me as anything can be that this organizer was given this information and was given an opportunity of picking these men—perhaps not by the minister; I have to accept his statement across the floor of the House—but certainly by some one in authority. I do not object to this man being chosen to take charge of the census of Manitoba because he is a Liberal organizer. In my own country, the man who is chosen to look after the taking of the census is the Liberal organizer of the county, Ira Stratton. Hs is more than that; he has a position that keeps him on the road all the time; he is secretary of the post office association. He boasts openly that he has the patronage of the county. Man after man has been appointed, to my knowledge, on his recommendation, and, more than that, he is the probable Liberal candidate in the next election.

An hon. MEMBER. He must be a good man.

Mr. BRADBURY. No doubt as good a man or a better man than our friend Perry, although I do not think he is so well qualified for the position he occupies as Liberal organizer as Mr. Perry is. I believe it is the duty of the minister to repudiate this Liberal organizer Perry and to warn the public that this man has no authority to write these letters broadcast asking these men to call at his office and get instructions. The letter bears on its face evidence that he is acting on authority from some source, and the minister, who alone is responsible to this House for the action of his department, must take the responsibility and repudiate this man unless he is acting with authority.

Mr. GLEN CAMPBELL (Dauphin). I have never seen a minister so hard put for words, especially a verbose gentleman like the Minister of Agriculture who always has words to defend a question such as has been brought up by my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples). This is one of the most indefensible things brought to the attention of the House this session. It has been shown that a certain man in the employ of the Liberal party in the west has been officially taking part in the appointment of census enumerators. I have in my hand a letter from the executive office of the Liberal organizer of Manitoba signed by the organizer and marked 'confidential circular' showing that this is not the only one that was sent out, that perhaps hundreds of others have been sent out to various enumerators, as I believe. It is evident that Perry has taken on himself a great part in the appointment of enumerators. It has been shown here that this man has been doing his utmost, perhaps for party reasons, to shield criminals; birds of a feather are noted for flocking together, and if he has been in the habit of shielding criminals, I have not the slightest doubt that in his choice of enumerators for this census he will not pick the cleanest men he can employ. The letters which he wrote to these fugitives from justice, if you can read between the lines, show that he kept these men while they were in the United States, fugitives from Canadian justice. The minister said that one of these men, Moberley, had been brought before the courts and found guilty of a trivial offence.

The Liberal party must be dipped in tar to call such offences as these men committed, trivial. This man was convicted of making false returns on oath, perjury of the worst kind, and the little old gentleman sits there and calls that a trivial offence against the laws of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. TALBOT. Has the hon. gentleman from Dauphin a right to call the Minister of Agriculture 'the little old gentlemen'?

Mr. SPEAKER. The words are not unparliamentary.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) can find a more appropriate term, after the speech we had from the minister, I would be glad to use it. Another offence which the minister calls trivial was the stuffing of ballot boxes. I would call that pretty near a hanging offence, but he might call it trivial because the stuffing of ballot boxes on behalf of the Liberal party has become so common that they regard it as trivial. Mr. Perry winds up his letter: Yours in the good cause. I would ask the minister what he considers the good cause in a letter from an organizer of the Liberal party to a criminal who is a fugitive from justice. May I ask an answer?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Vote.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Evidently the minister is ashamed of the cause, whether it is good or not. I am sure he is ashamed of the cause he is espousing to-night as is every Liberal on that side, because no one has risen to defend it except the minister and my friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot), who made a very able defence. It was brought to your attention by the hon. member for Macdonald, Mr. Speaker, that Prince Albert, in the northwestern part of Canada, is known to have been perhaps the most crooked part of the whole of Canada in the matter of elections in the Liberal cause. It has been represented by a gentleman who is now a senator. I shall not further advert to him except to say that he has the honour of having been the sponsor for most of the gentlemen who did the kind of work which has been charged against Liberal workers out in that country. This is the part of Canada, Sir, that on one occasion was represented by the Hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Some years after the rebellion, in 1885, when the election was held, the great and only cry was: Vote for Laurier; he is the great white French leader down in eastern Canada and he is the man who said that if he had been up here when Riel was fighting he would have shouldered his musket; therefore you must vote for him, he being a good loyal French Canadian. He was elected and Mr. McKay was defeated.

An hon. MEMBER. Very fine.

An hon. MEMBER. Very good.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not know whether I heard my hon. friend who now represents Prince Albert say 'very fine,' but I presume that when he used those words he was referring to the methods which were employed in his deferred election. This is above all the place in Canada where corruption of all sorts has been perpetrated in the past, and I hope that in future we will not be justified in saying anything of the kind about it. If nothing of the kind can be said about it there will not be a Liberal member representing it. I hope that the good sense of this House will compel hon. members, regardless of their politics, to vote in strong support of the resolution brought forth by the hon. member for Macdonald.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw). Mr. Speaker, the motion which has been placed in your hands by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) in amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply is not very harmful. It is divided into two parts. The first part is such that no person would very seriously take exception to it. The second part is one, which, because of its innuendo, can scarcely be accepted by this side of the House without acknowledging that there has been that corruption which he says is not to be allowed to continue. However, the motion itself is not nearly as unfair, is not nearly as undesirable a thing to bring into this House, as some of the remarks which have been made by gentlemen who have spoken in favour of the amendment. The remarks of the hon. member for Macdonald, while generally in good nature, were such as scarcely to call for any serious reply on this side of the House. I think that if you take out his facetious references to 'beer and pickled pigs' feet,' take out his weighty arguments with regard to 'jack rabbits,' and eliminate some of the deep and ponderous remarks which, as the product of a curious mental process, poured forth from his lips, there is very little left which calls for any reply. The circular upon which he based his remarks is to my mind the most harmless communication that he could have brought here. There is nothing on the face of it, or on the back of it, which requires any defence from this side of the House. In the first place it is a confidential communication. I am not surprised at its use here. It is a circular and, in endeavouring to bring up a motion such as this I suppose these hon. gentlemen can go very far and very wide of the mark to bring forward a document of this character, although they make use of a confidential communication signed by Mr. H. E. Perry. My first impression was to consider it a departure from good taste to read a confidential communication, but we will let that go as unimportant. They brought in one or two points that are absolutely foreign to the communication itself. The one which is most offensive which they endeavour to read between the lines is that the organizer called upon the prospective appointees to come into his office and receive instructions. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, when they present that view of it, know full well that there is no such thought suggested by the letter. You can read that letter from beginning to end and there is no such idea in the mind of the writer as that which is suggested by these hon. gentlemen. There is a little postscript at the close of the letter which says: 'When in the city come in and see me.' Could there be a more ordinary thing to say than that? The organizer anxious to make good feeling says at the foot of his letter: 'Come in and see me.' There is not a suggestion of wrong-doing or of corruption in that little postscript. Notwithstanding the insinuation that hon. gentlemen endeavour to make with respect to the writer of that letter, I say there is nothing in it to be in the slightest ashamed of. It gives notice to certain men that they have been recommended. That letter might have been written just as well and in just as good faith by any hon. member on the other side of the House or by the Conservative organizer conveying the information to a certain man that he had been appointed to such and such a position.

Mr. STAPLES. That letter says: I beg to advise you that you have been appointed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. STAPLES. He is the man who advises these gentlemen that they have been appointed.

Mr. KNOWLES. That is exactly what I am saying. It might be written by any one. This gentleman sits down and says: 'I beg to advise you that you have been appointed.' I have written many such letters in which I have made no recommendation whatever. I learn that a person has been appointed to an office and I write him, as I would write him with regard to anything else that might concern him, and say: 'I beg to advise you that you have been appointed.' If an hon. gentleman opposite learned in one of the departments in the city of Ottawa of the appointment of a rural postmaster would it not be the most natural thing in the world for him to sit down and write: 'I beg to advise you that you have been appointed to such and such a post office?' That would not mean that the writer had the ear of the government. My hon. friends from the west have written to more than one homesteader saying that there has been granted such and such a concession at the hands of the department. This is merely doing what we are doing every day.

Mr. BARKER. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he were writing such a letter to a man who had received an appointment to a post office, would he ask him to call at his office and be instructed in his duties?

Mr. KNOWLES. No.

Mr. FISHER. That letter does not say that; it does not contain those words.

Mr. KNOWLES. No, I would not ask him to come in and be instructed. If hon. gentlemen would stick to the letter, or bring a letter which says something about instructions, or else stop talking about instructions it would be more to the point. I would think nothing of it if the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) wrote a gentleman in Dundas advising him that a certain thing had been done in his interest, in the departments at Ottawa and saying in closing the letter: If you happen to be in the city, drop in and see me. Would we have read into that letter something greatly to the discredit of the hon. member for Hamilton; would we have said that he was a man of the most unworthy kind? No, would we not say rather that it was an innocent remark such as any man might put into a letter he was writing to a political friend, or indeed to any one else. That letter is, to my mind, the silliest kind of thing to base an argument upon. I think the argument based on that letter by the opposition, and on which they found a non-confidence motion is one of the most nonsensical I have ever heard during the six or seven sessions I have been in this House. I may have forgotten some of these non-confidence motions, there were very many so nonsensical, but I think that possibly this is the weakest case that has ever been made out by the opposition in this House from their point of view.

I wish now to deal with the Prince Albert election case, and I may say to begin with that it has as much to do with the taking of the census as the Indian mutiny has. What connection it has with the census, I cannot see, and I do not believe that any sensible man can. One Sinclair and one Moberley, and some one else, away back in 1905, a few weeks after we first became a province, went out, as my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples), with his ponderous reasoning says, to watch jack-rabits and eat pickled pigs' feet. And these men did what was wrong. The result was that two or three Liberals were coralled for having broken an election ordinance of the Northwest Territories such as it was then. They came back, they were punished. There lived in the province of Saskatchewan some of the very cleverest lawyers who are supporters of that provincial rights party; men who could have prosecuted these offenders, and if they thought they did wrong could have ensured that they were prosecuted to the hilt; men like the Hon. Frederick William Gordon Haultain, who was eight or nine years attorney general of the Northwest Territories, and who with his own pen had written the election ordinance they broke. Why didn't he, seeing that the courts of the land were open to every one, swing wide their doors and himself lay, or have some one else lay a complaint for forgery or perjury. Then there was Mr. J. T. Brown, now one of the judges of the Supreme Court of Saskatchewan who, had the provincial rights party been elected, would have been their attorney general no doubt, and there was every opportunity for Liberal and Conservative alike to prosecute these men to the hilt for just as serious a charge as it was possible to bring against them. There is no reflection on the Liberal party in connection with that matter. It is not the business of the Liberal party any more than of the Conservative party to prosecute men, even though they be party friends. But these men were prosecuted. They were fined by the magistrates who had been appointed by Mr. Haultain himself on the testimony produced before them such as it was. I merely mention that fact to show that there could be no suspicion surrounding their trial, and what the magistrate thought was a just punishment was meted out to them, and they bore it. Now, why is the Minister of Agriculture to be called upon to answer for all this? What connection is there between that and the appointing of some census commissioners in the province of Manitoba?

It is said by these gentlemen opposite that this man, Mr. Perry, some months afterwards, down in the city of Regina, wrote a few letters to these men telling them how the litigation was proceeding, and telling them that if they were to return they no doubt would be prosecuted, and stating that if they wished to avoid meeting a charge of that kind at that time, they had better not return within the jurisdiction of that court. There is nothing criminal about that. I would dare to say that any lawyer would write such a letter to his client; I would dare to say that any friend would send such a letter to another friend under similar circumstances. Even if I were not a lawyer, and not acting as solicitor, if I had a friend who wanted to know how litigation was proceeding, I would not feel that I would demean myself by giving him any information that any man in the land had to give that was present on the ground. Everybody knew these things which Mr. Perry was writing to that man, and there is absolutely no guilt resting on Mr. Perry, and there is absolutely nothing to connect him with a crime, and there is not even the slightest suspicion cast this afternoon in the remarks of gentlemen opposite that Mr. Perry knew anything about that offence before it was committed, or that he had ever dreamed of such a thing. The only charge they can make is that he knew of the threatened charge afterwards, and that he did a friendly act for those who were then away from the jurisdiction of the courts of Saskatchewan.

Let me say, however, since it has been brought into the discussion, that it was to the credit of the Saskatchewan government —and reflection has been cast upon that government this afternoon—that at the very first opportunity they gave that seat to the Conservative who had been the candidate. As soon as Dr. Tyreman knew of the grave irregularity that had been charged he endeavoured to place his resignation before the proper authorities that the seat might be vacated and go to Mr. Donaldson; but, according to our election ordinance, while the seat was under protest it was not possible until the litigation was over that he could offer his resignation, and the question was also before the Privileges and Elections Committee of the Saskatchewan house. I will admit that it was unfortunately a long time before Mr. Donaldson was able to take the seat, but I have never heard complaint or criticism on that score. At all events, the fact is that on the very first day it was possible for the government of the Hon. Walter Scott to make such a motion, they introduced a motion at the hands of the Attorney General of Saskatchewan vacating that seat, and then by special Act of the legislature of Saskatchewan Mr. Donaldson, the Conservative member, represented that constituency as the occupant of that seat for the rest of the parliament.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How many years did it take to find out that Mr. Donaldson was elected?

Mr. KNOWLES. I think two years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, a little over two years.

Mr. KNOWLES. I said there was an unfortunately long delay, but I have never yet heard the criticism offered that that delay was avoidable. I know it was done just as fast as the procedure of the legislative assembly and the litigation in the courts would allow of its being done. At anyrate, as soon as it was possible to do so they did it.

Let me say, in conclusion, that probably the last man in this government that should have reflections cast upon him for his conduct in the discharge of his duty and in the administration of his department, is the Minister of Agriculture. I was pretty well pleased with the Minister of Agriculture when he stood up and said in effect, though not in words: that it was practically his own business where he got his recommendations from, that he declined to tell whence they came, and that he took responsibility for all his acts. I am pleased with that declaration of the Minister of Agriculture, and I trust that our friends opposite will read between the lines and, seeing that they are so keen on reading 'instructions,' see that there is a little instruction meant for them in that. And, I think that what the Minister of Agriculture meant is: that the Liberals are governing this country, that they make the appointments to office, that they get their recommendations where in their wisdom they think right. The ministers no doubt use their own judgment, and they seek the counsel of their friends, and if they wish it sometimes of their foes, but when it comes to the last resort I think what the Minister of Agriculture meant was that the sixty, seventy or eighty hon. gentlemen opposite should understand that for the present at least the Laurier government is governing this country and making the appointments to office. And this idea of gentlemen opposite, that because for a few days they may hold us up and waste our time and defer the business of the House, that, therefore, they are governing the country, is absolutely an illusion on their part. They are governing the country only as a man somehow can interfere with the lines of communication a little here and a little there, but when it comes to the long run they will find that just as for the last fifteen years so for many years to come the hand of Sir Wilfrid Laurier will hold the reins, and that the chariot of good government will be driven by him, and this country continue to prosper under his guidance.

Now, suppose that Mr. Perry did make some unfortunate recommendations; suppose he did recommend some unfit men, and suppose his recommendations were accepted —although we have not learned that he had any patronage; in fact, we learn that he had not and that he has no connection with the government directly or indirectly; suppose that he did make recommendations, why even a Conservative organizer can make recommendations if he wishes, but that is another matter—well, suppose he did make recommendations, and suppose the minister appointed his nominees, these men would go among the people, the people would know them and it is the people in the long run who will judge of what this government does. It is the people of Canada who, in every election since 1896, have judged what this government has done. We have heard a lot about the polling booths this afternoon, but in 1896, in 1900, in 1904, in 1908, despite the slanders that were uttered, the Liberal party went into these same polling booths in every constituency from the Atlantic to the Pacific and the people, time after time by overwhelming majorities, declared to Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Come back and govern the country again; we want to be governed by the Liberals and not by the Conservatives. And, Sir, we on this side of the House are not afraid that the Minister of Agriculture by this or any other act of his in the administration of his department will lose the confidence of the people of Canada or will do anything other than what he has always done, and that is to conduct his department with great credit to himself and to those who support him, and with enormous benefit to the welfare and prosperity of this country. We are not afraid of the impression our census enumerators will make in the country, nor have we any doubt that the Minister of Agriculture, in this or in any other act of administration will, as he has always done, conduct it so that those who support him will be prouder of him than ever. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk of the recommending system. Let me tell them that it will be a long day before they will serve any practical trouble with the recommending system, for it will, I believe, be many a long year before it comes their turn to do any recommending to offices. I am not surprised at our hon. friends from Manitoba being desirous of prolonging this debate as long as they can, for, without referring to the occupant of any particular seat, I think they have come to realize that their voters are not altogether pleased with the manner in which they have represented them during the larger part of this session; and so hon. gentlemen desire to bring up some other issue, something that they are not afraid to talk about among their constituents. It is more than pleasing to find supporters of the good old Conservative party in Manitoba shedding tears over the guilt of this government —men who support and follow a government, starting from the man who builds railways into sand pits that he owns——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Order, Mr. Speaker. I rise to a point of order. No hon. member of this House has any right to throw out any insinuations against the premier of my province.

Mr. KNOWLES. Mr Speaker, since it is so offensive to the hon. gentleman, I have no desire to hurt his feelings. He is always so careful of the feelings of others that I shall not go further in speaking of the Conservative party of Manitoba, but will just say to hon. members of this House who are not familiar with the west that they are pretty much of a kind from the top to the bottom.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat can regard the remarks which he has just addressed to the House as a defence against the accusations made against the Minister of Agriculture and against Mr. Perry in this House this afternoon and to-night, then he is very easily satisfied, and we on this side of the House have no complaint to make. The hon. gentleman, at the outset of his remarks, complained of an hon. gentleman on this side having read a confidential circular or letter that was issued by Mr. Perry to a private individual in the constituency of Regina ; and yet the hon. gentleman sits behind a government that has been guilty of publishing correspondence of a private character sent by private individuals all over the country to the Postmaster General prior to the coming into power of this Laurier government, of which we have heard so much from the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) to-night—publishing that private correspondence in a blue-book, and sending it broadcast throughout the Dominion. I have not heard the hon. gentleman condemn any action of that kind on the part of a minister of the Crown. I think the taking of the census is a matter that should be absolutely free from any taint or suspicion of party politics. By that I do not claim that the political proclivities of the census enumerators should be completely ignored, because I recognize that in this country we have party government, and in such appointments the party in power will always give the preference to their own political friends. With that I have no fault to find. But when the government ignore the character of the appointees, and when they select Liberal organizers who bear unsavoury reputations and appoint them, not only for their qualifications, but as a reward for party services of a most questionable character as has occurred in this instance, and in many instances in the past in the province of Manitoba, it is a different matter. As the hon. member for Selkirk has truly said, it is most unfortunate that the Liberal organizers in the province of Manitoba for years back have been men who have been guilty of questionable transactions which have resulted in bringing into disrepute not only themselves but the party they represent. It is only necessary to refer to the gentleman who preceded Mr. Perry as the Liberal organizer, Mr. R. E. Leach, the author of 'the thin red line,' by which he disfranchised a larger number of electors, and who was rewarded afterwards with an office in the Department of the Interior carrying $2,000 a year and expenses, and whose expenses have been so outrageous that the Auditor General has taken him strictly to task for them in his report of this year. It is also worthy of notice that nearly every person who worked with Mr. Leach at that time, and assisted him in disfranchising the electors, has also received a position under this government. It is only necessary to refer to Messrs. Macleod, Neigh, Ayotte and Duggan. It seems strange that men who are guilty of acts of the most questionable character on behalf of the party are able to hold up the government and secure almost any position they ask. Now, the hon. Minister of Agriculture was not quite so frank with the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples), as he should have been on Friday when answering his questions. In that somewhat important air which he sometimes arrogates to himself, he replied to some of the questions in the most emphatic manner. For instance, when he was asked if certain enumerators were appointed, he honestly and frankly stated that they were. When he was asked, however, who recommended them, he declined to answer, though to-day he is not nearly so reluctant to answer the question, for he did admit that Mr. Perry, the Liberal organizer, nominated some of the enumerators. To the third question, did Mr. Perry ask the enumerators to come into his office to be schooled, he most emphatically replied, no. We can all read between the lines and can realize that when Mr. Perry wrote that letter inviting the enumerators to come into his office and be schooled, he did not mean in order to count the heads for census purposes, but to school them to count political heads in order that this information might be utilized by the Liberal party in the province. This information would come in very well at this particular time, because in the province of Manitoba they are just now in the act of revising the voters' lists, in connection with which the information that could be secured by these census enumerators by turning them into party hacks would be of a most useful character. The information would also be most useful to this government when the redistribution takes place a few months hence, and in the election that is expected to take place in the near future. I have no doubt this was the schooling that Mr. Perry referred to when he extended his invitation to these enumerators to come into his office. It has been said, oh, he merely stated in this letter: 'I have the honour to advise you that you have been recommended.' I would ask the Minister of Agriculture whether this gentleman to whom this letter was addressed was not appointed census enumerator.

Mr. FISHER. I really do not know. I do not know to whom the letter was addressed.

Mr. ROCHE. It was addressed to John Colnin, Dickens post office. The minister cannot tell us whether he was appointed enumerator or not, but evidently Mr. Perry was quite sure, or he would not have delimitated the area in which he was to work or sent him the rates, or asked for an answer within 10 days, or invited him to his office in Winnipeg on the first occasion he visited that city. There can be no doubt that this gentleman was not only recommended but appointed to the position of census enumerator.

Mr. EMMERSON. What is the date of this letter?

Mr. ROCHE. April the 17th of this year. The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has asked what connection had the Prince Albert election to do with the selection of enumerators for Manitoba. Well, if the Prince Albert election has no direct connection with the selection of enumerators for Manitoba, it has a very direct connection with the gentleman through whose hands aparently these enumerators are being appointed, I refer to Mr. Perry. According to the correspondence read tonight, this man Perry stood in a very unenviable light indeed in connection with the shielding these fugitives from justice, who had to flee from the country because of their doings in the Prince Albert election when working the Liberal machine. That was one of the most disgraceful episodes in the political history of this country. Fancy these deputy returning officers and poll clerks being sent away out north to hold polls hundreds of miles from Prince Albert. They did not go within a hundred miles of the places where they were to hold the polls, but they sat down on the prairie, took out their poll books and poll boxes, and wrote in the poll books the names of 150 fictitious individuals—among them, as my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples) has said the Rabbit family predominated—and they stuffed the ballot boxes with 150 ballots, every one of which was marked in favour of the Liberal candidate. And they came back to Prince Albert with their boxes and their poll books and hailed the result as a great victory in the far north for the Liberal candidate, morally and otherwise. They made out their false returns. Forgery and perjury are none too strong names to characterize their actions. When arrested and brought before the court, who was it appeared to prosecute them and who appeared in their behalf? Instead of the Dominion government prosecutor appearing before the court to see that justice was done, he appeared in their defence. They pleaded guilty and were fined. The deputy returning officers were fined $200 each and the poll clerks $100 each for having stuffed the ballot boxes and made false returns. The fines were paid by a clerk in the Crown prosecutors office. Where did the money come from? I think we need not stretch our imagination very much to say that it could have come from no other source than the Liberal campaign fund. But when recount of the ballots took place, after these men had been fined and after it was proven that 150 ballots were fictitious, the judge holding the recount, counted every one of these as legitimate. That may have been technically within the law, but there is not a man within the sound of my voice, be he Liberal or Conservative who will not say it was travesty of justice.

After the trial some of these deputy returning officers made themselves scarce. They fled south of the boundary line, and then this correspondence took place between Perry and these fugitives from justice, which the hon. member for Moose jaw (Mr. Knowles) looks upon as so innocent that he, as a lawyer, would do it for any of his clients. Well, I do not think the hon. gentleman will find his ethics endorsed by other practitioners at the bar; but in any event Mr. Perry was not acting as a lawyer for these men, but as the head of the Liberal machine in that province, as the Liberal organizer, and he was accessory to those offences, after if not before, because he was doing his best to keep these men out of the country lest there should be still greater rascalities unearthed if they remained or reappeared on the scene.

I do not propose to go through all this correspondence, but wish to refer to a few paragraphs in this correspondence which the hon. member for Moosejaw tells us was of such an innocent character. In the letter of June 10, I find these paragraphs:

> Tories threatening further prosecution.
> I have heard it said that the missing deputies would be as well to keep out of sight, I think this is undoubtedly correct.

This is the gentleman against whom the hon. member for Moosejaw says there has not been found anything wrong by reason of anything that transpired in that election or subsequently. The following day Perry wrote again:

> Tories are talking of other prosecutions and are, of course, pleased at the results so far.
> Prudence would, I should judge, suggest to the absent deputies that their safety lies in remaining away.

This is taken from correspondence between Perry and Neilson, and Perry was not then writing as a lawyer to a client, but as the Liberal organizer advising these people to stay away until the trouble had blown over, as they would be subject to more prosecutions, should they reappear on the scene.

Let me quote one more paragraph out of a letter written by Perry on October, the 4th, to Neilson, who acted as deputy returning officer:

The 'Standard' here last night published a story that if the case went against Sinclair, he was going to squeal.

Squeal about what? Squeal on whom? Evidently there was something which had not yet been brought to light and which Perry was afraid might come out if further prosecutions took place. But he expresses his confidence in the returning officer Sinclair by saying:

But I do not believe that, as he would never do anything to help the Tories, he is too sore on them. Kindly consider this as absolutely confidential and done in your interests.

This came from Perry who evidently had the ear of the Department of Agriculture, if not the minister, and who assumed the responsibility of sending out a circular under the seal of confidence to his appointee notifying him of his appointment and inviting him to his office on the first opportunity. In a letter written on October 20th, 1906, Perry goes on to say to Neilson:

I am also informed on the best authority that the Tories say that any or all of the fellows who are away will be arrested immediately on their return, which quite bears out what I have understood all along they were intending to do.

I, therefore, cannot hold out any hope for your early return. Things will settle down after awhile when the by-election is over, and after the end of next session of the House. I shall be pleased to give you any further information if possible to obtain it and you so desire.

All through this correspondence, Perry as Liberal organizer, is trying to keep these men, who perpetrated these frauds on the electors, out of the country lest further exposures might result, should they return to the disadvantage of the Liberal party.

In connection with that election, I remember a memorable saying of the Prime Minister of that province (Mr. Scott). When the returns were coming in that evening from the thickly settled portions of the province and they were going against the government, Mr. Scott, in addressing his audience, said: 'Wait until you hear from the back townships.' Evidently he knew what these returns from the back townships would be and was not ignorant of what was transpiring in that portion of the country.

It is only necessary to look at the signature to the circular to show what connection there was between this government and the Liberal organizer. The Minister of Agriculture asks us to believe that any person might send out such a circular as that. Well, I wonder if a Conservative organizer sent out a letter like that, what the minister would have done. I fancy he would very soon have called him down. He would soon take him to task for arrogating to himself the authority to notify the enumerators as to their pay, as to the positions to which they were appointed, as to the territory they were supposed to cover, and practically to extend to them an invitation to come in and be schooled in his office. And when he winds up his letter 'Yours in the good cause' he emphasizes the fact that it was not for the census alone that he was writing, but rather that he might use them as political partisans—to count heads for the party as well as for the census. I think the minister (Mr. Fisher) should accept the motion of the hon. member for Macdonald. The minister says that for fifteen years past they have recognized that public office is a public trust. They have taken a very peculiar way to exhibit that to the country, if we may judge them by the appointments they have made. Leach, Mr. Perry, Ayotte, Neigh, McLeod, Duggan—all these men who figured in these scandalous transactions of the past have been provided for by one member of the government or another. Ingram, the organizer who tampered with the lists on election day, and who was also Liberal organizer for a time—I do not think he is now; I believe that Mr. Perry is the organizer—has also been provided for. I say the minister takes a peculiar way of showing his belief that public office is a public trust when he refuses to receive the motion put forward by the member for Macdonald. I think that one of his first duties in view of what has been brought to his attention to-day is to call Mr. Perry down in short order and show that he is really in earnest in saying that Mr. Perry has done this without authority. Mr. Perry should be notified to that effect, and that duty devolves upon the Minister of Agriculture, because he is the one whom this parliament will hold responsible.

Mr. FISHER. Does the hon. member know anything against this enumerator or against any of the others appointed?

Mr. ROCHE. I am not talking about the enumerators, but——

Mr. FISHER. The enumerator is the only official I have in this discussion.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I desire to call attention to the fact that the people of the west are not the only ones who have resting upon them the burden of such men as Mr. Perry. In western Ontario we have a gentleman by the name of George M. Reid, and the minister may possibly tell us what connection he has with the western district in reference to the census taking. I see it stated that:

J. C. Macpherson, special census commissioner, is in London, and will be here for the next five days, instructing the census commissioners who have been appointed to supervise the census taking in this western peninsula. To-day, Mr. Macpherson met the commissioners from Lambton, Essex and Kent county.

I find in another column of the same paper the following:

Liberal club to approve the list.
Commissioner Scatcherd presents his census appointments for revision.
Says he gave the list to George M. Reid.
Majority of forty appointments find they have not the qualifications.

Mr. Scatcherd selected the brightest and best men according to his judgment, but he had to present their names to a committee in the city of London, the head of which was Mr. George M. Reid, whom surely the minister remembers in connection with the election frauds of years gone by, and how he was brought before the courts in Toronto. Yet he is still seen strongly in evidence in the western districts of Ontario in handling the affairs of the Census Department, a department, I am sure the minister must agree with me in saying, that can best be dealt with by taking it out of politics altogether. But let me read something that this paper has to say in reference to this matter:

Many young men of this city who made application for a position as census enumerators will be disappointed. Most of them will not secure the appointment.
E. W. Scatcherd, who is to have charge of the taking of the census, received something like 105 applications, and practically appointed the forty men required to do the work.
A committee of three of the Liberal politicians of the city was appointed to go over the appointments and ratify them.

I would like to ask the minister who are the three men in London, who are appointed to carefully pick out of the group nominated by Mr. Scatcherd men to be enumerators for that district.

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The minister is not aware. But it appears that three men with George M. Reid as their leader are appointed to take charge of choosing the men who are to take the census in the city of London. This committee went to work, and of their work the newspaper says:

The result is that but few of the names originally chosen are on the revised list. The majority of them got the axe and others were appointed in their places.

And on the same page of this newspaper appears a picture of George M. Reid and over it are the words 'Did he wield the axe?' And underneath is this explanation:

Geo. M. Reid, to whom Commissioner Scatcherd states he gave the list of enumerators, most of whom were cast aside, it is alleged because of failure to qualify politically. Commissioner Reid would say nothing about 'the committee of three.'

We find also that this newspaper asks some questions in reference to Mr. Reid.

The names of the committee who made the final appointments are not known, but it is said that Geo. M. Reid was the chairman of the committee.
E. W. Scatcherd stated to the 'Free Press' Saturday that he did not know the names of the committee who made the appointment. He turned his applications over to Mr. G. M. Reid.

Mr. Scatcherd closes by making this statement:

Mr. Scatcherd says he will allot the districts again with the new men, although he had the majority of them already allotted, with the expectation that the committee would put the 'OK' on his choice. He says he saw most of the applicants and chose the ones whom he thought would be most reliable and do the best, and at the same time quick work.

I merely rise to ask the minister if he thinks that a man with the reputation of Mr. Reid in that western part of the province is the proper man to gather the enumerators from the different counties around London, and those to be appointed in the city of London, and if he has charge of the enumerators in that city, and can conduct affairs as far as the census is concerned.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Reid has no control over the enumerators at all. The newspaper stories that the hon. gentleman has read may be true or may not be true; I know nothing about them.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Why don't you find out?

Mr. FISHER. I don't care about it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I do not understand the minister saying: 'It may be true or it may not be true.' It is plainly evident that Mr. Scatcherd was appointed to select the men according to his judgment, and he was compelled to turn over to George M. Reid the names of those whom he had chosen; and the minister must know that Mr. Reid is not a fit man to take charge of taking the census in that district. I was sorry to hear the minister trying to make the House believe that he did not know what was going on about the Prince Albert election at all. No man knows better about these things than he does. He has had it drummed into him across the floor of this House as to how these frauds are carried on. I was surprised that he should try to lead the House to believe that he had heard nothing of it, and also try to belittle the member from Macdonald (Mr. Staples) for bringing forward a matter of national importance to the people of Canada. I sincerely hope the minister will see his way clear to support this resolution and thus help us to make sure that the men connected with the Census Department are free from political bias.

Mr. MONK. I have not followed this debate closely, nor am I familiar with the facts brought forward during this discussion, but I would avail myself of this opportunity to get from the government a clear declaration in regard to the opinion enunciated by my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) who stated here that the government would not tell us the basis or the recommendation on which these enumerators were appointed in different constituencies. I think we are entitled to know whether that is the policy of the government, and whether they intend to act upon that principle. My hon. friend stated here: We are governing the country, we are in possession of power, we will satisfy ourselves as to the nomination of these enumerators, and you shall not know upon what basis they are appointed. Is that the principle upon which the government will act in the eastern as well as in the western portions of Canada? The Minister of Agriculture said the other day, in answer to an inquiry, that he was satisfied as to the qualification of an enumerator, and that he would not state who had recommended that man. Is that going to be the policy? If so, I think in the face of the declaration made here to-night by the member for Moosejaw, that we are entitled to a statement from the minister on behalf of the government.

What are the facts? Is it my hon. friend who pays for the cost of the census, or is it the people of Canada? Everybody knows that the minister in charge of the department does not himself know of the persons qualified to act in each electoral district. My hon. friend knows that, and will admit it. He is, therefore, obliged to seek outside information and, as a matter of fact, we all know that under the detestable and damnable system of patronage which prevails in this country the appointment is made upon the recommendation of whom? Of a political partisan, of a friend who makes the recommendation, somebody generally in the electoral division who has some personal purpose to serve. That, I suppose, is inevitable. But are we going to be told that the House of Commons, in its general inquisitorial power, will be refused information as to the reasons which guided the minister in making the appointment, that we will not be told upon whose recommendation he assumes responsibility for that appointment? Such a proposition is preposterous, and in the face of the declaration made to-night by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) and applauded by the minister in his quiet little way, by slapping his desk, we are entitled to know whether that is the principle which is to guide the government. Was that the principle that governed in Quebec where some appointments have been approved of, and some are found very unwise? What was the motive, what was the recommendation that guided executive action? We are told that when governments get old they get faulty; I have read that in many places, and it has been said that among other things they profess that they are the masters, that they are the possessors of power, not the trustees of the people. We could have no better evidence of that than this refusal. I still believe that the government will not lay down the principle that we are not entitled to that information, but I would like to know the principle that is going to guide the government.

Mr. BARKER. One or two names have been mentioned here to-night in connection with the forthcoming census that I think call for a word or two from me, because I know some of the gentlemen who have been named. I know the career of Mr. Reid in the past as a politican. As the Minister of Agriculture knows, Mr. Reid was directly connected with the notorious Elgin frauds. His name was a household word, with that of O'Gorman, in connection with these frauds. He was later connected with O'Gorman, in the no less notorious London election frauds, which led to the resignation of a colleague of the minister. If the hon. gentleman thinks he can put his head into the sand and escape observation, escape opprobrium and contempt, by professing not to know who these men are, I tell him he is mistaken. The people of Canada know the history of those notorious cases, and they know that the minister is aware of every fact and detail, and yet the men who have been mentioned here are allowed to take part in making appointments upon the taking of the census.

Mr. CROTHERS. The taking of our census is not a mere formal or frivolous matter; it is a very important matter. The statistics gathered by these enumerators will determine the representation in this House, and guide us in many other very important matters during the next decade, and it must appear to every member of this House that it is of the utmost importance that these statistics should be gathered in such a manner, and by such persons, as to command the utmost confidence of every man in Canada. I quite agree with the observations of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) when he finds fault with the position taken by the Minister of Agriculture. That hon. minister tells us: I do not pretend to know the enumerators whom I have appointed. If he were in a position to give his word that he knew every one of them, and knew every one to be sufficiently intelligent, and to be men of character, perhaps we would be satisfied with his word; but he does not tell us that. He tells us he does not know one of these enumerators whom he has appointed, and in the face of that he refuses to tell us upon whose recommendation he appoints these men. These men are to do important work for the whole people of Canada. They are to be paid out of funds which are the moneys of the people of Canada, and the people's representatives in this House, I submit, have a right to know upon whose recommendation he appoints them. He has admitted to us this afternoon, if I understood him aright, that he has appointed several men to the important position of enumerators, on recommendations made by this man Perry, and every moderate man will admit at once upon the evidence adduced on this motion that Perry is not a proper man, not a man of sufficient character to warrant the Minister of Agriculture in accepting his recommendation for the appointment of any enumerator. I could understand very well the Minister of Agriculture saying: Heretofore I supposed that Mr. Perry was a man of unblemished character.

I am satisfied upon the evidence I have heard here to-night that he is not; I will make further inquiry to ascertain the standing and character of the men I have appointed upon his recommendation before I permit them to go to work. Would not that be a reasonable position for the Minister of Agriculture to take, if, as he tells us, up to this moment, he never knew anything against the character of Mr. Perry? This is not the only case in which the taking of the census is being used for party purposes. This seems to be not the only case in which men are appointed enumerators upon the recommendation of worthless characters like Perry. It must appeal to all as it appeals to me, that the enumerators shall be men of character, men of intelligence, men whose work will be accepted freely by the people of this country as having been honestly and intelligently done. If such men are not employed the census will be utterly useless. The census will be a valuable thing if taken on a scientific basis by competent men, but if it is taken, as appears from this case and the London case, by party heelers as a reward for party services, then the government need not be disappointed if they find that the people have no confidence whatever in the results of the work of the enumerators. One or two of my friends have referred to this man Reid, and I should like also to refer to him for a moment also. It seems that Mr. E. W. Scatcherd has been appointed commissioner by this government for the city of London, and as I understand it was the duty of the commissioner to select the enumerators. I could understand the Minister of Agriculture selecting as a commissioner a man of reputation and character, whom he could trust to select competent and intelligent enumerators to work under him. What do we find this man Scatcherd doing? If the articles in the newspapers are correct, we find Scatcherd actually stating to the London 'Evening Free Press' that he handed over the names of all these one hundred and five applicants to G. M. Reid for him to determine who, if any, of those 105 men should be appointed to act as enumerators for the city of London. Could a greater outrage be perpetrated upon the people of London and the people of this country? Who is George M. Reid? The Minister of Agriculture said a few minutes ago that he would not recognize any charges made in newspapers or letters, even when facsimiles of the originals are produced. He wanted something proved in court. Well, this man, George M. Reid, has been in court. We all remember that very shortly after the passing of Bills establishing the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, we had a bye-election in the city of London, and the result of that election was a majority in favour of the government. We had it proclaimed from one end of this country to the other that this was a test of public opinion as to the Bills which had been carried by this House establishing these two provinces. What followed that? It was established in the police court of Toronto, not in the newspapers, that in one corner, one subdivision, of the city of London, because there was only one man who squealed who handled the money, 100 men had been bought at the price of $10 apiece, less a rake-off of fifty cents that was taken by the man who made the payments. That is how that bye-election was carried, that is how that large majority was obtained in favour of the Bills establishing the new provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. What followed that? Four men were arrested and indicted for conspiracy. One of the four was George M. Reid. These four men were tried before His Honour Judge Winchester, the senior judge for the county of York, and convicted of conspiracy; yet George M. Reid is the man to whom the commissioner appointed by the Minister of Agriculture hands over the names to make the selection of those who are to make the enumeration. Of course, I do not state it as a fact that the commissioner handed these names over; I am saying that that is what is stated by this newspaper. I do not want to be misunderstood as to that. What confidence can the people of Canada have in a census taken in that way? We have a gentleman at the head of the department having control of the census saying: I will not tell you upon whose recommendation I have made these appointments; I have made them upon the recommendation of men whose character and standing were satisfactory to me. He does not get up and say: I will rectify the wrong, if there is any, I will inquire further as to the character of these men whom I have appointed on the recommendation of Mr. Perry, I will instruct Mr. Scatcherd that that is not the way in which I want the census taken; I do not approve of my commissioner handing over the names of the applicants to a man who has been convicted of fraud, of a serious offence against the election laws of this country. But, he does not take a position of that kind. I refuse to tell you who recommended these enumerators. It is a party matter; the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) says; it is none of your business; we are doing this work on our side of the House; we are allowing such men as Perry chooses to be appointed as enumerators, a man who, upon his own confession, is of the character we have heard described here this evening. We are accepting the recommendation of this man who has been convicted in a court of justice of defrauding the electors of London. We are doing this work, it is none of your business, and we propose to continue it in this way. I ask what confidence the people of Canada can have in a census being taken in that way and costing over a million dollars?

Mr. BLAIN. I believe the people of Canada will condemn the Minister of Agriculture and this government for not accepting the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Staples) which simply declares for clean politics in the taking of the census and the appointment of census officers. The Minister of Agriculture occupied his present position in 1901 when the census was taken, and more than once was he condemned for allowing politics to interfere in a matter which should be free from politics. I have here a letter written to the Minister of Agriculture after the taking of the last census by Mr. Kelly, who was census commissioner for the county of Peterborough, and that letter, together with the circumstances attending it, show the Minister of Agriculture in an unenviable light. Mr. Kelly had an account for $653.14 which was large in comparison with the accounts of the other commissioners, and the department refused to pay it, but Mr. Kelly knew how to reach the Minister of Agriculture, and this is the letter he wrote to him:

> The Ontario elections are coming off the end of May or the beginning of June. Mr. B. O. Lott is the unanimous choice of the Liberal convention. I have made up my mind to do some hard work in this north riding of Hastings. Mr. Lott is the best canvasser and the hardest worker ever went into a political contest.
> I have the honour to remain,
> Your old servant,
> WM. KELLY.

Well, Mr. Kelly came down to Ottawa, and he brought with him Mr. Lott, who was the Liberal candidate for the legislature in the county of Hastings, and these two gentlemen interviewed the minister, and after Mr. Kelly went home he wrote this letter, and the account was paid at once.

An hon. MEMBER. Did anybody here see Kelly?

Mr. BLAIN. Oh, yes, the Minister of Agriculture saw Kelly, but Lott went to the United States and has not returned. You will remember that this was the same Mr. Lott who was interested in the ballot box stuffing case in the province of Ontario, and that is the company Mr. Kelly was in. The Minister of Agriculture talks about there being no politics in the taking of the census, but let me read to the minister the following advertisement in the Elora 'Express' of Wednesday, February 8, 1911:

> PILKINGTON LIBERAL ASSOCIATION.
> Notice of Meeting.
> A meeting of the Liberal Association of the township of Pilkington will be held on Friday, the 10th of February, 1911, At Three o'clock P.M.
> At the residence of the undersigned in Elora, for the purpose of naming census enumerators for the township of Pilkington.
> THOS. MARSHALL, President.
> Elora, Jan. 31, 1911.

Elora is the constituency of South Wellington, and the Minister of Agriculture knows that this meeting was held, and he has in his office the very men who were named at this political meeting. He won't deny that he appointed the men whose names were sent in from that meeting. Do we want any further proof that there is politics in the taking of the census? I do not condemn the Minister of Agriculture for taking recommendations from his own political supporters. It is a well known principle pretty generally observed that the government in power take recommendations from their supporters in this House and from the defeated Liberal candidates. That is fairly well defined policy in this country, but the Minister of Agriculture is not living up to that. In order to broaden the influence of the political machine he takes his recommendations from the Reform organizer of the province of Manitoba. Will the Minister of Agriculture say that Mr. Perry was the defeated candidate in the last election, or will he deny that Mr. Perry has the patronage for not only one but several counties in Manitoba? If Mr. Perry were a defeated candidate, I do not know that the House would complain if the Minister of Agriculture adopted his recommendations, because the principle would be fair and I do not think there would be any criticism from this side of the House. But Mr. Perry was not the defeated candidate in the constituency of Macdonald, and the charge is that the minister goes outside his supporters in this House and outside the defeated Liberal candidates and receives recommendations. The policy laid down by the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw is fair enough, but the Minister of Agriculture went outside of that policy in order that the political machine in Manitoba should be brought into operation. Not satisfied to take in the machine in one county, the Minister of Agriculture wants the whole machinery of the Grit party in Manitoba introduced so as to bring political influences to bear in order that the lists in Manitoba and the census in Manitoba shall be prepared in a way that will best help the Reform party in that province. We are suspicious of the Minister of Agriculture for another reason, and that is that before he came into office he preached economy, yet, the census taken under his direction in 1901 cost extravagantly more than the census taken in 1891, when his Conservative predecessor was head of the department. May I illustrate this by showing that in the county of Halton, in 1901, although the population had decreased by 2,437 as compared with the previous census, the cost of taking the census in that county was increased by $1,043.96, and sixteen more enumerators than in the previous census. In the county of South Perth there was a decrease in the population of 1,539, but it cost $1,136.90 more than the previous census, and there were nine more officers appointed. In the county of Peel the population had decreased 1,779, but the cost increased $865.28, and six more officials than previously were appointed. In the county of Cardwell, although the population had decreased by 2,322, the cost increased by $853.94, and the number of officials by eleven. In the county of Prince Edward the population decreased 1,025, but under the administration of the present Minister of Agriculture the cost had increased by $1,011.91, and he appointed thirteen more enumerators than were found necessary in 1891. This shows that my hon. friend has adopted the policy that when the population decreases the cost of taking the census increases. That is a policy that the people of this country knew nothing about until my hon. friend came into office. This is the reason why my hon. friend's department, especially in connection with the taking of the census, is surrounded with so much suspicion. It would have been to the credit of my hon. friend if, when this Prince Albert matter, with all its corruption, was referred to, he had stood up and said, as a minister of the Crown I have no defence for this, and I will condemn it. That is what we should have expected of my hon. friend, if we had not known him quite so well as we do. As my hon. friend has failed to measure up to what the people of this country would expect in an hon. gentleman occupying so important a position, he must take the consequences when he refuses to adopt so reasonable a resolution as that moved by my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples).

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize one matter that has not been very clearly brought out in the course of the debate. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture spoke of this notice as one which had been sent out apparently in quite an incidental way by Mr. H. E. Perry, who happens to be the Liberal organizer for the province of Manitoba. I would like to point out to him that this document certainly bears on its face the evidence of wholesale work of this character throughout that province. It bears the printed heading: 'Manitoba Liberal Executive, Organizer's Office, P.O. Drawer 2076, Winnipeg, Canada.' Then the circular is filled in by some kind of a machine, leaving blank spaces for three particulars—the name of the man and his post office address, the name of the constituency, and the description of the census enumeration division for which he is to be appointed. The circular bears a stamped signature. Any one who looks at it for a moment can see that it is stamped. So that this is simply one of perhaps thousands of these notices that have gone out in the province of Manitoba from Mr. Perry. That is perfectly obvious from the slightest perusal of this document. So that there can be no question or doubt that this notice is a part of a system under which hundreds and perhaps thousands have been sent throughout the province of Manitoba. Does my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture deny that? I will submit this to the judgment of any one of his supporters in this House and ask him to say that the perusal of the document will not bear out what I am saying. A little slip is attached to indicate the census enumeration division; there is a blank for the man's name and a blank for the federal constituency, all indicating a system by which these appointments have in effect been made by the Liberal organizer for the province of Manitoba.

Mr. SMYTH. And in every other province too.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not know about any other province, but we have the evidence here of what has been done in the province of Manitoba. Now, it has been very well said to-night that the census is an exceedingly important event in our national life, and that the people of this country have the right to demand that it shall be taken fairly. They have also the right to demand that the public money of this country shall not be paid out for party purposes under the pretense of a census enumeration. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has been rather lordly about this matter. We have heard the doctrine proclaimed in this House this evening that this government is in power, and that they can act on the recommendation of criminals in the penitentiary if they see fit; that it does not lie in the mouths of gentlemen on this side of the House, or in the mouth of any citizen in Canada, to raise the slightest objection thereto, because Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government are in power, and they can act as they see fit, and do what they like with the public money of this country. That seems to be the theory of these gentlemen. Let us for a moment examine the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture with regard to this particular gentleman selected to make appointments in the province of Manitoba. We heard something this afternoon about trivial offences. Apparently, in the eyes of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, it is only a trivial matter, worthy of only passing notice, that two deputy returning officers and their poll clerk should go into that northern country, should pretend to hold a poll, should violate their oath of office, should violate every provision of the Election Act, should sit in the wilderness and write in 150 names of fictitious persons, should place 150 false ballots in the ballot box, should sign and swear to false returns as to the poll having been held, and should bring all these statements back as if that poll had been actually held in good faith under the election law. I do not know one provision of the election law that they did not violate, in addition to which as I have already said, they have been guilty of forgery and perjury. There does not seem to be any dispute about the facts. They were brought out not only in court, but as I understand, before the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan. Now, what is the position of Mr. Perry with regard to this? I will not go over the letters; they have been read over and over again. I just want to refer to one or two passages. A letter of October 4, 1906, from Mr. Perry to one of these men who were absent in the United States:

I would suggest extreme caution; I shall try to keep you advised.

The 'Standard' here last night published a story that, if the case went against Sinclair, he was going to squeal, but I don't believe that, as he would never do anything to help the Tories; he is too sore on them.

Indicating a distinct knowledge on the part of the man who wrote that letter, not only that these crimes had been committed with which they had been charged, but that there were other crimes as to which there was a danger that Mr. Sinclair might speak. A letter of June 10:

I have heard it said that the missing deputies would be as well to keep out of sight. I think this is undoubtedly correct.

Further on, in a letter of the next day:

Prudence would, I should judge, suggest to the absent deputies that their safety lies in remaining away.

Another letter, which does not appear to have been actually from Perry, but from a gentleman who was associated with him in bringing aid and comfort to them:

Everybody is prepared to stand by their guns and do what is right by you, and what I ask is that you hold steady for a while longer until all can be arranged.

What does that mean? That means that these men have been sent away to the United States by the connivance and with the money of some person or persons. It means that these men have been kept in the United States at the suggestion and by means of the money of certain persons. Further on this letter says:

See Mark, and he will fix things up with you.

Who is Mark? If you turn to the first letter here, you will find who he is. He is Mr. Mark Sands of the firm of Sands and Scott, to whom letters intended for these gentlemen were sent in order that their address might not be known to any one in Prince Albert. What further does this gentleman say? He says:—

See Mark, and he will fix things up with you. Thought best to send it that way.

What is the meaning of 'it'? 'It,' as I understand, is the wherewithal which enabled these men to remain in the United States when the hand of criminal justice should have fastened on them in Canada long before. These were the lawyers in Chicago to whom letters were sent intended for these absconding and criminal deputies in order that the whereabouts of the absconders might be kept secret. But these were trivial offences and trivial matters which impressed themselves so little upon the Minister of Agriculture that although he heard them referred to at length at least twice in this House, he has entirely forgotten them this afternoon and apparently never heard of them before. Were these transactions so much in the ordinary course of affairs that my hon. friend was not impressed by them? Let me tell him the position which Perry occupied in this connection. Has my hon. friend never heard of such a thing as an accessory after the fact. Here is a definition in the Criminal Code, section 71:—

An accessory after the fact to an offence is one who receives, comforts or assists anybody who has been a party to such an offence in order to enable him to escape, knowing him to be a party thereto.

I say that if these letters are genuine—and if they are not genuine this man has had his remedy for a year or more in the public courts of this country—in my opinion Mr. Perry was an accessory after the fact to the crimes that those men had committed and as to their participation in which there can be no reasonable doubt. When we find the virtual appointment of the census renumerators in Manitoba committed to that gentleman under those circumstances, I think it is more than right that my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples) should have risen to vindicate common honesty and decency in this country by moving the motion which he has made and which I shall be most happy to support.

Mr. FIELDING. Much has been said of matters important in themselves but not really relating to the census, so that there is danger of our losing sight of the real circumstances and methods under which the census has to be taken. There are two classes of census officials. There are the commissioners, who have charge of the different counties or electoral districts, one to each district. Numbers of the commissioners have been appointed, but throughout this debate no attempt has been made to show that any one has been chosen who is not worthy and qualified to perform the service. Then we have the enumerators, a much more numerous class, because each enumerator has charge of a comparatively small subdivision. These run into the thousands and have been in many cases already appointed or are in course of being appointed from day to day. Throughout all this discussion it has not been charged that any man has been chosen as enumerator who is not qualified for the work, who is not respectable and reputable in every sense of the word.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). We do not know them yet.

Mr. FIELDING. Then my hon. friend should not be so ungenerous as to cast any reflection upon them. He should wait until he finds some reason to criticise the appointments of the commissioners or enumerators.

Mr. CROTHERS. Might I put a question? If it be true, as charged in the newspapers, that the commissioner appointed for the city of London, handed the names of the applicants into the hands of Mr. Reid to decide who should be appointed, does the hon. minister think the commissioner who would do this was a worthy man to hold the position.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not aware of the circumstances, but generally speaking if any commissioner should put his list of the names into the hands of anybody and give him any control in the appointment, I would not consider he was acting wisely or properly. I do not, however, know anything more about this than my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Crothers) knows himself, but I want to call attention to these essential facts. Mr. Perry is a commissioner or enumerator and has no official connection whatever with the government or with the taking of the census, and, therefore, the outcry raised concerning him has no bearing on the question as to whether we are appointing reputable men to be commissioners or census enumerators.

Mr. STAPLES. Does the hon. minister know that Mr. Perry according to the statement of the Minister of Agriculture, has been recommending enumerators to those positions?

Mr. FIELDING. I can assure the hon. gentleman in all sincerity that I know no more about it than what I have heard in this debate to day. As to the question of recommendations, I shall come to that in a moment. But I want again to emphasize the fact that the commissioners and the enumerators are the only people who have to do with the census. The Minister of Agriculture must take the responsibility of those appointments. When he has to appoint thousands of men all over Canada, no doubt among them he may appoint some whom our hon. friends opposite will find reason to criticise, but there is so far no allegation that any commissioner or any enumerator has been improperly appointed. That being the case, how can hon. gentleman opposite hope to influence public opinion by reviving the old story of the Prince Albert election; I am not referring to that as a trivial matter. It was a grave and serious matter, and I do not complain if hon. gentlemen offer any condemnation of what occurred at that time. When we come to the question of recommendation, hon. gentlemen opposite lay down the proposition that it is the duty of the government to declare on whose representation any one has been appointed to a public office. But on reflection they must see that such a theory is preposterous. Take the appointment of a lieutenant governor of a province, will any hon. gentleman opposite contend that he has the right to demand in this House and to know on whose recommendation such an appointment was made? Every member of this House has of course the right to put a question, but must be guided by reason and propriety, and would it be reasonable and proper to ask on whose recommendation the appointment of a lieutenant governor of any province was made? Take the appointment of a judge. Could anything be more ridiculous than to insist on knowing who recommended his appointment? Will the hon. member for Jacques Cartier stand up and say that he has the right to know who made the recommendation?

Mr. MONK. I never put forth such an absurd proposition. What I said was that the nomination of such officers as enumerators could only be made upon recommendation as a basis, and it was the right of every member to know what that basis was.

Mr. FIELDING. And the nomination of a lieutenant governor could only be made upon a basis. There is no difference in principle between the appointment of a high officer and the nomination of an officer of a lower grade. If it was a governor, he would not ask who recommended him. If it was a judge, he would not do anything so preposterous as to insist upon knowing who recommended him. Well, if he is a census commissioner who is appointed, would it be less preposterous for him to ask who recommended him?

Mr. MONK. Why you appointed him?

Mr. FIELDING. Because we needed a man for the office and our information was that he was a suitable man. And that is the reason why we appointed the Governor —because we needed a man for the office and our information was that he was a suitable man. And that is just the reason why we appoint a judge—because the place had to be filled and our information was that the gentleman in question was well qualified by his legal attainments to fill the office. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot be serious in advancing the argument that it is the right of the House to be informed what are our grounds for——

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). What harm will it do?

Mr. FIELDING. But the hon. gentleman must permit us to be the judges. The House has rights, and these rights we do not question. But hon. members opposite have an unhappy faculty of speaking of what the House demands when what they mean is what they themselves ask. Nobody in this House would question for a moment the right of the House to demand information in the proper way. But when an hon. member stands up in the House and insists upon the right to obtain certain information, I think it does not necessarily follow that he has that right in the sense in which he uses the word.

Now, much has been said throughout this discussion of nominations by political committees. I am bound to say that, while I do not think the political committee is the best way of doing the thing, and while I do not like it myself and would discourage it, I am not prepared to admit that there is anything wrong in having a political committee make a recommendation to any minister in regard to an appointment in which the members of that committee may be interested. They cannot be denied the right to make a recommendation in a public matter. The field of party patronage is, I am glad to say, being somewhat narrowed, there is less of it under this government than there ever was under any of its predecessors.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING. There is less room for the exercise of party patronage to-day than there was in any previous time in the history of Canada. But, so long as we have party government—and, with all its evils it seems to be about the best system that can be devised,—it is inevitable that there will be more or less of what is called party patronage; there will be a human desire on the part of every government to give the preference to their friends. Just at present, the census being about to be taken, my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has a right to make a selection of the officers to take that census, getting the best information that he can. And, twenty years hence, we will concede to hon. gentlemen opposite a similar privilege. And those of us who are here then may question and may find fault in other respects, but will not deny their right to appoint their own friends to office, always with the qualification that the men appointed must be reputable men and able to fulfil the duties for which they are appointed. Even if the committee was used, it would not be a reasonable ground for criticism, although I confess I do not like the system

Hon. gentlemen opposite complain that, in making appointments in counties represented by hon. members on this side, we turn to the member for advice in the matter. As to counties represented by hon. gentlemen opposite with whatever gravity they try to discuss this question, they cannot expect us to go and ask their advice. Well, if we have to get information in reference to an appointment in a county represented by an hon. member sitting on that side of the House, surely the minister in charge of the department concerned must be left to exercise his own judgment and discretion as to the manner in which he will get that information; and, for the judgment he shall exercise he is accountable to the House and the country

Mr. MONK. In the case of the enumerator in the county referred to or in the appointment of an excise officer, is not the sitting member entitled to know on whose recommendation he is appointed, since he is not consulted?

Mr. FIELDING. According to the conception of government that I have—which, I think, is that held by every government that has ever held office in this country—my hon. friend would not have the right to ask that. It would make no difference who recommends it, the minister must be responsible, and if the persons appointed by the minister prove to be improper persons and unfit for their duty, the minister would have to bear the responsibility, and his colleagues would have to share it with him. And I do not think, that on reflection, hon. gentlemen opposite will gravely adhere to the view that it is the duty of the minister to tell at a given moment on what recommendation any officer of the census, or judge or governor is appointed to office.

Mr. MONK. There is just the difference. In the case just referred to, the member on the government side gets that knowledge, whereas a member on this side of the House he does not know, and the public is not entitled to know, and therefore there is nobody known to be responsible for the recommendation.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, the minister who makes the appointment is responsible and the government that endorse it is responsible.

Mr. A. S. GOODEVE (Kootenay). The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) himself has given the strongest argument and the best reason why the principle laid down by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) ought to govern appointments of this nature. He himself has stated that it is utterly impossible for the Minister of Agriculture, making such a large number of appointments all over the Dominion, to personally know the individual character of his appointee. And that was the basis of the argument of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that the House has a right to know the basis on which appointments are made, in order that we may thereby judge the character of the appointments. And the whole argument on this side this afternoon is based exactly on that principle. I think the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) had the right to bring the question into the House, and his right is based on that very principle. I think it was argued rightly by the Minister of Finance that if there was no connection between the letters read here and the appointments made, our case falls to the ground. But the hon. member for Macdonald laid the foundations for his argument carefully and well. He started out by reading a document which, I think, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has made very clear, was an official document; he has shown that it was a circular, not an individual letter, issued by an irresponsible person, on an official letterhead and bearing the title of an official organization. There were blank spaces left for filling in essential particulars, and these had been filled in the letter submitted. I will call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that, if further evidence were wanting that this was an official document recognized not only by the government but directly by the Minister of Agriculture it was given in the admission made by the Minister of Agriculture himself during this debate. He stated in answer to the question put from this side that he had acted on the recommendation of this Mr. Perry and in some cases had appointed enumerators on the recommendation of that gentleman.

He did not tell us how many he had appointed on his recommendation, but the whole inference of the letters, and the written evidence produced in the House makes it a prima facie case that he has been acting generally in an official manner in making these various recommendations. I was glad to know that the Minister of Finance himself said that he did not look upon that as a very trifling matter, that it was a very serious charge that had been made against these gentlemen. He admitted they had been guilty of certain criminal offences, and I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has clearly demonstrated that the man who is making these appointments or on whose recommendations the appointments were made, and who has undertaken officially to notify these men of their appointments, of their duties, the amount they are to receive, and the particular territory over which they would have jurisdiction, has been acting semi-officially. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has clearly shown that the man was accessory after the fact to the crimes committed at that time. That being the case, we have a right to bring up this question in order that the country at large may know the basis on which these various appointments are made, and how much confidence we should place in enumerators or officials acting on behalf of this government who are gathering statistics which are of vital importance to this country. The census will cost about $1,000,000, but apart from the mere financial cost, the importance of the data we are supposed to secure by the taking of this census, which is of vital importance to the Dominion of Canada, amply justifies the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) when the information came to him, in bringing it before the House; in fact, it was his bounden duty to do so. I am amazed that the principle should be laid down by the minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) that he is not prepared to consider evidence of that nature, that he feels he is not bound by his office to give the information to the House to which I think we are entitled. That is the argument, and the position taken by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and by every member on this side. We are not asking for the individual recommendations that come to hon. members of the government from time to time, but we are asking on what basis or principle appointments of this kind are made, or on what principle the minister judges the recommendations that come to him. These recommendations could not possibly come to the minister in a private way. For instance, if the minister were to resign to-morrow, no man would continue to send in recommendations to him to make appointments for offices of this kind. Therefore, it is wholly and solely in his official position as a minister of the government that these recommendations come to him, and so they are the public property of the people of Canada, they should be placed upon the public files, and should be at all times at the disposal of this House. He is laying down a wrong principle when he undertakes to say that that is purely a private matter between him and the persons making these recommendations. He has a very wrong conception of his position, and his duty in regard to that question. But it is like many other principles that we constantly find laid down from that side of the House in regard to what they consider the constitutional method of government. I am prepared on the evidence that has been adduced this afternoon, to earnestly support the motion of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples). I had heard nothing of this case previously, but I consider the hon. member has made out a most complete case, and that it is the duty of this government to accept the recommendation, and produce letters of this kind. We must accept the minister's word that he has not officially authorized Mr. Perry to send out these circulars, but there is not the slightest doubt that he has received these instructions and authority from some governmental source. The minister shakes his head. Supposing I or any other private citizen to-morrow issued circulars throughout Canada signed personally, to all the enumerators, stating that they had been recommended to the position of enumerators, and that they had certain jurisdiction, giving them the amount of remuneration for their work and asking them to report to me within ten days, would he take cognizance of that, or would he immediately take steps to see, in some way that I was prevented sending out circulars of that kind.

Mr. FISHER. I would take no notice of it whatever.

Mr. GOODEVE. That is an amazing statement of the minister that any private citizen could send out in a case of this kind involving the appointment of thousands of officials to be paid for by public money, circulars stating what the duties and remuneration of these officials are to be, and asking them to report in ten days; the minister says he would take no notice of it. It is an amazing statement and one which I scarcely think any business man or any man realizing the responsibility he has in connection with the office he holds, would make.

It is in the context that we find the sting of that circular. Mr. Perry says in a postscript: If you are in the city within a short time, drop in. Why? To talk over with him the good cause, because he signs himself: Yours in the good cause. Every sentence of that carefully worded circular goes to show that it is issued in order to bring political influence to bear. The wording of the circular is such as to impress on the minds of those receiving it that they have received their appointments through the influence of the Liberal association, whose printed official statement is on the head of the paper on which the letter is written. So before we commence to take the census at all, we find held out to the people of Canada that it is to be purely a political institution used for political purposes, and I ask in the face of that how are the people of this country to have confidence in a census taken in that manner?

Mr. CROSBY. I did not intend saying anything in regard to this question, but when the Minister of Finance lectured this side of the House on the question and said that hon. members had not proven that a single criminal had been appointed a commissioner, I was surprised. That is very true, but we have proved that the enumerators had been and are nominated by criminals. That is what we proved and that is what we are trying to impress the minister with. But, it seems there is no impression to be made on him to-night. On Friday he was very easily impressed by the hon. member for Macdonald. He jumped up from his seat on that occasion like a trout jumping at a fly in the springtime. But to-night he is perfectly satisfied to sit in his seat and have nothing to say to him. He is prepared to take it all. He has not even the Minister of Finance to help him. The Minister of Finance says that not one of the enumerators is a criminal. We say that Mr. Perry, who has recommended the enumerators in Manitoba, has been proven beyond a shadow of a doubt to be a criminal. His recommendation has been accepted because we have the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that he has appointed some enumerators on the recommendation of Mr. Perry. We also have the statement that the names of the 105 applicants for appointment as enumerators in the city of London have been submitted to Mr. Reid, a noted criminal, for selection. It is not the enumerators that we are worried about but our suspicion is aroused by the manner in which they are appointed. We do not know these men, we do not know what they are going to do, but we do know that if we accept the recommendations of men of this character we are going to get into a bad condition with regard to the census. It was a very nice thing for the Minister of Finance to get up and tell us that when they appoint a Lieutenant Governor they do not tell us who recommended him We can easily find that out whenever Lieutenant Governors are appointed. Anybody who can see any distance at all can tell why a Lieutenant Governor or a member of the Supreme Court bench has been appointed, and who has recommended him. But, in the case of enumerators, with Perry and Reid and men of that character how can we tell? The Minister of Agriculture cannot tell himself; he admits that he does not know anything about them. All the knowledge he has of the enumerators is what he has obtained from men of this character. It is little wonder that we are suspicious. We are suspicious first of the Minister of Agriculture anyway. But he creates further suspicion by the selection of the men whose advice he takes in the important matter of the census. It has been proved to-night that two of the men who have been the advisers of the Minister of Agriculture in the selection of these enumerators have been criminals. He said at one time that it did not make any difference what was said about any man as long as it was not proved in court. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition brought Perry before the court and settled him right here, and then my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Crothers) settled the other man Reid by pointing out that he had been in court, and that the court had settled him. Yet we have not been able to settle the Minister of Agriculture. He sits in the same position—

An hon. MEMBER. He has turned halfway round.

Mr. CROSBY. Yes, he has turned half way round, and I hope he will come all the way round. It is an indication that he is about to turn. Somebody says that he is on the wrong side. There has been very little argument on the other side of the House. The only argument was that of the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw—or is it Long Jaw?

An hon. MEMBER. Moosejaw.

Mr. CROSBY. Thanks, very much: I thought it was Long Jaw from the nature of the argument to which he treated us this evening. He is the only gentleman who pretended to present anything in the nature of an argument. He threw his hands around his head, held his waist as if he was wearing corsets, and kept us about an hour and a half, but I do not think that any hon. member of the House will be able to understand any one point that he made until he reads 'Hansard' to-morrow, because I do not think anybody in this House could follow what he was endeavouring to demonstrate. He was of very little use in helping out the Minister of Agriculture. I intend to vote for the motion of my hon. friend for Macdonald for the reason that it has been proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that the men from whom the minister has been taking advice are criminals. If they have been proven to be criminals I am naturally suspicious of the kind of men they will recommend. They will not recommend men better than themselves and therefore I intend to vote for the amendment of my hon. friend.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Staples).

WESTERN COAL STRIKE.

Mr. JOHN HERRON (Macleod). I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Labour to the following which appeared in this day's Montreal 'Gazette':

WESTERN COAL STRIKE.

Conciliation Board can't Agree and Adjourns.

Fernie, B.C., May 13.—The Dominion Conciliation Board, which is trying to settle the strike of ten thousand western miners, has declared that nothing can be done at present, as the members are so divided in their views, and the Board has adjourned sine die.

The people of the Dominion generally, and of the western provinces in particular will be interested to hear what information the Minister of Labour has to give in connection with this news item. I will be glad if the minister can assure us that the announcement in the Montreal 'Gazette' is not true, but as that journal is usually well informed on public questions I fear that the dispatch may be correct. I trust the Minister of Labour will not desist from his efforts at this stage, but that he will try to have the board continue, and if possible bring about a settlement honourable and just to both parties.

Hon. MACKENZIE KING (Minister of Labour). The last statement in the news paragraph; that the board has adjourned is correct, but I think the rest of the paragraph is misleading. On Friday last I received a telegram from Mr. Gordon, the chairman of the board in which he states:

Board temporarily adjourned to-day. Feel that delay will materially help the situation. Letter follows.

(Sgd.) CHARLES W. GORDON.

I have not as yet received the letter referred to, but I believe it is felt that in the light of the evidence already brought out, both parties should be given an opportunity of conferring together before further evidence is taken. There may have been other reasons for the adjournment. I believe that possibly the chairman returned to Winnipeg, because when he accepted the appointment he intimated that if the investigation lasted longer than two weeks it might be necessary for him to ask for a slight adjournment. There is no intention on the part of the board to discontinue its efforts to effect a settlement. The reports I have received up to the present indicate that good progress has been made. I have every hope that before long the board will be able to terminate its work, having accomplished a satisfactory result.

TRAVELLING EXPENSES—PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Has the Minister of Public Works completed the return as to the expenses of himself and his officials?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I gave directions to have the return hurried.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). They are about two months making up that small return.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend is not correct in that statement. The return had to be prepared in their order, and a good many have been brought down since this return was asked for.

DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECHES THROUGH MAILS.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I regret the Postmaster General is not present, but I ask the acting Prime Minister to ascertain whether there is truth in the report that comes to me on reliable authority that copies of the speeches delivered by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, are being sent out in bundles to postmasters all over the country, and that the postmasters are asked to deliver them, without being addressed, to persons who come to the post office on business. This is making use of the mails of this country for distributing literature that ought not to be read by the people of Canada, because I think such literature does not educate our people in the best interests of the country. Anyway, the government has no business to use the portmasters for political purposes.

Mr. FIELDING. I can well understand the unwillingness of my hon. friend to have the literature read. I will mention the matter to the Postmaster General.

MILITARY ADVISER TO THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. SAMUEL BARKER (Hamilton). I call the attention of the leader of the House to a letter from the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes) which appeared in the Ottawa papers of last Friday, May 12. The letter is long, it concerns a police court matter, and I shall only read a part of one sentence which deals with a question of public interest. The words I call the attention of the leader of the House to are these:

I am leaving to-morrow for England as military adviser to the Imperial Conference.

The House is entitled to know whether such an appointment has been made to the knowledge of the government, and by whom. I would infer from the words of the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) that such an appointment if made at all would have been made by the imperial government. It could hardly have been made by the conference as the conference has not convened.

Mr. EMMERSON. It was probably made by the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) himself.

Mr. BARKER. I wish to ask the acting Prime Minister whether such an appointment has been made, and if so what the object of the appointment, what the functions of a military adviser to the imperial conference, the duration of the appointment——

An hon. MEMBER. And the emolument.

Mr. BARKER. Everything connected with it. The matter is very specifically put forward in the letter which has appeared in the newspapers, and I think the leader of the House should make a statement with regard to it.

Mr. FIELDING. No such appointment has been made by this government, nor have we any knowledge that any such appointment has been made by anybody.

THE CHRISTIAN GUARDIAN AND RECIPROCITY.

Mr. C. J. THORNTON (Durham). Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the report is being industriously circulated by certain newspapers that the opposition is pursuing a course of obstructive tactics in this House in connection with the debate on reciprocity, and that the effect will be to prevent the Prime Minister from attending the imperial conference. That the report is without a shadow of foundation is well known to every member of this House, and to every newspaper reporter in the press gallery. Notwithstanding this, respectable and even religious newspapers industriously circulated the falsity. One of the offenders in this respect is the 'Christian Guardian,' the organ of the great Methodist church. If this were its first offence it might be overlooked, but unfortunately for the paper, and the church it represents, it is continuously misrepresenting the facts. Editorially it makes the following statement in its issue of May 3:

CANADA AND THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Just now one of the livest questions at Ottawa is whether Canada shall be represented at the Imperial Conference by Sir Wilfrid Laurier or not. The Conservative tactics in opposing the reciprocity pact are such as to greatly delay the passing of the measure, and there seems not to be any too good reason to hope that there will be a change in the situation. The Conservatives are determined that the reciprocity pact shall not be ratified without a general election; and the Liberals are determined it shall, if at all possible. Our rules of procedure, fortunately or unfortunately, allow what we may call obstructionist tactics to be carried to a very great length, and the Conservatives are determined to fight every step of the way. Unfortunately, however, this is Coronation year, and also the year of the Imperial Conference, and if the fight over the reciprocity pact is continued it will be impossible for Canada to be properly represented at either. From every standpoint this would seem to be most unfortunate. For Canada, the greatest British colony, to be unrepresented or inadequately represented, at either the conference or the Coronation, would appear little less than unseemly. Both parties realize this, and yet neither is willing to yield a jot to its opponent. We cannot but hope, however, that the cooler and wiser heads in the two parties will succeed in reaching some way out of the difficulty. It will not be complimentary to our Canadian parliament if they do not.

When the reciprocity proposition was introduced in this House, the statement was made by the Prime Minister and by the Finance Minister that the fullest time and opportunity would be given to discuss the question in this House. The Finance Minister was most emphatic in this. On February 9, 1911, page 3358, he said:

There will be abundant opportunity for the members of this House and the people of this country to carefully consider the arrangement to which the government asks them to give their approval.

On page 3360 the Finance Minister said:

But we propose to proceed with this measure not rashly but in due order.

On March 8, 1911, on page 4947, he said:

We desire that this matter shall be discussed, as I stated in the earlier stages of the debate, not hastily, not in a rush, not unduly; we desire that every member of the House shall have abundant opportunity to form and express his views.

Thus it will be seen that there was to be ample time for a very full discussion of the subject. Members on both sides of the House have presented their views. Those on the government side have taken their full share of the time that has up to the present been occupied in the debate. No obstructive tactics of any kind have been introduced by the opposition. On the contrary, Mr. Borden, the opposition leader, has made it plain that there will be no obstacle thrown in the way of the Prime Minister's attendance at the Coronation and the imperial conference.

In order that there may be no mistake in this matter, I will read what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) said on the floor of the House on the 28th day of April, which was five days before the article was published which I have read from the 'Christian Guardian',:

I am very happy indeed to concur in the hope which he has expressed that he may be enabled to attend the approaching Imperial Conference.

Now, there are three courses which would permit the Prime Minister to attend the approaching Imperial Conference. If the present session of parliament should not have come to a conclusion at the time when it will be necessary for him to leave, he could proceed to the conference, leaving his colleagues in charge of the business of the House; that is one alternative as to the desirability or expediency of which I am not so good a judge as the Prime Minister himself. I frankly concede that that is a matter upon which it is his right, his duty, to exercise his own judgment. In the second place, he can bring the session to an end, leaving some of these very important matters unfinished and letting them stand over to another session. It has already been intimated to us that the Bank Act will not be pressed at the present session. If that is to stand over to another session, there can be no particular reason why the proposals for closer trade relations with the United States should not also stand over until another session. I do not want to enter into any controversial observations with regard to that, I only mention it as another alternative which is open to the Prime Minister in that regard. Then in the third place, he can adjourn this session of parliament for two or three months, or whatever length of time may be sufficient to enable him to attend the Imperial Conference and the Coronation. After the Coronation and after the conference, the session can be resumed; and I desire to say now that for the purpose of facilitating public business we would be prepared to give interim supply to such an extent as the public interest would demand, in case the Prime Minister should see fit to follow that course.

Every member on this side of the House is willing and anxious that the Prime Minister should attend the Coronation and the Imperial Conference, and are willing to make any sacrifice to this end. As yet not one-half the members on the Conservative side of the House have had an opportunity to express their views on the reciprocity pact. Nearly all of those who have not yet spoken have made preparation so to do, but are willing that the House should adjourn in order that Canada may be properly represented by the Prime Minister at the Imperial Conference. In view of these facts, which the editor of the 'Christian Guardian' must have known, it seems very much out of place that he should have penned the article he did, which appeared in the issue of that journal, of May 3. I have waited for several days, hoping that the editor in last week's issue might make a correction, but he has not done so. I regret very much that the 'Guardian' should be made the organ of misrepresentation, and I hope that the editor may be honest enough to correct the wrong he has done in his next issue.

INQUIRIES ABOUT PAPERS.

Mr. MONK. I would like to ask the government how soon we may expect the printed French edition of the representations of the Fruit Growers and Vegetable Growers. The House ordered these to be printed. They were printed and circulated on the 27th of March last. They have been translated, and I am told that the translation has been for some time in the hands of the printer. There is a considerable demand for the document in the province of Quebec.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend is aware that these printing matters are not in the hands of the government. They are in the hands of the officers of the House, and I can only make inquiry of them, just as my hon. friend himself can.

Mr. MONK. I ask that the government should make that inquiry, and press the printing.

Mr. FIELDING. Why should not my hon. friend do that himself?

Mr. MONK. Because I fancy, as the discussion to-night shows, that it would have more effect if it came from my hon. friend.

Mr. FIELDING. This is a case in which we would accept my hon. friends' recommendation.

Mr. MONK. I am afraid not.

Mr. THORNTON.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to ask the Minister of the Interior when I may expect that the papers in regard to the Aylwin irrigation grant will be brought down. On the last day I asked for them he said that he would perhaps be in a position to tell me on the following day, but on that day he was somewhat mixed up himself, and perhaps for that reason did not tell me. I would like some definite answer as to when I may expect these papers.

Mr. OLIVER. I laid the papers in question on the table some time last week.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I sent to the official quarters to-day, and could not get them.

JAPANESE TREATY.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether it is contemplated to take any action regarding the Japanese treaty before the reassembling of parliament after the adjournment?

Mr. FIELDING. A notice of motion is already in the hands of the clerk, and will appear in the Votes and Proceedings to-morrow morning. It is to give the Governor in Council power to continue to Japan the tariff privileges which she now enjoys, Canada to receive similar privileges, for a period not exceeding two years. In all other respects the treaty is permitted to lapse. The two years is fixed to allow time to negotiate a special treaty, should one be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Mr. FIELDING. When the Committee of Supply last sat a little difficulty arose owing to the fact that there were certain items which the committee had passed or were quite willing to pass, but which unfortunately were merged with others as to which further discussion was required. The desire was to report the items passed, but we did not think they could be reported separately from the others. The clerk has looked into the practice, and I understand there is a custom which will warrant our reporting these particular items which have been passed and leaving the others. My proposal, therefore, is that the items in any group which the committee has dealt with should be reported separately.

Exhibitions, $150,000.

Mr. STAPLES. I would like to ask if the minister has given any further consideration to the Selkirk Centennial. I understand that a delegation interviewed the government a short time ago, and would like to know what satisfaction they received. I would like to ask who the delegates were and what satisfaction they got from the minister when they were here a few days ago. Also I would like to know whether the government is still considering the matter, or whether they intend to give an appropriation such as it was proposed to give to the undertakers of this great exhibition?

Mr. FISHER. I am afraid I have to say that the government has come to no conclusion yet in the matter. Since it was brought up in the House before we have had some slight discussion of it, but without reaching a conclusion.

Mr. STAPLES. That does not answer my question in full. I asked if there was a further delegation here to interview the government in regard to the matter. I understand that there was such a delegation a very short time ago—within the last week or so—to find out whether the government were prepared to carry out the proposition they at one time made to the undertakers of the celebration that if they would secure $2,500,000 the government would supplement it with a like amount.

Mr. FISHER. I am not aware of any delegation having been here since the matter was up in the House before. If there was, they must have seen only the Prime Minister, not the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) nor myself nor any other minister present. I do not think that any delegation came.

Mr. CAMPBELL. An answer was given in this House more than a year ago by the Prime Minister that he could not give a definite answer to the question until he had consulted the Minister of Finance. Now, he has had an opportunity to consult the Minister of Finance with regard to the matter. The success of an affair of this kind is a matter of great consideration to the people of the west, and the people of all Canada. The day of the expiry of the time when the subscribers can be called upon to implement their promises is getting very close—I think it is within a few days. It seems to me a fair proposition to ask the government, as my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples) has done, what they intend to do. Two years they have had to make up their mind whether they are going to do it or whether they are not. I do not think we in the west now care very much whether they do or not, but we would like to have a definite straightforward answer. If they are not going to do it, let them say so; if they are going to do it, let them say so. I think that that is a fair proposition.

Mr. FISHER. I am afraid I cannot give any more definite answer than I have already given. I will try to have it taken up and decided as soon as possible.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not particularly want an answer from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). I intended my remarks more particularly for the Minister of Finance on whose shoulders the Prime Minister has laid the burden by saying that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) came back renewed in health and strength—as we know he is to-day—he would be in a position to discuss it with him, and the people of the country could depend on getting a final answer. I am not advancing it for party purposes by any means, because, as the Finance Minister knows and the government understands, the people who are most interested, the private citizens who have offered to spend more money than any others, are gentlemen of the same stripe of politics as themselves.

Mr. FIELDING. I am afraid I cannot add anything to what has been said by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) I quite realize the importance of the matter. If it has been two years since the matter was mooted, perhaps the hon. member can find in the public records other matters that have been pending for much more than two years. The very magnitude of an enterprise sometimes causes delay. I think it possible that gentlemen in the province primarily affected have some reason to complain that there has not been a definite answer. But to be frank with the hon. member I cannot give a definite answer at this stage.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Can the hon. minister give me some idea of the probability of an answer in the next two years?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, I think I can go as far as that.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Can we get an answer within the next year?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not want to be too exact.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In the next year, can I expect a definite answer?

Mr. FIELDING. I want to encourage the hon. gentleman, I hope to give an answer in much less time, but one does not like to tie himself up.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You are tied up badly now.

Mr. FIELDING. We tnink not.

Mr. BLAIN. We should have some explanation from the Minister of Agriculture concerning this vote

Mr. FISHER. I gave a pretty full explanation when a supplementary vote for the last fiscal year was taken. I explained that we were participating in the exhibition called 'The Festival of Empire,' in the Crystal Palace which was opened, I think on Friday last, by His Majesty the King. The Canadian Pavilion has been built and we are now in the position of owing for the building.

Mr. BLAIN. What will be the total cost?

Mr. FISHER. About $225,000; between that and $250,000. That covers the total organization of the exhibition, the work of taking down and removing the exhibits —the usual thing from one year to the other. I asked for $250,000 in this vote, and I have asked for $75,000 in the supplementaries for this year which, I trust, will enable me to close up everything absolutely, making the expenditure $225,000. There was a little expenditure from the vote last year.

Mr. BLAIN. Will there be any special appointments by the minister or his department?

Mr. FISHER. None except the permanent staff—there have been none and will be none.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I know that to a very large extent, the grain exhibit comes from the west. Are the provinces generally well represented in their own products in such exhibitions as the minister has described?

Mr. FISHER. Each province is represented in the products which it yields best. We do not discriminate, provided the products come from Canada we try to get the best of every kind. We have, in London this year, I believe, the most magnificent display of fruit, that has ever been collected at any exhibition. Most of it came from the province of Ontario, but a considerable quantity from British Columbia, and also some from Quebec and some from Nova Scotia. We have also a very fine collection of minerals coming from all over the Dominion. Asbestos which is produced in Quebec, I believe, is exhibited from that province. The silver ore comes largely from Ontario, the nickel from Ontario and the coal from various provinces. The grain exhibit also comes from nearly all the provinces, although wheat naturally comes largely from the Northwest and Ontario. The forestry exhibit comes from the different provinces; we make no discrimination between the provinces, the exhibits are shown as Canadian, without reference to the places from which they come, although the names of the exhibitors and the places from which they come are on the exhibits.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I have heard the suggestion that Ontario grain was not represented as fully or displayed as attractively as it might be.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think there was any ground for that complaint. All the winter wheat comes from Ontario, nearly all the barley and corn, and the oats are from nearly all over the Dominion.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Having met at 11 o'clock, does the Minister of Finance not think that 12 would be a good hour to adjourn?

Mr. FIELDING. When we get into Committee of Supply at 11 o'clock, would not 12 o'clock, be too early to adjourn?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I think there was an understanding that certain items named should be put through, but I did not understand that this was one.

Mr. FISHER. This was one.

Mr BORDEN (Halifax). I do not remember it being mentioned, but I am subject to correction. The Prime Minister said:

> There are, however, some items of supply which must be voted in full, independent of such agreements. There is the vote for the military and Northwest Mounted Police contingents, which are to attend the coronation, and with respect to them a partial vote would not be sufficient. There is also in this category the vote for the Festival of Empire, which, although a private enterprise——

Mr. FISHER. This is the exhibition at the Festival of Empire.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understood it was a separate item. What is the amount of the item?

Mr. FISHER. $150,000 in the main estimates and $75,000 in the supplementaries.

Mr. BLAIN. Was the contract let for the building?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, part of the expenditure on this exhibition was taken from the vote of last year.

Mr. BLAIN. Did the minister let the contract for the building, costing a great deal of money, before the money was voted by parliament?

Mr. FISHER. The money is not voted yet.

Mr. BLAIN. Then my hon. friend and his government take it upon themselves to enter into a large contract for the expenditure of money without consulting parliament or having a vote for that purpose.

Mr. FISHER. I explained all that at the time I took the supplementary vote in the earlier part of the session. We could not delay. If we had done so we could not have taken any part, and the government decided on its responsibility, having charge of the affairs of the country, to take part, on the invitation of the committee in London under the presidency of Lord Plymouth and under the patronage of His Majesty.

Mr. BLAIN. Without consulting parliament.

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the cost of the building?

Mr. FISHER. About $100,000; it is a copy of this building.

Mr. BLAIN. What amount has been expended up to date?

Mr. FISHER. We have contracted obligations of about $135,000.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend has undertaken, without consulting parliament, to enter into contracts for the construction of a building costing upwards of $130,000. That is one of the complaints we have against my hon. friend's government that they are doing too much by order in council, that they do not take parliament into their confidence, and when a discussion comes up in the House in connection with expenditure, the government say: Oh the opposition are as much responsible as the government because they were in the House when the item was passed. I have heard my hon. friend's colleagues make that statement.

Mr. FIELDING. Not if you never voted for it.

Mr. BLAIN. But the Minister of Finance must remember that his colleagues said that there has been no vote.

Mr. FIELDING. And therefore we do not blame you if there has not been.

Mr. BLAIN. No, because I do not see how you can blame the opposition.

Mr. FIELDING. That is fair.

Mr. BLAIN. Does my hon. friend think that it is a fair policy that any minister should have the power to enter into expenditures and make contracts for $125,000 or $130,000 without consulting parliament and then come along and ask parliament to vote after the money has been practically expended or the contracts made for the expenditure? Is that to be the policy of my hon. friend?

Mr. FISHER. No, except where it is impossible to wait and where you cannot do it in any other way I think it is justifiable for the government to take that responsibility in the interests of the country. The government has to take that responsibility on certain occasions and when it does take that responsibility it is accountable to the House. The House need not vote the money if it does not see fit.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister has already stated that this was not an unexpected proposition.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman must not put words in my mouth. The Festival of Empire last year was an affair for which we had a vote of parliament. The festival was postponed until this year, it was very much magnified, it was made a very great affair in conjunction with the coronation and the imperial conference and increased enormously in magnitude and importance. The question was whether we would still take a part in it commensurate with the importance of Canada and the empire or whether we should delay and not be able to take part. We believed that it was in the interest of Canada and the empire that we should take part, we assumed the responsibility of taking part and we now ask parliament to vote the necessary funds to enable us to do so.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Do I understand the minister to say that this sum of $150,000 and the sum of $75,000 in the supplementary estimates are both required for the Festival of Empire?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Is the money to be all spent for that or is part of it to be spent on other exhibitions?

Mr. FISHER. No, there is no other exhibition.

Mr. PERLEY. When was this contract given out?

Mr. FISHER. About the end of November or in December.

Mr. PERLEY. I would like to ask the minister whether he does not think that there is something in the comments of my hon. friend from Peel. I have seen special votes brought before this House and the government asked for them to be passed immediately by parliament. I remember that the vote in connection with the San Francisco disaster was passed in that way. Even in a case of this kind, if it comes in the recess and the House is not in session, I can understand the argument of the minister that the government must decide in this peremptory way that it will go on with the work and ask parliament to vote the money afterwards. But I do not see how that argument can apply when parliament is in session. This is an imperial matter in which we all take an interest. I do not think there is a member of this House but would be glad to give his assistance in passing a vote in order that Canada should take part in this festival. What right has the minister or the government to undertake an expenditure of $150,000 for a building without coming here and asking for a vote while parliament is in session? The vote could be asked for specially. It does not need to be left to come up in the ordinary course in the estimates. I would like the minister explain why he did not come here and get a vote last fall.

Mr. FISHER. In a measure my hon. friend is quite correct. The government, however, were committed to this festival long before the House met. We had to announce whether we would take part in it or not and make the necessary arrangements. My hon. friend is in a measure certainly correct in what he says. Last November the House was sitting, or about to sit, these estimates were laid on the table soon afterwards and I might then have urged that the House should take up the estimate and pass it before proceeding further. I confess that has not been our practice. When these estimates were laid on the table the country, or the government, was committed to this enterprise and we judged that the House would support the enterprise. I think my hon. friend is correct that the whole country was satisfied that we should take part in this celebration and the only question is whether we should have immediately stopped all other proceedings and taken up this item at that early stage of the session.

Mr. PERLEY. The reason I mention the thing is because this has not been the practice. I may be very old fashioned, but it seems to me that there is far more government by order in council in this country than there is any need of. The reason I have gone into this question somewhat fully is because I feel very strongly on the subject. It is not fair to the House, or the country to have so many things done by the government by which the country is committed. Then, they come to parliament to have their action confirmed, and the money voted. Of course, all the Liberal members will vote for the government. It is perfectly natural that they should do so even if they do not think it is a right and proper thing. They cannot object to it; they must vote for the government in order to sustain their leader. There have been many similar cases. I remember very well, with regard to the Grand Trunk hotel, that, although parliament was in session at the time, this government actually made a contract with the Grand Trunk Railway Company to sell them a piece of land, and after it was put through they submitted it to this House, and asked to have the contract confirmed. I know as a matter of fact that there were many Liberal members in this House who felt that it was a mistake to put the hotel where it is. It is in the middle of the government grounds, and we should have kept all the Dominion government property intact by itself. The Minister of Public Works proposes to build a large new departmental block on Sussex street, and the ordinary person walking on the street will be unable to see the new departmental building until he gets right up to it by reason of the fact that this Grand Trunk hotel has been located where it is. There were a lot of Liberal members who did not approve of that location, and the government deliberately, during the session of parliament, made a contract, and then came here to have it confirmed. I really think that there is more of that sort of thing done than there is any need of. They are doing altogether too many things without consulting parliament. I am not prepared to say that of everything the government does off its own bat, but I do think they are doing other things that there is no need of. I will ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the government might not have saved themselves and the country a great deal of trouble if they had not passed a contract with President Taft at Washington this year without bringing it to parliament for consideration, and whether he thinks that two ministers of the Crown ought to go down to Washington and then come back to this parliament and say that we must pass it because the honour of Canada has been pledged. The honour of Canada is said to be pledged because two ministers of the Crown bind the government of the day, who in turn bind the Liberal members, and who in their turn profess to bind the whole country. Well, while there are many things a government reasonably may do without coming to the House, I do not believe they should, under the strict spirit of the constitution, do so many important acts of government without consulting parliament.

Mr. FIELDING. In connection with the reciprocity arrangement my hon. friend seems to be unaware of certain important facts. There is no difference between the method of negotiating this agreement and the method of negotiating any other agreement that was ever made with any foreign government with respect to a similar transaction. The agreement was made confidentially—hon. gentlemen opposite say secretly—but every treaty is negotiated confidentially and secretly. It was brought down here and submitted to the House with the suggestion that it could not be changed. It was exactly the same in that respect as the Washington treaty of 1871, as the treaty made by Sir Charles Tupper in 1888 and exactly the same as every other treaty in which an agreement has been made on behalf of Canada with any foreign country. According to the custom, such an agreement had to be negotiated confidentially and when completed it was submitted to this parliament precisely the same as in every other case.

Mr. BLAIN. Notwithstanding that the House was in session after the government had decided to take part in the Brussels exhibition, the Minister of Agriculture did not ask for a vote but got a Governor General's warrant to remove the exhibit from Seattle to Brussels, so that this is an old habit with him. He should be more careful to consult the representatives of the people.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there any further explanation as to the withdrawal of the proposal to celebrate the battle of Chateauguay in connection with the Festival of Empire?

Mr. FISHER. I have not cabled to England for information, but I expect to get a report with regard to the matter by letter.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Our friends on the other side of the line are not nearly so much concerned about such matters as we seem to be. The Minister of Agriculture will have observed that Admiral Perry's victory on Lake Erie in 1813 is to be celebrated in very impressive and flamboyant style. Large sums of money have been contributed by a number of states; one of the ships sunk in that fight is to be raised; there is to be a great naval demonstration, and a magnificent permanent memorial is to be erected at Put-in Bay. No one on this side of the line has the slightest feeling about that. It is entirely within the right of the American people to celebrate that victory and no one here thinks twice about it. What I wonder is that any one could have been so exceedingly foolish as to imagine that the American people would have had any ill-feeling if the Battle of Chateauguay were celebrated at this Festival of the Empire? Why is it that we seem to be so exceedingly supersensitive about offending our neighbours in such matters when we do not see any spirit of the same kind on their part, because they realize that we are big enough not to be oppressed with a feeling of resentment on any such account. It is a very great pity that in connection with this Festival of the Empire to which Canada has contributed a large sum of money, the celebration of that battle should have been omitted for the reason given. It was a very gallant exploit; it has been called the Thermopylæ of Canada; a few French Canadian volunteers in command of De Salaberry, assisted by some Glengarry men under Col. Macdonell, put to route eight or ten times their number of American troops who were invading Canada. I really believe we are paying no compliment to our friends on the other side of the line when it is imagined that their feelings would be hurt by a celebration of that noble event.

Mr. FISHER. I sympathize with every word uttered by the leader of the opposition, and had we been consulted I would most emphatically have expressed that opinion to the English authorities. I most sincerely believe that no feeling would have arisen in the United States had the battle of Chateauguay been celebrated at the Festival of Empire. Our neighbours are too big to be offended by such a thing. No doubt, the arrangement was made with the best intentions and without any idea of wounding us, but I regret that we were not consulted. I cannot say more on that point. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has said with regard to the Battle of Chateauguay is perfectly true and the Canadian people are justly proud of that exploit. I have been waiting for a report as to the reasons which actuated those who had control of the matter, and I trust it will be a better reason than has yet been given.

Mr. BLAIN. When was the government first invited to take part in the Festival of Empire?

Mr. FISHER. About eighteen months ago, I was in England immediately after the death of King Edward, when the question of the postponement of the first proposed festival came up on account of the King's death. It was decided to proceed with the festival this year. I was spoken to by various people who were interested in it, and they then expressed the intention and expectation of proceeding with it this year. I came back here about the 1st of July, and it was not until after that that I received the official positive declaration that they were going to proceed. I then at once laid the matter before my colleagues, and we were asked at once to accept the invitation or let them know what we were going to do. A few weeks after that we decided to accept the invitation, and I then instructed the commissioner of exhibitions, who was at Brussels, to go to London and meet the committee there and find out what recommendations they would make as to our participation. Later on the suggestion was made that the Canadian building should take the form of a replica or copy of this one. I understand that Australia is putting up a replica of a part at any rate of the buildings at Melbourne. I am not quite sure whether New Zealand is doing the same, but I think so. Then the commissioner went on with the work and made the arrangements. I think the contract for the building was made some time in November last.

Mr. BLAIN. I may say that at the last session of parliament my hon. friend made this statement, at page 5728:

Lately we have been invited and strongly urged by a very influential committee in London to take part in what is known as the Festival of Empire at the Crystal Palace, and the government has decided that it would be very unfortunate if at such a celebration as that Canada was not represented.

That was on March 18. My hon. friend had abundant opportunity to consult the House and submit an estimate.

Mr. FISHER. That was the celebration of last year.

Mr. BLAIN. The same one.

Mr. FISHER. The same one, but postponed to this year on a different scale.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If any portion of this vote is being devoted to the historical representation, I wish to ask if the minister could not make representations that the battle of Chateauguay be not omitted.

Mr. FISHER. We have contributed some $10,000 to the general expenses of the festival. I do not know whether any portion of the money goes to the pageant or not.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Could not the minister on that ground have made some representations to the authorities that it would be greatly regretted if the battle of Chateauguay were omitted from the representation.

Mr. FISHER. I have asked for information on the matter. I thought I would not do anything until I got that information.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Of what material is the proposed building to be constructed?

Mr. FISHER. I think it is a steel structure, with staff covering, as all these exhibition buildings are.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Who has the contract for building it?

Mr. FISHER. Messrs. Humphreys of London, who have been constructing our exhibition buildings for many years. They have made that a specialty. We have invited tenders from others, but they have always been the lowest, and lately we have been giving them the contract without competition, based on their figures.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. What becomes of the building after the exhibition is over?

Mr. FISHER. They have to take it down as part of the contract.

Mr. BLAIN. Were tenders invited in Canada for the construction of this building?

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. BLAIN. Why not?

Mr. FISHER. I do not think it possible that Canadian contracting firms go to London and erect a building at anything like the figure of the London firm, which has all the necessary labour and materials there.

Mr. BLAIN. Would it not have been a very good advertisement for Canada if the steel structure could have been made here and transported to England, so that not only the exhibits, but the building itself, would have been made in Canada? Besides, a goodly portion of the money would have been expended in Canada and to our own workmen.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think it would have been a feasible proposition at all.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend may say that off-hand, but he has not given any consideration to it. Would he say that the firms engaged in putting up large buildings in Ottawa and elsewhere in Canada would not be able to construct such a building as has been referred to? Surely not.

Mr. JAMESON. I understand that almost a quarter of a million dollars is to be expended as a contribution to the Imperial authorities for this purpose. It seems to me a most unfortunate thing that the representation in regard to the Battle of Chateauguay has been omitted. I do not think it can yet be too late for the government to make representations on the subject to the Imperial authorities. It seems to me that it is a duty that we owe to our own national dignity to have that battle represented there, and in my judgment it is incumbent upon the government to make at least a fair attempt to have arrangements made for a proper representation in that regard. I believe that the people of Canada will feel that they are not being fairly dealt with if there is not a representation of that most historic battle, and I trust that the government will take measures to see that a fair opportunity is given for a representation.

Mr. FISHER. I may say that I was waiting for information to make representations that the omission of that battle was not received with favour in Canada, and that if the committee could see their way to retain the representations, it would certainly be in accordance with my own views.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Did I understand the minister to say that the Humphreys Company had been erecting exhibition buildings for this government in the past? If so, where?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, they have put up buildings at Brussels, Dublin, and I think Milan, and one in London in 1908.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If it is a fact that this London company have been putting up exhibition buildings for Canada in foreign countries, I think the opportunity should have been offered to Canadian firms to erect the requisite building for this Festival of Empire, to employ Canadian workmen and Canadian materials. If a London firm can go to Milan or to Brussels and make a business success of a building, why should not a Canadian firm be in a position to enter into an enterprise of that kind and make it a success? It was up to this government to give the opportunity at least to Canadians to show their enterprise. It seems to me that our people could perhaps do this work to greater advantage.

Mr. FISHER. When we had an exhibition in St. Louis, we advertised for tenders, and no Canadian offered. When we exhibited in Seattle not long ago, no Canadian contractors put in a tender. This business is a speciality, and the firm of Humphrey's do most of the building in all the exhibitions of Europe. The firm that put up our buildings in St. Louis, erected them in Seattle. These contractors put up the buildings and take them down again, and use the material in other exhibition buildings.

Dominion exhibition, five-sixths of $50,000.

Mr. FISHER. This is a grant we give to each province in turn. This year it goes to Saskatchewan, and the exhibition will take place in Regina in the month of August, and they will be wanting the grant before the House meets again.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Under the circumstances, I see no objection in passing this.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 12.33 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TUESDAY, May 16, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANK ACT.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 219) to amend the Quebec Savings Bank Act. He said: The purpose is to extend the terms of these two savings banks in Quebec for another year just as we are doing with the General Banking Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 218) for the relief of George Mackay Sutherland.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HERRON. Before the orders of the day are called, would the hon. the Minister of Finance tell the House definitely when parliament is going to adjourn? I ask this because it is sometimes very difficult to get Pullman accommodation at this time of the year, and it takes a week's notice to secure Pullman passage from here to the west. The distance is too far to travel without sleepers and the government should be prepared to give some intimation as to when the House will adjourn.

Mr. FIELDING. I quite appreciate the reason given by my hon. friend for desiring to know more definitely when the adjournment will take place. The date fixed, as stated by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, was the 23rd, but the wish was generally expressed that we might possibly adjourn on Friday, the 19th, rather than on Tuesday, the 23rd. I would be very glad, and so would my colleagues, to facilitate adjournment on the 19th, but there are some matters of urgency which we ought to get through before adjournment. We still hope to be able to adjourn on the 19th provided we can have the co-operation of hon. gentlemen opposite in bringing about such a desirable result.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What are the matters of urgency?

Mr. FIELDING. There are various matters on the Order Paper which had better be disposed of before recess, and we ought to make some further progress in Supply.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The answer concerning matters of urgency is exceedingly vague. Will the hon. gentlemen kindly tell the opposition what measures the government wish the House to deal with as matters of urgency?

Mr. FIELDING. I am very unfortunate in not being able to satisfy my hon. friend. We indicated yesterday some things which we desire to bring on to-day, and to-morrow I shall make another statement as to what we wish to forward as quickly as possible.

THE 'NIOBE' AND 'RAINBOW'.

Mr. CROSBY. Will the hon. minister give the names of the officers of the 'Niobe' and 'Rainbow' who have been selected to attend the coronation?

Mr. FIELDING. When the Minister of the Naval Department is present I shall call his attention to the hon. gentleman's question and endeavour to have him furnish the information.

PETAWAWA MILITARY CAMP.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Has the government any information regarding the extent of damage caused by the fire at Petawawa a few days ago, and is it the intention to proceed immediately with the reconstruction of the buildings which were damaged?

Mr. FIELDING. I cannot give the information at the moment, but will give it later on when the acting minister is present.

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS TREATY.

Mr. PUGSLEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 36) relating to the establishment and expenses of the International and Joint Commission under the Waterways Treaty of January 11, 1909. He said: This matter was so fully discussed when the resolution was under consideration by the House in Committee of the Whole that I do not think it necessary at present to go at any lengh into the subject. Hon. gentlemen will find the discussion in 'Hansard' on pages 890 to 945, 6th of December last.

After the Bill was introduced it was thought desirable, after consultation with the Minister of Justice, that provision should be made in it for the summoning of witnesses and also for giving the subjects of the United States the right to bring actions in Canadian courts for the recovery of damages, the United States giving the same right to British subjects. In the United States it has not been deemed necessary to pass legislation upon the subject because under its constitution a treaty becomes the supreme law and supersedes all state laws. But in Canada the constitution is different, and in the opinion of my hon. colleague, the Minister of Justice, it is desirable that provision should be made so as to make it clear beyond doubt that our courts will have power to summon witnesses to give evidence under oath, and also that the right of action shall be clearly granted.

Mr. SPROULE. As I understand it, this is a federal law. Do not the several states still claim to exercise their right on boundary waters?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not where they are subject to a treaty. Under the constitution of the United States a treaty precedes all statutes of either Congress or of the several states.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Which clause of the constitution?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I read the clause when the resolution was before the committee; hon. members will see it in the 'Hansard' report of the remarks I made on that occasion and to which I have already referred. Therefore, I propose, when the House goes into committee on the Bill, to amend it as shown by the printed amended Bill which I have had distributed among some hon. members who are taking more special interest in this matter. Other hon. members who desire copies can, of course, obtain them by sending to the proper office. I propose asking the committee to add five sections——

Mr. FOSTER. Before the minister (Mr. Pugsley) goes on I would like to be sure with reference to his general statement that in all cases a United States treaty overrides state rights. It seems to me that that is not the genius of the United States constitution. I am not an authority on that document, but there is one case which, as I recollect it, seems to me in point. Difficulties arose in California over the school rights and privileges of the Japanese in that state. Japan contended that the treaty guaranteed to the subjects of either country in the other, equality of rights with the subjects of the country. I remember well there was a very strong line of correspondence between President Roosevelt and the authorities in California, occasioned by the fact that a law was contemplated to be passed by the California legislature which, the president contended, would be in contravention of the treaty rights. My recollection of the affair is that California got its back up, and kept it up, and was constitutionally able to keep it up. But milder counsels prevailed and, in some way or other, an arrangement was made. But as I recall the correspondence, President Roosevelt expressed the fear that California, by persistence in its action—which, as I understood, the federal authorities could not control—would render the relations between Japan and the United States otherwise than friendly. I may be wrong, but it seems to me the statement of the Minister of Public Works went too far.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not remember very clearly the controversy to which my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) refers, but I will read the article of the constitution of the United States of which I have spoken, and which hon. gentlemen will find at page 902 of 'Hansard.' It is article 6 of the constitution and it provides as follows:

> That this constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.

I think it would be impossible to find language which more clearly provides that a treaty shall be the supreme law of the land.

Mr. FOSTER. Another case comes to my mind, a case between the United States and the Italian government with reference to redress sought by the government of Italy for citizens of that country of Italy who, in some of the states of the American union, were deprived of their privileges and who claimed damages. Now, the demand made at that time, as I recollect it, was that the United States was not in a position to confirm these privileges of the citizens of Italy because of the powers of the states.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) will not question my construction of this article. I think it is clear beyond any possibility of doubt. That is the view taken by the Attorney General of the United States who has not the slightest doubt upon the point and is acting accordingly. They, by their legislation, are providing for the expenses of the commission. The Attorney General's opinion is, just as, I think, any one reading article 6 of the constitution will see, that there is no question whatever that the treaty has become the supreme law of the land, and that it supersedes all state law bearing upon the subject.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). May I ask the hon. minister (Mr. Pugsley) a question? I understood that another clause of the constitution of the United States modified the clause he has quoted. I have not the document before me, but where the difficulty arises over this question of construction is where treaty rights interfere with private rights. There is a clause in the constitution which says that private rights shall be observed and shall be supreme, and that the United States of America or any of the states cannot perform any confiscatory act without redress. All this trouble over treaty rights has arisen where private rights are affected. Take the case of the Ste. Marie river, for instance. One of the problems in the discussion with reference to this waterway arose out of the private rights of the owners at Sault Ste. Marie. I should think that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) could quote some precedents or judicial expressions of opinion by the United States Supreme Court on this point before asking us to swallow his dictum holus bolus. Because, if I mistake not, the view always taken by the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States is that where matters of private rights are involved they are supreme over treaty rights.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Currie) wished to ask me a question. If he purposes going beyond that, I think it would be well to await the conclusion of the very brief statement I wish to make. However, I may just remark with reference to the hon. gentleman's suggestion, there is a clause in the constitution of the United States providing that private rights cannot be taken away except with compensation. But I do not think that affects the matter at all. As to the case of the Ste. Marie river, where the rights of the American citizens at Sault Ste. Marie are concerned, that is a question between the United States government and its own citizens. And the United States, after the passing of this treaty acquired the rights of its citizens, becoming the riparian owner; and, therefore, all questions, so far as private rights in that locality are concerned, have been settled. I cannot see how the question is at all pertinent to the consideration of this Bill. Now, I propose——

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I do not wish to be asking questions, but I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) has an amendment to this Act which gives American citizens the right to sue in Canadian courts for damages sustained through this treaty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Quite so.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Carrying out the doctrine he has laid down, if there is any damage, the authority which is responsible for that damage should be the United States government, and there should be no occasion for suing in Canadian courts for damages.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The amendments I propose to suggest to the committee are simply for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the treaty. Perhaps, as hon. gentlemen may not have copies of the amendments, it might be well for me to read the five sections which contain the amendments I propose. They are as follows:—

1. The treaty relating to the boundary waters and to questions arising along the boundary between Canada and the United States made between His Majesty and the said United States, signed at Washington the eleventh day of January, one thousand nine hundred and nine, and the protocol of the fifth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and ten, in the Schedule of this Act, are hereby confirmed and sanctioned.

2. The laws of Canada and of the several provinces thereof are hereby amended and altered so as to permit, authorize and sanction the performance of the obligations undertaken by His Majesty in and under the said treaty; and so as to sanction, confer and impose the various rights, duties and disabilities intended by the said treaty to be conferred or imposed or to exist within Canada.

3. Any interference with or diversion from their natural channel of any waters in Canada which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary between Canada and the United States or into boundary waters (as defined in the said treaty) resulting in any injury on the United States side of the boundary, shall give the same rights and entitle the injured parties to the same legal remedies as if such injury took place in that part of Canada where such diversion or interference occurs, but this section shall not apply to cases existing on the eleventh day of January, one thousand nine hundred and nine, or to cases expressly covered by special agreement between His Majesty and the government of the United States.

4. The Exchequer Court of Canada shall have jurisdiction at the suit of any injured party or person claiming under this Act in all cases in which it is sought to enforce or determine as against any person any right or obligation arising or claimed under or by virtue of this Act.

5. The International Joint Commission, when appointed and constituted pursuant to the said treaty shall have power, when holding joint sessions in Canada, to take evidence on oath and to compel the attendance of witnesses by application to a judge of a superior court of the province within which such session is held, and such judge is hereby authorized and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary and appropriate to that end.

Those five sections are the new sections. The remaining sections of the amended Bill remain the same as they are in the Bill now before the House. If hon. gentlemen will compare these sections with the provisions of the treaty which are to be found in the schedule to the amended Bill, it will be seen that they simply carry out the provisions of the treaty, and are inserted because, in the opinion of the Minister of Justice, they are necessary to enable the courts of Canada to have jurisdiction, and in order that the provisions of the treaty may be effectually carried out.

Mr. EMMERSON. I desire to ask if there are similar provisions in the legislation of the United States giving the same rights to Canadian citizens in reference to wrongs committed by United States citizens?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. I may say to my hon. friend that the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States is, and in that opinion the Minister of Justice concurs, that the treaty iself confers all those rights upon Canadian subjects in the courts of the United States.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The hon. gentleman has referred several times to the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States given on this question. Is that document available to the House?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I hold in my hands a copy of a despatch from the British Ambassador at Washington, which justifies me in making the statement I make to the House. In his despatch of April 21, 1911, addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, he says:—

Mr. PUGSLEY.

My Lord,—I have the honour to transmit herewith that clause of the Appropriation Act passed at the termination of the first congress which provides the legislation required by the last paragraph of Article XII. of the treaty on boundary waters and boundary questions.

It will be observed that the powers conferred on the commission by this legislation are those specified in the article above mentioned. There was at one time some question as to whether legislation would not be required in order to give the Canadian complainants access to the United States courts in injuries inflicted on them in Canadian territory as provided in paragraph 1 of Article 11. But after taking legal opinion it was decided that the treaty was sufficient in itself to effect this.

I assume that the legal opinion would be that of the Attorney General of the United States, who is the legal adviser of the United States government. He proceeds as follows:—

The United States government are, I understand, anxious to arrange for an early convention of the commission as there are several urgent and important questions awaiting reference to it. The appointment of the United States commissioners was recently reported to Your Excellency.

I have the honour to be, My Lord,
Yours most obedient, humble servant
JAMES BRYCE.

His Excellency, The Rt. Hon.
The Earl Grey, G.C.M.G., etc., etc., etc.

Now, in that opinion, as I have said, the Minister of Justice concurs. His opinion is that Article 6 of the constitution of the treaty gives effectually all the rights to Canadian subjects which could be conferred by an Act of Congress. I may read Article 2 of the treaty which provides for that:

Each of the High Contracting Parties reserves to itself, or to the several state governments on the one side and the Dominion or provincial governments on the other, as the case may be, subject to any treaty provisions now existing with respect thereto, the exclusive jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion, whether temporary or permanent, of all waters on its own side of the line which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary or into boundary waters; but it is agreed that any interference with or diversion from their natural channel of such waters on either side of the boundary resulting in any injury on the other side of the boundary shall give rise to the same rights and entitle the injured parties to the same legal remedies as if such injury took place in the country where such diversion or interference occurs; but this provision shall not apply to cases already existing or to cases expressly covered by special agreement between the parties hereto.

It will be seen that the amended sections of this Bill provide exactly in the terms of that article.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does that give jurisdiction in their courts?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I need to say anything more at present. I move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Do the state governments claim the right of jurisdiction with respect to the several matters over which the federal government assumes the right?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not aware that they have made any such claim. I would be surprised to learn that they make any claim that is in contravention of the terms of the treaty, so far as respects boundary waters. I cannot see how it would be possible for them to make such a contention in face of the express provisions of Article 6 of the constitution. I understand that it is well recognized in the United States that a treaty overrides all state laws bearing upon the subject to which the treaty relates.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Just one word more before the hon. gentleman leaves this discussion. I observe that in clause 4 provision is made for the Exchequer Court of Canada to have jurisdiction in cases of this kind. As I understand it, when a foreign citizen desires to bring an action against the government of any British country, he approaches the matter by petition and the authority, either His Excellency the Governor General or the King, or whoever is acting, will issue a fiat and write across that petition 'let justice be done.' The matter is referred to the courts in the ordinary way, so that there is no necessity for this clause 4, in a sense, at all. Provision has always been made under the British constitution for a foreigner to sue for any injury or damages which may have been occasioned by the government or an individual in a British country. But, as far as I can ascertain, there is no remedy or machinery provided in the United States for bringing an action of this kind. In all civil matters, as I understand, the states have jurisdiction and the states have refused to allow a foreigner the right to sue for any damages caused either by the United States government or by a corporation within their jurisdiction. If an injury occurs to a person in the state of New York, a foreign citizen, unless he has property within the state, has no right to any recourse by way of suit. A case arose not very long ago where a young lady was killed on the Lehigh Valley railway in the state of Pennsylvania. Action was brought and when the action had proceeded a certain length the railway company took refuge behind a claim that the party injured had no property within the state and consequently had no right to sue. There was no recourse and the case was dismissed by the United States court. Is the hon. gentleman assured that machinery is provided and if so, what is the machinery provided, under the authority of the federal courts whereby a citizen of Canada can sue? We ought to know that. Machinery is already provided by us even without passing this clause. What machinery is provided in the United States? It is all well enough to say that by the treaty you can do a certain thing, but although you had the treaty you might not have the machinery of the courts provided in order to carry out your treaty. You might find yourself damaged in the United States, you might go into the United States and try to bring suit but you would find there was no court before which you could bring suit. You would find that there is no means by which you could approach the court by petition or in any other way to bring this suit, and there is no court provided to give justice except perhaps a state court and a state court will take the most narrow and restricted view possible in your case. I think the minister in charge of the Bill should clearly explain to the House what procedure a citizen of this country can follow in carrying out this clause of the Act, or under this treaty. Suppose a citizen of Canada has land flooded by the action of the American government or an American corporation, and he desires to bring suit in the United States courts. Let the minister in charge of the Bill clearly explain to the House whether proper machinery is provided whereby an action can be brought and sustained in the courts of the United States. I think it is necessary that the House should know what that machinery is.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend's statement certainly surprises me, and I am sure it would surprise every lawyer in the House when he says that if a party in one of the United States suffers injury that party can have no redress in the courts of the state in which he happens to own property.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I said a foreign citizen. Do not let the hon. gentleman put any words into my mouth that are not true.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A foreign citizen. I am satisfied that there is no such law.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I am satisfied that there is.

Mr. PUGSLEY. And until my hon. friend calls my attention to the statute which so declares I am sure he will forgive me if I hesitate to accept his statement. Possibly he might have to do just as foreigners have to do in this country; he might have to give security for the payment of costs in case he should lose his suit.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). That suit must be brought by the executors or trustees of the party's estate, or by himself, and if he has no property he must be represented by a trust company.

Mr. EMMERSON. He could not hold property in the state of New York if he were a foreign citizen.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). You mean real property?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am speaking of real property.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). But he must have property of some kind; he must either have money or be represented by a trust company.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think these details had better be discussed in committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it would be better. I was just going to say a word in answer to my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Currie). The words of the treaty are that in case of any injury caused by diversion of waters from their natural channel on either side of the boundary resulting in any injury on the other side of the boundary this shall give rise to the same rights and entitle the injured parties to the same legal remedies as if the injury took place in the country where such diversion or interference occurs. In case that injury took place in one of the United States, the party whose property was injured would have a legal remedy. He would have the right to go into the courts of the state and recover damages.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The state courts?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The state courts.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Not the federal courts?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Possibly not the federal courts. I am not sure as to the line of distinction between them, but it does not make any difference, because that there is a legal remedy under the treaty is beyond question. What this treaty does is to give to a Canadian subject who has suffered injury upon this side of the boundary line the same rights and remedies as if his property were on the American side of the boundary, and as if it were injured by the act of the United States government or of an American citizen.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Suppose the consent of the Interstate Commission was given to the erection of the work that had caused the damage, would he then have any right of action?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, he would still have the same right of action.

Mr. REID (Grenville). With reference to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) that a treaty made by the federal government in the United States would supersede any rights of the state legislature, I may say that the minister knows that there was a treaty made between Great Britain and the United States commonly known as the Ashburton treaty with reference to certain rights in boundary waters between the two countries. The state of New York does not agree with the statement made by the Minister of Public Works. The state of New York claims that it has the right to build a dam across the St. Lawrence river irrespective of the Ashburton treaty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not to interfere with navigation.

Mr. REID (Grenville). They only admit that the federal government are to say what interferes with navigation or something of that kind. The Ashburton treaty stipulates that nothing shall be done to interfere with the natural flow of the river.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The words of the treaty are that the subjects of each country shall have the same right of navigation as the subjects of the other country. In other words it shall be equally free and open to navigation to the citizens of both countries.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It means that the river was to remain free and open. In the evidence taken in the United States the representative of this great corporation said:

> My position is that the people of the state of New York through their legislative body and government in the passage of this Bill have passed upon the question absolutely as to whether it is in the interests of navigation or not.

The representative in the state legislature claims the right to dispose of half the power irrespective of the federal government, notwithstanding that it is boundary waters. You can see that a different view is taken of the treaty than that taken by the Minister of Public Works. I agree that there should be a commission of some kind to look after our interests, but I want to see everything done that can be done to protect our rights not only on the St. Lawrence but in other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I have prepared a clause which I think will have the effect of safeguarding our rights, and which will leave any future question of damming the St. Lawrence with this parliament, where the Prime Minister promised it should be left. My amendment reads.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would it not be better to bring it up in committee?

Mr. REID (Grenville). Very well, we can discuss the matter then.

Mr. C. A. MAGRATH (Medicine Hat). Early in December the Minister of Public Works had a resolution before this House bearing on the treaty recently entered into between the United States and Canada dealing with international waters and now known as the Waterways Treaty. That resolution was the forerunner of this Bill, and although I believe I made my position perfectly clear on that occasion in connection with the matter, I shall take this opportunity to discuss some features of that treaty. The treaty consists of two main features, first, it undertakes to divide between the two countries certain specific boundary waters as well as certain waters which flow across the boundary; and, second, it provides machinery for the investigation of future water questions which may arise along the boundary and in the settlement of which it enunciates at least one principle. The Minister of Public Works on the occasion to which I have referred was most insistent that the settlement which has been made as to the division of certain boundary waters is eminently fair to this country, and, he was equally positive that the principle which is to be applied in future cases was sound and just. It does not require any stretch of imagination to see that if we have an eminently sound settlement it can only be obtained through the application of sound and just principles and I purpose showing to this House that we have in that treaty the enunciation of a sound and just and fair principle and side by side with it a settlement provided in article 6 of the treaty which undertakes to divide the waters of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers and their tributaries between Montana and Alberta, a settlement I repeat in which that principle was over-ridden in a roughshod manner. In May, 1909, I undertook to discuss some features of this treaty. I do not now purpose going over the same ground in detail, but I shall recite some of my findings on that occasion and then pass on to other features of the treaty. We know that in June, 1902, the Congress of the United States invited Canada, through Great Britain, to participate in the investigation of our international waters; we know that this country was somewhat tardy in accepting that invitation, but finally decided in April of the following year to accept it; we know that the United States selected the three members of the then proposed International Joint Waterways Commission in October, 1903. We also know that this country did not complete the Canadian section until practically two years thereafter, and there, it seems to me, the United States scored point number one. We know that President Roosevelt in going afield to secure two engineers to act upon the American section obtained the services of men who had previous technical training in water questions, men who had actually been engaged in investigating work on the Great Lakes which supply the water that creates Niagara Falls; the division of its waters being one of the principal questions that was afterwards dealt with by the Joint Commission. Now, while I have nothing to say against the character or ability of the two engineers first selected by our government, I do say that there is not an atom of evidence that can be produced to show that these men had any large experience in that branch of their profession in which they were to be engaged in looking after the interests of the people of this country. It appears to me that in that respect—and I state that without any desire to belittle the ability of these men—the United States again scored. But probably the feature that is most astonishing in connection with the completion of the Canadian section is the appointment of Mr. Mabee who was selected in May, 1905, and to use the language of the right hon. gentleman was 'elevated' to the bench in November of that year. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold the doctrine that water is the most valuable asset this country possesses, and holding that doctrine I cannot conceive it is possible to 'elevate' any man from the position then held by Mr. Mabee to any other in the gift of the people or of the government.

I claim that the government had no proper conception of the character of the work that was to be conducted by the Joint Commission, and that it had no conception of the great services the Canadian section would be called upon to render this country, and I claim that the proof of that is in the government's method of procedure in using a seat on the Canadian section as a resting place on the road to the judiciary. I am aware that Judge Mabee has since rendered signal service to this country; that he is engaged in very important work at the present time in the interests of the people, but I claim that it cannot be of the same character of importance as that in which he was first selected by our government.

It is true that the full importance of work in connection with our international waters may not be recognized by the present generation, but the time will come, in my judgment, when our people will properly measure, and appreciate our asset in those waters.

The correspondence which both sections had with the respective governments, justifies me in stating that as soon as the Canadian section was completed, its colleague, the American section, brought forward the Niagara river situation, and pressed it into reaching an early conclusion as to the division of waters at that point. I claim that the Canadian section had to rely upon the American engineering data. I do not, for an instant, suggest that that information was not correct in every detail, but I do say that intelligent people in this age do not go into questions of such great importance without securing their own technical information to guide them in reaching their conclusions. I claim that the division of water at Niagara Falls is a division practically suggested by the American section. I, therefore, think the foregoing summary of facts, which were presented to the House by me in May, 1909, fully justifies the charge that our government utterly failed in its duty to the people at that time.

Turning now to article 6 of the treaty, which undertakes to divide the waters of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers, between Canada and the United States, to the detriment of this country, and especially with great injury to my constituency, here again, I claim, the division is one that was practically suggested by American representatives. What is the use of carrying on negotiations if one side is to do all the negotiating?

As I am intimately familiar with the features of the controversy over the waters in question, I propose dealing with the matter at considerable length. It will, therefore, be necessary to give a brief synopsis of the situation. The St. Mary's lakes, two in number, of a total length of 22 miles, are to be found within the eastern base of the Rocky mountains in Montana. Out of them flows the St. Mary's river in a northerly direction, reaching our boundary at a distance of about nine miles. The stream continues its northward course, and becomes part of the Saskatchewan river system, and its waters eventually discharge into Hudson bay. It is an important mountain stream.

The Milk river, likewise, arises in Montana, out in the foot hills, about twenty-five miles east of the St. Mary's river. It crosses over into Canada, and for over one hundred miles flows eastward through my constituency, then, returning to Montana, its waters become part of the Mississippi river system, and empty into the Gulf of Mexico. It is an unimportant stream.

At the time the negotiations were on between the two countries regarding the division of the waters of those streams, what were the commitments against them? In other words, what were their responsibilities? Turning first to the St. Mary's river, within its nine mile course in Montana, it is walled in by two prominent foot-hill ridges which extend practically up to the Canadian border, and within the valley so formed, there is practically not an acre susceptible to development by irrigation. There is no settlement in the valley outside of two or three ranches which front along the stream. In other words, it practically was, and still is a foot-hill wilderness. The situation, however, changes as the stream enters Canada. The valley broadens out, and there are several hundred thousand acres of land capable of developing by irrigation from the waters of that river. As early as 1894, the Canadian government conducted investigations, looking to the development of irrigation from the St. Mary's river, and in 1897, a company was formed with that object in view. The first question that arose was as to the feasibility of diverting water from the stream in Montana, and the decision reached was, that it would not be commercially practicable to do so. Of course no one thought the United States would ask Canada for the use of the Milk river channel, down which it would carry water diverted from St. Mary's river. The Canadian company received authority from this government to carry on its development work, it received authority to divert all the available low water flow of St. Mary's river, and up to two thousand cubic feet per second of high water, and under the irrigation laws of this country was given by our government fifteen or seventeen years within which to carry out its plans. At the time negotiations were in progress, it had developed its canal system to take care of some 800 cubic feet per second.

Turning now to Milk river, I am aware that for some years the total normal available flow was in use for the irrigation of certain areas within the valley of the stream in eastern Montana, to be more exact, in the neighbourhood of Harlem, on the Great Northern railway, where a large quantity of hay is grown by means of irrigation. It has been stated that the rights of the various users of water in eastern Montana were adjudicated upon, and those total rights fixed at somewhere about 350 cubic feet per second. Whether that statement is correct or not, I am prepared to admit that the total normal flow during the summer was appropriated, and was being used. I am also aware of the fact that 350 cubic feet is a great deal more water than the stream carries, except at certain periods in the spring. I have seen the stream carrying not more than ten to fifteen feet per second in the month of August.

Turning briefly to the policy of the United States government for the reclamation of its arid lands, an Act of Congress was passed in 1902 wherein it was provided that lands capable of development by irrigation could be set apart; that the government would provide the necessary moneys to construct the irrigation system, and that the lands would be sold at a figure which would recoup the government its expenditure in connection with the work of bringing the water to the land. That Act brought into existence a corps of engineers, known as the Reclamation Service, and those engineers, in going through Montana, located about 200,000 acres of land within the Milk River valley in eastern Montana which could be easily irrigated from the stream, provided there was sufficient water available for the purpose. They found, however, that the available water was fully appropriated so they had to look elsewhere for water with which to reclaim the lands three methods of taking water from the St. Mary's River valley and made extensive surveys. The result of these indicated three methods of taking water from the St. Mary's river in Montana for the use of the reserved lands. Two of those schemes involved immense outlays in building canal systems entirely in Montana, but owing to the great cost, they were impracticable. The third scheme was to throw the water into the Milk river in Montana by a diversion canal some 25 miles in length and to allow the water to run down through Canada for one hundred miles within the St. Mary's river channel and upon its return to that state to carry it to the reserved lands.

Now, what is the settlement that is provided in article six of the treaty? Namely that two streams running in opposite directions, the important one having its waters discharged in Hudson bay, the other running southward to the Gulf of Mexico, are to be considered as one stream. That is a very excellent declaration so far as our neighbours are concerned, as it allows them to break through a sound principle affecting important streams, that principle being that waters diverted from such streams for irrigation or power purposes should be allowed to return to the same stream in order to permit it to fulfil to the fullest extent its functions or the functions which it may be called upon to fulfill as the country settles up through which the stream flows. The principal function to which I refer is that of navigation. The importance of that declaration, so far as our neighbours are concerned, is fully realized, when we understand that half the waters of St. Mary's river—the important stream—which has for ages past been flowing into Hudson bay will upon the completion of the United States Diversion canal, be carried into the Milk river to supplement the Mississippi river system, and aid in development work in the United States.

The next feature of the article is that the waters of the two streams are to be equally divided. With a prior right, during certain summer months, to Canada of 500 cubic feet per second or so much of such an amount as constitutes three-quarters of the natural flow of St. Mary's river and a similar right in favour of the United States for a similar period as against the flow of the Milk river. There, then is how Canada with about 600,000 acres capable of development, with important vested rights equal to 2,000 feet (cubic) per second against the principal stream—the St. Mary's river are offsetted by vested rights in Montana against the Milk river, which I understand have been adjudicated upon and fixed at 350 cubic feet per second. There then is how Canada's rights, amounting to 2,000 cubic feet per second, and with a canal system capable of taking care of 800 cubic feet per second, are to a considerable extent being destroyed, not for the protection of any vested rights against the St. Mary's river in Montana, but for the creation of rights in an entirely different water system and fully three hundred miles from the source of supply. And now comes the feature of that article which makes the project of the United States feasible. Canada is to allow the undisturbed right of use of the Milk river channel, for over one hundred miles in Canada down which the United States government will transport its half share of the St. Mary's river for use in eastern Montana. That feature has brought the American project out of the clouds of visionary imagination down into the realm of a practical project.

Now about that principle, which is referred to in my opening remarks, and which is to be applied in dealing with future water questions along our boundary, we find that article 2 of the treaty dealing with streams flowing across the boundary consists of four features. 1st. It provides that each government shall absolutely control the waters within its own boundaries, notwithstanding the fact that they may flow into or from the adjoining country. 2nd. That interests which may be injured on one side of the boundary through the diversion of a stream on the other, that the injured interests may cross over into the other country and seek redress in its courts. In short, that vested rights on one side must be honoured on the other. That is the opinion of the Minister of Public Works, who in dealing with this resolution stated page 898 of the unrevised 'Hansard':

Mr. MAGRATH. One more question. I understood the minister's opinion is that under that article, vested rights against a stream on one side of the boundary must be honoured on the other side?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Exactly, that is the spirit of the treaty, that is what it is intended to provide, and it is giving an absolutely new right to subjects of the two countries.

Now it appears to me that that is a fair and just principle which will permit vested rights to seek redress in the country where the damage has been done. The underlying principles of irrigation in the appropriation of water for irrigation is the same in all countries. In Canada a right was obtained under the irrigation laws of this country to take from St. Mary's river certain specific waters. That right still exists and the Canadian company which has the right has been developing its canal system with due diligence. Yet that right, a right which would be honoured under the irrigation laws of Montana was, to a large extent, destroyed by the settlement arrived at in article 6.

I cannot understand the view point of the honourable Minister of Public Works who on the occasion referred to, page 894, unrevised 'Hansard,' said:

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is provided that the people of Alberta shall have the same right to proceed in the courts of the United States as they would have to proceed in the courts of Alberta if the diversion had taken place in Alberta, that is to say, the United States will have a perfect right to divert the water, yet that diversion must be subject to the right of the person lower down the stream, whether in the United States or in Canada, to the same right of action against the other riparian proprietor as if those people were subjects of the same country.

If the hon. minister's statement, as quoted above, is correct, then there is nothing more to be said, as Canadian rights, as soon as they are disturbed by American interests in the United States, can at once seek redress in the courts of that country. The minister appears, however, to have overlooked the third feature of article 2, which clearly states that the principle of allowing vested interests to cross over into the other country is not to apply in existing cases, or cases which can be settled by special arrangement, and the existing case, the only one—namely, the controversy over the waters of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers were settled as provided in article 6 of the treaty. Now, if it is fair and just to allow vested interests that may hereafter be disturbed to protect themselves by going into the courts of the other country, I say, if that is a fair and just principle to be applied in cases that may arise in the future, surely, it was a fair method of settling the existing case, especially between friendly people, who claim that they only wish to be fair to each other. If the Canadian commissioners, who negotiated the treaty, had any idea that we might have in the future a great number of cases of disturbances of waters flowing across the boundary, from one country to the other, then, possibly, there might be some justification for allowing those who negotiated for the United States to insist upon this single case being dealt with by 'special arrangement.' There might be some excuse for doing it, that is, they might have felt it desirable to give way on this occasion in order to have a settled plan on a fair and just basis, whereby future cases might be dealt with. I venture to suggest, however, that the government has no evidence to offer to show that the Canadian commissioners attempted to estimate to what extent this principle might be applied in the future. As a matter of fact, in all human probability, the principle can never be applied, as I cannot see how it is possible that any other cases may arise in the future. In fact, that is the view point of the hon. Minister of Public Works, as will be found on page 901 of the unrevised 'Hansard':

All that this treaty does is to provide an equitable mode for the people of each country to obtain compensation from the people of the other country in case their rights are in any way affected. I am sure the committee will realize that there are very few cases. Perhaps there never would be a case where this question would arise except in the case of waters which are used for the purpose of irrigation. The question might arise between the inhabitants of Montana, Alberta and Saskatchewan, because a person or company in Montana might divert certain waters which flow to the northwest and use these waters for the purposes of irrigation. The result might be to deprive a Canadian living lower down the stream upon the Canadian side of the boundary of water which would be very necessary for the purpose of irrigation. Before this treaty, that could be done and he could not say a word, but under this treaty he can complain through this government.

It is only necessary to consider the international boundary for a moment in order to see that the minister's views in that respect are correct. For instance, from the southeast corner of Manitoba down to the neighbourhood of Montreal, the boundary is a water boundary, across which streams cannot flow. Then the short portion between Quebec, New Brunswick and the state of Maine, the diversion of water can only be for power purposes, and in that case the water will immediately be allowed to return to the parent stream. The same remarks apply to the boundary south of British Columbia. Then along the southern boundary of Manitoba, there are two streams, the Red and Souris rivers, the former is navigable and cannot be disturbed the latter is of no importance for irrigation purposes, in my judgment, can not even be used for power purposes. In the remaining portion of the boundary extending eastward from the base of the Rocky Mountains—the territory within which irrigation is practised—the only streams that cross the boundary are the St. Mary's and Milk rivers, and their tributaries, and the division of those waters is absolutely settled in article 6 of the treaty. I, therefore, repeat that in all human probability, the only opportunity wherein that fair and sound principal of allowing vested interests to protect their rights, regardless of the boundary, is the one case which existed at the time the treaty was being negotiated and which our neighbours were clever enough to insist upon being settled by special arrangement.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Magrath) contends that there are no other instances outside the Milk and St. Mary's rivers which physically allow the principle to be applied?

Mr. MAGRATH. I do. I say that in any other streams that cross the international boundary that, in all human probability there will not be an instance in which the interests on one side can be injured through the diversion of the stream on the other side.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to understand. The hon. gentleman's argument is that a perfectly fair and just principle is laid down?

Mr. MAGRATH. Certainly.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then, in respect of the largest, indeed the only cases to which that principle would be applicable, the principle is entirely departed from by an exception engrafted on the treaty?

Mr. MAGRATH. Yes. I say I cannot conceive how the Canadian representatives could have failed to recognize the true situation. I repeat that if we wish to deal fairly with our neighbours and to be dealt fairly with by them, there is no reason why Alberta interests in Canada could not have been permitted to take advantage of the principle that is to apply in future cases. If this were done there would be no criticism from me. Now, I previously stated—or intended to state—that this settlement is a settlement suggested by the American representatives. If hon. members will look at a return brought down at the instance of the leader of the opposition they will find there a copy of the letter addressed by Secretary of State Root to the then British Ambassador at Washington, dated January 15, 1907, in which a suggestion is made as to the division of the waters and that suggestion is substantially the settlement arranged in article 6 of the treaty. That is, the suggestion was made by Mr. Root two years before the treaty was negotiated. I stated also in explaining article 2 of the treaty that the fourth feature deals with navigable streams. I have seen steamers operating on the south Saskatchewan river; I have seen steamers operating on the Missouri. They are not to be found on either stream to-day. But that is no reason why they should not be found there in the future. I am aware that the South Saskatchewan river is near the vanishing point in regard to navigation. I believe that by the withdrawal of half the waters of the St. Mary's river which enters that stream, that stream will pass out of the class of navigable streams into that of unnavigable streams. I would like to know to what extent the Canadian Commissioners considered that feature, because if they did, and if my contention is right, then the St. Mary's river should not be disturbed, because it is one of the principal sources of supply of a stream which is today navigable. Now, the right hon. gentleman is not here. In discussing this matter in May, 1909, he spoke at considerable length, and I am quoting from him now at greater length, on account of his absence, than I really require to do in order to avoid any charge of attempting to garble his statements. On 'Hansard' 6640 of 1909, we find the right hon. gentleman saying:

> The St. Mary's river is not a large stream comparatively, but is much larger than the Milk river. This treaty, if it comes into force, will join them, that is, power is given under the treaty to join the two rivers into one steam which will flow together in the bed of the Milk river and enter the United States. My hon. friend (Mr. Magrath) has asked why we should have agreed to such a disposition as that, why we should have permitted a stream that flows into Canada to be made to flow into the United States? The reason is such that I am surprised that my hon. friend does not appreciate it; I was more than surprised, was more than sorry, I was even astonished at the criticism he made of that disposition.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that those remarks require any statement from me. As a sample of rhetoric they appear all right; otherwise they are absolutely wrong. The right hon. gentleman went on to say:

> The United States reclamation service have undertaken large works upon these waters, and they contemplate still larger works. They contemplate first to tap St. Mary's lake through which the St. Mary's river flows and to divert it into their own country. If this had been to the injury of a river flowing into Canada we would have protested against anything of the kind being undertaken.

Well, it appears this is the psychological moment for me to express some surprise and regret that any one should be found in this country possessed of so little appreciation of the value of water as to suggest that by the withdrawal of one half the water from the St. Mary's river, which has been flowing into Canada for all past ages, the same would not be to the injury of the river and of the interests along it in this country. The right hon. gentleman went on to say:

Whether we would have protested successfully is a matter as to which I am not quite sure, because the United States claim that they have the right to divert any river, even if the river flows into Canada or into a foreign country, so long as they tap it within their own territory. They assert that their sovereignty with regard to a flowing stream is absolute, even though that stream flows into a neighbouring country. I am not quite sure that as a matter of international law the position is well taken. My view, on the contrary, is that the principle of civil law would apply to international law, and that there is a strong authority for that contention, but whilst it is a contention, the Americans have held to a different construction, and they assert that they have the right to exercise sovereign power so long as the work in question is within their own territory, even though the water flows to a foreign country. There was a source of difficulty.

Well, I was pleased to hear the right hon. gentleman state that he felt that we had some rights under international law. It would have been much more agreeable to me if we had some evidence that he had called in the services of legal experts who have been dealing with inter-state water questions, and a great number have existed in the western states. I am also aware of the claim made by some of our American friends to their sovereign power over waters within their own territories. I know this, that we have sovereign rights over the St. Mary's river in Canada, and we need not give them up unless we get what we think is fair and reasonable compensation. The right hon. gentleman continued:

But, putting that aside, the Americans contemplate establishing at the head of these streams large reclamation works, that is to say, putting up an immense reservoir to store the waters and keep them for the whole season. Under the present conditions my hon. friend stated this afternoon that with a committment of two thousand feet of water they never could develop more than eight hundred.

I fear the right hon. gentleman misunderstood me, because that is not what I intended to say. I intended to say what I have said to-day, that the Canadian company, while having a right to two thousand cubic feet of water at the time the negotiations were in progress, it developed its right to the extent of 800 cubic feet per second. The right hon. gentleman further said:

Why? I speak under correction, because I have to get my information from other sources, and I am not familiar with the country. But I understand that in a very short time in that section of the country the spring waters are exhausted, and that in the summer they have a very small amount of water, whereas, if they had these immense reclamation works which are contemplated by the American reclamation service the water would be stored and would be available during the whole summer, and, therefore, my hon. friend from Alberta and his constituents would have the benefit of the storage of that water all summer. I know that I speak with absolute certainty when I say that the reclamation service cannot join these two streams into one, as contemplated under this treaty, unless they construct these immense reclamation works which are now proposed. Therefore, these reclamation works being established, Canadians will have the benefit of them, and will have a store of water to draw from all the long summer, whereas at the present time they can only have it in the spring and fall months.

I draw attention to the next clause:

That is the reason we have agreed to this diversion of the St. Mary's river into the Milk river.

There then is the price that this country was to pay to the United States for performing certain services for us. That country was to establish immense reclamation works in Montana so as to conserve the total flow of the St. Mary's river; to hold back the winter flow, and to control the spring freshets, and allow Canada's share of water so stored up to pass down, in the language of the right hon. gentleman: 'to my constituents during the long summer months.' Now I come to an astonishing letter which is disclosed in the return laid on the table of this House.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman make a little more clear the position taken by the Prime Minister, that is, as to its lack of basis.

Mr. MAGRATH. I will later on. I will quote an extract from a letter from Mr. Knox, Secretary of State, dated Washington, January 10, 1910, and addressed to the Right Hon. James Bryce:

Dear Mr. Bryce,—Referring to your note of the 25th ulto. and the memorandum inclosed therewith relative to the Boundary Waterway's Treaty of January 11, 1909, which is now awaiting ratification, there seems to have been some misunderstanding on the part of the Canadian government as to the purposes for which the United States intends to construct the dam at the outlet of St. Mary's lake and the canal between that lake and Milk river in Northern Montana in connection with the use of the waters apportioned between the United States and Canada under the provision of article 6 of the treaty. An examination of that article will show that it provides merely for an equal division between the two countries of the waters of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers, with certain prior appropriations of the natural flow apportioned to each side. There is no requirement that the United States shall store any waters for the use of Canada, in fact, no mention is made of the storage of waters, and the waters which the United States proposes to store are to be taken from its half share of the natural flow, and are intended for use on its own side of the boundary. The proposed storage of waters, therefore, by the United States will in no way diminish or interfere with the half share of the natural flow to which Canada is entitled under the treaty * *.

Here, we have a statement from the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, clearly showing that no such intention existed, that the language of the treaty does not attempt to bear out the view point of our government, and that it is not the intention of the United States to do any storage of waters in the St. Mary's lakes that would be of any service to my constituents during the long summer months. I say, it is a most astonishing situation, and evidently is indicative of the character of the work which we performed in connection with the negotiation of that treaty. I say it is enough to make any Canadian blush to think that we so signally failed to look after the interests of our own people. The Minister of Public Works understood the situation very well, though he has since recanted, and has told us that the treaty is quite fair to this country. I am not placing any particular significance upon his change of front, but we find in the correspondence a letter from the Minister of Public Works to the right hon. the leader of the government, dated January 20, 1910, from which the following extracts have been taken:

There seems to be a misapprehension on the part of the United States authorities in reference to the mode in which Canada would expect to derive any advantage from the construction of such storage works.

I have not yet discovered that there was any misapprehension on the part of the United States. It appears to have been on our part.

The principal benefit which would be derived by Canada from the construction of these works would be the securing of an increased and regular supply of water for irrigation purposes by means of the St. Mary's river. . . .

The hon. gentleman goes on to say:

—but this object would be defeated if the dam were so constructed as to only provide for carrying the water stored thereby to the Milk river by means of the proposed canal. For this reason, I regard it as essential to an equally beneficial division of the waters of both rivers that provision should be made for a due proportion of the stored waters of the St. Mary's river being allowed, under direction of the commissioners, to pass down the St. Mary's river into Canadian territory, instead of all stored waters being diverted to the Milk river.

If the United States authorities take this view and give an assurance that in the construction of the dam, provision will be made for the passing of the stored waters down both the St. Mary's and the Milk rivers, in order that they, as well as the natural flow, may be divided in accordance with the spirit of the treaty, I am of the opinion that such assurance will be satisfactory, and remove a ground for serious criticism which would otherwise be made against the treaty by those interested in irrigation projects upon and in the vicinity of the St. Mary's river in Alberta.

Well, the United States certainly did not give any assurance along the lines suggested by the Minister of Public Works. The treaty was accepted in March, 1910, without the change of one line in the document as it was before this House in May, 1909. I am not here to criticise it on behalf of any special interest in Alberta. I am here to criticise it in behalf of the people I represent in this House, people who realize the value of water, who realize that they require every drop of water for development purposes in that country, and it is astonishing to think that our government should treat this matter in such a haphazard way as to yield such unfortunate results to us. The treaty professes to recognize prior rights both in Canada and the United States. It is a mere profession so far as this country is concerned. Under conditions which might arise at any time during a dry season in southern Alberta, there are men to-day who are using water and doing it beneficially who will find themselves deprived of some of that water on account of its having been given to the United States for the benefit of lands that are absolutely unsettled at this moment. We must realize that any impairment of the authority granted under the laws of this country, which would stand good under the laws of any other country, where irrigation is in operation that any impairment of the authority granted to a Canadian company, for the diversion of water for development purposes in southern Alberta especially, if that impairment has been aided and abetted by this government which granted that authority, is in effect a breach of faith with the Canadian company and is a wilful disregard of the interests of the people I represent in this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend speaks of it being a breach of faith with the Canadian company. Is he aware that the Canadian company has recommended the agreement with respect to this treaty?

Mr. MAGRATH. No, I was not at all aware of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman will see on the file a letter from Sir Thomas Shaughnessy and another from Mr. Dennis both recommending it.

Mr. REID (Grenville). They did not understand the situation.

Mr. MAGRATH. I would now like to trace the evolution in the plans of the United States Reclamation Service for the diversion of water from the St. Mary's river. The Annual Report of the Reclamation Service for 1902 submits complete plans in detail. It was the intention of that service at that time to build a dam fifty feet in height across the St. Mary's river, a short distance below the point where it leaves the lakes. The report, a copy of which is to be found in the library of parliament, shows that a number of borings were taken at various points across the valley of the river to determine the character of the foundations of the dam, and the borings so obtained justified those reputable engineers who have been investing millions of money elsewhere in the United States in connection with similar works, justified them in suggesting a dam of the height named, and which would impound in the reservoir so created in the St. Mary's lakes about 25,000 acre of water. The American canal was to be taken out of the reservoir at practically the river level, or about the bottom of the dam. I am aware from personal observation, that that proposed canal encountered some very heavy side hill cutting during the first seven miles in getting away from the St. Mary's river valley. I am aware that the Reclamation officers were most insistent in those days that that was the only proper way to conserve the waters of St. Mary's river. That they were positive in their statements that Canada had no such opportunities to conserve the total flow of the stream. And, in that I believe they were absolutely correct, because there are no lake areas through which the river flows on the Canadian side and which might be converted into reservoirs.

Possibly, through indifference on the part of our government, the United States became less ambitious to do all the conserving of the waters of the St. Mary's river, and concluded to look after No. 1 only. They changed their plans. They decided to raise the level of their canal some twenty-five feet in order to escape the heavy side hill cutting to which I have just referred. That would necessitate that building of a dam twenty-five feet high in order to raise the level of the river to their canal. They then, evidently, concluded to store half the waters of the St. Mary's river, which necessitated carrying their dam some fifteen feet higher; those are the plans so far as they are known at the present time.

Then the Reclamation officers set about to demonstrate that Canada had excellent opportunities to store water within her territory. We find on page 72 of the Return the following extract in a letter from Secretary Ballinger, dated Washington, February 9, 1910:

The natural conditions north of the International boundary in Canada are more favourable for water storage at reduced cost and with great assurance of permanency and safety of the structure.

It is regrettable to think that Canada did not appear to have any one sufficiently acquainted with this matter to have pointed out to our American friends the position taken by their own reputable engineers a few years previously, and I say that it is humiliating to be told by a prominent engineer in the United States, an engineer who has not been in any way connected with the Canadian government case, that the trouble with Canada in this controversy was, that she had no one connected with the case who had any knowledge of irrigation. The engineer who made that statement to me did not know that Mr. G. G. Anderson had been called in, and to whom, I propose referring very briefly in a few moments.

Why did our government not insist upon the price being paid which the Right Honourable gentleman referred to in addressing the House in May, 1909? He told us that when we were giving the use of the Milk river channel through Canada to the United States which made the American project feasible, we were given that right because we were going to have immense reclamation works established by the United States which would be a benefit to my constituents during the long summer months. Evidently some reason appeared in the horizon of the government between May, 1909, and that well known month of March, 1910, when the American surtax was likely to be put into effect against this country on the 31st day of that month, and all on account of some treaty-making jaunts to Europe wherein some European countries have special privileges in trading in toilet soaps in Canada. We all remember how our friends opposite appeared so pleased when the Honourable Minister of Finance reached a settlement with the executive of the United States in connection with the matter. When it was announced that commercial interests of this country were not to be penalized in the markets of the United States because the Honourable Minister of Finance gave that country some privileges in the matter of trading in peanuts and a few other minor articles in this country. I am disposed to think that we were told on that occasion that the slate had better be cleaned and the outstanding questions between the two countries settled. If my view is right in that respect, I am disposed to think that Southern Alberta is paying pretty dearly for the privileges that Canada has of securing cheap European soap. Now, as to the methods pursued by our government in this matter, the return that has been brought down to this House makes most interesting reading. It shows that the government secured the services of George G. Anderson, a prominent Consulting Irrigation Engineer of Denver, Colorado. The government is to be commended for that because Mr. Anderson is one of the first men in the irrigation profession in America. That, I am aware, is a mere statement, but it can be verified by any one who wishes to write to any financial institution in the State of Colorado. Mr. Anderson was well qualified to deal with the matter because he had been the consulting engineer of the three large Canadian Irrigation enterprises, first, the Alberta Irrigation Company, second, the Canadian Pacific railway irrigation project, and lastly, with the Southern Alberta Land Company, which is operating in the neighbourhood of Medicine Hat. The Return shows that Mr. Anderson submitted an extensive and valuable report, dated 22nd April, 1908, giving in detail the history of the questions involved in reference to the division of the waters of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers, and suggested a division that would yield the greatest good to the greatest area, regardless of the International boundary, a principle that I believe should be applied between friendly people and we have heard considerable recently of how friendly we are with our neighbour in this and other questions. We have no evidence that his views were in any way put forward before the American representatives. Then the Treaty was negotiated in the following January, and we had a discussion in this House in May, 1909. It had to pass into the Senate of the United States and a representative of the people there felt that the interests of the people he represented were not being properly protected, and he had a rider attached to the treaty which necessitated its being sent to our government for acceptance. For some reason, not disclosed in the correspondence, Mr. Anderson's services were again brought into commission, and we find a report from him, dated at Denver, 18th September, 1909, in which he criticises the settlement as arranged in article 6. The opening paragraph of his report is as follows:

Thorough and careful consideration of the provisions of the treaty.

It is a pity, Sir, that our representative did not treat the subject in the same way.

Thorough and careful consideration of the treaty with the United States relating to boundary waters and questions arising along the boundary between Canada and the United States signed at Washington, January 11, 1909, so far as the provisions affect the waters of the St. Mary and Milk rivers and their tributaries compels the conviction that they are greatly unjust to the interests of Canada, and for the following reasons.

Now, I do not propose to indulge in any technical discussion of this subject, nor to follow Mr. Anderson in his report beyond making a couple of references thereto.

Mr. FOSTER. Are these reasons lengthy?

Mr. MAGRATH. Oh, yes, they cover many pages. The return shows an extraordinary situation for which I question if any parallel is to be found in any business organization. Here, we had secured the services of an expert in irrigation to deal with a purely irrigation question, and that expert submitted a lengthy and able report. In the return which has been brought down we find an undated memorandum addressed to the Minister of the Interior by a representative of our government, evidently prepared between the end of 1909 and March, 1910, and in this undated memorandum, Mr. Anderson's views are pulled to pieces by the people who employed him as an expert, instead of throwing Mr. Anderson's opinions and views up against those on the other side of the controversy and following them up by sound argument of our own. I repeat that I question if it is possible to find a parallel for action of that character in any business institution in the wide world It might not be out of place to state here, that the negotiations so far as the United States is concerned, were either conducted by the Technical Officers of the Reclamation Service who were familiar with every foot of the ground, through which these streams run, or when not conducted by them, one or more of those men were at the elbow of those who were in charge of the negotiations. I challenge the government to produce any evidence to show that that was the situation so far as Canada is concerned. Why there was not an expert within one thousand miles of the gentlemen who conducted the negotiations for us. It is true that the Minister of Public Works, when his resolution was before the House, undertook to certify two gentlemen as Irrigation Experts. I am aware that those gentlemen are experts in certain lines, but they would be the last to say that they were in any way expert in water questions, and the minister in attempting to manufacture them into Irrigation Experts simply exposed the weakness of this feature of the case, which I have been largely criticising, and instead of elevating the gentlemen in question into the sphere of Irrigation Experts, he had shown to the country at large his methods of looking after the interests of the people of this country.

At one o'clock, House took recess.

House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MAGRATH. Mr. Speaker, before resuming my argument which was broken off owing to the House adjourning for lunch, I would like to revert for a moment to a feature that I may not have made absolutely clear this morning, and that is that while article two enunciates that sound principle that in the case of streams flowing across the boundary, vested rights on one side must be honoured on the other; that owing to the rider which does not allow that feature to be applied in the only existing case, that case had to be settled by special arrangement, and which was done in article six. I merely wish to point out how that sound principle was totally disregarded by the negotiators in article six, wherein the Canadian company, with a canal taking 800 cubic feet per second from the St. Mary's river, with legal rights up to 2,000 cubic feet per second, was only given a prior right of 500 cubic feet per second against the St. Mary's river, and not even that, because when the stream falls so that three-fourths of it will not produce 500 feet, then the Canadian canal will only be entitled to what that three-fourths of the stream amounts to. On the other hand, the charges against the Milk river in Montana, adjudicated at 350 cubic feet, are given a prior right of 500 cubic feet per second against that stream, though, of course, I know it is not capable of producing that amount in normal years during the irrigation season.

Returning now to that undated memorandum which I was dealing with when the House adjourned, the only question which Mr. Anderson raised which appears to have been seriously considered by our government, was his criticism that the United States need not build immense reclamation works whereby Canada would be served therefrom; but our representative disposes of even that view on page 80 of the return, in which he says:

> Therefore, it will not be necessary for the United States, Mr. Anderson says, to provide any storage on St. Mary's river. The flaw in this argument is in the fact that Mr. Anderson deals with average flows.

And elsewhere on page 82, he says:

> It is probable, therefore, that the dam will be built.

I think Secretary Ballinger's letter, of which a portion already has been read, indicates that there was not very much flaw in Mr. Anderson's argument. Elsewhere, it appears that Mr. Anderson referred to a very important feature which appeared in a communication made by the late John Hay, then Secretary of State, to the British ambassador, dated at Washington, February, 8, 1903, as follows:

> It is proposed to deal with this matter in strict conformity with the laws concerning the right to the use of water as recognized by the courts of the arid region, both on this side of the international boundary and on the other. The principle may be stated in the language of section 8 of the Reclamation Act: that the right to use of water shall be appurtenant to the lands, irrigated and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure and limit of the right.

Mr. Anderson pointed out that that statement substantially meant that the Canadian company should be protected in its legal appropriation against the St. Mary's river. That statement of Secretary Hay is the sound and just principle of allowing vested rights to be protected, but our government's representative, in criticism on that point on page 75 of the return, uses the followinig language:

> I do not think there is much force in this argument. The United States would probably say in reply that if they are bound by Mr. Hay's words they are bound only in the sense in which he personally intended them.

It is rather an astonishing admission that Mr. Hay's own views were not used against his country in discussing this question. It appears to me that it would be more in the interest of Canada if we had theorized less, and had dealt in a practical way with a practical question, which, however, of course could only have been done by practical men. Finally, on page 83 of the return, we find the following statement from our representative:

> It is suggested in the note that storage on the Canadian side of the boundary could be secured at less cost and with greater assurance of permanence than at the outlake of the St. Mary's lake. This is corroborated by Mr. J. S. Dennis of the Canadian Pacific railway, who has a thorough knowledge of the engineering questions involved. While in the government service about fifteen years ago, he surveyed the whole of that region for the very purpose of ascertaining the possibilities of irrigation by water diverted from St. Mary's river. His view is that by utilizing the storage facilities of the northern slope of Milk river ridge, Canada can store all her share of the water, and that the storage in the basin of the St. Mary's lake would be of little or no service to her.

There are three features in the foregoing statement worthy of some attention. First, we have the statement of American authorities endorsed, namely: that storage facilities in Canada are better than in the United States. It is not a question of permanence of structures, because the United States is committed to the construction of a dam some forty feet in height, which will probably hold behind it 200,000 feet of water. It is a question of putting two holes in the bottom of that dam, one for the use of Canada, the other for the use of the United States. That of course, would involve the building of the American canal as originally located, and involve that country in greater expense. Instead of that, however, there is to be one hole in that dam twenty-five feet above the river level, out of which the American share of the water will be taken, and the Canadian share of the water will go down the valley uncontrolled.

Then, we have the opinion of Mr. Dennis, that by using the storage facilities of the northern slope of the Milk river, Canada can store all her share of water. That statement is absolutely incorrect. The storage facilities of Canada are situated many miles from the St. Mary's river. They can only be connected by earthen canals with the river. Those canals can only be operated in normal years, about seven months in each year. We must realize that earthen canals must be closed down in order to allow them to dry out, so that teams can be placed in them to do the necessary repairs before the frost sets in. Any child in these northern latitudes knows that water cannot be carried in such canals during the winter months. Then, what happens to the flow of the stream for what, I may term, the five winter months? It is true that water will run longer than seven months, but I have already explained that the canals have to be closed down, and my experience in operating canals, is that they have never operated more than about seven months per year. So that at once disposes of that question. Then the other statement is that the storage in the basin of the St. Mary's lake would be of little or no service to Canada. All I have to say in connection with that is that the storage in the basin of the St. Mary's lake, is good enough for the United States, and, looking carefully over the entire treaty, and the success which has attended the efforts of the United States in its negotiations. I am disposed to think that what is good enough for that country, should be good enough for this.

Sir, when this question was before the House in May, 1909, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) criticised me rather severely for importing, as he said, political bias into this debate. I absolutely deny the charge, Sir. I was not sent here to throw platitudes at any one in this House. I came here to look after what I regard as the interests of the people of this country. I went into the western country over thirty years ago, without any very great appreciation of the value of either water or timber. I settled on the plains of western Canada, and it gradually came to me the great value of these two natural advantages. I was connected with development work in southern Alberta, and I say that any man who has an interest in this country should be glad to take part in making two blades of grass grow where one grew before I realize the necessity, as the people in that country to-day realize the necessity of every drop of water we are entitled to. We know that we have not sufficient water for our needs; and when the government allows water to be taken from us to which we are legally entitled, I have every right to come here to criticise the government. More than that, Sir, we are not doing what I consider we should do in the development of the water resources of that country. We have vast bodies of water going down towards Hudson bay, and doing little or no good. The government should carry on careful investigations to see to what extent the water can be put to beneficial use. Nothing is now being done in that direction beyond the measurement of some streams. But, before we can attempt the development of our water resources other things need to be done. We have certain gentlemen north of Lethbridge asking that water should be taken out of the Belly river for use in that country. They are not in a position to say whether that is or is not feasible from an engineering point of view. The government ought to go to their aid and tell them to what extent it is feasible.

Now, a few words dealing more closely with the Bill before us—that is in reference to the appointment of the three gentlemen who will be associated with the three appointees of the United States for operating the Waterways Treaty. I understand that the three representatives of the United States were selected several weeks ago and that ex-Senator Carter, of Montana, is one of them. Senator Carter was most active and aggressive in pushing forward Montana's claims during negotiation of the treaty.

I consider that our government has a great opportunity to render a signal service to Canada in the selection of the three Canadian representatives. In my opinion, it is not a question of obtaining gentlemen with legal lore, as the questions which will be involved are engineering questions. We know that continental Europe has been forced through circumstances to reduce transportation to a science. She has been forced to bring her water routes—the very cheapest—to the highest point of development. She has developed energy for industrial purposes in the same way, and in doing so, has made use of electricity for the transmission of power produced from water. Irrigation with her has likewise been brought to the highest point of efficiency, therefore, her engineers have had greater opportunity than has yet been offered in young America, but America is being forced in the same direction, through keen competition. Then, it appears to me that this is the time for Canada to hunt for a man who stands pre-eminent in that branch of the engineering profession, which this commission will be called upon to deal with, namely, water questions. Let us get that man, regardless of price or where he comes from, as we need a man with such a reputation that when he speaks he will be listened to throughout Europe as well as America. Having secured such a man, let our government place a copy of the treaty in his hands with instructions to carry on investigations along the international boundary, so that when the five-year period for which the treaty was made comes to an end, he will be able to point out all the weak places so far as Canada is concerned. Place before him a map of Canada and draw his attention to the vast bodies of water possessed by this country, with streams flowing in almost every direction; point out to him the strategic position this country possesses in the world of commerce, and the vast quantities of raw materials we possess. Tell him to study Canada's problems of industrial development so as to be able to lay down a policy of water-power development and water transportation that will permit this country to get its products into the markets of the world at the lowest possible figure. Then, Sir, every link that we lay down in our transportation system will be a link in that enlarged plan of our ultimate aim in the matter of transportation which will enable Canada to be a great country with a prosperous people.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). I am sure the House has listened very attentively to my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath). No member of the House is better qualified to speak on the general question of the rights to water and the uses of water, and nobody is better qualified to speak on the question dealt with in article 6 of the treaty, than is my hon. friend. Therefore, it is right, first that he should give every attention to the matter, and next that the House should give every attention to him. He has marshalled his arguments and his facts very well. The only criticism that I would have to offer is that my hon. friend has proved too much. He has proved, in his opinion, that the government has been absolutely derelict in its duty, has paid no attention to the rights of the people, has ignored the facts, and generally has thrown away an opportunity to protect the interests particularly of the constituency he represents. I am sure the House will forgive me if I do not agree in that extreme view. I shall not endeavour to follow my hon. friend through the technicalities of the subject, and I have no fault to find with the way in which he has presented the facts. What I criticise is his deductions from these facts, and I think I can show the House, from the hon. gentleman's own figures, that his deductions are not by any means warranted.

The position with regard to the matters dealt with in article six is exactly as he has stated. There are two rivers which take their rise in the United States, and flow into Canada. The smaller flows out of Canada back into the United States, and the larger remains in Canada, and flows into Hudson bay. The arrangement whereby Canada has granted three-quarters of the flow of these rivers in low water and one-half in high water, he condemns as an improvident one. I admit at once that, as compared with an arrangement which would secure to Canada the whole flow of both streams, it would be an improvident arrangement. But that was not the alternative. Let me put the alternative as I understand it, and as the House will understand it from what my hon. friend has said. The alternative was not between securing one-half of the water of the two streams and all the water, but between securing one-half of the water of the two and none of it, speaking of their low water flow. If the House has followed my hon. friend's statement, it will recollect that the proposition of the United States government, and the Reclamation Commission was to divert the whole of the low water flow, and some part of the high water flow of the St. Mary's river from its natural channel, out of its own drainage basin, into the drainage basin of the Milk river.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But what right had they to do anything of the kind? That is an international stream, taking its rise in the United States and flowing through Canadian territory into Hudson bay. I have yet to find any authority for the proposition that the United States had the right to do anything of the kind.

Mr. OLIVER. I take exactly the same view as my hon. friend, but I think he will agree with me that, if they had not the right, beyond question they had the power to do it, and that was what was in question.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). My hon. friend says they have the power to do it. They have diverted the St. Mary's river into the Milk river south of the boundary line.

Mr. OLIVER. They have not done so, but propose doing so.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Well, there is nothing to prevent this government diverting the water of the Milk river into the St. Mary's.

Mr. LENNOX. I understand the hon. minister to say that undoubtedly the United States had not the right to divert this water.

Mr. OLIVER. In my opinion they had not.

Mr. LENNOX. But they had the power. In what way had they the power? Was it by force?

Mr. OLIVER. They had the power because the water originated within their territory and they were able to make a diversion of it within their own territory; and as a sovereign power, not governed at that time by any treaty, there is no doubt that whatever the right may be, the power absolutely lay with them to make that diversion and take the whole low water flow of the St. Mary's out of the drainage basin of the St. Mary's, and thereby leave all my hon. friend's constituents high and dry, so far as the low water flow of the St. Mary's was concerned, he will not dispute that statement.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Why did you not offer a counter proposition?

Mr. OLIVER. This is a counter proposition, but I wish to deal further with the suggestion of my hon. friend from North Simcoe. The proposition of the United States government was to divert the water of the St. Mary's into the Milk river, and then use the Milk river as a channel whereby that water could be taken around to Montana, and then used on the lands contiguous to the Milk river.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). That would pass through miles of Canadian territory.

Mr. OLIVER. Precisely, we all agree as to the facts. This Milk river passes for 100 miles through Canadian territory, and the level was such that it was possible for Canada to tap that Milk river within Canadian territory and thereby take from it the water that would be taken out of the St. Mary's. As a matter of fact a ditch was dug for that purpose, but it would not take the water onto the land owned by the settlers in whose behalf my hon. friend (Mr. Magrath) was speaking.

Mr. MAGRATH. Yes, it would. The hon. minister will pardon me for contradicting him. I gave the contract for the portion of the Milk river ditch, and must know something about it. The water could be brought to Raymond and northward.

Mr. OLIVER. I would not care to enter into a controversy with my hon. friend on an engineering question.

Mr. MAGRATH. The hon. minister will find in his department plans which show that the water taken from the Milk river in Canada can be carried out into the other canal system on to the lands that are being supplied direct from the St. Mary's river.

Mr. OLIVER. Could it be secured to the town named after my hon. friend?

Mr. MAGRATH. No, there is very little water distributed there.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend says that, so far as a large part of the lands occupied by his constituents is concerned, this water could be taken out of the Milk river and distributed along that land, but to a part of that land it could not. My excuse for assuming that the water could not be brought from the Milk river into the St. Mary's direct is because at present it flows from the St. Mary's direct into the Milk river. While the possibility exists to take out of the Milk river what might have been taken out of the St. Mary's, and put into it by the United States, there is the further possibility that the United States did not need to do that. They could have carried the water of the St. Mary's river past the Milk river into another river which did not flow through Canada, and could thereby have defeated the purpose that was in the mind of the hon. member for Simcoe when he said that if they put the water into the Milk river we could take it out again. They did not need to put the water into the Milk river, they could have put it into another river, and could have used the water of that river. True, that would not have been an economical proposition, it would have cost more than it was worth. But it is an engineering fact that it could have been done, and it is a financial fact that the United States has money enough to do it. Speaking from my place in parliament, I would not like to go further and suggest that sometimes it has appeared to me that the United States is not always governed by economical considerations in dealing with a neighbouring country. At any rate, I have placed the situation before the House. The choice was not between getting half the water and all the water, it was between getting half the water and none at all, therefore, the government of Canada took the course that is laid down in the treaty as being in the best interests of the people concerned. We were not in a position absolutely to protect their interests, therefore, we believe that we were well advised in protecting them as far as we were able. That this action of ours was well taken I am convinced from the fact that we have an assurance from the head of the responsible company which to-day owns the irrigation rights that my hon. friend has spoken about, that is to say, the residuary rights which have not yet been disposed of, and the head of this company advised the government that the company was satisfied with the arrangement that was then about to be made. Under these circumstances, while I am free to admit that the arrangement was not such as we would have liked to make, and that perhaps we might have made a more favourable arrangement with our neighbours, still it was such an arrangement as commended itself, under all the circumstances, to the people who were most directly financially interested, as well as to the government, in dealing with what was a very, very difficult question. I just wish to say that I think my hon. friend was not justified in the conclusions that he drew from the very accurate statement of facts that he made. I do not think the government have slighted the interests of the people affected, and are not to be blamed, but rather they are entitled to credit for having done all that could have been done, under the difficult circumstances, to protect those interests.

Mr. C. J. DOHERTY (Montreal, St. Anne). In this Bill there seems to be a very material change from the provisions of the Bill when it was originally introduced. The Minister of Public Works told us this morning, if I followed him correctly, that he had introduced some new sections for the purpose of making it clear that there should be a jurisdiction in the courts of this country to try actions contemplated by the treaty brought by persons residing in the United States. It seems to me that the first section of this amended Act modifies materially the case, and puts this House, as towards this Bill, in a very different position from that which it occupied at the time the Bill was originally introduced. By the first section of the amended Act this Bill purports to confirm, and sanction the treaty that was made. Now if I understand the situation, when the Bill was originally introduced, the treaty was considered as being absolutely in force and binding upon us, and what parliament was asked to do was to provide for the officers to be named under the treaty, for their appointment, and for their fees. The Bill now seems to proceed upon the principle that the treaty requires some confirmation, or some sanction from this House; because I do not suppose that the government is asking us to go through a performance which is absolutely unnecessary, which can have no effect. It would appear now that the government must be under some impression that this parliament has power to deal with the treaty in the shape of ratifying it, and I suppose that if we can ratify we would likewise have the right to refuse our ratification. Perhaps the minister will say whether he understands by this clause of the Bill that a confirmation of this treaty by parliament is necessary.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I thought I had made it clear that it is the opinion of the Department of Justice that, in order to give authority to a court to subpoena witnesses and to have them sworn before giving their testimony, an Act of this parliament is necessary; also, that legislation is required in order to give a right to American citizens to proceed in the courts of this country pursuant to the terms of the treaty. That is the object of introducing the legislation. Of course, in doing that it is desirable that we should ratify the whole treaty, because these clauses are essential parts of it.

Mr. DOHERTY. I can understand that the sections following section 1 do make provisions for the machinery to enforce the rights that are created under the treaty. But section 1 purports purely, and simply to sanction and confirm the treaty. Now it seems to me that one of two things must be true ; either the treaty requires a sanction and ratification by this parliament, and we have power to sanction and ratify it, which also implies that we have power to refuse to sanction or ratify it; or the treaty requires no sanction or confirmation on our part, and we have no power to confirm or to refuse to confirm. Now, if the latter is the case, the government is asking this parliament to put itself into a position where it subjects itself to the criticism that it is undertaking to deal with a matter with which it has no possible concern.

What would be the effect upon this treaty if parliament refused to pass this Bill? Surely the first inference would be that the treaty was not binding upon it, and it seems to me that we ought to be very careful before we undertake to break into a matter with which we have no right to deal. I have understood up to the present that the position that the government took was that this treaty was completely binding upon us as soon as it was passed, and that we had no further power in the matter than to provide machinery to carry it out. The introduction of this section raises a very important question. If I understand it rightly, the treaty-making power is vested in the Crown, and it seems to me that if this be a treaty which can be made by the Crown without any intervention of any other authority, it is nothing short of a piece of impertinence on our part to take it upon ourselves to sanction or confirm it. If, on the other hand, this be a treaty which can only become binding upon its ratification by parliament, then I entirely fail to see how this parliament comes to be the proper body which ought to pronounce that ratification. I do not want to go into a discussion of this matter in detail of whether ratification is necessary or not, but it seems to me that if it be a case where ratification is necessary this parliament is without power to deal with this question of ratification. I understand there are treaties which are recognized as requiring legislative action to make them perfectly and completely binding, and that among treaties of that kind are those which have the effect of modifying or altering the private rights of individuals which require legislative action to make them binding upon those individuals. But, in that view, so long as the treaty-making power is exercised by His Majesty, not as forming any part of the parliament of Canada, but His Majesty as being the King of Great Britain and Ireland, and, therefore, Sovereign of the empire, it seems to me that the only legislative body, which, under these circumstances if we assume ratification to be necessary to this treaty, could take upon itself, or would be the body, to exercise that power would be the imperial parliament and not this parliament here at all. I do not know that the British North America Act gives us any treaty-making power of any kind, and if ratification is essential to this treaty then the pronouncement of the ratification is a part of the making of the treaty. I quite understand that it might have been a part of the treaty that it should be subject to ratification by this parliament, and if that had been so then I quite understand that it would be within the purview of this parliament to pronounce upon it and say whether it would confirm and ratify it or not. But, there is nothing of the kind in the treaty; so that, it seems to me that by this first section the government is asking parliament to do a something which it has absolutely no power, or no quality, or no function to do. I do not know whether the answer would be that even if it is none of our business it would not do any harm if we should do this. I do not think that is a very conclusive answer because I do think that this parliament ought to guard itself against laying itself open to the accusation of stepping in where it has no power to ratify or refuse to ratify what His Majesty, in the exercise of his prerogative powers, has done, because stepping in to ratify does imply that it lies with us, if we choose, to refuse to ratify this treaty. Now, if it be assumed—and I suppose we must assume it, inasmuch as the government asks us to ratify this treaty—that we have some power in the matter, and that it is open to us to refuse to ratify this treaty if we choose, then, it seems to me the question arises—and I believe it is a very important question—as to whether we ought to ratify this treaty. I think that my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath) made out a strong case this morning in regard to one feature indicating that we should refuse to ratify the treaty. An important clause of the Bill is that which purports to grant the right of action against individuals in this country for damages resulting from diversions of streams running through this country, and that ultimately pass into the United States. In that regard it seems to me that the government, by this treaty, has undertaken to create rights of action against individuals in the different provinces and then, because it has taken upon itself to create these rights of action, follows it up in this measure by withdrawing the individuals who may be responsible for such diversions, and who are consequently subjected to the rights of action the treaty purports to create, from their natural jurisdiction before the provincial courts and making them amenable to the Exchequer Court and liable to be brought away from their homes and the jurisdiction of their courts which are constitutionally charged with the administration of the civil law to answer for what after all is on their part a violation of the civil law, or the common law, as the case may be, giving rise to action in damages on the part of persons who have suffered by it. The provision of the treaty is this. It is agreed that:

> Any interference with or diversion from their natural channel of any waters in Canada, which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary between Canada and the United States or into boundary waters (as defined in the said treaty) resulting in any injury on the United States side of the boundary, shall give the same rights and entitle the injured parties to the same legal remedies as if such injury took place in that part of Canada where such diversion or interference occurs, but this section shall not apply to cases existing on the eleventh day of January, one thousand nine hundred and nine, or to cases expressly covered by special agreement between His Majesty and the government of the United States.

I understand that the purpose of this article is to give to persons in the United States suffering from the diversions of streams that take place in this country the same right of action which a person living in this country would have against a person who is responsible for the diversion. If that is correct, the right of action that is created or recognized in favour of this outsider is a right of action that is governed by the law of the province in which the diversion takes place. It does not appear to be intended to give an outsider any greater right of action than exists already in the country in which the diversion takes place as between the person responsible for that diversion and the person who has suffered damage. The right of action, therefore, is a right of action which results from the common law or the civil law, as the case may be, in the particular province in which the diversion took place. The right of action which existed on behalf of a person within a province against another would be the subject matter of litigation before the courts of that province, and the party defendant in a case of that kind in which he had to meet a demand or claim made by a person resident within a province would be entitled to be summoned before his natural court, the court of his domicile, and have the matter threshed out there.

This treaty or rather the Bill purports to give a different right as regards the court to an outsider than would be given to a resident within the province, and because the injury happened to occur to a person resident in the United States it purposes to make a resident within the province subject to the jurisdiction of a court which, generally speaking, has no jurisdiction in matters of that kind. You are giving a special jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court over persons in actions resulting from violations of a civil law, a law that governs them in the exercise of their rights of property within the province, and you are doing that because the person injured happens to be a stranger. I would not like to pronounce myself absolutely upon that, but it does not seem to be very clear, that, without this treaty, if a person within one of the provinces diverted a stream—take a person living on the boundary line—that was running through his property and into his neighbour's on the other side,and failed to hand it over to him in the condition in which he had received it, that person would not have an action against him in the courts of the particular province merely because he lived outside. It is quite true that the damage suffered may have occurred in the outside territory, but the act in violation of law which was done by the person responsible for it was done within the particular province. I think that apart from the treaty itself, those provisions of the Bill which undertake to make an individual, who may become liable for the diversion of a stream, subject to the jurisdiction of a particular court outside of the province when the damage happens upon a stream that runs into another country and damages a person in that other country, whereas for a precisely similar act as regards a fellow citizen he would be within the jurisdiction exclusively of the provincial court is susceptible to very serious objection. It may subject the person against whom the action may be brought to very serious practical inconvenience and damage because he will be withdrawn from the court of his own domicile and forced to go before a court that may sit at a place remote from where he resides. At all events, it is supposable that there may be cases where the witnesses may be persons coming from a long distance. It seems to me that there is no necessity, even if this right of action required a treaty to create it, for giving jurisdiction for the determination of these cases to courts other than the provincial courts that would deal with a similar liability on the part of the person if the injury resulting from his act happened to an individual within the country. There are other objections which might very properly be urged against this legislation. Some of them perhaps have more to do with particular sections and will come up more properly in committee. It seems to me the principal objection to this Bill is that, by submitting the Bill to us, the government is asking this parliament to ratify a treaty with regard to which I entirely fail to see that there is power in this parliament either to ratify or to refuse to ratify. Either this treaty is complete as being the exercise of the power of the Crown itself or it is not, and if it is not in the absence of any provision in the treaty itself, making it subject to the ratification of this parliament, if any need for ratification, results from the general principles which provide for the cases in which treaties made ought to be subject to ratification by parliament, I entirely fail to see that there is any other parliament that could give that ratification than the imperial parliament itself.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). One or two words before the treaty passes. In the first place I desire to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Medicine Hat for the very able and lucid address he has given to the House to-day, in which he has set forth very distinctly the practical effect of this treaty, from his standpoint, upon the conditions in the province of Alberta and more particularly in connection with the waters of the St. Mary's river and the Milk river. The hon. member (Mr. Magrath) has gone into the matter with very great thoroughness. He has reviewed the situation from beginning to end in a very fair and convincing manner and in my opinion he has demonstrated very completely that the government, in negotiating this treaty, have not taken the best means of safeguarding the interests of the people of Canada, and have not adequately safeguarded these interests. I would like to say to the Minister of Public Works who has charge of the Bill, that during the period which has intervened between the signing of this treaty and the present time the situation has been to some extent altered if we may judge by what has recently been to the fore in the way of negotiations between the government of Great Britain and the government of the United States for a general arbitration treaty.

I do not think that the President of the United States can be too highly commended for the position he has taken in that respect, and I would like to quote to the House the language he used in what has been called his inspired deliverance before the peace and arbitration society in New York on the 22nd March, 1910. He said:

Personally I do not see any more reason why matters of national honour should not be referred to a court of arbitration than matters of property or of national proprietorship. I know that is going farther than most men are willing to go, but I do not see why questions of honour may not be submitted to a tribunal composed of men of honour who understand questions of national honour, to abide by their decision as well as any other question of difference arising between nations.

We all know that up to the present time treaties of arbitration between the nations of the earth have excepted matters which concern the national honour, or the vital interests of either country. President Taft took a memorable step in advance when he used these words I have cited. The policy which he then expressed himself as willing to follow will make his presidency memorable in the history of the United States, and in the history of the world. But he did something more than that. On the 17th day of December, 1910, he delivered an address at the banquet of the American Society for the Judicial Settlement of International Disputes. There are a great many peace societies in the United States, and the society which I have just named is one which has done most excellent work in the cause of peace throughout the world. In the course of his address on that occasion President Taft went one step further. He said this:

If, now, we can negotiate and put through a positive agreement with some great nation to abide the ajudication of an international arbitral court in every issue which can not be settled by negotiation, no matter what it involves, whether honour, territory or money, we shall have made a long step forward by demonstrating that it is possible for two nations at least to establish as between them the same system of due process of law that exists between individuals under a government.

After the two speeches of Mr. Taft, from which I have briefly quoted, it was generally recognized, I think, throughout the world, that the address delivered by him on December 17 last, was practically an invitation or suggestion to Great Britain that the United States would be willing to enter into a treaty of arbitration along those lines with the British Empire.

On the 28th day of April last, a notable gathering assembled at the Guildhall, when the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, the leader of the opposition in the imperial House of Commons, both spoke on this question. I do not intend to quote from them at any length. Just one or two words from the address of Mr. Asquith on that occasion:

Arbitration for the settlement of disputes between nations is already familiar to us, but hitherto points of national honour of vital importance have been reserved and have not been referred to courts of arbitration. Now, whatever the magnitude of the interest may be, whatever poignancy of feeling may be involved, war will be absolutely abandoned.

Then he went on to say further:

It is the privilege of great nations as well as of great men not only to follow but to acknowledge precedents. If the United States and Great Britain make this compact it will be an immeasurable step in the progress of humanity.

Mr. Balfour spoke entirely along the same lines, and in precisely the same spirit.

It is understood that negotiations have been going on for some time between the government of the United States, and the government of His Britannic Majesty along these lines. Of course, it is yet a diplomatic secret as to how far these negotiations may have been advanced. But if they are in good progress, and we have every reason to believe that such is the case, may they not in effect supersede a treaty of this kind, which deals with only one kind of possible dispute between the United States, and a portion of the British Empire alone. I do not, of course, deny that the tribunal would be differently constituted. There would be a greater and a stronger tribunal under the general arbitration treaty now contemplated than the tribunal constituted by this commission; but we have nothing to fear, I hope, from that. Therefore, it would be well for us to pause for a moment to consider whether everything that this treaty accomplishes, and a great deal more besides, may not be accomplished by the arbitration treaty that we hope will be consummated before very long. Besides, something can be said for the position that it would be better for Canada to stand in line with the rest of the empire in respect of such a matter than to have its own particular arbitration treaty dealing with its special differences with the United States. It would seem to me that there could not be any possible objection on the part of the United States to that outcome, and certainly there ought not to be any objection on the part of Canada.

My hon. friend from St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) has spoken of the complete change in this Bill. It is completely changed from the form in which it was presented to parliament in the first instance, because it is now proposed by the first section to ratify the treaty, and by the second section to alter and amend the laws of Canada, and of the several provinces of Canada, so far as may be necessary to carry out and perform the obligations of this treaty. In speaking upon this question in this House on the 14th day of May, 1909, I argued, and I have seen no reason since to change my views, that this treaty should have been made subject to ratification by the Canadian parliament. After examining this question, as discussed in the most recent and authoritative text books I arrived at the conclusion that treaties of the following character should be made subject to the approval of parliament: First, those imposing any burden on the people; second, those involving any change in the law of the land; third, those requiring legislative action to make them effective, or which affect the free exercise of the legislative power; fourth, those affecting territorial rights. I pointed out also that Anson, in his work upon the British constitution, referred in the edition of 1896 to the Heligoland Treaty between Great Britain and Germany as creating an unfortunate precedent. In that case Great Britain, having ceded the Island of Heligoland, subject to the approval of parliament, came to parliament for ratification of the treaty. It was at that time apparently the view of the British government that any treaty involving the cession of territory ought to be made subject to the approval of parliament. Anson, in his edition of 1896, criticised this as an unfortunate precedent. In his edition of 1908 he withdraws that criticism and says this:

> We seem to be drawn to this conclusion, that apart from precedents relating to Indian territory, it has of recent years been thought desirable, if not necessary, that the consent of parliament should be given to the cession of territory in time of peace.

I pointed out also that Lowell, in his recent work on the government of England, at page 22 of volume 1, used this language:

> The Crown has power to declare war, make peace and conclude treaties, save that, without the sanction of parliament, a treaty cannot impose a charge upon the people or change the law of the land, and it is doubtful how far without that sanction private rights can be sacrificed or territory ceded.

Then there are a great many recent treaties between Great Britain and foreign countries which have been made subject to the ratification of the British parliament. I need not go over these again. It appears now that the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth), according to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), has come to the conclusion that this treaty must be ratified by parliament. That is perfectly obvious, as I pointed out most distinctly in May, 1909, but could not then find any one on the treasury benches willing to agree with me. I then said:

> This treaty must have the effect of altering the law of the land if carried into effect. You must have new laws in regard to actions brought by people in Canada against people residing in the United States, or by people in the United States against people domiciled in Canada.

And I argued, as I claim to-day, that it cannot be carried into effect without the ratification of parliament. My hon. friend the member for St. Anne division (Mr. Doherty), has shown the singular situation into which the matter has been brought by the action of the government. They did not make this treaty subject to the ratification of any parliament. They took the ground, contrary to all British precedents in the last twenty years, that this treaty need not be made subject to the ratification of parliament, but still they come to-day, and ask parliament to ratify it. In taking that step they are, therefore, departing from the position they took in the first instance. Inasmuch as this treaty was not made subject to the ratification of any parliament, what has this parliament to do with ratifying it to-day? In the absence of any provision in the treaty itself, there is strong ground for the argument which my hon. friend from St. Anne has presented, that the proper parliament to ratify it is the British parliament. That the Crown has the right to make a treaty and insert in it a stipulation that it shall not go into effect until ratified by the parliament of Canada, of that there can be no doubt. But if the Crown sees fit to make a treaty without inserting any such stipulation, there is strong ground for the argument of the hon. member for St. Anne that the proper, the only parliament which has the right to say it shall or shall not be ratified, is the parliament of Great Britain. That is the position in which the government finds itself to-day.

This treaty goes on, in the second place, to amend in a general, and comprehensive way, the laws of Canada, and of every province in Canada. It provides, as my hon. friend from St. Anne division (Mr. Doherty), has pointed out, a new tribunal for the determination of questions, which, according to my view, would have been determined formerly by the courts of the various provinces. That brings me to the point which my hon. friend, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), made, namely that we were absolutely in the power of the United States with respect to this matter. I shall not go into the argument made by my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath), except to this extent, that I do not at all agree with the view which the Minister of the Interior has put forward. What was the minister's argument? He said that he agreed entirely in the position which I advanced, and fortified by authority when this matter was discussed on the 6th of December last, namely, that it was not competent, under the principles of international law for the United States to divert within its own territory the waters of a river which ran through the territory into Canada. I shall not quote in full the authorities which I read in December last upon that point. I took a text book recognized as an authority upon this question. The author is Professor Oppenheim. This gentleman is lecturer in Public International Law at the London School of Economies and Political Science (University of London), and a member of the Faculty of Economics and Political Science of the University of London, and he was formerly Professor Ordinarius of Law in the University of Basle, Switzerland. He is a well recognized authority in international law. In the preface of the work which I quoted, the author says:

> I have nearly always taken pains to put other opinions, if any, before my readers. I have been careful to avoid pronouncing rules as established which are not yet settled. My book is intended to present international law as it is, not as it ought to be.

And this opinion, expressed in a few words, is as follows:

> A state is, in spite of its territorial supremacy, not allowed to alter the natural condition of its own territory to the disadvantage of the natural condition of a neighbouring state, for instance, to stop or divert the flow of a river which runs from its own territory into a neighbouring territory.

We could not have anything more directly to the point than that statement of international law. But what is the position taken by the Minister of the Interior? It is that we were absolutely within the power of the United States, because the United States were capable of authorizing within their own territory the erection of works which would divert that river. He might just as well have said that, because the United States might pass a law authorizing its officers to confiscate all British shipping that came within its ports, we were absolutely within the power of the United States in that regard. That would be just as reasonable a conclusion to draw. But we were not within the power of the United States, because they could not divert the waters of this river, according to the principle of international law, except at the risk of committing an unfriendly act against a friendly power, an act which would be quite as unjustifiable, in my opinion, as the act of confiscation to which I have just alluded. My hon. friend might as well say that if the United States came and occupied 30 or 40 miles of the territory of Alberta or Saskatchewan, they were entitled to do so, because they had the power, and, therefore, we should make the best of the situation, bad as it was.

We were, I submit, entitled to have our rights determined according to the principles of international law, and I deny absolutely, that we were in the power of the United States. Under these circumstances the government made a treaty which in this particular respect, will have the consequences pointed out by my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath). Under the conditions which he has outlined, and with the results he has pointed out, is this a good or a bad treaty from the Canadian standpoint? I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that it is not an advantageous treaty to Canada, and that if the government had been properly advised, if they had taken advantage of the opinion of the experts whom they employed, if they had gone into this question with the care, and thoroughness which marked every step taken by the United States, we either would not have had a treaty at all, or a treaty very much more to our advantage. I regret, therefore, that a treaty has been entered into which will have the consequences we have pointed out. I regret that the government have seen fit to depart from the view which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), expressed in the letter over his own hand, which has been quoted to-day. I regret that the government has seen fit to disregard the views of the only expert, and a very able expert, I believe, he was, whom they employed on this matter.

In speaking in that way I do not wish to cast any discredit upon Mr. King or any of the other gentlemen who were concerned in this matter. But Mr. King has not had the experience in these matters which would justify us in calling him an expert in the same sense of the word that he would call Mr. Anderson an expert. He is not an expert of the same class as those who surround the men who were negotiating on the part of the United States. The only answer to all this seems to be the reply already made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver)—that the manager of the great irrigation company which is controlled by the Canadian Pacific is satisfied with the treaty so far as his company is concerned, and the Canadian Pacific, which controls that irrigation company, is also satisfied with the treaty so far as it is concerned. Still, that does not by any means settle the question so far as the people of Canada are concerned. The treaty may be satisfactory to these gentlemen, but these gentlemen may be deceived. But, even if they are not deceived, it does not necessarily follow that everything that is in the interest of this great irrigation company would be absolutely in the interest of the people of Canada. There are the rates for water to be charged to the people in the future which we must consider; there are a dozen different considerations to which we must have regard. And I respectfully decline to be governed in my appreciation of the conditions and the results by the argument which has been made in that regard by the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If no other hon. gentleman desires to speak on this subject, I would like to make a few observations in reply to some remarks made by my hon. friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath), and by some other hon. gentlemen who have spoken. In the first place, I think the Minister of the Interior put the matter very fairly when he said that he personally would very much have preferred to have an arrangement by which Canada could have got all the water of the St. Mary's river and the Milk river. But it was not a question of getting all the water or half of it, but a question of getting even half the water or the possibility of being deprived of all of it. I think the remark of my hon. friend from Medicine Hat that the water of the Milk river could be diverted to Raymond, which is a flourishing town in the province of Alberta, and distributed over a considerable stretch of country there is a very important point in that connection, because it indicates very clearly that, as a result of this treaty, when these commissioners are appointed to distribute the water of these two rivers equally to both countries, they may be able to allow a portion of that extra water which is turned into the Milk river and which for a hundred miles will then flow through Canadian territory, and will be available for the irrigation of that vast section of Alberta, to be diverted to the north and used for irrigating the large section of the country of which the town of Raymond is the centre. At the present time, as has been forcibly said, there is not a large flow of water in the Milk river. But when the stored waters of the St. Mary's river are turned into the Milk river there will be water available not only for a large portion of Montana upon the eastern waters of the Milk river, but a considerable quantity of water will be available which can be turned to the north and can be used, as I have stated, to irrigate a considerable section of country around Raymond. My hon. friend from Medicine Hat has said—and in this he has been followed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax)—that it is not a fair treaty so far as the distribution of the waters of these two rivers is concerned. But has he shown you, Mr. Speaker, in what respect it is not fair? He starts out with the theory that the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company has a vested right in 2,000 cubic inches of water per second. Who gave them that vested right? The government of the United States? Not at all. The only vested right they have is a license from the government of this country to utilize water if it is available, up to 2,000 cubic feet per second. That is not a vested right against the government and people of the United States. The hon. gentleman said also that this company have a canal system which enables them to utilize at least 800 cubic feet of water per second. Well, that gives them no vested right. The theory of this right, so far as irrigation purposes are concerned, is a right as between different subjects of the same country, who in the courts of that country can enforce their rights. But, as between the citizens of Canada and the citizens of the United States, there can be no vested right unless that right is given by treaty. If my hon. friend had been correct in his statement that the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company had a vested right as against the United States to 2,000 cubic inches per second there might have been force in his argument. But, as I have said they have no such right.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I desire to ask a question just for information. The hon. minister stated a moment ago that the people of Canada would be entitled to a large quantity of water from the Milk river, that is to say, water diverted from the St. Mary's river.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I do not read the treaty that way, and I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) can have read it. It states that the United States can use the Milk river as the channel for conveyance of their water, but that does not say that they are going to convey any water for our purpose, and I distinctly understood the hon. member from Medicine Hat to state that we could look at that water but we could not use any of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman is wrong in that. It rests entirely with the commissioners to treat all the flow of these two rivers as one, and to apportion the waters of the two rivers equally between the inhabitants of the two countries, giving more of the water of one river and less of the other to one country, or vice versa, as they deem most advantageous to the people of both countries. That is the duty imposed upon the commissioners; and, if, for the purposes of irrigation they found it desirable to give more of the St. Mary's river to Canada than to the people of the United States, they could do so. In that case they would give less of the flow of the Milk river, and vice versa, always keeping in mind that the total flow of these two rivers is to be distributed equally between the people of the two countries. There is another important fact which my hon. friend from Medicine Hat forgot. As you go eastward beyond the point where the Milk river turns again into Montana there are a large number of tributaries rising in Canadian territory, and the waters of which all flow down into the Milk river, upon the United States side of the boundary. The commissioners will be obliged to take the waters of these tributaries into consideration, and when they come to the United States, as they necessarily will, then, in the exercise of the power and in the performance of the duty vested in them by this treaty, they must keep in mind the waters of the various tributaries flowing from Canadian territory into the United States, and make allowance for them in the division of the total flow.

Mr. MAGRATH. Might I ask a question? Will not these streams which the hon. gentleman referred to—which after all will not use much water—be divided now equally between the two countries? Whereas now we get all that water.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They will form part of the whole. These waters flowing into the Milk river in American territory must be deducted from the whole water of the St. Mary's and the Milk, and in that way we shall be entitled to a larger flow of the water that comes from the westward, and so the people of Canada will secure a greater advantage. Now, as I have said, the whole argument of my hon. friend from Medicine Hat rests upon the theory that the people of Alberta, and more particularly the irrigation company and other citizens out there, cannot be interfered with in their rights to the extent implied by the granting of this license. They have no right which can be enforced as a legal right ordinarily can be enforced. If the citizens of the United States, or the United States government, were to divert every inch of the water of the St. Mary's river, and every inch of the water of the Milk river before it comes into Canadian territory, neither could this company nor the people of Alberta bring any suit against anybody for doing that. There is no court into which they could go. They might appeal to the government of the United States; but what has been the attitude of that government in the past? My hon. friend the leader of the opposition speaks of the principles of international law. What are they, Mr. Speaker? They are those principles that govern nations in their dealings with each other. You can have no principle of international law unless it is recognized by the nations of the world as being a correct principle which is binding upon the nations of the world. Now, when you find the predominant sovereign country on this hemisphere taking an entirely different view, claiming as it does claim, that each nation is sovereign within its own country, claiming to divert waters for the purposes of irrigation and for domestic purposes just as it pleases, and no other nation has the right to question its doing so, can you say that it is within the principles of international law that should refuse to allow any such diversion of water within their own country?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). When did they enunciate that doctrine?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is a notable instance in which the United States government has taken the ground that within its own territory it has the sovereign right to do as it pleases so far as the streams in its own country are concerned. It is true that the principles of navigation enter into the question with regard to large rivers; and it is possible, I am inclined to think it is the case, that Professor Oppenheim was referring to a navigable river in the article which the leader of the opposition has quoted. But we can learn the attitude of the United States by referring to what they did in a dispute with Mexico which came up for consideration as late as 1895.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Before the hon. gentleman reads that—did not this water commission decide that according to international law and custom the tributary waters of the Rainy river which flow down to the boundary could not be diverted southward to Duluth?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What was proposed on that occasion was to divert a portion of a river which flows into the Rainy river into another stream which flows down into Lake Superior to the southward of Duluth. It was alleged that that would interfere with the navigation of the Rainy river. But let me say to my hon. friend that since that time the United States Minister of War has granted a license to a company to divert the waters of that stream, to take them out of their natural flow into the Rainy river, and to divert them southward, always of course providing that the interests of navigation shall not be affected. Well, so far as the report of the commissioners is concerned, my hon. friend surely is aware that Secretary Root declined to accept that ruling of the commissioners, and as I have said, subsequent to that, a license was issued by the Minister of War to a company to divert that stream. The Minister of Justice informs me that it was put distinctly on the ground that a refusal to allow that diversion would be inconsistent with the sovereign right of the States. Now the case to which I referred a moment ago, which arose in 1895, was a case between Mexico and the United States. A large and very fertile section of country in the vicinity of El Paso on the Rio Grande had been irrigated by waters from that river, and a very fertile country had been developed. For its fertility and development the waters of the Rio Grande were absolutely essential for irrigation. Further up the river in the United States, irrigation works were constructed and ditches were dug out, the effect of which was to divert a large portion of the river for the purposes of irrigation for the benefit of United States citizens, and the result was to render absolutely arid a large section in Mexico, and to bring great distress upon the people in that section of Mexico. The Mexican government appealed to the government of the United States alleging that they had the right, under the principles of international law, to have that river flow down into their own country where it might be utilized by them. The question was submitted to the Attorney General for his opinion. My hon. friend will find his opinion in volume 21 of the Opinions of the Attorney's General of the United States, beginning on page 281 from which I will quote:

> The fundamental principle of international law is the absolute sovereignty of every nation, as against all others, within its own territory. Of the nature and scope of sovereignty with respect to judicial jurisdiction, which is one of its elements, Chief Justice Marshall said (Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 7 Cranch, p. 136):

I may say that Chief Justice Marshall was, as my hon. friend knows, one of the most distinguished lawyers who ever occupied a seat upon the bench of the United States, or even upon the bench of any country.

> The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction. All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source.

So in order to settle this question according to the principle of international law, as my hon. friend desires, he must have the United States, which, as I have said, is the dominant sovereignty upon the American continent, recognize that as a principle of international law, but which they have refused to recognize.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How far does the hon. gentleman think that principle of Chief Justice Marshall would extend?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It would extend to the right to legislate with respect to everything that is within its own country.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course the point involved is whether the United States or any other country has the right to do something within its own territory which would be an absolute and positive detriment to the adjoining country. If you divert the water of a stream why cannot you discharge cannon from the territory of another country on the principle enunciated by Chief Justice Marshall that a country has an absolute right of sovereignty to do within its own territory whatever it sees fit?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think my hon. friend would even persuade himself that he would be very successful in combating the opinions of Chief Justice Marshall on questions of international law.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am not combatting them, and I do not want the minister to misrepresent me. I am pointing out that Chief Justice Marshall could not have had any such idea in his mind when he used that language.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then the Attorney General proceeds:

> It would be entirely useless to multiply authorities. So strongly is the principle of general and absolute sovereignty maintained that it has even been asserted by high authority that admitted international servitudes cease when they conflict with the necessities of the servient state. (Bluntschli, p. 212; see criticism by Creasy, p. 258). Whether this be true or not, its assertion serves to emphasize the truth that self-preservation is one of the first laws of nations. No believer in the doctrine of natural servitudes has ever suggested one which would interfere with the enjoyment by a nation within its own territory of whatever was necessary to the development of its resources or the comfort of its people.
> The immediate as well as the possible consequences of the right asserted by Mexico show that its recognition is entirely inconsistent with the sovereignty of the United States over its national domain. Apart from the sum demanded by way of indemnity for the past, the claim involves not only the arrest of further settlement and development of large regions of country, but the abandonment, in great measure at least, of what has already been accomplished.
> It is well known that the clearing and settlement of a wooded country affects the flow of streams, making it not only generally less, but also subjecting it to more sudden fluctuations between greater extremes, thereby exposing inhabitants on their banks to increase of the double danger of drought and flood. The principle now asserted might lead to consequences in other cases which need only be suggested.

That was the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, and the opinion upon which that government acted in the case of Mexico, although the circumstances there were certainly very hard upon a large number of people in Mexico.

Mr. FOSTER. Did Mexico get any redress?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mexico got no redress so far as I am aware.

Mr. FOSTER. Because she was the weaker power.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What is the view which Great Britain takes of the rights of a country to deal with waters in its own territory? I have only to call attention to what took place in my own province some forty or fifty years ago. There was a river called the Allegash flowing from a lake called Chamberlain lake through a portion of the United States into the river St. John. About forty years ago the people in the state of Maine under the authority of the legislature of that state erected a dam at the foot of Chamberlain lake the result of which was to turn back the waters of the watershed from the St. John river to the Penobscot, and so send the waters down through the state of Maine into the Atlantic ocean in the vicinity I think, of Bangor. The result of that was to enable the lumbermen of that section of country, instead of sending the logs down the Allegash to the St. John and thereby to the city of St. John and other towns on the river St. John for manufacturing, to turn them down the Penobscot, an American river entirely, and manufacture them in their own country. The government of New Brunswick sent a protest through the British Ambassador to the British government. We protested year after year. Some of those interested in lumbering on the upper waters of the Allegash, and I think that upon one occasion they blew up the dam, but it was restored again by those who had erected it. There came pretty nearly being bloodshed as the result of what was deemed to be an infringement of the rights of the people along the St. John river. After confederation protests were again made.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Is any part of the Allegash in our territory?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). It is all in Maine?

Mr. PUGSLEY. All in the United States, but it flows into the St. John river, which is a boundary river between the two countries. The water of the Allegash, in a state of nature, flows first into the St. John where it is the boundary, and a certain distance below that it is wholly within New Brunswick territory. Therefore, it was water which, in its natural state, flowed into Canadian waters. After confederation protests were again put in by the New Brunswick government. These protests were sent to His Excellency the Governor General here who transmitted them to the British Ambassador at Washington, and they were transmitted by the British Ambassador to the British government. Although these complaints had been made, and although these protests were vigorously supported during the long time which has elapsed, forty years, the British government have never felt that this was a case in which they could take issue with the United States, but they have recognized that the government of the state of Maine, with the permission of the federal government, were exercising the right of sovereignty within their own country.

Mr. FOSTER. They are our neighbours.

Mr. LENNOX.. Yes, they are our dearest friends.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the British government, for whose opinions, or course of action, we have the greatest possible respect acquiesced in that view of the sovereign rights of the people of the United States I am inclined to think that we would hesitate before we would be inclined to say that they were wrong.

Mr. FOSTER. Have they acquiesced?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Certainly, because they have allowed that to be done for forty years without taking any effective measures to prevent them from continuing it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Have the British government ever made any protest?

Mr. PUGSLEY. As far as I am aware, no. The diversion still continues just as it was created forty or fifty years ago. In that case it might be urged too, that it has interfered with the driving of logs which, of course, is a species of navigation, so that it would be a stronger case than the diversion of water merely for the purpose of irrigation or domestic use. I might also say, I think fairly, that not only have the British government acquiesced, but the Canadian government, during all these years have acquiesced. We felt in the province of New Brunswick that the Dominion government, during all the time that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was a member of that government, acquiesced, because we could get no redress. Our representations, in so far as we could understand, were simply pigeonholed. I cannot remember any reply being received except a mere acknowledgment of our protests, and no effective steps were taken to prevent this diversion from being continued.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Dominion government did not acquiesce if it sent the protests forward to the British government, and asked that the protests be given effect to, as my hon. friend said was done.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I cannot imagine any more effective acquiescence than to send a protest forward, and then let the matter slumber for years and years until another protest comes from New Brunswick, then to send that protest forward and allow the question to slumber for years and years again.

Mr. LENNOX. What about the present administration?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The present administration has been no more successful than its predecessor.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Have you tried?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, we have tried, representations have been sent forward, but that is the end of it. My own view is that the British government acquiesce in the view of the American government that the United States were simply exercising their sovereign rights in their own country when they allowed this diversion to take place.

Mr. FOSTER. At what date did the present Dominion government forward the protest with reference to the Allegash river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. When I was Attorney General of New Brunswick I forwarded my protest to this government, and I believe there was no result.

Mr. LENNOX. They acquiesced and sent it forward.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Did you insist on it going forward again since you became a minister here?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am inclined to think, judging from the action of the British government, that it is not much use to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. And you are now arguing that that is the correct thing?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am stating that the argument of the United States is that in the exercise of their sovereign rights they can do this, and they have already done it with the acquiescence of the British government, and I am inclined to think that the British government takes the same view that they do. In the course of the duty I had to perform in connection with this treaty, I would necessarily be brought somewhat in contact with the British ambassador, and I know that his view was that the British government would not be likely to dispute the allegation on the part of the United States that if they diverted water for irrigation purposes they would be acting in the exercise of their right of sovereignty. Let me ask my hon. friends what would have been the result in all human probability if we refused to enter into this arrangement for the diversion of these waters? In the case of the waters which arise wholly in the neighbouring country and which would be required for irrigation, an agreement under which these waters should be equally divided between the people of the two countries, would seem to the ordinary mind to be a very equitable arrangement, and that is the way it was viewed by the government of the United States. Suppose we had refused to enter into negatiations on that basis, do you think that the United States government, requiring a portion of those waters in eastern Montana for irrigation, would have hesitated very long to have built a canal to draw the waters of the St. Mary's lake wholly through their own country down to the Marias river and thence on by the Missouri river system to where the water was required for irrigation. The hon. member (Mr. Magrath) says it would not be commercially a profitable undertaking.

Mr. MAGRATH. Does the minister know the height of the dam they would have to build to get to the Marias river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not suppose it would be higher than the dam they have to build now.

Mr. MAGRATH. It would be 180 feet high according to the reports of their own engineers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend may be right in that, but the estimated cost is three or four million dollars, and if a government so powerful and so wealthy as that of the United States felt that they were not being treated as a friendly nation ought to treat them I do not think they would hesitate to spend that sum of money to build an irrigation ditch to carry these waters down the Marias river to where they were needed for irrigation. And had they done that, what could we do? My hon. friend (Mr. Magrath) says they would be taking away our legal rights, but how would he propose to enforce these alleged legal rights? It would be by representations to the British government, and in view of their attitude in respect to the Allegash river, they would be very apt to say: We think the United States have a perfect right to do what they have done. They would certainly say, I should think: The United States made you a very fair offer under which you can have half the waters of these rivers, to be divided under the direction of a commission and we are not disposed to interfere and make trouble with the United States. That would have been the answer of the British government, and I would like to know what comfort it would have been to the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company and to the people whose very existence depends on a regular supply of water during the dry season, to be told that we would be able to protest year after year to the British government, and that we would have a grievance against the government of the United States. That would be but poor satisfaction to the company whose shareholders would have been ruined and to the people who were living in what was formerly a fertile country, but which had been rendered barren by reason of the source of its fertility. We took these matters into consideration, and we came to the conclusion that it would be better to make this arrangement in order to avoid these difficulties which had been rising between the two governments in that western country, and which were likely to be a source of very great irritation in the future. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath) says we did not take the advice of Mr. Anderson. Well, we did not act wholly upon Mr. Anderson's advice; I am not sure that we acted upon it at all, but I can say to my hon. friend that we gave it the most careful consideration; we submitted it to our own experts. We submitted it to Dr. King, who, although he is not specially engaged in irrigation work, is a gentleman of great ability and large experience and one who has made a special study of that western country in connection with the settlement of that question. We conferred with Mr. Campbell of the Interior Department, who is in charge of the Forestry Branch, and I think the Irrigation Branch also. I was called upon on two occasions to go to Washington in connection with the question, and Mr. Campbell and Mr. King were present, and we gave the question the closest study possible. I think my hon. friend from Medicine Hat will agree that Mr. Anderson was speaking upon the theory that the waters of the river were to be divided, and that no prior right was being secured to the people of Canada. I regard that as of great importance, and I fear the importance of it was overlooked by my hon. friend (Mr. Magrath).

Mr. MAGRATH. When Mr. Anderson made his report the treaty was as it is today. That is to say, he was called in after the treaty had been signed at Washington, so that it has not been altered through any suggestion made by him.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I thought Mr. Anderson made the report in 1908 when this provision was not in article 6.

Mr. MAGRATH. That is quite correct. I thought the minister was referring to Mr. Anderson's criticism of the treaty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was referring to his report of 1908. We have secured by article 6 what I think is of the greatest possible importance to the people of that section of Alberta. We provide that, during the dry season when the people want the water, our people shall have a prior right to the extent of 500 cubic inches per second if it is not more than three-fourths of the flow, but at all events, during the dry season, at least three-fourths of the entire flow of the St. Mary's river is allotted to us, and that is a matter of great importance. In the flood season the waters flow in vast quantities, and can be stored if our people want to store them. But in the dry season the United States government must not hold back the water so as to prevent our people getting the 500 cubic feet per second, or at least three-fourths of the whole natural flow of the St. Mary's river. These are the words of the treaty, which I think are of extreme importance, and their importance has been overlooked by my hon. friend. Article 6 is as follows:

> The high contracting parties agree that the St. Mary's and Milk rivers and their tributaries (in the state of Montana and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan) are to be treated as one stream for the purposes of irrigation and power, and the waters thereof shall be apportioned equally between the two countries, but in making such equal apportionment more than half may be taken from one river and less than half from the other by either country so as to afford a more beneficial use to each. It is further agreed that in the division of such waters during the irrigation season, between the 1st of April and 31st of October inclusive, annually, the United States is entitled to a prior appropriation of 500 cubic feet per second of the waters of the Milk river, or so much of such amount as constitutes three-fourths of its natural flow, and that Canada is entitled to a prior appropriation of 500 cubic feet per second of the flow of St. Mary's river, or so much of such amount as constitutes three-fourths of its natural flow.

Now, can you conceive of a better arrangement for the people of Alberta, who are interested in this irrigation question, than is made in that provision? That provision was not in the suggestion of the American government made by Secretary Root. It was put into the treaty after lengthy negotiations, after our representatives and myself had urged upon those representing the United States, that it would not be fair to our people unless we could secure a prior right to appropriate a certain quantity of the water of the St. Mary's river; and after these negotiations the United States agreed to this demand, which is of infinite value to the people of that section of the province of Alberta. And yet my hon. friend deals with the matter just as if this provision were of no importance. I say it is of enormous importance, because no matter whether the flow of water is great or small, no matter whether the season is exceptionally dry or not, no matter whether little water may be left to the United States or not, we during the irrigation season have up to 500 cubic feet per second, or at least up to three-fourths of the natural flow of the St. Mary's river.

Mr. MAGRATH. Did I understand the hon. minister to say some time ago that Canada could have the use of some of the diverted waters of the St. Mary's river after they had been turned into the channel of the Milk river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I said was this: that is a matter that rests wholly with the commissioners. It is the duty and power of the commissioners to divide all the waters of both rivers, and of all their tributaries equally between the people of the two countries. They can give more of one river to one country and vice versa in respect of the other river; and if in the judgment of the commissioners it would be better to give to the people of Canada a greater portion of the flow of the Milk river, and less of the St. Mary's river, they would have a perfect right to do that. The treaty imposes upon them the duty of dividing the waters of both rivers, treating them as one stream, equally between the people of the two countries, and gives them the power of so distributing the waters as to make the distribution as beneficial as possible to the people of both countries.

Something has been said by my hon. friend with reference to a letter which I wrote to the Prime Minister to be forwarded to Washington, urging that the United States government should undertake to build a dam upon the St. Mary's river for the joint benefit of both countries. I am free to admit that when I wrote that letter I was strongly impressed with the desirability of securing some such arrangement if I could do so. I do not think it will be improperly disclosing any secret if I say that the Canadian government were prepared to pay a portion of the cost of erecting that dam upon American territory; but the government of the United States said, and we cannot perhaps wonder at their saying so, that they would hesitate to accept a contribution from another government for the erection of works in their country, even though they might be irrigation works that would be for the benefit of both countries. But the strong argument they made, as will appear from the correspondence, was that until they had erected a dam, and had some experience whether or not it would stand in the bed of the St. Mary's river, it would not be desirable to enter into such an arrangement. It will also appear from the correspondence that they argued that it was not practicable to take water from the bed of the river, but that it would have to be taken from a height of about 30 feet above the bed, and therefore, it would not be possible to store more than one-half the water of the river. That was their view. We were not able to make an answer to that, and after careful inquiry we came to the conclusion that on the Canadian side of the line there were opportunities to store the water of St. Mary's river as good as, if not superior, to those on the American side. We gave a great deal of thought to this question of article 6. A good many months intervened before we finally agreed to the treaty, even after it had been ratified by the United States Senate. We were making inquiry with regard to the effect of article 6, looking at it from every possible standpoint, and conferring with those who had a knowledge of the subject. As a result of all this inquiry, we came to the conclusion that it would be in the interest of Canada to sign this treaty, and that on the whole article 6 would be just to the people of Alberta. We did not act upon the judgment of our own experts alone. My hon. friend has stated that the making of this treaty was a breach of faith with the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company. He made a strong point of that. Well, Sir, when I tell you that the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company, through Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which controls more than 60 per cent of the stock of that irrigation company, approved and expressed to us their approval of the execution of this treaty, I think you will hardly be disposed to agree with my hon. friend from Medicine Hat that there was any breach of faith towards that company. They expressly advised us that it would be not only in the interest of that portion of the western country, but in their own interest, because they were anxious to have permanence in the supply of water for their irrigation works, and they thought it would be better to have a certain quantity secured to them than to have the matter remain in the unsettled state in which it had been for years. We conferred not only with Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, but with Mr. J. S. Dennis of the irrigation department of the Canadian Pacific railway, a gentleman of large experience in irrigation work. I doubt if there is a man in Canada, or in America, whose judgment might be better relied upon in irrigation matters than that of Mr. J. S. Dennis.

Mr. REID (Grenville). How do you know?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I know because Mr. Dennis has had charge of the expenditure of many millions of dollars for the Canadian Pacific railway on irrigation works on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains, and these works are exceedingly successful. The reputation of Mr. Dennis throughout our western country is of the very highest.

Mr. CROCKET. Does that view agree with Mr. Anderson's?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. Dennis' views agrees with our view, that it is a good arrangement.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Does it agree with Mr. Anderson's view?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, Mr. Dennis' view is that it would be better to agree to this equal division such as we propose. I had verbal interviews with Mr. Dennis, went into the matter very fully with him, and he was clearly of the opinion that it would be in the interests, not only of their company, but in the interests of western Canada that this treaty should go into effect. I have a letter from Sir Thomas Shaughnessy which appears in the return under date of March 4, 1910. It is as follows:

Canadian Pacific Railway Company,
Montreal, March 4, 1910.

Dear Mr. Pugsley,—Mr. J. S. Dennis, who is our Superintendent of Irrigation, wrote me from Ottawa, February 16, as follows:

With reference to the interview had this morning with the honourable Mr. Pugsley and Dr. King, Boundary Commissioner, regarding the matter of diversion of international waters, and to my telephonic communication to you through Mr. Beatty, I send you herewith a copy of article 6 of the treaty, together with map of Alberta and a portion of Montana.

As you are aware, I know the local situation very thoroughly, not only on our own side of the line, but also on the other, and after very full and careful consideration of the subject, I am quite decided that the division of the waters of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers, provided for by article 6 of the treaty is perfectly fair and amply protects Canadian interests, as a whole and the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company particularly . . . and that we are in a position to store at suitable points in the St. Mary's river ridge such portion of the high water and flood and flood discharge of the St. Mary's and Milk rivers as must be passed to us by the American authorities under the provisions of section 6 of the treaty.

There is no question whatever in my mind, that the treaty provides for a division of the waters of these two streams on a thoroughly equitable basis, and amply protects our interests in as far as they are concerned with the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company.

Mr. Pugsley asked that I would write him a letter to that effect, but I said that I would of course, desire to consult you before doing so. I am now advising him that he will hear from you direct with reference to the matter, or through Mr. Creelman.

It is probable that Mr Dennis intended to refer to the Milk river ridge instead of the St. Mary's ridge, but I am giving the exact language of his letter.

Personally, I am not sufficiently familiar with the situation, nor have I the requisite technical knowledge, to confirm Mr. Dennis' report, but I would accept it without hesitation if it were made with direct reference to any irrigation work or water supply in which this company was interested.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) T. G. SHAUGHNESSY,
President.

Honourable Wm. Pugsley,
Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend had that letter before him, because it is in the return from which he quoted, and yet in face of that positive statement on behalf of the railway and irrigation company he makes a strong plea that the agreeing to this treaty is a breach of faith with the irrigation company, which company says that the provision of the agreement with respect to the division of the waters is on a fair, and equitable basis, and that it would be better that we should enter into it not only in the interests of the people of that section of the country, but in the interests of the irrigation company as well.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I can now very well pass away from the St. Mary's and Milk rivers, and I will make one or two remarks with regard to what was said by my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), with reference to the Bill itself. He says that he is inclined to think that we have no right to ask this House to confirm and sanction, as section 1 proposes to do, the treaty which has been entered into. I think that we have a clear right to do so. That right is contained in article 12 of the treaty which provides that:

The commission shall have power to administer oaths to witnesses and to take evidence on oath whenever deemed necessary in any proceeding or inquiry, or matter within the jurisdiction under this treaty, and all parties interested therein shall be given convenient opportunity to be heard, and the high contracting parties agree to adopt such legislation as may be appropriate and necessary to give the commission the powers above mentioned on each side of the boundary, and to provide for the issue of subpœnas and for compelling the attendance of witnesses in proceedings before the commission.

I am sure that the hon. member for Montreal, St. Anne, could not have been aware of that provision in article 12. That provision gives us power, and this is the only legislature by which that power can be given to make provision as required by the treaty for the purpose of compelling the attendance of witnesses, and of having them sworn before giving their evidence. Also, it gives us power to make this provision with regard to a citizen of the United States claiming redress in the courts of our own country for any wrong which he may have suffered by reason of the diversion of water where the injury takes place upon the other side of the line. Therefore, it is clear that it is not only the right, but it is our duty to make those provisions which are contained in the first five paragraphs of the amended Bill. Hon. gentlemen might say that when I introduced the Bill in the first place I should have thought of these things, and had the sections in. I am quite prepared to say that if I had had an opportunity of conferring personally with my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth), before the Bill was introduced, and talking the matter over with him, it is not at all unlikely that the Bill as introduced would have contained these sections which we are now asking to be placed in the Bill. But, it is absolutely clear that it is our duty to put them in the Bill in order to give complete effect to the treaty, in so far as the enforcement of rights, and the granting of remedies is concerned as well as the subpœnaing and swearing of witnesses.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I apologize for taking up so much of the time of the House. The matter is one of a good deal of importance, and I thought it not undesirable that I should reply to the observations which have been made in criticism of this treaty, which I think is one which is not only just to the people whose interests are affected by the treaty, and more particularly to those who are living in the province of Alberta, but which is a great step forward in the establishment of permanent peace between Great Britain and the United States. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, has referred to the proposed general treaty of arbitration which is now pending between the United States and Great Britain. We all sincerely trust that that treaty will be signed, and will become effective and that for all time to come it will ensure peace between these great nations, but I desire to say that in a smaller way the treaty that this House is now called upon to consider is a great step forward in that direction. When we entered upon these negotiations there were irritating questions especially between the people of the west with regard to boundary waters. In our western country people living in the vicinity of the town of Raymond connected with the irrigation company had started upon the construction of some works for the diversion of the waters of the Milk river. The United States government had started in upon certain works for the diversion of the waters of the St. Mary's river. There was ground for ill-feeling, and it is difficult to say what might have been the result if these negotiations had not been entered upon. This treaty makes provision for all questions relating to boundary waters, all questions arising along the boundary, and all questions of whatever kind, and description which may arise between the government of Canada and the government of the United States being referred to a commission. When the larger treaty goes into force it is possible that it may supersede, and take the place of the present one, but this treaty is for five years, and only for five years, subject, of course, to its being continued, and we trust it will be continued for all time, unless it be superseded by the larger arbitration treaty between the two countries. If that treaty should come into effect, and should take the place of this one no harm can possibly be done by enacting the present treaty. It is necessary that it shall be brought into force, and brought into force at as early a date as possible. There are many questions which are arising from day to day, and which ought to come before a tribunal such as this will be.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time on division, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. PUGSLEY. With the consent of the committee, I would suggest that the amended Bill be taken up and read by the Chairman. The present Bill consists of the last two.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Is it the desire of the committee to take the Bill as proposed to be amended into consideration?

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Has it been distributed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say the Bills were printed on Saturday. I asked the law clerk if it had been distributed, and he said they were ready for distribution. I do not know why they were not distributed. I sent half a dozen to some hon. members on the other side. I will let my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart, Lanark) have my copy, if he desires.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). No, thanks.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Section 1 of the Bill as in the members' hands, reads as follows:

The International Joint Commission, when appointed and constituted pursuant to the treaty of January the eleventh, nineteen hundred and nine, between His Majesty and the United States of America, shall have power, when holding joint sessions in Canada, to compel the attendance of witnesses by application to a judge of a superior court of the province within which such session is held, and such judge is hereby authorized and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary and appropriate to that end.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I understood the Minister of Public Works to say, Mr. Chairman, that you were going to take the amended Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I proposed to read the amended Bill, but unless I get authority——

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The objection taken that this Bill has not been distributed should have force. The best thing we can do is to have the committee rise, have the Bill distributed, and then bring it up again. This is not the time to distribute a Bill of this character for immediate consideration. There are a number of members of the House who are not here this afternoon, and they might desire to say something about it. This Bill touches many interests, both public and private, from one end of the country to the other, and involves many propositions which are of a vital character to the country. I think it only fair and right——

Mr. PUGSLEY. May I be allowed to state that the amended Bill has been distributed. The hon. gentleman will find it on his file. I find that it is on mine.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). When?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It must have been distributed certainly early yesterday morning. It was printed either Friday or Saturday.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I know, but——

Mr. PUGSLEY. The page tells me that it was distributed this morning.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Unless some intimation is given that these amendments are proposed, the Bill might be on one's file a long time before we would know about it. I confess I was taken entirely by surprise by the amendments the minister proposes. It was a very wise precaution for the minister to have them printed and to give us as long notice as possible before we go into committee. But one can easily see the consequences to which this method of procedure might lead. A Bill might be introduced with very innocent provisions, pass its first reading, and then, just as we are going into committee, after it has been read a second time, exceedingly important amendments in printed form might be put into our hands and we would be told that this is the real Bill——

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will the hon. member (Mr. Borden, Halifax) pardon me a moment? How would it do to begin with section 5 of the new Bill, which was section 1 of the old Bill?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). But it is so absurd to ask this House to consider this Bill now, for it is entirely different from the former Bill. Of course, some things contained in the original Bill are contained in this one, but this Bill as it stands now actually never had its first reading. A Bill has just been read the second time, but I think we are establishing a very bad precedent. As the leader of the opposition has said, it leaves it open for the government to bring in a Bill at any time, a Bill of a very simple character, and then, at the tail end of the session, bring in an amended Bill in an empty House and try to force it through. I cannot see, since the objection is raised, how we can go on. I understand that, under the rules, a Bill must be distributed in plenty of time for every member to have an opportunity to see it. I do not—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is only one Bill before the committee, and in the hands of the Chairman, and that is Bill (No. 36) which has passed its first and second readings. The proposed amendments can only be considered as they are moved from time to time, as amendments to the original Bill.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. With regard to this section and the second section of the Bill, as it is now proposed for consideration before the committee, it occurs to me to point out the reasons, or some of the reasons, which led to the clauses being drafted in the language in which they now appear. The treaty, of course, had become entirely operative by the interchange of ratifications and formal ratification of it nearly a year before this——

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Sir Allen Aylesworth) is speaking to matters which are not before this committee, as you, Mr. Chairman, ruled a moment ago.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think I shall have to rule that the only Bill that is before the committee is the Bill as originally printed. I cannot accept the Bill as it is proposed to be amended as the one that I am to submit to the committee. Any changes in the original Bill may be moved, and the Bill may ultimately be changed into exactly the form of the proposed Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I move that the present section 1 of this Bill be made section 5 and that section 1 be as follows:

1. The treaty relating to the boundary waters and to questions arising along the boundary between Canada and the United States made between His Majesty and the said United States, signed at Washington the eleventh day of January, one thousand nine hundred and nine, and the protocol of the fifth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and ten, in the schedule to this Act are hereby confirmed and sanctioned.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think I can accept that motion.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. With reference to this section which it is proposed shall be section 1 of the Bill, I was about to say that it is not framed with any idea that the treaty was not thoroughly effective without it. The treaty had been ratified practically a year before this clause had been put on paper and was entirely operative so far as constituting a treaty obligation is concerned, and it needed no ratification or sanction from this House, because it was a compact of the King constitutionally entered into, binding upon this country as a part of the British Empire. The whole object and purpose of framing sections such as appear here in the section which it is proposed to make section 1 of this Bill and in the second section beside it, was in order to effect any necessary changes in our statute or unwritten law which the obligations of this treaty would necessitate. Under the British North America Act, the jurisdiction is conferred upon this parliament to legislate in the way of carrying out the treaty obligations that this country may be under.

Now, a treaty had been entered into in May, 1910, by which certain changes are made in the existing laws with reference to the water courses of, probably, every province of the Dominion which borders upon the United States. This parliament has, under the provision of the British North America Act, power to alter these laws accordingly, although those laws are laws of the various provinces upon matters ordinarily within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province. It is proposed to provide in what will be asked to be the second section of this Bill, that the laws of Canada and of the several provinces thereof be amended and altered so as to permit the authorization, sanction and performance of the obligations of this treaty, and to found such a section, and with the object of making the provisions of this treaty of statutory effect within Canada exactly as though they had been in the first place embodied in a statute of this parliament, the first section is framed in form taking the shape of this parliament confirming and sanctioning the treaty. The words used are, I think, apt to effect the purpose intended; certainly they conduce to convenience in putting into our statute-book in the shape of a schedule to this Act, in a place where it will be of ready reference, this so important treaty between the two countries. Now to illustrate what I mean, let me point out that there are, in perhaps nearly every clause of this treaty, provisions in the nature of changes or declarations of law which otherwise would not appear upon the statute-book. Take, for instance, this provision as to the order of precedence which is to be observed in deciding before the Board of Railway Commissioners the various uses to which the boundary waters may be put, giving precedence to the use of water for domestic and sanitary purposes, and arranging in their order the various uses which may be made of such waters. Then there is a provision with regard to the diversion of waters, and the consequence of such diversion, in reality conferring a new right of action which, while in the United States, under the provision of their constitution, is completely conferred by the making of a treaty which becomes at once thereby the law of the whole country and of every state in the country, is not made effective by any similar provision in this country. While it is no more binding upon us because it is sanctioned and confirmed by Act of this parliament, while such sanction and confirmation was in no respect necessary for the validity of the treaty, and while the treaty receives no support from the action of this parliament in that regard, the action of parliament in making the treaty practically a statute of this Dominion is one which is in furtherance of its objects, and seemed to us a highly convenient course to take, to which there could be no practical objection.

Mr. CURRIE (North Simcoe). This treaty which we have before us is a portion of a matter that has been subject to negotiations and treaty-making on previous occasions. The principle laid down by the Canadian negotiators for many years was that in making treaties with the United States of America, all questions should be included within the walls of one treaty; that is to say, that questions involving navigation, fisheries, waterways and trade were dealt with in one treaty. By dealing with all these questions in one treaty, the negotiators were able to set off one thing against another, enabling this country, as for instance in the treaty of Washington, to secure something as a set-off against things that were demanded by the United States. Unfortunately for this country, we have now an ambassador at Washington who is very strongly pro-American. This country suffered at one time very severely from another ambassador who was pro-American, I refer to Lord Ashburton, previously Mr. Baring, who was the British ambassador in the negotiations that resulted in the famous Ashburton treaty. Now the house of Baring had large pecuniary connections in the United States. It must be evident now to any one reading cold history, that the associations and connections by marriage, and business, and otherwise, which Mr. Baring, or Lord Ashburton, had at that time with the United States, must largely have influenced him in his actions. It was indeed a dangerous thing to have appointed him as ambassador to make a treaty between Great Britain and the United States respecting Canada. We all know how this country has suffered from the Ashburton treaty; and without question those of us who have given the matter any study, even the school children in Canada, now ascribe that treaty and the troubles we have had under it, to the fact that Lord Ashburton had large American connections and was more American than British. We have now at Washington another ambassador who is also, I may say, tainted to a large extent in the same way. We know that Mr. Bryce, who has negotiated this treaty, and who seems intent upon negotiating a treaty at every turn of the road, and on every day in the week, is the great historian of the United States, and his book on the American Commonwealth is a text book in nearly all the universities of that country. It has a very large sale in the United States, and therefore he is dependent on the goodwill of the Americans both for his fame and for his profits. Now by a very skilful diplomatic process, within recent years we find that the points upon which there has been any difficulty between the United States and Great Britain have been separated, and a distinct treaty has been negotiated to meet each case. We have had a separate treaty dealing with the fisheries, with some other things; we have had a separate treaty dealing with trade. Now a strange thing has occurred with reference to this treaty and that is the fact, as pointed out by the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), that this treaty requires to be ratified by this House.

To my mind every treaty made for and on behalf of Canada should be submitted to this House before it is ratified or confirmed. The question is a very serious one, and one which has been debated in the mother of parliaments whether the government have the right to make a treaty of this kind, and to come to this House and say: We have pledged the honour of the country, the House must accept this treaty, or whether they have the power to make a treaty without any ratification by parliament whatsoever, which is the principle enunciated by the Minister of Public Works here to-day. It was the original intention to pass this treaty without any reference to parliament whatsoever in the matter. The reference was simply to be made to this House to provide the money for these commissioners, and no such thing as the ratification of the treaty was deemed necessary. But, a change has come over the spirit of their dream, and the treaty is submitted to this House in the form of a schedule. Let us see what has occurred, and what is the practice. In the early days, in the history of the mother country, previous to the discovery of America, the rule was, when kings were absolute and parliament had not attained to any strength or power, such as it has to-day, that the king made all the treaties and that these treaties had the force of law. The question was fought out on several occasions, but after the revolution a different rule obtained and from the time of William III. on until the early part of this century, no treaty was undertaken by the government of Great Britain without first receiving the sanction of parliament. It has been held by the most eminent authorities that it is a sound constitutional rule that all treaties should be first passed upon by parliament before they become law. If such were the case, Mr. Chairman, we would not have the spectacle here of the Minister of Finance coming to this House and declaring that the agreement that he made, with the United States, which is purely a convention, has the absolute force of law, that the honour of this House is pledged and that it must become law whether this parliament so desires or not. Mr. Bagehot, who is a well-known constitutional authority, takes the trouble to discuss this question of treaty making in one of his books, and he says this:

> Treaties are quite as important as most laws, and to require the elaborate assent of representative assemblies to every word of the law, and not to consult them even as to the essence of the treaty is prima facie ludicrous. In the older forms of the English constitution this may have been quite right; the power was then really lodged in the Crown, and because parliament met very seldom, and for other reasons, it was then necessary that, on a multitude of points, the Crown should have much more power than is amply sufficient for it at present. But now the real power is not in the Sovereign, it is in the Prime Minister and in the cabinet—that is, in the hands of a committee appointed by parliament, and of the chairman of that committee. Now, beforehand, no one would have ventured to suggest that a committee of parliament on foreign relations should be able to commit the country to the greatest international obligations without consulting either parliament or the country. No other select committee has any comparable power; and considering how carefully we have fettered and limited the powers of all other subordinate authorities, our allowing so much discretionary power on matters peculiarly dangerous and peculiarly delicate to rest in the sole charge of one secret committee is exceedingly strange. No doubt it may be beneficial; many seeming anomalies are so, but at first sight it does not look right.

Proceeding, he goes on to say:

> It certainly would be in many ways advantageous to change it. If we require that in some the assent of parliament shall be given to such treaties, we should have a real discussion prior to the making of such treaties. We should have the reasons for the treaty plainly stated, and also the reasons against it. At present, as we have seen, the discussion is unreal. The thing is done and cannot be altered; and what is said often ought not to be said, because it is captious, and what is not said ought as often to be said because it is material. We should have a manlier and plainer way of dealing with foreign policy, if ministers were obliged to explain clearly their foreign contracts before they were valid, just as they have to explain their domestic proposals before they can become laws.

That is the opinion of Mr. Bagehot. I claim that this parliament has no power to ratify or confirm this treaty, that the power to ratify and confirm this treaty rests in the parliament of Great Britain. Then, to come to another point, which is a very strange and a very technical constitutional point; this treaty deals with personal rights, it deals with navigation and it deals, to some extent, with taxation. If you establish a joint High Commission some person must provide the money to pay for the commission. You give this commission the power to deal with private rights involving damages to persons, and as the treaty involves taxation in some form to carry out its provisions, it of necessity should be confirmed by the parliament of the mother country. The treaty itself states that it is a treaty on behalf of the government of the United Kingdom, not on behalf of the government of Canada. This country simply provides the money for the joint high commission. Great Britain recommends the appointment of the commission and we have to pay for it. For that reason the treaty should first have been passed and ratified by the parliament of the United Kingdom. If the cabinet of this country and the cabinet of Great Britain are going to be continually taking the power unto themselves to make treaties with foreign countries involving the rights of the colonies there is sure to be trouble. More especially is there sure to be trouble in so far as this country is concerned. If we are going to give absolute, Czar-like power to two or three men to bind the people, where the ratification of these treaties in parliament is only a mere matter of form, we are introducing a principle that is vicious in itself, and that is contrary to the spirit of British institutions, that is going to lead this country into trouble with foreign nations, and is going to make the people virtually the slaves of three or four men, of possibly one man, who is dominant and who rules in the cabinet.

I object to the measure, because upon the face of it it bears evidence that it was the intention to pass it without reference to anybody excepting the contracting parties, namely the Ambassador to the United States, and the President of the United States. But, under the constitution of the United States, it could not become a treaty until it is consented to by the United States Senate, and the schedule points out that the treaty was approved by that body on the 3rd of March, 1909. Let me cite authority for the statement I have made that the making of treaties without first consulting parliament is contrary to the constitution, and to the practice which prevailed in the British parliament, at all events, until the year 1815. Lord Campbell, one of the greatest constitutional lawyers of his age, discussed the question in the House of Lords in March, 1873, and I cannot do better than quote his words:

What the public absolutely wants is to guard itself against the errors and miscarriages of which the late negotiation with America was fertile.

Strange to say this speech of Lord Campbell would apply with very great force to a certain convention that has recently been made by this government:

That such treaties should be laid on the table of the two Houses a sufficient time before ratification to admit of their being examined and debated may be an inadequate security. It may be urged that to lay treaties on the table is but a decent ceremonial;——

Just as we are told by this government that the honour of the country is pledged to what the negotiators do, and that this parliament is nothing but a rubber stamp to place its imprint on the treaty, a syllable of which we cannot change.

—that in the recent treaty the faith of the Crown was irrevocably pledged before ratification; that a noble and learned Lord explained that doctrine when the House was on the verge of a proceeding to control the treaty; that the doctrine was accepted, and the proceeding stifled or relinquished by your Lordships. These facts, which occurred in the session before last upon the motion of Lord Russell have not at all escaped me. The only answer is, that when parliament had made up its mind to exercise a certain power over treaties, sharp practice of the kind—and sharp practice it would be in that event—could hardly be resorted to by governments. The objection that the executive may still find a method of overruling parliament and of defrauding the community is one I cannot expect to hear to-night from those who form it at this moment.

Every word of this speech applies to certain things that have occurred in this House with reference to treaties:

The misgivings some may have to the effect that prerogative would suffer by bringing treaties before parliament with greater regularity, which, as it is, are brought before it stealthily and hastily, does not bear examination. The prerogative as vested in the Crown of negotiating, of signing and of ratifying treaties, would be perfectly inviolate. Parliament would not be competent to give rise to any treaty whatsoever. The Earl, the Secretary of State, must at some time have been familiar with the debate between Mirabeau and Barnave, in the French Assembly, soon after 1789, as to where the power of making treaties should be vested. Mirabeau, on that point, an advocate of monarchy, contended that the power should be vested in the Sovereign. Barnave—the organ of the more popular idea—that it should be consigned to the Assembly. Mirabeau prevailed; the power resided in the Crown; but the veto of the legislative body was universally admitted—the initiative of the Crown and the veto of the legislative body were seen at once to be compatible. The prerogative would only suffer if treaties were allowed to emanate from any other origin. But it is just to go beyond that statement. When questions are irrevocably settled by negotiators at a blow, Sovereigns can have no voice in their conclusion.

Now, Sir, treaties of this kind are made purely by the negotiators, but these men are always ready to invoke the sovereign power, the royal prerogative, and while ordinary every-day ministers making the treaty they are always prepared to throw the cloak of royalty around their shoulders and thus protect themselves from the consequences of their errors and failures.

PRIVATE BILLS.

REVILLON FRERES TRADING COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 158) to incorporate the Revillon Frères Trading Company, Limited.—Mr. Devlin.

On section 10,

Mr. FIELDING. I think the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) suggested that this clause should stand over for consideration. I understand that the solicitor of the company has seen that hon. gentleman, and that the amended clause as prepared by the law clerk of the House is satisfactory to him.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Does he say that there is no objection to directors voting by proxy?

Mr. FIELDING. This is practically a foreign company, the chief controllers of which will be in France. The case is exceptional, and in this case, according to those who have studied the Bill, there is no objection.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). It is an unheard-of principle of law in any portion of the British Empire to allow a director to vote by proxy. A director is a trustee for the shareholders, and, if so, how can he delegate his trusteeship to another? The thing is absurd. I think the Bill had better stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The solicitor of the company explained the matter to me, and unless this authority is given the actual owners of the company would have no voice in its management. They live in Paris, and they carry on a very large business in many parts of the world. While this provision is exceptional, the circumstances are exceptional, and I cannot see that any harm would come from giving them this power, because they are the shareholders as well as constituting two of the directors.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that the chief objection is that it would be establishing a bad precedent. Probably next session some one or more companies will come and ask the same thing, and you cannot well deny it to them when you have given it to another. It is by such unfortunate means that we get into our awkward plights in regard to the powers that we give to companies.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am afraid that it might be taken as a precedent; yet it might be very convenient at times for members of parliament who are directors of companies to be able to send a proxy to a friend to vote at meetings of directors. I could never make up my mind that it was regular. I think we had better have the opinion of some men who are better informed than we are, than I am at least, as to the legality of it, and as to the propriety of it. Can any precedent be furnished? I do not like it myself.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is no question about the legality of it if we choose to make it legal.

Mr. HENDERSON. Possibly I may be wrong in questioning the legality of it, because what the Dominion parliament says is law, even though it should be a reciprocity pact; but it is not always right. I would like to have a little more light on this.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. member in charge of this Bill, in some observations yesterday, stated with regard to this clause:

> We have tried to follow as closely as possible the wording of section 9 of the Act to incorporate the Alberta Railway and Coal Company.

I would infer from that remark that he had a precedent for it. However, the hon. gentleman is not here, and I have no desire to see the Bill pressed if there is any doubt about it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think it would be well to let the Bill stand over. It will come up again on Friday, and in the meantime let some one look up that Bill and see if that is the case.

Mr. FIELDING. There are naturally objections to directors voting by proxy. The other side of the question is that in an exceptional case like this, if it is desirable to encourage foreign capital, we must sometimes adapt ourselves to the conditions under which it is offered. Of course, an exceptional case would have to be shown to justify exceptional treatment.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). My objection is that if we continue this, we may have the Standard Oil Company coming here asking for a charter to be allowed to carry on their business over long-distance phone, and that sort of thing. This company is not entitled to any privileges more than any other company. It is simply a great big fur combine, and it chooses to do business in Canada, but it is not any more entitled to do business in Canada than any ordinary trader. The business it carries on in Canada it carries on in competition with Canadians. It carries on a general grocery and dry goods and every other kind of business in opposition to Canadians. If this company wants to do business in this country, let them come here and do it.

Progress reported.

SAULT ST. LOUIS LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY.

House went into committee on Bill (No. 214) respecting the Sault St. Louis Light and Power Company.—Mr. Bickerdike.

On section 1,

Mr. BICKERDIKE. This is simply the extension of a charter granted years ago. There was some doubt as to whether the money expended on engineering entitled the company to be still in existence, and we are asking to have its powers continued another term.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Are they operating under a public franchise?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. No, they have not started yet. They get their water-power from the Lachine rapids. They cannot begin work until the Governor in Council approves their plans.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Nobody is seized with the facts connected with this Bill. It seems to be an important measure, and we should have an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. The only thing we ask is to continue the old charter.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). It may not be in the public interest to continue the old charter on the same conditions?

Mr. HENDERSON

Mr. BICKERDIKE. The Bill came from the Senate, and was on the Order Paper yesterday, and the day before. At this late day, my hon. friend should not try to block it. It was threshed out in the Senate the last two weeks, and he has had ample time to examine it.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Does this Bill go from this committee to the Private Bills Committee?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. It has been through that stage.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I have no desire to block it, but want some information. I would like to see the original Act. If my point is well taken, I desire to object to the Bill being proceeded with, because it is not on to-day's Order Paper.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. By order of the House we are in committee on the Bill and consequently the point is taken too late.

Mr. SPROULE. A motion was made that it be put on the orders to-day, as recommended by the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. FIELDING. That is exactly how the matter stands.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I would like to have the Bill assented to before we leave on Friday.

Mr. HENDERSON. Are we going to leave on Friday?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I cannot answer for the leader of the House, but I hope so.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Was any objection taken to the Bill before the Senate committee, or the Committee of the House by any one?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. It passed unanimously without amendment anywhere.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have the statute of 1903 and I think that section 7 is the important section, because it is the one that gives the powers to the company. It is as follows:

7. The company may:

(a) Manufacture, use, supply and dispose of electricity, water and gas, and water, hydraulic, compressed air, or other power, by means of poles, wires, cables, pipes, conduits, machinery or other appliances; and construct, maintain and operate works, machinery and plant for the production, sale and distribution thereof, and for the purposes aforesaid may acquire lands by purchase, lease or otherwise; construct, acquire, use, maintain and operate canals, water-courses, raceways and water-powers in or adjacent to the Lachine rapids, in and upon Ile au Heron, Ile au Diable, and adjacent islands in the St. Lawrence river; and construct dams, wing-dams, sluices, conduits and buildings in connection therewith; and connect by bridge or bridges the island known as Ile au Heron with the north and south shores of the St. Lawrence river and Ile au Diable with the south shore of the said river: Provided, that the works hereby authorized shall not be commenced until the plans thereof have first been submitted to and approved of by the Governor in Council.

Now I think that my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike) ought to inform the committee as to the location of 'Ile au Héron and Ile au Diable and adjacent islands in the St. Lawrence,' and what would be involved in the power to construct dams in that locality. I am not sufficiently familiar with the St. Lawrence at that point to know the facts.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) can explain the Bill better than any of us. Ile au Héron is a small island near the north shore near the channel where the Lachine power is at the present time. The same company owns the island, and they simply want to construct works there. Also they have taken power to build a bridge subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. This is in the Lachine rapids on the north shore and does not interfere in any way with the channel.

Mr. MONK. I am sorry I am here, because I would like for my part to advance a Bill that is in the hands of my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike). But I must confess that I am not very favourably impressed with what I have just heard read. This is the most valuable water-power within a short distance of Montreal, as my hon. friend knows, and this charter is one without conditions, with none of the safeguards which within the last few years we have found it necessary to provide. There is nothing about rates, but there are powers to build dams there; and what I heard the minister read from the statute is very, very grave indeed. I really would like to ask my hon. friend to delay this Bill so that we may take cognizance of these powers that we are renewing. For my part it seems to me that the interests of the city of Montreal in this matter are sufficiently great that we should examine carefully every section of this Bill before we pass it.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. The reason I mentioned the name of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is that he scrutinized the sections very closely when the Bill was going through, and raised quite a number of objections, and every one was struck out. He must remember the circumstance.

Mr. MONK. In 1903?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. And the question here is merely whether the company should get an extension of powers. We are giving it every day to other companies. The company is not asking for new powers.

Mr TAYLOR (Leeds). Perhaps you got too many as it is?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Then, why give them to anybody else?

Mr. MONK. In that connection, the powers that this parliament granted to the Lachine Hydraulic Company whose works are on this side of the island were altogether exorbitant. They would not be listened to for five minutes in the House to-day. I do not know when that charter was granted. I believe it was under the previous government. But we have progressed since then. At the last sitting of the Conservation Commission in Quebec we sanctioned certain principles which, I think, would meet with the approval of the House if we could get to the Bill which consecrates the principle. But we, in this instance, are asked to place in a private Bill what amounts to a violation of the principles enunciated by the Conservation Commission and almost, one might say, sanctioned by the government. I have no idea of blocking the Bill or of interfering with my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike) as he knows. But here we are in Montreal threatened with a great electric monopoly. We welcome a company such as the hon. gentleman is trying to bring into existence, but we cannot surround the prolongation of the powers of this company with too much care. We must act with the greatest care if we do not want to make Montreal the most expensive city electrically in Canada, notwithstanding that we are surrounded with water-powers on all sides.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I do not think the promoter of this Bill should proceed with it without referring it back to the Standing Committee to have the usual safeguard inserted. The Bill is not on the Order Paper to-day and consequently escaped the attention of hon. members. It is a very dangerous Bill. Clause 1 repeals section 14 of the existing Act, and section 14 sets a time limit within which the works must be completed. The effect of this repeal would be to give the company a perpetual charter. It is a most dangerous piece of legislation, yet it would have gone through the House in two or three minutes had not members on this side taken objection. I have my views as to whether the House should grant such a charter or renew the rights under the Act. If they have not proceeded with the work in time, they should forfeit their rights and this water-power should revert to the public. But, in any case the usual safeguards should be put in the Bill for the protection of the public. I would suggest that the promoter should ask that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, that the Bill may be referred to the Standing Committee. It is a most remarkable thing that the Minister of Public Works has not had cognizance of these matters, for, as I understand, this will interfere with navigation and that surely should be brought to his attention. He should not allow a Bill of this kind to reach this stage without at least the ordinary safeguards.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I have no objection to the Bill being left over, but I want to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Sharpe, Ontario) that there is no navigation any where near the place referred to in this Bill.

Mr. LENNOX. The navigation is in getting the Bill through.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Yes. As the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has asked it, I have no objection to allowing the Bill to stand over. I do not want anything that is not given to others. At the same time, I do not think that hon. members should pick on this Bill, simply because I am introducing it, and try to block it. Everybody else can come here and get extensions of time—which we give them every day, and the hon. member (Mr. Sharpe, Ontario) knows it and supports it. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. REID (Grenville). As I understand the location, the purpose is to run a dam from one island to another, and probably to the main shore. The government, of course, control the water. Will the company be subject to any charge by the government for the use of the water-power?

Mr. BICKERDIKE. This parliament has no rights there. The Quebec legislature has control of what is known as the water rights, and we shall have to buy from the Quebec government.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I understood from the Minister of Public Works in a previous discussion that the bed of the river belonged to the province, but that the water belonged to the government; they control the waters of the St. Lawrence river. Does the Minister of Public Works admit that the Quebec government control both the bed of the river and the water that runs in it in the province of Quebec?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think under our present legislation known as the Navigable Waters Protection Act, before any works can be constructed in any part of the St. Lawrence river the plans must be filed with the Minister of Public Works and approval of them be obtained. I do not think, because there happens to be a rapid in a navigable river, which is navigable water both above and below the rapid, that just at that particular point the river ceases to be navigable water. I think under the Navigable Waters Protection Act this government would have control. But these are matters which might very well be considered in committee. I understand that the promoter of the Bill intends, when Mr. Speaker is in the Chair, to move that it be referred to the Committee on Private Bills.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Is it the policy of the government to allow important water-rights to be alienated without some compensation, some charge for the use of the horse-power? This is practically reviving an old charter. Our conception of these rights has entirely changed the last few years, and surely a company should not receive important rights of this kind to develop an enormous horse-power for the purpose of merchandise, without compensating the government, as they do in the United States. Has the government any policy in connection with this matter?

Mr. NESBITT. I do not like to interfere in the discussion, but there is a motion that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I move that the Bill be referred to the Private Bills Committee for further consideration.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I move in amendment that it be referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. This Bill really deals with waters that are involved in canal privileges, and in my opinion a Bill of this nature, dealing with a public franchise in water, should go to the Railway Committee.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. If it is the desire of the House that it should go to the Railway Committee I have no objection, but it came from the Private Bills Committee. I move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 215) for the relief of Wm. Francis Currie.—Mr. Pardee.

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS TREATY

House resumed consideration of Bill (No. 36) relating to the establishment and expenses of the International Joint Commission under the Waterways Treaty of January 11, 1909.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). When the House rose at six o'clock I was engaged in reading some remarks by Lord Campbell on the question whether treaties should be laid before parliament before they are ratified by the ambassadors. Unfortunately it is rather dull for the House to listen to extracts of this kind, but in order to support my argument I think it essential that these should be placed upon 'Hansard,' as we may have occasion to discuss this matter again. I will now continue:

So long as they are forced to wait for parliamentary adhesion, a salutary influence may often be asserted by a Sovereign, informed on foreign policy and anxious for the honour of the country. By what goes on at present, courts and parliaments are simultaneously mocked. The last fear of scruple, it may be, perhaps, essential to remove, is connected with a view that flagrant innovation is demanded. Innovation as to detail there might be; but there would not, in point of fact, be any as to principle. The principle was long ago conceded. There is no class of treaties which it is more critical and delicate to expose to parliamentary discussion than those by which a war is ended. They give rise to passions the most various, and debates the most entangled. It may become necessary, with a view to justify the terms, to explain the decline of credit, the dissipation of resources, the misconduct of allies, the rottenness of vessels, and bring forward many other topics which prudence would avoid, and dignity, in some degree, recoil from. Much stronger argument may be advanced against parliamentary revision of treaties which lead to peace, than of those which pave the way for arbitration. But on treaties which conclude a war, since 1688, what has been the method usually adopted? As regards the first, that of Ryswick, the records are too scanty to determine. On that of Utrecht, which succeeds, materials are only too abundant. Lord Bolingbrooke, its celebrated author, has left undying pages on the subject. Preliminary articles were brought before both Houses, and so important was it deemed to gain the concurrence of this House that a dozen Peers were called into existence to secure it—this part of history can scarcely have escaped Her Majesty's government. The Peace of 1748 does not appear to have been conducted in this manner. Complaints were made in parliament about it. It was allowed to be the ignominious end of an unnecessary contest. The peace which followed the Seven Years' War in 1761-2, was brought with every possible solemnity before the Houses of that period. Lord Chatham, at that time Mr. Pitt, who had resigned, left a sick bed on purpose to oppose it. He took that course, it may be well supposed, not to execute a medical injunction, or to raise his credit as an orator, but, in the midst of pain and risk, to induce the House of Commons, if he could, to reject the preliminary articles. The Peace of 1783, which closed the struggle with America, was no less formally submitted to the legislature. Not only did debates occur—not only were they followed by divisions, but the government of Lord Shelburne was outvoted, and another set of public men required to negotiate. The beginning of the century was marked by the Peace of Amiens. Preliminary articles were brought before the Houses, against which Mr. Windham took the opportunity of delivering a speech, with which his face is, in a great degree, identified. The same process was repeated in 1814 and 1815. I am forced to hurry over it, that I may not exhaust the patience of the House. But the abilities of such men as Sir James MacKintosh and Mr. Hormer were brought to bear on criticism of the treaties before, not after they were sanctioned. In 1856, after the Crimean War, I readily admit that parliament was not consulted in that method, but that circumstance can hardly be accepted as an argument against the present motion. It merely indicates a tendency to overlook and to encroach on the authority which parliament enjoyed down to 1815, and which your Lordships are invited to restore as regards the class of treaties most in want of vigilant solicitude at present.

About the same time a motion was brought forward by Mr. Sinclair Aytoun in the House of Commons as follows:

In the opinion of this House, all treaties with foreign powers ought to be made conditionally on the approval of parliament, as was done in the case of the commercial treaty with France in 1860.

Mr. Aytoun then proceeds to discuss the question, and asked what is the practice. I may say that this applies to this government now that this government has undertaken to make treaties, the line of action outlined in Mr. Aytoun's speech is the identical line followed by our government here. Mr. Aytoun said:

What was the practice always followed by the government in making a treaty? No information was given to the House with regard to these treaty obligations until after they were settled. When a question was asked in the House, they were told that they should wait until the treaty was concluded, and then express their opinion as to the conduct of the government. In accordance with this practice, the Under Secretary for the Colonies declined, a session or so ago, to lay on the table a treaty with Holland before it had been ratified. Then, however, it was too late either to reject a treaty or to obtain any modification of its terms. He maintained that this practice was inconsistent with one of the well-ascertained rights of the people of this country. One of the best known provisions of the Bill of Rights was that all taxation by prerogative was illegal; and it followed that the practice which allowed the government to enter into engagements which would have the effect of imposing an immense amount of taxation on people must be unconstitutional. They were told that the House did maintain its control over foreign treaties, because the ministers were responsible to it; but cases might occur in which it would be impossible for the House to interfere until after a treaty was concluded and ratified. A government which had a large majority in parliament on a domestic question, might not be in harmony with the opinion of the country on questions of foreign policy. They had also had cases where a government did not actually possess a majority of the House; and it was, therefore, possible for a government not having a majority and not supported by the public, to enter into engagements during the recess of the gravest character. The safeguard of ministerial responsibility was perfectly illusory. They were told that the effect of such a change as that which he proposed would be to take the conduct of foreign negotiations out of the hands of Her Majesty's government.

I might add in this connection a schedule of the treaties since that period. The following treaties between Great Britain and foreign powers since 1815, contained articles, the execution of which was made contingent upon their confirmation by the British parliament: On May 19, 1815, a treaty with Russia relating to payment of dividend of Russian-Dutch loan; November 17, 1823, a convention with Austria about loan; November 16, 1831, a convention with Russia about Russian-Dutch loan—continuance of payment; May 7, 1832, the convention with France and Russia relating to Greek loan; August 2, 1839, a convention with France dealing with channel fisheries; May 28, 1852, a convention with France about extradition; January 25, 1855, convention with Sardinia about loan guarantee; June 27, 1855, convention with France and Turkey, relative to guarantee raised by the Sultan; June 3, 1855, a convention with Sardinia relating to loan; January 14, 1857, convention with France about Newfoundland fisheries; March 5, 1864, convention with Prussia relating to the subject of extradition; March 29, 1864, a treaty with France, Russia and Greece relating to Greek loan and pension to the King of the Hellenes; April 30, 1868, convention of Austria, Italy, Turkey, Prussia and France to guarantee loan to complete works on the Danube. There was no special article in the treaty of March 29, 1864, stating the sanction of parliament would be required for its execution, but an Act was passed for that purpose; and in the cases of the convention of May 28, 1852, the convention with France in January, 1857, and the convention with Russia in 1864, parliament exercised its powers and rejected the provisions which were submitted to it.

You will see that in all cases where there is involved a question of territory or war, or the guaranteeing of money, or anything in which taxation is involved in any shape, that very article is always inserted in the treaty, namely, that it requires the affirmation of parliament or parliamentary sanction. In this case we have no such articles, and I think with my hon. leader (Mr. Borden, Halifax), that this treaty, instead of being ratified by the Dominion parliament, should first be ratified by the imperial parliament.

I cannot leave this subject without touching upon another one which, to my mind, is of very serious import. In the old country, in the mother of parliaments, the idea underlying treaty making is altogether different from that which underlies treaty making in any other country. For instance Great Britain has nothing to give in the way of trade privileges or rights, and everything to obtain. Consequently when she asks a treaty, she desires to get all the concessions possible whilst she has none to give, because of her free trade policy.

The idea underlying the principles of parliamentary government in the mother of parliaments, is that parliament does not represent the people; the people have the privilege of sending representatives to parliament, but the principle of representative government does not hold in Britain, and it is entirely an American idea. It is the principle on which the American revolution was fought, and I may say that it prevails in Canada, where we have fought elections on the principle of representative government. In view of the principle of representative government which prevails in Canada, the government of the day have violated that great principle when they sent ambassadors recently to Washington to bring about a trade treaty with the United States. Not only that, but the very men who violated that principle had the hardihood to come into this House and maintain that when they made that treaty they were invested with the royal prerogative and could pledge not only the honour of the cabinet but the honour of the country, and the honour of the British Crown to what they did. They told the House that not a line, or letter or figure in that treaty could be changed.

Mr. KING. What treaty has the hon. gentleman reference to?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I am dealing with treaties generally, and I am pointing out that this government on every occasion it has taken part in treaty-making, especially with the United States, not only violated the principles of representative government, but betrayed the interests of the people.

Mr. KING. I was wondering whether the hon. gentleman was referring to the recent trade agreement as a treaty, or whether he was speaking of something else.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). What is the difference between a treaty and a convention?

Mr. KING. If the hon. gentleman is referring to the recent trade agreement as a treaty, he is entirely mistaken, and he knows it.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The recent trade agreement is a treaty in every sense of the term. It was made subject to concurrent legislation; it was negotiated between representatives of both countries; the President of the United States signed it on behalf of the United States, and I say it is most shameful that this parliament should be wasting its time——

Mr. FIELDING. Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe)—Yes, wasting its time because the two ministers that were sent to Washington did not know anything about treaty-making, and they were humbugged by the President of the United States and buncoed into making a treaty which is no good and which they do not intend to put through, and which is making them the laughing stock of the whole country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are now discussing the Waterways Treaty, and I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to confine the hon. gentleman to that question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman was referring to the trade agreement and the matter of reciprocity as an illustratioin of the principle of making treaties it was in order, but I would ask the hon. gentleman not to carry it further than that.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I am illustrating the manner in which the business of this country has been conducted by our treaty negotiators. In this treaty before us the Hon. Mr. Bryce was the negotiator, and the Minister of Public Works told us that he represented this country as its attorney. There has not been a single occasion when these treaties with the United States come up but what the fear was paramount in the mind of the Canadian negotiators, as one of them said this afternoon, that the United States was the dominant power on this continent. When did the United States become the dominant power on this continent? I tell these gentlemen opposite that the United States never was the dominant power on this continent, and that Great Britain has as many rights on this continent as the United States has.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). The hon. gentleman who used that expression spoke of the dominant sovereignty of the United States in this matter.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The United States is not a sovereignty, but a republic, and they would be the first to repudiate that they are a sovereignty. He said that the United States were the dominant power on this continent, and he said they could do anything they liked here, and he intimated that they could force an unjust principle upon us, and the leader of the House sat there and listened to him. If ever there was an example of members of the Canadian government holding a brief for a foreign country it was to be seen in the House this afternoon. The leader of the government sat silent when that statement was made, and he clearly showed the views of the members of this government that when they go into treaty making with the United States they go in with fear and trembling, they think that Canada is only a small, isolated power and that at any moment the United States can come in and capture this country the same as they are endeavouring to do with Mexico this very minute. I repudiate this idea. Canada is a part of the British Empire, and Britain has ever been ready to take part in her defence as occasion demanded. Great Britain is always ready to see that justice will be done between Canada and the United States or any other country. I said that when these two gentlemen went to Washington to make this trade treaty their knees were shaking under them. When they went down to Albany last spring, and the big stick was held up by the President of the United States, and he threatened the surtax against us, then it was that this Waterways Treaty was forced upon us, and that the rights of Canadian citizens were violated. I claim that this treaty is a violation of the rights of Canadians. Why should not the same just rule prevail as to water rights between two countries side by side, as would prevail as between two private individuals? But here we have gentlemen opposite rising in their seats to-night, evidently holding a brief for the United States in relation to every international question that comes up in this House, and asserting that we have to give away our rights in this matter. Objection was taken to the diversion of the waters of the Rainy river, and the minister interrupted, and said that the commission refused to divert that water, but that the Secretary of War of the United States had given permission to divert all the waters on the American side flowing into the Rainy river, and keep them in American territory. There you have an example of what can be done by the United States. If firm ground had been taken by the Canadian government; if they placed their confidence in the mother country as they should have done, instead of continually endeavouring to break up the confederation of this country, as the leader of the government to-day in this House has done on every occasion, we would have less giving away of Canadian rights. Why, in a few years a Canadian dare not eat his breakfast unless he consults a joint international commission. Every sovereign right which Canada has on this continent will be invaded through the treaty making mania of hon. gentlemen opposite and especially the proxy premier who is the chief offender, and who leads the House to-night.

He is the leading man in trying to get the United States to edge into our affairs. We have a joint commission on waterways, and a joint commission on fisheries; we shall soon have a joint commission on railways. The next thing will be a joint commission on farming, and no one will be able to grow wheat in the Northwest unless he gets the permission of that joint commission. For the first time in a British country, a foreign country has been allowed to interfere with our rights of taxation. Pitt laid down the principle that if you allow a foreign parliament to interfere with your rights of taxation you have allowed it to enter the citadel, and all hope of your country is gone. We have allowed the United States to dictate to us in matters of taxation, and we are allowing it to dictate to us in regard to our water-powers. The Niagara river is dealt with here. At one time the only thing about the Niagara Falls was the scenery and some land, and when a division was made under the old treaty, the United States took all they could take, which was the land. They took all the islands in the river that were worth anything, and they left to us the Horseshoe Fall, which they did not think was valuable; but just as the water becomes valuable, we find them seeking to put this treaty through so that they will get more than their fair share of the water. The House will understand that the Niagara Falls were surveyed by their surveyor, named Hunter, and then they had the gall to come to this commission and say, we have not been able to find that old survey, so we will make a new survey, and we will try to divide the water equally so that we will get more of it than we have now. They first got the islands and the land, and now they want the water as well. You find them acting in the same way in regard to everything. The Americans have never made a treaty with any country that they have kept unless it has been to their advantage. Where did the name reciprocity first occur? They made a treaty with France in the early part of the last century with reference to trading rights in Louisiana, and no sooner had they made it than they tried to hedge and not carry out its provisions. Take the Bulwer-Clayton treaty with regard to ships on the lakes—they are not keeping that. Another treaty said that they could not fortify the Panama canal, and they are not keeping that, but are going to fortify the canal. As a man of war I am a great believer in peace. Every one who knows anything about war must recognize its terrible horrors. None of the gentlemen have ever encountered war or seen anything of its horrors. But, whenever I see any country beginning to preach peace, I have a very strong idea that before long that country is going to be engaged in a great war. Who was the first and principal mover in founding the peace establishment at the Hague? The Czar of Russia; and inside of a year he was involved in the greatest and most sanguinary war in the history of the world—the war with Japan.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I rise to a point of order, but before stating the point, I would like to know whether it would be easier to let the hon. gentleman go on or to stop him. I think he should come down to a discussion of this Bill. Our time is precious, we are approaching the time when we want to adjourn, and the hon. gentleman will surely see the propriety of discussing the merits of this Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The section before the House is to confirm a certain treaty which is in the schedule. I think the hon. gentleman's remarks, while very broad, are entirely along the line of the treaty and treaty-making, and I have not felt that he has transgressed the rule.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Of course, this is not a matter that the Minister of Public Works likes to have any reference made to; but I was referring to the subject of peace in order to point out that the United States at the present moment, while talking of a peace treaty with every other country, has a large army on the borders of Mexico ready to jump the line on ten minutes' notice; and I have no hesitation in saying that if the circumstances do not change in the next few months, there will be a great war between the United States and Mexico, perhaps the greatest war that has ever taken place on this continent. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in making their treaty, have shown themselves afraid of the United States, the dominant power. They know that the United States can take all these water-powers from them. They have gone down on their knees on every occasion when they have had a treaty to make with that country. On every occasion that they have had anything to give away to the United States, they have given it away. If they go on making treaties very much longer, we shall not have any of this country left. Some fine morning we may be told that negotiators have gone to Washington, and have turned over Canada or some of its provinces to the United States, and according to the principle laid down by the government of the day, they have a right to do that, and then come down to this House and say, we have made this treaty, we have given away Alberta and Saskatchewan and Manitoba to the United States, and you have no right to question that, because your ambassadors have pledged the honour of the country that that should be done, and this parliament of Canada has no right to change a letter in that agreement; the only thing it can do is put the government out of office. Carrying out what I said in my opening remarks, I think that before any treaty or bargain of any kind is made with the United States, preliminary articles relative to what is intended to be done should be laid on the table of this House, so that the members of this parliament could discuss them, and give the government of the day the advantage of the knowledge of how it will affect the various constituencies represented here, in order that when the treaty is made, it can be brought to this House, and there will be no objection or opposition to it. I claim that in the pact recently made this country has been betrayed again and again in that respect. Parliament has been made the laughing stock of this whole country. We are kept here for months discussing a treaty of which there is no possible solution. It is a bargain which the Americans, judging by the action of their Senate, have no apparent intention of carrying through. If this government desired to act in a dignified manner, they would have told the United States government that before this country proceeded with any treaty of that character it would be necessary for Congress first to adopt it. We have a precedent in this very treaty, which the United States Congress has already passed before it is submitted to us. For that reason I think this tariff treaty should be dealt with in a similar manner.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. I think the hon. gentleman is now referring to the tariff treaty in a manner not warranted by the circumstances. He may draw an illustration from the tariff arrangement and apply it to this section, but I think he is now reversing that.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I have no intention to transgress the rules, but I wish merely to point out that this treaty, which we are now asked to pass, was passed by the United States Senate and Congress, as will be seen on page 11 of the Bill:

> The above treaty was approved by the United States Senate on the 3rd March, 1909, with the following resolution:
> Resolved, that the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, providing for the settlement of international differences between the United States and Canada, signed on the 11th day of January, 1909.

I claim that that should have been taken as a precedent, and that this House should not have wasted three or four months uselessly discussing a reciprocity treaty which I do not think the United States have any intention of passing. Whenever we go to make any treaties with the United States again, I would suggest that this procedure be followed. If the government desires to maintain its dignity, and the honour of this country, it should proceed at once to withdraw this proposed reciprocity treaty, and follow the procedure given in this Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is again using an argument which I ruled out of order. He has no right to discuss the reciprocity pact on this measure.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Then I shall reverse the argument and say that we are wrong in carrying out this treaty now, that it should not be brought before the House in this manner, but that it should have been passed by this House before it was submitted to the United States Congress. That shows the absurdity of the whole thing. This House, and the whole of Canada has been made a laughing stock by the United States government in order to advance the interests of a vote-seeking President, and a political party whose cause seems to be pretty nearly lost.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I was very much surprised when this Bill was presented by the hon. the Minister of Pubic Works (Mr. Pugsley). If I remember rightly, when the matter was up before in this House, the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who is now leading the House, took the ground that it was not necessary for this House to ratify this treaty. I see him smiling. I suppose he has changed his mind.

Mr. FIELDING. Will my hon. friend be good enough to quote the passage.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I shall look it up in a few minutes. The Minister of Finance has a bad memory sometimes when it suits him. Who made this treaty?

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman can have all the information he can desire about this treaty from my hon. colleague the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Minister of Finance who is leading the House should give more information.

Mr. FIELDING. The Minister of Finance takes a different view.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It is rather strange that the moment we ask for any information from the Minister of Finance, who is leading the House, he gets wrathy. I ask him who made this treaty? Surely some Canadian representative made it? Was it the hon. minister?

Mr. FIELDING. The Minister of Public Works is dealiing with this treaty and will be very happy to answer any questions of a proper character.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The leader of the House should answer these questions.

Mr. FIELDING. He thinks differently.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why does my hon. friend not want to ask me?

Mr. REID (Grenville). I have no objection since the Minister of Finance will not reply. I would like to know what minister of the government had charge of this treaty when it was being negotiated at Washington.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The interests of the Canadian government were looked after by Mr. Gibbons, the chairman of the International Waterways Commission, who was constantly in conference with the British ambassador, and who was assisted by Dr. King and Mr. Campbell, both of the Department of the Interior. On different occasions I went to Washington to render what assistance I could, and the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) also went to render assistance at one stage in the negotiations.

Mr. REID (Grenville). So that the negotiations were practically in the hands of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend wants to draw that inference, he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I want to understand what took place.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have stated exactly what took place.

Mr. REID (Grenville). As I understand it, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Justice are really the two government representatives who had charge of this Bill at Washington. There must have been some one to assume the responsibility because the International Waterways Commission surely would not have the power to negotiate a treaty. If they did negotiate it up to a certain point, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Justice assumed the responsibility. Am I right?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have stated exactly what took place.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I think that the attitude of these two gentlemen is most unfair; and if they want this Bill to go through they will have to change their tactics.

Mr. PUGSLEY. How could I make the matter plainer? I stated who negotiated the treaty, I made reference to the services of the British ambassador in that connection, I stated the part the Minister of Justice and I performed. That is all the information I can give my hon. friend, and on reflection he will see that is all he could ask me to give. I intended no discourtesy, but answered fully and frankly.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Did the government as a whole delegate the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Justice to negotiate this treaty?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Minister of Justice, when he went to Washington, and I, when I went there, went with the authority of the government.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Then the negotiation of this treaty was practically delegated to the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Justice on behalf of Canada, and they are responsible for the treaty being in its present shape.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The whole government is responsible.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The government assumed the work done by these two gentlemen. What I was trying to find out was whether this treaty, as it now stands, is in the same form as was arranged between the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Justice on behalf of the Canadian government. Will the Minister of Public Works reply?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think I can give my hon. friend any more information.

Mr. REID (Grenville) What I am surprised at is this: This Bill has been before the House some time. I think the original Bill was Bill (No. 36) with only three clauses in it, and at that time the point was raised as to whether the commission would have power to decide certain questions regarding water-powers on the St. Lawrence. There was also a question as to the ratification of this treaty by parliament. The ground was then taken that the treaty did not require to be ratified by this parliament; yet to-day, just when the minister wishes to pass this Bill, down it comes in a different shape altogether. There are men not now in this House who were here a few days ago and very anxious about this Bill, but they took it for granted that the Bill submitted originally was the only one that would come before this House. They have no opportunity of studying this Bill, and the effect of the changes that have been made in it. This is practically a new Bill, and the government ought not to ask this parliament to ratify it without giving the members an opportunity of seeing what effect these changes will have. I think the Minister of Public Works took the ground that the United States, if they wished, could divert a stream through their own territory into another channel altogether, and we could not interfere.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Always excepting any diversion which would interfere with the navigability of a river.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Take the point at the Long Sault rapids, what effect would it have, supposing they dammed the St. Lawrence river on American territory?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that this treaty would give no authority whatever to dam the St. Lawrence at the Long Sault or anywhere else. The words of this treaty are simply prohibitory, they are not permissive; and in addition to getting the authority of this parliament to construct a dam in the river, the plans would also have to be approved by the Boundary Waters Commission. It does not take away the necessity of first obtaining the authority of parliament.

Mr. REID (Grenville). On the American side they take a different view. The Bill was up in Congress during the last session when the representative of the New York legislature claimed that the New York legislature had the right to dam the St. Lawrence. The House of Representatives passed the Bill, and if it had not been so late in the session the chances are that the Senate would have passed it too. Now what confidence can we have that the United States government will keep faith with Canada in regard to this treaty? If the Bill had passed, how could we have prevented them going on and building the dam on the St. Lawrence? There would have been a Bill passed by the New York legislature, who own the bed of the river and they would have got the Washington Congress to pass a Bill of the same nature. If they had started to build that dam we could not have prevented it unless we had gone to war. Now, what confidence can we have that Washington will keep faith when we make treaties with them? As my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Currie), has shown, they have violated treaties in other cases. As I mentioned the other night, they have violated a treaty in placing war vessels on the Great Lakes, and when there was trouble they simply got the consent of the State government to allow them to go through the canals. This government never objected. During all these years the United States have compelled vessels going from Ottawa to New York to unload on the frontier, while vessels from New York could come right straight through to Ottawa. But as soon as this reciprocity agreement came up, and the fisheries treaty, and the waterways treaty, then the United States government allowed these vessels to go through the canals. I mention these facts to show that the United States government have not in the past kept good faith with us. Now, this treaty, when it is passed, will be entirely in their favour, and Canada will get the worst of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In what respect is it in their favour?

Mr. REID (Grenville). Why, it is in their favour if they can dam the St. Lawrence.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is a big 'if' in your suggestion.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Minister of Public Works was the first man to give it to them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, he was not.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Minister of Public Works stated in this House that he was considering it, and that he would protect Canada's interest by charging some rate, and that the New York State government was to charge $35,000 per annum.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Minister of Public Works knows he did refer to the way he was safe-guarding Canada's interests.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He did not state at all what the hon. gentleman has just said.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Minister of Public Works was considering the advisability of letting this great work go through. Why is the Minister of Public Works so awfully anxious to protect navigation from the Long Sault rapids? The whole navigation east of that is in Canada, there is no part of the St. Lawrence river on the American side from the Long Sault rapids down, it is all in Canada. Now if this treaty goes through, it only requires one of our Canadian commissioners to agree with three American commissioners in order to carry through any proposition that is made in these great waters between Canada and the United States. I have consulted lawyers on this question, and they differ from the Minister of Public Works.

They say they believe that, if this treaty goes through, this International Waterways Commission will have the right to decide. All I want to do is to protect Canadian interests so that they will be beyond dispute. Let us see the position we should be in if they assumed the right and this work went on. In the first place, if a dam were built at the Long Sault rapids, these commissioners agreeing to it, the private corporation would have absolute control of that great work. They build locks there. It is true, they are willing to put in a Bill that the government can control these locks. But then the United States government and the Canadian government jointly control them. If trouble should arise between Canada and the United States, or between Great Britain and the United States, the treaty comes to an end, and, as the locks are on the American side of the river we should not have the control of the navigation that we now have. Or if the dam should break or anything of that kind occur, our canal system would not be in proper shape to take vessels through, because the effect of damming the St. Lawrence would be to raise the water at the head of the Cornwall canal and so our canal system would have to be changed to meet the new conditions. I object to this work going on at the Long Sault rapids because I believe it is going to divert trade to American seaports. For instance, you place the foot of navigation for the Americans down at the Long Sault or at Massena. The distance to Portland is not very great, so that grain trade and other trade could be diverted from Montreal. Again, I object to the whole water-power that might be developed there getting into the hands of a private corporation and practically into the United States. For vested interests will arise, and once these privileges have been given we cannot possibly destroy them. If this treaty were sufficiently protected, if nothing could be done there without this parliament having to agree to it—that is so far as placing any obstruction or dam across the St. Lawrence or alter it in any way—it would certainly remove my objection to the treaty to a very great extent.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say to my hon. friend, he may not take my word for it—that it is made absolutely clear by the treaty that it must be by consent of the Dominion of Canada, and that means the parliament of Canada. Read article 3.

Mr. REID (Grenville). That is the one I had in mind:

It is agreed that, in addition to the uses, obstructions, and diversions heretofore permitted or hereafter provided for by special agreement between the parties hereto, no further or other uses or obstructions or diversions, whether temporary or permanent, of boundary waters on either side of the line, affecting the natural flow level or flow of boundary waters on the other side of the line, shall be made except by authority of the United States or the Dominion of Canada within their respective jurisdictions and with the approval, as hereinafter provided, of a joint commission, to be known as the International Joint Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. So, you must have the double approval, first of the Dominion of Canada and then of the commission.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I have had two or three leading lawyers examine that clause, and they tell me that it might be construed directly opposite to what the Minister of Public Works says.

Mr. PUGSLEY. How did they say it might be construed?

Mr. REID (Grenville). That the commission could decide that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But does it not say: 'The Dominion of Canada'? That does not mean the commission. It adds 'and the commission.'

Mr. REID (Grenville). It does not say that the sanction shall be of this parliament, but of the Dominion of Canada, and this commission that we are appointing will represent the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. REID (Grenville). In other words, it will represent the minister. Certainly I would like to see the clause a little plainer. My attention is called to this clause which reads: 'Shall not be made except by the authorities of the United States or the Dominion of Canada.' The minister said we would have to have the consent of the United States, and the Dominion of Canada. But it says 'or,' and not 'and.'

Mr. PUGSLEY. 'Within their respective jurisdictions.'

Mr. REID (Grenville). But this is practically all in the United States. If you have the consent of one or the other——

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend will pardon me I may be able to make clear my own view. I think it is absolutely clear that the United States cannot do anything which will alter the actual level or flow of boundary waters on the Canadian side except with the authority of the Dominion of Canada, and the approval of the Joint Commission; and Canada can do nothing to alter the actual level or flow of boundary waters on the United States side without the consent of the United States, and of the commission also. So that, so far as the countries are concerned, you must have the two things—you must have the consent of that country and you must have the approval of the Joint Commission.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I will have to leave that to be argued by some person who is better qualified than I am, or by some lawyer who would understand the cause better, but I have heard it argued by lawyers who express a different opinion from that of the Minister of Public Works and who claim that the clause is not clear and that if the Joint Commission did agree to this it would be impossible for us to dispute it. If the minister wishes this to be thoroughly understood, to protect the rights of Canada, and to carry out the promise made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works himself that they would guarantee that this work would not be carried out without first coming to parliament, then I would suggest that he put in another clause——

Mr. PUGSLEY. What is that?

Mr. REID (Grenville). Something like this:

Nothing in this Act nor in the appointment of the commissioners to be appointed by His Majesty pursuant to the said treaty and under this Act shall empower or be interpreted as empowering the commissioners so to be appointed, or the said commission to assent to authorize or approve of the erection or maintenance of any dams, locks or other obstructions in any or all of the channels of the St. Lawrence river mentioned in section 7 of the treaty made between Great Britain and the United States, dated August 9, A.D. 1842, upon either side of the boundary line for any purpose whatsoever, nor shall the said commissioners or said commission be empowered to pass upon or determine nor pass upon or determine the question as to whether or not any proposed dams or locks or other obstructions at said place will or will not either impair or improve navigation.

The minister can see the object of that section.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I regret that I cannot see it in face of the express words of the treaty.

Mr. REID (Grenville). This would be a clause in this Bill. It does not alter the treaty but it expressly tells the commission that in so far as that clause in the Ashburton treaty is concerned, there shall be no misunderstanding between this parliament and these men that we are now appointing. We cannot change the treaty here without going back to Washington. They would have to agree to any change that is made in the wording of the treaty, but this would place beyond doubt what the wishes of parliament are if such a case should come before the commission. Where you find a difference of opinion between leading lawyers in Canada, in so far as the construction which can be placed upon clause 3 is concerned, I cannot see why the Minister of Public Works should object to something being placed in the Bill on the lines I suggest in order to keep this matter perfectly right, and in order that the promise that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works made to this House should be carried out. This question may not come up before the commission within a few months, or if, at any future time, there was a change in the positions of the gentlemen who have given us this promise, this project might go through and we could have no recourse. At all events, I cannot see why the Minister of Public Works should object to placing this parliament in a position that there can be no possible chance of a misunderstanding of that kind occurring. This great work at the Long Sault rapids is not being done for the improvement of navigation. That issue was raised at Washington and those who are proposing this work state that water-power is the first consideration, not navigation. That being the case, why should we interfere with navigation or place it in a secondary position? There is no doubt that the trip down the St. Lawrence and through the rapids is a very important part of our navigation system. It attracts a great many persons, we like to see them and it advertises Canada. In so far as it being necessary to furnish power for the frontier is concerned, I may say that has been taken up by the Hydro-Electric Commission and, as I understand, they are offering a very cheap rate for power along the frontier. Therefore, I think that the objection from the frontier is being overcome.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does my hon. friend know where they are going to get the power?

Mr. REID (Grenville). I understood from the minister who has charge of the Power Commission that there are two, I think three sources. There is one power company that, I think, could supply Kingston at any time and they are trying to negotiate with them now. That is the Seymour Power Company of Trenton. I think that they would come down further if there was a sufficient consumption of power to guarantee the enterprise. There is another large power about to be developed at a place called Calabogie back of Kingston.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have seen something in the papers about getting power from Waddington.

Mr. REID (Grenville). There is that source too.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What would be the effect on the canals of the development of power there?

Mr. REID (Grenville). None whatever. It would not affect the river at all.

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. member from Dundas (Mr. Broder) asked me two or three weeks ago to lay on the table of the House a report which had been ordered some weeks before with regard to this matter. In my absence it was laid on the table of the House, and I have only had an opportunity of casually looking it over, but the opinion seemed to be very strong that it would affect the Morrisburg canal very much if they developed as much power there as they are talking about.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Of course, the Minister of Railways and Canals knows that section well. The only way it could affect it, I suppose, would be that it would make more water.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It would increase the discharge and draw more water away from the other part of the river.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I would like to know how it could affect it.

Mr. GRAHAM. I remember discussing this question with the engineer. He calculates that it would reduce the water on the sill at the head of the Morrisburg canal one inch for every thousand horse-power developed at Waddington. It is a low head and they would have to make their dams in a way that would draw off a great volume of water from the main channel into the little river in order to develop power and this would decrease the depth on the sill. I do not know anything about it personally.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Who is the principal owner of the power at Waddington?

Mr. REID (Grenville). Mr. Allison.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He is the gentleman who appeared in New York in opposition to the other one?

Mr. REID (Grenville). He is the gentleman who appeared in New York. I was under the impression it would raise the water at the head of the canal because it would dam it back. However, I am not going to argue against the engineer.

Mr. GRAHAM. Look at the report; I do not know anything about it personally.

Mr. REID (Grenville). But it strikes me that it would have a very decided effect. That being so, if the dam were built at the Long Sault rapids it would take the water away from the Cornwall canal altogether.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It depends altogether on your flume and upon the depth to which you can draw the water.

Mr. REID (Grenville). If it acts that way at Waddington it will have the same effect at the Cornwall canal and draw the water from the head of that canal, and our canal system at Cornwall, on which we spent so much money, will be spoiled. We can now run a steamer from Kingston to Montreal altogether in Canadian waters, but if these locks are built we will be going through the American lock, and while there is no objection to that so long as everything is all right, yet you cannot tell when something will happen, and then there will be trouble. I urge strongly that the consent of parliament shall be obtained before anything is done in this matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the law now; no such plan can be approved without the authority of parliament.

Mr. REID (Grenville). When other gentlemen of high legal repute give an opinion to the contrary, is it not well to make it sure?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What legal gentleman has given a contrary opinion?

Mr. REID (Grenville). I do not wish to mention names, but there are able lawyers in Canada who hold that the clause is not clear, and that if the commission decided to place a dam there it would be difficult for the government to interfere. I do not belittle the opinion of the Minister of Justice or the Minister of Public Works, but lawyers, like doctors, differ. What objection can there be to the clause I suggest?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will the hon. gentleman send it over to me?

Mr. REID (Grenville). If the opinion of the Minister of Public Works is right, the insertion of this clause can do no harm, and it will remove any doubt there may arise in the mind of the commission. The promoters of this great scheme will no doubt be back here for legislation, and it is this parliament which should decide whether they will proceed with the work or not. This clause simply gives effect to the understanding announced by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Public Works in this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would like to oblige my hon. friend, but I would not like to put ourselves on record as doing a very foolish and very unnecessary thing.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). You do that often.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The less we do of it the better.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). You do it so often that really it does not make much difference.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The clause my hon. friend wants inserted is as follows:

> Nothing in this Act nor in the appointment of the commissioners to be appointed by His Majesty pursuant to the said treaty and under this Act shall empower or be interpreted as empowering the commissioners so to be appointed, or the said commission to assent to authorize or approve of the erection or maintenance of any dams, locks or other obstructions in any or all of the channels of the St. Lawrence river mentioned in section 7 of the treaty made between Great Britain and the United States, dated August 9, A.D. 1842, upon either side of the boundary line for any purpose whatsoever, nor shall the said commissioners or said commission be empowered to pass upon or determine nor pass upon or determine the question as to whether or not any proposed dams or locks or other obstructions at said place will or will not either impair or improve navigation.

If the latter part of that clause were adopted the commissioners would be absolutely powerless to approve or disapprove even if parliament had granted the necessary authority to erect any works in boundary water. Anyway the clause is entirely unnecessary because at last session of parliament, to make assurance doubly sure, even after the Prime Minister had made the statement that the government would not consent to any plans for the obstruction of the St. Lawrence river by erecting a dam therein without first having the approval of parliament, section 12, chapter 166, 1910, was enacted.

Mr. DOHERTY. That is exclusively with regard to the authorizing of works upon our side of the river. It has nothing to do with works upon the American side.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Quite so. As to works on the American side of the river, we have, of course, no authority outside of the authority given by this treaty, and in this treaty is the safeguard.

Mr. DOHERTY. What in the opinion of the hon. minister is the safeguard?

Mr. PUGSLEY. So far as Canada is concerned, we have the absolute provision that no works by way of dams, or other obstructions shall be erected in the St. Lawrence without the plans being first submitted to, and approved of by parliament. As to anything that may be done on the American side of the line, as it might affect the rights of the other country, article 3 provides:

It is agreed that, in addition to the uses, obstructions, and diversions heretofore permitted or hereafter provided for by special agreement between the parties hereto, no further or other uses or obstructions or diversions, whether temporary or permanent, of boundary waters on either side of the line, affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters on the other side of the line, shall be made except by authority of the United States or the Dominion of Canada within their respective jurisdictions and with the approval, as hereinafter provided, of a joint commission, to be known as the International Joint Commission.

I cannot conceive of language which would be more prohibitory than that. In other words, these two countries agree that there shall be no obstructions of any kind or description placed in these boundary waters which will affect the natural level, or flow of the water upon the other side of the line without the consent of the country in which such natural level or flow would be affected, or without the approval of this International Joint Commission. Under these circumstances, I could not ask the committee, with any reason, to accept the amendment which my hon. friend proposes. It is not necessary, as all interests are safeguarded by the treaty.

Mr. MACDONELL (South Toronto). I think there can be no two opinions as to the meaning of article 3. The effect of it and of the whole treaty, as I interpret it, is this. The boundary waters are waters in common. The waters that flow on the American side of the boundary line are in American territory, and those that flow on the Canadian side are in Canadian territory. Each party has an easement in the waters of the other for the treaty purposes. What article 3 says is simply this: no uses, obstructions or diversions of water shall take place on either side of the river without the consent, first, of the country in which such uses, obstructions or diversions are to be created, or without also the consent of the commission. According to the minister's interpretation, it would not be necessary to get the consent of the country in which the use or obstruction or diversion takes place.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Article 3 proceeds on the theory that each country, so far as its own territory is concerned, can legislate, but it also expressly provides that neither country shall authorize the construction of works in its territory which would alter the flow or level of the water in the adjoining country without the consent of that country, or without the consent also of the International Joint Commission. That is clear. He who runs may read and understand that and there cannot be any doubt.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). It is quite obvious that article (3) does not require the consent of both countries, the consent of one is sufficient provided the commission also gives its consent. Suppose an obstruction be created on the American side——

Mr. PUGSLEY. It must be a work authorized by that country.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). Then the consent of that country is the only consent needed, since article (3) only requires the consent of one country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. You get the consent of the country in which the water level is being altered.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). You must have the authority of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada and the consent of the commission, so that if the minister be right, the consent of the country on whose side the obstruction is to be created would not require to be secured. That is obviously absurd. There is no provision requiring the consent of both countries. If the minister be right in saying that you must have the consent of the country on whose side the water is raised, you do not require the consent of the country on whose side the obstruction is being created.

Mr. DOHERTY. There is absolutely no doubt that the interpretation of my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) is the only one possible of this section. I feel perfectly warranted in saying this because I can cite the express declaration of a lawyer for whose opinion, I am sure, the Minister of Public Works will have much greater respect than he can possibly have for mine or that of my hon. friend, I refer to the Minister of Justice. On the 2nd of February, page 2970, the Minister of Justice said:

Surely both can well stand together, the Ashburton treaty securing equal freedom for purposes of navigation—that is, freedom equally to the inhabitants of one country and those of the other country—in the river which constitutes the boundary, and the recent treaty providing that no new obstruction shall be put anywhere along that river on either side of the line which will have the effect of raising the level on the other side of the line, except: First, with the authority of the government of the country in which the obstruction is to be placed, and, second, with the approval of the International Joint Commission. Now, that language, I say, implies that the government of each country has the right to authorize, if it sees fit, such an obstruction as will alter the level on the other side of the line, and that obstruction, when it has been authorized by the proper government, must also receive the approval of the International Joint Commission before it can be permitted —the two things must concur. The language implies that there is a right, without any infraction of treaty obligations, on the part of either Canada or the United States to authorize such obstruction as may affect the level on the other side of the boundary if, in the judgment of the legislature of Canada or the United States, such obstruction is desirable. Now, we have a proposition in the Congress of the United States to authorize such an obstruction. It is entirely within their legal right; they are not infringing upon any treaty obligation by entertaining that proposition. But, if they see fit to authorize it, then, if it will affect the level on the Canadian side of the boundary, it must receive the approval of the International Joint Commission before it can be permitted. That is an additional safeguard which we have secured by entering into this recent treaty.

I asked the Minister of Public Works what was the safeguard which the treaty gave us, and I understood him to say our safeguard was that our parliament had to authorize the creation of an obstruction on the American side. Evidently he and the Minister of Justice do not agree. The only safeguard we can have is that which the treaty gives us, and I do not think it gives us that which the Minister of Public Works says it does. The only safeguard it does give, in cases where it does apply, is the consent of the International Commission which must be obtained after the country on whose side the obstruction is created authorizes that obstruction. So that the country on whose side the level of the water is altered by the obstruction created on the opposite side has no voice in the matter but has to depend on the ruling of the Joint Commission. If anything more is wanted than the words of the first paragraph of the section, we need only read the second paragraph which makes it clear that if there be no interference with the flow of water on the other side, either country may go on and construct whatever works it thinks necessary for the improvement of navigation or other purposes mentioned in that section without the consent of the commission. The Joint Commission therefore has only warrant to interfere in cases when the obstruction created on the one side alters the level of the water on the other. But there is absolutely nothing to entitle the parliament of Canada to be consulted and required to authorize works to be built on the American side. The wording of the section leaves no possible doubt:

It is agreed that, in addition to the uses, obstructions, and diversions heretofore permitted or hereafter provided for by special agreement between the parties hereto, no further or other uses or obstructions or diversions, whether temporary or permanent, of boundary waters on either side of the line, affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters on the other side of the line, shall be made except by authority of the United States or the Dominion of Canada within their respective jurisdictions.

That is to say, if you are going to make any use or obstruction, the United States must authorize those that are made within its jurisdiction and Canada must authorize those that are made within its jurisdiction. That is, the agreement of the United States with Canada is that it shall be made by the United States and not by the state of New York or any other authority. We undertake on our side that nothing shall be done by any authority other than that of the Dominion of Canada. And the protection of either party so far as the level of the water is concerned, is in the Joint Commission. But, if there be any possible doubt as to what the first paragraph means, the second paragraph makes it absolutely clear:

The foregoing provisions are not intended to limit or interfere with the existing rights of the government of the United States, on the one side, and the government of the Dominion of Canada, on the other, to undertake and carry on governmental works in boundary waters for the deepening of channels, the construction of breakwaters, the improvement of harbours, and other governmental works for the benefit of commerce and navigation, provided that such works are wholly on its own side of the line and do not materially affect the level or flow of the boundary waters on the other, nor are such provisions intended to interfere with the ordinary use of such waters for domestic and sanitary purposes.

It seems to me that makes it absolutely clear that, as regards this question of damming the channels at the Long Sault, in the first place it is absolutely untenable to say that that clause has one word which requires authorization by this parliament of constructions in any of these portions of the channels that are on the American side—and the two channels which are governed by the Ashburton treaty are practically entirely on the American side;—and, in the second place, that it is absolutely untenable to say that this Waterways Commission has one word to say about it unless the level of the water on our side is affected, but that if that water could be dammed in these two channels and these two channels blocked without altering the level of the water on the Canadian side, not even the commission would have a word to say about it, and, so far as this treaty is concerned, the American government might do just as it pleased. But, as I understand him, the hon. minister contends that this treaty requires both the assent of our parliament and the assent of the Waterways Commission, and provides that with these two things this damming operation could be carried on lawfully by the United States. It seems to me that, even if that interpretation be erroneous, as I think with all due respect it is in so far as attributing any right in our parliament to speak in opposition to doing that, and even if it be not sound to say that in that case apart from the question of affecting the level of the water, the consent of the Waterways Commission would be required, and, being given, would be sufficient,—yet because that interpretation is put upon it, it behooves this parliament which is called upon to ratify this treaty, to say whether or not it is willing to enact the legislation without repudiating that interpretation—Now I understand, the minister says, that the enactment of this amendment may be a useless and foolish thing. There might be a great deal of force in that if the minister were not asking us if that interpretation be clearly right or clearly wrong to do the useless and foolish thing of ratifying the treaty, over which we have no power. The treaty is in force, and has been in force for two years, as the Minister of Justice told us; and yet parliament is seriously sitting here to-night to ratify, sanction and approve it. It seems to me that that is at least as foolish and useless a thing as putting in this proviso, which is only useless and foolish if it has no effect. Now, to my mind, this treaty does not give to the Waterways Commission, which is created under it, any powers whatever to consent to the damming of these two channels. The government which is presenting this Bill to us tells us that it does, and we are asked to ratify and confirm it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Surely my hon. friend is in error. I never made such a statement, that the treaty gives the commission power to authorize the obstruction of the river. I said it must be by the authority of parliament and the commission.

Mr. DOHERTY. If the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) should happen to be wrong and the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) should happen to be right——

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the hon. member will pardon me: The minister and my hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) both, I think, agree that, at all events, so far as the Canadian side is concerned as to any obstructions being placed in the river, that must be with the consent of parliament.

Mr. DOHERTY. Undoubtedly. But we are not in danger, at present at all events, of obstruction on our side of the river. That is not the question which presents itself.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the question brought up by the member for Grenville (Mr. Reid).

Mr. DOHERTY. I understood that hon. member to say that what he was anxious about was the proposed damming of the two channels referred to in the Ashburton treaty; and the amendment makes that clear, because it provides that nothing in this Act or in the appointment of these men, shall be interpreted as affecting the rights of Canada under the Ashburton Treaty. The rights of Canada under the Ashburton Treaty are rights in channels on the American side—we do not need the Ashburton treaty to give us rights on our own side. What we want to preserve is the rights, such as they may be, which we have in these two channels, and what the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) seeks to do by his amendment is to make it absolutely clear, that, at all events so far as this legislation is concerned, it is not intended to modify those rights nor affect them in any way. Now, one of two things is true: Either this new waterways treaty has wiped out our rights under the Ashburton treaty and substituted these provisions for the Ashburton treaty, or it has not produced that effect. If it does produce that effect, and if under this treaty the assent of the commission is sufficient to authorize and make binding on Canada works constructed by the authority of the American government in these channels, of course we cannot alter the situation, and the amendment of the hon. member for Grenville does not undertake to alter that. But what it undertakes to do is to provide that this legislation which we are passing now, shall not alter that situation.

Now, I think, in view of the interpretation put upon the treaty by the minister, of Justice the desirability of that amendment becomes perfectly clear, unless parliament wishes by this legislation to enact that the commission should have power to bind Canada, by recognizing the right of the American government to authorize the blocking of these two channels, so far as they are in American waters, and they are practically altogether in American waters. The purpose of the amendment is to guard against the effect being attributed to our ratification of this treaty, and our ratification of this treaty coming on top of the opinion of the Minister of Justice, that under this treaty the proposed damming of these two channels, if assented to by this Waterways Commission, would be binding on Canada. It is to guard ourselves against the effect of such an interpretation as given by the Minister of Justice. We have ratified the treaty but we do not intend that this ratification should be invoked in support of the contention that that is a proper interpretation, and that these commissioners have this authority. The purpose of the amendment is to make perfectly clear that the power of the commissioners should be just exactly what it would be under the treaty, but nothing additional should come to them by reason of the enactment of this statute. It is a measure of precaution. But at the same time, the interpretation that has been put upon the treaty, and our proceeding in face of that interpretation, without a word of explanation, to ratify it, would put a strong argument in the mouth of those who would have an interest in urging that by this legislation, and by the appointment of the commissioners to be made under it, we were confiding to them in toto all the voice that Canada may ever have with regard to damming these two channels. If the interpretation of the minister should happen to be wrong, the amendment will at least serve this purpose, it will make clear that parliament, in enacting this ratification, does not intend to adopt the opinion of the Minister of Justice and give it statutory effect, and is not handing over this particular matter to this commission, and giving them the whole power to speak for Canada. If the opinion of the Minister of Justice be the correct interpretation, notwithstanding that amendment to the statute, these gentlemen will have that power under the treaty. For my part it does not seem to me that the treaty itself gives to these gentlemen of the commission any power to deal with the question of the obstruction of these two channels. The purpose of the control that is given to these gentlemen is to put them in a position to prevent works on one side of the river which raise the level of water on the other side; that is their entire function. What is in view in conferring this power, I think, is the protection of the country on the side of the river opposite to that where the obstructions are made, from alterations in the level of the water. There is no purpose of protecting the rights of the country on the other side in the navigation of the channels. Manifestly the power of the commissioners is limited to judging cases where the level of the water opposite the side where the obstruction has been created, is altered, and does not extend to determining to what extent the rights of navigation on the part of one party may be affected by the construction made upon the other side. This is made clear by the preamble of this treaty which says what the purpose of the treaty itself is. The purpose of the treaty is clearly not to alter any situations which are settled and fixed by previous treaties. I need not say that there is no safer guide to correct interpretation than that which is set forth in the preamble of the Bill. What is the purpose of this treaty? The preamble tells us that.

> His Majesty, the King and the United States of America, being equally desirous to prevent disputes regarding the use of boundary waters and to settle all questions which are now pending between the United States and the Dominion of Canada involving the rights, obligations, or interests of either in relation to the other or to the inhabitants of the other along their common frontier, and to make provision for the adjustment and settlement of all such questions as may hereafter arise, have resolved to conclude a treaty in furtherance of these ends.

That is to regulate the uses of the water and to determine all questions which are now pending between the two countries. It cannot be contended that at the time of the enactment of this treaty there was any pending question with regard to the free and open navigation of these two channels. That question had been absolutely settled and concluded by the terms of the Ashburton treaty which dealt expressly and specifically with these two particular channels and created the rights of Canada in them. So, I say it is clear that there are limitations put upon the power of these commissioners under which that power is to be exercised only in cases where the flow of water is affected and clear, from the purposes for which this treaty was entered into, that the treaty was not intended to and does not alter the express provisions in the Ashburton treaty in regard to navigation; and not so altering them it clearly does not place the determination of any questions arising under the Ashburton treaty under the jurisdiction of these commissioners.

There is another reason which I think can be advanced in support of my proposition. I do not think I am making any mistake in saying that in interpreting these treaties and determining the effect of them, one upon the other, we are perfectly justified in applying the rules that are applied as regards the interpretation of laws and the effect of one upon another when it is a question of how far a subsequent law repeals a previous one. We would be justified, when construing these two treaties between these countries, in applying the rules that govern the interpretation of contracts. I urge without fear of serious contradiction that it cannot be denied that when you have made a special, particular and specific law to deal with one particular specific instance, the subsequent enactment of general provisions does not override that law. In the system under which I was brought up that simple rule as expressed, declared that throughout the whole law 'in toto jure' the special rule derogates from the general rule.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think anybody will deny that.

Mr. DOHERTY. Here then we have the determination of a specific case by the Ashburton treaty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What does my hon. friend want the amendment of my hon. friend from Grenville for?

Mr. DOHERTY. I want it because this government stands before this parliament interpreting this treaty as governing this case and giving power to these commissioners to assent to any works which the American government might erect on that side, and because, if we pass this legislation in the face of that authoritative interpretation and without any reserve or qualification, we will be furnishing a very powerful argument to our adversaries in this matter which they will not fail to invoke when they come to claim that because they have the assent of these commissioners our parliament has absolutely nothing to do with it. I am free to confess that our position has been far from ameliorated by the terms of this treaty as expressed, but I want to, at least, as far as it is in my power, bring about the result that this particular legislation shall not make our position worse than it is from my point of view. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works, seeing that the Minister of Justice has disagreed with him in the interpretation, that I have not been able to agree entirely with either of them, and that the hon. member for South Toronto is in the same position, will at least admit that there may be room for doubt as to the interpretation of this clause. If that be the case surely it is not intended that this legislation should be enacted for the purposes of serving as a means of enabling an interpretation to be put upon this treaty. If we pass it purely and simply we are building up a very strong argument in support of the interpretation put upon this treaty by the Minister of Justice, and we are placing our adversaries, if we should come to have adversaries, or if we should come to take an adverse position to that of the government of the United States and it was to their interest to say that all they had to do was to get the assent of the commissioners under this treaty in order to bind Canada, in possession of an additional argument in favour of such a contention. I have no very great hope of producing conviction in the mind of the Minister of Public Works, but I must say that it does seem to me that I am arguing in support of a most eminently reasonable position, because, if the view of those who desire to propose this amendment to this section in respect to which there are disputed interpretations should prove to be wrong, then the amendment will have done absolutely no harm; whereas, if, in the face of this clause, susceptible of different interpretations, the amendment should be accepted, it will do this much good that it will leave that section absolutely to be interpreted as it ought to be interpreted according to the proper rules of interpretation without that interpretation being affected in the slightest degree by this legislation. Unless it is intended by this legislation that parliament should intervene for the purpose of interpreting this treaty and interpreting it in a sense favourable towards those with whom we made this bargain, unless it is desired that we should add to this treaty and to its terms an authoritative interpretation favourable to the persons with whom we are dealing in the event of there coming up a difference of opinion between us, it seems to me that there can be no reasonable objection to adopting this amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Grenville, and which, I think, is a valuable section as, at all events, insuring this country against the action we are taking now being interpreted as impairing in any way its rights such as they actually are under this treaty, or as, I believe, they are under the Ashburton treaty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would not for a moment think of setting up my views against the opinion of the Minister of Justice which no doubt is the correct one. On the point that this treaty does not give any right to the commissioner to interfere with navigation, there is no doubt. My hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) who has made a very able argument takes that ground.

Mr. DOHERTY. The minister does not.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not understand the Minister of Justice to argue that this treaty in any way interferes with the Ashburton treaty. Article 1 of this treaty clearly preserves the right of navigation in substantially the language of the Ashburton treaty. Either country can make improvements, but these improvements must always be aids and improvements to navigation, and the commissioners would have no power to give any consent to any obstruction which would interfere with the free navigation of that part of the St. Lawrence. This makes it absolutely clear that the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) is not required. Then in section 12 of the Act of last session it is provided that no plans, no proposition, no application to the British government even to alter the terms of the Ashburton treaty can be made without the approval of the parliament of Canada. The amendment of the hon. gentleman could not safeguard the rights of our people better than they are safeguarded now.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Minister of Public Works stated that the language of this treaty was exactly the same as the language of the Ashburton treaty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I said it was substantially the same.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Article 7 of the Ashburton treaty says that channels in the River St. Lawrence on both sides of the Long Sault and Barnhart Island shall be equally free to the ships of both nations.

Mr. PUGSLEY. And this says boundary waters.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The clause in this treaty means free passage through the canals when they are built.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is not that the same as the Ashburton treaty?

Mr. REID (Grenville). If this dam is built there will be only one channel where there are two now, because the north channel which is the main channel now on the downward route, will be spoiled. When this Bill was before Congress there was strong opposition to that feature, from amongst others the city of Montreal, the Board of Trade, the Chambre de Commerce, the Harbour Commissioners, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Citizens' Association, the Canadian Shipping Federation, the Montreal Transportation Company, the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, the town of Morrisburg and the city of Toronto. Here we have able lawyers disagreeing on the construction of that clause and yet the Minister of Public Works refuses to insert a clause which makes the meaning plain beyond doubt.

If the Minister of Public Works wants to protect the interests of the people of Canada, he will surely put in that clause. This whole scheme with regard to the Long Sault is sure to come up again, and I think it is dangerous to leave it where there is a possible chance of doubt. I think he should not object to that clause being added, and then the Bill would go along, and we would be able to hurry the business through. Surely the minister cannot think that in asking that there is any obstruction; the object is simply to make plain the clause. On the other side of the line, when this Bill was before Congress, Mr. Maltby, the gentleman acting for the company that was trying to get the Bill through, was asked at the end of the hearing by Chairman Burton of the special committee, if it was contemplated to go on with the construction of the dam without the consent of the government of Canada, and he admitted that it was. So evidently they do not intend to carry out the treaty, and I think the minister should consider that. Now, I want to correct one thing that the minister stated in the early part of this discussion, when he denied that he had said that he would protect Canada by collecting from the company $30,000 or $35,000 a year for the privilege. Here is what happened, on page 917 of 'Hansard':

Mr. REID (Grenville). When we raised the question of damming the St. Lawrence the hon. minister made the statement that he was protecting the interests of Canada because we were going to get $30,000 a year of revenue from that, similar to what the United States was getting.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I stated was that if parliament should hereafter grant any authority to dam the St. Lawrence and I were Minister of Public Works at the time, I would see that any company getting the power would pay as much as was to be paid to the state of New York, which I understood was to be $30,000 a year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is, if parliament was hereafter to grant the right. What the hon. gentleman said was that I was in favour of granting the right subject to a rental of so much a year. I said that I had made no such statement, and what the hon. gentleman has read absolutely confirms what I said.

Mr. GOODEVE. I would like to ask, for information, if we pass this Bill confirming the treaty, could a company or an individual, under Article 3, get the right from the United States government to dam the St. Lawrence, and then only require to get the consent of this Joint Commission to go on with the work, regardless of whether it altered the level of the water or not? If we pass this Bill, then under clause (3) of the treaty any company or individual getting the right from the United States government to dam the St. Lawrence could go on and do so, and if that dam altered the level of the water on the other side, the consent of the Joint Commission would have to be obtained.

Mr. PUGSLEY. As regards the construction of works on the United States side which would in any way affect the level of the waters on the Canadian side, this treaty does not apply at all. In respect of the St. Lawrence, the Ashburton treaty still exists; and it is provided by that treaty and also by article (1) of this treaty that there must be free navigation preserved to the people of both countries.

Mr. GOODEVE. I only use the St. Lawrence as an illustration. I want the interpretation of the government on clause (3). As I understand that clause, parties desiring to construct works in either country must get the consent of the parliament of the country in which the works are to be constructed; but if the work affects the boundary waters in the other country, the parties must get in addition the consent of the Joint Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. GOODEVE. And no further consent?

Mr. PUGSLEY. If they affect navigation, the works could not be constructed at all under article (1). That article provides that navigation of all boundary waters must be kept free.

Mr. GOODEVE. But if a company got the consent of its own government to construct a dam which might interfere with the flow of water on the other side of the boundary, they would have to get this consent of the Joint Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. You mean on the other side of the line?

Mr. GOODEVE. Suppose a company desires to construct a dam on the American side, they would naturally get the consent of their own government. But if that dam would affect the level of the water on our side, they would have also to get the consent of the Joint Commission, and that would be all they would require.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Subject always to article (1) which provides that all boundary waters shall be kept open to navigation freely to the people of both countries.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). The treaty and more especially the Bill deal very largely with the public domain of the provinces, especially of Ontario, and the provincial laws are to be apparently abrogated or overridden wherever they interfere with the operation of this treaty. Has the government conferred in any way with the province of Ontario, both as regards the appropriation of public waterways and the overriding of provincial laws, and has the province of Ontario given its consent to this measure? As has been pointed out to-night, although this Bill has been on the Order Paper for a considerable length of time, the treaty has been over two years in operation. Only the other day a Bill was brought down by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) for the purpose of putting into operation this treaty and providing machinery including a very large expenditure of ways and means. That Bill went to the public but it has since been very largely amended.

Mr. PUGSLEY. All those sections remain just as they were.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). As regards the overriding of provincial laws, I think that section of the Bill is entirely new, and I do not know if the provinces are aware of this change.

Mr. PUGSLEY. None of the provinces were consulted in the framing of the treaty. All that section (2) of the Bill provides is that, so far as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the treaty, all Dominion and provincial laws shall be altered. The only respect in which they can be altered would be as to the remedies given to people in the adjoining country to bring actions in the Exchequer Court for damages on account of injuries sustained by reason of the diversion of the water. Provision is made for the issuing of subpœna and the taking of evidence under oath. Any effect which this Bill would have upon provincial laws would be only such as is necessary to put in force the provisions of this treaty. The limitation is contained in clause (2).

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). That contains no limit whatever.

The section is as follows:

The laws of Canada and of the several provinces thereof are hereby amended and altered so as to permit, authorize and sanction the performance of the obligations undertaken by His Majesty in and under the said treaty; and so as to sanction, confer and impose the various rights, duties and disabilities intended by the said treaty to be conferred or imposed or to exist within Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Limited wholly to the necessary connection with the treaty.

Mr. MACDONELL. At one fell swoop it is proposed to amend all the laws of all the provinces so as to permit this treaty to have full operation and effect.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is so.

Mr. MACDONELL. Having regard to the public domain, surely the minister does not consider that because waters are international or boundary waters, they cease to be provincial waters. I do not think there is legal authority for any such proposition. In as much as this treaty proposes not only to deal with international or boundary waters, but to extend its operation to waters very remote from the boundary or international waters—waters that are notoriously provincial waters—it seems to me that when we come to the wide power given by section 2, you simply propose (if you have the right to pass that section 2) that for treaty purposes and Dominion purposes, the domain of the various provinces where it comes in contact with this treaty, shall be included under the Act. I will just point out the far-reaching effect of the language used. Take, for instance, article 1. Therein we find these waters defined, and they not only include boundary waters but waters connected with boundary waters, and also, by the preliminary article, 'all bays, arms and inlets thereof, &c.' So, we take the boundary waters of the Great Lakes and by the operation of the preliminary article and article 1 you include in boundary waters all the bays, arms and inlets of the boundary waters which are tributary to or form part of the Great Lakes. This would include the Georgian bay and all the waters tributary to it. I believe the Minister of Public Works himself was authority for the statement this afternoon that because a river in Maine, flowing entirely in the state of Maine, entered the St. John river, it also was a boundary water, and included in the treaty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is not a boundary water, but one that flows into a boundary water.

Mr. MACDONELL. Yes, and therefore comes under the operation of the treaty. If that be so, having reference to the geographical aspect of the watershed of the Great Lakes and the watershed of the Georgian bay, all the streams that flow into the Great Lakes and Georgian Bay from the north—and almost all that flow into the Great Lakes, except the Rainy river, flow in from the north, that, from Canadian territory—according to this definition, at one fell swoop——

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman has not read it. It expressly excludes all tributary waters.

Mr. MACDONELL. Then, why did the minister include the river of which he spoke?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is different. I was speaking with reference to what was done as to the Allegash.

Mr. MACDONELL. Then, it either is or is not a boundary water. And take section 2 of article 1. It extends not only to natural bodies of water, but 'to all canals connecting boundary waters and now existing or which may hereafter be constructed on either side of the line.' The effect of this—speaking subject to correction and simply as a matter of common reading of English—that if we construct the Georgian Bay canal, forming part of the Ottawa river, that tributary for 300 or 400 miles will be held under the treaty in common. So, by this joint commission we submit to the joint supervision of the United States and ourselves all the inland waters and canals belonging to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Where did the hon. gentleman find that in the treaty, it must be a canal connecting boundary waters.

Mr. MACDONELL. I am glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned that. Lake Huron is a boundary water, and Georgian bay, by the preliminary article, is a part of a boundary water, because it is a bay that is included in 'all bays, arms and inlets thereof.' So the Georgian bay canal, which goes to the Georgian bay, which is part of the boundary waters——

Mr. PUGSLEY. And joins the St. Lawrence where it has ceased to be boundary water.

Mr. MACDONELL. It flows from boundary waters, and it joins boundary waters.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, it joins the St. Lawrence below where it is a boundary water.

Mr. MACDONELL. The St. Lawrence is a boundary stream.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Only to a certain point.

Mr. MACDONELL. You will find that our American friends will claim the whole length.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. MACDONELL. There is the fact staring you in the face. It seems to me that the rights of the provinces have been overlooked, and that there has been no attempt to safeguard those rights or consult the provinces in the confiscation or disposal of their rights. The minister is well aware of the decision in the fishery case in the Privy Council. It is common knowledge that it was decided that the Dominion government has no right in the waters except where they have been improved in rivers, harbours, or canals, but that public waters and land under public waters, in the old province of Canada, belong either to the province of Ontario or to the province of Quebec. And you will find nowhere in the British North America Act any authority to divest the province of Ontario of its domain in these waters or under them. Yet this measure proposes to deal with them without even consulting the provinces. Then you have the additional feature that, as I have said, at one fell swoop, you wipe out provincial legislation that is in conflict with the operation of this treaty. Every lawyer knows—the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth), is not here, but if he were here I am sure he would agree with me—that of all legislation, legislation by inference or reference is the most obnoxious. To declare generally that all law in conflict with what is here laid down shall be amended, altered, or repealed, is the most objectionable kind of legislation, because you have to go to court every time you want to find out what the rights of the individual are, and to what extent these laws are altered, amended, or require to be altered, amended, or repealed, to be in conformity with the treaty. So, both the contents of the Bill, and the manner in which it is brought down—without consultation with the parties vitally interested—are objectionable. It does seem to me that the objection raised by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid), has been well taken. The amendment can do no harm if inserted. I might point out here that in the case before the committee of the Senate of the United States with regard to the erection of an obstruction in the St. Lawrence it was there openly stated that the effect of allowing that legislation to go through would be to entirely abrogate those clauses in the Ashburton treaty which require the River St. Lawrence to be forever free and clear. If the Minister of Public Works should accept the amendment of the member for Grenville, as I have said, its presence in the Bill would do no harm, whereas it would wonderfully safeguard the rights of the people of this country, and make plain, and unequivocal the position which we all, the minister included, agree should be taken, namely, that it is not in any way intended or desired to interfere with the freedom of the river which has been guaranteed by the provisions of the Ashburton treaty. I think the minister would do well to consider whether he should not accept that amendment. The minister has made some remarks about not making headway with the Bill. That is his own fault in not bringing down this important measure until practically on the eve of adjournment. If this Bill had been brought down long ago, it could have had more consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have delayed it frequently at the special request of hon. gentlemen opposite who were desirous of being present. However, I do not complain.

Mr. MACDONELL. This treaty has been in operation now for more than two years. The provision for financing the commission is a matter that can go on. In answer to a question I put the government, I was informed that the government has spent already $218,329 on the Waterways Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not this commission, that is under the old treaty.

Mr. MACDONELL. It is the same men and the same work. However, there has been a large amount expended already. If this Bill were not passed the expenditure could go on. In the meantime the minister would do well to let this measure stand for further mature consideration until after the adjournment. We find the Minister of Public Works holding one view, and the Minister of Justice another view, but the Bill goes on all the same. I think it would be in the interests of the country to let this measure stand, and let the government consult with the provinces who are affected by it. The rights of the provinces are being impaired by this Bill, both in regard to their public domain, and to their public law. It would be better for the government to wait awhile, and come to some arrangement with the provinces for taking joint action.

Mr. REID (Grenville). If the Americans got a Bill through at Washington giving them power to dam the South Sault, then all they would want would be the consent of the Joint Commission. Would the Minister of Public Works take that position?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I have said already is that this treaty gives no right whatever to dam the St. Lawrence river, or any other river; on the contrary, it preserves every right of navigation. Article 1 declares that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall forever continue free and open for the purpose of commerce to the inhabitants of both countries, safeguarding to the fullest extent the right of navigation. In the case my hon. friend put of the United States Congress giving authority to place a dam upon their own side of the boundary, this treaty gives no such power. That is a power which they have at the present time, but this treaty contains a prohibitive clause which says that they shall not do that, if the effect is to raise the water level upon the Canadian side, without the consent of the International Joint Commission. While Canada might erect works on its own side, if the effect was to alter the level of the water on the other side of the boundary, there must be the consent of the International Joint Commission. This treaty gives no power to place an obstruction of any kind or description in a boundary water; on the contrary, it limits the right which exists at the present time. It preserves every right of navigation, and provides also that if the parliament of either country should authorize the construction of any works, they must be subject to every right of navigation, and must always be subject to the approval of the International Joint Commission, if the level of the water on the other side of the boundary is affected.

Mr. SPROULE. This treaty has been in operation for over a year, and why is it that we have had so much trouble this winter trying to prevent the Long Sault Company from interfering with the St. Lawrence? We have made representations from this House over and over again, the city of Montreal has been much exercised over it, and representations have been made to Washington, and the attention of the commission has been drawn to it, notwithstanding the fact that under this treaty they could not interfere with it in any way.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The minister knows that at Washington they have been fighting all winter, and Congress did not hesitate to say they had the right. But, as I understand it from what the Minister of Public Works said, they can erect a dam in the South Sault, and all they want is the consent of the Joint Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Before this treaty was negotiated Congress could authorize, the same as the Canadian parliament could authorize works, each upon its own side of the boundary. This treaty limits that right because it makes all subject to free navigation.

Mr. REID (Grenville). They probably could if it had not been for the Ashburton treaty which provides that the channels on both sides, the Long Sault and Barnhart Island, should remain free and open. These are the two channels mentioned there.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does not my hon. friend understand clearly, as the hon. member for Montreal, Ste. Anne said, that the Ashburton treaty is in no way affected by this treaty. It remains as it is and as it will always remain providing for the free and unobstructed navigation of these channels. This treaty goes even farther and says that in all the boundary waters there shall be that free right of navigation.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I cannot see it in that light.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend will not take my view he might take the view of the hon. member for Montreal, Ste. Anne.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The minister made the statement a few minutes ago that he had delayed this Bill at the request of members on this side of the House and he said that on one occasion I asked him to hold it over from Friday to Monday. I plead guilty to that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would be very glad to hold it over at any time for hon. members.

Mr. REID (Grenville). That is the only time that I remember.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath) also requested me to hold it over.

Mr. REID (Grenville). This Bill in its changed form was only handed around this morning and I would ask the minister if he would allow it to stand over until tomorrow in order that we may really understand it and then it can go through.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think the hon. members clearly understand the Bill.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I am not quite sure of that. I think it is only fair to ask that it be allowed to stand over. There are other members who have not been here and who have not seen this Bill. They should have an opportunity of seeing it and the minister should not desire to force it through.

Mr. PUGSLEY. These new clauses are all unimportant.

Mr. MAGRATH. It is not a matter of any consequence, but I would like to know from the minister when I asked him to hold this Bill over.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think my hon. friend did it personally but an hon. member of the House said that the hon. member for Medicine Hat was desirous of speaking on the Bill.

Mr. MAGRATH. I wished to know when it was coming up.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think the hon. member was away.

Mr. MACDONELL. Can the minister tell us to what extent the Chicago Drainage canal will reduce the depth of water in the lakes? There is an enlargement and it is said to be drawing more water from Lake Michigan at 10,000 cubic feet per second, which was supposed to be the amount they should be allowed to take under the arrangement made by the commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not able to give my hon. friend definite information on that point. I understood they had the right to draw 10,000 cubic feet per second. I have not heard that that has been increased.

Mr. MAGRATH. Has that been settled by any treaty arrangement?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, it is by an understanding. Of course, all the cities bordering on the lakes are just as much interested in it as we are. There is no clause relating to this in the treaty.

Mr. MAGRATH. They cannot take more than 10,000 cubic feet per second without the consent of the commission provided for in this treaty?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not prepared to say that.

Mr. MACDONELL. Can the minister inform the committee whether it is intended to make a further abstraction of water from Lake Erie by the enlargement of the Erie canal?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not heard of anything of the kind. Of course, there is work going on now with the view of deepening the Erie canal. I may say to my hon. friend that the water that is used for filling a canal is not very likely to appreciably alter the level of the great lakes. We should not raise that question at all events. What might more seriously alter the levels would be the deepening of the canal through the St. Clair Flats, although that is for the joint benefit of both countries.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Suppose the Long Sault were to be dammed what effect would it have on the lakes on the eastern side of it? The River St. Lawrence goes into a lake east of the town of Cornwall; and what would be the result if this commission should grant power to dam the St. Lawrence.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This commission cannot grant power to dam the St. Lawrence.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Well there is a difference of opinion.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This treaty does not give power to dam the St. Lawrence.

On section 4: Exchequer Court jurisdiction.

Mr. DOHERTY. I would like to ask the minister why it is considered necessary to give this jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court? In our own province of Quebec, if a man diverted the waters of a stream running in the province of Quebec, and crossing the boundary, and thereby did damage to a man in the state of Maine, he would, under the treaty, become liable towards that man in the state of Maine just precisely to the same extent as he would under the law of the province of Quebec be liable to his next door neighbour for a like diversion of the same stream. In other words the liability of the party guilty of the offence which gives rise to the damage is to be governed by the law of the province of Quebec. The province has created courts for the administration of justice, and I can see no reason why you should take the party defendant before a court which as a general rule has no jurisdiction to administer the law of the province. I am not attempting to reflect in the slightest degree upon the gentleman who is now judge of the Exchequer Court, but in the province of Quebec it is known that we have a distinct system of law, under which the obligations of the man who diverts the stream as well as the rights of the man injured will be governed. The provincial courts are especially created for the administration of that law, are presided over by men trained in that law, and you will draw these cases from their jurisdiction and give them to a tribunal which as a rule is not concerned with the administration of that law. Then in that province you will very probably have the language question. I am not now making any personal reference, but it will likely happen that the judge of the Exchequer Court will not be familiar with the French and English languages, and in Quebec the two languages are official, and the people attach considerable importance to their right to be heard in their own tongue. Apart from sentimental consideration those who have experience in these courts know how exceedingly important it is in the interests of justice that the witnesses should be heard by a judge who understands both languages. In the province of Quebec, in nine cases out of every ten, the bulk of the cases are in the French language, and it is rare to have a case in which both parties, and the counsel, and the witnesses speak only English. I am at a loss to see why you should create this exceptional jurisdiction to deal with cases of this kind which affect civil rights that belong to the jurisdiction of the province. I urge upon the consideration of the government that justice would probably be much more satisfactorily attained by leaving the adjudication of these cases to the courts to which they naturally belong.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think it is of very great importance what court a suppliant may enter in order to get redress, the important thing being to let him know what court he has a right to go to, and be assured that that court has jurisdiction. I suppose that one reason for providing the Exchequer Court would be that all actions taken under this treaty would be of the same character, and it would be desirable that one tribunal should deal with them.

Mr. DOHERTY. If the liability for diverting a stream should be different in one province under the law of that province from what it would be in another province, the cases would not be of the same kind or under the same law.

Mr. PUGSLEY. At all events, they will all be cases of damages in relation to watercourses and boundary waters. In the province of Quebec, I imagine, there will not be many cases, and the present judge of the Exchequer Court speaks both languages, as I apprehend any judge would who would be likely to be appointed. I know that Mr. Justice Burbidge spoke French very well, having studied it after he became a judge, and Mr. Justice Cassels speaks French very well. The judge of the Exchequer Court travels about from one place to another, and would be willing to go to any town or city where the parties lived to try the cases. The Exchequer Court would perhaps be the best court to which to give jurisdiction in the cases provided for under this treaty. If after practical experience it is found desirable to make a change, it can be made in the future. I trust that my hon. friend will not press for a change, but allow the section to go through as it is.

Mr. DOHERTY. I do not wish to press unduly; but while section 132 of the British North America Act makes it clear that this parliament has power to pass any law to give effect in any province to any rights created under the treaty, it seems to me that in the exercise of that power we ought to try to interfere as little as possible with the rights of the provinces. This is a part of the administration of justice in the provinces, even though it results from a law that we pass. It is not the treaty that makes the law of Quebec what previously was not the law of Quebec, but it is in virtue of this enactment that it becomes law. Why depart from the application of the general rule that the administration of justice belongs to the province? As a matter of principle, it seems to me that we ought, under section 132 of the British North America Act, to confine ourselves to doing what it provides we shall do, that is, enact the laws which are necessary to give effect to these rights that we create, and then leave the administration of those laws to the provinces. It is not at all necessary, in order to give effect to these rights, that we should create a special court for this privileged class of plaintiffs. I accept the statement of the hon. member in regard to the two judges of the Exchequer Court speaking both languages; I do not want to make any personal observations about any judge, past or present; but I think lawyers from the province of Quebec will bear me out in saying that there have been cases in which it was the subject of serious complaint that before the tribunal mentioned the parties were not in a position to be heard in their own language. When you have an entirely organized system that meets a desire, and a not unreasonable desire, on the part of persons speaking a particular language to be given a court where their language would be official, a court which would without doubt be qualified to hear and understand testimony if it should be given in that language, it is at least remarkable that you should provide a court which may possibly be in a position where it would be necessary to interpret all this testimony. Moreover, the procedure in these cases will be governed by the Code of Civil Procedure in the province of Quebec. I see no provision to the contrary in the Bill. It does seem to me that all these considerations ought to weigh against something which is a departure from general rules, and in support of which I have not heard any very substantial reasons. It seems to me that if we say to the foreigner, you shall have the same recourse as any citizen of Canada, and have it before the same court, we shall be implementing our obligations under the treaty to the full, and leaving him in no doubt as to what court he should go before.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This section was drafted by the Justice Department, and the matter does not seem to me to be of sufficient importance to make a change in it.

Mr. DOHERTY. Perhaps I might take the liberty of asking the Solicitor General whether these considerations which I have ventured to offer were thought of before this was enacted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It came from the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. DOHERTY. I do not know that it would be any reflection on the department to suggest that possibly these matters nad not been thought of, and it would be more satisfactory if when one has grounds for suggesting a change he should have the gratification of feeling that the author of the Act had given them some consideration. It is an unfortunate condition, when one urges reasons before the minister who is responsible for the Bill, to be told that this has been decided by somebody else who is not here to listen to you and to whom possibly these considerations did not occur.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). I would like to ask the minister whether the commission to be appointed under this Act will have any jurisdiction on the St. Lawrence from the boundary line at Cornwall down to Montreal?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think not. That is wholly in Canadian waters, and the commission is limited to boundary waters.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Then we have the sole jurisdiction over the canal from the Georgian bay to Montreal, and the United States would not be entitled to the user?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Although they have the right to navigate the St. Lawrence by treaty, that only applies from boundary waters to boundary waters?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Perfectly correct.

Mr. REID (Grenville). This only gives power to navigate jointly as far as Cornwall?

Mr. PUGSLEY. This treaty is confined to boundary waters.

On section 5,

The International Joint Commission, when appointed and constituted pursuant to the said treaty, shall have power, when holding joint sessions in Canada, to take evidence on oath and to compel the attendance of witnesses by application to a judge of a superior court of the province within which such session is held, and such judge is hereby authorized and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary and appropriate to that end.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Is there provision made for the payment of fees to witnesses?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, these would be included in the expenses of the commission.

On section 6,

The Governor in Council may appropriate annually, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, a sum not exceeding seventy-five thousand dollars, toward the payment of the salaries of the commissioners to be appointed by His Majesty on the recommendation of the Governor in Council, as well as the salaries of the secretary and other officers and employees, and also all other expenses which may be incurred by such commissioners with the approval of the Minister of Public Works, together with one-half share of all reasonable and necessary joint expenses of the said commission incurred by it and, under the terms of the said treaty, required to be paid in equal moieties by the High Contracting Parties.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). It seems to me that we are doing many things which are not correct. Our salary list is subject every year to discussion in Committee of Supply, and we have no right to fix the salaries in a Bill of this kind.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the case of the Board of Railway Commissioners, their salaries are fixed by statute. In appointing gentlemen to a very important position such as this, particularly when the treaty runs for a term of years they would naturally want to know what their salaries would be. I thought that parliament would prefer that a limit should be put on the salaries.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). This parliament has no right to bind another parliament. The principle that obtains in matters of that kind is for parliament from year to year to fix the expenditure.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The judges' salaries are fixed by statute, and not by vote from year to year.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). It may be reasonble to fix the judges' salaries, but it is a wrong principle to embody in a statute payments that ought to be voted by this House.

On section 7,

Each of the said commissioners who is appointed by His Majesty shall receive as compensation for his services an amount to be fixed by the Governor in Council but not in excess of the sum paid by the government of the United States to each of its commissioners, and not in any case to exceed the sum of seventy-five hundred dollars per annum. The secretary appointed by the Canadian section of the commission under the provisions of the said treaty shall receive as compensation for his services a sum not exceeding three thousand dollars per annum.

Mr. JAMESON. I think that these words, 'not in excess of the sum paid by the government of the United States' should be struck out. I can see no reason why the salaries of these commissioners should be governed by any allowances the United States may make. We ought to be able to determine ourselves what their services are worth, and we should pay what they are worth.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the appropriation Act passed at Washington, it is provided that the salaries to be paid the commissioners in the United States shall not be greater than those paid by the government of Canada. It is very desirable that both countries should pay the same salaries as these commissioners are sitting together and doing the same work. The idea is that the commissioners on both sides be paid the same salaries.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). When do the governments of the two countries get together to fix what the sum is to be?

Mr. PUGSLEY. When this statute is passed, in the ordinary course we would get together and fix the salaries.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Are the ministers going to have another mission to Washington to get that settled? I suppose it will be arranged that the Canadian Commissioner is to have the same bill of fare as the American.

Mr. GRAHAM. Ought to have better.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). How would the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) like to have the same rule applied to his department? If it were applied he would be giving the chief of the management of the Intercolonial railway $50,000 a year.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a comparison of salaries, one paid by a private company and the other by a government road, but in this other case both are working for governments.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). That is a nice way to put it. It seems to me that the governments take the position: 'After you my dear Alfonse,' 'After you my dear Gaston.' The result will be that you will have to have another Joint Commission to fix the salaries of these gentlemen. I think it is childish to put such a provision in a Bill dealing with an international question.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). This is a very serious innovation. The reason a statutory allowance is given the judges is to provide against their removal except by impeachment. If you could stop a judge's salary you would in effect dismiss him from office without impeaching him. But statutory allowances are only given to judges, railway commissioners and a few others who are appointed during good behaviour and cannot be removed except for good reason.

Mr. BUREAU. What about the penitentiary officials. Their salaries are regulated by statute. You cannot exceed the amount mentioned in the statute.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). But their salaries as I understand, are voted every year. The principle applies only to parties who are removable by impeachment. The minister (Mr. Pugsley) refers to the United States. But the United States will never commit the folly of passing a statute fixing the salaries of these parties; they will vote the salaries every year. Why do not we do the same, so that the House of Commons can control them?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am willing to take the suggestion of my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson), and strike out the words 'but not in excess of the sum paid by the government of the United States.' I move that these words be struck out.

Mr. JAMESON. Will the commissioners be expected to devote their whole time to the service of the commission?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That has not yet been decided. My own opinion is that if they receive the maximum salary provided for in the section, they ought to devote their whole time to the work of the commission. Of course, it may be desirable to engage the services of some gentleman who might have other work to do, and who would be paid by the day or paid a smaller sum than that fixed by this Bill. But, in case the salary should be the same, or nearly the same as is provided in the Bill, I think they should give their whole time to the work of the commission.

Mr. JAMESON. What are the salaries now paid to the commissioners?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The chairman gets $50 a day, and the other commissioners $25 a day, for the time actually engaged in the work of the commission.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe).

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I think that the point raised by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) is well taken. The minister knows that there are two kinds of appointments under the Crown, one continuing as long as the appointee's conduct is proper. Such appointee is not removable except by impeachment, really at the bar of this House. But other appointments are during pleasure, and I understand that the salaries of these appointees simply appear in the Supply Bill. I do not think the principle here proposed should be embodied in legislation pertaining to a treaty. It is only for five years; it is not a life appointment. The whole thing could be adjusted without such an enactment. It involves a vicious principle.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The amount is not fixed, and the Governor in Council is to fix it. But once he exercises that power I doubt very much if he can reduce it—it becomes a statutory enactment under which they are entitled to their pay.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think undoubtedly that is so.

Amendment (Mr. Pugsley) agreed to, and section 7 as amended agreed to.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Next we come to the schedule and protocols. I think every hon. member has read this because it has been before parliament——

Mr. REID (Grenville). Before that is taken up, I wish to move as section 8 the amendment which I submitted before.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

PENNY BANKS.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend chapter 31, Revised Statutes, The Penny Bank Act, and by such amendment authorize the Minister of Finance to fix and determine the rate of interest that shall be allowed and credited half-yearly on the amounts from time to time at the credit of the accounts of penny banks, incorporated under the provisions of that Act, in the government savings bank or post office savings bank, the rate so fixed and determined not to exceed one per centum in advance of the rate then payable to depositors in the government savings bank or post office savings bank.

He said: This resolution is to enable us to increase the allowance to Penny Banks by one-half per cent. Several public spirited gentlemen in Toronto, a few years ago, initiated a movement for the encouragement of thrift by establishing what is called the Penny Bank. Since that time another bank of similar character has been established at Chicoutimi in the province of Quebec. All the money that is collected is placed in the government savings bank, except a very small amount as working capital which remains in the hands of the Penny Bank. We have been allowing them three and a half per cent, while they allow the depositors three per cent. In order to assist them with the expenses of management we propose to increase the allowance to one per cent above the savings bank rate instead of a half per cent. At present it represents an increased allowance of about $780 per annum. It is to help them with the expenses of management. At the beginning the expenses were borne by some public spirited citizens, but since then some of these have dropped off. As we think the movement is deserving of encouragement, we propose to give them one per cent instead of a half per cent.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). This work for the Penny Banks is done largely by the school teachers of the city of Toronto. They do not get anything for that work.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I do not think the school teachers get anything. Experience has shown that it is a very desirable thing. The gentlemen who are promoting it are public spirited citizens who put their own money into it to a considerable degree.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee on the Resolution.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 221) to amend the Penny Bank Act.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. FIELDING moved the second reading of Bill (No. 213) to amend the Bank Act. He said: This is a Bill which continues the bank charters for one year. The schedule attached to the Bill includes the names not only of all the banks that are actually engaged in business, but also includes the names of several banks which are going out of business, for the reason that, acting upon the advice of the Department of Justice, it has been thought well to include them all in the schedule for the coming year.

Mr. LENNOX. Does this include banks which have actually failed?

Mr. FIELDING. It includes them only for the purpose of their being closed up. It does not give them any new powers.

Mr. LENNOX. I understand it does include some banks which have actually failed.

Mr. FIELDING. It does include them for the purpose of their being wound up.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 2,

Mr. DOHERTY. I notice that this Bill does not deal with the saving banks in Quebec.

Mr. FIELDING. I have a separate Bill in relation to those, which is now passing through the House, and I will be very happy to move it to-morrow.

On the preamble,

Mr. HENDERSON. If the minister will agree to allow the third reading to stand over—I have no objection to this Bill, but I want an opportunity of reading it.

Mr. FIELDING. I am quite content to accept my hon. friend's suggestion.

Bill reported.

CANADIAN NORTHERN ONTARIO RAILWAY—GUARANTEE OF BONDS.

Bill (No. 211) respecting aid towards the construction of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway—Mr. Graham—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. GRAHAM. This Bill is identical with the resolution that we discussed the other day, and to which we made one amendment at the suggestion of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax). In a Bill of this kind there cannot be much diversion from the original resolution. I do not want to press it unduly, but it is identical in its terms with the resolution we passed the other day. If we could take a few minutes and go through a portion of it, we would be able to give it to the Senate before they adjourn.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The minister was to give some explanation of the securities on that part of the road from Montreal to the Niagara river.

Mr. GRAHAM. My information is that they are allowed to issue $30,000 a mile, With respect to the securities between Montreal and a point opposite Hawkesbury there was a subsidy voted by this parliament, but it has not as yet been paid or earned. There was a land grant asked for from the province of Quebec, and I think voted, but the time lapsed, and it will have to be voted again if they ever get it. The branches in Ontario that have been acquired by the Canadian Northern will come under the second mortgage, but they will remain branch lines. That piece of road which will form part of the main line is to be reconstructed up to standard.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). This Bill has been advanced an important stage to-night and in the absence of the leader of the opposition, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is no need to move that. I said that if any one objected when we got to the second reading we would not proceed. It is an important Bill, but if we are going to get through as hon. gentlemen want, we will have to work hard, and sit late.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). We have been fourteen hours at it to-day, and the Minister of Labour is trying to get through an eight hour Bill.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. PERLEY. What business will be taken up at the next sitting?

Mr. FIELDING. The Canadian Northern Bill, the Railway Act, the resolutions respecting trade with Japan, and we would like to have the Grain Bill advanced a stage.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Is that all, do you want the whole Order Paper?

Mr. FIELDING. I would not like to except anything on the Order Paper, but if we make reasonable progress with these Bills we would like to go into Committee of Supply for the purpose of voting items that are of an urgent character. Irrespective of the proportion of Supply which will be taken later, there are some items which apply to services for which the entire vote is needed at an early stage, and we expect to deal with these items to-morrow, if possible.

Mr. HAGGART. What items?

Mr. FIELDING. We will select the urgent items from the various departments.

Mr. PERLEY. Would the minister give the leader of the oppositon a list of these items?

Mr. FIELDING. I am now speaking only for to-morrow's business, and I think the programme I have mentioned ought to make a fair day's work.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Is it the intention to continue Supply right along or is it the intention to conclude before Friday?

Mr. FIELDING. If all goes well, we will plan our programme with the hope of adjourning on Friday, though I cannot speak more definitely than that at present. We will ask votes for the whole year for the particular items which for reasons that will be explained, we think should, with advantage to the public service, be voted. Then, later, we will ask for the proportionate vote according to agreement. We hope to reach the Supply for the particular services I have mentioned to-morrow after the measures I have referred to are dealt with.

Mr. PERLEY. I referred to the special votes which the government is desirous of obtaining for the whole year, and I wish that a list of them should be sent to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. FIELDING. I will endeavour to see if we cannot arrange about that some time during the day to-morrow.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). A list of the Bills to be dealt with might also be furnished so that we will not waste the whole day with a Bill like we had to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. That is your fault.

Mr. FIELDING. The items I have mentioned will, I think, make a fair day's work for to-morrow, and some time during the day we will make a statement as to the balance of the business.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the minister does not expect to get the Grain Bill through before adjournment.

Mr. FIELDING. We would like to.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is a very important Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, but I was given to understand it was not controversial.

Mr. HENDERSON. I remember attending eleven sittings on one Grain Act and I fear this will be the same.

Mr. FIELDING. It ought to be in perfect condition if so much time was spent over it.

Mr. HENDERSON. This was years ago, about another Bill.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1.05 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WEDNESDAY, May 17, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

ALBERT AND MONCTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmoreland). Bill (No. 220) to incorporate the Albert and Moncton Railway Company, was read the first time last night. With the leave of the House I propose that it be now read the second time, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not know why this kind of thing has to happen so frequently. We are not going home to stay at home for ever; we are coming back in a couple of months, and, unless there is some special reason for it, I do not think this ought to happen. I think we should all observe the ordinary procedure and not being everlastingly breaking our own rules.

Mr. EMMERSON. I quite appreciate the fact that if any hon. member objects this cannot go through, but I would urge that consideration be given to this Bill. It is connected with a large enterprise in the county of Albert, involving the development of the shale interests in that section of the province and, expedition is necessary in order to further the objects in view. That is the only reason I would urge upon my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) to give his consent, and other hon. members to raise no objection.

Mr. LENNOX. I only wanted the hon. member (Mr. Emmerson) to give some reason for his motion. I do not propose to jump on his Bill in particular; a gentleman for whom I have very great respect —but I do not like this procedure as a rule, and I wanted some reason given.

Mr. EMMERSON. I quite agree.

Mr. SPROULE. I heard this shale argument advanced about twenty years ago. I am afraid it comes now a little late in the day.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is a new thing there.

Mr. SPROULE. I can hardly imagine that the question of the Bill going through a few weeks later or a few weeks earlier would make much difference to that great interest in that county.

Mr. EMMERSON. I may explain that English capitalists have taken hold of the matter now, and if there is delay here that will delay their movements in connection with the development of what is hoped to be a very great industry. As my hon. friend has said the shales have lain dormant for many years, and we cannot hasten their development now with too great speed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I move:

That leave be granted to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines to sit during the time the House is in session in accordance with the recommendation contained in the 21st report of the said committee.

Mr. SPROULE. I think this is entirely unnecessary. There is very little to come before that committee, and if the committee would meet, as it did to-day, half an hour before the time of the sitting of the House, there would be plenty of time for it to pass all the Bills that come before the committee. We have granted this leave in the case of two committees this session, when, in my judgment, there was no need for it. When the House was in session, most of the members desire to be here and possibly to take part in the debates that go on. But if the committee is sitting at the same time as the House, a member of the committee must make a choice which he shall attend. What is the reason for asking that this committee be allowed to sit while the House is in session?

Mr. EMMERSON. I believe it has been in contemplation on the part of many members that it would be desirable to adjourn the House on the 19th instant, instead of waiting until the 23rd. I may say that I am particularly anxious that the committee should have this leave, because I wish to expedite the Bill, which has just been read the second time. But, if this House remains in session until Tuesday next, or even Monday, there will be opportunity for me to have this Bill brought to the consideration of the Railway Committee in ordinary course. I would urge that in the public interest, and in the special interest of the section I represent, this committee should be allowed to meet as proposed by the chairman (Mr. Guthrie) and take into consideration, as they very well can, this Bill, and any others that may properly come before them.

Mr. SPROULE. That is simply a scare signal thrown up. There is plenty of time for the committee without their meeting when the House is in session. I for one am opposed on principle to a committee doing business while the House is in session. If there were a rush of business I could understand it; but I imagine there are very few Bills to come before the committee, and those of such a nature that they need take up very little time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to add my protest against the meeting of the Railway Committee while the House is in session. A few days ago twenty or twenty-five of us were called up stairs to attend a committee meeting while the House was in session, and while the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) was explaining a long resolution he had with reference to the Canadian Northern railway. I regret very much that I had not the opportunity to listen to his explanation, and I have no doubt there are other members in the same position. Besides, I think there is no real excuse for this procedure. The House has been in session for six months. Why did not these gentlemen bring forward their Bill and have it passed in the regular way.

Mr. EMMERSON. It comes from the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. Somebody is responsible for not having that Bill brought forward either in the Senate or this House. I for one, do not intend to put a premium on delays of that kind—simply holding legislation back with the hope that it will be rushed through without notice in the dying hours of the session, or just prior to adjournment. I do not know whether this motion requires notice or not, but if it does, then I do not consent to it.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Important legislation is coming before this House constantly now, that we are on the eve of adjournment, and it is very desirable that every member should be in his place, and pay attention to the proceedings. One Bill that the Railway Committee desires to deal with is the Water-power Bill, that was before the House last night. This Bill came before the Private Bills Committee when there were only four members present; but the chairman with enlarged vision saw a quorum and reported the Bill unanimously, and the House started to deal with it last night, notwithstanding that it was not on the Order Paper.

This Bill is not of such urgent importance that it should be rushed through the House at this end of the session. It is a very important Bill, and while the Railway Committee desires time for its consideration, it is desirable we should all be here and pay attention to the legislation going through the House. I think it would be a mistake to pass the motion presented by the chairman of the Railway Committee. The rights under the old Bill of 1903 have been forfeited, and the object of this legislation is to renew the rights granted in 1903, and which were forfeited three years ago. Why the urgent necessity, when they have not asked for a renewal for three years, and why should we seek now to rush the Bill through the House in the course of two or three days?

Mr. GUTHRIE. We had a meeting of the Railway Committee this morning called at half past ten. There are one or two Bills now before the Railway Committee; both of them are Senate Bills, one the Bill which has just passed its second reading, and the other the Bill referred to by the member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe). I understand there is some urgency in respect of both of them, and there was a general disposition on the part of the committee this morning that leave should be granted to sit while the House is in session in order to expedite these two measures. I do not think it is unreasonable; I do not think it will take a great length of time. It is a custom that has been followed every session since I have been in the House.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I do not approve of the practice of the various committees sitting while the House is in session. The Railway Committee is composed of nearly every member of this House; therefore, if we are to be in our places in this House we cannot be in the Railway Committee. If we are not on the Railway Committee, we do not save any time, because when the Bill comes back to the House again we will have to go over the whole procedure and obtain in the House all the information afresh. So we are not going to save any time by holding meetings of the Railway Committee during the sessions of the House.

Mr. FIELDING. If the committee has considered the matter and desires to have the rule suspended to enable them to meet, I should be individually willing to support the motion. At the same time I doubt whether they would make any progress in the matter, because, if the Bill is not fully considered in the Railway Committee, it will certainly be resisted here. As I presume the committee has talked the matter over and desire to be permitted to meet, I should be glad to join them in their motion, but I doubt whether they will make much progress by it.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). This motion asking for a suspension of a rule of the House must stand as a notice of motion, and cannot be passed now.

Mr. SPEAKER. Under rule 41, I am afraid it cannot be put except with the consent of the House. That rule requires notice being given.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does any one object?

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that objection is taken, and the motion cannot be put except by consent of the House.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 222) respecting the National Battlefields at Quebec. He said: As the House is aware, some years ago a commission was appointed composed of Sir George Garneau, then mayor of Quebec, Sir Edmund Walker, Mr. Dennison, the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, Minister of Public Works of Quebec, Mr. Turgeon, president of the Legislative Council of Quebec, and the late Sir George Drummond. Upon the death of Sir George Drummond, the hon. member for St. Lawrence division, Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike) was appointed to replace him on that commission. The object of the commission was to implement what had already been done towards nationalizing what is known as the Plains of Abraham of Quebec. The House is aware that some legislation was passed a few years ago empowering that commission to acquire certain lands and farms around the Plains of Abraham, and near the other battlefield of Ste. Foy. The commission went to work very diligently, and has so far done splendid work. It has acquired practically all the buildings and lands which naturally come under the scope of the commission. There remains, however, a few lands and a few properties to be acquired, and the object of this Bill is to give the commission the power to expropriate these properties. The various estates and lands are mentioned in the first clause of the Bill. The second clause requires a little more explanation. I may say that the commission has been unanimous in reporting in favour of the acquisition of those properties. Some of them belong to the federal government, and some of them belong either to the Dominion government or to the local government. For instance, the observatory building on the Plains of Abraham is one in regard to which we do not yet know whether it belongs to the federal government or the local government, but that will be ascertained. It is also desired to acquire one of the old Martello towers on the edge of the St. Charles valley. This old tower is decaying, and it was thought that, being an old relic of the past, it should pass into the hands of the Quebec Battlefields Commission. The next clause also requires some explanation. The commission has obtained the service of the well-known landscape architect, Mr. Todd, who was employed, I think, for the embellishment of the environs of Ottawa. They have decided, under the supervision of Mr. Todd, to open an avenue from the battlefields on the Plains of Abraham to the other battlefield on the Ste. Foy road facing the monument, as the Monument des Braves is on the Ste. Foy road. The first decision of the commission was to open and widen an already existing avenue known as the Belvedere. But that avenue was not in a straight line between the battlefields on the Plains of Abraham and the Ste. Foy battlefield; so they have decided to open another avenue which will be in direct line between the Monument des Braves and the Plains of Abraham. It will add to the spectacular effect of the park when it is completed. The first project would have cost the commission a sum amounting to $19,000. By the second project which is now submitted to the consideration of the House, the town of Montcalm, one of the suburbs of the city of Quebec, has agreed to give the commission the lands necessary for the opening of that avenue. The town of Montcalm asks in return to be loaned a sum of $15,000 for a period of thirty years, at which time the town will reimburse the commission with interest at the rate of three per cent per annum. This amount will be loaned by the commission to the town of Montcalm in order that the town itself may acquire the necessary estates and lands for the construction of that road.

Mr. SPROULE. Does not the hon. gentleman think that this Bill should be introduced by resolution, since it contemplates a charge upon the revenue?

Mr. LEMIEUX. This is not money of the government, the money required for the acquisition of these lands is already in the hands of the commission. The fund now in their hands is composed of sums received, not only from various parts of Canada, but from the British Empire at large. In fact subscriptions were received from New Zealand, from Australia, from Great Britain and from all the British colonies, as well as from the various provinces of Canada, and there were private subscriptions in great number. The amount now in the hands of the commission, I am informed by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence division, amounts to from $300,000 to $350,000. It is with this fund that the commission desires to acquire the said properties. But even though the commission desires to acquire these properties with their own fund, yet, according to past legislation, it has to come to the Dominion parliament, because all sales made to the commission must receive the approval of the Governor in Council. Before I take my seat I may be allowed to lay on the table of the House, or to insert in 'Hansard,' the report of the landscape architect, Mr. Todd, on the National Battlefields under the control of the commission. As I said a moment ago, Mr. Todd has been engaged by the commission, and has prepared an outline of the great national park which will be one of the features of our national life. I would like the members of the House to read this report, which is not very long. I will hand it to the 'Hansard,' so that hon. gentlemen may be able to read it tomorrow. Later on, the commission may come to parliament for further aid, when the members of the House will have an opportunity to appreciate the demands made by the commission. The report is as follows:—

10 Phillips Place,
November 15, 1909.

Sir George Garneau,
Chairman, National Battlefields Commission,
Quebec.

Dear Sir George,—In compliance with your request of last May, I have examined the Plains of Abraham and other property under the control of your commission, and that which you propose to acquire, with a view of presenting to you a general scheme or plan, the gradual development of which would seem to me to insure the restoration and permanent preservation of its impressive grandeur and historic interest, and at the same time make it available for public use and enjoyment.

With a situation unequalled and historical associations almost unparalleled, it is clear that you have in this property, where the fate of Canada and perhaps the whole continent more than once hung in the balance, the making of a park 'par excellence.' There are other parks of magnificent views, and many places in the world over where the memory of past deeds of valour fill the soul of man with high ambitions and patriotism, but it is no exaggeration to say that in no other place can we find such grandeur of proportion, such sublime views combined with such a wealth of historical associations, as in encompassed within this park, which legacy you have the privilege of handing down to future generations, with its grandeur and beauty undespoiled, and its historical interest revived and hallowed with the passing time.

To adequately describe your possessions is impossible. One must see to appreciate the grandeur of the views, one must wander at leisure over these old fields of strife, now so peaceful, and must live over the lives of these great men, who gave up their lives for their country, to begin to appreciate what a priceless gem is this National Battlefields Park. This vast treasure house of the history which is so closely intertwined with that of Canada, with its magnificent panorama of views, you have secured to be dedicated forever to the people of Canada, and the question of how you shall make this available to those who wish to study its history or to gather inspiration from its sublime views, of how you shall plan the necessary artificial features of the drives, walks, and shelters, without injuring its natural beauty or historical associations, is the problem which I have endeavoured to solve in the accompanying plan.

In presenting the plans, I have in several instances given numbers to drives and entrances to aid in describing the plan.

Broadly speaking the park is divided by its geography and topographical features into five distinct parts.

First, That portion from the Citadel to Wolfe's monument, which consists largely of a high undulating plateau, broken by small elevations. This portion of the park I have endeavoured to keep as natural and informal as possible, and at the same time have avoided planting many trees, in order that it may remain as near as possible in the condition in which it was when the historic battles took place. In fact the only planting which is suggested is here and there a group of trees along the drives and walks, to break the monotony, and groups of trees massed along the outskirts of the park in order to screen out what may be inharmonious private property.

Second, We have that large area of comparatively level ground which has been for so long known as the 'Plains of Abraham.' This portion of the park it has seemed desirable to treat in quite a formal manner. It is proposed to locate the new monument at the edge of the slope about opposite the middle of these plains, and this is approached by a formal drive from each side of the park. It is proposed that these drives should be bordered by trees planted at regular distances in contrast with the planting in other portions of the park, which is of an entirely informal character. Thus will be formed a proper setting and dignified approach for this monument, which is to be the crowning feature of the park. At the same time the formal arrangement of this portion of the park preserves an extensive open space, where parades and encampments may be held. In order to produce most satisfactory results, it would be necessary to build up a retaining wall of considerable height to form a terrace on which to place this monument, and as the plains are broken by a small excrescence in the centre, the material might be taken from this elevation and used for building up the terrace for this monument, thus obviating the necessity of obtaining filling from a distance.

Third, We have extending from the edge of this plateau to the escarpment bordering the river a large area of rather steeply sloping ground which is covered by a dense growth of coxspur thorn, and other small-growing native trees and shrubs. This portion of the park it is proposed to keep in perfectly wild and natural condition with walks leading through it in various directions and along the edge of the escarpment. In most places this escarpment is so steep as to be dangerous and when walks are laid out along here, protecting fences will be required in many places.

Fourth, We have a narrow strip of land extending from the plains to the Wolfe Cove road, and from Champlain street to the Merici property. Considered from a landscape point of view this is a charming spot, with its gently undulating topography extending to the steep cliff and open groves of lofty pine and elm, while historically it is of the greatest interest, as it was up this steep cliff in the shelter of the small point of land that General Wolfe and his advance guard climbed and put to flight the small French poste encamped at the head of the road leading up from the cove, thus gaining the key to the plains above.

Fifth, We have a small park on the Ste. Foy road, which although in itself possessing few features of marked beauty except magnificent views, is a point of great historical interest as one of the most fiercely contested positions in the battle of Ste. Foy. The distant views, rather poorly shown in photograph No. 1 accompanying this report, obtained from this park over the St. Charles valley, are entirely different from those obtained from the other parts of the park, and are equally charming.

It has been rather difficult to design this Ste. Foy park in such a way as to provide a proper setting for the Monument des Braves, and at the same time lay out the park in a pleasing manner. The proposed arrangement, I think does this as well as circumstances will allow. By making two entrances equally distant from the monument, a certain needed formality is given, which could not be secured with one entrance, and below the monument the park is laid out in an irregular manner, which I think will be pleasing, and admit of its best use by the public.

ENTRANCES.

The question of a suitable entrance to your park is one of the greatest importance. There must necessarily be several entrances, but there should be one principal one, so located and constructed as to give some idea of the importance of the park to which it is an entrance, and in so far as possible to be an index to the general character and associations of the park itself. This matter of a proper entrance to a public park is not given the attention in this country that it should. We often see a park with drives and walks well laid out, and with beautiful landscape, while the entrance is entirely unmarked, or else marked by some fantastic gateway entirely out of harmony with the character of the park. We recognize the importance of a well designed entrance to our buildings, and would be shocked to see a large classic public building with merely a hole in the wall for an entrance, or an entrance made out of rustic boulders, nor would any amount of interior beauty dispel from our minds this disagreeable first impression. It is equally important that a park should have a well designed entrance, it may be of the most simple and inexpensive construction, or it may be large and costly, but it should be of harmonious design and of such proportions and construction as will lend dignity to the park itself. This has always been recognized in the old country, as for example the stately entrance to Hyde Park in London. What could be more dignified or show more clearly the character of the park itself? Again take the entrance to the Bois de Boulonge at Paris, or that gem of French parks, Parc de la Tete d'Or at Lyons, and yet these parks, beautiful as they are, have nothing to compare with the grandeur and historic associations of your Quebec Battlefields Park to act as an inspiration for the designing of an entrance.

Entrance No. 1, or Main Entrance.—The logical place for your main entrance is to be found on the left, immediately after passing through the St. Louis gate, at the side of the high Citadel wall. An entrance at this point could be made very characteristic, for you have at the east side of the entrance, the massive time worn wall of the Citadel, and I would suggest making the entrance really form a part of this wall, by building a wing wall slightly lower than that of the Citadel wall and at right angles to it across the west side of the present skating rink. You will see by photograph No. 2 accompanying these plans, that it would be impossible to make any kind of an effective entrance here without removing this skating rink, but by removing it and having an entrance occupy the whole width of this space, it could be made very effective and impressive. I am submitting with this a sketch for an entrance, which carries out in some measure my ideas of what would be effective. This sketch is not to be considered as a proposed plan, but simply as a suggestion to show the effect of such an entrance. One of the most important and effective features of such an entrance would be that the instant you have passed through the gateway you obtain a most striking and impressive view of the Citadel fortifications, which would help greatly to carry out the prevailing idea of the park. Photograph No. 3 gives an idea of what this view would be, although if the rough material which has been dumped near the rear end of the present skating rink were removed, the view would be even more effective than the photograph shows.

Entrance No. 2.—The entrance to your park of next importance would naturally be located near the present Wolfe monument. At this point it seems to me that the present straight drive leading up to the monument should be widened, and that a low entrance should be constructed, with gate piers eight or ten feet in height, conforming in character to the main entrance. As shown by photograph No. 4, the present entrance at this point is very poor, in fact can hardly be called an entrance. The monument itself is distinguished in the distance with an iron railing about it. The street between the entrance and the monument should be re-graded and laid out formally in order to unite it pleasingly with the formal arrangement which I have suggested about the monument itself. I would suggest that sufficient property be taken on either side of the entrance to allow for a double row of trees, as shown on the plan.

Entrance No. 3.—On account of its being necessary to maintain a certain amount of formality in the treatment of this portion of the park, I would suggest that this entrance be made similar to entrance No. 2.

Other Entrances.—There would be several other entrances to the park, viz., at Lansdowne, Tache, and Montcalm streets, and at Wolfe's Hill, Belvidere Road, etc., but these would hardly rank as important entrances, and could be marked by simple stone piers, in harmony with the other entrances.

DRIVES.

In locating the drives, it has been my endeavour to keep before me three important considerations, to place them so that they do not break the pleasing continuity of the park, and disfigure it as little as possible; to make them conform as far as practicable to the natural contour of the ground, so that there will be no bad grades or disfiguring cuts and fills; and to locate them in such a way that a person is brought by the most pleasing and convenient route to the finest view points, and to the places of greatest historical interest.

Drive No. 1.—I have so designated the drive leading from the main entrance as far as Wolfe's monument. After passing through the main gateway, where one is confronted by the impressive view of the Citadel, this drive curves out into the broad valley in the rear of the drill hall, and gradually ascends the hill, on which are located the martello towers, where a most beautiful view of the entire easterly section of the park is obtained, as shown in photograph No. 5. This view is, of course, at presently badly marred by the Dominion arsenal buildings. It is also somewhat difficult to realize or form a proper appreciation of this view because its proportions and distances are so large, and there is nothing at present to give it scale. A few well placed groups of trees would make a great difference in the view and afford the eye the necessary scale to properly grasp its proportions.

From the martello towers westward, the drive descends into the valley, where occurred the actual battle between the contending forces, and by a gentle curve approaches Wolfe's monument.

The present tower street, leading from Montcalm street to the monument, it would seem better to abandon and locate as shown on the plan. You will notice by referring to photograph No. 6, which is taken from the centre of tower street looking toward the jail, that this is a very poor approach indeed to Wolfe's monument. The street is laid out so that it appears to terminate in the blank wall of the jail, and it is necessary to squeeze by one corner of the jail and then descend by a sharp grade to the monument, whereas, by diverting this drive as shown on the plan, this disagreeable feature is obviated, and a pleasing drive with an easy grade secured with an approach directly on the axis of the monument.

Drive No. 2.—At a short distance from the main entrance this drive branches off from drive No. 1, and ascending gradually the ruins of the covered way forming part of the old fortifications constructed by the English army, reaches the high point known as Cape Diamond. From this point are obtained perhaps the finest and most impressive views of the whole park. The view up the river partially shown in photograph No. 7, is particularly fine. Hundreds of feet below and almost underneath one, winds the historic Champlain street, bordered by its quaint houses cut into the face of the cliff. Flowing by is the majestic St. Lawrence, bearing on its beautiful expanse an everchanging burden of marine craft, while in the distance Wolfe's Cove and the picturesque Sillery church on its high plateau, jutting out into the river, make a picture of rare beauty. At this point the drive should be widened to form a concourse, so that a number of carriages could stand without interfering with others passing, and I would suggest also the building of a shelter at this point. Leaving the extremity of Cape Diamond, the drive should follow for a few hundred feet the old roadway, forming part of these fortifications, and still descending would approach quite close to the Citadel wall at its highest point. Here also the panoramic views are very impressive, but perhaps not as distinctly pleasing as those from Cape Diamond itself. From this point the drive would descend by a fairly easy grade and rejoin drive No. 1.

Drive No. 3.—This is rather a formal drive, extending from entrance No. 2 straight to Wolfe's monument, and then bordering the Plains of Abraham to the terrace on which is located the new monument. The grade of this drive is almost level and will form a good approach to the monument.

Drive No. 4.—Branching from drive No. 1, this would pass through the present location of the arsenal laboratory, and following around the base of the hill would pass below the little hill east of the fulminate of mercury plant, and would then follow along the side of this fairly steep slope below the Martello Tower No. 1, and continuing would pass below the observatory, gradually ascending again to the proposed new monument. In some respects it is to be regretted that this drive cannot be carried more on the upper level and take advantage of the fine views which are to be obtained from such points as those on which are located the Ross rifle factory and the observatory, but as this seems impossible, the drive has been carried for its entire distance along the side slope, and in many ways you will find this an exceedingly pleasing location. The views differ entirely from these to be had from the upper drives, and there is such a thick natural growth of trees and shrubbery that it will make the drive very interesting, especially if the evenness of this present growth is broken up here and there by the planting of higher growing trees. The distance that this drive follows this side slope is almost a mile, and in order to avoid its becoming monotonous, it will require careful treatment in the way of arranging vistas by planting and other means, so that a succession of interesting views will be obtained rather than a continuous panorama. The construction of this drive will be a little more difficult than that of the other drives, as there will be a cut and fill for the greater part of the distance.

Drive No. 5.—This would enter the park at the westerly side of the Plains of Abraham and approach the new monument in a formal manner similar to drive No. 3.

Drive No. 6.—This drive would leave the westerly end of the monument terrace, and descending would pass along the brow of the cliff where Capt. Delaune and his band first ascended, and continuing along the brow of the cliff would join the present road leading up from Wolfe's Cove.

Drive No. 7.—You are particularly fortunate in being able to arrange such a fine approach to Ste. Foy park as that given by this boulevard.

Drive No. 8.—A formal drive enters this park from each side of the monument, and from the centre branches descend to the lower side of the park by pleasing curves and wind along the edge of the escarpment overlooking the St. Charles valley, thus taking advantage of these magnificent views.

WALKS.

By reference to the plan you will see that walks are shown leading to the various points of interest in the park from the different entrances. It has been my endeavour with the walks, as with the drives, so as to locate them, that they would exhibit the various features of the park to best advantage. Some of these walks in the less used portions of the park would be more pleasingly kept in turf until such time as their use makes gravel walks necessary.

MONUMENTS AND SHELTERS.

Cape Diamond Shelter.—On Cape Diamond I have suggested a small shelter, as this is perhaps the finest viewpoint in the whole park, and will undoubtedly be very much frequented by those who wish to enjoy these views. In constructing this shelter, I would suggest that it be designed in such a manner as to harmonize with its surroundings, and it seems to me that the best material to use for its construction would be undressed native stone. The base of the shelter could be built entirely of this, and would practically form part of the cape itself, while if part of the piers supporting the roof were also of rustic stone, and the roof covered with red tile there could be just enough colour to provide a pleasing contrast.

Wolfe's Monument.—I do not know how far you would care to go in making any changes in this monument, shown in photograph No. 8. The shaft itself is pleasing, but the surroundings and setting of the monument are lacking entirely in anything which make it really impressive, or which lend it the dignity such a monument ought to have. Therefore, I would suggest that a formal court or square be laid out about this monument, and that the monument itself be raised and placed on a base of sufficient proportions to render it more impressive, and at the same time of such design as will harmonize with the present shaft.

New Monument and Terrace—The location suggested on the plan for the new monument seems to me to be the best which could be selected in the entire park. There might be some advantages in having this located on Cape Diamond, but it would be very difficult to obtain there the necessary formal surroundings which are required to form a proper setting for such a monument, and situated as proposed, it can be seen to advantage from any part of the Plains of Abraham, and will be a distinctive landmark as seen from the water. The proportions of this park are so large, and especially as viewed from the water, that it will be necessary to have the design of this monument sufficiently grand in its proportions to crown this natural slope, and in order to do this, I think the monument itself should stand on a broad terrace from 400 to 600 feet in length, the masonry of which would rise above the existing slope at least 20 feet or high enough to provide a proper base for the monument as viewed from the river. I have suggested that the monument itself occupy the centre of this terrace, and that the terrace be terminated at either end by a low shelter.

Monument des braves.—This monument, photograph No. 9, forms a most effective termination for the approach drive (No. 7). The base of this is better than that of the Wolfe monument, but I would suggest that here also the surrounding fence be removed, and that a formal entrance be built about the base.

HISTORICAL TABLETS AND MARKS.

This is something which is rather outside the scope of this report, and yet the interest of the park depends so much on its history, that tablets and small monuments properly inscribed should be placed wherever necessary, but in all cases I would suggest that these be kept low, and not intrude unnecessarily into the landscape of the park.

Whenever the jail is removed from its present location, I think it would be a very pleasing feature to restore the Wolfe redoubt which surmounted this hill.

The old English fortifications on Cape Diamond, although not built until a number of years later, are very interesting and would seem to be worthy of being restored and preserved at least as ruins.

The two martello towers, photographs Nos. 10 and 11, situated not far distant from the Ross rifle factory, are objects of considerable historic interest, and particularly the one situated nearest the river, adds much to the character of the park as viewed from the river, and it seems to me a great sacrilege that this tower should be surmounted by the ugly water tank as it is at present, and moreover the walls of this tower are at present apparently being used as a butt to shoot at in testing rifles, and for a considerable area on the northeast side the stone has been broken away by the continual shooting. Certainly these towers are well worth preserving, and should not be used for such purposes.

PLANTING.

I doubt if there is anything in the entire work on your park which will require more care in handling, or which if effectively handled, will do more to enhance the beauty and interest of the park, than the judicious planting of trees. Owing to the fact that the character of this park is so entirely different from that of the ordinary park, and also on account of the desire to retain the features of the topography as historically correct as possible, the amount of planting must be very limited, and must be confined to the borders of the park, with here and there an odd tree to give proper proportions to the views.

I have on this preliminary general plan shown the location of the trees, where it seems to me they should be placed, but before this planting is carried out the whole question should be studied in detail, and the position and variety of trees carefully considered, for the effect of this planting as it reaches maturity will do much to make or mar the appearance of the park. If you could put in the trees just as they are to look when 25 or 50 years old, it would be a comparatively easy matter, but inasmuch as this cannot be done, and the trees have to be put in and allowed to grow to maturity, it is absolutely necessary that they be carefully selected with a full knowledge of what their effect will be in after years.

In planting in the vicinity of the Citadel, I would suggest using largely the pyramidal-growing Lombardy poplar, for no other tree can add interest to the old fortifications as would a few of these characteristic trees. Starting at Entrance No. 1, I would suggest just an odd two or three of these trees between the entrance and Grande Allée. Inside the entrance I would omit the planting against the Citadel wall until you come to the group shown on the plan on the higher ground. This will allow the Citadel wall to be seen to its most striking advantage. Near the entrance I have suggested massing trees and shrubs along the border of the private property, and this planting is continued irregularly along the border of the park wherever it is bordered by such property. Along drive No. 1 are proposed a few scattered trees, which should be largely composed of broad-spreading native trees such as the Sugar maple. Between drive No. 1 and the wooded slope below the martello tower No. 1, I have suggested very little planting, as it seemed to me more effective and more historically correct to leave this entirely open.

Two groups of trees are shown on Cape Diamond, and although it may be fairly questioned whether these would be historically correct or not, they will do so much towards increasing the interest of this portion of the park and in giving proper scale as viewed from a distance, that I think they should be used.

The formal planting of trees along the drive leading to Wolfe's monument, about this court, and along the drives leading to the proposed new monument can be readily understood by reference to the plan, and needs no additional explanation.

The character of the park from the edge of the upper plateau to the edge of the escarpment is and always has been so entirely different, that I have suggested here not only retaining the greater part of the existing growth, but re-enforcing it very considerably with the planting of larger growing trees. The arrangement of the trees along this drive will require careful study in order to properly frame in the different vistas, and in order to provide a liberal amount of shade, which is very much to be desired along this drive on account of its being on the southerly slope and sheltered from prevailing winds.

Below the proposed new monument in particular the planting requires very careful treatment in order to add to and not interfere with its effectiveness.

On that portion of the park between the Merici property and the escarpment, I would suggest using largely the native white pine and cedar, in order to restore this as nearly as possible to the conditions that existed when Wolfe gained the ascent at this point.

The trees along the boulevard should be ordinary street trees, which are suitable for your climate, and of which none is probably better than the hard or sugar maple and elm.

In the planting at Ste. Foy park, the chief object will be to provide a formal setting for the monument and needed shade along the walks and drives, and to screen out the adjacent private property.

LAND REQUIRED.

You have supplied me with a plan drawn by C. E. Gauvin, Esq., dated October 31, 1908, showing lands intended to be acquired by your commission in order to properly carry out your park plans. In addition to the requirements as shown on the plan, it seems to me quite necessary that the following property should be acquired.

As already mentioned in discussing the main entrance, it will be necessary to procure the property of the skating rink shown in photograph No. 1, in order to make an effective entrance.

Between the present Montcalm street and Wolfe monument, it would seem desirable that lots Nos. 4441 and 4442 should be acquired back to the line shown on the accompanying plan. The whole of this area is not absolutely required, but a large portion of it is necessary in order that the drive may properly approach Wolfe's monument, as shown on the plan, and the taking of these lots back to the suggested line makes a much better park boundary than to acquire just enough for the road, and as this entire ground is one of the most important parts of the actual battlefields, and where Wolfe fell mortally wounded, it is of much historic interest.

On both sides of the present entrance to Wolfe's monument it will be necessary to acquire the private property and to tear down the two rather poor houses at present standing here, and shown in photograph No. 4, in order that an effective entrance may be made.

On the Gauvin plan above mentioned, you show a line through the Merici property, the land south of which you intend to take for the purposes of your park. I have been unable to lay out a drive along this escarpment which is entirely satisfactory, without encroaching at some points still further on the Merici property. In order to keep south of the line as now proposed the drive would join the Wolfe's Cove road just where the grade is very bad, and in addition a sharp curve is required. If a small additional piece of the Merici property is taken the drive can be located as shown on the accompanying plan, so that it will form practically a continuation of Gilmore Hill road and escape the greater part of this bad grade. I would, therefore, suggest that the taking the line through the Merici property be changed as shown on the accompanying plan.

If there is anything in this report or on the plans which I have not made clear, about which you wish additional information, kindly let me know.

Respectfully submitted,
(Sgd.) FREDERICK G. TODD.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this money that is put at the disposal of the commission in the hands of the Receiver General or in the hands of the commission?

Mr. LEMIEUX. In the hands of the commission.

Mr. SPROULE. How does it come then that parliament is asked to grant power to the commission to spend their own money?

Mr. LEMIEUX. At the time the commission was created it was provided that not a red cent of the money received from the various parts of the empire should be spent without receiving the sanction of the Dominion parliament, and also of the Governor in Council. With this sanction, the people of the country will have confidence that their money is being properly expended.

Mr. SPROULE. Even with the consent of the Governor in Council, if parliament has a right to give authority to use this money for that purpose, it comes under the control of the Crown in such a way as to require the consent of the Governor in Council. Besides that we are either taking or purchasing a highway that, I presume, will be for all time in the future a charge upon the revenue; it will have to be kept up by the government.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We do not buy it ourselves.

Mr. SPROULE. Though it should come to us by way of gift, we still will be charged with the responsibility of maintaining it for all time. In addition to that, parliament will likely be invited to give an additional amount to that commission to carry out the purposes which they have in view. I think it would be well to take a little time to consider it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have stated that the moneys belong to the commission. The commission was appointed by parliament, and it was resolved then that nothing should be spent towards the acquisition of land or property except it were done under the supervision of the Dominion government. This being a national park, it is well that parliament should have control over the enterprise.

Mr. SPROULE. Will not this money have to be paid out of the consolidated revenue, and will it not be a charge upon the consolidated revenue, if they commence the undertaking now and acquire property that must of necessity compel them to pay out money in the future?

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is no question but that later on, if the commission comes to parliament to get some further aid towards beautifying or maintaining this park, then such aid will have to be introduced by way of resolution. But in the present case the object is to give legislative sanction to an act of the commission, an act to purchase property with their own funds which they hold in trust.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does the proposed purchase include the Ross Rifle factory?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. LENNOX. There are a few points which the minister has not explained fully. First, I would like to know why this matter has been delayed until now. In common with many other members, I have very serious objection to matters being rushed through the House when we have not proper time to consider them, and I do not think we have proper time to consider this matter now. I would like to know in the second place what is the urgency for doing it now. Then I would like to know as to the acreage of land it is proposed to acquire, and what is the amount of expense contemplated. I would like a fuller explanation as to the proposal of the town of Montcalm. I understood the minister to say that Montcalm proposed to make a gift, and that in consideration of that gift he wishes to authorize the commission to make a loan to the town of $15,000, without interest for a certain length of time, after which interest will be paid at the rate of three per cent.

I am very doubtful of the right of parliament to sanction anything of that kind; I do not think it was ever contemplated when this trust was created that an adventure of this kind should be entered upon. If the municipality of Montcalm feels disposed to make a gift let them do so, but for us to authorize a loan by this trust would not be a proper thing. Was not a considerable portion of the money now in hand contributed by the Dominion parliament?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I shall be glad to state the amount in the hands of the commission on the second or third reading of the Bill. I gather from the hon. member for St. Lawrence division, Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike), who is a member of the commission, that they have about $300,000 in cash, perhaps a little more.

Mr. LENNOX. I want to know if any came from the Dominion government?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly. The large portion of that amount came from the various provinces of Canada, but a very large amount from other sections of the empire. As regards the proposed arrangement with the town of Montcalm, I shall read a letter which I have received from Sir George Garneau, president of the commission, who says:

As to the proposed loan of a sum not exceeding $15,000 to the town of Montcalm, the position is as follows:

It was at first intended to connect the two battlefields, of the Plains of Abraham and of Ste. Foy, by widening the present Belvidere road and making it one of the Park avenues and authority to acquire the necessary land on the east side of the Belvidere road for the purpose of widening was granted by 7-8 Edward VII, chapter 58, schedule No. 3. The acquiring of this land would have cost over $19,000. The commissioners now propose to open a new avenue instead of utilizing the Belvidere road, which new avenue will be in line with the Ste. Foy monument and will greatly improve the general scheme of the park. The municipality of the town of Montcalm has agreed to give to the commission the land required for the proposed avenue on condition that the avenue be built and maintained, as a part of the National Battlefields Park, by the commission. As this municipality is called upon at present to make heavy disbursement on capital account for the laying of water and drainage pipes in the rapidly extending parts of the town, which practically absorbs its borrowing powers, the commission has agreed to advance the amount required for the purchase of the right of way from the private holders on the condition that the municipality cede it to the commission and reimburse the amount by annual instalments extending over thirty years with interest at the rate of 3 per cent, subject to the approval of parliament. This is the power that is prayed for by article 3 of the proposed Bill. The net result as far as the commission (and the public) is concerned is that instead of paying over $19,000 for the land required to widen the Belvidere road it will get the land for the new avenue gratuitously and build and maintain the avenue in either case.

So it is, in my judgment, a good transaction which is being made by the commission. A few days ago I met two of the commissioners, Mr. Denison of Toronto and Sir Edmund Byron Walker. Sir Edmund Walker stated to the Prime Minister, the Finance Minister and myself that he considered this a great improvement on the first scheme to widen the Belvidere road, because it is in a straight line between the Ste. Foye monument and the Plains of Abraham. I do not think any exception should be taken because the commission take the proper precaution of coming before parliament to get the necessary sanction.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). What about the urgency?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The tercentenary of Quebec took place in 1908. We are now in 1911. This is the remaining portion of the lands necessary to begin the beautifying, and embellishment of the park. The commission have engaged Mr. Todd, the landscape architect, on the suggestion of the Dominion government, and he has made a very lengthy report which my hon. friend will read in 'Hansard' to-morrow. The people who have subscribed for the acquisition and beautifying of the battlefields naturally wish to know what has been done with their money, and it is time to start vigorously in order that the work may be accomplished without undue loss of time.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The government knew this three months ago.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This has been before me for some time. The Prime Minister had to introduce the Bill at some time during the session, and I do not think any time has been lost.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). It is six months to-day since the House met.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is nothing in this Bill which is controversial.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the minister consider that the proposed arrangement with the village of Montcalm comes within the terms of trust created some years ago?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly, and the very reason that the commission applied to parliament for the sanction of their operations is that they can do by this Act of parliament what they cannot do of their own authority. Any transaction of the commission whether by way of loan or sale or purchase must come before parliament.

Mr. LENNOX. We created a commission for the disbursement of money for specific purposes, and they have no right to go into an extraneous matter. Have they the right to begin to loan money?

Mr. EMMERSON. Is it not one way of acquiring land?

Mr. LEMIEUX. They might acquire the land by loan or by payment of cash. I will explain on the third reading.

Mr. SPROULE. I raise no objection now to the form of procedure, but I shall ask the ruling of Mr. Speaker later on.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COLLINGWOOD DRY-DOCK.

Mr. PUGSLEY moved: That the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution.

Resolved, that it is expedient to ratify and confirm an agreement between the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, Limited, and His Majesty, dated the 27th day of July, 1910, respecting the construction of a dry dock at the town of Collingwood, and to authorize the Governor in Council to pay an annual subsidy of three per cent per annum for 20 years upon the sum of $306,965.18 being the cost of the construction of the dry dock.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been apprised of the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—LEASING OF BRANCH LINES.

Mr. GRAHAM moved: That the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolutions:

Whereas, by chapter 25, of the statutes of 1910, it was provided that the Minister of Railways and Canals might, subject to the terms and conditions therein contained, lease lines of railway connecting with the government railways and operate them as a part of the government railways, but no leases have been made under the said Act: and whereas it is deemed advisable to make the provisions hereinafter contained for the leasing of the undermentioned line of railway. Therefore it is resolved that it is expedient that the Minister of Railways and Canals be authorized, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to lease for a term not exceeding 99 years the following line of railway, namely: —The Vale railway, property of the Acadia

Coal Company, Limited, extending from New Glasgow to Thorburn, in the province of Nova Scotia, a distance of about six miles, upon terms and conditions to be approved of by the government railways managing board; provided, however, that the consideration by way of rental for such line of railway shall be an annual rental of one dollar and the carriage of the traffic of the company, its successors and assigns, upon the line of railway to be leased and upon the government railways, and between points to be designated and at rates not in excess of maximum fixed rates for such carriage between such points, such fixed rates to be subject to a provision for revision of such rates at the end of each period of 10 years during the continuation of the lease.

Such railway so leased shall become and be operated as a part of the government railway.

And the following:

Whereas, by chapter 25, of the statutes of 1910, it was provided that the Minister of Railways and Canals might subject to the terms and conditions therein contained, lease lines of railway connecting with the government railways and operate them as a part of the government railways but no leases have been made under the said Act, and whereas it is deemed advisable to make the provisions hereinafter contained for the leasing of certain of such lines of railway. Therefore it is resolved, that it is expedient that the Minister of Railways and Canals be authorized, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to lease for a term not exceeding 99 years, any of the following lines of railway, namely:

The Quebec Oriental railway, extending from Matapedia to Paspebiac, a distance of about one hundred miles;

The Hampton and St. Martins railway, extending from Hampton to St. Martins, a distance of about thirty miles;

The Albert railway, extending from Salisbury to Albert, a distance of about forty-five miles;

The Moncton and Buctouche railway, extending from Moncton to Buctouche, a distance of about twenty-eight miles;

The Caraquet railway and Gulf Shore railway, together extending from Bathurst to Tracadie, a distance of about eighty-five miles;

The York and Carleton railway, extending from Cross Creek to and beyond Stanley, a distance of about ten miles;

The International railway, extending from Campbellton to the St. John valley at St. Leonards, a distance of about one hundred and thirteen miles;

The Cape Breton railway, extending from Point Tupper to St. Peters, a distance of about thirty miles;

The Temiscouata railway, extending from Rivière du Loup to Connors, a distance of about one hundred and thirteen miles;

The New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, extending from Sackville Junction to Cape Tormentine, a distance of about thirty miles;

The Elgin and Havelock railway, extending from Elgin to Havelock, a distance of about twenty-eight miles;

The Kent Northern railway, extending from Kent Junction to Richibucto, a distance of about twenty-seven miles;

Including the company's rolling stock in each case.

Upon terms and conditions to be approved of by the Government Railways Managing Board, provided, however, that the rental to be paid for each such line of railway shall in no case exceed an amount to be determined in the following manner, that is to say, the value of the railway proposed to be leased shall be fixed and determined by the judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, upon the report of the chief engineer of the government railways, based upon the examination of the railway by, and the report of the engineer appointed by the Department of Railways and Canals to inspect such railway during construction, such value also to include interest during construction, the cost of equipping the railway, the cost of terminals and right of way of the railway now in use in the operation of the said railway in any city or incorporated town, (the amount of such interest during construction, the cost of equipping the railway, the cost of terminals and of right of way of the railway in any city or incorporated town to be fixed by such judge upon proper and sufficient evidence) and deducting therefrom any aid received from the government of Canada towards the construction of such railway, and also deducting such amount, if any, as may, in the opinion of the said chief engineer, be necessary to put any such line of railway in a safe and efficient condition.

Except that in the case of railways which have, since their construction, either through sale, foreclosure proceedings, transfer of shares of stock or securities, become either wholly or substantially the property of other companies or persons, at a cost less than the original cost thereof with the deduction aforesaid, then the value of such last mentioned railways shall for rental purposes hereunder, be determined by such judge upon evidence of, and shall be based upon the amounts actually paid by the present owners for such line of railway, shares and securities, respectively. Such judge shall, in the case of the railways last above mentioned, make a report showing the amounts paid for such railways and their rolling stock, shares and securities, respectively, and the owners thereof, as of date of April 1, 1911. After receiving the report and finding of such judge, the Minister of Railways may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, lease any of said lines of railway and pay therefor, for the first five years of the term of the lease, an amount as rental not exceeding three per cent per annum on such value so fixed by such judge; for the next five years of the term of the lease an amount not exceeding three and one-half per cent per annum on such value; and thereafter during the term of the lease an amount not exceeding four per cent per annum on such value, such rental to be paid half-yearly.

Nothing herein shall be deemed to require the taking over of any of the said railways if, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, having regard to the convenience of the public or the interests of the Intercolonial railway, the terms and conditions proposed by the company are not fair and reasonable.

Any such line so leased shall become and be operated as part of the government railways.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been apprised of the subject matter of these resolutions, recommends them to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

DALHOUSIE PILOTAGE DUES.

Mr. CROCKET. I am informed that the Marine Department has notified the collector of customs at Dalhousie not to collect pilotage on vessels carrying pulpwood from Dalhousie to Portland. Is the department of opinion that under the terms of the Shipping Act these vessels are exempt from pilotage dues, or, has the department power to exempt from pilotage dues vessels which under the Act are liable to pay?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will make inquiry and give an answer at three o'clock.

CORONATION STAMPS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the Postmaster General any announcement to make in reference to the coronation stamps?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is under way at present.

UNITED STATES TAX ON CANADIAN SHIPPING.

Mr. G. H. BARNARD (Victoria, B.C.) I call the attention of the government to the following article published in the Victoria 'Daily Colonist' of May 10, 1911:

A Bill aimed at Canadian shipping under which the coasting steamers plying to the United States ports will be called upon to pay a tonnage tax ranging from 10 cents a ton on vessels of the usual coasting type, to 50 cents a ton on steamers from 4,000 to 8,000 tons register has been introduced at Washington. This is one of two Bills introduced and aimed against Canadian and British shipping. The Bill introduced by Mr. Rucker, of Colorado, contains the following clause.

'Every vessel not of the United States that shall arrive direct from her own country, its colony, or possession, in ballast or merchandise produced there, or with passengers in a less portion than one-third of her burden or capacity, for freight or passengers as aforesaid, shall pay a duty on the gross measurement in addition to the regular duty imposed by law, as follows: On all vessels not exceeding 2,000 tons, 10 cents per ton; not exceeding 2,400 tons, 25 cents per ton; between 4,000 and 8,000 tons, 50 cents a ton: between 8,000 and 12,000 tons 75 cents a ton; between 12,000 and 16,000 tons, $1 a ton; between 16,000 and 20,000 tons, $1.25 a ton; exceeding 20,000 tons, $1.25 a ton.'

Under this law, if it comes into effect, the local steamers of the Canadian Pacific railway trading to Seattle would have to pay a tonnage tax of 10 cents a ton, which, in the case of the 'Princess Charlotte' of 1,925 tons register, would be $192.50 per trip, and the 'Princess Victoria' would be mulcted $43.30 a trip. The steamers plying to Alaskan ports would also suffer from this law. The Blue Funnel liners and the Weir liners would suffer, being called upon to pay 75 cents a ton, for they rarely have passengers to the extent of their tonnage. The Japanese liners, by touching at Victoria, would escape under this law, as by making a call at Victoria, they do not go direct from their home country, but the Japanese lines plying to San Francisco from the Orient would suffer.

Another Bill, introduced into the United States senate on April 20 last, by Mr. Gore, provides that, 'on and after July 1st next, all alien immigrants coming to the United States from any foreign country other than an adjacent country shall be required to embark upon a vessel of American register at a seaport of the country of which he is a lawful citizen, or subject, and of which he has been resident for two years.'

Here is another clause of the same Bill: 'Any and all vessels may be entitled to admission to registry in the United States for the purposes of this Act without regard to the place of construction, and without any requirements as to ownership, except that a majority interest of such vessels shall be owned by citizens of the United States.'

This means that no immigrants are in future to be allowed to go to the United States through Canadian ports or by Canadian lines. How immigrants can be brought across the Pacific for the United States under this law is hard to see, for there is but one steamer flying the United States flag in the North Pacific ocean trade, the Minnesota, which makes about five trips a year.

If these measures receive official sanction at Washington, local transportation men are expecting they will be followed up by measures equally prohibitive in Canadian railways doing an international business. A start has already been made by including in the first Act above mentioned a clause exempting from the operation of the interstate commerce commission and the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, freight brought to the United States in American ships.

I would like to ask the government if they have any knowledge of the introduction of these Acts, and if it is their intention to make representations to Washington that they would be, if passed, an undue discrimination against British and Canadian ships?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have no information at present in regard to such Acts; but if there is any truth in the statements published by this paper, I am quite sure that the government will make the necessary representations.

THE BRITISH COLUMBIA MILITIA.

Mr. GOODEVE. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to call the attention of the acting Minister of Militia—to some articles which are appearing in some of the western daily papers. The first article is from the Nelson 'Daily News' of April 20, and is headed: 'Go to Kamloops Camp or Resign; Situation of Officers in 102nd Regiment; Allege Neglect by Department.' The article says:

'Go to Kamloops on June 5 or resign,' exactly represents the situation in Nelson as regards the order which has been issued by Colonel Wadmore, D.O.C., to the effect that the 102nd Regiment shall go into camp on that date; and the unanimous decision of the officers of the regiment as far as can be gathered is that the latter is the only step which they can take.

Further on the article says:

Another point over which there is the greatest dissatisfaction is the drill hall. The armoury here was originally built to accommodate but one company. There are now two companies, a Maxim gun section, a stretcher bearer section, a signalling section, a bugle band and all their equipment. Last year a special store room was obtained by the regimental staff, but this, it is claimed, is far too small to accommodate all the equipment which has to be piled in, more or less discriminately, something after the junkshop manner. The regiment contended that the new rooms are needed for the Maxim gun detachment, for the stretcher bearer corps, for the signallers and for armoury purposes for 'C' Company. For over three years efforts have been made to induce the department to make these improvements with the net result that promises have been given and plans approved but nothing more tangible accomplished.

A little further on, under the heading of 'Ludicrous State of Affairs,' the article says:

A ludicrous feature of the neglect with which the regiment is said to be treated, and the general mismanagement at headquarters which is alleged, is that of clothing. It was learned during the past few days that if the regiment turned out to-morrow some of the men would be without coats, others would be without trousers, and others would be without caps. An instance of this mismanagement is that in 1907 the officers of the regiment were told that they were entitled in 1908 to 24 great coats, while none of these promised coats have arrived so far.

But that was a minor matter compared with the trouble that commenced after the general order was issued in September, 1909, that the green uniforms which up to that time were worn by the Canadian militia, were cancelled and that they were to be replaced by khaki clothing.

After several months of patient waiting on the part of the local officers, the clothing began to come along from headquarters in driblets, usually in very small and mixed driblets. For instance, one consignment consisted of four caps, eighteen pairs of trousers and five frocks. This varied assortment, naturally, was just sufficient to furnish four men, though one other might have gone on parade nicely dressed but with a bare head, while 14 others would have made a fine soldierly picture in their undershirts, caps and trousers and without any frocks.

Then, a paper of May 11, just to hand, represents that the dissatisfaction with this state of affairs has reached the climax. Above the article is a picture of Sir Frederick Borden, and it has these headings: 'Headquarters Officers Hand in Resignations; Officers of Other Units of Regiment Expected to Follow Suit; Ottawa Stands by District Officer Commanding.' Then it goes on to say:

The commissioned officers of the 102nd regiment R. M. R., in Nelson, which means all the officers of the headquarters establishment comprising 'B' and 'C' companies, Maxim gun section, stretcher bearer section, signalling section, and regimental staff, are resigning as a body, as a protest against the refusal of the Militia Department to pay the regiment for the drill and training of 1910-11. Many of the officers handed in their resignations yesterday, for transmission to the proper quarter, and it is undertsood that the balance will hand them in to-day. The drill and training of 1910-11 was duly performed, both by the headquarters establishment and by the companies in the other towns, but Colonel Wadmore, the new district officer commanding, both refused to grant the inspection requested and refused to allow pay. While this is not the chief ground on which nearly all units in the regiment have refused to attend the annual drill and training ordered for Kamloops in June, it is one oi the grounds, and it is one of the sorest points with the 102nd.

There are reasons for believing that the officers of the companies at Rossland, Kaslo, Revelstoke and Kamloops are about to resign also, on the same ground that serves the officers of the headquarters establishment.

The article then gives a list of the officers. At the time of the trouble in South Africa, no regiment was more prompt in offering its services than this regiment, and no men did better service than the men from these western contingents, and they seem to have a very just ground of complaint.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot discuss the matter on the orders of the day.

Mr. GOODEVE. I merely wish to ask what action the department intends to take with regard to the resignation of these officers?

Mr. KING. If the hon. gentleman will let me have the clippings which he has read, I will inquire in the department and endeavour to get the information.

PETAWAWA MILITARY CAMP.

Mr. KING. Yesterday the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) asked a question in regard to the military buildings at the Petawawa camp, which had been destroyed by fire. For his information I beg to say that the buildings were destroyed on the 11th instant. Two buildings at Petawawa camp grounds, the supply and ordnance buildings, were burnt, the fire having originated from lightning. The fire occurred about five o'clock in the morning, and notwithstanding the fact that within a very short time two streams of water were playing on the buildings, they and their contents were completely burnt, there being a very high wind blowing at the time. The loss by this fire is approximately as follows: Buildings, $6,000; stores $9,000; a total of $15,000. It is the intention of the department to rebuild these buildings, at least one of them, at once, and probably both.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Was there any insurance?

Mr. KING. The memorandum does not say.

THE FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE.

Mr. MARTIN BURRELL. Mr. Speaker, on Monday night, in answer to a question of the hon. leader of the opposition, the hon. Minister of Agriculture said that he had cabled to England and expected to get a report with regard to the withdrawal of the Battle of Chateauguay from the Pageant of the Festival of the Empire. I notice in this morning's paper the following press dispatch:

London, May 16.—Frank Lascelles, master of the Festival of the Empire pageant, in an interview to-day with reference to the strictures in the Canadian parliament because of the omission of the Battle of Chateauguay, said it was a storm in a teacup. The abandonment of the scene, he asserted was not due to fear of American feeling, but the result of the conclusion reached by the Canadian committee that the episode was not typical of Canadian life.

I might say that the day before yesterday I received the following letter on this subject:

St. James Street, S. W.
Royal Societies Club,
5th May, 1911.

My dear Sir,—As the author of the scene 'Chateauguay' which was to have been presented at the Festival of the Empire Pageant, I have read your remarks as I find them reported by cable in the 'Times' with very great interest.

At the same time, I should be extremely obliged to you if you would take some occasion to make it publicly known that Lord Strathcona was no party to the suppression of this most picturesque scene.

Several Canadians on the committee feared that the scene, in which a number of American soldiers were to have been represented, might be exaggerated by the Yellow Press of both countries and thereby cause ill feeling most undesirable in connection with such a Festival. For that reason we withdraw it.

Believe me, dear sir,
Faithfully yours,
BECKLES WILLSON.

I make no comment except to add that I thoroughly sympathize with the views expressed by the leader of the oposition, and can only regret the withdrawal of a feature which should have roused no resentment on anybody's part.

THE VICTORIA MUSEUM.

Mr. OWEN. Some days ago I drew the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the condition of the new museum building in this city, and I notice in the Ottawa 'Citizen' this morning that the crack is still widening. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance, who is leading the House, to this, and ask him if he considers the building safe.

An hon. MEMBER. How wide is the crack now?

Mr. OWEN. Forty-six feet ten inches.

Mr. FIELDING. No doubt when the period referred to by the 'Citizen' arrives, I expect the Minister of Public Works will be still here to answer the question.

DAM ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. THOBURN. Before the orders of the day are called I would like to ask the attention of the acting Minister of Marine (Mr. Lemieux) to a letter I have received from a resident in my riding, complaining about a dam built at a place called Galetta on the Mississippi, which destroys the fishing. The letter is as follows:

Almonte, May 9, 1911.

Dear Sir,—Excuse my liberty to ask would you kindly have fishways looked into and provided from the mouth of the Mississippi river to at least Carleton Place lake you could not provide a much greater blessing for the people of the surrounding country.

I may say that the dam complained of is built near the mouth of the Mississippi river which empties into the Ottawa river about a mile or two from where this dam is located, and it is utterly impossible for fish to come out of the Ottawa and up the Mississippi on account of that dam. That dam is built for power purposes, and for supplying light to the town of Arnprior, and is situated about four miles from the village of Galetta. If the hon. minister will look into that, he will confer a great favour on a large number of people who have the pleasure of living along the Mississippi river.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I understand from my hon. friend (Mr. Thoburn) that the people are willing to have the dam, but now they want to have it tempered by a blessing. While it might be in my power to give a dam, I am not quite so sure that I could give the desired blessing.

DISTRIBUTING SPEECHES BY POSTMASTERS.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Might I ask the Postmaster General whether the report, which comes to me on reliable authority, that copies of speeches of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are being sent out in bundles to post offices, and the postmasters are instructed to distribute them, is well founded. I put this question the other day and would like to have a reply.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Unfortunately I was at a funeral yesterday and did not hear the question.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). It was put on Monday.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No such instructions are given postmasters. Hon. members on both sides can send out literature, but the postmasters have no right to distribute it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). But if they are doing it?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Then they are acting contrary to instruction.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). If it be proved that they are doing it, will the Postmaster dismiss them?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would certainly warn any postmaster who did anything of the kind. Some of them may have done it through ignorance. I warn them publicly now that they have no right to distribute for anybody literature sent to them.

Mr. LALOR. Was it due to ignorance on the part of the gentlemen who sent out the speeches of the Prime Minister and the Finance Minister?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It may have been due to ignorance on the part of some postmasters, but they have their instructions and ought to know their duty.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the publisher of a newspaper such as the Toronto 'Globe' have the right to send bundles of that paper to country postmasters and have them placed in the post office boxes without being addressed?

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is quite different. A postmaster may receive a list of subscribers from the proprietor of a newspaper and distribute the newspapers according to that list. Some times there is no time to address the newspapers and they are sent in bundles so as to catch the early train, but the usual way is to label each newspaper.

Mr. BLAIN. Can the publisher of a newspaper send a hundred copies to a country postmaster to be distributed by him to people who are not subscribers?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. BLAIN. That was done in the general elections, I think. It was done in my own town with the Toronto 'Globe,' and that is why I asked the question. I understand the Postmaster General to say that no newspaper can send a bundle to a country postmaster to be circulated to people who are not subscribers?

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is against the post office regulations. They can only be sent to bona fide subscribers who have paid their subscriptions, and are entered on the list. No postmaster is allowed to distribute bundles of newspapers which are not regularly subscribed for.

Mr. BLAIN. Suppose they call it a sample copy.

Mr. LEMIEUX. A sample copy is allowed, but there are rules governing sample copies. No one has the right to send a bundle of papers to a postmaster to be distributed to people who are not subscribers. The postmaster must be given a bona fide subscription list, otherwise he is not allowed to distribute the newspapers and the proprietor is liable under the law.

Mr. BLAIN. It might be well for the hon. minister to issue a circular to his postmasters notifying them to that effect.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend will find that in black and white in the Post Office guide.

Mr. BLAIN. But the minister might send a little reminder to the public.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I give that reminder now, that it is done.

Mr LENNOX. Is there any regulation by which a newspaper publisher has the right to send a list of his subscribers, and then send a bundle of newspapers not individually addressed, and have the postmaster open that bundle and distribute the newspapers according to the list?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No. That is against the regulations.

Mr. LENNOX. I would like to ask another question. The Postmaster General intimated a few moments ago that he knows that this is sometimes done, but not very generally. Does not the minister think it his duty to see that it is not done?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly.

Mr. LENNOX. Will he do it?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is not a criminal offence. Take a case in point. Suppose the Ottawa 'Citizen' or the Ottawa 'Free Press,' wishes to serve a place, and to serve it must catch a particular train. When the time comes to catch that train, they have only 200 or 300 papers printed. I asked the hon. member (Mr. Lennox), would it be human in me to prosecute the 'Citizen' for that when it is done in good faith. This is a regulation for the protection of the department and public, but it must be administered in good faith.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. minister asked me a question, I would like to answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid I cannot allow the debate——

Mr. LENNOX. The minister asks a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. But there must be a stop put to it somewhere.

Mr. LENNOX. May I not answer the question?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is against the rules to continue——

Mr. LEMIEUX. As I put the question I would like the hon. gentleman to have an opportunity to answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The only difficulty is that if I grant permission to one member I cannot refuse it to others.

Mr. LENNOX. Very well, I will take it up later.

CANADIAN NORTHERN ONTARIO RAILWAY—GUARANTEE OF BONDS.

House in committee on Bill (No. 211) to grant certain aid towards construction of the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company—Mr. Graham.

On section 1,

1. His Majesty, on behalf of the Dominion of Canada (hereinafter called 'the Government') may aid and assist the construction and completion by the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company (hereinafter called 'the Company') of a line of railway extending from the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, to the city of Port Arthur, in the province of Ontario, including the mileage of the line (lying between the said points) already in part constructed by the company and by the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company extending from a point in the province of Quebec opposite the town of Hawkesbury to Rideau Junction, west of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario, and including the line already constructed by the company extending from a point in the township of Capreol, in the province of Ontario, to or near Sellwood Junction, by guaranteeing the principal and interest of the bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other securities (hereinafter called 'the guaranteed securities') of the company, to the extent of thirty-five thousand dollars per mile of the said line of railway so aided, which guaranteed securities to the extent aforesaid, the company is hereby authorized to create and issue; interest on the guaranteed securities to be at the rate of three and one-half per cent per annum, payable half yearly; the principal to be payable in fifty years from the passing of this Act. The government may, subject to the provisions of this Act, enter into a contract with the company fixing the terms and conditions upon which the guarantee is given and of the security to be taken therefor.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The minister (Mr. Graham), stated that the route would be given more definitely in the Bill than in the resolution. But that is not the case.

Mr. GRAHAM. I did say to my hon. friend that I thought perhaps it would be more definitely stated. But, in looking over it, I do not see how we can state it more definitely. The route has to be approved by the Railway Department with final approval by the Railway Commission. I gave the route in a general way, and it cannot vary very far from the line I mentioned the other day, and as given in the resolution.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That, I suppose, is more or less a formal matter. You never find the Railway Commission varying very much from the general line of the route proposed.

Mr. GRAHAM. About a mile perhaps—they cannot vary very much.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Therefore, there does not seem to be very much ground in that contention. This is rather important because the preamble of the Bill declares that among other objects this railway is for the purpose of opening up, and developing portions of the country as yet without railway facilities. The Bill states one terminus as being in Port Arthur and the other in Montreal. Rideau Junction is named, and also a line of railway partly constructed. But otherwise the route seems to be entirely indefinite as between Port Arthur, on the west, and Monteral on the east. If the object is to open up and develop the country now without railway facilities, one would suppose that the route would be stated, and that looking at the Bill we could see that the preamble is carried out by the terms of the enactment.

Mr. GRAHAM. The route, as I stated it the other day, is as definite as it could be made until we come to actual location. The charter of the company states where they can build. Beginning at Port Arthur, as I outlined the other day, that part——

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The minister need not go over that again. When we come to deal with the realities of the situation, the company will be bound by the Bill, and not by the minister's speech.

Therefore, his explanation does not put us very much further along. My point is that there should be something in the Bill binding the company as to the route, since the alleged purpose is to give railway facilities to portions of the country that are not yet provided therewith.

Mr. GRAHAM. To fix the route in the Bill would mean, that, if there were engineering difficulties the road could not be built. As a matter of fact the route of this road has to be approved by the Railway Department before the company can start construction, the final location has to be approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners. I do not see how we can describe it more particularly in the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand you cannot point to a single county in Ontario through which the road must run, according to the terms of the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. I presume there is nothing in the statute which says they must run to certain points except that they must go to Ottawa, Hawkesbury, Carillon, Montreal and Port Arthur. The department will certainly locate the line along the most feasible and practicable route. The company intends to run through Renfrew, Nipissing, and all through that country to within sixty miles of Port Arthur, when they get closer to the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How near does the road approach the other lines if that intention is carried out?

Mr. GRAHAM. The Canadian Pacific railway skirts the Ottawa river, and this road will cross the Ottawa into the province of Quebec, and will return in the locality of Portage du Fort, and then it will go to the town of Beachburg. There are points where it will be 10 miles from the Canadian Pacific Railway, and other points where it will be 40 or 50 miles away. On the way to Pembroke it will go through territory not touched by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Railway Committee would not grant a charter for such an indefinite location as this.

Mr. GRAHAM. They have a charter.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why should not this company, which is heavily subsidized by the people, define more particularly the route, as indicated by the Minister of Railways in his remarks?

Mr. GRAHAM. Even the minister cannot deviate from the charter of the company.

Mr. LANCASTER. We should not involve the credit of the country in helping a railway, the location of which is so indefinite. I do not think we should be asked to pass this Bill until the location is better defined. The Railway Commission can deviate, but they must have something to deviate from, and there is nothing in the Bill to guide them. I would not tie the company to an exact location within a mile or so, but we certainly should say it should pass through certain named parishes, townships or counties.

Mr. GRAHAM. In the old settled country it is easy to do that, but this line will run through territory that has never been opened up, and it is difficult to describe it. You might put something in the Bill that would prevent the building of the road at all if it were restricted in that way, when you come to approve of the route map. There has to be some discretion left to the department in approving of a particular route through such territory, else you may defeat the object we have in mind.

Mr. LENNOX. This line is about 1,000 miles long, between Montreal and Port Arthur, and whilst some of that territory is new, its physical features are fairly well known. We inferred from what the minister said that there have been explorations sufficient to enable the company to know pretty well the cost per mile of building this line, and there appears to be sufficient data to move the government to give a guarantee of $35,000 per mile. The minister should at least have defined in this Act certain points through which it will pass, so that we may know that we are promoting the building of a railway through a country which it is desirable to open up.

Mr. GRAHAM. Let the clause stand and we will see if it can be better defined.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there anything in the Bill which fixes the outside mileage that we guarantee? Are we sure that the road will not be 1,500 miles instead of 1,000?

Mr. GRAHAM. There is a clause in the Bill which says that the decision of the Governor in Council as to the mileage shall be absolute.

Mr. LENNOX. That is only as to the measurement.

Mr. GRAHAM. It does not say so.

Mr. LENNOX. It certainly means that.

Mr. GRAHAM. Possibly it does. However, the approximate distance is one thousand miles and the department would not be so negligent as to let them build all around the country.

Mr. LENNOX. There should be a limit in the Bill saying 'not exceeding' a certain distance.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is rather unusual to ask a guarantee at the rate of so much per mile for an indefinite mileage.

Mr. LANCASTER. You should say not exceeding so many miles.

Mr. GRAHAM. It would be easy enough to do that.

Mr. LENNOX. It is rumoured that instead of being 1,000 miles it was 1,200 miles.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have never heard of that.

Mr. LENNOX. There is a lot of information on this side of the House that you never heard of.

On section 2,

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). How is the security that the government takes to be paid out to the railway company?

Mr. GRAHAM. The proceeds of the sales of the guaranteed stock are placed to the credit of the government and are paid out from time to time upon the certificate of the government engineers.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). That would mean a thorough survey by the government as to the quantities taken out and the estimates. If you fix the price the parties are to get for the material removed you can pay out as the work proceeds, but unless all that is provided for I do not see how you can guard yourselves.

Mr. FIELDING. The guarantee being for so much per mile, all that would be necessary to see to would be that that amount of money was expended on fair and reasonable terms on the mileage as respects which the certificate is given. We have nothing specifically to do with the terms of the contracts, but if the prices were excessive or unreasonable or did not represent a bona fide expenditure, the government engineer would certainly not certify them. I think that is the only check we have. The contracts made between the company and the contractors are not matters directly under our control.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The danger is this: Suppose a construction company is formed by the same parties who own the railway; the railway company enters into an arrangement with the construction company, as nearly every railway company does, for the purpose of getting this road constructed. The prices may be fancy prices. The security of the government may amount to double the actual cost of the work. The amount paid goes into the hands of the construction company. The necessity then arises for the government to have an exact valuation of the work done, and the exact quantities, and to pay out the money on these securities just as they would pay out cash on a contract of their own.

Mr. FIELDING. The government do not pay out securities at all. The securities are sold in the market, and the proceeds are placed to the credit of the government, and are then paid out from time to time on the certificate of the government engineer.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the government exercise any supervision over the payments to contractors? Does it see that the contractors have been paid before it releases the money?

Mr. GRAHAM. There is a clause in the contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company providing that the material that goes into the road must be paid for. Cases have arisen in which sub-contractors have run bills for materials that did not go into the road, and the government engineers have held up the money until an attempt has been made to have a settlement of these bills. Some of them have been found collectable under the contract and others not.

Mr. LENNOX. Suppose that contractors either for work or for material had a lien on the road for a large amount of money that was owing to them, it would be necessary that the government should take note of all that in releasing this money.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think that would be a part of the agreement with the company. If we are paying public money or going security, we ought to know that there would be no lien prior to the government security.

Mr. LANCASTER. That should apply not only to the contractors, but to the workmen. The contractors might get the money and not pay the men.

At one o'clock, committee took recess.

Committee resumed at three o'clock.

On section 3,

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. In the case of a contractor or subcontractor who has not paid for material or labour, and where a lien is filed against the railway, what precaution is taken to see that the lien is discharged?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am informed that workmen cannot enforce a lien against a railway. We protect, however all these interests in our guarantee contract just as we do in our subsidy contract. We insert a clause providing that if claims are made against any of the contractors for material or labour, these must be paid or we retain a certain amount until they are settled.

Mr. EMMERSON. That applies to subcontractors as well?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, it applies to all the labour and material that goes into the work.

Mr. SPROULE. You are only mortgaging the bonds, and I would assume that the company sells the bonds and realizes the money.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Then the money is in the hands of the company.

Mr. GRAHAM. No, the bonds are sold and the money is deposited with the Receiver General, and is released from time to time as the work progresses on the certificate of the engineer in the Railway Department.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There are two matters which should be had in mind. One is that the proceeds of the bonds guaranteed shall be applied to the purpose for which the guarantee was given. These proceeds, I understand, are taken charge of by the Finance Department, and the department pays out the money according to the amount of work performed, upon the report of its own engineer, reserving a certain amount to meet any contingency.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is right.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The other thing necessary is to insure that subcontractors, and contractors under them, and the men employed shall be paid, and that no contractor shall retain money which ought to be paid out for material and work. From what the Minister of Finance has said, I take it that that point is pretty well covered, though I am not quite sure.

Mr. GRAHAM. We make a contract with the company as to this guarantee, and we put in that contract a section which protects the working men and those who supply material either to contractors or subcontractors, and the department reserves the right to retain funds until these demands are settled.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand from the Minister of Finance that his department takes precautions to the end that these moneys shall be applied only to the purposes for which the guarantee is granted.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is ascertained by the examination and report of the engineer of the Railway Department?

Mr. GRAHAM. Quite so.

On section 10,

Mr. REID (Grenville). Does the government hold all this money until work is commenced, and then pay it out according to the work being done?

Mr. GRAHAM. As the Finance Minister explained a few moments ago, the bonds are disposed of and the money is deposited with the Receiver General and paid out as the work proceeds, on the certificate of the engineer, and the auditing of the books by the auditor.

On section 13,

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. What is the penalty?

Mr. GRAHAM. As I said the other night, I am still of the same opinion, that we have done the utmost that can be done in order to encourage trade through Canadian ports. I do not think that any penalty you can place there will help the situation in the least.

On section 14,

Mr. GRAHAM. I move that after the words 'Port Arthur' we insert the words 'Ottawa.' That will give us three chief terminals.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why do you put that in the disjunctive? You say that the company is bound to consent to an order providing for use by the government or by such other railway company 'of the terminals at Port Arthur or Montreal.' It is meant to include both, is it not?

Mr. GRAHAM. We will say 'Port Arthur, Ottawa and Montreal, or either.'

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). What are the terminals used for the Intercolonial in Montreal? If I remember rightly, there is a joint ownership between the Grand Trunk railway and the Intercolonial, and the expenses are paid according to the user. Who are the owners of the terminals?

Mr. GRAHAM. The terminals are owned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. We have a rental arrangement by which we use their lines from Ste. Rosalie to Montreal, and also their terminals. For that we pay $140,000 odd a year. In addition to that we have a traffic arrangement with certain conditions as to the upkeep of the road, and of the terminals.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Do we not get the ownership in some manner, or was that in connection with the bridge, that by a contribution we acquired a joint ownership with the Grand Trunk?

Mr. GRAHAM. The proposed arrangement is not with the Grand Trunk. The Canadian Northern will probably have terminals there, and, as I suggested the other night, the time may come when we will wish to compel the Canadian Northern to connect with the Intercolonial railway, to hand us its traffic, but it will probably not be through the Grand Trunk terminals.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The object of the section is to provide that if the government, through the default of the company, is obliged to buy in the railway or any part of the railway from Montreal to Port Arthur, it shall also be in a position to acquire the terminals, since otherwise they could not operate the road. This is a paragraph which was put in at my own suggestion after we had discussed the resolution. We were told in very eloquent terms of the great advantage to the country of our obtaining a lease for certain purposes of the Grand Trunk terminals at Montreal. One is never impressed in visiting the terminals there, with the idea that the Intercolonial railway is very much to the fore; it is very difficult to find the headquarters or location of Intercolonial railway at these terminals. I have had occasion sometimes to look it up, and I find it housed in a little cock-loft upstairs, a very absurd looking place and altogether out of keeping with the character of a road which covers 1,600 or 1,700 miles of territory. If one wants very much information about the operations of the Intercolonial railway, it is not always the easiest thing to get it there, it is much easier to get it here.

This agreement looks forward to an interchange of traffic between the Intercolonial railway and this road. How will it be possible to bring that about? We have our terminals in Montreal fixed for the next 90 years. I suppose it might be possible to interchange traffic between the Canadian Northern and the Intercolonial railway in Montreal, even if the terminals were at a considerable distance apart, but I would like to understand what the situation will be. How will this interchange of traffic be arranged? The idea in 1898, and 1899, when this country bought the Drummond County railway and leased a portion of the Grand Trunk railway as well as the terminals, the idea then was to make our traffic arrangements, or, as the minister very graphically expressed it, to hook up, with the Grand Trunk railway. Now, apparently, we are looking forward to the project of unhooking from the Grand Trunk railway and hooking up with the Canadian Northern railway. That will not be quite so simple an operation as it would appear on its face, if I am correct in my appreciations of the conditions, but I do not understand enough about it to be able to form a correct judgment. For that reason, I would like the minister to explain what will be the outcome in that respect.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend is absolutely correct as to its not being a very simple proposition. If it had been quite simple perhaps we would have gone further in this Bill and outlined an agreement about to be made, but the situation with the Grand Trunk railway is as described by my hon. friend. We have a lease with them for 99 years. We have a traffic arrangement with them for the interchange of traffic at Montreal which the government can break by giving notice but which the company has no right to end of its own motion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). You cannot break the lease of the terminals?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, it is the traffic arrangement. The Grand Trunk railway are already urging very strongly and so are the Grand Trunk Pacific, their interests being identical, that the traffic arrangement may be brought to a close. We could not afford at present to bring the traffic arrangement to a close because if we did the need for using the terminals at Montreal would be largely diminished as our traffic would be reduced to the extent of $1,500,000 each year. But the Grand Trunk Pacific being constructed down to the eastern provinces, and the interests of the Grand Trunk railway being identical with theirs, they are already beginning to feel their way to see if some arrangement could not be arrived at by which they could be relieved from the obligation to give us their traffic.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Do they carry out the arrangement?

Mr. GRAHAM. They do pretty thoroughly now. There were differences of opinion when the arrangement was first made. A board of arbitrators settled a number of matters such as Montreal being the junction point instead of some other place. It will undoubtedly be strongly urged in years to come that from Lévis at least the Grand Trunk Pacific should be allowed to carry the traffic. We are not in a position now to release the Grand Trunk railway from this contract, but it may be in the interest of the public, it will certainly be in the interest of the through Transcontinental line, and it may be in our own interest that that arrangement should be broken if at the same time we could make other satisfactory arrangements. We would prefer to have our terminal arrangements part of the agreement to enter into a traffic arrangement, and I think it is in the interest of the Intercolonial railway that we should be in a position to go to the Canadian Northern, and make a proposition to them that they should enter into an arrangement with us to interchange traffic, both through and local, as the Grand Trunk railway is doing with its local traffic. That is why I was careful to put it in that way. We are taking the power to say to the Canadian Northern railway when we are ready to do that: You must enter into such an arrangement with us. But we could not say that now, because we are not in a position to enter into an arrangement.

Mr. LALOR. What did the Minister of Public Works mean the other night by stating that we could only break that agreement with the Grand Trunk railway by serious loss to the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I said was that if parliament now were to make it obligatory on the part of the Minister of Railways to cancel the agreement with the Grand Trunk railway, that company would know that the Minister of Railways was bound by the Act of parliament to cancel the agreement, and, therefore, they would be in a position to exact terms which might be very detrimental to the Intercolonial railway and might inflict a loss upon that railway which would not be likely to be sustained if the Minister of Railways were allowed a free hand to deal with the Grand Trunk in the matter.

Mr. MONK. This is the last clause of the Bill, and I would avail myself of the opportunity, before the Bill goes out of committee, to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) if it is intended to push this important measure through before the adjournment?

Mr. GRAHAM. I hope so.

Mr. MONK. Is it intended that the Bill shall go through before the adjournment?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have that in my mind. I am very anxious to get it through this House, so that it may go to the Senate.

Mr. MONK. I have listened to the discussion while the Bill was in the committee, and I must say that although that discussion has gone largely upon details, it has left a number of questions which appear to me to be unanswered. Furthermore, it seems to me that for the consideration of a Bill such as this the House would require more time. It is a measure of the very greatest importance. I believe that very few of the members of this House are informed as to the details of the measure. We have not had time. Yet it is being rushed through. Is that wise? We are undertaking to fasten on the public a liability of $35,000,000—that is, if the calculation of the distance over which the guarantee extends is one thousand miles. But there is not a man in this House who can say whether that is the exact distance or not. It more probably is twelve hundred miles, in which case we are pledging the credit of the country for $42,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. If my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) will permit me—I have an amendment to suggest that the Bill provide that it shall not exceed 1,050 miles.

Mr. MONK. That may be the information of my hon. friend (Mr. Graham). I have heard that the distance is greater than that. But it has not been measured. But my hon. friend will admit that even at 1,050 miles, the liability is very large. Yet we really have not had opportunity to consider the measure. There are a number of clauses in the Bill itself which seem to go into details as, for instance, clause 14, which we have put through in a very few minutes, but the experience we have is that these clauses are nothing but a screen. They may be eluded, they have been eluded in the past, and will be in the future; there is no doubt about that. I consider that, under these circumstances, when the House is on the eve of adjourning through necessity for a few weeks— I am using a strong expression, but not too strong it seems to me—its a public scandal, nothing less, to push through a measure of this importance. No man in the House has had any opportunity whatever to go fully into the question and get all the information which we ought to have. I say this—the public cannot be aware of such undue haste, or we should all be condemned for rushing through an agreement of such magnitude under such circumstances of levity. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is no reason. Hon. gentlemen are aware that—probably through our own fault but also largely through the fault of the government—measures of this kind are brought in at the end of every session; they are rushed through, and we have no time to look into them. It is not right; it is not fair to our constituents; it is an injustice to the country. For my part, I wish to enter a protest against the passage of this Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. Of course, if we were discussing this matter for the first time—I presume my hon. friend was not here when this Bill was discussed on the resolutions, some days ago. We took a whole day for a full discussion, and did not rush it. The Bill is exactly as the resolutions were, with some very slight amendments which we think a little improves them.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) calls that a full discussion. Members get up who face these resolutions for the first time, and ask questions. I do not think I am doing injustice to the minister when I say that, generally, he cannot get positive and categorical answers. You cannot in half a day discuss any transaction of over $30,000,000. In such a time you cannot get a satisfactory discussion of a measure of that kind. The matter would have to be gone into in the minutest detail as such matters are in other countries. I venture to say there is not a legislature in the world that puts through measures of this kind with such speed. As a matter of fact, I am perfectly sure that we could take up these clauses, examine them carefully and find a multitude of unanswered queries which would suggest themselves at once to our minds. I can only protest, but I think it my duty to do so.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). To utilize the terminals at Montreal, you will have to have an exchange with the Intercolonial at the Grand Trunk station. I do not see how you can do it otherwise. My recollection is that we have a half ownership in the terminals at the Grand Trunk at the city of Montreal. That was given to us in exchange for our assistance in the widening of the bridge going into Montreal. We pay a lease to them of $140,000, and we have joint ownership of the terminals.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think we have not joint ownership of the terminals.

Mr. MONK. What sanction is provided in case of the non-execution of this clause 14? Without going into the subsections this provides for an agreement to secure suitable terminals in Montreal. This is like the preceding section where there is no sanction whatever provided in regard to the route—and we know what the clauses about routing traffic amount to ; they do not amount to a row of pins—they are violated every day. What is going to happen if the railway company will not enter into the agreement as regards these terminals in Montreal? And if it declares that it is ready to make an agreement with the government, as foreshadowed—though it is nothing else but foreshadowed—who is going to decide whether the terminals are suitable or not? Is there any independent authority? Will the city of Montreal have anything to say? The whole of that clause 14 is to my mind nothing but a screen.

Mr. GRAHAM. The establishment of terminals at Montreal or anywhere else can not be undertaken until after an arrangement is made with the city and approved by the Railway Commissioners, or at any rate approved by the Railway Board. The practice in all such large places is to have a thorough discussion of the city's interests in the matter, and then the Railway Commission says what precautions must be taken.

Mr. MONK. We have but the dictum of a minister that nothing will be done without these precautions, but seeing that this legislation is bound to be put through in a short space of time, and that the country is to be made liable for $35,000,000, talking on my part will not prevent it. Let me ask if there is a report extant from some responsible person as to the advisability and safety of this enormous guarantee.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is no special report from anybody. The government made full inquiry, and are fully satisfied that security is ample, and that it will not cost the country a cent.

Mr. MONK. That is the usual answer we get from this government, but I venture to say there is not another legislature in the world that would pass in this way such an important transaction without having before it the report of competent and independent men as to the value of the security offered, and the necessity for giving this guarantee. Sometimes guarantees are necessary and beneficial, and sometimes they are not, excepting to individuals who make money from them. We have no report as to the advantages the country will get from this immense risk it is taking.

Mr. PORTER. The Minister of Railways said that the estimated cost of this railway is from $50,000 to $55,000 per mile, and the guarantee being only $35,000 per mile and being a first charge against the railway, the security was therefore considered ample. I have been told by several people who professed to know—I cannot vouch whether it is a fact or not—that this railway will be constructed, as the Canadian Northern railway have been accustomed to construct their roads, for a total expenditure of not more than $35,000 per mile. If that be so the government would be practically building the railway and handing it over to the Canadian Northern. There is a good deal of force in the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Monk) that there should be before parliament some reliable estimate and information. We ought to know what evidence has been laid before the government to satisfy them that the $35,000 per mile liability is really secured. It occurs to me that if there is anything in the statement that the Canadian Northern in the past has been constructing railways and operating them too, through a country just as difficult as this, at a cost of not more than $35,000 per mile, then it is indispensable that the government should have a proper and reliable estimate made, so that we may be sure we are not guaranteeing the full cost of the road. If it should turn out that default is made by the railway company and that the government is forced to foreclose and acquire the railway, it will not be a very good bargain if, after the railroad has been operated long enough for the company to make default, the government has to take it over at its original cost which would be more than the railway was worth at the time of foreclosure.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not think any person experienced in railway engineering and knowing the country through which this line runs would suggest that it would be built for $35,000 per mile. We have laid down a standard to which they must build and there is no doubt such a railway cannot be built for $35,000 a mile.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The point is that the government asks parliament to authorize a guarantee of bonds to the extent of $35,000 per mile, and bases the application upon the assertion that the road will cost $50,000 per mile; surely that statement ought to be supported by some authoritative report by engineers of standing. Up to the present we have nothing but the more or less casual assertion of the minister that his engineers informed him the road will cost so much.

Mr. PORTER. It is common talk that the promoters of this railway have been building railways for less money than they were able to sell their bonds and securities upon that railway for, and that they are growing rich day by day by this means, and that this is only another scheme for adding to their accumulation of wealth. In order to put a finality to that sort of talk, if there is nothing in it, it would be in the interests of the railway as well as in the interests of the government that proper inquiry should be made. There is no denying the fact that this is common talk and common belief among the people of the country.

Mr. MONK. Part of this railway in the province of Quebec can certainly be built for less than $35,000 per mile. I assert that because I know the country. I am perfectly certain of what I say. At the figures given by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, we are undertaking for 1,050 miles a liability of thirty-six and three-quarter millions of dollars. The minister has said that he discussed the resolution during an afternoon, and now we are putting the measure through finally. Does anybody in his senses pretend that that is a sufficient investigation—with no documents before us, no report, only a statement of the minister. We are supposed to be business men, and the country expects us to look into questions of this magnitude according to business methods. In this instance the investigation has been altogether insufficient.

Mr. LALOR. I do not think I would be doing my duty, as representing a rural constituency, that is not in any way interested in this road directly, if I permitted this Bill to go through the House without entering my protest against it. It is being rushed through too fast altogether. We have had no time to discuss the project or to give it proper consideration. In the short discussion that we have had, we have found already that there are mistakes apparently, in the judgment of at least two members of the government themselves. There has been no estimate provided by competent engineers of the cost of this road. I would have thought that one of the first duties of the government was to have had competent engineers go over this road and estimate its cost to the promoters. But without any estimate before us, we jump to the conclusion to guarantee the bonds of this railway for $35,000 a mile, merely taking the word of the promoters that it is to cost more than the government guarantee. I do not think that is just to the people of this country. I think that as careful an estimate of the cost of this road should have been made as if it were a road that the government themselves were building. It looks to me as if the promoters of this road would be able, with this guarantee, to build the road, and pocket a very large amount of money on the transaction. I do not believe that we are acting with good business judgment, or as any business corporation would act in a transaction of this kind. One of the features of the agreement is the routing of freight by the Intercolonial; but when we look into that, we find that the arrangement does not amount to anything at all, because when the freight reaches Montreal over the Canadian Northern, the company can route it to an American port, and there is nothing to prevent them doing so. According to the Minister of Public Works, there is in existence an old agreement with the Grand Trunk that almost prohibits us making this arrangement with the Canadian Northern company. I find on the Order Paper to-day a notice of a resolution to lease or take over about 12 branch lines of railway in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I do not know what the cost of this will be, but it is sure to involve an enormous additional cost to the country. This guarantee to the Canadian Northern amounts to nearly $40,000,000. The whole thing savours of an election campaign, and an enormous election fund, and the country pays the bill. As the representative of an agricultural constituency. I want to protest against rushing this project through without any consideration in the dying days of the session, in order, if there is to be an election this fall, that a huge campaign fund may be provided for the government.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). I find that I was correct in my statement that the government of Canada is half owner of the terminals at Montreal. I will read to the hon. Minister of Railways the clause in the Act which confirms my statement. This is from the agreement made on the 1st day of February, 1898:

And, whereas, for the purpose of carrying out the said extension the said company is willing that, for the conducting of the business and traffic of the Intercolonial railway, Her Majesty shall have an undivided one-half share or leasehold interest in the company's railway and property between and including Ste. Rosalie and St. Lambert station at the eastern end of Victoria bridge, together with the use of the company's railway and property between and including Ste. Rosalie and Bonaventure station in the city of Montreal, the use of the Victoria bridge across the River St. Lawrence and of the terminals and connections hereinafter more particularly described, together with an undivided one-half interest in and use of the bridge across the Chaudière river, and of so much of the tracks and line of the said company in connection therewith as are hereinafter described, all of which right, title, property, interest and user shall be used, enjoyed and exercised to the same extent as if the said railway and property were owned by Her Majesty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. For what length of time?

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). For 99 years, the lease is made.

Mr. CARVELL. What is the rental?

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Nearly $150,000 a year. Besides that, we paid in cash for making an addition to the Ste. Rosalie branch, and for broadening the Victoria bridge. We become half owners of that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Half owners for a limited time.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). My interpretation of that enacting clause is that it is an absolute half-ownership in fee simple. Let us look at this thing. We get no security upon the terminals. There is no arrangement made binding them to use our terminals for the exchange of traffic. We are guaranteeing them $35,000 per mile, and they have the right to build terminals and issue securities for the purpose of doing so independent of our lien. Besides that they have the additional right to issue bonds on the rolling stock, independent of our lien. For our $35,000 per mile guarantee, they contract with us to build the road and put the rails and stations on it—not the rolling stock and terminals, because they are independent of our lien. There is not a railway man in the country who does not know that this road, under the conditions of our guarantee, can be built for half the money. Then we ought to have a report from the permanent officers of the Railway Department showing what would be the cost of building this road. But we have not a word about that. All we have is the statement, which will appear ridiculous to any one who knows anything about a railway, that to build this road and put a track on it, independent of the terminals and rolling stock, will cost $50,000 per mile, and we are only giving security for $35,000 out of the $50,000. That is not the kind of statement which the people are entitled to. We are entitled to all the details of the cost of this undertaking, including the terminals and rolling stock. We ought also to have the route more accurately defined. To give a company the power to build a railway from Ottawa to Port Arthur, without mentioning the objective points, is very dangerous. In the Railway Committee we always insist on certain objective points being mentioned. Why? In order to prevent railway companies from dickering with the municipalities and saying to a municipality: unless you agree to pay us a bonus or give certain other favours, we shall go in another direction. So that we ought to see that the objective points of this railway are specifically mentioned. But the minister says they have a charter. Well, I have not seen the charter, and we do not know where it is. There is no evidence yet before the House as to the charter this company has. We should not leave to the Minister of Railways and the Board of Railway Commissioners the locating of this road. We have the right to know where it goes. We have the right to know which particular route is to be adopted in the building of this line. As my hon friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) says, the information given us is of the most meagre kind ever presented to this House, when asking this House to vote a guarantee to such a large extent.

Mr. PORTER. The Minister of Railways said, in answer to a statement of mine, that anybody would know that this railway could not be constructed through certain portions where it was intended to go for anything like $35,000 per mille. While that may be true as regards the north shore of Lake Superior, are there not other portions—for instance, all of the line east of the particular point I have mentioned—where the road could be built for very much less? If I understood the minister rightly before adjournment, he could not say exactly where the line would be located and would not undertake to define in the Bill the exact location. If that be correct, how can he say that it is going to cost $50,000 per mile to construct a railway, when he does not know where it is going to be constructed?

Mr. GRAHAM. If my hon. friend will study the general contour of the country, he will find that it would not make any difference whether the railway went 10 miles one way or the other. The cost in either case would be practically the same. In the map which I laid on the table, hon. gentlemen will find that there is a route approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners and the Railway Department which this line proposes to take. That route was approved after full argument before the Railway Commission and the Minister of Railways by every interest involved. All were present and all laid their views before the commissioners and the minister, and a considerable portion of this line has been finally located by the commission. We could not change that again without full notice being given to all the parties.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). What portion from Ottawa to Port Arthur?

Mr. GRAHAM. From Sudbury to Port Arthur has been approved by the Railway Commission, after hearing the representatives of the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway, and all others interested. A piece from Montreal to Georgian Bay has been approved by the Minister of Railways. A short portion east of North Bay and through to Sudbury is the only portion that has not been approved after hearing all the parties.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Why could not the route be defined in the Bill?

Mr. GRAHAM. For this reason. Supposing when the company came to construction that, for some reason, every interest would see that it ought to be moved, neither the railway commission nor the Minister of Railways nor any one else would have the right to move it. There was the statute, and we could not vary it. But no change can be made in the approved route without all parties interested being heard.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). There is a part, the minister says, from Montreal to Pembroke; you go up to the Falls there, cross over and come back again to the Ontario side of Portage du Fort—has that portion been approved?

Mr. GRAHAM. That has all been approved after every one interested was heard, except a few miles on either side of Pembroke. That was delayed in order to allow the company to go to Pembroke and make some arrangement which would be suitable to that city.

Mr. LALOR. Does the provincial land grant apply to this line?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. PORTER. Then they get not only the provincial land grant but our guarantee as well.

Mr. MONK. The minister says 'all parties.' That reminds me of the story of the judge who asked the lawyer if he had any authorities in support of his proposition, 'Yes,' said the lawyer, 'your honour, all the authorities are in favour of my proposition.' What 'parties' does the minister mean? There is a 'party' for whom we are acting—the people of Canada. We are their representatives. But we have not had an opportunity of looking into this matter.

Mr. GRAHAM. That shows distinctly that what I said is correct. My hon. friend knows from his own experience—and I leave it to his own experience—that where his constituency is interested in a line of railway, he is informed of the hearing. And when a town or municipality is affected, the mayor is notified. And so it is with the representative of every parish. They are the people who are interested in seeing where the road is to run, particularly so far as local interests are concerned.

Mr. PERLEY. Who notifies the members of the House as to the hearings?

Mr. GRAHAM. Where a constituency is interested in the location of the line, it is the duty of the Department of Railways to inform the member for that constituency. And I think it is invariably done. Certainly these are the instructions that have been given. And, in the same way, the mayors of towns are notified. I am sure I never have a hearing on a route map in my department when there are not members of parliament there because of having been notified.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) has asked me as to the route going through Jacques Cartier and neighbouring counties. There is no difficulty about that. But when the route was fixed, there was no question of a guarantee. The point I insist upon is not the route, but the guarantee, the importance and magnitude of the transaction. And when he says—and he has said repeatedly—that 'all parties' have been heard, I can only say that they may have been heard upon the question of the route, and all questions of that kind, but I say also that we have not had an opportunity to be heard as to this particular transaction, which is being rushed through unfairly.

Mr. GRAHAM. I was answering an hon. gentleman who was asking me more particularly as to where the railway was going.

Mr. PERLEY. The minister must be mistaken as to these notifications, or he had better give more distinct instructions to his department. Because, in the case of this very railway, the route of which between here and Montreal passes through the county I have the honour to represent, the hearing was held a couple of years ago, and I never had any notification of when the matter was to be brought before the minister.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think it must have been longer ago than two years.

Mr. PERLEY. I do not know, but it was since I became a member of this House.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am very careful about that. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) remarked that I did not notify members of the House. I will leave to members about him the refutation of that statement.

Mr. LENNOX. In the case of the Sudbury branch of the Canadian Pacific railway, which was built through my riding since I became a member of this House, I got no notice whatever. And I understand there are a good many other members who have had similar experiences. However, that is not the point I wish to speak about. I wish to say a word about the question of the cost of construction. The minister understands that it will cost $50,000 a mile. On the other hand, it is said by hon. members on this side that it cannot cost $35,000 a mile. I am inclined to think, with all deference, that none of us know very much about it. And that is the very difficulty in the matter; we have no more information about this than we had about the Transcontinental. Take the Transcontinental line, say, from Quebec to Winnipeg. We had specific information from the Minister of Finance——

An hon. MEMBER. 'Mountains of information.'

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, 'mountains of information.' We had not only statements from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) but we had a statement from the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) who was advocating the construction of that road. He stated that he had engaged his own engineer to go into the matter, and that this engineer, in conjunction with another engineer who had been over the route, had placed the cost definitely, as an outside figure, at $30,000 a mile for a large portion of this road. There is no reason to believe that that was not stated in good faith, perhaps, but we have the fact now that this railway, 1,800 miles of it —a large portion of it paralleling this 1,000 miles—will cost $100,000 a mile.

An hon. MEMBER. With stealings.

Mr. LENNOX. Of course, we do not know how much stealings that includes. I do not for a moment imagine that the construction cost anything like $100,000 a mile, if the thing were properly and honestly carried out. But what I am pointing out is that we have a right to some definite information about the cost of construction. But we have the fact that the minister says that he is informed that the total cost will be $50,000 a mile, and then hon. gentlemen on this side state that it cannot be over $35,000 a mile. I venture to say there is no good foundation for the minister's statement. We had an estimate in reference to the Transcontinental that the cost would not exceed $28,000 a mile, including interest, and we know that other estimates put it at from $25,000 up to the estimate of the hon. member for Brandon, $30,000 as an outside figure. And we know also that the cost to the country will be actually $100,000 a mile. Now, we have a right, both on general business principles, and more particularly having regard to the fact that these statements of this government have proved themselves to be utterly unreliable in the past—we have a right, I say, to some definite information about this matter. I am not saying that this road can be built for $30,000 a mile, or that it can be built for $50,000. But what I do say is that as a business proposition we should have placed before us the estimate of engineers who have gone over the route, and who can testify as to the character of the road, and give us a reasonable basis upon which to form an estimate, and that estimate should be laid before the House in advance of our being driven into adopting a measure of this kind. I am entirely in favour of giving reasonable assistance to this company, but I am very much opposed to this system of rushing things in when we are all anxious to go home, and have no reasonable information to justify us in pledging the country to this enormous liability.

Mr. LALOR. I would remind the minister (Mr. Graham) of the fact that the provincial government of Ontario gave a large land grant to the road that we are asked to furnish $35,000 a mile to build. The hon. gentleman has had considerable experience in politics in the province of Ontario, and if I am not mistaken, he took some part in the last provincial campaign. And the chief argument of the leader of the opposition, Mr. Mackay, in that campaign was that the provincial government had given a land grant to this road far in excess of the value of the road. Any one who heard Mr. Mackay in the Opera House in Ottawa, and his followers throughout the country, knows that that was his argument about this railway. Now, the Dominion government step forward, and give them an additional sum of $35,000 a mile, and do that without giving the matter proper consideration, in the dying hours of the session, without any engineer's report, or any information at all before them in connection with it. We grant this large sum of money, which will amount probably to nearly $40,000,000. I say it is not right in the public interest that this should be done. We should have had much more time to consider it, and the government should not rush hastily into this matter. As I said before, it looks very much as if there was something behind this, some reason for it on the part of the government, and I can see no other reason than the fact that a Dominion election is staring them in the face this fall.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). In addition to the land grant, does the provincial government guarantee the bonds too?

Mr. GRAHAM. There is a small section of ten miles in the vicinity of Sellwood which comes under the provincial guarantee. That guarantee runs out in twenty years, then ours will become the first mortgage. In the meantime, we get $35,000 a mile of mortgage bonds on another portion of their line to cover that ten miles. Without wanting to drag in political questions, I may say that I think my hon. friend will remember it was that guarantee that Mr. McKay discussed more than the land grant.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I notice that one of the principal objects stated in the preamble of the Bill as a justification for the government guaranteeing these bonds, is to afford the government system of railways in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, an interchange of through traffic. That would also include, I suppose, the proposed branch lines, concerning which there is an item on the Order Paper to-day. Section 14 says:

> The company (the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company) and the Canadian Northern Railway Company, respectively, shall enter into an agreement with the government:
> (a) to secure or establish, or cause to be secured or established, suitable terminals for the company within the city of Montreal;
> (b) on the request of the government, to make arrangements with the Intercolonial railway for the interchange of traffic between the company and the Intercolonial railway at Montreal.

I suppose that is one of the chief objects of guaranteeing the bonds. I would like to ask the minister, if the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company refuse either to enter into an agreement, or, having entered into the agreement, refuse to carry out its terms, what remedy has the government against the Canadian Northern Railway Company?

Mr. GRAHAM. I imagine that if they refuse to enter into the agreement provided under this Act, they would not get the guarantee. It is a part of the Act that they enter into a certain agreement.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Supposing they agree to do it and do not do it, what remedy has the minister?

Mr. GRAHAM. That would be a legal point.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. As I understand it, the principal obejct of the agreement is to extend the Intercolonial railway westward?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I think the members on this side of the House understand that one of the chief objects of the agreement is to make the Intercolonial a paying concern by giving it an interchange of traffic with this company. Now they may enter into this agreement, and there is absolutely nothing that I can see to compel them to keep it. All we are doing with the company is to guarantee the bonds. Once we guarantee the bonds, and the company does not carry out the chief object of this agreement, there is, so far as I can see, no remedy. It does not constitute such a default that would justify us in taking possession of the road. They could refuse to carry out the agreement, and we still have to guarantee the bonds. If they make a breach of the object for which we give a guarantee of those bonds, we have no remedy.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have discussed that point so many times already that perhaps I should not weary the House with repeating it. But I suppose it is a principle of law, or ought to be, that there is a remedy for every wrong. We should discuss the question from a practical standpoint, as well as hanging on the threads of technicalities. Does my hon. friend surmise that they would have a railway all the way from Port Arthur to Montreal and then refuse to have a terminal in Montreal?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I said my principal objection was that if they refused to enter into an agreement for an interchange of traffic, if, for instance, they should find it more profitable to send their goods by way of Boston or New York than by the Intercolonial, and if they refused to send them by the Intercolonial, you would have no redress, so far as I can see.

Mr. GRAHAM. We could proceed against them for damages.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. What would be the measure of the damages to this government whose only contract is to guarantee the bonds? You simply have to guarantee their bonds, and you have no measure of damages against this company for not carrying out their agreement.

Mr. GRAHAM. There may be some legal question mixed up in that. I take it for granted that if the government makes an agreement with the Canadian Northern railway that it shall do certain things, the government would have redress against the Canadian Northern if it did not do those things.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. What redress would you have?

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. gentleman is asking a legal question, and I am stating a plain business transaction. It is like a business transaction between two men, and I cannot conceive that the law would place a railway in any other position than I would be placed in if I made a contract with my hon. friend, if he was worth anything, and if I could substantiate that I had been damaged by his refusal to carry out that contract, I could obtain damages.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The action would have to be brought by His Majesty against the Canadian Northern railway or the Canadian Northern Ontario Railway Company. What would be the measure of damages?

Mr. GRAHAM. That would be for the courts to determine.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Under what principle would they be assessed? I have never been able to understand yet, either under the Grand Trunk agreement or under this, that His Majesty could recover anything more than nominal damages.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If I were making a contract I would make it in such a manner that, if there was a default on the part of the company, I would have some redress. We could seize some portion of their receipts, or something of that kind.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I do not see how you could attack this company. The operation of this guarantee of ours would be subsequent to the action of the company in breaking this promise. For instance, we guarantee the bonds of the company. The guarantee by the government, that is to say, the action of this government, or whatever guarantee it gives, only takes place after there is a default. Now it is before there is any default that the company would likely refuse to carry out the spirit of this agreement. So long as they are paying interest on its bonds we could not step in. The only way in which action could be taken would be this, that if the company refused to ship goods by the Intercolonial railway, this parliament could withdraw this guarantee. The government of this country has power to withdraw this guarantee at any time by legislation.

Mr. LANCASTER. Not after the bonds are sold.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). We all know that this parliament has absolute power to withdraw that guarantee at any time. The only thing about it is that it would be repudiation. If you wish to have any hold on the company you must insert a clause in this agreement, that if they fail to carry out the spirit of this clause parliament can cancel this guarantee.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I have here the Act of the Ontario government of 1908 guaranteeing certain aid to the Canadian Northern railway. I will ask the Minister of Railways if we are duplicating the guarantee of the Ontario government? Section 4 of chapter 47 reads as follows:

The securities hereby authorized to be guaranteed are as follow:—

(a) Securities to the amount of $20,000 or its equivalent in sterling or other money per mile of the company's lines of railway specified in the first part of the schedule hereto.

(b) Securities to the amount of the expenditure heretofore made in acquiring the lands and premises for terminal purposes specified in the second part of the schedule hereto and in making improvements thereon for terminal purposes, including wharfs, docks, warehouses, tracks and other terminal works and facilities.

(c) Securities to an amount representing sixty-five per cent of the expenditure hereafter made in acquiring other lands for extensions of the said terminal lands and premises, and in making improvements thereon for terminal purposes, and on the lands and premises mentioned in subclause (b) of this section. Provided, always, that the total amount of the securities authorized by subclauses (b) and (c) of this section shall not exceed $1,500,000.

(d) Securities to the amount of the outstanding debenture stock issued by the company and guaranteed by the province under the provisions of chapter 20 of the statutes of Ontario for the year 1904, representing $20,000 per mile of the line of railway specified in the third part of the schedule hereto.

It is a matter of great public concern to what extent we are duplicating this guarantee, and the total amount of guarantees that this company possesses on the construction of this road.

Mr. GRAHAM. There are but ten miles of that guarantee included in the line we are guaranteeing. The terminals referred to there are to be established in Toronto.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario) What consideration moved the government to specify the specific amount of the guarantee per mile, $35,000, instead of a percentage of the cost of construction which would seem to be the business methods to adopt in guaranteeing bonds. If the actual cost is $55,000 per mile, and we are guaranteeing $35,000, that is a little over 60 per cent. If the cost should be only $30,000, then a guarantee of $20,000 would be sufficient. Then the government's engineer would supervise the construction and you would guarantee a certain percentage of the cost.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend objected to that very principle in the mountain sections of the Grand Trunk Pacific. We guaranteed 75 per cent of the cost of construction of the mountain section, but that was not satisfactory. On the prairie section, we put in a maximum amount, a certain percentage not to exceed a certain amount. The railway has cost over $33,000 per mile on the prairie sections, and the guarantee that we gave has not met the expectations of those to whom we gave it. The Grand Trunk Pacific have to raise another loan of $10,000,000. Having the experience of the Grand Trunk Pacific and of the Canadian Pacific railway, from a business standpoint, I believe it is better in the interests of the country to name a stated amount, which would not be decreased and could not be increased and adhere to that amount. I believe this is only a fair proportion of the cost.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That may be correct. I appreciate a portion of that argument at least; but it is only a good argument when the minister comes down with reasonable evidence of what the road will probably cost. Surely this estimate of $50,000 a mile must have been founded on something? I would imagine that the minister would not trust to an oral report of an officer of his department, that he would insist on a written report. He must have some information. Why not communicate that to parliament, when his whole case is based on the theory that this road will cost $50,000 per mile? Estimating the cost at $50,000 per mile, we guarantee bonds to the extent of 70 per cent of its cost. That is less than we guaranteed in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Upon the prairie section of that road we guaranteed three-fourths of the cost not to exceed $13,000 per mile. The minister points out certain inconveniences. These inconveniences have not been to the country, but to the persons who are building the road. We are supposed to be looking at it here at least to some extent from the country's standpoint. What is the evidence upon which the minister asks this committee to come to the conclusion that that road will cost $50,000 per mile upon the average, and that, therefore, $35,000 per mile is a reasonable amount to which the country should pledge its credit for the purpose of consummating the construction of the road?

Mr. GRAHAM. I could understand that if we were not naming a certain standard of road to be built?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). To say that the road must be built of a certain standard may convey an idea of its cost to persons familiar with railway construction; to me it conveys absolutely nothing, I do not know whether a road of that standard ought to cost $15,000 or $20,000 or $30,000 or $100,000 per mile. Therefore, I am obliged to rely on the reports of experts who do know. It seems to me as one member of the committee, that I am entitled to the report of some competent engineer who will say that a road built up to that standard through this particular country, although the country is not very well defined, will cost $50,000 a mile, or will cost something so that I can make up my mind as to whether this is a reasonable guarantee. The minister is handicapping his own case before the committee, by not coming here armed with evidence of that kind. If I were trying to put a proposition of this kind through a committee of this House, it would be the first thing that I would think of. I would not expect the committee to pay any attention to me when I asked them to assume that this road would cost $50,000 a mile, and to base their action upon that assumption unless I had provided them with evidence or a report indicating what the road would cost.

Mr. GRAHAM. Of course my hon. friend does not see it from my viewpoint. We have had any amount of evidence as to two roads being constructed through a portion of this country, one of a better standard than this which will cost a large amount of money, and it never dawned on me that any one would intimate that $50,000 was too large an amount for the construction of this road, and the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) has endeavoured to prove that my estimate was too low.

Mr. LENNOX. It would prove that you do not know anything about it.

Mr. GRAHAM. That might not be difficult to prove. However, my engineers know the profile of the country, and the standard of the road has been submitted to them, and I am sure it cannot be constructed for less than $50,000 per mile. I believe myself it will cost a good deal more before it is finished.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Who says that?

Mr. GRAHAM. My engineers. I have not asked for a written report.

Mr. LENNOX. Have they been over the route?

Mr. GRAHAM. They know the contour of the country, and they estimate that it will cost $50,000 a mile, and my experience is that it is safe to add at least 25 per cent to the estimate given.

Mr. LALOR. Will this road be constructed up to the standard of the Canadian Northern from Fort William to Winnipeg?

Mr. GRAHAM. The standard is set out in the Bill.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Will it be as high a standard as the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. While I do not think clause 14 is of much value, still we might make it as valuable as possible, and we should state a time when the company will enter into the agreement. As it is now they might not enter into the agreement until all the bonds have been guaranteed by the government. The words should be inserted, 'before the execution of the guarantee mentioned in section 4 of the Act.' Otherwise you lock the stable door after the horse is stolen.

Mr. GRAHAM. Our difficulty is that we were not prepared to enter into an agreement now owing to certain conditions existing. I want the right to compel them to enter into an agreement when we are ready.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. They will have the money then, and they don't care whether they agree or not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The clause is now indefinite as to time, and possibly it could be put in proper shape by inserting after the word 'shall' the words 'when required by the government.'

Mr. GRAHAM. That would cover it. It would carry out what it is intended to do.

Amendment (Mr. Borden, Halifax), agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM. I move that section 4 be amended by adding the words: 'not exceeding in the whole 1,050 miles.'

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Now, what about the route?

Mr. GRAHAM. I discussed the route question at luncheon, and I do not see that we can describe the route with any more particularity. The charter does not prescribe the route very particularly, but it does say at a point in the township of Chisholm, which is at or near North Bay to a point in another township, which is near Sellwood Junction. The route map has been practically approved by the department and the Board of Railway Commissioners for a great deal of the distance. A short section from North Bay to the junction north of Sudbury is the only portion not approved. None of the other portions were approved without the Canadian Pacific railway, and the other parties interested being notified and heard. The road is agreed to from Sudbury to Port Arthur. From Montreal to a point east of North Bay has been approved by the minister, but is subject to a change of one mile either way by the Railway Board. The question will be at once asked: 'If that is the case, why not describe the route in the Act, and no doubt the route approved will be approximately the route constructed on, but, if we name definitely the route in this Act the minister could not change it suppose it became necessary to move the track to another side of a lake.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Surely the minister could do that?

Mr. GRAHAM. He could, if it is not in the Act. If there was a possibility that the minister would arbitrarily and without notice change the route, it would be another matter, but the practice is to notify all the parties interested, and no route can be varied unless such notice is given, and the parties heard if they object. Once a route is approved by the minister it takes a pretty strong argument to vary it. After that they have to proceed to the Board of Railway Commissioners. If the location were marked out in this Act, it might be necessary to change it, but it being statutory, the Minister's hands would be tied.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is that not an argument for not proceeding with this measure until we know where it is to be located?

Mr. GRAHAM. The route for practically the whole distance has been approved.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The hon. minister is mistaken in supposing that the naming of the principal points on the line would prevent him altering any portion of the line.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If the route is not defined in some way, there is the danger that the company will use the indefiniteness of the route for the purpose of extracting bonuses from municipalities.

Mr. GRAHAM. The route is fixed and is approved practically from Montreal to Port Arthur, except the small portion which I have described. A considerable portion of it has also been approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners, and unless good cause can be shown, neither the minister nor the board will allow it to be varied. The company is building under a charter in which the route is defined generally, and if we placed in this Bill something that is not in their charter, they would be tied up to the particular route described, and it might be that when they came to construct, that route would be found to be practically impossible, and the company could not proceed with the work until they came to parliament again.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The minister says, what is the use of fixing the route in the statute? It is fixed already. There is nothing to prevent the minister reversing his decision from day to day as to the location of the route. If we do not name the objective points in the Act, we might as well have a general statute under which railways could be built anywhere. Let us fix the objective points to which the road must be built, and then these gentlemen will not have the opportunity of holding up the constituencies for bonuses.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Why not define the route subject to its being changed by the Minister of Railways. That would give an assurance to the municipalities that it could not be changed at the dictation of the railway company.

Mr. GRAHAM. As a matter of law, the company cannot change that route once it is approved. They cannot build a foot on any other location except with the approval of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand the route is approved for nearly the whole distance except for a part north of Lake Superior.

Mr. GRAHAM. A small part east of North Bay to Sudbury.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does that mean that the line must be built where the route has been so approved, and that no tribunal or minister or any other power can change that?

Mr. GRAHAM. No. Most of this route has been approved by the Minister of Railways, and a portion has been definitely located by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is it first approved by the minister and then located by the board?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is approved generally speaking by the minister after he has given notice to the railways and municipalities and others interested. That location is taken to the Board of Railway Commissioners who can vary it a mile either way. The road from Sudbury west has been approved by the Minister of Railways, and the Board of Railway Commissioners. The line, with the exception named from Montreal to east of North Bay, has been approved by the minister. My hon. friend asks can that be changed? It can be changed, but all the proceedings would have to be gone over again. The company would have to make their application and file a new map showing the proposed deviations and all the parties would have to be heard. Then the minister could, if he considered the argument sufficient, consent to the deviation. Then that would have to go before the Railway Commission again, and the parties be again heard.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The definition of the route leaves Rideau Junction a little west of Ottawa, and hits nothing again until it strikes Port Arthur, eight or nine hundred miles away. Why not name some points fifty or a hundred miles apart to indicate in some general way where the line is to run between Rideau Junction and Port Arthur.

Mr. GRAHAM. It does in one other point:

A line of railway extending from a point in the township of Capreol, in the district of Sudbury, to or near Sellwood Junction.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I thought that was quite close.

Mr. GRAHAM. Sellwood Junction is north of Sudbury. There would be no objection at all to saying 'at or near North Bay.' That would give a general line.

Mr. BRADBURY. Why could it not be described as so many miles north of the Canadian Pacific railway at given points?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is fixed absolutely on the route map.

Mr. BRADBURY. You can revise that any time you like. Why not fix it at given points on the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. Then we could not change it, and that might stop the building of the line.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I have here the Toronto 'Globe' of April 11, 1908, which has an editorial discussing the propriety of the Ontario government guaranteeing the Canadian Northern bonds to the extent of $1,500,000. This is an illuminating editorial. It is headed 'A million and a half endorsement,' and is as follows:

Such an Act as that guaranteeing the bonds of the McKenzie and Mann system to the extent of a million and a half would never be introduced except at the close of a session. The explanation that the necessary information was not available earlier sounds puerile in the face of the obvious attitude of the public towards such a measure. To bring it in at a reasonable time in the session would have been to invite the earnest consideration of the public. It would have led the public to ask why their credit should be pledged to the extent of a gigantic sum for the benefit of these men and their enterprises. If the public had a few weeks to reflect on the matter instead of having it rushed through in virtual violation of the rule, they would have asked why the endorsement of the province, and an endorsement having a large cash value, should be given for nothing. They would also have asked how far the line aided by the credit of the province would go to build up a system parallel to or in competition with the road which the province should complete to Hudson bay.

Then the article goes on:

Such a pledging of the credit of the province naturally occurs, not only in the dying hours of the session, but in the dying hours of the legislature and when a general election is above the horizon.

We hear rumours around Ottawa that there is to be a general election.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend did not repudiate that guarantee by the Ontario government, but defended it.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). The Minister of Railways is not repudiating it now. The article proceeds:

Mr. E. B. Osler has stated in the Dominion House that subsidies voted to railway promoters do not always stay with them, but are sometimes diverted to the politicians voting them. This from one so well informed should lead to questioning every time the money of the people is given or the credit of the people is pledged to support any private railway enterprise. The same interest that is freely receiving the credit of the province to the extent of a million and a half is virtually holding up Hon. Adam Beck's power policy and stepping in where the premier was afraid to venture. Taking all the circumstances into account this extension of public favour to men who are interfering with the development of a public policy has anything but an innocent aspect. It is at all events a blunder and a waste of public resources, and it remains for the government to assure the public that it is nothing worse.

That is a very illuminating editorial coming from the source it does, because the conditions at that time bear somewhat of a resemblance to those existing now. Here we have a pledge of $35,000,000 on the eve of a general election. It is being rushed through the dying hours of this stage of the session. Some one has suggested the dying hours of the government. I would respectfully suggest that, owing to the importance of this matter, and the strong condemnation of this pledging of the credit of the people to which we have just listened from the Toronto 'Globe,' the Minister of Railways should postpone the consideration of this Bill until we come back after recess. We would then be in better position to give judgment as we would have had the opportunity of testing the feeling of our constituencies regarding the guaranteeing of such an immense sum to these men.

On the preamble,

Mr. PORTER. As to the preamble of this Bill, I take it to be a recital of the facts upon which this legislation is based. I do not doubt for a moment that the construction of this railway by means of the guarantee that this Bill gives will be of vast benefit to the Canadian Northern railway. But that is not the preamble of the Bill. The preamble is that it is greatly in the interest of Canada that this Bill should pass in the form in which the committee has just pronounced upon it. Now, I would like to know, for my own information, before assenting to the passing of that preamble, whether the facts—or the alleged facts—stated in it, are true, and what evidence there is before the House to show that they are true. I agree, in a general way, that there is prosperity, and great prosperity, in this country. But to go to the extent of saying that the increase, or to use the words of the preamble—'that, having regard to the growth of population'—is another matter. I question very much that the growth of population in Canada since the construction of the last transcontinental railway has been such as to be a reason, a good reason, for constructing a third transcontinental railway. I do not believe that the statement is true, as recited in the preamble of the Bill. The preamble goes on, 'and the rapid development of the production of trade of that portion of Canada lying west of the Great Lakes.' Now it is unquestioned and unquestionable that there has been very great development and production in that part of the country lying west of the Great Lakes, but it does not necessarily follow that there has been such an increase in the production and trade as to warrant the construction of another line of railway. Are we to assume from the statement in the preamble of the Bill that it is a fact that there has been such a development in the production in trade in that part of the country that it does warrant the construction of a railway. I would ask the minister (Mr. Graham) what evidence he has of that fact to convince this House that the construction of another transcontinental line of railway is a necessity, or even advantageous, at this particular time. It seems to me that, in order to pass judgment upon that, it would be absolutely necessary to have some comparative table of the amount of traffic and extent of development in that country that the railways already existing are capable of handling, or some evidence that the railways now in existence are incapable of handling the development and the trade of that portion of Canada. We are absolutely without any information, so far as I have heard the discussion, upon that phase of the Bill. The preamble goes on to say: 'and the rapidly extending trade and commerce of Canada.' No doubt, the trade and commerce of Canada generally is extending; but the extension of that trade—to repeat what I have already said—is not settled such (or may not be such) as to warrant the construction of another transcontinental line of railway. We have no figures upon which to base any such statement. It looks well on paper, and I hope it is all true. I hope that the trade of the west and the trade of Canada generally has developed to such an extent that the construction of this line of railway, or even still another line of railway, is an absolute necessity; but I do not believe it at this time. I have no facts before me, nor am I able to lay hold on any facts that would enable me to pass judgment as to whether the statement in this preamble is true or false. If true, it ought to be made known to this House and the country; if untrue, it ought not to be recited as a reason for passing this Bill. And it seems to me that the committee ought to have some information on this subject. The preamble says further, 'to open up and develop portions as yet without railway facilities.' Now, I can remember very well, during the argument preceding the passage of the Bill incorporating the Grand Trunk Pacific, that it was said that railway would open up a section of the country that heretofore had been unserved by any railway and would answer the purposes of the country for a long time to come. When the line came to be located finally, we found that it did not, and will not, serve a portion of the country such as it was stated it was designed to serve, but, in very large measure will parallel, and very closely parallel, another line of railway, and will not open up new country to settlement or will not traverse a country that is being traversed and rapidly settled up by the people of this country. Now, this measure may be only a repetition of what took place a very short time ago in regard to the National Transcontinental. It seems to me we ought to have some evidence in regard to that point on which this committee could base a judgment. It goes on to say, 'to promote the internal and foreign trade of Canada,' to develop commerce through Canadian ports, and to afford the government systems of railways in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, an interchange of through traffic. For these reasons, it is said, this railway ought to be assisted in the manner indicated here. Now, up to the present time, I have not been able to discover any evidence that the statements made in this preamble are true. We are asked to say that for the reasons set out here this government ought to be pledged to the extent that we are pledging it by this Bill, and we are asked to say it in the face of an entire absence of any evidence to convince this House or to cause hon. members to believe that the basis on which we are asked to do this act are true. It seems to me that the hon. minister, before asking the House to adopt the preamble of this Bill, should come to the House with a comparative table of the trade that was handled by one railway, the trade that is just now handled by two railways, and the trade that will be handled by three railways, if this one is constructed, to show that the construction of the third line is a necessity, in order to meet the requirements of our foreign trade or the trade of Canada generally. It seems to me that we need some data, some information, upon which we would be able to form a reasonable judgment in that connection. Until we have that evidence, and in the entire absence of that evidence, I cannot agree with the statements, however much I might hope and desire that they are absolutely true—I cannot undertake to say that they are true without some evidence being furnished in that way.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will not detain the House very long. In the first place, surely my hon. friend (Mr. Porter) does not want any tables outside those in the trade returns, to answer his first objection as to the trade of Canada rapidly increasing. I do not think he would ask me——

Mr. PORTER. I admitted that in opening. I said I admitted it; but to be able to judge whether the increase was of sufficient extent to warrant this Bill, I want a comparative table.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend, of course, will understand that a comparative table would not assist him very much in forming his conclusion. The question of the future of Canadian trade can only be based on the faith we have in the country. I pointed out the other day, when perhaps my hon. friend was not present, that in looking over the western country I found the Canadian Northern railway with 4,000 miles west of the Great Lakes, but without any outlet except over some other line.

Mr. PORTER That is in the interest of the railway.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not want to contradict my hon. friend, I do not look at it in that way. At the present moment, perhaps, the railways that are under construction could handle the traffic, but there is a good deal of doubt as to the ability of the railways and transportation companies to handle the traffic as rapidly as it ought to be handled. If you give them sufficient time they can handle any amount of traffic.

Mr. PORTER. Do the present railways say that they are unable to handle the traffic?

Mr. GRAHAM. Now, my hon. friend takes the railway side of it, as he accused me of doing a moment ago. I have discussed this matter with a good many people in the west, men who ship goods. The railways contend that they can handle all the traffic, but a good many shippers contend that they cannot get accommodation even now when they need it. What the western production is to-day is hardly an indication of what the traffic will be in three or four years. I may be wrong, but I believe I would be recreant to my duty as a public man if, having an opportunity to connect the eastern and western sections of this great system by merely lending the name of the government to the proposal, I did not take advantage of the opportunity. To my mind the traffic in the next five or six years when these two roads are completed will be ample to keep all the three railways busy, running to their full capacity for the most part of the year. I believe further, and I think western people will agree with me, that we can improve our waterways, and there will still be sufficient traffic for the railways and the waterways. Now, this is not all done in the interest of the west. A railway train bringing a load of wheat from the west must take back a load of goods from the east in order to give a fairly good freight rate. I am not such a little Canadian that I am afraid the transportation facilities of Canada will not have all they can do when they are up to the requirements of the country. The man who has a carload of wheat in the west will send it to the ocean port by the line that will take it at the best rate, and in the quickest time; and if Canada has the courage to give these facilities we will get the carrying trade, and the country that has the carrying trade is the great country of the world. Now let me point out further that the people of the east have as much interest in this line as the people of the west. It must be borne in mind that one train load of implements going to the west pay the railroad perhaps twice as much as a train load of grain going to the east, owing to the different classification of the freight. In order not only that the west should have good facilities for getting its products to the east, but that the east should have good facilities for getting its products to the west, I say again that I would not be doing my duty if I were to neglect an opportunity of securing this line for the country. It is my belief that in the next five or six years the increase in the western traffic will be something that we cannot now understand. There is not a man in this House, who has not lived in the west for years, who can realize the marvellous advance of that country in the last ten years. The most optimistic people never thought that the west at this moment would have reached the proportions it has reached, and only the fringe has yet been touched. I may be perhaps too optimistic, but I have the fullest confidence that when the Grand Trunk Pacific is built, and when the Canadian Northern is built, when our transportation facilities are completed, including the Hudson Bay railway, there will still be traffic sufficient in Canada to keep all these lines busy, and people will even be asking for better accommodation.

I believe also that Canada occupies a natural position on this continent, not only to do her own carrying trade cheaper than anybody else, but is in a position to offer facilities to our neighbours to the south that will give us a part of their carrying trade from the east to the west and back again.

I come back again to my statement that this proposition to connect the east and the west by this through line, simply by loaning the name of the government to aid them to get money more cheaply, is an opportunity that parliament cannot afford to let go by. Now, as to the eastern section, it is a belief held by most Canadians who have looked over the matter carefully during the last two or three years, that there are abundant signs of great development in eastern Canada during the next four or five years, and a government that does not rise to the situation, and refuse to wait until the opportunity comes and has gone, is not doing its duty to the people. Governments make mistakes, but I believe that the country west and east demands greater transportation facilities, that the rate of wages of the man working on the farm, and in the shop, as well as the profits of the proprietors, depend on the speed and cheapness of their transportation facilities. Those are my views. I believe that in a few years to come we will see in the east a development scarcely second to that in the west, and it is our duty to endeavour to conduct the trade down through our own Canadian territory to Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, and do everything we can to stimulate the efforts of our own people. We are side by side with a great country with a very much larger population, and we are doing our best to maintain our position on this continent.

Mr. PORTER. What development does the minister speak of in the east?

Mr. GRAHAM. A general development in the east. People do not understand, even in Ontario, that there is as much land in the newer parts of Ontario yet untilled as there is now cultivated in the older portions of the province. This railway will run through the southern portion towards the centre of the clay belt; the Grand Trunk Pacific will run through the northern portion. When the Timiskaming Northern and Ontario Railway was being projected, many people laughed at it, and said it would be merely a colonization road. But the result has been that Ontario has developed, and has been shown to possess some of the richest mineral areas in the world. If we go further east we will find the same wealth in Quebec, in Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, where there are besides vast areas of good agricultural land that are not being cultivated as they ought to be. These provinces are making efforts through their provincial governments to attract immigration to open up their natural resources. Nova Scotia has a mineral wealth that we in Ontario know very little about, acres and acres of which have not yet been uncovered. I do not know what the future has in store for the little province of Nova Scotia, but if we do our duty as Canadians to assist her, as well as New Brunswick, which has also great mineral resources besides her agriculture and timber, we shall see the eastern part of Canada rivalling the west in prosperity. I have sufficient faith in the country to believe that if we have courage, Canada in twenty years from now will have assumed such proportions in the life of the world that we who are now discussing these questions will be surprised even at our own modesty.

Mr. PORTER. If we just take care of it. The United States have developed along the lines the minister has just indicated Canada is to develop. The United States, we may say, is fully developed to-day; all her natural advantages have been exploited. She has made more rapid progress than any other country. We will have three transcontinental railways in Canada for a population of 8,000,000 and the United States, with all its development and with a century of time, should, according to the same ratio of population, have about twenty transcontinental lines to carry its commerce, which is absurd. Canada is capable of great development in wealth, commerce and trade if we only take care of it, and do not allow it to get into the hands of the Americans through reciprocity or some other mistake of this government, but the minister will see that his argument does not lead to the conclusion he would have us believe, that is, that we should have three transcontinental railways to take care of the traffic now or ten years from now or that the present railway facilities are not sufficient for our present needs. On the contrary it proves by comparison with conditions in the United States, and their development, that we do not need a third road at this time. I agree that the Canadian Northern railway, having lines constructed in the west, and also in the east, it is vitally important to the Canadian Northern that these two systems should be hooked up together, and that this Bill should help the Canadian Northern railway in such a way that they would be willing to reciprocate. It might be well to add another declaratory clause: And whereas there is likely to be a general election in 1911, and the Canadian Northern railway will likely contribute generously to the campaign funds, therefore, it is desirable to pass this Bill.

Bill reported.

Mr. GRAHAM moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, we all agree that this country is now experiencing a period of unusual development, although that development is no greater than is justified by its great resources, and by the enterprise and industry of its people. The Minister of Railways is inspired with a spirit of optimism. I think every Canadian is so inspired, but what I object to is that the minister should develop the spirit of optimism just at the period when this House is about to adjourn for a couple of months and that he should insist on that spirit of optimism running its full course in this particular matter, without that due consideration of the measure which otherwise it would receive. Optimism is a very desirable thing in public men in a country like Canada, in a very interesting stage of its development and progress, but there are other qualities which are just as necessary or which should at least accompany that optimism. Some of these are a reasonable regard for business methods, a reasonable amount of foresight, a reasonable amount of caution in pledging the resources of the country. The circumstances under which this Bill has been introduced, and under which it is being pressed to an unusually speedy conclusion in this House do not indicate that the government is seized of all these qualities. The Bill was introduced at a very late period. My hon. friend received a very great inspiration in the west last year. He returned from the west some time in September. Why is it that this optimism with which he was then inspired did not prompt him to introduce this measure earlier in the session? It is undoubtedly true, as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) pointed out, that this measure has not received the consideration which it would probably have received if it had been introduced three or four months ago. But we also find that the methods of the government in introducing this Bill are otherwise not quite up to the standard which we might expect. There has been almost a complete lack of information on two points, first as to the necessity of the road and, secondly, as to its cost. When I speak of the necessity of the road, I couple with that the extremely meagre information that is embodied in the Bill with respect to the route over which the road is to be constructed. As to the cost, I repeat that if it had been my privilege to introduce a Bill like this for the consideration of the House of Commons, and if I based my claim that the Bill should be passed on the statement that the road would cost on an average $50,000 a mile, I would have considered it my absolute duty to bring the report of at least one, and probably more than one engineer of standing who would state to the House of Commons that in his belief a road built up to that standard would cost that amount. I must repeat that I do not think the minister has treated the House of Commons with proper respect when he asks them to assume that the road will cost that amount, he himself having given no more attention to that particular phase of the question than what he has explained to us in the course of his remarks upon this Bill. The route is exceedingly indefinite. I repeat that it was the duty of the government to have given us at least ten or twelve points which this road might have been expected to touch between Rideau Junction and Port Arthur. I have not heard advanced any reason why that should not be done.

In the discussion on the resolutions I pointed out that with regard to the building of this road for a distance of four or five hundred miles north of Lake Superior, that is undoubtedly unnecessary at present. I say so for the reason that I understand the Canadian Pacific Railway can to-day accommodate over that portion of its lines five times the traffic that is offered, and we have the Grand Trunk Pacific in process of construction there, thus giving us three railways north of Lake Superior. I imagine that when these three roads are completed they will be able to carry from ten to fifteen times the traffic that will be offered for many years to come. I regard the construction of these roads there under these conditions as an economic waste. If you waste the money of Canada in building railways where they are not needed, you must necessarily deprive of railways other parts of the country that are justly entitled to them.

I desire to emphasize that this measure contains no assurance that the traffic which will be gathered by this system in western Canada will be brought all the way over Canadian routes to Canadian ports. It is idle for me to repeat my remarks on that subject. It is true the measure does embody a stipulation for an agreement to that effect, but if that agreement should not be fulfilled by these two companies I do not know what can be done about it, except possibly it might be a ground for parliament to take some step against the companies by way of retaliation or punishment, but whether such a step could be taken with advantage to the people of Canada is very problematical.

Another point is this; when the measure for the construction of the National Transcontinental railway was brought down I urged, and others on this side of the House urged, that as the people of Canada were financing that road to the extent of more than three-fourths of its entire cost, it would have been proper that the people of Canada should have some direct interest in it. I estimated at the time that the government of Canada financed the National Transcontinental railway to the extent of nine-tenths of its cost. The people of Canada received no interest whatever in the common stock of the road, while the Grand Trunk Railway Company which assisted to a very limited extent in financing the project received the entire common stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific amounting to $25,000,000. I also pointed out that while that common stock represented no present investment of capital it would, through the progress and development of the country, ultimately acquire very great value. It seemed to us on this side of the House that the people of Canada by reason of the financial aid they were giving to that undertaking should have some direct interest in the value which would be created in that common stock by reason of the progress and growth of the Dominion. I admit that in the present case the conditions are not quite similar. We asked that the Grand Trunk Railway Company should be called on to indemnify the government against the guarantee which it was giving for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and our motions in that regard were denied. That which was denied in the case of the Grand Trunk is carried out in this case, because the Canadian Northern does, by the terms of this agreement, indemnify the government and the people of Canada against any loss which may accrue by reason of the guarantee of the bonds of the Canadian Northern Ontario railway; so that the two cases are not quite similar. But notwithstanding that difference, inasmuch as this government is giving very important financial assistance towards the construction of this railway it would have been proper for the government to insist that the people of this country should have some direct interest in the common stock of this railway as a consideration for the aid given. The interests of the people of the Dominion have not been safeguarded in that respect nor in the other respects I have mentioned.

In conclusion I wish to say that I do not pretend to doubt that the road, as the country increases in population and development, will be a financial success, but in the net result the people of Canada, while they get the advantage of the transportation, have no further control of the rates than that which already exists through the Board of Railway Commissioners. And although the common stock of this railway will no doubt some day reach the very high standard which the stock of other great railways in Canada has attained, and although we are contributing to the building of this road by pledging the credit of the country to the extent of about $37,000,000, the people of Canada in the end will have no direct interest whatever in all that enormous value which will come to the promoters of this road. I regret that the measure was not introduced at a time when it would have been possible for parliament to have given to this proposal the consideration and discussion which its magnitude deserves.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this question before we finally dispose of this Bill, if for no other reason than to put myself on record as to some of the views I hold regarding this and similar questions. This session will certainly go down to the history of the Canadian parliament as one in which we have been very prodigal in our provision for expenditure, and our assistance to railways. It is true, we have good times, the country is being developed rapidly, and the people do not feel the pinch of want very much. But that to my mind is no justifiable reason why we should go it too extravagantly in the meantime. I have been looking over what we have committed the country to during the present session and what we propose to commit it to before the session is ended, and I sum up the commitments in the following figures. First, our estimates, main and supplementaries, amount to $156,000,000, a provision for the expenditure of one year which certainly is a record-breaker, being away and above anything that Canada has ever been called upon to expend in any year up to the present time; and when one remembers that this is proposed by a party who, before they came into power, were notable for their desire for stringent economy, one realizes the wonderful difference there is in some men between professions and practice. Then, we are committing the country to an expenditure for the Canadian Northern railway of at least $37,000,000 for the first building of the road, and about $1,250,000 for the two years interest which will be borne by the country before there is anything repaid by the company. We have also on the notice paper some resolutions providing for the leasing or taking over or building of 445 miles of railways in the eastern provinces as branches of the Intercolonial railway. This will cost us, at the rate which we have estimated the Canadian Northern will cost, namely, $35,000 a mile, about $15,575,000; making in all, for these railway projects, saying nothing about the railway subsidies of which I presume we shall have some before the session ends, $52,575,000. This, added to the estimates, makes a sum total of $209,800,000 that we are during the present session, committing the country to either in the expenditure of cash or in credit. That is a very large amount of money. Perhaps the development of the country may justify it; perhaps it may be necessary; but to my mind we have not had submitted to us sufficient evidence to convince me at least that this heavy expenditure is amply justified. I know that the west is developing rapidly; I know that there will be an important trade to be handled in the future; but in my judgment the provision we have already made will be quite sufficient to handle that trade for years to come. I agree entirely with what the hon. leader of the opposition said with regard to the portion of the Canadian Northern railway passing around Lake Superior, where one railway could handle nearly all the traffic if it were run to its capacity. It seems to me it is not the height of wisdom to provide for building three railways, and the cost of maintaining the tracks when one could do the work. Therefore, I look on that expenditure as one which is not justified by circumstances, and which a good business man would have avoided in the interest of the country. We have been obliged to do this on very scanty information. I happened to be attending a committee meeting during the time the Minister of Railways made the most of his speech, and I did not hear all he said; but I read most of it afterwards, and I thought the information he gave was very meagre, and very unsatisfactory to any business man who wanted to satisfy himself as to whether we were doing the proper thing or not. One of the questions that interested me was: What did the Canadian Northern up to the present time cost per mile? I do not know whether that information was given or not. Perhaps the hon. minister will say now.

Mr. GRAHAM. No, it was not given.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that was a very important item of information that we should have had, because it would have enabled us to determine with some kind of approximate accuracy whether or not we were proposing to give too much for the building of this portion of the road. The next question was: What is its bonded indebtedness? Was that given?

Mr. GRAHAM. That was not given.

Mr. SPROULE. That is another item of information which I think the House ought to have had to enable us to determine about what the portion of the road already built has cost. Then we could have judged whether the country was giving too large a subvention for the portion of the road proposed to be built. The next question was: What subsidies in land or money have the Canadian Northern Railway Company received or are they to receive for any portion of their road, and how much per mile does it amount to?

Mr. GRAHAM. I gave that information.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the hon. minister tell me approximately what it amounted to?

Mr. GRAHAM. I cannot tell how much per mile. There was a subsidy, I suppose, of $6,400 per mile, for the portion between Montreal and Hawkesbury; but that has not been earned, as that portion has not yet been constructed. Then the Quebec legislature gave it a land grant, but that has never been earned, and will have to be revoted. The Ontario legislature gave for a portion of the road from Sudbury west 4,600 acres per mile.

Mr. SPROULE. For how many miles?

Mr. GRAHAM. I forget the distance. Then there are ten miles that will become part of this line and on which the Ontario government gave a guarantee in connection with the Toronto terminal. Those are the subsidies from Ottawa to Hawkesbury that had been paid to the Canadian Northern railway.

Mr. SPROULE. We ought to know what assistance this company has received for the building of this railway. We ought to know its indebtedness per mile and the actual cost of the road. All these things we ought to know before deciding whether or not the estimate of the cost of building that portion of the railway not yet built is too high or too low. But we are simply asked to go it blind and put this Bill through on the most insufficient data. That is not the way to treat the representatives of the people. What the road cost per mile, what is its indebtedness per mile, both by bonds and other indebtedness, what subsidies in land or money have been given or remain to be given, what the company has received in every shape or form for these portions of the road—all these things we ought to know. Then the question which interests me is: are we giving the company too much? We know that we give subsidies to railways of $3,200 per mile or $6,400 per mile, according to the cost of construction. But we have had a great many miles built without subsidy, from which the people are getting all the benefits they can expect from this line. Are we giving too much? I heard it said not long ago in Toronto that the Canadian Northern railway is one of the most fortunate railways in Canada because its bonded indebtedness is very much below that of any other railway. How did this company build its various lines? It built them through the subsidies given and by selling its bonds. The owners of this system put very little of their own money into it, so that whatever the railway costs, was paid through the assistance given by the various governments in this country and through selling its bonds. I heard an eminent financier say that if the Canadian Northern railway were as successful in the future as it has been in the past, it will not be long before it will have between five and six thousand miles of railway on which practically there is no indebtedness except the bonded indebtedness. The owners of this system will be among the richest railway men in the world without having put much of their own money into it. Are we helping them by this proposal to a greater extent than we ought, to build that portion which we are told it is so desirable to build? I think we are giving entirely too much, and I am under the impression that such is the opinion of the bulk of the people. Our people have pretty well come to the conclusion that we have reached the time when we should cease subsidizing railways because, although we have many railways to which we have given extensive subsidies, not one of them will carry a pound of freight a cent cheaper than if we had given nothing. These railway men may become rich, their shares may go to 240 or 250, their bonds may sell at a high premium, they may pay large dividends, but the users have still to pay high rates for freight and traffic. Just look at what the Canadian Pacific railway got from the country. Look at the dividends it is paying and the prices quoted for its stock and bonds, largely due to the assistance given by this country, but how much benefit has the country received from that railway on account of this assistance? The more we give, the less we get in return, and the day has passed when we should be so lavish with our assistance, without getting any consideration in return.

There is another question in this connection that interests me, more particularly as a resident of southwestern Ontario. It is said that this system will be beneficial to the whole country. Perhaps in one sense it may. But many years ago I said the building of railways through the hinterland had practically side-tracked line and the trade of the country southwestern Ontario almost entirely. Southwestern Ontario was until quite lately on the great highway of commerce, but to-day it is simply on the branch east and west is being carried away past it, although it is one of the most wealthy and most thickly populated parts of the Dominion. Southwestern Ontario paid proportionately a larger share of this money than any other section of the Dominion. What does she get in return? Practically this expenditure has reduced the value of her farms, destroyed her towns and cities and injured her ports in the Georgian Bay. It has practically impoverished southwestern Ontario for the benefit of the back part of the country. Indirectly that policy is doing good, but every additional line we build there is an additional highway that injures the southwestern portion of Ontario. What do we get in return? Little or nothing. The trade is being carried by our ports, our cities are being dwarfed and we are put on the branch lines instead of being the great highway of commerce which we were heretofore. . . I do not think that we should look with any favour on this proposed heavy expenditure. In my opinion the people are not getting any substantial benefit proportioned to the assistance we are giving this road. I think the government would have been well advised had they arranged, when giving this lavish support, to get some reduction in the freight rates. Had they been the good business men they profess to be, they would have made an effort in that direction.

It seems strange that, after all we have given for railways in this Dominion, stuff can be hauled twenty-five, thirty or forty miles with horse teams as cheaply as it can be carried by railway. Two years ago I had some light machinery to bring from a place about thirty-five miles this side of Toronto. I inquired at the factory what it would cost me to lay it down in Toronto and was given a figure, but was told that if it was all the same to me they could send it to Toronto a little cheaper by horse team than by the Grand Trunk railway. So it was carried thirty-five miles by horse team and put on the railway over which it had to be carried to reach its destination, and it was done cheaper than the Grand Trunk would carry it, and transfer it about half a mile to the other road. That means that there is something wrong with regard to the service the railways of this country give the people.

Well, we are called upon to pass this Bill. Is there any urgency in it? The Minister of Railways says there is, but he has not told us in what that urgency consists. We have no information, but we have pushed the measure through in a very short time. Why, if a man were buying 100 acres of land in a section not thoroughly known to him he would take more trouble about it than we are taking about this arrangement that is going to cost the country about $37,000,000. I presume the explanation of 'urgency' in this Bill is that we are near an election. It takes money to run elections, and the government must get money from some source. We know where these funds have come from in the past, and where they are likely to come from in the future.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. gentleman should tell us where they come from?

Mr. SPROULE. I could easily give the facts as to some, and there is a good deal more that we could clear up if we had a little of the information that the hon. gentleman and his friends could so easily give. In years gone by when Sir John Macdonald proposed to build the Canadian Pacific railway, he and his party were turned out of power because it was claimed they received or were to receive $50,000 for election purposes out of the assistance given to build that railway. How many times has this government got that amount twice over to run their elections from railway corporations and not a word about it? Would they dare to take the people into their confidence and tell how much they got in the past from the Canadian Pacific railway to run an election?—how much they got from the Canadian Northern?—how much they propose to get from the Canadian Northern out of this scheme when it is passed? I am sure that if they did, it would not be worth their while to go to the country, for they would be wiped out so suddenly they would scarcely know what struck them. That is one of the great reasons for 'urgency.' That is one of its great aims, in my opinion. The people of this country ought to know that, so that they might govern themselves accordingly when the day of reckoning comes. We would like to be able to give them that information clearly, but we cannot do it because we are denied the information. So, it is because of the approach of an election that it is important to put this through. I suppose the government will put it through, but we would like the people to know what is being done with their money, the lavish way in which their funds are expended and the reckless way in which they are committed to the burdens of taxation which must be borne for all time. And when in possession of that information, I hope that when they go to the polls, they will record their votes against this very 'economical' government that, a few years ago thought $43,000,000 expended in one year meant bleeding the people white, and to-day give us to understand that $156,000,000 of expenditure is stringent economy.

Mr. LAKE. I do not wish to detain the House at this stage of the proceedings, but I desire to say just a few words in the way of protest against this legislation and of comparison with other legislation that might be introduced. Rumours have been rife during the past two or three years that it was the intention of the government to hand over the Hudson Bay railway to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. In consequence of these rumours the strongest expression of opinion came from the people, especially the people of the west, and that expression of opinion was so strongly opposed to the proposed action that the government proposals in that respect were headed off. Now, apparently, we find that the government are determined to do something by way of making a gift to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. What can the reason be? The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has suggested reasons. It appears to me extremely probable that if the government had been allowed to hand over the Hudson Bay railway to the Canadian Northern Railway Company, we should not be asked to pass this legislation for them. This is making a gift to the Canadian Northern Railway Company. I speak advisedly when I say it is a gift because it means millions of dollars to that concern. And it may mean a very great burden upon the people—not less a burden because it bears the form of a guarantee for this company. For my part I would very much sooner see sums of money given outright rather than these enormous guarantees we are making, and which it appears to be the policy of the government to make to these railway companies. When this legislation is passed, I think we shall find that the people of this country are bound to the extent of somewhere near $100,000,000 of guarantees for undertakings by private companies. And we know that occasionally government guarantees have to be met. We had an example of that in the case of the Quebec Bridge Company. When the bonds were guaranteed for that bridge, it was never believed that the people would have to pay the guarantee, but the disaster to that bridge brought about a condition under which the government had to pay the money that was lost.

I wish to make a comparison between the providing of an additional transcontinental railway and the providing of a new outlet by means of the Hudson Bay railway. The people of the Northwest for many years past have been demanding an entirely new outlet for the produce of their country. They have the very highest hopes of the benefit to be derived from the building of the Hudson Bay railway. It is nearly three years ago now that the Prime Minister gave his word to the people of Canada that that railway should be built immediately. Up to the present time nothing whatever has been appropriated by this parliament for the construction of that road.

It was only on the 8th of the present month that the first sum appeared in the supplementary estimates for the commencement of that work, and up to the present moment parliament has not been asked to appropriate anything for the purpose. The sum which appears in the supplementary estimate is merely the sum of $2,000,000; that is all the government proposes to appropriate at present. If they only appropriate that amount each year, it will take fifteen to twenty years before that railway is provided for the people of the Northwest. There is an urgent demand for the construction of that railway by the people of the Northwest. The leader of the opposition this afternoon has demonstrated that there is no urgent demand for the construction of a third transcontinental railway. He has pointed out that the two railways now provided for, the Canadian Pacific railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific are amply sufficient at the present moment, and that all the freight which will be offering for many years to some will not half equal the capacity of those two railways. I think it would have been better for the government to provide for the Hudson Bay railway than to make this additional provision for another transcontinental railway which is not immediately needed. I yield to no man in my confidence in the great possibilities of our western country, but I think that at the present time the government should apply the public revenues for the extension of railway communication where it is most urgently needed, and that I believe is the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I was unfortunately unavoidably absent this morning when this Bill was discussed in committee. In looking over section 1, I find that it does not state through what towns this line of railway will pass, and I would like to know from the Minister of Railways whether it is to pass through the town of Pembroke. The Canadian Northern surveyors have been in that neighbourhood for some time, and it has been the impression that the road was going to pass through that town. Pembroke being one of the most important towns in the Ottawa valley, I would like to have the assurance of the Minister of Railways that the Canadian Northern will pass through that town.

Mr. GRAHAM. The route as approved passes within two miles on the east side of the town of Pembroke. I understood the town had some suggestions to make as to the entry, and as soon as an agreement is arrived at the route will be finally approved. If I remember rightly, it was at the instance of the town that the route was not approved before. However, I am sure it is the intention of the road to pass through the town of Pembroke. The company has never discussed any other suggestions with me.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

GRAND TRUNK WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). With the consent of the House I would like to present a matter of some urgency relating to Bill (No. 55) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company which has been passed this session. It was found that by a clerical error the word 'principal' in one of the clauses was omitted. It is a matter of guaranteeing the bonds of the Grand Trunk Western Railway Company, which is a road on the system from Detroit to Chicago. One clause of the Bill is intended to enable the Grand Trunk Railway Company to guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Western Company, but by inadvertence the Bill was read as only authorizing the guarantee of the interest, whereas the intention was to guarantee the principal as well. The Bill has come over from the Senate, amending the former Bill by inserting the word 'principal'; that is the only change in the Bill. The context clearly shows that that was the intention. I, therefore, move that Bill (No. 223) respecting the Grand Trunk railway of Canada be now read for the first time.

Mr. BARKER. Do I understand that the Bill sent from the Senate here is being altered?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The Bill that is now presented to the House is precisely as it was passed by the Senate; but it alters a Bill previously passed and assented to by the government, and which is now in force.

Mr. BARKER. Are we introducing the word 'principal' without further consideration by the House? The hon. gentleman will see it makes an enormous difference whether we authorize a company to guarantee principal and interest, or interest only.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That is true.

Mr. BARKER. I think it ought to stand a day or two.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The motion now is only to read the Bill the first time, and I propose doing as the Senate did, having it passed without reference to the committee. I have here the proceeding of the Grand Trunk meeting held in London in April, dealing with this Bill, pointing out clearly that the intention was to guarantee the principal as well.

Mr. LENNOX. That is virtually a new Bill?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Yes, just one clause saying that section 5 of the former Bill is amended by inserting the words 'principal and,' before 'interest.'

Mr. BARKER. The interest and principal are very different, the interest would be probably 25 times the principal, and we should not pass this without its going to the committee.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I will move that it be read the first and second time, and be referred to the committee, and that all rules be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. SPROULE. Why is there so much urgency for this Bill?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The urgency is that they are in the midst of negotiations. Since Bill (No. 55) was passed, at this session, the matter has been before the meeting of shareholders in London, and as the House is about to close they are anxious to have this disposed of.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What was the Bill?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It dealt with several matters, but the only clause in question was one authorizing the Grand Trunk Railway Company to guarantee a new issue of bonds of the Grand Trunk Western Railway Company, part of the system from Detroit to Chicago.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Was not the original guarantee simply a guarantee of interest on those bonds? You are replacing this with a fresh issue of bonds, and in the Bill already passed the Grand Trunk are permitted to guarantee the interest just as before; now you propose to guarantee not only the interest, but the principal as well, on the American end of the road.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That is quite right. They are at present guarantors for the interest only, but instead of having a second mortgage they have agreed, and desire to guarantee both principal and interest, and that is how the mistake arose, in drafting the Bill they followed the former one, guaranteeing the interest alone, whereas they wanted to guarantee the interest and principal.

Mr. BLAIN. When the matter was up for discussion in the committee was it understood that they were to guarantee the principal?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Although the Bill was in my name, I cannot now remember what occurred before the committee.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member has not been as frank with the House as he ought to have been. He says it was a clerical error, but now it seems it was simply the interest that was intended to be guaranteed.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It was intended to guarantee the principal as well. I have here the report of the meeting in London which shows that clearly.

Mr. LENNOX. When was this meeting?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). In April.

Mr. LENNOX. Since the Bill went through?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Yes. It was the intention from the beginning to guarantee the principal.

Mr. LENNOX. Is there any evidence of that?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I suppose we may say that until we have representatives of the railway present, that was the intention from the beginning.

Mr. BARKER. I have no doubt of the facts, but I am quite sure the proprietors of the Grand Trunk in England would be very pleased to know that some care was taken of these matters in this House, and I do not think that such a far-reaching change should be made without evidence being produced before a committee. I object to the Bill going through except in the usual way.

Mr. SPROULE. That is committing the Grand Trunk to an obligation to guarantee bonds belonging to a railway in the United States. This guarantee would take precedence of any obligations the Grand Trunk railway owe to the Dominion of Canada, and this would make Canada's security that much less valuable. We should not pass such an important measure without careful consideration.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I am not asking that it be considered now, it is to go to the committee in the usual way.

Mr. SPROULE. It looks like undue haste.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I understand there is a company in the United States, the Chicago and Grand Trunk——

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The Grand Trunk Western railway.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). And there is the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. By the amalgamation which took place some years ago, the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada acquired absolute control of the Grand Trunk in the United States although it remains a separate corporation. It had outstanding bonds. It is not as easy now as it was some time ago to finance a railway company, and even great railways like the Pennsylvania and the New York Central are feeling the stress. I suppose the Grand Trunk, desirous of having money as cheaply as possible, and to have the annual net charges reduced, has deemed it wise to have the guarantee extended to the principal as well as to the interest. Is it not a fact that the Grand Trunk owns all the stock as well as the bonds?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I have no reason to doubt that all my friend says is true, but I do not know.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first and second time.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex) moved that the Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, and that all rules be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That seems to be a pretty comprehensive form of motion. What would be the result of suspending all rules?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). We can strike that out.

Mr. LENNOX. The allegation is that this is to cure a mistake. If it was a mistake it ought to be corrected, but if it is not a mistake we are within a few minutes' initiating a Bill, and advancing it three stages contrary to all rules. We should have some evidence now that it is to correct a mistake.

I am not much concerned in it personally, but I have a lingering desire to see the rules observed. If my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke, Essex), knows of his own knowledge that it was a mistake, I shall be quite willing to take his statement, but if he does not know I urge my point.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I know nothing about it except that the Bill happens to stand in my name, but the committee is the only place where those who know about the mistake can appear and give evidence.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the directors state they want the Bill amended in this way I do not see any particular reason why it should not be so amended, provided they have given proper notice to their shareholders so that they may appear before the committee if they so desire. Subject to that it is a matter that concerns the company more than it concerns anybody else.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The petition to parliament for the Bill states that it was an oversight in the original Act not to include what is now asked for.

Mr. FIELDING. If it is a clerical error it is not a clerical error on the part of parliament, but in the drafting of the Bill. No harm can be done by letting it go to the committee, but in view of the importance of the change the committee should give it very careful consideration, and not treat it as a mere clerical error.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FIELDING. I would like to call attention to the remaining business of the House up to the time of the adjournment. Hon. gentlemen on both sides have very reasonably urged that we should have a definite understanding as to the time of adjournment so that they may be able to make their arrangements accordingly. We have not hitherto been able to make a definite statement, but we may now say that it is our desire and intention that the House should adjourn on Friday, which is the earlier day of the two mentioned. I believe if we can arrange to adjourn on Friday we should be giving effect to the general feeling of the House.

Som hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING. I quite understand that at this stage matters which may be submitted to the House cannot be advanced very far unless by general consent. When you are within forty-eight hours of the date fixed for adjournment any hon. gentleman who has strong objection to any particular measure can very easily prevent its enactment. In giving the list of the measures which we desire to bring to the notice of the House, and to advance, I do so with the understanding that we can only hope for success so far as they are non-contentious. There may be some of the measures which I shall mention which are in part contentious, and in part non-contentious, and we may be able to take that which is generally satisfactory, and reserve that which is debatable. Of course, fair discussion on any of these measures is invited, but if it be found there is such strong opposition to any one of these measures from any section of the House as to indicate that the discussion will carry us beyond the Friday adjournment, we frankly say we will not press that measure beyond sufficient time to ascertain the disposition of the House towards it. We propose to take up as the next measure, the Railway Act, portions of which I understand are not likely to be debatable. If there are any portions of it which are likely to give rise to debate, and in consequence to delay, the Minister of Railways will consider what portions he wishes to press, and what portions he wishes to set aside.

The special Bill respecting the Bank Act, as I have already stated, will be advanced, also a Bill which is associated with it known as the Quebec Savings Banks Bill. The Forest Reserves Bill, I am told, although it has been the subject of considerable discussion, should be passed, and is not likely to be much objected to; I do not know whether I am correct in that or not. There is also the Grain Act which my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior will advance and see what the desire of the House is concerning it. The Water Carriage Bill, which I am advised, is not likely to be contentious, will be brought forward; it is to amend an Act of a previous session, and I understand that it has been agreed upon by the Committee on Marine and Fisheries. Then, there is the Quebec Battlefields Bill, which has already engaged the attention of the House briefly, and which it is desired to advance. The resolution respecting the Japanese Treaty will be presented, and a Bill founded thereon. The Minister of Public Works has a notice on the Order Paper concerning the Collingwood Shipbuilding Company, which he will endeavour to advance. The Minister of Railways has two resolutions relating to the Intercolonial railway which will be presented for the consideration of the House under the conditions I have mentioned. We now come to the question of Supply. I shall have occasion to present this evening a small extra supplementary estimate dealing with a matter in connection with the coronation arrangements throughout the country, to which I am sure there will be no objection. We will bring forward a number of items in the estimates—I will send my hon. friend the leader of the opposition a list of them—which we will ask the House to vote for the whole year. Some of these items are small and beyond all question, and I think the committee will agree to vote them. Others are quite large, but although they are for the twelve months, the actual expenditure is likely to fall within the summer months, and a failure to grant practically the whole amount might paralyze the particular services for the whole year. That of course will have to be explained by the ministers in charge of these items when they are brought forward. Then, having obtained as much as we reasonably may of the votes for the whole year, we shall introduce a vote on account, in which I shall propose to take such sum as, united with what has previously been voted, will make five-twelfths of the estimates for the year, that being in accordance with a previous understanding. This is the programme as far as it is possible to state it now. It is possible that some measures have escaped my notice. If so, they will be added under the conditions I have mentioned. We shall only press each on the House if it proves to be of a non-contentious character.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. Minister of Finance has given us a pretty good programme for 48 hours. Including the Supply Bill, to which he has referred, it comprises twelve Bills and resolutions which we are expected to dispose of in that time. Well, I do not suppose it is seriously expected that we shall make such remarkable progress on all these Bills or on any considerable number of them within that time; it will be absolutely impossible to do it. So far as I am personally concerned, I would rather remain until Tuesday night and give them proper discussion than to drive them through in order to adjourn on Friday night. We have been rushing things through rapidly enough, I fear too rapidly in some cases. Some of these measures may invite discussion; about some of them there will be no question whatever. I would not feel disposed, for the sake of getting away on Friday, to limit what I would regard as necessary discussion on any one of these measures. At the same time, subject to that, I would be very glad to assist in getting as many of them through as possible.

Mr. FIELDING. I am quite content with my hon. friend's remarks, which are reasonable. I have certainly no desire to limit discussion on any one of these Bills. If after fair discussion hon. gentlemen still wish to postpone them, they will not be pressed, if I am right in assuming that they want to get away on Friday. Do not imagine that I would object to remain till Tuesday. I thought I was giving assent to the general wish of the House to get away on Friday, but if I am mistaken in that, I am willing to change the date to Tuesday.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I would suggest that the hon. leader of the House take up his Supply Bill first, and then we shall have time to attend to these Bills afterwards. The most important item before the House, as far as the government is concerned, is the Supply Bill. If the Minister of Railways thinks the Intercolonial Railway Bill is the most important, we can discuss that for 48 hours. There is nothing going to be advanced in this House by endeavouring to give us too much to do or by threatening us that if we do not put all these measures through we shall not get away on Friday. We can stay here till Tuesday. We have enough money left to pay our board till Tuesday, and the reasonable course for the leader of the House, to my mind, was to have brought down all the supplies he wanted as soon as the programme was laid down when the House was going to adjourn. After that we could have discussed these Bills. As I understand, the premier announced, before he left, that all the Supply that had been arranged and promised had been passed by this House except the five-twelfths. Now, there is a large Supply needed apparently over and beyond that. If the government want that Supply passed before the 23rd, I think it would be wise for the leader of the House to bring it down right away and get it passed.

Mr. FIELDING. I think the programme is not so difficult as my hon. friend imagines. We shall try to get through a number of these Bills, and if we find that they will be unduly delayed, we will not press them on the House.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Mr. FIELDING presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting further supplementary estimates for the year ending the 31st March, 1912, which were referred to the Committee of Supply.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 197) to amend the Railway Act—Mr. Graham—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. GRAHAM. This is merely to make the section of the Act which compels the railway companies to furnish us with statistics, apply to telegraph, telephone and express companies.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Does this provide for express companies making a return also?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know that it would include the return which my hon. friend has in mind, but certain statistics required as to the amount of business, indebtedness, &c., from railways, is also required from telegraph and telephone companies.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). The hon. minister said that possibly this Bill would cover the amendment contained in my Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. My department will have the power to make it cover that if they so desired.

On section 2,

2. Paragraph (f) of subsection 1 of section 30 of the principal Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

'And may require the company to establish and maintain an efficient and competent staff of fire-rangers, equipped with such appliances for fighting, or preventing fires from spreading, as the board may deem proper, and to provide such rangers with proper and suitable equipment to enable them to move from place to place along the line of railway with all due speed. The board may require the company to maintain an efficient patrol of the line of railway and other lands in the vicinity thereof to which fires may spread, and generally define the duties of the company, and the said fire-rangers, in respect thereof. The board may require the company to make returns of the names of fire-rangers in its employ in the performance of the above duties, and of the places or areas in which they are from time to time engaged. For the purpose of fighting and extinguishing fires, the said fire-rangers may follow the fires which spread from the railway to, over and upon the lands to which they may spread.

Mr. GRAHAM. The matter to which this amendment refers has been discussed a great deal. The Canadian Forestry Association passed a resolution concerning this question, so did the Conservation Commission, and suggested certain amendments to the Railway Act, with the view of greater protection against fire, caused by sparks from locomotives. The amendment was not such an easy one to work out as might appear on the surface, and I took the opportunity of asking the chairman of the Conservation Commission, and Senator Edwards of the Canadian Forestry Association, besides the representatives of the railway companies and the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, to meet in my office, with the view of working out an amendment. After discussion, it was decided to ask the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners and the Chairman of the Conservation Commission to draft a clause and present it. I could not say that the clause these two gentlemen drafted met with the absolute approval of the railway companies. These companies object to its not being confined solely to forests, but they did not make serious objection, and it has met the approval of the other parties concerned. This will enable the Board of Railway Commissioners to require a railway company to protect the forests through which its railway runs and give the commissioners power to have the other portions of the country traversed by a railway protected from fire where they deem it necessary.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Does this mean that the companies are to control the whole of their lines of railways?

Mr. GRAHAM. It gives the board power to say to the railway companies, where there is danger, as in a prairie section, from fire on account of the grass: you must patrol that part of your line, but the continuous work will probably be done in the forests.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. From whom must the request come, say in a prairie section?

Mr. GRAHAM. Under the Act, the Board may, on the request of any one or on its own motion without request, give its orders. The information would have to come from some one, and when seized of the information, the board may act without request. No doubt the practice will be that some one would make a request.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). The province of Ontario has power to range railways, especially in the north. Does this Act relieve the railway company from liability or expense in that respect? If you put a clause in the Railway Act of Canada, under which Act they are operating, they can say that their sectionmen are patrolling the track, looking for fires and so repudiate any attempt to compel additional ranging.

Mr. GRAHAM. That was discussed, and it was thought that this would not interfere with any arrangement made with the provinces. If there is likely to be a collision, an amicable arrangement could be arrived at by which there would be no increase of expense.

On section 3,

Subsection 1 of section 41a of the principal Act, as enacted by section 10 of chapter 62 of the Statutes of 1908, is amended by inserting immediately after the word 'railway' in the third line of the said subsection the words 'telegraph, telephone or express.'

Mr. GRAHAM. This is on account of the telegraph, telephone and express companies coming under the Act. Under the Railway Act we require each company to have some person in Ottawa on whom the board may serve notice. This provides that the express, telegraph and telephone companies shall comply with this requirement.

Section agreed to.

On section 4,

Mr. GRAHAM. This is a section in which the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) is particularly interested. I told the hon. member I would let him know when this Bill was coming up. It was announced by the Minister of Finance last night, but evidently he did not catch it.

Mr. LENNOX. Since the minister mentioned it a little while ago we have endeavoured to find the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara but have not been able to do so.

Mr. GRAHAM. This section involves a legal question. It relates to the limitation to acquire land and give notice. If no hon. member wishes to discuss it now, I would suggest that we might let this stand for a little while in the hope that the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara will be here.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Section 4 stands for further consideration.

On section 5,

Mr. GRAHAM. This is really a question between the railways. It seems to have been held that land owned by a railway company, not strictly the right of way, cannot be taken by another railway without the consent of the owners. On the face of it, it looks as if every railway ought to be treated as the ordinary citizen would be treated. But such strong representations have been made by several railways concerned that I know this will cause discussion. Therefore, I propose as it is a contentious clause to let it come up another session.

Section 5 struck out.

On section 6,

Mr. GRAHAM. I would like some of the legal gentlemen in the House to look through this and see that it is all right. It is an amendment proposed by the chairman of the Ontario Municipal and Railway Board, and is to provide for the formation of a joint board to consist of members of the Ontario board and members of the federal board to deal with questions such as the physical connections between a railway having a provincial charter and one having a Dominion charter. The Ontario House passed their Act, and I agreed to pass one in conformity with it.

Mr. LENNOX. This is a matter that has been very much needed for many years. The people have had great difficulty about it. As the minister knows I have given some attention to the subject. The chairman of the board here was good enough to talk with me in reference to it; I have had two or three conversations with him at various times. It was up for discussion in the House last session, but we could not get it through. The member of the Ontario board, Mr. Leitch, was here and I discussed the matter with him. The two chairmen gave their experience in the drafting of this section, as I understand it, and I have no doubt they succeeded in putting it in good shape. It would be almost presumptuous in me to say that it appears to me to be all right, but I have taken an interest in the matter, and I feel confident that this section will be found satisfactory.

Mr. BARKER. Do I understand that these clauses have been approved by the provincial authorities?

Mr. GRAHAM. The Ontario legislature has passed a similar enactment. The chairman of the Ontario board and the chairman of the Dominion board came to me and placed this in my hands.

Mr. LENNOX. I think that at the time this was being considered, the international railway question was before the Railway Board here, and so the chairman had the benefit of that experience as well.

Mr. HERRON. As this deals in some way with provincial charters, I would like to know from the minister if there has been brought to his notice the question of a railway with a provincial charter getting right-of-way across an Indian reserve? Is there provision for such an emergency? Would it come under a Bill of this kind?

Mr. GRAHAM. I should think that would be a matter between the Department of the Interior and the company making the application.

Mr. HERRON. The question was brought up last summer in the southern part of Alberta, and I understood from the representatives of the company that they had communicated with the local government, and it was found there was no way by which they could force a right-of-way across the reserve. I did not know but that the matter had been brought to the attention of the minister. Some provision should be made for such a contingency.

Mr. GRAHAM. It should be done under the Indian Act rather than under the Railway Act. Indian lands are in a peculiar position, the Indians being wards of the government. It would hardly do to decide under the Railway Act how land is to be taken away from the Indians.

Mr. DOHERTY. My impression is that we did enact a provision of that kind.

Mr. GRAHAM. I thought so, and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), tells me that it has been done.

Mr. DOHERTY. Yes, I think it is covered by the Bill which was passed this session relating to Indian reserves.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7,

Section 235 of the principal Act is amended by striking out the words 'the railway' at the commencement of the said section and substituting therefor the words, 'Subject to the company making such compensation to, adjacent or abutting land owners as the board deems proper, the railway of the company.'

Mr. GRAHAM. This covers a question which arises where an electric railway, it may be a steam railway, is allowed to run on a highway, there does not seem to be any provision for the owner of property abutting on the street to secure damages. This is provided to get compensation if he sustains damages in this way.

Mr. BARKER. There are cases of that kind referred to in Hamilton. Serious damage was done, and yet no compensation could be had.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Why is not the fixing of the amount of damages left under the expropriation clause of the Bill instead of being referred to the Railway Commission? As the section now reads the board will fix the damages instead of the arbitrators.

Mr. LENNOX. I think section 235 should be amended to read: 'subject to the company making compensation to adjacent or abutting land owners.'

Mr. GRAHAM. I am quite willing to accept that amendment. Let it read: 'Subject to the company making compensation to such of the adjacent or abutting landowners as the board deems proper.'

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Who has been asking for this legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think there is a case in court at the present time about it. But this will not interfere with the present litigation. The Board of Railway Commissioners asks for it.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). We will have a thousand cases of this kind in the courts inside of the next year if you put that amendment in the Act, because everybody having a railroad running in front of his place will soon find occasion of bringing an action against the railway company. In the United States they have just such legislation. In nearly all the states of the union the owner of the property abutting on the highway owns the right of the land as far as the centre of the highway. Consequently if a railway runs in front of his property, even a street railway, they have got to get the right from the owner of the property, apart from the municipality. In this country the rights of highways are vested in the Crown, and the Crown can give anybody the right to run a railway on a highway. The only right the municipality has about highways is the right to prevent the creation of a nuisance on that highway. This amendment will create the impression that the owners of all the land along the railway, or highway where the railway runs, have some vested interest in the highway. I think the courts are quite capable of guarding the interests of everybody along these routes, and they are doing it now. This will simply invite further litigation.

Mr. LENNOX. I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). As I understand this section, there is no possibility of getting any compensation, no matter how much a man suffers, where a railway crosses the highway. This provides that if it is a proper case they still shall have the right to cross the highway; but if it is a case where compensation ought to be awarded, then the crossing shall be subject to the right of compensation after the board has so determined. That does not invite litigation. The board will say whether each man's case shall be considered or not.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I am not a lawyer, but I understand that the railway can run along a highway, but if they put anything on it that will injure the value of your property, you can sue them and get redress. This permits of many other things. For instance, if a railway passes fifty yards from your house and shakes the dishes off the table, you can sue them for damages.

Mr. PORTER. This amendment as proposed seems to go a great deal farther than is intended. Under the original clause, section 235, provision is made for crossing highways. By the interpretation clauses of the Act a highway is defined to cover more than is ordinarily understood as a public highway, certain roadways, alleys, &c., are defined to be public highways for the purposes of the Act. A case arose before the board two or three weeks ago in which I was interested, the case of the Belleville-Prince Edward Bridge Company. The minister will recollect that there is an approach of about three quarters of a mile from one of the streets in Belleville to the superstructure of the bridge. The Canadian Northern railway in its Toronto-Ottawa line is crossing that approach to the bridge and a question arose whether that was a highway under which they could expropriate under this section of the Act or whether it was private property. It belongs to the Belleville-Prince Edward Bridge Company and they operate for toll, but under the description of a highway in the Railway Act it would come within the description of a highway. The Board of Railway Commissioners held, however, upon the construction of the statute, that the approach to the bridge not being a public highway in every sense of the word, the railway company must treat for that land in the same manner as they would treat for crossing any land of a private individual. The result was that the railway company opened negotiations with the bridge company and made an arrangement by which they were to cross, so far as compensation is concerned. By the passage of this amendment as it appears here, if that power is left in, the Board of Railway Commissioners would have power to deal with that. It would be contrary to the decision already given and unless it is the desire of the Board of Railway Commissioners or unless it would be advantageous to take it out of the category it is now in and place it in the other, it would be better that that clause be not passed now, as it would complicate the matter. It should be made clear, because the order directed by the board has not yet been issued, and as some parts of the Bill will be left over, it might be wise for the minister to allow this to stand in order that the board may be consulted as the amendment seems to me to go further than was intended.

I would also suggest an amendment to section 196 of the Railway Act, which deals with the expropriation of land as it is ordinarily understood, and provides that:

If within ten days after the service of such notice, or within one month after the first publication thereof, the opposite party does not give notice to the company that he accepts the sum offered by it, the judge shall, on the application of the company, appoint a person to be sole arbitrator for determining the compensation to be paid as aforesaid, provided that the judge shall, at the request of either party, on such application, appoint three arbitrators, &c.

By this clause, the railway company may obtain the appointment of an arbitrator to fix the compensation but there is no corresponding right on the part of the land owner. Suppose the railway company serve that notice, and within ten days the owner does not say whether he will accept or will refuse, that is taken as a refusal. There is nothing in the Railway Act by which the owner can take proceedings to compel the railway company to arbitrate; if the railway company do not see fit to make an application to the judge to appoint arbitrators, the railway company may let the thing drag along for a year or two. That is an undesirable state of affairs. It came up recently in connection with the construction of the Toronto-Ottawa line of the Canadian Northern railway. There in a number of cases where land has been expropriated, the railway has been constructed across this land, but the owners have refused to accept the compensation offered; the railway company will not take any proceedings to have an arbitration, and the owners cannot take any because there is no provision in the statute by which they can do so; the result is that those whose lands are taken in that way are held up, and are at the mercy of the company. It is said the company are using the power thus placed in their hands to force the owners to accept such compensation as they may see fit to offer rather than engage in any litigation. It seems a very unfair position, what is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander. If the railway company is given a right to provide for arbitration the owner should have the same right. It could be remedied by having the clause read:

Upon the application of the railway company or the owner.

Mr. GRAHAM. That matter was brought to my attention some time ago, and an amendment was suggested. Going through the various sections my hon. friend will understand that scores of amendments are suggested. This is one that fell by the wayside. I understand more clearly now the real objection to the clause as it stands, but I would like to discuss it with the Chairman of the Board before making an amendment. If this section is debatable to that extent possibly we might let it stand.

Section 7 allowed to stand.

On section 8, transmission of electrical energy.

Mr. GRAHAM. Under the present arrangement for crossing a highway special application has to be made to the board. This is to provide that the board may give a general order under general conditions by which a wire can be laid across.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Why should that not apply to telephone wires as well as to electrical energy wires?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I do not see why the Railway Board cannot have their engineers design a standard form of crossing for telephone and telegraph wires, because it is a great hardship to compel small independent telephone lines to appear before the board and go to the expense of drawings and all that kind of thing. A telegraph wire is not nearly as dangerous as a telephone wire, and the minister would be justified in including telephone wires in this clause.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Even though there are standard conditions, should the railway company object, application will still have to be made to the board. I suppose the railway company would invariably object.

Mr. GRAHAM. In nine cases out of ten the companies do not object now, but the chairman of the board thought it wise to leave in that provision in case some special condition might arise. I cannot just now see what objection there is to adding telephone wires, but I will let the clause stand and make inquiry.

On section 9—waterpipes.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). In this case also the consent of the railway company is necessary. Could not the onus be put on the railway company to formulate the objection?

Mr. GRAHAM. I would prefer to leave the clause stand as the board has arranged it, and we can see how it works out.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). In former days the railway companies always objected, and it was only when Mr. McGuigan became a power in the Grand Trunk that a farmer was allowed to drain his land across the railway track. He took the ground that if the farmer could raise an extra bushel of grain on the land to be drained the railway company would have that much more crop to haul. This has been a very contentious matter. What is the law now?

Mr. GRAHAM. The Board of Railway Commissioners has the power to allow these pipes to be placed on application of the parties, and this clause provides a certain standard method under which the pipes can be laid without application to the board, if no objection is raised.

On section 10—fencing right of way.

Mr. GRAHAM. Hon. gentlemen from the west will have interest in this clause. It is not easy to frame a law on this matter which will apply equally to the older sections of the Dominion as to the new. This clause has received the attention of the Railway Commissioners, and it has been discussed with the representatives of the western farmers in the desire to reasonably meet their views. This clause seems to meet the difficulty fairly well, and has practically been agreed to. The present law relieves the company from fencing unless the board orders them to fence, and we are now reversing this, and saying that they shall have to fence unless the board relieves them from the obligation.

Mr. LENNOX. We contended for that in 1903 when the Railway Act was passed.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Suppose the board should make an order relieving the company permanently, not temporarily, has the board power to vary that order?

Mr. GRAHAM. The board has that power under the general Act, and they use it frequently.

Mr. HENDERSON. They vary their orders every day just as they deem fit.

Mr. MAGRATH. Under subsection 5, where a railway is being constructed through inclosed land it shall be the duty of the company to take effective measures to prevent cattle, and other animals escaping from such inclosed land on the property of the company. That is all right as far as it goes; but if a railway company is building through a field of wheat, and the contractors working for the company see fit to throw down the fences, the railway company claims that there is no responsibility on its part. I know a case in which under such circumstances a man lost his entire crop. That should be from vided for.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have a clause to cover that point. The proposed clause in lieu of subsection 5 is this:

Where the railway is being constructed through inclosed lands, it shall be the duty of the company to take effective measures to prevent cattle or other animals escaping from or getting upon such inclosed lands or upon the property of the company, by reason of any act done or permitted to be done by the company.

Mr. LENNOX. Would that make them liable for the action of the contractor?

Mr. MAGRATH. I would like to see the clause put in such shape that the company must settle for the damages in two weeks, because I know cases in which the companies have been humbugging with settlers. How does the settler proceed to secure his remedy?

Mr. GRAHAM. I suppose he can only have the ordinary recourse of suing for damages. The trouble, as I understood it, from the complaints made to me, was that settlers would have their fences thrown down, and cattle would get in and destroy their crops, and the company would not be responsible. We try to make them responsible whether they do that or permit it to be done.

Mr. MAGRATH. I know it is a serious question. You get contractors rushing through and building a railway, and they are not at all considerate of the people whose lands they go through. I know instances where crops have been damaged and the owners have not been able to get any redress, even from the Railway Commission.

Mr. DOHERTY. I do not think the wording suggested by the minister would exactly meet the case mentioned by the hon. member from Medicine Hat. It makes the company responsible for anything that is done or permitted to be done by the company. A case might arise where the company, in making its contract, would stipulate with the contractor that he must keep the fences in order, and must refrain from doing anything that would permit the cattle to escape. The company in that case would say, we did not permit that to be done, but did our best to prevent it; it is the action of an independent contractor. If it is intended to make the company responsible for the negligence of its agents or contractors, that should be provided for by express words.

Mr. GRAHAM. The section provides that the company shall take effective measures to prevent.

Mr. DOHERTY. But it goes on to limit the obligation of the company to prevent by the words 'by reason of any act done or permitted to be done by the company.' I am not prepared to say that under that wording the company would not be responsible if the contractors did it; but if the intention is to make it clear that the company is to be responsible for the contractors' neglect, I would suggest that you make it read: 'done or permitted to be done by the company or by any agent or contractor acting for it.'

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Might I make a suggestion? Strike out the words 'to take effective measures' so that the clause will read 'it shall be the duty of the company to prevent cattle, &c.' That makes the duty absolute upon the company.

Mr. LENNOX. As the minister is leaving a number of these sections over, he might probably leave this one also, and the hon. member for St. Anne division (Mr. Doherty) could draft a clause. There has been great difficulty arising out of this very matter of the independent contractors. I have had cases in which I could not recover from the railway company on that account. The minister is anxious to get a remedy, and we might frame a section in the meantime.

Mr. GRAHAM. What I was trying to accomplish was not only to protect the farmers against loss from the killing of stock, but also from injury to crops by the cattle going through them.

Mr. BARKER. I would suggest that clause 5 should read:

Where the railway is being constructed through inclosed lands, the company shall prevent cattle and other animals escaping from such inclosed lands upon the property of the company.

Mr. GRAHAM. The objection to that would be that it would only prevent their getting on the company's land and they might get into some other fellow's field.

Mr. SHARPE. (Ontario). I would suggest to strike out the last three words 'permitted by the company' and substitute 'done or omitted to be done by the company, its servants, agents, contractors or workingmen.'

Mr. HERRON. I hope the company will be able to arrange this matter so that a clause of this kind may become law. The grievance is a very serious one, especially in the county I represent, as the railway companies are killing horses and cattle there almost every week in the year. Sometimes they kill them in bunches of a dozen head at a time; and in the last few years they have refused compensation of any kind. I would like to know particularly whether, if the railway board, under subclause 4 of section 10, should relieve a company from putting in cattle guards or building fences, would the company then be responsible for stock running at large and being killed?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend will find that provided for in the next clause. How would it do to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) subject to discuss again in committee and add the words 'done or omitted to be done by the company, its agents, contractors or servants'?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). That throws the onus on the owner of the land to prove that the company threw down the fences and let the cattle get in on the land. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) made the best suggestion, putting the absolute duty on the railway company of preventing damage.

Mr. PORTER. Suppose a man not connected with the railway should throw down a fence, the railway would be held responsible?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is the view which accounts for the words 'effective measures' being in the proposed amendment. I suggested making it very drastic, but the Justice Department thought I should only make the railway company responsible for their own acts and not for other people's acts.

Mr. MAGRATH. I do not agree with the hon. minister. When contractors take a contract from a railway company, they employ all kinds of people, and those men are passing in and out of one's property when building the road through it. Some one should be responsible for these men. If they should throw down a gate or tear down a fence at night, some one should be made responsible to the owner. If the minister allows this clause to stand over, I would suggest that he give it more thought and let us have an opportunity to discuss the proposed amendment again. If contractors undertake to build a railway and go on my property, they should see that my property is protected.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I would like to call attention to this case. Suppose cattle escape, through the negligence of the company, from inclosed lands on to other property, and then escape on to still further property, would the clause cover that?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think it would. It was intended to make the company responsible for whatever might result from their action or omission.

Section allowed to stand.

On section 11,

11. Sections 294 and 295 of the principal Act, and sections 8 and 9 of chapter 50 of the Statutes of 1910, are repealed, and the following is enacted as section 294 of the principal Act:

294. The company shall be liable to the owner for the full value of all horses, sheep, swine or other cattle that may be killed or injured upon the company's lands through the operation of the railway, save where such killing or injury is caused by reason of any person—

(a) failing to keep the gates at any farm crossing, at each side of the railway closed, when not in use; or,

(b) leaving open any gate on either side of the railway provided for the use of any farm crossing without some competent person being at or near such gate to prevent animals passing through such gate on to the railway; or,

(c) other than an officer, contractor, or employee of the company, taking down any part of the railway fence; or,

(d) turning any animal upon or within the enclosure of any railway company; or,

(e) except as authorized by this Act, without the consent of the company, riding, leading or driving any animal, or suffering it to enter upon any railway and within the fences and guards thereof; or,

(f) leaving the gates of the company at railway stations open for the convenience of the public.

Mr. GRAHAM. This clause has the approval of the Farmers' Association as it is now drawn:

The company shall be liable to the owner for the full value of all horses, sheep, swine or other cattle that may be killed or injured upon the company's lands through the operation of the railway, save where such killing or injury is caused by reason of any person.

Then it gives the exceptions. It repeals absolutely the clause which provides that cattle shall not run at large on the highways within half a mile of a railway. The exceptions are just as they were in the old Act with one added—relating to gates at railway stations left open for the convenience of the public—the company is not held liable for cattle going in through these gates. With the exceptions made in the Bill the railway company is liable in all cases.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). This is a very important section. Cases under it arise in every part of the Dominion. I would suggest that this section be allowed to stand until we have an opportunity to look into it. There are words at the close of this section that, I think, should not be there, the words, 'any person.' The effect of the section is to provide that the railway shall not be liable for cattle killed if the killing is caused by reason of 'any person' leaving the gate open. It does not confine it to the owner of the premises. Might not a stranger, in walking through a man's farm, leave the gate open so that the cattle might get out and get killed? Yet, in that case the railway would not be responsible.

Mr. GRAHAM. Are they to be responsible for the acts of a person with whom they have no connection?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I think that under the Act as it is now the railway company is liable unless it can show negligence on the part of the owner. The onus is on the railway company.

Mr. GRAHAM. The people who are most interested agreed to this. It took me some weeks to get a Bill that would be drastic and yet acceptable, and, having reached that point, I would not like to change it if it can be avoided.

Mr. BARKER. It might be a question whether the neighbour who leaves the gate open should not be responsible for damages.

Mr. LENNOX. It would be all right to make it apply to the owner of the land or his servant. But if it would apply in the case of 'any person' as is proposed here—I would not go so far as that.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). This question of farm crossings is very involved and difficult, but when a railway company goes through a property, and creates a nuisance, the liability properly rests upon them for keeping the fences in order.

Mr. LENNOX. It is the railway fence, and they should keep it closed. The only thing that should deprive the owner of compensation is the leaving of the gate open by himself or his servant.

Mr. BARKER. That would be carrying the responsibility of the railway company altogether too far. The railway is in the public interest, but it is in his own interest the farmer gets the gate. If the railway company were called upon to undertake the keeping of all such gates closed the expense would be enormous. The farmer who gets the gate usually takes upon himself the duty of seeing that it is kept closed, and he should not allow other people to open it. It is his business to keep it closed.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not agree with the hon. member (Mr. Barker), that the farmer gets the gate for his convenience. The farmer has his farm, and the railway company runs through it. The railway company must put up the fence, and it is right that the farmer should be, as far as possible, left in the condition he was in before. I think the only burden on the farmer should be that he shall not neglect to close his gate, but if any stranger or employee of the railway company should leave the gate open, the railway should be responsible. They create the condition of things that makes it dangerous. The farmer should be responsible only for the actions of himself and his servants or agents in these matters.

Mr. NESBITT. I agree largely with the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker), though I do not go quite so far as he does. I agree partially with the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), that 'any person' might include the railway servants, which it ought not to do. If the railway's servants leave the gate open—which, by the way, they sometimes do—the railway should be responsible, but for any other person the farmer should be responsible, for it is his duty to see that the gate is kept shut.

Mr. BARKER. I would like to add this, and I am sure the Minister of Railways will consider it. We here must think not merely of the loss to the farmer in having cattle killed, but also of the more important consideration of the safety of trains. If every farmer along a thousand miles of railway might, without risking personal loss, leave his gate open negligently, trusting to the duty of the railway company to keep his gates closed, we should have plenty of railway accidents, for gates could be left open, cattle would go upon the track and be run into, and trains would be thrown off the track.

Mr. MAGRATH. No one should be on the railway track unless he is a servant of the railway company, and if such a man goes through a farmer's property, and leaves the gate open the railway company should be liable. The railway company has the privilege of arresting anybody for trespassing on its property.

Mr. MARSHALL. It seems to me that the difficulty could be overcome by the farmer putting a lock on the gate. I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker), that it would be unreasonable to ask that the railway be held responsible.

Mr. GRAHAM. This section was an important point, but I think it was pretty well considered. I think it is not a breach of confidence to say that the chairman of the Railway Commission was strongly of the view that it would save many cattle if a clause were put in the Act to fine every farmer who leaves his gate open. I could not go quite so far. A railway runs through a man's farm, and he gets damages. He wants a crossing, and makes application to the board. But the board is very fair to the farmers in giving them crossings. I would insist always that the gate shall be kept closed by the farmer or his assistants or your transportation might be ruined as well as the farmer's stock killed, but I will go as far as any person to make the railways responsible for their neglect to protect the farmer's cattle. But there is a certain liability on the part of the owner of stock from which he should not be relieved altogether. I do not think the farmers would appreciate our saying that they had no responsibility at all. The chairman of the board had strong views on that point, and the farmers themselves are willing to assume all just liabilities for their own actions.

Mr. NESBITT

Mr. SCHAFFNER. When this Bill is passed I presume it refers only to the owners of cattle and property through which the railway runs. We have had cases in the west where the cattle of a man who owned land half a mile from the railway, finding the fences down, strayed away on to the railway. This Bill says the company shall be liable to the owner for the full amount of the cattle killed or injured. Where a man owns cattle a mile away from the railway, and they stray on the railway and are killed, does this law allow him compensation?

Mr. GRAHAM. This law would allow him compensation. I imagine it would not if his cow was killed at a crossing, but if anywhere else on the track, he would get compensation.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. According to the present law I do not think he does receive compensation.

Mr. BARKER. That is the old law.

Mr. GRAHAM. This Act repeals the clause which says that cattle shall not be left running at large within half a mile of a railway. That was made for the west where cattle grazed beside the track, and was the source of vexation. Then the railway must pay full compensation to every person whose cattle are killed, except in the circumstances named here.

Mr. BARKER. Under the old law cattle running at large and getting upon another man's land were trespassers, and the trespassing owner had no right as against the railway company, and could not recover.

Mr. GRAHAM. If the cattle were at large within half a mile of the track, the railway had a defence to put up.

Mr. PORTER. It might meet the case by striking out the word 'person' in the clause which says 'where such killing or injury is caused by reason of any person,' and make it read 'by reason of any owner, or railway company, or their agents, servants or workmen failing to keep the gates closed.' That would make it equally the duty of the farmer and the railway company to keep the gates shut.

Mr. GRAHAM. The railway company is not responsible for keeping a farmer's gates shut.

Mr. NESBITT. I suggest to add, after the word 'person,' 'any person excepting the company or their servants.'

Mr. MARSHALL. I understand from the minister that if the gates are left open, and cattle are killed, the farmer will get nothing for his cattle. But supposing those cattle cause the wreck of a train or damage to a train, would the farmer be liable for that?

Mr. GRAHAM. We passed an Act last year to make that clear. Would these words be acceptable 'Where such killing or injury is caused by reason of any person not being an employee or agent of the company'? Personally I feel that in the interests of those most affected we might as well not pass the item at all as not meet the views on which all were agreed. It was agreed by all parties that this was a solution of the difficulty.

On section 12, correction of clerical errors.

Mr. NESBITT. The provision in section 12:

No action shall lie against the company by reason of anything in any policy of insurance or by reason of payment of any moneys thereunder, is unfair legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is no new legislation in this section, that is already on the statute-books.

Mr. NESBITT. I think it is bad legislation.

Mr. CARVELL. The matter wes dealt with by a special committee last year which met representatives of the railway companies and others concerned, and this clause was agreed upon. There would be a good deal of dissatisfaction if it were changed now.

Mr. NESBITT. The railway companies were represented on the committee but not the insurance companies. I was on the committee.

Mr. CARVELL. Everybody was represented who should be.

On section 13, Railway Commission and electrical power.

Mr. GRAHAM. We have given the Board of Railway Commissioners, power to say at what price power generated from waterpowers under Dominion jurisdiction shall be furnished. This gives them power to issue orders as to the quantity to be furnished.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Subsection 2 provides machinery to ascertain the quantity whether they have a sufficient quantity. Should that not also apply to subsection 3 so that they can ascertain whether the company need all the power for their own use?

Mr. GRAHAM. The reason for that is that we have leased many powers to companies solely for their own use. This is to provide that it shall not be possible for any one to demand of them power which they have not even a right to dispose of.

On section 14, government aided railways falling into bad repair.

Mr. GRAHAM. This is an important and drastic amendment. In Canada we have granted aid very liberally towards railways. Cases have been brought to my notice where railways liberally aided by the parliament of Canada have allowed their roads to become so delapidated that a train cannot be run safely on them. In some cases the rails have been taken up and we have had the spectacle of a road that the people have helped to construct vanishing as old rails, the receipts being obtained by the owners of the road. The railways are aided for the purpose of giving the people transportation and it ought to be our view to have that object carried out even at the expense of the country. This section provides that where a company under federal jurisdiction has been aided by the Dominion parliament and its road becomes unfit to operate, this aid becomes a first lien on that road, and the Board of Railway Commissioners, at the request of the minister, can practically foreclose that first lien, sell the road or dispose of it and use the funds to put it in proper condition, something to get the people the use of the road for which they paid. The objection has been raised that it is dangerous legislation to say that the aid given as a gift by the parliament of Canada should be allowed to become an underlying charge, even under the first mortgage bonds. There is a good deal of force in that argument, but there is this reply, that a road which gets into that condition does not give any value to its first mortgage bonds or any other bonds, and the only way for the railway to be made of any use to the people or value to the bondholders is to have it put in proper condition. The object of this is to practically give the government power to take possession of these roads it has aided and see they are put in proper condition for the use of the people.

Mr. PORTER. Has the minister any such railway in his mind that he could mention?

Mr. GRAHAM. I would not care to mention them, because if I were wrong it would be unfair to the railways. This clause will, I think, be a mighty lever to have these railways put in a fit condition to operate.

Mr. PORTER. I had in mind the branch line from Madoc to Eldorado, which was subsidized by the federal government and the municipalities through which it runs and has not been operated for a number of years. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) made an effort to have this road operated, but without success. Would this clause compel the railway company to operate that road?

Mr. GRAHAM. If the road is unfit to be operated on account of its condition, means are provided here to put it in proper condition, but I am not sure it would compel operation.

Mr. PORTER. It may be confiscated.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, disposed of.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. There ought to be some provision for notifying the bondholders before the road is closed up.

Mr. GRAHAM. All interested parties would, I suppose, be notified by the board.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). This clause does not cover the case of the railway I have mentioned.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not think it does.

Mr. PORTER. Would it not be well to take power to compel the operation of that and other such railways? This line has been subsidized, but it has not been operated for a number of years, and no other company will undertake to build in that territory, because if they did the Grand Trunk would likely commence to operate the Madoc and Eldorado branch line. In such cases it would be well to empower the board to take action.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is a good deal in the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Middlebro) that the first notice should go to the bondholders.

Mr. GRAHAM. We will amend the clause so as to read that the trustees of the bondholders, if any, shall be notified.

Mr. PORTER. What does the minister think of the suggestion regarding the case I have mentioned?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think we had better not try to enlarge the scope of the Bill at present.

Mr. MAGRATH. If a road gets into that condition, it is because it is not a paying proposition, and I do not think there is much use in attempting to put it into proper condition unless you are prepared to provide that it must be operated.

On section 15,

Mr. GRAHAM. I wish to move that in the first line of section 372 after the word 'annually' there be inserted the words 'or more frequently if the minister so requires.' Heretofore the companies have been required to make returns semi-annually of certain accidents. As a matter of fact, they only make them annually. I am making it legal for them to make the returns annually for our general report, because we only issue it annually, but I am providing that on the request of the minister they shall make them more frequently, and I propose to include with other accidents, the killing of animals.

Amendment agreed to, and section 15 as amended agreed to.

On section 16,

Mr. GRAHAM. I have a section which I want to substitute for this. At the present time, when a railway company proproposes to change its tariff, it has to give only ten days' notice. I am asking that subsection 3 of section 328 be amended by striking out the word 'ten' and substituting the word 'thirty.' The meaning of that is that the railway company will be compelled to give thirty days' notice instead of ten.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). As the object of this Bill is to straighten out a good many matters that are not very straight just now, I wish to mention that in connection with the building of the Transcontinental railway lands have been taken from the former owners and are now being used for the railway without having been paid for. An ordinary railway company has to make a deposit in court before it can go into occupation of lands so taken. It is not so with the Transcontinental railway. Besides the provision in the Transcontinental Railway Act for the expropriation of lands, there are conferred upon the commissioners all the rights that are given to a railway company under the Railway Act and its amendments. Proceedings have been taken in the Exchequer Court, and Judge Cassels, I believe, has held, in the case of King vs. Jones, that the proper proceeding is to proceed under the provisions of the Railway Act, and not under the Expropriation Act, and in the Exchequer Court. The Deputy Minister of Justice, I believe, differs from the judge, and the case is now in appeal, I believe, before the Supreme Court.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understand that it has been decided that the Exchequer Court has jurisdiction, reversing the judgment.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). In that case I beg the minister's pardon. That will relieve us from the difficulty. In the neighbourhood of Winnipeg a great many cases were held up, and hundreds of thousands of dollars, I believe, were not paid to the claimants. If the matter had remained as it was, I was going to ask for the insertion of a declaratory section in this Bill so as to relieve the difficulty.

Mr. PORTER. I would like to inquire of the minister whether there has been any complaint to any great extent in regard to the operation of the provisions of the law in dealing with claims for damages for the killing of animals on railways. The practice now is to take such claims before the Railway Commission instead of as formerly before the local courts, and there has been in my section of the country a great deal of complaint of delay in consequence. Has there been any complaint of that kind made or is the new regulation operating to advantage?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have a great deal of complaint from western Canada but none from eastern Canada. The complaint from western Canada arises out of the belief that the railway companies kill cattle and horses and then their employees immediately bury them, so that a farmer, after hunting for months, will discover his stock beneath the sod. It is said that the railway companies dispute all and sundry claims, and it is very difficult for a farmer under the circumstances to prove his allegation.

Mr. PORTER. If the local courts had jurisdiction, at the expense of some $5 or $10, a farmer could bring his action and have his case tried, whereas now the cost and trouble are prohibitory.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does the hon. gentleman say that the jurisdiction of the local courts is taken away?

Mr. PORTER. Yes. Suppose a farmer has a cow killed on a railway, instead of going to a division court he has to apply to the Railway Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What section of the Act compels him to do that?

Mr. PORTER. I have not the section, but that is the practice. As soon as a claim is made on a railway company, which they dispute, they say it has to go to the Railway Commission.

Mr. GRAHAM. In that they are wrong.

Mr. PORTER. That is the practice.

Mr. PUGSLEY. People go to the Railway Commission because they think they can get speedier justice.

Mr. GRAHAM. A year ago we changed the Act relating to the Intercolonial railway to provide that the ordinary law shall apply to the Intercolonial railway, and thus enable claimants for damages on account of cattle killed on the government's railway to go to the ordinary court, as they would in the case of cattle killed on an ordinary railway.

Mr. HERRON. I know of many cases, such as described by my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Porter), of animals killed, and the railway companies simply laughed at the claims for compensation. I never heard any complaint made regarding the change from the common courts to the Railway Board because the railway companies have absolutely refused to pay damages of any kind. These companies killed at least 50 animals within a few miles of my home within the last few years and refused to pay damages of any kind.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I would be surprised to learn that such an amendment to the Railway Act was enacted because I had a couple of suits last year for loss of cattle which I won in the ordinary courts. It would be very extraordinary if there was such an amendment because that would deprive us of a right to a jury trial, and jury trials are very effective against railway companies.

Mr. HERRON. I would like to draw attention to clause (5) in section 11:

> The company shall be liable to the owner for the full value of all horses, swine, sheep or other cattle.

I think that the words 'other animals' should be substituted for 'other cattle,' so as to cover every class of animal likely to be damaged. There is one valuable class of animals plentiful in the country and I do not think you could collect under this clause.

Mr. CARVELL. If my hon. friend will look at the interpretation clause of the Act he will find that the word 'cattle' is a very comprehensive term and includes everything except those animals specifically mentioned in that clause.

Progress reported.

THE BANK ACT.

Mr. FIELDING moved third reading of Bill (No. 213) to amend the Bank Act.

Mr. HENDERSON. I find in the schedule the name of the Farmers' Bank, of Canada. That charter, I understand, is to be completed along with others although the bank is practically out of business. What effect will this legislation have on the Farmers' Bank?

Mr. FIELDING. That point has been carefully considered. I am advised by the law officers that this amendment leaves matters exactly as they are. Whatever rights any party has with regard to the Farmers' Bank remain undisturbed.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is not intended that the Farmers' Bank shall be able to do business.

Mr. FIELDING. No, it is practically suspended by its insolvency. This will simply give them beyond question the power of winding the thing up in proper form. The Department of Justice advised that it was expedient to put in the name for that purpose.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the desirability of appointing a Royal Commission to inquire thoroughly into the conditions of banks in this country and other countries with the view of improving our present Banking Act. Recent events have disclosed many serious defects in it. The provisions regarding government inspection do not meet with the approval of many people. The provision in the Bill brought down, would not meet the approval of many people outside the bank authorities.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not sure that they approve it.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I do not think they would raise any serious objections to it. I should imagine it should meet with their approval.

Mr. FIELDING. It did not emanate from them.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I am glad to hear that because I was under the impression it had been drafted by the counsel of the Bankers' Association, or some one standing close to them. I do not think that our banks pay enough for the great privileges they enjoy. In France, England and Germany the banks pay the government for the privilege of issuing currency. Under our system they pay nothing. There should be some restraint, some taxation, should be placed on the right to send money out of the country for speculative purposes. All these and a great many other important matters should be thoroughly investigated by a commission and reported to our next parliament. For when the Bank Act is before the commission what may we expect? We shall have bank presidents and inspectors presenting their views, but no one to speak on behalf of the people. If we had a Royal Commission to examine and report, it might make many suggestions which would assist us to come to a proper conclusion. In the Toronto 'Telegram' of May 16, I find this despatch from Washington:

Washington, D.C., May 16.—Out of a total expenditure to date of $207,130 to study the various banking systems of the world, with a view to improving the United States banking laws, the National Monetary Commission has spent $2,931 to learn about Canadian banks.

Here we have the United States people spending $200,000 in investigating the banking conditions of other countries, and we have not had a Royal Commission to investigate the banking system of our own country. There are patent and admitted defects in our banking law, as shown by the many failures that have occurred. I think it would be well to spend if necessary $20,000 or $30,000 to have a commission investigate thoroughly the conditions in Canada and other countries, and report next session.

Mr. FIELDING. Fortunately, the desire to improve—where it may be improved—the Bank Act is one which hon. members on both sides will share. Therefore, any suggestion looking to that end will be received by the government with all the consideration to which it is entitled. I frankly say that I doubt whether a Royal Commission would serve the good purpose my hon. friend (Mr. Sharpe, Ontario) has in view. To begin with, it would be rather difficult to get the right kind of men to serve on a Royal Commission for that purpose, men who have the capacity, knowledge and experience necessary. To a large extent—not conclusively—we must learn from the experienced bankers themselves. We are not bound to accept their suggestions, but they are certainly well qualified to give us information and useful advice. I do not reject the hon. gentleman's proposal for a Royal Commission, but at first glance I doubt whether it will serve the purpose.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). There was one to investigate life insurance.

Mr. FIELDING. That was for a different condition of affairs. The hon. member will recollect that there had been an outbreak in the United States in regard to the insurance companies of that country, and many irregularities had been disclosed. A feeling of distrust arose with regard to our own companies. I think, notwithstanding some things that occurred which became the subjects of controversy, it was the wise thing to have an inquiry into our insurance laws, and their operation, in order to reassure the public of Canada as to the stability of our insurance companies. At any rate, that was the reason for the commission. I do not think a similar condition exists with regard to our banks. Our banking system, while not a perfect success yet, I think, in the opinion of many of the financial men of the world is held to be a good system. Other countries seek information from us and learn from us.

Touching the question of taxation, it is a common view that the banks should be taxed to a larger degree. That is worthy of consideration. But it must be remembered that the country needs banking capital to facilitate trade, and that if you have too many restrictions upon banks and the organization of banks, you will never get the banking capital needed. When you consider there is a double liability of shareholders, the responsibility the bank directors have to assume ' with all the obligations now imposed upon shareholders and directors, I am inclined to think that if you enforce substantial taxes upon them you may defeat the purpose the hon. gentleman has in view. However, these are only passing thoughts. I quite appreciate the interest the hon. gentleman has taken in the subject, and I will discuss his suggestions with my colleagues in due course.

Mr. SPROULE. I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Sharpe, Ontario), who favours the appointment of a Royal Commission on this subject. I went carefully over the results of the work of the commission in the United States, and it seemed to me that they had collated a lot of very valuable information, which will, if made known to the people of Canada, and especially to the parliament of Canada, would afford us useful lessons in amending our Banking Act. Our banking system is generally regarded as a very good one. But I am far from being of the opinion that it is entitled to the eulogies very frequently expended upon it. I do not think our banking system has fulfilled what the country might reasonably have expected of it. The Minister of Finance says we must learn from the bankers. The experience of the bankers will teach us much if we can get it set forth frankly. But we must learn much more from the great public as well. The public are not being served as they should be by our banking system. Here is a case that is known to me: One of the regular banks of Canada has a branch in a certain town. A farmer living within a mile and a quarter of that branch bank, a man well known to the manager of the bank, the owner of a fine farm of about 200 acres with good buildings and not a dollar of debt on the property, a man having debts of not more than $200 in the world, a sober, industrious man who has always enjoyed the reputation of being reliable and prompt in meeting his obligations—when that man asked the bank manager for the loan of $25 he was refused. Why? Because he would not get an endorser. To that bank as to others, parliament has given great privileges—it can stamp paper and call it bank notes, and earn interest on it from the day it goes out, and many other privileges it has from which it makes money. The people must use the banks, because the banks hold the circulating medium which they must hold to carry on business. Yet this is the way one man was used. I asked the manager why, and his answer was: Our instructions from headquarters are to discount no notes no matter how good the individual may be unless he gets an endorser.

Look at our banks to-day. What has built these palatial banking houses that we see on every corner? Pass along Sparks street or Bank street in this city, pass along King or Yonge street in Toronto, and how many hundreds of thousands, and even millions, of dollars you find invested in costly buildings for the banks. These have been built out of the earnings of the people who pay very sweetly for any business they do with the banks.

Then, go behind the counters of the banks and look at the employees. Consider the long hours they have to serve. We had a discussion on the Bill introduced by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Lewis), and since that time I have had two or three letters from parties whose sons are employed in these banks, telling of the long hours they have to work—extending in some instances to eleven and even twelve o'clock at night. One man tells me of his son working until nine o'clock at night without anything to eat—the work had to be finished. And yet that boy works for only $4.75 a week. For what purpose? That they may be able to pay dividends of 9, 10, 11 and 12 and 13 per cent to their stockholders. Would you call that a banking system that is to be admired? What is our banking system? The great central banks send out their dicta to the branches that must be obeyed, everything must be done the same as at headquarters. The branch manager knows the conditions of the locality where his bank is situated, he knows the wants of the people, whereas the head office knows nothing about them; still the branches have to take their orders from headquarters. Compare that with the American system, which is called a bad banking system. There a bank starts in a small village, it accepts the savings of the people, and loans them out to the industries of the country, to the manufacturers and other people, who need money to pay their workmen. The money thus loaned out serves to develop industries in that locality. Compare that with the Canadian system. Here the banks take the savings from the hard working people, and their money immediately goes to the head office, to be transferred very likely down to Wall Street to be used in stock speculations, because they can earn more on it than they can at home. I can point out line after line where our banking system is defective. I remember when a branch of the Central Bank was started in Durham. The manager of that bank told me that every time he got a few thousand dollars, even though it was not half enough to meet the needs of the people in his locality, a demand came from headquarters, and that money went away to be invested in New York. The people who had saved the money and put it into the bank could not get the advantage of it. Then there is the low rate of interest upon the savings of the people.

The banks are strong enough to control this government, and the rate of interest in the government savings banks is put at the same figure as in the private banks, compelling the people to deposit their money with the government at three per cent interest because they can get no more from it anywhere else. I think the banks should be made useful institutions to the public here as they are in England, France and Germany, where they take up the earnings of the people and lend them out again at a higher rate of interest than they can get in the ordinary banks. Such a system puts a premium on industry, on frugality, and economy, by giving the people a larger rate of interest than they get in the banks to-day. Some years ago we were paying depositors four per cent in the government savings banks, but twice since I came into this House the Finance Minister cut down the rate of interest. At whose instance? At the instance of the banks. They appeal to the people to put their money into the bank and only give them three per cent; but when they go to borrow it for their needs they have to pay seven and eight per cent. Is that a proper service rendered to the public by the banks, to whom we give charters? I say many such evils as I have referred to would be brought out by a royal commission, that would enable us to consider them carefully and provide a remedy. When we amend the Bank Act, if we had a royal commission, it would afford us the needed information upon which we could base a remedy for the evils complained of. The representatives of the people do not, in many cases, know how serious these evils are, and they could be brought out by a royal commission in a better way than any other. There are many others that I might refer to. Take the banks of France, take the banks in Germany, take the Farmers' banks. They lend their money at a rate not above five per cent, and they pay a certain per cent to the government on the business they do. Whereas our banks are allowed an unlimited right to earn what they can, and they pay the government nothing for the privilege. Now, with regard to another subject. A few years ago I read about the case of a young man, who was employed in one of these banks. He had been a steady young man for some years, he had been saving his earnings in view of a time when he could settle down. His salary was about $900 a year. He took it into his head to get married, he married a very estimable young lady, and one who had means coming from her own people to assist him. But what was the result? That young man was dismissed from the bank inside three days after his wedding, because he did not wait until he had $1,000 salary. Is that not putting an embargo upon marriage? Is that not an interference with the free rights of the people? I say no young man should be placed under such an embargo as that, at a time in life when he desires to get married, when nature and everything demands that he should settle down in wedded life. When the requirements of the state, the propagation of the species, when everything demands that he should marry, he is not allowed to do so. Some hon. members find this a laughing matter. But I say that it is a very serious matter. I have letters in my possession, and information which, in my judgment, show that this is a matter highly important to the country, one that should receive at our hands the most careful consideration. It is an evil that nothing short of a law, making it a criminal offence for any manager of a bank to enforce such a rule upon his employees, will afford a remedy. It is not only a grievance, it is a cruel injustice, it is at least a moral crime against young men, many of whom could settle down and become even more valuable to the bank that employs them. But why don't the banks pay their employees a reasonable salary? Why do they insist upon extracting from them every drop of blood they can draw out in the way of long hours and steady service, for a mere pittance, in order that they may show the world what large dividends they can pay? Do we not want information about these things? I think we want more information than we have, to enable us to look into these matters very carefully when we come to amend the Bank Act, to see if we cannot provide a remedy against the crying evils that are prevalent to-day.

Mr. PERLEY. Several times lately, and particularly after the Farmers' bank failure, there appeared in some of the newspapers statements and comments regarding bank failures in Canada and the United States. They were compared with each other, to my mind, in an unfair way, because percentages were given of the number of banks that had failed in Canada, without any reference to the actual losses, or to the percentages which the losses bore to the total amount which the public had in the banks.

As a matter of fact, it is chiefly the smaller banks that have failed in Canada, and the amount of loss by the public has been very small proportionately to the business done by the banks. It is only fair that this matter should be put in that shape, so as to show the percentage of money loss in Canada through failure of banks. I have had a statement made up, which I will ask the indulgence of the House to read in order that it may be on record. This is a statement of banks that have failed in Canada since confederation, with the date of their suspension, liabilities to the public, and the amount of loss to the public.

According to the last bank statement, March 31, 1911, the total liabilities of the banks to note holders was $81,938,753, and to depositors $961,424,425, making total liabilities to the public of $1,043,363,178. I have given the total loss to the public in 43 years, and from this it will be seen that that loss was a shade over one half of one per cent of the total liabilities to the public of the banks of Canada to-day. The average loss to the public of Canada since confederation has been $155,225 per annum.

In order to compare that, which to my mind is a very small percentage, considering the business done, with the American banks, I have here a Standard Book, called 'A Rational Banking System,' by Mr. H. M. P. Eckardt. In that book, at page 25, he says the proved liabilities of the National Banks of the United States which failed from 1891-1909 amounted to $123,988,860; the loss reported was 17·71 per cent of this, which amounted to $21,958,427, or an average of $1,155,706 a year.

Of the state and private banks during the same period, 1891 to 1909, the same authority on pages 28 and 29 give the losses to depositors during 19 years at $201,983,310, an average of $10,630,701 a year, and this, added to the National Banks, makes the total loss during the nineteen years to the public of the United States an average of $11,786,407 per year.

This authority, on page 30, puts it shortly in this way:

> The people of the United States may expect that each year an average of ninety-one banks will close their doors,locking up $31,117,433 of their depositors' funds, and that $11,786,407 of the funds will be irretrievably lost. When the loss to depositors is so heavy as this it may safely be assumed that the loss to stockholders is very large.

In other words, according to these figures, while the loss in Canada to the public since confederation has only been $155,225 a year, the loss in the United States has been between eleven and twelve million dollars. I thought it only fair to put this on 'Hansard' because it seemed to me to be proof positive that by percentages of the business done the Canadian system brings a far less proportionate loss to the public that the average annual lockup of depositors' funds in the United States is forty-eight times as great as occurs in Canada; the average annual loss suffered by bank creditors is seventy times as great in the United States as in Canada. There has been some comment regarding the banks of Canada not lending money for commercial purposes. This same authority gives the following percentages of the manner in which the money of the United States banks is loaned as compared with that of the Canadian banks. It says that in the United States 41 per cent of the resources of the banks is applied to stocks and bonds, 12 per cent applied to real estate, and only 23 per cent of the resources of the banks in the United States is applied to ordinary mercantile loans. In Canada we have no bank loans on real estate, because the law does not permit of it, but, 24 per cent of the resources of the Canadian banks is applied to stocks and bonds, and 51 per cent is applied to mercantile loans. (Ref. page 40.)

Mr. SPROULE. What do you mean by mercantile loans?

Mr. PERLEY. Ordinary commercial loans, ordinary business paper of all kinds, and not loans on stock or anything of that kind. In the United States the proportion applied to fostering the industries of the country, and the lending of money to ordinary individuals on their notes is only 23 per cent of the resources of the banks, whereas in the case of Canadian banks the percentage is 51 per cent. The banks of Canada lend proportionately over twice as much of their funds for the ordinary purposes of the community as do the banks of the United States.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANK ACT.

Mr. FIELDING moved second reading of Bill (No. 219) to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act. He said: There are two old savings banks in the province of Quebec whose charters were granted, I think, before confederation, and from time to time their charters are renewed in the same manner as the charters of the other banks. We propose to extend these charters for one year as in the case of the other banks. There is one other clause which enables them to re-arrange their stocks in shares of $100 which is a very desirable thing.

Mr. SPROULE. What rate of interest do they pay?

Mr. FIELDING. Three per cent.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. Do these banks do an ordinary banking business?

Mr. FIELDING. They do not issue notes. They are of high standing, and excellent reputation, and have power to loan money within certain limitations.

Mr. SPROULE. I believe there ought to be established all over the country banks for the purpose of taking the savings of the people and paying a higher rate of interest on them than do the existing banks. I believe the state should make better provision for the handling of the money of those who can earn it but are not financiers enough to invest it profitably. I believe the state should put as high a premium as possible on frugality and industry. Other countries seem to do that and succeed with it, and we might well take a lesson from them. My hon. friend gave us a nice history of the failures of Canadian banks. I notice that it has been prepared by a banker, and the best side of it has been put out. I would like to have a man who had been in the business for a few years and dropped out of it to give the other side. I think it would not sound quite as favourable or look as rosy as it does. When he makes a comparison between the failures of Canadian banks and the failures of American banks, he very conveniently leaves out of the comparison the number of failures of national banks in the two countries. Over 25 per cent of all our banks, I think, have gone down in the last 25 or 30 years, whereas, speaking from memory, from 5 to 7 per cent have gone down in the United States. There was another statement with regard to the amount of money our banks put in circulation through manufacturers or merchants or others for the use of the people. I have lived in both countries, and have seen the operations of the banks in both, and I cannot believe from what I have seen and know that that statement is even approximately correct. If it is, it is only accounted for by this, that the large amounts of money put in circulation through large corporations like railway companies or wholesale men are put out in the great metropolitan centres, and not in the small towns and villages. In my judgment, the banks of the United States serve the people better than the banks here. In saying that, I am not especially enamoured of the banking system of the United States, which is defective in many respects, fairer comparison might have been made by comparing the Canadian banks with French or German or English banks. Another consideration in connection with the banking business that has always appealed to me is this. We give certain corporations power to handle the circulating medium of our country—what for? To supply that to the whole people of the country, and not simply to a few millionaire merchants or railway corporations or great manufacturing concerns; every honest and industrious man in this country ought to have some limited credit in these banks. I think I am within the mark when I say that not over 5 per cent of this people of this country can go to these banks and get accommodation. There are at least 90 per cent who are never served by the institutions which the state provides for the service of the people. A system that does not do any better than that for the people of the country is not in my judgment the best that human ingenuity can devise. Why is it that private banks succeed so well in Canada? People will go to them and pay 10 or 12 per cent for accommodation when they cannot get it from the standard banks? As long as the banks maintain the custom of denying accommodation to the great bulk of the people so long will I contend that the banking system of our country is, comparatively speaking, a failure.

Mr. MILLER. How would my hon. friend define by any provision of law what persons a bank should extend credit to, and what not? Also, how does he account for the fact that there is not in Ontario to-day one private bank to every ten that there were ten years ago?

Mr. SPROULE. I cannot go into that as I would like at present; but perhaps at another time I will give a good reason for it. I think the hon. gentleman has overstated the fact when he says there is not one to ten.

Mr. PERLEY. With respect to bank failures, I would like to ask the hon. member from East Grey to consider, what difference does it make what proportion of the banks fail? The real test is what percentage of the money does the public lose that it puts into the banks?

Mr. SPROULE. I think it makes this difference. In the various centres of Canada we have only 25 banks that supply all the credit, whereas the country would perhaps need 25,000. We confine the business to these large banks which do not give the people the accommodation they are entitled to.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS.

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 85) respecting Forest Reserves and Parks.—Mr. Oliver.

Mr. OLIVER. This Bill was gone through when it was in Committee of the Whole on a previous occasion, but it was held in committee for the purpose of making a small addition to section 18 suggested by the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty). Since then an amendment has been drafted which has been agreed to by the hon. member for St. Anne division (Mr. Doherty) and I would ask the committee to adopt it and let the Bill take its third reading. The amendment was for the purpose of requiring that regulations for the disposition of the natural resources in the parks should come before parliament for approval just as in the case of regulations under the Dominion Lands Act. The following is the amendment:

That to section 18 be added the following proviso: Provided that any regulation made by the Governor in Council under subsection (b) of section 16 shall remain in force until the day immediately succeeding the day of prorogation of the session of parliament next after the date of such regulations and no longer, unless during the session such regulations be approved by both Houses.

Mr. PERLEY. Why confine it to that particular subsection?

Mr. OLIVER. Because this subsection deals with natural resources.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does this amendment correspond with the provision in the Dominion Lands Act?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not see much distinction in principle between this particular subsection and some of the others. Why make any distinction between (b) and (c) or (b) and (g)?

Mr. OLIVER. The idea was that regulations which merely had to do with the conduct of the business of the parks need not come before parliament, but that those having to do with the alienation of natural resources ought to have the approval of parliament.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There may be some ground for such a distinction, but take subsection (g) which deals with the confiscation of property and disposal of the things seized. That is rather an important regulation.

Mr. OLIVER. It was not considered necessary that parliament should take responsibility regarding regulations for the administration of the parks, but that the alienation of the rights of the Crown in natural resources required the sanction of parliament.

Mr. MILLER. If you are going to apply your amendment to subsection (b) you should divide that subsection into two, and confine your amendment to the cutting and removal of timber, the working of mines, quarries and mineral deposits, and make a new paragraph to include the removal of sand, gravel, &c., so that your amendment shall not apply to comparatively trivial things.

Mr. OLIVER. They are all of the same class. There is the right to the use and occupation of land. That deals with the occupation of land within the reserve.

Mr. MILLER. I understand perfectly the explanation, but if a settler wants a load of sand for the building of his house or a municipality wants a few loads of gravel, that should not require the approval of parliament.

Mr. PERLEY. Why should the amendment to section 18 not apply to section 17 also?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know, but that it might apply to subsections (b) and (c) of section 17. I do not know that it is well to cumber the administration by unnecessary references to parliament. At the same time, if the committee insists upon it, I would not seriously object.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It does seem to me that subsection (c) of section 17 is of equal if not greater importance in this respect than subsection (b) of section 16.

Mr. OLIVER. If the wording in the amendment I handed to my hon. friend were left as typewritten without the reference to section 16, the matters in subsection (c) of section 17 would be covered.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why not merely add a few words, so as to make the section read:

Provided that any regulations made by the Governor in Council under the provisions of this Act with respect to the matters mentioned in subsection (b) of section 16 of this Act and subsection (c) of section 17 of this Act shall remain in force until the day immediately succeeding the day of prorogation of the session of parliament next after the date of such regulations and no longer, unless during the session such regulations be approved by both Houses of parliament.

Mr. OLIVER. I will accept that.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PERLEY. The other night when we were discussing this Bill reference was made to squatters, and I think there is a provision by which squatters are not allowed on the land of a forest reserve. But at page 9 of the schedules, referring to certain subdivisions, it says that they have been withdrawn owing to the presence of a squatter, and that the presence of this squatter will tend to protect the forest against fire. How is the minister so much in favour of this particular squatter when there is a provision in the Act to prohibit squatters from going into the forest reserves?

Mr. OLIVER. This squatter was in occupation before the reserve was located. The question is whether it is better policy to buy out his rights or to cut him out of the reserve. In this case it is thought better to cut him out of the reserve than to buy out his rights.

Bill as amended reported, and read the third time and passed.

WATER CARRIAGE OF GOODS.

Bill (No. 212) to amend the Water Carriage of Goods Act, read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. LEMIEUX. This Bill was left in my care by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I understand it has been thoroughly examined and reported upon by the Committee of Marine and Fisheries. The Act in question was passed in the session of 1910, and the shippers, especially in the maritime provinces, have represented to the government that section 10 of the Act hampers them in their business of exporting lumber to Great Britain. Some fifty petitions which I hold in my hands were sent to the department, asking for the repeal of that clause, and for the amendment which I now propose. A special committee appointed two or three years ago on Marine and Fisheries sat and heard the interested parties, the shipping federation and the lumber exporters. The legislature of New Brunswick has also passed a resolution to the same effect. In the evidence taken by the committee with regard to this Bill, it is stated on page 7 that the lumber people of the United Kingdom have refused to accept a Bill of lading used under the present Act. The Bristol Timber Importers' Association unanimously resolved not to purchase any more lumber cargoes under existing conditions. On page 29 of the evidence will be found certain telegrams from large shippers of lumber asking for the repeal of clause 10. The lumber industries ask that they shall be at liberty to enter into a contract with ship-owners for a bill of lading with what is known as the conclusive evidence clause in it, so that shipping companies who do not wish to give such a bill of lading need not do so. They represent that section 10 is in restraint of trade with regard to the carriage of wood goods. The chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) read a telegram addressed to a Liverpool firm by Price, Walker & Company, Limited, Gloucester, which I will read:

Dear Sirs,—Cargo per SS. 'Hersilia' at Sheet Harbour. The provisions which you suggest will not meet the requirements of the Bristol channel importers. We will not contract without the clause which has been adopted by our association being embodied in the contract itself.

There are one or two communications of a similar nature which I need not quote.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The minister has been dealing with section 2 of the Bill, which I understood pretty well. I was familiar with the legislation passed by the legislature of New Brunswick, and some other protests that had been made against section 10 of the Act as it originally stood. Would the minister tell us what was the original form of subsection (a) of section 2?

Mr. SINCLAIR. The only change is the addition of the words after the word 'animals,' 'lumber, deals and other articles described as wood goods.' Subsection (a) in the original Act contained this clause:

Including goods, wares, merchandise and articles of any kind whatsoever except live animals.

The object of this amendment is to exclude wood goods from the operation of the Act relating to water carriage of goods. The original Act, clause 9, prohibits the shipowner from relieving himself from certain kinds of liability for negligence, and this clause 9 includes those goods. It was stated on behalf of the shipowners that they were not in a position to measure the goods and to find out the superficial feet, that it would take a great deal of time and cause delay, and that to ascertain whether a certain plank or deal contained so many superficial feet, was impracticable. Consequently, they asked for a clause that would relieve them from the liability, provided they delivered the number of pieces that were received from the merchant. That is the meaning of clause 10 which was in the Act of last year. The merchants of New Brunswick, it appears, object to that system and wish to go back to the system in force in that province previously by which the shipowner made himself liable not only for the number of pieces but also for the actual measurement, for the number of superficial feet contained in those pieces, and they required the shipowner to sign a bill of lading that he would deliver on the other side a certain number of superficial feet. Often when he reached the other side, there would not be that quantity of superficial feet in the ship and the shipowner had to make up the difference. The shipowner was anxious to get rid of that liability and it was on behalf of the small shipowners in the maritime provinces that that clause was inserted. The effect of this Bill will be to put the law back where it was before and leave absolute freedom for the shipowner and merchant to make their own contract. If the merchant can pervail on the shipowner to sign a bill of lading for a certain number of superficial feet it will be for the shipowner to deliver that, but if he refuses he has to make his bargain with the merchant.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 12.50 a.m., Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THURSDAY, May 18, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

THE ALBERT AND MONCTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. GUTHRIE moved that Bill (No. 220) to incorporate the Albert and Moncton Railway Company be placed on the orders of this day, immediately after routine proceedings, for consideration in Committee of the Whole, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the twenty-second report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. SPROULE. I think there is too much of this kind of procedure of late. It gives very little time for consideration; the Bill will no doubt be taken up at once. Then we are not by any means at the end of the session, but only going to adjourn for a while. The Bill cannot be delayed long, and I think it should stand over until after the adjournment.

Mr. MONK. The Bill for the Albert railway was adopted by the committee without any amendment, and this seems to be the only opportunity offered to pass the Bill. There is no controversy about it. I do not see any reason why we should not get rid of that Bill.

Mr. EMMERSON. While agreeing with the general remarks of my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule), I want to say with respect to this Bill that unless it is passed now it will very materially delay the development of the shale interests in Albert county. They have for many years lain dormant, but there is every prospect now that, if facilities are not afforded, the English capitalists who are on the spot, and have been on the spot, may be delayed in developing that property. The railway runs from Hillsboro, where large plaster quarries are situated, out into the Baltimore district where the shale quarries are found. The distance to Moncton is about twenty miles. It is for industrial development, and simply because we are going to have a recess is no reason why, if it is at all possible, to have this Bill passed, it should be delayed. We want to go into this business at once, and why should the Bill be delayed until September?

Mr. PERLEY. Will the hon. gentleman state why the Bill was so late in coming before the House?

Mr. EMMERSON. It came from the Senate. The parties from England only came over late during the session, arrangements were only completed very recently, and I think they have moved in the matter with great expedition. It has only been possible to reach this Bill from the Senate within a day or two, and I felt it my duty, in the interests of that section of the country, to attempt to expedite the Bill. I do not see that any interests will suffer; the Bill is not contentious. It is a standard Bill and passed through the Railway Committee unanimously.

Mr. SPROULE. We do not touch private Bills to-day, this being Thursday, and we will reach private Bills to-morrow, when it is very likely to pass. Therefore, there is no urgency from that standpoint. If it passed the committee without any amendment, there is not likely to be any delay in the House. Let it take its natural order and come up to-morrow evening with out any motion.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is the private Bills ahead of this one that will prevent its being considered to-morrow. We have only one hour. It would only take a minute to pass this Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not opposed to the Bill; I am only drawing attention to what I think is the commencement of a bad practice.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE moved that the House go into committee on the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. SPROULE. How is it that the House is moved into Committee of the Whole on this Bill now before we have reached the orders of the day? I see no reason why we should not go on to the questions put by members according to the order of precedence. Why should we disarrange our Order Paper for the sake of shoving a Bill through a few minutes ahead of time? It does not require to go back to the Senate again. What is the urgency?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think the objection of my hon. friend is out of order now. If we violated the rules a moment ago when the Speaker was in the Chair, that is no reason why we should continue to do so.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the motion as read out from the Chair that this Bill be put on the Orders this day, and that the rules be suspended to allow that to be done. Now it is put on first before we reach the orders of the day. That is what I object to.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was not my fault.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In view of a misapprehension, as my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) understood it was to come after questions put by members, we had better take up questions put by members first.

Mr. EMMERSON. I have no objection.

Progress reported.

THE NATIONAL HYDRO-ELECTRIC COMPANY, LIMITED.

* Mr. MONK.

1. At the time of the lease granted by the government to the National Hydro-Electric Company, Limited, of the water-power on the Ottawa river at Carillon, were tenders called for publicly announcing said alienation and calling for bids?
2. On the 1st January, 1911, was the said power under lease to any party? If so, to whom?
3. For how many years was the lease existing in January last of said water-power to run?
4. When was the National Hydro-Electric Company, Limited, incorporated?
5. Who are the president, vice-president and directors of this company?
6. Will the government lay on the table of the House a copy of the order in council of the 14th March, 1911, authorizing the lease of the Carillon water-power to the National Hydro-Electric Company, Limited?
7. Who signed the lease on behalf of the lessee company?

Mr. SPEAKER. Stand, in the absence of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. MONK. I rise to a question of order, as my hon. friend did a moment ago. There is the notice of a question put on the 15th and easily answered; we are just on the eve of adjournment and it would be a great convenience for me if I could get the answer to that question before adjournment.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) is not present. On his return, if he has the information, I will be glad to arrange that it shall be handed in. If it is not available we cannot answer it; that is all.

ANNUAL DRILL OF MILITIA.

Mr. SPROULE:

1. How many officers, non-commissioned officers, men and horses were called out to perform their annual drill or training in the years 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909 and 1910, and how many are intended to be called out for drill for the year 1911, with the number from each battalion, and where drill will be performed?

2. (a) What length of time was spent in drill and rifle practice in each of these years, (b) were all the officers and non-commissioned officers properly qualified to handle, instruct or drill the militia forces each year, and (c) who were charged with these duties?

3. Where, how rapidly and in what numbers could the force be mobilized and properly supplied with arms, uniforms and all necessary equipment for active service?

4. How many additional men could be equipped and put in the field for active service, say in three months?

2. (a) 12 days. (b) Unqualified officers to instruct are shown as provisionally appointed officers in the quarterly militia list of each year. As regards N.C.O's., it is impossible to say if all N.C.O's., were qualified to instruct as no return is available which gives the information asked for. (c) It is not understood what is meant by 'who were charged with these duties' as every officer and N.C.O. in their respective capacities are in varying degrees responsible for instructional duties.

SUBSIDY FOR RAILWAY FROM GRAND FALLS TO ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. CARVELL:

Has any, and if so, what, correspondence been carried on between the government of New Brunswick, or any member or members thereof, and the government of Canada, or any member thereof, with reference to changing the Subsidy Act, 1910, with respect to a subsidy for a line of railway from Grand Falls, in the province of New Brunswick, to the city of St. John, in the same province?

Mr. PUGSLEY. This question is of such a nature that, in my opinion, the reply should be in the form of a return. Pursuant to clause 4, rule 37, I beg to state that I have no objection to laying the return upon the table of the House.

Mr. PATERSON.

CENSUS—ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF JACQUES CARTIER.

*Mr. MONK:

1. What are the names and occupations of the officers in charge of the census for the electoral district of Jacques Cartier?
2. Where are the said officers domiciled?
3. On what date were said officers appointed?
4. By whom were said officers recommended for appointment?
5. Did the government consult any one from the said district before making the said appointments?
6. From what person or persons did the government seek advice regarding said appointments?

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is not here to reply. On his return the reply will be handed in as if the question had been answered at the moment.

CENSUS—ELECTORAL DIVISION OF HOCHELAGA.

*Mr. MONK:

1. Who are the officers in charge of the coming census in the electoral division of Hochelaga?
2. Are they personally known to the Minister of Agriculture?
3. By whom were these officers recommended?

Mr. FIELDING. That will be the same.

CANADA CEMENT COMPANY.

On the orders of the day being called.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the leader of the House (Mr. Fielding) if the government contemplate doing anything with regard to the complaint made by Sir Sandford Fleming regarding the organization of the cement company known as the merger?

Mr. FIELDING. We understand that the matter is already before a committee of this House. I am not advised as to the particular shape in which it stands at this moment, but I presume that whatever investigation is necessary in regard to the company's application and the letter of Sir Sandford Fleming will take place before that committee.

Mr. SPROULE. That is the Private Bills Committee?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

THE BAHAMAS AND CANADA.

Mr. SPROULE. I have seen a number of articles of late regarding the proposal to annex the Bahama Islands to the Dominion of Canada, and some, what I should regard as strong reasons why it would be advisable to do so. The people of the Bahama Islands appear to be especially anxious that it should be done, for their legislature, I notice, have passed a resolution to that effect. I would like to ask the government if they have had any representations on the subject from their legislature and, if so, if the government have given the matter sufficient consideration to take the House into their confidence, and tell us what they propose to do, if anything.

Mr. FIELDING. We are aware, as my hon. friend has pointed out, by the general representations in the press, of a desire in the Bahama Islands to open negotiations with Canada. I think I am correct in stating that we have had no official negotiations on the subject. What has happened is that several enterprising citizens of Canada, residents, I think, of Montreal, who have been visiting the Bahamas, have taken a very warm interest in the matter, and in that way a good deal has been heard of it in the Canadian press. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) asked a question a day or two ago on the subject, and I said that while I did not think there was any official correspondence on the subject I thought it not unlikely that during the visit of the Prime Minister to England it might be the subject of conversation between the colonial office authorities and himself. I think I am quite correct in stating that we have had nothing official on the subject. I should have made a further search of the records, but I am pretty certain I am correct. If I find there is any official communication I will be glad to have it brought down to-morrow.

Mr. SPROULE. I would think that there should be some when their legislature has passed a resolution.

Mr. FIELDING. I am quite sure there has been nothing but what has already appeared in the public press. There have been no negotiations whatever on the subject. It is a matter which might engage attention in the future.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understood that, while it has been reported in the press that the legislature passed the resolution alluded to, it had not come in an official form to the attention of the government up to the time that the Minister of Finance made his statement on the subject to the House a few days ago.

Mr. FIELDING. I will ask the Secretary of State to make a further examination. It is possible that the resolution has been officially communicated. Of course, we are thoroughly aware that they have passed the resolution. The channel of communication with the colony would be by way of the colonial office. They would hardly communicate directly with us.

DALHOUSIE PILOTAGE DUES.

Mr. CROCKET. I would like to ask the hon. acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lemieux) if he has an answer to the question I put yesterday.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I was just going to rise to give my hon. friend the answer which has been communicated to me by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and which is as follows:

With reference to the telegram which Mr. Crocket read in the House to-day, to the effect that the Department of Marine and Fisheries had notified the collector of customs at Dalhousie not to collect pilotage on vessels carrying pulpwood from Dalhousie to Portland, Maine, the facts are these:

Early this spring the department was appealed to for a ruling as to whether a vessel carrying pulpwood from Dalhousie to Portland, Maine, was obliged to pay pilotage dues in the pilotage district of Dalhousie. The reply was to the effect that such a vessel came within the list of exempted vessels named in section 477 (c) (iii) of the Canada Shipping Act, which reads as follows:

'Ships propelled wholly or in part by steam employed in voyages between any port or ports in the said provinces—Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island—or any of them and the port of New York, or any port of the United States of America, on the Atlantic north of New York were exempted ships.'

The Bill now before parliament to amend the Canada Shipping Act retains this clause. It is, however, proposed to give the power to every pilotage district to say what ships in the list of exempted ships shall be exempted in so far as that particular pilotage district is concerned. Any pilotage by-law varying such list of exempted vessels would, of course, be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. It will thus be seen that if this amendment to the Canada Shipping Act passes it will be competent for every pilotage district to regulate this matter in such a manner as is best suited to its own requirements.

Mr. DANIEL. Would the minister state why this matter is placed in the hands of the collector of customs? Is it usual for the collector of customs to collect pilotage dues in a pilotage district? It is usually done by the pilotage authority, but this telegram states that the collector of customs has this matter in hand.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I could not say exactly. It is a matter quite new to me, but I will get more information and communicate it to my hon. friend early in the day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I presume it will be a question of the collector clearing the vessel, and I take it that it has allowed the vessel to clear without payment of the pilotage dues under that section of the law.

Mr. DANIEL. That is not the way the telegram read.

NAVAL CORONATION CONTINGENT.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I desire to give the answer to the question asked the other day by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) regarding officers of the naval service who will attend the coronation. The answer given to me by the naval service department is as follows:

In reply to question of Mr. Crosby in the House on 16th instant regarding officers who will attend coronation: Lieutenant Lord Alastair Graham, in command of coronation contingent; Midshipman Percy W. Nelles, Midshipman Victor Brodeur.

Mr. CROSBY. I would mention to the acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries that that statement does not say anything about the 'Rainbow.'

Mr. LEMIEUX. They give the names of the officers, but they do not give the name of the ship to which they belong. I do not know whether these officers belong to the 'Rainbow' or the 'Niobe.'

Mr. CROSBY. I think the 'Niobe.'

DELUSIVE PROMISES OF MARRIAGES.

Mr. DOHERTY. Has the Minister of the Interior any information concerning the report which has been widely circulated in the press that a certain transportation company or some immigration agents in the United Kingdom, have by means of advertisements or other public announcements been seeking to bring, about the immigration of young women, using as an inducement the representation that there were husbands in plenty waiting for them, more particularly in the western country. I am quite aware that this is a matter that perhaps lends itself to a more or less facetious treatment, that it has, in fact, been treated in that way by some newspapers but it has a very serious side. Such an action if even in appearance sanctioned by the government might lead to very false impressions and possibly mislead some not overwise young women into coming into this country with anticipations that were fated not to be realized. This has formed the subject of very serious consideration amongst organizations in Montreal and other places which concern themselves with taking care of young women immigrants on their arrival in the country and endeavouring to protect them. These ladies think it is a matter that ought to be officially cleared up, that it must be quite understood that no one on behalf of this government or no transportation company, at least with the countenance of the government, should be permitted to hold out inducements of that kind to young women who might be misled thereby and might, on coming to this country, be exposed to very serious temptations, which these organizations seek to protect them against.

Mr. EMMERSON. Is this in anticipation of the amendment to the Bank Act by my friend from East Grey?

Mr. DOHERTY. I do not understand that bank clerks are held out as especially desirable husbands.

Mr. OLIVER. No inducement such as this has been held out by the government or any officers of the government with the knowledge of the government, and if it can be brought to the knowledge of the government that any of these officials have held out the inducement that my hon. friend has spoken of, I can guarantee that the connection of these officials with the government will cease there and then. I have some knowledge of the rumour referred to. I think it arose from some advertising said to have been done by the Canadian Northern or some of their agents, but while I am not able to give any particular details at the moment, my impression is that on inquiry being made of the Canadian Northern Company they absolutely repudiated any action of that kind and placed the blame where it is very frequently placed, on the newspapers, and intimated their belief that it was a misinterpretation of an interview to give occasion for a startling headline. No such announcements or statements have appeared recently, which would indicate that this was done without authority and that the practice, if it existed, has been checked.

Mr. STAPLES. Has the minister had any communication from a Miss Wileman who has been organizing the bringing out of domestic servants to this country? It appears that Miss Wileman before leaving for England had some understanding with the minister and according to the advice I have, the minister promised to give her all the assistance he could in the home immigration office but has failed to make good his promise. Therefore she has been detained over there with the domestic servants whom she had ready to bring to Canada. Has the minister had any communication with or made any promise to the lady which he has not fulfilled.

Mr. OLIVER. I have had letters from a Miss Wileman, and she has discussed immigration matters with me. She said that her purpose was to bring out domestic servants. I told her that the government could not make any special grants to her for that purpose, that if she wished to engage in that effort she would be subject to the same conditions, and considerations as anybody else. She has no promise of any consideration from me as far as her work in the old country is concerned. The only promise she had from me was that if she could make arrangements here in Ottawa for the proper entertainment, and care of young women who were brought out by her as domestic servants, I would consider the bearing of some part of the special expense thereby incurred in their entertainment, and care on their arrival here. Beyond that she has no promise, and never had any from me.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 220) to incorporate the Albert and Moncton Railway Company—Mr. Emmerson.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

House in committee on Bill (No. 197) to amend the Railway Act.—Mr. Graham.

On section 4,

Mr. LANCASTER. This section is absolutely necessary in some form for the purpose of meeting the state of law as found by the Supreme Court of Canada in a recent decision, and with the principle of the section I am in entire accord. It has been found by a majority decision of the Supreme Court that where railway lands are not expropriated, but where a registration of a plan takes place, thus declaring the lands to be subject to the Expropriation Act, the railway company can practically wait forever without taking any other proceedings. The only suggestion I would make is to insert in the third line of subclause (b), after the word 'sanction,' the words, 'whether made before or after the passing of this Act.' Otherwise the effect of this section would be to make one law for the owner, and another for another, because it would mean that this remedy would apply only to orders sanctioning the location of the right of way made after the passing of this Act, and would not be any benefit to the people who are affected by an order made before the passing of this Act.

Mr. GRAHAM. From my standpoint, I do not see any objection to the proposed amendment; but I would like to hear some legal view as to whether or not it would wrongly affect cases that are now pending.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is the legal effect which I have in my mind. The order referred to granting the sanction, is the order of the board which has located the right of way, and therefore allows the railway company to register their plan which covers the land through which the railway passes, and the registration prevents the owner from selling. Whether the order sanctioning the taking of the land and the locating of the right of way is made before or after the passing of this Act, no railway company can be hurt by this provision, because in either case the owner should have the right which this section contemplates to apply to the Board to have the railway company say whether they are really going to take the land or abandon it.

Mr. GRAHAM. I see no objection to the proposed amendment.

Amendment of Mr. Lancaster agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 7,

Section 235 of the principal Act is amended by striking out the words 'the railway' at the commencement of the said section and substituting therefor the words, 'Subject to the company making such compensation to adjacent or abutting landowners as the board deems proper, the railway of the company'

Mr. GRAHAM. This section was left over until I would consult concerning it. It was feared it might give cause to litigation, but after close scrutiny, it appears to me that it will have the opposite effect. It merely provides that when a railway asks to go on the highway opposite a man's property, the board may say: You must pay this man so much damages or you cannot go there. The damages will be appraised by the board who have every facility to do so.

Mr. LANCASTER. The only objection is that you make the board both judges and arbitrators. I am not afraid of the board abusing its jurisdiction, but I question whether we should give them the right not only to say that damages must be paid but determine the amount.

Mr. GRAHAM. If a railway runs through a man's land, there is a provision for arbitration, but in this case it does not run through its land, and the board will only grant its application on the condition of its paying this man a certain amount of damages. The clause is drafted in the handwriting of the chairman of the board, and he thinks this would be an expeditious way of settlement. Heretofore there was no provision to meet a case of the kind; and as the land did not belong to any one, the question of damages was a difficult and litigious one. Damages may accrue. Sometimes a road might run between a man's house and his barn but not on his land, and the chairman thought it would be wise to let the board make the payment of damages a condition. It would be right to empower the board to determine whether a man was entitled to damages or not, but as to the quantum of damages, why should you ask the board to sit as arbitrators?

Mr. LANCASTER. You are going to make this a board of arbitration as well as a board for administering the Railway Act. It will have to take evidence and sit as a court of law to determine the amount of damages and decide on legal points involved in the question of damages.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). This will facilitate the determining of the location. The railway may adopt that location, but only conditional on its paying the compensation fixed by the board. If you adopt this plan you have to pay damages to this individual. They may say: We do not go there. Besides that, in all these cases of expropriation the speediest is the best manner. Why should the party have to go to arbitration? He applies to the commission, they can determine the matter just as well as a board of arbitration. I think it is more to the interest of the party who is affected, and it is an extension of the principle which has not been in the Act at all, because unless a man's property is touched he has no claim for damages. It is an extension of that privilege. I think the plan proposed under the Act is the best.

Mr. LENNOX. It is an arbitration, whether that arbitration is conducted by a board or by somebody else. There are some cases where it would be advantageous to have the question determined by the board. Take, for instance, a case where there could be no doubt as to the damages, where it is an easy question which would not involve the hearing of many witnesses. That would be a case for the board to decide. But these cases are not very numerous. When it comes to indirect damages, where you do not touch a man's property, it is a difficult question to decide, difficult because you have to get a technical class of evidence, and that involves a number of witnesses. It means either that you have to bring a host of witnesses to Ottawa, or it means that the board have to go out, we will say to Calgary, or some other remote place, and that would involve a good deal of trouble. I think, on the whole, it would be wiser to leave the question of the amount of damages to be decided in the ordinary way by expropriation. I do not myself see the necessity of the board coming in at all. I think we might adopt an amendment something like this: 'Without prejudice to the right of a party affected to recover such compensation as he is entitled to.' Then the order might be made for them to go on. If the board is to intervene at all then I think it would be well to let the chairman of the board decide whether there should be compensation, and let the amount of compensation be determined in the ordinary way. But it could be done without the board intervening at all, and the order should be made subject to the right of the party to obtain such compensation as would be fair under the circumstances.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. By this Act we are giving them a new right. As the law of Canada now stands, it gives him no right of action except where he is injuriously affected.

Mr. LENNOX. That is the case at present, because there is no provision at all for compensation. But here we make a provision, and say that they shall have the right to go over the highway, but he shall have the right to compensation. All he can get in any case is whatever damages he has sustained. If he does not sustain any damage, he cannot get any, whether we have this provision or not. I am pointing out that we can either leave it for the board to determine whether he shall have compensation or not, or leave it solely to the arbitrators. But if the system pursued here is that the board should intervene, and if they do intervene, the utmost right we should give the board is to say whether he shall have compensation, and leave the amount of compensation to be determined afterwards by arbitration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I agree with my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) that it is very much better to allow the board to determine what damages the party who is injured shall have. The board, in the first place, have to determine whether it is desirable to allow the railway to run upon the highway at the particular point asked for. The board would naturally take into consideration whether it is going seriously to injure the land owner or not, or whether it might not be better to compel the company to take some other route. Now, is it not much better for the land owner that the board should settle the damages as a condition of granting the privileges? The whole matter is determined then by a tribunal which is as competent as you could possibly have. If the suggestion of my hon. friend is acted upon, the company might be permitted to go on and build its railway on a highway, and the adjoining owner would be obliged to go to court, perhaps, and go from court to court, and obliged to incur great expenses before he could get redress. I think it is infinitely preferable that the matter should be settled by the board, and that the amount of damages which they find is reasonable shall be paid before the company is allowed to build its railway.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. When I drew the attention of the minister last night to the wording of the amendment, I did not express any opinion as to what would be the better course. I simply pointed out that it would give the board not only the right to determine as to whether a man is entitled to damages, but also to determine the quantity. I am inclined to think that, as the matter will have to be gone into very thoroughly to determine, first of all, whether a man is entitled to any damages, and as they have to have the evidence before them, it would take but little more time for them to go a little further and determine the quantity of damages. Therefore, under the circumstances, as the board is a perambulating board, and as it is their custom to make a view of the premises, I think they would be able to ascertain in a summary manner, and with less expense, not only the right to damage, but the amount thereof.

Mr. PORTER. It occurs to me, with all respect to the opinion of others who have expressed themselves contrary to my view, that in this legislation there ought to be uniformity. The Railway Act has recognized all through it the principle of arbitration in settling compensation for damages caused to an owner by reason of the railway. That seems to be the principle that has been adopted by this parliament, and has been in vogue for a very long time. Now, if this clause, as proposed, goes into effect, there would be a new jurisdiction, a new court appointed having jurisdiction over this particular matter, which is not in uniformity with the other provisions of the Act. A great deal of difficulty has arisen by reason of legislation in that direction and along that line heretofore. My hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel) proposes to offer an amendment to this present Act covering the point I am about to mention in regard to farm crossings, and in regard to fences along farms. A serious question has been before the courts a number of times as to whether they have jurisdiction over this question, or whether it must be settled by an arbitration, or whether the Board of Railway Commissioners alone have jurisdiction to order the construction of a crossing, and the payment of damages in consequence of not having provided a farm crossing, or fences, and that sort of thing.

It has been before the courts a great many times in the province of Quebec, I think I am correct in saying, six or seven judges have decided one way, while five have decided the other way, and the Supreme Court has decided with the five. The conflict of authority arises from the want of clear language expressing the jurisdiction and the want of uniformity in jurisdiction. It seems to me that this parliament, having adopted the principle of arbitration in settling damages or compensation in the majority of such cases, ought to folow it in this case. And there are other reasons. It would be a great inconvenience if parliament required persons claiming compensation under this Act to go before the Board of Railway Commissioners. I think the Act should be amended in such a way as was suggested by me yesterday—so that the railway company, or the person claiming damages or compensation should have the right to call in a board of arbitration to settle the amount of damages. That procedure is inexpensive, speedy and convenient. The damages may be very small, and it is not well to incur the expense of bringing witnesses to where the board is sitting. It seems most desirable that the jurisdiction should be given to one body to try these questions of damages for compensation, so that there may be no conflict of authority, and no question where the person aggrieved should seek a remedy.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). It seems to me absolutely necessary that the commission should decide whether damages have been incurred or not. But if the commission decide that there are damages, I think it is not going much further to give them power to decide the amount of the damages. I do not know whether these arbitrations are final——

Mr. LANCASTER. Under $600 there is no appeal.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). But in some cases there is an appeal to a court. That is wrong; the decision should be final. I think it would be better to leave the whole thing to the commission, but, in any case, they should have the absolute right to decide whether there is damage or not.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. We all seem to agree that we are going to leave the board to decide whether the owner has right of action or not. That is not determined by the board in ordinary cases. If in this case we are going to allow the board to decide whether there is a right of action, they must necessarily go to a lot of trouble to reach a reasonable decision. It seems fair that this trouble and expense should be used to ascertain the amount of damages. If the Railway Commission were a body sitting in Ottawa to which all cases would have to be brought, I would have some hesitation in allowing them authority to assess the damages. But, in deciding whether there is damage or not they would probably view the premises, and at the same time could ascertain the amount of damages.

Mr. LANCASTER. If the suggestion of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) is carried out, the Railway Board will have to adopt a different procedure from that which they adopt in cases in which they act, but do not settle the amount of damages. The board sends its engineer, and he makes a report. I have had a good many cases, and I do not recall any case in which the commissioners visited the locality except in the case of one very dangerous crossing at Grimsby which had killed eight or ten people. Moreover, to adopt the proposal made is to throw upon the board an entirely new set of duties—directing them to decide damages without appeal. In cases over $600 at present there is an appeal from the board of arbitrators to the Superior Court of the province. This is because where the damages are relatively large, legal questions are often involved, and it is felt that either party to the case should have the opportunity to go before the courts. But there is no appeal under $600. In the cases covered by this section the damages may be very serious. The whole frontage benefits of a man's property may be destroyed by the railway running along the highway. The commissioners ought to view the locality in order to settle the amount of damages. But, if these new duties were thrown upon them, they might interfere with the performance of duties which are more important, and which are thrown upon them by the present law. The commissioners might say in a certain case—they could do it legally: We will not take time to look at this place, but we will give $1,000 damages no matter what the damages may be; we cannot be bothered going into it any further. That is what might take place. The board is a busy one. It has more work piled on it than it can do. No one would have suggested to establish a Board of Railway Commissioners for such purpose as assessing these damages. I might favour giving them these duties if they had not enough to do, but they are likely to be busy enough attending to matters that properly come to them in the administration of the General Railway Act. I believe that if we go the length of declaring that the board shall decide whether damages are recoverable or not, that is as far as we should go. The fixing of the damages should be left under the arbitration clauses. I think the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter) has well explained that the same principle should apply in these cases of damages as in others. The amount of damages should be settled locally, where the evidence is thorough, and the expense of collecting it is small. Otherwise injustice will be done by compelling people to meet the commission in Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, or elsewhere where they may be sitting, which may be at a considerable distance from the locus in quo. The more I think of it the more I think that the damages should be assessed and decided according to arbitration under the Railway Act.

Mr. GRAHAM. There are a great many ordinary arbitration cases with a certain method of procedure arising every day with railways. The cases that will arise under this section are very few indeed; in fact, up to date, nobody has any damages that will accrue under this section.

Mr. LANCASTER. But they would have had if this section had been the law.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think that everybody will agree that the number of cases will be very small in which there will be any damages. Let me read the section of the Act:

> The railway may be carried upon, along or across any existing highway upon leave therefor having been first obtained from the board as hereinafter authorized.

They must get leave first to go upon, along, or across the highway.

> Provided that the board shall not grant leave to any company to carry any street railway or tramway, or any railway operated or to be operated as a street railway or tramway, along any highway which is within the limits of any city or incorporated town, until the company has first obtained consent therefor by a by-law of the municipal authority of such city or incorporated town.
> 2. The company shall, before obstructing any such highway by its works, turn the highway so as to leave an open and good passage for carriages, and, on completion of the works, restore the highway to as good a condition as nearly as possible as it originally had.
> 3. Nothing in this section shall deprive any such company of rights conferred upon it by any special Act of parliament of Canada, or amendment thereof, passed prior to the 12th day of March, 1903.

These are the conditions under which the board may allow a company to use the streets. But here arises another condition: John Smith has some property. The property over which the railway goes is on the public highway, and it, therefore, does not belong to John Smith, but he says: It is going to hurt me if you allow the railway to be placed there. The board will say: We find that is so, and they can say to the company: You may go there provided you compensate John Smith. The damage amounts to so much.

Mr. LANCASTER. Would not an arbitration assess the damage?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, but it may be assessed there before it gets into the courts. The railway company, if it has to go into the courts, cannot tell whether they can go along that highway on reasonable terms or not. It is in the interest of everybody that there should be speed in the matter, and the railway companies say: We cannot afford to go upon the highway on those terms, and we will take a location in some other place. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it can be settled in twenty-four hours. Looking at it from the practical standpoint it will tend to keep men out of expensive lawsuits, to secure them fair damages, and enable the railway to be built within a reasonable time.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). That is the objection to your Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER. I agree with what the minister has said, that it will be more speedy, but speediness is not right if the amount is not correct. It is not justice to a man to get a speedy decision, if the decision is not for the right amount.

Mr. GRAHAM. He loses it in costs.

Mr. LANCASTER. If you want to hurry up the decision you can have it done in a month. The railway company must give ten days' notice, the property owner has either to accept or decline the offer and, if he declines it, they can go before the county judge and get the arbitrators appointed.

Mr. GRAHAM. Then there might be delay.

Mr. LANCASTER. If it can be decided in a month what would that amount to? It is the speediness of the matter that I am afraid of. It might be that the board would say: We must hurry up and make this order, and they would issue an order for $1,000 or $500, which might be too much or might not be enough. They just guess at it. It is done by explosion, they do not understand it, and I think it should be done properly. The land owner, as a rule, is a poor man, and the case should be decided in the interests of both parties in a proper way. There would not be much delay because, if the railway made a fair offer, it would be accepted, and it would be all over in ten days. If it made an unfair offer and it was submitted to arbitration, it would be all over in a month, and justice would be done, instead of the thing being jumped at.

Mr. DOHERTY. There would be a very great deal of force in the contention that we ought to have uniformity in the tribunal that is to assess damages in all cases of taking property by railways were it not for one thing. That is that we are dealing here essentially with an exceptional case. Where the matter goes to arbitration, and where the law absolutely settles the right to damages, the one question to be submitted is, how much ought to be paid. As the law stands at present the property owner, where the railway runs on the highway, has no rights. It is proposed to give him a right not absolutely established by law, but a right conditional upon the judgment of the Railway Commission. It would be a very inconvenient system to leave it to the Railway Commission to absolutely determine whether this man should have any damages or not and then proceed to another tribunal to establish how much they were. You may arrive at this result that the other tribunal may determine that this man is entitled to damages of a class that the Railway Commission never meant he should be entitled to. The Railway Commission have the determination of whether this man should get damages. There must be present to their judgment and mind some idea, not necessarily of the precise amount, but of the nature of the things for which he ought to be compensated. For instance, it might be that his access to the highway is interfered with. That is one ground upon which they might determine that he should get compensation. But if they merely say that he should get compensation, and send it to a board of arbitration, that board might assess the damages on some other basis, for instance, because his house is shaken, or for some other reason, which the Railway Commission never intended should be taken as the basis for assessing damages. And if they had foreseen that that was going to be the result, they might, in their judgment, have thought that giving the land owner damages for all injuries of that kind, would be a greater injustice to the railway than giving them damages generally. As the landowner's right depends on the judgment of the Railway Commission, one of the essential factors which must operate in leading them to a conclusion is what kind of damages he is to get, what the extent of the damages is to be; and to ask them to determine in an abstract way simply that he is entitled to damages of some kind, and then send it off to some one else to determine the amount of damages, is creating a situation where you make it exceedingly difficult for the Railway Commission to come to a conclusion on the question.

In the second place, you run the risk that the Railway Commission may say: You do this subject to compensating so and so, and the Board of Arbitration might think there was no damage at all. Thus you would have two tribunals arriving at contrary conclusions. Of course, that is not likely to occur, as boards of arbitration generally are disposed to grant compensation, and rightly so, perhaps, as the railway is disturbing the property of the man. In view of these considerations, it would be safer to adhere to the Act as proposed. By this Act, we are improving the position of the proprietor of adjacent lands; as it stands to-day he gets nothing. Would it not be wise to pass the Act as it now stands, leaving the whole matter to the determination of the Railway Commissioners? The proprietor advances to the extent that he gets to a state of affairs where he can obtain compensation. If it is found in practice that this does not work satisfactorily with regard to fixing the quantity of damages, it would be possible to remedy it; and if, on the other hand, it should be found to work out satisfactorily, it would obviate a great deal of complication, and in that case, I think, it would be desirable to adhere to it. On the whole, I think that the wise course would be to leave the Bill as it stands.

Mr. PORTER. With all respect to the hon. gentleman from Montreal, (Mr. Doherty), it seems to me there is a contradiction in terms when one reads the provisions of this Act. The hon. member seems to think that the board must determine the question first as to whether or not there is any right to compensation, and then that the arbitrators should say what the amount of that compensation is to be. It seems to me that that contradicts the provisions of the clause as here proposed. The clause, according to its fair reading, declares that where a railway crosses a highway there shall be a right to compensation, it is just a question of the amount. This parliament declares that there shall be a right to compensate, that is already decided by statute. The board would have no right to say: Well, yes, the owner shall have compensation. The statute says that already, so that when the argument is used that the board must determine whether or not there is a right to compensation, it is contradicting the statute. Assuming that the owner is entitled to some compensation, there is no reason why the railway company should not be able to determine that just as speedily as they determine the compensation they shall pay for the lands of an owner taken in any other way. They can serve their notice on him and make their offer, and if it is not accepted they can go to arbitration in the ordinary way. I would suggest that we strike out the words 'as the board may deem proper.' Then you will have the whole thing covered by one court, and the right court.

Mr. LENNOX. We cannot very well agree to this provision, as it is suggested, and I would suggest that this section also be allowed to stand over, so that we may consider it further and deal with it with the other amendments which the minister will bring in after we reassemble.

Mr. LANCASTER. I think, too, that section 11, which will be very contentious, should either stand over or be dropped. It is undoing what it took us three strenuous years to accomplish here for the owners of animals in this country. It is absolutely retrograde legislation, it is putting us back where we were in 1900, when I first came here. Many members will remember that a commission was appointed in connection with legislation introduced by myself, and the House finally determined unanimously upon a principle of law which should protect the owners of animals killed by railways. The minister, who was not in the House at the time, perhaps does not realize that the effect of section 11 is to undo that legislation.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman is addressing himself to section 11, while other hon. members desire to speak to section 7.

Mr. LANCASTER. I wish to show why the committee should rise and report progress.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is no motion to that effect. I think the hon. gentleman should wait until section 7 is disposed of.

Mr. COWAN. I am very much disposed to agree that under the old section 235 the land owner has no right, and that the purport of this section 7 is under certain circumstances to create a right in the owner. The body that creates the right is the Railway Board, and the body that creates the right should determine its value, if the section remains as it is. But it seems to me that it was a great mistake to destroy the common law right of the owner by section 235. The power should never have been given to a railway to pass upon a highway without compensating the adjoining owners for the damage done to their property. That power was given by section 235, and, therefore, the common law right of the owner to compensation was taken away. It seems to me that that right should be restored, and the compensation to be allowed to the owner for the invasion of that right should be left to the ordinary tribunal of arbitration. My suggestion would be to amend section 235 so as to preserve the common law right of the adjoining owners when the railway passes along the highway, and then let section 7 specify the tribunal which shall determine the compensation after that is done.

Mr. GRAHAM. This clause seems to me to be so much in the interests of the people that I hesitate to drop it unless some good reason is given. The situation at present is that a man's property may be damaged by a railway running along the highway, and he has no recourse. By this section we propose to give him recourse. The clause appears to me to be so simple that I do not like to take the responsibility of dropping it. I would be perfectly willing to accept the suggestion that its consideration be delayed if the committee so desires.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why not adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for West Hastings, and simply declare the railway company liable to pay damages and not bother the board with the matter at all? It is not the function of the Railway Board to determine whether or not there is an evil in the country that requires redress. It is for this parliament to take the responsibility of declaring that if a man's land is damaged in the way the section describes, he should have compensation, and then let the arbitration clause of the Railway Act settle the amount. I do not see why the board should be brought into the matter at all. They are not properly assessors as to land damages, nor law makers to say that the principle of land damages should be applied. This is the function of parliament. With regard to this provision causing litigation, there is just as much evil in litigation before the board as before the courts, and in my opinion litigation in the ordinary way is more expeditious than litigation before the Railway Board.

Mr. COWAN. I want to add another reason why there should be some little modification. As I pointed out a moment ago, this section deprives a land owner of a right which ought to be restored, and it gives the Railway Board the power to create a right. In the first place, the common law right is destroyed, and then a new right is given. The Board of Railway Commissioners are given the absolute right of determining the value which is a big power to put in its hands. I do not want the Bill withdrawn because it is an improvement on the law, but I want the common law right restored to the land owner, and leave the assessment of damages to the tribunal provided by the Act.

Mr. LENNOX. I want to see this section withdrawn, because if we pass it now, we shall never get it into proper shape. The Finance Minister made a very reasonable proposition last night when he suggested that clauses, which involve diversity of opinion, might be left in abeyance until we meet again. I do not want to drop this attempt to remedy the law, but I want the minister to take the same course with regard to this section as he did with regard to section 5, and as we shall have to do with regard to some other sections which we discussed last night.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not want to be arbitrary, but here is a clause prepared by the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners for the purpose of getting justice for the people, and in a summary way compensating them for the damages they may sustain. Both sides of the House are preponderately in favour of it. In fact I would be willing to abide by the vote on the other side. Since there is such a preponderating opinion in favour of the section, I do not see why we should drop it. I am prepared to drop it if the committee so wishes, but as far as I can judge, the committee wants the clause put through.

Mr. LENNOX. No one suggests that the minister is arbitrary——

Mr. GRAHAM. Why not leave it for the committee to say whether we should drop it or not?

Mr. LANCASTER. If it were ordered so that the principle we approve be carried out, no one would want to drop it.

Mr. GRAHAM. The majority of the committee are in favour of the section as it is, and I do not think that two or three hon. gentlemen should insist on our dropping it.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Carried.

Mr. LALOR. As a layman, and consequently not qualified to speak from a legal standpoint, it strikes me that this particular clause is in the interest of the public, and I am in favour of it.

Mr. LENNOX. I have great respect for my hon. friend, but I have had better opportunity of forming an opinion as to what is in the interest of the public as regards this class of legislation. I have given a good deal of my time to the study of this class of question, and with the greatest respect for my hon. friend I want to maintain my own position. I want to do the very best I can for the public, and have given this matter such consideration as I could in the short time allowed us. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways is very fair. He says he is willing to leave this over until we meet again in a few weeks.

Mr. GRAHAM. Let the committee decide.

Mr. LENNOX. I think we ought to leave it over, because if we crystallize it into legislation now, we know how difficult it will be to have it changed again. If this were the only provision left over, I could understand the objection, but there are other sections left in abeyance, and when we meet again in a few weeks, we shall have more time to consider the matter. I am quite confident that if we had proper time to discuss this matter, I could convince my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Lalor), that what the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter), and the hon. member for Lincoln-Niagara (Mr. Lancaster), propose, and I support, is very much more in the interest of the people than the provision we have before us now.

Mr. NESBITT. Did not the hon. member (Mr. Lennox) favour a clause last night containing practically the same language?

Mr. LENNOX. No. My hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) came over here, and I showed him the form in which it was suggested the change should be made; 'the company making such compensation to adjacent or abutting landowners.' And it was suggested—I do not know by whom—that this should be changed to read, 'The company making compensation to such adjacent or abutting land owners.' But I never became settled in my own mind about it. If I spoke last night, I think I said that I objected to having the Board in it at all. And, having considered it more fully I all the more strongly object to departing from the established principle in these cases.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Has the general question been discussed of making compensation to persons whose land has not been taken?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is what it is for.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I know, this covers it in part, but does not cover the ordinary cases to which I allude. I had a good deal of experience in cases years ago, and, both in Britain and here this principle has been adopted; if a man has a large property, of which, say 50 feet is taken and the rest damnified by the construction and operation of a railway, being rendered thereby unfit for the purposes for which it was intended or for which it is useful, he can recover damages in respect of that detriment; but if the railway runs close enough to his property to destroy it—even within a foot of it—if it does not take any of his property, he has no remedy for any damages resulting from the operation. That is the law, unless there has been a change by statute.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is as the law is now.

Mr. CARVELL. If my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) refers to what is called the Cotton Mill Case, I cannot recall the exact title at the moment, he will find—

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If there is legislation which authorizes it, that is different, but under the old English Land Act the law was construed exactly as I have said. If it were not so construed, in this country, this legislation would not be necessary, because, if by running a railway along a highway a man's property were injured, damages would accrue at once. However, I rose not to argue the question, but to inquire whether there has been any idea of covering the general question as this covers part.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think not. In their experience, the commissioners have found cases in which there is a proposition for a railway to run on or a long a highway, and the commissioners have to give the decision whether it shall do so or not. As I understand it no damages can be collected in that case and the Board wish to have the power to say to the railway commission: You may go there, but you must pay this man for damages.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That covers one class of cases the cases to which I allude.

At one o'clock, committee took recess.

Committee resumed at three o'clock.

On section 8,

Mr. GRAHAM. The discussion about section 8 was with reference to wires for the transmission of electric energy, and we were discussing it last night in the light of an attempt beng made to lay telephone or telegraph wires across. But what the chairman of the board is trying to straighten out is the difficulty when different power lines are crossing each other, or a street railway transmission line is crossing a steam railway. He wants to make standard regulations by which they can cross without making formal application to the Board of Railway Commissioners.

On section 10,

Mr. GRAHAM. This is a section we had a good deal of discussion about. Subsection 5 deals with the case where a railway is being constructed through inclosed land, and animals escape from such inclosed land upon the property of the company. I said last night that this clause had been practically agreed to by consultation with the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the farmers' deputations from the west intimated that it met their views. What was agreed to was the whole section, except the words at the end 'upon the property of the company.' Then after that was agreed to, it was suggested by the farmers' organization that there ought to be something put in to make a railway company responsible for the destruction of crops as well. But this did not quite meet with the view of the committee. Last night we were discussing how to reach that point. I had a clause prepared by the legal department which did not quite meet the views of the committee last night, and they thought there might be some improvement in it. This was the clause I proposed last night, and hon. gentlemen who know the situation in the west will see what I was trying to get at. This is what I proposed:

Where a railway is being constructed through inclosed land it shall be the duty of of the company to take effective measures to prevent cattle or other animals escaping from or getting upon such inclosed lands, or upon the property of the company, by reason of any act or thing done or permitted to be done by the company.

It is contended that by making it obligatory upon the company to prevent animals from getting on land or in getting off land, they would be responsible for damage done to crops on the land as well as responsible for the killing of cattle who got off the land on to the property of the railway company. In discussing it this morning with my legal department again, I pointed out that the question raised in committee last night was that some officer or agent of the company might do something, such as a contractor, that would allow damage to be done, and under the clause as we had it the railway could not be held liable. I think the member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) said he was not clear whether these words would not be open to that construction or not, and it was thought desirable in a case of that kind to make clear just what the liability would be where a contractor or some official was concerned, because, as he pointed out, the railway company might issue instructions to any of its agents that they must keep the fences closed, and if they did not, then it would be open to the construction that the company had done their part and would not be liable.

Mr. LANCASTER. If contractors are there with their permission they ought to be responsible.

Mr. DOHERTY. I do not think there would be much difficulty about an agent, but the difficultv is in the case of an independent contractor, with whom the railway company have made a contract to build a certain section of road, and has stipulated with him that he shall attend to the fences and carry out all the obligations. It is in that case that there might be difficulty about its being held that any acts of his which brought about any violation of his contract, and which brought about damage to outsiders, was an act permitted by the company.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is what I understood. Well, would it be right for us to make the company liable for the action of an independent contractor?

Mr. LANCASTER. He is there with their permission.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). If a contractor performs an act in violation of his contract with the railway company, should the company be liable?

Mr. DOHERTY. I think in that case the railway company ought to be liable, for this reason, that they are given a right to construct that railway, and it is quite proper that we should put upon them the obligation of seeing that the construction of that railway does no damage to an outsider; if we start by doing that, the company have no right to claim that they can throw off that obligation on to the shoulders of a contractor They might come to the contractor to be indemnified for any damage they may have had to pay. But after all, the source of damage to the individual is the exercise by the railway company of its power of constructing this railway. Whether it does it by itself or by another, it would be just that it should be responsible to the outsider for damage caused by the construction of their road.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The question is not whether they ought or ought not to be liable; it is whether the words of the Act cover the case.

Mr. LANCASTER. They should be liable, but they would have redress against the contractor. Like a corporation which is obliged to keep the sidewalks in repair, when they permit a contractor to tear up the sidewalks the municipality will still remain liable for damage to persons injured. Let the company put in a clause to indemnify the contractor. They should have redress against the contractor, but they should be liable to the injured persons.

Mr. GRAHAM. We all agree that somebody ought to be liable, and it seems to me it ought to be the company. I propose these words to cover the case:

Where a railway is being constructed through inclosed land it shall be the duty of the company to take effective measures to prevent cattle or other animals escaping from or getting upon such inclosed lands, or upon the property of the company, by reason of any act or thing done by the company, its contractors, agents or employees.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That is still open to the objection of the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) that the company might make all sorts of agreements with the contractor to protect themselves from damage. The company should be liable the same as a private individual. If a private individual enters my property through a contractor. he is liable for the action of the contractor.

Mr. GRAHAM. Let me read what was agreed upon as likely to meet the situation, and then I will read my amendment:

Where a railway is being constructed through inclosed land it shall be the duty of the company to take effective measures to prevent cattle and other animals escaping from such inclosed lands.

Those were the words approved of after a good deal of discussion. Now it is said that that would not protect the crop, and, therefore, I have replied with this section:

Where a railway is being constructed through inclosed lands, it shall be the duty of the company to take effective measures to prevent cattle or other animals escaping from or getting upon such inclosed lands, or upon the property of the company, by reason of any act or thing done by the company, its contractors, agents or employees.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Why not make it all damages without enumerating grain, stock, &c.?

Mr. GRAHAM. I want to adhere to what seems to be satisfactory to all the people most intimately interested in it. I am making it, if anything, stronger than they had it, and I do not want to go too far the other way.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is it the intention of the minister that the railway company shall be liable for all damages caused by the railway company, passing through inclosed fields, to grain, cattle or any other property?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Why, say anything about cattle or wheat? Why not say:

Where the railway is being constructed through inclosed fields, the railway company shall be liable for all damage caused to the owner by the company, its contractors, subcontractors, servants or agents.

Mr. GRAHAM. It will be ordinarily subject to all damages it might cause, I imagine.

Mr. CARVELL. I do not think that is as strong as the minister's proposal.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would propose that the subsection be changed to read as follows:

Where the railway is being constructed through inclosed lands, it shall be the duty of the company to take effective measures to prevent cattle or other animals escaping from or getting upon such inclosed lands or upon the property of the company by reason of any act or thing done by the company, its contractors, agents or employees.

Mr. COWAN. Should you not also say 'or any act omitted to be done'? There are two classes of negligence there are omissions and commissions.

Mr. GRAHAM. I discussed that pretty thoroughly with my legal department today, and they convinced me by legal arguments that everything would be the act of the railway company in producing a condition that did not before exist, and that it would all come under this section.

Mr. EMMERSON. It would be quite a burden on the railway which would require them to take effective steps, because effective steps must mean steps that will effectively prevent any damages. I do not see how you could make it any stronger.

Mr. DOHERTY. The obligation, no doubt, is to take effective measures to prevent any damage resulting from any act done. If the damage results merely from the omission to take effective measures you will not be able to bring suit based on any act that the railway company did to cause that damage. The damage will be caused because they did not do something.

Mr. GRAHAM. Give us a case.

Mr. DOHERTY. Suppose the fences are not up, and they omit to put them up.

Mr. GRAHAM. If the fences are not up it is because the contractors have knocked them down. This applies to inclosed lands.

Mr. DOHERTY. Suppose they are accidentally knocked down. I cannot at the moment lay my finger upon a particular case of omission in this instance.

Mr. EMMERSON. Supposing there is a whirlwind?

Mr. DOHERTY. Yes, supposing these fences are carried off by force majeure, and the contractor omits to reconstruct them. Suppose he comes through a gate and leaves it open, he does not open the gate but he just leaves it open. The damage is caused because he omits to close it. In most legislation that I have seen of this kind provision is made for acts of omission.

Mr. EMMERSON. Supposing the fence is destroyed by a whirlwind the company would be liable for not taking effective measures to prevent whirlwinds.

Mr. DOHERTY. Not to prevent whirlwinds. Underneath all law there lies the commonsense principle that a man is not responsible for a force majeure; but if the fence has been destroyed by a whirlwind the company are not responsible for the destruction of the fence, but they become bound to put up a new fence, because that would necessarily be an effective measure, and if you undertake to sue them you will not be able to show that by any act they caused the damage; the act was the act of God, but still they would be responsible for the replacing of the fence.

Mr. GRAHAM. Take the case of a whirlwind which destroys a fence. The section speaks of a property which is inclosed. The railway company has nothing to do with property which is not inclosed. It does not touch it, and it is not responsible in any way.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Suppose the fence is destroyed by fire?

Mr. GRAHAM. If the railway company has not taken the fence down it has nothing to do with it. It has not made any change in the condition.

Mr. COWAN. If it is not put up by them would it not be an act of omission?

Mr. GRAHAM. If it did not come within the purview of where they were operating they would have nothing to do with it. I went through this for an hour with my legal department, and they convinced me that this would meet every condition where a railway could possibly be held to be liable.

Mr. COWAN. What would the minister say of the case mentioned by my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), where the gate is left open? Would that be an omission?

Mr. GRAHAM. The next section says that the company shall be liable unless where the gate is left open by some person outside of its employees. The case of a gate being left open is fully covered by another section.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 11, the company liable except under certain conditions.

Mr. GRAHAM. This section was left over largely on account of the words 'any person.' It was argued last night that the railway should not be exempted from liability for damage to such a large extent if 'any person' left the gate open on either side of the railway. It was contended with some force that there should be some qualification which would say that if a gate were left open by persons other than the employees of the company liability would result. This is what I suggest as a prefix to subsection (b). I will read the whole section:

The company shall be liable to the owner for the full value of all horses, sheep, swine or other cattle that may be killed or injured upon the company's land through the operation of the railway, save where such killing or injury is caused by reason of any person—

(a) failing to keep the gates at any farm crossing, at each side of the railway closed, when not in use.

I believe that clause is all right, because it presupposes that the duty of the farmer is to keep his gate closed. I had thought of prefixing to subsection (b) the words:

Other than an officer, contractor or employee of the company leaving open any gate.

Making the same prefix to (b) as there is to (c). That, I think, would have the legal effect of saying that if any person in the employ of the company left the gate open the railway would be responsible, but that if any other person left it open the railway would not be responsible.

Mr. LANCASTER. If we are going to pass this section, I would say that the limitation should be to the owner of the animal or his servant. Why should the owner suffer because some stranger, who is trespassing on his property leaves his gate open? I appeal to the committee not to pass this section. We discussed this matter for three years, beginning with 1901. We had a commission appointed especially to deal with this question. They took evidence all over the country and reported to parliament, and finally the legislation of 1903 was passed by the unanimous consent of this House. In the committee I had many warm supporters on the Liberal side of this legislation, when it was being passed, among them the hon. member for South Wellington, and the former member for Haldimand.

The hon. gentleman yesterday said that he was repealing for the benefit of the farmers the clause which says that they shall not allow their animals to be within half a mile of a railway crossing on the public highway, but he is repealing more, he is repealing the clause which puts the onus on the railway to prove that the owner is negligent. The hon. gentleman said that the farmers' associations were in favour of this legislation. With all due deference to the farmers' associations, as a man having actions against railways in cases of this kind, I say that the farmers' associations are bringing on themselves interminable litigation to construe this Act. Apparently they do not understand what their rights have been since 1903, if they approve of this. There has been no litigation, the only question has been the amount of damages where they were recoverable, and where they were not recoverable, no attempt has been made to secure them. Any lawyer could tell from the statement of facts whether the company was liable or not, and the railway company also recognized when they were responsible.

The present law is quite clear that the railway company is liable unless they can prove that it was through the fault or neglect of the owner of the animal or his servant that the animal got on the track, except in cases where the animal was killed on the highway. Why change all that? This is a most drastic taking away of the rights which we, after full consideration during three sessions, granted to the owners of animals. I would suggest that the minister should repeal subsections (a) and (b) of section 294, but not the whole section, as this Bill proposes. Sections (a) and (b) cover the point which the minister said yesterday he was dealing with, that is the removal from the farmer of the obligation to keep his animals at least half a mile away from a railway crossing; but subsection (c) provides that the farmer shall not recover if the animal is killed at the point of intersection, which I think is good sense, while subsections (d) and (e) provide for the protection of the farmer by enacting that he is not to be held responsible for anything except his own negligence, and is entitled to recover if the railway company does not prove such negligence.

We have the law codified in plain language in subsections 3, 4 and 5 of section 294. Why should we disturb all that and take away the protection it affords? Why should we unsettle the law which was determined on by this parliament after full and careful consideration for three years, and which has been in operation for 8 years, and is now thoroughly understood by everybody? I tell the minister, as a lawyer who has a great deal of experience in these cases, who discovered the outrageous state of the law before he got a seat in this House, and who has realized the beneficial results of the change that was accomplished in 1903, and the great saving of expense in litigation consequent upon that change, that this particular section is under the circumstances very hastily entered upon. The farmers do not know what they are talking about if they think the proposed legislation is going to get them paid for one animal where they were paid for ten before. I am not objecting to the removal of the penalties if an animal happen to get within half a mile of the crossing; but I say, do not go further than that, and remove the protection to the farmer who takes all reasonable care to keep his animal at home, and it escapes because of the act of some stranger or because of a windstorm or a falling tree breaking down the fence, and so letting the animal escape. Most farmers do not want their animals to get within half a mile of a railwawy crossing. I have never known a farmer to get damages equal to what a horse or a cow was worth; they always take a little less; they are not anxious to get their animals killed. They cannot help their animals sometimes escaping, and when they do escape in spite of their reasonable precautions, if this Bill passes, the legislation which this parliament enacted, after three sessions of thorough discussion, will be gone, and these men will not be able to recover.

There is no real protection to the people in this. People are not going to allow their animals to escape just for the sake of getting paid for them, and if it be found that the owner of the animal or his employees be at fault, the railway companies do not pay. If, however, the conditions existed which were so carefully laid down by parliament in 1903, which entitled the owner to recover, he would get his money. Under these circumstances, I think that this section ought not to pass in its present shape. The purpose the hon. minister has in view could be very well met by repealing subsections 1 and 2 of section 294 which deal with the question of animals getting on a highway crossing, which he wants to change, but to take away the principles laid down in subsections 3, 4 and 5 will create chaos. Practically all the liability is gone because the question resolves itself into whether the animal got on the railway through the fault of any person other than the railway company. A railway company is not going to open a man's gate or smash his fence, and if it was not the agent or servant of the railway company who caused the trouble, the man cannot recover, even if the company did not keep the animal off its tracks as it should. The minister should not undertake to undo all we did in 1903, and change entirely the condition of affairs and cause litigation with very little hope for the owner of the animal to get any substantial justice.

Mr. GRAHAM. The object of this Bill was to cut out anything unnecessary and get in a small compass something that would make a railway company liable for the killing of cattle on its tracks. The conditions in the colder provinces are so different from those in the west that it is difficult to devise a section which may be applied with equity in both sections. In the older sections, farmers, as a rule, do not allow their cattle to run near a railway, but in the newer portions the cattle graze at large, and that is not illegal. We had a provision to the effect that if the cattle were grazing within half a mile of a railway, the owner had no recourse. In the east that would be all right, but not in the west.

Mr. SPROULE. Neither would it in the east.

Mr. GRAHAM. It was suggested to make the railway companies liable without reservation for all the cattle killed on their tracks. That was very drastic. I called in the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners to discuss the question with him. He pointed out to me what many farmers in the west did last year, and what does not agree with my hon. friend's experience in the east, namely, that railway companies pay the settler for the animal killed. But hundreds are killed in the west which are not found.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Thousands.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is contended by the Chairman of the Board that this will sweep away a great many of the difficulties, and make the railway companies directly responsible except under definite conditions here outlined. If it does not protect the farmers more than the present law does, the amendment would be futile.

Mr. LANCASTER. It does not.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Farmers' Association is advised by its solicitor that it does.

Mr. MEIGHEN. On what does the minister base his statement that the Farmers' Association in any way has consented to these amendments?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have a copy of a letter here which was addressed to a number of members of parliament by Mr. James Bower, president of the Canadian Council, Manitoba, in which he says that the draft amendment submitted to him, and which is in this Bill, meets their wishes.

Let me read the letter:

Ottawa, March 31, 1911.

Dear Sir,—In response to the request of the farmers for amendments to the Railway Act, giving them more protection from loss in having stock killed on railways, the Hon. Mr. Graham, Minister of Railways and Canals, has caused the following draft amendment to be made, to be submitted to parliament.

The clauses as amended in this form meet with our approval and as representing the farmers, I wish respectfully to enlist your support in having them become law.

Yours faithfully,

JAMES BOWER,

President Canadian Counoil of Agriculture.

I shall now read the draft clause which Mr. Bower endorses:

Sections 294 and 295 are repealed and the following substituted:

294. The company shall be liable to pay the full value thereof to the owner of all horses, sheep, swine or other cattle that may be killed or injured upon the company's lands through the operation of the railway, save where such killing or injury is caused by reason of any person—

(a) failing to keep the gates at any farm crossing, at each side of the railway closed, when not in use; or,

(b) leaving open any gate on either side of the railway provided for the use of any farm crossing without some competent person being at or near such gate to prevent animals passing through such gate on to the railway; or,

(c) other than an officer, contractor, or employee of the company, taking down any part of the railway fence; or,

(d) turning any animal upon or within the enclosure of any railway company; or,

(e) except as authorized by this Act, without the consent of the company, riding, leading or driving any animal, or suffering it to enter upon any railway and within the fences and guards thereof; or,

(f) leaving the gates of the company at railway stations open for the convenience of the public.

This being the situation, I thought I had arrived at a solution of the difficulty. I had a clause drafted by the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, who has given this more attention than any man in this House, and has made greater complaints to me about the loss of stock suffered by farmers in the west than any man in this House, and who has an experience greater than that of any man in this House and ability equal to any.

Mr. LANCASTER. Without any franchise to make the law.

Mr. GRAHAM. We are making the laws. He has had more experience.

Mr. MEIGHEN. How has he had any experience dealing with cases of damage to cattle?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend makes a little technical objection. The Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners has to deal with the conditions that bring about the loss of animals, and has had more experience than any man in this House in that direction. He deals with the conditions under which animals are kept off or let on to a railway track, and it is to him we look to suggest a remedy. And it is to him we look to suggest a remedy from his experience. He has suggested a remedy. He has drawn a clause which has been submitted, as I pointed out, not first to me but to the chairman of the Board of Agriculture of the Dominion of Canada. That gentleman as representing the farmers says this is satisfactory, and will meet the conditions, and asks that the House put it through. Of course, these gentlemen are not infallible, but their opinions are worthy of consideration. I am bound to say, with all deference to gentlemen on the other side of the House, that I have not yet found the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners erring on the side of any company.

Mr. LANCASTER. He has in this case.

Mr. GRAHAM. If there is any charge made against him it is that he is hard on the companies, and favours the public.

Mr. LANCASTER. He is sawing off now.

Mr. GRAHAM. I believe this amendment meets the conditions, and ought to pass.

Mr. LANCASTER. Let me appeal to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), as a practical man and a legislator—for I have more respect for him as a legislator than I have for the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners. That gentleman has no franchise to make laws for this country, and, with all deference, he does not know the people's side of this question. He knows the railway conditions, he knows how the track should be built, and how orders should be made as to railway operation; but he does not know how the farmers live in regard to these railway intersections. He does not know the conditions the farmers are up against. For this gentleman as an administrator—and I do not wish to be misunderstood nor do I wish to throw bouquets—I have every respect. But I have no respect for the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners saying that he knows what the conditions of our people are in these matters better than the Minister of Railways. The chairman of the board is very busy, and he would do well to stay busy administering the laws we put up to him to administer, and not—to use an ordinary expression—butt in and tell the minister that he knows the conditions better than the representatives of the people who have to live under the conditions, and who with all deference to the chairman of the board, know what are the practical evils to be remedied and the practical common sense way to meet them from both sides. I appeal to the minister; can he say the farmer's association is well advised in asking for the repeal of subsections 4 and 5? They were well satisfied with the way this Act was working except as to the conditions of which my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), is better able to speak than I, though I know something of them from him. The minister is right in repealing the section in regard to animals on the highway within half a mile of the crossing. But, while he gives the farmers five cents worth in this way, he is taking away $5,000 worth by the repeal of subsections 4 and 5. By doing this, as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie shows, he is taking away the chance of the farmer to recover for his animal killed in this way. Subsections 4 and 5 fix on the railway company the onus of proving negligence on the part of the owner. Cannot the minister see that these men were ill advised when they asked for a repeal of these subsections? They do not understand. They are like a child of eight or ten years who is asked if he would not like a dollar to buy candy and told all he has to do is to get his guardian to sign away the farm that will come to him when he is 21 years of age.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). In what case were they protected before in which they are now not protected?

Mr. LANCASTER. If subsection 4 is not repealed here is what we have:

When any horses, sheep, swine or other cattle at large, whether upon the highway or not, get upon the property of the company and are killed or injured by a train, the owner of any such animal so killed or injured shall, except in the cases otherwise provided for by the next following section, be entitled to recover the amount of such loss or injury against the company in any action in any court of jurisdiction,—

The cases provided for in the following sections are practically the same as are provided here.

—unless the company establishes that such animal got at large through the negligence or wilful act or omission of the owner or his agent, or of the custodian of such animal or his agent.

5. The fact that any such animal was not in charge of some competent person or persons shall not, if the animal was killed or injured upon the property of the company and not at the point of intersection with the highway, deprive the owner of his right to recover.

These put the onus of proof of negligence on the company. It was not a matter of guesswork. The farmer goes out in the morning and finds two of his cattle gone. He does not know how they got away any more than the railway company does. But if these animals are killed at the railway and unless the railway company can prove negligence, the owner can recover damages. The fact that the animal was not in charge of a competent person is not to be taken as proof of negligence. That is a necessary part of it.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Which exceptions let the company out of liability in such cases? I cannot understand how they would be relieved.

Mr. LANCASTER. Under the Act as now proposed?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Yes.

Mr. LANCASTER. It says:

The company shall be liable to the owner for the full value of all horses, sheep, swine or other cattle that may be injured upon the company's lands through the operations of the railway, save where such killing or injury was caused by reason of any person——

Then you enumerate all the cases that will happen, and make each of them an exception. I cannot see how a man can possibly recover on an animal killed on the track unless he can prove that the station master, or somebody else in the employ of the company deliberately admitted the animal to the property of the company.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is on either side of the railway at a farm crossing.

Mr. LANCASTER. The animal is not killed unless it gets upon the railway, and the party does not recover except in those cases. Now every one of those clauses provided for every possible case where that animal would get killed, unless it could be proved that an agent of the company deliberately led the horse or cow upon the railway.

Mr. GRAHAM. Supposing his cow was at large and strayed on the crossing?

Mr. LANCASTER. Then he cannot recover simply because he suffered it to go there. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the animal is killed because it goes down the highway to the point of intersection, and gets on the track and is killed on the railway property.

Except as authorized by this Act, without the consent of the company, riding, leading or driving any animal, or suffering it to enter upon any railway and within the fences and guards thereof.

Except that before, we had this deliberate statement that that alone should not disentitle a man to recover. That before was in the shape of a liability on the man. No one can doubt what the decision of the courts will be if you repeal subsections 4 and 5, which put the onus upon the company of proving that the man himself was negligent. Then they don't have to prove anything of the kind. I have no doubt that this Act has been drawn in the interest of the railways, although the minister does not think so.

Mr. GRAHAM. I cannot see any point where it is in their interest.

Mr. LANCASTER. None is so blind as those that won't see. I want to point out to him that in the sections that are a protection to the farmer in this regard, the onus is to be on the company to prove him negligent. Surely the minister knows that when these sections are repealed a different construction is to be put upon the sections that remain. I repeat they were adopted by the unanimous consent of this House, and they were sent up to the Senate, who objected to them. We had a conference, and the Senate had to give in. The farmers' associations were thinking of the fact that they were escaping the trouble of having to keep their animals half a mile from the railway crossing, and this section would mislead them into thinking so, because section 294 does say that. I do not see how this can be construed so that the man can be paid for his animals under ordinary circumstances. But I am certain that it won't apply to nine out of ten cases that it now applies to, because there always will be litigation to ascertain whether he led, or drove the animal, or suffered it to enter upon the railway or within the fences and guards thereof. Now let me suggest to the minister to repeal subsections 1 and 2 of section 294, and leave subsections 3, 4 and 5. If he does that he will be doing something for the farmers; if he does not, he will be handing them five cents with one hand and taking away from them five dollars with the other. It is the common law duty of a man to keep his animals at home. Now, unless we declare that the company shall be liable, and if we do not set up against a defence to such liability what is now being repealed, then at common law the man would be guilty of negligence for letting his animal get there, although he did not intend it. We are all sincere in desiring to protect the farmers' rights, and the intention of the minister is to increase the protection to the farmers. Therefore, it can be doing no harm simply to repeal subsections 1 and 2 of 294, and leave subsections 3, 4 and 5 to stand.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I have been endeavouring to ascertain whether the proposed amendments lessen the liability of the railway company for accidents, and it seems to me that if there is any difference it increases their liability. I think if we make a comparison of the law as it was in sections 294 and 295, with the proposed section, which consolidates the two, we will find that in the part which my hon. friend complains of, that is the part where animals are allowed to run at large, the proposed amendment increases the liability of the company instead of lessening it; in this respect, that under the Act as it exists at present, when animals are running at large and get upon the railway, prima facie the company is responsible. The burden is put upon the railway company to prove that the owner of the animal was guilty either of negligence or of some wilful act with respect to it. The meaning of the present section, I think, is that even if he is guilty of negligence the railway is liable.

Mr. LANCASTER. No, they are not liable if he suffers it to get there.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Yes. The only way the railway can escape is by proving that the owner wilfully turned the animal on the railway property. The first two paragraphs of the proposed section 11, (a) and (b), are practically the same as they were before. They refer to farm crossings, and do not refer to animals running at large. Therefore, these are the sections which refer to animals running at large:

The company shall be liable to the owner for the full value of all horses, sheep, swine or other cattle that may be killed or injured upon the company's lands through the operation of the railway.

They state there that they shall be liable for everything. What is the exception?

Save where such killing or injury is caused by reason of any person—

(d) turning any animal upon or within the enclosure of any railway company.

That is the only exception with regard to animals at large. They are liable for all animals save where a person turns an animal upon or within the enclosure of the railway company.

Mr. LANCASTER. You must read (e) with that.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). No, (e) does not refer to animals running at large.

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes, because he suffers it to get there.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). But that refers to wilfully leading, driving or suffering the animal to get on the property of the railway company. That is precisely the same as the old clause. The old section 295, paragraph (e) says:

> Except as authorized by this Act, without the consent of the company, riding, leading or driving any such horse, cattle or other animals, or suffering the same to enter upon any railway, and within the fences and guards thereof.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not think the hon. gentleman quite understands my argument. The old clause was a declaration that a man should not do a certain thing. Section 295 was the clause which declared the company's liability.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Quite so, in the case of animals running at large.

Mr. LANCASTER. Section 294 was a declaration of liability. Section 295 simply said that a man should not do certain things but that was not a declaration of the liability of the company.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Section 294 is dealing with animals running at large. Section 295 is not dealing with animals running at large, it is with the question of animals running at large that we are now concerned. Section 294 says that when any animals are killed or injured the owner shall be entitled to recover 'except in the cases otherwise provided.' This section simply says that they shall be liable for all animals unless it be shown that they are deliberately driven upon the railway.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is not the chief point of difference between the sections, that in the old Act there is an express provision that the company must establish negligence?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Yes, but here they are removing even negligence on the part of the other party.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. But it does not say that they must establish it.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It makes no difference whether there is negligence or not; the company is liable. It does not make any exception for negligence of the owner; it only specifies wilfully driving the animals on the property of the railway company.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Under the old Act, if I find my cattle killed in the enclosure of the railway company, the company will be liable unless they can establish my negligence. Is there anything in this Act which allows me to take a similar position? There is an express stipulation in the old Act which says that the company must establish negligence. True, this Bill says that the company are liable, but it does not say that they must establish negligence. The old Act declared their liability unless they proved that they were negligent. Under the present Bill there is no express stipulation which says that the company must prove negligence. In that respect I think the farmers have been gold-bricked.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Under the present Act the burden of proof is on the railway company to prove facts which disentitle the owner to relief—negligence or some wilful act. The present section does not, in express terms, say that the burden is upon the railway company to prove that the owner of the animal turned the animal upon the railway.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Or was guilty of negligence.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). There is no question of negligence under the present Bill, because the company is liable whether there is negligence or not.

Mr. LANCASTER. The question of contributory negligence is always open, and a court would say that ordinary contributory negligence disentitles the claimant to recover.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I do not know about that. Ordinarily, in a case of contributory negligence, you cannot recover, but if the Act says that you shall recover except in a certain instance, you must prove this instance. Whether or not the doctrine of contributory negligence is applicable, that stands upon its own footing, and we are not concerned with it one way or the other. I do not know that anybody will say that we ought to put a statute upon the statute-book saying that contributory negligence or the absence of contributory negligence must be proved by either side.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is what was done in 1903, and that has been the law up to now.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Not contributory negligence. What you are saying is that they are not liable unless the company prove negligence or some other act on the part of the owner.

Mr. LANCASTER. We have said that a certain thing would not disentitle a man to recover which would otherwise be contributory negligence. We have said that allowing any animal to run at large shall not disentitle him to recover. We did not say that that should be contributory negligence which should disentitle him.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Would the hon. gentleman have any objection to changing the proposed section so as to say that the following only shall be defences to an action under this section? Then we would know if we had our case proved, and it would lie upon the company to make a defence upon the grounds mentioned in the various subsections.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). As to turning the animal upon the property of the company.

Mr. LANCASTER. Suffering it to get there.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I do not know whether or not it should be amended, but I do not see much need of it for this reason. The only escape from liability is in case, there is evidence that the owner of the animal turns it upon the railway. I think it is going pretty far to say that the railway company must prove that the owner turned the animal upon the railway.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is the law to-day.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It goes further to-day. It is not a question of negligence. There might be negligence in the way you fasten a gate, or in a hundred other things. That ground of defence is taken away absolutely. The only way one railway company can escape under the proposed amendment is by showing that the owner actually turned the animal upon the railway.

Mr. LANCASTER. No; suffered it to get there.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That is a different thing entirely.

Mr. LANCASTER. It says so in paragraph (e).

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That is another clause. Under the present clause there is no burden upon the railway company as to suffering an animal to get upon the railway.

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). No. The present Act, section 294, subsections 4 and 5, only refer to animals running at large. Section 295, subsection (3) says that:

> Except as authorized by this Act, without the consent of the company, riding, leading or driving any such horse, cattle, or other animal, or suffering the same to enter upon any railway, and within the fences and guards thereof.

There is no burden of proof upon the railway with respect to that.

Mr. LANCASTER. But you must read subsection 5 of section 294 of the Act which you are repealing, and which says that the fact that such animal was not in charge of some competent person shall not, if the animal is killed, deprive the owner of the right of recovery. You are taking that away and you might as well read the two together, that is read the present law with that which you are proposing to-day. It is saying that there shall not be contributory negligence.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I cannot read anything in the present Act which casts any onus on them in respect to anything in section 295.

Mr. LANCASTER. It distinctly says so.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I do not think it is any great hardship. I think it will be going pretty far as the section is to say that before the railway company can succeed, they must prove that the owner of the animal killed, turned it on the highway.

Mr. LANCASTER. That has been the law since 1903.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). In the working out of it any lawyer of experience in these things will say that it amounts to nothing at all. Consider a man going to court——

Mr. LANCASTER. No, they do not go to court.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Whether a man has a genuine claim or not he knows if he turned the animal on the highway. It does not depend on a tramp opening the gate as at present, the only point is that it has to be proved it is there, the company is liable unless somebody shows the man turned it on the highway himself. Then is it any great hardship that a man should have to go there and prove what any honest man should be able to prove without difficulty, that he did not put it on the highway himself?

Mr. LANCASTER. We came to the conclusion that that was not a good argument, the man does not know how the animal got away.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). My hon. friend ignores what I said as to the difference between the present Act and the old Act. In the old Act it was not the act of the person himself that was the issue, it might be the act of other people, of any one opening the gate. There you very well said: 'We will not put the onus on the owner to prove that somebody did not open the gate, or did open the gate, we are going to put that onus on the railway, and say that unless the railway prove there was some negligence or something of that kind, they shall be liable.'

Mr. LANCASTER. Why change it now?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Because we are striking out the negligence entirely. There is only one thing that exempts the company, and that is if the owner actually turned the animal on the railway himself.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Why not strike out the words 'save where,' in the second line of paragraph 11 so that it would read:

Unless the railway company establish that such killing or injury is caused by reason of——

So as to put the onus on them of establishing the exception.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I know that opposition or even comment on this Bill is very likely to be interpreted as opposing the farmers' demands, and consequently a very serious step. Much as I respect the opinion of Mr. Bower and those associated with him, I do not see why we should abdicate our functions in their favour, nor yet in favour of the Chairman of the Railway Commission. We had a committee of the House last year dealing with a proposed amendment to the Railway Act, including an amendment to subsection 4 of 254 which is repealed by this Bill. That committee reported favourably on the amendment which was adopted by the Minister of Railways, and embodied in the law only a year ago. By virtue of that a large class of losses for which there had previously been no compensation, were included in the list of those losses for which a railway is liable. That is now all repealed. What is the explanation?

Mr. GRAHAM. I argued in favour of that clause in my discussions with representatives of the farmers of the west. I pointed out that clause as assisting them in their own protection. They were unanimous in telling me it did not meet the object at all. In one or two places I had very warm discussions with representatives of the farmers, and they told me that this did not meet the case.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The explanation is the same as formerly, that Mr. Bower did not want it.

Mr. GRAHAM. It was not Mr. Bower.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Nobody contended that the amendment of last session gave all that was desired. I introduced an amendment this session that went much further, but to say it meant nothing and did not cover cases not previously covered, is to talk nonsense. Under the old law in certain conditions a railway company was liable if it killed or injured horses or cattle. Under the same conditions of negligence it might do other damage besides killing or injuring horses or cattle by trains or engines, but in such cases the railway company was not liable. The courts held, on the theory of the history of the legislation, that the class of damage for which they were liable was confined to the killing of horses or cattle. There is a line of cases leading up to that where serious losses are suffered with no redress. This parliament got to work and remedied that. Now the whole remedy is to be thrown to the winds because a certain gentleman out in Alberta does not understand what it means. This same gentleman had submitted to him the amendment which I introduced this year and he could see nothing in it. I venture to say that any man on this side of the House could submit any amendment in the world to that man and he would see nothing in it. What has been the law in this regard? Up to the present time the law can be stated in very clear and very brief terms. If an animal is killed or injured on the right of way by a train or engine the owner recovers unless the company shows the animal got there by the negligence or wilful act of the owner. It is very true, as the minister says, that conditions are different in the east and in the west, and that the law as it stood remedied conditions in eastern Canada to a much greater extent than in western Canada, because in eastern Canada it would be almost impossible for the company to show that the animal got at large by the negligence or wilful act of the farmer. In western Canada animals run at large almost indiscriminately, in fact a great part of the industry of western Canada would have to collapse unless animals were so allowed to run at large, and as a consequence of their running at large in this way in almost 80 cases out of 100 the railway company were able to show at once that the animal was simply turned out, that it got out of a gate and was running at large on the commons. In four cases out of five the company got an admission from the man himself and they took the precaution generally of getting it by affidavit. When the killing of an animal was reported to them their usual course was to send an affidavit to the poor fellow whose animal was hurt and he filled it out and sent it in and then and there the whole case collapsed, because the animal got out in that way. A gentleman near Portage la Prairie had a band of horses, some one drifted in his gate, got a drink of water, and went away leaving the gate open. The band of horses got out. But it happened that the farmer knew that the gate was open; he was passing some corner of his farm and saw the gate open. We were compelled to advise that man that he had no case, although his animals were killed by getting on the track through the negligence of the company in not keeping their gates closed. Although the negligence of the company was tne clear cause of the loss, the farmer had no case.

Mr. GRAHAM. This is an improvement on that.

Mr. MEIGHEN. This is no improvement. Whereas before it was a matter of some difficulty to advise the farmer whether he had any cause of action or not, under this Bill he who runs may read and may tell him that he had no cause for action. It has been held that unless you expressly put the burden on the company to prove the exceptions, the burden is on the plaintiff, and he has to negative the exceptions. Previously he did not have to negative them. All he had to show was that the animals were not on the right of way, and the burden was on the company to show that he had let them loose. The state of the law before was not satisfactory, at any rate in western Canada, because the company should have been liable unless they could prove that they were not negligent. It is not hard to frame a statute to meet the case if we simply take the common law of the country, and apply it to the Railway Act; but the railway companies have taken good care that the common law is negatived almost throughout the Act, and it was never more clearly negatived than it is by the amendment now submitted. If we apply the principles of the common law, the result will be that the railway company will be liable for loss if the negligence or breach of the law by the company is the immediate cause of the loss, no matter whether there was a remote cause or not. Let the railway company show that there was no negligence on their part, and then they will escape. That is all that has to be done. I submitted to this House a Bill which unfortunately did not meet the approval of Mr. Bower, but which I did hope to submit to the approval of the House of Commons, which to my mind would have brought the railwav law into conformity with common law principles, and make the last party whose immediate negligence was the cause of the loss, the party to pay for that loss. The exceptional circumstances that attend the operation of railways, and the exceptional advantage a railway company has over private individuals, should make it responsible for disabusing itself of that negligence and should throw upon it the burden of showing that it was not negligent. That would not be hard to do. If the company provided the best possible guard, kept its fences up and its gates closed, it would not be negligent, and should not be held liable. The two principles of law pertaining to railway companies should be these. They should in every case be responsible, where under common law principles an individaul would be responsible; and, by virtue of the great advantage they have over the ordinary individual whose animals are injured, they should shoulder this additional responsibility, and have the burden where in the ordinary case the plaintiff has the burden. If we embody that in the Railway Act we clearly cover the ground. But to alter section 294, which has been the foundation of all the legal decisions which have made the law pretty clear, and substitute five new exceptions, making it not only impossible to recover, but almost impossible for counsel to advise the farmer whether he has a ground for action or not, is only to make it a case of scorpions instead of whips. I submit that these amendments should not pass at the present time. If it can be shown that they in any degree relieve the difficulty under which the farmers of the west suffer to-day, I will vote for them; but I can see no advantage in them except the striking out of clause which I support. From that on they are doomed not only to produce confusion, but to make it more difficult to advise the farmer whether he is shouldering a lawsuit or the hope of success, and at the same time to make it impossible in many cases that now exist to advise him clearly that he has any case at all.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Both sides are evidently agreed as to what the law should be. The difference is only one of interpretation. Surely both parties can get together and draft a clause which will carry out the meaning of what the House wishes.

Mr. COWAN. What change does the minister propose in subsection (b)?

Mr. GRAHAM. I was going to prefix these words: 'Other than an officer, contractor or employee of the company.'

Mr. LANCASTER. It should be 'other person than the owner.' You are putting the liability on the farmer for the acts of somebody else. Why not say the converse of what you have—unless it is the owner or an agent of the owner? Why should he take the risk of other people's acts? I think I made it quite distinct what the vice of this proposed legislation is. Under the present law, unless the owner or his agent or custodian is guilty of some negligence, he should not be debarred from the right to recover.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). If you look at the old section, you will find it provides: that no person whose animals are killed by any train shall have a right of action if they were killed by reason of any one, for whose use any farm crossing is furnished, failing to keep the gate on such railway crossing closed.

Mr. LANCASTER. The minister now suggests that this clause be modified so that the person shall be an officer or agent or the company. But an officer or agent of the company is not at all likely to let an animal through. The most likely person is the mischievous or careless one who does not own the animal and is not responsible —the tramp or meddler, or trespasser. Surely the owner should have the right to recover unless he himself or some one employed by him is to blame. Subsection 4 of section 294, which we are repealing, has this declaration:

> Unless the company establishes that such an animal got out through the negligence or wilful act or omission of the owner of the animal or his agent or custodian.

Why not put in these words? You are taking away the only protection the farmer has.

Mr. DOHERTY. I notice that in the old Act the clause that corresponds to section (a) has these words:

> The person for whose use any farm crossing is furnished failing to keep the gate closed.

The company is liable unless it shows that the accident was due to the person for whose use the farm crossing was furnished, failing to keep the gate closed. But under this amendment the company escapes having to prove that. What is the reason for the difference?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is the specific duty of some one to keep the gate closed. That is quite different from opening a gate. To my mind it is the duty of a farmer to see that the gate is closed because the gate is his. It would be very hard to prove who left the gate open, much harder than to prove who opened it. Everybody might leave a gate open who saw it open and did not close it. My own opinion is that the man responsible for keeping the gate shut is the farmer; and if it be left open, he should see that it is shut. But the next clause imposes a penalty on the company if any of its employees left the gate open. I am strongly of the opinion that this section, as now drafted, is a great improvement on the present statute. The people who have given it the most study and are most interested are of that opinion. Looking at the thing from a business standpoint the present law contains some paragraphs, to which my hon. friend referred, which are so obscure that they give rise to great difference of opinion as to what they really mean. At any rate the farmers in the west who have lost cattle have not been able to get paid for them, whatever the reason may be. In discussing this question with men of some legal ability, they take the ground that we ought to wipe out all this excrescence of language and show clearly that, no matter who may be in fault, the railway company shall pay for the cattle except under certain specified exceptions. This Bill is plainer than the present Act and it leaves less room for expensive lawsuits and gives greater facility to the farmers to get paid for their cattle. However, I do not want to detain the House. If my hon. friends opposite insist, we will drop the clause for the present and take it up when we meet again and let the rest of the Bill go through.

Mr. LANCASTER. I have no doubt that if we could have a private conversation—say a committee of three or four of us—I could convince the minister of things he does not yet see. There is the common law principle of contributory negligence which we must not forget. The present law provides that it shall not be contributory negligence if an animal loose on the highway gets on the railway track. But no matter how clear the liability, if you provide that if the person injured knew the danger at the time and could have avoided it, you practically nullify the provision. We have got round that hitherto by the section I have referred to. However, I am glad this is to stand. I presume it will not be proceeded with until after the holiday? And it will be struck out in the meantime?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. HERRON. I am not a lawyer, and I do not know what would be the effect of the clause proposed, but for my own part, personally, I would be prepared to accept any amendment accepted by this House, knowing that nothing could be worse than the present situation so far as our part of the country is concerned. I would accept this Bill on trial and be glad of it, for it can be no worse than what we now have. I am sorry it is to stand over, because farmers are sustaining losses every day by having their cattle killed or injured on the railways, and in no case have the railways paid damages for the last three or four years—and they do not make pretense of paying as the law is now; they completely ignore the claim of the farmer for the loss of his cattle.

Mr. EMMERSON. That is good for lawsuits.

Mr. HERRON. People will not attempt lawsuits, because they know they cannot win. I am very sorry the House cannot agree on something in regard to this Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY. I am free to say that, as I read this proposed section as it stands, it does seem to me to be a great improvement from the point of view of the farmer whose cattle are killed on the railway. Personally, I think there might be some verbal alteration that would make it clearer; but I would be sorry to be responsible for creating a situation in which the Bill would be passed and this left out, for I think leaving it out would be a distinct loss to the persons who wish to invoke the benefit of the law against the railway company in these matters.

Mr. NESBITT. I would suggest that the company follow the advice of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Herron) and let the section pass. This is not as the laws of the Medes and Persians; if it is not satisfactory we can amend it. I am not a lawyer, but I am a farmer; and from a farmer's standpoint I think this is much more satisfactory than the old clause.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is not the present law satisfactory in your part of the country?

Mr. NESBITT. No.

Mr. LANCASTER. What are the objections?

Mr. NESBITT. I would not like to take up the time of the House at this stage explaining to my hon. friend, but if he will take dinner with me I will tell him all about it.

Mr. LANCASTER. No, you can't do that with me.

Mr COWAN. I would suggest alterations that, I think, will bring the opposing views together. In subsection (a) I would insert the words that are in the present subsection (a), 'for whose use any farm crossing is furnished.' That would make it read that the company shall be liable save where killing or injury of cattle is caused by any person 'for whose use any farm crossing is furnished failing to keep the gates at each side of the railway closed, when not in use.' In subsection (e) I would insert the word 'wilfully' before the word 'suffering.' I am inclined to the view expressed by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Clarke) that this amendment limits the defence of the company to the subsections in section 11. Prior to that, the company would have the additional defence of negligence. But these subsections in section 11 are wider than those in the old Act. The words I suggest, if added, confine the failure to keep the gate closed to the man for whose use it is furnished, and under subsection (e) it would confine the suffering of the animals to enter upon the railway to wilfully suffering them so to enter. And if similar change were made in subsection (b) as in subsection (a) would not that meet the case and improve the law? In other words, I would insert before the word 'leaving' in subsection (b) the words 'for whose use any farm crossing is furnished,' making the other verbal alterations that this change would necessitate.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) understand that a man can recover damages for cattle killed on the track unless he himself, and not some stranger, left the gate open?

Mr. COWAN. In regard to subsection (a), yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN. That is not the law. If any person left the gate open the man could not recover. But the law should be changed in that respect.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Did the hon. gentleman say he could not recover if a tramp left the gate open?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke, Essex) say that if a tramp left the gate open and cattle got through the farm crossing gate—

Mr. GRAHAM. We are not speaking of the farm crossing gate.

Mr. COWAN. That is under subsection (b). I should think it strange if, with these words inserted in subsection (a) the railway company could succeed without proving that the owner for whose benefit the gate was furnished had failed to keep it closed. I think the extent of subsection (a) should be limited so that that failure should be confined to the owner for whose use the farm crossing was furnished.

Mr. GRAHAM. That was the wording, but it was held that as regards a farm crossing, a layman would not understand it to be the law.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The case that went to appeal held this point, that if that gate was opened by any human agency whatever, the farmer could not recover; but if the gate became opened by any other agency than a human agency, he could recover. Take subsection (f):

Leaving the gates of the company at railway stations open for the convenience of the public.

Now upon the prairie it is a common thing at country points for the gates to be left open. I have in my mind a case where the gates are left open by careless people, and animals are permitted to run from the roadway on to the track. The gate is opened in the first place by some person for the convenience of the public. But why should an individual who is no party to that Act, be deprived of his recourse if he is injured, simply because the station agent, for instance, is no longer obliged to see that the gate is kept open?

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to follow up what my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Herron) has said. Coming from a part of the country that is more interested in cattle raising than possibly any other, I want to say that what the hon. member for Macleod said is said by every person in that part of the country, namely, that they cannot recover under the present law. I do not think that is a creditable condition of affairs to this country. I think if, on the authority of the Chief of the Railway Commission, a section is drafted which, in his estimation, will cover the point, parliament should accept that drafting and have the law go into operation, so that cattle owners will have some effort at protection which at present, and under existing circumstances, they have not.

Mr. LANCASTER. The trouble is that most of us on this side of the House are not convinced that this gives the remedy the hon. gentleman wants. I have had a good deal of experience in connection with this question for twenty-five years, I have had a lot to do in making this law before the hon. gentleman from Oxford ever entered this House, and this House was unanimous in putting on the statute the clause we have now.

Mr. OLIVER. It does not matter what legislation we pass here, it must run the gauntlet of the courts, and even neither my hon. friend or any one else can say what interpretation will be placed upon any legislation by the courts.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does not the minister think that we should pass legislation here so clear and distinct that it will not have to go to the courts to be fought over? Then why leave it in this chaotic state that is now proposed?

Mr. GRAHAM. We will never get legislation that lawyers will not differ about, that would be ruinous to the profession. But I think we have discussed it pretty well. I do not want to force my views on the committee, and if the committee wish to drop this I will do it if the committee want to vote on it, let us vote on it and get on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The minister proposed an amendment to subsection (b) which has not yet been put, namely, that before the first word, 'leaving,' the following words be placed, 'other than an officer, contractor or employee of the company.'

Mr. COWAN. Instead of the words the chairman has read I would suggest 'for whose use any farm crossing is furnished.' It was because of the omission of those words in the old Act that the liability my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie mentions, arose. If these words were inserted the chief of our difficulties would disappear.

Mr. PORTER. Does the minister intend to alter the last word in the section as it is framed here? It reads now 'or injury is caused by reason of any person.' Is it intended to change those words 'any person,' or leave it in that way?

Mr. GRAHAM. In the reprinted amendment placed in my hands, the only change I was suggesting was the one read a moment ago by the chairman, prefixing certain words to subsection (b).

Mr. PORTER. When these words are left there it seems to reverse the whole state of affairs that has existed up to the present time. It not only repeals the clauses of the old Act which fixed the onus upon the railway company, but it declares that the onus shall be upon the other party. Let us take an illustration. Suppose a farmer finds his horse lying upon the railway track killed. He goes into the court to recover the loss sustained by him. He knows that he did not leave his gate open, and he knows that the horse has escaped by reason of the gate being opened. He has been guilty of no wrong and his servant or workman has not been guilty of any wrong. In connection with that one must recollect that this railway has been put upon his farm against his wish or will, and that it is something he could not possibly prevent. This dangerous thing which has killed his horse has been forced upon him. He should be surrounded by every possible protection, but if this section passes, what is the result? He finds his horse dead, and he sues the railway company to recover the damages which he has sustained. When he goes into court he is met by this section, and he must prove, first, that his horse was killed by the railway. He proves the value of his horse. He has to prove that his horse was not killed by reason of any person failing to keep the gate at his farm crossing closed. He has to prove that no person left the gate on either side of the railway open. He has to prove that no other person, other than an officer, contractor, or employee of the company took down any part of the fence. Then, he has to prove that nobody led, drove, or suffered the animal to be put upon the railway. He has to prove every one of these negative propositions, and it is utterly impossible for him to prove them. He can go into court, and put his agent, his boys, and his girls, into the witness box and prove that no one of them did any of these acts, but for him to prove that no other person did them is utterly impossible, and the result will be that unless he does prove any of these things he will be non-suited by the court. Under the old law that condition of affairs is reversed. If he finds his horse killed upon the railway track the onus is upon the railway company to prove that it got there through his negligence or through his wilful act. This entirely reverses the whole situation. This is most dangerous legislation. It is most unfair because this dangerous thing has been placed there against the man's wish, he had no way of preventing it, and yet you make him responsible for everything that happens. It would make it reasonably fair if the onus of proof were confined to the acts of the owner, and if, instead of the words, 'any person' it read 'or injury is caused by reason of the act of the owner, his agent, servant, or workman.' He could prove that, but when it is left open by the use of the words 'any person,' he cannot recover at all.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Would the amendment that I proposed about an hour ago meet the point raised by my hon. friend? I suggested that we strike out the words, 'save where,' and put in the words, 'unless the railway company establish that.'

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. PORTER. I would like if the minister would do me the favour of answering the question I put to him. Does he think it is fair to reverse the whole system of proof, and the right of recovery in the way I have pointed out, or does he say that it is not the case?

Mr. GRAHAM. My answer is that my advice is that it is not the case.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Porter), is referring to the clause of crossings and gates. Hon. members will probably remember that under the present law the railway company is not liable for the acts of third persons.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is in regard to gates and farm crossings.

Mr. PORTER. We are making that still stronger by legislating that it is a fact.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). No, I think we are making it the other way. I do not think my hon. friend has read section 295 which says that no person shall have any right to recover if his animals are killed by reason of any person, without any qualification, leaving open any gate. If any person at all wilfully leaves it open there is no relief.

Mr. PORTER. Is that fair?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I am speaking of the old law. You say we are going back.

Mr. MEIGHEN. It has been held that 'any person' does not include any officer or person connected with the railway corporation.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I would think so. So, by putting these words in you are only making the statute read in the way in which it has been accepted by the courts.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The minister stated that his advice was that it was not shifting the onus by this legislation. I can give him my own experience on that. I have argued as strenuously as I was able that under the present law we should not have to negative the exceptions, but I did not succeed in convincing the judge, and the judge held that we had to negative every exception that is in the Act. We will certainly have to under this law. The minister's advice, of course, may come from the distinguished authority in Alberta who told him that there was nothing in last year's amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend has no right to make that insinuation. I got my advice from as eminent a lawyer as is in the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I was not making any insinuation.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not quite sure that the gentleman from Alberta is not an eminently respectable man, but I did not get my advice from him.

Mr. LANCASTER. Let us get to the actual law we are making.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. LANCASTER. You will not get it through in that way. I did not labour for three or four years to get a law in the interest of the people to have it wantonly kicked out on the eve of adjournment, and in the dying days of the session. That sort of spirit will stop this Bill altogether

Mr. GRAHAM. That is not the spirit that was shown last night in withholding this Bill for the convenience of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LANCASTER. The minister made a reasonable proposition that we should drop this, and consider it during the recess, but certain gentlemen behind him who have very little regard for the legislation that they are passing, did not think his suggestion reasonable, and called out 'carried.' The statement of my hon. friend from West Hastings (Mr. Porter), is absolutely unanswered. He has put it better than I did. He has put it more concisely, and the Minister of Railways ought to be able to answer it. Why does he want to enact that because any person leaves a gate open by which an animal escapes, therefore, the man who loses the animal has no right to recover The minister says he is advised that he is not changing the present law.

Mr. GRAHAM. I did not say that.

Mr. LANCASTER. He says he is not changing it to the injury of the owner of the animal.

Mr. GRAHAM. I did not say so.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was once a lawyer myself. Would my hon. friend look at the old section 295 and compare it with the language of the new section, and tell me whether it does not change the onus of proof and place it on the company? Under the present law the wording is entirely different, and the onus is on the individual claiming damages.

Mr. LANCASTER. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, because it says 'no person whose horse, &c., shall have any right of action if the animal was killed or injured by reason of any person for whose use, &c.' The present section has been framed to throw the onus entirely on the company and it says the company shall be liable to the owner for the full value of the animal that may be killed or injured on the company's lines, except where such killing, &c. You have there a positive provision for the company being liable, and in order to bring the company within the exception, the company is obliged to prove that those exceptions exist. I think it is clear that the language shifts the onus of proof from the individual to the company.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman says he was a lawyer. When he was, did he read the whole contract and not a part of it only before giving an opinion.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I got tired of being a lawyer.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman takes good care to ignore what was so insisted on here and what cannot be answered, that sections 4 and 5 of the Act which is now being repealed did put the onus on the railway company, and that the section which he says formed a liability does nothing of the kind. Section 295 as it reads to-day is that no person shall do certain things. It is not a declaration of liability on the company, and the hon. gentleman should have taken care to read the section before undertaking to make the House think it was a declaration of liability. If the minister does not do what I have suggested he should at least accept the suggestion of the hon. member for West Hastings, and strike out the word 'person,' so that it would be unless such killing or injury is caused by reason of such owner or his agent or servant, &c. That would be reasonable.

Mr. COWAN. I understood the Minister of Public Works to deny that a person going into court to a statutory right has to prove the statutory exceptions to that right. I understood him to say he does not have to prove those statutory exceptions.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I said was that the section makes the company expressly liable save in certain excepted cases. I said that my view of the law was that the company would have to prove the exceptions, and I think that is manifest from this: suppose a plaintiff went into court and proved that his animal was killed on a railway track and there was no further evidence, the judge would in that case direct the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and if the company wished to prove there were exceptions, which took his right to recover out of that express provision of the statute, the onus would be on the company to prove that.

Mr. COWAN. The minister then recognizes that the right of the owner of the animal killed is a statutory right. If that be the case I say with all deference to the minister, who in times gone by was a lawyer, that it is elementary law that that man cannot come into court and assert a statutory right without proving and without having upon him the burden of proving that he comes within none of the statutory exceptions to that right. I cannot understand from what source the Minister of Public Works gathers his knowledge. I am not professing to have the most profound knowledge of all the principles of law, but I think I know whereof I speak when I say that no farmer who had a horse destroyed by a railway and who went into court under that provision would have a ghost of a chance of succeeding unless he alleged that he did not come within any of the exceptions and proved that he did not. It is an elementary principle of law that where a man has a common law right, he has to prove the facts that give him a right to recover; but in a case of a statutory right, he has to prove that he is within the four corners of the Act; and you will find it in all the reports in every case dealing with statutory right, that he must prove that he does not come within the statutory exceptions to that right. So that I can see no possible objection to the amendment suggested by the hon. member for North Grey. If it is really intended to put the burden of proof upon the company, that is the only way in which it can be done. You must expressly say in your statute that the burden of proof is upon the company and not upon the man who claims a statutory right under the Act.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I think we are all desirous of having the Bill go through. If we are all agreed that the onus should be on the company, there can be no harm in inserting the words which I suggest. I would, therefore, move that the words 'save where' in the 44th line be struck out, and there be inserted in lieu thereof the words 'unless the company establish that.' The section would then read:

The company shall be liable to the owner for the full value of all horses, sheep, swine or other cattle that may be killed or injured upon the company's lands through the operation of the railway unless the company establish that such killing or injury is caused by reason of any person——

Then follow the exceptions.

Mr. GRAHAM. This is an amendment that may mean a good deal more than I can see at the present time. As far as I am concerned, I would rather let the clause stand for consideration, because this may have a far-reaching effect.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I am proposing the insertion of these words because they are in the old Act.

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) has argued for two or three hours that the changes we have made in this Bill do not make the clauses applicable to the old Act—that what was a good clause in the old Act would not be a good clause now. The proposed amendment may be all right, but I would like some time to consider it and advise as to just what the effect of it is.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The hon. minister might submit the Bill to the Minister of Justice, and some one from that department should be here to explain its legal bearing. It is lamentable that no member of the government who is responsible for its legal construction is here. The Bill before being approved of by counsel should have been submitted to the Minister of Justice and have received his imprimatur.

Mr. GRAHAM. That was done, and the Department of Justice approved of the section as it is now before the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The amendment of the hon. member for Norh Grey cannot be now entertained, as there are two amendments already before the committee—that of the Minister of Railways and that of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan).

Mr. COWAN. I think the principle involved in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for North Grey is of more importance, perhaps, than the principle involved in the amendment proposed by myself. For that reason I would withdraw my amendment so as to get an opportunity of voting for the other.

Amendment (Mr. Cowan) withdrawn.

Mr. GRAHAM. If the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) urges his amendment strongly, I would prefer to let the clause stand. I was in hopes the committee would accept the Bill as it is.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Surely the amendment of the hon. member for North Grey simply carries out what the minister says is the intent of the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. It may, but my hon. friend urges that I should get the advice of the Minister of Justice. I have got as good advice as I could get in the country. The Bill has been approved by the Justice Department and the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I do not want to accept something that may alter the whole situation.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. There is every disposition on this side to have the Bill go through with reasonable amendments. We are losing one of the large benefits under the old Act. I would move to strike out the words 'save where' in the forty-fourth line, and substitute the words 'unless the company establish that.'

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is now on the amendment of the hon. the Minister of Railways.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I beg to move in amendment that the words 'save where' in the 44th line be struck out and the following inserted in their stead: 'Unless the company establish that.' This means that the company must establish the defences set out in these five subsections.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is a step in the right direction, but I am not prepared to say that it meets the whole difficulty. The minister made the suggestion a few minutes ago that this clause be dropped and we should pass the rest of the Bill. I think it would be well to carry out that suggestion.

Mr. GRAHAM. Rather than accept the amendment proposed, I will postpone the clause. If the hon. gentleman presses his amendment I shall have to vote against it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If the hon. minister says he will drop the clause and let us amend it when we meet again, I am willing to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. GRAHAM. I shall probably introduce again this section the first opportunity. If we had a week more to discuss this measure, I would feel like pressing it. as I fully believe it is a great improvement over the old Act on behalf of the farmers.

Mr. NANTEL. I beg leave to propose another amendment. Section 252 in the present Act provides as follows:

Every company shall make crossings for persons across whose lands the railway is carried, convenient and proper for the crossing of the railway for farm purposes.

Section 253 provides:

The board may, upon the application of any landowner, order the company to provide and construct a suitable farm crossing across the railway, wherever in any case the board deems it necessary for the proper enjoyment of his land on either side of the railway, and safe in the public interest.

Section 254 says:

The company shall erect and maintain upon the railway, fences, &c.

The amendment I propose is as follows:

In the exercise of his rights, as set forth in sections 252, 253 and 254, the claimant may apply concurrently either to the provincial courts having jurisdiction in the matter of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and sections 252, 253 and 254 are amended accordingly.

My reason for proposing this amendment is that the courts have construed section 253 as taking away the jurisdiction from the provincial courts in this matter. I think it is important to restore this jurisdiction. This section of the law, though it seems very clear and inoffensive, has given rise to a great deal of contention and controversy. Twelve judges, seven in the province of Quebec and five in the Supreme Court here, have given judgment on this question. Seven have decided on one side and five on the other side. And the result has been that the five were right against the seven. I consider that it is in the interest of the farmer not to be obliged, when he needs a farm crossing or when he needs a fence repaired, to be obliged to come to Ottawa and make his application to the Board of Railway Commissioners. I do not believe that, at the beginning, it was the intent of parliament to create in that board a tribunal to decide points in litigation. For these reasons, I move the amendment which I have read.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Board of Railway Commissioners was established to deal with these very matters. It is not stationary in the city of Ottawa, but traverses the entire country where business arises which demands its attention. It gives a quick and ready adjustment of these differences. Only to-day I read in the paper of a widow woman writing a letter to the board about a railway crossing. The railway was asked if the letter were true, and when it (the railway) said, 'yes,' judgment was given, and the question settled. It would disarrange the whole machinery for the control or management of these things if we were to refer them to every court in every province. I think it would be reactionary legislation and not in the public interest. I would certainly ask the committee not to accept it.

Mr. DOHERTY. I think there is something to be said——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. DOHERTY. If hon. members think it is not right of an hon. member to put forward his views on these matters, I am prepared to bow to the will of a brute majority. At the same time, I do not think it proper that endeavour shoud be made to prevent a member speaking in this House. I do not propose to deal with the subject at any length, and I think I can say that I usually express myself in a manner not to give offence. This involves the rights of the people, and I think hon. members should be willing to listen to a discussion—

Mr. TALBOT. I call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that it is six o'clock.

Mr. DOHERTY. I take it that hon. gentlemen prefer to hear me after dinner when, I think, I may assume, they will be in better humour.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DOHERTY. At six o'clock I was saying, in support of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel), that his proposition does not involve withdrawing jurisdiction from the Railway Commission. In all cases such as referred to by the minister, where the matter is very simple and can be disposed of by an application, which might be made by letter, the jurisdiction of the Railway Commissioners would remain perfectly untouched. In cases of that kind the parties would take their cases to the commission. But there is another class of cases, cases in which the right may be subject to serious dispute, and where it may be necessary for one side or the other to examine a number of witnesses. Now, I fail to see that any injury could be done if, in cases of that kind, it were made possible for the person seeking to enforce his rights, to address himself to the ordinary tribunal. It is true that the Railway Commission moves around from place to place, but I hardly think it would be desirable that the Railway Commission should transport itself to the remotest limits of the county of Terrebonne, or the county of Gaspé or any back county, for the purpose of hearing a contested claim for a railway crossing. Yet if that were not done, you would put perhaps a large number of people, and in many cases poor people, to heavy expense as well as trouble and inconvenience, by having to go into some large centre where the commission is sitting, to be heard upon the matter. After all, the right involved is a purely civil right, given, if you will, by a statute of this Dominion; and it is a reasonable proposition that the right should be allowed to stand, as it was certainly understood to be up to the time of the judgment of the Supreme Court, to which my hon. friend from Terrebonne referred; that is to say, in a condition where, though the Railway Commission would continue to have jurisdiction, a jurisdiction which might be very advantageously exercised in certain cases, there would still remain a jurisdiction in the ordinary tribunal of the province to deal with the matter. It is doubtful whether the statute meant to take away that jurisdiction from the ordinary civil tribunals, because the courts themselves were, as my hon. friend pointed out, divided upon the question. I can see no injury that would result, either to the railway companies or to the parties interested, from leaving it open to the complainant to address himself to the Superior Court. There are cases where justice is more satisfactorily obtained before an ordinary tribunal than before the Railway Commission. The amendment would leave the very beneficent jurisdiction of the Railway Commission still in existence, and liable to be exercised in cases to which it is appropriate.

Mr. GRAHAM. The decisions of the Railway Board in regard to these crossings have been eminently satisfactory. The commission has all the machinery for hearing evidence, and further, they have a full engineering staff at their disposal. In a dispute as to the practicability of a crossing they despatch an engineer, no matter where it is, to make an examination on the ground and report. It seems to me the proposition before the committee is rather calculated to favour litigation. It looks to me as if it would be a breeding ground for litigation rather than a quick and speedy way of settling disputes.

Amendment (Mr. Nantel) negatived.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—TRADE RELATIONS WITH JAPAN.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into committee of Ways and Means to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907, and to provide as follows:

1. The Governor in Council may, by order in council, extend to Japan for a period not exceeding two years from the 17th day of July, 1911, the benefit of the tariff advantages at present enjoyed by that country on its exports to Canada, as expressed by and contained in article 5 of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great Britain and Japan, signed at London, July 16, 1894, which treaty was made applicable to Canada by the Convention between the United Kingdom and Japan respecting commercial relations between Canada and Japan, signed at Tokio on January 31, 1906; Provided, however, that such advantages shall only be extended to Japan when and so long as the Governor in Council is satisfied that Canada will receive and is receiving during such period the reciprocal tariff advantages at present enjoyed by Canada on its exports to Japan under the provisions of the said article 5 and the said Convention.

Mr. MARTIN BURRELL (Yale-Cariboo). Mr. Speaker, before going into committee on this resolution, as there has been a good deal of discussion on the general trade question, I would like to deal somewhat fully, yet as hurriedly as I can, on some aspects of our trade with Japan. As the House knows there have been a great many expectations raised in the past as to the great value of oriental trade. I do not want to give too many quotations, but I want to remind the House of one or two statements which have been made by public men upon this question. The right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in 1907, speaking in the House of Commons made this statement:

> We have a growing trade with Japan, a trade which must be improved, and which will assume in years to come, and in the very near future, very large proportions.

On December 16, 1907, the Prime Minister, speaking to a delegation from the Trades and Labour Council, said:

> The treaty has proved of great advantage, and our trade with Japan under it has considerably increased.

There have been many other statements made by supporters of the present government along similar lines. I find that the Prime Minister, speaking before the Manufacturers' Association in 1907 spoke in a similar strain upon this subject. Amongst others I have an extract here from a speech by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith) delivered in this House, on December 6, 1907. That hon. gentleman said:

> I say that if the full development of British Columbia is to take place, we must have a share of oriental trade. The prosperity of that country, the development of its trade, require a market in the orient * * * * Now, Sir, the trade with Japan, in my opinion, is tremendously important.

Then, again on January 28, 1908, the same hon. gentleman said:

> The commercial future of the Pacific coast depends very largely upon the extension of Canadian commercial markets in the Orient.

And he added:

> We want the chief productions of Japan, articles that are desirable for our consumption, when those productions do not come into competition with our own productions.

A sentiment which I wish he had given utterance to in connection with the recent reciprocity negotiations. Then, we have the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) making a speech upon this subject in which he dealt with the hopeful outlook from his point of view with regard to certain classes of manufactured goods. In Hansard of 1905, page 7192, he is reported to have said:

> There are the following manufactured goods in which Canada might reasonably expect to enter into trade with Japan: cotton goods, woollen goods, paper, enamelled kitchen goods, rubber goods, wire of all kinds, hats and caps.

I think it might be of interest to the House to have on record exactly what the state of Japanese trade with Canada has been during the past few years. I propose dealing, not with the year 1907, because that was a nine months' period and that was the first year in which the treaty was in effect. But, for purposes of comparison I propose to take three years prior to that beginning with 1904 and coming down to 1910. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will permit me, I would very much like not to weary the House with all these figures, but to put them on 'Hansard' assuring him they have been compiled by the statistician of the Customs Department at the commissioner's request.

Mr. FIELDING. I have no objection.

Mr. BURRELL. I will deal first with imports and the statement is as follows:

It will be noticed that our imports from Japan have steadily kept at about the rate of three to one, that being the balance against us in our trade with that country. While I am quoting these figures, if the minister has no objection, I would like to give very briefly the figures of our trade for the corresponding years with Australia, New Zealand and South Africa which should be an interesting record, this statement having also been prepared by the statistician of the Customs Department. This statement is as follows:

I would like to give just a brief analysis of these figures as bearing on the general theory of the trade question with the Orient and especially with Japan. I may say frankly that possibly the greatest benefit we have derived in Canada in so far as any preferential treatment or any benefit which we have enjoyed under our trade arrangement with the Orient has been with regard to the article of lead. We have preferential treatment on lead which amounts practically to 79 cents a ton. That is one of the larger items, the export of which amounted last year to $182,836. With the exception of lead, however, we practically find no encouragement at all. We can point to two items, pickled salmon and pickled herrings, which are the only items totalling over $100,000 and we do not enjoy the benefits of the conventional tariff with Japan on these items. Japan's tariff, as the House probably knows, while not very protective as it exists at present, is now being placed upon a more protective basis by the new arrangement which will become operative on July 17. With regard to these two special items affecting the trade of British Columbia, there is no material advantage as far as Canada is concerned for the simple reason that practically all of that particular industry is in the hands of the Japanese who are resident in British Columbia. They practically carry on the whole of that business, it enures only to their advantage, and they ship these goods to their own people.

Then, I take up the next item with regard to which a great many hopes were raised in the minds of people, not only in the east, but especially in the west. I refer to the question of lumber. We find that in the three years subsequent to the treaty we have actually exported less lumber than we exported in the three years prior to the treaty, showing that, in so far as the benefits that are derived from the treaty go, we have not received any great amount of advantage. The encouragement of trade with Australia and South Africa would be far more valuable in the development of our western lumber trade. There are a good many reasons which we never expect any very great advances in the development of our timber trade with Japan. There is the protective tariff that exists in some lines by reason of which we cannot hope to derive much advantage, and there is also, what the House may not know, that sixty per cent of the total area of Japan is covered with a carefully preserved forest. All of these 58,000,000 acres are directly under government supervision. So large is this industry in Japan itself that the dues to the government for cutting timber amounted in 1907 to no less than 12,000,000 yen, that is $6,000,000. In 1908, Japan exported $4,500,000 worth of various timber products and imported only $700,000 worth, so that, on the whole, I do not think there is any very great expectation of a big trade being built up along those lines.

I might deal somewhat hurriedly with other productions on which large hopes of Oriental trade were based in this country. One has first to observe that nearly all the agricultural products of Canada are protected in Japan, and in the new Japanese tariff there is a tendency to a higher rate of protection on practically all the various agricultural lines; in very few of them, with the exception of condensed milk which has a conventional tariff that gives us a slight advantage, have we any preference in the markets of Japan; she does not place any of these things on the conventional tariff. Take cheese and butter, hams and bacon, vegetables and fruits, not only do we get no preference in the markets of Japan, but in every one of these articles the tariff which goes into operation on July 17 is actually higher than the tariff that has been in existence in the last few years.

I come now more particularly to the wheat question, because great expectations were based on the development of the trade in wheat, and flour from Canada to the Orient. We have heard a great many extravagant statements from all sources as to the enormous trade and the enormous advantage to Canada to be reaped from the development of our wheat and flour trade with Japan. I need only say that our expectations have not been realized. Our actual exports have been insignificant. In 1904, we shipped $602 worth of wheat to Japan, and we have not shipped any in any other year except 1907 when we shipped $1,525 worth. We are told that Japan is a very large consuming country with a population of 52,000,000 in an area not much greater than the riding I have the honour to represent. Being such a congested population we have been led to suppose by some of our free trade friends that naturally they would welcome free all the products that went to supply food to their people. Curiously enough, under the present tariff we have to pay a duty of 57 sen a hundred kin. A sen is half a cent, which makes 28½ cents on 132 pounds or 12½ cents a bushel. I am advised that under their new tariff they have actually raised that tariff, not very much, but from 5 sen to 60 sen per 132 pounds, nor do we get the preference. The average production of wheat in Japan, for Japan is a wheat growing country, to some extent, as reckoned by Mr. Crowe, the Commercial Attaché of Great Britain in Japan, for the seven years ending in 1908, is placed at 19,500,000 bushels and as Japan is very largely a rice eating population it is not at all likely that over and above their own supply they will ever very largely increase their imports. Another element is that they are developing their wheat raising areas in their northern country, in the Hokkaido district and in the future there will be a tremendous development of one of the biggest wheat growing areas in the world, in Manchuria.

The greatest hopes of trade were built on flour. In the three years subsequent to the passage of the treaty ratified by this parliament in 1907, we actually exported less flour to Japan than we did in the three years before the ratification of that treaty. Flour is again a protected item in Japan. Under the present tariff there is a considerable duty, and we get no preference under the conventional tariff now or under the new arrangement. The present tariff on flour is 1 yen, 45 sen per 100 kin, or 72½ cents per 132 pounds. In the new tariff they propose to raise that to 1 yen, 65 sen per 100 kin or 82½ cents per 132 pounds, which is rather a heavy protection on flour. As a matter of fact, from 1898 to 1908 the figures as they apply to the importation of flour into Japan are the reverse of encouraging. The imports rose to the very highest point in 1903 when there was an importation into Japan of 5,162,000 worth of flour. Since that, it has steadily sunk, and in 1908, the last year of which I have the record, it had sunk to $1,414,000. In reference to this special question of flour I would like to refer you to the experience, and to the very emphatic declarations of a man who, perhaps, has more authority to speak on this subject than any other man in America, Mr. J. J. Hill. Mr. Hill, who is a man of very large vision, a man who is reaching out to develop not only the trade of his railways, but in a large way to develop the trade of the whole country, some years ago conceived the idea that the Asiatic trade in general would be of immensely greater value to the United States if it was properly looked after, and for this purpose he built two of the largest ships ever put on the Pacific, the 'Minnesota' and the 'Dakota,' of 28,000 tons each, to handle the traffic which he confidently expected to develop from the great central and western states when he had assisted in building up the trade with Japan. The whole story of that development is almost a romance, a romance that had rather an unfortunate ending in some ways. Mr. Hill, when he first started on the development of this trade, especially of the flour trade, made this remark. He realized that:

> The country had to give to the Japanese and Chinese, wheat flour so cheap that they would use it instead of rice. Profits would have to be cut to the bone.

I do not want to go into the story of Mr. Hill's failure; it was partly owing, as a good many of us know, to the interference of the Interstate Commerce Board on the long haul rate which made it impossible for him to lay the goods down in Japan where he would meet the world's competition at a price which would meet the prices of countries producing even more cheaply than the United States. Mr. Hill remarked that whereas by 1904 the export of flour from the United States to Asia had increased very much, yet in 1908 it had sunk down to very much smaller figures. Another vital factor which Mr. Hill pointed out, which has to be borne carefully in mind, and which is no doubt appreciated by the government in regard to this Oriental trade, is the extraordinary difficulties and differences in the money exchanges of the two countries. Writing in 1910 Mr. Hill said this:

> For the present we can sell some flour in China and Japan, until the Manchuria uplands shall be turned into wheat fileds. Then China can grow wheat at a cost of seventy cents a bushel in silver, which is about equal to thirty cents in gold in this country.

I do not know that I need say any more about the flour and wheat question. I would like now to refer briefly to a larger phase of trade namely, that relating to manufacturing industries. I have already referred to the statement of the Minister of Agriculture about the hope he had of our building up a trade in manufactured cotton goods, hats, caps, and articles of that kind. I might point out that even with the British preference lowering the general rate of our duties on these things, we still have on these articles for the benefit of the Canadian manufacturer, a duty of from 22½ to 25 per cent against the British manufacturer. How we can expect to compete in these articles with the British manufacturer in the open markets of Japan on an even footing is a conundrum which I leave the Minister of Agriculture to answer; I confess I am not able to answer it. As a matter of fact, our trade with Japan in these lines, especially in cotton manufactures, is practically a negligiable quantity. Our exports of cotton fabrics to Japan were never heavy; they are diminishing, and last year they reached a figure of only $9,804; and I think we may fairly expect that they will go to the vanishing point in the near future. I may add that in 1908 Japan exported in cotton yarns and cotton fabrics over $21,000,000 worth. She has steadily increased her importations of raw cotton, and has developed her factory system in a marvellous way. The Japanese Year Book of 1910, in which hon. members will find a lot of valuable information in regard to Japanese development along industrial lines, states that the textile industry alone employs 354,000 employees, and that a few years ago the wages of these employees averaged 16 cents for men, 11½ cents for women, and 6 cents for children, large numbers of women and children being employed. It is quite true, there has been a rise of wages in recent years, but not after all a very heavy one. In the report, Mr. Crowe, from which I have already quoted, showing the rise of wages between 1902 and 1908, placing the wages of 1902 at 100, and by 1908 they had risen to only 134·76, which is not a very heavy increase; nor, with Japan's conditions of population, is there likely to be a very rapid advance, at any rate such an advance, as will bring them within measureable distance of what we have to pay on this continent. An analysis of present industrial conditions, especially in regard to manufactures, is not only discouraging, but absolutely alarming to the future trade of this country, for two reasons; and here again I will refer to a remark of the Minister of Agriculture, which will be found at page 888 of 'Hansard,' December 18, 1907:

The advantages secured in regard to Japan are of the utmost importance to our manufacturing industries.

I must confess that I cannot agree with that, and anybody who has given any close study to this subject will hardly agree with this opinion of the Minister of Agriculture. It is a subject profoundly interesting, but a detailed examination of the matter at this time would only weary the House. I will, however, quote again Mr. J. J. Hill, who has given a more comprehensive, and close study of commercial conditions in the far east than any other living man. He says:

Japan has organized her industry with the same scientific attention to details that she gave to her military operations. She has her own shipyards in which her ocean carriers are built. She has her own factories, in which almost every manufactured commodity obtained heretofore from Europe or the United States is made by her own artisans, working for wages that would not be accepted here. She is preparing and hoping to dominate the Oriental markets, and to invade those of the rest of the world. . . The markets of Europe, our own markets, may, not long hence, be full of goods made in the Orient, for sale at prices so low that no tariff endurable by our own people would keep them out. . . The country needs to rid itself of the illusion that its Oriental trade is to be one of the big elements of its future prosperity.

To show the actual results of the industrial development of Japan, I might quote from a report prepared by the Foreign Trade Association of Japan, which says that the total volume of exports during the ten months ending last October amounted to 373,452,000 yen, the value of the yen being equal to 50 cents, the figures being an increase of 43,999,000 yen over the figures for the corresponding period of last year. The most conspicuous items of the increase were manufactured articles and manufactured raw materials, which showed a conspicuous increase of 15,429,000, and 22,595,000 yen respectively. That is enough to show, without going more fully into the subject, that any hope that we have built on a market in Japan for our manufactures along almost any line, is entirely illusory. It has been a favourite theory of some people that not only will this trade be valuable to our manufacturers and our producers generally, but that it will cause an immense development of the Canadian merchant marine on the Pacific. My own opinion, based on the researches of a great many people who have given this matter a lot of study, is that the markets of both the United States and Canada will in the future be far more valuable to Japan than Japan's market will be to us. But with regard to shipping, the Prime Minister especially has been seized with the idea that it is going to be a great thing for Canada, and in Vancouver last fall, on his western trip, he made these remarks:

VANCOUVER'S TRADE AND HARBOUR.

Now with these Japanese and Chinese we can only trade in what we produce. We can do there what has been done in our own country. We can exchange our flour for their tea; and, therefore, my fellow-citizens of Vancouver, there is a future in this Oriental trade. This city must trade with the Orient as well as with the Occident. And if I have the happiness again—as I know I have the certainty in my purpose—when I come again to Vancouver—as I hope to come again soon—because if I don't come soon I will not come at all—and, therefore, when I come soon, I hope now, and feel sure that I will see this noble harbour, second to none in the world, full of steamers plying between China, Japan, India and Canada. This is the hope that I have cherished, and I believe it is a hope that will be realized.

The Prime Minister has referred on other occasions to this Pacific Ocean trade, and has expressed extremely rosy, optimistic, and I think wholly illusory sentiments in regard to our share of that sea-borne traffic. To those who have noted the various phases of Japan's commercial development in the last twenty years, nothing is so significant, I might almost say portentous, as the extraordinary expansion of her merchant marine. In 1884 there was not a single Japanese vessel navigating any but Japanese waters. In 1890 Japan had 1,450 seagoing vessels with a tonnage of 145,000. In 1900 she had 4,500 vessels with a tonnage of 600,000; and in 1908, 5,654 vessels with 1,543,000 tons. One noticeable feature of this growth is the conversion of sailing vessels to steamers, and while it was thought at one time by many of our shipping people that the Japanese would never make expert sailors, so far as their officers are concerned, the facts show the contrary, because Japanese officers are practically handling the whole of this fleet. The Japanese marine will always be more cheaply paid than can possibly be the case in the United States or Canada, for the reason that Japan has a larger population to draw on, three millions of her people being engaged in the fishing industry at of course much smaller wages than we pay our fishermen. This Japanese marine has been developed for national purposes, along scientific lines, with systematic organization and precision, and has also been aided by very considerable bounties. Under her navigation and ship building encouragement laws, Japan has spent enormous sums of money. As far as I can figure it out, this year she is paying something like $4,000,000 on subsidies for ship construction and to various shipping companies.

I might give one more reference to show the ship development there has been quite recently in that country. Another very large steamship company has been organized in Japan under the name of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha Company. That company has been organized in order to be ready for the opening of the Panama canal which, it is expected, will be finished in 1915, and thus be in a position to capture a large share of the trade through that canal. A gentleman, who is largely responsible for the organization of that company, made these remarks concerning its plans:

> An idea of the extent to which the trade of Japanese shipping companies has grown is given in the address made by R. Kondo, president of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, at the banquet held on December 15 at Tokio to commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the company. He said that the N. Y. K. which started this trans-Pacific line in 1900 has reached the sixth place in order of the world's shipping companies. It has now a fleet which aggregates 280,000 tons and includes six vessels of 8,600 tons each. From the point of view of a commercial carrying agent it is noteworthy that whereas the foreign trade of Japan in 1895, the year before the company opened its first regular ocean-going lines, aggregated $129,000,000, and the share carried by Japanese steamers amounted to only 3 per cent—the foreign trade in 1909 totalled some $403,000,000, no less than 45 per cent of which was carried by Japanese steamers.

These figures indicate fairly the general trade situation, as it exists between us and Japan and is likely to exist in the future. In apologizing to the House for dealing with this trade question at such length, I venture to think there is some justification for my doing so because in the earlier days I find, throughout the various negotiations such as these which the minister proposes to bring down, it was generally assumed that the commercial advantages would be so great as to justify concessions in more important directions. But the fundamental fact, the vital feature of the whole oriental question, from the point of view of any man who has made a study of it, especially from the western point of view, is the oriental immigration and the danger of such an immigration in large quantities to the vast unfilled spaces of our great west, notably British Columbia.

With regard to the resolution before the House, with regard to the arrangement to give us favoured-nation treatment in the markets of Japan, I do not want to be understood as opposing any arrangement that will put us on an equally favourable footing in the Japanese market as the United States; but I think I have shown that the conditions are such that the hopes of any great commercial prosperity arising from a treaty with Japan, are wholly illusory. Therefore, the paramount, almost the sole reasons, which should guide us in any trade arrangement with Japan are those which concern the question of immigration, which is really the strictly national and vital feature of the whole thing. I understand from the return that the government proposes to enter into direct treaty arrangement with Japan. While it is true that the British treaty, as is stated in the correspondence brought down, may not be altogether adapted to the commercial situation in Canada, it might be well to point out that in adhering to any treaty with Great Britain, we would have all the weight and authority of the empire at our back. Whereas in making a treaty direct we would be without that tremendous prestige, that great reserve power which is expressed in that simple phrase 'British power.'

The United States treaty with Japan, which has recently been ratified, has two very important safeguards, certainly more real and essential than the shadowy one we have had in past treaties. Our treaty, I understand, will expire on July 17, next, and we then resume that control which is the inalienable right of every nation—the control over immigration. I do not know that I can do better than quote in justification of that absolute control, the citation read by the Minister of Public Works, publicly the other night from Chief Justice Marshall. Speaking of the principles of international law underlying all these questions, he said:

> The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restrictions. All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source.

I can only say in closing that if this arrangement were to diminish at all that control which we should have at the expiration of the treaty, it will be the right time for us to again reassert the supreme necessity of our having that control within our own territory. And if that question does develop in the course of the discussion in committee, I shall hope to have an opportunity of touching upon it as well.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee on the resolution.

Mr. FIELDING: The relations between Japan and Canada have been governed for some years by a treaty which will expire on the 17th of July next. The foundation of that arrangement is to be seen in a treaty made between Great Britain and Japan on the 16th of July, 1894. The treaty did not immediately apply to Canada. It contained a proviso that the self-governing Dominions, as we usually described the larger colonies, should be excepted from the operation of the treaty, but that they might be brought within its operation by special arrangement. Canada, therefore, had the opportunity to adhere to that treaty but did not at the time, or for some years, avail herself of that opportunity. I do not think we suffered any serious disadvantage from non-adherence to the treaty in any respect save one. We did find some embarrassment as affects customs tariffs. We found that other countries were having advantages in Japan which Canada did not enjoy, and naturally that was regarded with anxiety by parties in lines of trade in which it was hoped for an extension of business with Japan. For that reason largely, I think, it was determined to open negotiations, and, in 1906, a supplementary treaty was made under which the British treaty to which I have already referred was applied to Canada. From that day until the present time we have been under the operation of that treaty.

Treaties of that character are very broad and comprehensive and elaborate in their terms. To the ordinary layman who reads them it would probably seem that there is much repetition in them. But there is no doubt that all that is in them is put there for a good purpose. As we read the treaty it deals with travel and residence; protection of person and property; free and easy access to the courts; right to employ counsel; conditions with regard to freedom of worship; exemption from compulsory military or naval service; reciprocal freedom of navigation in a general way; protection of dwellings, factories, &c. Article 5, of which I make special mention because it is the subject of our present measure, provided that no higher or other duties could be imposed on the products of Japan on the one side or of Canada on the other, than are imposed upon like products of most favoured nations. Article 6 deals with equality of duties as to exports. Proceeding with the various articles we find in various matters of trade and commerce equality of treatment is stipulated. British vessels and Japanese vessels were to have equal treatment in various shipping matters; equal privileges in unloading; coasting trade excepted; equal privileges of vessels in distress; privileges of consuls to the respective countries; equality in all matters of commerce and navigation; protection of trade marks or patents; conditions with respect to foreign settlement in Japan; and certain other things, all no doubt necessary in a treaty of this character, but most of them things which a country like Canada would grant to any other country without any treaty stipulations. While it might be well that we should have undoubtedly the right to protect ourselves in all these things, yet, as a matter of fact, in all these things Canada would be disposed to grant to any country equality of treatment. But we found, as I have stated, that in the absence of any commercial arrangement we were at a disadvantage owing to the lack of a treaty, and for that reason largely steps were taken in 1906 to bring Canada within the operation of the British treaty of 1894. That treaty has been in operation, as I have said, until this time. Japan, not long ago, determined to put an end to her commercial treaties and leave herself free to make a fresh start. In consequence of this general policy, notice was given to the British government that the British treaty would fall on the 17th of July next, and with it would also fall the special treaty relating to Canada. So, on that date, as matters stand, we shall cease to have any treaty obligation with Japan. The British government have recently made a new treaty with Japan, not very materially differing from the old treaty. As usual, we have the opportunity to adhere to that treaty. But we thought it best that we should not do so. Recently, the Japanese authorities, through their Consul General at Ottawa, approached us, and rather urged that we should adhere to the British treaty as the best way of continuing friendly relations with Japan. But, upon close examination of the British treaty we thought it not particularly adapted to Canada, and, on the whole, prefer to have further time for consideration. And so it has been suggested that we should make a temporary arrangement on the only point which seems of immediate importance, and that is in relation to the customs tariffs of the two countries. It is true, as the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) has pointed out, the trade with Japan is not so extensive as we could desire. Our exports have not been increasing in the way we at one time hoped. But we all agree that, though the trade is not all that we could desire we do not want to diminish it or to find ourselves at a commercial disadvantage in Japan, compared with other countries. We have suggested to the Japanese authorities, leaving all the other matters in the old treaty to be dealt with by the mutual goodwill of the two countries, that we should make a temporary arrangement with them confined entirely to the various matters in article 5 of the old treaty. Let me read article 5 to show exactly what we are now proposing to do:

No other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty of any articles, the produce or manufacture of the dominions and possessions of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, from whatever place arriving; and no other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the dominions and possessions of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan of any article, the produce or manufacture of the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty, from whatever place arriving, than on the like article produced or manufactured in any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be maintained or imposed on the importation of any article, the produce or manufacture of the dominions and possessions of either of the high contracting parties, into the dominions and possessions of the other, from whatever place arriving, which shall not equally extend to the importation of the like article, being the produce or manufacture of any other country. The last provision is not applicable to the sanitary and other prohibitions occasioned by the necessity of protecting the safety of persons, or of cattle, or of plants useful to agriculture.

We have proposed, therefore, that we shall extend to Japan for a period not greater than two years the provisions in effect of that article; that is to say, while we should have no special rates of customs duties between the two countries, each guarantees to the other that it will grant what is called 'most favoured nation treatment,' that is: We shall grant to Japan no less favourable treatment than we grant to any other foreign country. Of course, the term 'foreign country' is used for a purpose, because it does not interfere with our liberty to make any arrangement that we deem proper within the British Empire. But if we adopt this arrangement, for a period not exceeding two years, practically the same conditions we now grant to other foreign countries we will grant to Japan. We have received information from the Japanese authorities that regarding this as a temporary arrangement, they will be content to meet the suggestions we have offered. Some correspondence has been brought down, only one or two letters of which I think have any immediate bearing on the proposed arrangement; and with your permission I will read these, because they will give in brief space the nature of the arrangement we propose to make. This letter is dated the 10th of May, and is addressed by myself to the Consul General for Japan residing in Ottawa:

Ottawa, May 10, 1911.

Sir,—Referring to our several interviews and to the note verbale of the 24th April last, communicated to me by you this day in an amended form, I have to observe that the terms and conditions of the treaty of the 3rd April, 1911, between Great Britain and Japan do not seem to be in their entirety adapted to the circumstances of Canada, and, therefore, we have some hesitation in advising that immediate adherence to it on the part of Canada which your government desires.

Article 8 of the treaty of the 3rd April provides that:

'The articles, the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom, enumerated in Part I of the Schedule annexed to this treaty, shall not, on importation into Japan, be subjected to higher customs duties than those specified in the Schedule.

'The articles, the produce or manufacture of Japan, enumerated in Part II of the Schedule annexed to this treaty, shall be free of duty on importation into the United Kingdom.'

There might be a question whether in the event of Canada giving adherence to the treaty, the schedule referred to in article 8 would thereupon become applicable to Canada. Granting, however, that it would so apply, an examination of its details shows that while no doubt well adapted to the conditions of the trade between Great Britain and Japan, the schedule is not wholly suitable to the commercial interchanges between Japan and Canada. Part I of the Schedule, for example, which contains a list of British products upon which maximum duties are fixed does not include many products in the export of which Canada is largely interested; and on the other hand, Part II of the Schedule, containing a list of Japanese products to which Great Britain agrees to give admission free of duty, includes silks and other articles which are dutiable on importation into Canada although free of customs duty in Great Britain.

It would, therefore, appear that the schedule to the treaty of the 3rd April is not wholly applicable to the conditions of trade between Japan and Canada, and that if a commercial arrangement is to be made to suit these conditions it will probably have to be accomplished by means of a separate treaty. It would be reasonable to expect that the negotiations and formal steps necessary to the making of such a treaty could not be completed before the 17th July next, when the present treaty will expire.

The Canadian government, therefore, propose to avail themselves of the suggestion contained in the 3rd paragraph of the note verbale of the 24th April communicated to me this day:

'The Imperial Japanese government have no hesitation in expressly declaring that it is their policy not to extend the term of their present treaty with any country, even though the new treaty could not be concluded before the expiration of the existing one. However, in case unavoidable circumstances prevent the conclusion of the new treaty in due time, the Imperial Government may, as a matter of convenience, enter, with the parties concerned, into a temporary agreement engaging the reciprocal grant of the most favoured nation treatment, for the purpose of regulating their commercial and tariff relations pending the conclusion of a new treaty. But they are firmly determined not to extend the term of their existing treaty with any country.'

In pursuance of what I understand to be the policy of your government as thus set forth, I would suggest that, leaving all other matters affecting the intercourse between Japan and Canada to the mutual good will of the two countries and the comity of nations, a temporary arrangement be made providing that from and after the 17th day of July, 1911, Canada shall receive in Japan the tariff treatment as expressed in Article 5 of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great Britain and Japan, signed at London on the 16th July, 1894, which was made applicable to Canada by the Convention between the United Kingdom and Japan respecting commercial relations between Canada and Japan, signed at Tokio on the 31st January, 1906, and that reciprocally Japan shall receive in Canada the tariff treatment as expressed in the said article 5.

The question of the form in which such an agreement may most conveniently be made is a matter which can receive further consideration upon our receiving an intimation that the Japanese government are willing to agree to the proposal herein made.

The question of immigration has been discussed between us on several occasions. I do not deem it necessary that this should be more than mentioned here, inasmuch as the assurance received from you of the willingness of your government to continue the friendly understanding on that matter at present existing is entirely satisfactory to us.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant.

(Sgd.) W. S. FIELDING,
Minister of Finance.

The Hon. T. Nakamura,
Imperial Japanese Consul General,
Ottawa.

The reply of the Consul General for Japan, on behalf of the Japanese Imperial government, is as follows:

IMPERIAL CONSULATE GENERAL OF JAPAN FOR THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

Ottawa, May 15, 1911.

Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, setting forth the views of your government in regard to some hesitation which they have in advising immediate adherence on the part of Canada to the treaty of the 3rd April, 1911, between Great Britain and Japan, and suggesting that, leaving all other matters affecting the intercourse between Canada and Japan to the mutual good will of the two countries and the comity of nations, a temporary arrangement be made providing that from and after the 17th day of July, 1911, Canada shall receive in Japan the tariff treatment as expressed in article V of the treaty of commerce and navigation between Great Britain and Japan signed at London on the 16th July, 1894, which was made applicable to Canada by the convention between the United Kingdom and Japan respecting commercial relations between Canada and Japan signed at Tokio on the 31st January, 1906, and that reciprocally Japan shall receive in Canada the tariff treatment as expressed in the said article V.

In reply, I have the honour, duly authorized by my government, to state that the Imperial Japanese government fully concurs in the proposal therein made by you in regard to a temporary tariff arrangement engaging the reciprocal grant of the most favoured nation treatment.

I have honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd) T. NAKAMURA.
Consul General of Japan.

The Honourable W. S. Fielding,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

It will be observed that in the communication which I sent to the consul general I confined myself to two points: First, entirely to the question of the customs tariff, all other things are allowed to stand aside, and the treaty as respects these other things will lapse. My proposal was that we should reciprocally have what is called the most favoured nation treatment, so that we might guard against any other country getting terms with Japan which would place us at a disadvantage. That they have agreed to give us. Then I went on to speak of the question on which my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) addressed the House, and which is one of great importance. Let me again read the paragraph on the question of immigration:

The question of immigration has been discussed between us on several occasions. I do not deem it necessary that this should be more than mentioned here, inasmuch as the assurance received from you of the willingness of your government to continue the friendly understanding on that matter at present existing, is entirely satisfactory to us.

Now it is necessary to observe that whatever has been done in the matter of immigration has not been done by treaty at all. Under the terms of the treaty which is soon to expire, Japanese subjects had the right to enter, to reside, to travel, and to have all the rights of British subjects in Canada. But we know that embarrassments arose from the free exercise of the rights so granted, and a friendly arrangement was made several years ago by which the Japanese government, though not going into details, not being content that the matter should be discussed very much in detail, gave this government an assurance, through the proper official of the Japanese government, to my hon. colleague the Postmaster General who was at the time in Japan, that the Japanese government would itself place certain limitations and restrictions upon immigration from Japan; and we had every reason to believe that, with the arrangement which the Japanese government, for its own purposes, was ready to make, there would be an absence of the difficulties which had unhappily arisen on our Pacific coast. That assurance so given has been fully lived up to. It is fair to the Japanese government to say that though it was never a matter of treaty, but a somewhat loose understanding, it has been acted up to in all good faith, and the number of Japanese who have desired to come into Canada has not been large. The number has been in the last year some 400, while in the last three years some 1,200 have come in. So, having received the assurance at that time that the Japanese government were prepared to deal with the problem in that way, and having received the assurance that they would continue that friendly arrangement, we have accepted that assurance and we feel that all will be well.

We do not, in the resolution before the House, touch the question of immigration at all. The old treaty undoubtedly did touch the question of immigration, because, if its terms had been enforced by the Japanese, it would have given them all the rights and privileges of British subjects in the Dominion; but, as I pointed out, they did not insist upon the exercise of the rights that came to them under the treaty. But when, on the 17th July, that treaty expires, there will be no arrangement of any kind, by law, or statute, or treaty, of a legal and binding character with respect to immigration from Japan. While we would be free as a matter of law to make our arrangements with Japan in the same manner as we would be with any other country having no treaty obligations, and while we would be, under the terms, absolutely free to apply all our immigration laws and every other law to our relations with Japan, we do not hesitate to say that it is our desire and inclination to maintain that friendly understanding that already exists. We are happy to acknowledge the fact that the Japanese government have dealt with the matter in a good spirit, and we have every assurance that they mean to continue to deal with it in the same spirit; so that we feel that there is no probability of a revival of those unpleasant incidents that occurred on the Pacific coast several years ago. With these few explanations, I beg to ask the committee to adopt this resolution and, upon its adoption, I will have the honour to present a Bill to carry it into effect.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the resolution is adopted, I would like to have a little clearer understanding with respect to the matter which has been alluded to by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his concluding remarks. I must confess that the situation does not seem to me quite so clear as it seems to him. In article 1 of the treaty of commerce, by which Canada became bound by the convention of the 31st January, 1906, it was provided as follows:

The subjects of each of the two high contracting parties shall have full liberty to enter, travel or reside in any part of the dominions and possessions of the other contracting party, and shall enjoy full and perfect protection for their persons and property.

That gave to the citizens of Japan the absolute right to enter and reside in any part of Canada. It is unnecessary to recite the troubles that arose afterwards in British Columbia in consequence of which my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) made a visit to Japan and entered upon some negotiations with the government of that country, through the intervention of the British ambassador. The result of those negotiations was embodied in a letter bearing date Tokio, December 23, 1907, addressed to the Postmaster General. That letter is in the following terms:

Monsieur le Ministre,—

In reply to your note of even date, I have the honour to state that although the existing treaty between Japan and Canada absolutely guarantees to Japanese subjects full liberty to enter, travel and reside in any part of the Dominion of Canada, yet it is not the intention of the imperial government to insist upon the complete enjoyment of the rights and privileges guaranteed by those stipulations when that would involve disregard of special conditions which may prevail in Canada from time to time.

Acting in this spirit and having particular regard to circumstances of recent occurrenec in British Columbia, the imperial government have decided to take efficient means to restrict emigration to Canada. In carrying out this purpose, the imperial government, in pursuance of the policy above stated, will give careful consideration to local conditions prevailing in Canada, with a view to meeting the desires of the government of the Dominion as far as compatible with the spirit of the treaty and the dignity of the state.

Although, as stated in the note under reply, it was not possible for me to acquiesce in all of the proposals made by you on behalf of the Canadian government, I trust that you will find in the statement herein made proof of the earnest desire of the imperial government to promote by every means within their power, the growth and stability of the cordial and mutually beneficial relations which exist between our countries. I venture to believe, also that this desirable result will be found to have been materially advanced by the full exchange of views which has taken place between us, and it gives me special pleasure to acknowledge the obligation under which I have been placed by your frank and considerate explanations regarding the attitude and wishes of your government.

I avail myself, &c., &c.,
(Sgd.) TADASU HAYASHI.

The Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux,
Postmaster General and Minister of Labour for Canada, Tokio.

The arrangement between Canada and Japan, when that letter was written, was to be found, in the first place, in the article of the treaty which I have quoted, and, in the second place, in this letter I have just read. The treaty was thus supplemented by an informal engagement on the part of the Japanese government that it would restrict emigration from Japan to Canada, and in doing so that it would have regard from time to time to any special conditions in Canada that made such restriction desirable in the interest of goodwill between the two countries. I am unable to divorce the letter from the article of the treaty to which that letter continually alludes. If there is no treaty there is no need of any understanding. If the continuation of the understanding means anything, it seems to me to mean the continuation of the article of the treaty to which I have just now alluded and which is almost in terms embodied in it. If you continue the understanding embodied in this letter then it seems to me you continue the article of the treaty which is not only referred to but embodied in the very letter itself.

That is one view of it. The only other view is that the treaty is absolutely gone, that the understanding is gone also, that because the treaty is gone, therefore, there is no need of any understanding and that matters will subsist between the two countries as far as immigration is concerned, exactly as if there were no treaty. It is not the latter position which the Minister of Finance seems to take. In his letter he has, in the first place, said:

I would suggest that leaving all other matters affecting intercourse between Japan and Canada to the mutual good will of the two countries the comity of nations, a temporary arrangement be made with regard to commercial affairs.

That would be entirely consistent with the view, that, in so far as immigration is concerned, we are absolutely unhampered by any treaty or understanding, but the latter part of the letter, where special reference is made to immigration, is not consistent with that view. These are the words which have already been quoted by the Minister of Finance:

The question of immigration has been discussed between us on several occasions. I do not deem it necessary that this should be more than mentioned here, inasmuch as the assurance received from you of the willingness of your government to continue the friendly understanding on that matter at present existing is entirely satisfactory to us.

I am unable to understand how you can continue, how it is possible to continue, that friendly understanding unless you continue as a part of that friendly understanding, because it was a part thereof, the article of the treaty of 1894 which I have quoted just now and which gives to the citizens of Japan the absolute and full right to enter and reside in Canada, subject always, of course, to the modification which is embodied in the letter written by the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs, to my hon. friend the Postmaster General.

Mr. FIELDING. I think the error in my hon. friend's argument is in assuming that article 1 of the treaty and the arrangement respecting immigration hang together. That is the foundation of his contention. I do not think that is correct. The Japanese have always claimed that this arrangement is independent of the treaty, and I think we ought to go upon the assumption that that is correct. The treaty, with article 1, ceases to exist because the Japanese authorities, of their own motion, have determined that it shall cease to exist; they cannot claim that in any way that article is in operation. However, while that is the legal position, the technical position, I do not think it practically makes much difference, because the arrangement after all is this: We have assurances that they will themselves restrict the number of Japanese citizens coming to Canada. That is the essence of the whole thing, they gave us that assurance several years ago, they have lived up to it. We have the assurance. We cannot always bring down papers in relation to matters of this kind, but we have the assurance, in terms admitting of no doubt, that the Japanese authorities are willing to continue that arrangement which has worked so satisfactorily in the last three or four years. It is a point upon which the Japanese government have been rather unwilling to go into details. They have asked us to accept their assurance in good faith. We did so at the time and we have every reason to feel satisfied with the manner in which they have acted and feel that they would do the same thing in the future. We will be free, as a matter of law on July 17, from any obligation under that treaty except whatever obligation we shall assume if we adopt this resolution respecting customs tariffs; but while we will be absolutely free, as a matter of treaty and of law, to put these matters aside, we desire to give to the Japanese government the assurance that we wish to continue our friendly relations with them, and we feel that we should not take advantage of the absence of that treaty to engage, by legislation or administration, in any course of treatment different to what we apply to them to-day. If they continue, as I believe they will, in good faith to act up to that arrangement, we should be willing even without any treaty, to deal with them in a friendly spirit. That is a correct statement of the situation.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not wish to suggest that any harsh action should be taken by this government at this moment in consequence of the denunciation of this treaty and while negotiations are pending; nor do I desire to cast any aspersions on the good intentions of the government of Japan. They have carried out the arrangement made some years ago, and embodied in the letter which has been read, in a very fair spirit, so far as I am aware. But I do not see how it is possible to divorce that understanding from the previous treaty, because the letter makes the article of that treaty which I have quoted part of the understanding. I think it exceedingly desirable in all negotiations of this kind that we should have a perfectly clear understanding in this parliament and more especially as between the two governments as to just what the situation is. That is conducive to good relations between the two countries. I shall not go over the argument again as I understand that the hon. member for Vancouver is going to deal with the same subject, but I am bound to say that while I appreciate the force of the observations of the Minister of Finance, they are not absolutely convincing to me that the view which he takes of the situation is the correct one, nor am I convinced that the situation is such that future misunderstanding may not occur.

Mr. COWAN. I would ask the Minister of Finance at the outset whether the friendly understanding to which he refers in his letter of the 20th of May, 1911, is embodied in the letter of December 23, 1907, from Count Hayashi to the Postmaster General?

Mr. FIELDING. That expresses it in part, but, as has been more than once stated, there were communications between the Canadian government and the British Ambassador and the Japanese government which, if read in association with this, would perhaps help to make it clear. I can only state the general fact that there is no misunderstanding. Article 1 which is alluded to in that letter cannot be an essential part of any understanding now when that article has been terminated by the action of the Japanese authorities themselves.

Mr. COWAN. Then am I to understand that there are other documents setting forth this friendly understanding to which the Minister of Finance has referred and which the Japanese government treat as being independent of the treaty? Are these documents in the possession of the government?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, but they are of a confidential nature.

Mr. COWAN. Do they, in any degree, change the conditions set forth in the letter of December 23, 1907?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think so; I think they are quite consistent with one another.

Mr. COWAN. Then I will be safe in assuming that the minister, when he is speaking of a friendly understanding, is referring to the understanding as set forth in the letter of December 23, 1907?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, but you must read that in the light of the fact that article 1 ceases.

Mr. COWAN. Yes, but the substance of the understanding is to be found in that letter.

Mr. FIELDING. The essence of the understanding is the restriction of the immigration of Japanese to Canada.

Mr. COWAN. To be found in this letter?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes in the letter to the Postmaster General, that is substantially correct.

Mr. LEMIEUX. But this letter is implemented by a note of a confidential nature.

Mr. COWAN. But that note of a confidential nature does not change the character of the understanding.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is the understanding.

Mr. COWAN. This letter is the understanding?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Implemented by a note of a confidential nature.

Mr. COWAN. But the note of a confidential nature does not change or modify the understanding in this letter?

Mr. FIELDING. And that note which did not change the understanding was a correct expression of the understanding at the time; but my hon. friend must read it now in the light of the fact that article 1 is being terminated by the Japanese authorities themselves, and he must read that termination into that letter.

Mr. COWAN. If the minister will kindly exercise a little confidence in my ability to read that letter, and wait, he will see what I wish to say. I wish now to ask him to what document I may look for this friendly understanding. I understand that I am to look to that letter of the 23rd of December, 1907.

Mr. FIELDING. And the history of the last four years. We must read it in the light of that understanding with respect to the restriction, and the way in which that restriction was carried out is a legitimate part of the study of the question at this moment.

Mr. COWAN. Then I am to understand that that friendly understanding, to which the minister refers in his letter of May, embodies not only the terms of this letter of the 23rd of December, but the whole history of Japan and Canada in connection with this transaction. Am I right in that?

Mr. FIELDING. No, not the whole history of the number of Japanese subjects who came in. The understanding has reference to the number of Japanese subjects coming into Canada, and the results of the last four years in that respect are a useful element in the study of the question and in the interpretation of the understanding.

Mr. COWAN. But the whole understanding itself is to be found in this letter. We might as well confess that.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In the letter plus a note of a confidential character.

Mr. COWAN. But that does not modify it. Does it modify it?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It does not.

Mr. COWAN. We have got something at last. This friendly understanding is to be found in a letter which reads as follows:

> In reply to your note of even date, I have the honour to state that although the existing treaty between Japan and Canada absolutely guarantees to Japanese subjects full liberty to enter, travel, and reside in any part of the Dominion of Canada, yet it is not the intention of the imperial government to insist upon the complete enjoyments of the rights and privileges guaranteed by those stipulations when that would involve disregard of special conditions which may prevail in Canada from time to time.

In other words, that understanding hands over to the Japanese government the power to consider the special conditions obtaining in Canada; and if those special conditions require them to limit the number of Japanese coming into Canada from Japan, they say they will do it. In other words, we have handed over our power to legislate for the protection of the people of Canada to the government of Japan.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is your inference.

Mr. COWAN. Will the hon. the Postmaster General draw any other inference from it, I will give him the opportunity. I would regret very much to find myself wrong. Will the hon. Postmaster General please give me the right inference to be drawn from that letter?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The hon. gentleman is waxing too eloquent on his own inference. I will let him go on.

Mr. COWAN. But, in the interest of truth, and perhaps to the delight of the House, the minister could expatiate upon the pleasures of life in Japan while he was explaining exactly the right inference to be drawn from this letter. Does he wish the opportunity?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, I am listening.

Mr. COWAN. Well, we will look at it again. The Japanese—there are forty-nine millions of them—have full liberty to enter, travel, and reside in Canada, but that liberty will be checked, not by the Canadian government, but by the Japanese government, after studying the conditions, not of Japan, but forsooth, 'the special conditions which may prevail in Canada from time to time.' If we need more Japanese immigrants, the power is no longer in the Canadian government to decide, if we need fewer Japanese immigrants, the power to decide that is no longer in the Canadian government. Under this friendly understanding it is in the Japanese government. Now, it may be that I have not a right interpretation of this sentence. I am willing to be writ down as a man incapable of construing English if I am wrong in my construction of that sentence. That, I have ascertained at least, is the basis of this friendly understanding that is going to be continued, that is independent of a treaty, and that does not expire with the treaty. By the way, perhaps the Minister of Finance would tell me, out of the heap of his oriental wisdom, whether he agrees with the Japanese government in saying that this friendly understanding is independent of the treaty.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, I do not hesitate to say that the Japanese government, I have reason to believe, regard it as quite independent of the treaty.

Mr. COWAN. And it does not terminate with the treaty?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, that is my view, unless either party wishes to terminate it. They are willing to continue it, and we have no objection.

Mr. COWAN. Then, this is an understanding between two nations that does not expire on the 16th or the 17th of July, 1911, with the expiration of that treaty. I wonder what member of the government ever told the people of Canada that before—that they had entered into an understanding with Japan on the subject of immigration which does not expire with the treaty adhered to on the 31st of January, 1906. Perhaps the minister will tell me now just when this friendly arrangement will expire. Is there any limit put to it?

Mr. FIELDING. I should say when either party becomes displeased with it.

Mr. COWAN. Now, perhaps the minister will be good enough, out of the abundance of his reasons, to tell us why we want this treaty with Japan. Is it in the public interest of Canada that we should encourage immigration from Japan? Does the Minister of Finance regard it as so? —Silence. Then, if it is not in the interest of Canada to encourage immigration from Japan, why in the name of all that is sensible have we entered into this agreement which does not expire with the treaty? Can the minister give a single reason for it? I do not think he can give one reason in the public interest of Canada. I do not believe he can justify before the people of Canada having entered into that secret understanding with Japan, which does not expire on the 17th of July next, when the people of Canada believed that it would expire.

The fact is that under that friendly understanding with Japan, the Japanese people have free right of entry and residence in Canada, and that free right is to be restricted only by the Japanese government. There is nothing more to it, and we are handing over for no reason which any minister or public man dare state publicly, and are continuing to hand over, in spite of the expiration of this treaty, this power to regulate immigration into Canada. What reason can any public man give for handing over to a foreign power the jurisdiction which was given by the Act of confederation to this parliament with regard to immigration? What reason can the government give in the public interest for doing it? They can give none; and mark you, the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) sneered once, in answer to a suggestion I made, that the right of the Japanese to enter Canada under the Japanese Treaty is less encumbered by conditions than the right of an Englishman, a Scotchman, an Irishman or a Frenchman under our Immigration Act. Perhaps the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) will make bold to say again that I am wrong in my construction of the Japanese Treaty or of the friendly understanding or of the Immigration Act. I say again you are not, by this friendly understanding, putting the immigrants from the mother land on an even keel with the immigrants from Japan; you are discriminating in favour of Japanese immigration. You cannot cut down those rights acquired by agreement between two nations by an Immigration Act. The United States evidently believe that cannot be done because they made an express stipulation in their treaty that Japan shall be subject to the immigration laws of the United States. But under this friendly understanding which this government has entered into, every Japanese subject has an absolute right to free entry and residence in Canada except when that right is restricted by his own government. That understanding gives privileges and preference to the Japanese immigrant which the immigrants from other countries do not enjoy. Can any reason in the public interest be advanced for this discrimination in favour of the Japanese? Are we so anxious to increase the Japanese population of Canada that we are going to discriminate in their favour against Irishmen, Englishmen and Scotchmen and men from other European countries? That was the legal effect under the old treaty which expires on the 17th July next, and it will be the effect of the continued understanding between the two nations. The difference between a treaty and an understanding is the difference between tweedle dum and tweedle dee. It is infinitesimal. It does not modify the fact that when an agreement between nations is entered into, neither one has any right to pare down that agreement, and limit by legislation the rights of the citizens of the other country with regard to immigration or any other subject. So that we are presenting to the world this spectacle. We started out with a great desire to make treaties, and we blundered into this treaty in January, 1906. The government blundered into it and tried to justify it by the misleading statement that they had an agreement with Japan limiting the number of Japanese immigrants to come from Japan into Canada. Within six months after that treaty was ratified, 8,125 Japanese immigrants had landed in the ports of Vancouver and Victoria. Then my hon. friends opposite will say: Oh, but our Postmaster General went over and made this arrangement, and the number coming into the country since has been considerably reduced. With that point I propose to deal later, but the fact remains that this agreement will continue to the Japanese people the right which the people of the United Kingdom would be delighted to enjoy, the right of free entry and free residence, the right to be restricted only by the government of the country from which the immigrant comes. Suppose that right were given to Englishmen, do you not think it would increase the number of English, Scotch and Irish immigrants? Is it any wonder that the Japanese were so alert to avail themselves of this right and rush into Canada in such numbers?

The vice of the thing is this, and no one knows it better than the Finance Minister —I venture to say that he has wished a thousand times he had never made the fatal blunder of entering into this foolish treaty of the 31st January, 1906, the vice of the thing is this, that you have selected a people who never intend to become Canadian citizens, who are unfit to become Canadian citizens, and you are giving them a preference in our immigration field over every other people in the known world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I see absolutely no reason why we should continue this alleged friendly understanding. The advantage of the tariff arrangement has been discussed to-night fully by my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) I think he has shown that its advantages are nil. Why should we not avail ourselves of this opportunity, when this treaty is expiring, to make no arrangement that is not to the advantage and honour of Canada? The commercial side of the treaty is of little or no benefit to Canada. The balance of trade is with Japan, and gold has to go from Canada to Japan to meet that balance. This 'friendly understanding' on the subject of immigration, I venture to say, is, in the view of ninety per cent of the people who are affected by it, a most unfriendly arrangement so far as the interests of Canada are concerned. I see no necessity for Canada making any move at the present juncture. She does not have to adhere to that agreement. There is no breach of national honour or national etiquette in our failing to adhere to that agreement. There is no advantage in adhering to that agreement or making a new commercial arrangement. Why not, with the dignity and self-respect that becomes a nation, exercise the power given us by that Confederation Act, the power to regulate and restrict and govern immigration from any country we please according to the interests of Canada? Why do we hand that power to a foreign country? What advantage are we getting in return? How does it add to our self-respect or advance any of our interests? What end is it attaining for Canada? Why not stand exactly as we are in all treaty relations between the two countries, until we can get an arrangement that is really for the interest of the country?

Now, I know of no power possessed by the government of Canada which enables it to enter into an agreement that has never been submitted to parliament for ratification and which is described by the representative of the Japanese government in this language:

> The understanding arrived at between the two governments——
>
> The Canadian and the Japanese.
> —in 1908 on the subject of immigration is quite independent of the existing treaty concluded between Japan and Canada in 1906 and is not terminated on the expiration of that treaty between Japan and Canada.

I am prepared to say that the Canadian government has no power to enter into a side agreement with a nation which agreement was never submitted to parliament and is not part of the British treaty. I am prepared to state that the government does not need to take the view that there exists any understanding or agreement independent of the treaty and not expiring with the treaty. There is no necessity put upon the government to take that view; and I say it is in the interest of Canada generally that no such view should be taken, and no action taken such as the minister has outlined to-night.

I can only say, in conclusion, that I know that the people who live in these conditions, and who are as broad and generous-minded as any other part of the electorate of Canada, regardless of occupation or origin, race or creed, are of one mind in believing that it is a fatal mistake in the interests of Canada, looking to her larger destiny, to encourage by treaty or friendly understanding with Japan, the immigration of people who never intend to become citizens of Canada and who take the place in that western country of men who should be citizens undertaking the responsibilities of citizens. In that western country we have duties to perform; we have to establish there the institutions that have made Canada and the other portions of the British Empire what they are. We have to do this by our own exertions. And when you find that of the people we are adding to the population of this country, twenty-five per cent of them at least are aliens and intend to remain aliens, who intend to leave the country, who take upon themselves no part of the duties of citizenship—I tell you that you are casting upon what the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in an unfortunate moment called the 'white portion of British Columbia,' a burden that may become, one of these days, greater than they can bear. I have no desire to refer to past events or to affect in the slightest degree the relations between Japan and Canada or between Japan and the British Empire. I hope these relations may always remain cordial. But I do say that the men who propose these arrangements with Japan on a subject which, under the Confederation Act we have the power to deal with, are not rising to the great height of Canada's destiny in those matters that affect not only Canada but the whole Anglo-Saxon race. I say there are other duties cast upon us besides this two-penny half-penny chasing after the dollar in the remote corners of the earth. I say that our patriotism should not be of that sordid kind which is measured by the price of a ton of lead in Japan or of a sack of potatoes on the Boston market. I think we have other and higher duties to perform. I feel that this government is failing, and failing absolutely, in the performance of those high duties, in this attempt to put through this arrangement with Japan.

Mr. KING. At this late hour of the night and at this late stage of the session, I would not like to detain the House more than a moment or two. But I feel, after listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) that I would be doing an injustice to those whom I more particularly represent in this House, the working classes of this country, if I allowed his remarks to pass without comment.

I was particularly struck with one phrase the hon. member made use of, that there was danger of casting on British Columbia a burden greater than she could bear. As I listened to his remarks I could not help feeling that if many speeches of that kind were delivered throughout Canada, we would be casting upon this country a greater burden than the people would be able to bear. I wonder if the hon. member realizes the extent and magnitude of this question of Oriental immigration. It has been my privilege to see something of the 300 millions of India, to see something of the 400 millions of China, to see something of the 50 millions of Japan; and as I wandered through those countries and saw those multitudes, and thought that we on this side of the Pacific were a people of only 8 or 9 millions, I could not help feeling that the manner of dealing with the problem of Oriental immigration was one of the most important and far reaching concerns of this nation. Now what is the manner my hon. friend suggests tonight? It is that we should claim the rights which we have under the British North America Act, and begin to legislate in this parliament by a series of acts in the nature of exclusion.

Mr. COWAN. I never suggested such a thing.

Mr. KING. What other meaning can be attached to my hon. friend's remarks? He has spoken of the arrangement which this government is making.

Mr. COWAN. When I say that I did not made such a statement, and every one in this House knows I did not, I have a right to ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his assertion.

Mr. KING. I am prepared to accept what my hon. friend says as to his statement, but every hon. gentleman in this House will draw his own inference from his remarks. There are only two methods by which this question of Oriental immigration can be dealt with. There is either the method of diplomacy which this government has followed, and there is the other method of hurling defiance in the face of these Oriental people and telling them that, despite their numbers, despite their industrial and commercial importance, we shall legislate against them in a fashion which will exclude them totally from our shores. Now I believe with all my heart that it is absolutely necessary to restrict immigration from the Orient. I think in the interest, not only of the working classes of this country, but of all other classes it is absolutely necessary that the people of the Orient shall be restrained from coming to this country. But there are two methods of doing that. One method is to attempt it by legislation, with the possibility of incurring the hostility of those peoples, the other method is to allow those people themselves to show their desire to deal with us as a friendly nation, and when they express a willingness to restrict their own emigration, if they carry out that promise faithfully, to give them an opportunity to do so, and to continue that arrangement with them as long as we have reason to believe in their good faith. Now that is the position we are in with regard to Japan at the present day.

Our position, and the position of the nation to the south of us, is precisely analogous in more than one particular. We have each had a treaty recently with Japan, a trade treaty which deals also with the subject of immigration. In the treaty with the United States I believe the American government reserved to itself the right to handle the question of immigration as it pleased. At the time we were discussing this treaty with Japan some years ago, hon. gentlemen opposite urged that we on this side of the House should have put into our agreement the same clause which was in the agreement of the United States, namely, that nothing in that trade treaty should in any way restrict our privileges in the matter of legislating on the subject of immigration. But what has taken place in the United States within the last six months as a result of their experience? The United States has entered into a new treaty with Japan, and what is the first clause in that treaty? This treaty has been signed within the past few weeks, on the fifth day of April in fact, and the first article in that treaty reads as follows:

The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel and reside in the territories of the other, to carry on trade wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactures, warehouses and shops, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects, submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established.

Mr. COWAN. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to read on to that section which shows that all these rights are subject to the Immigration Act of the United States.

Mr. KING The hon. gentleman may read any section he pleases.

Mr. COWAN. But it is there.

Mr. KING. I am reading what is here at present, and no language can be more emphatic than this:

The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel and reside in the territories of the other.

That is the language which appears as part of the treaty lately entered into between the United States and Japan, and which gives complete liberty of movement in the matter of immigration between the two countries. Now my hon. friend says: Read on. After you get through the treaty altogether, I find at the end of it the following paragraph, which comes under the head of a declaration, not as part of the treaty, but as a separate document altogether, signed by Mr. Uchida, who is the ambassador of the Japanese government at Washington. And what are the words of this declaration?

In proceeding this day to the signature of the treaty of commerce and navigation between Japan and the United States, the undersigned, Japanese ambassador in Washington, duly authorized by his government, has the honour to declare that the Imperial Japanese government are fully prepared to maintain with equal effectiveness the limitation and control which they have for the past three years exercised in regulation of the immigration of labourers to the United States.

Mr. BURRELL. The minister surely does not mean to intimate that a formal declaration of that kind by a plenipotentiary is to be compared with the shadowy assurance which this government has got?

Mr. FIELDING. Does my hon. friend complain that we have not an assurance? His friend is complaining that we have too much.

Mr. KING. I may say that I regard the two assurances in every particular, so far as honour can make them such, on exactly the same footing. This assurance is given by the highest representative of Japan in the United States to the United States government, given on the honour of the Japanese government. The assurance with this government is also given by the highest representative of the government of Japan in Canada, and given with the full honour and knowledge of the Japanese government and on its behalf. Moreover, the assurances given by the Japanese government to the government of Canada have been given in formal documents signed by the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs, and given to the British Ambassador in Japan.

Mr. COWAN. It may be that the minister's copy differs from mine, but my copy contains this:

And whereas, the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States to the ratification of the said treaty was given with the understanding 'that the treaty shall not be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Act of Congress entitled 'An Act to Regulate the Immigration of Aliens into the United States', approved February 20, 1907.'

Mr. KING. Exactly the same thing applies to this country. We have in this country an Act respecting immigration from other countries, relating to different classes of undesirable immigrants, and that law is enforced against Japan as against every other country, and the United States is in exactly the same position. My hon. friend cannot have looked into the matter carefully, or he would know that we have in this country immigration laws applicable to all immigrants that come to this country, whether on the Atlantic or on the Pacific, and the stipulation to which my hon. friend has just referred applies exactly in the same way to Canada.

Mr. COWAN. Was that under the old treaty, too, ratified on the 31st of January, 1906?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. COWAN. So they are subject to the Immigration Act. I suppose it was on legal advice at that time that the government was acting?

Mr. KING. My hon. friend is endeavouring to insinuate that it is not a fact that our laws in regard to the various classes of immigrants that are undesirable coming to our shores, operate against Japan. I inform him that I have seen myself the officials of this government putting those laws into force on the Pacific coast, turning back men and refusing them the right to land in this country because they were not able to pass the medical examination which was required of them. My hon. friend knows the law has been enforced out in British Columbia.

Mr. COWAN. That is not answering what I said. The treaty between the United States and Japan is subject to the Immigration Act of the United States while our treaty is not subject to the Canadian Immigration Act.

Mr. FIELDING. There will be no treaty after the 17th July.

Mr. KING. I was just going to point out to my hon. friend that under the treaty the United States have found it desirable to make with the Japanese government they have given the Japanese the free right of entry into the United States. The immigration of Japanese into the United States is restricted only by the general application of the United States immigration laws along lines exactly parallel to our own; that is with reference to the question of diseased and undesirable immigrants and the like. With that exception the whole matter of immigration from Japan to the United States is based on the declaration that:

> The Imperial Japanese government are fully prepared to maintain with equal effectiveness the limitation and control which they have for the past three years exercised in regulation of the emigration of labourers to the United States.

I may say to my hon. friend that perhaps he is not aware of the fact that the agreement between Japan and the United States went into effect subsequent to the time at which the arrangement was effected between Canada and Japan. My hon. friend the Postmaster General left this country for Japan in December, 1907. He was able at that time, through negotiations with the Japanese government and with the assistance of the British Ambassador, to make an arrangement which has effectively stopped emigration of any extent from Japan to Canada. After that arrangement had been effected the United States government sought to make a similar arrangement with the government of Japan. They were successful in getting either in part or in whole what this government got with Japan, but not more; and that arrangement has been found to work so satisfactorily that the United States government, in consenting to this treaty with Japan, has accepted the assurance that this arrangement will continue to work satisfactorily as far as immigration is concerned. That assurance is given irrespective of the treaty one way or the other. It is because of the policy of the Japanese government, that they have given this assurance to two different countries. It is part of their present policy that their people shall not come to this side of the water, but that those who leave Tokio and other Japanese cities shall emigrate to different parts of the Orient, Corea and Manchuria in particular. That is why this government has found a more effective way of dealing with this question by friendly negotiations through the channels of diplomacy rather than by an attitude of defiance and by the passing of exclusion laws against the citizens of that country. I have some figures here which show the immigration from Japan under this present arrangement.

Mr. COWAN. Does the minister mean that it is better to allow the Japanese government to exercise the right of restricting immigration from Japan into Canada than that Canada should exercise that right herself?

Mr. KING. If the Japanese government will undertake to restrict emigration of its own people, it is much better that they should restrict it than that this country should be put to the necessity of enacting exclusion laws. Let us see how it has worked out. I have here some statistics giving the actual numbers of immigrants from Japan to Canada, and also the number who have gone from this country back to Japan. Every month the Japanese government furnish this government with a carefully tabulated statement showing the number of Japanese who have left Japan to come to this country, and the numbers who have returned from this country to Japan. These figures, by comparison with the figures of our own immigration officers, have been shown to be absolutely correct all through. Under the heading of 'labourers' the Japanese government include returning emigrants, relatives of emigrants, domestic servants, agricultural settlers and contract labourers. Taking of these classes all those who have returned to Japan from Canada, and noting those who have travelled third-class, which would likely be the labouring and coolie classes, I find that the following are the comparative figures for the years 1909, 1910 and 1911 in so far as I have been able to obtain from files in the Department of Labour which have just been sent to me:

	1909.		1910.		1911.
	Came to Canada.	Returned to Japan.	Came to Canada.	Returned to Japan.	Came to Canada.	Returned to Japan.
January	....	....	12	20	16	35
February	....	....	17	17	25	26
March	....	...	26	21	63	6
April	....	....	78	35	....
May	....	....	80	24	....
June	....	....	62	18	....
July	19	20	76	41	....
August	11	8	65	47	....
September	23	4	35	37	....
October	23	70	36	100	....
November	3	117	19	153	....
December	7	159	39	115	....
Total	86	378	545	628	104	67

The actual result as shown by these figures is that in that period of time the last two years all but three months 338 more Japanese labourers have returned to Japan from Canada than have come from Japan to this country. This is a tribute to the agreement which has been effected by my hon. friend the Postmaster General, and that is the arrangement which, I understand, my hon. friend from Vancouver would have this government annul without considering the desirability of maintaining it one way or the other. In other words, an agreement which has had the effect of actually sending back to Japan 338 more labourers than have been brought to this country he would have us put an end to if we could. Speaking on behalf of the working classes of this country I would say that an agreement which has worked out in that way is a great deal more beneficial to them than any legislation which we could possibly put on the statute-books of this country.

I have nothing more to add other than to say that, looking carefully at the letter from the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Japan, to my colleague the Postmaster General, dated Tokio, December, 1907, and which has been read, I entirely disagree with the leader of the opposition, and also with the hon. member for Vancouver that it necessarily implies that this agreement hangs upon the treaty which has been entered into with Japan. If one will read the last paragraph of that letter one will find that no mention is made whatever of the treaty, and if one takes into account each of the paragraphs one will see that the emphasis is laid upon what is the policy of the Japanese government. Mention is made of the special conditions in Canada by which is meant the economic conditions which exist in this country, and which are different from the economic conditions in Japan, and the letter throughout implies a desire to maintain the cordial and mutually beneficial relations which exist between these two nations. I maintain that that should be the supreme object which this parliament should seek to obtain namely the promotion of cordial and beneficial relations between not only Japan and Canada, but between all these countries of the Orient, and this particular country, and that end, I think will be best effected, first of all by taking into serious consideration the experience of larger nations; nations such as the United States which have precisely similar problems to deal with, and profiting to some degree by their example; and I would emphasize this in the case of my hon. friend who belongs to the very loyal party, by having regard also to what we owe to our British citizenship, and to allies of the British nation, and, more than all, and lastly, by keeping before this nation what is likely to be the policy which in the long run will best serve the object in view. That will be found to be a policy of conciliation, and not a policy of coercion and defiance.

Mr. BARNARD. As far as I can see, reading the letters which have been produced here, and hearing the debate as far as it has proceeded, there can hardly be a possibility of a doubt but that the proposed agreement is merely a continuation of the existing arrangement, so far as immigration is concerned, for the next two years. That arrangement, I can assure the members of the government, is unsatisfactory to the people of the province of British Columbia who are most immediately concerned in this question. It is unsatisfactory to them for the simple reason that the question of the regulation of immigration is left wholly to the government of Japan, and this government has absolutely nothing to say in it. The Minister of Labour eulogized the arrangement that had been made by the Postmaster General when he was in Japan. He told us what a magnificent arrangement it was, and how very well it had worked out. One thing is very sure and that is that that arrangement was not what the Postmaster General asked when he went there; he certainly wanted something more than that, but he did not get all he asked for. Of course the correspondence, and what took place between him and the Imperial Japanese government I assume was more or less of a confidential nature, but I have here what purports to be a copy of the letter from the Postmaster General to Count Hayashi, dated 23rd December, 1907, the reply to which is the agreement which is now under discussion. He states in that letter:

I understand the imperial government is not able to accede to my wishes in the matter of limiting the number of the above immigrants. I am therefore persuaded in the sequel of negotiations that it is quite unnecessary for me to further dispute the fact that the Canadian government's desire cannot be acceded to.
