What he asked for I do not know, but he evidently thought he should get much more than he did get; at any rate he asked for it, and did not get it. The people of British Columbia are not satisfied, and have not been satisfied with this agreement as it stands. They are not satisfied because the control of this immigration is in the hands of the Japanese government to deal with as they see fit. The letter of December 23rd, 1907, which is the basis of the agreement, provides that the Japanese government is to give careful consideration to local conditions prevailing in Canada, and that for the purpose of this discussion means in British Columbia, with a view of meeting the desires of the government of the Dominion of Canada, as far as compatible with the spirit of the treaty, and the dignity of the State. That is to say, when they feel inclined, they can send as many immigrants as they like into British Columbia, and the Dominion government has no right to say anything in protest. It is unnecessary, and would be futile at this stage of the proceedings to discuss the desirability or undesirability of Japanese immigration.

Mr. KING. Where does he find any language which will give him any reason to say that this government has bound itself so that it has no right to say what immigration shall come into this country?

Mr. BARNARD. I understand this government has accepted this letter, and this letter states that the imperial government is to give serious consideration to local conditions prevailing in Canada with a view to meeting the desires of the government of the Dominion as far as is compatible with the spirit of the treaty, and the dignity of the state. That is, if the imperial government do not think it compatible with the spirit of the treaty, or the dignity of the State of Japan, they would be still living up to their arrangement, and coud do as they pleased.

Mr. KING. That is simply an offer on the part of the Japanese government to this government. It does not in any way restrict the power of this government to do what it thinks right in the premises provided that offer is not lived up to.

Mr. BARNARD. That is the whole agreement that the Minister of Labour has been telling us is such a very fine agreement. Surely he does not propose to continue that agreement which he praised so highly.

Mr. KING. What I have praised is an arrangement whereby the Japanese government have voluntarily offered to do a certain thing which has left this government absolutely free to do what it thinks best. That is the arrangement I have applauded.

Mr. BARNARD. The government at Ottawa have not appreciated the feelings of the people of British Columbia, they never have from the time that this question first became a live issue. I do not wish to enter on anything particularly controversial in connection with this matter to-night, but we have had statements from different ministers which go to show beyond question that the sympathies, and the feelings of the government were not at one with the people of British Columbia. The government undoubtedly made a blunder when they first entered into this treaty, a blunder which was absolutely unnecessary because the details were called to their attention by the imperial government at the time, and the imperial government informed this government that they did not need to adhere to that treaty so far as the question of immigration of labour was concerned. In spite of that they adhered to the treaty, and found themselves in trouble by reason of having done so. At this time it would be a mistake on the part of the government to perpetuate that blunder; let this matter drop, and begin all over again. The people of British Columbia wish to develop their own province along their own lines. We think, rightly or wrongly, that we have the finest province in the Dominion. We have any amount of difficulties to overcome, and we do not want these difficulties increased by a large influx of alien population which can never be assimilated with the population of the province, and which will be for all time to come a detriment to it.

Mr. KING. Hear, hear.

Mr. GOODEVE. I would like to add a word or two of protest in regard to the resolution. If the resolution as it is on the Order Paper was all that we had in connection with the matter to be dealt with, I would have nothing whatever to say, but yesterday the Finance Minister brought down a return of correspondence leading up to the resolution that we have on the Order Paper. In that return I find a letter which the Finance Minister has read in the House this evening. In it he referred to the fact that he trusts the same relations will continue in regard to immigration that have been in existence since the letters referred to between the Postmaster General and the Imperial Japanese government were exchanged. I absolutely agree with the argument advanced by the leader of the opposition, that we must read the reference in the letter addressed by the Finance Minister to the Imperial Japanese government in connection with article 1 of the original treaty to which, undoubtedly it refers.

The whole argument of the hon. Minister of Labour has been that they have no treaty now, and that therefore we can at any time restrict the immigration of Japanese subjects. But that is contrary to the correspondence brought down and laid on the table yesterday, and repeated by the Minister of Finance to-night. Following that argument, the Minister of Labour refers to the recent treaty between the United States and Japan, from which he endeavours to argue that they are using exactly the same agreement that we have had with the Japanese government. But what are the facts? As the hon. member for Vancouver pointed out, in the latter clause of the agreement between the United States and Japan, it is expressly stated:

> And, whereas, the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States for the ratification of the said treaty as given with the understanding that that treaty was not to be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Act of Congress entitled an Act to regulate immigration into the United States.

By that clause the United States absolutely claim the right to control the immigration. The hon. Minister of Labour says that refers only to criminal immigration; but in the original treaty made with Japan that class of immigration was not excepted. That was one of the objections taken by the province of British Columbia, namely, that instead of retaining control over our own immigration, we had handed it over to the Japanese government.

Mr. KING. I think my hon. friend is mistaken. The objection was this, that we had allowed to go on the statute that section of the treaty which said that the subjects of either country were to have the right of free entry. The question was not in regard to our not having applied for immigration laws against undesirable classes, but it was that the Japanese would have the right to enter this country without any restriction.

Mr. GOODEVE. The objection was that we had failed to put in a clause regulating immigration, and the result was a large influx in the following year.

Mr. KING. The fact that we did not expressly name our immigration Act did not exclude its provisions from applying to the Japanese in the same way as to immigration from other nations. Any labourer from Germany who could pass our laws in that regard could also come from Japan.

Mr. GOODEVE. The Minister of Labour does not seem to recognize the fact that the treaty superseded any immigration laws we had, and we had absolutely no control over either criminal or other immigration, at that time. It is quite true that possibly the Japanese government would not have taken objection to our excluding criminal immigration, although even in regard to that we have no absolute right under the treaty; but we failed to retain control over our own immigration, even of labourers from Japan. We are satisfied that this government should have friendly trade relations with Japan; but at the time this treaty was made with Great Britain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies called attention to the fact that the colonies could accept these rights and privileges with respect to trade, and yet retain control of immigration. We have no objection to trading with these people; on the contrary, we are from time to time increasing our shipping in that direction, and we desire to have trade with them; but the Japanese government, through the imperial government, said that they were quite prepared that the Dominion government should accept these trade relations and still retain control of her own immigration. What is the condition to-night? This treaty lapses in July next, and we had a right, not only as citizens of British Columbia, but as citizens of the Dominion of Canada, to expect that this government would have taken advantage of that opportunity to retain control of our own immigration. There was absolutely no necessity for the Minister of Finance, in negotiating on behalf of this government, to report that they had difficulties in regard to immigration, and practically to continue the treaty. You have not only deliberately handed over the control you had given to them by the treaty with Great Britain, but handed over that control by that letter without any reciprocal return whatever. I do not mean to say that we would value Japan as a place of immigration for Canadian citizens, but we had at least that reciprocal right by the treaty. To-day that right is taken away. The letter of the Finance Minister deals with the arrangement based on the letter about which the hon. member for Vancouver was so careful to ask, and as to which he got the assurance of both the Postmaster General and the Finance Minister that it was the basis of the agreement. Under that letter the Japanese government indefinitely, or at least to the full extent of two years, will have the absolute right, if they so desire—and they will only be guided after an investigation of the Canadian situation—to control that immigration, and we have absolutely no rights in return.

Mr. FIELDING. Where does my hon. friend find that?

Mr. GOODEVE. I find it in a letter which was read here to-night by the hon. gentleman. No one will dispute that that letter bases the position we occupy to-night in connection with article (1) of the original treaty and in connection with the agreement based on the letter of the Postmaster General.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend must not say that no one disputes it because I do.

Mr. GOODEVE. I would like to know on what ground.

Mr. FIELDING. I have explained that already.

Mr. GOODEVE. And while doing that, we have not even the previous concessions, which we had under the treaty. There are no reciprocal concessions with regard to immigration. True there are with regard to trade, but absolutely none with regard to immigration, and that is why I enter my protest, not only on behalf of the people of British Columbia but of the Dominion.

I do not propose at this late hour to go into all the arguments why we think this immigration is not suitable to Canada. Every one will agree that we cannot assimilate Asiatic immigration and make the Asiatics good Canadian citizens. But that is no reason why we should not trade with them, and the Japanese recognized that in the treaty of 1906 and said they were quite prepared that the Dominion should accept the advantages of a trade treaty, but still retain control of her own immigration. Now when the opportunity arises this year to resume our control of immigration, we find, by the letter of the Finance Minister, that the government has given away the right to control that immigration. I am free to admit, from the figures furnished by the Department of Labour which I assume are correct, that to a large extent the Japanese have restricted immigration, but that is purely a matter of goodwill on their part, and it is on that my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) argued that to-day the Japanese have more rights with regard to immigration than British people. They have the absolute right and freedom to come in, reside, travel, &c.—rights exceeding those which any other nationality has to-day. It is on that basis we object to this proposed agreement. We do not object to the proposed extension of our trade or our traffic regulations, but solely to our immigration regulations.

Mr. FISHER. On what does my hon. friend base his statement that under the treaty the Japanese have greater right of entry than British subjects?

Mr. GOODEVE. I base it on the fact that under the original treaty we retain no control over the immigration from Japan whereas British immigrants from other countries are subject to our Immigration laws.

Mr. FISHER. That is not the case. Our Immigration Act applies to the people of Japan as well as to all other people as regards disabilities of any kind contained in that Act. That is a statement I make with the full responsibility of the government.

Mr. GOODEVE. I take exception to that. A treaty obligation overrides that Act, and I appeal to the lawyers in the House if I am not correct.

Mr. BURRELL. If the minister's view be correct, why should the United States have found it necessary to have a special protocol making the Japanese subject to their immigration laws.

Mr. FISHER. If the clause in the United States Treaty, which says that the treaty does not exempt the Japanese from the immigration laws of the United States—and which clause is contained in the body of that treaty—has the effect my hon. friend says it has, why is it that a protocol was required outside of that treaty to continue the agreement between the United States and Japan? Why did they want that agreement to continue if their immigration laws shut out Japanese immigration? Either one of two things. Either the United States immigration laws did not have that effect or else the United States, like ourselves, considered it better for the Japanese themselves to restrict emigration to the United States than for the Americans to pass laws and regulations to shut the Japanese out.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The protocol deals with something which is not covered by the general immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. FISHER. But if these laws apply what need was there for a protocol?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Because the general immigration laws do not touch that particular subject.

Mr. FISHER. The immigration laws of the United States can shut anybody out. They can shut the Japanese out; but by reason of the protocol attached to the treaty, it is evident that the United States authorities prefer a friendly arrangement of that kind to being obliged themselves to shut the Japanese out by their own laws. They might be able to do that under the treaty but they preferred a friendly arrangement with the Japanese because, like ourselves, they prefer the policy of friendly relations between people, rather than be under the necessity of insisting on their full rights by shutting them out. The policy of this government has been that we should secure the restriction of Japanese immigration by friendly arrangement with the Japanese government, under which the Japanese government would restrict that immigration themselves, rather than undertake to restrict it by our laws.

Mr. GOODEVE. Why does not the government of Canada make similar arrangements with all other countries and allow all other countries to restrict immigration to Canada? If the government are going to hand over to one country the right to control emigration to Canada, it would only be logical that they should give that right to other countries.

Mr. FISHER. As a matter of fact we have just such an arrangemnt with the government of India. My hon. colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) went to England some time ago in consequence of certain immigration of Hindoos into British Columbia which was objectionable.

Mr. GOODEVE. That was a British country.

Mr. FISHER. And he then made an arrangement with the Indian authorities by which they agreed to restrict and discourage the emigration to Canada of those Hindoos. My right hon. leader stated not long ago in this House that he would be glad, as soon as the time was ripe, to make a similar arrangement with China if possible. It is true that with regard to European countries generally, we have no such arrangement, but we have other means of dealing with them. We might adopt it there also if the opportunity should arise, but it has not yet arisen. With Japan, however, we had the opportunity of making such an arrangement, and we did make it with the most satisfactory results. There is a direct difference between the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that of this government. The policy of this government is to deal with Oriental immigration by means of arrangements by which the governments of those countries will themselves restrict emigration from them to Canada, and we shall not be obliged to pass regulations to restrict it ourselves. Apparently hon. gentlemen opposite think it better to ignore the friendly proposals of governments in the Orient who are willing to agree to such an arrangement, and have Canada herself pass such drastic regulations as they would like for the purpose of shutting out Oriental immigration. That seems, so far as the discussion to-night has shown it, to be the direct difference between the two policies here to-night.

There is another point on which I wish to say a word. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to consider that the arrangement is dependent on the treaty. I have no hesitation in saying that the arrangement is not dependent on the treaty. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) read an extract from the document which was laid on the table to-day by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) which bears out entirely what I say now. The memorandum is explicit that the understanding arrived at beween the two governments in 1908 on the subject of immigration is quite independent of the existing treaty and does not terminate on the expiration of that treaty, and that is quite in accord with the understanding we have always had on the immigration question. The immigration arrangement was made after the treaty. It is a mutual arrangement by which the Japanese government undertakes to restrict the emigration of Japanese to Canada. As a result of that, Canada makes no drastic regulations of immigration against the Japanese. If the Japanese government did not maintain its part of that arrangement Canada would be free to make any restrictions she chose in regard to Japanese immigration. We believe it is better in the interest of Canada—and not only in the interest of Canada but in the interest of Japan—that the Japanese government themselves should restrict their emigration to Canada. We wish them to continue that. The Japanese government also wishes to continue it. But I wish to have it clearly understood that this arrangement is independent of the treaty and that it is dependent upon the faithful recognition of the arrangement by both sides to the agreement. If at any time the Canadian government considers that the Japanese government is not fulfilling its obligations, or the Japanese government considers that the Canadian government is not fulfilling its obligations, either party would have the right to terminate the arrangement at once. It is not a treaty, but an arrangement, and it continues by the mutual good feeling and good understanding between the two countries and can be terminated the minute that that mutual feeling of faith and confidence ceases to exist.

Mr. GOODEVE. With reference to the similar agreement that the Minister of Agriculture has stated they have made with the Indian government, it must be remembered that the people of India are British subjects and would of necessity have to be dealt with in an entirely different manner from those who are not British subjects. I can readily understand an arrangement of that kind being made with our fellow subjects. It was a difficult question to handle, and if an agreement of that kind was come to, I think it is eminently satisfactory, and I am quite prepared to give credit for it. But, speakinf for myself alone, and not on behalf of this side of the House, I differ entirely with the policy of the present government in regard to foreign and alien immigration—handing over the absolute control of that immigration to the foreigners themselves. I say it is not a question of defiance as stated by the Minister of Labour (Mr. King). There is absolutely nothing infra dig in treating with Japan on the basis of controlling immigration. And I point out to the government that they did not consider it so, and the British government themselves did not consider it so, as shown by the letters from the Colonial Secretary. I have not the letters before me now, but I think that on three separate occasions by cable and afterwards by letter they stated to this government that they could have all the benefits of the trade relations and still retain control of immigration. Further, these hon. gentlemen argue quite contrary to what they argued before, for they stated that until this treaty expired nothing could be done in regard to immigration. I think that was the argument used in this House,—in fact I am quite sure of it. Now they are arguing that the arrangement is entirely independent of the treaty. I am protesting because the time has come when we are again in the position to say to Japan, without offending them in the slightest degree, that we will resume control of immigration. I respect the progress the Japanese have made, and we are glad to interchange commerce with them; but that is no reason why we should hand over to them the con trol of immigration. It is difficult to make a parallel case. It did occur to me to ask whether we should request Japan to allow us to control our emigration going to Japan. But we are a different country. We are the last great open country—as the government likes to put it, 'the last Great West,' and it is not likely that our citizens, for a century to come at least, will be seeking to emigrate to these countries. So, we cannot apply that parallel. But, it is for that very reason that we should exercise the greatest care, because we are the last great west and desire to build up here a Canadian nationality; because we believe in our own young nationhood; because we believe that immigration should be restricted, and not only criminals should be excluded, but only the best people of European countries should be selected, only those people who can assimilate with us to make one united, sound, Anglo-Saxon race. That is the principle which I advocate, along with others on this side of the House. It is not the idea that we should defy these people; neither do they feel that it would be contrary to their dignity that we should retain complete control of immigration. I think it would be more consonant with the dignity of the Canadian parliament that we should say to Japan that while we welcome her trade, yet we intend to maintain control of our own immigration.

Mr. FIELDING. Is my hon. friend advocating exclusion or restriction?

Mr. GOODEVE. Control, we must control our own immigration.

Mr. FIELDING. But we have control. If we are not satisfied, if any day we believe that more Japanese are coming into the country than we think is desirable, all we have to do is to enforce such laws as the parliament of Canada may see fit to pass to that end.

Mr. GOODEVE. The letter the Postmaster General read from the representative of the Imperial Japanese government is clear on that point. It states clearly that they, Japan, must be guided by Canadian conditions, not the conditions that we set forth, but their understanding of our conditions. They are to be the judges, and that is what I am objecting to, that is the issue between us. I say that we should maintain such control of our immigration as becomes the great Canadian people. The Minister of Agriculture went further. He says: Why, we did that with India, we are going to do it with China; and it may be possible, he said, that we shall extend the same treatment to other European countries. I say we differ with him. We have an absolute right, and it is our duty, to retain control of our own immigration.

Mr. LEMIEUX. As I understand the hon. gentleman's remarks, he would exclude by our immigration laws against Japan, all Oriental immigrants.

Mr. GOODEVE. I want to retain control.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is no question that we do maintain control of our immigration laws, as they are admitted by the comity of nations. For instance, in spite of clause 1 of the treaty passed between Canada and Japan in 1906, giving reciprocal entry to British subjects in Japan and Japanese subjects into Canada, the laws which apply against the white races as regards paupers, anarchists, diseased and undesirables generally, these immigration laws which apply by the comity of nations to all people and races, apply to the Japanese as well. If to-day there were landed on the shores of British Columbia anarchists, paupers and diseased, unfit mentally and physically to become Canadian citizens, they would be excluded according to the immigration regulations passed by this parliament and enforced by the Minister of the Interior. Besides that, there was in 1906 the general law applying to Japanese and all other nations, and there was a special arrangement. I have not got it under my hand at the moment, but it was quoted in the debate on the Address which took place in 1907-8 and in 1909 after the last general election. There was an arrangement made by the Japanese and Canadian governments to restrict the number of immigrants coming from Japan to Canada. After the treaty went into force, through some misapprehension on the other side of the Pacific, a general influx of Japanese took place into Canada, and riots occurred in the streets of Vancouver. We remonstrated, and as a result an arrangement was arrived at between the Japanese government and the Canadian government. Now what has been the result of that agreement? My hon. friend read only one portion of the letter which was handed to me by the Foreign Minister in Tokio. That part of the letter reads as follows:

In reply to your note of even date, I have the honour to state that although the existing treaty between Japan and Canada absolutely guarantees the Japanese subjects full liberty to enter, travel and reside in any part of the Dominion of Canada, yet it is not the intention of the Imperial government to insist upon the complete enjoyment of the rights and privileges guaranteed by those stipulations when that would involve disregard of special conditions which may prevail in Canada from time to time.

My hon. friend stopped there and did not proceed any further. Let me read the next sentence:

Acting, in this spirit, and having particular regard to circumstances of recent occurrences in British Columbia, the Imperial government have decided to take efficient means to restrict emigration to Canada.

Now what is that restriction, admitted by the Japanese government themselves? I tell my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), who knows that I am right, that the agreement does consist not only in a letter which was published at the time and which I have just read, but it is implemented by a note from the Japanese government of a confidential nature which we are not at liberty to publish, which is known not only to this government but to the British government as well. Would we be justified in publishing it? Is it not sufficient to quote the words of the Foreign Minister of Japan, who says in his letter addressed to myself that they intend to take efficient means to restrict emigration to Canada. In a letter which I read concurrently with this one I find these words:

In order to further this object, I understand they are willing to restrict voluntarily within reasonable limits the volume of immigration.

Now because no number is mentioned, does that imply that there is not a numerical restriction? If my hon. friend will allow himself to be guided by common sense, by his experience in British Columbia in the summer and fall of 1907, as well as in 1908, not less than 8,000 or 9,000 immigrants came from Japan to Canada. This was the cause of riots in the streets of Vancouver. Now what has happened since then? You have the figures, they are loyally sent to this government by the Japanese consul in Ottawa, and there we find the exact number of Japanese immigrants coming to Canada. We know that Japan has lived up to that agreement, and I have no hesitation in saying that the agreement has been most loyally and most faithfully carried out to the letter.

Mr. COWAN. The Minister of Finance and the Postmaster General have both given us to understand that although we are handing over to the Japanese government the power to restrict immigration into Canada, yet we still retain that power which we agreed to hand over to Japan. You must either eat your cake or keep it. If you are giving the power to restrict immigration to Japan as long as that agreement is in existence, you cannot exercise that power which you have given away.

Mr. KING. Can my hon. friend tell me where, when this treaty expires, and it will in July, there is anything in the agreement to which he refers which will prevent this government from enacting any legislation it pleases in reference to immigration from Japan?

Mr. COWAN. There is the friendly understanding or agreement that the Japanese government and not the Canadian government shall exercise control over immigration into Canada. As long as that agreement endures you cannot exercise a power which, by that agreement, you have given to the Japanese government.

Mr. CARVELL. Suppose the agreement is abrogated?

Mr. COWAN. That is what we say will surely happen.

Mr. CARVELL. Supposing it is in six months, what then?

Mr. COWAN. Then we would have the control which we ought to have now. As long as that agreement endures it gives the control to the Japanese government and we cannot exercise it. I do not know that anything further need be said in answer to the argument that although we have given our cake to the Japanese government we still keep it. That is the argument, but I say it is impossible. If you have given them the control over immigration into Canada you cannot exercise that control as long as the agreement continues. I was a little astounded tonight to learn that this agreement has blossomed into a policy, forsooth, for Canada, that throughout the whole world we are hunting for bidders for the power to legislate with regard to immigration into Canada. We have gone to India and now we are trying to get China, if you please, to study the special conditions in Canada and to determine the number of immigrants that should come into Canada according to her judgment, and not according to our own. When we have exhausted the yellow races we are going to Europe and we are offering to give away the jurisdiction conferred upon this parliament by the Confederation Act. We are bartering the whole thing away. This is quite of a piece with the policy that proposes to barter away to a foreign country the power to legislate with regard to our tariff. The two policies have this in common that they are consistent the one with the other. They are able to give away the powers of legislation vested in this parliament by the Act of union to a foreign country and have no return whatever to Canada.

I was delighted with the pleasant, self-satisfied assertion of the hon. Minister of Labour when he rose in his place and declared in an orotund voice that he peculiarly represented the labour interests in Canada. I am prepared to admit that he does represent the labouring interests in this House in a peculiar way. When he consigned to the scrap heap the resolution in favour of technical education, better calculated than almost any other Bill that could be introduced into this House to develop a common citizenship in Canada, a national life and a national sentiment, he represented labour in a peculiar fashion.

Mr. KING. What Bill does the hon. gentleman refer to? There was never such a Bill before the House.

Mr. COWAN. Again, when the eight-hour Bill came before the House——

Mr. CARVELL.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FIELDING. What has this to do with the Japanese question?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. A point of order is raised. The question before the Chair is that of the treaty with Japan. I do not know what conclusion the hon. gentleman is going to draw from the argument he is now bringing forward, but whatever argument he brings forward must be applied to the particular resolution before the Chair. The connection is not very apparent to the past record of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. COWAN. I must apologize, Mr. Chairman, for the fact that the connection is not apparent because the connection of the remark of the hon. Minister of Labour that he represents labour in this House in a peculiar fashion is not exactly apparent as being apropos of the question under discussion. I am forced to deal with the matter in the same way the Minister of Labour did and I want to show that the policy which he is attempting to inaugurate in this House as a representative of labour in a peculiar fashion, culminating in this agreement, is a policy that from start to finish, is inimical to the best interests of the workingmen of Canada. I think I am justified, when he says that he is the peculiar representative of labour in this House, to agree with him to the extent of saying that his representation of that great interest—the labour interest—is a peculiar one. I was about to say, subject to your correction, that he is correct in saying that his position in this House as the representative of that class was peculiar when he mutilated that eight-hour Bill that has been before this House every session since I have had the honour of being a member of the House until it finally became a travesty on what it was when introduced. If he represents labour in the same peculiar way in reference to this question that peculiar way is one that the people and especially the labouring interests of Canada do not appreciate.

There is one more question to which I wish to make a very brief reference. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), with all the outward suits and trappings of eloquence, rose to the height of this great argument and to his own height, and said, a few moments ago, that the treaty now in existence between Japan and Canada is subject to our Immigration Act because his government had so determined it. The minister and his government cannot lift themselves over the stile by their boot straps in that way. They cannot make rules that govern the interpretation of international treaties. While they may exercise great power within a small radius, the arm of that power cannot reach to the extent that they can control the international rules that govern the interpretation of treaties. I would like some responsible lawyer on the other side to get up and repeat what the Minister of Agriculture had the hardihood to say that the treaty now in existence between Canada and Japan is subject to the Immigration Act of Canada. The Postmaster General in his own eloquent fashion has attempted to show that the Japanese immigrant coming into Canada is subject by law to exactly the same conditions as the English immigrant coming into Canada. Can the Postmaster General tell me that the provisions in the Immigration Act requiring the English immigrant to have $50 in his pocket would apply to the Japanese immigrant coming into Canada?

Mr. KING. That is not in the Act, that is a regulation.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Chairman, the profundity of that remark is exactly in keeping with every argument that has been made in support of this 'friendly understanding.' 'It is not in the Act, it is in the regulation.' That regulation is made by virtue of the Act, and, therefore, that provision is enforced by virtue of an Act of this parliament. Whether it is in the Act or in the regulation, I want to know if, out of the depths from which that remark came, I can get an answer to the question whether that provision can be lawfully applied to a Japanese immigrant coming into Canada under the present Japanese Treaty. No answer. The thing is so superficial and so out of joint with every principle of international law, and international usage that it taxes a man's common sense to deal with it. I believe that the member for Carleton has a thought upon this subject. We have heard him time and again in this House laying down the laws, not only the domestic laws, but the international laws, and rules and usages that govern the relations of nations, with a face of wisdom that would do credit to Coke. Perhaps he can tell me if the Japanese immigrant is immune from that regulation which requires an immigrant to have $50 in his poke, and if he is immune why is he immune? Why does the English immigrant have to show up or go back, and why has the Japanese immigrant a right to say: I will not show up, I will enter freely, and reside and travel in your country, and you can demand proof that I possess that $50 till you are black in the face, I will not give it. He has a perfect right to say that. Why again have we enlarged this policy of giving favours to any country that will undertake the legislative duties of this country? Why do we surrender our legislative functions to Japan, to India, or to China? This effort to show that the Japanese immigrant is on an even keel with the English immigrant is futile, it is impossible for you to show it. You cannot, for example, exact that $50 provision. That is a specimen brick of the whole structure. There are many other onerous conditions that apply to the English, Scotch and Irish immigrant coming into Canada that do not apply to the Japanese immigrant. Do we want to make this a preserve of China and Japan?

I wish to say publicly what I have never said publicly before, that my duties in Vancouver in September, 1907, at the time of the riot, to which the Postmaster General referred, revealed to me a state of things of which I think it is well for this House to take some cognizance. It is an absolute fact that a portion of the Dominion of Canada in the city of Vancouver was in the insurrectionist control of the Japanese for five days, and that notwithstanding the fact that there was a 'friendly understanding' at that very time. The Minister of Agriculture had told the hon. the leader of the opposition that that friendly agreement was both verbal and in writing. Notwithstanding that same friendly understanding, the influx to which the Postmaster General has referred took place and these 8,000 or 9,000 men, army reservists, bound by the most solemn oath ever administered to a subject of any country to return to the home land at the bidding of their emperor, no matter what their obligations to another foreign country, gathered and took actual possession of a portion of the city of Vancouver. The powers that be in Canada, the police of the city, the arm that enforces the laws of Canada, was powerless in the face of that insurrectionist mob. I do not want to sound the note of danger too strongly, but I tell you that British subjects who live in those conditions and realize what they mean to the arm that enforces the law, realize that the condition of things is absolutely and entirely different from any condition that we ever saw in Canada before, and I hope we will never see such a condition again. They realize that it is our duty, while we maintain the most friendly and courteous relations with those people, to see to it that not they, but we study the special conditions in Canada, which will tell us whether or not we want more immigration from that country. We cannot do that as long as we have this agreement. I think that right now is the time when we should recover to ourselves the power that we have voluntarily given away, and maintain it in the public interest. The Postmaster General was anxious to ascertain what exercise we would make of that control if we had it back. That would depend entirely on the special conditions, and it is our duty to study these conditions, and should not be the duty of a foreign power. These special conditions are in Canada and our solemn duty is to legislate under the powers given to us in the Confederation Act, and to enforce the law. We have been derelict in both these duties, we have been handing over the legislative power to a foreign country, and when a little disturbance came, we were unable to enforce the domestic laws of our country.

Keeping in mind these conditions, it behooves us to go carefully. We in the west know it, we realize these problems as the people in the east do not, and I hope that this House will not take a sectional view of this question. We in British Columbia I hope take no narrow view of this question. We do not wish to legislate against the Japanese. We do not wish to discriminate against them, but we wish to retain our own national self-respect, and to exercise the legislative and administrative control which it is not only our right, but our duty to exercise.

Mr. OLIVER. It seems to me that some of our hon. friends opposite are unduly excited about the measure of control which Canada exercises in regard to immigration. We have an immigration law, and it applies to such people, and in such way as the parliament of Canada sees fit to decide that it shall apply. I do not know what more our friends want. The idea that they seem to have that Canada has in some way abrogated its control of its own affairs does not seem to me to have any warrant. We pass a statute, and we pass regulations under that statute which declare that certain people are admitted to Canada under certain conditions, and certain other people are admitted to Canada under certain other conditions. That does not in any way argue that Canada has not control of her own immigration laws or her own affairs. It may be that it suits Canada to deal with one class of immigrants in one way, and with another class in another way. We have done so, as a matter of fact; and if it suits Canada to deal with Japanese immigrants under certain conditions, with Hindu immigrants under other conditions, with Chinese immigrants under other conditions, and with European immigrants under different conditions, in what way is Canada's control over immigration abrogated? I cannot see any warrant for the suggestion. Our hon. friends have taken the view that in the case of Japan we have handed over our authority in regard to immigration to Canada, to the government of Japan. I fail to see the foundation for their view. They are pleased to put it that we have negotiated with Japan, and have said to Japan, we will accept in immigration matters such direction and legislation as you see fit. From my point of view, it is this way; we have said to Japan, unless you restrict the movement of your people to Canada, we will take such measures as will restrict it. That seems to me to be the position, and there is no derogation from the authority of Canada in taking that position, nor is there any handing over of our authority over immigration from Japan. Immigrants from Japan are subject to our immigration laws the same as any other immigrants. If our hon. friends want any enlightment on the subject, they will find that during the excitement in regard to immigration from Japan, when large numbers of Japanese had come to British Columbia, and large numbers of others were in prospect of coming, while we were negotiating with Japan as to the attitude that Japan should take in regard to her citizens who were under her control, it was just as necessary for us to take action in regard to her citizens who were not under her control. It will be remembered that the movement of the Japanese into British Columbia was not so much a movement from Japan as it was from the Sandwich Islands, which are a part of the United States. There were thousands of those people there, and there was a concerted movement to bring them to Canada. No law of Japan could control that movement; but the parliament of Canada passed legislation empowering the government to take certain action. An amendment to the Immigration Act was passed, called the indirect passage provision, authorizing the Governor in Council to pass regulations to prevent the landing in Canada of persons who came otherwise than from the country of their citizenship or birth. This amendment was passed for the purpose of excluding these Japanese from the Sandwich Islands who were going to be brought to Canada in thousands, and the result was that they were excluded.

Mr. GOODEVE. Was it not a fact that before that applied to Japan you had to get the consent of Japan?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly we did not have to get the consent of Japan. We had to get the consent of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, and I may say we had some difficulty in getting it; but once we got that, there was no impediment whatever. We passed the order in council, and the prospective movement was checked, and did not take place. It is a figment of the imagination to suppose that the government of Canada is not controlling its own immigration affairs; but if by frendly arrangement the government of Japan sees fit to take action that will arrive at the same end as other action which the government of Canada might take, and certainly would take, it seems to me that there is no fault to be found, and no derogation from the authority of Canada or the proper exercise of that authority. Surely it is better policy to be on friendly terms with another country than on unfriendly terms. It is better not to have restrictive and coercive measures if they can be avoided. We would be very glad to-day if we could have an arrangement with the United States that would remove the difficulties that arise along the three thousand miles of our border by reason of the exclusion of undesirables; everybody will agree that that would be a good thing. The same with the Empire of Japan. If we can have a friendly arrangement with that country, it is better in the interests of this country, and of the world. The hon. member for Vancouver expressed surprise that a certain Act should have blossomed out into a policy. Well, I understand that this Act is a part of the general policy of the Liberal government of Canada. It is always the policy of the Liberal government of Canada, if I understand aright, to make a friendly arrangement rather than to have unfriendly acts: and the prosperity which Canada has achieved under the Liberal administration is all the evidence I want that that policy is the best policy for Canada, and I believe that it is the most acceptable to the people of Canada.

Mr. GOODEVE. The Minister of the Interior started out by taking the direct opposite view to that of the other four ministers who have spoken to-night. He argued from entirely different premises. I do not know whether or not he was in the House while they were speaking, but certainly they laid it down that they had decided as a policy that they would allow the Japanese—and the Minister of Agriculture went further and said that they were negotiating to allow the Chinese—to regulate their immigration into Canada instead of Canada regulating it itself. So that is entirely contrary to the argument of the Minister of the Interior started out with, although he ended somewhat by following along the same lines as the other four ministers. With regard to the other question which has been raised, particularly by the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) over and over again, namely, on what ground I base my statement that the Japanese in this particular instance were regulating the emigration into Canada, I had not the papers at the time, but I have them now, and I propose to read the one in connection with the other which I think will prove conclusively the argument I have made. I have here a letter of December 23, 1907, addressed to the Minister of Labour from the Japanese minister. I shall not read the whole of it as it is in 'Hansard'. In that letter the Japanese minister says:

In reply to your note of recent date, I have the honour to state that although the existing treaty between Japan and Canada absolutely guarantees Japanese subjects full liberty to enter, travel and reside in any part of the Dominion of Canada, yet it is not the intention of the Imperial government to insist upon the complete enjoyment of the rights and privileges guaranteed by those stipulations when that would involve disregard of special conditions which may prevail in Canada from time to time.

Then he goes on:

In carrying out this purpose the Imperial government——

That is the imperial government of Japan——

—in pursuance of the policy above stated, will give careful consideration to local conditions prevailing in Canada with a view to meeting the desires of the government of the Dominion as far as is compatible with the spirit of the treaty and the dignity of the state.

Absolutely as far as compatible with the spirit of the treaty, and the dignity of the state. Based on that treaty——

Mr. FIELDING. Which the Japanese government have themselves terminated.

Mr. GOODEVE. I am going to show you that they have not terminated it. He says: 'As far as is compatible with the spirit of the treaty and the dignity of the state.' The Minister of Finance has admitted that. Then the Japanese minister goes on:

Although I stated in the note under reply, it was not possible for me to acquiesce in all the proposals made by you on behalf of the Canadian government, I trust that you will find in the statement herein made proof of the earnest desire of the Imperial government to promote by every means within their power the growth and stability of the cordial and mutually beneficially relations which exist between our countries.

By this it is absolutely clear that the imperial government of Japan retains the absolute right to judge of the conditions, and to interpret the terms on which they shall have free right to enter, travel and reside in any part of the Dominion.

This refers to the treaty, and that is the letter, admitted by the Minister of Finance to my hon. firend from Vancouver, on which that was based. Here is the letter written by the minister, dated Ottawa, May 10, 1911. The last paragraph of that letter is as follows:

The question of immigration has been discussed between us on several occasions. I do not deem it necessary that this should be more than mentioned here, inasmuch as the assurance received from you of the willingness of your government to continue a friendly understanding on that matter at present existing is entirely satisfactory to us.

Here we have the admission of the Minister of Finance that the agreement is based on that letter I have just read.

Mr. FIELDING. Not guilty.

Mr. GOODEVE. It cannot be based on anything else. What is the agreement that is entirely satisfactory to the minister?

Mr. FIELDING. The agreement, or understanding which was expressed in a letter read by the hon. member for Vancouver, in which it was stated by the Japanese authorities that this understanding was absolutely outside the treaty and in no way dependent upon it.

Mr. GOODEVE. But the Minister of Finance says he is now dealing with a new condition, and I must hold him to that. I am discussing the resolution on the Order Paper, and that resolution is based on a certain return brought down by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FIELDING. I cannot find anything of the kind on the Order Paper.

Mr. GOODEVE. In connection with that resolution the minister gives us a certain return which he lays on the table as full information. I find the last paragraph of that return is just as I stated. He proposes that the agreement shall continue. I ask what agreement? It must be some agreement. And we have the admission that the agreement was the agreement based on that letter I have just read, and which was accepted by this government. That being the case we take exception to it because we think that the time has arrived when we should take back the control over that immigration. It does not matter whether or not the Japanese have lived up to the spirit of that agreement. The question is we have not the sole and absolute control which we ought to have, and there is no reciprocal benefit for the Dominion. We have the right to know on what basis the minister is binding us for another indefinite term of years. I put him the question, and so did my hon. friend from Vancouver, and he said it is on the basis laid out in these letters. That being the case, I think I have proved the contention I have made.

Mr. BURRELL. Let me reply to the remark made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) who said very clearly that in no respect had Canada deferred to the wishes of Japan in curtailing the immigration from Hawaii. I have here a speech by the Postmaster General made in this House on January 28, 1908, and in the course of that speech he said:

> But I can tell him that public opinion in Canada, public opinion even in British Columbia, accepts in good faith the assurance given by the Japanese government. But that is not all. We have this written assurance from the Minister of Foreign Affairs. It is the more binding because it is given of Japan's own free will. We also have the declaration that we may stop any immigration of Japanese originating from the Island of Hawaii, whence this great influx of labour came. Still more than that, we have a formal declaration that no contract labour will come to Canada from Japan or Hawaii or any other place where Japanese are colonized.

I think that shows pretty clearly that the government did get the consent of the Japanese before they dealt with the question of Hawaii. In a debate of this kind we should not lose sight of the fact that we are all Canadians trying to deal with an immensely grave question and to deal with it in the best interests of the future of Canada. And I must enter rather a protest against the tone of the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) who told us there were two ways of dealing with this question, one by conciliation or diplomacy, and the other by 'defiance,' to use a word which he repeated several times, the very plain imputation being that those who do not agree with the particular form of diplomacy which he favours were following the other method. I think that is very regrettable. I can assure the Minister of Labour and the other members of the government that the average man in British Columbia regards this question as of supreme national importance; he is not looking at it in the narrow-minded way. And I think it was gratuitous folly, also almost to assume that we are 'hurling defiance' at another nation on a question which should be above that method of treatment. This is all the more to be noted because nearly every one of the members of this government have come round to the views in favour of restriction that they now entertain simply through the opinion in British Columbia expressed year after year. I do not wish to weary the House, but I could quote passage after passage from the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux)—although he came round sooner than the others—the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), and many other members of the government to show that they did not understand the gravity of this question or appreciate our view until the constant reiteration of those views and compelled them to look into the question, and to their gradually being converted to the views we hold, though their methods of solving the problem may be different. The government tells us that ours is simply a policy of harsh legislation, while theirs is a policy of diplomacy. One thing is certainly true—that no Canadian has the right to forget that, for the people of Japan and for ourselves, the time has come, when we should look this question frankly in the face and recognize that oriental immigration into western Canada is an impossible thing without creating violent friction between the two countries. But let me point out also to the government, who argue that we favour an intolerant method, that the Japanese do not hesitate to exclude the Chinese labourers from their country. They have a clause forbidding absolutely the Chinese Coolies who come into competition, and fierce competition with the Japanese labourers. When economic conditions are sufficiently stringent and national dangers sufficiently grave, the Japanese government does not hesitate to practise what this government tells us we ought not to practise in regard to Japan. The Minister of Agriculture asked us whether we want restriction or exclusion. We want exclusion. And he himself is coming round to that view. I could quote that from his speeches to show that the principle of exclusion commends itself to him. We have had a new doctrine from the Minister of Labour, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Agriculture. They have taken the ground that the treaty is subject to our immigration law. I cannot say that the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture were very clear to me. In section 38 of our Immigration Act are these words:

The Governor in Council may, by proclamation or order, whenever he deems it necessary or expedient, prohibit for a stated period or permanently the landing in Canada, or the landing at any specified port of Canada of immigrants belonging to any race deemed unsuited to the climate or the climates of Canada, or an immigrant of any specified class, occupation or character.

I could quote, if there were time, a number of passages from government speakers to show that the Japanese are regarded by them as not suited for the requirement of Canada and, therefore, would come under the section. According to the Minister of Agriculture the Japanese treaty would have to be read in the light of that section. If they were to plainly say that it would save trouble. Now, let me point out the situation in the United States—I asked the Minister of Agriculture a question on that point which he did not answer very clearly. In the former treaty with the United States they have this clause:

It is, however, understood that the stipulations obtained in this and the preceding article do not in any way effect the laws ordinances and regulations with respect to trade, the immigration of labourers, police and the public security which are in force, or which may hereafter be enacted in either two countries.

The United States had that clause in their treaty; and, after much correspondence, and with great efforts on the part of Japan to restrain the United States from putting such enactments into their immigration law as would mean absolute exclusion, they deleted this clause from their present treaty, as is known to the government, and in doing that it is perfectly clear the present treaty did not come under the Immigration Act of the United States, and for that very reason the United States put in this very protocol which has been referred to and which distinctly says that this treaty is on the understanding that it shall be subject to the general immigration law of the United States. That, I think, is absolutely clear. Now, if we are to solve this question I hold we should solve it by having admitted the principle of our inalienable right to control our own immigration. But, if we were to make any other arrangement, the arrangement the United States have in this treaty is far ahead of anything we have. It means a contract, practically, on the part of a recognized plenipotentiary of Japan to maintain restriction which has almost amounted to exclusion in the past three years, and in addition put the whole matter under the immigration law of the United States, which, in spite of anything said here to-night, I fail to see it done in our case.

I have only to repeat that our feeling in British Columbia must not be misunderstood. We regard the whole matter as of intense, vital importance not only to British Columbia but to the whole of Canada. We are looking to the future. No man can say what the development in the national life of Japan may be—what clashes there may be between the east and the west—that is too big a subject to go into. But we should be fools if we were to shut our eyes to the possibilities of grave dangers, and it would be grave danger to allow the Japanese people to imagine that we do not control, had not control, over these matters ourselves, or to think anything else but to face the broad fact that fusion of the two races is impossible, that we should be better friends far apart, and a frank recognition of these things now would save a great deal of trouble in the future.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. Fielding moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 223) respecting duties of customs on importations from Japan.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time and second time, and the House went into committee on the Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. This Bill has been prepared and submitted to the Justice Department, and is giving effect to the resolution which the House has just adopted. It is substantially for the same purpose, and has the approval of the Justice Department.

Mr. COWAN. I want to examine that Bill more carefully.

Mr. FIELDING. It can only go through with general consent. We will let the Bill go through, and stand for third reading to-morrow, so that hon. gentlemen opposite may examine it.

On section 1,

Mr. SPROULE. That would allow them the privilege of sending free goods in here the same as into the United States.

Mr. FIELDING. That is the principle of the favoured nations. Any concessions granted to any country would have to be granted to Japan, the same as by the present treaty.

Progress reported.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS AT QUEBEC.

House in committee on Bill (No. 222) respecting the National Battlefields at Quebec.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood we were to have a ruling of the Speaker as to the regularity with which the Bill was introduced.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not understand that my hon. friend raised a formal objection. He mentioned that he would raise it later on. I do not think the objection can be taken seriously, because, as I explained yesterday, this is not a money Bill. The commission which was organized by chapters 57 and 58 Edward VII., is empowered to receive from various sections of the country, subscriptions towards the acquiring and maintaining of the National Battlefields on the Plains of Abraham. I have here the statute which constituted that commission, and the powers of the commission are defined in section 7:

> The commission may (a) receive and expend any moneys, whether appropriated by parliament or the legislatures or contributed by any municipality or other body or private individual, for the purposes authorized by this Act;
> (b) remove all buildings and other structures upon the lands taken or acquired, and erect a museum and such monuments and statues or other works as seem fitting or approprite; and
> (c) lay out and construct on or through the said lands such avenues, drives or paths, gardens, squares or other works as are, in the opinion of the commission, desirable for the improvement of the grounds and the conversion thereof into a national park of a character to commemorate worthily the great events which happened there.

Now, the same statute also enacted that whenever they acquired property for the purpose mentioned in the statute, the payment for such lands, properties, and buildings and for the maintenance of this park, must be ratified by the Governor in Council.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose this was a Bill for the purpose of the commencement of a new navy and it would entail a charge on the revenue in future, the minister could with equal propriety, advance the same argument that he is doing now. There would not be a dollar spent until it was voted by parliament on this undertaking which is expected to involve in future a charge upon the revenue of the country.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Unquestionably. If the commission were coming before us to-day asking aid from parliament towards the acquisition of the properties and lands mentioned in this Bill, unquestionably it would have to be dealt with through a resolution to the House. My hon. friend would be perfectly right then, but, at the present instance, the commission has a trust fund in its own hands, subscriptions received from various parts of the empire, and it is with the money that the commission has in its own hands that it purposes to purchase some of the properties mentioned in the Bill. Under these circumstances the objection taken by my hon. friend does not apply.

Mr. SPROULE. I think I had a perfect right to raise the point of order. I understand distinctly that I have a right to have the ruling of the Chair upon it and that is all I ask. It is my right and I shall insist upon it at some stage of this Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly, when the third reading comes, my hon. friend will be quite at liberty to raise the objection.

Mr. SPROULE. Not quite at liberty to raise it, but I do raise it and my understanding was that the Speaker was to rule upon it the next time we reached the Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I did not so understand it. At all events I shall be glad to have the decision of the Chair and I am sure that my hon. friend will find that his objection does not apply in the present instance. The object of the Bill is clearly mentioned in the preamble. The commission has authority to purchase, as my hon. friend will see by chapter 58, 7 and 8 Edward VII, certain properties and lands for the National Battlefields Park at Quebec. The lands to be acquired now are the lands which will complete, according to the plan of the architect engaged by the commission, the park in question.

Mr. LENNOX. I have been singularly unfortunate in failing to make myself clear or else the hon. gentleman is a little obtuse. What I desire the hon. gentleman to point out, is whether or not the purpose, that is now sought to be accomplished is within the scope of the purpose for which the commission was organized.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. gentleman, a moment ago, read an extract from the statute stating that it had the right to receive and dispose of moneys in accordance with the purpose and objects mentioned in the original statute. If he would refer to the part of the statute which says what the objects are or what they can do we will know what they can do.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Section 5, of chapter 57, 7 and 8 Edward VII, provides that:

The commisison may purchase, acquire and hold the lands or immovable property in the city of Quebec, or in the vicinity thereof, where the great battles were fought, or which were occupied by the various commands of the respective armies upon the battlefields.

The lands mentioned in the sections of the Bill which I have the honour to present to the committee are exactly the lands where the two battles were fought. The hon. gentleman will see that it is within the scope of the powers of the commission.

Mr. LENNOX. I really do not see it. I would think that probably they have the right to acquire lands and that they probably have the right to acquire the lands that are here spoken of. I have not read the Bill, but I heard it explained by the minister the other day and one of the objects was that it was to lend money to the village of Montcalm.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is provided for in the last clause of the Bill, and when we reach that I will explain it.

Mr. LENNOX. All I was concerned about— and I am not very much concerned because the government will take the responsibility—was to know whether we had the right to authorize the commission to lend money in the way contemplated by this Bill. I would think we had not, but I am not going to try to embarrass the position or delay the passage of the Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think that my hon. friend, with his legal experience, will see that it is within the power of the commission to do what is applied for now. By clause 5 they are empowered to purchase land where the two battlefields are situated. By another clause they purpose opening an avenue between the Plains of Abraham and the Monument des Braves on the Ste. Foye road. In order to open that avenue they are obliged to apply to the municipality of the town of Montcalm. The municipality is ready to cede the lisière needed for the avenue in question, which will be one of the features of the great national park and, in order to cede the lisière the town of Montcalm is obliged to pay a certain price for the acquisition of the property. The town of Montcalm has proposed to get from the commission a loan of $15,000 which will be applied towards the acquisition of the lisière. The property will revert to the commission. The commission, within thirty years, will have recovered the amount of $15,000 with interest at three per cent per annum. Otherwise the commission would have been forced to take another avenue called the Belvidere avenue, which would cost $19,000. By this transaction the commission save $4,000, immediately, and get, in the long run, the lisière gratis. From Mr. Todd's report my hon. friend will see that for spectacular effect this is the only available place to locate that avenue.

Mr. BLAIN. What amount has been expended by this government in connection with this work?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The government of Canada contributed $300,000 for the celebration, including the reception to the present King, and distinguished visitors from France, the United States and the various colonies. The commission has not spent any of the money subscribed from the various colonies, and by the Daughters of the Empire, or the votes of $100,000 each from the governments of Ontario and Quebec.

On section 2,

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why are they obliged to come to parliament, have they no power under the original statute to acquire property?

Mr. LEMIEUX. By section 10 of chapter 57, 1908, it is provided:

No land or immovable property shall be purchased or acquired by the commission except with the previous authority of parliament, and no expenditure shall be made by the commission until it has been approved by parliament.

Mr. SPROULE. How much land in all is there, and how much is it intended to purchase?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I cannot state the acreage necessary to complete the park. I have here a plan which I shall show to my hon. friend. Later on the commission may apply to parliament for some aid for the maintenance of the park, and then they will probably give to the House a more elaborate plan than the present one, which is only for the purpose of this Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. It appears that it is contemplated buying a considerable quantity of land. We ought to be informed from whom this land is going to be purchased, what it is going to cost the country, and its area.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I gave yesterday the report prepared by the architect, Mr. Todd, in which my hon. friend will find a description of about the area of the park. I could not give it exactly myself.

Mr. SPROULE. Surely the minister ought to be able to tell the House how much land it is proposed to purchase.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may say that no payment will be made for these lands without receiving the sanction of parliament. The members of the commission have told me that already they have approached the owners of the various properties. My hon. friend can be assured that nothing will be done in this matter that will not redound to the credit of the commissioners.

Mr. SPROULE. That seems to be, I was going to say, only trifling with the House. We do not know how much they propose to buy, what options they have received or what they are committing the country to—nothing at all but the assurance that the commissioners will do nothing but what is right, and that parliament will be called on to approve of what they do.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The total area is 220 acres. Many of the properties belong to the federal government, some belong to the local government, and two or three belong either to the federal government or the local government.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why is the purchase of this property accomplished in this indirect way? Would it not be better to acquire it directly?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It will cost $4,000 less this way than the other project of passing through Belvidère road but finally it will cost nothing to the commission. It is a loan which the commission makes to the municipality of Montcalm, in order that the municipality may be in a position to purchase the strip of land necessary to have the avenue. Then the municipality undertakes to cede that strip to the commission and within thirty years to pay that $50,000 loan with interest of 3 per cent.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. SPROULE. Before you leave the Chair, Sir, I had an understanding that the Speaker was to give a ruling on this Bill.

Mr SPROULE.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule by which we are guided is section 54 of the British North America Act:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to pass any vote, resolution, address or Bill for the appointment of any part of the public revenue, or any tax or impost to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or Bill is proposed.

Mr. SPROULE. But this is likely to cost $165,000, and the commission will not have enough to defray the expenses.

Mr. FIELDING. We have to take the resolution as it stands and it imposes no burden on the treasury. Surely my hon. friend will see that this is not in that sense a money bill. We have to take things as they are and not possibilities.

Mr. SPEAKER. I can only judge of the Bill now before me and, for that reason the objection is not sustained.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am going to ask the committee to pass some items that it is very important to have voted in order to carry on work which has largely to be done by day work, some of it being for repairs. Then there are some items for dredging, in regard to which it is necessary to have the full vote, because the dredging work is performed in the summer season.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia—Amaguadees pond (Castle bay)—to complete addition to wharf and road, $500.

Mr. LENNOX. Where is this?

Mr. FIELDING. In Nova Scotia.

Mr. LANCASTER. There is a local election going on in Nova Scotia.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This has nothing to do with that election.

Mr. SPROULE. If there is a portion of the whole vote already given, I should think that would be sufficient to keep the work going during the season. The understanding was that we would vote a certain sum which would keep all public works going until about the 1st of September. We will be able to vote the rest of the supply long before the 1st of September.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have kept that in mind. I asked my deputy to go through the items, and act on that principle. But suppose there is $1,000 to be spent on a wharf, and that work ought to be done in a fortnight, or in a month. The men who are to be paid for their day's work will not be able to understand why the government cannot pay them every week. I have had these items marked, and I showed them to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I have not heard from him, but I do not think he would consider it unreasonable that this should be done. I am leaving hundreds of items in my estimates which I do not propose to touch at all, only those that are absolutely essential in order to carry on these works during the working season.

Argyle sound—repairs and extension to public wharf, $700.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is in the county of Yarmouth.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Did the minister say that I had consented to these items?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, I said I had no reason to suppose that my hon. friend would object to them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think the hon. gentleman told me that he was desirous of having them passed.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not say that the hon. gentleman had agreed to them, but I said that I had not reason to suppose my hon. friend objected.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, that he had no reason to suppose that the hon. gentleman objected.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does that mean that he was satisfied?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, I do not think it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What the hon. gentleman did in reference to the matter was to supply me with a copy of the estimates with the items marked to which the minister desired to direct my attention. I placed this in the hands of the committee on this side of the House, which looks after these matters.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What does the committee think?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The members of the committee are here now.

Mr. SPROULE. There is enough in the list to keep us going until morning.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The items that I am asking to have passed are for small repairs or for some other work which has to be done by day work, and which has to be done in the summer season. They are all believed to be necessary works and in some cases for material are actually made. Unless these amounts are voted I would have, in the course of a short time, to stop the work. That is not in the public interest. There are hundreds of items in my estimates that still remain.

Mr. LENNOX. There are hundreds of items every year which the minister takes and does not attempt to expend the money. It is kept dangling before the electors for years and some of these are probably of that character.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. BLAIN. Is there much shipping at Argyle Sound?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think there is a great deal, but the wharf is there and it requires repairs. The item is only $700.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). May I interrupt to ask the minister with respect to the marked copy of the estimates he handed to me? What is meant by the marks? Some are marked with straight lines and some with crosses.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The straight line means an existing wharf, and the cross means a new work on which the work is to be done by day labour. I am not asking for votes for any works which have to be done by contract.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the hon. gentleman want all these items?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, the deputy tells me that it would be very awkward if we do not get them.

Mr. BLAIN. How many will be left?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hundreds.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the minister want us seriously to believe that this money is required by the 1st September.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The deputy tells me that it is.

Mr. LANCASTER. Five-twelfths would be all that would be spent.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, it would not be sufficient.

Mr. BLAIN. Does not my hon. friend think that this is a violation of the proposition laid down by the Prime Minister before leaving for Europe?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think so.

Mr. BLAIN. I understood the Prime Minister to make the statement in the House that he desired before leaving that a certain amount be passed. He made a subsequent statement in the House asking that further items be passed naming in particular the annuities of Indians. As I understand it the list now submitted by the Minister of Public Works is a brand new list.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is no understanding, and no obligation, expressed or implied, upon hon. gentlemen opposite to pass these items, but I understand that we are perfectly free to submit them for consideration.

Mr. LANCASTER. Are we, at twenty minutes past one, to take up these items? When we passed the three-twelths additional it gave you a supply until the 1st of September. We will meet in the middle of July and the hon. gentleman will have six weeks from then until the 1st of September wherein he can report what has been spent and tell us how much more he needs, if any. If we pass this whole item we have voted the money in full and then no information and no criticism are any good. It is done. We are voting money without knowing whether we should vote it or not when we vote it in full. As long as we retain a portion of each item we are free to protect the people by refusing to vote the balance. At twenty minutes past one in the morning I do not think it is reasonable that we should be asked to strain our minds with regard to these items and pass them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What my hon. friend says would be quite true if there were a lump sum voted which we could draw upon for different works. Let me answer the hon. gentleman by reference to the item we now have under consideration. It is for repairs and extensions to a wharf. The item is $700 and five-twelths of that would be a little over $300. When the work is undertaken it has to be all done.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the hon. gentleman say seriously that it will not be finished by the 18th July?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Certainly it should be finished in three weeks time.

Mr. LENNOX. It can be done in three weeks after we come back.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the repairs are urgently required there should be no delay.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister says that none of these are contract works.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. SPROULE. What about Port Arthur for which $650,000 is asked. Is not that a contract work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not asking for that. I have decided on abandoning that. I told the hon. leader of the opposition that I would leave that out.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The list which the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), has in his hands is a list which the hon. Minister of Finance was good enough to give to me by way of notice that a certain number of items would be presented, and that we would be urged to pass them in full.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Minister of Public Works afterwards saw me, and said that the first six items would not be pressed at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and the reason was that I felt that my hon. friend might fairly object to these because they are large items. I took these small items which are necessary to do repair work, and other small works, which, from their nature, could better be done by the day than by contract.

Mr. SPROULE. What about your extra dredging for which you are asking $3,000,000? That could not possibly be done inside the time.

Mr. PUGSLEY. With a vote of only that proportion the work would have to stop in July. This is in the county of Yarmouth.

Mr. JAMESON. What is the nature of the work to be done?

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is undertaken on the report of the resident engineer. It is to provide for the reflooring of the present wharf and a short extension of cribwork 28 feet long. The wharf was built 10 years ago and there has been no expenditure on it since.

Mr. CROSBY. Is wharfage collected on it?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not sure if this has been transferred to the Marine and Finance Department or not, but I think it has not.

Mr. CROSBY. We passed an Act a session or two ago providing for the transfer of all these wharfs to the Marine and Fisheries Department, the idea being that wharfage was to be collected on them all. I do not want to insist on wharfage being collected on any wharf because the people derive the benefit from a free service, but I have been told that where wharfage is collected there is sometimes discrimination as between different persons using the wharf and when you have not uniformity in different places people residing in places where wharfage is collected are dissatisfied when they go to other places and find that wharfage is not collected. Whatever system is adopted it should be carried out uniformly and universally.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have been very reluctant to comply with all requests made by the Marine Department for the transfer of wharfs to them, because I know the collection of wharfage in some cases at least would be a hardship on the people. The wharfage is not very much to the government, but it is quite a burden on the people who have to pay. Two wharfs, one in New Brunswick and one in Nova Scotia, at Campbellton and Digby, pay about one-sixth of all wharfage collected in the Dominion. Some years ago a proposal was made to collect wharfage on the St. John river where no wharfage is collected on the provincial wharfs, and the people objected very strongly. Only this morning I found a request from the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries to transfer all wharfs to that department. I do not think I shall do so without bringing the matter before council and having it talked over. I would like to see some better system adopted, and possibly I ought to transfer all the wharfs to the Marine Department. But the Marine Department does not repair the wharfs, except some little repairs to the extent of $25. The repairs are all done in my department.

Mr. BLAIN. Are we to understand that when a wharf is transferred to the Marine Department, dues are at once collected?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not think the revenue will show any great amount of dues.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The revenue is very small except in cities and towns, and at these small wharfs in the country districts it seems hardly worth while to collect it.

Argyle sound—repairs and extension to public wharf, $700.

Mr. JAMESON. When is it proposed to go on with this work? Votes of this character have been placed in the estimates from time to time, and have not been expended, but have been merely dangled before the eyes of the people and used for the purpose of securing votes, and after the election is over it is found that the money has not been expended or the work gone on with. Will the minister give me the direct statement to-night that he intends to go on with this work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. This work has been asked for, not by the member for the county nor by any of our friends in the county, but by the resident engineer, who reports that it is necessary. The intention is to go right ahead with the work this year.

Mr. CROCKET. Is this amount intended to cover the whole expenditure?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Has not my hon. friend been careless in letting his wharf go to pieces? It has been standing for ten years, and now this is a hurry-up order.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, it is not a hurry-up order, but Mr. Dodwell, the resident engineer, says that the work is necessary, and that is why the vote is proposed.

Mr. CROCKET. What is the size of this extension?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Twenty-eight feet long, eleven feet wide and ten high.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I hope the minister does not intend to waste the time of the House on small items such as this, which can easily be voted after the recess. They surely cannot expend more than five-twelfths of this $700 in these six weeks. I do not see any urgent necessity for passing this item.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The deputy minister reports that in respect of these works the engineer is instructed to go ahead and make the repairs; he assembles the men, appoints the foremen, and they go to work. It does not take them long to spend $700. If they cannot go on and complete the work, it has to be left half finished, and when a further amount is voted, the men have to be brought back again. In many cases, if these repairs are not made, it means serious damage to the wharfs and an expenditure of thousands of dollars.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the minister state what is the nature of the traffic carried on at that wharf?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not that information. I am told that it is a fishing and trading district. I am told this is to accommodate fishing vessels and other small craft.

Mr. CROSBY. I understand it is to be extended 28 feet long by 11 feet wide and 10 feet high. Is that 10 feet over the surface of the water?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We do not build on top of the water.

Mr. CROSBY. If you build it much under water, you will not have any on top.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We do not want very much above the water. A couple of feet above the surface is sufficient. It is only for small vessels drawing about 8 feet of water. The neap tide is 10 feet.

Mr. DANIEL. Is this owned by the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, it was built by the government in 1902.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister says that the revenue was about $30,000 for the whole Dominion for these wharfs. In the Auditor General's Report I find that the contribution of Ontario was last year $5,661; Quebec, $2,879.29; Nova Scotia, $5,456.46; New Brunswick, $3,637; British Columbia, $314.16; making a total of $20,042.46.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Suppose I admit all that would my hon. friend cease further objection?

Mr. LANCASTER. Why not wait until the 14th of June?

Mr. PUGSLEY. These amounts are for repairs and my engineers report that they are absolutely essential. The work is urgently required, and if the repairs are not made the result may be a considerable loss to the country. Every reasonable man knows that to be the case. If hon. members opposite wish to keep back supply they can do it, for there are a large number of items in my department. But the responsibility must rest with them. I want it to be borne in mind that I began early in the session and remained here day after day and night after night trying to get these items through. But the hon. member for Simcoe and the hon. member for Grenville specially requested that further time should not be spent on the Public Works items, because my department had been fully discussed. We yielded to that and the items were allowed to stand. I am not asking for amounts for wharfs to be built by contract.

Mr. CROCKET. This for day labour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, entirely, and the men who do the work must be paid.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I made a certain arrangement with the Prime Minister about Supply. I am anxious to carry out that arrangement and if there is any doubt I will give the benefit of the doubt against myself. I did not hear anything about items that were to be passed in full until the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made his statement in the House. But I thought his statement reasonable and assented at once. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) sent me, yesterday, I think, a list, not very large in number but rather large in amount, forty-seven items altogether, which he said he would like to have presented to the committee and voted in full if possible. That was followed by a list from the Minister of Public Works covering 449 items. It seems a pretty large wholesale order especially when one felt that he had fulfilled what had been arranged before the Prime Minister went away.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But they do not amount altogether to as much as the five or six items I have abandoned.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Some are small, but some are fairly substantial. I think it would be hardly worth while to waste a great deal of time in endeavouring to pass to-night 449 items, unless hon. members on this side are prepared to pass them as a wholesale order and without information.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. PUGSLEY. How would it do to put it over until the morning?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think that would be a good idea.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Very well, we will do that.

Mr. BLAIN. This is an item of $700. The minister's statement is that if the money is not voted the work cannot be done. Did not that suggest itself to him at the beginning of the session, six months ago?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There are about 1,100 items in my department. We have to be guided by the reports of the engineers, and a great many of them are reported as urgent. I began last November and taking the items in order, did everything I could to get them all through, but yielded as I explained to the request of some hon. members opposite that the discussion of the Public Works items should be suspended. We have now reached the time when the working season is beginning, it will be necessary to have this money to pay these men, and it will be a great hardship if they cannot get their pay when it is due.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not see why the hon. gentleman's deputy did not come to him with the information about the urgency of these votes two or three months ago. I cannot see any bona fides in it; apparently there are none. The five-twelfths voted ought to cover the purpose. The explanation is, to say the least very fishy.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think we had better accept the suggestion of the Minister of Public Works and adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. FIELDING. Perhaps some other minister might get some items through. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) has some suggestions to offer.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). If the Minister of Railways desires to break the arrangement in this matter he can urge these things.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not urging anything. I am 'the mildest mannered man that ever cut a throat.'

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not understand the desire to break an arrangement.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will submit the items, and we will leave them till morning if hon. members say so. The first is an amount of $10,000 to pay expenses in connection with cases before the Board of Railway Commissioners. We have a very important case before the board in the telegraph investigation. It would be embarrassing while they are in the midst of that case; if it prove that there is no money to pay expenses. The next item is for several compassionate allowances for the heirs of two men drowned in the Hudson bay survey and others who lost their lives in the employ of the department.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Carried.

Mr. GRAHAM. The next item is for protecting highways. This is for the removal of level crossings, and I want to remove more of these crossings. The engineer says he would rush the work as it is dangerous to leave things until the fall rain. I have an item for this purpose in the main estimates.

Mr. LANCASTER. Have not you a regular statutory amount for that work?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, we always take a vote for it. The vote was criticised as being too small. It was too small.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the minister tell me if this is necessary for the purpose of rendering the crossing safe, is it necessary now?

Mr. GRAHAM. My engineer says that if this remains only partially completed when the fall comes on, it would make it very disagreeable and even dangerous. To be working in the fall rains is liable to cause slides and troubles of that kind. There are two more items I would like to have passed. One has reference to the dock at Halifax, for which there is a vote of $600,000. The shippers there urge that they must have accommodation for this next season's trade, and my department is afraid that five-twelfths of this sum, which will be less than half, will not be sufficient for rushing the work, and possibly we may run out of money. The other item is to complete the Welland canal survey. I hope to have a recommendation to the House when we meet again, at least by November, and I hope to get some information as to the route when we meet again after adjournment. I do not wish to urge these items if there is any opposition.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 2.13 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FRIDAY, May 19, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 223) to amend an Act of the present session intituled an Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.

On section 1: correction of clerical error by insertion of the words 'principal and' before the word 'interest.'

Mr. LANCASTER. I would like to have an assurance from the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that this is really a clerical error. We passed this Bill in the Railway Committee this morning on the understanding that the intention had been to guarantee principal and interest. It will make a great difference if it is to be made to include principal. If it is really a clerical error I am not opposing it.

Mr. FIELDING. I understood the Bill was to go to the Railway Committee and I presume they investigated it.

Mr. LANCASTER. It was a very short sitting this morning. The statement was made, the House was going to sit in a few minutes, and we only had the word of Mr. Wainwright for it. I am not questioning it, but I would like to know if it is really a clerical error.

Mr. FIELDING. From what I have heard it is not a clerical error in so far as any of the officers of the House are concerned, but it is a clerical error in the application.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Bill followed the application?

Mr. FIELDING. I fancy so. I have not given any close attention to the matter, but I assumed that the Railway Committee would look into that.

Mr. LANCASTER. We assumed that it was all right, but we thought we would have some assurance from some member of the cabinet when the Bill came to the House.

Mr. SPROULE. The Railway Committee did not look into it, and Mr. Wainwright read the resolution passed by the board asking to have this done. It clearly said 'principal and interest,' but, Mr. Wainwright said, in some accountable way when the Bill was drafted the word 'principal' was omitted?

Mr. EMMERSON. The bonds were prepared in accordance with the resolution, were they not?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes. When the Bill went back to the company they noticed this error for the first time.

Mr. FIELDING. If the resolution clearly intended to include principal, and it being a matter between the two companies, I do not think we should offer any objection to it.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am not objecting; I want to make sure of the facts, that is all.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

OFFICIAL STATUS OF FOREIGN CONSULS.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the government a question. During last session I asked them whether they were taking any steps to change the status of foreign consuls now in Ottawa. We are now negotiating treaties with other nations, and it is necessary that something should be done in regard to this matter. Replying to my question on December 2, 1909, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said:

> The question which my hon. friend has brought to our attention is an important one, not perhaps so much on account of the drawing room as on account of the duties which consuls-general now discharge in Canada. We have no diplomatic service in Canada, and the consuls-general are exercising by tolerance some, I shall not say diplomatic powers, but powers very often cognate to such. The question is one which should be settled, and the matter is now engaging the attention of the government.

I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House (Mr. Fielding) if any steps have been taken, or if the government purpose taking any steps in the immediate future, to deal with this question. The present colonial conference should be the place to bring this up.

Mr. FIELDING. The matter has engaged the attention of the government. I regret that I am not in a position to give any positive statement as to the results, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that this question has been considered along the lines of the statement of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL AGENT AT WASHINGTON.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to ask another question. On December 15, 1909, I brought forward the question of a commercial agent to represent Canada at Washington, stating at that time that we have commercial agents in almost every country in the world—the Netherlands, Australia and some countries connected with us by treaties, but that in the country of our greatest commercial neighbour, with which we have the most intimate personal and other relations, we have no agent.

The matter was again brought up in this House on March 14, 1910, when reference was made to an article in the Toronto 'Daily Star.' I then asked the government whether it was not high time that it should have an agent at Washington so as to furnish us with information of what was going on in the United States, a country with whom we had such large dealings. I pointed out that every commercial agent of the United States in Canada sent a weekly report as to our commerce and as to how the United States merchants could improve their business with Canada. The government at that time stated that they had no fault to find with the British ambassador, but I say that this agent would not replace the British ambassador but would be there to advise and consult with him, and I have no doubt the British Ambassador would welcome the appointment of such an agent.

Mr. FIELDING. I understand the hon. member is putting a question; what is the question please?

Mr. LEWIS. I asked whether the government had taken steps to appoint a commercial agent at Washington and whether, if not, they do not consider it high time to do so?

Mr. FIELDING. Washington is not a commercial city and the conditions under which commercial agents are appointed in other places would certainly not apply to Washington. If there were an agent at Washington at all he would probably have to be something more than a mere commercial agent. While the matter has not escaped the attention of the government, no action has been taken upon it.

Mr. LEWIS. Why should we not have a commercial agent in other large American centres?

Mr. FIELDING. Speaking from recollection I think we did have a commercial agent in Chicago, but my impression is that he was transferred to another place. There certainly would be no reason why we should not have commercial agents in commercial centres in the United States, unless it be that in appointing such agents somebody might say that we were disloyal.

GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER. (Minister of Interior) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 209) respecting grain.

Mr. BORDEN. (Halifax). Please explain.

Mr. OLIVER. This Bill was introduced in the Senate, discussed there at length, referred to a special committee to hear objections which might be offered to certain portions of the Bill, reported to the Senate and considered by the Senate and passed. While the Bill is somewhat bulky the portion of it which is new legislation is comparatively small. Hitherto, the grain trade has been administered under the Manitoba Grain Act and a certain portion of the Grain Inspection Act. It was desirable to provide for still better administration of the handling of western grain and it was thought a commission should be appointed to control the grain trade instead of it being controlled direct by the Department of Trade and Commerce through its officials. Instead of bringing in a Bill merely to make provision for the appointment of a grain commission, it was thought better to consolidate the Manitoba Grain Act and that portion of the Grain and Inspection Act relating to grain, into one statute, providing in addition for the appointment of a board to control the grain and administer the Act. It was in regard to the constitution of the board and the authority that would be vested in it, that the Senate spent such a large part of their time considering the measure. There is no change and there is not intended to be any change in the terms of the Manitoba Grain Act or of the Grain Inspection Act. The Senate thought it advisable only to take cognizance of the new principle that was being introduced. It was thought that after this board had exercised its authority during the coming grain handling season it would be a proper time to make a further revision of the Grain Act and the Grain Inspection Act, feeling that it would be better to have the advantage of the knowledge and experience of this board than to undertake to deal with details at the present time. As a matter of fact it is not understood that the present law requires amendment, for I am given to understand that the administration of these Acts has been as satisfactory in principle and detail as could possibly be expected from the administration of any Act so complicated and so closely concerned with the business interests of the people. However, it was found that the authority vested in the officers of the department was inadequate, and provision is made in the Bill to extend the authority of those who administer the Act. It is desired to have the Bill passed so that it can come into operation as soon as possible. We may get the advantage of the knowledge of the grain commission acting under the special authority conferred on them, in order that we may the sooner arrive at a conclusion as to what amendments may or may not be necessary.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the the new part of the bill?

Mr. OLIVER. The several clauses providing for the appointment of the Board of Grain Commissioners, namely sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, together with sections 123, 124, and I think 229.

Aside from that, to all intents and purposes, there is no attempt to amend the existing Act.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Is it the intention to put this Bill through to the third reading to-day?

Mr. OLIVER. That is something which of course I cannot say. I would be glad to do so if the House would agree, but we might consider that in committee.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In the very great pressure of work during the past two or three days, and it is only during that time that this Bill has been on the Order Paper, it is manifestly impossible for any considerable number of members to have themselves acquainted with the scheme of this measure. I do not profess to have done so. It is exceedingly important that such legislation should be passed at the earliest possible moment as would remove the grievances from which the grain growers of the west have been admittedly suffering during many years in the past. They have proposed to the government during the past year or two a certain scheme by which that may be accomplished. As I recollect their claim went to the extent of asking the government to take over, by actual ownership or lease, the terminal elevators and to operate those elevators under complete government supervision and control, so that the mixing of grain and the other frauds which are claimed to have been perpetrated upon the grain growers would be impossible of future continuance. I do not understand that anything of that kind is proposed by this measure, except the constitution of a board or commission, and I suppose it is expected that that board or commission will have a more complete and effective supervision of these matters than has been possible in the past.

Mr. OLIVER. Section 17 of the Bill gives the proposed commission authority to take over for operation terminal elevators. That, of course, is an important feature of the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Section 17 is as follows:

> Upon the construction, acquisition, leasing or expropriation by His Majesty of any terminal elevator, the board shall be charged with its operation and management, and the board may, with the approval of the Governor General in Council, make regulations for its management and operation and prescribe a tariff of fees and charges for the use thereof.

Has the government come to any conclusion as to the policy upon which it will embark in that connection?

Mr. OLIVER. I have said on previous occasions that the policy of the government is not to undertake as a government to interfere with such an important portion of the trade of our country unless and until they feel themselves to be fully informed in regard to the effect of any action they may take, and, therefore, they desire the authority contained in this Bill to provide for a commission which will be able to take knowledge of all the facts of the case, and will have authority to deal with these facts, and to bring into force a policy of actual operation of elevators, if, after investigation, in the judgment of the board it is considered to be feasible and desirable.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The declaration of the minister of the Interior is contained in a very long sentence which is accompanied with a great many qualifications. It does not seem to be very direct or to the point. He speaks of further information. Considering the extent to which these grievances have prevailed in the past, and that the government has been informed of these grievances not only through the public press, and through actions in court, but through inquiry after inquiry, and by delegation after delegation of these men from the west who have come here to press their claims—and I know that delegations were here four or five years ago urging exactly the same thing—it would seem quite reasonable, quite possible, quite necessary that the government should have made itself acquainted with the facts and have come to its own conclusion upon these matters long ago. Why is it necessary, after all this investigation, after all these inquiries, after all these delegations, to appoint a board for the purpose of coming to a conclusion as to whether or not the facts are such that the government should embark on a certain policy? The minister proposes to move the House into committee on the Bill. I think this Bill should receive greater consideration, and a fuller discussion than we could possibly give to it in the time at our command during this day.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). The Winnipeg Grain Exchange, which is a rather important commercial body, has been in communication with me for the last few days. They are objecting to this Bill being proceeded with now until they have an opportunity of disclosing their case to this House. They have not had an opportunity up to date. This Bill comes to us through the Senate. While passing through the Senate it was referred to a special subcommittee of that House, not to consider the whole Bill, but to consider three clauses only

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

They wanted to be heard before that committee, but the committee refused to take evidence with respect to any other part of the Bill except those three clauses, 122, 123 and 242. The first refers simply to terminal elevators. 123 refers to the buying and selling of grain by the owners of terminal elevators and 242 deals with penalties. They never had an opportunity of being heard by the Senate Committee at all. The Bill never went to the Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate but went direct to this special committee which reported direct to the Senate. Now it comes here for a second reading and in the ordinary course would be referred to a Committee of the whole House. The Winnipeg Grain Exchange or the Montreal Corn Exchange would not be heard before a Committee of the Whole House. That difficulty might be obviated if the Bill were referred by this House to the Committee on Banking and Commerce or a special committee might consider the whole measure and hear evidence. I have here a telegram which was sent me by the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, which handles from 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 bushels of grain per year, and therefore ought to know something about the business. This is the telegram:—

Winnipeg, May 15, 1911.

Alexander Haggart, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Grain Exchange request you to protest against the Grain Bill until exchange delegation is heard by committee of House. Exchange has repeatedly requested government for such hearing without success. Grain men generally agreed that Grain Act will require amendment if reciprocity agreement passes to prevent diversion of grain through American channels. Hence our anxiety to be heard before Bill passes House. Think more desirable legislation should be postponed till after reciprocity matter disposed of.

The WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE.

On receipt of that telegram I had an interview with the Minister of Interior, and he intimated to me that he thought everybody had been heard and that he would like to get the Bill disposed of. I wired to this effect to the Grain Exchange, and on the 17th of May, I received this telegram:—

Telegram received. Senate only referred three clauses of Grain Bill respecting terminal elevators, ownership and penalties to special committee and refused discussion on all other clauses. This exchange both wired and wrote Sir Richard requesting that when Bill went to Commons, exchange would be heard before committee and especially in view of effect reciprocity agreement will have on grain trade. Reciprocity without necessary amendments to Grain Act will certainly seriously damage Canadian trade and unnecessarily divert grain through United States channels. This is firm opinion. All interest in grain trade urge strongly for second reading after adjournment with opportunity all concerned submit facts to committee of House.

I have searched the records of the Senate and found that the allegations of fact set out in this telegram are substantially true. These people want to be heard, they are vitally interested in the sucess of this country, and they can give as much information as any other body of men. If this Bill should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, the object of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange would be attained.

I might say that the hon. the Minister of Interior (Mr. Oliver) informed me that the Corn Exchange in Montreal, a similar body, is of the same opinion and want practically what the Winnipeg Grain Exchange ask for. There is no doubt about the inquiry in the Senate having been directed solely to three clauses of the Bill. We want the Bill to be open to criticism. We all want information. I doubt if there is any man in this House who has the information required regarding this very important Bill, which as the Minister of the Interior has told us, is complicated and important, and if we want legislation to be perfect we want all the information we can have.

Mr. NEELY. The most serious objection to delaying the passage of this measure is the fact that this present season is so far advanced that unless it is put through before adjournment, there is no probability of its going into effect in the present year so far as the grain trade is concerned. I quite agree that the subject is of too vital importance to be judged hastily or passed upon without the most serious consideration; but at the same time I am sure that this Bill has been long enough before us to enable us to give it at least cursory consideration. No one can fail to be impressed that it will provide considerable relief to the western producer of wheat. As the Minister of the Interior pointed out to the leader of the opposition, its primary object is to establish a Board of Grain Commissioners who shall have the interests of the grain trade of the whole of Canada in their jurisdiction. It is not to be expected that even if this House gave this Bill the most thoughtful and long continued consideration, it would pass a measure which would be absolutely without a flaw. But the first consideration to my mind is the establishing of this Board of Grain Commissioners. The Bill provides for government ownership and operation of the terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur, if, in the view of this board, that is necessary in order to remedy the evils complained of; but in any case the first step, before any project of government operation could be entered upon, would necessarily be to establish a commission which would have the absolute supervision and control of these terminal elevators. That is the primary object of the Bill; and even supposing there is no definite provision made for government ownership, which is the remedy demanded by the large majority of western grain producers, the establishing of this commission will enable the government to have this matter considered by the board before this House reassembles.

If my hon. friend from Winnipeg, or the leader of the opposition, or any member of the House, wants expert evidence on the question involved in the Bill as affecting this very important question, I can see that the conclusions of such a board of commissioners would be of inestimable value. I am free to say that, having given some consideration to the Bill, there are a number of its features that do not appeal to me as covering all the necessities of the case. But, as I have said, we have come almost to adjournment and there is this year's crop to be considered. Delay in passing the Bill means that there will be no opportunity for the commission to dea. with the present year's crop; and so it would appear to me that in the interests of the people of the west there should be no delay in passing this Bill to-day. My hon. friend from Winnipeg has mentioned the fact that the Winnipeg Grain Exchange are anxious to be heard before a committee of this House. So far as my information goes—I am open to correction by my hon. friend from Winnipeg—the most serious objection that the Winnipeg Exchange, or the Montreal Exchange have to the matter is in reference to the very clauses that were submitted to the special committee of the Senate for their consideration. The Senate committe gave a number of sittings to the consideration of these clauses. So far as I know every interest was notified when these clauses were under consideration, and had an opportunity of being heard before that committee. The Senate committee having given due consideration to these representations, and having modified the Bill to its present form and sent it to this House, I do not see that any serious harm could come to the Grain Exchange, or to any one interested by the passing of this Bill now. The Grain Act is not a thing that we have not found it necessary to change from time to time. No matter in what form we pass this Bill, when the commission is appointed to take charge of the grain trade no doubt they will suggest many changes in any legislation we pass. The western grain producer I think, is satisfied that the Bill furnished a very considerable amount of relief from the conditions he complains of at the present time. For that reason, I would ask that this Bill rather than being sent to a special committee of this House, or to any standing committee, should be put through the House in the form in which we have received it.

Mr. BARKER. I would ask the minister who has charge of the Bill, what is the object of presenting the Bill here to-day? This Bill, if passed in its present form, must go back to the Senate.

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. BARKER. The head note indicates that there are clauses that have not been before the House.

Mr. OLIVER. I am wrong if I said so. This Bill has been passed by the Senate, and if the House should pass it without amendment it would not need to go back to the Senate. Any amendments that are made would have to go back.

Mr. BARKER. The head note says:

The clauses and portions of clauses inclosed within square brackets, namely 10, part of 12, subsection 1 of 14, 16 and 17, do not form part of the Bill as passed by the Senate. They are printed in the copy for information only. It is intended to propose their insertion when the Bill is in Committee of the Whole in the House of Commons.

Mr. OLIVER. These are the sections involving the expenditure of money, and the Senate has not the authority to pass it.

Mr. BARKER. Section 17 involves a very important matter of principle. It provides that the Governor in Council may authorize the minister to construct, acquire, lease, or expropriate for His Majesty any terminal elevator if parliament grants money for this purpose.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Bill would have to go back to the Senate in that case, would it not?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, but only for the formal acceptance by the Senate of the provisions passed by the House in regard to money matters. Hon. members are aware that the Senate does not deal with questions of money, and as the Bill was introduced in the Senate, these sections should not be considered by the Senate.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I should hardly suppose that the minister would contend that section 16 would go to the Senate for the purpose of mere formal consideration. Sections 16 and 17, according to the minister constitute the most important part of the Bill——

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. NEELY.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is, all the important new provisions of the Bill have not been passed by the Senate at all.

Mr. STAPLES. Like the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax)and the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) and others who have spoken, I say that this is very important legislation. But for that reason it should have been dealt with long ago by the government. The government may say to this committee that they have not had sufficient notice as regards the legislation required by the grain producers of the west; but I have been a member of this House for seven years, and every year since I came here representations have been made to the government asking for legislation, and the most particular request was for the government ownership of elevators. The government has been jockeying with this question for years. Instead of taking action in a business-like manner they have been putting it off, shunning the evil day, until the present time. And this morning we have the spectacle of the minister introducing this Bill at the eleventh hour, for the purpose of making what I would call a stage play, trying to make the farmers of the west, and those who are interested in the farmers in the west, believe that if this legislation is not passed it is not the fault of the government.

It has been pointed out by the leader of the opposition that even if we do proceed with this legislation and it passes this House, it cannot possibly get through the Senate. There is no one in this House who is more anxious to have the legislation asked for by the farmers of the west placed on the statute-book than I am. Unfortunately the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not a member of this House, and I suppose that is the reason why this legislation was introduced in the Senate. In my opinion, this legislation should have been introduced in this House, and should have been in charge of a minister of this House from beginning to end, instead of having been first introduced in the Senate by men who are not in as close touch with the farmers of the west as we are. Yet we are in that unfortunate position. I do not know why it should be so. It has occurred to me ever since I came into this House, that if there is one minister more than another who should have a seat in this House where we can speak with him face to face, it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. But for reasons best known to the government that is not the condition of affairs. Now I say this legislation should have been introduced into this House at the beginning of the session. The government have had sufficient notice of what the farmers of the west desire. Instead of coming down now at the end of the session, they should have brought this legislation in earlier when we could have considered it and passed it. But they have chosen to bring it down at this moment, and to railroad it through the House, so that they can stand up before the electors and pretend that if this legislation did not go through it was owing to the obstruction of the opposition. I say that is the secret of the action of the government. My hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely) says that he has been advised by the farmers he represents in the west what legislation they require, and he has told us this morning that this legislation, although it does not go nearly as far as he believes it should, nevertheless will afford a certain measure of relief. Well, I leave it to the judgment of the grain growers of the west, whether it relieves them to any large extent. I think my hon. friend from Humboldt will find, when he goes back to the representatives of the Grain Growers' Association, that they will not agree with him that it affords them much relief. It is simply playing with the question. The government knows the legislation that the grain growers of the west require, it has been urged upon them time and again, and there is no reason why they should not have introduced this Bill at the beginning of the session so that parliament might have dealt with it. We know that several times this session the government have passed special orders bringing in some private Bills and dealing with them. Why did not the minister who has this thing in charge do that many days ago, when we might have given it consideration? So far as I understand the situation, all the legislation that the grain growers have been petitioning for has been introduced over in the Senate, though as the minister said in introducing the Bill, there is practically no new legislation in it, it is simply a consolidation of existing Acts; thus it furnishes a make-believe to deceive the farmers of the west into thinking that the government is doing something for them, when in point of fact nothing is being done for them. All the special legislation they have been asking for, and which was in the draft Bill that went before the Senate committee, has been pared out, so that we are practically getting nothing. As the leader of the opposition has pointed out, the farmers will be no further ahead by leaving the Bill stand over until the end of the session. I regret very much this condition of affairs. We should not be put in this position this morning. We should have had this legislation before us days ago, when we could have considered it and passed it on its merits.

Mr. SPROULE I presume that other members of the House have received a copy of a memorial, which I hold in my hand, from the United Farmers of Alberta. It reads as follows:

I have been instructed by the board of directors of the United Farmers of Alberta to forward you a copy of the following resolution:—

'The directors of the United Farmers of Alberta reaffirm their belief that absolute control of our terminals can only be secured through government ownership and operation. We view with alarm the apparent disposition of supporters of the government to still further experiment along the lines of control by supervision and inspection, knowing as all concerned do that this policy has failed entirely in the past. We respectfully urge that the Dominion government make financial provisions in the estimates for leasing, purchasing and erecting terminal elevators this session, providing also that such charges shall be placed on grain passing through these elevators as shall provide for cost of operation and paying off purchase price within a reasonable time.'

In requesting that you support the proposal for government ownership and operation of all terminals, this association would ask you to keep in mind the need for terminal facilities at the Pacific coast, and the necessity for the early opening up of this route if the farmers of western Canada are to secure full advantage of the year open port.

That comes from the farmers. If I understand this Bill, it does not provide to do that; it provides for making another effort by a commission or by some other means of inspection to do what the farmers of Alberta declare the experience of the past has shown cannot be done. Then if it is a failure, the government may consider the advisability of taking possession of the terminal elevators. It seems to me that the government are only tampering with the situation. They also say:

It is also our firm belief, and we firmly maintain the stand our association has always taken, that it is impossible for the producers to secure full returns for their grain as long as individuals or companies having any interest whatever in line elevators or in the purchasing of grain, are allowed to have any interest or control in the terminals. It seems an impossibility to prevent mixing in the terminals while they are under private control. We believe that this is a matter which must necessarily be handled by the government, and therefore ask that section 16 of the proposed Bill Q, an Act respecting Grain, be made effective at the present session of parliament.

There is more of this which I need not read. But the gist of it is that they want what the government are not prepared to give them, and which, in their judgment, will alone remedy the situation. In face of that it is most unlikely that this Bill will meet their requirements. Then there is the additional fact that if it is pushed through to-day it must be done without our giving it any consideration. I forgot to say that this memorial is signed by Edward J. Fream, secretary.

Mr. KNOWLES. Representing as I do an important agricultural constituency, whose inhabitants have taken a live interest in this proposed legislation, I wish to give my humble support to this Bill and ask that it be proceeded with.

It is true that it is contemplated that there may be an adjournment in the near future, but that is not compulsory. I cannot see any reason why the Bill cannot be proceeded with to-day, why, after the full discussion which has been enjoyed throughout the country, and in this House, on this very same question we might not, at this moment, be sufficiently well informed to proceed to pass this legislation. I do not agree with the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples), that it is impossible to have it become law before the adjournment, because the Senate can facilitate the matter there, and it can be disposed of. It is almost certain that the Senate would not interfere with any amendment we might make in regard to the expenditure of money, because it is a principle well known under the British parliamentary system that the Upper Chamber should not interfere in the matter of public expenditure. The delay which has been caused is a delay that the government have reason not to be ashamed of, but to be proud of. Upon such an important Bill as this they have given the fullest opportunity to every person who desired to be heard. A great many people appeared as witnesses before the special committee in the Senate, and I do not think that anybody should criticise or condemn the government, because the right hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill in the Senate permitted delay for that purpose. I trust that my hon. friend from Macdonald will not be too harsh with the government for having brought the Bill in at this late day.

Mr. STAPLES. It may satisfy you, but it will not satisfy me.

Mr. KNOWLES. Perhaps, if he had not been so loquacious on Monday we would have had more time to deal with this question. A whole day was lost with a lot of drivel when we might have proceeded with this Bill. I trust that our hon. friends opposite will cease obstructing and opposing this Bill——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. KNOWLES—and do what is necessary in order to bring this legislation into effect.

Mr. LENNOX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. If there was the faintest possible ground for saying that the Conservative party, or the opposition, were obstructing, I would not rise to a point of order, but when an hon. gentleman gets up for political purposes, and makes a statement absolutely out of whole cloth, saying that which he knows not to be a fact, I rise to a point of order, and I ask that the hon. gentleman take it back.

Mr. KNOWLES. What is the point of order—that I told a story?

Mr. CASH. Mr Speaker——

Mr. LENNOX. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that if any gentleman in this House rises to a point of order he at least has the right to have the Speaker pay some little attention to it?

Mr. SPEAKER. I intend to rule upon it, and I have to give the decision that has been rendered in England, to the effect that the word 'obstruction' is not unparliamentary. I am ruling from memory but if the hon. gentleman desires the precedent, my hon. friend the Deputy Speaker is looking it up, and I will give it in a moment. But, I know it has been so held by the English Speaker that the word 'obstruction' is not unparliamentary.

Mr. LENNOX. Mr. Speaker——

An hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. LENNOX. Will the hon. gentleman keep quiet?

Mr. LANCASTER. He wants his house painted.

Mr. LENNOX. This is the hon. gentleman of whom I remarked some few years ago that I thought he was playing the buffoon, but he is playing something more important since.

Mr. FIELDING. That is not parliamentary.

Mr. LENNOX. I have said that now, and if the hon. gentleman wants me to discuss it I can do so. If you recollect the decision to be as you state, Mr. Speaker, and you feel you are sure about it, I am quite willing to abide by your decision. I have accomplished my purpose, at all events, by calling attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman got up for the purpose of making a purely political speech, and dragged in what he knows not to be the fact.

Mr. KNOWLES. I want you to deal with it.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. member (Mr. Lennox), is certainly not in order when he states that an hon. member makes a statement which he knows is not a fact.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, I do make that statement.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman must know that that is not parliamentary. He is bound to assume that when another hon. gentleman makes a statement he makes it in good faith. It may or may not be a fact, it may be a matter for a difference of opinion, but to say that an hon. gentleman has made a statement which he knows is not a fact, I do not think makes for good order in the House.

Mr. LENNOX. I entirely differ from the hon. leader of the House (Mr. Fielding). We, on this side of the House know there has been no obstruction.

Mr. FIELDING. I never said anything about obstruction.

Mr. LENNOX. I said that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Knowles), made a statement which he knew was not a fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FIELDING. We should have your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr SPEAKER. I will rule on the first point first. In Peel's 'Decisions' it is said:

There is nothing unparliamentary in attributing obstruction to an hon. member.

Mr. BUREAU. I want to know if the word 'buffoon' is parliamentary? If not I want the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. LENNOX. I did not use the expression at this time; it was at another session, and you are a little late.

Mr. SPEAKER. The word would not be parliamentary if applied to a member of the House.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman used the expression.

Mr. LENNOX. I said that three or four years ago I had to apply the word 'buffoon' to the hon. gentleman. He has graduated into a higher class since then.

Mr. BUREAU. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not heard the expression, and as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox), says he has not used it there is nothing to rule on.

Mr. CASH. I understand this Bill is a consolidation of the two grain Acts which have been in force for some years, the object of which is to carry out the desire of the farmers of the west to have the government divorce, as far as possible, the grain dealer or the grain handler, from the trade and to proceed by way of the appointment of a commission to do this work. I do not understand the difference between the government doing this themselves, which they personally could not do, and doing it through a commission. Provision is made for the appointment of a commission by this Bill. It has been the cry of the west to prevent the grain, after it has once passed into the hands of the government, and been graded, from being interfered with by other parties. They want it to go to the consumer as it is graded by the government, and that is what the government is trying to do. That is the main object of the present Bill, and it is proposed to accomplish that object through the appointment of a commission. It would be unfortunate if this could not be effected before the movement of the present season's crop. I see nothing in this Bill which should provoke contention. A number of members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange are of the same opinion as I am myself, that this matter should be attended to in some such way as that which is here suggested. We may differ somewhat as to the details, but I cannot see how there can be any great difference of opinion as to the main provisions of the Bill. There has been a lot of discussion in the Senate on the question, and we have had some private elevator men obstructing and objecting to certain provisions. They have had certain clauses cut out which it would have been better to have left in. As the time is so short I think we should proceed with the Bill at once in order that it may be passed as it will ultimately result in accomplishing the very object that the grain growers desire to have accomplished.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I just want to make a few remarks in connection with this Bill. A grain Bill has been before this House for a great many years. I understood the minister to say that with the exception of a very few clauses the Bill before us is simply a repetition of clauses of the Grain Act as it stands on the statute-book. The grain growers of the west have either been sincere or they have not. For years the grain-growers of the west have urged on the government the redress of their grievances; they have had a grievance in connection with the weighing of the grain and in connection with unfair dockage and, most serious of all, the manner in which their grain was tampered with in the elevators. They urged that the identity of their wheat should be preserved so that when it reached the world's market in Liverpool they might receive the highest price possible for it. During this session, and during previous sessions, it has been my privilege to address the House on the question of terminal elevators, and I point out again that the burden of the complaint of the delegation which came before us on the 16th of December last, was insistence on government operation of the terminal elevators at Port Arthur and Fort William. The western farmers truly said that useless experiments have been tried long enough, that thousands and thousands of dollars have been expended during the last few years in duplicating the supervisors at the terminal elevators at Port Arthur and Fort William, and these farmers who are the best judges on such a matter told the government that all that money was wasted, and that no good results followed. They pointed out that this duplication of supervision ultimately reflected on the price of the wheat, and that radical changes had to be made in the system to make it effective for good. The question before us to-day is: Does this Bill give the farmers of the west what they have asked for?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I say the chief demand of our farmers is that the government should operate these terminal elevators, and that is denied them. Hon. gentlemen opposite who want to assist the government in getting out of a hole and in neglecting their duty, and the Grain Growers' Guide, may be satisfied with this Bill, but I am not; and if the Grain Growers' Guide is satisfied then it is not true to the arguments it has used in the last few years in connection with terminal elevators. The farmers of the west have asked for government operation principally; they have asked for government ownership, but to my mind it is not so important who owns the terminal elevators as it is who operates them, and there is absolutely nothing in the Bill that grants government operation. Will the Minister of the Interior answer this straight question: Is it the intention of the government at this session to provide in the estimates for money to buy or lease these terminal elevators and to operate them entirely by the government? If the Minister of the Interior answers that question in the affirmative I will admit there is something in clause 16 of the Bill to meet the demands of the farmers.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not authorized to speak for the government, but I would like to make the bargain with my hon. friend, that if he will let this Bill pass now we may possibly be able to get a sum in the estimates to enable the Bill to be operated in that way.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I will have to be more definite in my question, and the Minister of the Interior will have to be more definite in his answer. Here is what the United Farmers of Alberta say on the question:

> The directors of the United Farmers of Alberta reaffirm their belief that absolute control of our terminals can only be secured through government ownership and operation. We view with alarm the apparent disposition of supporters of the government to still further experiment along the lines of control by supervision and inspection knowing as all concerned do this policy has failed entirely in the past.

That is a definite demand from the farmers. At this very session the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin) was frank enough to admit that after the government had appointed 96 men to duplicate the service at Port Arthur and Fort William, and after spending thousands and thousands of dollars, the experiment was a failure, and that the only way to make the business a success was for the government to operate the terminal elevators. The minister says if I will allow this Bill to be read the second time and go to committee——

Mr. OLIVER. I said that if the hon. gentleman and his friends will allow the Bill to pass there would be some object in the government providing a sum in the estimates, but until the Bill passes there is no warrant for the government putting a sum in the estimates.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I tell the Minister of the Interior—and I think I can speak for my colleagues from the west—that if he will promise us right now—no 'may' about it—place a sum in the estimates to purchase or lease these elevators and to operate them by the government, I, and I believe my colleagues from the west, will allow the Bill to pass at once and give it no opposition. I am suspicious of that clause 16.

Mr. OLIVER. I might suggest to my hon. friend that it might not do any harm to try it. Let him allow the Bill to pass and take chances on the government voting the money and the farmers would not be any worse off.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. We have had too much experience of letting things go through without a definite promise, to lead me to place any faith in the government. But I do say that if the minister would state right now that there will be a sum placed in the estimates to buy or lease these elevators and operate them, we will not oppose the Bill for a moment.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend knows that no member of the government can pledge the government off-hand in that way, and he is not fair in making such a challenge as that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The government is here and can answer.

Mr. SPROULE. And they have already this session given a similar pledge with reference to a dry dock, and if they can do that they can also give a pledge in connection with the terminal elevators.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I am not familiar with the working of the Privy Council, but as we all know this is a government Bill promoted by the Minister of the Interior, and there is no doubt that this Bill has been debated by the Council, and that the minister has a pretty good idea as to what the government is willing to do. I believe the Council will be prepared to do what the Minister of the Interior recommends. If the minister and the government want to meet the demands of the farmers they have it in their power to do so. This commission business has been on trial for a great many years, and the farmers have come to the conclusion that it does not meet the case. The farmers refuse to accept or experiment with that system any longer. I shall oppose this Bill until I have some promise from the government that they will this session place in the estimates a sum of money for the acquisition or control of these elevators. I must accept the statement of my farmers and believe that they are sincere when they say they will not accept any half measure. This Bill as it stands does not give what we want, it is absolutely useless. The farmers came here on December 16, and presented their grievances. Now, on the 19th of May, 6 months after, on the day the House is to adjourn, we are asked in one day to pass over 200 sections of a grain Bill which has been before the government for about 6 months. I am not obstructing this Bill. If any one of my constituents takes the position that I am, I shall leave it to his opinion, but I want a Bill passed that will meet the demands of the farmers. This Bill does not do so. If I take the stand I have taken this morning, I think it will be absolutely unfair for the Grain Growers' Guide or any other institution to say that I am obstructing this Bill. I want exactly what I advocated in this House, and what the farmers have asked, that is, that we should have government operation of the terminal elevators at Port Arthur and Fort William.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This Bill has been so well discussed by my hon. friends that there is little left for me to say, but, as the matter is one of paramount interest to the people of the west, I would be derelict in my duty to the farmers whom I try to represent, if I did not say a few words. I agree absolutely with my hon. friend from Souris who has put the case in a nutshell. The farmers for years and years have been asking a certain thing. They sent a large deputation here, and the most important thing they asked for was the government control of terminal elevators. That request was the most strongly urged of any. The matter was discussed at that meeting by the farmers, the grain buyers and the millers, all of whom voiced the opinion that it was an absolute necessity for the grain trade of the west that the government should control the terminal elevators. Now, at the eleventh hour, we are asked to pass a Bill not a clause of which touches in a practical manner the request laid before this government by the farmers, that the government should control the terminal elevators. I am not obstructing, but I am most seriously anxious to have effective legislation put through, and it could go through in five minutes if the minister would take the bull by the horns or answer definitely the proposition laid down by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner). Will the government vote the money? The ministers are nearly all here, and we could hear from each one of them separately in a moment. If the Minister of the Interior will say that he will do this, and use his influence to have it put through Council, and the other ministers would say yes, that they would carry out the semi-pledges which they have been making to the farmers of the west the matter could be settled at once. The farmers' delegation asked for half a dozen things, and the reply to all of them is: We will give you reciprocity, we will give you free trade in everything you produce, and you will have to buy everything you require in a protected market. By this grain Bill the farmers do not get what they wanted. As far as I can see there is only one little bunch who will get anything out of this, and that is the three commissioners, who will be appointed and who I am quite certain will have been party heelers at some stage of the game. They are the only people who will get anything. The farmers are not getting anything they want, and for that reason I am with my friend from Souris, I am absolutely against this being passed at the eleventh hour in this way because it does not go one step in the direction of protecting the farmers' rights, and his wheat, and giving him what he has been asking for all these years.

Mr. BRADBURY. When this question of government control of elevators was before this House two years ago and again a year ago, it was urged strongly from this side of the House that in the best interests of the farming community of western Canada the government should provide means for taking over and operating the terminal elevators. That matter was urged by every hon. member on this side of the House from the west. The attitude of the government's supporters from the west was directly opposed to that. They advanced the argument that the government had appointed supervisors of the elevators, that the elevators were now under government supervision, and that the men who had been appointed should be given a fair chance to demonstrate whether the supervision would meet the requirements of the west or not. The claim of the farmers of the west was that they were unfairly treated, in fact that their grain was tampered with, that its identity was lost, and that the men who were operating the elevators were mixing the grain to the detriment of the farmers and to their own gain.

That was demonstrated in this House time and again. Some of the men who were guilty were punished and fined heavily. The attitude of the government on that question and of the western men was opposed to the proposition of the farmers that the elevators should be owned and operated by the government. They said in this House, one after the other, that they were not prepared to urge the government to grant the demands of the farmers in the west because they believed that the present system should be given a fair trial. The proposition of the government to-day is very similar to the conditions which have existed during the last two or three years. The control of the elevators is under government supervision and the country has paid out from $60,000 to $70,000 a year to men who are supposed to take control of the wheat passing through the elevators. But what the farmers believe is necessary is the government operation of those elevators pure and simple. The minister has intimated that if we would allow the Bill to go through, the government might see fit to put a sum in the estimates to carry out the wishes of the farmers. I would suggest that he would consult with his colleagues now and make a definite statement so that we might know whether the farmers are to be treated fairly or not or whether this is another gold-brick they are handing to the farmers. There can be no doubt that, when from time to time the farmers of the west have made requests to the government to redress their grievances, they have been side tracked. They came down to Ottawa a large delegation asking for reciprocity in natural products and manufactured goods, but the government astutely turned the tables on the farmers by giving them reciprocity in natural products whilst still maintaining a high protection on agricultural machinery and everything the farmer has to buy. Thus the farmer has to meet the competition of the world in everything he produces, but he is not given the advantage of competition in things he has to buy. This Bill is along the same lines. The farmers have adduced evidence in abundance to show that the only possible relief is the government taking over these elevators and operating them. The question is whether the government should own these elevators or not. I hold that they should. I would therefore urge the Minister of the Interior to consult his colleagues now and see if it is not possible for him to make a definite statement to-day to the effect that he will provide the means for the government taking absolute control of these elevators. It seems to me that the government have been injudicious in bringing this Bill before the House at this eleventh hour within a few hours of adjournment. Surely we ought to have reasonable time to discuss a Bill of such vast importance. I do not want to delay this Bill unnecessarily, but I am not afraid of the insinuation made from the other side that we are obstructing. I am satisfied to oppose any measure which I believe is to the detriment of the farmers. This Bill does not meet the demands of the farmers, and the minister would be well advised to allow it to stand over until the House meets again so that we may place it fairly before the people in the meantime that the farmers may know what the government proposes to do.

Mr. FIELDING. It is quite evident that this Bill can hardly be classed among the non contentious measures; and as hours and even minutes are beginning to become very precious if we are to carry out our intention of adjourning, I would suggest that the debate should be adjourned and the Bill stand over.

Mr. KING moved the aljournment of the debate.

Mr. LAKE. I do not desire to keep the House more than a few minutes. For years we on this side have been advocating the government operation of terminal elevators and have placed ourselves on record this session to that effect. Liberal members from the Northwest have agreed with the government in its desire to continue the system of government control and supervision in preference to that of government operation. Now the minister has before the House a resolution on the Order Paper to adjourn to-day and at the same time brings before us for the first time this important measure. To my mind it is merely a bluff. The hon. members on this side, while believing in the principle of government operation, would desire to have the opportunity of replacing in this Bill special clauses which were in it originally at the desire of the grain growers and which made it of some use, but which were struck out in the Senate. It is ridiculous to ask us to consider a Bill of 71 pages and 245 sections and put it through in the dying hours of the session. The grain growers have said time and again that they will not be satisfied with anything less than government operation. I had intended to read an article which appeared in the 'Grain Growers Guide' only a short time ago declaring that they would not be satisfied with anything short of that, but as the Minister of Finance has asked that this Bill be withdrawn, I shall not detain the House any longer.

Motion to adjourn the debate agreed to.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH JAPAN.

Bill (No. 224) respecting duties of customs on importations from Japan.—Mr. Fielding—was considered in committee and reported without amendment.

Mr. FIELDING moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the Bill is read the third time, I would like to allude to the fact that last evening there was a good deal of discussion upon the very important question of immigration. That discussion arose, however, out of some correspondence brought down in connection with this proposal from which it appeared that the government between the two governments embodied in a certain agreement which had been entered into some four years ago should be regarded as still continuing. The Bill itself contains no reference to the question of immigration. So far as this country is concerned, the fact that the treaty between Canada and Japan which came into operation a few years ago will cease to have any effect or operation after the 17th of July next leaves it entirely open to us in Canada to deal with that subject as we may see fit, unless the action of parliament in that regard would be impeded in any way by an understanding arrived at between the two governments. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has assured us that any such understanding as continues by virtue of the correspondence alluded to can be brought to a termination at once. Assuming that to be the case, and in view of the fact that the Bill itself does not deal in any way with the very important question of immigration I can see no reason why it should not pass.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax), has correctly stated my understanding of the matter as I expressed it to the House last evening. The reference in the correspondence to immigration did not arise from the Japanese authorities at all. We regarded the assurance that had been given of the restriction of immigration as a desirable thing, and we were anxious to be assured that that arrangement would be continued, and hence I made the allusion to and hence, I think the allusion to it did not arise in the proposals of the Japanese authorities. My hon. friend's statement of what we understand to be the situation is entirely correct.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' ACT—AMENDMENT.

On consideration of an amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 48) to amend the Montreal Harbour Commissioners' 1894.—Mr. Brodeur.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Section 1 of this Bill is designed to correct an error in the description of the harbour boundaries. That passed in this House. But when the Bill was before the Senate it was decided to further amend the Act. The first error was in the wording of the designation of the boundary. For the word 'southern' we substitute 'eastern.' The Senate made another correction. Section 2 of the Bill transfers all the powers possessed by the Harbour Commissioners in the port of Montreal up to the 19th of May, 1909, to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. On the 19th of May, 1909, by chapter 24 of the statutes of that year, assented to on that date the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal were relieved of all responsibility within the limits of the port of Montreal. It may be here stated that the port of Montreal, and the harbour of Montreal, are two separate and distinct areas, the harbour extending only to foot of the island of Montreal, but the port extending as far as Portneuf near Quebec. After the passing of the legislation in 1909, a doubt arose as to whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had jurisdiction in the port of Montreal. The proposed section in this Bill is to remove all such doubts on that point. Section 3 of the Bill is merely a verbal amendment. The heading of section 37 is 'recovery of rates, penalties and harbour dues.' As the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal no longer are the pilotage authorities, the reference to pilotage dues in the section is superfluous. Under section 39, of the Harbour Commissioners' Act, 1894, the Harbour Commissioners had originally the right to seize vessels for non-payment of pilotage dues. In 1909, this section was amended in regard to pilotage dues in so far as paragraph (a) of the section was concerned, but in reference to pilotage dues the paragraph (h) was however overlooked. That is the explanation given to me why this amendment was made in the Senate.

Mr. EMMERSON. I thought I heard the words read 'The boundaries of the harbour of Montreal.' It is within the knowledge of my hon. friend that there is a certain litigation now pending before the courts respecting the bounds of the harbour of Montreal as they existed a few years ago. Will this in any way affect that litigation?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am informed it does not affect it at all.

Mr. EMMERSON. It would seem to me that the rights of parties involved in that litigation should be in every way protected. I think my hon. friend from St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) is much more familiar with that question than I am.

Mr. DOHERTY. I have not yet been able to judge accurately of the alterations made in the Senate; they seem to make a new Bill. The Bill as it originally passed this House contained one clause substituting the words 'southern' for the word 'eastern' in the description of the boundaries. There is no doubt that correction needed to be made. The error arose from the fact that in Montreal we always talk of the north when we really mean the east. When a man is going north we say he is going east, and no doubt that is the way the error arose.

Mr. EMMERSON. The difficulty is with respect to the western boundary.

Mr. DOHERTY. The amendments made by the Senate seem to me to constitute practically a new measure. While I have no reason to doubt that the provisions are reasonable, still I have not had time to consider them.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think the Senate has made several amendments, which have to be followed closely and compared with the previous language. We might let the Bill stand until after the noon recess, and take it up again after my hon. friend from St. Anne has had time to look into it.

Mr. MONK. What will be taken up after recess?

Mr. FIELDING. I think we will go into Supply.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Am I to understand from the hon. member for St. Anne that he would ask the Bill to be postponed until after adjournment, unless, during the noon recess, he looks at the statute to see if there is anything in it debatable? I understand from the officers of the department that there is nothing debatable in it.

Mr. DOHERTY. I will endeavour to examine it during the noon recess.

Mr. FIELDING. Unless this Bill be proceeded with, we will move the House into Supply. If the items under consideration last evening can be agreed to without debate; we will be glad to have them passed, but we do not wish them to be a cause of delay. If we have time we will take up the Bills respecting the Post Office Savings Banks, and the Customs, but with Supply ahead of them, in order to assist the clerks in their work.

At one o'clock, House took recess.

House resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. DOHERTY. Before the House rose I was discussing the amendments made by the Senate to the Bill respecting the Montreal Harbour Commissioners. I have looked into the powers conferred on the harbour commissioners under the old law, and I find that some of these powers appear by this Bill to be transferred to the minister. I have no doubt there is some explanation of the fact. The statute of 1894, I find, did confer powers with regard to the port of Montreal upon the harbour commissioners which I hardly think it is intended to confer upon the minister. They have the power to acquire vessels and property and to exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction. I do not think it is intended to confer these powers upon the minister, and therefore I think it would be desirable that the Bill should stand over until we have had an opportunity of further considering it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have no obejction to the position taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Doherty). The amendments made to the Bill were not submitted to me before they were proposed in the Senate; therefore, I am not in a position to insist upon them. However, nobody will suffer if the Bill is postponed until after the adjournment.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, 19th May, 1911.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon at five o'clock to give the Royal Assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) D. O. MALCOLM,
Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable
The Speaker,
House of Commons

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG:

What are the names of railway mail clerks injured or killed in railway accidents during the past ten years, and the names of those to whom or to whose families a compassionate allowance has been made

Mr. LEMIEUX:

(a) The following are the names of the Railway Mail Clerks, who have been injured on duty during the past ten years:

Halifax District—D. O'Sullivan, T. Keith.

St. John District—J. P. Hipwell, A. S. Belyea, C. E. O'Reilly, H. D. Porter, C. J. Dionne.

Quebec District—A. Lachance, C. Audet, J. E. R. Roux.

Montreal District—W. E. C. Jones, A. Tetreault, C. W. Candlish, J. Lallier, J. H. Duval, J. Beaulieu.

Ottawa District—E. A. Beach, A. P. Black, W. E. Alguire, E. A. Roberts, W. H. Gass, J. D. C. McFarlane, Geo. C. Chattaway, L. E. Galipeau.

Toronto District—W. Mitchell, T. J. Atkins, J. D. Thomson, T. H. Brent, P. H. Wainwright, Thos. Mason, G. B. Stanton, W. J. Kirkpatrick.

London District—Geo. Matthews, A. J. Cheyne, W. McKee, W. J. May.

Winnipeg District—J. Kinney, J. W. Flatt, T. J. Smith, B. A. Parson, W. H. McKinnon, T. Glendinning, G. E. Hawkins, O. D. Benoit, A. M. Ferguson, S. H. Might, J. O. Bernier, A. L. S. Emsley.

Moosejaw District—J. H. Lewis, W. B. Greenhalgh, R. M. Manahan, W. B. McNair.

Calgary District—A. A. McLatchie, G. G. Buell, H. E. Wilson, E. J. Dutton, W. W. Peel, J. A. Poole.

Vancouver District—Thos. Morton, R. F. Drummond, R. J. Herbert, F. N. McCrimmon, W. Willis.

(b) The following Railway Mail Clerks have been killed during the past ten years, but in no instance has the family of any of them been granted a compassionate allowance (other than the usual gratuity equal to two months' salary) as, in each case, the family had recourse against the Railway Company:

M. Roy, Quebec District, 3rd October, 1901.

R. E. Curran, Toronto District, accident 29th May, 1908, died 31st May, 1908.

W. D. Tye, London, 4th February, 1911.

MAIL ROUTES IN NORTH GREY.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO:

1. What are the starting and terminal points of the various mail routes in North Grey and the intervening post offices where mail carrier calls?

SUPPLY—ENGLISH MAIL SERVICE TO THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair there is a matter that I want to bring to the attention of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) and it is in respect to the mails from points west of Montreal destined to points in the eastern provinces. Letters mailed in Ottawa after two o'clock in one day should reach Montreal at eight o'clock the next morning, and if addressed to a point anywhere in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, it seems to me that these letters, and other mail matter, should go to the east in the Intercolonial railway train which leaves Montreal at 12 o'clock. In a great many instances, with very many of which I am conversant, these letters and other mail matter are held until the Canadian Pacific railway train leaves Montreal at 7.25 in the evening, thus delaying the letters reaching their destination until some twenty-four hours after they should reach the recipients. It seems to me that there must be negligence on the part of somebody connected with the postal department. A few days ago, I think it was on Thursday of last week, I called the attention of the Postmaster General to the delays incident to the transmission of the English mails from Rimouski to points in the eastern provinces. I realize that this is a question between the Departments of the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. I showed where the mails which arrived at Rimouski at a certain hour went to St. John at an average rate of 12½ miles an hour, and that the mails from Moncton only reached there at the average rate of a little over five miles an hour. That brings us back to the old stage coach days when the mail contractors had to enter into an agreement with the imperial and provincial governments that they would convey the mails between Halifax and Quebec at a rate of not less than five miles an hour. We have not advanced in any great degree beyond the conditions which prevailed in those bygone days. I realize that the delays are incident to a difficulty between the two departments.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In what case was it that the mails took so long?

Mr. EMMERSON. Mails which reached Rimouski on the 6th of May reached Halifax at an average rate of 12½ miles an hour. They were delivered in Moncton some 53 hours after they had reached Rimouski and the average rate in that case was 5½ or 5¼ miles per hour.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is this year?

Mr. EMMERSON. May 6th of this year. They were not delivered in Moncton until some time during the day on the 8th.

Mr. FIELDING. That does not mean the average rate of travel. My hon. friend is counting the time when they were not travelling.

Mr. EMMERSON. They were held somewhere.

Mr. FIELDING. But to say that it is the average rate is not a fair statement.

Mr. EMMERSON. But they counted the average rate in the old days in respect to the stage coaches including stops at the houses of entertainment along the way. I bring this matter up, not with any desire to complain, but I think that the eastern provinces are entitled to a little more consideration. I do not attach the whole blame to the Department of the Postmaster General. There has been for many years a misunderstanding, or a failure to reach an understanding, between the two departments. It is true that to avoid these delays perhaps there would require to be special arrangements made with the Department of Railways and Canals. Now, with a department, such as that which the Postmaster General controls, with a surplus of nearly $1,000,000 a year, it seems to me that instead of that surplus going into the consolidated fund of Canada and being part of the revenues of Canada, it should be applied in some way to the facilitating of the carriage of the mails, whether they are from England, or I care not from what point they may come. I am sorry that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) is not in his place, but it seems to me that he should take cognizance of the conditions which prevail, and that an effort should be made by either the Postmaster General or the Minister of Railways and Canals to find a remedy. Mails mailed in Moncton at noon to-day will, via Canadian Pacific railway, reach Ottawa at one o'clock to-morrow, but if they are addressed to any point south of Lisgar street they would not be delivered until to-morrow morning. If mailed in Moncton on Friday, although they reach the Ottawa post office at one o'clock on Saturday, they would not reach the addresses in the part of the city I have referred to until Monday morning. This matter should receive attention from the postal authorities.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The information brought down by the Postmaster General on the 11th of May shows delays of the mails up to twenty-two hours at Rimouski. I have correspondence which has passed between the secretary of the Halifax Board of Trade and the Post Office Department from which, if time permit, I would like to read copious extracts. Under date May 11, 1910, I quote from a letter addressed by the secretary of the Board of Trade to the Postmaster General:

Last year, it was a frequent occurrence for the eastern mail to lie at Rimouski, or some point there, from twelve to twenty-two hours, and I think, sir, you will agree that it is rather rough treatment, when the western mails are forwarded immediately on their arrival by special train.

The Postmaster General in reply said that special trains are not ordered beyond Montreal and the Halifax Board of Trade answered that from Montreal to the west there are several trains a day, and, therefore, special trains are not necessary. The board of trade then forwarded to the Post Office Department a letter from a passenger giving his experience as follows:

On Friday morning, April 29, at 3 o'clock, the English mail was landed from the ss. 'Empress of Britain' at Rimouski and some of the passengers also landed. The mails and passengers were kept at Rimouski station for twelve hours, when a local freight train dragged them into Campbellton, where they waited for the regular Intercolonial train, due in Halifax Saturday afternoon about 5.15; the time from Rimouski to Campbellton, 123 miles, was 20 hours. The merchants of the city of Halifax should have had English letters on their desks early Saturday morning, instead of that, those mails did not reach here until 6.30 Saturday night, and were not delivered until Monday morning. Had the mails reached here Saturday morning as they should have done, the letters could have been answered that day—same leaving here Saturday night for England. The time of the mails and passengers from Rimouski to Halifax was forty hours, instead of 17½ hours.

Another communication from the Board of Trade says:

The members of the council do not consider they were asking anything unreasonable when they asked that a special train be provided should it be found that the mails would have to lie at Rimouski for, say, over six or eight hours, and a recurrence of last winter when on one occasion, I think, there was a delay of twenty-one hours and on several occasions a delay verging on twenty hours, would warrant a little outlay on your department to give better despatch.

I should think that from a business standpoint it would be well to send these mails forward because there are usually a number of passengers, and I imagine that it would pay fairly well to send a special train. The government operates the Intercolonial, and the government is responsible for the delivery of the mails, but there seems to be some friction between the Post Office Department and the Railway Department as to which shall be responsible for any loss incurred by the speedy transportation of mails and passengers. I trust that such friction will not be allowed to militate against the public interest. We have a good steamship service between Britain and Canada—although not so good as we hope to have in the early future—and it is a very great handicap on that service that passengers and mails should be delayed twenty-two hours after landing. I would not have been surprised had the Halifax city council and the Halifax Board of Trade expressed themselves even more strongly than they have. I do hope that the Postmaster General and the Minister of Railways will get together and see that better arrangement is made so that in future delay and inconvenience to passengers and mails will be obviated.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We have an excellent staff at Rimouski, and a mail tender which does good service. The business of the Post Office Department is to deliver the mails on the wharf at Rimouski, and there they await the first available train. Sometimes the trains are late, and for that the Post Office Department is not responsible. Besides, the Post Office Department does not carry passengers, and the bulk of the complaints come from passengers who have to wait for the regular trains. I realize that the business men of Halifax and the maritime provinces have some reason to complain about this matter. I shall endeavour to force the Intercolonial railway and the Department of Railways to provide better train accommodation from Rimouski, and if it is possible to meet the Railway Department half way I shall do so. I may say that representations have also been received on this matter from the Minister of Finance, who represents the interests of Nova Scotia in the cabinet, and I shall urge the views presented, on the Department of Railways. As regards the mails which are sent from Ottawa to the maritime provinces I shall have the following memorandum from the controller of the railway mail service:

With reference to the despatch of mail to the maritime provinces, the Postmaster General is informed that all mail for the maritime provinces posted or received at Montreal is despatched from there by 7.25 p.m Canadian Pacific railway train, except for the counties of Gloucester, Kent, Northumberland and Restigouche in New Brunswick, mail for which is invariably forwarded via Intercolonial railway trains.

Any mail received at Montreal after departure of 7.25 p.m. Canadian Pacific railway train is forwarded the following day by Intercolonial railway train at 12 noon, the only through train at present operated by the Intercolonial railway from Montreal to Halifax.

Next month (June) the Intercolonial will issue a new time-table under which a train leaves Montreal for Halifax at 8 a.m, and another at 7.45 p.m., and both these trains will carry mail (and have always done so) for the maritime provinces.

Any mail for the maritime provinces now posted in Ottawa up to 3.30 p.m., except for the counties mentioned, is despatched from Ottawa so as to connect with the 7.25 p.m. Canadian Pacific railway train from Montreal.

Any mail posted between 3.30 p.m. and 7.30 a.m. the following morning is despatched to connect with Intercolonial railway train at present leaving Montreal at 12 noon.

No reports or complaints have been received that mail for the maritime provinces is not forwarded by Intercolonial railway trains when same will gain thereby in delivery.

B. M. ARMSTRONG, Controller.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend may understand that to be the case but I have tested it personally and found that it is not so. I have mailed letters here before 10 o'clock in the evening addressed to Dorchester. The next morning, I travelled to Montreal and on to Dorchester on the Intercolonial railway train and reached Dorchester seven or eight hours before the letters arrived by the Canadian Pacific railway train which left Montreal several hours after I did.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have myself had occasion to complain in this matter. The trouble is traceable to the point at which the letters are mailed. I have posted letters in the post office in the House of Commons at night addressed to my office on the other side of the Square, and they have not reached me before the next day at 12 o'clock. It is because the clerks in the post office here leave too early. They should not leave the House of Commons until after the House has adjourned and they should take all the mail matter that is posted. That is where the fault lies and I again call your attention to that fact.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—Mr. WILSON (LAVAL).

Mr. WILSON (Laval). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On Saturday the following question was asked of the Senate:

THE CANADIAN COMMISSIONER AT PARIS. INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Among the applicants for the position of Commissioner at Paris, left vacant by the death of Mr. Hector Fabre, is there one answering to the name of Charles Avila Wilson? If so, what qualifications did he think himself possessed of, and what competency did he endeavour to impress upon the authorities in order to obtain the said position?

That is my name. Yesterday the right hon. Sir Richard Cartwright answered in this way:

Rt. Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—So far as I have been able to ascertain no application was made by this party; but as there are several members of this Cabinet who are now absent from the country, I cannot reply with absolute certainty.

It is to answer with absolute certainty that I rise now. To the first question I answer emphatically, no. To the second question, I answer in the form so often used in this House, 'answered by the answer to the first question.' I never was an applicant, I never had the slightest idea of being an applicant. Though I am very glad to take a trip to Paris and to good old France occasionally I still prefer to live in Canada. Canada is good enough for me.

Motion agreed to and House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Department of the Interior—Astronomical surveys—investigations and demarcations of the exterior boundaries of Canada, and the astronomical and geodetic work of the Department of the Interior, including expenses of the Dominion Astronomical Observatory, and $1,000 for W. F. King, as boundary commissioner, $260,000.

Mr. OLIVER. The urgency of this item arises from the fact that our boundary surveys are made in conjunction with those of the United States, pursuant to an understanding between the two countries that joint surveys shall be made. The survey parties have to be started out in early spring in order to do a season's work. A large part of the work is done during the summer season; a five-twelfths vote would not carry them through their summer's work and would cut them off during the summer. Part of this expenditure is for the Alaskan boundary where the work will be done this summer some distance north of the Arctic circle. In every way it is desirable that this sum should be available.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). At what time does the commission complete its work for the season?

Mr. OLIVER. The work is always done in the summer, they come in in November.

Surveys, examination of survey returns, printing of plans, &c., $965,000.

Mr. OLIVER. The committee are aware that the township surveys of Dominion lands are carried on during the summer time. The parties have to start out early in order to do a summer's work. We have assumed that the money will be voted and the parties are now out.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How long have they been out.

Mr. OLIVER. They started out about the first of April.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What time do they come in?

Mr. OLIVER. In November. Their work is done by November. If we only vote five-twelfths, they will be out of money when the summer is about half through.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). One would think that five-twelfths would last until we come back again?

Mr. OLIVER. It is very expensive keeping parties in the field, and it would not be desirable to have to call them in for lack of funds.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Do they go out and remain out until the 1st of November, and then come in, and do you pay them then or during the summer?

Mr. OLIVER. The House has already voted one-sixth of the year's estimates. Out of that we have been able to arrange for the advances for the purchase of supplies, &c., always made to enable the surveyors to take the field. We now require a further sum to pay the expenses during the summer, and the wages. Five-twelfths would probably keep them going until the end of July, but would leave them actually stranded, and in the field at that time.

Mr. STAPLES. Has the hon. minister given further consideration to the petition I presented to the House for the resurvey of township 8 in range 9, west of the first. The old mounds have become obliterated, and there is some dissatisfaction as regards the location of the line.

Mr. OLIVER. In the province of Manitoba the resurveys made by our government are not recognized by the Manitoba government. This has practically tied up our efforts to resurvey lands in Manitoba. We may be able to come to some arrangement with the provincial government which will enable us to go forward with these surveys, but are tied up at present.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Mr. STAPLES. Has there been any correspondence with the provincial government?

Mr. OLIVER. Any amount of it.

Mr. STAPLES. Can the hon. minister give any information as to the object of the large land survey done two years ago in township 9 range 10? There was an organization of surveyors working there all summer, and the minister now says that the provincial government do not recognize the surveying done by the federal authorities. Why then was such a large amount expended?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not personal knowledge of the instance mentioned, and cannot give information at the moment.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How much was spent last year?

Mr. OLIVER. $970,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How much to the 1st of September last?

Mr. OLIVER. I should say that considerably more than one-half the total would have been incurred by the 1st of September, probably 66 per cent.

Mr. PERLEY. The hon. minister says one-half would be incurred, but would it be spent? These parties are provided with supplies, and perhaps certain payments are made to their families in the interim, but the bulk of the payments are made after their return. Although one-half might be incurred by the 1st of September, I doubt if one-half would have to be paid. I think the minister will find five-twelfths sufficient for the actual cash required, and when we come back no doubt the House will provide the balance.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to delay the House if my hon. friends opposite are not willing to pass the item.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Suppose we take two-thirds?

Mr. OLIVER. We do not require the whole amount, but more than five-twelfths.

Mr. MAGRATH. What proportion is required for contract survey?

Mr. OLIVER. $343,000.

Mr. MAGRATH. Is it not the case that these amounts are largely paid after the surveyor returns in November?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly, we do not require the whole of the money, and probably two-thirds would answer, but we have not made the calculations to enable us to make that division.

Mr. PERLEY. There would be no difficulty in the contract surveys getting on with five-twelfths before the 1st of September.

Mr. OLIVER. I am very sorry, but I have to say to the committee that five-twelfths will not be sufficient to meet the requirements of the service up to the time that that vote will expire. I say that on my fullest responsibility.

Mr. PERLEY. Will the minister also say that it is customary to pay five-twelfths before the time mentioned? While I admit that five-twelfths may be earned by that date, is it customary to pay the money before the fall?

Mr. OLIVER. We have to pay bills as they are presented, and when money is earned it is necessary to provide for the payment. We might possibly get out of paying it, or not be called upon to pay it. On the other hand our surveyors get into jail sometimes because they are not in funds to pay, and we do not want to put them in that position.

There are several sub-items in vote 272 for which I ask consideration. This is the vote for Dominion lands and parks.

One sub-item is:

Contingencies, advertising, &c., $240,000.

This is to pay current expenses, such as the work of the homestead inspector, advertising, printing, and various other matters. The position is the same in regard to this and other items. We do not require the whole amount to carry us through the summer season, but we do require more than five-twelfths.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is it field work?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, the homestead inspectors, the forest rangers, the fire rangers, and other parties in the field.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Are you asking for the whole amount?

Mr. OLIVER. We have not made a subdivision. But we are asking for more than five-twelfths. I would be glad to have two-thirds of each item, if that would be satisfactory to the committee. If that meets the committee's views, I could, if allowed, withdraw the items for the present, make the calculations, and bring them forward again for a vote of the two-thirds.

Mr. BRADBURY. There was an arrangement made to vote five-twelfths of Supply, and if you are going on making exceptions in this way you will nullify the arrangement.

Mr. STAPLES. Has the minister sufficient to put him through until September 1?

Mr. OLIVER. No, five-twelfths will not carry us until September 1.

Mr. STAPLES. How long will it carry you?

Mr. OLIVER. Probably until the end of July.

Mr. STAPLES. We are to be back here on July 18.

Mr. OLIVER. Under this vote for Dominion lands and parks, there are the following items to which the same remarks would apply as to the item I have just mentioned. If the committee will vote two-thirds of these amounts we shall be very glad to make the change.

Mr. PERLEY. Why not make it half? That would be ample.

Mr. OLIVER. It might be in some items, but not in all. The items to which I refer are:

Dominion Lands Surveys, $965,000.
Dominion Lands Contingencies, $240,000.
Protection of timber, $255,000.
Irrigation surveys, $68,500.
St. Mary and Milk rivers, $13,000.
National parks, $201,600.
Water investigations, $20,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax), Is that all the minister wants?

Mr. OLIVER. All in that item. There are also two items relating to the Yukon, the grant to the Yukon council, and to the roads in the Yukon.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why do you want these?

Mr. OLIVER. Summer is the only time when work can be done on the roads in the Yukon. We are anxious at any rate to have the whole of the road vote.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why do you want the vote for the council?

Mr. OLIVER. That involves the general expenditure of the Yukon. However, if the committee will not agree to that I shall be glad to get the road vote, and drop the grant to the Yukon council, except that we get five-twelfths of it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And you want two-thirds of these amounts?

Mr. OLIVER. No, two-thirds of the items referred to under Dominion lands and parks, but I would like the whole of the road vote to the Yukon, because the expenditure, to be of any use, must be made early in the summer. Then there are two further items in the supplementaries:

Water investigations, $55,000.
Seed grain advances, $60,000.

The water investigation is to go thoroughly into the question of water in the railway belt of British Columbia in view of the legislation which we have now before the House, and which we hope to have passed, authorizing the Department of the Interior to deal with that question.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How much do you want?

Mr. OLIVER. We are asking for $55,000 in the supplementaries.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What proportion?

Mr. OLIVER. As the legislation has not passed, perhaps if we took five-twelfths it would answer our purpose. Seed grain, $60,000; that money is already spent, the seed grain is in the ground, and we would like to get the whole of the money. We would like to get two-thirds of the vote for Dominion lands, the whole of the Yukon roads, $50,000. We drop the grants to the Yukon council and surveys in British Columbia.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). We are now voting one-half which, with one-sixth already voted, makes two-thirds.

Geological Survey Branch—For explorations and surveys in Canada, including ethnological archæological and palæontological investigations; and to pay wages of explorers, draughtsmen and others, $142,000.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This is to pay the salaries, expenses and outfitting of the geological parties in the field. Some of them are in the field now, and the rest are going out. We want the whole item if possible. We might be able to do with two-thirds. The expenditures are entirely during the summer. The expenditures are being made now; many of these parties are out in British Columbia, and one or two in the Yukon. Excepting the head of each party, who is an officer of the Geological Survey, all the rest of the men are hired, and have to be paid their monthly wages. We will probably require the whole amount. It would be very desirable if the House would vote the whole sum.

Mr. PERLEY. I think a chance should be given to the members to make inquiries and ask questions. If we grant one-half now, as we do to the Minister of the Interior, that would give the minister two-thirds altogether. That ought to be sufficient.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. All right.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We will take item 151 on page 68. I will call the attention of the committee to these items from Ontario. I think they are all upon the list which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition had. They are as follows:

Burlington channel piers, $17,000.
Blind river—repairs to dock, $550.
Cobourg—to repair and reconstruct superstructure on east pier at north end, $6,000.
Goderich—harbour improvements, $175,000.

That was not in the list but it was mentioned last evening.

Harbours, rivers and bridges—general repairs and improvements, $40,000.
Kincardine—repairs to piers, $1,500.
Lake Nipissing—improvement of navigable channel in west arm leading through Shanty lake to Monetville, $3,500.
L'Orignal—repairs to wharf and freight shed, $1,000.
McGregor's creek—to pay W. F. Smith, $2,500; O'Keefe and Drew, $320, and the executors of the Poile estate, $1,500, in full and final settlement of all claims for losses sustained owing to damages caused to their properties in the city of Chatham by dredging performed in the creek by a government dredge, $4,320.
Montreal river—removal of boulders in Flat rapids, $3,000.
Pembroke—repairs to wharf and approach, $3,500.
Pelee Island—repairs to west dock, warehouse and approach, $1,000.
Port Hope—repairs to piers—to construct new superstructure on counterfort on west side of harbour and effect general repairs, $5,000.
Providence bay, Manitoulin island—warehouse built on stone embankment protected by cribwork, $3,650.
Rainy river—improvements at mouth, $60,000.

That is dredging work.

River Sydenham—second outlet from Chenal Ecarté to Mitchell's bay—protection of banks at Martin island with pile work, $1,000.
Saugeen river—repairs to north and south piers, $1,000.
Sheguiandah—Manitoulin island—repairs to wharf to make good damage by ice shoves, &c., $4,000.
Southampton—harbour improvements, $3,000.
South Nation river—improvement of waterway, $4,000.
Thornbury—repairs to wharf, $1,000.

If any hon. gentleman would state any objection to any item to which there is objection, I would be quite willing to drop it.

Mr. LANCASTER. They are all objectionable. We have no objection to giving the hon. gentleman the proportion arranged for, but we can go no further.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will you give a few of these in addition to what has been done?

Mr. LANCASTER. No, I do not think so. The hon. gentleman will not need this money until the end of July when we will be back here. There is no reason for giving more than that called for by the arrangement made between the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will not discuss the matter. Of course, if it is understood that hon. gentlemen are not willing to allow these items for repairs and work to be done by the day, the responsibility will not be upon me. In Manitoba there is one item of $8,000 for general repairs and improvements. Repairs are needed in many places, the men have to be employed by the day, and I am sure the public interest will suffer if that work is not done. Is there any objection to that?

Mr. LANCASTER. There will not be many men employed on day work until after the 18th of July. There will be the five-twelfths of the estimates available which will provide more than is required.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understand that is objected to?

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Very well. Now in Saskatchewan and Alberta there are four items that I urgently ask for. There is the item of:

Harbours, rivers and bridges—general repairs and improvements, $20,000.

These are in remote districts where it is necessary to send men to work by the day, and it will be extremely inconvenient if these men have to be recalled.

Mr. MAGRATH. Where are the works?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They are on the Saskatchewan and Peace rivers and Great Slave lake.

Mr. STAPLES. What is the nature of the work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Removing boulders, improving rapids, doing bridge work and making general improvements to assist navigation in the interest of the traders and settlers.

Mr. BRADBURY. Do I understand that five-twelfths of these estimates have been arranged for?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BRADBURY. Then, of that item in Manitoba amounting to $8,000 you have authority to spend five-twelfths?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BRADBURY. Is not that sufficient until we come back?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, and I will tell my hon. friend why. The year will not expire until the 31st March next, and while this is supposed to be for the year, this is a class of work that has to be done during the open season. The season closes about the middle of October and therefore the five-twelfths will not enable us to continue the work beyond midsummer.

Mr. BRADBURY. We will be back here on the 18th July, and if the minister will come down with anything that is special I am sure that there will be no objection to giving him whatever he wants if he makes out a good case. But, an arrangement has been entered into between the two leaders.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not asume that to be the case because when we come back on the 18th July we have special business to take up, but if the leader of the opposition will make that statement, or if my hon. friend speaks with the authority of the other side, then it will be different. I was assuming that when we come back we will not get into supply again perhaps until the autumn.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is the minister's own look-out. I think that the position that we now take is absolutely reasonable under the circumstances, and we should not be expected to make pledges from one to the other. An arrangement was made and we propose to abide by it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then I am to understand that in respect of all the items for harbours and rivers in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, the maritime provinces generally, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, every item is objected to?

Mr. LANCASTER. You have the five-twelfths?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Except what has been allowed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is not exactly that, Mr. Chairman, if the minister will allow me to correct him. We are perfectly willing to take any one of these items and consider it whenever there is time and if there is time now. But when the minister asks us to take 449 items and pass them without discussion it is rather a remarkable order particularly in view of the understanding we have had. Among the items which he has presented to us as impressed with urgency I find a great many where the whole amount now asked is a revote, the money having been voted last year, and not a dollar expended. You could hardly regard a case of that kind as a very urgent one. I observe a great many items of that kind.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There are some.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). A great many. For instance:

West Advocate—breakwater, $10,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What province is that in?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In Nova Scotia.

Poulamond wharf—renewals and repairs to superstructure, $1,600.

Litchfield—extension of breakwater, $4,000.

Liscomb harbour—wharf, $3,000.
Leonard's cove—breakwater, $1,500.
East Bay—wharf, $4,000.
Creignish—construction of landing pier, $2,500.
Central Economy—to renew stem of wharf, $2,000.

So that the items of urgency do not seem to have been very carefully selected. I told my hon. friend, as he will remember, that I would do what I could to have a limited number of these items, really of a rush character, passed in full, but a wholesale order of 450 items embracing items of the character to which I have just alluded is a very different thing indeed.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Well, suppose we come down to an item in regard to which that objection would not apply. It is not a revote. I refer to item 158 for dredging, vessel repairs and new plant. Hon. gentlemen know that the dredging season is the summer season, and the officials of my department inform me that five-twelfths will not carry us along until the close of the summer season. I would, therefore, ask that that item be voted in full.

Mr. PERLEY. The whole of it?

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman will find that he has more than plenty to pay what will be required to pay before the 18th July.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, the difficulty is that we will have to stop the work before the end of the dredging season. It seems to me that with respect to a great deal of necessary work, I shall have to refuse to give orders to go ahead at all, because the time will come early in the summer when there will be a lot of people clamouring for their pay, and I am not going to be in a position of not being able to pay them. It is very necessary, and the request is not unreasonable.

Mr. PERLEY. The minister is making an effort to get political capital out of this and to try and make the people believe that we are responsible for stopping the work by not voting the money. He has had lots of time to have his estimates passed had he been serious about them. We have been discussing things in this House that were not important at all; we spent two days on a Railway Act which could very well have gone over until after the adjournment, and this morning we were two hours discussing a Grain Act which the government must have known could not possibly have been rushed through the House in the very last hours. We do not object to these votes but we want an opportunity to discuss them and to understand them. The minister brings down here three or four hundred items without drawing a distinction between those which are urgent and those which are not, and he asks us to swallow them without knowing anything about them. Well, we object to that, and we think the people of the country will say we are right in objecting.

Mr. PUGSLEY. For six or seven weeks early in the session my estimates were discussed day after day, and it was only on the special request of some hon. gentlemen opposite that we deferred the discussion on them and took up the estimates of some other departments. I have no intention of making political capital out of this; I may say there are a number of large items on page 56 which I thought were necessary, but the deputy minister and the assistant deputy minister of the department were requested by me to cut down as closely as possible the items asked for, and to report what in their judgment it was absolutely essential in the public interest should be passed. The list of items which I handed the opposition was made out by the officials without any special instructions from me.

Mr. LANCASTER. If there is urgency for these items the departmental officers knew it a month ago, and the minister could have arranged with his colleagues to give the discussion of them precedence, but he failed to do that. There is no urgency about it at all.

Mr. BLAIN. This very item before us amounts to $2,000,000, and in it is included a revote for dredging in Saskatchewan and Alberta which was not expended last year and was not then considered urgent.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is for new dredging plant. I put it off until the present year, but the plant is necessary now.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask if this item includes anything for dredging at Port Credit this summer?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I cannot say as to the details of that.

Mr. BLAIN. Does not the minister think it is urgent?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not sure whether that is on the program for this season or not, but we did some dredging there last year. We are dredging at Oakville in the adjoining constituency and propose working also at Bronte in Halton county. That work is only going to cost $1,400, but if we get at it right away it will be an enormous advantage to the people of the locality. I will not put people to work and not be able to pay them.

Mr. PERLEY. The minister has shown conclusively that he is not in earnest in asking for these votes. The leader of the opposition has demonstrated that the minister made out a list of items which he knew could not be accepted, including a number of revotes for work that was deferred from last year, and for which there was no urgency then. Had he made out a list of the urgent items he would have found us reasonable in passing them, but he knew we could not accept the list he presented and he simply endeavoured to put up a big bluff. His action is unfair in that respect.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would like to believe that my hon. friend (Mr. Perley) is reasonable, but if he says I am unreasonable I am unable to believe that he is reasonable. When he suggests that I am trying to put him in a hole, I answer that it would be cruelty to assist him in getting deeper in that direction than he already is. My officers inform me that all these items are equally urgent, but I suppose if I only brought down twenty items gentlemen opposite would tell me I should only have selected six. On reflection hon. gentlemen will see that this item of dredging ought to be allowed. Dredging work is to-day as important as any work that can be done for the transportation interests of the country. Steamers are getting larger and in many cases harbours have silted in and in some cases there has been a lowering of water, particularly on the Great Lakes. But what is of the greatest importance is that the steamers are getting larger. There is a great deal of dredging work to be done. The inland waters freeze up in November and unless we can get the work done during the summer, we will be greatly handicapped and the public interest will be greatly prejudiced.

Mr. LANCASTER. As I understand, the work the hon. gentleman has in mind has not been started yet. In that case five-twelfths of the amount will not have been earned by July 15. The hon. gentleman ignores the fact that we are voting five-twelfths without discussion, he is asking for the other seven-twelfths. There is no possibility of excuse for saying that more than five-twelfths will be required before the end of July. The hon. gentleman takes care to give the opposition no credit for having voted the five-twelfths.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I suppose I may take it for granted that hon. gentlemen are not willing to pass these items now, and, therefore, I shall not move further in them.

Mr. MAGRATH. Are the recommendations of his officers as to the urgency of these expenditures made in writing?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Made in writing.

Mr. MAGRATH. Has the hon. gentleman the memorandum?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall send to my office for it.

Mr. SPROULE. The history of the hon. gentleman's conduct hardly bears out the statement which he makes to-day. He says these things are urgent. He got that information from the engineers of his department. I take the list handed to us yesterday, and I find Port Arthur $650,000 for dredging, and the minister expects that will all be required before we get back and vote any more. Last year when we voted $600,000 he went on and spent nearly $400,000 more without any vote, and he could do it as well this year as last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is not a desirable thing to do.

Mr. SPROULE. I admit that, but it shows that the minister is equal to any emergency when he wishes to do a thing that we have not provided for in the regular way. If the dredges were employed every day they could not use up this amount in that time or anything like it. If urgency was the reason why did the minister discredit himself by putting forward an item like that? It tells the whole tale; it is not a desire to get through items where there is absolute urgency, but to get as many items on the programme as possible, and push them through without inquiry or anything else. The minister said some time ago that earlier in the session some members of the opposition desired that he should refrain from bringing forward his items, and should let other departments bring forward theirs. Why did he do it? Because of the crassness of human nature, that he did not seem willing to give any information to us, and only parried the questions put by hon. members on this side of the House. In our judgment he did not desire to give information and, therefore, he was kept longer than he should have been to get his items through. Had he shown the same desire as is manifested by other ministers to give all the information possible, the House would have been more amiably inclined to let items go through, even although they had not the information; but it was because of the evident desire to give no information on any question asked, and of his attitude which seemed to say: Well they have to vote it sooner or later, and I will not give the information, I will jolly them along from week to week. When he would not give the information he was delayed from day to day. He said that some of us objected, and asked to have the estimates of some of the other ministers brought on. That was because of the desire to get some one who would give information, and not be frittering away the time of the House as the Minister of Public Works was doing in handling his estimates before the House when the opposition knew he was not sincere in his conduct, and was not making a reasonable effort to give the information.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member should not attribute insincerity to another hon. member.

Mr. SPROULE. Well then, I shall say his burning desire, and his great sincerity.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Nobody pays serious attention to my hon. friend.

Mr. SPROULE. The result was the same.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend's memory does not serve him correctly. I was not complaining of any delay in getting my estimates through, I think they went through with very satisfactory progress indeed. I was greatly pleased at the way in which my hon. friends facilitated the progress of my estimates. They asked that I should take a rest from the very great labour which they thought was being imposed on me working day after day and night after night, but I had nothing but feelings of gratification at the manner in which the hon. gentlemen facilitated the passage of the estimates. I have now the memorandum to which I referred, it is as follows:

Ottawa, May 13, 1911.

Memorandum to the Minister:—

The department is going to be greatly handicapped in its work this year owing to the full amounts of appropriations not being available. As you will realize, it is not possible, under such circumstances, to commence works by day labour. Where work is done that way, the money must be forthcoming to pay wages, and, in addition to that, it would not be good business to employ a foreman and a number of men, buy timber and commence repairing a wharf; get half way through and dismiss the whole lot, and take them on again two or three months later to finish the balance of the work.

As you are aware, one-sixth of the harbour and river appropriations in the main estimates have been voted, and possibly before the House adjourns next week, a further portion of one-third will be voted, making one-half in all; but even so, our position as above outlined would not be much improved. Works could only be begun and left half finished, which would not be either economical or businesslike.

However, as hon. gentlemen take the view that it is not in the public interest that provision should be made for going on with these various works to which I have referred, I shall not press the matter any further

Mr. SPROULE. Hon. gentlemen have not taken that view. Hon. gentlemen believe that the works can be carried on in a business like way and successfully carried on with the amount they are willing to vote in most of these cases. An odd work might be picked out here and there where the circumstances were different, but it was because of the desire of the minister to select a great list of items about many of which there could be no urgency, and which could be proceeded with in the regular way until the House resumes, that we were faced with the dilemma of not knowing what to give or what to withhold. Many of the items mentioned by the leader of the opposition were revotes, some of them have been in for two years in succession, and now it becomes terribly urgent that the money should be voted, although the money has been voted for two or three years without a stroke being done. Yet for three years not a stroke of work has been done. These things indicate to us that the minister can scarcely be sincere in saying there is special urgency.

Mr. BLAIN. Since the minister has said that the opposition assisted him very materially in putting through his estimates in the earlier part of the session, how many estimates were put through in his department? There must be a large number.

Mr. PUGSLEY. During the early part of the session, I think all the public buildings through the Dominion were voted in full with the exception of some armouries.

To complete payment incurred in the North Atlantic coast fisheries arbitration before the Hague Tribunal—Revote, $50,000.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. I want to explain the necessity for this revote. About two months ago an item, of which this is in part a revote, was considered by this committee; and after some discussion, the committee voted $100,000 to complete the disbursements in connection with expenses at the Hague. My hon. friend fram East Hamilton (Mr. Barker) took considerable part in the discussion and will no doubt recollect the circumstances. That item was included in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March last, and as a result any unexpended portion lapsed on the 30th April. There remain still some accounts to pay, and as these accounts are overdue, and ought to be settled, I have taken the liberty of asking that this amount be voted now in full.

General protection of highways, $135,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. This is an item for the subways and protection of level crossings on the Intercolonial railway. The urgency of the case is this, traffic must be continued, and we cannot take any chance of getting a subway partly through and then having to leave it incomplete.

Mr. PERLEY. Are these contracts all made?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, a good deal is done by our own men. This will include twelve level crossings.

Mr. LANCASTER. If this is done by permanent employees, we pay them by the month or fortnight, and will not have to pay more than five-twelfths by the time we meet again.

Mr. GRAHAM. We have to engage men in addition to our own. This is required for the protection of the public.

Mr. LANCASTER. In that case I have no objection.

Halifax—docks and wharfs at, $600,000.

Mr. GRAHAM. This is even more urgent. An estimate was made for a dock of a certain size by Mr. Kennedy of Montreal, but a deputation from Halifax, representing the citizens, and the Board of Trade has been here urging strongly that the size of the dock be increased. If we increase the size, the amount voted will not pay more than two-thirds of the cost. We are urged strongly to have the dock ready for next winter, and if we increase the size $200,000 more will be required.

Mr. PERLEY. How much will the dock cost altogether?

Mr. GRAHAM. The estimate was $600,000, but we are asked to increase the size, and that will cost $200,000 more.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). As far as the necessity of increasing the dock service is concerned, there can be no doubt. The traffic at Halifax more than doubled last winter, and there was great delay in the transmission of freight for that reason that the accommodation was entirely inadequate. I saw the delegation which came from Halifax three or four weeks ago, and which met the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways, and some other members of the cabinet. There is no doubt at all about the necessity of increasing the accommodation, and of doing that as speedily as possible. If the minister says it is necessary to vote this for the purpose of going on speedily with the work, I would not object.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am strongly in hope that this item will go through, but I would like to call attention to the fact that in the presence of the leader of the opposition, the assurance was given that on the 18th of July, when we resume any additional amounts required will be voted. Now, it cannot be assumed for a moment that $600,000 will be expended upon this work before the 18th of July. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and his friends have refused absolutely to permit items equally necessary with this item to go through. While I am in favour of it I wish to call the attention of this committee to the fact that when it comes to a question of getting an item of $600,000 through for the port of Halifax which my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) represents he is willing to support it, but refuses items for absolutely necessary public works in other sections of the country.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) had gone after his items in the same way as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) went after his, I think he would have had exactly the same difficulty. The Minister of Railways selected a few items which he declared to this committee are urgent, and he explained what the urgency is. So far as this item is concerned, if the minister says it is urgent, I am willing that it should go through. But, of course, the minister must pay some attention to the objection raised by his hon. colleague. He will have to take that into consideration. I leave it entirely to him. I have explained that, upon his explanation of urgency, I am willing that this should be done, but at the same time I think that proper consideration should be given to the protest of his colleague.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend, perhaps, did not hear me—perhaps he was quite willing not to hear me at the moment—when I expressed the hope that this item would go through, but I called attention to the inconsistent course of my hon. friend when it came to dealing with other public works in other parts of the country.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I told the Minister of Public Works here, and elsewhere; select the items you regard as of the greatest urgency, and we will endeavour to have them go through.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, and the minister brought in 447 items.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But in the aggregate, outside of dredging, not one-third of this item.

Mr. LANCASTER. There is no inconsistency. The Minister of Railways says that this is an urgent matter, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) for whom we on this side—without casting any reflections—have more respect than we have for the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) happens to agree with the Minister of Railways. Knowing what he knows about Halifax, when the Minister of Railways in his tactful way presents his case, the leader of the opposition agrees with him. Having the unanimous opinion on both sides, we pass the item.

The Minister of Public Works is hopelessly alone in his opinion.

Mr. GRAHAM. The next is:

Welland ship canal—To complete survey, $50,000.

I had been in hopes of laying the report on the table this session giving some definite information as to the Welland canal route. I now hope to be able to lay it on the table when the House meets again in July. Two or three routes have been surveyed, but none satisfactory. The surveyors are now investigating another. I have urged them to use all diligence, and make as great progress as possible. When the House meets I hope to be able to report a recommendation by the engineer of the proper route to take.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I do not see why there is any urgency in this item. The country has a map of that section to scale of six foot intervals made by the Militia Department. An engineer knows that with a map of that kind he can pretty near pick out a route even sitting in an office. This whole thing is a big bluff hung up on the people of the Welland district to make them believe that there is going to be a new canal. If the government is going to force its new policy of trade relations with the United States through parliament, a Welland canal will be only a detriment to us, because it will mean that we will be maintaining a great public work mainly for the use of foreign ships. The time when this House will reassemble will give ample opportunity to vote any further supplies for this purpose the minister may need. It seems to me that the sum is exceedingly large for the survey of that country. The whole distance between the two lakes is only a two-hour run in an automobile; a man on a bicycle can cover it in about two hours and a half. I suppose with a vote like this every good Liberal in that district will expect to be on the staff of that survey. That is the only reason of urgency that I can see in this expenditure. The item should stand over.

Mr. GRAHAM. This is not a question of the survey of the surface. Borings have been made on several routes and must be made on another. It is too late to abandon the policy of at least completing the survey, for the men in the field are working as hard as they can, and I have been urging them to come to a definite conclusion as to the route.

Mr. LANCASTER. They have been making these surveys all winter, have they not?

Mr. GRAHAM. More or less—yes; I think so. I have been much disappointed that the practical difficulties in the way have prevented the making of a report. I am not going to urge it, but I think that in the interest of the country and for the satisfaction of everybody, it would be a good thing to complete these surveys as soon as possible. I have not been extravagant in asking heavy items, but this, I think, is urgent.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I do not think the House is pining for information on this question. As a matter of fact there are two or three factions in the House, and the country fighting over these canals and, as one who stands aside from them all, my opinion is that it will take five or ten years to decide whether they are going to build the Nipissing and Georgian Bay canal, rebuild the old Welland, or build a new Welland. The idea of this expenditure, I suppose, is to dig post holes all over the escarpment, and you may be sure that in every post hole there will be an Italian, and a good Liberal at $4 or $5 a day bossing him. Every loose fish in that district that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) has not already engaged as a special officer will be attached to this survey, judging from the large sum asked for. The work is not urgent; no lives will be lost if it is not finished. Even if we had the information before the House, it would take five or six months to consider it, and the loss of a month and a half—even if it were to take place—would not matter very much.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). I do not see much use in spending this money on investigation. We all know that over a million dollars has been spent in investigating the feasibility of the Georgian Bay canal, and it has been demonstrated conclusively not only that it is feasible, but that it is one of the best undertakings the country could possibly go into. That being the case, I do not see the use of spending money looking for another route for the Welland canal.

Mr. GRAHAM. The House has voted money to complete the surveys of the Georgian Bay route, and all I ask is the same policy in this other case—money to complete the surveys. We have spent over a million dollars in investigating the Georgian Bay canal route.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). But having done that, no commencement has been made to the canal. If you go on and spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in this kind of way, what is the good of it?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I think that item should stand. When this government cannot make up its mind for political reasons what line of action to take in an important matter, and starts spending money on investigations, by the time they have investigated the question they will have spent enough money to build the whole work. I think the government should decide what they are going to do and then spend money on it. But spending money on it beforehand is something that is going to be of no use. If the government wishes to go on with this canal, there is no reason why the money already voted will not carry them over six weeks. I do not see any urgency in the matter at all.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not think this vote should be objected to under the circumstances. The fact that a large amount has been spent in investigations into the feasibility of the Georgian Bay canal is surely no reason why this reasonable amount should not be spent in connection with the enlargement of the Welland canal, which is such an essential link in our system of transportation.

For the decoration of public buildings throughout Canada in connection with the celebration of the coronation of His Majesty the King, $25,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Carried.

Mr. PERLEY. What is the plan for expending this money?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have conferred with the officials in my department, and it is thought that $25,000 will be sufficient to do a reasonable amount of decorating of public buildings throughout the country. There seems to be, as we have learned from communications sent to us, a desire in many sections of the country to celebrate the coronation of his Majesty. I have made inquiry, and find that this was not done when his late Majesty was crowned; there was no decoration of public buildings throughout the country. But I have had applications from different places, and I am sure that the people generally expect that we will take some part in the celebration in the way proposed.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Will each small town that has a public building get a portion of this money for the purposes of decoration?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think that any town which proposes to celebrate the coronation, and to go to some expense, will receive a part of it. We will devote a sum proportionate to the population to the different towns to assist in the celebration.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). There are three small towns in my locality that have public buildings, and I think they ought to have their share of the money, so that they may make a decent showing on that occasion, if we are to spend any money for that purpose. I do not know whether it is wise for the government to spend it, or whether it should not be the municipality. But if it is the opinion of the House that we ought to spend money in that way, I think there ought to be a sufficient allowance so that every town with public buildings might have a chance to get a portion of it for the purpose of decorating such buildings.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand the Minister of Public Works to say that this vote is for the purpose of decorating public buildings. Now how are the people in a county that has no government public building going to show their loyalty? Are they to be put in the background?

Mr. EMMERSON. We will have to pay for it ourselves.

Mr. FIELDING. It has been understood that, as respects all the items which have not been voted in full, there shall be voted a sum which, with what already has been voted, will make five-twelfths of the whole. That is a matter involving calculations that have to be made by the clerks, who cannot complete their work until we ascertain what progress we would make this afternoon in passing the items in full. Now that that is understood, the clerks will be able to advance their work, and at the evening sitting I hope we will have the matter in complete form. I, therefore, move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again this day.

Some resolutions reported.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Resolutions reported, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House again went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. FIELDING. The officials of the House have made more rapid progress than I had anticipated, and they have placed in my hands the schedules of the proportion of the votes which has been agreed to. They are very numerous, and I will ask the House to assume that the calculations are properly made by the officials.

Mr. MILLER. Is there any possibility of making such an arrangement as will enable us to meet on the 1st of August rather than on the 18th of July?

Mr. FIELDING. I think that it is rather too late now. That would necessarily involve a further vote in Supply, and I am afraid it is too late to arrange that now.

Mr. MILLER. I thought that probably it could have been arranged at this time.

Mr. FIELDING. I think perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you will not be expected to read all these items.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand they cover the items of which a proportion is taken?

Mr. LANCASTER. Are they separate?

Mr. FIELDING. Each item is set forth for its exact proportion. It will be subject to a slight revision in consequence of the changes made within the last few minutes, but subject to that it is the exact sum which we vote.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the minister know how much was voted in full.

Mr. FIELDING. I cannot tell at this moment.

Mr. FIELDING. I shall ask the House to wait until the evening sitting for the Bill founded on this resolution.

Progress reported.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved the second reading of Bill (No. 216) to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. MONK. I think it is important to give an instruction to the committee, and I would move to add to this motion:

And that it be an instruction from this House to the said committee to so apportion the increases provided in section 1 of the Bill as to ensure, in the reclassification of employees referred to in said section, a salary calculated upon the duration of the services of said employees, so that officers of long and meritorious time of service should not be placed upon the same footing as officers but lately appointed.

I intended explaining this, but I shall not take the time of the committee.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This principle is followed throughout this and the other Bills, so that the motion need not be pressed forward. This principle is adopted in the department, and my hon. friend will see in considering the various sections of the Bill that it is being followed.

Mr. MONK. If my hon. friend states that the principle contended for in this motion is followed, and will be followed——

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly.

Mr. MONK—I would withdraw the motion, but I would like it to go on record with the statement of my hon. friend.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It will be in 'Hansard'.

Mr. SPEAKER. It has been read by an hon. member, I suppose it is on 'Hansard'.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee on the Bill.

Mr. MILLER.

On section 1,

Mr. LEMIEUX. The explanations that I gave in moving the resolution the other day are complete as regards the classification, the changes, and the increase. There are many minor details which add to the length of the Bill, but I shall ask the House to take for granted the explanations I gave the other day as to its general scope.

Mr. MONK. There is no doubt that the post office employees in our larger cities are suffering from a very considerable grievance on account of the difference between their salaries and the salaries of other civil servants, therefore it seems to me that the principle of this Bill cannot be opposed. At the same time we have not carried the Civil Service reform through all the branches of the service as we should have done. When we found that the excellent reform introduced by this government for the inside service worked satisfactorily, we should, without any unnecessary delay, have carried those reforms to the outside service. We did not do so because there is no doubt the government in reforming the inside service cut off from members of this House a patronage with which they were not willing to part, and we have continued for the outside service a system which is universally condemned. This has caused many inconveniences and disadvantages to the public at large, and to the Civil Service itself because the inequalities that existed for years in the outside service have been maintained, and we have found in the outside service new employees gaining government patronage and enjoying large salaries when really old and meritorious employees were less generously treated than these newcomers. That system will continue as long as we do not carry the reform from the inside to the outside service. The Postmaster General some time ago increased the salaries of the letter carriers. Their salaries were increased 40 per cent, and they undoubtedly deserved that increase. I believe that the letter carriers in the larger cities, like Montreal and Toronto, are to-day not sufficiently paid when you consider the work they have to do, the trust that is imposed in them and the expenses which have so greatly increased in our large cities. They have had an increase of 40 per cent, and yet men working alongside of them in the post offices have received no increase. The customs employees were increased some time ago 33⅓ per cent. There is no reason why they should be increase and the post office employees should not be increased. What is the increase which my hon. friend provides for in this Bill? It is an increase of $50 a year except in the case of employees who belong to a class who receive on appointment $500. Take the case of a man in a large city who has been in the employ of the country for 20, 25, or 30 years, and who receives $1,000. He belongs to a class where the increase will be only $50 a year until he receives $1,200 which will be in four years, an increase of $4 a month. It does not seem to me that that is a fair increase. I have in mind the case of a man who has been 38 years in the public service, and who has belonged to the second class since 1887. He will receive an increase of $50 a year during the next four years in order to reach the maximum of his class. Another one whose case was brought to my attention in Montreal receives $1,000 after 26 years' service. These two men have been in positions of great trust, and have always given perfect satisfaction. Their salaries are, by common admission absolutely inadequate, yet they are to get an increase of $200 extending over four years or $4 a month. That is not a fair increase, it is not at all on the same footing as the increases in other branches of the service unless, as my hon. friend has stated, I do not understand the Act, and that it is intended to take these old employees from the class in which they are and put them in another class, say above the $1,200 maximum, where they will go from $1,200 to $1,600. Even in that case it does not seem to me that the increase given to those men is sufficient unless they skip a class and are put in a class quite above that in which they have been for so many years. These old employees find themselves working alongside men who have been appointed within the last two or three or five years, who receive the same salary, or very nearly the same salary, and some, I believe I can say truthfully, even more. This is not the proper way to ensure a good Civil Service in these large post offices where the bulk of the work devolves upon these very old and experienced employees who really conduct the business of the office. With regard to post office employees in Montreal generally, they do their work excellently, the cases of dereliction of duty and breaches of trust particularly are extremely rare, when you consider the large responsibilities upon the employees.

I have no hesitation in saying that if in the city of Montreal, the system which has worked so well in the interior were transferred to the outside, at any rate in the Postal department, we would have a much larger revenue. In London, if you drop a letter into a box at a certain hour, you are sure that at a given hour it will be delivered into any other part of the city, but you cannot depend on anything of the kind in Montreal. This session, letters I have sent from Ottawa to Montreal have been detained 24 hours. I do not blame the officials because they are heavily worked and not neglectful but the system is bad. In Montreal we cannot rely on letters being promptly delivered there as they are elsewhere. Consequently when you want a letter delivered at a certain hour, you have to use other means than the postal service. Unless my hon. friend will do justice to these older employees by taking them out of their present position and putting them in a superior class, the advantages to them from this Bill will be very small. A man at $1,000 a year, who has given a quarter of a century to the service of his country, will stand to get an increase to $1,200 in four years. Of course it will be open to my hon. friend to change his class, but the time has arrived to carry the reform from the interior to the outside service. The only obstacle in the way is the desire to give a sop of patronage to members of parliament. In the United States they have carried civil service reform very much further than we have. They began with the customs in New York, where the spoils system had produced the worst results. That system is entirely done away with, and the postal service has been considerably improved also. I would invite my hon. friend to carry civil service reform into the postal department throughout the outside service, and in this way considerably increase our postal revenue.

Mr. RUSSELL. The other night when we discussed the resolution, the minister gave us to understand that the men in the service were perfectly satisfied with the increases. But since the wording of the Bill has been made known, I have received several letters and telegrams from men in the service, indicating that they are anything but satisfied. Here is one telegram which I received:

Bill much less favourable than appears. Clerks greatly disappointed.

I had another letter from a clerk who pointed out to me that in a good many cases a large percentage were receiving practically no benefit from the increase. There is no doubt that the object of these resolutions was to increase the salaries of different clerks in the post office and railway mail service; but in the way these increases are proposed, in some cases the clerks have to work five or six years before they begin to derive any benefit. Take a clerk who is now at $900, he will have to work ten years before he gets to the top of this increase or six years until he gets to the present maximum of $1,200. Then he begins to derive some benefit from what we are given to believe is an increase at present. It is not much of an increase the clerks are getting now. They are already getting $50 increase in their salary per year, and have to go on working six years before they participate in the increases given under the new Bill. After thinking this matter over, perhaps the Postmaster General will consider favourably some of these things, and make the increase from $800 instead of from $1,000. That would be some sort of an important increase. It would be something in the way of an immediate increase to the men. There is no doubt that they have the same reason to expect an increase that the men of the inside service have. I do not see why there should not be an increase to the outside service as well as to the inside service who happen to be under the Civil Service Act. All are public servants of the Dominion, and all give good returns for the salaries they receive. We should do justice to all public servants. But I suppose I need not deal at greater length with this question. The Postmaster General understands what we need. We desire some real benefit to the employees, and I think that what I have asked is not in any way unreasonable.

Mr. MONK. I desire to move, in conformity with what I stated a few moments ago, to add to the section the following proviso:

Provided that a new classification of all employees referred to in the foregoing section, whose term of employment in the public service exceed ten years, be effected upon the coming into force of the present Act, so as to ensure to said employees a salary proportioned to the duration of their services as compared with the salaries of officers more recently appointed.

I suppose the minister will have no objection to this. He says this is the principle that will guide him in the application of the law.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not think that, at the present stage, I could take it upon myself to accept the amendment. I told my hon. friend (Mr. Monk), that the Bill as framed is exactly on the classification adopted for the inside service, and no added words of mine, or of my hon. friend could perfect it so far as that is concerned. He stated a moment ago that we should carry out as soon as possible the principle that the employees in the outside service in the larger cities should come under the Civil Service Act. If my hon. friend had been here the other day, and had listened to the long discussion which took place on the Bill he would have learned that that is my policy. We take the first step this year in classifying the clerks and employees in the post offices of the Dominion as they are classified in the Post Office Department. The next step, and one that I intend to take, but to which parliament as a whole perhaps, is not yet committed, is the bringing of the outside officers under the operation of the Civil Service Act. That pledge I have given to the House, and I intend to carry it through. The Bill has been framed very carefully by the officers of the department, and I could not alter the wording of it. All I can say is that the older employees in the service will benefit by the Bill. I am told by my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Russell), that the increase is very small. I heard the speech of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), the other night about the bank clerks; and that, and other things lead me to believe that the salaries in the post office will compare with the salaries in our financial institutions, and in other employments. The young man is appointed at $500 and gets a raise of $100 if he behaves well. He goes up to $800, to $1,000, to $1,200, to $1,600, and if he is a clever man, and knows how to make his way, if he shows some intelligence and some diligence in his readings he will soon be one of the best employees in the service. Examinations—we call them case examinations—are required every six months. This, as I said, is the first step. According to the arrangement, not by the whim or caprice of the minister, but by the reorganization of the post office system, there will be regular case examinations, and the best men in the service can have a chance to assert themselves, and to get increases. Again I say, that as a whole the increases are quite substantial, and will offer an opportunity to every diligent officer in the department. My hon. friend from East Toronto says he has heard many complaints about the increases. Well, my experience is that no man in the service is pleased when he gets $200 of an increase if he expected to get $250 or $300. But there must be a limit, and that limit is a question of policy. The government as a whole say that those employees can be increased to a certain limit, and not beyond. This is a charge upon the public revenues. I told the hon. gentleman the other day that the total increase of the employees of the post office would amount this year to over $51,000. Three years ago, we increased the letter carriers, which meant another charge on the public revenues, I made that increase cheerfully, and I think that the letter carriers as a body are satisfied. Their salaries will reach $2.75 a day. Of course, there are a few agitators who can never be satisfied, who think they are entitled to salaries equal to the indemnity of a member of parliament, or the salary of a minister of the Crown. We cannot satisfy these agitators. The less work they do the more highly they think they are entitled to be paid. But, as I have said, the great majority of these men are satisfied. Of course, if they are encouraged by gentlemen who pat them on the shoulder and say: Why do you not have some more? You are getting $2.75, but you ought to get $3. Demand it; the minister will give it to you. If they are talked to in that way dissatisfaction may increase. Of course, I am only administering a trust for the people of Canada, but I think from the expressions of opinion I have heard, the people are satisfied. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), spoke of young men in banks twenty and twenty-five years of age receiving $400 a year.

Why, Sir, in the Post Office Department they receive $500 on appointment, and an annual increase of $100 until they reach the maximum of their class. Then if they are diligent, if they are intelligent, if they show some ability, they are taken into a higher class. But the man who simply performs his work in an easy way, who is always looking at the clock to leave the office, that man will not get beyond the maximum of his class. Now as regards the pull, or such influences as are mentioned by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), let me tell him this: During the last five years that I have been Postmaster General I have made very few appointments to positions carrying large salaries. I have in mind two or three officers who have been appointed to the higher positions. Let me mention the post office inspector at Ottawa, Mr. Bolduc, a brother of Senator Bolduc, belonging to a Conservative family, and a Conservative himself. He had served for twenty years in the Quebec district. I did not consider his political leanings, I only knew that he was the best man in the service in the province of Quebec, and I gave him that lift. I have in mind also another post office inspector whom I appointed the other day in Quebec to succeed Mr. Caouette. He had served the public for many years in the post office, and I was reminded by some of my friends that I should have taken a Liberal. But that gentleman is a man of ability, he has had a large experience, and that is the keystone of the whole service. Then I selected Mr. Green, of Quebec, a gentleman whose politics I do not know, but everybody admits that he was by far the best man, and I believe he was also an Irishman. In the higher positions of the service, the best men always reach the top.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to ask the minister a question. Under present conditions and regulations, is the department getting satisfactory men in the railway mail service? Have they any difficulty in maintaining the service with satisfactory men?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The only difficulty I find in getting men for the railway mail service is to find those who are able to pass the qualifying examinations. Otherwise, we get hundreds of men who are ready to serve as railway mail clerks, but they are not able to pass the qualifying examination. We are obliged to take them on as labourers, in twenty-five cases out of forty, and give them a chance to learn their runs, and after a while they are able to pass the examination. But it is when the time comes to appoint railway mail clerks who can pass an examination without coming into the service first as labourers that we find difficulty. Later on they pass the examination and are appointed regularly. My hon. friend may be sure that we have hundreds and thousands of applications for the position, and the minister and the members are pestered through the applications we receive.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is there any way in which you make the position attractive enough to get men who could qualify? When you get men who are able to qualify at the start, would you necessarily send for them from among the labourers you take in and train?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is not a question of whether the position is attractive or not. The question is whether the man is able to fulfil the duties imposed on him by the Post Office Act. That is where we find the difficulty. All young men would like to get attractive positions; they think a position in the Post Office Department is an attractive one, where they receive good salaries, and have not much to do. We do not want that class of men. We want men who are qualified, who are industrious, and who do not spend their time in agitating for increased salaries.

Mr. COWAN. When the Postmaster General institutes a comparison between a post office employee and a bank employee he cannot afford to forget the fact that a bank offers rewards for merit, and a preferment which the Post Office Department does not offer.

Mr. LEMIEUX. A man can get to the top in the Post Office Department if he possesses the necessary energy and industry. The best men in the service are those who fought their way up from the bottom, who showed pluck and industry.

Mr. COWAN. I quite agree. But I say that even if a post office employee does reach the top, the reward he gets on reaching the top is nothing in comparison with the reward a bank employee receives who reaches the top in his calling.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is the reward of the bank employee? The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) told us the other night.

Mr. COWAN. My hon. friend from Grey was referring to the ordinary employee of a bank. But human nature is so constituted that a man is willing to take a very small salary for his labour if the goal of his ambition offers a very high one, and if the reward when he reaches that goal is a great one. I want to point out to the minister that he cannot afford to overlook that fact, and that since he is not offering that great reward to the man who attains the goal of his ambition in the Post Office Department, it is the duty of a minister, and of the country to pay liberally the men for the work they perform in the service.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

REVILLON FRERES TRADING COMPANY, LIMITED.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 158) to incorporate Revillon Frères Trading Company, Limited—Mr. Devlin.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin), had this Bill in charge, but he is not here. All the clauses were passed in committee with the exception of No. 10. That was laid over because of some technical changes made in section 10, by the law clerk, not altering in the least the sense or legal effect of the Bill. Since then clause 10 has been again submitted to the law clerk, a new clause has been agreed upon, and as I was a member of the committee to which, in a sense, the Bill was referred, I was about to propose a new clause 10. Perhaps as the hon. member for Wright is now in his place he will do it.

Mr. DEVLIN. No, I would rather that the hon. gentleman should propose it.

Mr. BARKER. I would, therefore, move that section 10, as it appears in the Bill, be struck out, and that the following be inserted in lieu thereof:

10. At least two directors shall be residents of Canada and subjects of His Majesty.

As to this clause I may say that the real proprietorship of Revillon Brothers is in old France, they are a very wealthy concern, they established a large business in Canada, and they are constituting a company to manage the Canadian business. The present Bill appoints five directors, and it was considered advisable that at least two directors should be residents of Canada and British subjects. That is acceptable on all sides.

2. Non-resident directors may vote by proxy at any meeting of directors, and such proxy shall be held by a director only, but no meeting shall be competent to transact business unless at least two directors are present in person.

That was discussed fully in committee, and I am aware that its terms are strictly in accordance with what the committee desired to include in the Bill.

3. No such proxy shall be valid unless it has been made or renewed in writing within one year next preceding the time of such meeting.

That clause was not fully discussed in the committee, but it has been added in accordance with the general laws about proxies as to insurance, and all other such companies so as to prevent old proxies being held by parties, and used when perhaps all knowledge of them has expired. That simply requires that every proxy to be used shall be renewed within a year.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 202) to incorporate the High River, Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company, Mr. Martin (Regina).

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 218) for the relief of George Mackay Sutherland.—Mr. Tolmie.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 216) to amend the Post Office Act, Mr. Lemieux.

Mr. COWAN. At six o'clock I was drawing the attention of the House to what seems to me to be the fact, that the analogy drawn by the Postmaster General between the position of a post office employee and a bank clerk is a fallacious one. In the case of the post office employee at the end of a long and faithful service, there are awaiting him none of those big rewards that human nature craves, no money rewards in the sense of princely incomes, nor social distinctions such as the minister himself may attain unto in the shape of knighthood. And so to compensate for this lack of big rewards, the income from day to day should be sufficient to furnish an incentive to the employee to do his best, and at the same time to induce a better class of employees into the service. The analogy is not a fair one. Many of the post office employees are just as well equipped as bank clerks. There are no Sir Edward Cloustons and no Sir Edward Walkers amongst them, but compensation should be made them in some form. Perhaps the minister can tell us how many 'mute inglorious Miltons are wasting their sweetness on the desert air' in his department. I draw the attention of the minister to another fact. I submitted to the House two years ago carefully collated figures which went to show that at that time the cost of living on the Pacific coast was about forty-six per cent greater than in the East. What provision is the minister making to meet this greater cost of living of his employees in the west?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I made a statement as to that the other day showing that an extra allowance was made to officials living west of Port Arthur. The leader of the House reminds me that time is precious, and that if there is to be discussion we must postpone the consideration of this Bill until after the adjournment. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MONK. Is it the intention not to pass the Bill now?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Supply Bill will come in a few minutes, and adjournment will take place this evening. This measure has been already thoroughly discussed, and while I like discussion, yet the adjournment cannot be delayed, as the Deputy Governor will arrive shortly.

Mr. MONK. There will be no delay so far as we are concerned. The Postmaster General took up most of the time to-day.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In answering questions.

Mr. MONK. It will only take a few minutes to put it through.

Mr. FIELDING. All right, put it through.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier announced that he had an amendment.

Mr. MONK. If the Postmaster General will carry out the idea suggested by that amendment, as I understood him to say he would, I will draw it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. I would not like the Postmaster General to be under the impression that the old employees of the post office have done any grumbling. It surely is legitimate for those officials who have given twenty years faithful service to the country to see that their rights are safeguarded.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is the object of the Bill; we both are agreed on that.

Mr. MONK. I would remark that I have done less talking than the Postmaster General. I notice that my hon. friend is developing a tendency of one of his eminent colleagues to absorb all the time of the House on his own measures.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. MONK. I will not mention his name; one saturn devouring his own children is enough.

Mr. BLAIN. I have considerable correspondence, which if time permitted, I would read, but I shall only read one paragraph in one letter, which says——

I am now drawing $1,040 and have been over nineteen years in the service, so that it will be three years yet before I reach the present maximum of $1,200, and seven years before I reach the $1,400, or twenty-six years to get to the maximum salary.

I am not going to make any comments, but I hope the minister will give this some further consideration.

Mr. BRADBURY. I have a telegram from Winnipeg regarding this matter:

Re Postmaster General's statement as reported in to-day's Winnipeg 'Telegram' that an allowance is paid western postal servants of $180 to $280 per year to meet extra cost of living in the west, we beg to draw your attention to the fact that the allowance paid at Winnipeg is from $200 to $180 according to salaries. $800 and under only receive a maximum allowance of $180. An allowance under $180 per year is entirely inadequate to meet the ever increasing cost of living in the west. Press for the maximum allowance of $180 on all salaries.

I do not know what that means, but I infer from it that they do not always get the $180 allowance, and I understood from the Postmaster General that they do.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. BARKER. I have frequently had occasion in my constituency to look into complaints of officials in the hon. gentleman's department. I have not taken their statements, but have obtained information over a period of years, and I do not hesitate to say that there have been many cases of very gross injustice to deserving employees. I do not propose to go into any details, but ask the House to accept my word. I have not encouraged such complaints, but rather discouraged them, but my opinion is that if the Postmaster General, or his very able deputy minister will frequently look into the operation of the changes in the staff, and take some responsibility upon themselves for what is done in their names, a great deal of injustice will be prevented, and the staff generally will be better satisfied.

On section 9,

Mr. SPROULE. Does that mean that they must pass an examination yearly?

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is a qualifying examination, and besides they must pass a case examination. That applies to those who come up to reach their maximum.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose a man has been 15 years in the service, surely he could not inprove in his work after that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have a communication from the western railway mail clerks, dated May 13, 1911, in which they point out that this Bill is not fair to them in several respects. No doubt the minister has received a similar communication.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why does he not relieve the injustice?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Post office officials are only human and poor humanity has always a grievance. Formerly they were appointed at $500 and received an annual increase of $50 until they reached $700. Now they are appointed at $500, and they reach $800 by annual increases of $100. Then instead of getting a maximum of $1,200, they get $1,400.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Here is what they say:

If you take the case of a man drawing $1,200, he is now drawing $1,200 and under the present schedule he also receives a living allowance of $120 or 10 per cent on his salary. Under the proposed schedule he advances to $1,250 by annual increases of $50 and loses his allowance of $120, making a reduction of $70 the first year and $20 the second year.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The writer of that letter is under a misapprehension. I have received lots of such letters. They receive 10 per cent as a special allowance when they reach $1,200.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then he is not accurate in supposing his salary will be reduced.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will it be actually increased?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then they speak of their expectation of a flat increase of $150 and yearly increases of $60. They think this would be only reasonable under the conditions of the services, particularly in view of the high cost of living.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When they are placed in the inside service I will seriously consider a flat increase such as the inside service received.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the objection to putting them in the inside service receives.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have no objection myself, but it takes time to commit parliament to it. This classification is based on the inside service. I hope, within a year or two to bring them into the inside service.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I hope so,—perfectly willing to take time, but not willing to take to eternity.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL JULY 18.

Mr. FIELDING moved:

That when this House adjourns this day it stand adjourned until Tuesday, July 18, 1911.

Motion agreed to.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FIELDING moved:

That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1912, the sum of $353,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved:

That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1912, the sum of $26,642,222.07 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved:

That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1912, the sum of $7,934,806.56 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 225) for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial years ending respectively 31st March 1911, and 31st March 1912.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first and second time, considered in committee and reported without amendment.

Mr. FIELDING moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If it is possible to keep any check upon the accuracy of the figures, I take it for granted, as is always the case in such matters, that the computation has been accurately made, and in accordance with the resolutions which have been passed.

Mr. FIELDING. I have no doubt that it is correct. The officials are very careful.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

INTERCOLONIAL—BRANCH LINES.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:

Whereas, by chapter 25, of the Statutes of 1910, it was provided that the Minister of Railways and Canals might, subject to the terms and conditions therein contained, lease lines of railway connecting with the government railways and operate them as a part of the government railways, but no leases have been made under the said Act: And, whereas, it is deemed advisable to make the provisions hereinafter contained for the leasing of the undermentioned line of railway. Therefore, it is resolved that it is expedient that the Minister of Railways and Canals be authorized, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to lease for a term not exceeding 99 years the following line of railway, namely:—The Bale railway, property of the Acadia Coal Company, Limited, extending from New Glasgow to Thorburn, in the province of Nova Scotia, a distance of about six miles, upon terms and conditions to be approved of by the Government Railways Managing Board; provided, however, that the consideration by way of rental for such line of railway shall be an annual rental of one dollar and the carriage of the traffic of the company, its successors and assigns, upon the line of railway to be leased and upon the government railways, and between points to be designated and at rates not in excess of maximum fixed rates for such carriage between such points, such fixed rates to be subject to a provision for revision of such rates at the end of each period of 10 years during the continuance of the lease.

Such railway so leased shall become and be operated as a part of the government railways.

He said: Of course I do not hope to get these resolutions through to-night; but as we have a few moments to wait, I think it would be the part of wisdom for me to say a few words about these branch lines, so that hon. gentlemen can find them on 'Hansard,' and have an opportunity of thinking the subject over during the recess, and be able more intelligently to take it up again when the House reassembles. The great majority of the lines that might be available under lease to the Intercolonial are placed under two resolutions. The first one referred to as the Vale railway, is a short road a little over five miles long, running out of New Glasgow, and owned by the Acadia Coal Company. It really does its own traffic, and it is very desirable from the standpoint of the Intercolonial that, if reasonable arrangements can be made, that road should come under government control, and be leased as part of the government railways. The Acadia Coal Company owns the railway, and owns the coal mines, and really does its own business, and little else. Just beyond the property of the Acadia coal mines there are other coal areas that might, so it has been represented to me, be well developed. But as one coal mine or coal company owns the railway, it does not at all encourage the development of the other coal areas by assisting them to carry their traffic. It has been represented to the department, and to the board of management that this road could be secured, not by the payment of any cash, but merely by an arrangement with them for a term of years as to the freight rates on their coal. Of course the Intercolonial would get all the traffic, as it does now, but it would be in the interest of the railway as well, to acquire that line. The reason it is put in a separate resolution is, as I have said, that it can be acquired without the usual terms of lease, by an arrangement as to freight rates, and without the payment of any cash.

The other lines can hardly be said to be paying in themselves, apart from the government railway system, if we take them as single entities. The majority of them have a surplus of receipts over expenses now, but if we were to lease them, and pay interest on a certain amount, probably there would not be any surplus, probably there would be a deficit, treating them as mere entities, each line by itself. But this much must be borne in mind, I say it on behalf of the state owned railway, that it will not be long until other railway lines must have certain rights over the Intercolonial, or they will have to build a line from St. John to Halifax themselves. The Grand Trunk Pacific has running rights, under its contract, over the Intercolonial from Moncton to St. John, and from St. John to Halifax. Merely looking at these lines as entities in themselves, as not paying much, or not paying at all, should some other line secure any of these branches that now feed the Intercolonial, it would be a very serious thing for the state owned railway. That is one side of it. The other side is the interest of the people. Now, leaving out of the question what detriment it would be to the state owned railway, and the decrease in the value of our property if these branch lines with their traffic were to be diverted to some other private owned road, there is another aspect. Some of these roads governments have aided, and their operation is unsatisfactory. I will give an extreme case, the Salisbury and Albert road has ceased operation over a certain portion of it, the department has been advised. The people who for years have had railway facilities given them by this line, are at the present moment without any railway facilities. The government of Canada has aided that line, although it has I think a provincial charter. I presume the provincial government has also aided it, and the county itself gave aid. But notwithstanding all that, the people along that line of railway are now deprived of all railway facilities. I am bold enough to take the ground that it is the duty of some government to afford facilities to those people that formerly had them, even if it should cost some money. That is one class of line. The other class will come into the category I mentioned a few moments ago. It will be an immense detriment to the Intercolonial if they pass into other hands. I am not going into details at all, but I want the members of this House during recess to think over the situation of those lines, and ask themselves whether it is not advisable to give the Department of Railways power, under the terms outlined in the resolutions, which are very much restricted, to secure these lines, or a portion of them at least, for the reasons I have stated. On the other hand, where people are likely to be deprived, and have been deprived in some instances, of the railway transportation they have enjoyed for years, is it not our duty to do something in that respect? I submit the resolutions for the consideration of the House during the recess, so that when they come back they will be able, I hope, to support the measure.

Mr. DANIEL. I would like to ask the minister what position those lines will be in whose bonds are guaranteed by the provincial government, and I think where the provincial government holds a mortgage on the railway? What position would that railway hold after it was leased by this government?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a question to be investigated by a judge of the Exchequer Court. My hon. friend will see in this resolution that the present condition of a line of that kind, its indebtedness, where it is, and what the remuneration ought to be, will be investigated by a judge of the Exchequer Court. It strikes me that in a case of that kind probably some arrangement might be made, but at least on most of the lines I imagine interest is not being paid to any one on the bonds.

Mr. DANIEL. What is the meaning of the words 'present owners' in one sentence, and then in the next sentence, 'owners thereof as of date of April 1, 1911.' Do they refer to the same persons? Do 'present owners' mean owners of date of April 1, 1911?

Mr. GRAHAM. As I understand it, when this Bill was introduced, if a date had not been fixed it might be possible to have the ownership revert to the original owners in order to have the conditions of taking over bettered.

Mr. DANIEL. Is that the explanation of the present wording? What is meant by the first of these two sentences when it speaks of 'present owners'?

Mr. GRAHAM. Those are the owners of April 1, 1911.

Mr. DANIEL. In regard to the owners of April 1, 1911, the judge has only to make a report, but he makes a valuation with reference to what the present owners have paid for the road?

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would not for a moment, at this stage, attempt to discuss the resolutions, but I have taken considerable interest in this matter. Indeed, I have had the honour of first bringing to the notice of parliament and the government the whole question of the absorption of the branch lines of the Intercolonial railway, and I think it is due to myself that I should say some few words in respect to the resolutions. If I were to evince a little exaltation with regard to the government having met my views, at least measurably, perhaps, I would be pardoned. However, my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), has thrown out some ideas which he wishes hon. members to consider during the adjournment. There are a few things that I would like him consider during the adjournment, and one is this, that in an undertaking of this character it is well—and I suppose we all recognize it—that two interests should be considered; first, the interests of the Intercolonial railway, second, the interests of the communities served by these several branch lines, and you might say, third, the interests of the whole country. But, as I understand it, the Intercolonial railway interests are representative of the interests of the whole of Canada. Now, I regret that there are one or two omissions with respect to railways in the province of Nova Scotia. I refer to the coal railways in the county of Cumberland. There is an omission of the power of expropriation with respect to some of these roads, or in respect to all of them. In a word, I would like to make my meaning clear in this regard. I hold that if there were power of expropriation given the government of Canada to take over some of these roads it would only be protecting the interests of the Intercolonial railway, and therefore, the interests of Canada, and it would enable them to secure lines of railway which they might not be able to secure under the provisions of these resolutions. For instance, the coal railways in the county of Cumberland are so situated. One is the Maritime Coal and Railway Company, and the other is the Cumberland Coal and Railway Company. The first named is known as the Joggins road, or coal mine. The Maritime Coal and Railway Company have a line running from Maccan to Joggins mine a distance of 12 miles, and it is known as the Joggins railway. There are five distinct coal mines on that line of railway, but the Joggins mine so called is owned by the railway company. The other mines are owned by separate corporations. One is the Strathcona mine, another is the Jubilee mine, another the Minudie mine, another the Fundy mine, and I think that there is still another tract or area known as the Boston area. These five companies, other than the coal and railway company, are placed at a very great disadvantage by reason of the fact that the railway company operate a coal mine on that same line of railway to the detriment of the other mines, and the result is a depreciation in the value of the coal mined by these separate corporations. It seems to me that in the interest of the Intercolonial railway the government should be in a position to secure that line whether the coal and railway company desire it or not. The right of eminent domain should apply and the powers of expropriation should be given, in the interests of the whole country, and in the interests of those several mines that are lying along the same route. The same condition applies to the Cumberland Coal and Railway Company which operates in connection with the Springhill mine. This is a railway running from Springhill Junction on the Intercolonial railway to tide-water at Parrsboro, in the county of Cumberland. That company operate lines, they own the railway, and there are several coal mining areas which are absolutely precluded from being developed by reason of the conditions resulting from the ownership of that railway. If the government had the power of expropriation they could secure these lines. The coal and railway companies as owners are not interested in parting with these roads. They make large dividends out of the operation of the railways, and while provision is made with respect to some of these railways there are many of them which will not take advantage of the opportunity of leasing or even selling their roads to the government of Canada in order that they might become a portion of the Intercolonial railway system. Then, there is the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, which, to my mind, commands the traffic of Prince Edward Island and is the key to the situation with respect to that traffic. The Minister of Railways has said very clearly and distinctly that to the extent to which any of these branch lines are secured by any great private railway corporation the valuable asset of the government in the Intercolonial railway is thereby depreciated. We must look forward to the fact that as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company have running rights over the Intercolonial railway from Moncton to Halifax, and from Moncton to St. John, so must the Canadian Pacific Railway Company secure those rights. So must the Canadian Northern in time secure those same running rights, and if one of these railways in the meantime were to step in and secure this New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, secure the Albert railway, and secure some others of these branch lines the main trunk line would be depreciated in value. If the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have it in mind to secure any portion of the Intercolonial railway, either by purchase or by lease, or if the Canadian Northern have any such idea in their minds, naturally, as a business proposition, they would secure some of its main feeders, and securing them they would depreciate the value of the government asset, the value of the Intercolonial railway, and, therefore, they could derive a better bargain.

They would be in a position to say to the government of Canada: We have control of the branches which supply traffic, and to that extent the Intercolonial railway would be depreciated in value, and that would be a very easy way for any railway corporation to secure for practically a song the Intercolonial for their own use and benefit. Therefore, as a matter of protection the government should take power of expropriation. There are measures before parliament to-day to build new branches for the Intercolonial railway, and power of expropriation is given with respect to the right of way, and in order to protect the interests of the people, and of the Intercolonial railway the same principle should apply with respect to these branch lines. I already have evidence that one of these railways was secured by private individuals within the last six weeks for speculative purposes; in my judgment, for the mere purpose of holding it as against the Intercolonial railway, and playing off the Canadian Pacific railway, or the Canadian Northern railway as against the Intercolonial railway. Having secured this road they would have the Intercolonial railway and the government at a disadvantage in the event of any attempt on their part either with respect to securing running rights or leasehold interest on any particular portion of the Intercolonial railway. I ask the Minister of Railways to consider during the adjournment, if, in self-protection, it would not be advisable to incorporate in this resolution a clause to secure powers of expropriation. If there were a clause giving the minister power to expropriate and exercise the right of eminent domain, we would be in a better position to deal with the owners of these several branch lines. I strongly urge upon him the advisability of carrying out this idea. It seems to me that the minister should by all means add to the list of railways to be secured the railway known as the Maritime Coal and Railway Company's road, and also the Cumberland Coal and Railway Company's road, the one 12 miles long and the other 30 miles long, speaking from memory. I know the value of many of these roads. The possibilities of the road formerly known as the Baie des Chaleurs railway are immense. The great fishing and lumber resources of Bonaventure and Gaspé counties cannot fail to make that railway in years to come one of the best paying roads the government could secure. Then the International road running from Campbellton to the St. John river protects the Intercolonial railway in its American traffic, it being a short line by which to convey to the New England market the stone and fish and great natural resources of that territory. Then, the Caraquet road running from Bathurst to Shipegan and Tracadie traverses a country second to none in Canada as it runs through the county of Gloucester rich in mineral, lumbering, fishing and agricultural resources. That railway would add very materially to the value of the Intercolonial railway. Then there are the Kent Northern, and the Moncton and Buctouche railway in the county of Kent which are valuable pieces of line. Then the Albert railway traverses a district, the richest in mineral resources in eastern Canada. The great shale district, the rich natural gas and oil district of the county of Albert, and the great plaster industry predict for the future of that road as well as for the Salisbury and Harvey line great prosperity. The Intercolonial railway should secure that, and it should not be left to the whim of owners or speculators as to whether the people of Canada should or should not have these railways. It is a business proposition in the interests of the property of the people of Canada, and it should be so managed that no band of speculators, and no little corporation, or no aggregation of corporations should be allowed to hold up the people of Canada in securing leasehold rights in these railways. From a business standpoint there should be the right of expropriation, in justice to the Intercolonial railway, and to the communities which are served by these branch lines. I could give other reasons in support of my contention, but I shall reserve them until, if it is the will of Providence, we shall meet again. I earnestly beseech the Minister of Railways and the government, and the hon. members of this House to study this question during the recess. I am not advocating it from a party standpoint; I advocate it because I believe it to be in the best interests of the Intercolonial railway and in the best interests of affording facilities for the interchange of interprovincial trade. I believe it is an absolute necessity from a business point of view that expropriation proceedings should be taken Motion agreed to and House went into Committee on the resolution.

Progress reported.

McLEOD POST OFFICE.

Mr. HERRON. Is any progress being made on the McLeod post office? I have brought this matter to the attention of the House on several occasions. It is in a most disgraceful condition.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I shall urge upon the Minister of Public Works the erection of a public building in McLeod. That is the only way to remedy the grievances.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—LEASE OF BRANCH LINES.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Whereas, by chapter 25, of the statutes of 1910, it was provided that the Minister of Railways and Canals might subject to the terms and conditions therein contained, lease lines of railway connecting with the government railways and operate them as a part of the government railways but no leases have been made under the said Act, and whereas it is deemed advisable to make the provisions hereinafter contained for the leasing of certain of such lines of railway. Therefore, it is resolved, that it is expedient that the Minister of Railways and Canals be authorized, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to lease for a term not exceeding 99 years, any of the following lines of railway, namely:

The Quebec Oriental railway, extending from Matapedia to Paspebiac, a distance of about one hundred miles;

The Hampton and St. Martins railway, extending from Hampton to St. Martins, a distance of about thirty miles;

The Albert railway, extending from Salisbury to Albert, a distance of about forty-five miles;

The Moncton and Buctouche railway, extending from Moncton to Buctouche, a distance of about twenty-eight miles;

The Caraquet railway and Gulf Shore railway, together extending from Bathurst to Tracadie, a distance of about eighty-five miles;

The York and Carleton railway, extending from Cross Creek to and beyond Stanley, a distance of about ten miles;

The International railway, extending from Campbellton to the St. John Valley at St. Leonards, a distance of about one hundred and thirteen miles;

The Cape Breton railway, extending from Point Tupper to St. Peters, a distance of about thirty miles;

The Temiscouata railway, extending from Rivière du Loup to Connors, a distance of about one hundred and thirteen miles;

The New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, extending from Sackville Junction to Cape Tormentine, a distance of about thirty miles;

The Elgin and Havelock railway, extending from Elgin to Havelock, a distance of about twenty-eight miles;

The Kent Northern railway, extending from Kent Junction to Richibucto, a distance of about twenty-seven miles;

Including the company's rolling stock in each case.

Upon terms and conditions to be approved of by the government railways managing board, provided, however, that the rental to be paid for each such line of railway shall in no case exceed an amount to be determined in the following manner, that is to say, the value of the railway proposed to be leased shall be fixed and determined by the judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, upon the report of the chief engineer of the government railways, based upon the examination of the railway by, and the report of the engineer appointed by the Department of Railways and Canals to inspect such railway during construction, such value also to include interest during construction, the cost of equipping the railway, the cost of terminals and of right of way of the railway now in use in the operation of the said railway in any city or incorporated town, (the amount of such interest during construction, the cost of equipping the railway, the cost of terminals and of right of way of the railway in any city or incorporated town to be fixed by such judge upon proper and sufficient evidence) and deducting therefrom any aid received from the government of Canada towards the construction of such railway, and also deducting such amount, if any, as may, in the opinion of the said chief engineer, be necessary to put any such line of railway in a safe and efficient condition.

Except that in the case of railways which have, since their construction, either through sale, foreclosure proceedings, transfer of shares of stock or securities, become either wholly or substantially the property of other companies or persons, at a cost less than the original cost thereof with the deductions aforesaid, then the value of such last mentioned railways shall, for rental purposes hereunder, be determined by such judge upon evidence of, and shall be based upon, the amounts actually paid by the present owners for such line of railway, shares and securities, respectively. Such judge shall, in the case of the railways last above mentioned, make a report showing the amounts paid for such railways and their rolling stock, shares and securities, respectively, and the owners thereof, as of date of April 1, 1911. After receiving the report and finding of such judge, the Minister of Railways may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, lease any of said lines of railway and pay therefor, for the first five years of the term of the lease, an amount as rental not exceeding three per cent per annum on such value so fixed by such judge; for the next five years of the term of the lease an amount not exceeding three and one-half per cent per annum on such value; and thereafter during the term of the lease an amount not exceeding four per cent per annum on such value; such rental to be paid half-yearly.

Nothing herein shall be deemed to require the taking over of any of the said railways if, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, having regard to the convenience of the public or the interests of the Intercolonial railway, the terms and conditions proposed by the company are not fair and reasonable.

Any such line so leased shall become and be operated as part of the government railways.

Mr. TURGEON. I desire to extend to the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) my heartiest congratulations on every word he has said. I appreciate what he said on the question of expropriation. That course will avoid all possible obstruction in the future, and I hope that during the recess the minister will so amend the resolution as to provide for that means of acquiring these roads. I have on other occasions expressed my sentiments in reference to the absorption of branch lines by the Intercolonial. It is a project which has been much discussed in the maritime provinces, particularly during the last few years, and it is a proposition to which the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) has devoted great attention for many years. I certainly congratulate him upon the fact that he has been able to bring to his view of the question both the members of the government and of the House in the years during which he has been advocating the transfer of these branch lines to the Intercolonial railway, and I hope that when this House meets again after recess, every member will have seen the advisability of accepting that policy and also of introducing an expropriation Act with reference to each of these branches.

Mr. SPROULE. Are all these lines now built and in operation?

Mr. GRAHAM. They are all built and in operation except a portion of one line which I described a few moments ago, on which operation has ceased recently.

Mr. SPROULE. Must they be up to a certain standard before being taken over by the government or may they be in a dilapidated condition which will involve heavy preliminary expenditures?

Mr. GRAHAM. As a matter of fact it would be impossible to take them over under a condition that they were all to be repaired up to a certain standard.

There is a provision in the resolution which says that the amount required to put them into good working order shall be taken into account in taking them over under lease, that it will be taken from the amount on which interest will be paid. That is one class. The conditions are so peculiar that after studying them it was found that the Act passed last year included provisions which made it impossible to take over some of these lines.

On motion of Mr. Graham the debate was adjourned.

ROYAL ASSENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TUESDAY, July 18, 1911.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In what position is the taking of the census at the present time, has the enumeration been completed, and if so when is it expected that the completed census returns will be ready?

Mr. FISHER. I cannot reply off hand, but after consultation with the officers I hope to make an announcement to-morrow.

THE SEAL FISHERIES.

Mr. SPROULE. I saw it stated in the papers some time ago that the negotiations in reference to the seal fisheries had been concluded. Has the government any information to give on this important subject?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The treaty has been signed, and we expect to be able to lay it on the table at an early date.

CHINESE INVESTIGATION COMMISSION.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Has the report of Mr. Justice Murphy, of the Chinese Investigation Commission at Vancouver been received, and if so will it be laid on the table without an order of the House? I put the question because Bill (No. 147) has stood over at the request of members of the House pending the presentation and consideration of this report. If an order of the House to have it printed has to be moved for, of course it would not be feasible to consider the report now.

THE COPYRIGHT ACT.

Mr. LENNOX. Can the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) inform us about what time he will proceed with the Act respecting copyright? I want to give that measure some personal attention, and I am reasonably busy now, so that if the minister would say about what time he would bring forward the measure it would facilitate me and others.

Mr. FISHER. I have been in communication with the Rt. Hon. Sidney Buxton who has informed me that he hopes the Bill in the Imperial parliamnet will be passed shortly. As some amendments have been introduced to that Bill it would be well for us to delay so that our Bill may harmonize with it as far as possible in the shape in which it is finally passed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is it out of committee in the Imperial House?

Mr. FISHER. I think it is still in the committee.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). Will any opportunity be given to interests who are concerned in that very important measure to present their views to parliament. Since the Bill has been introduced there has been a great deal of public discussion on it in the press and throughout the country. I understand that the imperial Bill was referred to a committee of the House before which the interests affected were heard. I also understand that the same proceeding was adopted by the American Congress on their Copyright Bill and also in Germany and other European countries which are in what might be called the copyright family of nations. Does not the minister consider that the Bill should be referred to some tribunal which would receive the opinions and suggestions of those interested?

Mr. FISHER. Before the adjournment, the Bill had practically passed through Committee of the Whole, but I asked that it should not be reported. Since then I have taken great pains to send copies of the Bill and of the debate to everybody who seemed to be at all interested, with the request that they should communicate their views to the department, before parliament reassembled. We have had a few replies which will receive every consideration. The Bill is still in Committee of the Whole and can be thoroughly considered there. I am sure that the hon. members interested will be able to present to the House the views of those whom they represent.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FENIAN RAIDS VETERANS.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I desire to bring to the attention of the House a matter that has been before the government for the last fifteen or sixteen years; that is, the question of the recognition in some substantial manner of the claims of the veterans of 1866 and 1870. I do not intend at this stage to go into the merits or demerits of the claims of the veterans, but I intend to show first of all what steps had been taken by the veterans with a view to having their rights recognized in some manner by this government. In the year 1896, I think, the first deputation waited on Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government and asked for some recognition of their claims. In speaking to that deputation, the Prime Minister is reported as follows—I am reading now from 'Hansard' of the 26th of March, 1906, and quoting from the speech made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk):

> He would like to find a few facts about the subject under discussion so that he would have a basis to work upon. To begin with, he said, I would like to know about how many men were called out at that time, and if it is the desire of the present delegation that services of all the remaining veterans who took an active part and also in what way it is considered their services would best be recognized.

Further on the Prime Minister is reported as saying:

> In making his reply, Mr. Laurier stated that he fully appreciated the strength of the reason that all should be remembered, and and that nothing would give him greater pleasure than laying the claims of the veterans before his colleagues at the next parliament, as he regretted to say it was too late at present to bring it up at the present session.

That would be towards the end of the first session of the present administration. Although between that time and 1905 two other delegations waited on the government, each of which received a favourable reply from the government, neither of which was specific, however, I understand that in 1905 a further large delegation waited on the Prime Minister and Sir Frederick Borden, a delegation evidently composed largely of veterans from the eastern townships of the province of Quebec and some from the province of Ontario. To that delegation the Prime Minister is reported to have replied as follows:

> Sir Wilfrid Laurier received much applause when he rose to reply. Two years ago he had been approached by a smaller deputation on a similar errand, but as the session was far advanced he had been unable to give them a definite answer. He had told them then he hoped to be in a better position next time they came to him. The members had evidently remembered his words, for they had now returned in largely increased numbers. He could hardly claim to be a veteran, as they had called him, for he had only been a volunteer in 1870. When the regiment he belonged to had been mustered the trouble was over. To the victors, he said, belong the spoils, was an expression most of them were familiar with. While the veterans had turned back the invaders in 1866 and 1870 there had been no spoils left. Thirty years after they come to ask from the country some recognition for their services, and he thought some appreciation should be shown. Their services then had saved the country from much humiliation, if not worse. Had the invaders not been repelled at the border much misery would have been caused, although, of course, the country would not have been conquered. What the veterans asked was not much. He could not give a definite answer himself to their request, but he could assure them that he and the ministers with him would be very pleased to report their request to the Privy Council. The meeting closed with three cheers and a 'tiger' for Sir Wilfrid, called for by some enthusiastic veteran.

In the same year the hon. member for Jacques Cartier again brought the matter up in the House, and at page 642 of Hansard of 1905, we find the Prime Minister reported as follows:

I think it is obvious to any one, and my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) will agree with me, that if the veterans of 1866 and 1870 have a claim against anybody, it is the Dominion government, although I do not say that the veterans, from their point of view, have not done well to address themselves to the provincial government. Mr. Gouin, the provincial premier, I do not think went further in his answer than to say that they should first of all address themselves to the Dominion government. This they have done, and the matter is now under consideration. But I must say, and my hon. friend will not be surprised, that up to this moment the government has had no time to take the matter in hand and give it the attention which it will require before we can come to a conclusion.

I may just point out that although the government say they had not time to take the matter into consideration, it is exactly nine years since the veterans first presented their petition to the House. Then the Prime Minister went on to say:

The matter is under consideration, and without making any pledge, I will say that I will give an answer during the present session. When the answer will be given, I am sorry to say that I can give no indication today to my hon. friend, but certainly it will be given during the present session.

Well, the answer was not given during that session. A further deputation waited on the government in 1906 and laid their claims before it, and I find that on that occasion the following reply was made to them by the Minister of Militia, Sir Frederick Borden:

But since my hon. friend has presented his argument and suggested that homesteads bona fide should be offered to these men who might be willing to go to the Northwest as actual settlers, I am inclined to the opinion that the government would be willing to take that matter into consideration.

Mr. MONK. They have that privilege now.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. That is what my hon. friend suggested, and I am merely giving him all he asks. I said a moment ago that some advantages might be given in the way of offering them special privileges to settle in certain communities or in certain favoured quarters. I have no right, however, to speak for the Minister of the Interior, but I would be disposed to go that far and see whether anything could be done to meet their views in that respect.

In the same debate the right hon. the Prime Minister is quoted as follows:

I dare say these veterans will say to us: We could fight in 1866, we could fight in 1870, but you canot expect that we can take up a pick and shovel and perform the arduous duties of a settler to-day. I can appreciate that answer, and I will say this, that if there is a man who cannot take his homestead we are ready to give it to him. If he has a son who is ready to fulfil the conditions of settlement, the government will be only too glad to give him that recognition. But if it is intended that these lands should be given to the veterans simply for the purpose of selling them to the foreigner, to the despised foreigner who has been mentioned by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, that is a thing which I think would deserve a little consideration.

Further on the Prime Minister used these words:

This motion comes very late after a lapse of 40 years, but yet it is not too late, and if a plan can be devised by which we can leaven the mass with our own blood and find homesteads for our veterans or their descendants and children, the government would be prepared to consider the question and do its share towards recognizing the men who risked their lives for the defence of the country upon that very important occasion.

I might here remark that the Prime Minister said that this motion came very late. I would like to point out to him that in the year 1875 the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, then premier of the country, did not think that it was too late, after a period of 65 years, to grant an annual pension of $50,000 to the veterans who had served in the war of 1812. On page 252 of 'Hansard' of 1875, I find the following:

On item 50—$50,000 to meet the probable amount required for pensions to veterans of the war of 1812.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK asked for some explanations. He desired to know whether those who had served for a shorter period, were to be placed on the same footing as those who had served for a long period, and whether all regiments would get a grant, or whether those known as the Glengarry regiment, which, he believed, had been pensioned by the Chelsea hospital authorities, were also to have a share. He also desired to know whether the widows of the veterans of 1812 would receive any consideration.

Hon. Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he feared they could give nothing to the widows. The intention of the government was to give to all men in actual service, numbering, he believed, probably about five or six hundred—of course, they could not tell the exact number, as some applications had come in which doubtless would not be fortified by the records. Those receiving aid must be at least seventy-six or seventy-eight years of age, because the great number of those who took part in that war must now be about or over 80. The pensions would be as nearly as possible approaching the amount to those given to the pensioners of the regular army at home.

In reply to Mr. Flesher,

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE said it was intended that the vote should be taken yearly. —Item passed.

So I would say that the mere fact that the volunteers of 1866 and 1870 have not been recognized after 40 years is no answer whatever, but on the contrary is only an argument why, if their claim is just, they should be recognized at this day, because the longer their rights are deferred the stronger their claims become. I would suggest that the Prime Minister follow the precedent of his former colleague and the former prime minister, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, who thought it was not too late, after 65 years, to recompense those who had fought in the interests of their country.

From what I have read, I think it may safely be assumed that a promise was made in 1906 by the Prime Minister and by Sir Frederick Borden that something would be done, and I believe that many members on the Liberal side who at that time voted against the resolution of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), did so, believing that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia intended to give something substantial to the volunteers. In proof of that, I shall quote from a speech of Mr. Logan, of Hants, then a member of this House, who said:

I feel very much in sympathy with the idea of giving substantial recognition to the men who live and to the heirs of those who have died who fought at this time or who went to the front; and I might have been inclined to have voted in favour of the motion as put before the House if we had not had the assurance given by the Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister, in reference to considering certain substantial recognition of what these men have done for their country.

So it is quite evident that in 1906, when this motion was before the House, many Liberals voted against it because they believed that the statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia amounted to a promise to do something for these veterans. Mr. Logan said further on:

We believe the government will do its duty, with this promise which has been given by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia.

And he voted against the resolution. My friend and opponent, the former member for North Grey, I find used words which only illustrate his sublime faith in the Prime Minister and anything the Prime Minister might do.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is why he is not here now.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. He is a very fine old gentleman, the only fault he had was that he was a blind follower of the Prime Minister, and would do anything the Prime Minister asked him. That hon. member said:

I would rather trust the somewhat indefinite promises of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) and the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) than to the belated good intentions of hon. gentlemen opposite.

That was five years ago, yet nothing whatever has been done to implement these promises.

I find that in the following years, with the perseverance and tenacity which they displayed in the rebellion, the veterans came back to the Prime Minister. In 1908, the Prime Minister replied to them as follows:

Two years ago I had the honour to receive a delegation of veterans of '66-'70 for the purpose of hearing a petition for recognition at the hands of the government. I did not then see a way of granting the petition. But I gave Mr. Patterson the injunction which I see he has remembered. Gentlemen, you have always been too kind to me. I cannot claim to be a veteran. True, I turned out with the rest, but I did so little that I am almost ashamed to wear my medal. But, gentlemen, there is an old saying that to the victors belong the spoils.

It is a peculiar thing that the Prime Minister has been holding up the spoils to these veterans the whole time, but they have not seen any of them yet. He continued:

After 30 years you come to your countrymen and ask that you may receive a little recognition at the hands of a grateful country. Something should be done. There is no doubt that by your action you saved the country from humiliation and perhaps worse. What you ask is not very much. But I am only one of the government. There are others here, the Postmaster General, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Militia, and we shall be pleased to present your request to the Privy Council and the Governor General. But, gentlemen, further than this I cannot promise.

The Prime Minister then added:

But do not trust the government.

That was in 1908. In the following February they came and in the Toronto 'Globe,' of February 5, I find this account of the meeting:

Sir Frederick Borden, after referring to the medals granted, is reported as follows:

He recognized the value of their services and would promise that the government would act on the petition in a proper manner.

Sir WILFRED LAURIER. He was very much in sympathy with their request. They were of course watch dogs of the treasury, but if the opposition would agree to spending the money he would be strongly tempted to be extravagant. He would be pleased to report to the Governor General the unanimous voice of this meeting and so far as he could discern the unanimous feeling of the House regarding the grant.

The 'Mail and Empire' the same date reports the meeting as follows:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier this afternoon promised a deputation of men who took part in the Fenian Raids of 1866 and 1870 that he would recommend their request for a grant of land to His Excellency the Governor General at the earliest possible day.

That was in February, 1909, and still the veterans are kept waiting for the spoils which had been promised. Back again they come on December 3, a larger deputation than ever, and, on December 4, I find in the Toronto 'Globe':

Veterans' requests—Sir Wilfrid's answer is very encouraging—Government already considering scheme of rewarding the men who repulsed the Fenian Raids.

One hundred and fifty Fenian Raid veterans of '66-'70 marched to Parliament Hill at noon to-day, headed by a pipe band, and met Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Frederick Borden, Hon. Sydney Fisher and Hon. L. P. Brodeur. . . They asked either a land grant or pension. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in replying . . . said the government was always disposed to deal in a sympathetic spirit with the men who had stood ready to sacrifice their lives in defence of flag and country; but, while sympathizing with the movement for some tangible recognition of the veterans' claims, he thought there would be some difficulty in deciding just who were entitled to the reward, and he intimated that perhaps it would be well to distinguish between the men who actually went to the front and saw active service and those who were merely under arms at the time of the raids. The matter was seriously engaging the attention of the government, and personally he would be glad if some action could be taken soon to grant a reasonable measure of recognition to the veterans by a grateful country.

Upon that same delegation the member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey) made these remarks:

Mr. W. O. Sealey, M.P., believed that if the veterans could agree to take a land grant with the provisions that they or their children would settle on it they would get it immediately.

On the 30th of January, 1910, a question was put upon the Order Paper by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) to which the government replied as follows:

The government has not come to any conclusion but will at an early day.

Just imagine, fourteen years after they came into power and after they had had it under their very serious consideration for fourteen years, they say that they still have it under their serious consideration. In the meantime there have been three general elections, in every one of which they received the support of the veterans on the assumption that they would get substantial recognition at the hands of the government.

In 1910, during his tour in the west, the Prime Minister is reported to have said:

We have had it under consideration some months and, without making any promises, I can say that something may be done.

Not very specific I admit, but a promise that something may be done. Then from August 10 there were continual interviews by Mr. Patterson with the government for the purpose of ascertaining what the government really intended, and I have here a letter addressed by Mr. Patterson who represents the association, to the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) dated April 20, 1910, which is as follows:

Sir Frederick Borden,
Minister of Militia,
Ottawa.

Honourable Sir,—Two weeks ago to-day, in the interview I had with you in your private office, you stated you would bring the matter of federal grant to the veterans of '66 and '70 before the Privy Council on the following Saturday, lapsing our interview. You said you would push the matter to a final decision, either a grant or the government would say no. You promised to communicate the results of your intention. Up to the present time I have not had the pleasure of hearing anything from you. Won't you kindly advise me by mail what has been done, or what is the intention, if any? Your reply will be appreciated by the veterans of the Dominion.

Yours faithfully,
CAPT. J. H. PATTERSON.

In reply to this the Minister of Militia wrote as follows: And this, of course, was before the Prime Minister had taken his western trip in the course of which he said that something might be done:

Ottawa, May 9, 1910.

Dear Captain Patterson,—I must apologize for not having answered sooner your letter of the 28th August, but I am sure you will understand that I have been very busy ever since that date.

I have brought the matter of the veterans up in council on two occasions as promised, but unfortunately there was no time so late in the session to consider it. As I understood the feeling of the council, however, it was that there was a disposition to consider sympa-thetically the claims of such of the veterans as actually went to the front and took part in repelling the would-be invaders, and with this object in view I feel sure that the Premier would be glad to receive you and any other colleagues whom the veterans might wish to associate with you and to discuss the manner in which this idea might be carried out.

I can only add that I shall be very glad at any time to join the Premier in assisting in such a discussion.

Yours very truly,

F. W. BORDEN.

Capt. J. H. Patterson.
93 McKenzie ave.,
Ottawa.

I think I am quite justified in saying, in view of the extracts that I have read from the remarks of the Prime Minister and his Minister of Militia, and from the correspondence, that the veterans were promised and had a right to expect some substantial consideration at the hands of this government. I think I am justified in saying also that the debate of March 26, 1906, when the matter was brought up by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, showed that it was upon the express understanding that something was going to be done by the government that many members on the Liberal side of the House voted against the resolution to give some substantial recognition to the veterans.

Apart altogether from the merits of the case, I think nobody will deny that the services to the country rendered by the veterans were rendered at the psychological moment in our history. One occasion was a year before Confederation. At that time there were large numbers of disbanded soldiers in the United States only too willing to fight. And had not our veterans come to the assistance of the country against these disbanded soldiers the destiny of Canada might have been entirely different from what it is. After confederation had been in existence only three years when the second occasion for the veterans to offer their assistance arose. At that time the United States had refused to continue the policy of reciprocity in natural products with this country; and those of the older generation know that at that time there was a very considerable feeling in this country that, because of the action of the United States, Canada would be compelled to throw in her lot with the United States. And, again, I say, the veterans came to the aid of the country at the psychological moment in that respect.

And it was owing at least in part to their action that the country was directed to a different destiny. These men left their businesses, their farms, their avocation at the call of duty. Permit me to read a portion of a letter from one of the veterans of that time which will illustrate better than any word I could speak the risks these men ran, and the hardships they endured. This is a letter from one veteran to another:

Dear comrade,—It pleases me very much to learn that the veterans of the Fenian Raids of 1866 and 1870 have formed a national association and are making a fight for recognition of the services which they (or rather we, for remember I am one of those veterans) have rendered our country almost half a century ago. Think of it, Charlie, it is just 45 years and 41 years ago respectively since the word of command 'to arms' came from our beloved Colonel F. G. Marchand, the late Prime Minister of the province of Quebec. The moment that command was heard, men in shops dropped their tools, men in stores walked out from behind the counters, men in offices laid down their pens, men on the farms left their ploughs where they stood, donned their uniforms, shouldered their rifles and in less than three hours the 21st Battalion Richelieu Light Infantry was in line fully supplied with ammunition and ready to start for the front, which we did on the afternoon of the same day. The patriotism shown by the men of the 21st Battalion on that occasion was never equalled by the young men of any country, European or any other country, and the same spirit prevailed among the young men of the province. We cared not for our lives, we took that in one hand, our rifles in the other and marched out to defend our country or die. . . .

Many of us are to-day suffering from different ailments as a result of exposure and hardships experienced at that time. But, did you ever hear any one complain? No, sir, I never have met one sad or dejected heart in all that campaign. Every man felt cheerful and was happy to be where he was and he knew he was doing his duty.

I believe that expresses the sentiment of the men who went to the front at that time. We have had, since then, two precedents. The veterans of the rebellion of 1885 were given not only medals but grants of land. The veterans of the South African war were given not only medals but grants of land. If the grants made to these veterans are just and right, they create a precedent which cannot be ignored by this government. I can see no reason why the veterans of the present day should not be given some substantial recognition. It is not for me to say what form that recognition should take, whether a grant of land or a pension. If a pension, it is to be remembered that most of these men must be close to 80 years of age, and cannot live long. I think it is as little as the government can do to give some substantial recognition to these men who came to the aid of the country in time of stress. I move in amendment:

It is desirable that the government of Canada should recognize in some substantial manner the services rendered during the Fenian Raids of 1866 and 1870 by your Canadian volunteers.

I use exactly the words used in the resolution of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier in 1906 when the government promised to do something along these lines.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I have to express my regret that my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) is not in his seat to-day. He would have been better able to do justice to the amendment of my hon. friend than I can attempt to do. The matter is one that I know has been engaging his attention; if my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) has at heart the interests of the veterans whose case he has espoused it would, perhaps, be preferable that he should have waited for a day or two until the Minister of Militia were in his seat.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The Minister of Militia has already given a reply stating that nothing further will be done whatever.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Exactly. And perhaps it would have been better for the hon. gentleman to have a reply from the minister himself. But he has taken his course, and there is nothing to be done but to deal with his motion. The hon. gentleman stated that this question was fifteen or sixteen years old. He is altogether too modest—it is forty or forty-five years old. My hon. friend invited me to act upon the precedent created by the government of Mr. Mackenzie in 1875, of which government I was a supporter. If there were any argument in that, perhaps my hon. friend would find a better and more adequate argument in the precedent created by the government of Sir John Macdonald who was in office at the time these raids took place and which dealt with the case at that time. The government of Sir John Macdonald was in office in 1866, and, as he was the first Prime Minister of the Dominion his government was in office immediately after confederation, and until after 1870, the time the second raid took place. The veterans of that time did render valuable service to the country, undoubtedly. Those services were considered when they were fresh in the minds of the people of Canada and of the government of Canada. For reasons which I am not called upon to pass judgment upon, these claims were not entertained.

If the veterans of 1866 did that service for the country which my hon. friend says they did, and which they did emphatically, for some reason which I have not to appreciate—I did not belong to the party which was then in office, and my hon. friend does belong to that party—for some reason, at that time the government did not think it advisable to call upon the people of Canada to give them any recognition for the services they had performed. I think it is not to be expected that volunteers should give their services for a consideration, they do it simply out of patriotism; and if the government of that day took that position, what reason can be given to-day why we should reverse that judgment? There is, therefore, no argument in the fact that if the government in 1875 did recognize services which had been rendered to the country in 1812, we should do the same. We have adopted since then another method; we have now a more humane way of looking at those things. It is not a Conservative government which is in office, it is a Liberal government; but the Liberal government did recognize the services of the men who went to South Africa, and also, I think, the services of the men who went to the front in 1885. We gave them grants of land, and we did it out of the abundance of our heart; the Liberal party supported us in so doing. But I think my hon. friend must have heard echoes coming from the western portion of the community, especially that the policy adopted of giving grants of land to the veterans had not turned out very much to the benefit of the country, or to the benefit of the veterans themselves. That is the opinion I express; I would not be disposed to be critical in that matter. I have called the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Militia, more than once to this question. The veterans have been pressing with great persistence to have some recognition made to them. Now, I may say frankly to my hon. friend that for my part, leaving out my own individual point of view, I would not be disposed to treat the application of the veterans according to a universal system; that is, a system that should apply to all. There are degrees of merit in the veterans. Some of them did very little service, if any at all. I know a corps to which I myself belonged was called upon to go to the front, but they did not go, because the trouble was all over before they turned out. But I was given a medal, although I did not deserve it at all. We had no claim for one. But there are men who went to the front and who were engaged in a battle, who bore the burden and heat of the day, and exposed themselves to danger, and that is the class which is entitled to consideration. There were other veterans who were simply called upon to do garrison duty, or picket duty, but were never called to the front. Therefore, I would make a distinction between one class and another. At all events, this condition of things has been engaging the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia. My hon. friend who has made the motion will himself understand that it is not possible to apply the same rule to all cases, and I do not think, if any recognition is to be given, that the universal recognition implied in this motion should be adopted. The government of the day in 1866 and 1870, I know, did give pensions to those who had been disabled in battle, that was the extent to which the bounty of the government was given at that time. I speak correctly when I say that some of the men who, in 1866 and 1870, were actually engaged in battle and were disabled, were pensioned by the country.

Mr. LANCASTER. And some of the widows.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER. I am not aware that the widows received pensions, perhaps they did; but I speak of those who were in battle. I know instances in which some received recognition, while others did not. Now my hon. friend would go further. I have only to say to him, and he will agree with me, that if the only object he has in mind is to come to the assistance of these men, the manner in which he has brought it to the attention of the House, perhaps is not the best calculated to impress the House. In the absence of my hon. colleague, the Minister of Militia, I have only to ask that the motion be not proceeded with, but that it be rejected by the House.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that the reason given by the Prime Minister for refusing this request is not a very strong one. He says it is not expected that volunteers should give their services for a consideration, and therefore, I presume, he intimates that they are not entitled to a consideration. Had they been regulars, they might have been entitled to it. Now, if he applies that reasoning to the volunteers of 1885 who went out to the west in the service of their country, and who afterwards received gold medals and land grants, he will see that his argument falls to the ground, or iti carries no weight. Then if he applies it to the volunteers who went out to South Africa and who received land grants, the argument is not a very strong one, nor a very sound one. The right hon. gentleman said that his sympathy was with them, and he had several times expressed his sympathy with them when speaking on this subject. But he never seemed to go beyond that though he was always desirous of persuading his colleagues that that was the right thing to do, to give the men some substantial grant. I would imagine that the Premier of the government would always bring his colleagues to accept any special request which he desired to make, because otherwise they would not be faithful supporters of the government. When he was telling us how strongly he sympathized with the veterans, it reminded me of what I heard an eminent minister say once who did not receive a very large stipend, that he was always getting the sympathy of his people. He said he remembered a friend of his once who tried to feed a cat on sympathy, and it just lived ten days. Now, I do not think that the veterans will be very grateful for the sympathy the Prime Minister has extended to them, because it will take more than that to sustain life. I was looking over some answers given in the past with regard to this question, and they are various. One was that the services were rendered before confederation and, therefore, only one portion of the country was interested in the matter. Well, 1866 was but a short time before confederation, and 1871 was after confederation, and what did the government then do? One naturally asks why we should not compensate these veterans by a land grant.

We have recognized the principle of pensions to those who have gone to the front in the service of the country; we recognized it in favour of the South African veterans, we recognized it with regard to the men who took part in the rebellion of 1885. Now, if it was a sound principle in those cases it must be sound in this one, Now, what was the first? The first case was when we made a grant of land to the South African veterans. They did not fight to keep people from invading the country, but they fought to sustain the authority of the British Empire, and to put down an insurrection in another part of the empire.

On the other occasion, in 1885, when the volunteers went to the northwest to put down an insurrection there, it was not to prevent invaders from coming into the country, but it was to maintain the authority of the British Empire and to preserve peace in the country. On both these occasions the veterans were recompensed by grants of land in consideration of their services to the country. But in both cases it was to put down an insurrection in a portion of the British Empire. Where is the difference between the action of those men and that of those who took part in preventing marauders from coming into the country to overpower the people, and break down the authority of the government? It seems to me that if merit there was in each case it was greater in the case of the men who prevented outsiders from coming into the country than in that of the men who endeavoured to put down trouble in the country. If there was a justifiable reason—and I take it for granted that there was—I believe there was—in giving land grants to the veterans who went to South Africa to maintain the authority of the British Empire outside of the country altogether, that reason, it seems to me, is doubly strong in the case of those men who prevented our own country from being invaded by marauders. No strong ground has been given, as far as I can see, why there should not be some better recognition of those veterans than has been given up to the present time.

There is another feature of this question that has occurred to me in looking over the records of the various occasions upon which it has been before the country and the House, and it is that the government were always considering it. They had taken it into their consideration—their careful consideration—but they had never reached a decision. How long does it take a man to reach a decision? I could understand that sometimes it takes a woman a long time, but a man is supposed to be made of different stuff, to be actuated by different principles, to be able to reach a conclusion after short consideration, and to reach a conclusion that is apt to be final. But, time after time, when this question was before the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia and Defence, they were always considering it—seriously considering it. They denied that they had given a refusal, they denied that they had abandoned hope, they denied that it was not their intention to do something for these veterans, but they were always considering it, and they have not reached a conclusion yet. The remarks of the right hon Prime Minister to-day are just about as indefinite as his previous ones. He wants to lead these veterans to believe that the sympathy of the government is with them and that it is their desire to do something substantial for them, but they believe that they cannot do it. Why cannot they? It must be because they cannot get their followers to support them. The remarks of the former hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), have been quoted here to the effect that he was disposed upon that occasion to vote for the motion but for the fact that he understood that the government were going to take the matter up and were likely to compensate these veterans. That is the statement of one of the right hon. gentleman's own following, who was supposed to be behind the scenes and to know what was taking place. He got the information, I presume, privately, which induced him to vote against this motion. Hon. gentlemen opposite voted against the motion on that ground, yet nothing has been done and the question has remained in abeyance up to the present time. The right hon. the Prime Minister told my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), that he had not taken a very opportune time to bring this question up as the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence is not here. But, there is greater than the Minister of Militia and Defence here; there is the Prime Minister himself, the man who lays down the policy and who gets his cabinet to carry through what he wants. Surely he ought to be equal to the occasion in the absence of the Minister of Militia, who I assume would be only too willing to support any proposal that he would make. He should give these veterans an answer—yes, or no. Let them know their fate whatever it is. It is much better for them to be told that there is no hope whatever than to be led to believe and to hope year after year that the government will come to their aid.

It cannot be that the government are afraid of the opposition not supporting a proposition of this kind, because the opposition has put itself on record more than once in favour of such a prinicple. The opposition would support a grant of this kind in so far as my judgment enables me to speak upon this matter. Therefore, it is a question within the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they must be held individually and collectively responsible if nothing is done, because it is for themselves to say whether anything will or will not be done. They have the power, if they have the desire. They have expressed themselves as having the desire over and over again; why do not they make their action decisive?

Mr. SAMUEL BARKER (East Hamilton), Mr. Speaker, I said a few words upon this subject in 1906, and I spoke on that occasion simply because of words uttered then which have been practically repeated by the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to-day. I will read what was spoken then and the House will see that the right hon. gentleman has hit very closely upon the same words to-day. The minister—I need not mention his name—upon that occasion, said:

> Surely we are not to establish a precedent that whenever this country is threatened by invasion, such as that of 1866, or whenever a rebellion has to be quelled, our volunteers shall demand payment in land or money.

I considered that a deliberate insult on that occasion to the volunteers. I do not think the Prime Minister has been very happy in using almost the same words to-day. The volunteers did not turn out in 1866 for the purpose of securing a reward in land or money or anything else; they turned out for their country. How different is the conduct of this government from that of the United States government? When they asked for volunteers at the time of the war with the south they made no promises of pensions or rewards of any kind. But, how did they treat their veterans? Enormous sums of money were voted and granted freely to their volunteers, some of whom enlisted for only three months at the beginning of the war, and all were treated alike. Would any politician in America dare to stand up and sneer at the volunteers who took part in that war as men seeking compensation? The people granted the money willingly. Only a few months ago I saw in some of our papers in Ontario mention of the case of a woman whose husband had been wounded while fighting for the north and who died afterwards. The United States government granted the widow a pension. They did not draw any lines such as the Prime Minister seeks to draw now. They would not say to a gentleman who should bring forward a motion or an application or anything of that kind: You are not taking the best way to get this. That is what the Prime Minister tells my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Middlebro) who has spoken. He says that he has not taken the best way. Whose duty is it to improve upon that and take the best way? Why, it is the duty of the Prime Minister to do something for the men who turned out upon that occasion and risked their lives. It is all very well to say that they were out for only a short time and that the actual fighting was confined to a very limited period. I happened to be out at that time myself. I am inclined to think that I am the only living officer of the 7th Regiment who turned out upon that occasion. All the officers of my company and I think nearly all of the officers of the regiment are dead, and but few of the non-commissioned officers and men are living. These men worked as regular soldiers practically for months. As early as February or March of that year we were warned of the threatened attack and night after night, winter and spring, we turned out with the regular soldiers then quartered in London. The regiment to which I belonged got on the battlefield the night of the fight, and I recollect at two in the morning seeing the dead body of an officer of the Queen's Own brought in, and others wounded. On the following morning as we marched over Ridgeway I saw a number of the Fenians lying dead. Were it not that my regiment was delayed at Paris we would have been in the fight, and we would have done our duty to our country. Personally I never asked for anything not even a medal, but after I spoke on this subject once before in the House a medal was sent to me by the hon. Minister of Militia, although I would much rather that some practical recognition had been given to the men from the shops and the sons of farmers, the business men of London, the students who left their offices and all who were ready and willing to fight for their country. For the Prime Minister to say now to the gentleman who brought forward his motion that he has gone the wrong way about it is evading the question at issue; it is a poor way to treat such a subject, and it is not calculated to induce people to turn out to do their duty. From veterans now living in several states of the union I have been asked year after year why the government has not carried out its promise in this matter. Everybody assumed that the right hon. gentleman would do what he promised to do, but perhaps they did not know that the right hon. gentleman is a better promiser than a performer. If the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Middlebro) has not taken the right course as the right hon. gentleman says, why does not the right hon. gentleman suggest what course should be taken. If he wants any assistance in the matter we on this side of the House will readily give it to him. Only a month ago one of the old non-commissioned officers of the 7th Regiment now living at Westmount sent his son here and asked if we could not do something in the matter. These men feel that they have been treated very ungratefully by the government. True, there was no great loss of life on either side, but there might have been, and the Canadian volunteers were ready to do their duty, and it is only proper that the government of the country should recognize their services. The hon. gentleman has asked if it is to be supposed that volunteers will only turn out when they expect to be rewarded for it. They will do their duty, but if a paid soldier is to get a reward, surely the volunteer who, as a patriot risks his life, is more entitled to it. I feel that a great injustice has been done to the men of 1866 and 1870, and am not surprised that when many of these now living in the United States see all around them men who in the war with the south went to the front to the old tune: 'We are coming Father Abraham 400,000 strong,' and when they see these men rewarded and they themselves neglected by Canada they naturally feel disappointed and aggrieved.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). I desire to express my strong sympathy with the amendment now before the House. The town of Prescott where I live was one of the most important points during the Fenian invasion. A great many volunteers were stationed there, and while they turned out to fight for their country without hope of reward, yet, they naturally now expect the same recognition as those who fought in the Canadian Northwest and in South Africa. I remember attending one of the veterans' meetings at which the Prime Minister was present and his language then led the veterans to believe that their claims would be recognized at an early date. That was several years ago, but nothing has been done since. Some of the veterans have several times complained to me about the neglect with which they are treated, and I have never hesitated to state that so far as I was concerned, and the Conservative party as well, we would support any reasonable recognition of their services which the government might propose. But to-day, we have this motion before us and there is not a single man on the Liberal side of the House to get up and say a word on behalf of these men who were out to fight, and to die if need be for their country.

I cannot understand why they have no sympathy with it. Surely there must be some members on the government side who have agreed to support some recognition of the services of the veterans; but so far there does not seem to be one who is willing to take any part. The Prime Minister states that the government might consider some proposition with regard to those who took an active part. The hon. member for Hamilton shows that there should not be any distinction made in that way. There may be some who were wounded, and who might be in need of a pension, but I believe that every volunteer who served for a certain length of time in drilling, and who was prepared and willing to take part in any battle that might take place, should receive the same recognition as those who did take part. I only rose to express my hearty sympathy with the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Grey, and to say that I will support any reasonable recognition of the veterans of 1866 and 1870 that may be brought down by the government.

Mr. LANCASTER. I want to say a word in protest of the position taken by the Prime Minister on this matter. I am satisfied that if he took a census of the people of the Niagara district, where the principal invasion referred to by my hon. friend took place, he would find that all those people, whether they were alive at that time or not, would be a unit in favour of this motion, because they know particularly well what great services were rendered, in a very hurried and very philanthropic as well as patriotic and intelligent way, by those veterans. We in the Niagara district have never been able to understand why something in this respect was not done years ago. The Prime Minister has been quoted as having intimated from time to time that something of a substantial nature would be done. My hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) quoted the language of the Prime Minister, to which the Prime Minister replied, but he made no explanation or denial of the promises he had made. Therefore, I am justified in assuming as absolutely true that the Prime Minister did make the promises that were recited against him by the hon. member for North Grey. If he did, he stands obliged to support the motion. The right hon. gentleman's only reason for opposing the motion to-day is that he does not think it opportune, and does not approve of the manner in which it is brought up. For the life of me I cannot understand what the Prime Minister does want done. He makes promises in regard to this matter, and he does not fulfil them; his ministers make promises, and he does not say they should fulfil them, and when a humble member of the opposition undertakes to help him to fulfil them, he wants none of them. He does not want his promises carried out by any one if he does not propose to carry them out himself. If he wanted some excuse for doing this long-delayed justice to these people, he has every excuse in the declarations which have been made by the opposition in this House over and over again for a number of years past, that they were willing to vote for any measure which would extend some substantial recognition to the class of patriots referred to in this motion. The application of these people no one has dared to reject on the merits. It is not only the veterans who are concerned; the nationality of Canada, the integrity of this portion of the British Empire and the integrity of the empire as a whole is concerned. If invasion were threatened tomorrow, ten times the number who enlisted on that occasion would be prepared to enlist to protect this country from any invader, but foreign countries will have very little respect for the Dominion if it fails to recognize in some substantial way the patriotism shown by these veterans on the occasions to which this motion refers. The example to the rest of the world is a bad one. This country practically insults itself when it refuses a motion such as that made to-day, after all these years. The government that undertakes to reject such a motion and offers nothing in its place, practically tells the world that it does not care anything about gratitude towards the people who may protect the country. Those of us who were not on hand at that time are just as much interested from a national point of view as the descendants of those who were. We were served by those people, our nationality, and our integrity as a part of the British Empire were protected by them, and this country owes it to itself to do justice to the veterans who served it on those occasions. The Prime Minister has not told us why this motion is inopportune. Is it inopportune simply because the Prime Minister has neglected his duty for the last 10 years? Is it inopportune in the sense that the government is to blame because it is necessary to make the motion at all? I do not apprehend that this is what the Prime Minister means. I apprehend that he wants to do other business this week instead of dealing with this motion. He does not undertake to deny the promises that were quoted as having been made by him. Therefore, the Prime Minister in 1905 expressed the opinion that the Dominion government was the right body to be appealed to, and promised attention to the matter during that session, and in 1906 his Minister of Militia, who the Prime Minister to-day regrets is not here to make a better defence, has been quoted as saying that the Dominion government would soon do something, probably by some sort of special land grant.

Members of this government are quoted as having declared in 1909 that if the opposition would not oppose it they would recommend a grant. The opposition have never opposed such a grant, but on the contrary have declared in advance in favour of it. In this, as in many matters of public importance which have arisen during the time I have been a member of this House, and, during which time this government has been in power, the opposition have invited the government to do something in the public interest and have promised in advance to support such action to their utmost so that the government need not fear the loss of any party advantage. What does the government want? I never heard of the Conservative government of Ottawa or the government of Sir James Whitney in Toronto receiving such charitable offers and assurances. A resolution was moved in 1909 or 1910 by the opposition favouring the granting of recognition, and one of the excuses made by supporters of the government like Mr. Logan has been that they relied on the promises of the government, believing that in this way there was more likelihood of something being accomplished than if they relied on the opposition. The Minister of Militia, in May, 1910, according to the hon. member for North Grey, whose statement has not been disputed, wrote to Captain Patterson who was pressing the claims for the veterans, that it was too late to attend to it that session, although it is not disputed that shortly before that the minister had specified a certain Saturday, the next Saturday, as the date when he would put the matter through the Privy Council. He made this statement to Captain Patterson when face to face with him, but did not carry out the promise and then wrote that it was too late that session. That did not mean that nothing would be done. The Prime Minister to-day, speaking for the Minister of Militia, says that the hon. member for North Grey knew that the Minister of Militia had said that nothing would be done. So the Prime Minister, in rejecting this motion to-day is rejecting it after having quietly and without much emphasis got on 'Hansard' a statement that it is understood to-day that nothing is to be done. But we have the evidence of witnesses on the other side, including the Prime Minister, who, during the past 14 years have repeatedly said that something would be done. Now, the Prime Minister admits that nothing is to be done. Surely that is a reason why every independent gentleman in this House should support this amendment and vote for it. The Prime Minister and his colleagues and supporters have repeatedly given the public to believe that there was no question as to something being done for these veterans, that it was simply a question of what form the grant should take. To-day the Prime Minister says that he understood and the hon. member for North Grey understood that the Minister of Militia had said lately that nothing was going to be done. Then every independent man in this House should vote for this amendment even against the will of the Prime Minister in order to save his own reputation and to demonstrate that if he finds he cannot rely on the promises made by the government he will vote against it. I do not care what the subject may be that principle should apply.

What will happen in regard to this matter if this amendment is voted down? If the majority vote it down it is understood finally by everybody in this House, and by the country, that these veterans are to get no recognition. That is what is to be understood from the words of the Prime Minister when he says that the motion is inopportune. If it has been delayed it has been delayed by the members of the government, not by the veterans or by the members of the opposition, who have not hesitated to assume their responsibilities and to assure the government that they would not raise this as a political question against the government either in this House or in the country. The veterans, as well as hon. gentlemen in this House supporting their claims, have been misled into believing that by delaying and keeping quiet they would get this matter attended to, and now when forebearance and patience have ceased to be a virtue, they are told by the government that they never intended to do anything, that they do not intend to do anything now and that the claim of the veterans will not be recognized.

I must protest against the Prime Minister suggesting that these veterans are looking for remuneration.

The veterans are not looking for remuneration in the sense the Prime Minister would indicate. The patriotism of these veterans, and of their descendants and of our people generally, is as it ever was, and will be the same whether this money is paid or land grant given or whether it is not. But here is the point: These men have been led to believe all these years after having established their claim, that their services would be given some recognition. They have established their claim morally and one might almost say legally. They have not established it on the ground of technical legality, that is of making it enforcible in the courts, but they have established it legally in the sense that the government has recognized other claims that were no better legally. If precedent has anything to do with legality, if a precedent set by the government makes the law outside of this make the common law outside of this House—then the young men who might be called upon to take up arms to-morrow have been given to understand that they would have a right to compensation, because they have seen the South African veterans rewarded, not more than they deserve but at all events recognized; and they have seen the volunteers of the rebellion of 1885 recognized in the same way. And alongside that every year has been almost a promise from the Prime Minister or some member of his cabinet that the matter would be attended to and the veterans of 1866 and 1870 recognized. The House was asked to vote down this motion on the ground that it is not wise to bring it forward at this time. The Prime Minister seems to be satisfied that all he has to do is to say that and the majority of the House will vote it down. The majority of this House must take the responsibility. I am going to honour myself by voting for the amendment; and if the majority choose to dishonour themselves and this House and the veterans by voting on the other side, the responsibility rests with them.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX. The Prime Minister has made it perfectly clear, I think, that he does not intend to do anything in this matter. It is as well that the veterans of 1866 and 1870 should understand from the utterance of the Prime Minister, that, however he may have evaded the issue down to this time, he has made up his mind that he will do nothing for them, and he takes this opportunity and means of making that absolutely clear. The reference to the Minister of Militia, of course, is a mere evasion. The Prime Minister is all-powerful in this matter. There is nothing done in his cabinet which is not in entire accord with his view. He controls the whole situation, and he has controlled the situation which has brought us down to what has been announced by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) and concurred in by the Prime Minister, namely, that as the result of cabinet deliberation the Minister of Militia says that nothing will be done. It makes it no stronger for the government to say that Sir John Macdonald should have done something, and would not do anything in reference to these veterans. The Prime Minister must recognize—the country recognizes—that this defence of the country by the veterans was undertaken at a time when Canada was in a very different position from that which it occupies to-day. If the results to the country did not amply justify our recognizing these heroes, there would be no one claiming from the government at this time that they should be recognized. Not reward, but patriotism, the Prime Minister says, should be the actuating motive of these men. I quite admit it. And of course patriotism and not desire for reward actuated these men when they went out in defence of the country. At that time they identified themselves in resources, in income, and even in their lives with the future of the country. They succeeded in defending the country and maintaining our position in Canada. And, the country having greatly prospered since, is it not a pity that a generous people should not in some way, having recognized many subsequent heroes, recognize also in some way the heroic action of these men? The Prime Minister speaks of the difficulty of discriminating—he would not reward them all. Those who got ready, those who took up arms, those who responded to the call but had not the opportunity of fighting, he would not recognize. He would reward only those who were in active service. That may be a logical position, though I do not think so; I would reward all those who came to the defence of the country at the call of duty. But if the Prime Minister—and he is all-powerful in this matter—has come to the conclusion with his government that they will discriminate, why do they not get at it? Why do they not do something? The Prime Minister says that those who were actually in action in the field of battle, and those only, he would reward; those who were only ready to go he would not reward. Well, why does he not do it? Fifteen years ago this matter was urged upon him. For forty-five years these men have been waiting and entitled to recognition. Why, then, does not the government do something? The Prime Minister has had the matter under that 'serious consideration' of his. When he was in the West last year, and during all the years since he came into power, he has had the matter 'under his serious consideration.' There is nothing to prevent him acting in the matter. Two or three years ago he said: I am in sympathy with you; I think you are entitled to something, and I would like to recognize you; I would do it if I could. I will do it if I can and I will do it if the opposition will allow me. Has the opposition ever prevented him? Has not the opposition been ready, figuratively speaking, to pat him on the back? Have not they proposed resolutions asking him to do something? What is to prevent it? He knows. He could get up and tell us, but he does not do so? I know why he does nothing. It is because there is a certain element he is afraid of. Will he say now that it is not so? He knows that it is so.

He is afraid that he may lose a certain vote. If he could be sure he was not going to lose a certain vote he would have granted this long ago. Surely it is not that he does not like these veterans. Surely it is not that he is not really in sympathy with them? He says he is in sympathy with them. But he does not and dare not act because he is afraid of a certain vote.

Now he promised an answer. My hon. friend from North Grey says he promised it in the session of 1905. Why has he not given that answer? Who held him back? Just the same reason I have already alluded to. He wanted to give an answer, but he dare not give it, and he has not given it yet. Then there is another point, which I think is the most cruel part of the whole thing, that is the argument, the suggestion, of the Minister of Militia that he would give the veterans land in the Northwest on the same terms as lands are given to the foreign immigrants who come in. Then when it was suggested that that would hardly be giving them anything, he said: I am giving it to them on the same or more favourable terms, but upon terms of performing settlement duties. Surely the Prime Minister and every other member must realize that there is no gift in that. Those men at their age are simply offered a gold brick when they are offered lands in the Northwest upon terms of settlement duties, such as are imposed by the land regulations of the west. So the proposition suggested by the Minister of Militia in 1906 is actually an insult to the men who exposed their lives for the country. As the Prime Minister says to the victors belong the spoils, but these men have got no spoils, they have got no reward. They do not want spoils, it is only the government they are following who are looking for spoils. The men want the recognition to which they are entitled; and not more earnestly than the veterans themselves is their recognition demanded by the people who are speaking on their behalf. I knew when this matter was broached what the Prime Minister would do about it. He never felt yet that he dared recognize those veterans, and we understand from what he has said to-day that he does not intend to recognize them; and whatever may be fought for by the opposition, yet, while this government is in power, there will be nothing done for the men who fought for us in 1866 and 1870.

Mr. ALLEN. This matter of the recognition of the veterans who fought in the Fenian raid of 1866 and subsequently, is one that concerns me very deeply. In the county of Shefford there is a large number of those men, and they feel that they should be recognized in some manner. I take exception to the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), who say that the government does not feel that they have a duty to perform in this matter. I was not here in 1905, and therefore am not acquainted with the discussions of that time. But I remember in 1909, I think it was, a large deputation of Fenian raid veterans came to interview this government and asked that something be done in recognition of their services. One man suggested one thing, another man suggested another, and still another suggested something else; there seemed to be no common desire on their part, or agreement as to what they did want. The right hon. premier in reply to these men, said: I am in sympathy with you, and if you will formulate a demand upon which you can all agree something that we can do for you, we will do it. But we cannot do one thing for one man and another thing for another. Formulate a straight demand and we will do something. Now I think that is the gist of the whole matter. This government is ready to meet these veterans and do something for them; I am convinced of that myself. If these men will only say whether they want land or whether they want a pension, I am convinced the government will meet their views.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the hon, member not know that there has been an answer placed on the paper saying that the government will do absolutely nothing for these veterans?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know it. But I am free to say to the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) that I think if these men will formulate a straight demand as to what they want, the government will do something for them.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). But the Prime Minister says that if they ask for a land grant it would not be acceptable to the people of the Northwest.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe, as I said before, that if this question is brought before the government in a concrete form, the government will do something for these men, I am thoroughly convinced of that. But this resolution is indefinite, it merely asks the government: What are you going to do? There is no suggestion as to what the government should do, it merely asks that something be done. The government are ready to do something for these veterans, I am thoroughly convinced of it, if they will only formulate a reasonable and concrete demand.

Mr. TURRIFF. I would like to ask the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) a question. If I understood him aright, he said that at the time the government of Sir John A. Macdonald was in power the country was not in a position to deal liberally with these veterans. The question has been asked whether that reason was given at the time by the Conservative government. I am not posted on the question, and I would like to know. There seems to have been some reason given during the time the Macdonald government was in power why something was not done in response to the request of the veterans, and I would like to know if that was really the reason given.

Mr. LENNOX. I did not say exactly that the country was not in a position to reward these veterans at that time; but I pointed out that the country was not so well able to deal with the matter then as it is now. Our resources were not anything like what they are at the present time. The hon. gentleman asks me what answer the Macdonald government gave to the requests made at that time. I would not profess to give the various answers that may have been given, but I do not understand that the matter ever came up in the same definite and concrete form that it has come up to-day. In fact, I do not think it ever did come up in any definite form before the Macdonald government. But some fifteen years ago it took a definite form, and since that time the question has been vigorously agitated.

Mr. BOYCE. The remarks of my hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Allen) clearly demonstrates to my mind the insincerity of the government in dealing with this question, and the pitiable level to which, by the action of the Prime Minister, this great national question, involving the national honour of Canada, has been dragged down to the lowest level of party politics.

What is the position, as illustrated in the very exhaustive speech of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) in support of this motion? I believe that, as my hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Allen) is convinced that this is a righteous claim and that these veterans are justly entitled to this recognition, the majority of this House are in favour of the principle of this resolution, and that were it not for the lash applied to them by the Prime Minister in his speech this afternoon there would be a majority in favour of the resolution of the hon. member for North Grey. What a lamentable spectacle has been presented upon a question of national importance in which national honour is involved? Here are a set of men—I do not want to recapitulate the value of the services that they rendered to this country—who left their homes, and their business, who made great sacrifices of their interests, and at great danger to themselves and privation to their families, rushed to the border to defend their country against invaders, the country of which we are now so proud, which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are never tired of extolling. They ask in a very moderate way for such recognition as has been given in other instances to other Canadians who have fought in Canada's interests as well as in the interest of the empire. What is the answer that is made to these men? For fifteen years, during the term of the administration of this government, they are put off with different excuses and promises, all of which involve sympathetic consideration of their case. The hon. member for Shefford prefers to believe that this government will give some relief to these veterans although it is upon the records of this House, out of the mouth of the responsible minister—the Minister of Militia and Defence—that the government has no such intention at all, and that in so far as the government is concerned the matter is closed. What a sublime faith this one of the right hon. gentleman's followers has in his government notwithstanding the fact that they have placed themselves on record as being unwilling to do anything. What position does the hon. member for Shefford find himself in to-day? He is in sympathy with the motion; will he vote for it? No, he will vote for the right hon. leader of the government and why? Because he is subject to the whip. My hon. friend believes and has sought to express the belief that this government will, and should do something for these veterans, and, notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Militia has said in answer to a definite question that nothing will be done, he will vote to reject this motion. It is a lamentable spectacle in connection with a great national question, and a question involving national honour and duty. Not to grant this recognition would be to leave a blot upon the fair escutcheon of Canada, and it is lamentable, I repeat, that a question of this kind cannot be dealt with in this House without the whip of the party being brought into play in order to make the followers of the government vote, as I believe they will vote, contrary to their sympathies in this case.

But, there is another view of this question which strikes me as being somewhat peculiar. We have large tracts of land out in the Northwest; we have thrown these open to settlement upon liberal terms free to who ever will till the ground and otherwise comply with the homestead regulations. The lands of the Northwest have been used for other purposes, for rewards for those who have served the country and the empire, a fact which has been referred to by my hon. friend from North Grey, and other hon. gentlemen who have followed him. The right hon. leader of the government has taken a strangely inconsistent position upon this question. He admits that the men who went to the Northwest in 1885 to quell the rebellion were properly rewarded by grants of land belonging to the government, and he further consents to the giving out large parcels of these lands to those of our Canadian boys who answered the call of empire and fought in South Africa in 1889, 1890 and the following year. Where is the consistency of the Prime Minister now in refusing to accept the resolution introduced by my hon. friend from North Grey? The right hon. gentleman does not like to see Canada mixed up in the empire's wars. In London, not long ago, he distinguished himself, (or extinguished himself) in the view of the Candian people, by laying down the proposition, shocking to the consciences and feelings of a number of the empire's citizens, that Canada should not be drawn into the empire's wars without her consent. Yet, Sir, when our boys, responding to the call of the empire, went to South Africa, reluctant as the Prime Minister was on that occasion to give his consent for them to go, and when they came back he rewarded them with federal land grants in the west. What a strange inconsistency is manifested now by the right hon. gentleman? When Canada was in the dawn of its present development, when it was in the twilight of the magnificent prosperity which now blesses it, and which we hope shall hereafter bless it, these men responded to the call of their country for the protection of their homes, our homes, our land, our heritage and rushed to the border willing to lay down their lives if necessary as good Canadians in the cause of Canada, and yet the right hon. leader of the government, out of the great loyalty of his heart, posing as a great Canadian, says that there shall be no reward for these men, no land grant of any kind whatsoever, and calls upon this House to vote down the resolution of my hon. friend from North Grey. That is a strange spectacle for the right hon. gentleman to present to the Canadian people at this time, and in conjunction with the course which he has taken in regard to Canada's position in imperial wars.

It is well to notice what the reasons are that guide the Prime Minister in taking this somewhat questionable stand. Has he given any reason why these men should not be rewarded suitably? No, Sir, he has not, but he has broken straws with reference to the case of the veterans by alluding to the inactivity of the previous government in dealing with the question. What has that to do with the case? For fifteen years the right hon. gentleman has jockeyed with the situation, has jollied these veterans, and has given them expressly to believe that they would be rewarded in a substantial manner by this government.

Why, at the last moment, should he endeavour by flimsy excuse to avoid the real issue and attempt to throw the responsibility upon his predecessors in office. The question before this House is whether these veterans are going to get long delayed justice; whether the government will recognize the moral claim of these men to recognition, as they have promised. I am strongly in accord with the resolution now before the House, and I think the non-adoption of it would leave a blot upon the fair name of Canada and leave outstanding a national debt of honour which Canada ought to pay. Large grants of land have been made to friends of the government for political purposes; men who have sat in this House have been enriched tremendously by grants of land from the government obtained through means open to criticism and suspicion. Foreign immigrants are encouraged to come here by offering blocks of free land; steamship and immigration agents have been paid by this government so much per head to induce foreign immigrants to take up the land and till it, but have not the veterans a greater claim to their own soil? Are not those who have fought for Canada in her dire need entitled to recognition before foreigners who have to be bonused to come here? I earnestly hope that the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro) will receive greater consideration than has been shown it by the Prime Minister. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will vote in accordance with their principles and that my hon friend from Shefford (Mr. Allen) will vote in accordance with his expressed conviction, and by so doing free Canada from a blot on her escutcheon.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). As one closely identified with the Candian militia for over twenty years and in whose constituency a great many of the veterans reside, I am in favour of the spirit and wording of the resolution which is similar to that moved in 1906 by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), and which was voted down by supporters of the government on the understanding that the Prime Minister and Minister of Militia would recognize the claims of the veterans. I quote from page 643, 'Hansard,' 1906, the statement of Mr. Logan, then member for Cumberland:

> We have had the experience of some of the members related to-night by the senior member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) showing the harrowing circumstances under which they laboured. We sympathize with them and I believe that some recognition should be given them. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia have promised that some recognition will be given, and under these circumstances I think it is our duty on this side of the House to vote against the motion made by the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk).

We have in these words the distinct understanding that at least one supporter of the government believed that the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Militia would provide some tangible recognition of the claims of the veterans. But, the attitude of the government on this question since 1906 has been uncertain, indefinite, and equivocating; they have led the veterans along, pursuing a will-o'-the-wisp, without ever implementing their promises. To-day the Prime Minister wants to know why the government of Sir John A. Macdonald did not do something, but I tell him that the government of Sir John A. Macdonald looked after the widows and orphans of those killed and pensioned those wounded, and did everything then asked of them. Subsequently in 1896 a Veterans' Association was formed and they pressed their claims on the government, and the government has side-stepped the issue ever since. Deputation after deputation has waited on the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Militia without ever obtaining a definite promise, but to-day the government will be forced to say yes or no to this resolution. I regret the language of the Prime Minister in which he apparently belittled the great services these veterans have rendered to the country. He said that he himself had secured a medal, and did not deserve it, but it does seem extraordintry that he should make application for a medal if he felt that his services did not entitled him to get one. The men of 1866 and 1870 responded to the call of their country; they endured the hardships of a daily drill from the month of March till the month of June; they came under fire; they made greater sacrifices than some of the volunteers who went to South Africa, and who never set foot on the shores of that country, but whose services were nevertheless recognized by a land grant. The quick response of the men of 1866 and 1870 to the call of their country and their determined resistance to the invading enemy possibly changed the destiny of this country, so that their great services are not to be slighted. I call attention to the treatment accorded to the veterans of 1866 and 1870 by the Ontario government. It would seem to me that the attitude of the federal government is brought about in a measure by the fact that the majority of these veterans lived in the province of Ontario, and this seems another instance of unjust discrimination by the present Dominion government against that province. A great proportion of these veterans came from Ontario, and the edict goes out that their services must not be recognized. The province of Ontario appreciated the services of the veterans of 1866 and 1870 just as they appreciated the services of the South African volunteers. Cap. 6, 1 Edward VII, 1901, provides for a grant of certain lands to the volunteers who served in South Africa and the volunteer militia who served on the frontier in 1865, 1866 and 1870, and it shows that the Ontario government did not discriminate. As the Ontario government appreciated the services of the militia in 1866 and 1870 and the services of the volunteers in South Africa, there is no justification for the Dominion government discriminating between the two. Clause 1 of the Ontario Act says:

1. The lieutenant-governor in council may from time to time designate by proclamation within two years after the passing of this Act such lands as he may deem proper for the purposes hereinafter mentioned.

Clause 2 says:

2. The lands so set apart shall be reserved for location by any of the following classes of persons, viz.:—

(a) Persons resident or domiciled in the province of Ontario who, while so resident or domiciled, were enrolled or enlisted in the province of Ontario or elsewhere for active military service in the South African war, in the years 1899 and 1900.

(d) Persons who were members of the volunteer militia of Canada in Ontario and were engaged in active service in the defence of the frontier of this province in 1865, 1866 or 1870.

Surely if the Ontario government gives recognition to the veterans of 1866 for their services, there is no reason why this government should deny their claims to the generosity of the country. Now, all that the Dominion government has done in connection with this matter is to strike a few medals and hand them out instead of recognizing the claims of these men in some substantial way. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce), we have free lands for all classes—Doukhobors, Galicians, and all the polyglot population of Europe; why should not our government have free land for these veterans who did valuable service for this country? We have free lands granted to railways as subsidies; we have handed over practically as a free gift to the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company 250,000 acres of land at $1 an acre. If the government is so prodigal in giving lands and inviting settlers from a distance, why should it not deal generously with the veterans who performed these valuable services? It is a debt of honour which the country owes to these men, and there is no reason to my mind why the government should refuse this resolution. I was more than surprised to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Allen). He says, notwithstanding that the government has distinctly and definitely stated that they will not do anything for these men, he does not believe them. That is an absolutely absurd position for a member of this House to take, unless he has lost all confidence in his leaders. Whoever heard of a member of this House standing up and saying that he does not believe what the government says in answer to a question of an hon. member? At last the government have come from behind the lines of Torres Vedras and announce a policy on this matter, although it has taken them fifteen years to do so; and after they have announced that policy, the hon. member for Shefford says he does not believe that they are going to carry it out, but are going to do something else. Surely that is begging the question. Surely this country is not so ungenerous as to refuse to recognize the men who have defended it. I believe the country would approve the action of the government if they undertake to deal generously with these veterans and do something substantial for them, according to the words of the resolution.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I desire to add a very few words to the discussion that has taken place upon the motion of my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro). As I understand the situation, the veterans of the war of 1812 have already received, about the year 1875, substantial recognition from the people of this country. The same is true of the veterans of the Northwest rebellion of 1885. The same is true of the men who went to South Africa in 1900 or 1901. Now, the men for whom consideration is asked by the present resolution are those who responded to the call of their country in 1866 and 1870. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, during the course of his remarks, was asked, what about the alleged difference between the position of these men and those who went to South Africa in 1900 or 1901, and he said that he would come later on to the question of South Africa; but, as a matter of fact, he concluded his speech without reaching that interesting difference, if any difference exists, which I am not prepared to concede. If there is any difference in the consideration which the country ought to give to the men who fought in 1812, in 1885, and in 1900 or 1901, on the one hand, and the men who came out in 1866 and 1870 to defend the soil of Canada against an invader, I think that difference ought to be made clear to the House by the Prime Minister, and he has not done it up to the present time. Whatever rights the men who fought in 1866 and 1870 in defence of the soil of their country may have or may not have, I think we will all concede that they have one right at least, that is, to be treated in a straightforward and sincere manner, and not to be humbugged; and I think it is apparent to any one who looks at the history of this matter from 1896, when a large delegation of these men came to Ottawa, up to the commencement of this session, when apparently a final answer was given by the Minister of Militia and Defence, that they have been humbugged, deliberately humbugged. In 1906, when the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) presented his motion to the House in what seemed to me to be a very fair and commendable spirit, he was told by the Prime Minister that he deprecated the spirit in which the motion was brought forward. The Prime Minister on that occasion used such language that the then member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) regarded it as a promise that consideration would be given to these men, and, therefore, he voted against the resolution demanding recognition for them on the ground that he was entitled to rely on the promise of the Prime Minister given to the House. I have the language of the Prime Minister under my hand. I will not read the whole of it. The important words are as follow:

> We are told that we should recognize in some substantial manner the service of these men. The government will be prepared to consider any resolution of that kind.

The member for Cumberland declared that he understood these words as a promise. He made that declaration in the hearing of the Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister did not dissent from it. From 1906 to the present time nothing has been done. We have the final answer of the government given in this House on the 12th of December, 1910, and that answer is as follows. Mr. Middlebro asked:

> Does the government intend during the present session bringing down any legislation with reference to the grant of lands or money to the veterans of 1866 and 1870?
> Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The government has come to the conclusion that it is not in the public interest to grant public lands except as provided by law upon conditions of residence and settlement.
> It is not intended to recommend a grant of money in view of the fact that pensions were granted at the time to the wounded and to the families of those who were killed in the Fenian Raid engagements.

How is it possible, after such an answer has been given, for any hon member of this House to say that he is still convinced that the government intend to give consideration to these claims, absolutely passes my comprehension. There is the plain, distinct answer of the government that they intend to do absolutely nothing in the matter, although the Prime Minister this afternoon used certain more or less vague expressions that were not of the definite character of the language used by the Minister of Militia, which must be regarded as the answer of the government.

The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Allen) has said that this matter has not come before the government in a concrete form from 1896 until to-day. Why, it has never come before the government in any but a concrete form. The suggestion is made that the men should agree among themselves as to the character of the consideration which they ought to receive. That is not the province of the men at all, it is for the government, in the first place, to come to a conclusion as to whether or not these men are entitled to substantial consideration; when they have decided that that is the right and due of these men, then it is entirely for the government and not for the men to determine the character and amount of such consideration. It has come before the government in a concrete form and in no other form. It has been presented to the government in every possible form in which it could be presented from 1896 up to the present. The government have dealt with it in no other than a humbugging way, and like other hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this side, I deprecate the attitude which the government took in 1906 and which the Prime Minister took to-day, although not in so definite and offensive a form. The suggestion is that the loyalty of these men ought to be impugned because they come to the government and to parliament now and say that they are just as worthy of consideration as the men who fought in 1812 or in 1885 or in 1900-1901. The position which these men took does not reflect upon them in the slightest degree, but the position taken by the government that there ought to be a discrimination between the men who fought in the years I have named and those who fought in defence of the soil of this country in 1866 and 1870 is in itself a reflection on the government of this country which raises that discrimination without any excuse or justification.

These men, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker), sprang to arms at the call of their country when the soil of Canada was actually being invaded, without giving one moment's thought or consideration to reward in the future. Men dropped the axe, the plough, the tool in the machine shop, seized the rifle and bayonet and went to the front without giving a thought to any such consideration. But that does not the less involve a certain duty on the part of the government and the people of this country to give those men at least the same consideration as has been given to Canadians who fought in defence of this country and of this empire on other occasions.

The Prime Minister made another argument. He said these men had fought in 1866 and 1870 and that their claims were fresh in the minds of the people of this country at that time, but that they had not been thought worthy of recognition except for a certain compensation to those who had been wounded and to the families of those who had been killed. I would point out, as has already been pointed out by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that it is the boast of hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury Benches that this country is infinitely richer in resources and infinitely stronger in its revenues now than it was 15 years ago. That is perfectly true. Just for curiosity I looked up the public accounts of Canada to inform myself what was the total revenue of Canada in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, and I find it was $15,500,000. The Minister of Finance boasted this year that for the fiscal year ending March 30, 1911, Canada has a surplus of $30,500,000. It is perfectly apparent then that the comparison which the Prime Minister made is not a good comparison and that if there was any justification, which no one denies, for the recognition accorded to the men who fought in 1812, 1885 and 1900-01, there is no just reason or excuse why some similar consideration should not be accorded to the men who fought in Canada for the defence of the soil of Canada in 1866 and again in 1870.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Mr. Speaker, the fact that I am a beneficiary of the action of the government of 1885, in dealing with the so-called veterans of that year, prompts me to say a few words in support of the proposition to reward those who rendered a much greater service when the country was more in need of the armed service of her sons than it was in 1885 or on the later occasion which we have recognized by grant of this parliament. We have standing between us and the proposal for a commercial invasion of this country, a proposition to reward those who were instrumental in resisting an armed invasion at the time of confederation. We are brought here in the dog days, in the close season for legislation, because of the statement of the government that a promise by a minister of the Crown, an unauthorized promise even, is so sacred that we must go to this extreme means to implement it. We are confronted by this other promise of the First Minister and other ministers that they would do something substantial for the veterans of 1866, and when this proposition is before the House we are told in effect that the word of a minister of the Crown in Canada is of variable value, that it is something substantial when given to ministers of another country seeking to take advantage of Canadian simplicity to prey upon the resources of this country, but that the word of a minister of the Crown, of the First Minister, is of no value at all when given simply to a private soldier of the King who has gone out to active service in defence of his country.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the people of this country will relish the assumption that they are willing to subscribe to the monstrous doctrine that the word of a minister given to an elector of Canada in the hope that it may induce that elector to support this ministry is not of equal value with the word of a minister given to any foreign country. There is a widely-voiced opinion in this country, that this parliament, so far as its governing majority is concerned, is dead, and that we have come to the House at this inopportune season simply to set a date for the obsequies. If anything were needed to justify that popular impression, in which I concur, it is the spectacle presented in this House this afternoon of the majority supporting the government having absolutely nothing to say in defence of the extraordinary position taken by the Prime Minister, their answers to the arguments on this side being simply that which we have had presented to us so often during the last few years—'We have more heads than you have, count them.' And the fact that the silence of these gentlemen has not been prompted by their conviction that everything has been said that should be said in defence of the position that they propose to vote for is well illustrated by the unfortunate break made by the only follower of the right hon. the Prime Minister having the temerity to address the House on this occasion. The right hon. the Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, told us that this matter was settled, that it had been settled by the answers that the Minister of Militia placed upon the records of this House. He says that there is nothing to be done for these veterans. Yet the only one of his supporters who attempted to take part in this debate says that the reason he intends to vote against this motion is that the matter is not settled, that he feels in his heart that the government is going to do that which his leader and the Minister of Militia have told us they have no intention of doing. Mr. Speaker, I leave it to the public—it seems to be idle to leave it to the House—whether or not this does not indicate the moribund condition of the majority of this House—whether it does not indicate that we are wasting time in doing anything except setting the date for the obsequies referred to.

The Prime Minister, dealing with this subject, referred to one or two obstacles which present themselves to his mind. He referred to the results of the grants of land to other veterans which, he said, had done little for the benefit of the country, or of the veterans themselves. With that statement I have no quarrel; I think it is about as true a summary of the effect of an important action of this government as has ever been given on the floor of this House. So far as the veterans of 1866 and 1870 are concerned, it seems to me it is idle as has already been suggested, to offer them grants of land in the Northwest upon the terms of the grants made to other veterans. But why, if we desire to reward these veterans, should we confine ourselves to grants of land in view of our experience with similar grants that we have made. It is well known to the government, and to every member of this House that when you give as a reward to a veteran or any other person a grant of land, the country pays the full value of that land whether the individual to whom it is offered gets the value or whether he is forced to divide it with some intermediary who may be in a position to deal with, if not settle upon the land. Now, since the country has to pay the full value, why not ensure that the proposed recipient of the grant should have the whole value and not have to share it with the middlemen who have done so much harm in operations of this kind? The Prime Minister, knowing the experience we have had, knowing that it will cost no more to hand out the absolute value to the veterans than to give them grants of land to be preyed upon by speculators, has before him the immediate solution of one of the difficulties that presents itself to his mind. It is only necessary for him to give to the veterans the value, instead of grants of land such as have been shown to be so unprofitable if not unpopular. The right hon. gentleman told us also that we were confronted with a serious difficulty because it would be absurd to offer grants of land to every person who was mustered in connection with the repelling of the Fenian raid. He said there would have to be discrimination. And what we were told by the right hon. gentleman would lead one to believe that in none of the other grants of this kind had we exercised this discrimination. But the record is to the contrary. When we rewarded the veterans of the Northwest campaign of 1885, we did not hand out grants of land and medals to all those who mustered on that occasion. We drew the line at a certain degree of service which should entitle the men to the grant of land. We gave the benefit of the doubt to the volunteer in every case, so that it could not be said that any fine drawn distinctions were made to deprive any man of his reward. Speaking from memory I think the line of distinction in that case was that all the troops mustered for the occasion who proceeded west of the Lakes were given the reward of a grant of land, while those who were mustered, but remained at home were not given the grant. So, this difficulty with regard to discrimination of which the Prime Minister has spoken can easily be overcome by following the principle adopted in 1885. Yet, though the difficulties he has spoken of can thus be overcome, all the Prime Minister asks of this House is that the proposition be rejected. It is open to him, if he does not like the form of the proposal, to amend it, or to ask the mover to withdraw it on the promise made to the House that he will do something substantial. There are any number of courses open to him if he has it in his heart to make good to these veterans the promises made on so many occasions by himself and his colleagues that, in consideration of what they have done for Canada, we should make recognition of these veterans of 1866 and 1870.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that the will of this House may assert itself in a substantial vote in favour of the proposition now before the House.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Middlebro).

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I would like to ask if the hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) was in the House and heard the resolution read.

Mr. CONMEE. I heard the motion put. I was in the House when the motion was put. I came in to the door of the House, realized that the vote was on and heard the Speaker's remarks before he took his seat.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the main motion.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I saw the hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River come in after you, Mr. Speaker, had concluded reading the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the matter cannot be discussed. The hon. member (Mr. Conmee) says that he heard the motion read.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. No, that he heard the motion put.

Amendment (Mr. Middlebro) negatived.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE PORCUPINE DISASTER.

Mr. W. R. SMYTH (East Algoma). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I wish to bring to the attention of the House the serious and unparalleled catastrophe that has occurred at Porcupine in northern Ontario, and I would like to ask the government if it is their intention to give any substantial relief. No doubt you have noticed in the public press that private individuals and municipalities, and corporations of different kinds, as well as the government of Ontario, have granted considerable relief to the suffering people of that district. I noticed in the public press this morning that this government had under consideration a measure of relief towards those people who have suffered so terribly in that fearful calamity that happened last week. I know that anything that this government and parliament will do will meet with the approval of every citizen of the Dominion. We have in the past, as you are well aware, contributed largely to similar catastrophes in other parts of the world. From what I know personally of the suffering that has existed and that now exists in Porcupine, I believe the government would be warranted in acting very liberally towards the sufferers. Porcupine is a very important part, not only of the great province of Ontario, but of the Dominion of Canada. Perhaps no other part of this Dominion is advertising Canada to the outside world to the same extent as Porcupine is to-day, and the men who have been the means of this advertising are the men who have suffered, and many of them have lost their lives in an effort, no doubt with personal gain in view, but also to the great advantage of our Dominion. I hope the right hon. the First Minister will give us some assurance that it is the intention of the government to aid these sufferers in some substantial manner.

Mr. FIELDING. I am sure the members of the government as well as all the members of the House have learned with the greatest anxiety of the condition of affairs at Porcupine, and have the very warmest sympathy with those who have suffered so much in that disaster. We have had representations made to us through a committee of gentlemen in Ottawa particularly but they were not able to give us a very extended report as to the nature of the disaster and the need for assistance. Indeed, it has been represented by gentlemen to whose views we are bound to give consideration, that while the disaster is one of very considerable extent, and attended by many distressing circumstances, there is no immediate need of aid; that is to say, that the aid that has already been given is sufficient for all purposes, and that several weeks perhaps might elapse before we could be fully advised as to the extent of the misfortune and the need of assistance. It is even stated by a prominent gentleman interested in that part of Ontario that every need of the community is now being attended to. However, we quite realize that the information in the possession of the government, as it is in the possession of the public generally, is of a general and somewhat indefinite character, and we think it would be well that we should await some further information before coming to a decision as to what action may be necessary, if necessary, to provide the desired relief. Relief, perhaps in the most useful and substantial form, was sent immediately, in the form of canvas tents, which are being used to cover the people. That I understand has been very useful. Indeed, in itself it involves a very substantial aid. But whether or not the need will arise for further aid is a point on which the government are awaiting further information.

THE TELEGRAPH AND CABLE SERVICES.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, as I see the hon. Postmaster General in his place, I desire to bring to the attention of the House and the country an improvement that could be made by the action of the government in the telegraph and cable services of this country. We have heard a good deal in Canada for some years about public ownership. I believe it is a great principle; I believe it has great promise and great performance for the public of Canada. We have talked about it for quite a while, and we have realized it in a way.. In the province of Ontario we have realized that principle in a way that justifies it. Public ownership is based on the idea that it will first of all give the public a greatly improved service, and, in the next place, that it will give the public a much cheaper service. Now, that has been denied; but we have to-day the evidence of all Europe, of Australia, of New Zealand, of other countries, that the principle of public ownership is a great success. In Ontario we have tried it, and the very first result of the operation of the Hydro-Electric Commission in that province has been to cut the price of a widespread public service in two, and to improve the service. In the city of Toronto, where an electric monopoly held up the citizens and gave a very poor service, we have to-day the price cut in two, and a service owned and controlled by the people of Toronto, which promises to be an excellent service. In this House itself, where the lighting is by electricity, we make a contract with a private company for a certain candle-power. Do you ever get it? No. There is such an absence of juice, to use a technical term, in the service, that sometimes the lights are not equal to eight candle-power where we have been promised 32. In the city of Hamilton, where there was a monopoly controlled by the Cataract Power Company, the moment there is public ownership, what does the private monopoly say? It says, we will give you as good or a better price than the Hydro-Electric. And so the principle of public ownership has vindicated itself in the province of Ontario in connection with a great system of lighting for all the municipalities of that province. The province of Ontario, whether it is patriotic or not, is to-day selling or is about to sell power to the citizens of the United States for less than they can buy it for elsewhere.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is reciprocity.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes, but it is a different kind of reciprocity from that which the government is proposing. We have tried public ownership in the Dominion in connection with the Intercolonial railway, but that public ownership was never given an opportunity to make good. Put the Intercolonial railway in competition with other railways; extend it to Toronto, to the Georgian bay, to the Detroit river, and railway rates in the province of Ontario would be cut one-third in a single day, and the government railway would be a success. The Intercolonial railway should have been put into the great Canadian west, and then there would have been a reduction in rates that would have substantially benefited the people of the west. You cannot vindicate government ownership of railways unless you give the principle a fair chance to vindicate itself. And to-day, even though the Canadian Pacific railway is bound by its contracts to give the people of the west lower freight rates, we are told we must not enforce the law against the Canadian Pacific railway because it would injure the Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern railway. Now, as to the post office, the telegraph, and the cable services. True, we have tried government owned telegraphs in this country, but only in uninhabited parts on the Atlantic coast, on the Pacific coast, and up to the Yukon where public ownership had no opportunity to serve the people. The time has come when the post Office Department must take over the telegraphs, or else they must extend the existing government owned wires into a transcontinental service so as to compete with the railway monopoly of telegraphs. The telegraph tolls to-day in the Canadian west are exorbitantly high, and the telegraph company that controls the service in the west is reaping enormous profits. The profits of the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph service in the west ought to be reduced at once, and if we cannot reduce them by form of law we should immediately resort to the establishment of a government owned transcontinental telegraph service. The day has arrived when there ought to be a national transcontinental telegraph service throughout Canada and connecting with all the great cities of the country. Then, in conjunction with that, cable tolls should be reduced, and the effective way to reduce cable tolls is for Canada to establish an Atlantic cable. The business now offering is more than the existing Atlantic cable companies can do; there is room for competition, and I believe that the mere announcement that the government of Canada would adopt the principle of government ownership in cables would result in a reduction from the present commercial rate of 25 cents a word to 5 cents a word, and the business community of the world would be enormously benefited. You may talk of the Steel Trust and other great monopolies, but there is no such powerful monopoly in the world to-day as the Eastern Telegraph Company in England. They largely control the cables all over the world; they are probably the most influential corporation in England, and they have had more influence at government head quarters in England for the last 50 years, and especially with the late government, than any other corporation. Do what you might it has been impossible to get the Eastern Telegraph Company to reduce its exorbitant rates or to improve its service. I believe the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) has taken part in negotiations held in England, and that a promise has been made that cable rates would be reduced, but so far the public has derived no benefit in that direction. Perhaps it may come from the present discussion in this House, but anyway, come it should. The principle of government ownership so well vindicated in Ontario in connection with the distribution of electric power can easily and cheaply be applied to telegraphs and cables, for it will not cost much to build one or two cables across the Atlantic to start with, and then will follow a cable to Australasia if that be necessary to control the service on the Pacific. It has been mentioned in the press, and in parliament that a reduction in cable tolls is in sight, but it will not be realized by talking about it; government ownership of the telegraphs and cables is the real cure for the existing evil. Great Britain has adopted the principle in connection with her inland telegraph system, she is adopting it with reference to her telephone system, and Germany, and Russia, and Japan, and China, and Australia, and New Zealand, where their system has been tried would not give up their control for any consideration. Then, government ownership of telegraphs and cables would not only cheapen the rates, but it would widen the area of the effectiveness of the service.

Where there were 3,000 or 4,000 telegraph offices in the mother country they now have 12,000 or 15,000. The improved system has been a great success. We in Canada are to-day paying exorbitant telegraph and cable tolls. We can have them reduced by the application of the principle of public ownership. We can easily get the money to establish the new system and we can insist on the mother country joining with us in the project because Great Britain is now committed to the principle and there is a great imperial reason, there is a great reason of peace behind the proposition which I urge here to-day. We are to-day discussing arbitration treaties in the world. Great Britain and the United States are binding themselves one to the other in favour of a system of arbitration in place of a resort to war. That idea, which we all welcome, is making great headway but if the principle of arbitration is to govern, it can only realize itself by having the support of a world wide public opinion and a world wide public opinion can only be created by the rapid interchange of public opinion between different countries by means of a cheap cable telegraph service. It is in the interest of this country, in the interest of peace, in the interest of business, in the interest of the empire that there should be cheaper telegraph and cable tolls and we can never get them to the full until the state undertakes to build telegraph lines and to be a party, along with other states of the empire, in the construction and maintenance of the state-owned cables. If that is the case why is not the principle recognized? It will do everything for the country. It will be a boon to the farmer of the west. Those farmers are told that they want the American market. Perhaps they do. Perhaps the Americans will give it to them off their own bat. By all means let them do so if they wish to, but let the farmers get relief from the exorbitant telegraph tolls now exacted from them. The railway commission have not yet caught up with all their work, they have not yet reduced the telegraph tolls to any great extent. But those tolls would be reduced at once by the mere threat to start a state owned telegraph system. We have had the fruit now in Ontario; the city of Toronto is about to realize it in connection with its street railway. They proposed to establish a municipal system as they have a right to do in competition with the private owned principle and the moment that was done there was an improvement in the service, a cheapening in the price and an enlargement in the area of the application of the service. My contention is that the government or the Postmaster General representing the government should tell the people of Canada what all these negotiations up to the present have resulted in and whether we are to have cheaper cable telegraph tolls or whether the government are prepared, if they cannot get it by negotiation, then to come forward and give the people and press of Canada the benefit of a state-owned system. They have given some relief to the press in connection with cable tolls because those tolls were so exorbitant that the newspapers were not able even to transmit the ordinary news of the day between Canada and the mother country. The government is committed to that principle to-day in relation to the press but they have not realized it for the public; the press get a ten cent rate and the government help to pay the difference, but if the government will establish state owned cables and land lines jointly with the Imperial government, first connecting the great cities of Canada like Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver, the interest on the investment would be easily paid and the telegraph rates would be cut in three. There is a substantial opportunity to benefit the people of all this country by giving them a state owned telegraph and cable service.

It is true the Prime Minister said he is afraid of public ownership. I do not know whether the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) is also afraid but if he has been afraid in the past he has that living example in Ontario that the moment they embarked in earnest on the project of public ownership applied to the distribution of electricity, one of the greatest blessings in the world, to the people, the price was cut in two, the service was improved, and distribution was made all over the province. The work has only begun but at the very first inception of it the coon comes down. The late Attorney General of Ontario—I shall not speak of him by his present title—devoted himself to creating a great monopoly in Ontario in connection with the electric service, especially in connection with the city of Hamilton. It never would amount to anything and the special pleaders now in Hamilton and all over Ontario are saying it will not amount to anything, it will not realize itself; but it has realized itself to-day and we in Toronto have had our electric prices cut in two. We have done more than that, we have disciplined the competing companies. They are civil now to the public, they take off their hats and ask what they can do for their customers. They have to do for every city what they do for any one city and if, by competition of the government they are forced to give consideration and to give concessions in one place they must by parity of reasoning give them to other places. So the result of public ownership, this much derided principle, in Ontario to-day is that it has realized itself and yet, it has only started. It is the greatest project that any state has undertaken and is almost the widest exposition of the principle we have seen for a long while. But it has been successful from the start and it comes home to us in this House in connection with the government of Canada to see if we cannot apply that principle of government ownership to the telegraph and cable services of this country and of the empire in such a way as to bring about an improvement and cheapening of these services.

So I would like to hear some account of these negotiations, a statement of what the result has been or if no result is in sight when the government would be prepared to take up the question of improving the cable service of the country and the land telegraph lines in such a way as to afford substantial benefit to the country. we can do a great deal. We can bring relief to-morrow to the farmers of the west in connection with telegraph tolls and to all Canada in connection with railway rates, a still greater question, if we have the courage and the capacity to apply the principle of public ownership to the railway problem of this country.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). Mr. Speaker, I would have preferred to have had my hon. friend give me notice of his intention to bring this matter up this evening. However, I will state in a few words how the question stands in regard to cable rates. First, let me tell him, speaking personally and for myself alone, that I am not so much averse in many respects to public ownership. As my hon. friend stated, in the older countries such as France, England and Germany and in newer countries from the point of view of civilization, such as Japan, the Post Office Department includes all communications and in those countries telephones, telegraphs and cables are under post office jurisdiction.

In this country, however, we have not yet reached that stage, although there is a strong movement, in some parts of the country in favour of public ownership of this form of public utility. We have, however, made a very important step in that direction by the establishment of the Railway Commission. My hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) knows that any person can bring before the Railway Commission the telegraph companies or telephone companies, or even the cable companies, if it is believed that their rates are excessive.

My hon. friend stated that there had been some discussion between the Post Office Department in Great Britain and the Canadian Post Office. That is quite true. On two different occasions, it was my duty to discuss with the Postmaster General in England the question of cable rates. There was a strong opinion in this country that the rates should be cut. I found also two friends of cheaper rates in the two Postmasters General with whom I have discussed this matter, Mr. Buxton and Mr. Samuels. Mr. Buxton, who is now president of the Board of Trade, was strongly in favour of cheaper cable communication between Canada and the mother country. Like his predecessor, Mr. Samuels, with whom I had some interviews last year, he agreed that in some way or other means should be found to reduce the rates. We even discussed what schedule of rates should be established. I may say that we reached the following basis in case we were able to bring the cable companies to terms: The actual rate of 25 cents per word was to be maintained for what we called 'urgent cables'. Twelve cents a word was to be charged for the semi-urgent messages. My contention was that we should have another reduction for the press to a rate of six cents a word. Without at all committing my colleagues on the other side of the water, Messrs. Buxton and Samuels, I may say we were practically agreed upon these rates. But in England the cable companies have thousands of shareholders and it was thought that perhaps it would injure vested rights if the government should press too hard on the cable companies in order to bring them to terms. I am passing very rapidly over the various discussions we had; but, later in the session, if my hon. friend will renew his motion, I may bring before the House the papers I have in the department relating to the subject, and from these he will gain more information than I can give him this evening. Last year it was finally agreed that the cable companies should reduce their rates by 12½ cents on the semi-urgent messages, provided these messages were not in cipher, and provided also that a certain time should be allowed for delivery.—I think it was 20 or 24 hours. Before recess, I received a letter from Mr. Samuels stating that there remained one country, France, to join in the general agreement made by the various European cable companies. The government of Germany and of Great Britain had agreed. I have not received any further information from Mr. Samuels since that time, but I dare say that in a very short time announcement can be made that a reduction is made from 25 cents a word on ordinary cable messages to 12 cents a word. But I wish to go further than that. My hon. friend is aware that the question was brought up at the last Imperial Conference. Again I say that I am speaking on my own responsibility. I am personally in favour of a state-owned cable between Canada and Great Britain. I am not what some people call a jingo; I am a sane imperialist and I think that if you wish to forge the bonds of union among the different parts of the empire, you must have cheap electric communication so as to make the centre of the empire the nerve centre of the imperial organization. There are objections to that, of course, and I agree that we cannot overcome such objections by a wave of the hand. As my hon. friend is aware, a motion was made in the last Imperial Conference in favour of a state-owned cable. The reduction of which I have spoken was referred to by the British Postmaster General, Mr. Samuels, who said that the reduction would be made within a short time. But he committed himself and the British government to a further reduction to be obtained from the cable companies, otherwise a state-owned could would have to be established. I think that is the gist of the resolution adopted by the conference. So, if my hon. friend and the press, who are very much interested in these matters, and the public generally, will be patient, I think the day is not far distant when we shall have cheaper communication by elecricity between Canada and the motherland. I am sure my hon. friend is aware that the question of the land lines is not a great difficulty after all. We have to-day a land line leased for the Pacific cable between Vancouver and Montreal. There is a very little gap between Montreal and Quebec, and from Quebec and the maritime provinces we could use the government telegraphs. It would be a very small matter to provide a cable between the two countries. According to figures which have been verified by experts it would cost something like $2,000,000 or a little more to establish cable communication between Canada and Great Britain. Another objection which prevents the home government from committing themselves absolutely to state-owned cables at present is the outlook for Mr. Marconi's invention. Mr. Marconi has been very successful, and it is believed in England that he will go much farther and that perhaps, when he has mastered his invention it will be a much less expensive matter to establish a system of communication between England and Canada than by means of a cable.

I may say to my hon. friend that last year the Imperial government purchased all the rights of the Marconi system in Great Britain; to-day the Marconi stations in England, Ireland and Scotland are the property of the state; and it is intended, when Mr. Marconi has perfected his system, to take full control of the invention. At a later stage of the session, I hope to be able to give the House more information on this question.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman says the Imperial government owns the Marconi system and the stations in Great Britain. How is the trans-Atlantic service to be operated? The stations on both sides of the Atlantic will be necessary for the operation. I am asking for information. I was not aware that the Imperial government had purchased the system.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may, perhaps, qualify my statement by saying that they have purchased the Marconi stations in relation to the navy, they have established a Marconi system on all the ships of the navy, and all the stations in Ireland, England and Scotland belong to the Imperial government. I read the contract not long ago. But Mr. Marconi, I suppose, has retained some rights as regards the sending of private messages across the Atlantic; but for state purposes and for the purposes of the Admiralty the stations are controlled by the government.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Has the hon, gentleman a copy of the contract?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I can get one for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. THOBURN. Did I understand from the Postmaster General that in the event of the cable rate being cut from 25 to 12 cents per word, we are not permitted to use cipher or code words?

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is the agreement between the Imperial Postmaster General and the various cable companies. I regret not to have the verbatim statement made to me by the Postmaster General, but I will file a copy of it for the benefit of members of the House. No cipher message can be used and get the benefit of the reduction.

Mr. THOBURN. Let me point out to the Postmaster General that instead of that being of advantage to the business men of Canada it will be a burden. For instance, there are many code words representing a sentence, say, of ten words. Now, that code word as it stands to-day costs 25 cents, but under the new regulation it will cost $1.20. The reduction in rates will be all right providing cipher and code words are left as they are, otherwise it will be an injury to the business men of Canada instead of a benefit.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I said this was the first agreement made between the Postmaster General in England and the cable companies. But my hon. friend will realize that after the resolution adopted by the conference another step will be taken. The delegates of the various colonies and the Postmaster General in England himself are not satisfied with this reduction, they want a further reduction; if they do not get it they have committed themselves to the establishment of a state-owned cable.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Supposing these reductions were agreed to between the companies and the government, how long, or would it for any time check the government in the application of the principle of state ownership in connection with cables and telegraphs?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The moment the reduction is accepted, the moment there is no burden on the public, there will be no necessity of state ownership.

Mr. TURRIFF. If that agreement is made between the telegraph companies and the government in Great Britain, would it do away with the present rate of 25 cents per word for code words?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not know if I am in a position to answer my hon. friend's question without having the papers before me. The government in England and the cable companies agreed that the present rate of 25 cents should remain as it is for urgent messages. My hon. friend knows that during certain hours of the day the cables are busy with messages from the various bourses of the world, and those people do not care whether a message costs 25 cents or even $1 a word. But for the general public, for social messages and even business messages, provided they are not in code or cipher, and provided there is no obligation about their delivery within a specified time, say within 24 hours, the cable companies have agreed to reduce the rate to 12 cents a word. But that is not thought sufficient by the parties who have made the agreement, and at the last Imperial conference the question came up, and it was decided that the British Postmaster General should urge upon the cable companies a still further reduction in their rates, and if they do not yield to the pressure of the government, there is an implied promise that there will be a state owned cable.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee on Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FIELDING. We will take up the motion for the further consideration of the resolutions respecting reciprocity with the United States.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound). When I left this House two months ago I was opposed to this agreement, believing as I did that it would be most injurious to Canada as a whole. I believed that the average elector of Canada, more particularly of Ontario, with which I am better acquainted, was also opposed to this agreement. I still believe that I was right in both propositions. I was surprised to find in going through the country, that in many places the Ontario farmer is being deliberately misled as to the scope of this agreement. I find not one but hundreds of farmers who are being taught to believe that this agreement amounts to absolute free trade in all agricultural machinery, and some other articles the farmers use. I may go further and say that the free list as passed by the House of Representatives of the United States, commonly known as the farmers' free list, is being circulated throughout my riding as the offspring of this government, and as a reason for supporting the reciprocity agreement. Now, I will take up a little time of the House by reading over a list of manufactured articles which enter into this reciprocity agreement, and the amount of reduction in each case.

I am now reading from the official document, and will be pleased if any hon. gentleman will correct me if I am wrong.

Articles.	Reduction.
Farm wagons and complete parts thereof	2½ per cent.
Ploughs	5 "
Tooth and disc harrows	5 "
Harvesters and reapers	2½ "
Agricultural drills and planters	5 "
Mowers	2½ "
Horse rakes	5 "
Cultivators	5 "
Threshing machines	5 "
Windstackers, baggers, weighers and self-feeders therefor and finished parts of the foregoing for repairs	5 "
Portable engines with boilers, in combination, with horse powers and traction engines for farm purposes
Hay loaders	5 "
Potato diggers	5 "
Fodder or feed cutters	5 "
Grain crushers	5 "
Fanning mills	5 "
Hay tedders	5 "
Farm or field rollers	5 "
Manure spreaders
Weeders
Windmills—and finished parts of the foregoing, for repairs, except shafting
Cutlery, plated or not, viz., penknives, pocketknives, knives for household and other purposes and table steels	2½ "
Bells and gongs; brass corners and rules for printers	2½ "
Basins, urinals and other plumbing fixtures of earthenware for bathrooms and lavatories; baths, bath-tubs, sinks and laundry tubs of earthenware, stone, cement or clay, or of other material	2½ "
Brass band instruments	2½ "
Grindstones of sandstone, not mounted, finished or not	50 cents per ton.
Building or monumental stone of freestone, granite, sandstone	2½ per cent.

I think these are the principle manufactured articles except one, and that is automobiles, which are reduced 5 per cent. Now I will read a list of articles produced by the farmer on which there is a reduction. Butter, reduced by 4 cents per pound. Cheese reduced by 3 cents. Fresh milk by 17½ per cent; fresh cream, 17½ per cent; eggs, 3 cents per doz.; honey, 3 cents per pound. Then I read from the table other items, with the reductions of duty:

Articles.	Reduction by United States.	Reduction by Canada.
Cattle		25 per cent.
Less than one year old	$2 per head
Valued at not more than $14 per head	$3.75 "
Valued at more than $14 per head	27½ per cent
Horses and mules
Horses over one year old, valued at $50 or less		$12.50.
Horses, N.O.P.		25 per cent.
Valued at $150 or less per head	$30
Valued at over $150	25 per cent.
Swine	$1.50 each	1½c. per lb.
Sheep and lambs		25 per cent.
Less than one year old	75c. each
One year old or over	$1.50 each
Other live animals	20 per cent	25 per cent.
Poultry, dead and alive
Alive	3c. per lb.	25 "
Dead	5c. "	20 "
Wheat, per bushel	25 cents	12 cents.
Rye "	10 "	10 "
Oats "	15 "	10 "
Barley "	30 "	15 "
Buckwheat "	15 "	15 "
Beans, edible, dried, per bushel	45 "	25 "
Pease, dried, per bushel	25 "
	40 "	15 "
Potatoes, per bushel	25 "	20 "
Corn (except into Canada for distillation)	15c. per bushel.
Sweet potatoes, per bushel	25 cents	10 "
Yams	25 per cent	30 per cent.
Turnips	25 "	30 "
Onions	40c. per bushel.	30 "
Cabbages	2c. each	30 "
All other vegetables in their natural state	25 per cent	30 "

If the farmer believes he is going to be benefited by the small reductions which are being made in manufactured articles according to this list, he is absolutely being misled. But this idea is being sedulously spread throughout all Canada to-day. We find large quantities of literature going out from the government side teaching this idea, but we do not find them sending out any literature giving the actual facts. Now, I intend to oppose this reciprocity agreement for three principal reasons. In the first place, I believe it is unwise for us Canadians to entangle ourselves at the present time, commercially or otherwise, with the United States. That country has always been our most formidable competitor commercially. I believe the United States has entered into this bargain with the idea that they are getting the best of it, and that in the end it will lead to the annexation of Canada by the United States. In the second place, I believe that no fiscal change as great as this should be entered into by Canada, making such radical change in our tariff conditions, without the people of Canada being consulted. In the third place, I believe the treaty in itself would be of no benefit to Canada, but would be most injurious to the farmers of this country and would put many of our Canadian industries under the control of the trusts of the United States, of which we already have enough of our own. Now I do not mean to say, and I do not think, that hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House are less loyal than those sitting on this side of the House, but I believe they are mistaken. I believe they entered into this agreement without understanding its full import, and I believe that those of them who have studied the question carefully, if it were not for their party loyalty would be absolutely opposed to this agreement at the present time. Now there is no question as to what the Americans think of it. They have shown no hesitation in expressing their opinions, and at the risk of wearying the House, I would like to quote a few extracts from leading American statesmen showing what they think will be the effect of this agreement. First, I will quote a statement from President Taft:

One path leads to practical if not political union with Canada, and the development of the entire North American continent as the heritage and the possession of a great and free people. The other path leads to the hardening into two distinct political entities, two hostile or at least unsympathetic peoples on this continent. It leads to a closer relation between Canada and Great Britain. It means the carrying out of Joseph Chamberlain's great dream of a British imperial federation, bound together no less by trade than by sentiment, with preferential tariffs on either side, with Canada taking the place of the United States as chief purveyor of food products and manufactures to Great Britain.

To-day England is our best customer, and Canada is our third best customer. But our foreign trade wanes, and that of Canada grows. If we push Canada into England's arms, the trade arrangements between the two will tend more and more to shut us out.

How long will our trade with these two customers last, if reciprocity fails? Our Canadian must drop off, as the east and west channels of her commerce are scoured by us. And Canada will more and more supply English needs in our stead.

Again, speaking on page 8 of the American 'Congressional Record,' we find Mr. Taft saying:

The benefit to our widespread agricultural implement industry from the reduction of Canadian duties in the agreement is clear Similarly the new, widely distributed and expanding motor vehicle industry of the United States is given access to the Dominion market on advantageous terms. . . That the broadening of the sources of food supplies, that the opening of the timber resources of the Dominion to our needs, that the addition to the supply of raw materials, will be limited to no particular section does not require demonstration. The same observation applies to the markets which the Dominion offers us in exchange. As an illustration, it has been found possible to obtain free entry into Canada for fresh fruits and vegetables—a matter of special value to the south and to the Pacific coast in disposing of their products in their season. . . The entire foreign trade of Canada in the last fiscal year, 1910, was $655,000,000. The imports were $376,000,000, and of this amount the United States contributed more than $223,000,000. The reduction in the duties imposed by Canada will largely increase this amount and give us even a larger share of her market than we now enjoy, great as that is.

Mr. Beveridge, speaking at Washington said:

There must be reciprocity with Canada. Our tariff with the rest of the world does not apply to our northern neighbour. That policy already has driven American manufacturers across the Canadian borders, built vast plants with American capital on Canadian soil, employing Canadian workmen to supply trade. That capital should be kept at home to employ American workingmen to supply Canadian demands. We should admit Canadian wood pulp and Canadian paper free in return for Canada's admitting our agricultural implements, our engines, our pumps and other machinery free. We should freely admit Canadian lumber to American planing mills in return for Canada freely admitting other American manufacturing products to Canadian markets.

Then we find Senator Sherman saying:

The way to union with Canada is not by hostile legislation; not by acts of retaliation, but by friendly overtures. This union is one of the events that must inevitably come in the future; it will come by the logic of the situation, and no politician or combination of politicians can prevent it. The true policy of this government is to tender freedom in trade and intercourse, and to make this tender in such a fraternal way that it shall be an overture to the Canadian people to become a part of this Republic. . . The settlement of the Northwest territory, the Louisiana and Florida purchases, the annexation of Texas, and the acquisition from Mexico are examples of the adaptation of our form of government for expansion, to absorb and unite, to enrich and build up, to ingraft in our body politic adjacent countries, and while strengthening the older states, confer prosperity and development on the new states admitted into this brotherhood of Republican States. . . With a firm conviction that this consummation most devoutly to be wished is within the womb of destiny, and believing that it is our duty to hasten its coming, I am not willing, for one, to vote for any measure not demanded by national honour that will tend to postpone the good time coming, when the American flag will be the signal and sign of the union of all the English-speaking peoples of the continent from the Rio Grande to the Arctic ocean.—Senator Sherman in the United States Senate.

I have given you sufficient to show the opinion that the Americans hold as regards the ultimate result of this treaty. There is no question in my mind that the principal aim of the promoters of this treaty on the other side of the line is to divert trade into American channels, gradually to obtain control of Canadian trade, both export and local, and prevent Canada from asking for or receiving a preference from Great Britain. We have had many unsatisfactory experiences in dealing with the United States, and in every case the United States have had the best of the bargain. Only a year ago the United States, through their government, held the big stick over this government, over the same men who negotiated this treaty a few months ago. In passing the Payne-Aldrich treaty at that time it was threatened that they would put an extra duty of 25 per cent on all Canadian goods unless Canada made certain concessions. It is quite true that these concessions did not amount to much but the principle was and is absolutely wrong. We should control our own duties absolutely free from the United States in any way.

There has been absolutely no demand in Canada for this treaty. The people have been and are perfectly satisfied with the conditions as they exist at the present time. There are many electors in past elections, have openly said that there was very little difference between the Conservative and reform parties in so far as their policy was concerned. The Reform party had a platform which was somewhat similar to that of the Conservative party in many respects.

When they came into power in 1896 they practically swallowed the National Policy holus bolus. They kept on the same duties, increased them in some cases and in some cases decreased them a very little. The prosperity of Canada at this present juncture has been entirely owing to the policy put into effect by the Conservatives many years ago.

This idea of tariff stability has been drilled into the people not only by the present opposition—the government at that time—but also by hon. gentlemen who are on the ministerial benches now. I have an extract here from a speech made by the right hon. leader of the government in November, 1910, only a few months ago. He said:

> The people of the west are now asking for a reduction of duty on certain articles which they consume. That is a very proper subject of investigation,——

Not for any treaty, not for any resolution of this kind, but a proper subject for investigation.

> —and we intend to investigate it. But at the proper time.

The hon. gentleman who at the present time is leading the House, the Minister of Finance, in 1906-7, page 287 of Hansard, said:

> Our desire has been to encourage a larger degree of tariff stability—not a slavish adherence to every item in the tariff. But we have been desirous that the impression should go abroad that the government were not willing to make changes hastily, that they were rather slow to do anything in that line, and only when a case became of extreme urgency would we undertake to make changes.

Later on he said:

> We have, therefore, from time to time resisted many applications for changes, not because in some instances there may not have been something in the argument, but because it was not wise to make changes too often, and if in one or two cases there was some reason perhaps to justify a change I do not think anybody has suffered any serious loss by the delay.
> It will be the policy of the government to have that inquiry made throughout the Dominion with the utmost care . . . care will be taken to afford opportunity to every class who wish to present their views to come and state in what respect they think either that the tariff is right and should be maintained or that it is defective and what changes they believe should be made.

Speaking in another place he said:

> When the moment for tariff revision arrives, the public of Canada may rest assured that the government will undertake the work in the spirit of moderation and caution that has prevailed in their past actions in tariff affairs, avoiding the extremes which almost always find advocates, and having regard for what is best; not for particular industries or particular sections of the country, but for the interests of the people of the whole of the Dominion.

In another place, also in the year 1906, he said:

> Now that we are approaching the question of a general tariff revision, we again wish to keep in mind this idea of tariff stabilty. We do not desire to make radical changes. We feel that the general conditions of Canada today is such that no radical changes in the tariff are called for.

In spite of these declarations the Minister of Finance, on April 6 of this year said in this House:

> What we have done is no departure from the policy of Canada; it is in accordance with the policy of Canada for forty years. . .
> . . . There is an important difference in the position of the United States government then and now. They were proposing a radical departure from the policy of the country, and they may have needed information of that sort to support their case, but we certainly did not.

They repudiated the promises, such as I have just read, of a tariff commission, and we find the government coming down here with this proposition and asking the country to accept it offhand without any evidence, without any commission, without any knowledge as to the ultimate effect of the agreement, or what effect it will have upon various sections of the country, and we are accused of—I was going to say obstruction—because we do not let this pass without any consideration at all. The Prime Minister at one point said that this was before the country because it was one of the planks of the reform platform of 1893. I thought the reform platform of 1893 was a thing that had passed away long ago but they will revive it once in a while. It may interest some hon. gentlemen to have recalled to their recollection some of the planks of the platform of 1893 which have been allowed to pass into oblivion:

Senate reform.
Reduction of expenditure.
Lower taxation.
Free trade as they have it in England.

These are apparently the principal planks of the platform of 1893.

Mr. LANCASTER. Prohibition.

Mr. ARTHURS. Prohibition too. I forgot that. We have had three elections in Canada since 1896, and while I have had some active part in all of these elections I have no recollection of any of these planks having been brought forward in any election since 1893. I believe the Conservative elector is perfectly justified in believing them all dead.

But, there is some reason for the changed attitude of the government, and in looking around I have come to this conclusion. On November 4 of last year an election was held in the United States at which the democratic, or low tariff party, were successful. They obtained control of the House of representatives and they will, I believe, shortly have control of the Senate of the United States. Mr. Taft, President of the United States, elected by the Republican party, and desirous of a second term as president, looked around for some means by which he could obtain a second term. This bright idea struck him and it is a remarkable thing that on or about the same day an election was held in Canada. One of the strongest constituencies held by this government in the province from which they derive their principal support saw fit to repudiate the government's policy upon a very important issue and the candidate of the government was defeated in Drummond and Arthabaska, Quebec. These things occurred within a day or two of one another.

I honestly believe that the Prime Minister and the government got cold feet as Mr. Taft did and they looked around for some means to cloud the issue in the coming elections. That is the reason why the time of parliament has been taken up with this proposition. It is strange that during this long debate the members of the government side of the House have been unable to offer any reason for this policy of theirs. The Minister of Finance, though he spoke eloquently in introducing the motion, gave only one side of the story. He told the farmers of Canada about the 90,000,000 market in the United States, but he forgot to tell them that these 90 millions would invade their own home market. He did not tell the farmers of Canada that 80 per cent of their products were sold in Canada so long as the tariff continued to protect them, and he did not prove nor could he prove that the Canadian farmers would continue to sell that 80 per cent in the home market if the treaty came into force. The Minister of Finance also forgot to tell our farmers that 13 other countries as well as the United States would be able to compete with them in their home market. Then, the Minister of Customs took 25 minutes to tell the House of the great benefit Canada would derive from the free exportation of talc. I confess that when the Minister of Customs was speaking I had a vague idea of what talc was, but I was comforted by knowing that the Minister of Customs knew less about it than I did, because he told us it was something to beautify the complexion, whereas the truth is, that it is commercially used for whitening writing paper. I find, however, from the official returns that there are 27 men in the whole of Canada engaged in the talc industry, and that the averages wages paid them is $1.32 a day, which is less than we pay in Northern Ontario for men who work with the pick and shovel. I honestly believe that the Minister of Customs took up the time of the House talking about talc because he had no better argument to offer. Then again he was very eloquent on the fact that the duty on iron ore exported to the United States was to be reduced by 33⅓ per cent and as the present duty is only 15 cents a ton we are to have the magnificent concession of 5 cents on each ton of iron ore. These are samples of the argument put up by the Minister of Customs, one of the very men responsible for this Reciprocity agreement. So far as iron ore is concerned, I believe that the best thing that could happen to Canada would be to absolutely prohibit the exportation of iron ore because I believe it should all be manufactured in this country and until we are able to manufacture it we ought to keep it here. The people of Ontario have had a lesson right along this line. For years the Conservative party in that province advocated the probibition of the exportation of sawlogs, but the Liberal goverment resisted it for years until finally they were compelled to adopt that policy. We were told that if such a law went into force. timber limits would not be worth ten cents a square mile. Well, I know something about timber limits; I know something about the conditions then and now, and I know that from the day the prohibition of the export of sawlogs went into force in Ontario up to the present time the price of timber limits has continued to increase. The result of that policy was that labour was employed in Canada, that our Georgian Bay ports were built up, that the Michigan mills engaged in that industry had to be moved to the Canadian side and that the population of the Georgian Bay towns largely increased. I believe, Sir, that the same would work out in regard to the prohibition of the export of iron ore or any other natural resources of that nature. The Prime Minister, as usual, spoke eloquently in favour of reciprocity, but if you study his speech you will find he said absolutely nothing as to the merits of reciprocity. His sole argument was that Sir John Macdonald or Lord Elgin or some one else said something in favour of reciprocity away back in 1854 or 1879. I am free to confess that I do not care a cent about what Sir John Macdonald or Lord Elgin or any one else said in 1854, and I do not think the average Canadian elector cares either. But if we are to dip into ancient history we need not go as far back as 1879 or 1854 because we have the utterances of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Finance of recent date which show that not so long ago they were adverse to the policy they are now promoting. Speaking in 1898 the Prime Minister said:

Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians, beginning with myself, would have given many things to obtain the American market, but thank heaven these days are past and over.

Ten years afterwards in 1908, speaking at the Imperial Conference the right hon. gentleman said:

There was a time when we were wanting, reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside and negatived. We have said good-bye to that trade, ard we now put all our hopes on the British trade.

In 1903, when he was proposing the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill we have this further pronouncement from the right hon. gentleman

Such is our duty, it is immediate and imperative. It is not for to-morrow, but of this day, of this hour and of this minute. Heaven grant that it be not already too late; heaven grant that whilst we tarry and dispute, the trade of Canada is not deviated to other channels, and that an ever vigilant competitor does not take to himself the trade that belongs to those who acknowledge Canada as their native or their adopted land. Upon this question we feel that our position is absolutely safe and secure; we feel that it corresponds to the beating of every Canadian heart. Now, sir, we lay it down as a principle, upon which we are to be judged by friend or foe, that we are to have a transcontinental railway, that its terminus must be in Canadian waters, and that the whole line, every inch of it, must be in Canadian territory. We say further that such a line is a necessity of our commercial independence.

What country had the right hon. gentleman in his mind then?

It was evidently the United States, because his argument could apply to no other nation.

Mr. LENNOX. He made that clear.

Mr. ARTHURS. Then, in 1899 the right hon. the Prime Minister said:

If we know the hearts and minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the general feeling in Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians would have given many things to obtain the American market, there was a time not long ago, when the market of the great cities of the Union was the only market we had for any of our products. But thank Heaven, these days are past and over now. We are not dependent upon the American market as we were at one time.

In that short extract from the speech of the right hon. gentleman lies the true secret of the difference between the period mentioned from 1866 to 1879, and the present time. At that time we had no railroads, we had little or no canals, our farmers were absolutely dependent on the United States for a market for their products; we had no other market, we could reach no other. But things are entirely changed now. We have spent millions to build up a railway system and to provide the best facilities for transporting our products, so that at the present time Liverpool is a nearer market for the Dominion of Canada than New York.

A few words in regard to the opinions, or the late opinions, of the Minister of Finance, because he has changed them very often. Speaking in 1899 he said:

Whatever our American friends may have intended by their trade policy, there is one thing that they certainly have done; they have made Canadians more independent and self-reliant and have caused them to look more steadily than before to their home market and to their markets over the sea, where there is an open door. Especially have our producers given attention to the British market during the past two years, when our trade relations with the mother country have been so developed and increased by the preferential tariff. Therefore, the market of our friends to the south of us is much less important to us than it was a few years ago, and we are better able to do without reciprocity than we have been at any previous time in the history of Canada.

That is the hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LANCASTER. Not the same man who went to Washington surely.

Mr. ARTHURS. The same man, one of them. In 1906, speaking on the Budget, the Minister of Finance said:

The farmer, as a rule, is a low tariff man; but if you ask him whether he wants the duties on agricultural products abolished, he is apt to be a little careful. Some will say yes and others, no. Others will say: Take the duties off agricultural products if you take them off everything else. Well, whenever we have made changes in the schedule of agricultural duties, as a rule they are in the direction of a little increase. We do not want the farmer to say that the changes made are to the disadvantage of the things he himself produces. In fact some farmers are strong advocates of high duties although the general tendency is the other way. Therefore, we have not made any changes, and any we have made are in the way of an increase to some extent.

In spite of all these pledges given by different members of the government at different times, the government say they have pledged the honour of Canada to press this measure through parliament without delay—no investigation into prices in Canada, no report on prices in the United States as compared with Canadian prices, no report on the cost of the production of agricultural products in the 12 other countries whose product under this agreement can come into direct competition with our own in our own home markets. On this account alone I contend that we on this side of the House are justified in opposing by every lawful means the passage of this reciprocity agreement. If the agreement is a good one, it should not be difficult to prove it by a tariff commission and by a full statement of the surrounding facts, and all these facts should be available not only to every member of this House, but to every elector of Canada.

As an example of how unreliable the information sent out by this government is, I would point out that according to Part II of the Canadian Trade Report for the year 1910, Canada imported from the United States last year $12,070,881 worth of dutiable wheat. Now, I would just like to ask the Minister of Customs if he believes that himself.

Mr. PATERSON. I believe the figures are correct but what did we do with it?

Mr. ARTHURS. It does not matter what we did with it. We paid the duty on it, otherwise it should not be in that column.

Mr. PATERSON. Does it say so? What is the amount of the duty paid on it?

Mr. ARTHURS. There is no amount of duty given. That just shows the unreliability of the whole report.

Mr. PATERSON. It came in bond, was held in bond, and went out. We had the carriage.

Mr. ARTHURS. Does the Minister mean to tell me that all the wheat that went through Canada in bond in 1910 was $12,000,000 worth?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. ARTHURS. Where is the rest of it credited in this report? The minister himself told this House a few weeks ago that 37,000,000 or 40,000,000 of American wheat was carried in bond through Canada last year. Why should that not appear in this report? This column says dutiable; it does not say in bond. The fact simply remains that these returns, or some of them, are absolutely unworthy of confidence or credence. We also had the Minister of Agriculture making the statement in the House that during the past 12 years Canada had exported to the United States $11,000,000 of potatoes more than she imported. On the same day the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith) asked how many potatoes were exported from Canada and imported into Canada during the same term, and the answer given by the Minister of Customs was that Canada had during those 12 years exported $253,000 worth more than she had imported. In other words, the Minister of Agriculture had stated the figures as exactly 44 times as great as the Minister of Customs did for the same period. I have here also some interesting figures which probably came from the Minister of Customs' Department. I have here an answer to a question asked by the hon. Senator Landry in the Senate on March 2 of the present year. He asked the number and the value of live stock imported by Canada from the United States during the last fiscal year. The answer given is this:

The number and value of live stock entered for consumption from the United States, together with the duty collected thereon, during the fiscal year 1910, was as follows: hogs, 2,760; value, $2,140; duty, $41.40.

That is an average value of 77c. per hog. During the same year the number of hogs exported from Canada to the United States was 205 at a value of $6,088, an average value of $29.70. The same thing applies to cattle; we imported cattle from the United States at an average value of $24.85, whereas we exported cattle at an average value of $59.40. Horses we imported at an average value of $60.80 and exported at an average value of $238. Sheep we imported at an average value of $3.67 and exported at an average value of $5.47. It is a very easy matter, with such figures as these, to make our exports look very large and our imports very small. If the Minister of Customs looks at these figures tomorrow, he will laugh at them himself. They were given by Sir Richard Cartwright in answer to the question of Senator Landry.

The Democratic party are about to succeed, in all probability, in the United States. They are pledged to lower the duties on goods entering the United States from foreign countries, Canada included, and I think it would have been absolutely wise and eminently fair to have waited until these men had reduced their duties to a fair level before we reduced ours or made any agreement with them. By so doing we would have avoided that trouble, which after all is a very serious one, of allowing goods of 13 or 14 other countries to enter Canada where we have no compensating advantage of any kind. Our tariff has been and at present is only about one half that of the United States, we collect less than one half of their average duty. We have been eminently fair in our dealings with them. I find that last year, 1910, according to our own Canadian Customs report which must be correct, we imported from the United States $118,834,173 worth of dutiable goods on which duties amounting to $29,515,836 were collected, an average of about 24.75 per cent. The free import from the United States amounted to $96,668,242 so that the total importations from the United States, dutiable and free, amounted to $217,- 502,415, with an average duty of 13.57 per cent.

During the same year we imported from Great Britain $71,822,941 worth of dutiable goods on which the duty amounted to $18,032,629 or 25.107 per cent. We also imported $73,513,846 worth of free goods from Great Britain making a total importation from Great Britain of $95,336,427 at an average duty of 18.194 per cent. Taking the dutiable articles alone we find that the duty was higher on goods coming from Great Britain, even with the preference, than on the goods coming from the United States by about 1 per cent, and if we take the total importations from the two countries, Great Britain and the United States, we find that the average duty from the United States was only 13.5 per cent while on goods from Great Britain it was 18.9 per cent or almost 7 per cent more than from the United States.

Viewing this matter from the standpoint of dollars and cents, from the ordinary commercial point of view, I wish to quote from the Congressional Record of the United States of Wednesday, April 5, 1911, and from the message of President Taft to the Congress of the United States. In this message to Congress, President Taft said:

> The agreement in its intent and in its terms was purely economic and commercial. While the general subject was under discussion by the commissioners, I felt assured that the sentiment of the people of the United States was such that they would welcome a measure which would result in the increase of trade on both sides of the boundary line, would open up the reserve productive resources of Canada to the great mass of our own consumers on advantageous conditions, and at the same time offer a broader outlet for the excess products of our farms and many of our industries.

Further on he said:

> I am constrained, in deference to popular sentiment and with a realizing sense of my duty to the great masses of our people whose welfare is involved, to urge upon your consideration early action on this agreement.

Mr. Champ Clark, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, at page 2624 of the American Congressional Record says:

> It is my judgment that we get the better of the proceedings in this treaty.

Further on he says:

> The intelligent farmers of America know that the agricultural products of Canada are inconsiderable when compared with the agricultural products of the United States; to use a common phrase they do not constitute a drop in the bucket. They also know that wages are as high in Canada in many lines as in America and higher in labour pertaining to the production of lumber; so they know too much to be scared by the overworked cry of 'pauper labour.'

At page 2930, Mr. McColl says:

> When I scan the commerce of Canada and the United States; when I see, for instance, that of butter the United States sends to Canada more than twice as much, notwithstanding the existing tariffs, as Canada sends to the United States; when I see that we send over fifteen times as many eggs to Canada as Canada sends to the United States; that we send nearly as much wheat to Canada, notwithstanding our great mills, as Canada sends to the United States, I can see no threat to the agricultural interests of this country. . . For a third of the year the price of wheat at Winnipeg is higher than the price of wheat on this side of the line.

I have one more extract I wish to place on 'Hansard'. This is a quotation from a speech made in this House in 1903 by Mr. John Charlton, the high priest of Free Trade, and the father of the reciprocity movement in Canada:

> Something must be done to change the trade conditions that exist between the United States and Canada. Free trade in natural products would afford a reasonable adjustment. Nothing short of this will do it, and this condition of free trade of natural products must be granted by the United States without a solitary concession from Canada further than it has already made. We can not afford any more.

This, I say, was the expression of probably the most prominent man in favour of free trade who ever sat in this House. An hon. friend near me says: 'And the fiscal brains of his party', and I think perhaps that is right. I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the United States is largely an agricultural country. They have twelve farmers to our one; they are selling their products in the same markets as our farmers sell theirs; they export almost along the same lines as we do; and, as a matter of fact they have had, during the recent years, an average sale of more agricultural products than Canada produces altogether, and I believe they are doing that at the present time. On the other hand, our exports to them of agricultural products have been very small. In the last fiscal year, 1910 our total sales of agricultural products were as follows:

Agricultural products..	90,413,747
Total from the farm..	$144,360,262

During the same period we exported to the United States of agricultural products only the following:

Animals and their products..	$10,629,614
Agricultural products..	8,204,250
Total..	$18,833,864

In other words, practically seven-eights of our agricultural exports went to Great Britain and only one-eight to the United States. On the other hand it must be born in mind that during the same term we imported from the United States, both according to their returns and to our own for the two do not differ materially, many more dollars worth of agricultural products than we sold to them, while from Great Britain we imported practically nothing in this line. During the years 1907, 1908 and 1909, the United States exported an average of $987,771,761 worth of farm products. They have a balance of trade in favour of their farmers of almost $500,000,000. To be exact, during the past year, the farmers of the United States had coming to them from foreign countries $431,231,941 in cash, that is, after deducting from their total exports of farm products their total imports in that line. During the same years the United States exported an average of $31,000,000 worth of farm products to Canada. As our exports to the United States in this line were $12,000,000 there was a balance of trade against the Canadian farmer of $19,000,000. I am quoting the figures of the reports of the United States Department of Agriculture. In order to be fair, instead of taking the figures for one year, I have taken the figures for three years and averaged them. From these reports I find the following:

Average exports of farm produce to Canada from United States, for the years 1907, 1908, 1909:

Cattle	$ 267,185
Fowl	36,800
Horses	2,507,000
Mules	129,000
*Sheep	187,000
Total live animals	$3,185,000

*Or 53,000 sheep.

Butter, $312,000; cheese, 707,000 lbs.; milk, $97,000; eggs, 923,000 dozen; honey, $16,000; hams, $423,561—3,365,888 lbs.; salt pork, $959,192—11,536,143 lbs.; lard, $1,156,978—11,880,929 lbs.; total packing house products, $4,364,946.

Apples, $172,095—53,801 barrels; wheat, 695,173 bushels; flour, $270,053; total grain products, $6,146,821.

Hay, $155,804; vegetables, $761,412; seeds, $1,101,033 (mostly timothy and clover); extract of bark for tanning, $191,350.

To put the matter in short form, according to their trade reports, which, I may say, do not differ in totals very materially from our own, we have imported from the United States of articles coming within this treaty almost two and a half times as much as we have exported to the United States. To show of how little importance the market of the United States is to us on the average I would call your attention to one item, the item of cheese.

During last year we exported $21,481,566 worth of cheese, or an average of about $3 worth per head for every man, woman and child in Canada. During the same year we exported to the United States $63,390 worth, or an average of a little less than three-quarters of a cent per head. At the same time we imported from the United States 707,000 pounds. The list of imports into Canada as given by the Canadian Trade and Commerce Report is very similar.

I will now give the figures taken from the Canadian report. The figures which I have quoted have been taken from American reports published by the Department of Agriculture of the United States. These are the figures as given by the Trade and SCommerce Report of the Dominion of Canada for the year 1910. We imported from the United States animals living to the value of $2,416,207 and during the same period we exported $2,307,125 worth. Our other imports from the United States were as follows:

Grain	$17,525,433
Flour	565,887
Fish	601,917
Hides	1,760,420
Provisions (butter, eggs & meat)	3,928,697
Seeds	1,039,021
Wood products	10,916,532

Or a total, including animals, of $38,764,114 imported into Canada from the United States during the last fiscal year. This does not include many other items which might properly be placed under the heading of agricultural products, such as vegetable oils or greases, or anything of that kind, which I have not taken into consideration in connection with this matter.

Another point to which I would like to call your attention is the fact that Canadian exports of farm products have been and are growing steadily less every year with the exception of cheese and wheat. If these two items are taken out of the list we find that Canadian exports have been growing less and that the home market has been increasing very rapidly during the last term of years. In the matter of butter we find that in 1906, four years ago, we exported 7,086,019 pounds of butter while at the present time we are exporting less than 1,000,000 pounds. Our exports of eggs have almost ceased, our exports of lamb and sheep are practically a thing of the past, and if it were not for the matter of wheat our exports of farm produce would look very small in the list of our total exports. To show that I am not the only one who entertains this opinion I would call to your attention a remark made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) on December 13 last. Speaking on cold storage he said:

One thing my hon. friend did not allude to was the poultry production. There is no question whatever that to-day there is a far greater production of eggs and poultry meat than there was ten years ago, and yet the prices of those things are much higher. Why? Because home consumption has increased more rapidly than home production, and the result is, that the home market for eggs and poultry meat is better than the export market; consequently, we have practically no export of eggs or poultry to Great Britain, and very little to the United States.

In the matter of eggs, the United States last fall exported between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 dozens and during the same term Canada imported or bought over a million dozens. Our exports of butter have been growing beautifully less and less every year while our imports have been growing very rapidly. In order to prove that I have only to point to the fact that during the first two months of the present year, January and February 1911, our imports of butter have amounted to over half a million dollars worth from foreign countries, while we find that the United States are exporting large quantities of both butter and eggs. The sheep industry is very much on a par with the butter industry. In the report of the American tariff commission we find the following:

While the sheep industry in Canada at the present time is a minor one, the feeding of lambs for market has been an important business in Ontario, as many as 125,000 head having been exported as late as 1907 to the United States and 33,000 the same year to Great Britain. The surplus is now dwindled, however, to such an extent that practically none was received at the Buffalo stockyards during 1910. In fact it is reported that a few American lambs have been shipped from Buffalo to Toronto, indicating that Ontario at the present time is scarcely supplying her own wants in this trade. This is, however, an abnormal condition.

That is according to their report, but we find, according to the daily papers of the day before yesterday, that on the Toronto market ten cents a pound was paid for lamb, live weight, while in Buffalo and Chicago the price was 5·65 and 7 cents a pound. We find that conditions are changing in that and in many other regards and that the Canadian home market is a very much better market for the Canadian farmer than the market of the United States. As to the horse market, I think it is almost unnecessary for me to go into that question because almost any man who knows anything about the conditions knows that the price of horses especially work horses, at the present time is much higher in Canada than in the United States under the same conditions. I will quote again from the same report as that to which I have just alluded:

As to horses, Canada has no surplus of importance outside of Ontario The agricultural development of the northwestern provinces has put prices of work stock and heavy draft teams at a premium in the territory tributary to Winnipeg. During the spring of 1910 it is stated on good authority that not less than 20,000 horses were sold out of Ontario alone for shipment to the market just mentioned, and prospective loss of this trade is giving Ontario some concern at this time. The five provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta combined have but 1,863,744 head as compared with 1,600,000 head now in the state of Iowa alone.

The same thing applies to milch cows and other cattle in the United States. I have here a tabulated statement sent down with the message of President Taft on reciprocity to the Senate, document 849, in which are given the average prices of cattle, dairy cows, horses, sheep and swine in each state of the American union and also in each province of Canada.

I will not weary the House by giving details, but it gives the average price of horses in the United States covering all States and Territories as $108.19, and the average price of horses in Canada, covering all the Canadian provinces as $133.00, a considerable difference in favour of the Canadian horse. Then, it gives the average prices of other animals as follows:

	Average price in United States.	Average price in Canada.
Dairy cows..	$35 79	$43 00
Other cattle	19 41	31 00
Sheep	4 08	6 00
Swine	9 14	11 00

It may be said that the Americans prepared these figures for the purpose of passing the Treaty in their own country, but I point out that they went thoroughly into the question, that they visited every part of Canada and the United States, that they knew the conditions on the ground, and that they had the monthly reports of their consular agents, while we on the Canadian side had absolutely no means of knowing just how the Treaty might work out or what the average price of any of these commodities was. I had intended to demonstrate the Canadian ignorance on the subject by quoting from reports issued by the Minister of Labour, but suffice it to say that when a Minister of the Crown would send out such absolutely foolish reports as to the price of commodities in different parts of Canada it is quite easy to see how absolutely devoid of reliable information the Canadian government was when they entered into this bargain. At page 109 of the American Report, Document 849, the following appears with reference to American horses:

Prices of horses range from $106 to $125 per head in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and New York. In Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and North Dakota the range is from $111 to $126, and in Montana, Idaho and Washington, from $80 to $108. In eastern Canada prices of horses range from $107 to $139 per head, while in western Canada the range is from $107 to $156. In the great agricultural states of Indiana, Illinois and Iowa prices range from $120 to $124. In all the Canadian provinces except Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and Nova Scotia, the prices are higher than in any of our states.

Prices of dairy cows range from $33 to $39 a head in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and New York. In Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and North Dakota the range is practically the same. In the western border states of Montana, Idaho and Washington the range is from $41.80 to $46.50. In eastern Canada prices of dairy cows range from $32 to $48 and in western Canada from $39 to $41. The highest Canadian price quoted is $48 in Ontario as against $46.50 in Montana, the highest American price.

A great deal has been said about the benefit to be derived by Canada if the United States duty on barley,—and in this connection I would like to read from the Report of the United States Ways and Means Committee:

In 1890, the barley crop of the United States aggregated 59,000,000 bushels, with the average farmer price of 40 cents per bushel, and of this total crop about 66 per cent was used for malting purposes. The crop of 1910 aggregated 162,000,000 bushels of barley, with an average farmer price of about 48 cents per bushel, and of the total crop only 39 per cent was used for malting purposes.

Where does the rest go? The American farmer does as the Canadian farmer wisely does; he feeds it and gets nearly a dollar a bushel for it in the form of pork or beef. At page 4563 of the Congressional Record, speaking of Canadian barley, Mr. E. J. Hill, of Connecticut, one of the representatives, says:

The hearing before the Ways and Means Committee developed the fact that because of its superior quality the barley of our own northwest had captured the markets of the Pacific coast and actually driven out the domestic product there to compete on equal terms with Canadian barley abroad, and in addition to that the northwest had last year shipped barley malt into Canada in excess of the entire amount of Canadian exports of barley.

In other words, according to the Report of the American Ways and Means Committee Canada actually last year imported more malt than was exported altogether of barley. In this connection, I quote a few figures taken at random from the Reciprocity Report of the United States Government which purports to give the price of barley for each year from 1900 to 1909 in Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Milwaukee and Minneapolis. In the year 1906 the average price in Cincinnati was 57 cents, in Chicago only 45 cents and in Milwaukee 53 cents. There is of course absolutely no duty between these different towns and as the freight rate would not amount to a difference of more than one or two cents a bushel the variation in price must be accounted for because of local conditions. At one period the price is higher in Chicago, at another it is higher in Cincinnati or Milwaukee or Minneapolis as the case may be, and that is accounted for by the fact that there was a local shortage of the grain on that particular day. However, we have in another report the average price of barley for the whole of the United States for the years from 1890 to 1910. Up to 1895, there was a duty of 30 cents a bushel on Canadian barley entering the United States and in 1895 that duty was reduced to 30 per cent ad valorem or an average of 12 cents per bushel, while in 1898 the duty was again increased to the old rate of 30 cents a bushel. Here is the average price of barley on December 1st in the various years named:

	Cents.
1891	54.4
1892	47.5
1893	41.1
1894	44.2
1895	33.7
1896	32.3

The point I want to make is simply this, that during the years that the duty on barley was 30 cents a bushel, the average price ruled at from 40 to 50 cents a bushel. Immediately that the duty was reduced from 8 to 12 cents a bushel, the price throughout the United States dropped correspondingly, and during the succeeding three years the average price was less than 35 cents a bushel. Immediately that the duty was restored by the United States to the old figure of 30 cents a bushel, the price went up again. This is the argument that we have urged on this side of the House right along. There is nothing in the contention that because the price of wheat or any other grain may at some time or other be higher in the United States, it is going to continue to be so. If the United States takes the duty off, and our wheat goes in free of duty, the extra wheat that we market there will simply be reduced to the lowest price they can buy for. We find that illustrated every day. The ruling price is the price wheat can be bought at Liverpool unless there is some local condition affecting the price for the time being.

Now, I would like to say a few words on the market of ninety million people, which is being held up to the Canadian farmer as the one great thing desirable for him, that will make him happy ever after. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, who has had this market of ninety million for the past ten years? Who has been supplying it? The American farmer; and yet we find that the American farmer is selling his goods for less than the Canadian farmer is getting for his, and his farm is not worth as much as that of the Canadian farmer, all other things being equal. We find that he has less for his labour. In the eastern states a great many going farms are abandoned—in the state of Vermont nine or ten per cent. Yet these men have had that market of ninety million absolutely for themselves, protected from encroachment by any other nation. And hon. gentlemen opposite purpose allowing these men to enter our small eight-million market, and at the same time allow the agriculturalists of the Argentine Republic, the butter makers of Denmark, the frozen mutton men of New Zealand, to come here on the same terms as the farmers of the United States, while we cannot enter their markets, because they have heavy duties against us, and our farmers must necessarily find some other market for the surplus goods which up to this time they have sold in their home market.

This leads up to what I consider to be the most important point on this whole question, that is, the question of interprovincial trade and whether or not it would be jeopardized by the binding of Canada to this agreement. It is very difficult to judge just how great our interprovincial trade is; but it has been computed by some of the best business men of Canada that it amounts to 40 or 50 times as much as our total foreign trade, and I think that is well within the mark. We sell large quantities of manufactured goods, fruits and vegetables in the northwest provinces, and buy grain and cattle from them; we buy fish, coal and other products from the maritime provinces, and in return send our products there. This trade is after all the most important thing for Canada. It does not matter much whether we sell our goods to the United States or to any other foreign country—the really important thing is the home market. The farmer of Parry Sound does not care what may be occurring in the country represented by the Minister of Customs; he has no reason to care whether the farmer of Brant is getting 35 cents or 27 cents a bushel for his oats so long as he himself is getting 50 cents a bushel. The home market is after all the most important thing to the farmer of Canada. It is the one thing he must look after, and we should take no steps that would tend in any way to jeopardize the trade between the different provinces in favour of trade between the United States and Canada; but if the contention of our friends opposite is true, this must necessarily occur. Any business man knows perfectly well that if the northwest farmer of Canada can get a cent a bushel more for his grain from the Americans, he is not going to refuse it; he would be a fool if he did. The result will simply be that the American railroad will haul that wheat, the American elevator will handle it, the American mill will grind it, and the American workman will benefit by it. To the extent that our trade goes that way there will be a certain loss of trade between Ontario or any of the eastern provinces and the west. In order to make the traffic profitable the railroads must have traffic both ways. They will naturally take a return cargo cheaper if they are taking grain to Minneapolis than they would from Port Arthur. This is true not only of our own grain trade, but of many other branches of our trade. With regard to the cattle trade, the conditions in the adjoining state of New York are entirely different from those in Ontario. The cattle trade of the United States to-day is almost entirely in the hands of the meat trust. If the tariff is removed, if we have free trade in cattle between Canada and the United States, I have no doubt that Canada would in a short time be under exactly the same conditions as the United States. If the farmer on the other side of Lake Ontario wishes to sell cattle he must go to Buffalo or New York, there is no home market, there is no such thing over there as the small butcher, the local butcher, who handles three-fourths of the cattle of Canada to-day. The local butcher there buys his meat dressed out of a refrigerator car, and if the farmer wants to sell cattle he must take them many miles from home and accept the going price.

I have already referred to the other countries that would come under this agreement without granting to Canada any compensating advantage. We find that Russia, Argentina, Austria-Hungary, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and most of the British colonies, including Australia and New Zealand, would enjoy all the benefits of this agreement, the free access of their agricultural products to the markets of Canada, and we could not send one dollar's worth to them without paying heavy duties. Speakers on the other side of the House make very light of this question, and say it does not amount to very much any way. I will quote some of the principal exports of these countries. Denmark, during the year ending December 31, 1909, shipped 196,639,220 pounds of butter of a value of $48,320,668. She shipped upwards of $31,000,000 worth of meat. Australia shipped over $15,000,000 worth of meat, and over $11,600,000 of butter. New Zealand shipped $18,000,000 worth of meat, $8,000,000 worth of butter, and $6,000,000 worth of cheese. Argentine shipped upwards of $40,000,000 worth of meat alone and about $1,500,000 worth of butter, and so on. This shows that these countries are actual shippers to the markets of the world. Then it costs just as little to send a pound of meat from Argentine to Halifax as to send it to Liverpool and meat can be delivered in Montreal about as cheaply as in Liverpool provided there is not an adverse duty. On the other hand we cannot ship to Argentine partly because we have no boat lines, no proper channels of communication and partly because we have to meet a heavy import duty. For instance if we wished to ship wheat to France we would have to pay $3.51 a hundred pounds duty, and on lambs 77 cents each. On wheat we have to pay 61.4 cents per hundred pounds, and on barley 26.3 cents a hundred pounds, on potatoes 3.5 cents a hundred pounds, and on butter 2.63 cents per hundred pounds. If we wish to ship to Italy we would have to pay on cattle an average duty of over $6 per head; on wheat 65.80 cents per hundred pounds. Shipping to New Zealand we would have to pay on wheat 18.2 cents per hundred pounds, on barley 48.6 cents per hundred pounds, on beans 18.2 cents per hundred pounds, on potatoes 21.7 cents per hundred pounds, on butter 20 per cent, on cheese 20 per cent, on eggs 20 per cent, on hay 20 per cent, and so on through a long list of duties which are charged by all these various countries upon Canadian imports, and would continue to be charged should this agreement go into force.

I wish to point out that the abrogation of the old reciprocity treaty of 1854-1856 was a blessing in disguise for Canada, although the Americans abrogated it with the intention of driving Canada into annexation or starvation according to their newspapers. It is true that during the term of that treaty Canada enjoyed a short period of prosperity, but I would point out that during the earlier years of its existence the Crimean war was at its height, and prices reached a level not reached since at any time. Shortly after the close of this war, the American war occurred beginning in 1861, and ending in 1865. In 1866, the year after the close of the war, American conditions having become normal, the treaty was abrogated by the United States, and Canada was told that she would be forced into annexation or starvation. It is quite true that Canada at that time was in pretty bad shape, but it was probably the best thing that ever happened to Canada as a whole, and I firmly believe that had it not been for the abrogation of the treaty in 1866 the federation of Canada would be still in the distant future. Canada was driven to fall back on her own resources. The men who were then at the head of affairs in Canada, some Conservatives and some Reformers, were forced to consult together, and to devise some means whereby we could trade with one another, benefiting one another instead of being scattered provinces as we were at that time. The building of the Intercolonial railway and the Canadian Pacific railway, the acquisition of the northwest territories by Canada are, I believe, directly attributable to the abrogation of that treaty, and our prosperity from that time to the present, has been through that means. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in building the various railways and canals. The cost to Canada as a whole has probably exceeded $600,000,000. We have, according to our Reform friends, spent many millions building up industries. They have now arrived at a stage where they are practically self-supporting, and yet we would apparently be willing to cast away all these advantages to go back to the condition of affairs which existed in 1886, and depend almost entirely, because that is what it amounts to in the end, on the market of the United States.

I believe that this treaty or agreement, if it does what is claimed for it by its friends, must inevitably lead to the loss of our commercial independence, and ultimately to annexation to the United States. The fact that some hon. gentlemen opposite are acting in good faith, and do not see any danger does not prove that that danger does not exist. The man who rocks the boat never sees any danger, and the gun that is not loaded is always the most dangerous. I believe that we should look into this matter more thoroughly, that we should have more time, and that the whole thing should be placed in the hands of an independent commission, a commission of business men, who would discuss it thoroughly among themselves, and bring before parliament a finding which, I believe, would be acceptable to the people of Canada.

I believe it would be wise to postpone this treaty until the Americans have formally settled their tariff matters and until the people of Canada have had an opportunity to thoroughly digest the proposal. As far as I am personally concerned, as I said in the first place, I believe we have no mandate from the people to pass a matter of this kind or to accept such a treaty as is proposed. I believe that in all these great changes the people should be consulted before anything is done. I am prepared to vote against the resolution and to do anything that lies in my power to defeat it until the people have been consulted. If the people say they are prepared to stand behind the agreement my opposition must necessarily cease, and will cease. But I believe that the true solution of the whole question would be an independent commission. We have got along for fifteen or twenty years very well without reciprocity, and I think we can get along for fifteen or twenty years more without it just as well. I believe the people should have a true statement of the facts. Let the whole matter be laid before the people; let them have an opportunity to form an independent judgment, and they will come to a wise and independent decision. And I believe their verdict will be that the best course is to allow Canada to go on as in the past and to work out her destiny as part of the British empire with independent control of her own affairs.

An hon. MEMBER. Go on.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). 'Go on,' says an hon. gentleman on the other side who has nothing to contribute to the debate except such a bald remark. While I have something to say on this subject, yet, as I have been travelling for six days to reach Ottawa and arrived here only at five o'clock this morning, I do not think it reasonable to ask me to begin an address to the House at twenty minutes to eleven. Therefore, I ask that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sure that my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Taylor) will not find it extraordinary if we cannot agree to this motion. After a delay of two months we ought surely to proceed with the business of the session.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). If I am forced to proceed, of course, I will proceed, but I think this demand upon me will be recognized by the people I represent as a most extraordinary one. I would call the attention of the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson)—who seems to regard this as a joke, but I can assure him that the people I represent do not at all regard as a joke the change he proposes to inflict upon us—to the fact that the Minister from Victoria, British Columbia (Mr. Templeman) is not present, and it seems to me he should be present while the interests of his province are under discussion. The only other member from British Columbia on the government side of the House who has taken part in this discussion is not present. And I think it is unfair to him and to us to ask us to discuss here the statements he has made while he is not here to take his part in the discussion. But, meanwhile there are some subjects which can be laid before the House at the present time with which these hon. gentlemen are not very immediately concerned, but to which it would seem to be advantageous for them to give attention. I have a very valuable text here which should afford food for thought on the part of every member of this House. It is in the shape of a pamphlet prepared by the Canadian National League and going very fully into this subject. A good many members of the House, no doubt, are familiar with the origin of this Canadian National League and with the literature which it has put out. Hon. members will recall that when this matter of reciprocity was sprung upon the country no persons were more shocked at the attitude of the government and what was generally regarded as the folly of our ambassadors extraordinary to Washington than were some of the men who, up to that time, had been in the front ranks of the Liberal party in Canada. We found this feeling taking shape in Toronto in a manifesto signed by no less than eighteen leaders of the Liberal party at that important centre, eighteen prominent members of the Liberal party who thought it worth while to declare to the public that this action on the part of the government had finished them with the Liberal party, that they could no longer assist in perpetuating the reign of a government that had proved so false to every principle which it would have led its supporters to believe it professed, that had proven recreant to its duty to the people and that had so shamelessly, I may say, betrayed the trust conferred upon it. So, we have these eighteen Liberals promoting the formation of the Canadian National League and taking part in the dissemination of literature to show the people of Canada precisely what this arrangement means to us. The object of the league is stated in their prospectus:

> To oppose the adoption of the proposed Reciprocity Agreement between Canada and the United States of America and to support such measures as will uphold Canadian nationality and British connection, will preserve our fiscal independence and will continue to develop our present national policy of interprovincial and external trade, under which the Dominion has achieved its present prosperity.

The basis on which the league has been formed is: Canadian nationality, British connection and fiscal independence.

Three objects which I am sure must commend themselves to every man in this House, objects worthy of the position which these gentlemen have occupied up to the present in the ranks of the Liberal party of Canada. The league declares that it is non-partizan in character, that it is opposed to the Laurier government because it believes that in negotiating this agreement with the United States and in endeavouring to have it adopted by parliament, the government is not upholding Canadian nationality and British connection, and is not preserving our fiscal independence. They would be opposed to any government, whether Liberal or Conservative for the same reason, and so I am convinced will the great majority of the electors of Canada oppose any government, whether Liberal or Conservative, which proposes to surrender to the United States our fiscal independence. While opposed to this agreement for the reasons stated, they are opposed to it on patriotic grounds also, because they say:

We believe that our government failed to appreciate properly the present position and condition of Canada, contrasted with its position and condition when reciprocity would have been welcomed, and that it lost sight of the fact that the principles underlying its own policy for years past are utterly inconsistent with the principles underlying this agreement.

In the present pamphlets, and in those to follow, nothing will be said intentionally to wound the feelings of any one, and no offensive personal allusions will be made. The subject is above party and persons, and will be so kept and treated.

Of this fact we have seen tonight the most convincing evidence read by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Arthurs), evidence which fully justifies the position taken by the league.

The opposition will be kept up until the people have pronounced upon the question.

Until we have the opportunity we desire of going to the polls, and putting before the people of Canada the question whether they wish for a reciprocal arrangement of this kind, or whether they are content to be bludgeoned by any government in continuing this debate with the idea of forcing this House to consent to something which they would never consent to willingly. This league takes as its first text the significant statement of the President of the United States that Canada is at the parting of the ways, and it submits evidence to show that this statement is unfortunately only too true. As this pamphlet says:

Shall we continue along the path which has led us to our present prosperity and to our proud position as the keystone in the arch of a united British Empire; or, shall we take the path that leads to Washington?

Facts which indicates the answer which should be made to this question are set forth in this pamphlet.

When the Hon. Mr. Fielding announced to parliament the reciprocity agreement he alleged, as the chief reason for making it, that ever since confederation Canada has been committed to the policy embodied in the agreement, and earnestly desires it at the present time, that the Conservative party, as well as the Liberal party, was committed to it. He did not attempt, by facts and figures, to prove that upon economic grounds it would be beneficial to Canada; he assumed that it would be so.

Now Mr. Chairman, I would like to call your attention to the fact that not only is the statement true made by these protesting Liberals that the hon. gentlemen who arranged this agreement have presented to the house no satisfactory reasons why we should adopt it, but that their failure to do so has been accentuated by the extraordinary course of their followers in parliament who are content to sit still and swallow this, as they have swallowed every other nauseous dose presented to them while they have occupied their present benches.

An examination of the pages of history shows the damaging effect of this arrangement. It is recalled to us how reciprocity damaged the St. Lawrence exports .

From 1854 to 1866 a reciprocity treaty existed between the old province of Canada and the United States of America. This province at that time comprised only Upper Canada and Lower Canada (now Ontario and Quebec). Confederation did not take place till July 1st, 1867.

When this treaty was made the province of Canada had a population of approximately 2,100,000; when the treaty was abrogated it had increased to about 2,650,000. Settlement had extended but a few miles, comparatively, north of the United States boundary in either Upper Canada or Lower Canada. The Grand Trunk railway from Toronto to Montreal was the only railway connecting the two provinces. The Great Western railway from Niagara to Windsor (now part of the Grand Trunk) was the only railway running through Ontario's western peninsula. There were no large factories, and but a small home market, while the population of the United States in 1854 was 26,500,000, and in 1866 it was 36,000,000. Communication across the Atlantic was meagre and expensive.

Showing that under the former reciprocity arrangement the population of the United States made the extraordinary increase, notwithstanding the disturbance of the war of secession, in four years, from 26 millions to 36 millions; while Canada, which, we are told, should benefit so much by reciprocity, made the insignificant increase of from 2,100,000 to 2,600,000. Now Mr. Chairman, I would like once more to call attention to the fact that the minister representing British Columbia in this government is not in his place. I protest that it is unfair for the government to force the members from British Columbia to continue this debate when the minister representing that province feels himself physically unfit to occupy his place in the chamber. I say that in a matter of this kind there should not be one rule for a minister and one rule for a private member, that it is a rank injustice to me that after a six days' trip on the train I should be asked to speak now while the minister from my province, the man who, with his colleagues, proposes to saddle this burden upon us, is reposing in his bed. I would ask the government again whether they cannot produce here the body of the Minister of Inland Revenue or else consent to adjourn. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the first minister or any of his colleagues to say whether they do not think it is a reasonable request that when a matter of this kind is being discussed of such great interest to our province the minister from that province should at least be present.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Go on.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The First Minister says 'go on'. That is the only answer he will make. I may say that the service rendered by the minister from the province of British Columbia at the present moment is probably equal to the service that he usually renders to that province and his colleagues have made it apparent that in a matter of this kind his value to the province is regarded as a mere nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Now, to resume, if any of those hon. gentlemen who are making those remarks on the other side of the House wish to get on the floor for a while I will have much pleasure in yielding it to them. If they have not the courage to stand up and occupy the floor I would ask that they observe the rules of the House and not make what they intend to be disconcerting remarks disturbing to the trend of thought that I am applying to this discussion. We are led to believe from a study of the results of the reciprocity arrangement of 1854-66 that its effect upon the east and west traffic was a warning which should be a lesson to us. Here are some of the results. The House will pardon me if I spend some time in reading because it is impossible for a man to carry in his head the number of valuable figures which I propose to present during the course of my argument:

Following the treaty, business in and out of the port of Montreal declined.

I would commend that to the consideration of those hon. gentlemen now representing the city of Montreal, who, without giving any reason at all for the faith that is in them, propose voting for this agreement for no other reason than that it is presented to them by the government which is their master.

The carrying trade of the St. Lawrence in 1854 was valued at $33,633,128. In the next year it dropped to $15,208,600.

That is it had shrunk to less than fifty per cent of what it had been before.

The ships' tonnage going to the sea from Montreal and Quebec decreased from 1,487,097 to 870,794 tons, and the value of the exports from $42,000,000 to $28,000,000. On Canadian canals in the first year of the treaty the tolls fell off by 32 per cent.

An examination shows that there was an advance in the price of farm products.

This advance we have often heard of during the course of this discussion, but it was not entirely, or even to a large extent, due to this treaty with the United States:

The Crimean war . . . began in 1854 and continued during 1855 and 1856, and the price of food stuffs in Europe increased rapidly and persistently—wheat in England went up to $2.50 per bushel. When peace was made, prices fell, until the Civil War in the United States broke out. From 1860 to 1865, because of this war, farming in the United States was considerably curtailed, and the market for Canadian products was correspondingly enlarged.

This in a large measure, if not entirely, accounts for what increase did take place in the prices of Canadian commodities during that period. But no sooner was the war over than a demand arose in the United States for the abrogation of the treaty which some farmers, through jealousy, thought was conferring some benefit upon their Canadian neighbours. This demand was not only from the farmers, but, as on the present occasion, trade relations with Canada were made a foot-ball by the politicians of the United States who entered upon a political cry for the termination of the arrangement, so that by pursuing Canada with a hostile tariff policy they might drive her into closer political relations with them if not indeed into annexation.

In 1866 the United States put up the tariff wall again, and the Canadian farmer was worse off than ever.

The existence of the reciprocity treaty had disarranged the channels of trade just as the adoption of the arrangement or pact now before the House would disarrange all our avenues of trade. Having ceased to look to the British market in the endeavour to cultivate that of their nearer neighbour, Canadian producers had come to rely almost entirely on the United States market. They were sending everything they could across the boundary and impoverishing their land and capital. They received many warnings that they might be shut out of the market which they were told was to be for them a continuous and continuing blessing. Many of them thought that they were ruined for life and a decided leaning towards annexation arose in many minds. This is the record from history. It is not the vain prophecy of any person attempting to frighten his fellow citizens into opposing something which otherwise they might be inclined to try. But we have the lesson from history that many Canadians were so fearful of the consequences of the abrogation of this treaty that a decided leaning towards annexation with the United States arose in many minds. When we draw this lesson from history it cannot be said that we are reflecting in any sense upon the Canadians of that day. It is not regarded as a reflection upon a Canadian or a British subject from the old country, that when he goes to the United States and takes up his residence there, he shortly after takes the oath of allegiance to the American Republic and forswears his allegiance to the British Empire.

That is done by the most loyal of British subjects as a measure of self-protection. Having gone to the United States to make their living there, it would be unfair to themselves, it would be unfair to their families, to persist for a sentimental reason in remaining apart from the people amongst whom they made their living. As with these individuals so it may well be with the Dominion or with a province of Canada. Thus if by an alliance of this kind with the United States we hopelessly commit our trade arrangements to their hands, the time may come when they will be in a position to put such pressure on us that it may become an issue with us as a nation whether we shall do what so many citizens, quite our equals in loyalty to the British Empire, are forced to do as individuals. I commend that to the consideration of these gentlemen, who, when they say anything at all upon this subject, are fond of sneering at what they call the waving of the old flag and professions of lip-loyalty. I ask them whether they see any reason why we as a community should not be proof against what our equals, who have gone to the United States from England, instead of coming first to Canada, have been unable to resist as individuals. I for one do not wish to take the risk; I do not wish to defy the lightning, but while I have a chance I would prefer to take precautions against being struck.

The abrogation of the treaty was a blessing in disguise. It stopped the fatal drain of fertility from the soil. At the very time the movement for confederation was fructifying, it turned the Canadian people once more to the British market, which had grown enormously through the expansion of trade in manufactured goods all over the world.

We were referred early in this discussion to the lectures delivered under the auspices of the Minister of Agriculture—who, also I regret to say is not in the House—in which the people of the Province of Quebec were warned that it was the most disastrous kind of farming to export hay, instead of raising cattle and enriching the land. Up to the time the minister had started this crusade the farmers of Quebec had been exporting to the United States this hay which they should have fed to the cattle on their own farms. A similar state of affairs existed during the continuance of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 and we are told that the abrogation of the Treaty stopped the fatal drain of fertility from the soil.

And now, as a parting gift to the province which has kept them in power this government proposes to facilitate the export of hay. I ask them if they have no higher regard for the interest of that province than to attempt to prolong their term in office by a catch-cry such as reciprocity, upon which they hope to be judged in a rush by the people, to the exclusion of all the sins which otherwise would have been arrayed against them, and as to which they fear condemnation from their fellow-citizens in Quebec as well as their fellow-citizens in the other provinces. The Prime Minister laughs.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The Prime Minister has no fear of the consequences. He has adopted the motto of his distinguished predecessor who said 'After me the deluge.' The Prime Minister laughs, and provided he can persuade his people to give him another term in office it is a matter of indifference to him how many years of repentance will follow their sad experience.

In 1867 confederation came, and with it the hope which had previously been confined to a few ardent patriots—that Canada would become a nation within a nation, and would work out her destiny as such—spread to the mass of our people; and there and then began one of the most courageous and difficult and patriotic enterprises which has ever been witnessed, viz.: the building up upon half a continent, by a handful of people, of a great Dominion, and the overcoming of enormous natural difficulties and disadvantages.

Consider, for a moment, the difficulties to be overcome. The British North America Act, Canada's constitution, first united Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and provided for the union of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia and the vast territories between British Columbia and Hudson bay and extending from the United States boundary to the Arctic ocean. Canada's task was to weld all these into one Dominion and to provide for its government, and to preserve its autonomy and British connection.

The first part of the task has been accomplished. The great territories referred to were added, and the province of Manitoba was formed on the 15th of July, 1870. British Columbia came in on the 20th of July, 1871, and Prince Edward Island on the 1st of July, 1873. This first part was comparatively easy.

These were the days when there began to arise in Canada the feeling that we should renew our relationship with the United States our only near neighbours, and that it might be more profitable to us, than to attempt to establish connection with the scattered provinces of Canada across the great gaps then existing. While the people of Nova Scotia for instance, the province represented by the hon. gentleman responsible for this pact, were still lamenting to a large degree their union with Canada—and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) was doing anything at all at that time no doubt he was helping to voice the plaint of their union with Canada and to satisfy them then as he would satisfy them now that it was more to their profit to trade with the United States than to trade with their sister provinces in the newly formed Dominion. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) will excuse me for saying so, it is one of the most sinister features in connection with it, and tends to induce the people of Canada to regard it with suspicion, to regard it as recommended to them, not by one who has at heart the welfare of Canada, but one, who hopelessly biassed as to the impossibility of a happy union of his province with the rest of Canada, would like to round off his career by showing that he has been right all his life, and that those of us having more hope, greater courage, greater confidence in our ability as Canadians to make all the provinces benefit from the union, have been wrong in our contention of all these years, that we are happier as a united people trading east and west, than we would have been had we followed the advice of the Minister of Finance and his friends in Nova Scotia, and had cut adrift from Canada and continued to trade as before on the best terms his province could arrange with the United States.

The House will pardon me, I hope, if I do not speak with utmost fluency on this occasion, because, while I hope to proceed for a very long time yet on this very interesting subject, as I would be loath to drop it without doing justice to it, yet it is not conducive to eloquence of ideas or fluency of diction to speak after travelling across the continent—to be called upon to speak up to midnight or afterwards on the very day one has accomplished this journey of 3,000 miles.

I was referring to how nature has favoured trade between the north and the south, and how the fathers of confederation, of whom there are none in this House, had attempted to introduce the east and west principle. While we have never heard much in support of that principle from the hon. Minister of Finance, the right hon. the First Minister has taken a much larger view of the country in which he has risen, and deservedly risen, to so high an eminence, and has at times striven to do the very opposite of what this legislation of his would perform; he has striven to the best of his abilities to develop the east and west principle in Canadian trade. What Canada has accomplished in this direction so far has been accomplished because reciprocity with the United States has not existed Canada could not have accomplished this had reciprocity been in force. The lessons of history enable us to speak with certainty as to the past, while we can only predict the future. This prediction, however, voiced by the best people in Canada after the most careful consideration, is that the result of the proposed reciprocity agreement will be to check the growth and development of the east and west trade, and the trade between Canada and Great Britain, to weaken our British connection, and to render our task of consolidating the scattered provinces of the dominion and preserving our fiscal independence and autonomy, much more difficult. I would like to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to a statement made by their late colleagues, the 18 prominent Liberals who signed the manifesto to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks. These gentlemen are not Tory politicians aching for office; they are not waving the old flag or shouting loyalty because of any affection for the Tory party or because of any desire to put any other party out of power in Canada. They must be credited with speaking the sentiments of their hearts, as representing the best thought in the Liberal party, the thought that we confidently hope to see indicated when the people get a chance to pronounce on this subject. These gentlemen, speaking in advance of their fellow Liberals who have not yet been heard, said:

> We believe that this reciprocity arrangement will eventually result in our losing our autonomy and in becoming politically a part of the American Union. We are aware that opinions honestly differ on the points; but we ask, why take the risk?

A pertinent question, Mr. Chairman: why take the risk? I am very sorry that our minister from British Columbia is so little interested in this subject that he is not present, that if a messenger was sent for him, he has not been able to get him away from his couch; because I would like to recall to him in this connection what occurred in my own little city only a couple of weeks ago. The pertinent question asked in this pamphlet reminds me of it. Our minister was spellbinding in British Columbia, and the gentlemen on the other side who have been so often thrilled with his eloquence in this House will realize with what tremors we witnessed his approach on our several constituencies. However, we could not control his movements, as we cannot control them now. He was accompanied by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clarke), to whom the unfortunate fact that he is still engaged in his patriotic mission and is also absent from his place in this House. The hon. minister was a little unequal to the task set before him in the riding of New Westminster. The First Minister I know admires that riding, because we gave him a great welcome there last year, and he was pleased to speak with his customary eloquence in the kindest and most flattering terms of the progress he had observed in New Westminster. I am sure he had a high opinion of the intelligence of the people of that district, except that he might regard it as a blot on their intelligence that they made the unfortunate choice of their representative at the last election; so he will realize that there was not much encouragement for these two federal spellbinders without drawing in the unwilling services of the deposed leader of the Liberals in British Columbia, the gentleman who for so many years represented the district in the legislature and who, no doubt, would at the present moment be a candidate for election to this House were it not that he recognizes that this arrangement makes the prospect of the election of any Liberal there altogether hopeless.

This gentleman, Mr. John Oliver, a farmer, possibly the best informed man in the whole district as to conditions in the district was brought forward to give the best comfort he could to the two spell binders from Ottawa and the best he could say for them was this, that he was losing no sleep because of the issue of reciprocity. It was a matter of indifference to him, the chief witness they could produce from the district, whether or not this reciprocity campaign succeeded, because, he said, we are too prosperous to be affected by it. He said the farmers of this district were never in their history so prosperous, so happy and so contented as they are to-day, and supplementing what he said, I ask with these pamphleteers, why take the risk? That question can produce only one answer from the farmers of the district of New Westminster, from the farmers throughout the length and breadth of British Columbia who see the livelihood of themselves and their families menaced by the proposition, that they shall be delivered over to their comparatively poverty-stricken neighbours across the American boundary. Why take the risk? and echo answers, why? There is no other answer in this House or out of it, except that in a moment of panic the Finance Minister of Canada promised President Taft that if President Taft would forbear imposing the American surtax on Canadian products he would go down representing this government and make the surrender in which we are now asked to assist.

Reviewing the history of the position of affairs we find that the British North America Act, by section 145, declared that the Intercolonial railway was essential to the consolidation of the union of British North America. This principle of east and west transportation ran through the agreement with British Columbia for it was made an essential part of the union that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built. And here it is opportune to say that British Columbia had, before the time of her union with Canada, ample experience of free trade with the United States to settle her in advance in opposition to the arrangement now before us. These pioneers of British Columbia who know by their own experience or by what they have heard from their fathers of the results up to 1871 need no other argument than the lesson of their own history for their present opposition and hostility to this arrangement. We had at that time in British Columbia a system of free ports, the idea being that if we could produce the wares of the world free of duty at the ports of Victoria and Nanaimo these ports would develop into great trade centres and would become very great entrepots of commerce. In a way that worked well but it was soon realized that since everything grown in the United States would come into these two thriving Canadian settlements and that nothing grown on Vancouver Island, then the centre of population of British Columbia, could be admitted to the United States, the whole settlement was drawn over to the American side, and after the Island had become depopulated as a result of the experiment, the people decided that they would depart from their position of isolation from the rest of Canada, that they would invite Canada to make terms of union with them, that they would cease their efforts to trade north and south as this government now invites them to do again, and would begin to develop trade east and west with their fellow-Britishers in the Dominion of Canada. So there came about the union of British Columbia with the rest of Canada. I referred to the help given by the First Minister for a long time in developing this east and west trade. I am reminded that this principle more strongly than ever before, actuated the Laurier government when they committed this parliament and this country to the gigantic task of building the Grand Trunk Pacific and National Transcontinental railway. Upon that occasion Sir Wilfrid said to the House of Commons:

> A railway to extend from the shores of the Atlantic ocean to the shores of the Pacific ocean, and to be, every inch of it, on Canadian soil, is a national as well as a commercial necessity. That such a road must be built, that it is, in the language which I have used, a national and commercial necessity, that it is a corollary of our status as a nation, that it is a requisite of our commercial development is a proposition to which, up to this moment, I have heard no dissent. . . .
> We consider that it is the duty of all those who sit within these walls by the will of the people, to provide immediate means whereby the products of those new settlers may find an exit to the ocean at the least possible cost, and whereby, likewise, a market may be found in this new region for those who toil in the forests, in the fields, in the mines, in the shops of the older provinces. Such is our duty; it is immediate and imperative. It is not for to-morrow, but of this day, of this hour and of this minute.

Let me interrupt the reading of the right hon. gentleman's eloquent words to point out that while we were warned of the momentous necessity of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, while it was not for to-morrow, but of this day and of this hour and of this minute, a pressing and imperative duty on the community, in which we could brook no delay in the construction of this road, and the investment of $200,000,000 in its construction, up to this time the road has failed to accomplish its purpose in any degree, it is not yet finished and the construction of the British Columbia portion of it has barely commenced. It therefore seems to me a most extraordinary thing that, having committed us to an expense of $200,000,000 in order to promote the patriotic principle of trade between east and west, the right hon. gentleman should be found apparently forgetting the principles which animated him at that time, and asking us to forget that it is our patriotic duty to encourage trade between east and west; inviting us to send our trade south to Washington, Oregon and California and to draw north from those states the trade which we would so willingly draw from Saskatchewan and Alberta into British Columbia. However, I have been digressing. I trust, Mr Chairman, that you and the Committee will pardon the digression and will not take it amiss that this interruption has taken place in reading the eloquent remarks of the right honorable the first minister. The right hon. gentleman invoked Divine assistance:

> Heaven grant that it be not already too late; heaven grant that whilst we tarry and dispute, the trade of Canada is not deviated to other channels, and that an ever vigilant competitor does not take to himself the trade that properly belongs to those who acknowledge Canada as their native or their adopted land.

Was the right hon. gentleman mistaken when he assumed, as he then did assume, that he was a favourite of Providence, that Heaven had granted his prayer even before it was uttered, and that his influence had been such that this calamity had been averted? What are we to think of the pressure which must have been put upon the right hon. gentleman by his colleagues returning from Washington when he was induced to adopt the proposition they brought, notwithstanding the record that he had addressed the House in this language, that he had warned us against the folly of doing that very thing to which they say they have committed what they call the honour of Canada. But I say the honour of Canada is not so committed. When two ministers so far forget the duties they owe to Canada, and the responsibility of their office, as to take upon themselves to abandon the principles of their party, to betray their leader, to offer to a foreign and dangerous competitor freedom in our markets which we cannot enjoy in theirs, —I say that when two ministers make a promise of that kind they do not pledge the honour of their country. And I am astonished that a man so astute as the Prime Minister did not do what he had the courage to do in other cases when his colleagues made mistakes—tell them that their connection with the government must forthwith cease. I have been looking at the right hon. gentleman in the hope that he might commit himself, if no more than by an involuntary nod of approval. I am sorry to say I have not seen it, but I am quite sure that in his heart he does feel that that course would have been the course of wisdom and that if he had adopted that course it would not have been necessary for him to adopt, as we are told by the chief party organ he has had to adopt as his rallying cry for the next campaign, a motto which, perhaps is misconstrued in the 'Globe' and which it seems to me might be more fittingly put, 'follow where the white feather leads.' Some hon. gentlemen asked me what it says. I wish I had the 'Globe' here; it puts it more precisely and significantly than I can remember it. But it says we are likely to have in the ensuing election as a substitute for the rallying cry 'Let Laurier finish his work' the motto 'Follow where the white plume leads.' Everybody knows that a plume is a feather. I think it would be proper therefore to say 'follow where the white feather leads.' For, if ever there was a white feather brigade in Canadian politics we have it in these men who have no argument except political force to advance against the reasons laid before the House by hon. members on this side. Now, I am happier than I was, because I have brought a smile to the countenance of the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman was not the only one who wished to build up Canada from east to west at the time of the proposal of the Transcontinental Railway. He had sufficient force to draw with him one who must have been in his heart an unwilling colleague. A significant heading in the pamphlet to which I have referred reads, 'Mr. Fielding for another transcontinental.' It says that Mr. Fielding was equally emphatic as the Prime Minister in his declaration of the prinicple that our trade must be built up from east to west. Hon. members who are familiar with the history of the Finance Minister will realize what an effort it must have been on his part and will realize also what pressure must have been brought upon him by circumstances and his right hon. leader. Perhaps it was upon the principle of tit for tat that he was able on this next occasion to lead his leader. I do not expect however, to learn the mysteries of that Council chamber where, as one of the right hon. Prime Minister's distinguished colleagues once remarked they continue to 'fight like blazes.'

I am glad that there is a fairly good congregation present of hon. gentlemen opposite—even though the minister from British Columbia is not among them—and would call their special attention to these remarks of the Minister of Finance, and would ask them to realize what they mean. He says:

It is desirable that we should give our American brethren to understand that Canada is resolved to work out her independence in these things, that the present proposal will promote this object, and that even if still another railway should be necessary we shall be prepared to construct it.

Now, if I may be permitted to destroy the continuity of this splendid confession of new faith on the part of the Finance Minister, I would like to remind him that his first railway has not yet been finished. It is true that he has consented to the construction of a second railway to foster the underlying principle of trade between the east and the west. But while he has placed on this country so huge a burden to promote trade between the east and the west, he comes to this House, forgetting, or ignoring, or not deigning to explain, why the conditions of six or seven years ago are so different from the conditions of today, and tells us that these railways are a mistake, that what we want is not railways between the east and the west, but a new chain of railways to carry the trade of Canada north and south, away from its natural channels, for the benefit of our grasping neighbours in the United States. I will read the rest of that confession of new faith of the Finance Minister:

The attitude that the government has taken upon the subject has already attracted much attention across the border, and there is much keener appreciation of Canada's independence than ever before.

I wonder who told him that. I wonder if he had a private communication from President Taft which inspired him to use this language. I wonder if, since he realized the keenness of the American appreciation of Canadian progress without American assistance, it would not have been logical for him to think that it would be a good idea for Canada to proceed on the course which, according to his own statement, had aroused the admiration of our neighbours to the south. I wonder if it did not show a lack of perspicacity on his part that he did not resist the appeal from Washington to walk into the spiders web which the shrewder politicians of the United States had set for him. Now, to show that these gentlemen were in earnest at the time of the projection of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, I would refer to the steps which they took to ensure that the views they laid before the House might be carried out. In the agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway there is this provision in section 42:

It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the transportation of goods through Canadian channels.

'Of encouraging the transportation of goods through Canadian channels.'

The company accepts the aid on these conditions, and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for points in Canada, be carried entirely on Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to the Canadian ocean ports.

This, Mr. Chairman, shows an intention, at least, to make an arrangement with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company that would secure for Canada the maximum benefit from the construction of that railway, but what are the conditions now? As is recognized everywhere, the main trade to be carried over the Grand Trunk Pacific is the grain trade of the Northwest. Eliminate that and you have no justification, either for the Grand Trunk Pacific or for the succeeding railway indicated by the Finance Minister at that time, and since realized by the bonusing of the Canadian Northern. Now what becomes of all these arguments with respect to the necessity of this railway to carry this grain east and west, to export it by our Pacific ports on one hand, and by Fort William and Port Arthur on the other? The hon. gentlemen now propose the diversion of that traffic from our own heavily bonused railways to the ports of the United States. I would like the House to consider another aspect of this arrangement in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. As they well know, there is a very general suspicion that if there were any possibility of doing it the whole burden of the Grand Trunk Pacific would be shifted to the shoulders of the Canadian people by the philanthropic gentlemen who have projected it for the benefit of the nation. Now if ever there was a provocation to them to raise any quibble as to their payments promised to Canada, that provocation is supplied by the action of the government, taken even before the completion of the road, tending to destroy all the trade which it was intended should earn for the road the money to pay its obligations to Canada.

It seems to me that this is a subject as to which these ministers should deign to say something to the House, for surely this phase of the case impressed itself upon the cabinet when it was considering this arrangement with the United States even though, as we have been told, it was put through, for better or for worse, in about the time that it takes to perform a marriage ceremony. It would seem that they should have thought of the momentous effect this diversion of trade would have upon their agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, that they should have realized that it would of a certainty have the effect of saddling upon Canada not only the enormous burden which we have assumed in that connection, but the whole burden of the enterprise. That is a subject which might very well be discussed for a day by itself, as to which I feel wholly unequal at this late hour when the hands of the clock stand at midnight. However, no doubt, before this debate finishes, we will hear from some hon. gentleman on the ministerial benches their views of this aspect of the case, their statement as to the liability, if any, which they expect to have to assume towards the Grand Trunk Railway Company because of the breach of contract and of faith involved in diverting the trade from that road.

Now, as I said at the outset, there are matters connected with this arrangement affecting the province of British Columbia which I have not touched upon so far, and which I do not desire to touch upon until the minister from that province is in his place in the House. Unless my failure to come up to the standard of parliamentary oratory under the painful circumstances surrounding my speaking to-night has so annoyed hon. members that they do not wish to hear a continuance of my argument, and therefore wish them wound up before the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue awakes from his slumber and returns to his place. I would suggest to the right hon. leader of the House now that as I most earnestly desire to address myself to the minister from British Columbia when he is here, it being now midnight, it is an opportune time to move that the committee rise, and therefore, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would renew my motion that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 12 o'clock, midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WEDNESDAY, July 19, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORTS PRESENTED

Summary Report of the Geological Survey; also Report of the Chief Astronomer.—Hon. Wm. Templeman.

List of Vessels registered in the Dominion of Canada.—Hon. L. P. Brodeur.

QUESTIONS.

THE STEEL COMPANY OF CANADA.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. When was the Steel Company of Canada incorporated by letters patent?
2. What was the amount of capital stock of said company?
3. What amount of bonds have been issued, and what is the amount of preference stock and common stock respectively?
4. What were the names of the companies and their places of business which were combined together under the name of the Steel Company of Canada, and what was the value of each of the companies that went into the combination?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Letters patent dated 8th June, 1910, were issued incorporating 'Canadian Steel Corporation, Limited.' Supplementary Letters Patent were issued dated 22nd June, 1910, changing the name 'Canadian Steel Corporation, Limited,' to 'The Steel Company of Canada, Limited.'
2. The authorized capital of the company is $25,000,000 divided into 250,000 shares of $100 each.
3. The department has no knowledge as to the amount of bonds which have been issued by the company. Of the capital of the company, one hundred thousand shares were authorized to be issued as preference shares.
4. The department has no information upon this subject.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I would like to ask when we shall be privileged to see a report of the last Imperial Conference. I presume that the notes have been extended; probably my right hon. friend has brought them back with him. Nothing could be of greater interest for us than to see exactly what has taken place at that important gathering. Also, will we have a full report of all the proceedings of the conference, and not, as in the last instance, a very much reduced report for most of us, while a privileged few saw a verbatim report of all the proceedings. In this instance the conference is not one of a special nature, a conference of defence, but a general conference, and I hope we shall have the full report.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I hope the same thing, and I suppose the report will be published at an early day. I understand that it is now in the hands of the printer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What printer —of this House?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No. It is printed in England and is to be distributed as soon as it is printed.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Of course, it is very difficult to get any general supply if we are to rely on the British bluebook. I think on some occasions at least the book has been printed here in order that members of this House and of the Senate might have full information of what has taken place. Has the Prime Minister taken that into consideration?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. On previous occasions we have had it reprinted, and there is no objection, if it is so desired, that it should be reprinted this time. I have nothing in my hand. The report is in the hands of the printer, and I expect it from day to day. We shall have a certain number of copies for distribution here and if they are not sufficient, we may have to reprint the report.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think the document has been printed in Great Britain, because a copy came to hand to-day I do not know from what source it came.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The proceedings of the conference were printed from day to day, but the report is not finally struck until it is revised by each member of the conference. I sent my proof sheets just before I left England.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The document to which I allude purports to be a report of the conference. I do not know whether it has been revised or not, but it has an index of the various subjects at the commencement.

Mr. MONK. I understood, from what appeared in the newspapers since my right hon. friend returned, that a copy had reached this country, that my right hon. friend in fact had brought back with him a report of the conference, and I am a little anxious to know if we have to wait for the printing in England.

Mr. MONK.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sorry to say that, as often happens, my hon. friend has been misinformed. I brought nothing back from the conference; I am no more privileged in that respect than my hon. friend. All I saw was the proof sheets and my last proof sheet was sent to the printer the day before I left England.

THE RECENT GRAND TRUNK STRIKE.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) if it is correct that there are still out of employment a large number of the men connected with the recent strike on the Grand Trunk railway, and is it my hon. friend's intention to communicate to the House the report of Judge Barron in regard to that strike?

Hon. MACKENZIE KING. A few days ago I communicated with Mr. Hays, asking if Judge Barron's report had been received, and what action he proposed to take on the report. In a letter of June 26, Mr. Hays replied

> As to the investigation conducted by His Honour Judge John Barron, at my request, will say, he has concluded his report, but it is very lengthy, consisting of several hundred pages of testimony, and I have not as yet been able to thoroughly consider it. I may add, however, that any recommendations therein will receive our most careful and favourable consideration.

Mr. Hays further intimates that he has made a similar intimation to the representatives of the employees who have been communicating with him.

Mr. BLAIN. That is not quite an answer to my question. What I would like to know is whether the members of the House will have an opportunity of examining that report?

Mr. KING. The report is not made to parliament or government. It is a report made to Mr. Hays himself. I cannot say whether Mr. Hays intends to make the report public or not. I have no assurance from him on that point.

Mr. BLAIN. The other question my hon. friend has overlooked, as to how many of the men are still out of employment.

Mr. KING. I understand that there are several. I could not give the exact number.

Mr. BLAIN. What is my hon. friend doing towards getting these men reinstated, as he took an active part in the settlement?

Mr. KING. The government has kept in touch with the company, and has intimated to it that it hopes that it will see its way to reinstate any man who may still be out.

Mr. BLAIN. Has anything been done by my hon. friend or his department since the adjournment of the House a few weeks ago?

Mr. KING. Yes. The communication which I have just read is an answer to a communication which I sent to Mr. Hays; and other officers of the company have been communicated with as well.

MINORITY REPRESENTATION.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. Mr. Speaker, has the First Minister observed the remarks made in his absence quite recently in the city of Toronto by his Minister of Trade and Commerce, in which he may fairly be taken to have advocated minority representation as applied to cities? His utterance would appear to have been inspired, and I would like to know if the government has any intention, in the Redistribution Bill, which will doubtless be brought down in consequence of the new census, of introducing the principle of minority representation in urban municipalities, or if the matter has been considered by the government, and, if so, what action will be taken?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think my hon. friend had better put a motion in writing.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the orders of the day are called I would like to inform my right hon. friend in connection with what I mentioned a moment ago, that the document to which I alluded yesterday seems to be a report of the proceedings of the recent Imperial Conference. It is a blue-book entitled 'Imperial Conference 1911;' precis of the proceedings presented to both Houses of parliament, by command of His Majesty, June, 1911, printed by the government printers; and it begins with the proceedings on the 1st day, Tuesday 23rd May, 1911, on which day a resolution was passed presenting a humble address of the conference to His Majesty, and it ends with a record of the proceedings on the 20th June, 1911, setting forth the concluding speeches of certain members of the conference.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When was it presented to parliament?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). June, 1911, the day of the month is not mentioned. The conference seems to have come to the conclusion, according to this document, on the 20th of June, and evidently was presented to parliament some time between the 20th and the end of June.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I left England on the 1st of July, and it may have been presented the day before. If so we shall have it in a very few days. Perhaps it has come already, I shall make inquiries. If received, it shall be put on the table of parliament immediately.

Mr. MONK. I would ask my right hon. friend to have the document translated as soon as possible so that we may get it in both languages at the same time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly.

Mr. MONK. There was considerable delay the last time which, I hope, will not take place again.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As far as I can see this blue-book is the precis which was issued to the press every day, and is not a full record of the proceedings.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There will no doubt be a fuller record.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) promised a statement regarding the census.

Mr. FISHER. I was to have had one in writing, and it was to have been here at three o'clock. It may come in a few minutes, and I would not like offhand to make a statement.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE PORCUPINE FIRE.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I consider it my duty, having been up in that locality, to say a few words regarding the great fire at Porcupine. The conditions there are simply heart-rending beyond description. The town of South Porcupine was totally wiped out, also the town of Pottsville. The town of Golden City fortunately escaped severe disaster, but the town of Cochrane is practically utterly destroyed, and that of Kelso has been destroyed to the extent of three-quarters at least. In the vicinity of Matheson, nearly all the settlers—and there are quite a number of them—have been burnt out. Further south in the district of Nipissing, but not from the same fire, Sellwood was practically annihilated, and in that vicinity 25 families are to-day destitute. Up to the present the sufferers are being cared for as regards food and clothing, but it is absolutely necessary that the people in the district should be furnished with a considerable supply of money. They cannot possibly get along without it. Food and clothing have been distributed to the relief parties at work there, but up to the time I left—Monday night last—they had not been in receipt of any money, and I am sure all will agree that it is most necessary that they should be supplied with some funds. No one who has been in that locality, as I have been, could fail to be impressed with the conviction that no stone should be left unturned in order to help these people out. Many sad cases have I witnessed, cases of heart-rending misery, but I shall not attempt to enter into details because you have had that information already through the press. I am glad, however, to find that the loss of life will not be as great as we feared. Up to Monday, so far as I could ascertain, 63 corpses had been recovered, and many people who were thought to have been lost are continually being found out at other points. There is no doubt, however, that the loss of life was considerably more than can be judged by the number of bodies which have been recovered.

I have information from the clerk of the town of Cochrane that the last assessment of that town was $913,000. The rate of taxation was 25 mills on the dollar. The town owed $75,000. It issued debentures to the extent of $50,000, which have all been sold, and there is on hand about $40,000 in cash. The corporation loss through the destruction of town property was $21,000. The total insurance will only be in the vicinity of $200,000, while the total loss in Cochrane alone the assessor estimated at $2,000,000. In this condition of affairs, you can easily see that the town is in very bad shape for the purpose of rebuilding, because those who may go there to build will find themselves at once saddled with a very high taxation. I, therefore, am of the opinion that the government should at a very early date do something towards relieving that town as a whole. For this we have a precedent created lately in the case of the conflagration at Campbellton.

I would suggest, and I trust that the suggestion will meet with the approval of the government, that something substantial should be done in that connection, and that a very liberal amount of cash should be at once provided to be handed over to a central committee for distribution throughout the district for the benefit of the settlers. In this one district I have spoken of in the townships of Capreol and Hanmer, of which we have heard very little in the papers, there are to-day 25 families of settlers homeless and destitute. I am sure the government have this matter at heart, and I simply urge them to make a liberal grant to alleviate the sufferings of these people.

Mr. ARTHURS. I wish to endorse briefly what has been said by my hon. friend (Mr. Gordon, Nipissing). I come from a district somewhat south of the fire region, but many people from my own home town were unfortunately in that fire at Porcupine. I have their description of the scene there, and of the results of the fire. Some few men are still undiscovered, and it is feared they have been lost in the fire. These towns are not in a position to help themselves, they have now large debts, they have been built up very quickly, and it is almost impossible to get new settlers to go in there, and assume the old debt created previous to the fire. It would be only reasonable that the government should do something to help out the corporations in that way. It is supposed too that a large number of men have been killed or burned in the woods and there is at present no means of searching for their bodies. Many sufferers from the fire are absolutely blind from the effect of smoke and heat, and some poor unfortunates thus afflicted may be still in the woods around that settlement. The Ontario government has been very generous in this matter, so far at least as the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railroad is concerned. They are moving the men out free of charge, and carrying in supplies free and in fact doing everything possible to help the settlers. It is only right that this government should do as much for these people as they have done for settlers in foreign countries, as, for instance, at the time of the earthquakes in San Francisco and Italy.

Mr. FIELDING. I will only remind the hon. gentlemen that this matter was brought up in the House yesterday when a brief statement was made as to the action which the government had taken, and the present position of the whole matter. If my hon. friends will be good enough to read that statement they will see that the matter has already been engaging the attention of the government, and will engage their further attention.

WESTERN COAL MINERS' STRIKE.

Mr. A. S. GOODEVE (Kootenay). I would ask the Minister of Labour when he intends to bring down the report of the conciliation board appointed to enquire into the trouble between the miners and operators in southern Alberta and the Crowsnest district of British Columbia, and also what action is being taken or has been taken by the government since the reception of that report? I am sure that he as well as other members of the House recognize that each day the seriousness of the situation increases. In a very short time now we will have cold weather throughout the prairie provinces, and the railways will soon commence to move the large crop of grain so that all cars will be in use, and the difficulty of getting the necessary supply of coal through to the prairie provinces will be very great. Every day the seriousness of that danger increases. I saw it stated in the press that the assistant to the first vice president of the Canadian Pacific Railway had made the statement that undoubtedly numbers of settlers would be frozen to death in the prairie provinces, unless some immediate relief was given. We have been inviting, and are taking in very large numbers of settlers, and it is important from every standpoint that there should be an ample supply of fuel. I have here a number of references to this matter from different western papers, most of them couched in very strong language indeed. If I read an extract or two I only do so to impress on the minister, and other members of the government how earnestly the western people feel in regard to this particular matter. Whether rightly or wrongly there is a strong feeling throughout the west that the government has not done its whole duty in this matter; they feel that there has been unnecessary delay. It is true that, just before the recess, the minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. King), in reply to a question in the House, said that the government had offered their services, and he intimated further that it was possibly because neither the operators nor the miners desired publicity that they had, up to that time, refused to avail themselves of those services. I ventured at that time to state that it was possibly not from fear of publicity, but because they had lost confidence in the Lemieux Act that this refusal had been made. I think all subsequent events go to prove that the suggestion I made at that time was correct. Whatever has been the past history of the Lemieux Act in the settling of various disputes, certainly in this case it has been a lamentable failure in every particular. Instead of assisting in any way it has been the means undoubtedly of preventing both parties coming together because, relying on that Act, they have waited from day to day until it drifted from week to week, and finally into months before that report was completed. I shall not criticise the members of that board nor their appointment, but I wish to read an editorial from one of the western papers, which I think voices largely the feeling and the sentiment of those people. As I say the language is strong, but it is because they feel very strongly on the matter, and feel, as I have said, that there has been neglect on the part of the government. This editorial which appears in the Calgary 'Herald,' is as follows:

THE COAL STRIKE.

If for no other reason than its deplorable handling of the coal strike the federal government should be rejected and condemned by the people of western Canada. It is not only that the Department of Labour has utterly failed to reach a settlement but also that it has displayed an indifference to the situation that is nothing else than shameful. Reciprocity versus anti-reciprocity is a debatable question, but the need for coal next winter, and the suffering which will come to western Canada for lack of it, are not matters of debate but of common knowledge.

For nearly four months the mines of southern Alberta have been closed through a difference between employers and employed. After a delay that was in itself reprehensible, a conciliation board was organized and a man put at the head of it who, in the opinion of those best qualified to judge, has shown himself a lamentable failure.

Meanwhile, what of the young Minister of Labour who, when he was a deputy, used to go around hunting trouble in order that he might settle it. Have the sweets of office clogged the wheels of his industry, or has he grown too great to hearken to a public cry? In the press dispatches we read that Mr. Gordon's report has at least reached Ottawa, but that it cannot be opened until Mr. Mackenzie King chooses to come back and do so, while we also read that Mr. King is delivering political speeches before a Quebec audience. What cares he for Alberta and Saskatchewan? A minister of the Crown must not be bothered with trifles.

And here in the west are a million of people who will suffer because of Mr. King's selfish carelessness and Mr. Gordon's laziness. Here homes are without coal, here manufactories are hampered for lack of fuel. Here the steam ploughs on which the development of our country largely depends have had to cease operations on account of the strike. Here we have three great provinces whose people depend on coal for their winter warmth, and we know that however the strike is now settled there will be suffering and privation in thousands upon thousands of western homes during the coming winter. Is it not scandalous that a lazy and surfeited government should sit calmly by and watch its people robbed of the use of their natural heritage? Such a strike as this first impels one to believe that all coal mines should be controlled and operated by the government. But on the other hand if the government were as inefficient as the Department of Labour has shown itself to be, the last stage might prove to be worse than the first.

Then there is a long article in another paper, in even stronger language, which perhaps I had better not read.

An hon. MEMBER. Read it.

Mr. GOODEVE. This is from the Lethbridge 'Daily News,' a paper published in the centre of the affected district. I will read an extract.

Must the coal mining industry of this country be tied up to suit the convenience of the cocksure and bumptious youth who presides over the Department of Labour?

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for this language, but I trust the minister will thoroughly understand it.

The interests of thousands of people, the lives of some of them, perhaps, are at stake. Already there has been great inconvenience if not actual suffering by the cause of this strike. These mines which are the source of such great wealth to Alberta should be humming with activity. The transportation and industrial concerns of the country need coal. The householder needs it and cannot get it. The miners need the work. The merchants in the affected districts need the money for the goods that they have supplied the miners. Must all of these multifarious interests languish because Mackenzie King is in Berlin gratifying his vanity and boring his constituents.

The Lemieux Act specifically states that as soon as the award reaches Ottawa it shall be made public and that a copy be given to any newspaper in Canada that asks for it. The 'News' representative at Ottawa has made this request and no doubt all of the other newspaper representatives have done the same, but Mr. King is not at home.

I admit that the language I have read is somewhat strong, and I have only read these editorials from western papers because they are published in this immediate district, and I think correctly reflect the views of the people of that district. Some portions of the affected districts are in my own riding of Kootenay. There are three great smelters depending on the output of coal from the district. They consume probably on the average 1,150 tons a day, or 34,500 tons a month. One of these has been shut down for some time; fortunately the others, by making an arrangement with the transportation company for a special rate, have been enabled to import coke from Pennsylvania and to continue running. How long that condition will last, they are unable to say. If, as is more than likely, the fight continues much longer, and they also are compelled to shut down, then many other dependent industries will be closed, and many more thousands of men, just at the season when work is most needed, will be thrown out of employment. For these reasons I think that the Department of Labour should inform the House and the country what steps they are taking to bring about a settlement of these difficulties.

Mr. KING. Through the courtesy of my hon. friend in communicating his intention to bring up this subject in the House to-day, I am able to hand him a copy of the report of the board which has investigated this dispute. I may say by way of explanation as to why a copy was not laid on the table before, that it is not customary to lay copies of reports of Boards of Conciliation on the table of the House; they are given out to the press as soon as received, and they are also published in the 'Labour Gazette.' But it has not been a customary procedure to lay them on the table of the House. However, I am glad to present this report to the House, though it has already been published in large part in the press, and I have no doubt the details are familiar to my hon. friend.

Mr. GOODEVE.

I must say that I expected, when my hon. friend began his remarks, that he would deal with this question from the point of view of the interests concerned, and the public welfare, and that he would not have introduced into the discussion editorials from party journals that have been written certainly for political purposes, and not to alleviate the situation in the west at the present time. If there is one thing above another which to my mind, is all important in connection with the western situation at the present time, it is that it should not be made a matter of party politics. The moment it is attempted to make political capital out of the serious industrial situation in the west at the present time, that moment the difficulty of settlement is going to become increased, and a heavy onus will rest upon those who take that course in approaching this question. The government, through the Department of Labour, has tried to deal with this question in a fearless and a direct manner. When the cessation of operations took place, the first step taken was to endeavour to get the parties to agree to allow the dispute to be investigated, so that the public might know what were the causes of the dispute, and what would be a fair basis of settlement. As a result of the method by which the department approached the question at that juncture, we were able, without any act of compulsion, to get the parties voluntarily to agree to refer the matter to a board. I admit that it took a little time. But I may say that any other method would not have accomplished the result at all, that the parties would not have willingly referred their differences to a board if we had tried to coerce them. By adopting the method of voluntary conciliation, we were successful in getting the parties to go before a board, and in having a board investigate the conditions. That board has gone into the matter fully, and the report which has been presented by the board gives to the public I think an intelligent idea of the causes which are at the bottom of this dispute. It does more than that, it outlines what, in the opinion of the board, appears to be a fair basis of settlement of the dispute. It is true that it has taken the board a considerable time to get through its work; but hon. gentlemen must remember that the dispute in British Columbia and Alberta at the present time is one of the largest mining disputes that has ever taken place on this continent. There are some 18 different mining companies affected; there are 18 locals of the United Mine Workers affected. The dispute is not one which could have been dealt with quickly, if it were to be dealt with intelligently and thoroughly.

The chairman of the board has very wisely taken the view that if this western situation is to be satisfactorily solved at all it will not be by going superficially into the matter, but by investigating the difficulty thoroughly and giving to the public as full an account of the situation as it is possible to give, at the same time making recommendations which, in the light of all the information, he has reason to feel will furnish a fair basis of settlement The board's report has been given out. It is not unreasonable to hope that the parties, having before them the report of the board, although up to the present, they have not seen their way to reach a settlement, will now use that report as a basis for coming to an agreement.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the minister tell me when he received that report and when it was given to the press?

Mr. KING. It was given out just a week ago. It was received on the 11th, I think, of this month, and it was given out either the same day or the day following. It is very easy to criticise a government, or to criticise any one in regard to a dispute of this kind. My hon. friend said, in the first instance, that the government was to blame for the dispute going along such a length of time because the parties were waiting for the government to have the difficulty investigated, and that if the government had not been promising an investigation they would have got together and settled the difficulty. When the investigation takes place he says that if there had been no investigation there would have been an earlier settlement. Well, now the investigation has taken place and I presume, if my hon. friend is true to his own line of argument, he will now take the view that the best thing to be done is to let the parties understand that they need not look further to the government for intervention, but that it is advisable for them to do that which, he says, it would have been better for them to have done at the outset, namely, get together and try to come to a definite settlement of their differences.

Just in this connection, I think it is well to point out to the parties involved in this dispute and to the country also, that some persons, for reasons best known to themselves, are trying to create an impression in the west that if this dispute is kept up long enough the government will take over the mines, probably operate them and guarantee a certain rate of wages to the men. Rumours of this kind can be nothing other than prejudicial to the situation. They give rise to false hopes, and they only help to prolong a condition of affairs which has already gone on at too great length. A resolution was adopted, for example, by the Nelson Board of Trade on the 19th of June, and I find it contains this clause:

It has been generally understood that it was the intention of the government to conduct the operations of the mines, with guarantee to the workers, during the settlement of such questions as those at present involved.

I think it only fair to say that the government has no intention of the kind, and to hold out to any body of men the idea that if they keep up the dispute for a certain length of time the government will undertake to guarantee them certain rates of wages is to put them in a false position, and to put both parties to the dispute in an unfair position towards each other. I think the parties should now take this report which has been concurred in for the most part by one of the members of the board along with the chairman, take it into consideration with the minority report which has been presented by one other member of the board, and see if they cannot, by mutual conference, having the facts before them, come to some definite settlement. I notice that in the report the board says:

> It is, however, the conviction of the board, that after due consideration of the equity and of the effect of this decision, the parties will come to an agreement upon the basis suggested.

The board may be mistaken in its view, but I think we are only right in assuming that inasmuch as it spent nearly a month and a half in going into the whole situation, its opinion is one entitled to consideration. The report mentions that:

> In conducting this work, the board placed itself entirely at the disposal of the parties in seeking to possess itself of the fullest data upon every point. Every mine was visited, every witness called, every grievance probed as each party desired. Sworn documents taken from the company's book were presented, pay rolls were examined, mine officials and union officials were put on the stand. Sanitation was inspected; the cost of living; the cost of coal production; the tonnage output of mines; the selling price of coal; markets; the relation of coal companies to railway companies; these and all cognate matters at the instigation of the parties and on its own motion, the board faithfully and fearlessly investigated.

The situation having been gone into in that fashion, it seems to me that the parties are now at the point where all the data are before them. Everything has been brought to light and all this information has been made available in order to assist in the solution of the question. In these industrial disputes there are often three stages which it is necessary to go through. First, it is necessary to get a board of conciliation to investigate, secondly, it is necessary to have an investigation made and a settlement suggested, and then it must be referred to the parties to see if, on the basis of the settlement suggested, an agreement can not be come to. We have reached that third stage and I think that if hon. members will unite with the government in expressing the view that it is desirable to keep party considerations out of this question altogether and advise the parties to try to come together on the basis of the award, they will be helping in bringing about a speedy termination of the dispute.

Just one word more before I sit down. I think it is well that my hon. friend has brought up this question, for this, if for no other reason, that the people of the provinces in the west which are likely to be affected by this matter ought now, while it is summer to take some steps themselves to see that if we approach winter without this dispute being settled, provision is made for coal for the people there. When the strike took place in Lethbridge some five years ago, on which occasion I intervened myself, the strike had been going on for nine months, we were then in November, snow was on the ground, and those provinces were face to face with a very critical situation. But, it is different in this case. This strike has lasted now for not quite four months. We are still in the early part of the summer, it is possible for those who see danger ahead to make provision, in the event of a settlement not being speedily reached, and I think it would be in the interest of all companies and individuals concerned not to pin their faith too much on an immediate settlement, but to make provision for themselves against any contingencies. The reason that I advise them not to pin their faith too much on an immediate settlement is that the main question concerned is as to whether there shall be an open or closed shop, or as to the degree of recognition which is to be given to the union. I must frankly confess that I do not know of any means that can be used to end a dispute upon that question so long as one body of men take the view that they will work only with union men on certain conditions, and so long as the employers take the view that they will not allow their mines to be operated on those conditions. It comes then to a test of endurance, and it is well for the country to know the facts and face them squarely. However, I believe if the parties do that, with the advance which has been made by this investigation, it may be possible for this dispute to be speedily terminated.

In conclusion, let me say that the thanks not only of the government, but of the whole country are due to Mr. Gordon, chairman of this board, for the exceptionally able manner in which he has performed his work. Mr. Gordon went into the whole question with the other members of the board patiently and exhaustively, and those who have been present have felt that he has rendered a very great service to the Dominion, notwithstanding what hostile political critics may have to say.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). The Minister of Labour has been at any rate candid with the House and the country and like the candid doctor who is not afraid to tell his patient the truth he announces to the people of Canada that there is no remedy to be had. The minister has enlightened the House with a long recital of the facts, but what the country wants to know is what relief the government is going to afford. This strike is more particularly one in which the public has a very much greater interest than it usually has in conflicts between labour and capital. Here is a section of the country that for six months in the year is practicably inaccessible to the carriage of bulky commodities such as coal and being destitute of wood for fuel purposes the inhabitants are face to face with impending disaster. The first minister is responsible for the doctrine that the government as a whole is responsible for everything that takes place in any department of the government and I commend to the right hon. gentleman that sins of omission as well as sins of commission in any department shall be shouldered by the entire government. Had not this present government been laivsh in giving away the fuel areas of that country for little or nothing in bygone days there would have been to-day a weapon in the hands of the government which would have prevented a strike. In entering a conflict of this kind both parties look to the chances of ultimate success and they know that is measured by the amount of public pressure that can be brought to bear on either side of the question. The American government in their administration of the coal fields, especially in Alaska now retain in their own hands large coal areas for public purposes, and had the Canadian government retained only a fractional part of the vast coal lands in this very region these coal lands would now be capable of early development in the public interest and the dire consequences resulting from this strike would be minimized if not obviated. I understand that coal is being shipped into these provinces for months past by interests that know there will be a great scarcity of fuel in the coming winter, and no doubt the Minister of Labour in his capacity as regulator of combines and trusts will be called on to interfere just as soon as the winter comes. The government is well aware that the conditions on the prairies are different in this respect from those in well settled parts of the country where there are means of rushing in a fuel supply in an emergency and altogether it seems to me that from beginning to end the whole matter has been inadequately handled by the government. Immigrants are rushing into that country daily and hourly and if it be found impossible for them to obtain fuel during the coming winter disaster is bound to overtake them. The government has allowed the thing to drift along until at this late date all that the minister can do is to hand in a report and say to us, 'What are you going to do about it?' It is the business of the government to do something about it so as to protect the people of the west from hardship.

Mr. TURRIFF. It is unfortunate that the speakers on the other side of the House pay more attention to trying to blame the government than to suggesting a remedy. The question of how the people of the west are to get fuel during the coming winter is a serious one. Let me point out to the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) that this government has done just exactly what he says they should have done. Several years ago they withdrew absolutely from sale all the coal lands of these western provinces and for years back no one has been able to purchase an acre of coal land from the government.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Because it was all sold.

Mr. TURRIFF. I may tell my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) that there are thousands and tens of thousands of acres of coal lands the equal of any that have been disposed of available to anybody who is willing to develop them, and to pay a yearly rental of $1 per acre and a certain royalty per ton on the coal. My hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) or anybody else can get some of the richest coal lands on earth for a specified rental and royalty and without having to invest one dollar on capital account. In addition to that in the Crowsnest Pass on the British Columbia side, the government has 50,000 acres of the finest coal lands in the world ready for development. At present there are hundreds of thousands of tons of coal coming in from the United States to southern British Columbia and all through the Calgary district and the railways are using American coal now. That very report which was tabled to-day states that the minimum wage paid in one of these mines during the past year amounted to $4 per day for the miner, that the maximum wage was $12 a day, and that the average earning of the miner in that mine was $6 a day. Under these conditions the men have struck and they demand that none but union men shall be employed and the operators contend that they cannot afford to operate their mines if they have to meet the demands of the miners. I do not know which party is right, but there is the condition. Will some one suggest now a means by which the Minister of Labour can end that unfortunate strike? In dealing with it I think we should deal with it as a coal strike, and not bring in party politics for the purpose of blaming the government for something for which they are not to blame at all.

Mr. GOODEVE. In view of the quotation from the resolution of the Nelson Board of Trade, may I ask the Minister of Labour if he has notified both parties to the dispute, as well as the public, that they have no intention of taking any further action in the matter, and that they will leave the parties to the dispute to work out their own salvation?

Mr. KING. The purpose of my remarks to-day was to acquaint the public as well as the parties themselves with the fact that for the present the view of the government is that, the matter having been fully investigated and a report brought down, the parties should now feel that they themselves must try to get together and settle this difficulty. If they believed that the government were going to intervene further, what my hon. friend said at the beginning of his remarks would probably take place: they would wait for that further intervention before coming to a settlement. But I would not like my hon. friend to believe that because the government takes that position it is not watching every phase of this situation and taking care to see that the interests of the public are duly protected.

Mr. BLAIN. After listening to the discussion I do not think there was any justification for my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) charging members on this side of the House with introducing party politics. My hon. friend is very ready to make charges against members on this side of the House when they are discharging their duty. For my part, I would like to know if it is not the duty of members on this side of the House, particularly gentlemen coming from the west, to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour and of the government to a condition of affairs that is threatening the western development. I notice that my hon. friend had no suggestion to the government or the House for the settlement of this case; but he is seeking from the opposition side what the Department of Labour is unable to give. When the Lemieux Act was introduced, we were told of past strikes and the suffering that the public of this country had endured in consequence of them, and we were assured that when the Lemieux Act was put on the statute-book, strikes would be at an end. Now we have, as the Minister of Labour states, the most far-reaching strikes ever known in the history of this country, and still we have the Lemieux Act on the statute-book. What is the matter? Either the Minister of Labour or his department are unable or unwilling to enforce the Lemieux Act, or else the Lemieux Act is not sufficient to meet the difficulty. I would like my hon friend the Minister of Labour to state which side of this question he is on, and which side the department is on. In the early part of this session, when a matter of this kind was up, my hon. friend pointed out that the difficulty was whether unions should be recognized or not. I asked on which side was my hon. friend and his department, and my hon. friend said, 'we are on neither side'. When we have a Labour Department, and a full-fledged minister, and a Labour 'Gazette', and correspondents all over this country, it seems to me that if that is the essence of the difficulty, my hon. friend should be able to say, after years of experience and investigation, whether it is in the best interests of this country that labour unions should be recognized or not. It is not enough for my hon. friend to say, I am not on one side or the other, I have not made up my mind whether labour unions should be recognized or not. We had all that information before my hon. friend was put into the government, and when we had this labour legislation, we were told that before labour disputes reached the stage of strikes, the Lemieux Act would be applied and everything would be settled. The duty does not rest on the opposition to settle these strikes. The opposition is not responsible for the Lemieux Act. We questioned when it was introduced whether it would be sufficient to meet the case; but we were told, and the country was told, and the labour organizations were told, that in future there would be no strikes. And now we are confronted with strikes lasting for several months, and a supporter of the government asks, what has the opposition to suggest for the settlement of this difficulty? My hon. friend the Minister of Labour has been criticized for delivering political speeches. It strikes me that my hon. friend is more of a partisan than a Minister of Labour, or he would have been out in the west looking after this difficulty himself. It hardly becomes my hon. friend to suggest that it is the duty of the opposition to make suggestions how this matter could be settled, and I don't think he will do it again.

Mr. SPROULE. It rather amused me to hear the statement of the minister that this matter should be kept out of the domain of party politics. That is very good advice, but I would like to remind him that from time to time on the public platform, and sometimes in this House he tells the country how many strikes have taken place and about the important part taken in their settlement by the Labour Department and the Minister of Labour, and how many were settled by his intervention. He is quite willing that this matter shall be in the arena of party politics when there is anything to be made out of it; but when he sees danger ahead, he wants it to be kept out of politics. I was very much amused to hear the minister give the history of the operations that have been carried on since the appointment of the commission was made, and then to find, after it was all cleared up, that the Minister and the Department of Labour had nothing to do and did not intend to do anything—they only intended to stand aloof and let the parties fight it out. This reminded me of the story of the Irishman who met the bear. He was not very pious, and did not know what to do. It occurred to him that as he was face to face with trouble he ought to pray. At last the situation became very dangerous, and he said, 'I am not much at praying, but, good Lord, if you don't help me, don't help the bear, but just stand aside, and you will see one of the damnedest rackets you ever saw'.

He said we are not done with it because we are watching it carefully and are waiting patiently what will be the outcome. That reminds me of a story I heard of a celebrated Scotch grit away up near Owen Sound who had a little rat terrier. That terrier one day caught a small rat as it came out of its hole, and having chewed it up, watched that hole steadily for years but never another rat came out of it. In like manner the minister is going to watch that rat hole and will continue to watch it all year to see if anything will come out which he can turn to political advantage.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Might I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) when did the government come to the decision to sit tight, and did it advise the parties to the dispute that it had come to such a decision?

Mr. KING. The government is taking exactly the same position in this dispute as it has done in all disputes. When the board makes its report, it is not necessary for the government to make any statement. That report is submitted for the consideration and action of the parties.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Evidently the Department of Labour is absolutely useless in the present instance. The minister says the question is one of endurance, but that is the case in every strike, and he is practically admitting that the Department of Labour, to which we grant an annual subsidy of some $30,000, is pracically of no use whatever. Evidently the minister hopes that by sitting tight and looking wise he is going to hatch out a solution of the difficulty. He reminds me of a hen sitting for weeks on an empty nest and expecting some results. To-day the hon. gentleman hopes that by looking wise and sitting tight on nothing, he will accomplish something. That seems to be his policy. I was rather struck by the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). To my mind these remarks were a corroboration of the general opinion that the western members on the government side have control of the government. The other day when we offered a resolution to grant some substantial recognition to the veterans of 1866 and 1870, that proposal was turned down because it did not meet with favour among the western members on the government side. They said they were not in favour of granting any recognition to the veterans of 1867 and 1870. Although they were in favour of granting similar recognition to the veterans of 1885 and to the South African volunteers. A similar control is evident in the matter we are now discussing. While we are told by the Minister of Labour that his policy is to sit tight and do nothing, we have had the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) telling us that the operators are getting too much pay as it is.

Mr. TURRIFF. I did not say that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The hon. gentleman said, speaking of the pay they were getting, that they were still dissatisfied, and I took that to mean that, in his opinion, they were getting sufficient pay to-day. He apparently also thinks it is good policy to have the coal which is being used in our west taken from the mines in the United States, transported by American railways and delivered in this country, thus encouraging our neighbours to the south. That is a policy on the lines of reciprocity, and the hon. gentleman thinks it is a good policy. We on this side do not agree with him. And I think that it is up to the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) to take some steps for the purpose of settling this strike.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Was there not a commission appointed by the minister last year to visit the different countries throughout the world and find out the conditions of labour in each?

Mr. KING. My hon. friend must be thinking of the commission on technical education.

Mr. REID (Grenville). At all events the minister himself visited a great many foreign countries in order to find out how they settled their labour troubles. He went to China and even to Japan to find out how strikes were settled in those countries. He was then in the position of deputy minister and had full power to go to all those countries and see how the labour unions were working there and how strikes were settled. Therefore, if there be anyone in this government qualified to give some information regarding the settlement of strikes, that one should be the minister himself. The minister, however, and the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) want information from this side on that point but there has not been any member on this side who has had the opportunity the Minister of Labour has had of finding out what has been done in China, Japan and other countries. When this Labour Department was first created, I understand, the object was to put into the hands of the government a means of settling strikes, yet not one has so far been settled by this government.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). Yes ,the telephone girls of Toronto.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The minister may have been able to settle that strike but he could not settle that of the Grand Trunk Railway operators. Beyond doubt it was understood that the Labour Department was to have settled that strike so as to give satisfaction to the men or give them the terms on which they understood the strike was settled. I have heard of a great many strikes, but I fail to find that any have been settled by the government. They have all been settled by the parties themselves. In the case of the Grand Trunk railway strike, the minister undertook to settle it, but to-day some of the men are walking around yet, doing nothing within 12 miles of where I live. The hon. minister knows that on the Grand Trunk railway some of the strikebreakers are still occupying the very best positions in charge of the trains or as conductors, and men who served for years have not been put back in their former positions. If that is the way the Labour Department is going to settle strikes, of what use is it?

Mr. BRADBURY. Abolish it.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It should be abolished and the minister superannuated and I believe that the strikes would then be settled a good deal quicker. Although we have a minister in charge of the Labour Department, who has been all over the world inquiring into labour conditions, the department is evidently useless.

Mr. PERLEY. This is only another example of the incompetence of this government. From some remarks of the Minister of Labour this afternoon, it seems to me he ought to have been a supporter of the leader of the opposition in his policy in regard to the lands and natural resources of the Northwest provinces during the last ten years. The Minister of Labour tells us to-day that the Dominion government has practically made up its mind that it can do nothing to settle this difficulty, and that the people of the Northwest will have to freeze this winter, so far as this government is concerned. At the same time he says the provincial governments out there ought to take proper steps now.

Mr. KING. My hon. friend misunderstood me. I did not mention the provincial governments at all in this matter.

Mr PERLEY. The people of the northwest provinces, I understood him to mean that the people of the northwest as a whole, and as a body ought to make preparation for this trouble and to provide themselves with coal for the coming winter. If the policy of the leader of the opposition had been carried out the provinces of the northwest would have had control of these lands, and these coal mines, and could then have taken proper steps to see that they were operated in such a way as to be of benefit to the people of the northwest. We know that years ago many of these lands, the best of them, were practically given away and that there were many frauds in connection with applications for these lands as has been brought out in discussion in this House many times, and if the provinces had had control of these lands they would have been able to find some other method of administering them, and would have better control over the coal mines themselves.

THE CENSUS — OMISSIONS IN ENUMERATION.

Mr. PERLEY. In connection with the question asked by the leader of the opposition before going into the orders of the day yesterday with regard to the census, it seems to me very necessary that the Minister of Agriculture should hasten his explanation and statement regarding the census. Many reports have appeared in the newspapers as to the incompetence of the census officials, the incorrectness of their reports and their failure to enumerate all the people. In that connection I would read an article which appeared in the Ottawa 'Evening Journal' yesterday:

CENSUS TAKING IN OTTAWA AN EXAMPLE OF COLOSSAL INCOMPETENCE OR WORSE.

Conditions Prevailing in Other Cities seem to be much more Serious in the Capital.

Ottawa seems destined to lose considerably in Population owing to very many families being overlooked—Most Glaring Example of Carelessness in connection with the Census that Canada has yet witnessed—Numerous complaints being registered daily by families and individuals who have been overlooked.

Whatever grounds there may be upon which to base the numerous protests in other towns and cities of omissions from the census records, of one thing at least a great number of Ottawa citizens are perfectly satisfied. In so far as the capital city of the Dominion is concerned, the census taking has proven to be a colossal farce.

The question asked by the average citizen in the streets of Ottawa to-day is not what gains in population the city will show, but what success has attended the apparent efforts of the enumerators to make its population appear smaller.

Facts are Supreme.

It is not merely a question, as claimed by the census commissioner, 'that it is quite possible that, in some instances, persons and families have been overlooked.' It is a demonstrated fact that very many families have failed to attract the wandering eye of the casual enumerator long enough for census purposes, and it should not be forgotten that the numerous instances which thus far have been reported must merely represent a small portion of the entire number.

Whether or not the deplorable situation, or conditions, which prevail in Ottawa, so evident in the daily and almost hourly complaints from families and individuals, it at least lends colour to the complaints being registered all over the country.

Not a Political Question.

And in face of the bare proven facts it is difficult to understand how certain newspapers, and persons, can find ground upon which to base the charge that the complaints made so far are registered merely for partisan and political purposes.

Every citizen is, or at least should be desirous that Canada should show a large increase in her population. The same applies to the citizens of Ottawa and of every other city, town, village and hamlet, throughout the whole Dominion. The public spirited citizen of any community is anxiously awaiting the returns to ascertain whether or not his district is showing the growth, which he believes it must. It is hard to understand what any one party could possibly hope to gain through certain families or even districts being 'passed up.'

Therefore it must be taken that any complaints which have been made were not prompted by a desire, for political purposes, to show that enumerators, who 'omit persons or families,' are doing so under orders from their superiors. It can only be said that they are registered because of a desire on the part of citizens who take a just pride in this city to have their names entered in the census.

Negligence Astounding.

Although, it is pointed out that no census, that has ever been taken, or that ever will be taken in the future will be absolutely correct or infallible, it is yet astounding and almost unbelievable that so many prominent and well known citizens of Ottawa should have been overlooked.

Almost every day cases are coming to light where the entire households, and in some cases the entire staffs of offices have aparently been overlooked with almost studious care.

In the face of the fact it is not surprising that the bulk of Ottawa citizens should disagree with the census commissioner when he says that 'the work of enumeration has been well and thoroughly done.'

Ottawa will Feel Loss.

It is very easy to see that it is in cities like Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, &c., where the loss will be felt the most through the inefficiency or carelessness of the enumerator or of the officials in charge. They have the largest population without fixed and permanent abode, or domestic relations, and it is this class that is more likely to be neglected or overlooked.

The enumerator received 5 cents per name, and was not altogether likely, if not closely watched to chase all day after illusive people who could not be discovered on his first or second visit.

Many enumerators have complained of a lack of co-operation on the part of the people which they consider they were entitled to. While this complaint may be just in many respects on the other hand, business men do not think it was their duty to remain at home from their offices in waiting to accommodate the enumerator when he was pleased to call at their homes.

Some of the Causes.

They declare that this census man had a right to hunt them up at their places of business for the necessary information. And just here is the cause of a great number of persons being overlooked.

Enumerators have undoubtedly refused to do this as it made their work more onerous and unremunerative. What the results have been is daily being demonstrated.

Of the whole piece of business only one thing can be said, to quote a well known citizen yesterday:

'It is the most glaring and serious example of incompetency, through lack of proper organization, that Canada has yet had to contend with.'

The system of payment by the department of 5 cents per head is one that may lead to many abuses and that, as this article points out, will not induce the enumerator to take the trouble of going to the house more than once or twice in order to enumerate the people. In June, when the census was taken, many people were out of town, and I know myself how difficult it would be for the enumerator to get track of them all. I have been told by several persons that they were not enumerated in this census. I mention that in case the minister may think that this article is not definite enough. I also find specific charges contained in a telegram from Montreal appearing in the 'Citizen' of July 11. That article reads:

MISSED BY CENSUS.

Many Complaints as to way Numbers were Left Out.

Montreal, July 10.—Complaints as to the manner in which the 1911 census has been conducted are coming in by the score, not only from individuals who have been overlooked, but also from whole districts.

'Not a householder in Rosemount has been called on by the census enumerators, as far as I can learn,' said Ald. Drummond to-day.

'No enumerator called at my house, although I represent the ward in the council of Montreal. But I was not the only one treated in this way. I have received scores of complaints from residents of the ward that no enumerators called upon them. This is remarkable. In my ward there are some three thousand houses, so you would think that the enumerators would not have been so careless as to neglect the place. It is most remarkable.'

Whole parishes, streets and corners have been similarly neglected. While a canvass of business men shows that in very many cases the enumerators, finding the head of the houses away, jotted down what information they could obtain from servants and children, completing their work by the use of imagination.

This is a matter of great importance. In the first place, we are all naturally anxious that the entire population of Canada should be enumerated in order that we may make as good a showing as possible in that respect, and on this census will be based the representation for this House of Commons for the next ten years, in the Bill which, I presume, will be brought down in the House before long. Now it would be an unfortunate thing if the census should not be reliable. I am not bringing up this matter as a political question, but simply to call the attention of the minister to this state of affairs, and to ask him for an explanation.

Mr. FISHER. In reply to the hon. gentleman I would say that the statement which he has just read, taken I believe from the 'Journal' of last evening, is about as reckless, and as unfounded a statement as I have read in a newspaper. It is an exaggeration in every way, shape and form. It happens that in the city of Ottawa the chief census office is situated; and if any such condition of affairs has existed as described in that paper, it is extraordinary that the people who were concerned did not make their complaints to the census office. It was the easiest thing for them to do. My hon. friend shakes his head. They are not bound to do it, I grant; but at the same time the public were asked to co-operate with the census officials in taking a correct census, and if such a state of affairs existed as described, it seems to me that the people affected would have made their complaint to the census office, either by telephone or verbally.

Mr. LANCASTER. Could they not make their complaint in the public press much more effectually than by communicating with the officers of the department?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, if the public press gave names and places. But when a reckless article of this kind is published, giving no name or place, it is evidently not the best way of making complaints. But if any one makes a complaint in the press giving name and place, it will be investigated at once. But here in Ottawa there was an easy opportunity for people who are thus described, as numbering scores and hundreds, according to the tenor of that article, to notify the census office, and have matters set right. That would not be the case in Montreal, Toronto, and elsewhere, I grant; but at the same time the public have been invited to make any complaint of that kind to the census office, free by post, and such complaint would be investigated. Now as a matter of fact in the city of Ottawa we have had a few complaints, not a score in all have come to the office. A majority of these complaints have been investigated, and have been discovered to be unfounded. As a matter of fact there have been a few cases where people have not been enumerated, and immediately on representations having been made, the enumeration has been properly done. There have also been a few such complaints in other parts of the country. Many of those coming from the cities are owing to a fact which the complainants seem to have overlooked. This census has been taken as of the 1st of June, during which month a large number of people left their residences for other parts of the country. We have, however, provided machinery for looking after them. They are enumerated in the place where they are found, and a special card is sent to the department here to indicate that these people, while enumerated at their temporary residence, at Britannia or up the Gatineau, for instance, are residents of the city of Ottawa, and the enumerator in Ottawa who has not been able to find the individual in his house, or to get information, sends a card into the general office to that effect. We compare the two, and when the final revision of the enumeration is completed, the corrections will be made, and all these people will be counted in the place where they are properly resident. That has all been arranged for, and I have no doubt whatever, that the people who have made the complaints spoken of have all been enumerated as inhabitants of the city where they live. I may say that in the census of 1901 we had such complaints as are now being made. Every complaint where a name was mentioned was investigated immediately, and according to my memory, it was discovered that a large majority of the complaints were unfounded. The people had been enumerated. An instance was given to me the other day. A gentleman resident of the city of Montreal said that his household had not been enumerated. His household was away for the summer, he himself was away, but he had left in charge of the house a confidential servant, and that servant had given full details of the entire family. She had made one mistake, however, in giving the age of the proprietor, reporting him as two years younger than he actually was. That gentleman came to the census office about the matter, and on investigation we found that his complaint was absolutely without foundation. That is a kind of thing which has occurred in a few instances in different parts of the country, and that is a kind of thing on which reckless journalists are basing absurd accusations, such as are contained in the article read by the hon. member for Argenteuil. I venture to say that the census is being accurately taken, that it is being taken with the greatest care, that proper machinery has been provided to take it effectively, and that when the returns are finally revised the actual population of Canada in its various parts will be known. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked for a statement which I had not at the moment, and which I now have. The census was taken as of the 1st of June, and we expected the last enumerators to get through their work in less than three weeks. That has been done to a large extent, but not altogether. In some instances where the enumerators have made omissions they have been directed to go over their work again. In one instance I know of a half street being left out. The census enumerator was sent back by the commissioner to do that half street, and it has been done, and the return is in. I will now make an answer to the questions of the leader of the opposition yesterday. The returns have been coming in very rapidly. At the present date there are 9,322 enumerations. I may say that that number will be slightly added to, because some of the outlying districts have been subdivided, but the actual number as reported to us at the time of the taking of the census, was 9,322.

We have received the returns from 6,556 of these districts leaving the balance of 2,761 to be received. Of those that have been received the first compilation has been going on since they were received, and out of 6,556 about 6,500 have been gone over up to the present day for the first count. I say clearly for the first count, because we have to revise all these schedules and compare them after the first count. Then we go over them a third time, check them and see that they are correct. That provision includes the compilation of these cards I have just alluded to, and a comparison and correction where any indication exists that a person may have been counted in two places. For instance, the other day I was counted here. I found when I went home to my farm in Brome that I had been counted there also. Therefore, this checking and revision have to take place before we can issue any figures which would be reliable or correct. After that is done we have to go over the whole of them again and check them, this being largely done by the machines, to see that they are accurate before we can issue any statement of figures. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked if we were going to issue statements of the returns as they came in. In former censuses we issued statements when we had finally concluded what was the actual population, but I would not like to undertake to issue a statement until that final revision and checking have taken place so that no misconceptions may arise, and so that nobody may be misled by what may turn out to be not absolute accuracy. My hon. friend also asked when the final figures would be given out. I am not prepared at the moment to say, but we think that the final figures should be completed in the month of October. It is possible we may be able to get them out earlier, but I would not like to hold out any hope that it would be at an earlier date than some time in the month of October.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to have one point cleared up, and that is to ascertain whether I am enumerated in this census. I do not know whether I have the honour to be included in this census as a citizen of Canada. I do know this: that up to the time I left on the 15th of June for the west I had not seen anything at all of these enumerators. I have been informed since my return that inquiry was made at my house as to whether the head of the house was at home, that the person who made the inquiry was informed that the head of the house was absent, and that is the last that has been heard of him. No papers were left at my house to be filled in there as far as I can ascertain, and I do not know whether I have the honour to be included in this census. I would like very much to find that out.

Mr. FISHER. I will find it out.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I know that a memorandum was prepared giving the particulars, as far as they could be foreseen, that would be required for the census enumeration, and if a call had been made at any time when any person was at home who would be prepared to hand that out, these particulars would have been available But, that has not been handed out as no one has called whatever, except on the occasion to which I have alluded at which time he got no information on the subject. That does not seem to me to indicate that care which the minister is so confident has been taken in the city of Ottawa. I was here for fifteen days of June, ready and willing to give all information available and I heard absolutely nothing of any census enumerator having called; nor was any application made to me. I do not know the method of taking the census. Is it not customary to leave some papers in which the person being enumerated will find out certain statistical information?

Mr FISHER. No. That might be done in case several calls had been made and a person could not be found or something of that kind The duty of the enumerator is to see somebody in the household.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am absolutely confident that if the information is of a character anything like that which was asked for in the census of ten years ago they did not obtain it in my case unless the enumerator has put it down by mere conjecture, because no one who was seen at my house would have been capable of giving any of the information. I think that the Minister of Agriculture may find that the taking of this census has not been of that almost perfect character which would be indicated by his remarks this afternoon. It is almost impossible to believe that the complaints that are coming from every city in Canada, or almost every city in Canada—I have seen a great many of them—are simply raised without any real foundation. I heard them in the west when I was there, I have heard them since I came back to the east, and I am inclined to think that the character of the census taking on this occasion ought to be the subject of a very strict and careful inquiry. The census enumerator has not taken the pains to obtain the information in regard to myself; is it not equally reasonable to believe that that has been the case in a great many other instances? It was perfectly available to him if he had seen fit to come to me and ask for it and obtain it. It would have been available to him in some degree at least if he had gone to my house during my absence. I do not know whether all the information could have been obtained in my absence, but certainly the most important part could have been, and that has not been given. I would like to know how many persons have been enumerated in my household. I do not see how any correct enumeration could have been made of my servants if there has been only the one visit to which I allude. The whole proceeding so far as that particular instance is concerned does not lead me to conclude that there was very great care in Ottawa, and if care has not been taken in Ottawa it is equally reasonable to conclude that the complaints which have been made to my own knowledge in western and eastern cities, are not entirely without foundation.

It seems singular that the enumeration should be so long delayed. In 1901, if I recollect correctly, the enumeration was completed on the 1st of September, or the latter part of August. That was mentioned in the House on a previous occasion, and I think the Minister of Agriculture in reply to that said that ten years ago the enumeration commenced on the 1st of April, and this year it commenced on the 1st of June. If it could commence on the 1st of April ten years ago there seems no good reason why it should not have commenced on the 1st of April this year.

Mr. FISHER. Only the law.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why was the law changed?

Mr. FISHER. It was changed by this House six years ago.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Upon the initiative of the government, and upon a government measure.

Mr. FISHER. Unanimously passed six years ago without a complaint or a suggestion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Very good; suppose that was the case, what was the object or reason of it?

Mr. FISHER. That was explained when the law was passed, and my hon. friend was in the House and did not object.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think it should be explained now. I did not introduce the measure; I am not responsible for it. The minister did introduce it, and he is responsible for it. As a matter of fact the Australian census has been announced already, the announcement having been made two or three weeks ago in the public press of this country. The enumeration has been completed there. It cannot be completed here for some three or four months according to the minister's statement.

It has been completed in Great Britain and in other countries who have undertaken the work this year, and Canada seems to be coming along at the end of the procession. I would much like to ascertain whether I am really to be excluded from this census. I am prepared to give any information that may be necessary for the purpose of enumeration, and if it is not too late I would like to enjoy the privilege of being included in the census of 1911 which I believe I enjoyed in 1901.

Mr. PERLEY. Has the minister seen the definite statement in the newspapers concerning Rosemount?

Mr. FISHER. I have. It has been investigated, and I have received a report with regard to it.

Mr. HERRON. I am surprised at the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, and judging by it he cannot be well informed as to the manner in which the census is being taken. In one instance, near where I live several heads of families went to the enumerator for their district and complained that they were not included in the census, and they were told by him that as he had no authority to go outside certain lines he could not include them. I have heard very general complaints of the same sort from people who are perfectly reliable.

Mr. FISHER. Was there not another enumerator to take these people in another district?

Mr. HERRON. They were not taken by any enumerator.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Probably the gentleman from Montreal who complains about not being included in the census will find that he was taken by another enumerator at his summer residence so that he will be counted twice.

Mr. FISHER. He will not.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). An American gentleman who resides on the Canadian side of the Thousand Islands asked me recently what business the census enumerator had to come to his house and threaten to fine him if he did not answer a lot of questions.

Mr. LENNOX. Reciprocity.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). This American gentleman whose family resides there during the summer and who himself only comes there for a visit for a very few days in the year, was asked what his life insurance was, and what was the age of his wife and a lot of nonsense like that. He told them it was none of their business, and that as an American citizen he did not want to be included as a Canadian. I wish to ask the minister if all the Americans who reside during the summer months on the Thousand Islands are to be counted as part of the Canadian population. The enumerator for my district met me on the street and asked me what life insurance I carried and I told him to call at my office where I could get my papers and would answer him, and I have never seen him since. My wife told me he had called at the house and asked a few simple questions, but nothing about life insurance. Anyway it is an impertinent question to put on the paper, but nevertheless, if the enumerator had come to me I would have given him the information.

Now, with regard to the coal miners' strike in the West, I can tell the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that I sent suggestions to the Minister of Labour some years ago which if he had carried out would have prevented any trouble. I was president of a coal company in the Crowsnest Pass and there was a strike which lasted from March until April, and I proposed to the Minister of Labour that he should appoint a commission similar to the railway commission before whom parties could be heard and that when that commission gave its award it would be binding upon the parties, and it would be illegal to have any strike or lock-out.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that the hon. gentleman from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) suggested that the government should drive the men back at the point of the bayonet.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). It would be better to drive them back at the point of the bayonet, than to let innocent people be frozen to death as they are likely to be in the Northwest this year. Is the government going to let the settlers on the prairie suffer and die? There would be no point of the bayonet about it if we had a commission whose findings would be binding on both parties. I think the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) is quite astray when he says that there is any quantity of coal lands in the west which have not been taken up by speculators. If the government has coal mines let them notify the operators and the miners that if coal is not supplied in time to save the people from death the government will open up these lands, and let any one who wants to, work the mines and distribute the product, and that no charge will be made for it. At all events I advised our company to sell out the coal mine owing to the labour conditions in the west. The Minister of Labour talks about interfering in politics, but I tell him that his Labour Bureau is nothing but a political machine from head to foot, and every one of his correspondents throughout the country is simply an agent for the government. The 'Labour Gazette' is nothing but politics from start to finish. I throw the thing into the waste paper basket every time I get it, and I would be obliged to the minister if he would stop printing it at the expense of the country.

Mr. EMMERSON. Do you read it?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). No.

Mr. EMMERSON. How do you know it is politics then?

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). I read a few copies of it until I found out what it was, and I got disgusted with it. If my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) will speak the truth he will say it is a political production from beginning to end.

Mr. EMMERSON. Not at all.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). Then my hon. friend gets up and and asks us not to talk politics in reference to this coal strike. Let the hon. gentleman adopt the plan I suggest—appoint a labour commission, and let the verdict of that commission apply to both employers and employees.

Mr. LENNOX. In reference to the census, as a matter of justice to the press, which has been pretty violently abused by the Minister of Agriculture I do not know that it was far out. I believe, if there was an investigation, there would be found to be a good deal of ground for what the 'Journal' has said. Although the minister has had the good luck as an unmarried man to be enumerated twice, and his wife was not asked any questions as to her age, I may tell him that as far as I know I have not been enumerated at all. I have been living in a place where I have lived for many years, and since the adjournment of the House two months ago I have been pretty regularly at home, and I have never had a suggestion in reference to the enumeration. My house has been constantly occupied, and I feel quite confident that if any inquiry had been made at my residence I would have been told of it. I will inquire, however, to make it absolutely certain. I do not think this is an isolated case. I think numerous instances will be found all over the country in which enumerations have not taken place, and the minister need not get violent about it until he knows the facts better than he does at present. In some respects I know the enumerators have been very active. I was at some public gatherings where discussions of a political nature took place, and the South Simcoe enumerators were very active in interrupting and contradicting and making themselves offensive. That is the only knowledge I have at the present time of the duties performed by the enumerators in South Simcoe.

Mr. DOHERTY. I understood the Minister of Agriculture to say that the case of Rosemount had been investigated, but I did not gather what the result was.

Mr. FISHER. I have not got the report.

Mr. DOHERTY. The minister is not in a position to say that the statement of the reckless journalist in that case was not correct.

Mr. FISHER. I am not in a position to say positively.

Mr. DOHERTY. Rosemount in my section is a very large district. Another large district, Villeray, I believe, was entirely omitted, and attention was called to the fact by a paper which the minister would not characterize as reckless because it has the great prudence of supporting this government, and if I am not mistaken the commissioner himself admitted that it was overlooked. Then, it is stated generally by the newspapers that Hampton Court, a large apartment house, had been entirely overlooked. These cases seem to justify me in asking whether there is any method provided for checking the work of the enumerators, or does the department consider that its duty is done when it sends out enumerators and only concerns itself with their possible omissions when newspapers or individuals take upon themselves to call attention to them? If that is the position, it occurs to me that it is a very loose method of getting at the census. What is the provision for checking the enumerators?

Mr. FISHER. It is the duty of the commissioner to go over every schedule that comes in, and check it by his general knowledge of the district, and see that all the houses are included. If several houses were omitted, that would be evident from the fact that the numbers of those houses were not scheduled.

Mr. DOHERTY. As I understand, he only does that from his general knowledge of the locality. That will not enable him to go any further than to say that every house number has been counted up. There is no means of saying that the enumerator has made a correct return of the number of people in each house. The matter seems to me to be of sufficient importance to require some more effective check over the work of the enumerators.

Mr. FISHER. That would simply mean another enumeration by somebody else.

Mr. DOHERTY. I do not think it would be absolutely necessary to have a second enumeration. But we have now before us evidence of the fact that there are omissions, and I would think that would be something to be anticipated. I do not know the enumerators of the city of Montreal, but I would think that a check might be got at by making some sort of test which would enable one to arrive at a conclusion as to whether in a general way the work had been carefully done. It seems to me a very unsatisfactory answer to say that if an individual complains, the matter will be looked into and rectified. The department is charged with getting this work done. People of public spirit, when they find that they have not been enumerated, may come forward and point it out, but there are a great number of people who are careless about such matters or who do not really know that a census is going on at all. This is not a case in which there is a grievance on the part of a person whose name has been omitted. The work is being done for the public benefit and it transpires that the department charged with finding an effective way of getting it done correctly, sends out people to make the enumeration of whose qualifications or responsibility it is quite impossible for the public to have any knowledge.

Without casting any reflection upon the commissioners, there is no method given them whatever by which they can check the enumeration. Without proposing that another man should be sent out to do the enumeration over again, I submit that some means could be devised which would enable the commissioners to conclude whether the enumerators generally were doing their duty. For instance, somebody might be sent afterwards to inquire generally whether the enumerator had gone from house to house in that locality. The matter is one sufficiently important to warrant every precaution being taken. On the correctness of the census depends the right to representation of the different sections of this country. This important work has necessarily to be trusted to a class of our people who have no other occupation at that moment, and we are consequently depending upon the unchecked and uncontrolled action of enumerators of whose qualifications and responsibility we have no means of being informed and whose work we have no means of checking. Without proposing two separate enumerations, it seems to me that some method could be devised of finding out whether these men were doing their duty properly or not.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am rather surprised at the character of the complaint. In as much as the pay of each enumerator depends on the number of names he secures, one would think that he would show a good deal of zeal in securing a large number.

Mr. DOHERTY. Would it not be just as bad if too many names were enumerated? The complaint is not that we do not get as many as we should but that we have no guarantee of accuracy.

Mr. EMMERSON. So far the complaints we have heard are to the effect that a great many names have escaped the attention of the enumerator. I have not heard many complaints that too many names were entered except the complaint of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) who says that American citizens were entered in our census. I can quite understand that American citizens who own property in this country would have their names taken down as the enumerators would require to know who were the owners of the property. The hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) says it would be desirable to have a sort of review of the enumeration. He would like to have a supervisor to supervise the work of the census commissioner and enumerator in each county or district. As we are dependent upon individuals for the enumeration there must necessarily be inaccuracies, but I think that in the main we can fairly conclude that the census has been pretty accurately taken. In the section from which I come the commissioners, when they got their schedules from the enumerators took special pains—I know that to be the case at Westmoreland—sought to go through the several districts and inquire as to whether, generally speaking, there had been a correct census. The commissioner of course does not travel from house to house or from community to community, but he makes inquiry as to whether the enumerator has attended generally to his work. I am bound to admit that we did, in some instances, find some inaccuracies—one in particular because of a misunderstanding regarding the boundary of a district. As a result of the supervision thus taken by the county commissioners, the correction was made and the census properly taken with respect to that section. We must deal with this matter practically. There may be errors here and there as in the case of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden); and I am sure it would be a very unfortunate circumstance if his name were omitted as it would be if any man's name were omitted.

Every one counts one and we are all anxious to have as accurate a statement of the actual population in our respective sections as can be had. I think that an accurate census has been taken. I hope the enumerators have not omitted any names in the maritime provinces for I am sure that with the numbers we have been sending to the west during the past two or three years, we have suffered very largely in the matter of population and I trust that the enumerators throughout New Brunswick have not been negligent and have not failed to take the names of every individual. I had the honour of a call from the census officer; I was permitted to give him my name and age, and he took them down. I think we should deal with the matter practically and I hope there is no ulterior object in bringing to the notice of the House and the country any of these slight mistakes or inaccuracies or want of attention on the part of the officials that may have occurred. I think a sincere effort has been made to get the best men. I found it in Westmorland very difficult to secure men, people are not free. While it was difficult to get officials there was a splendid selection.

Mr. BLAIN. Did my hon. friend make the selection?

Mr. EMMERSON. I did not but I knew some of the names and had an opportunity of judging the character, capability and qualities of those engaged in the work and I only hope that throughout Canada they had an army of enumerators equal to those in the County of Westmorland.

Mr. BLAIN. Did the census commissioner in 1901 send out a letter similar to the one sent out by Mr. Blue this year asking that people who had not been enumerated would communicate direct with him as chief census officer?

Mr. FISHER. I do not remember such a letter being sent out.

Mr. BLAIN. Why was it necessary to send such a letter if the census was being taken correctly?

Mr. FISHER. Because of the remarks in certain newspapers.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think the census commissioners in the counties are asking that question generally.

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). Has the minister seen an article in the 'Winnipeg Telegram' of July 13, dealing with the taking of the census at Calgary. That article reads:

CITIZENS DECLARE CALGARY CENSUS A PUBLIC SCANDAL.

Hundreds of persons assert they haven't been counted—Dominion Government scored for its neglect—Eighteen men in City's Fire Hall not counted at all.

Calgary, Alta., July 12.—The manner in which the census is being taken in Calgary is now approaching a public scandal. To-morrow is the day which the census commissioner has set for the completion of the work, yet it is safe to say, declare citizens, that there are thousands of names which have been left off the lists.

In response to appeals in the newspapers hundreds of persons are coming forward declaring they have never seen a census enumerator.

Liberal Machine Agent.

Appointed commissioner for Calgary because of his faithful attachment to the Liberal machine, John W. Dingle has not even placed a telephone in his office.

The Dominion government is being roundly scored and it is even hinted that the present situation was designed for the purpose of a general scheme to cheat the west out of its proper parliamentary representation.

It was discovered to-day that no enumerator had visited the Central Fire Hall, where 23 men were employed.

Fear for Correct Count.

In another office where there are 23 employees, 12 have never seen the enumerators. Fears are expressed to-day that Calgary will not receive credit for anything like its proper population.

If that description of the state of affairs is at all accurate it would be the duty of the minister to direct the attention of his officials in that important city to their omission, and to have the remedy applied

It appears to me that a lot of census enumerators have been appointed for their political zeal rather than for their ability to take the census. The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) said that the men were financially interested in getting as many names as possible but an incompetent man would be negligent in his duties and incompetent men have been appointed on account of their political activities rather than for their ability to do the work. The taking of the census is a matter of great public importance, it has to do with the representation in this parliament and every constituency is vitally interested in the accurate taking of the census. It seems to me the minister has been derelict in his duty in appointing incompetent people to do this work.

Motion agreed to and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. URIAH WILSON (Lennox and Addington). Mr. Chairman. I have the honour to represent a very old agricultural county in the province of Ontario, a county which I believe understands this question perhaps as well as any agricultural county in this country. The electors of that county elected Sir Richard Cartwright in 1863 and he continued to support Sir John Macdonald until Sir Francis Hincks was taken into the cabinet as Financial Minister. Then Sir Richard became very independent and when Hon. Alexander Mackenzie offered him the position of Financial Minister in his cabinet he took the position and in 1873 was elected by a majority of 800. It will be remembered that the members of the cabinet went to the country before the general election and were returned. At the general election of 1874, he was returned by acclamation and in 1878 the gentleman whom he defeated in 1873 by 800 defeated him at the polls and Sir Richard, so far as I know, has never held a public meeting in the riding since that time. I feel that he was driven from the county because he opposed the National Policy.

I shall perhaps not again be a candidate for this House but I feel that I would not represent the feeling of the county of Lennox and Addington did I not oppose in this House what I believe will be injurious to this country. It is all very well for the government to place before the county through their speakers, as I believe they do all over the country, the 90,000,000 market. They never tell us a word about what the 90,000,000 market will do in the way of sending in their produce to our market. They do not tell the farmers that while we will have the privilege of sending eight men to sell goods in that country they will have the privilege of sending into our country 90 men; that while we have a surplus of farm products to sell perhaps representing $140,000,000 they have, according to an article in the 'Toronto News' on the 8th of this month, a surplus of $956,000,000 of products of a similiar character to dispose of.

I wish to discuss briefly the old reciprocity treaty of 1854. The conditions in Canada to-day are very different from what they were then as is known to every member of this House. We were then a few scattered provinces, having little if anything to do with each other. Our transportation system was very poor, we were practically a poor people and a small people in those days, a little over 3,000,000 people and our trade, which was very small, was principally with the United States. I do not believe that that treaty did as much for this country as many of its admirers pretend, because shortly after that treaty was signed we had what is known as the Russian war.

The price of farm products, as every body knows, went up higher, I think, than they have ever been since. Wheat went as high as $2 or $2.25 a bushel. The result was that we were prosperous for a time. I know a firm of three brothers that lived in our district. They said they could have cleared $60,000 on what wheat they held had they sold it at the right time. But unfortunately they held it too long, and they went to the wall, and became bankrupt on that one speculation. Well, I think the older men in this country will remember that in 1857, notwithstanding that we had this treaty in full force, we saw as hard times as had ever been seen in Canada up to that time, and that condition continued until about 1860 and 1861. But in 1861, you remember, the American rebellion broke out, and the war, as a matter of course, took away a great many men from the ordinary pursuits of life. The country had not the men to perform the ordinary avocations of life, and of course prices went up, and that was a great advantage to the people of Canada, because they were able to supply the food stuffs for the American people. But unfortunately for us, and I think for the American people, they took umbrage at the sympathies which some of our people manifested towards the rebellion. I myself was a very strong northern sympathizer, but there were some people in this country who sympathized strongly with the south. The American people took umbrage at that, and gave notice in 1865 that they would abrogate the treaty at the end of one year. That was done. We had been in the habit of dealing largely with them, and we depended largely on them to take the farm produce we raised. But nothing would persuade them to continue the treaty, or to deal fairly by us. It looks to me, and it always has looked to me since I have thought the matter over, that the American people have always treated us unfairly. They have always acted like a big boy bullying a little one. I do not think that is the kind of usage we had a right to expect from them, but that is the kind of usage we got.

We remember that in 1876 Sir John A. Macdonald introduced his resolution for a protective tariff, either reciprocity in trade or reciprocity in tariff. When he introduced that resolution in the House of Commons it was opposed by the then Mackenzie government, and the Liberal party, and although the times were very hard, and they had to increase the tariff on a general scale, I think, of about 2½ per cent, they did not alter, so far as I remember, the duties to any extent, they appeared to think that the tariff was as nearly perfect as it could be made. This resolution of Sir John A. Macdonald was introduced year after year, until 1878. Then the government dissolved the House and went to the country, and I do not think any gentleman occupying the treasury benches need information from me as to what the result was. The country went strongly in favour of protection, and protection has been continued from that day to the present. I know that in our riding the question was fully discussed, and the farmers were just as enthusiastic supporters of protection as the manufacturers were. We had it discussed by Sir Richard Cartwright, the Finance Minister of that day. He was opposed by a young man named Rowe, who had taken great pains to inform himself on the question, and he made it so hot for the Minister of Finance that he would not allow him to come to one of his meetings unless he spoke first. But Mr. Rowe made himself so familiar with the speeches of the Minister of Finance that he could repeat them, and answer him. The result was that Sir Richard would not allow him to come to his meetings at all. On that occasion the government was beaten. We did not believe it was possible to defeat Sir Richard, because he had large interests in our county, and because of his great wealth, and because he belonged to an old family. I recollect that the first vote I ever gave was against him, although he had been a Conservative. But I have always been one of the people, and I never believed in aristocracy, and do not now, and I never supported him. I have no sympathy with men who are not willing to associate with the people, and live with them. I have nothing personally against Sir Richard Cartwright, but he thought we had nothing good for him, and he went to live in Kingston. I recollect one little instance that occurred, and I was told this by the man himself. He was going to support Sir Richard, but he thought he would chaff him a little on his lack of ability to represent the riding, and Sir Richard replied: 'I want you to know, Daly, that I was educated to represent Canada.' 'Well,' said Daly, 'I would not have known it if you had not told me.' That is the way things were going then.

Now I want to speak a little on the action of the two parties when they came to power. When Sir John A. Macdonald came to power it was not believed by the Liberals of that day that he would put in force the National Policy as he had promised. But he did so. He thoroughly investigated the matter by a commission, and brought down such a measure of protection that the Liberals were greatly astonished at it. I believe the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie said that he had trotted out the whole white elephant. Now they carried out their pledges, and that is what I think every public man ought to do. I do not think any man has the right to ask the people to vote for him under certain conditions and then, when he comes to this House, to go back on his pledges. Now what was the difference between the course pursued by Sir John A. Macdonald, and his government in 1878-9, and that pursued by this government in 1896-7? Everybody supposed that the Liberal party was in favour of free trade, by the course they took in 1891, when they stumped this country from one end to the other in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, when they said they had nailed their colours to the mast, and they would never come down until their policy was carried. I think everybody remembers that, I remember it distinctly. Now when they came to power we expected, I think naturally expected, that they would make at least some changes in the tariff. I want to call the attention of the government to the changes they did make, which were very few. This tariff was revised in 1897 when this government was fresh from the country. They made these pledges, and told the people that they were being robbed by the manufacturers, that they were going to cut the head off the monster of protection, and trample on its body, and all that kind of thing. Now in 1897, when they revised the tariff, the first group of items was ales, beers, wines and liquors—10 items. These were let severely alone, save that one was changed and increased.

Agriculture, animals and dairy products; 93 items under the tariff of 1894. Of these, 93 items, 81 were left unchanged, 5 were decreased and 6 increased. One was changed from specific to ad valorem.

Fish and products of the fisheries, 19 items under the tariff of 1894. The duties on these 19 items were left unchanged under the tariff of 1897.

Books and papers; 18 items, all left unchanged.

Chemicals and drugs; 14 items; 9 unchanged, 4 increased, one lowered.

Opium; 3 items; all unchanged.

Colours, paints, oils, varnishes; 21 items; 14 unchanged, 3 increased and 4 decreased.

Leather, rubber and manufactures thereof; 11 items; 8 unchanged and 3 increased.

Jewellery and materials thereof; 8 items; 6 unchanged, one increased and one decreased.

Textiles, furs, etc.; 51 items; 22 unchanged, 17 increased, 6 decreased and 6 readjusted as between specific and ad valorem.

Sundries; 26 items; 21 unchanged, 3 decreased, one increased, one new.

Sugar, syrups and molasses; 7 items; one unchanged, 6 increased.

Excluding the items of iron and iron manufactures, there were 348 items in the tariff, of which 244 were unchanged, 54 were increased, 34 decreased and 16 readjusted as between specific and ad valorem.

I will appeal to the First Minister if he thinks that he carried out his pledges to the people when he made that tariff. I remember the statement that the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) made in his speeches in the House and in Montreal, that, although he had talked so strongly in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, he had converted himself to the belief that it was not right, that when they came to form a government and he entered it there was an understanding that they would have a reasonable tariff and that they would not go in for reducing the tariff as had been advocated by himself and his colleagues. I think we have made it pretty plain that the government have not done as they agreed to do. It is true that since 1907, from time to time, they have made some slight changes in the tariff, some items they have increased and some they have decreased. The most noted change they made was in giving the British preference. If I remember correctly they raised the duties on almost all goods that came from England before they gave the preference. But there was a great difference between the preference they gave and the preference advocated by Sir Charles Tupper and his supporters. Sir Charles Tupper believed in a mutual preference; that is to say if they would give us a preference in their markets we would give them a preference in ours. I think that the right hon. Prime Minister said in Toronto that he was just as capable of getting that kind of a bargain from Great Britain as was Sir Charles Tupper, and that he would endeavour to do it. But, I am afraid that when he went to England he changed his tactics. He said that it was a free gift and that we did not want anything in return. That is not the way England deals with us. England does not give us any preference in her market that she does not give to every other nation under heaven as far as I know. If we give her a preference—and I would be in favour of giving her any reasonable preference we could—I think she should give us something in return. I do not see why she should treat her own children as badly or no better than a stranger who sets up a high tariff against her, who does not treat her fairly, but who simply takes advantage of her position to impose as high duties against her as possible. I may come to the treatment that President Taft is prepared to give to England before I get through. He seems very desirous that this pact should get through before we can make any arrangement with Great Britain because he says as a matter of course that when preferential trade leaves England and goes around the world it will make a tariff wall against the United States which they will not be able to get over. That is the trouble and I would think that the government would see it. I think it would be much better to have closer trade relations with the motherland than that we should try to cultivate trade relations with a nation that does not produce anything but what we produce. A great bulk of their surplus is exactly like our surplus, and while we have a large surplus to export they have a much larger one. According to a statement in a newspaper that I read the other day the United States have $956,000,000 worth of goods to dispose of in other countries. How can we expect to sell profitably to people who have such a surplus? There was a transaction in our town the other day. A man got sick of business and wanted to sell out. If he could have sold to some man who wanted the business as a going concern he could have got pretty nearly par for it, but unfortunately he had to sell out to a man who did not want the business as a going concern and, therefore, he had to sell at sixty cents on the dollar. That is about the way I view this reciprocity business. We are dealing with people who do not want our surplus. If we send our surplus over to the United States we displace just so much of the surplus of the United States, and they will, therefore have to find a market for it. I noticed a statement in the 'Globe' the other day to the effect that they were going to give the farmers better prices for their products, and that at the same time they were going to make cheaper living for the mechanics and working people. How it is possible to do that is something that I have not been able to find out, and I would be very glad to sit down if any man would get up in this House and tell me how it can be done.

I do not know and I do not anticipate that I will be able to find out from any person now present in the House.

As far as protection is concerned, we all know that both parties have been in favour of it. The party at present in power claim to be the low tariff party, but they have given us no indication of it. They claim that the Tory party, as they call it, instead of the Liberal Conservative party, is a high tariff party and that their policy is to increase the tariff. That is not true, and any motion that has been made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) has not been specially for an increased tariff, but for an adequate tariff——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox)——in order that we may equalize the tariff, in cases where changes have to be made. My right hon. friend says 'hear, hear. I see that he is in favour of that. But, he has not done much for the poor farmer in the way of providing a revenue tariff for him. They have been here in great numbers to see him, and while he was out in the west he said that the tariff would be investigated by a tariff commission and that they would make such changes as they thought desirable after getting the information.

But is that the course he pursued? Did he not send two of his ministers to Washington, who when they presented their programme to Taft and Knox, these astute Americans said: 'Why, we will not only give you all you ask, but will give you free trade in everything.' That is what the Liberals wanted in 1891, but in 1911, I think they were wise in refusing it. True, the Liberals went back on their principles by not accepting free trade, but that is a good thing for the country and it does not trouble the Liberals much. They have got the habit of breaking their solemn pledges and a thing like that does not worry them.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was referring to the tariff policy which the government had placed before the country. The changes they made in the tariff were so slight that they were almost imperceptible. With reference to this reciprocity arrangement, Mr. McKay, the leader of the opposition in the Ontario legislature, saw fit to pay a visit to my riding, and addressed a meeting at the village of Tamworth, about 20 miles from Napanee. I have it on reliable authority that there were present about 250 people, 75 per cent of them Liberals, and when it was asked that those in favour of reciprocity should stand up, only 27 stood up, and they were wise enough not to ask for a contrary vote. What I wonder at is the great effort the government is making to get rid of about 20 per cent of our farm products. It is stated on good authority that we consume in this country 80 per cent of the products that we raise on the farm. It is also reported that England takes 10 per cent, leaving only 10 per cent to be disposed of to other countries. Under such circumstances, when we were doing so well, it does seem to me that it was unwise for the government, especially in such a hurry, to send representatives to Washington without even taking the trouble to inquire what the needs of the country were. It is said that President Taft had his experts go all over the United States and Canada to gather information which he submitted to the Congress of the United States, and that he had this information when our representatives met him. I understand that our government took no such pains. If they did, they have not laid the information before this House as far as I am aware. They, therefore, were not in as good a position to deal with the question as were the representatives of the United States. It is stated that very few even of the cabinet knew what arrangements had been made until the day they were presented to the House. They had a cabinet meeting just before that, and the Finance Minister came direct from that meeting to the House and made the announcement to the public. Under such circumstances is it any wonder that the leading business men of Toronto, of whom 18 or 20 were prominent Liberals, should issue a manifesto protesting against such a course as that, especially as they had the promise of the First Minister that before any changes were made in the tariff there would be a commission to investigate the whole tariff question? These people held a public meeting in Massey Hall in Toronto, at which all the speakers except one, I believe, were Liberals, men of high standing as business men, and men who have been life-long Liberals. I want to refer to a few remarks that were made on that occasion by Sir Mortimer Clark, a gentleman whom this government appointed lieutenant-governor of the province of Ontario, a man who has spent 50 years in this country and a man of more than ordinary intelligence. 'Not here for the party, but for the country'—that was one of his statements, and it is a motto that might well be followed by any man in public or private life. 'A mere handful of men changing the whole policy of the country and compelling us to accept.' This is what he protested against. He did not see, and I do not think anybody sees, why two men should go to Washington and change the whole policy of this country without any notice being given to the country or to parliament. That is a matter well worthy of the attention of the whole country. He said further: 'A United States railroad magnate told me that he approved of the agreement because it renders impossible closer relations between Canada and Great Britain.' If there is anything we should desire in the matter of trade, it is to make the very best possible arrangements with the mother country, which is the great consumer of the surplus products of the world. There is no posibility of our selling profitably our surplus to the United States, because they have eight or ten times as much surplus as we have, and anything we send to the United States must be sold to speculators, who must sell it to other people to get profit out of it, while anything they send to us only displaces so much of our own product, for which we are obliged to find a market elsewhere. Everybody knows that the home market is very much better than a foreign market, because somebody has to pay the middleman his profit as well as the freight and other charges on the goods that are shipped abroad. Taft says: 'We are at the parting of the ways.' There are only two ways for Canada—the way to Washington and the way to the greater empire beyond the seas. Is it any wonder that strong men like Sir Mortimer Clark protest against any such statement as that? I have greater faith in my fellow-countrymen than to believe that they are at all in favour of closer political relations with the United States. In fact, I think it is a mistake to have very much to do with them, because in other days, when it would have been to our advantage to have reciprocity with them, and to their advantage, too, what did Blaine say? He said: 'If the Canadians want to trade with us let them join us; we will not give them the benefit of our market while they stay apart from us.' That is the spirit in which they received us at all times. In 1898, when representatives of the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier went to Washington, were they treated kindly? Were they met as they expected to be met? In the old days, when the other government was in power, the present Minister of Agriculture said: 'If you just change the government you will have no trouble whatever in getting reciprocity with the United States.' We changed the government and we did not get reciprocity when we wanted it, and it seems to me that the government themselves got so disgusted that they threw up the sponge and said: 'We do not want to have anything more to do with those people.' Sir Mortimer Clark said further: 'The United States have always been hostile to Canada. I have been 50 years in this country, and have never seen any friendly act on the part of our neighbours to the south.' That is a pretty strong statement on the part of a leading man in this country, but it is probably true. Mr. Lash and several other gentlemen made speeches on that occasion, but I do not purpose to quote them at the present time. I see that Mr. McKay is very glad to lose millionaires in this country, but I think he is very glad to get other millionaires from the United States.

Mr. LENNOX. He does not object to a dredging contract himself.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Has he got one?

Mr. LENNOX. He used to have one.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Well, I do not know anything about Mr. McKay, and therefore, I am not going to say anything about him, because I think a man should be very careful when talking about public men not to malign them in any way.

Let me now contrast some of the exports of Canada to the United States with some of our imports from that country. We are told by the Liberal party that the United States is the great market for our products and that if we had access to that market of 90,000,000 people we would get better prices for our goods than we do at home. Let me show the absurdity of that contention by the figures taken from our trade returns. Take the article of butter, we exported to the United States:

1907	35,078
1908	43,045
1909	54,894
1910	201,968
Total	$371,152

Or in the whole five years we exported butter to the United States—and I have taken these figures from the return of trade and commerce—$371,152. That is all we exported to that market of 90,000,000 people.

Take the article of cheese we exported as follows:

1906	$16,389
1907	6,918
1908	27,247
1909	28,936
1910	63,309
Total in five years	$142,799

Then take the article of eggs, about which we have heard a good deal of talk from hon. gentlemen opposite. We exported eggs to the United States, as follows: ,

1906	$11,924
1907	9,047
1908	9,846
1909	14,952
1910	13,896
Total in five years	$59,665

Now let us see what we imported from the United States of the same articles. If we imported a good deal more than we exported, surely that would indicate that our market is really better than theirs. Our imports of butter from the United States, were as follow.:

1906	$54,426
1907	87,997
1908	77,794
1909	156,443
1910	18,075
Total	$394,937

That is quite a little more than we exported to them. Take the next article of cheese. We imported cheese from the United States, as follows:

1906	$ 45,904
1907	84,084
1908	116,851
1909	55,030
1910	48,739
Total	$350,608

As contrasted with $142,799 which was the amount we exported in the same period. Take the next article of eggs. We imported eggs from the United States as follows:

1906	$ 92,172
1907	142,868
1908	216,278
1909	238,842
1910	179,408
	$869,568

Thus our total imports of eggs in these five years was $869,568 worth, and all we exported to the United States in the same period was $59,665 worth, showing a balance of trade against us in eggs alone of $809,903. It certainly does seem to me that in that case we got decidedly the worst of the bargain.

Let us now look to our exports of cattle. Cattle, over one year old, shipped to the United States:

1906	$ 185,213
1907	471,620
1908	532,523
1909	508,416
Total	$2,317,767

Contrast that with what we shipped to the old country—that country whose market, if this pact goes through, we will lose to quite an extent, because it looks as though the Americans would do everything they could to break up the connection that now exists between the mother country and Canada. To Britain we exported of cattle over one year old:

1906	$11,074,199
1907	10,200,137
1908	8,584,806
1909	10,115,793
1910	9,976,918
Total	$49,951,852

Comparing that with our exports of $2,317,000 to the United States, we have a difference of over $47,000,000 in favour of the English market and against the United States market—that market which the government are now making such great efforts to get.

Our total imports from the United States in 1910 amounted $239,070,949, and our exports to $106,026,137. These figures are taken from our trade and navigation returns and they show a balance of trade against us of $152,944,412. Of these goods we allowed to come in free of duty from the United States, $79,257,600 as against $23,480,217 allowed to come in free from Great Britain. So that from what I can see our best policy is to stick to what we have and not make this leap in the dark when we are doing very well as it is. Should we go into this reciprocal arangement, we do not know what will become of us. I never yet heard that the Yankees when they wanted to make a bargain, did not do their level best to get the best of it.

An hon. MEMBER. As they will in this instance.

Mr. WILSON (Lennox). Yes, but I do not believe that the country will ratify that policy.

I can say with the greatest emphasis that I believe the county I represent will, in the next parliament, be represented by another gentleman who has pronounced himself strongly against reciprocity. If he had not done so I do not think he would have received the nomination in our county.

Canada's exports of wheat for the last five years to Great Britain and to the United States were as follow:

Year.	Exports to Great Britain.	Exports to United States.
1906	$30,622,824	$ 298,160
1907	20,710,973	630,349
1908	42,911,610	102,849
1909	51,350,211	602,661
1910	58,538,772	1,883,637
Total in 5 years.	$204,125,390	$6,201,114

According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, we imported from the United States a great deal more wheat than we exported to them. The wheat imported into Canada from the United States for these five years was:

WHEAT IMPORTED INTO CANADA.

Year.
1906	$ 578,622
1907	1,167,402
1908	5,138,455
1909	9,431,346
1910	12,070,811
Total in five years	$28,387,706

We, a small people of eight millions, took from them $28,000,000, while they, a large people of 90,000,000, took from us $6,200,000. Does that look as though we were getting a great market where we would be able to sell our surplus at a great profit? When you want to sell goods, you must find the man who wants to buy them for his own use; the speculator always wants a profit.

The American Bureau of Statistics estimates the value of Canadian farm produce for the year 1907 at $532,992,100. That is quite a large amount, and from that amount I wish to pick out some of Canada's specialties.

I do not think any one who has studied the pork business can believe it possible for us to compete with the American corn fed pork, they can outdo us every time if they try, and I think they have been doing it. Our exports of these products to the United States and their exports to Canada, for the same period were:

BACON AND HAMS.

Or, our imports of ham and bacon from the United States exceeded our exports to that country by $3,356,832.

Where do we sell our bacon and hams, for we have quite a surplus of them, and you can see that we do not sell them to the ninety million market? We send them to Great Britain, our best customer. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, our export of hams and bacons to Great Britain were:

These figures, I think, demonstrate that the market which we want is the English market.

The Americans, of course, produce a great deal more of agricultural produce than they know what to do with. For instance, the United States exported in 1909 5,207,151 dozen of eggs valued at $1,199,522; of butter 5,281,261 pounds valued at $1,268,210; of cheese 6,822,842 pounds, valued at $857,091; of condensed milk, $1,375,104; of lard, $52,712,569; of pork, $4,599,431; ham and shoulders, cured, $23,525,307; beef, fresh, $12,698,594; beef, salted and pickled, $3,438,048. The total value of the meat and dairy produce exported by the United States in 1909 was $166,521,949. It does seem to me that a country with such an abundance of everything that they exported over $166,000,000 worth of goods exactly similar to what we are raising does not afford a market for our surplus products, because the American who buys the surplus from us in this country must be a speculator.

He certainly will not want it for use in his country; he must have a profit, and our people who raise these articles must pay the freight to take the articles to their destination, as well as the middlemen's profit.

Now I want to take up a little more time on the pork question. I have a circular here issued by the Ingersoll Packing Company, signed by C. E. L. Wilson, manager and director. I will read what he says before I give the figures:

> This is absolutely correct as taken from our books and open to inspection by any government officer for verification.

That seems to me to make it very strong, because the books are open for verification if the government see fit to send any of their officers there to look at them. He gives the prices for ten years:

Now, I think I have read enough to satisfy most people that the American market is not better than ours for most of our goods. I think that our pork is a better pork than the pork they raise, because our pork is fed on barley, pease and other hard feed, while theirs is fed, I believe, on corn; and as a matter of course, their cheap corn-fed pork and beef will come into competition with our business, and interfere seriously with the farmers of our country.

Now, there are some other things this government did not take into onsideration when they made this arrangement. It does not seem possible to me that a government with its eyes open would go to Washington and make a contract to regulate the duty on goods, and have that contract apply to ten or twelve other nations from which we get no compensation whatever. It seems to me absurd, and I am going to read some of the duties. I think if we are going to have reciprocity at all, we ought to have it all round. We ought not to be made a dumping ground. In fact, our government has already passed a law some years ago against allowing the Americans to dump cheaply bought goods in our market. But they did not seem to take any notice of these other things. If it is necessary to prevent men who go to the United States and buy goods at low prices to put them in here at the same price they pay, why should we allow other countries to come into our markets and sell their products without paying any duty, while we have to pay a large duty to get into their markets? Now there is the Argentine Republic, Austria-Hungary, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Venezuela and Bolivia. That list does not include the British possessions. As I understand it, this contract applies to all the British possessions as well as those countries I have mentioned that have the favoured-nation clause. If that is the case, let us see what some of these countries do. Take New Zealand. Barley, 48·6 cts per 100 lbs. Butter, 20 per cent, cheese, 20 per cent; eggs, 20 per cent. That is the duty we have to pay to get these articles into their market, while we will allow them to bring their articles of the same character into our market free. Then take Australia. Butter, 6 cents per lb; cheese, 6 cents per lb; eggs, 12 cents per doz.

We will allow them to bring in their eggs, butter and cheese free under this arrangement.

Austria-Hungary:

Wheat, 58 cents per 100 lbs.
Butter, natural, salted, $3.22 per 100 lbs.
Other fine cheese for the table, $5.52 per 100 lbs.

Denmark:

Butter in hermetically sealed vessels, $4.86 per 100 lbs.
Cheese, $2.43 per 100 lbs

France:

Calves (live weight), $3.51 per 100 lbs.
Pigs (live weight), $2.20 per 100 lbs.
Fresh butter, $2.63 per 100 lbs.
Fine cheese (affine), soft, $1.75 per 100 lbs.

Italy:

Oxen, $7.33 each.
Wheat, 65·8 cents per 100 lbs.
Salted butter, $1.75 per 100 lbs.
Soft cheeses, $1.32 per 100 lbs.

Japan:

Swine, 25 per cent.
Butter, 10·02 per 100 lbs.
Cheese, $6.40 per 100 lbs.

If necessary I can go over this whole list, but I think this will show us what we are doing. Now, I come to the list of exports of farm produce from the United States. United States exports of farm produce have increased from $370,000,000 to $490,000,000 in a year, as follows

Animals from	23,000,000	to	47,000,000
Breadstuffs	161,000,000	"	216,000,000
Provisions, including meat	134,000,000	"	180,000,000
Fruits and nuts..	17,000,000	"	18,000,000
Hides, about..	1,000,000	"	1,000,000
Hops, from..	1,000,000	"	4,000,000
Vegetables, about	3,000,000	"	3,000,000
Tobacco, unmanufactured	30,000,000	"	31,000,000

These are the people that we are expected to deal with and it is in their country, that we are asked to find a market for our surplus at a profit. Mr. Taft, that genial gentleman who captured the two ministers who went over to meet him accepted their proposition at once and said: 'Boys, here is more; you can have it all if you want to, but do not take more than you can get through.' Here is something which appeared in the Montreal 'Star' on the 28th April, 1911, to which I desire to call the attention of the House. It is a comment on the speech made by President Taft in New York on the 27th April, 1911. He met there the American Newspaper Publishers' Association:

In New York last night, speaking before the American Newspaper Publishers' Association whose president, Mr. John Norris says that they would save $6,000,000 a year on their paper mills if they could only secure access to Canadian pulp wood, President Taft again put in a stout denial that reciprocity means annexation. He said that 'the talk of annexation is bosh,' and that to present it as an objection to reciprocity should be treated as 'one of the jokes of the platform.' He denied as well that the Americans desire to annex Canada, giving as proof his belief that they already have all the territory they can possibly govern.

A robust denial is a fine thing; but the big President of the United States should take note of the fact that it is possible for a denial to deny too much.

However, there was the denial, big, bold and all-embracing—almost amounting to a denial that the Americans are human like other people and desire to extend the boundaries of their beloved Republic—but, side by side, with this denial, were such statements as these:

'There are other natural resources which I need not stop to enumerate which will become available to us as if our own if we adopt and maintain commercial union with Canada.'

'But there are other—even broader—grounds than this which should lead to the adoption of this agreement. Canada's superficial area is greater than that of the United States between the two oceans. The government is one entirely controlled by the people, and the bond uniting the Dominion with the mother country is light and almost imperceptible.'

I am not going to read the whole of this but there is a paragraph at the bottom that I would like to have placed on record.

Then, again, the President makes no bones of saying that the timber resources of Canada 'will open themselves to us inevitably under the operation of this agreement.'

How?

The agreement does not open them. It leaves our Crown lands still protected by the provincial governments. What does the President mean? He probably means what Mr. John Norris meant when the latter told the Congressional committee that, once they obtained the leverage of free access to our privately-owned forest lands, 'the pressure will be irresistible' upon the provincial governments to throw open the rest.

There are other speeches here about annexation and all that, but I am not going to refer to them just now. There is one thing that I particularly would like to call the attention of the House to and that is tnat for every $6 worth we export to the mother country there is $5 worth grown on the farm. That is well worth considering. If we are going to try to help our farmers the country that wants the product of our farms is the country that we should deal with.

It is a stale story to tell of the value of the British market to the Canadian farmer. But it may be as well to remind ourselves of a few facts. First, the British market is largely a farmer's market. Out of every six dollars' worth of Canadian products that we export to Britain, five dollars worth come off the Canadian farm. The figures are these: Total Canadian exports to Great Britain for 1909—$126,384,726. Food products exported from Canada to Great Britain—$101,992,448. Our other markets are not of this character. Out of every six dollars we export to foreign markets, only a little over one dollar comes from the Canadian farm. And out of every six dollars exported to other British possessions, less than three dollars are Canadian farm produce. They may talk just as much as they like about their 90,000,000 market, but they have now a market in England that takes five dollars worth of farm produce of every six dollars we export. It seems to me that is the market we should cultivate. It is easy to see how little of this enormous market Canada has supplied when we remember that the total Canadian exports to Great Britain this same year were $101,992,448 of farm produce—less than half the British imports of wheat alone. Both Argentine and the United States beat us. Argentine sold the British people £37,717,295 ($184,900,000) worth of farm products; and the Americans sold them £118,-353,893 ($574,000,000) worth.

It seems to me that the Americans would have more difficulty in getting rid of that immense amount of stuff if we had preferential trade as we should have instead of trying to make a reciprocal treaty with the United States. We know that the Americans are very anxious for this arrangement, one reason being that their manufacturers have invested their money on this side, already to the extent of 226,000,000 dollars, and what they want to do is to keep that capital in their own country, give employment to their own people, and sell their goods to us. That's the trick they are up to. There was a considerable amount of evidence taken before the Ways and Means Committee of Congress—although no evidence has been considered necessary by the Canadian government—and Mr. Aaron Jones made the following statement before the Congressional Committee.

The principle on which the protective policy has been defended during the past twenty years (20) is that all classes and interests of the country, should receive equal protection against the competition of foreign products. It was to carry out this principle that the duties on farm products were imposed by the McKinley law, and reimposed by the Dingley and Payne Tariff Act. Had it not been for the tariff on farm products the protective system would long ago have been abolished.

The purpose of the tariff on farm products has been to exclude those of Canada from our markets, and if this Bill becomes law it means the end of protection, so far as the farmers are concerned.

Is it possible that they believe that 6,000,-000 farmers will tamely submit to free trade in farm products and high tariff for manufacturers?

Why are cattle, sheep and swine on the free list, while meats, fresh and cured are taxed 1¼ cents per pound? Are not the farmers as much entitled to protection as the millers or great meat packers of Chicago?

Against this proposition we earnestly protest, and we insist that there shall be no free trade for farmers and high tariff for manufacturers, but that if farm products go on the free list, manufactured articles must also be made free, and they will inside a very short time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken longer than I ought, and in conclusion I will say that I am fully persuaded in my own mind that this trade arrangement made by two cabinet ministers with the United States government is not in the best interests of Canada. I am strongly opposed to it, and what little I am able to do in my constituency and elsewhere I shall willingly do to defeat this pact. I believe with Sir Mortimer Clark, ex-governor of Ontario, that we should put country before party, and that if we are loyal Canadians desirous of building up an empire on this northern half of the North American continent, it becomes us to stick close to the mother country because we need her protection and her capital, and we need her markets in which to sell our goods at remunerative prices.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings). At this late stage of the debate upon this very important question misnamed reciprocity, the members of the government seem to be exhibiting an insatiable desire for information and an undying interest in their country, by, with the exception of three ministers out of fourteen, all being absent from the House and these three ministers being supported by the presence now of fourteen Liberal members out of a total of 135, the remainder of the government members being represented by empty chairs. That is not a very inspiring thing for the member who is addressing the House, and I am sure if the people of the country knew of the lack of interest the government is exhibiting in this important question it would not inspire confidence in the government or faith in it. Why this government should with such undue haste endeavour to force this measure through parliament at this unseasonable time of the year, and, to use a crude expression, cram it down the throats of the people of this country, one is at a loss to understand. It suggests, to put it in the mildest form, that there must be some sinister motive behind the whole thing; something more than an interest in the welfare of the country that is actuating the government to press this measure with such undue haste now.

The opposition have taken occasion as it was offered, to criticise, as appeared to them to be just and warranted, this measure when it has come before the Chair; and because they have had the boldness to express their condemnation of it, hon. members of the government and the press supporting the government have seen fit to apply to us the name of obstructionists. Well, Sir, if the fair discussion of this measure, and the offering to the people of this country of the honest conviction of the opposition in this House, and pointing out in their judgment the disastrous effects which the passing of this measure through parliament will inflict on this country, entitles the opposition to the appellation of obstructionists, then, Sir, I for one am perfectly willing to be called an obstructionist. I think, Sir, it is preferable to be called an obstructionist under these circumstances than to be called by a name that would fittingly characterize the conduct of any government that would try, as this government is now trying, to force such a measure through parliament and upon the people of this country, against their wish, and without affording them an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it. I have had the privilege of occupying a seat in this House for a period of upwards of ten years, representing during that time a constituency containing a population of upwards of 40,000 people. I have always believed it to be the privilege of those 40,000 people, in common with all other loyal citizens of Canada, to express through their representatives in parliament their opinion upon any legislation that might be introduced here. I do not mean simply that the voice of the representatives of the people should be heard, but that it should be effectively heard, accordingly as the arguments adduced by that hon. member, the reasons given by him for his opinion, might meet with favour from the hon. members of this House and the country as a whole. I have always understood that to be one of the first principles, the main spring as it were, of representative and responsible government. But, Sir, when this trade agreement was introduced in this parliament, in the manner in which it was, the opinion which I had held for so many years received a very rude shock, and I was almost inclined to ask myself, are we living to-day in the dark ages, when responsible and representative government was unknown, or are we living in the twentieth century, which has been said to belong to Canada? If one would yield to the feeling imposed upon him by the action of this government in relation to this matter, I venture to say that he would feel that we were living in the dark ages. It has been the proud boast of the Canadian people, it is the proud boast of the Canadian people to-day, that we have the freest form of responsible government; and, Sir, when without warning and in a single instant almost, there is forced upon this parliament and upon the country a bargain, an agreement, a pact, or what ever it may be called, made by two hon. members of the government, without a mandate from the people, without a warrent from this parliament, then I say that our proud boast of responsible government has just about diminished to the vanishing point. A great deal of time has been taken up by hon. members of the government, and particularly by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, in the speech which he addressed to this House some time ago, in an attempt to convince parliament and the country that the opposition members of this House were opposed to any negotiations being carried on with the United States with a view to improving the trade relations between Canada and that country. I have listened during the course of this debate to a great many of the speeches that have been made by hon. members on this side of the House, and I have read a great many more, and I say without hesitation that I have never heard nor have I read in any of those speeches any expression of opinion or idea to justify that statement. On the contrary, it is not the desire of the opposition as I understand it, speaking for myself at any rate, that negotiations with the United States should not be carried on for the purpose of bettering trade relations between these two countries. That is not what the opposition object to; but what we do object to is the making of a hard and fast agreement with the American people, and that without warrant from parliament, and then bringing that agreement before parliament without affording an opportunity for amendment or for the alteration of a single line, a word, or even a letter; telling the hon. members of this House that that agreement must be given effect to, in every word, every line and every letter, just as these two hon. gentlemen have seen fit in their wisdom to make it with the United States. It is, however, in view of these circumstances, somewhat refreshing to know that all hon. members on the government side have not felt themselves bound to such an extent by party allegiance as to sacrifice what they believe to be in the interests of this country for the sake of advancing the interests of the political party to which they belong.

Those hon. members on the government side who had the courage to stand up in this House, and denounce this pact deserve credit, and the thanks of the people of this country.

Nearly every hon. member who has spoken on this question has referred to the language used by the President of the United States in discussing this matter before his people as regards its relation to Canada. The president, Mr. Taft, said that Canada stood now at the parting of the ways. In view of the history of the last forty-two years, it seems to me that Mr. Taft chose very unhappy language in which to express his ideas. And if I were to compare him to a second Rip Van Winkle, I think I would not be far from the truth because apparently he has been asleep for a very long time if he imagines that Canada is now only at the parting of the ways. Why, Canada was at the parting of the ways some forty-two years ago when the old reciprocity treaty between this country, and the United States was abrogated. Then was the time when the Canadian people had to make a choice between adopting a policy which would lead them into a stronger, and a firmer alliance with the mother land—a stronger federation with Great Britain—or whether they would choose the opposite course which would lead them into freer trade relations and ultimately into political annexation with the United States. Then was the time when Canada was at the parting of the ways. She then made her choice, and subsequent events during the past forty-two years have fully demonstrated that the choice then made by the Canadian people was a wise and patriotic one. It is true that when that choice was made it did not promise very much for the Canadian people; and perhaps if they had been actuated by the sole desire to benefit from trade relations they might have made a different choice, but there was something more in the Canadian mind, and heart, than mere commercial advantage, and a simple desire for pecuniary benefit. Canada, therefore, chose to stand by the mother country. True for a long time the course which Canada then adopted was not an easy one. True it was beset by many obstructions—not only natural obstructions, but artificial ones placed there by the American people in the endeavour if possible to wreck the Canadian confederation, and destroy the connection between Canada and Great Britain. During that forty years Canada has passed many mile-posts, not ordinary mile-posts, but monuments of progress that are bound to last forever to the glory of this Dominion. During all these years we received no encouragement, not a bit of assistance, from the American people who are now so anxious to bring us into a closer alliance with themselves. Throughout all these years, the Americans, instead of holding out the hand of friendship to us in return for the hand of friendship we offered them, steadily opposed Canadian interests, and endeavoured to force Canada into such a position that we would be obliged sooner or later to join our fortunes with those of the republic. It is certainly something which Canadians may well be proud of that they were able, in spite of all these obstacles, and obstructions placed in their way by the United States, in spite of all these coercive efforts, to steer clear of these obstructions, and go ahead on a firm, and solid foundation with full steam upon the engine of prosperity, and with that engine headed towards the motherland, in the endeavour to bind still closer the ties that have always existed between us and Great Britain. Canada, at the time of the abrogation of the old reciprocity treaty in 1866, was not in the position she occupies to-day. Conditions then were very different from what they are now. At that time we were not a united Dominion as we are to-day, and had not then the vast extent of productions from the farm which we now have. We had not then the means of transportation we now enjoy nor had we the population or the wealth. In fact our position was such that the total revenues of this country were insufficient to meet its wants.

When the reciprocity treaty first came into force there were special reasons why the United States desired a closer trade relationship with Canada. The fast approaching civil war in that country made it most desirable that it should have a friend close at hand, and a source of supply. Canada then offered the greatest inducements in this respect. At that time also was effected the change of policy in Great Britain, under which the corn laws were repealed, and free trade inaugurated. All the advantages that previously existed in favour of the British colonies were practically wiped away, and Canada was not in a position to compete with other countries in the markets of the world through her lack of transportation facilities. The conditions then were such that reciprocity with the United States was about the only thing that could help Canada.

Although the conditions were such as I have described, yet it took eight years of constant negotiations between these two countries to bring about the treaty of reciprocity that went into effect at that time. A great deal has been said in this debate of the advantages that Canada derived from that reciprocity treaty. There were special reasons for that. Prices during a part of that period were inflated. Prices in the United States were better than could be obtained in Canada, but that was owing to the civil war in the United States. The effect of that struggle was to take from the fields of agriculture and production, a very large portion of the workers and to put them into the field of battle with the result that production in the United States fell off so that the wants of the people could not be supplied and the products of the Canadian people were at a premium in the United States. But it was not a continuous period of prosperity by any means. During the time that that reciprocity treaty was in force, the first bank failure in Canada, that of the old band of Upper Canada occurred, That was not due to the prosperity brought to Canada by the United States, it was owing to the circumstances in which Canada found herself at that time. But the moment it appeared to be necessary to the Canadian people and they undertook to exercise their undoubted right of putting on a duty and raising a revenue, just that moment, when it ceased to be to the interest of the United States to have that treaty continued with Canada, they repealed it. It did not take eight years to repeal it as it did to introduce it; notice was given just as soon as their interest in reciprocity and in Canada ceased. Sir, history is about to repeat itself, in my judgment. If this treaty comes into force it will be taken advantage of by the American people, just as they took advantage of the old reciprocity treaty it will be continued only so long as it is to the advantage of the American people alone. The moment it is perceived that the American people cannot derive from it the benefit that they anticipated, we may rest assured that the Americans will serve notice that this agreement shall no longer be continued in force between these two countries.

It appears to me, after giving this question considerable consideration, that the government of the day in introducing this agreement is reversing not only its well known and adopted policy of protection, but is also reversing its often declared policy upon this very question of reciprocity. It will be remembered that only a few years ago the Liberal party in presenting this policy of reciprocity began by introducing it at the big end, under the title of unrestricted reciprocity. In 1887 the gentlemen composing this government were advocating as strongly as they possibly could and asking the people to approve of a policy then known not as unrestricted reciprocity, but as commercial union, another attempt to introduce the same principle by the big end. The dangers to Canadian nationality, the danger of destroying British connection, the danger of injury to the trade of Canada was then made too apparent to the people for them to be induced by the arguments of the Liberal party of that time to adopt either of these principles, in 1887, when the policy of commercial union was urged upon the people, or in 1891 when it was urged under the title of unrestricted reciprocity. It is to be noticed that in the endeavour of the Liberal party to force those policies upon the country that party was not in a position to have such a policy forced upon the people, by reason of the fact that they were in opposition, and they were obliged, owing to these conditions, to submit the matter to the will and opinion of the people. At that time the expression of opinion was not at all uncertain, the sentiment of the Canadian people was clearly and without hesitation or doubt expressed and both times the Liberal party, forced to appeal to the people of Canada, were defeated. I venture to think that the right hon. gentleman who leads the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has profited by the experience of those two efforts.

He must be convinced that any policy which has a tendency to lead to annexation with the United States, or to weaken the bonds existing between Canada and Great Britain, is not a safe policy in the hands of the Canadian people. I am persuaded, too, that with the right hon. leader of the government taking advantage of the position which he holds to-day, and recognizing how futile it would be to submit such a policy as this to the electorate of Canada, is now trying to force this resolution through parliament and denying to the people the right to pronounce their opinion upon it. At the time when those two policies of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity were being advocated by the Liberal party in this country, some very interesting literature was circulated by them amongst the electors. I have in my hand one of the pamphlets issued at that time entitled 'facts and figures for farmers' and I propose to read from that campaign literature a few extracts to show the feeling of the Liberal party at that time upon this question. At page 12 of 'facts and figures for farmers', they say:

The growth of manufacturers in the states as the result of protection makes it absolutely necessary that goods must be sent outside instead of money in exchange for natural products.

That expression shows, I think, the drift of this agreement as respects the interests of the American people is to get the natural products of Canada into the United States for manufacturing purposes and for the employment of American laborers, and send into Canada their manufactured goods in exchange, instead of money, to the ruin of the manufacturing industries of Canada. It proceeds:

These goods cannot be sent freely so long as the tariff wall shuts them out. The growth of the agricultural areas in the United States would also oppose the introduction of free agricultural products unless the manufactures were admitted free into Canada also, for in the creation of these latter a home market is maintained for the American farmer.

The Americans are always anxious to preserve the home markets for the American people, but just as anxious to destroy the Canadian market for the Canadian people.

The stimulus to manufactures as the result of protection in the United States has resulted in the creation of many lines of cheap goods, cheaper than elsewhere can be had in the world.

Then, discussing the question of annexation, this pamphlet proceeds to say:

But supposing that a better relation with the United States did contribute towards a growth in the annexation sentiment, suppose that England, denying the right of Canada to trade with whom she chose, hesitated to grant the privileges sought and thus gave a check to the relations that exist between them. Suppose if, on the one hand, she consented to a commercial union between her children on this side of the ocean and the result was an enlarged emigration from the United States, and a changed political condition in parliament by which an annexation resolution should pass—what is there to be horrified at in that prospect? . . If in the future the people of Canada desire to join the great constellation of commonwealths that so illustrate the greatness of this continent, what possible objection could there be? Annexation is a bugbear which a weak sentimentality has clothed with features that are repulsive, but which, upon examination, might be found to be the most attractive and most winning of events.

An hon. MEMBER. What is that ?

Mr. PORTER. This is the campaign literature of the Liberal party at that time.

This we certainly can do by breaking down the commercial barrier between the two countries, learn to understand each other better, and if the winning forces of commerce and their attractive institutions make the great continent of North America one nation, then God will bless the union. . . To achieve a commercial relation with the American people is an object therefore, of the highest duty, worthy of the noblest efforts of the best men of the country.

Note this particularly:

The great Liberal party which to-day represents a majority of the voters of the Dominion in parliament, but which is in opposition to the existing government, has adopted as the main plank in its platform this question of unrestricted reciprocity, and it will go to the polls within eighteen months with that cause inscribed upon its banner.

Now I do not think it would be possible to find anywhere a better expression of the policy advocated by the Liberal party at that time and now than can be found in the extracts I have read from the campaign literature they used. In endeavouring to discover the true object and scope of this proposed agreement, one must remember, in addition to the language contained in the agreement itself, the surrounding conditions and the surrounding circumstances. One must take into account the conditions of the United States in regard to her raw materials, her manufacturing interests, her natural products, her facilities for transportation, her population, and also her aspirations; and one must also consider the same elements from the Canadian point of view if he would arrive at what I conceive to be the real scope of the agreement now under discussion. It is only upon a proper comparison of the conditions existing in the two countries and the surrounding circumstances, that you can arrive at a fair conclusion as to whether this trade agreement will be in the interests of Canada or not. These considerations cannot be dealt with alone, but one must also consider the national or patriotic view of the question. There are two points of view; one the material or commercial view, the other the sentimental or national. I do not believe it possible, under the adoption of this trade agreement, for the Canadian people to preserve either their commercial interests or their national status.

I do believe that by following the policy and the principles that have been followed during the last number of years in this country it would be possible at the same time to preserve and strengthen our nationality and our empire connections and to increase and stimulate the trade of Canada. I have already made reference to the conditions existing in Canada at the time when the old reciprocity treaty came into force, and I have also stated that the conditions to-day are very different from what they were at that time. I think that difference will be apparent to any hon. member of this House, or to any Canadian citizen who will give a moment's reflection to the question. Instead of Canada occupying the position of a few scattered provinces, as it did then, Canada presents to the world to-day a bold and united front extending from ocean to ocean. Canada exhibits to the world to-day a production per head of population that is unexcelled by any other country in the world. Canada offers to the world to-day a position in regard to her transportation facilities, both by land and by water, that is a marvel to the world when the population of Canada is taken into consideration. Instead of the ocean ports of Canada as they were in 1854, being unequipped and unable to handle the trade going out from Canada or the trade from any part of the world coming into Canada, we find these seaports fully equipped and able to handle the trade that may be offered by or to Canada. We find here transportation facilities overland by railway to be equal to the increased production of Canada from year to year, and rapid progress and extension being made along these lines as the prosperity and production of Canada increase. We have to-day a revenue more than sufficient to meet all the requirements of the country and to enable the government to carry out these improvements in transportation and other facilities that tend so greatly to increase the trade of the country. All this is a decided change from the condition of the Canadian people at that time. Instead of a population of 2,000,000 odd people we have now, it is estimated, about 8,000,000 people. All these things combine to place Canada in a position where instead of the United States, as in 1854, being the market by necessity of the Canadian people, Canada has, by the progress she has made along the lines I have indicated, converted the world to her markets and it may be truly said to-day that the wide world is the market and the natural market for Canada rather than is the market of the United States alone. A very good illustration of the effects of reciprocity is contained in a statement issued by the provincial treasurer of Ontario for the year 1910. At page 8 of his financial statement he makes reference to the effect of reciprocity upon Canada when it was in force, and says:

> Now, what was the result of the reciprocity treaty in 1854? What happened then is likely to happen again, because the conditions are similar. Quebec at that time lost most disastrously, Montreal lost heavily, the bulk of Toronto's traffic came in through New York, and so, in the same way our Northwest traffic will go by Minneapolis and Chicago, and I am doubtful about the result.
> Here are the figures as to the effect of that treaty at that time. The treaty was formed in 1854 and adopted in Canada towards the end of 1854, after navigation closed. The exports from Quebec in 1854 were $10,047,068; in 1855, $6,234,808; the decrease in exports being $3,812,260. The imports in 1854 at Quebec were $7,017,316, and in 1855, $2,930,224, a decrease of $4,089,092 in the first year of reciprocity. Quebec suffered most disastrously by that treaty for Toronto and the west brought in their goods through New York instead of through Quebec.
> The shipping outwards at Quebec in 1854 was 1,558 vessels, carrying 693,588 tons; in 1855, 877 vessels carrying 408,994 tons; a decrease in one year of 681 vessels and 284,594 tons.
> At Montreal the exports in 1854—these are entirely different from those of Quebec—were $2,290,058; and in 1855, $1,914,412; a decrease of exports of $375,645. The imports at Montreal in 1854 were $15,264,328; in 1855 they were $12,256,245; a decrease of $3,008,083. The exports in 1866, that is the last year of the treaty ending 30th June, 1866, were $6,831,635, that is from Montreal. In 1867, the year after the treaty expired, the exports were $8,104,622, an increase of $1,272,987. Imports in 1866 at Montreal were $24,241,217. After the treaty expired, in 1867, the imports were $28,139,283, an increase at Montreal after the treaty expired of $3,898,066. At Quebec in 1867 the exports were $167,000 less than in 1866, and the imports $186,586 larger.
> At Quebec, in 1867, our total foreign trade was $2,750,000 less than in 1854, and although the foreign trade of Canada in 1867 was only $60,000 more than in 1866, the trade via Montreal was $5,000,000 more in 1867 than in 1866, so rapidly was the direction changed, both on the coming into force of the reciprocity treaty and again on its termination, the decrease of exports and imports at Quebec in 1855 being nearly eight millions out of a total of seventeen millions, and of shipping from 1,588 vessels in 1854 to 877 in 1855.

If, under the conditions existing when the former reciprocity treaty was in effect, such results were produced, what may we expect under the conditions existing in Canada to-day? If the effect upon our shipping and transportation was so detrimental then when our trade was small, what may we not expect it to be when the trade of Canada has grown to its present enormous proportions. It has also been urged by members of the government that the adoption of this trade agreement will have the effect of largely increasing the exportation of Canadian products into the United States. and that the Canadian farmer will thus get a higher price for his products in the United States than he could get in the home or any other market. On that point, Mr. M. O. Hammond, writing in the Toronto 'Globe,' puts the situation more clearly and concisely than I could hope to do. He appears to have given the subject a very great deal of consideration, and the fact of the article being written from the American standpoint commends it all the more strongly to the consideration of the Canadian people, as it unintentionally exposes what will be the result in Canada if this pact goes into force. Mr. Hammond writes:

The situation comes down to this, therefore, under the free list Bill, if it becomes law: the imports on many things to this country will not materially increase, but these will be what Mr. Underwood calls honest competition, and the producers of this huge amount of every-day necessities of life will be compelled to take a slice off their price. The 'New York World' estimates that the saving to the consumers of the country by reason of this would run up to no less than $300,000,000 per year. That is worth saving.

If the American people are going to make a saving of $300,000,000 per year because of the importation to their country of the products of the Canadian farmers, and it is going to have the effect prophesied by Mr. Taft of reducing the cost of living in the United States, I would like to know how it can be figured out that the Canadian farmer is going to obtain higher prices for his products in the United States than he could obtain in Canada. Now, in Ontario the industry of horse-raising has of recent years grown in importance until it is now admitted to be one of our leading agricultural industries. And the 'Live Stock Journal,' a non-political paper, in its issue of the 2nd of March, 1911, publishes the following:

Mr. C. A. Burns, of the firm of Burns & Sheppard, and the writer, figured out that not less than ten million dollars worth of horses are handled in eastern Canada every year.

So brisk has been the demand for horses all through Canada during the past few years that prices for blocky and heavy horses and good express horses are higher in Canada to-day than they have been in the past forty years, and so keen has the market been in the west that it has not been unusual for a single horse to sell for $350 and teams for $650 and $700. One buyer paying the sum of one thousand dollars, the other day, for three heavy horses in Toronto, while ordinary horses run $200 and $250 a piece.

These prices are far in excess of the prices in Chicago, St. Louis, Buffalo or New York markets.

Buffalo is the best horse market in the United States at the present time, but even in the Buffalo horse market neither the quality nor the price is at all equal to the Toronto horse market.

In the Chicago horse market, the class of horses is inferior and the prices are not at all to be compared with the Canadian prices.

In St. Louis the principal run of horses is the range raised horses, bronchos and mules and the prices are more than twenty-five per cent lower than in Toronto.

The reciprocity agreement would injure the horse business of Canada in two ways; first, it would reduce the price; second, it would lower the quality.

If the duty was taken off horses coming into Canada, the west would soon be flooded with inferior range horses from Chicago and St. Louis markets and the western farmers, while getting horses cheaper, would be supplied with horses far inferior in quality to the Ontario horses.

To allow cheap, mongrel-bred and inferior horses from the United States to be shipped into Canada free of duty would be nothing short of ruin to the horse breeding industry and ruin to the horse handling business of both east and west.

Now, I will submit to the House a few illustrations of the benefits that the boasted big market of ninety millions of people offers to the Canadian producer. It must be apparent to any one that if the ninety-million market of the United States is to be such a boon to the Canadian people as to afford then an opportunity of all becoming rich, then by parity of reasoning it ought to be just as apparent that the farmers of the United States, who have had every advantage of that market during many years, ought at the present time to be rich enough themselves, or at least to be in as good or a more favourable condition than the farmers of Canada. They are nearer to the market, it costs them much less for transportation, and before a single Canadian can get into the American market with the products of his farm, or at the same time, 90 of the United States producers will be coming into the Canadian market to destroy the home market that he has here. Let me make a comparison of the production and the profit per acre of different classes of grains of the American farmer as against the Canadian farmer. I do that for this reason. It is almost impossible to find in any state in the Union an acreage exactly as near the exact number of acres of the different classes of grain under crop that I can find to be under crop the same in Canada, and I have therefore been obliged to take the production per acre in the respective countries for this purpose. Let me compare the production of one acre in the banner state of New York with the production of one acre in the banner province of Ontario. In wheat, in Ontario the average production was 24.1 bushels per acre and the average price per bushel 88.2c, so that the value of an acre of wheat to the Ontario farmer was $21.15. In New York State the average production of wheat was 21 bushels per acre and the average price 94.3 cents per bushel, yielding to the New York farmer $19.74 per acre, or a difference in favour of the Ontario farmer of $1.41 per acre. In oats the average production of the Ontario farmer was 23.5 bushels per acre and the average price 37 cents per bushel, realizing to the Ontario farmer $12.21 per acre. In New York State the average production per acre was 28.2 bushels and the average price 41 cents per bushel, giving a total of $11.48 per acre, a difference in favour of the Ontario farmer of 73 cents. In barley, the average production per acre in Ontario was 27 bushels and the average price 54 cents per bushel, making the value per acre $14.58. In New York State the average production per acre was 24.8 bushels and the average price 60 cents per bushel, making a total value per acre of $14.40, again in favour of the Ontario farmer to the extent of 18 cents per acre. Take potatoes: in Ontario the average production per acre was 149 bushels and the average price 40 cents per bushel, or a total value per acre of $68.54. In New York State the average production per acre was 102 bushels and the average price 48 cents per bushel, or a total value per acre of $48.96, showing a balance in favour of the Ontario farmer of $19.58 per acre. According to the latest statistics that I have been able to have access to, I find that New York state produced of wheat and corn in the last 8 years for which statistics are given, from 1900 to 1908, 1,224,000 bushels at a value of $26,510,000. Ontario produced during the same time 1,028,240 bushels valued at $27,769,000. So that it will be seen that although in wheat and corn Ontario produced 96,000 bushels less than was produced in New York state, yet the Ontario farmer received for his product $1,259,000 more than the New York farmer. Let me offer another comparison, one between the state of Michigan and the province of Ontario, in regard to farms themselves, the value of and the encumbrances upon the farms and the value of and encumbrances on the live stock of the farms. In 1898 there were in the province of Ontario 177,000 farms valued at $556,246,569, exclusive of buildings; and in 1908 there were 183,000 farms, an increase of 6,000, valued at $671,431,018, an increase in value in ten years of $115,285,449.

Let us look at the records of the state of Michigan, which is the nearest approach to the province of Ontario in the number, and value of its farms. I find that in Michigan in 1898 there were 175,000 farms, and 177,000 in Ontario. Ten years later, in 1908, the number of farms in the state of Michigan had increased from 175,000 to 178,000, whereas in Ontario in the same period, the number had increased from 177,000 farms to 183,000. In other words there was an increase of 6,000 in Ontario as compared with an increase of 3,000 in the state of Michigan, and both are about the same area. In 1898, the value of the Michigan farms was $623,911,200, and in 1908, their value was only $621,297,000, showing an actual decrease in the value of farms in Michigan in these ten years of $2,614,000. While there was an increase in the province of Ontario during the same period of $115,285,000. In 1898, the value in Ontario was $556,246,569, and in 1908 it was $671,531,018.

If the market of 90,000,000 people is going to make the farmers rich, why has it not increased the number of farms in the state of Michigan and their value?

Lest that one test be not considered conclusive, let me call attention to another comparison—a comparison in respect of the live stock. In Ontario, the live stock in 1898 was valued at $103,744,223; and in 1908, ten years later that value had increased to $186,014,756. Thus in the ten years there was an increase in Ontario in the value of live stock alone of $82,270,433.

Now let us look at the mortgage debt upon that live stock in the province of Ontario. In 1898, the mortgage debt upon the live stock of Ontario was $3,110,543, and in 1908, it was only $2,730,119. In other words there was a decrease in the mortgage debt upon the live stock in the province of Ontario of $280,424.

Let us make a similar investigation into the figures of the live stock in the state of Michigan. The live stock in that state in 1898 was valued at $97,042,380, and in 1908, at $123,265,031, so that in ten years the increase in value was only $26,022,651, as compared with an increase in Ontario of $82,270,803.

Then take up the mortgage debt on this live stock. The mortgage debt in the state of Michigan in 1898 was $4,626,211, and in 1908 it was $6,922,210. In other words, while there was during the same period a decrease in the mortgage debt in Ontario, of $280,424, there was an increase in the state of Michigan upon the live stock of that state of $2,295,999. Yet during all this time the farmers of Michigan had been enjoying the benefit of the market of 90,000,000 people.

Let me make a still further comparison with regard to the debt upon the land itself. I find that the Ontario farmers in 1900 had a mortgage debt upon their farms equal to about 29 per cent of their value, or in round numbers $166,800,000. In ten years that mortgage debt had decreased from 29 per cent in 1900 to 17 per cent in 1910. Or the total mortgage debt on the farm lands of Ontario was only $102,000,000 in 1910, as compared with $166,000,000 in 1900, showing a decrease in ten years of $65,000,000.

Contrast that with the condition in the state of Michigan. The mortgage debt in that state in 1900 on the farms was $193,812,241, or an equivalent of 31 per cent on the total value. In 1910, the total debt was $216,209,750. So that while in ten years in the province of Ontario the mortgage debt on the farms had decreased by $65,000,000, in the state of Michigan it had increased by $77,602,491.

I shall not weary the House with further comparisons although I have them under my hand. But I wish to repeat what has been so well said by my hon. friend from Lennox (Mr. Wilson) to-night, regarding the articles of cheese and butter. In these articles the very same results figure out, if one will take the trouble to ascertain the amount of money received by the Canadian farmer as compared with that received by the American farmer for these products per pound.

There is still another test which I would apply. I have taken the trouble to look into the statistics of savings bank deposits, and life insurance. Either one of these is a very fair illustration of the progress which the people are making; and I find, comparing the province of Ontario with the state of New York or Michigan or Minnesota, that the life insurance which has gone into force upon the Ontario people per head of population within the last ten years is nearly twenty times greater than what has been affected upon the American people in any one of those states. I find also that the number of lapsed policies—and hon. members will understand that policies taken out upon life are not allowed to lapse unless the insured are not able to pay the premium—I find that in Ontario, the number of lapsed policies is very much less than that in either New York or Michigan.

I find also that the same results with regard to savings bank deposits, and both bank deposits, and life policies are things which indicate pretty clearly the progress and prosperity of a people. And if, with this boasted market of 90,000,000 people, the American farmer has not been able to pay off the mortgage debts upon his chattel property and land, if he has not been able to increase the value of his lands or the number of his farms, and if he has not been able to meet his life insurance premiums or make his bank deposits, while at the same time, under the policy pursued in this country the last twenty years, our Canadian farmers have been able to not only to pay off their mortgage debt, but increase the value, and number of their farms and live stock, and pay the premiums on their life insurance, and deposit besides a handsome sum in the bank, it must be evident that we have nothing to gain by this reciprocity pact.

That being so, is it not the height of absurdity to urge upon the Canadian people that they should barter away such a privilege as they now enjoy, the advantages they have been reaping during all these years, and cast in their lot with the American farmer who has not been able to show anything like as great progress as the Canadian farmer?

Coming to the question of our trade relations with Great Britain, it seems to be the reverse of one of the first principles of business policy to adopt this agreement. Great Britain is to-day the best customer the Canadian people have, and it is admitted by every business man that he will give the greatest advantages to the man who is his best customer. As in dealings with individuals so it should be in dealings between nations and where Canada finds Great Britain her very best customer, I think that it is up to Canada to show some favour to Great Britain, to increase, if possible, our present favours to Great Britain and enlarge the British market for Canadian products. If we are to pursue the policy laid down by this agreement, if we are to enter into this pact, we will not only be violating that first principle of business, but will be offering to the United States a premium to send their goods into Canada and shut out the goods of our best customer.

During the course of this argument the constant theme of supporters of the government has been the great advantage this agreement is going to bring to the Canadian farmer. When did this government become so solicitous for the interest of the Canadian farmer? It certainly has not been their history in past years that they were looking after the interest of the farmer rather than of any other classes, but they profess to be doing so now. What is the reason for this sudden manifestation of interest in the farmer? Is it because the farmer is considered by this government to be so mercenary that with the argument that he will make a cent a pound more on cheese or a few cents a bushel on grain he is going to be carried away altogether from his sentimental feeling towards his own country and the mother land? It must either be that or the government must think that the farmers of Canada are the only class of people in this country who can be deceived by such a policy as that. I believe there is a sentiment in the Canadian people far and away above any mercenary interest. There is a sentiment in the breasts of the Canadian people that would actuate them to support a stronger and more binding relationship between Canada and the mother country even if it were at the loss of a few dollars in trade between this country and the United States. It cannot be possible that the Canadian farmer will in a moment and without sufficient reason forget the action of the two political parties in Canada in regard to the great agricultural interest. I can remember very well speeches by members of this government when the want of greater prosperity on the part of the Canadian farmer was attributed by them to his slovenly methods of farming and his want of intelligent direction; in fact I recall an expression used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he was appealed to upon the question of want of prosperity of the Canadian farmer, he said that if the Canadian farmer wished to be more prosperous than he is to-day, he must work harder and eat less. The Liberal party was not then exercising the same feeling of interest towards the Canadian farmer that they profess to be exercising to-day and surely the Canadian farmer will not forget which political party it was in the past that has been responsible for the greater part of the prosperity with which they have been blessed. Under which party were the experimental farms and the dairy schools of Canada established for the benefit of the farmers? Under which government was it that the millions of acres of the great west were opened up for cultivation and for settlement by Canadian farm boys? It was not the Liberal party by any means. It is true the Liberal party have adopted the Conservative party's policy of protection, and I think I might truthfully say that it is the only policy pursued by this government that has brought any advantage to the Canadian farmer. But as against that they have not directed all their interests in that way. I remember an organization known as the Grangers. This government was successful in reducing that society, established for the benefit and advantage of the farmers into a political machine. Then, phœnix-like, there arose from its ashes the Patrons of Industry, and the government succeeded in reducing that organization almost to a political machine.

To-day we have the Grain Growers' Association which this government is endeavouring in every possible way, and with no little degree of success, to convert into a political machine, too. I have given a brief comparison of what the Conservative government and party have done for the Canadian farmer, and also a brief illustration of what the Liberal government and party have not done for the Canadian farmer. It seems to me that the Canadian farmer, in view of these facts which he certainly will not forget, will ponder carefully before accepting this policy, the tendency of which is closer trade relations and closer political relations with the United States, with a weakening of the bonds uniting Canada to the mother land. He will hesitate long before adopting the policy that is now being advocated by the Liberal party, in view of the history of that party, and the way the farmers have been treated by that party. Now, if it is true, and it is true beyond any question, that the policy of protection has been the chief element in the success of the American people while it has been in existence in that country, and if it is true that the same policy has to a still greater degree, during the time it has been in operation, brought prosperity to Canada, if it is true that the adoption and carrying out of that policy has brought prosperity to both countries, why should Canada, in this twentieth century which is said to be hers, hand over to the United States to exploit her natural resources, her national products, to feed the American factories, and furnish labour to American workingmen, to the loss and detriment of Canada?

During the course of this debate hon. members on the government side have told us that we need not be alarmed that the ultimate result of this policy will be to lead to annexation, or the absorption of this country by the United States. They ask what evidence there is that such a result can be brought about. I think it will be admitted that the more dependent one country is made upon another in regard to its trade relations, the more difficult it will be for that nation to maintain a separate existence, or to resist political absorption. In our case this tendency will be accompanied by a weakening of the sentiments of union with the empire, in consequence of a diversion of our commercial interests. It is the well known desire of the American people, as has been expressed over and over again, both before this pact was proposed and since it has been made, to coerce Canada into annexation. They have failed in their efforts, and just as they made a reciprocity treaty in 1854, when the pinch of necessity drove them to it, so in 1911 they have turned their attention to a country to whom they have hitherto refused to extend the hand of friendship. They have turned to Canada at this time because Canada is the only country that offers the United States any opportunity for exploitation. Sir, can any one be so far deceived as to believe that the sentiment in favour of the absorption of Canada, which has hitherto pervaded the people of the United States during the last forty years, does not still exist? Does any one suppose that it has faded away in a single night? I believe that feeling is just as strong in the United States to-day as it ever was. This reciprocity agreement is only a disguised method of accomplishing their desire, and I am sorry to say that it appears as if this government was willing to lend assistance to the American people in achieving their object. It seems to me there never was for the Canadian people such an opportunity of exhibiting their independence, of showing their nationality, of protecting their country, of protecting their homes, as is offered them on this occasion. The time had arrived when, of necessity, the American people were bound to lower their tariff wall between Canada and the United States; the time had arrived when they were bound to take down the barriers they themselves had erected; the time had arrived when they became convinced they could not coerce Canada into annexation, or at least into what I was almost going to call a position of slavery which they would have us occupy. And so they have set about making a bargain with Canada with that object, and I am afraid they have succeeded pretty well in introducing what has been called the thin edge of the wedge. This is not the first dose we have had. We all remember very well when only two years ago, the right hon. gentleman who leads this House was appealing to the people of Canada for a renewal of their confidence by asking them to give him an opportunity to finish his work. Well, it appears to me that the greatest unfinished work of the right hon. gentleman is now about to be finished, if this pact goes into force, for by it he will hand over this country into the lap of the United States, and then his work will be accomplished. We have evidence of that all along the line from the expression that has been used by the right hon. gentleman in discussing this question.

We have evidence of it in the selection of the man to form this pact—the most influential man of this Dominion who had the tendency to destroy confederation as he has, a very fitting tool, if I may use the expression not offensively, with which to finish the work which is the sole desire of the premier's heart; that is to see Canadian independence brought about or to see Canada drop into the lap of the United Staes just as the ripe fruit would drop from the parent tree.

In conclusion let me say that I am unalterably opposed to the passage of this trade agreement through parliament. I am unalterably opposed to it because I do not believe it can, in any substantial manner, work out in the interest of the people of this country. I am satisfied that it will not work out to the advantage of the people of this country but that there is a positive danger in passing this agreement in so far as the people of Canada are concerned. There is the danger that it will hand over to the United States the natural resources of Canada to supply the American factory with material and the American workman with labour. There is the danger that it will destroy the usefulness of the great transportation lines built east and west throughout Canada at such an enormous cost to this country. There is the positive danger that it will frighten away from Canada the money of foreign countries that is so lavishly being poured into this country at the present time, and upon which so much depends for the future development of Canada. There is the positive danger that so soon as we hand over the natural resources of Canada and tie ourselves up in an alliance with the United States the inducements for that class of immigration, which means the building up of this country, will be removed and the capital which now finds safe investment here will be frightened away or turned into other channels. These and other dangers threaten the Canadian people as a result of the adoption of this agreement and for these, as for other reasons I could give, I again express my unalterable opposition to this agreement, and further express the opinion that if this government will only afford the Canadian people an opportunity of declaring their views with regard to it, they will do so with no uncertain sound, and the government will have an opportunity of regretting that they ever adopted such a high-handed and tyrannical course as that which they have adopted in introducing and supporting this agreement.

Mr. WILLIAM THOBURN (North Lanark). Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion which has taken place in this House upon this Reciprocity Bill now before us. I have to confess that at this late date it is difficult to add anything new to what has already been said. However, I hope, as I proceed to touch upon some phase of the question not yet dealt with. Sometimes we come to too hasty a conclusion on great questions, and we do not consider them as they should be considered by this House before enacting them into law. As an illustration, take the question that was before the House yesterday in reference to the government ownership of cable, telegraph and telephone lines. I pointed out to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) that if the proposal that is now before the different governments became law it was going to cost the business men of this country five times as much to send a cable message to the old country as it is costing now. That will be the result if we are not allowed to use the cipher and the code as we use them now. We can send a message composed of a sentence of ten words for 25 cents. In the event of this new proposal becoming law, even at the rate of 12 cents per word, such a message would cost $1.25 or $1.30. In other words, it would cost nearly five times as much to send a cable message to the old country as it costs now.

If there ever was a time in the history of Canada when this government should have remained silent on the tariff question with regard to the United States it was at this very time. It is well known to us that in the last United States election the great issue before the country was the tariff question. We know that the Democrats of the United States are the free trade party, that the Republicans are the tariff party, that the issue before the people then was a lower tariff and that the lower tariff party were elected. They were in duty bound by the voice of the people to lower their tariff, and if they did see fit to come to Canada to confer with the Canadian government as to rearranging the Canadian tariff our Canadian government could very justly have told them: Gentlemen, your tariff as a rule has been fifty per cent higher than our Canadian tariff; bring your tariff down to the level of the Canadian tariff and then we will enter into negotiations with you as to lowering our tariff. Our government might very justly have said to the American government: You have had a mandate from your people to lower your tariff; we are perfectly satisfied to enter into negotiations with you, but before the result of these negotiations becomes law we want to submit the question to the people of Canada, and let them have a say as your people have had a say whether such a free trade policy as you are asking for now in natural products shall be placed upon the statute books of Canada. To me this is the most important Bill that has been before this House since 1878, the year the national policy became the fiscal policy of this country. This question is causing more unrest in the minds of the business men of Canada than any other question since the national policy came into force. What is the cause of this great agitation? They are affected by this reciprocity agreement. Two reasons are given why we should adopt this measure: first, Canada has wanted reciprocity for years, and second, that Canada wants the larger market of the United States.

Then, if Canada wanted the larger market of the United States there must have been some excuse for it. I ask: 'Has the market for Canadian farm products fallen off in Great Britain?' No, the market there is as good as ever. Has it become necessary for the Canadians to seek a market in the United States? No, but the Americans have found it to their advantage to seek our market; and, for whose benefit? Do you suppose for one moment that the United States would be so determined to have reciprocity unless they were sure that they were going to get the best of the bargain. A few years ago, we are told, Canada wanted reciprocity with the United States, but did they give it to us then? No, Why? Because it did not suit them to do so, it was not to their advantage then to do so. The first reciprocity treaty in the United States was that with Canada in 1854, and it was abrogated in 1866 on the ground, as the resolution of Congress set forth, that it was no longer for the interests of the United States to continue it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of quoting precedents as a reason for their actions, but, Mr. Chairman, I believe in every tub standing upon its own bottom. Times have so changed that what might have been good for Canada years ago would not be good for Canada now. We have spent time and money in securing the markets of Great Britain—the best markets in the world—for the Canadian farmers—but, these hon. gentlemen opposite say: there you have a market of 90,000,000 people. Are they aware, when they speak of that market, that the world's wheat production is 2,651,866,000 bushels, of which Russia produces 766,000,000 and the United States comes second as the greatest wheat producing country? What benefit to the Canadian farmer is the 90,000,000 market if these 90,000,000 people grow more of every kind of farm produce than they want for their own use, a fact proven by their exports? As to the argument of the government that reciprocity would open out a market for the farmers of the west, let me point out that last year the United States exported 156,000,000 worth of animal products and $216,000,000 worth of breadstuffs. That is the market in which we are told the Canadian farmer can find an outlet for their surplus production. Would any reasonable man think for one moment that a country that exports a total of $372,000,000 worth of farm products to the extent the United States does is a country in which the Canadian farmer can find a profitable market? I quote from the 'Farm World,' an American publication printed in the interests of the farms of the United States, the following:

AMERICA AS A PROVIDER OF MEAT FOR THE WORLD.

The United States shows a greater increase in cattle and swine during the past ten years than any other country in the world.

While the number of cattle in all countries has increased faster than the number per thousand inhabitants, this increase is larger in the United States than any other, while the number per thousand in Europe, our nearest natural market, has decreased.

The interesting feature of these figures is the relation of the increase of live stock to the increase of population. In this country, where the proportionate increase of cattle and swine has been larger than the increase in population, the result will be large exportations of our surplus to those countries where the facts are exactly the reverse.

The proportionate increase of sheep in America has been less than the increase in population, although the total increase in the number of sheep in this country is greater than any other, and this fact would indicate that the industry is in anything but a hopeless state.

Another important fact gained from the study of these figures is that through improved methods of feeding, the same number of animals now produced will turn into the market a very much larger total number of pounds of meat than the same number produced ten years ago.

The greatest increase in the number of cattle is in the United States. In 1900, the total number was 43,901,000, while in 1910, the total number was 69,080,000. This is an increase in round numbers of more than 25,000,000 head.

The greatest increase in the number of swine in the ten-year period is in the United States, the total being 10,732,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is a fact that the United States produced more of every kind of agricultural products than they can possibly consume what can be the advantage of shipping Canadian farm products into that country? Suppose, for the sake of illustration, that the United States grow 250,000,000 bushels of wheat and that they consume 200,000,000 bushels, they then have 50,000,000 bushels for export. I do not think that any gentleman opposite will for the moment contend that the people of the United States do not produce a surplus of every single commodity that the Canadian farmer has to sell.

For these 50,000,000 bushels of wheat for export they buy 50,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat, which they must also export; so that. instead of 50,000,000, they have 100,000,000 bushels to export. But I may be asked, why do they buy the 50,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat? It is a well known fact that we grow a better grade of wheat in Canada than is perhaps grown in any other country in the world. There is nothing that I know of to equal our Northwest No. 1 hard wheat. Now, where the trouble comes to the Canadian farmer is this. The Americans import 50,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat which they mix with 50,000,000 bushels of their own wheat which they have to export, and they thus improve the quality of their own wheat at the expense of the Canadian farmer. Then the Canadian farmer has to compete with that 100,000,000 bushels of wheat in the Liverpool market. That is as I see the matter. If any hon. gentleman opposite thinks I am wrong, I would like him to put me right. Although the United States has a population of ninety millions, it is safe to say that they raise produce of all kinds sufficient for 130,000,000 or 135,000,000 people. What applies to our grain applies also to our cheese and our bacon. The Americans know that we make a better quality of cheese and also of bacon than they do, and their sole object in buying our Canadian product is to take it into the United States and sell it as an American product; so that our Canadian product loses its identity in the Liverpool market.

Now, you will have noticed, in some of the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that there has been a tendency to array one class of the electors against another class—to array the farmers against the manufacturers. No greater mistake could be made than that. It is well known that there are no better customers of the farmers than the manufacturers and labourers of this country. Do not the labourers create the home market for the farmers which is the best market they have? I was very much interested in some figures that were given to us by the hon. Minister of Railways in dealing with the question of labour and wages. His remarks will be found at page 5142 of 'Hansard,' as follows:

> The question of transportation is very important as regards the men who are working with their hands as well as with their heads in this work throughout the Dominion. It is customary, in discussing transportation problems, to refer to them as being the property of capitalists, and dominated by them. They are to a certain extent, but the development of our railways, the development of our waterways, is of vital interest to the men who find employment on these railways and on these waterways. Here are the figures: There were in the service of Canadian railways on June 30 last 123,768 employees, whose wage bill amounted to $67,167,703. In addition, there were 16,709 employees engaged in outside operations such as steamers and hotels, whose remuneration amounted to $5,169,923. The aggregate would therefore be 140,477 employees, with a total wage bill of $72,337,626.

Now, where does that vast amount of money go to? I think every member of this House will agree with me in saying that a very large proportion of it is spent in Canada in purchasing breadstuffs, the products of the farm. I just give this as an illustration to show what the manufacturers are doing for this country, for it must be remembered that building railroads is manufacturing just as much as any other article. I think it is a mistake for hon. gentlemen opposite to try to array the manufacturers against the farmers or the farmers against the manufacturers. Remember, I am not here as the representative of the manufacturers only; I am here to represent the electors of North Lanark to the best of my ability. But are the manufacturers opposed to this treaty? True enough, a delegation of manufacturers waited upon the government when this question was brought before the House and presented a memorial, a clause of which reads as follows:

Although the prospect of reciprocity has already caused some unsettling of business, our confidence is still unshaken. But lest there should be a disposition on the part of our neighbours to stiffen their demands on your government in the expectation of finding on this side of the line any considerable element of our population favourable to their view, we welcome this opportunity of assuring you that the interests for whom we can fairly claim to speak, representing approximately $1,200,000,000 of invested capital, $1,000,000,000 of annual output, furnishing direct employment to 435,000 artisans and workpeople, and distributing annually $250,000,000 in wages, are opposed at the present juncture to any reciprocal tariff arrangement between the two countries that would necessitate a lowering of the Canadian customs tariff on manufactured products. They are convinced that any reduction would prove injurious to the industry directly affected, and indirectly detrimental to the interests of Canada and consequently to the empire as a whole.

As Canadians they regard the present an inopportune time for the negotiation of a reciprocity treaty.

They do not say that as manufacturers they regard the present question an inopportune time, but as Canadians.

United States enterprises are developed to the highest state in point of capital, specialization of product and magnitude of operation; Canadian enterprises, because of their restricted markets, are not yet so developed and it will be obviously impossible for them to withstand the competition that would inevitably follow reductions in the present Canadian tariff.

The appendix to that reads as follows:

An examination into the trade statistics of the United States throws an interesting side light upon that country's present overtures for reciprocity with us. For the nine months ending September, 1910, their exports of domestic merchandise of every kind were $1,193,321,512, of which $210,490,966 were manufactures for further use in manufacturing, and $401,684,694 were manufactures ready for consumption. The sum of these two, $612,625,660, accounts for 51 per cent of all their exports put together. But this is not crediting the exports of manufactures with a class known as 'foodstuffs, partly manufactured,' which are valued at $180,159,193. If we regard this also as legitimately forming a part of the exports of manufactured goods, it means that of everything the United States exported for the nine months ending September last, manufactured goods amounted to over 66 per cent.

Applying the average for the nine months to the last three, the figures for which were not available when this statement was prepared, it indicates that the exports for the year of manufactures ready for consumption and manufactures for further use in manufacturing will pass the $800,000,000 mark. This is an enormous amount for which to find an outlet, and there can be little doubt that underlying the present agitation in the United States for reciprocity with Canada is an earnest desire to open wider the markets of this country for exploitation by their manufactures, at the same time it enables us to catch a glimpse of what the future may hold in store for us if we continue to work out our own industrial destiny along independent lines.

To further prove that the manufacturers of this country, as a body, are not opposed to that treaty, let me point out—and I suppose there is as fair a representation according to numbers of the manufacturers in this House as can be found anywhere in Canada—that I have not heard the representatives of the manufacturers in this House stand up in their places and oppose this treaty. For instance there are the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), the hon. member for St. Lawrence Division Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike) the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Harty), the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Gordon), the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fowke) and the hon. member for West Peterboro (Mr. Stratton) besides the hon. member from South Renfrew (Mr. Lowe)—all these are manufacturers, and I do not think any hon. gentleman on the government side will say that they have uttered a single word in protest against the treaty now before this House.

Now we come to the other side of the question. Is there not a large number of the farmers of Canada opposed to this pact? True, we had a deputation of farmers from the northwest to ask for free trade in farm products and freer trade in manufactured goods, but we have also had other farmer delegations, and what did they ask for? Some of them asked that the tariff be left as it was, and others that it be increased. Would you believe it, if I were to tell you that there was a deputation of farmers who waited upon the government—to my personal knowledge, and who asked, not that the tariff should remain as it is, but that it should be increased by 25 per cent or 35 per cent or 45 per cent—nothing less than 55 per cent would satisfy that deputation of farmers who waited upon the government. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will bear me out in that statement because I happened to be present and I repeat that that deputation asked for a tariff on farm products of 55 per cent.

Then there was a farmer deputation from the counties of Kent and Wentworth who presented a memorial to the Prime Minister which reads as follows:

As there has been recently before you a large deputation of farmers from the west, and also a few from the east, claiming to represent the Canadian farmers' views on the tariff question (or at least that inference is being drawn by the press of the United States and Great Britain), we wish to say here and now publicly and emphatically, that they do not. Having consulted a great many farmers engaged in mixed farming in our different and several localities, both Liberal and Conservative, we find that the great mass of unorganized farmers are well satisfied with the present tariff as it is. At the last general election, stability of the tariff was the principal issue, and we, as farmers, think that no government should enter into such a large measure of reciprocity or free trade with the United States without a mandate from the people.

We also think that such extravagant language as was used by the speakers has a tendency to bring farming into disrepute, and at a very inopportune time when the eyes of the whole world are focused upon this country. At a time when the cost of eatables has been so high and the cry of 'back to the land' is being sounded, when so much money is being spent to induce immigration to this country, it seems ridiculous to have such sentiments spread broadcast over the land, claiming that such is the farmers' view.

We wish as farmers who are proud of our calling to again say that we deprecate the language of agitators who would stir up strife in this new country by setting up one class against another. Being engaged in mixed farming, we also believe in a mixed community in this country composed of manufacturers, merchants, craftsmen and artisans of all kinds, thus building up an ideal state.

Our opinion is that the great majority of farmers do not think that the manufacturers' heel is upon their neck, that they are ground down by oppression and are a down-trodden class that every body's hand is against them, but are well satisfied with their present condition and are against commercial union in any guise whatever.

Prices for everything we have to sell have been abnormally high, while machinery, implements, tools, vehicles, etc., have never been cheaper. We would, therefore respectfully urge that no radical change in the tariff be effected at the present time. We are pleased to see our cities, towns and villages prosperous, thus creating a convenient home market for what we have to sell, and also for what we have to buy. We are not enamoured with the idea of a strictly agricultural country but wish to see manufacturers attend to manufacturing, bankers to banking, storekeepers to storekeeping, farmers to farming, and Canadians to building up a strong united Canada.

The memorial further asked that the tariff be raised high enough to shut out American farm products and that employees of Canadian factories should be fed by Canadian farmers.

We believe that the principle expressed in the following motto is a good one; keep your money in circulation at home by having goods made in Canada. When you can't get what you want in Canada buy within the British Empire. If American manufacturers wish to sell their goods to Canadian people they should build branch factories in Canada.

Such sentiments have a real Canadian ring about them.

The Canadian tariff should be high enough to make them do so. We favour a policy of thorough protection for the products of Canadian farms, mines and factories.

David Jackson of Grimsby declared that the delegation represented unorganized farmers. They had no particular grievance but represented a silent voice. They were well satisfied with the tariff as it is and opposed to any radical change. Some of the western farmers he declared to be agitators. Canada had not alone been built up by farmers.

Bruce Johnson of Peterboro county stated that a canvass showed 80 per cent, of farmers favouring maintenance of the present tariff.

That was a memorial from the farmers of part of the province of Ontario. I have here one from the province of Quebec.

Following is the text of the Quebec resolution, just as it was handed to the newspapers, ready for use, to add to the report of the general deputation:

The farmers have no reason for complaint against the present tariff. Their products are selling well, and in view of the constantly increasing demands of the Canadian people, their markets are increasing from year to year.

The prices of hay, of corn, of vegetables, of butter, of cheese, of eggs, of live stock, have been materially increased and in certain cases have been doubled. Agricultural conditions are with us better than they ever were.

The prices of the articles which the farmers have to buy but especially that of agricultural implements, etc., have not increased in the same proportions; in certain cases they have actually diminished, and it can be said without contradiction that the position of the farmers as sellers have been very considerably improved, while their position as buyers has remained the same as formerly.

We attribute this satisfactory condition of the agriculturists to the increase of the population of the towns and villages where industry has been developed to a remarkable degree. In Montreal especially the workshops and the factories have for many years sprung up as though by enchantment, and now furnish work to a large number of heads of families. If the tariff on the manufacured articles should be reduced we believe that a large number of their employees will be forced as formerly to go to the United States to gain a livelihood for themselves and their families.

The sugar refineries employ 2,000 men, and if the tariff removes the protection which they now enjoy they would probably be compelled to stop their operations, to the benefit of American factories. A lowering in the purchasing power of this working population would certainly produce a decrease in the price of our agricultural products. We could put forward the same argument in regard to a number of other industries. The manufacture of cement in Montreal gives work to more than 1,000 men and we have no reason to doubt that without a protective tariff the manufacturers of this article would not be able to compete with the manufacturers of the United States.

The province of Quebec is satisfied with the present tariff and does not ask for any revision. It is becoming more and more a manufacturing centre and is attracting to its large centres a population which makes a constant demand for agricultural products.

We believe that it is the duty of the government to protect our markets against American competition. The farmers of the West can hardly desire to injure those of the east, when they ask for a reduction of the tariff which would mean the ruin of our markets and of our industries. This is not a fight between the two sections of Canada; it is a national question.

Similar petitions were presented from some half-dozen French agricultural societies of Quebec.

Here are three good reasons given from another portion of Canada why the tariff should remain as it is.

The undersigned farmers of North Monaghan township, in the county of Peterborough, believe that no reciprocity treaty should be agreed upon which will allow American farm products or American manufactured goods to come into Canada more freely than they do at present. We believe that the home market for farm products is better than any foreign market, for the following reasons:

1. The farther the consumers are from the farmers the more it costs to carry farm products to them, and the more middlemen there are to share the profits.

2. Many kinds of farm products command the best prices when they are fresh. If they are shipped to distant markets, they lose their freshness before they reach the consumers, and consequently the farmer gets a lower price for them than he would get if he could sell them while fresh in a market near at hand. Some kinds of farm products are so perishable that they cannot be profitably shipped to distant markets.

3. A workman employed in a city of the United States, or any other foreign country, consumes only a few cents' worth of Canadian farm products in a year. Workmen employed in British factories consume much more of Canadian farm products than those of any foreign country do, but even British workmen buy a very small proportion of what they eat from Canadian farmers. Workmen employed in Canadian towns and cities will, under a proper system of tariff protection, buy nearly everything they eat from Canadian farmers. At present, owing to the low Canadian tariff on farm products, large quantities of American farm products come into Canada.

The undersigned farmers believe that the Canadian tariff should be raised high enough to shut out such American farm products and preserve the home market for Canadian farmers.

Great quantities of manufactured goods also come into Canada from the United States because the Canadian tariff is not high enough to keep them out. The working men employed in making those goods are fed by American farmers. The undersigned farmers of Peterborough county believe that the Canadian tariff should be so framed as to cause the manufacture of such goods in Canadian towns and cities by workmen who will be fed by Canadian farmers.

A few days ago the following despatch appeared in all the eastern papers, from Victoria, B.C.:

The Central Farmers' Institute submitted a resolution viewing with alarm the movement of the grain growers for reciprocity in natural products with the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there was another very large and influential delegation of farmers waited upon this government, begging them very earnestly not to enter into free trade relations with the United States in the farm products in which they were interested; I refer to the fruit growers of Ontario. I do not know of any class of people in the Dominion of Canada who would be more severely injured by the adoption of this agreement than the fruit growers of Ontario. They put their case before this government very ably and very fairly. They stated that, owing to climatic reasons, it was utterly impossible for Canadian fruit growers to compete with the American fruit growers. They pointed out to the government that, owing to American fruit ripening so much earlier than Canadian fruit, the Americans could sell their fruit in this market at the highest price obtainable; and they contended that they were only able to remain in the business by the price they got for their earlier fruit. I remember one man making the statement that in the earlier part of the season tomatoes were sold at $1.90 a basket, whereas this same class of tomatoes, at the end of the season, would only bring about ten cents a basket. They had, however, to sell them, even at ten cents a basket, or else let them rot on the ground. But it was only because of the better price they got for their fruit in the early part of the season that they were able to make a profit in the business. They claimed that if the duty is taken off fruit the United States fruit and vegetable growers would come into the Canadian market and would ruin the business of Canadian fruit growers. I well remember the reply the First Minister made to that delegation who were pleading so earnestly for fair play; he told them he was sorry for them, but that they came too late. Does the right hon. gentleman not know that it is never too late to mend? Does the right hon. gentleman not know that their case was placed before the government when it was not too late? I want to tell him that two years ago that case was placed before the government by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sealey). On page 4171 of 'Hansard', Mr. W. O. Sealey said:

I desire to draw the attention of the House to a notice of motion which has been on the Order Paper for some time back, but which, owing to various circumstances, could not come up for consideration according to the rules of the House. This resolution proposed by myself, to be seconded by Mr. Turcotte, the hon. member for Quebec county, is as follows:

That in the opinion of this House, so long as the Canadian tariff affords, incidentally or otherwise, a considerable degree of protection to manufacturers, some protection may fairly and properly be afforded by our tariff to Canadian agriculturists and stock raisers upon hogs, hog products, garden vegetables and such other items as it may appear possible to so protect with advantage to the agriculturists, and without undue injury to the Canadian consumer.

That resolution was introduced by the hon member for Wentworth two years ago, and still the First Minister would tell that delegation of fruit growers who waited upon the government that they came too late, and he was sorry for them. Well, the hon. member for Wentworth, amongst other things, went on to say:

I am anxious to see them go further still. The growing of vegetables is an industry which is of increasing importance, and I believe that without serious inconvenienec to the consumer an increase of the tariff along some lines would benefit the producer. . . But we suffer seriously from imported cabbages when their crop is nearly finished and they ship them in by the carload at as low as $6 a ton, which, with the duty of 30 per cent, amounting to $1.80 is added, makes a total cost of $7.80 a ton.

Now if the hon. member for Wentworth was right in stating that the Ontario fruit and vegetable growers were at a disadvantage with a duty of $7.80 a ton on vegetables, at how much greater disadvantage will they be when that duty is taken off? Mr. Sealey also dealt with another question:

The American corn-fed pork of an inferior quality has been going to the British market to such an extent that it has dulled the taste of the Britishers for the Canadian pork, so much so that we find to-day that Canadian pork has backed down to about the level of United States pork, and in some cases less.

That only goes to illustrate what I was trying to show some time ago about the lowering of the quality of our grain, that is, they would increase the reputation of their grain at the expense of the Canadian farmer.

By the introduction of American pork here we have lost the splendid reputation we had built up and enjoyed for a number of years, and I think our western friends could afford to join in this movement to protect the enviable reputation which they enjoy at the present time. They are producing in the west large quantities of wheat fed pork. That wheat fed pork makes the sweetest hams and bacon, being equal to the pea fed product, with which we built up such a reputation, and perhaps surpassing it to some extent. Unless that reputation that they are building up in the west is safeguarded they will perhaps meet the same fate that we have met here in Ontario.

That was the statement made by the hon. member for Wentworth two years ago. But, on page 7684 of 'Hansard' of this year the hon. member for Wentworth makes the following statement in behalf of the fruit and vegetable growers of Ontario:

The latest Trade and Commerce report for the year ending March 31, 1910, shows that we imported during that year to Canada from the United States, fruit to the value in round figures of $6,500,000, while during the same period we only exported from Canada to the United States, fruit to the value of $500,000, or one-thirteenth of the imports. True, it may be said that $3,500,000 worth of our fruit imports were bananas, oranges, pine apples, and other varieties of fruit which we do not produce in Canada, and which therefore, come in duty free. But $6,000,000 of it, or six times more than we exported to the United States, was dutiable, and of exactly the same class of fruit as we produce in Canada.

Now, the Canadian tariff on peaches is one cent per pound, while the United States tariff on them is only one half cent per pound. The Canadian tariff on strawberries is two cents per quart, while the United States tariff on them is only one cent per quart. Our tariff on much of the fruit is twice as high as theirs; and if, under these conditions, they have been able to invade our markets to the extent of $3,000,000 a year and we have only been able to invade their market to the extent of half a million, or one-sixth that amount, during the same time, with only half as much duty against us as we have against them, the result under free trade in these articles would seem to be apparent to every one; they would swamp us in our own market, while we would be unable to meet them in their own market.

These are the words of the hon. member for Wentworth. It remains to be seen how that hon. gentleman is going to vote when this question comes before the House. Is he going to stand by the statements he has made in this 'Hansard' or is he going to swallow these statements and vote with the government? These are his own words and they appear as witnesses against him.

When the farmers of the Northwest waited upon the government they were clamouring for freer trade and direct taxation. They never made a greater mistake in their lives. I do not think there would be a greater howl go up from any section of the country than that which would go up from these Northwest farmers if they had direct taxation. What that country wants is manufacturers. If that deputation had come to this government and asked for an increase in her number of manufacturing industries in that country, it would have been more to the point. If this country is already consuming eighty per cent of the total product of the farmers it would not want a very great increase of the manufacturing industries to consume the other twenty per cent. I have here an article from an Edmonton newspaper which carries out the idea of the want of manufacturers in the Northwest. It says:

The secretary of the Edmonton board of trade has issued the following article dealing with the Buying-at-home Campaign, which is to be inaugurated in the Twin Cities:

It is pretty generally recognized that Edmonton and Strathcona are in need of greater industrial activity and the increased payrolls which would ensue. The board of trade, the city council and other organizations, as well as many individuals, have been very active in endeavouring to secure development along these lines, with some measure of success; but much is still to be desired in that direction. Industrial activity not only put into circulation a lot of money in the shape of wages, but it also creates a better market for the raw material, and there is no person making his living in Edmonton, no matter what his occupation, who is not benefited directly, or indirectly, by development of industries in the city.

The board of trade, in considering this matter, recognized that if the business of existing factories in the city could be doubled, this would be about as desirable as doubling the number of factories. With this object in view, steps have been taken to inaugurate a Buying-at-home Campaign, with a view to suggesting to the citizens of Edmonton and Strathcona that preference be given to goods of local manufacture, so far as their wants can be supplied locally. It is believed that if every citizen of the two towns will loyally and persistently insist on their dealers filling their orders with goods of local manufacture, an enormous impetus will be given to local industrial development.

Is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, that all kinds of farm stock and farm produce sell higher in Canada than they do in the United States? Why, in my own town, talking with one of our livery men a few days ago, he told me that only a few years ago he could buy a livery horse suitable for his purpose for from $75 to $100, for which he has to pay now from $125 to $150. A carter in my own town corroborated that statement by telling me that a good draft horse that he could purchase a few years ago for from $100 to $125 costs now $200. Speaking about the price of horses, I have an article here written by a well known dealer in Toronto:

Toronto, March 21.—Mr. C. A. Burns, one of the best known horse buyers in Ontario, has addressed a letter to the press in which he declares that reciprocity will ruin the horse business in Ontario. He says in part:

The large increase in the number of automobiles used and auto-trucks in the United States, has put a damper on the horse trade and several of the large sales stables in New York have absolutely closed down, and with a reciprocity agreement Canada will be an outlet for these horses. And then again, the ranch-bred horses have lived out nine or ten months of the year or the whole year round, while our horses are fed five or seven months on hay in the stables. How on earth can we compete with the horses of the United States?—for it costs more to breed horses in Canada.

The buyers from western Canada would go to St. Paul, Minneapolis, Chicago, St. Louis, or Texas markets. On the three first-named markets they would get a clean-legged Percheron bred horse for less money than they could buy a Clyde horse of the same class and weight for in Toronto or anywhere in Ontario.

The only protection now of the Ontario farmer is the duty. On a $200 horse, the duty is $65, and on a $150 horse there is a $30 duty at the present time. Remove this duty and let American horses come in here, and make it easy for Canadian buyers to go to the United States markets, and the Ontario farmer will get fully $40 to $90 per head less than he does now for his horses.

Some people might think that the western farmer wants reciprocity, but I am convinced that it is the American element alone that is crying for reciprocity, and there are a large number of American farmers in the Canadian west. We must preserve Canada for Canadians, and the Ontario farmer will make a big mistake to think that he is going to benefit by reciprocity.

During the year ending March 31 last, 33,853 head of live stock entered the western states, and of this number 12,853 were horses. I have here the message from President Taft to the United States Senate, and dealing with the question of horses in Canada he says:

As to horses, Canada has no surplus of importance outside of Ontario. The agricultural development of the northwestern provinces has put prices of work stock and heavy draft teams at a premium in the territory tributary to Winnipeg. During the spring of 1910, it is stated on good authority that not less than 20,000 horses were sold out of Ontario alone for shipment to the market just mentioned, and prospective loss of this trade is giving Ontario some concern at this time. The five provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta combined have but 1,863,744 head as compared with 1,600,000 head now in the state of Iowa alone.

Dealing with the price of live stock generally in 17 states of the union, he gives the following figures:

Prices of other cattle vary in the United States from $14.30 a head in Minnesota to $27.40 in Montana, while in Canada the range of prices is from $31 in Saskatchewan to $34 in Ontario.

Prices of sheep are much lower in the United States than in Canada, due to the fact that Ontario specializes on pedigreed flocks, as appears later on. In the United States they range from $2 per head in Texas to $5.30 in Illinois and Iowa, while in Canada the range is from $4 in Nova Scotia to $7 in Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

The average price of live stock in these 17 states as compared with the average price in Canada is shown by the following table:

And still in the face of that declaration made by the President of the United States, and in the face of such figures as I have quoted the government are advising Canadians to seek a market for their products in the United States. I want for a short time to deal with another phase of this question, namely, what has a reasonable tariff done for Canada? Has it not helped to make it one of the most progressive nations on earth, has it not increased our manufacturing industry; has it not compelled large industries to come from other countries, and locate in Canada? On this point I quote from the 'Monetary Times,' one of the leading financial authorities in Canada:

United States Capital in Canadian Industries.

As the result of some investigations conducted by 'The Monetary Times' (Toronto), and subsequently verified and added to by officers of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, it is known that at the present time at least 200 United States manufacturing companies are operating branch factories in Canada, representing an aggregate investment of $226,000,000. For this influx of capital, with all the benefits accruing to the Dominion therefrom, we must thank a tariff which made it worth while for those who hoped to sell us goods to come to this side of the line to manufacture. Had the tariff not been a protective one, those United States manufacturers would probably have enlarged their home factories to take care of Canadian business instead of building on this side, in which case we would now be using goods made from United States material with United States labour, instead of goods made from Canadian material with Canadian labour.

Hon. Eugene N. Foss, Governor of Massachusetts stated that the policy which has been in force for many years in the United States 'has resulted in sending approximately $300,000,000 of American capital to Canada, to build up branch industries which compete with our own in foreign markets. It has also resulted in stifling the growth of Massachusetts and New England industries and kept us out of the business and commerce which belongs to us by every right. It has kept the great Canadian railways from our ports. It has ruined our coastwise shipping interests and made our wharf property of little value.

Now, I want to deal with a phase of this question that has not been dealt with by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, though it has been alluded to several times by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is a delicate subject, and I am asking now, not on behalf of this side of the House, but purely from my own personal standpoint, in regard to the preferential clause in our tariff. But as it is past the hour of 12 o'clock, I would very respectfully beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 12.10 a.m., Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THURSDAY, July 20, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WATER-POWERS ON ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. LORTIE:

1. Has the government made, during the past year, any concessions whatever relating to the water-powers on the St. Lawrence rapids in the county of Soulanges, rights to use the shores and of passing along them?

2. Has the government made any concessions of water-powers in the St. Lawrence? If so, to whom and on what conditions?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1 and 2. No.

CORONATION AND CONFERENCE EXPENDITURE.

Mr. MONK:

1. What amount has been expended by the government in connection with the reception of the First Minister on his return from England after the Coronation and conference?

2. What government vessels took part in the said reception?

3. To what account have the expenses incurred by the said reception been charged?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. Nil.
2. The C. G. S. 'Druid' conveyed the Prime Minister and several of his colleagues from Quebec to Montreal.
3. Answered by No. 1

ROSS RIFLES.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario):

1. How many Ross rifles were issued to the Queen's Own, Toronto Regiment, which have been declared unfit for service?
2. (a) Has a new issue been made to this regiment? (b) If so, in what quantities?
3. (a) What has become of the defective issue, and (b) what claim has the government in respect thereto against the Ross Rifle Company?
4. What was the cost of the blue jeans issued to the Canadian militia for use at their annual drills?
5. Were they ever used by the militia? If not, why not?
6. (a) Has the Karki overall been issued in place of the blue jeans? If so, (b) why, (c) what was the cost of the new issue, (d) the name of the contractor who supplied the latter and (e) the quantity issued and contracted for?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

1. 703 issued. Defects reported in two which are now under consideration.
2. (a) Yes. (b) Full strength of unit.
3. (a) The two rifles are now undergoing expert examination. (b) Not yet settled.
4. The last price paid for blue drill shirts was 71 cents each, and for the blue drill overalls 73¾ cents per pair.
5. Yes.
6. (a) Service clothing consisting of shirt and trousers is now being issued for camps to replace blue overalls as fast as the latter become worn out. (b) Is more serviceable than the blue. (c) The contract price for the shirts was at first 70 cents each, which was later on increased to 78 cents, and again to 82 cents each, owing to increases in the cost of the material and slight changes in pattern. The price of the trousers was at first 80 cents per pair, which for the same reasons was increased afterwards to 87 cents, and again to 98½ cents per pair. The price of the pantaloons, or breeches, was at first $1.97 per pair, afterwards increased to $2.02 owing to an increase in the cost of the material. (d) Shirts and trousers have been manufactured and supplied by Messrs. Woods, Ltd., Sparks Bros., and Mackenzie & Co., Ottawa; trousers also have been supplied by the C. Ross Co., Ottawa. The pantaloons have been supplied by the Mark Workman Co., Montreal, and the W. E. Sanford Mfg. Co., Hamilton. In all cases the material has been issued by the department to the contractors at cost price. (e) Quantity issued—all available. Since July, 1909, the following quantities have been contracted for, and for the most part delivered:

Shirts	47,398
Overalls, prs	35,479
Pantaloons, prs	15,000

UXBRIDGE POST OFFICE.

* Mr. SHARPE (Ontario):

1. Have tenders been received for the construction of the Uxbridge post office?
2. How many tenders were there, what are the names of the tenderers and the amount of each tender?
3. When is it proposed to start work, and when is it expected the work will be completed?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1 and 2. Yes, two tenders have been received, but as they have not been acted on, it is not customary to give out the detailed information asked for.
3. The lower tender being considered excessive, new bids will be called for.

POINT PRIM FOG ALARM.

Mr. JAMESON:

1. What are the names of the tenderers for the construction of Point Prim fog alarm, and the amount of their respective bids?
2. When were the tenders opened?
3. Has the contract been let? If so, to whom and at what figure? If not, when will it be let?
4. What is the estimated cost of the completed work?
5. Does the contract call for the building and equipment of the fog alarm station?
6. What is the character of the alarm proposed to be supplied to the station, what is the size and cost thereof and the estimated carrying capacity in miles, under ordinary weather conditions?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. Gilbert Ellis, Digby, $4,600.
2. June 1, 1911.
3. No. The department proposes to do the work by day labour.
4. $2,800.
5. Building only.
6. 3-inch diaphone. Diaphone and machinery cost $6,000. From 5 to 10 miles.

LEAMINGTON POST OFFICE.

Mr. WILCOX:

What was the cost, in detail, of the post office building at Leamington, Ontario?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

Site, survey, legal expenses, &c.	$ 2,270 50
Adervertising and printing	557 74
Construction of building	18,606 00
Heating apparatus	1,082 00
Electric wiring	620 00
Fittings and furniture	3,170 32
Cement walk	695 65

Clerk of works, supervision and inspection	$ 2,683 88
Minor items	42 60
Total to date	$30,028 69

Note.—Of the above sum, there has been paid $26,382.69, while a balance of $3,646 is held pending certain settlements by the late contractors.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. MONK. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to ask a further question of my right hon. friend in respect of the Colonial Imperial Conference. I have had occasion since yesterday to look over the precis of the proceedings alluded to by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) and would like to ask if this document, which the government intends communicating to the House, is the report of the proceedings of the Imperial Conference, or whether there is something more to lay before the House in connection with the conference, and if so when it will be laid before the House?

Right hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). The document which is in the hands of my hon. friend is the precis, so far as I have been able to judge, of the proceedings of the conference, which was issued from day to day to the press, and which has been put in pamphlet form.

At the opening of the conference, a motion was made that the press should be admitted to the proceedings. This motion was not carried. It was determined at this conference, as at the last, that a precis of the proceedings should be issued from day to day to the press, and this was done accordingly. So far as I have been able to judge, this precis, which has been issued from day to day, has been issued in published form and put upon the table of parliament, but that is not the official document which contains a verbatim report of the whole proceedings of the conference, and which is the document intended to be communicated to the public.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think this must be an official document inasmuch as it has been presented to parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is, but my hon. friend will understand that the discussions were not given verbatim in the precis. This precis was prepared by an officer of the Colonial Department, I think, Mr. Hughes. That was given to the press, but it would not be satisfactory to my hon. friend. What the public wants to know is everything that took place, as was suggested by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) yesterday. That is the document which it is intended to lay before parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Mr. MONK. Might I ask how soon my right hon. friend expects the House will be in possession of the document?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no more information than my hon. friend upon this subject, but I should expect it from day to day.

MR. COURTRICE.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I noticed in the 'Evening Journal,' of Wednesday, July 19, that a civil servant, named Howard Courtrice, who has been employed in the Department of the Interior for some time has been put in charge of the Liberal party's bureau for the superintending of the distribution of campaign literature. I would like to ask the government if this man is still employed by the Department of the Interior, or if he has severed his connection with the department.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sorry to say that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) is not in his seat at the present time, but I will ask him as soon as he comes in.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds) Before the orders of the day are called, I would rise to a question of privilege. I see by the unrevised copy of 'Hansard' that in speaking yesterday, I made use of the following language:

> I proposed to the Minister of Labour that he should appoint a commission similar to the Railway Commission, before whom parties could be heard, and that when that commission gives its award it would be binding upon the parties, and it would be illegal to have any strike or lock-out.

I find that in reference to this, the hon. minister (Mr. King) said:

> My recollection is that the hon. gentleman from Leeds (Mr. Taylor), suggested that the government should drive the men back at the point of the bayonet.

I wish to say that that statement is a wilful and malicious——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds).—mistatement of the facts. If the Speaker wishes to call me to order for making use of language which is not in accordance with the rules of order, I shall withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the use of the word 'wilful' is not parliamentary.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The hon. minister made that statement yesterday, and I would now repeat that I never made a suggestion to him with reference to that matter verbally in my life. I wrote to him, and he has my letter and I challenge him to produce it, and if it be in accord with the statement he made here to the House, then I am willing to acknowledge the corn. But until he produces that letter and proves his statement, he must lie under the charge of having made a statement in this House which is not in accord with the facts, and be branded, as he should be, with trying by misrepresentation to injure a political opponent. I wrote to the hon. minister that I had gone out and visited the coal mines where the strike was, and after conversation with the mine owners and with the men, I wrote the hon. minister and suggested a plan, and he wrote back thanking me for the suggestion, and saying that he would consider it. My suggestion was that the government should appoint a permanent commission, similar to the railway commission, to which employers and employees could appeal if they had grievances. If the men had a grievance in reference to not getting sufficient pay or anything of that kind, they could make a complaint to the commission and the commission would hear them. The employers would have a similar right, and it should be unlawful for the men to strike.. If a man wanted to leave his employment he had a perfect right to do so, but no right to prevent another man from taking his place. This was my suggestion. Why, therefore, should the minister get up here and say to the House that I wanted the government to drive the men back to work at the point of the bayonet? I say that a minister who would make a statement of that kind, which is not correct, is not qualified for the position he holds. And if the Prime Minister finds that a minister would make statements which are not true, he should expel him from the government immediately.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) may call 'order,' but until he reprimands his Minister of Labour for making a statement such as I have quoted I do not think he can call me to order. I intend to vindicate my character in this House as well as outside of it, and the Minister of Labour has no right to make such a statement as he made, having no grounds for it. He made the statement that I said it would be better to drive the men back at the point of the bayonet rather than allow innocent people to be frozen to death, and so on. If we had a Labour Commission to whom parties who had grievances, either employees or employer, could resort—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds)—and whose decision would be binding upon both parties—that is the solution of this question, instead of the humbugging law we have. The whole country is on strike, and the Minister of Labour rises, and attributes to me a suggestion that I never made. Let him produce the correspondence. And until he does, he must lie under the charge of having made a statement in this House that is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. KING. I had no desire to misrepresent my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor, Leeds).

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds). But you did it though. And I challenge you to prove it.

Mr. KING. The hon. gentleman refers to certain correspondence which he sent to me with regard to the industrial disputes. My recollection was that he thought it would be well to have the troops called out, and the men forced to return to the mines if necessary. But I have his letter, and will produce it, and let the House judge for itself.

WAYS AND MEANS—CHINESE INVESTIGATION COMMISSION.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to a matter which was mentioned two days ago in this House, namely, the Chinese Investigation Commission. This commission was appointed last December to take evidence, took evidence from December until March, and presented its report to this government nearly, or over, two months ago with the evidence upon which the report is presented. These matters are common property of the public in British Columbia, particularly in Vancouver where the people are greatly concerned as to the outcome of that investigation. It is necessary, if parliament is to have any voice, any chance to know during this session what has been the result of that inquiry, that the report should be voluntarily laid on the table by the government without awaiting the ordinary procedure of an order of the House for its production. I had thought that the report would have come in ordinary course on the reassembling of parliament, judging particularly from the fact, that, two or three weeks before the holidays I inquired about it in the House in conjunction with the Bill to amend the Chinese Immigration Act, suggesting that the report should be brought down before we proceeded with the Bill, and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) in charge of the Bill stated that the request was a very reasonable one, thus signifying the consent of the government to produce the report at an early day. Having these facts in mind I asked the other day:

Has the report of Mr. Justice Murphy of the Chinese Investigation Committee at Vancouver been received, and if so will it be laid on the table without an order of the House?

The answer to this was as follows:

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. The report has been received by the Department of Trade and Commerce, but in the absence of the minister I am not able to say anything in reference to it except that it is under consideration.

Two days have elapsed since then. It is plain to me that if the government intends to give us the benefit of the information contained in that report the minister responsible would have taken action before now, but we have no report, and no information as to the report.

To show the gravity of the occasion, I may mention that at the lowest estimate the frauds dealt with by this commission have caused a loss to the revenue of Canada of fully $1,000,000, that they involve a widespread conspiracy extending from Canada across the Pacific to China, and involving not only government officials, but consular officials in China; they involve the Customs Department in opium smuggling, and other smuggling frauds as well as those in relation to Chinese immigration. The circumstances were explained during the course of the trial to several members of this government by persons in a position to know whereof they speak. The ministers to whom they have been explained as shown by the evidence, being the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), the Minister of Labour (Mr. King), and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman). These gentlemen at various times, have been put in possession of the details of these startling frauds as to which it was thought they might show some personal interest. Yet, having appointed a commission, and having received the report of the commission, we find that none of these gentlemen seemingly have had the curiosity to examine the report or determine upon any course of action to be taken with respect to it. That is a position of affairs, which, I submit should not be allowed to continue without protest. And, if I make the protest to-day it is because, in the present perilous condition of this parliament there is no knowing from day to day that further opportunity will be available to place the facts before the public, we must take any opportunity that offers. Now we are entitled, I think, to have that report and the evidence laid upon the table of this House, and placed in the possession of the members. In the absence of the report I have some well authenticated facts which we can present, thanks to the enterprise of the newspapers of Vancouver. We have some indication of the scope of the inquiry in a letter sent to this government by a person in a very responsible position in Vancouver, selected by them to be a judge of the county court, a man of well known integrity and probity, who wrote during last fall to this effect, and I quote from the evidence as taken in Vancouver:

Judge Grant, who had written to the Minister of Customs suggesting that 'the microbe of graft was evident in the ranks of the Liberal party in this province,' and expressing satisfaction that the inquiry was to take place and also asking that the matter be thoroughly investigated in spite of the social prominence of some of the parties implicated, was on the stand.

The following paragraphs are culled from that letter:

We observe with great satisfaction the feeling of the Dominion government in deciding to appoint a commission to investigate alleged frauds in connection with the importation of Chinese through this port and Victoria. There is no doubt that there exists a large scheme to defraud the government, and that certain parasites of the Liberal government have profited thereby.

I understand that these same parasites are doing all in their power to prevent the appointment of a commission, but I trust that the government which has done so much in the past to ferret out graft, will see that this also is looked into and that the facts are made public, notwithstanding the high social and party standing of its perpetrators.

The microbe of graft is evident in the Liberal party in this province, and no serum is more effective than the light by way of a searching investigation.

The report proceeds to say:

Judge Grant, in his evidence yesterday said that the allegations he had made in his letter were based on what he had been told by old members of the Liberal party. He declared that the questions referred to were not only Chinese immigration, but the fishermen's licenses and the Japanese element.

He had been told that a number of men in Nanaimo, who were not bona fide fishermen, apply for licenses and sell them to Vancouver men, who again dispose of them at a considerable profit to the Japanese.

The reference to the attempts to stop the investigation were also based on hearsay, said the witness. He did not propose to disclose the name of his informant.

Mr. Justice Murphy—I must insist that you disclose the name.

But My Lord, I'd rather——

Mr. Justice Murphy—As long as I am sitting on this commission I must insist on going into matters fully as they come up. I must insist on hearing his name.

The witness explained that he would prefer to give it privately to the commissioner or the counsel. He had just met the man on the street a few days after the death of Collector Bowell's daughter.

Mr. Judge Murphy—I am very sorry, but I cannot allow the name to be given in private. This is not a star chamber proposition.

There is quite a lot of testimony from the same witness, but the names referred to are not disclosed, so I shall not read further. The report proceeds:

Mr. J. C. Senkler, K.C., President of the Liberal Association, was the next witness. He said that as chairman of the patronage committee, he had not come in contact with any fraud in connection with Chinese immigration. He admitted that when a vacancy occurred in the Customs Department it had been the custom for the patronage committee to recommend a man. The name was submitted to Ottawa and acted upon. He claimed that Controller of Customs Bowell had made appointments on his own responsibility of a temporary character.

He said that the patronage system was common throughout the Dominion. He believed that money had been made out of Chinese immigration but claimed not by any members of the Liberal Association.

Here we have a belief stated by a gentleman high in the confidence of this government, a gentleman who has been a candidate of the party in Vancouver, and who now holds the responsible position of president of the Liberal Association in the great city of Vancouver, who says:

He believed that money had been made out of Chinese immigration, but claimed not by any members of the Liberal Association.

During his absence from Vancouver he discovered a telegram had been dispatched to Sir Wilfrid Laurier protesting against the inquiry. Mr. Senkler said on his return he at once informed Sir Wilfrod that the patronage committee had met and wished the inquiry to proceed. He did not know who had sent the telegram or who had signed it.

So we see that this inquiry has been conducted under the most august auspices, that is under the auspices of the patronage committee of the city of Vancouver, whose consent, apparently, had to be obtained before a million dollar fraud could be investigated.

As to this mysterious telegram, I am informed, although I have not under my hand that portion of the evidence, that it turned out afterwards to have been sent by the secretary of the Liberal Association after a meeting held in the office of the gentleman who repudiated it, and that the secretary of the Liberal Association was in the habit of sending official telegrams of this kind attaching thereto the name of the president of the association; so that we may take the gentleman's disclaimer of any knowledge of it as personal only and as not absolving the Liberal association there from the desire first of all to stop a revelation which they feared to have made and their later consent to it as merely forced by the knowledge that the facts would come out anyhow.

At the risk of taking up valuable time of this House I wish to read from the evidence as reported verbatim in the Vancouver press, some of the most striking passages. I regret that I have not the document itself which is now in the possession of the government, and which I should have, especially because the finding of Mr. Justice Murphy might throw some different light upon what seem to be cloudy passages in the evidence. But since the government refuse to give us this information we must do the best we can with what we have at our disposal.

I have here now the evidence which I said I had not under my hand, as to this mysterious telegram, and I shall read a portion of it. In the 'News-Advertiser' of Vancouver of December 30, I find this:

The patronage committee of the Liberal Association was again 'on the grill' at the morning session of the commission, when Mr A. M. Pound was exhaustively examined concerning the telegram sent in the name of Mr. Senkler, K.C., chairman of the commission.

Mr. Pound admitted that the draft of the telegram produced was in his own hand-writing, but he did not admit that he saw the actual telegram that was sent to the officials of the department at Ottawa. At the request of Mr. G. E. McCrossan, Mr. Justice Murphy agreed to issue an order for the telegraph company to produce their file for inspection.

The sending of a telegram on the matter had been discussed at a meeting, said the witness, and the reason they had decided to ask for the reinstatement of Yip On was that the customs officials stated that nothing had been proved against him, and that they had every confidence in him. Asked whether he thought that was a sufficient reason to go to Sir Wilfrid Laurier above Mr. Foster's head, witness replied in the affirmative.

He had no reason for supposing that Mr. Foster, or the department which sent him did not know what they were doing, but the information given was conflicting, caused, he thought, by one tong being against another.

This is the telegram, dated September 23:

Recommend reinstatement Yip On approved by our friends and customs officials; charges not proved; our friends object to drastic action of O'Hara in suspending collector Bowell.

I was wrong in saying that the meeting was held in the office of the chairman of the Liberal executive. I read here:

Who remained in the room of Messrs. Kelly Douglas' office when you left?

Witness was not very clear in this point, but he felt sure that Mr. Kelly was there.

You agreed with the sentiments of the draft?

Yes, at the time.

Witness was pointedly asked whether there was anything in the telegram suggesting that a probe was wanted.

In reply he stated again that all the Liberals were in favour of it, and he had never heard of any objection to the investigation.

'And the sole desire for this,' exclaimed counsel 'was shown in two telegrams—the reinstatement of Yip On and the leaving of the appointment to the patronage committee. Anything else? he satirically concluded.

'Yes', responded witness, 'I spoke to Mr. Templeman on his way from Ottawa. I met him at the station and told him personally that we would like to see the matter probed to the bottom. I said also that I was satisfied that Mr. Bowell had not done anything irregular.'

'When was that?'

It was shortly after the Drummond and Arthabaska election.

It was shortly after the Drummond and Arthabaska election when the fear of God was in the hearts of these Liberals in Vancouver, that they reluctantly consented to an investigation which just before that momentous event they had resolutely set themselves to prevent if they possibly could.

Now, as to the origin of these frauds. As I said, it is no new matter, but this has been going on ever since 1907, shortly after the Chinese Immigration Act was amended by this parliament for no honest purpose that any one has ever been able to discover, but under circumstances which gave ground for protests at that time, and for the assertion that the amendments were made with the sole idea of facilitating the frauds which have occurred. These protests were made locally to my knowledge when the amendments were before the House, and they have been fully borne out by subsequent developments which have shown nothing but fraud to have resulted from the larger scope given for the importation of so-called Chinese merchants and students. I read from the evidence in the 'News Advertiser' of January 5, page 5, second column:

When, asked Mr. McCrossan, did the new merchants from China begin to come in under passports? Witness could not tell exactly.

About 1907? I think about 1907 or a little of 1906.

'You had been interpreter the year before that?' 'It was about three years after my appointment as interpreter.'

'Did it strike you as peculiar that these passports should be presented by Chinese merchants? They never did that before. What did you think about it?' 'Mr. Bowell asked me the meaning of the passports, and I just read them from the translation. Mr. Bowell said: 'I think these passports will be all right. They have got the signatures of the consul.'

'Did Mr. Bowell think they were all right?' 'Well, one first time there were no seals on the photographs and Mr. Bowell said: 'Perhaps some other man get in.' Mr. Bowell wrote to Ottawa about it.' In addition explained Yip On, there must be an examination and information about the immigrants last business and why he came here.'

If I delay the House finding my references I wish to explain again that it is solely the fault of the government, because they have all this evidence in proper order in Judge Murphy's report.

An hon. MEMBER. Hurry up.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I observe one of the beneficiaries of these proceedings exclaiming 'hear, hear.'

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). 'Hear, hear,' or 'hurry up,' or some other interruption. It will be my painful duty to remind these hon. gentlemen every time they interrupt me that they are the beneficiaries of this million dollar fraud which is now engaging the attention of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Order, order.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I am speaking by the book, Mr. Speaker. This passage, is from the Vancouver 'Daily Province,' of January 6, page 20. Yip On, the dismissed interpreter is under examination, and he says:

The witness admitted a large number of new merchants had come in in the last two years. He did not know where they had gone to; he did not know of any who had started up in Vancouver.

I would like to explain the significance of that, Mr. Speaker. Immediately after the amendment of the Act providing an easy means of access for supposed merchants, there began to come in by scores on every vessel—merchants with no money, no credentials, unknown, who did not start up in business any where, and yet no person in the employ of the government thought it his duty for the moment to question why they came in, and this notwithstanding that the collector of customs at Victoria had written them an official letter calling attention to the extraordinary discrepancy between the number of merchants coming in at Victoria where the department is honestly and rigidly administered, and the number coming in at Vancouver under the auspices of the Patronage Committee.

'They come looking for business; any one would know that,' he declared.

'But they did not find any, eh?'

'I don't know.'

Yip On said his duty was just to ask questions put through him to the passengers by collector Bowell. He said that he did not think about the matter at all.

Mr. Justice Murphy.—He thought it was a dangerous subject and he had better keep away from it.

In the Vancouver 'News Advertiser' January 7th, on the 1st page, we read the proceedings of the previous day:

The balance of the day was taken up investigating Lew's connection with the department at Ottawa, how it commenced, and the work that had been done in Vancouver last September.

Unlike Yip, David Lew furnished information in the very best English, was definite and decided in his statements, and not at all afraid to express his own views. In fact, he was decidedly aggressive, and during the whole of the time gave profuse answers to all the questions.

It was, he said, a topic of conversation on the coast that a certain amount of smuggling was going on, and following an interview here with hon. Mackenzie King, he had a talk at Ottawa with Mr. O'Hara and furnished information regarding the system, and exempts.

In the same paper on page 4:

Yip Suh Foy was called, and not being in the hall Yip On went out to telephone to him. In his place David C. Lew was sworn and took the witness chair. His occupation, he said, was that of a Chinese agent.

Could he tell how the Dominion government suspected that there were frauds going on at this port?

'I cannot say who was the first,' said David Lew. 'It is probably a few months ago, and I was requested to furnish information. It was a topic around the coast that a certain amount of smuggling was going on, and I furnished the information to the department in the east.' He had given information to the United States Immigration Service.

'I mean, said Mr. McCrossan, 'information to the Dominion government.'

'Well, Mr. Mackenzie King was around and I mentioned the matter to hom. Nothing was done at the time.

'I did not bring the matter up. There was an indirect request from the general immigration department (the Minister of the Interior's department) at Ottawa, through Mr. McGuinness.' Mr. McGuinness was not an official, but witness knew he was down here on official business. He got the information from Mr. McGuinness that he was representing the department at Ottawa.

'Mr. McGuinness, then, was the starting point, as far as you know, of the inquiry?'

'He gave me to understand that he had a certain amount of information, and he got information out of me.' Witness met Mr. McGuinness about a year ago.

'What information did you give him?'

'As far as my knowledge of the local department here, things were very slack. No system at all.'

'What other information? Anything definite at that time?'

'No.'

'When was the next time that you were officially requested to give information?'

'I think the next time was on my holiday trip to the east, when I called on Mr. O'Hara in June or July last. I had previously called to pay my respects to the Chinese consul, and I dropped into Mr. O'Hara's office.'

'What was the matter that you discussed with him?'

'He said he would like to get some information out of me, and a conversation went on.'

'What information did you give him?'

'About the system and exempts. I said that the exempts should receive better treatment. The United States immigration law was much stricter and yet the system was better than ours. I also said that I hoped it was not the Canadian law to shut out trade and commerce. Those who were not bona-fide men made the bona-fide ones suffer.'

'What did you say about the ones that were not bona-fide?'

'I can't recollect exactly. I think it was as to the influence of passports. I think the chief controller brought that up himself.'

'Did you give any information as to Yip On?'

Not very directly, said witness, nor did he then discuss his suspicions of Yip On.

'Did anything you said at that time cause Mr. Foster to come here?'

Witness thought that Mr. Foster got here about August.

'And the conversation was in June or July?' 'Yes.'

'Did anything then transpire between you and Mr. O'Hara.'

'Not at that time. The chief controller, on the 2nd or 3rd, had sent for me at my hotel. He asked me to be very frank with him, and he would consider it a favor if I would give him light on the subject. I told him I did not think I could, but I said that there were some complaints amongst the merchants.'

'He asked if he sent an officer out will I assist him and I said I would do my best.'

He then said that he contemplated sending out an officer to inquire into the matter. I told him I was leaving on that day, and then he said he would like to introduce me to Colonel Sherwood. It was at the time of the printing-house scandal, and Colonel Sherwood was pretty busy.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, that there was some reason at the time for not getting diligently after this, because scandals crowded so fast one upon the other that it was impossible for the ministers to attend to them all at the one time. But since then ten months have passed so that the reason existing in September 1910 for lack of diligence is no longer a reason in July 1911.

Witness said he had had some trouble in connection with his C.P.R. ticket, and that caused him to stay a further two or three days. He did not meet Colonel Sherwood, and when he returned to Vancouver the matter slipped out of his mind.

It was again brought up to him by a letter from the chief controller, which he regretted he had not kept. The reason why he had destroyed it was because both the Chinese and the white people all threw the matter up at him, and he wanted to destroy everything in connection with it.

Before it happened, said David Lew, they were all his friends but afterwards he was called 'a dirty spotter' and a 'traitor.'

Judge Murphy—By whom? Give us the names of the Chinese and we will have them up here.

Lew said that he was sorry that he could not furnish their names. But he had heard the words spoken in public places.

The letter stated that Mr. Foster was coming and asked him to assist him. Mr. Foster, he thought, was quite a long time here before he called on witness. He did not know whether Mr. Foster or Mr. McGinness first called on him.

He was recommended to Mr. Foster by Inspector Campbell of the Provincial Police, and by the United States Immigration Service, for which latter he had done a lot of work. Mr. Foster also mentioned that Magistrate H. O. Alexander had spoken well of him.

'We started on the waterfront,' said Lew, 'with the stowaways, and then with the smuggling. We got something of that sort, but nothing we could pin down. Then we started on the passports.'

'And what did you find? Did Yip On and his friends know then that you were working for Mr. Foster?'

Well, I think he would. A report was made by me to Mr. Foster that the Chinese were meeting the boat, and I said that that was dangerous work. The practice of sending an interpreter down to Victoria was, he thought, unwise. The department at Ottawa then asked Mr. Bowell why he did it. That was one of the first communications Mr. Bowell had. Lew said that he could not give the exact day he started on the secret service work.

Mr. McCrossan quoted from letters from the department at Ottawa with regard to Yip On's absence from work, and the fact that some of his work had been done by his brother Yip Fong. From copies of letters to the department from Lew it appeared that, according to the poll-tax, Victoria received more Chinese than Vancouver, but acording to exempts Vancouver had more than Victoria.

That is to say, the Chinese who had to pay came in much greater numbers to Victoria, but the Chinese merchants who were to come in without paying for some mysterious reason made their way in overwhelming numbers to a place where there was the least prospect of entering into mercantile business.

In another letter there occurred a sentence which Judge Murphy took occasion to comment upon.

This sentence was: 'Mr. McGuinness has already told the government about the graft.'

'If there is any graft we are here to find it out,' he said.

'What did he tell you about this?' asked Mr. McCrossan.

'He told the government there must be graft in some place. He did not say that suspicion pointed to any one. He made a general statement,' replied the witness.

Then again, on page 11 of the 'News Advertiser' of the same date:

Yip On continued to state that all the letters were not addressed to him, but to Yip Hing Jang. Then he was asked to read another letter. This letter created an impression. It was as follows:

'We have received letter. Everything carefully noted. Lee Foon Soon spends money just like getting rid of dirt.'

This was one of the Chinese conspirators who was doing so well that he is reported as spending money just like he was getting rid of dirt.

This matter is true. He has taken $50 of the money left in Hong Kong and went home for a few days. He came back to Hong Kong and he drew another $100. He has nearly got all his money back. According to my experience this fellow is no good. I have guaranteed Mah Yoh, Yung Sing, Lee Gee, Gong Sun, Dun Kong and Tam Fung coming on this steamer and when they arrive look after them.'

I have drawn $134 from Mam Moy Co. for Tun Fung's passage. Please make note of this in your book. I have sent $100 to Quo Ho Long and told them to give Yong Sing $8 every month for his home expenses, and also give Yip Fee $20 for board, according to your request. Please note these two items as I have paid them and charged to you.

I read this letter in order to show that these things were accepted by the Chinese as ordinary routine in the Canadian customs service, as indicating that this thing had been going on for a long time, was well recognized as a regular occupation, and was likely to continue for a long time in the future. This was no accidental smuggling such as is bound to occur anywhere when a particular ship comes in and a contraband passenger is landed. But these letters, which are only a sample of many received, show that the thing was recognized by many Chinese, as well as by the conspirators in Vancouver, as something regular which there was no probability of stopping for a long time to come. These letters continue:

If Lee Fook Soon has sufficient passage money later on I shall guarantee him to come. Your cablegrams of Chinese eight month, third day, stating 'Strictly stop and wait for letter,' received and fully understood.

I should have obeyed your order but as I had purchased previously second class passengers tickets for them, $100 will be lost. I was obliged to send two pieces of provincial goods named Yung Yong and Chang Foon, who is a relative of Chang Hok Chow's cousin on 'Empress of India.'

I may say that this thing was so well organized that they had a regular cable code covering each phase of these smuggling operations, and 'two pieces of provincial goods' were shown by the cable code to be two exempt Chinamen.

That cablegram was the one following the explosion in Vancouver, the publication of the announcement that these things were going on, and the suspension of the interpreter so that a new interpreter might be put on by the Dominion police to intercept the contraband goods.

I delivered the merchants' passports and $300 in gold. Please receive them accordingly and enter in book, each man being given seven $20 gold pieces and one $10 gold piece to take with him. You look after them to be landed safely. When everything is settled all right write to me and let me know at once, and relieve my worry.

This letter was from Gat Won, dated August 24, and was sealed with the stamp of Lem How. It was addressed to Yip Hang Sang, which is one of Yip On's names. That letter was for you, said Mr. McCrossan.

Yip On slowly shook his head. 'No, I don't think so,' he said. This letter was not sent from Lem How. Only his seal.

Is the address on the letter correct? Yes. The letter was put in as an exhibit.

Now, Yip On, is not this letter for you? No, no.

You told us yesterday you often had letters on boats coming in from Lem How, addressed Yip Sing Sang. Sometimes, yes.

Now, when you think over this letter and when you remember the cable therein referred to, 'Strictly stop and wait for cable,' tell me, is not the writing of that cable yours? Did you send those cablegrams? No.

Mr. McCrossan—In view of the serious nature of the charge of dumping of emigrants—and this is a keystone if such a conspiracy exists—and also the statement made that there was a conspiracy to forge all these cablegrams and letters, I would suggest that the witness should be sworn on the chicken oath, an oath which has been administered by Mr. Justice Hunter in China.

I will read next from the 'News-Advertiser' of the 10th of January, 1911. This has a sensational heading showing the impression held by the citizens of Vancouver as to the part the government had in this, an impression which, if not correct, no doubt has been dealt with by Mr. Justice Murphy, so that the government, it would seem, owe it to themselves and to the honour of one of their members, to put that report on the table at the earliest possible day, and let us know whether this impression was justified or not. The headline says:

Ottawa and the Chinese inquiry—Hon. Mr. Templeman, according to evidence of Chinese agent, was anxious to stop progress of investigation.

The report proceeds:

Startling statements were made yesterday afternoon by David C. Lew in connection with a conversation which he said took place in September as to the position adopted by Hon. Mr. Templeman with regard to the inquiry then being instituted into Chinese immigration.

Lew had sent, on 21st September, two telegrams to Mr. E. T. R. McInnes, at Ottawa, one stating that Mr. Burrell had walked into the detention shed and dismissed him. He had replied that he took his orders from Mr. Foster, after which Hon. Mr. Templeman had telephoned to Yip On to come down at once as he was reinstated, whereupon Lew left.

The other telegram stated that Lew was done. That Hon. Mr. Templeman had wired to Paterson and Cartwright to reinstate Yip On, and that Hon. Mr. Templeman tried to deceive, perhaps intended to dismiss, Mr. Foster last night.

Further, Lew stated that Mr. Foster had told him there were several complaints against them. This admission was made most reluctantly, as witness stated he had given his word of honor not to speak of the matter, and he only supplied the information on being informed by Judge Murphy that he would be exonerated from his blame.

Following this exemption from his promise, Lew stated that he had been told that Hon. Mr. Templeman told Mr. Foster he wanted him to call off the investigation, and further had stated that he had wired to Ottawa, and that he would modify things when he got back there. In the meantime the matter of the inquiry was to stand over.

These things concerning the position of the Minister of Mines were told him, he said, by a young lawyer, with whom witness and Mr. Grant had been in communication. Judge Murphy requested Lew to make every effort to discover the name of that lawyer, as the commission desired to question him.

This witness proceeds—this is from page 8 of the same paper:

Witness also stated that the matter was too serious to be in the control of party politics and it hardly seemed proper to him that a minister from another department should step in and interfere.

There was, he said further, a general feeling of approval amongst the Chinese when Yip On was suspended, which immediately vanished upon his reinstatement. This was not only his personal complaint, it was also that of his people, and he trusted Mr. O'Hara would be able to read between the lines, and whether things had been honest and above board or otherwise. In concluding he pointed out that during the past fifteen months only six viceroyal certificates had been admitted at Victoria, of which three were rejected, while at Vancouver there had been about an average of fifteen each trip.

In reply to a question as to why he sent the telegram to Mr. McInnes witness explained that he did so to let him know what he was doing.

Judge Murphy—Is that the first communication you had with Mr. McInnes since he left here?

Witness said he thought it was. He wanted Mr. McInnes to know that his work was carried out and what the trouble was.

'Did you have any conversation that led you to send the telegram?'

Witness asked Judge Murphy if he must reply to the question, and was answered in the affirmative.

Witness—But I gave my word of honour I would not repeat it.

Judge Murphy—That cannot be helped. We will exonerate you from it.

Lew then stated that Mr. Foster told him, on the same day, that there were several complaints against him. He did not know who was present besides Mr. Foster, but the conversation took place at the post office corner. He did not know whether he came across Mr. Grant, he said, or some young lawyer in town. Coming back he was told that Hon. Mr. Templeman told Mr. Foster he wanted him to call it off.

Judge Murphy—Call you off, or call off the investigation?

'The investigation.'

Judge Murphy—Make an effort to find out the name of the young lawyer. We would like to have him here.

Witness declared he said he was not going to stop it, as it would look as if he did not go in to see the finish. 'They can "knock" all they like,' he said, 'the evidence and the facts would speak for themselves.'

Mr. Senkler, he said, had a personal grudge against him, and he had said he would tell about it some time before the public.

Hon. Wm. Templeman had said he had wired, and the telegram had gone, and he would modify things when he got back to Ottawa. In the meantime Lew might let the matter stand.

Judge Murphy—Do you know if Mr. Foster did any work after that?

'I cannot remember.'

Then the witness gave evidence of the modus operandi of the fraudulent Chinamen. He said:

These sworn declarations told how Lin Dong was given certain instructions before leaving China by the War Yick firm. Before he left he paid $950 in Mexican money to 'cover second-class passage and of landing by the customs interpreter.' Afterwards he entered Canada as a merchant, with gold and a draft lent by the Chinese interpreter, who afterwards took the money back again.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these Chinese merchants were absolute paupers, coming in, not only against the Chinese Immigration Act but against every other immigration Act, with money lent them by the interpreter, who took it from them as soon as he received the paupers on the Vancouver shore.

During the examination witness stated that he was told by a Chinese miner at Comox that there was 'no trouble at all in getting Chinese off there.' He also said that the result of his inquiries satisfied Mr. Foster that Chinese 'got off all right here' from the 'Kumeric,' one 'old-timer,' as Lew called him, being stated to have been caught no less than three times trying to get in on the 'Oceano.'

Another curious letter was the unsigned one to Mr. Fat Som, asking the receiver to look after five Chinese who were coming. He had sent Look Tuen to discuss the matter with Fat Som, he said, and finished up by saying that if the matter was not a success a large amount of money would be lost. . . .

A letter was then read from Lew to Mr. O'Hara, in which the witness stated that he had decided to do all he could for Mr. Foster. After this he went into the whole business with the latter gentleman. Asked whether he could give any information as to the identity of 'Julian Roy,' who seemed to be working with Mr. McInnes and with Lew, witness could not say, and returned the same reply when asked whether it could be Mr. Gordon Grant, the latter smiling at the suggestion.

The position and the antecedents of this witness having been questioned before the commission, evidence was taken on the point as follows:

Mr TAYLOR (New Westminster.)

Lew had lived thirteen years in British Columbia, was born in Canton, and was twenty-four years old. He was a Christian, a member of the Baptist church, and the Christian oath was binding on his conscience.

'Was he an official of the Dominion government prior to the trip to Ottawa?'

'No.'

'Was Mr. T. R. E. McInnes, then or now, an official?'

Witness could not say. Mr. McInnes might be an official without witness knowing it. He had a strong opinion that Mr. McInnes was a confidential agent of some department, what department he could not say. It might be the Immigration Department.

* * * * * * *

Lew was, notwithstanding, going on to tell how he was introduced to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and so on, when Mr. Taylor again stopped him and pressed for a definite reply.

The object of his trip was by no means principally concerning Chinese immigration, he said. Mr. Taylor endeavoured to find out why, therefore, Lew made Ottawa the principal object of his trip, and the place where he had stayed the longest, and inquired minutely as to whom he knew there kept him interested.

He knew Alec Johnson, he said, a Chinese boy who had been at McGill, and beyond this he met Mr. McInnes and Mr. Mackenzie King. He visited all the departments. He was introduced to Mr. O'Hara's office by Mr. McInnes.

Then the evidence goes on to show how Inspector Foster, of the Dominion Police ran down evidence of the conspiracy by visiting Victoria and boarding vessels there instead of at Vancouver.

Instructions had been given to introduce Lew on board as a man who had come in the place of Yip On. They went first, he and Mr. Foster, to the intermediate cabin, where Lew was introduced as the man who had come in place of Yip On. Everybody lined up for the manifest to be gone through. The first were returned merchants, and Lew knew them by sight and told them to stand on one side. After receiving the identification cards, they asked the men for letters, which were thrown on the table and marked by witness and by Mun Kow for identification.

Judge Murphy—Did each man have a letter?

Mostly, but I think in one case one man covered three letters. The first letter, said witness, addressed to Yip Ting Sam ('Ting' being evidently a mistake for 'Hing'), was marked, 'Important, and deliver personally,' and had the seal of Lam How of Hong Kong, and the seal of the writer, Gat Wow. The first letter was read. It was as follows:

Dear cousin,—Your letter that Chinese 'domestic goods' received understood, contents carefully noted. You say that Lem Quick Sun has been spending money not as gold but as dirt. That is true. The money he left with me he has now drawn. This fellow is no use at all.

I have guaranteed Man Yick, Yoo Sich and Tan Foop coming on the steamer. I have drawn $134.50 for the passage. Please see that these 'provincial goods' are landed. I received your cablegram of eighth month saying 'strictly stop and wait for letter' and same was fully understood, but as I had already bought a ticket, they had to go forward or else I would have lost a good sum. Please see, therefore, that they are received and landed all right. If not, from now on I will only send you 'one piece of goods' by each steamer.

Quite modest. One piece of goods by one steamer, which, compared with the scale on which these undertakings had been going on, is very little indeed.

I have given those now going forward seven big pieces and one small piece of gold. Please keep memo. of this.

The next letter referred to Lee Foop Soon, and also to the Chinese who had been guaranteed by the writer, to the money matters between writer and receiver, and to the request to 'look after' the arrivals and relieve the writer's worries. This letter also has already been published. Witness went through and agreed with the interpretation of these letters. Witness explained, in addition, that after he got up to the top deck of the ship he handed all the letters, which he carried in one bundle, to Mr. Foster, and Mr. Foster initialled them. These were exhibits 93 and 94 and these bore Mr. Foster's initials.

Dealing with passports, Mun Kow was, said witness, doing the interpreting in connection with the landing at Victoria. A sworn declaration made there, before F. W. Davy, in connection with an admitted bogus and rejected case, stated that the passenger was stated to have paid $1,100 Mexican money to Yip Gat Won in China, and that $150 was to be paid here to Yip Hing Sam. The passenger was fully instructed how to act and tell the 'merchant' story.

So that, bit by bit, it was developed that this conspiracy had been carefully organized. These men, of course, were detained.

They were provided with a meal, and Mr. Foster and Mr. Davy and the witness came back after supper. The men were then examined and, in the main stuck well to their story until it came to Chang Foon and Lung Moon, who broke down and confessed. These men took their confessions in the shape of sworn declarations made before Mr. Davy.

How did you get their passports?

They went, said witness, to one of the gentry in the village, and then prepared applications with photographs. Some said they went to Hong Kong and saw the British consul, but on cross-examination it would come out that they had certainly been no nearer the consul's office than the outside door.

A telegram of September 21st sent to Mr. T. R. E. McInnes at Ottawa in witnesses' name was read as follows:

Citizen Building, Ottawa.

Mailed a copy of transcript to-day and confidential report to O'Hara. Copy to you. Boy lost confidential message from Sherwood to Foster, did not receive until six o'clock. Cannot understand your word 'Brock.' D. Lew.

Another telegram of October 2nd, was also read. It was as follows:

T. R. E. McInnes, Ottawa.

Inquiry proceeded yesterday. Wong Ching (see last transcript) examined now stated that he wrote letter to Fin Ting Sam at David Lew's direction. Under examination witness admitted gave David Lew facts in letter as message of Yip On, but David Lew told him to write instead. Decoy letter addressed like intercepted letter reached Hong Kong, although same denied. Satisfied, proved Bowell at least negligent and incapable. Gordon writing and confirming. Result encouraging, but we have free hand to move quickly to prevent. Worshop acting better since telegram yesterday. Foster and I intend meeting next boat, but orders must be obeyed regarding Yip On's relations visiting boats. D. Lew.

In the 'News-Advertiser' of January 12, on the first page, we read something further as to the character of this correspondent.

Among the correspondence read in the afternoon was a letter from T. C. Tom, a Chinese missionary from Nanaimo, who wrote to the department at Ottawa stating that the department would find out that they had a thief——

The thief, I presume was not Lew.

—and further recommended Lew as one who had done good service to the government which no other Chinaman would do.

And then, at page 11, the interpreter said:

It was true that the Canadian Pacific railway had excluded him from the wharf. He was told by one of the Canadian Pacific railway employees, a tall stout man, in the detention shed, that the company had given strict orders to keep Lew out of the shed, as he was getting too much information. The next day he was told by a constable not to go near the 'Empress' as they had strict orders to keep him away. He could not say whether the Canadian Pacific railway were 'in on the game.' It was because he was stirring up the deportation that he was being excluded. Judge Murphy said these men must be brought before him as witnesses.

Then later on:

Lew said that he was told by T. C. Tom that Yip On was introduced by Mr. Kelly to Mr. Ralph Smith at Mr. Kelly's office, who said that Yip On was not such a bad fellow. On examining passports Mr. Taylor said: Was it suggested that the transport was a failure?

Lew said he did not say so.

Mr. Taylor said that the suggestion would mean that the consular seal had been forged.

Lew explained that there was no way for the consul general at Hong Kong to make sure, but Mr. Taylor was of opinion that it would be an extremely difficult thing to forge a passport. He could not, however, induce witness to say that the passport shown was an apparently genuine document.

Lew's strong point was that every one of the men, about twenty-two in number, admitted that they had never been in the vice-consular office at Hong Kong, and another man at Victoria had also admitted it.

This number, twenty-two, I may say, was a single consignment, for these fellows came in by scores.

How did they say the seal was obtained? We did not get that far.

Then you suggest that some person in the consul general's office in Hong Kong was in the ring? Lew said that what he thought would not benefit the commission.

Judge Murphy pointed out that the passports appeared to have been prepared in blank as the handwriting was different. It did not necessarily follow, however, that there was any fraud in this. It was clear that the consul general had no knowledge that the passports were to be used for customs purposes. Apparently they might have been given just for travel purposes.

And further on:

Who took the responsibility of the statement beginning, 'I may be wrong and indiscreet'?

I am responsible for that, said Lew.

Mr. Foster and Mr. Gordon Grant had given him the information, but he could not remember who were the other two men who gave him the information against the minister of the Crown. He remembered that Mr. Foster told him that Hon. Wm. Templeman took a trip to his bedroom after midnight and had then told him to stay his hand. He thought that this was told him at a lunch table at the Carlton, and the statement was afterwards repeated in the presence of Mr. J. B. Ferris and Mr. Grant. Mr. Foster gave him the information which led him to make the statement.

I may say, in justice to the minister named, that later on he appeared and declared that he had made no such statement. Now, we have some further evidence about the patronage committee.

In connection with some further questions, Judge Murphy said in justice to Mr. Lew, that he must say that it had been proven independently that more trouble was experienced in getting a bona fide man in than those others who were possessed of passports.

As regarded Hon. Mr. Templeman he could not say whether he was subject to subpœna, but he was very sure that if Hon. Mr. Templeman was wanted he would attend. He was not, however, going to bring a minister of the Crown here on an assertion.

The 'News-Advertiser' of January 13 comments in its head lines on the proceedings reported that day as follows:

Strange doings on water front.

Ease with which smuggled Chinamen could enter Vancouver is described before Royal Commission.

New light thrown on Mr. Templeman's action.

Cabinet Minister is declared to have been anxious for investigation—Lew's life said to be in danger.

The report gives the evidence of Dr. A. G. Munro, medical examiner at the port of Vancouver:

Did he, he was asked, have any conversation with Hon. Mr. Templeman regarding Mr. Foster?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster.)

Witness said he did. One evening he called in at the Vancouver Club and there he met Mr. Kelly and Hon. Mr. Templeman.

Mr. Kelly asked him did he know anything of this matter of Mr. Bowell's suspension, and he replied that he did not.

Mr. Kelly then asked where Mr. Foster was staying, and witness said he was going home, and as Mr. Foster was staying near to him he would call and tell him.

'I then went out,' continued witness, 'and walked to Mr. Foster's place and the others went in an automobile. I walked upstairs and told Mr. Foster that Hon. Mr. Templeman wanted to see him. Mr. Foster said he was just going to bed, and he thought it might be better to come in the morning. About that time Hon. Mr. Templeman and Mr. Kelly and a third party arrived in an automobile, and Hon. Mr. Templeman was coming up stairs. I called out to him and said that Mr. Foster was going to bed, and would he see him in the morning?'

Hon. Mr. Templeman said: 'Tell him to meet me at the Hotel Vancouver at ten o'clock,' and then he and Mr. Kelly entered the automobile.

Later Mr. Foster told witness he had an interview with Hon. Mr. Templeman at the hotel. He said that Mr. Templeman had told him that he wanted the whole matter gone into thoroughly, and that he would do anything to assist. Mr. Foster expressed himself as pleased with what Mr. Templeman told him. This conversation took place a few days later. Mr. Foster did not tell him specifically, it was only in general terms.

Was Mr. George Macdonald the third party in the automobile?

Witness could not say.

By Mr. Gordon Grant—Whose automobile was it?

Witness said he did not know.

The House will observe that all through this story everything leads up to Mr. Kelly. As one report said, there was a music machine outside the court room and it played 'Has anybody here seen Kelly?' Every witness called at some stage of the proceedings led the conversation around to Kelly, who, it is well known, is the head and front of the Tammany at Vancouver.

Mr. George Macdonald, who is mentioned in this evidence, is another leader of the Liberal party whose name has appeared in public records as a beneficiary to a large extent from peculiar transactions of this government.

Mr. Edward Foster, inspector of Dominion Police at Ottawa, being called, was asked about the character of these witnesses.

In his report of September 8, witness stated that customs officials knew of illegal landing of opium, and that Lew, he was told, had been used for years to get information, although the ways he had got it might not always be approved.. . . . He understood from Lew that there were one hundred (contrabrand Chinamen) on board the 'Kumeric' when she left Hong Kong, and only 53 were accounted for. How many got off was a question.

The opium traffic was also referred to in this day's evidence. The report says:

Opium, he heard from Lew, was sold in Vancouver at a lower price than anywhere else. It was $18 here against $25 in Seattle.

Then in the 'News-Advertiser' of January 14, on the first page, there is further evidence from Inspector Foster. I quote from the report:

Mr. Foster stated that at the interview at ten o'clock in the morning at the Hotel Vancouver, Mr. Templeman wanted to encourage him in his inquiries, and stated that he was sorry that he had not met Mr. Foster before, as he would not then have sent his telegram to Ottawa.

This is significant in view of the reply that we will have that the overwhelming testimony of Inspector Foster and others is that the minister from British Columbia sought to have the inquiry, because, if Inspector Foster is to be believed on one point, he must be believed on the other, and he says that Mr. Templeman told him that he had sent a deterrent telegram to Ottawa. That is the telegram referred to in the early part of the investigation which I have read. This shows how carelessly the ministers of the Crown under this government, administer their departments when a minister will deliberately advise his colleagues to stop investigation into a fraud of this kind on evidence so flimsy that a single conversation with an honest official causes him to regret that he had butted into the affair, and had sent a deterrent telegram.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The hon. gentleman will permit me to say that he has no right to make the statement that I had advised my colleague in Ottawa to suspend the investigation. That is not according to the facts or according to the evidence.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I regret that the minister from British Columbia did not see fit to put this evidence on the table, so that I might see the judge's report on this incident. I have no right whatever——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster)——to contradict a statement made by any minister in this House, nor have I desire to do so.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. My evidence is published there.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). If the minister will permit me, that is what I am going to read. I have already read the heading, which says that the minister sought the inquiry. I may point out that we have evidence early in these proceedings from other witnesses that Mr. Templeman, being appealed to by the Patronage Committee at Vancouver, did send, according to them, a telegram to Ottawa asking that the inquiry be stopped.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. There is no such telegram and there is no such evidence.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Then Inspector Foster has given false evidence.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Mr. Foster never gave such evidence.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I think it would be in much better taste if the minister would produce this evidence on the table of the House instead of giving us piecemeal such parts of it as he thinks suit his case. I have been reading the most damaging evidence for an hour and a half and this is the first contradiction I have had; so that from all appearances everything else is absolutely justified by the evidence in the possession of the government. Inspector Foster is on the stand and is examined by Mr. McCrossan, counsel of the government.

Going back a little, Mr. McCrossan asked whether witness had any correspondence with Hon. Mr. Templeman.

Witness said he had no correspondence, but he had a conversation with the minister.

'I had a conversation with him at the Hotel Vancouver at 10 o'clock in the morning.'

'What was the substance of the conversation?'

'I went very fully into what I had done and was doing at the present time.'

'Did Mr. Templeman suggest to you in any way that the inquiry should be stopped?'

'No, he did not.'

'And he made no remarks which could in any way give that impression?'

'No; he seemed rather to want to encourage me. I gathered that he wished me to go ahead. I had explained to him that it was fraud, and he said he was quite satisfied that such was the case.'

'Then the conversation related by Lew was incorrect?'

'He may be wrong.'

'To the effect that you told him that Mr. Templeman had used words that he wanted the investigation stopped?'

'I do not remember anything that would make him think so.'

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This is Mr. Foster, a material witness.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Yes, that is what I said.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. He swears that it is not true.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminister). This is the same Mr. Foster, a material witness. I cannot vouch for the accuracy of the 'News Advertiser's' report, but it is a reputable newspaper and this purports to be a verbatim report of the proceedings and this verbatim report of the proceedings makes this witness, Mr. Foster say:

Judge Murphy.—Lew went further. He said it occurred at 12.30 o'clock at night, and that Mr. Templeman went to you at that time and asked you to stop the investigation.

I can only corroborate Dr. Munro. I never saw Mr. Templeman then. The only interview was at 10 o'clock in the morning, and when I was leaving Mr. Templeman told me he was sorry that he had not met me earlier; that he fully understood now, and that he was sorry that he had sent the telegram to Ottawa the night before.

I would ask the minister whether that is a correct report of the evidence.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Yes, that is very nearly correct.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). It is very nearly correct that the minister was sorry that he had sent this telegram of the night before?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). And why was he sorry?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Was he sorry because it was not strong enough?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). If it were not strong enough it would be the most natural thing in the world to follow it up next day with another expression based on further information. The only reason that can be suggested why a man would be sorry for sending that telegram to his colleagues is that he had asked them to do something that he should not have asked them to do.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. What was the telegram?

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The telegram ought to be produced on the table of this House.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. It was printed in the evidence.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Why then do we not have the evidence? I have not got it here. I am reading everything connected with the case except matters personal to the minister which I have left out. Here evidence of one of these so-called merchants is offered by Inspector Foster:

One of the men admitted he was not a merchant, had never been a merchant, that he had $150 in gold which he was to hand over to the interpreter here, that his passport had been secured for him, and that he was a cook by trade. Another man also made full confession, practically corroborating the statements. These were Chang Foon and Yung Woon in the letters. These disclosures came to light at Victoria, and they then considered they had good evidence to prosecute the interpreter in Vancouver.

Judge Murphy.—On what advice? Legal advice?

Witness.—Mr. Farris and Mr. Grant, both.

By Mr. Grant.—Did that advice follow the luncheon at the Carleton? Yes.

And was it the only legal advice given to you?

Yes.

Judge Murphy.—You say that you came from Victoria with the idea of prosecuting Yip On. Did you see your solicitors then?

Witness thought that he did so.

Why were these men allowed to go out of the country?

The men were retained, said witness, only until he had seen his solicitors.

Judge Murphy stated that whoever was responsible for it, it was a most unfortunate thing that the men were allowed to go back to China.

After further inquiry witness admitted he had taken counsel's opinion on October 12, the day after he got back from Victoria. Further telegrams of the 12th and 16th of October, he stated that counsel advised against the prosecution.

In connection with the next letter, dated October 12, which stated that 'if there was a Royal Commission with judge McInnis presiding he was sure that a prosecution would follow.' Mr. Foster explained that he made the suggestion on his own initiative and it was not made to him by anyone else.

Now we have some light on the nature of the appointments recommended by the patronage committee at Vancouver, the same patronage committee administering this government's patronage at Vancouver to this day, the same gentlemen who are the consorts of the ministers of this government on every visit there and through whom alone these ministers can be successfully approached. Now I quote from the 'News Advertiser' of January 14, page 8:

John McPherson, the Canadian Pacific railway watchman on the wharf, was the first witness called at the morning session.

A watchman on the Canadian Pacific Railway wharf is no ordinary watchman. It is left to him to regulate whether or not any smuggling takes place from a steamer, in this case smuggling at the rate of $500 a head for every Chinaman who could walk unobserved from the ship ashore; and of every package of opium or silk or other commodity that could be smuggled under the cloak of any person leaving the ship. These watchmen have the most responsible positions in the customs service of Canada. Recollecting that the humble title of watchman is not the only thing to be considered, but that we must consider the duties to be performed by these men, I would like the attention of hon. members to the evidence of the nature of the appointments made to these positions:

John McPherson, the Canadian Pacific railway watchman on the wharf, was the first witness called at the morning session. He had been previously examined two weeks ago.

All the way through his examination Mr. McPherson presented an appearance of injured innocence, and protested it strongly during the whole of the time.

He depended greatly, he said, on his eyesight for his suspicions, and depended on his suspicions for the investigations he made.

The witness was warned by Judge Murphy as to his evidence, and the judge offered him protection regarding any statements he might make before the commission. Witness stated that he was recommended for the position he had occupied by the Liberal executive.

Mr. McCrossan said that McPherson had been again subpoenaed, and was present. He was at once called. He is a one-armed man.

This witness was previously examined two weeks ago. He lives at 632 Hamilton Street, and was yesterday represented by Mr. W. H. D. Ladner.

In reply to Mr. McCrossan, witness said he might have occasionally taken a glass of whisky, but he was not drunk.

'But Fagan says he twice ordered you home?'

'I have never been sent home because I was drunk that I know of.'

He was not drunk, nor had Mr. Quinn ever seen him drunk on duty, or seen him stay, for an hour, or for half an hour, on the 'Empress.'

The house will notice Mr. Speaker the strength of this contradiction. This witness says that he never was sent home drunk 'that he knows of.'

If any one said he was breaking up his furniture at home through drink it was not true. He was not a drinking man.

Told that 'Con' gave him a flask of whisky—which he could not remember— the judge pressed witness to tell 'Con's' name, informing witness that he meant to know who he was, and that he must give his name.

Had never seen 'Con.'

McPherson said he had never seen 'Con' until the time at the wharf. 'Con' was a member of the crew of the 'Empress,' the Empress of China, he thought. He denied he let 'Con' go on board. He was willing and anxious to tell the truth.

Witness said he had been here twenty-three years, and had never heard the slightest slur on his name. He did not know who 'Con' was.

He had seen the latter on the wharf two or three times, but not half a dozen times, and—to his knowledge—never twice on the same night. He considered he did his faithful duty as a watchman.

He could not remember that he ever told Mr. Quinn to 'turn his back and take what he could.'

Told that Mr. Quinn had shown the day and the hour when witness told him so, he said perhaps Mr. Quinn had some reason to say so.

He had never improperly received five cents for anything. He did not warn No. 1 pantryman to stay back and not go on board. He had no orders to stop any one going on board.

'Then you had no orders to stop any one coming off?'

'Only the Chinese.' He did not let any strange Chinese go on board.

As to 'Con,' again, that individual was either quartermaster or quarterdeck man. He knew nothing about him in any shape or form. He never saw a parcel thrown from the ship, as stated by Mr. Quinn. He did not see that parcel.

He explained that he put in most of his time on the dock, and if he was sometimes on the gangway he considered that was quite as prominent a place. He had never been on the 'Empress' more than fifteen or twenty minutes.

Counsel reminded him he had just said he had never been there except for a few minutes.

Witness often took a walk round the ship, he said, not to get a drink, or to fraternize with the petty officers. The latter would all be in bed.

There is other evidence which states that these men were not only taken on board the Empresses but retained there for long periods while goodness knows what went on the wharfs.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I was going to ask whether it was one of the ministers who said 'carried'. Probably he is one of the few who has not been mentioned and no doubt that is why he feels so happy.

Mr. McCrossan here asked that Mr. Quinn should put in the notebook from which he had given his evidence on the previous day, when Judge Murphy suggested that Mr. Quinn could sit beside Mr. McCrossan and that the latter could put in his questions from the book.

'As far as I am concerned,' said Judge Murphy, 'this matter is not going to be a farce. If any crime is committed, or any perjury, the man guilty will go direct from this room to the court.'

Addressing the witness the judge warned him very seriously that either he or Mr. Quinn was not telling the truth. 'Mr. Quinn must be a double-dyed villain if he purposely wrote up that book to blacken your character,' concluded Judge Murphy.

Then addressing the witness the judge asked who it was that recommended him for the appointment?

Witness replied that it was the Liberal Executive. Also he thought that Mr. Tom Neylands, Mr. Robert Kelly, and the present postmaster had said something in connection with his getting the position.

So that Mr. McPherson had very influential friends indeed and they must take some responsibility at least for the failure of Mr. McPherson to perform the duties for which he was paid and for the hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of stuff that is supposed to have come in through the failure of this appointee of the Liberal executive to take his position seriously or as anything but a means to get his monthly salary.

'You were transferred by Col. Worsnop to the immigration business?' asked Judge Murphy.

Witness said he applied to Mr. Kelly and one or two more of them, and he was transferred from the Australian line to the Empresses.

Mr. McCrossan read the note as to witness 'going behind the shed and having a drink.'

McPherson could not remember that, nor could he remember any one coming off the 'Empress' and his having a drink with them. It might have occurred, but not to his knowledge.

It might have occurred to Mr. Quinn's knowledge. You did not know that Quinn was there watching you. You are prepared to say that what Quinn has said here is untrue?

Witness said he could not say anything about it.

Quinn was a detective put on to watch McPherson and other so called watchmen and find out how it was that these frauds were possible. The Counsel for this watchman McPherson suggested that they were wasting too much time about it; that his client was altogether too humble a person to be so minutely inquired into, but the examination proceeded.

Asked further as to the night of Oct. 14 when 'Con' visited him twice, witness said that 'Con' never visited him. He did not know 'Con's' business any more than counsel did. 'Con' had no business with him at all, or he with him.

Did he only come to give you the flask of whisky?

Witness could not remember.

But we can remember. We have it here the day and the hour.

Then it must be so, witness said.

Why did he give you the flask of whisky if he was no friend of yours? You knew he was going down on board to take things off? Witness denied this.

But you knew he did not belong to the ship on the night of Oct. 14, and yet you did not search him?

No I never saw any suspicious thing about him.

But you did not seem to have any suspicion of any one at all who went there frequently?

Yes I had.

Of whom?

I said if there was anyone I had suspicion of I would ask them if they had anything about them. I never saw anything 'crooked' in any shape or form. He could not remember saying anything about Officer Fagan 'being too darned strict,' but he could not swear against it.

Mr. W. H. D. Ladner, who appeared for witness, protested that the questions were allegations and were improper.

Judge Murphy—I think they are not. They will proceed.

Then you were engaged down there in practices not in conformity with your duty? Witness could not remember even one.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster.)

You are rather faint-hearted about it, suggested counsel.

Judge Murphy said he would be prepared to give witness protection so that any answer he gave should not be used against him in any other court. Witness, however, made no request for this.

Mr. Ladner thought that if the questions were put in the form of straight questions they would get on quicker. He contended that many people in the city testified to the good character of the witness.

Judge Murphy said he could not agree with counsel as to the probability of proceeding quicker, and if counsel had been here as long as he had he might alter his opinion. He could not, however, believe that Mr. Quinn was the double-dyed villian he was made out to be. And regarding the high opinion some people might have of Mr. McPherson, that course of action he had been pursuing on the boats was certainly not calculated to enhance his character.

Witness said he knew Mr. Chang, a Chinese merchant in the city, and he had told Mr. Quinn that he had known Chang for nineteen years. He remembered giving permission for two boys to go to dinner with Mr. Chang.

Asked why he had to explain this case to Officer Quinn when other Chinese were frequently leaving the boat, he said he might have told Mr. Quinn or the latter might have asked him.

He also remembered 'Con' going on board with the woman, the latter standing on the dock, because the quartermaster did not like her to be on the ship. He remembered that well.

Your memory is getting very much better suggested Mr. McCrossan and Judge Murphy, suggesting they were at least doing better.

Witness did not remember, however, going in the shed with that woman for a drink. (Laughter.) But the woman might have gone in and had one.

'Con,' he said, 'was a stout, well-built gentleman, 35 to 40, not very dark.'

As to the question of three men leaving the ship at 10.30 p.m. with square packages he could not remember.

Too much time taken up promenading with the lady, suggested counsel?

He, however, remembered introducing her to Mr. Quinn. He thought she was the quartermaster's wife, but found out afterwards, he said, with a smile, that she was his sweetheart.

He had no recollection of motioning to the men with packages to go round to the end of the pier.

Judge Murphy asked when did witness see 'Con' last? Not since that time, said witness, by which he meant since he left the watchman job.

As to the cook on the 'Empress,' Chang Ko, the man who used to wear the big long overcoat, witness said they most all came off wearing big long overcoats, a reply which produced general amusement.

He did not remember saying to Quinn 'Here comes Chang, but do not be too strict on him.' If the Chinese went ashore they must have done so when his back was turned.

'And that was quite frequent.' remarked Mr. McCrossan.

'You got a lot of cigars off the 'Empress?' 'Very few; never a box at a time.' He never, either, got money from Chinese.

Possibly Mr. Quinn might have been offered money, but they knew better than to offer it to witness.

The incident of the throwing of a parcel at night from the stern of the vessel to a boy on the pier, he did not remember, nor did he remember seeing the C.P.R. constable Howard and a Chinaman talking, or Howard asking for a cigar. He did not also remember 'Con' going aboard, although he may have done so, and he agreed he would not search him or his friend. He depended greatly on his eyesight.

He might have told 'Con,' he admitted, that he would see him, or run across him, after the boat sailed, but he had never seen 'Con' down town.

As to the constable Reason, he told Jake that Reason looked very suspicious to him and he said he did not want him.

'That was not because he watched too much?'

'No; he was asleep half the time.'

'You were not?'

Witness said he could watch forty-eight hours without sleep.

He had no hard meaning when he warned Quinn that Officer Foster was around. Asked why then, it was necessary to say this if it meant nothing. Witness said there was no evil meaning in it. He could not remember telling Quinn at the same time to also warn another man on the Redhill, but if he did so he did it with no evil will or evil purpose. He did not know of any motive he had for so acting. Then he was asked why he sent Mr. Quinn to see if the lights were out in Mr. Fagan's office.

He could not say, but as in the case of the warning to Quinn and the man on the Redhill, it 'was without any evil purpose.'

Now, the Minister of Inland Revenue will excuse me I hope for having thought it worth while to call attention to the conflicting testimony as to himself because, like the reading public, I would have received the impression from this headline in the 'News Advertiser' of January 15th on the 1st page.

Evidence is in direct conflict—two witnesses before Royal Commission on Immigration contradict each other as to Templeman's statements.

The newspaper here makes a little summary of the proceedings up to date which I would like to interpolate, showing the impressions made on the citizens of Vancouver. It says:

Up to the present time the things which have been brought out are the finding of the packet of letters on people who, apparently, brought them from China; the securing of the two sworn declarations; the laxity of the officials, and the smuggling which might, in consequence have gone on at the wharf; the apparent integrity, in this matter, at any rate, of David Lew; and the sincerity of the convictions, as the result of his investigation, of Mr. Foster.

Mr. Gordon Grant, a young Liberal of Vancouver, a barrister by profession, was called on this day as a witness. His evidence is on page 4 of the 'News-Advertiser' of January 15:

Mr. Gordon Grant further stated that a lot of people had been discussing the matter of Yip On. Witness and Mr. Farris felt that as they were not going to recommend a prosecution, they were not disposed to have themselves quoted or relied upon. If any one was trying to make them responsible they were making a mistake. They had recommended it simply and solely because they thought the matter ought to be gone further into. They then went to Mr. Farris' office, where witness settled a letter, he and Mr. Farris keeping a copy each for their own protection if any one said that they wanted to stop the investigation.

David Lew, then coming into court, the judge asked him had he got the letter he went for, warning him that he was still on oath. Lew stated that there was some moving going on round the place and that the files were mixed up. Judge Murphy told him that he had plenty of time before Monday and Lew replied that seeing the way affairs had now gone he was going to take up the whole matter very thoroughly.

By Mr. McCrossan—Did you ever send a telegram stating that Mr. Senkler was untrustworthy and dangerous to Foster?

Witness said he recollected sending one saying that Mr. Senkler was unsafe.

Told to be frank in his replies, witness stated he certainly would be so. He sent the telegram because he was informed that there could be nothing without the possibility of Mr. Kelly getting his finger into it, and that Mr. Senkler was a great friend of Mr. Kelly's. He considered that this was graft of considerable magnitude, and it was impossible to know where its ramifications began and where they ended in regard to Yip On. He still thought that Mr. Senkler was an unsafe man to be interested in the investigation.

That is one Liberal on another Liberal—Mr. Gordon Grant on the president of the Liberal association.

Asked by Mr. Taylor for the reason for Vancouver Liberals had in taking the view suggested, witness said that an investigation would be likely to bring to light things that would hurt them individually and also as a party.

In the 'News-Advertiser' of January 17, on page 4, the report of the evidence of Mr. Gordon Grant continues:

As Mr. Gordon Grant testified that Mr. McInnes had definite instructions from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Judge Murphy stated that this disposed of any possible 'conspiracy' on the part of Mr. McInnes, Lew and Mr. Gordon Grant, and he said he should telegraph direct to the premier for confirmation.

Mr. Gordon Grant was in the witness box most of the day, and gave detailed evidence as to an alleged demand on the part of Yip On for $300 before passing merchants to the United States.

There was only standing room in the court during the whole of the day.

This indicates the interest taken locally in this transaction, the report of which has been so carefully suppressed from the date when this evidence was taken up to this day, when we are still awaiting its presentation to this House. Here is a new element in the inquiry. The labour organizations in Vancouver began to be very much interested in the revelations:

Mr. J. H. McVety, secretary of the Trades and Labour Council, asked witness how the conversation arose with regard to Mr. Senkler.

It was on the street. Witness asked Mr. Senkler who sent the telegram in his name. He said he did not know, and started to show some correspondence, some of which he dropped on the sidewalk. Witness saw minutes of a meeting of the patronage committee in regard to the appointment of an interpreter. He told Mr. Senkler that in anything in regard to the Chinese investigation Mr. Robert Kelly was somewhere in it. Mr. Senkler asked him what he had to say about it.

In reply he said that it seemed to him that Mr. Kelly was very attentive in regard to the Chinese interpreter losing his job, and he thought it peculiar that Mr. Templeman had gone into it at all and tried to stop the investigation.

Now, I do not forget that the minister says that he did not try to stop the investigation, but at every turn we are confronted with witnesses in Vancouver on whose minds the impression is that he did try to stop the investigation.

I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that all the way through this matter, we have nothing but Liberals. It is a family quarrel, pure and simple, not a row or a feud between the Conservatives and Liberals of Vancouver, but purely a family quarrel among the Liberals themselves over the division of the spoils. This man evidently is not a professional politician. Being secretary of the trades and labour councils, he is, I presume, a workingman, and has therefore rather simple ideas as to governing principles. This is what he said:

He was accused of being a traitor to his party and it was stated that the asiatic exclusion league would hurt the party but for patriotism you require a sacrifice even of political party. He was a British Columbian first and a politician afterward.

To show how the sentence was received in the courtroom—where there was standing room only—the witness was cheered for these expressions, and Judge Murphy warned the public that such a breach of decorum would not be permitted.

I would ask the House to pay particular attention to this because here is the crux of the whole matter—the reason for this disclosure. There was a family quarrel in Vancouver which brought these branches of fraud to light. The whole thing is explained in the sentence which follows. I would like you to remember that this is not the evidence of any irresponsible character, but is the sworn testimony of a young gentleman of high character. I would like to call the attention of the Solicitor General to this, partiularly, because it is his department, I presume, which has in hand the preparation of prosecutions in connection with these matters. This sentence contains the crux of the whole matter and gives the reason why these Liberals in Vancouver had this family quarrel:

He did not care personally how many Chinese came in illegally, but he did object to these fellows hogging it all.

An hon. MEMBER. Who is Senkler?

Mr. TAYLOR (Westminster). The president of the Liberal Association at Vancouver, and this is what Mr. Gordon Grant, a barrister of Vancouver and a Liberal, testifies as having been said by Senkler:

If it——

Meaning the rake-off of $120 per Chinaman.

If it had gone to the Liberal executive, I would not have cared.

As I said a while ago, wnen some hon. gentleman challenged me, I refer to the Liberal party, as a party, as beneficiaries of these frauds, and am not making any personal reference to anyone within the sound of my voice. Here we have the evidence that this was simply a quarrel among the Liberals themselves in Vancouver, as to whether Bob Kelly should get the money or the Liberal executive. But the Liberal executive were out for the dough. Judge Murphy asked:

If it had gone to the Liberal executive, I would not have cared.

And the witness said that Mr. Senkler objected to Kelly or some undiscovered people hogging it all. Judge Murphy asked whether he was speaking very seriously, and the witness replied that he was. I now quote from the newspaper report:

The witness was speaking very seriously; he was very agitated and he was very serious. The conversation still further impressed him with the reasonableness of his advice to McInnes who he knew would go direct to the government to advise with him not because he thought that Sinclair was dishonest. He thought the matter was important and that nothing should be hushed up or slurred over. This witness admitted that he himself was a Liberal in politics.

The witness warmly added that neither Foster, McInnes, Lew nor himself had been animated by any conspiracy against Yip On or with a view to get control of any grafting at Vancouver. Their idea was to have the graft stamped out.

Let me point out that this has been within the knowledge of the minister for a very long period. Here is some evidence to prove that statement. Mr. Gordon Grant said:

It was between September 1907 and early in 1908 that he met T. R. E. McInnes as the personal representative of the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Hon. Frank Oliver in connection with the matter. He was told that McInnes had been specially deputed by them to get information for the information of the government and for the consideration and information of Earl Grey.

I should, I see, have read some preceding paragraphs to show what the reference covers:

Mr. Gordon Grant said the matter dated back to the year 1907, when he was secretary of the Asiatic Exclusion League, and when much rumour was in the air as to the bogus entry of merchants, merchants' sons, &c. He was deputed to investigate the matter and saw the interpreter to the United States Immigration Department to try to find out the methods adopted by the United States. In reply to Mr. McCrossan, witness said he never went with Payne of Seattle to Col. Dudley. Witness told of the information he had received from the United States interpreter by his subsequent visit to the wharf where he witnessed the examining methods carried out there by Yip On. He reported to the League that there was absolutely nothing that guaranteed Yip On's methods.

He went down again and heard another examination through an interpreter by Mr. Bowell. After it was over, Mr. Bowell asked what the witness wanted and he said he was there on behalf of the League. He considered that Mr. Bowell was not intentionally rude, but his manner was decidedly rough.

He stated his reports were sent to His Excellency Earl Grey.

Knowing the position that Mr. McInnes occupied and that he had followed around pretty generally the people who had attended an Asiatic Exclusion League meeting in Seattle, he implicitly trusted him. Mr. McInnes had said that he hoped to see more riots as it was relieving the matter of the strain between the United States and Japan.

Mr. T. R. E. McInnes, the witness said, came out to look into the question of Chinese immigration, and at the request of the hon. Frank Oliver and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and that his final interview had been with Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Then on page 11 of the same date:

Witness had learned from the newspapers that a telegram had gone from Mr. Senkler, asking that Yip On should be reinstated but he had by that time learned the nature of the evidence against Yip On. The telegram he sent was sent because he had heard particularly that the Liberals wanted the matter hushed up.

'The names?' suggested Judge Murphy.

'Mr. Senkler's particularly, and Mr. Kelley's.'

'Who gave you the information?'

'Mr. Foster. He had discussed the matter with Mr. 'Andy' Tyson, Mr. A. M. Pound, Mr. D. Menzies and Mr. J. J. Graham and Mr. E. E. Teetzel, but he could not say that anyone but Mr. Foster told him particularly of a desire to have the matter hushed up.' When he saw Lew the latter said there were stronger people than Mr. Senkler and Mr. Kelly.

Mr. McCrossan.—Did that mean Mr. Templeman?

Witness did not know. After a question from Judge Murphy, witness said Mr. Templeman was directly under the influence of Mr. Kelly, which Judge Murphy explained was a statement which neither agreed with his own or Mr. Foster's evidence.

I call the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) to the injustice he is doing himself in leaving the matter there, because Mr. Murphy is an appointee of his own and seems to have stood up for him pretty sturdily during the investigation. It is due to the minister, if he can get flattering comments like this from the judge, and I think 'flattering' is not too strong, to state his position. I would like it to be noted that I give publication to the first certificate of character to the minister even in advance of his own action.

The witness—

Notwithstanding what the judge had said, this Liberal witness stuck to his guns.

—thought that Mr. Templeman would be unduly influenced by Mr. Kelly.

Witness further mentioned in regard to this stated conflict of circumstances that after what he had heard he considered Hon. Mr. Templeman, despite his good resolutions, might make another fall from grace. That he repeated what he had already testified to concerning Mr. Foster's statement as to what Mr. Foster had said concerning Mr. Templeman's first remark as to burking the inquiry and his subsequent remark as to moving to help it along. Then witness referred at length to the first investigation when Dr. Chang told him that he felt that the men were not genuine although they were as the doctor humourously put it coming by different steamers, they were all in the same boat.

Public opinion on the progress of this investigation is indicated by these headlines in the 'News-Advertiser' of January 18, page 1:

WATCHMEN WHO DID NOT WATCH.

Mr. Justice Murphy makes pointed comments on the state of affairs in watchmen's department on water front.

'CHARITY ORGANIZATION AND INEBRIATES' HOME.'

And the paper starts the summary of the day's proceedings thus:

'A sort of charity organization and inebriates' home.' This was the very pointed remark made by Judge Murphy at yesterday afternoon's session of the Royal Commission on Chinese Immigration, following a recital of the list of the halt and the lame, and as is alleged, generally intoxicated, who seemed to have formed the government line of defence on Vancouver's wharf against the wily ways of the Chinese who sought illegal entry into the city and the country.

It was Mr. E. S. Busby, the inspector of customs, who told the details of the infirmities of the old staff of watchmen employed to guard the boats. He also told how these old-timers had been replaced by new men—one of whom, by the way, fell into the water and was nearly drowned because he was unused to a boat.

Inspector Busby came armed with the official files from his department, and as they were confidential documents the witness read and dissected them as he went along, passing those which were material over to counsel for examination and discussion. From the information which, in consequence came out, it appeared that witness, as far back as 1907,recommended the dismissal, in the interests of the department, of some of the officials. The reports show that the inspector was aware of many peculiar things that were happening, and that he had at once reported them to his chief at Toronto and at Ottawa. One of the matters was in fact that the chief land waiter, Bowser, was in the habit of paying in official money to his private account and that the inspector warned him that if he continued to do so he would at once be suspended. . . . . .

Mr. W. F. McLeod was the first witness at the afternoon session. He was now a detective but was formerly connected with the Canadian Pacific railway as chief inspector of the western division police. Asked as to matters on the water front he said he had often found the customs officer was on board the ship at night and it had been continually reported to him that that officer was in the habit of going aboard after eleven and coming off between eleven and five in the morning. He might just as well have been uptown, he thought, and he believed there was just as much stuff going off irregularly as in the proper channels.

I would call the attention particularly of the prosecuting officer of the government, the Solicitor General (Mr. Bureau)——

Mr. BUREAU. Go on.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I really would like the attention of the Solicitor General——

Mr. BUREAU. I have read the paper before.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). If the Solicitor General has any duties they are particularly in connection with the prosecution of persons guilty of offences against the government. That, I think, is the business of the Justice Department of this country. Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that the Solicitor General refuses to be interested in this matter?

Mr. BUREAU. He is not alone in that if he does.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster.)

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would like that to be taken down. He is not alone among the ministers of the Crown if he is not interested in frauds against the government aggregating at least one million dollars. That is the position taken by a member of the government speaking for himself and five of his colleagues who are present. And I would like their names to go on record. The First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur), the Minister of Labour (Mr. King), and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman). He is not interested in frauds to the extent of a million dollars to which I am calling his attention; he is not interested in the statements which I am reading, that because of the absence of a watchman from his post of duty , as many goods leave the Canadian Pacific railway ships at Vancouver without paying duty as leave the ship upon payment of duty. That is the statement I have just read and that is what the Solicitor General says he is not interested in. Mr. Speaker, I believe the statement of the Solicitor General, I fully believe it. I do not think there is any thing in his record in this House to cast any doubt upon his perfect good faith in making the statement or to cause me to believe that he is interested in this detail of his duty as an official of the government.

Mr. W. F. McLeod was the first witness at the afternoon session. He was now a detective, but was formerly connected with the C. P. R. as chief inspector of the Western Division Police.

Asked as to matters on the water front, he said he had often found the customs officer was on board the ships at night, and it had been continually reported to him that that officer was in the habit of going aboard after eleven and coming off between eleven and five in the morning. He might just as well have been up town, he thought, and he believed there was just as much stuff going off irregularly as in the proper channel.

That is the statement as to which the Solicitor General says he has no interest and he believes he has as much interest as have his colleagues.

Inspector Busby was recalled, and continued the production of his reports from the morning session.

The first one was a letter received from Mr. B. R. McDonald, Collector of Customs at Prince Rupert, dated Sept. 3 last, in reply to one from witness, it being stated that the party who volunteered the information desired that his identity be not divulged. Mr. McDonald also drew attention to the alleged abuse of the regulation regarding minor children of merchants.

He found that when the 'Japan' was in port McPherson was on watch, also that Officer McKee found McPherson intoxicated, but that no action beyond a reprimand was administered to McPherson. Owing to the time allotted for meals during the night, there were three periods when the vessels were unwatched, and altogether they were neglected for six half hour periods during the whole day. Witness recommended certain changes to secure more effective service.

He referred to the watchmen. Kent, one of them, was unsatisfactory. Another was physically unfit, and Warburton another was a cripple, and was unfit through drinking habits.

Judge Murphy—A sort of Charity Organization and Inebriates' Home.

On page 4 of the 'News Advertiser,' of January 18, I find:

It was reported that the Chief Inspector at Toronto in acknowledging the report stated that it had been resolved to discharge the watchmen and to engage new men, and that they should not be allowed to take any meals on the ship. He was authorized to make the arrangements after conferring with the local committee.

Mr. Gordon Grant—What does that mean?

The Liberal executive. He was to see Mr. Pound. But. any recommendations Mr. Pound sent him were subject to witness' approval.

Mr. Gordon Grant referred to some names being mentioned 'on a list.' Did witness know of any list at all? Inspector Busby said he did not . The appointments were left to the Provincial Board of Customs. There had been, however, an urgent case when he had himself appointed a man temporarily. In the ordinary way the Minister of Customs would deal with the matter.

Mr. McCrossan—Who would he apply to?

The Collector of Customs, replied witness, who went on to speak of the greatly increased work at the port, and the fact that he was often compelled to be away for months at a time. He had personally examined the present eight watchmen, and he knew that they were all good men. The first man that he found drinking would be suspended. He had given the fullest instructions as to this.

Judge Murphy—Did you ever have any names sent to you from Ottawa?

Witness said he was instructed to apply to the Liberal committee here.

The department looked to you to see that the patronage committee did not foist any improper man into the service?

The department looked to him, said witness, to see that the man had proper qualifications.

Mr. Gordon Grant asked what percentage of appointments were made during the absence of witness against those made whilst he was here, and witness replied that he could not say.

The suggestion of Mr. Gordon Grant being that Inspector Busby being a strong man and an honest official, advantage is taken of his absence from port to introduce into the service men whom he would not pass.

Asked also did he confer with any member of the patronage committee, witness said that he called once on Mr. Senkler and once on Mr. Kelly. . . . The next report referred, on July 11, 1907, to an interview by Mr. W. A. Blair, of the customs, with a man named Chin Chan, who suggested that 'easy money' was to be got. The man explained to Mr. Blair the whole modus operandi suggested to be worked with himself, Yip On, and witness as partner. The scheme included a trip to China, the arrangements for sending over Chinese in bulk, each of whom was to pay them from $600 to $700, Chinese money. On Mr. Blair inquiring, with apparent interest, how they would get their 'rake off,' Chin Chan said it was 'heap easy,' by putting the money in the bank at Hong Kong and sending a draft to a Chinese firm in Vancouver.

It was further stated that dozens of Chinese had done this, and had paid $700 to Yip Yen at Hong Kong, 'and not a cent to the Government of Canada.'

Here is an official report in the possession of the government for a long time yet nothing is done to institute prosecutions against the men carrying on these frauds.

$100,000 was said to have been cleaned up in one year in this way by a Chinese firm in shipping Chinese to Canada.

Showing that this one firm alone represented one-half of the million I have represented as the amount of the frauds proved to have been perpetrated upon the government.

Witness showed this letter to Mr. Bowell. On reporting the matter to Toronto, he was advised to give the substance of the letter to the chief landing waiter, so that he might be on his guard.

Mr. B. R. McDonald, collector of customs at Prince Rupert, is to be subpoenaed. A letter from this official gave information as to proposed methods to be carried out for illegal free entry by Chinese in the way of substitution, the idea being that for every illegal entry $20 should be paid to the interpreter and $100 to the customs officials. He had been approached by a man who thought this plan might be carried out in Prince Rupert.

This report does not say so but I saw another report, and no doubt this is in the official document held back by the government, a statement that he added that this was the system being carried out in Vancouver, and that he simply offered for Prince Rupert what had long been in operation in Vancouver.

Next was a letter, November, 1908, from Chief Landing Waiter Aiken to the inspector, telling of the search, following suspicion, of the S.S. 'Tartar.' In this letter Mr. Aiken stated he had told the collector that he and Yip On were going to search the 'Tartar,' and that the collector then stated he would advise the captain of the vessel, which Mr. Aiken considered a peculiar thing to do. He was afterwards told in a letter from the surveyor that he was to wait until the collector came back.

When the collector came down, in response to a telephone call, and Aiken told him of the surveyor's letter, showing it to him, the collector said 'it was a damned lie,' as he never said such a thing, and tore up the letter. The collector then stated they 'would search her now,' and they did so, but he got no assistance from the collector, or from Mr. Fagan, or from the ship's officers. They found thirteen Chinese in the well, ten more in the coal bunkers, and another was found the next day.

That is 24 contraband Chinamen found, involving a loss of $12,000 to the government of Canada, in this one little incident alone.

To digress for a moment from the sworn testimony of the investigation, I would like to read the comment of a very prominent citizen in Vancouver, a very prominent Liberal, a man who did more than any other individual to put into power this present government. I refer, of course, to Mr. Joseph Martin. This is reported in the 'News-Advertiser' of January 20, noticing his return on a visit to Vancouver from London, and his statement is timely in connection with the discussion of the case because Mr. Martin's mission in Vancouver was to be a witness at this Chinese investigation. Mr. Martin says:

So long as the Liberal government continue to put up all their appointments, and fill their contracts, for sale at a certain price, so long will the present condition of political affairs in British Columbia, and in Vancouver especially, be indescribably rotten. The political position in Vancouver and in British Columbia is the rottenest in the world. I do not blame the people. So long as the Liberal government continue on the course they are travelling the people will buy. I blame the Liberal government. They are grafters, and it will never be stopped until the Liberals go out of power.

The next day, in the 'News-Advertiser' of January 21, on the front page, we find this heading:

POLITICIANS AS STUMBLING BLOCK.

Summarizing the local impression of the events happening there.

Difficulty of Reforming Conditions Governing Admission of Chinese at Vancouver is laid at Liberal's door.

This is the introductory passage:

It was said yesterday, before the Royal Commission, that 'the difficulty of reforming things here was due to the influence of the local politicians. By this remark was meant the Liberal executive.

Evidence further indicating deplorable conditions which—unaltered by the Dominion government notwithstanding their knowledge of them—existed in the Customs Department of this city for so long a time was again furnished from the examination of Mr. Greer, deputy surveyor of customs at the port.

To show that it was not a matter of great difficulty to stop these frauds or prevent them, if the government had desired to stop or prevent them, I will read this little passage referring to Victoria, where, as I said before, there is an honest administration of the customs. It will be found on page 13 of the 'News-Advertiser' of January 21:

Everybody knew, suggested counsel, that at Victoria, Collector Newberry was refusing to pass these passports. Had he heard of that? Witness had not, nor had he ever heard that Chinese could not be passed at Victoria, but could be passed at Vancouver.

Other evidence illustrated that the collector at Victoria had made an official report to the government calling their attention to the fact of the extraordinary number of these passports getting in at Vancouver, while hardly any were offered to him at Victoria, and suggesting that the number was caused by fraud. Now, we have another Liberal called in evidence —Mr. Norman McLean. This is a gentleman whom the Minister of Inland Revenue knows very well indeed.

Mr. Norman McLean was called by Mr. McCrossan. He had no recollection of a reported conversation with Judge Grant, concerning immigration frauds. He was clear, however, he never said anything as to Chinese immigration frauds. He may have said it was rumoured of course, he could not say as to that, but he really had no recollection of any conversation. He was not interested one way or the other and knew nothing about it.

By Mr. Gordon Grant—He was told that Ottawa officials had reports on matters here, but he could not go as far as to say that it reflected on Mr. Bowell's honesty. It referred to the honesty of the officers of the department, he understood.

It was told him that the difficulty in reforming things here was due to the activity of the local politicians?

'Yes.'

'Mr. Robert Kelly was mentioned?'

Yes.

Here we have Mr. Kelly, to whom I called attention before. Wherever we turn Mr. Robert Kelly is the pivot and Mr. Robert Kelly continues until to-day to be the pivot of every action of this government at Vancouver.

'Mr. Robert Kelly got Hon. Mr. Templeman to do what he wanted?'

'Yes.'

Judge Murphy—'In Vancouver or at Ottawa?'

'Everywhere.'

'And to reform things you would have to reform Mr. Kelly?'

'No, Mr. Templeman.' (Laughter.)

There was laughter in Vancouver when they were told that to reform things you would have to reform Mr. Templeman rather than Mr. Kelly.

Judge Murphy—'And that would lead to the reform of Mr. Kelly?'

Did witness remember, asked Mr. Gordon Grant, that some years ago when Mr. Aiken was given the position of Mr. Schlater and Mr. George Macdonald made a very strenuous 'pull' to get the position for Mr. Fagan? Witness said he was not familiar with that matter, and on leaving the witness stand the judge told him that he would like to have the name of the man who said they could not reform Mr. Templeman except by first reforming Mr. Kelly.

An hon. MEMBER. Time; carried.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I would say to the hon. gentleman that if he would stand up and identify himself his name might appear on the official record for his sole contribution to the business of the House this session. Mr. T. R. E. McInnis of Ottawa was called, and his evidence was reported in the 'News-Advertiser' of January 22, page 4.

Mr. Crossan resumed.

'Then you brought to the attention of the Premier certain things?' 'Yes, I did.'

'When would that be? What year?'

'Well, last July at Calgary. I think it was about the end of July, or it might have been in August.'

'That would be when he was in his tour west?'. 'Yes.'

'Following these facts were you unofficially retained by the Premier to investigate?' 'I could not say exactly as to that.'

'Voluntarily?' 'Well, no.'

'Without a retainer?' 'So far as Chinese matters were concerned, yes.'

'What were the facts you brought to the attention of the Premier at Calgary?' 'I brought to his attention that I had reported certain facts to Hon. Frank Oliver on November 10, 1909.'

'Why did you make a report to Mr. Oliver? I understand he has nothing to do with the Department of Chinese immigration'

'That's right. I was acting in an advisory capacity to the immigration department generally. I was officially retained to look into the whole matter of immigration, to draft a new Act, and to advise thereon. One of the things I advised should be done was to have Chinese immigration administered by the Immigration Department. I felt that, otherwise, a lot of bungling would happen, if not worse.'

'Then Mr. Oliver did not go out of his department to have you go into the working of another department.'

'No, not officially. Mr. Oliver felt it was an anomaly that the Chinese immigration Act should be administered by another department but at the same time he did not, I suppose, want to tread on Sir Richard's toes. If you were to take it from the Trade and Commerce Department they would have very little to do.'

Here we have an insight into some of the family quarrels of these gentlemen; Trade and Commerce and Interior scrapping as to which should have control of immigration. I would not suggest that the value of the consideration has anything to do with the desire to possess on one side, or the reluctance to give up on the other, but I would suggest that as under the administration of the Department of Trade and Commerce we are suffering such an appalling loss to our revenue, the Minister of Trade and Commerce should give up this Chinese immigration service which is about the only thing that remains in his department. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if we get down to the estimates we will be doing a splendid public service if we strike out in toto the vote for the Trade and Commerce Department because here we have the evidence—second hand evidence it is true—of another minister of the Crown that if you cut out the Chinese business from the Trade and Commerce Department there is nothing left for the department to do. We have also the evidence that the Department of Trade and Commerce is doing nothing with Chinese immigration except to permit these wholesale frauds to go unchallenged.

'When you were in Vancouver in November, 1909, and submitted a lengthy report to Mr. Oliver you were reporting only off your own bat?

'Not quite. No. I understood that the government wished advice on the whole subject of immigration.'

'That is Mr. Oliver?' 'Yes, and involved in that I brought in the opium matter.' Witness then referred to his report on the whole of the work, and a letter was read from Mr. W. D. Scott, superintendent of the Immigration Department, in which it was mentioned that witness was to receive $10 a day, expenses and a pass.

'That would be an official retainer by the Department of the Interior to inquire into the working of the Department of Immigration?'

'It might be open to that meaning. I understood I had a free hand to look into anything I wanted to.'

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. TAYLOR (Westminster). If the hon. gentleman who calls louder had it poured into his ears in trumpet tones that $1,000,000 was being stolen from the treasury of this country without the thieves being punished, it would make no difference to him in his support of the government. I doubt whether the information that the treasury was being robbed would make any difference to the interrupter whether he heard it in trumpet tones, or in the mildest whisper, If I thought I would impress the hon. member I would speak louder, but I feel that the effort would be wasted.

'Do you know whether that is the custom at Ottawa?' 'No. Quite the contrary.'

'This was a special occasion?' 'Yes. Mr. Oliver wished in no way to encroach on Sir

Richard's department. He did not intend to interfere in any way with Sir Richard's department.'

'Do you call that interference?' 'No. I think he was, perhaps, preparing for a possible change in the administration of the Chinese Act. That it would be better for the Chinese Act to be administered in the Immigration Department.'

Judge Murphy asked who was authority for the letter, and witness replied that it was Mr. Scott, who had full authority. He had in view the working of the Act in the new provinces and British Columbia. In consequence witness drafted the Bill now going through the House. Mr. Scott simply intended that witness should see how the new Act would work out. It was not in his department.

'And the Premier never commissioned you to look into the matter. That is clear enough from your statement?'

'Not at all.'

Asked for further information witness said it would be rather a long story.

'We will take a year to hear it, if we have to do so,' said the judge.

Mr. McInnes then went on to say that he felt it was a mistake to have a head-tax on the Chinese, and that a number should be let in free. They had to wait, however, to see how it worked out with Japan. He suggested to the Premier that the tax should be lifted. It might be in the Premier's mind to inaugurate such a policy if it should be considered in the interests of the Dominion as a whole. Witness did not think that he had ever received any verbal, written, or direct instructions from Sir Wilfrid, but—— 'As a friend of the government you have given this advice?'

'Yes.'

After hearing this explanation Mr. S. S. Taylor remarked that it was not such a very long story.

Mr. McCrossan, reading from the letter of 10th November, 1909, to Mr. Oliver regarding illegal entry of Chinese into the province and to the smuggling of opium, came to a passage in which it was stated that the government according to witness' knowledge, was losing at least $30,000 annually, and asked witness what was his reason for that statement.

It was, he replied, as the result of observation, and from what he had been told by reliable Chinese.

'What are their names?'

'I do not know that I will give those names.'

Judge Murphy.—You will have to do so, Mr. McInnes.

Witness then mentioned the name of Ow Yang King, Chinese Consul, at present in Mexico, Lew Gee Wing, Lee Kee, David Lew and Shum Moon. There were others whom he could not recollect. He would say that those he had mentioned were the most important.

Mr. S. S. Taylor thought that witness should give the other names, but the latter replied that this was impossible, as he did not remember them.

'Did they say that the government was losing $30,000?'

No, but he gathered from them that it was quite a lot of money.

The next part of the letter was in reference to smuggling to the United States through the Point Roberts route. Did he know anything definite about that. No; merely what he had been told by officers at Seattle.

Here is another bouquet for my hon. friend the minister from British Columbia, handed out by an official of his own government:

On October 28 witness communicated with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, telling him that the appointment of Poon Shun Lun was made on the recommendation of Hon. Mr. Templeman, who, although he was well acquainted with matters of western Canada, was not at all in the position of being a special authority on Chinese immigration methods. He also mentioned that Mr. Templeman had, according to that officer's statement, tried to dissuade Mr. Foster from his investigations, and had also tried to dissuade the Department of Trade and Commerce from the inquiry, and had insisted that Yip On should be reinstated.

Judge Murphy here took occasion to remark that he invited any member of the public who could speak of rumors to come to the court, when they could be investigated. It had been for this reason that he wanted the attendance of Mr. McInnes.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I have but little to add to the sordid story, the recital of which occupied the attention of the House this afternoon, but there are still a few passages which I would like to put on record to complete one or two points as to which some difference of opinion was expressed.

When the House rose at six o'clock, I had been reading from the evidence of Mr. McInnes at Vancouver, and the proposal to change the system of Chinese immigration to make it correspond with that respecting the Japanese. Continuing the reading from the 'News-Advertiser,' I find in the issue of January 24th, in the review of Mr. McInnes's evidence, the following:

Amongst the things he said yesterday was the statement that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had spoken to him of the abolition of the Chinese head tax, and he mentioned generally, that the Premier had said what a great thing it would be in the interests of trade. Another statement made by Mr. McInnes was that he thought that Canada had blundered in every way in its entire Chinese policy. Code names for about a score of prominent government and local personages were disclosed, and provoked a good deal of merriment amongst the crowd assembled. It was not explained why Mr. Robert Kelly's code name was 'Jew.'

Then in the 'News-Advertiser' of January 24th at page 5, Mr. McInnes, in reply to another query stated that Mr. O'Hara started this investigation off his own bat. Mr.

McInnes asked Mr. O'Hara whether he wished him to continue as he had other matters in hand. A letter of October 21st from witness to Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated that witness called on Mr. Paterson, who thought that, so far as opium smuggling was concerned, any sudden or drastic action such as was taken in the case of Yip On would be unwise, but a public investigation might be desirable. He had also an interview with Mr. McKenzie King, who advocated an amendment to the Opium Act, without a public inquiry.

At the bottom of the same column I find:

It was also mentioned that recent proceedings at Vancouver had prevented the revenue being defrauded out of $17,500 head tax on 35 Chinese, picked out on two ships; also that the recent proceedings had justified the temporary appointment of Lew.

The next was a letter dated October 29, to witness from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said he had some exception to take to what witness said of the Hon. Mr. Templeman. The Premier said: 'Of course, he is my colleague, and so long as he occupies that position I cannot put his advice aside. He may be wrong in his judgment, but his intentions, I am sure, are above suspicion.'

Another letter brought out a remark from witness that he did not wish to come to this investigation. If he had not been here, he said, he would have been in Washington on a very important matter, which would have meant a deal to him.

A letter from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's private secretary acknowledged with thanks the letters and enclosures from witness in which 'there was excellent advice, but the writer might mention that Judge Murphy had been appointed commissioner.'

In reference to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) this afternoon charging me with suppressing his telegram, which he said was in the evidence, I told him then that, from my search in the evidence, I did not find it. I am surprised that the hon. minister should so recklessly make a statement of that nature reflecting upon a colleague in the House, when the record—which he should have known—shows that what he said to the House was not correct:

I read in the 'News-Advertiser' of January 25th, page 1:

Counsel then stated it appeared that the telegram from Hon. Mr. Templeman to Sir Richard Cartwright was reported by the telegraph company to be missing. Mr. McCrossan said he did not know whether the copy was amongst the files, as he had not been through them yet.

Now that is the telegram the hon. minister so flippantly told the House this afternoon was in this record, and should be read by me.

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue). The telegram I sent to Sir Richard Cartwright, and the only telegram I sent was produced in evidence. It was procured at a telegraph office at Vancouver, and published in the papers. When I gave evidence I produced a copy of the telegram which I procured from the Trade and Commerce Department myself. If the hon. gentleman will read my evidence he will find the telegram.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). If the Speaker will permit me I will read this again. It is from the report contained in the 'News-Advertiser,' and I have no doubt it is correct. The hon minister told the House that I suppressed it from the evidence I quoted. I have covered the evidence day by day from the beginning, without finding such a telegram.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am not charging the hon. gentleman with suppressing anything, but what I do say is that the hon. gentleman charged that I had sent a telegram recommending that the investigation should not proceed. I dispute that absolutely. I only sent one telegram and it was not to that effect.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I have read from the sworn evidence. I have not gone beyond January 25th yet. I will read the statement from the 'News-Advertiser' again.

Counsel then stated it appeared that the telegram from the Hon. Mr. Templeman to Sir Richard Cartwright, was reported by the telegraph company to be missing. Mr. McCrossan said he did not know whether the copy was amongst the files, as he had not been through them yet.

Still quoting from the issue of the 'News-Advertiser' of January 25th, page 5, I find the following:

In connection with the telegram sent in the name of Mr. J. H. Senkler, K.C., suggesting 'the reinstatement of Yip On, and expressing the objection entertained to the drastic action of Mr. O'Hara in suspending collector Bowell,' the letter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier of October 3rd last stated that the Premier had found there was a very strong prima facie case against the Chinese interpreter, and that he had been properly suspended.

Sir Wilfrid added that 'the public are so keen about this oriental business that we should put ourselves into very serious trouble if we were to create the impression that we were not doing our full duty to have the law carried out. If you have any reason to think otherwise, please write to me and give me your full views.'

In his letter to the Premier of October 8th, Mr. Senkler stated he thought the executive of the Liberal association were wrong in sending the telegram in his name in his absence. They should, if they had felt so strongly on the matter as they apparently did, have sent it in the name of the secretary or vice-president, or acting chairman. However, he personally thought most Chinese were proverbially dishonest, and if it were possible to get an interpreter who was not a Chinese, it would be infinitely preferable.

In the 'Advertiser' of January 26th there is a review of the evidence given by Mr. Jos. Martin, K.C., which is as follows:

Mr. Joseph Martin, K.C., M.P., was the star witness yesterday. His evidence was not exactly evidence in regard to the definite points of the inquiry, but it was a scathing indictment, of 'the graft he believed had permeated every department.'

His was a meteoric appearance, and he burst in alike on the commission the Dominion government, the local Liberal executive and Mr. Robert Kelly, its chief, in particular. His charges included the statement that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was primarily to blame, and that the Premier 'could stop it all in five minutes if he wanted to do so;' that every department in which the Liberal government spent money or had any control in British Columbia went through the local Liberal organization here, over which Mr. Robert Kelly was the head; that Mr. Robert Kelly had the control of every thing in regard to the government's business and in return supplied funds for the government campaigns. These were two of the statements made by 'fighting Joe' and listened to with absorbing attention by the crowded assembly who were present.

Judge Murphy pointed out that Foster had said twice that Mr. Templeman said to him 'Foster, I want you to stop this.' Witness said Foster did not say that to him, but that he said that Mr. Kelly and Dr. Munroe attempted to stop the matter.

Now, there are reams of evidence in addition to what I have read. The inquiry proceeded in Vancouver and Victoria for some time after January 31, to which the files from which I am reading extend, and which contains all that I propose to read to the House. I think I have read enough to show that a most appalling condition of affairs has existed in Vancouver during the last four years; that persons in a position to know how the revenue has been defrauded have been making continual and repeated complaints since that time; that they have gone the round of almost the whole cabinet with these complaints; that no relief appears from any quarter until Mr. O'Hara a deputy minister saw fit, off his own bat, to institute an investigation which inspector Foster is declared by Judge Murphy to have said the Minister of Inland Revenue himself wished to have stopped. But the matter had gone too far to be stopped. It went on, we are told, largely as the result of the fear inspired by the Drummond and Arthabaska election which showed that it was possible to conceive that a day of reckoning could come. The evidence has been in the possession of the government, some of it since December, and the last of it since April last.

And we wind up with a statement in this House a few days ago that, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the matter is under consideration, and the ministers do not know when, if ever, that report will be laid before the House, or whether any action will be taken in connection with it. Now, the whole indictment, so far as the smuggling of Chinese into Canada is concerned, is against the Department of Trade and Commerce primarily to show its utter inefficiency, and its entire neglect of the business entrusted to it. We are told that a colleague of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is doing his level best within the cabinet to relieve the paralysis by having control of the Chinese transferred from a dead department to a live one. We are told by another employee of the government that the only reason that this is not done is that if you take this from the Trade and Commerce Department there will be nothing left for it. In the face of all that, this House is supposed to be content with the statement that the government will not act except on the initiative of the Trade and Commerce Department. I, for one, am not satisfied with that. I am quite satisfied that those of my constituents who form part of the population of the city of Vancouver are not satisfied, that they are earnestly desirous that the government should take some steps to put an end to the gross scandal prevailing there, and they would call me seriously to account if, in common with other members, I was so derelict in my duty to them as to allow the session to pass without some exposition of the state of affairs there, and a demand that some action shall be taken by the government. I leave it to the judgment of the House whether or not the facts indicate that we should put upon the record the opinion of this House as to the failure of the government to deal with these scandals, and to punish the perpetrators who, for a period of many years, have gone unwhipped of justice.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I thought that some minister of the Crown would give an answer to the very serious indictment brought against the government or give some explanation of the masterly inactivity which appears to have characterized the government in connection with this affair from first to last. I thought the minister for British Columbia (Mr. Templeman) especially would say something. But he chooses to remain silent. It seems to me that this is an extraordinary situation, and yet it is not so different from those we have had to deal with during the last few years. The government found themselves in this situation because of trouble over which, perhaps, in the first place, they had no control. But the action which they took in the premises was not calculated to impress the public with the belief that they were very anxious to punish the wrongdoers or stop the wrongdoing, otherwise we should have had different evidence of it from that which we have to-day. Rumours of wrongdoing, dishonesty, and fraud in connection with Chinese immigration, and government officials was brought to the notice of the government several years ago. It was brought to their notice in the most pointed and, direct way, by letters from their officials, by letters from their friends, by conversations they themselves had with those in whom they ought to have full confidence. But, notwithstanding, they appear to have paid no attention to it, and allowed these frauds to contipue. There was finally sufficient information brought to their notice to induce the government to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the matter.

They did appoint that commission, and the inquiry went on. It commenced about the time of the opening of this session last November. That inquiry was confined to two ports, Vancouver and Victoria, and so was not widespread, and did not require a long time to take the evidence. Now, seven months after its appointment, parliament is anxious to see that report, but we are denied that right although the report has been in the hands of the government for two months. Why are we denied that report? Because the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not here. Because the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who happens to occupy a seat in the Upper Chamber, which has adjourned until August 10, is off enjoying himself at his summer residence and may not put in an appearance until that date or afterwards.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. He will be here to-morrow.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that not strange conduct on the part of ministers and on the part of the Prime Minister himself? In the absence of the minister of any department one of his colleagues invariably administers his department, and surely it was the duty of the minister so acting to at least make an effort to procure this report for parliament. It is a strange parody on ministerial responsibility and executive duty. It is not what the country and this House demands. This House may at any time collapse from its own unfortunate conduct, and parliament be dissolved, and, in the absence of that report we will have no information to give to the country to enable the electorate of Canada to judge of the action of the government in connection with that transaction. Perhaps a year after the election that report may be presented to the House.

If the evidence given in the press is at all reliable an awful state of affairs has been disclosed. We see a minister of the Crown controlled by one of his supporters out there in the Tammany of Vancouver, Mr. Kelly, and an executive or patronage committee, a confidential committee who seem to control the whole affairs of this government in that great city. It was the duty of the Minister of the Interior to look after immigration, but he has done nothing in this matter. The attention of the Minister of Customs was drawn to these frauds in the smuggling of opium and Chinese into the country, but nothing has been done. Then we have the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) who belongs to the city, who knows all these men, and who has been acting through that committee, that Tammany ring for years, and has had brought to his attention over and over again the discreditable conduct of this committee. Yet there is no effort to do away with it or to purge the uncleanness of that stable out there. So it goes on, masterly inactivity, unconcern, indifference, dishonesty, culpability, crime, fraud, and everything, all brought home to the government in the plainest possible way if this evidence is reliable, and yet the evidence is kept from the House at the time we ought to have it. The report of the commissioner was finished early in May, but it has not been presented. This is not the only case of the kind; we had a similar condition with reference to the Marine Department, and were told that everything was all right there. The government from session to session were urged to make an inquiry, but they were able to sidetrack it in some way. Finally a commission was appointed. They attempted to prevent the carrying out of that investigation, to burke the inquiry after it was begun. The commissioners had not time to cover more than a portion of the ground, but they made a partial report of what they inquired into. That report disclosed the most disgraceful state of affairs that was ever known in the running of a department of the government here in Ottawa.

Then what happened? The ministers of the Crown commenced to abuse the commissioners and the commissioners were indicted before this House because of the report they had presented. They were the criminals, they were held up before the people because they had honestly endeavoured to do their duty. The government could not absolutely burke that inquiry although they stopped it after the inquiry was partially made. We had following that another one—the Printing Bureau.

The opposition endeavoured to have an inquiry, but they were not allowed to do so. It was voted down because it was said there was nothing wrong. Everything that had transpired that was wrong had been righted and yet there is only a fraction of what should come out that has been laid before this House to enable the House to judge of the state of affairs in the Printing Bureau. In every one of these instances the same tactics were followed by the government. The members of the House were kept in the dark as far as possible. The commissioners were prevented from going on with that inquiry as they should have gone on with it. In the case of the Department of Marine and Fisheries there was a second investigation that disclosed a great deal more wrong-doing than the first one and even that only covered part of the ground. From information in our possession we have reason to believe that there are other departments that are as bad as this, if they were inquired into. The opposition have tried over and over again to get a commission of inquiry with full powers to make an investigation into these departments, but every time it has been voted down upon the declaration of ministers that everything was all right and that there was no need for investigation. This, if it had been brought up in this House, would have been treated in the same way. But while there was a commission appointed and while it did bring out a lot of valuable information, the House is denied the right to see that information, to read, analyse and sift the evidence and present it to the people of the country, who in all human probability will be shortly called upon to express their verdict at the polls in regard to the conduct of this government during their term of office. We cannot have it. Is that treating the electors of the country right? It is an injustice to this House that should not be tolerated, it is an injustice to the electors that should not be tolerated, and I can only hope that when the day comes that the people must sit in judgment upon them they will have this case before their minds and that they will mete out even-handed justice to their representatives in this House who have made this effort to prevent this information being given to the House or the country as it should be, so that it can be dealt with in a proper way.

The hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) said that this thing was under consideration. How long will it remain under consideration before it shall fructify in results? With regard to the efforts made to recognize the veterans of the Fenian raid-fiasco, why, it has been under consideration, for 14 years and there is no indication that they have reached a conclusion yet. From time to time we have had that declaration from the Prime Minister, from the Minister of Militia and from other members of the government. It is still under consideration. As in this case the Minister of Justice declared that it was under their consideration. What does that mean to the House or the people of the country? If we are to judge what it means by what we know of other cases where the same expressions have been used and where we have had time to ascertain what the results have been we are justified in coming to the conclusion that it was under consideration for the purpose of keeping it from the people, keeping it from this House, keeping it in the dark, rather than for the purpose of bringing it to light. I think it is disgraceful, I think it is discreditable, I think it does not reflect credit upon any member of the present government. It happens that by an accident of life some of the members of this government must be in the Senate, but when the House of Commons desires information and if the Senate is not in session there is the easiest way in the world to have it presented to this House, instead of using the fact that the Senate has adjourned and that the minister is off on his summer holidays as an excuse for refusing to give the House the evidence of that important commission which it ought to have to-night and which it ought to be able to read over carefully and take action upon before the House has probably collapsed and a new election is held.

Right hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, I did not rise after my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) had taken his seat for the reason, which I will give him very frankly, that, in my estimation, the speech which he made was not so much for the purpose of obtaining information as for the purpose of killing time and obstructing the business of the House. My hon. friend spoke for a matter of three or four hours, certainly for three hours, and there is no reason at all, if he had been anxious to have the information, why he should not have had the answer which he wanted to have in ten minutes. My hon, friend (Mr. Sproule) has just taken his seat after having devoted fifteen minutes to the same subject and under such circumstances I owe it to him to give him the answer which he requires. An investigation has been made into the condition of things which prevailed in British Columbia with regard to the administration of the Chinese Act. This investigation was held by a Judge of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Murphy. His report was sent to my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) who handed it over to the Department of Justice for the purpose of taking action upon it. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) asked me to look over the report to-day and I had a conference with him. I will give frankly to the House the reason why the report has not been placed upon the table of the House. Mr. Justice Murphy's report is a very voluminous one, containing at least 100 pages of foolscap typewritten matter, if not more. I had no time to read it in its entirety, but I looked into it at the conclusion. The conclusion of the report is that certain parties should be prosecuted. These parties have not been prosecuted because they are not at this moment in the country. Mr. Justice Murphy's second recommendation is that this report should not be made public until the prosecutions have been instituted. I have not had the report in my hands to read it over, but I presume that if the report and the evidence were disclosed it would, to some extent, interfere with the administration of justice and with reaching the culprits. Under such circumstances we have to make up our minds either to make the report public and therefore give this advantage to the culprits which Mr. Justice Murphy says should not be given or we will have to keep the report to ourselves and be subjected to the very charitable inference that we have something to conceal. I said a moment ago, that I have not yet had an opportunity of looking at the report. It is my intention to look over it with my hon. friend the Minister of Justice in order to discuss with him what action should be taken upon the report. Then, we shall make further communication to the House and state whether we shall make the report public or not make it public as we deem best in the public interest.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman why the Minister of Justice answered in these words:

> The report has been received by the Department of Trade and Commerce, but in the absence of the minister, I am not able to say anything in reference to it except that it is under consideration.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not to be interpreted as it has been interpreted by my hon. friend that he is to be absent so long as the Senate is adjourned. The minister is to be in Ottawa to-morrow and it is my purpose to discuss this matter with him.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister of Justice gave the idea that the report was in the Trade and Commerce Department, and that he knew nothing about it, whereas it was in the Justice Department, and he might as well have told the House so.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). The First Minister has been so unfair as to say that I have brought this matter up simply for the purpose of wasting time. I give that statement a most positive contradiction.

Mr. TALBOT. You can contradict it if you like.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I do not expect to convince the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot). I brought the matter up in pursuance of my duty to a large number of citizens of Vancouver who are my constituents, and in pursuance of my duty to my constituents generally. I asked for this report on two previous occasions without making any remarks at all. The first time I was promised it and the next time the promise had vanished and I was given no information at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I must give my hon. friend the credit of this disclaimer but I am sorry to say his prolixity gave a different impression.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Prime Minister ought to make an apology rather than an insinuation. This matter has been in the public press for months past; the evidence has been taken, and largely printed in the newspapers of the country; a report has been made; parliament re-assembles, and there is not one word from any member of the government with regard to that investigation or report. No explanation is given by the ministry as to why the report of that commission has not been submitted to parliament and the inquiry of my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) is met in an evasive way. As a natural result of that, the evidence published in the press of the country has been placed in part upon 'Hansard' as it was the duty of my hon. friend from New Westminster to do in view of the apparent unwillingness of the government to give any information to the House or to the country. When the Prime Minister says that this report is not submitted to parliament because its submission might interfere with the course of justice I do not understand what he means. I am bound to say that the Prime Minister has not expressed himself in a manner that would carry conviction on that point in my mind. The inquiry was open to the public, and the evidence was published in the newspapers and it does not seem that there can be anything in the suggestion that the placing of the evidence on the table of the House would give these men information which they have not at present. I do not understand the suggestion of the Prime Minister in that respect.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) was not in the House when I stated, that, this morning I had a conference with the Minister of Justice upon the subject. I had not time to read the voluminous report, but I read the conclusion wherein Mr. Justice Murphy suggests that certain parties should be prosecuted. I am informed by the Department of Justice that these parties are not in the country. Mr. Justice Murphy also recommends that the report should not be made public previous to these prosecutions. That is why the report has not been tabled. I will see the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Trade and Commerce about it again to-morrow, and we will have to decide then whether we shall bring down the report and give to those who are to be prosecuted an advantage which Mr. Justice Murphy says they should not have, or whether, in order to clear ourselves, we shall act against the recommendation of the commissioner and bring the report down.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would not for a moment criticise a report made by Mr. Justice Murphy, or any other commissioner, but I am not at present able to appreciate the point he makes. I presume there can be nothing in the report which is not founded upon the evidence which was taken in public, and which every one of the men implicated knows. If the Prime Minister on the day parliament met had stated what he has stated to-night, and left it to the members of the House to press or not press for the report, it would have been better. Instead of that, we have an answer of an evasive character in regard to the report, and my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) in the face of that was in duty bound to extort from the government some explanation of their very extraordinary conduct in connection with this matter. I had not followed this subject very closely in the public press, and to-day I have been absolutely astounded at the evidence which seems to have been given before Mr. Justice Murphy in connection with Chinese immigration. Some of that evidence is of the most shocking character, and I should have thought that any government involved as this government has been, would have felt it its duty at the earliest moment to make an explanation to parliament, if any could be made, as to the extraordinary revelations made. I find it stated—not by Conservatives, but by prominent members of the Liberal party in the province of British Columbia—that there was actually a quarrel among them as to how the plunder from the public treasury should be divided. One would suppose that such evidence would bring from the government a prompt statement that effective measures would be taken immediately not only to end such an intolerable condition of affairs, but to bring to justice those who have been plundering the people of Canada for many years past.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE (North Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, the right hon. the Prime Minister has stated that the hon. member for New Westminster was taking up the time of the House, and carrying on this discussion purely for the purpose of wasting the time of this House. To me it seems that the party who is guilty of all this loss of time, if there is any, is the right hon. the Prime Minister himself, because had he earlier in the day made a statement such as he has made now, the discussion might have been curtailed, that is, provided the right hon. gentleman had gone a little farther, and stated to the House that in view of the fact that departments of his government have been so derelict in their duty as to hold this report over for three months in order to enable all those likely to be prosecuted to get out of the country, he would bring down the report at once. In fact, he did not apparently know that some one was to be prosecuted until to-day, nor did the Department of Justice know that the judge who made this report had suggested that some one should be prosecuted. For months that report has been pigeonholed in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the men guilty of defrauding this country of about $1,000,000 have no doubt been aided by information given to them directly or indirectly to leave this country, and thus avoid any prosecution. This is not the first time that the government has been asked for this report. The hon. member for New Westminster has again and again asked that it be presented to the House. One would have thought that in a matter not only involving a great money loss to this country, but showing that a most flagrant conspiracy existed in Vancouver to defraud this country, and that officers employed by a department of the government were in that conspiracy, the government would have as quickly as possible taken action, and laid the report on the table of the House. Instead of that, they have done nothing, and the guilty men are now out of the country. Certainly there was loss of time there on the part of this government. Under the circumstances there was only one course for the party on this side of the House to pursue, and that was to place on the records of this House the evidence taken by the commission as disclosed in the newspaper reports, and show as clearly as possible the facts connected with this great Tong war carried on between two factions of the Liberal party in British Columbia in the last few months. The birds have flown, and the fact that the Prime Minister has announced in this House that certain people are to be prosecuted is warning to those people who are out of the country that if they return they are liable to be placed under arrest. The cat is out of the bag. So far as future prosecutions are concerned, the report might as well be placed on the table of this House by the Prime Minister to-day or to-morrow as a month or six months from now, and I think he should state that he will place the report on the table to-morrow. The facts disclosed in that report are to all intents and purposes public property at this moment. In justice to this House and the country, I think the evidence should be placed on the records of this House. The hon. member for New Westminster has placed on the records the evidence up to the beginning of February. As his physical powers are not equal to his quoting the evidence for two or three hours more, I think I am justified in assisting him by proceeding to read the evidence taken at the remaining sittings of that commission in British Columbia. That is the only way in which this House can have the facts before it, and then we shall be able to deal with this question in an intelligent manner. It would be very absurd for us to bring in a motion casting any reflection on the government in this matter before we had all the evidence before us, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite, who are so closely and intently listening to the evidence, will be pleased to read it in 'Hansard' to-morrow. The Minister of Customs is at the head of the department which has to do with the collection of this tax, and he is the first man who should have taken action against these frauds and rascalities; yet he as the principal watch-dog has been absent during the whole afternoon, when this sordid tale has been told in the House. Let us see how this thing occurred. We know that the law with reference to Chinese immigration was changed in 1907, permitting merchants, students and merchants' sons to come to this country. A vast conspiracy was formed, with its ramifications in China and Canada, by which men in China, on payment of $100, were made partners in firms of merchants there. Some who were cooks or laundrymen were in this way raised to the dignity of merchants, and they received consular certificates from China on which were placed their photographs, and in many cases were given new names.

As near as I can understand it they were met by a man supposed to be an agent of this government, and he handed them gold coin to the tune of $150 or $200. Drafts were given on imaginary banking houses, and after they came to Vancouver they were met by the commissioner of customs, who was deluded by the interpreter, the latter pretending to ask a great many questions from these men, but it was definitely and clearly proved that he did not ask them any questions at all, on the other hand he laughed up his sleeve at what he was supposed to say. He made a long face to the customs house officer there who had charge of this end of the business and looked very wise and these men were passed as merchants. Hundreds of them got through in that way, and before I close to-night I propose to show how many were passed. The strange thing about this is that these men were not passed at Victoria—where they might have been passed—or Prince Rupert or Comox, but at Vancouver. The most peculiar thing in connection with it all is the appearance there of a patronage committee which seems to rule over the destinies of the Liberal party on the coast. That patronage committee has since become divided against itself, a great tong war now rages, their dirty linen is being washed before the public, and the names of ministers have been dragged into the light of notoriety, as we read in the evidence given from time to time in these papers.

But members of the opposition have refrained from making any reference to these questions previously during this session. That was not due to the fact that we were not well aware of what was going on or that we did not watch closely the evidence taken before the commissioners in Victoria Vancouver and elsewhere, but because we felt that the Prime Minister of this country and those who have charge of the treasury matters should realize the importance of this question and take prompt action. I am satisfied that it was the duty of the Prime Minister the moment the commission was appointed to ask the commissioner to make a report direct to him and give him the result of the investigation, by wire if necessary. In this matter this country has suffered a loss to the extent of at least one million dollars through the dishonesty of public servants —lost apparently through the machinations of the patronage committee who stood in with these Chinamen. In the newspapers on the coast at the time, it was stated that the interpreter who worked the racket got $20 a head on those he put in, and that $100 a head went to somebody higher up in the confidence of this party—some man who had power and patronage to distribute?

That is a very sordid and sad tale. I could quite understand it in connection with any other department but a department collecting revenue. In no other British country can we find anything of the kind in connection with the Customs Department. There have been frauds in connection with contracts, and petty grafting in connection with other departments, but such a thing as this in connection with a department collecting revenue is unknown.

The strangest feature of the whole matter is the apparent and intense interest shown by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) to help somebody out throughout this whole transaction. The holding of nice dinners at which this was discussed, nice little dinners where, according to the witnesses, nobody got drunk, and at which all these matters were threshed out by the patronage committee—these are the facts that came out in the evidence; and I am sure this House will not be satisfied until the whole of the evidence is laid before it in 'Hansard' to-morrow. The only possible way in which we can get this story before the public and the only way that we can get the facts before the people so that they can pass judgment upon it is to have some of the evidence placed upon 'Hansard'. Therefore I would ask the House to be patient with me while I read portions of the evidence from the 1st of February until the inquiry was closed.

On the 1st of February the investigation was resumed, and two Chinese witnesses were examined. These two men were printers. Apparently they have a paper in Vancouver called the 'Sun Bow,' published by the Chinese Association or a Chinese company. They were in need of printers, and they did not seem to have trouble in getting Chinese printers.

Reading from the Vancouver 'News Advertiser' of February 1st, page 5 I find the following evidence given by these printers:

Then two Chinese witnesses who had the appearance of students, who were dressed in European style, were brought in.

This was before the judge who was taking the evidence:

Then two Chinese witnesses, who had the appearance of students and were dressed in European style, were brought in, and Mr. McCrossan suggested that David Lew or the reporter of a Chinese—not English—paper should translate, but Mr. Taylor objected to Lew. The judge suggested Lew should translate subject to check on the part of someone else, but as Mr. Taylor had no one present the judge decided he would not let the men go before they were examined, as the chances were, if he did so, they might not see the men again.

Eventually Mr. Cum Yow was telephoned for, and while they were waiting for him the paper oath was administered, Lew, first being sworn in as interpreter for the purpose of administering the oath.

Hon gentlemen will understand what a paper oath is. The name of the Chinaman is written on a piece of paper and the paper is then burnt before him. There is another form of Chinese oath known as the 'chicken oath'. They threatened several times to use it in this case, but I do not see any evidence that it was used.

Then each witness, whose names were Yip Dit Chor and Yung Jung Sung wrote his name on a slip of paper which was lit and each witness held it until it burnt itself out, telling them beforehand, in Chinese, what the oaths meant and the full signification if perjury was committed.

AsMr. Cum Yow had not arrived at 5.20, the judge directed a message to be sent saying the court was waiting, and Mr. McCrossan unavailtingly tried witnesses in English.

Then David Lew started to interpret the questions, and soon after Mr. Cum Yow came in.

"Yip Dit Chor was a typesetter on a Chinese newspaper."

You will observe his name 'Yip' shows his clan. He was one of the Yip clan, and the interpreter against whom these charges were made was Yip On. I do not know whether this man Yip was a Liberal or an insurgent Liberal. However his name was Yip Dit Chor. He was a typesetter on a Chinese newspaper, and a fearful undertaking it is to set type on a Chinese journal. If the Minnistor of Railways (Mr. Graham) were here, he would, as he has been a type setter himself, understand what a lot of trouble it is for a man to set type when he has a font 30 feet long and has to run backwards to pick out each letter—a letter being supposed to represent a word, is it any wonder then, that under the circumstances that there was a scarcity of typesetters in Vancouver. However this man was a typesetter and the report goes to say:

Yip Dit Chor was typesetter on a Chinese newspaper here, and followed the same trade in China. He came to Canada on the Monteagle about June, 1907, and did not have the handling of a passport. He did not know whether he paid head tax or not. He came with Yung Sing Set. Mr. Cum Yow now entered and checked Lew's singing questions and interpretation.

Witness knew that he himself never paid the poll-tax. He met Yip On at the shed, and was examined by Mr. Bowell, who interrogated him as to age, etc., Yip On interpreting.

Was he asked if he was a merchant?

—He was not asked that in Chinese.

You will observe that the interpreter was supposed to ask him that question.

'Did he describe himself as Mak Sis Wah?' asked Mr. McCrossan, consulting a passport?

He signed his name as Mak Sis Wah, which was not his right name. It was his photograph which appeared on the passport. He never saw the passport before. He paid nothing for it.

Judge Murphy—And it cost you nothing to come into Canada?

Witness said it was all paid by the Sun Bow Newspaper Company.

At this point arises a very important thing in connection with the importation of Chinese, and that is this:. Peonage is recognized in China, and men come to this country whose way is paid and who for years afterwards remain virtually the slaves of the companies or individuals who import them. Anything that will encourage that system of importing Chinese labour into this country helps in maintaining a great evil and a great wrong to these men. This evil grew to great proportions in the United States, where there were societies that enslaved large classes of Chinese who worked night and day but all of whose wages went to these companies. Here you see, was a man taken charge of by a company in China, shipped to Canada, and a passport given him. Why, he was even given a new name. And he comes into the country and pays no poll tax, I think the case is a clear one.

Did Yip On to knowledge of witness know what work witness was coming here to do?—He did not know Yip On at all at that time.

He came over on the 'Monteagle' in company with Yung Ling Sit, another Chinese newspaper typesetter, who had since died. Yung Jung Sung, who had come to the court with him, was also a typesetter here and in China. They did not come on the same vessel.

Did witness ever go before the Viceroy?—Witness did not know how the certificate was obtained. He did not go for it.

A Chinaman in China is supposed to go before the viceroy and get his certificate signed. This man never appeared before the viceroy. So you see the law there was violated.

With the view to finding out if witness remembered seeing any of the men who came on the same boat, their photographs on the passports were shown to him. He was sick much of the time, he said, but recollected seeing one out of the four men shown on the photographs.

Mr. Taylor left over his cross-examination until the morning, the judge, who said there had been difficulty in getting the man here, having it made clear that he must attend.

Yung Jung Sing, a very intelligent looking man, was put on the witness stand at five minutes to six o'clock.

He was a typesetter on the Sun Bow newspaper, Carrall Street, and had formerly worked for over three years for the 'Reform Gazette'.

He came from Hong Kong on the 'Monteagle,' but not on the same trip as last witness. He was also a typesetter there and was not then, nor ever since, a merchant.

So you see, this man admits he was not a merchant, but a typesetter. And these two typesetters say that they were allowed to enter the country without paying the poll tax.

He got his passport—which had his photograph on it—from the Yah Wick Company of Devoe Road, Hong Kong.

That is one of the big companies handling these Chinese, trying to run them into the United States and Canada.

Who got it for him?—He did not remember the man's name. He was a clerk there. Witness was engaged to come here by Long Shu Hun, representing the 'Sun Bow' newspaper Company.

Did this Long Shu Hun take him to the Yah Wick Company?

He belonged to what company?

What was their business?—Exporters of general dry goods.

Did he know Yip Yen?—Yes.

Where did he meet him?—He saw him at the Yah Wick Company last on the day he left for the steamer.

Witness said he was examined at the detention shed here by a white officer and that Yip On was there. He did not know the name of the white officer, but he was a pretty elderly man.

What did Yip On ask you?—

He did not ask witness much questions, but asked if he was a merchant, the latter replying that he had come here to go into business. Some one in Hong Kong told him to say that.

What did he pay for the passport?—He did not know.

Had he paid any thing at all?—No.

Was it understood the Sun Bow Company were to pay his poll-tax?—

All that was said was 'He give you this paper. You go over there. It will be all right.'

He never saw the Viceroy, or went to the British consul. He got the photograph from the Yah Wick Company and travelled as 'Lee Su Hung,' which was not his right name, but was the name he was told by Yip Yen at Hong Kong to use for the purpose.

He gave the picture a few days before he got the passport. When he arrived here he had some money, but he did not remember how much.

This man Yip On was the official interpreter. He was sent to these men to train them and line them up to be passed. He passed them most successfully and in such a way that this government was defrauded out of one million dollars or more.

He gave him the gold on the steamer to put in his pocket in case he might be searched, so that he could back up his story that he was a merchant, was about to go into business.

Yip On gave him some gold, which he put in his pocket, and then gave it back to Yip On after he was examined.

Did he know if others on the boat did the same thing?—He looked only after his own business.

He was a wise Chinaman.

He was given just one letter by the Yah Wick Company at Hong Kong, to be handed to Yip On. Another man collected it from him on the voyage.

He knew nothing now as to whether the Yah Wick Company were still doing business.

I do not know either. I suppose that by this time there is no such company, for they would have had notice of that report.

Mr. B. R. Macdonald, collector of customs at Prince Rupert, was the first witness at the morning session.

He had learned in Prince Rupert that Chinese were coming into Vancouver without paying the tax.

You will note that it was a well-known story all over the Coast for a long time before action was taken, that the Chinese were coming into Canada without paying poll tax and that this was virtually an open port so far as the Chinese were concerned.

Through the aid of the interpreter, afterwards getting permits and transmitting them to China for use by improper merchants, who would bring in with them boys described as sons, but who were not their sons. This state of matters had been going on for three years he was told by his informant, and the latter had come with him from Prince Rupert to give evidence.

There was a case in Toronto not many weeks ago. A bright, intelligent lad of 12 or 14 who was staying with a supposed uncle and who was brought to Toronto, no doubt as a merchant's son. The lad was found hanging dead in a room and was supposed to have committed suicide. But there is a great mystery about it. I contend that no Chinese boy should be admitted to this country except in company with his own parents. But this man knew and it was current report, that boys were admitted to Canada who pretended to be sons of men with whom they entered.

He had asked this man whether he had any proof to sustain the charges, but had been told that he knew it only by hearsay. In this it was mentioned that the price paid was $100 to the interpreter and $20 for others.

Cross-examined by Mr. S. S. Taylor witness said the name of his informant was Mar Ben Quin. Witness admitted he himself had no proof. He only mentioned what he had been told.

Mar Ben Quin, not having arrived, Yip On then got back to the witness stand, and was asked whether he had had anything to do in the way of inducing passengers to come over by the use of passports, or had he brought in mere working men as merchants?—No.

Did the Reform Association in 1907 by resolution ask him or Yip Suh Foy to bring over Chinese printers, and did not one of them come in under a passport?—No.

Asked again what he thought was the reason for his suspicion witness considered it was merely for the purpose of a government inspection. It was nothing to do with a tong war. He had heard on the street that Lew had made some trouble for him.

Mr. McCrossan switched back to the matter of passports and Dr. Chang, and the reason Dr. Chang had sent the list of names to witness instead of to Mr. Bowell, because a bone of contention between Mr. McCrossan and Mr. Taylor, the latter holding that Dr. Chang's letter, as coming from the Chinese diplomatic consul here, was absolutely free from any possibility of being impugned, and that he had kept that letter all through, as strong evidence in favour of his client.

Judge Murphy said that whether he had power to call Dr. Chang or not, he did not intend to do so.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe).

After this little breeze was over Yip On was taken through another cable translating effort. This was a cable to 'Conclusion,' said to be Yip On's brother's code name, Hong Kong, and unsigned. It worked out roughly as follows: 'Suh Wy's position, suspended, last boat, tell the people that know.' Mr. McCrossan assumed this to mean, on witnesses' explanation, that 'Suh Wy's position,' meant 'little brother's position,' and contended that this cable was sent by Yip Quong, Yip On's brother. David Lew made the interpretation 'Suh Wy and his brother, position, suspended, last boat, tell everybody that knows.'

Reverting to the viceroy's certificate sent to Dr. Chang there was further argument between counsel and Judge Murphy stated that he believed it was a fact that every such certificate was duplicated at Ottawa. Mr. Taylor claimed that if this were the fact the passport conspiracy fell to the ground and protested further at the time taken up in bringing out matters in reference to Yip On, while other matters, such as the opium smuggling, were left over. The commission might go on for ever.

I would ask the Prime Minister if it is a fact that when Chinese entering Vancouver or Victoria in this way receive passports in China, duplicates of the passports are sent from the British consul in China direct to Ottawa as stated in this evidence?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I could not tell my hon. friend at the moment?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Is there any minister here who could tell?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think there is?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Could the Minister of Inland Revenue?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I do not know.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Perhaps the Minister of Customs could tell?

Mr. PATERSON. I could not state, but I suppose that if one was sent it would be sent to the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Perhaps the Minister of Militia, the latest recruit to the ranks of our diplomats, who has been practising the art lately with the intention of becoming High Commissioner, could? Would he send a duplicate passport in this way? The Minister of Militia should be an expert on passports, as no one can enter his department without a passport. It would be a proper thing to have the photograph put on the passport. No one on the government benches knows anything about the Chinese question. But to resume the evidence.

Judge Murphy interposed. There are some people, he said, amidst general laughter, who say that would be a good thing for us all. The opium matter was yet to come.

A good thing if the whole question was dropped. I wonder who the people were who the judge thought would like to see the whole thing dropped.

Mar Ben Quin not having arrived, Yip On then got back into the witness stand and was asked whether he had had anything to do in the way of inducing passengers to come over by the use of passports, or had he brought in mere workingmen as merchants? No.

Did the Reform Association in 1907 by resolution ask him or Yip Su Foy to bring over Chinese printers and did not one of them come in under a passport. No.

Asked again what he thought was the reason for his suspension, witness considered it was merely for the purpose of a government inspection. It had nothing to do with a Tong war

Yip On was then cross-examined by Mr. Gordon Grant concerning the method of examinations at the shed, and wanted to know if Mr. Bowell had refused permission to a man claiming to be a partner of Yip Sang, Yip On's partner. Witness did not notice if any of his uncle's partners had tried to come in.

Mr. Grant stated that Mr. Bowell had said that a man, so claiming, had tried to come in and had been refused. Would witness say Mr. Bowell was wrong? Witness only said: No.

He did not know how many partners his uncle had.

Why did he not know how many partners his uncle had? Because, perhaps, 200 Chinamen had each given $10 to become partners.

As regarded his brother, Yip Quong, he kept a jewellery store, starting three or four years ago, before which he was working in Wing San's. He had partners, of which witness was one, and Yip Quong and Yip Sam others, but he could not remember the names of others.

Three or four years ago he was Vice-President of the Reform Association.

I am surprised to see in the evidence that a Chinaman was vice-president of the Reform Association of Vancouver. But it is so stated here; he gives it under oath. He says three or four years ago he was vice-president of the Reform Association. Is that possible?? A Chinaman vice-president of the Reform Association, because the Reform Association consists largely of Chinamen.

Lee Quong was Secretary Treasurer. They passed no resolution that year for witness to get some men to work for them, nor did he know men employed on the paper or look into accounts. He spent no money for them to get it returned to him. He was not asked to get two printers from China for the association.

I wonder if that paper is on the patronage list. The Minister of the Interior is not here.

Did not those two men tell him, at the detention shed, where to go to get the $500 to pay their head tax? He could not remember.

Well, do you remember going and getting the $500? When?

'Did not the Chinese Reform Association pay you $1,000 to pay the head tax for two printers, or tell you where to get it?' 'No.'

'Did you ever get $1,000 from the association for any purpose?' 'No.'

'Did you not get this $1,000 and then go to Collector Bowell and pass these two men as merchants?' 'No.'

Asked why he had wished to be present at the first enquiry, witness said he wanted to be there to check up anything against him which was not true. It did not necessarily mean that he expected anything to be said against him. He knew nothing of guaranteeing to land Luey My Chee here, but he knew Won Chuck Mon and met him on the wharf in July. The latter, who had kept a store in the country, said nothing to him about an arrangement for witness to land Won Chuck Mon's cousin, and he had seen no letter sent to him stating that Pooh Kun and Wong Ching were coming in as passport men; that witness was to ask Chuck Mon for the passage money; and go and see him and have it settled.

Witness could not say why this letter should have been written, and he had never heard it said in Chinatown that he would take money to defraud the customs.

He had known Lew Duck who kept a shoe store here, five or six years. Shown the statutory declarations made by Lew Duck and Lew Dong, witness said the latter did not give him $250 and a draft at the detention shed, and nobody else had done so. On Mr. Taylor's objection to Mr. Grant's questions as being irrelevant, the judge said he would be glad if Mr. Grant would cut this sort of questions short, as much of it had no bearing unless names were given. Mr. Grant then mentioned Moy Chung, without further apparent result, and Yip On was released.

Mar Ben Quin, a smiling Chinese from Prince Rupert, who used to live in Vancouver some years ago, told that he had heard something on a visit to this city about a plan for "elegant landing in Vancouver". But pressed for details he wished to refer the matter to Mr. McDonald, as after telling things to the latter, he said he did not think much more about them.

If I know anything about this man McDonald he is apparently a partner of this man Kelly. Perhaps my hon. friends from Vancouver can check me up if I am wrong in that. Am I wrong? I understand that they are partners in various enterprises, the chief among them being a large block of land that they got from this government up the river a little way for something like $1.50 per acre, which is worth $1,000 an acre to-day, and has made these men over a million dollars. I wish I was a constituent of the Minister of Inland Revenue in Vancouver, for I could become a millionaire in a short time in that way.

Mr. McCrossan, again tried to get a distinct story in witness' own remembrance, but witness could recollect nothing, and said that if he had known he would have to come here he would have written it all down in a book.

That finishes the evidence taken that day. The next day's sitting was occupied with the discussion of Yip On. He appears again on the scene and is examined at some length by counsel. The details are given in the 'News-Advertiser' of Thursday, February 2, page 1:

There was much curious expectancy amongst the audience at the opening session of the afternoon to see what the stenographer's official notes would disclose as to Yip Jung Sung's apparent turn-back on his overnight statement regarding Yip On being the man who took gold from him and afterwards returned it after the examination at the detention shed, but nothing transpired.

Jin Hin, with the marriage name also of Lin Chim,——

The House will understand that a Chinaman sometimes has two or three names. Amongst other names he has a marriage name. If he is a bachelor. like the Minister of Agriculture, he is not allowed to have what is known as a marriage name. I make this explanation so that the reference here in the report will be understood.

Jin Hin, with the marriage name also of Lin Chim, and of sedate, not to say clerical appearance——

Evidently due to the fact that he was a married man.

——was sworn by the paper oath, the oath being translated by David Lew. He had been here over three years, from Hong Kong. Here he first "looked after business" and was a goldsmith, working at the bench for Yip Quong.

For the first two months he was "looking for business," then worked for Li Sang, for $20 monthly and commission on profits, if any, for a period of two years, after which he paid the $400 for the partnership.

This man was four years here before he became a partner or a merchant.

While in Hong Kong for five months he lived at a drug store, and previously had been a jeweller in Australia. Asked where he lived in Australia, he gave the curious geographical answer "Singapore", and "Annam". Asked further who told him to say he was in Australia, he said he was really there.

Anybody who knows anything about geography knows that Singapore and Annam are not in Australia.

Who got him to come to Canada?

His mother, and because he was not healthy, and was also looking for business. He was aware that it cost $500 to enter Canada, but he was told by his "cousins" that "when you do business you don't have to pay." He came in by a passport, got through Jin Ding Yuan, a sort of village esquire. He went from Hong Kong to the village, staying four months there, which made his stay in Hong Kong, said Mr. McCrossan, only two months. Witness said he paid the shunshee $92 Mexican for his passport. He did not go to the British consul. The shunshee got it vised for him from the viceroy at Canton. The photograph on the passport was his. He came in on the Empress of China in a different name to that of the passport, being told he could use either of his names, as they were both the same sound. The judge wanted to know more as to the why and wherefore of this, but all witness would say was that either one would answer. He got his photo taken before the passport was issued. Choy Chee Lung told him to have this done and also told him that business men going to Canada were exempt from tax. He did not know the Yah Wick firm or the Lam How firm. When he came through the Vancouver customs he had one or two hundred in gold, which he got from his mother, but no drafts.

'But he told us before that when he landed he had not enough to go into business with,' said Mr. McCrossan. Witness explained that he had not enough. When he landed and was examined Mr. Bowser was there, although he did not know at the time that it was Mr. Bowser. People told him shortly after he was landed that Mr. Bowser was the customs man. Yes, Yip On was there, too, and several white men, asking questions. He told them he came to do business, was a business man and had money. Judge Murphy rather snubbed Mr. Taylor for badgering Lew regarding his interpretation, the judge stating that Lew seemed to be giving quite correct translations.

Shown a photograph on a passport and asked whether the photograph was not Lee Hong, a fellow worker at Yip Quong's place and that the passport was also his, witness replied the photograph certainly somewhat resembled him.

Shown a photograph on a passport and asked whether the photograph was not Lee Hong, a fellow-worker at Yip Quong's place, and that the passport was also his, witness replied the photograph certainly somewhat resembled him. Lee Hong did not come on the same boat. He also had $400 interest in the goldsmith's business of Yip Quong's, at which they both were now working.

Mr. McCrossman found out that the cook at this store was Lee Foon, another passport man, three or four months here from China. Mr. McCrossan had tried, unsuccessfully, to also find this man during the morning. Witness expressed his willingness to go with an officer and bring Lee Foon to the court, and Mr. Taylor held it was unnecessary, as this man had paid the poll tax and was not a passport man at all, but Mr. McCrossan thought differently, and said he had the man's photograph. Witness failed to identify the photograph on the passport as Lee Foon, but he had seen the original of the photograph around the store a few days ago on a New Year visit. He did not work there.

Another passport man, by own name Yip Lee, was then brought in. He seemed rather of a different type to last witness. He was very cheerful. He was also sworn by the paper oath to tell the truth.

Of course he had other names, one of which was 'Yip Gee Gong," his 'marriage name,' and as for nicknames he had 'more than he can remember.' This effort at forgetfulness, however, did not help him out much, the judge ordering him to write out any and all of such names as he might ever have signed as a signature. This brought out conditionally the 'firm' name of 'Lim Gee Wing,' 'Yip Sung' and 'Chick Chang,' which, he said, included the lot

He was now over 40 and was about 34 he thought when he came here, having lived previously in China and Singapore following the 'jewellery' business for himself. He firmly but politely denied counsel's suggestion that he was a peddler. He was, for instance, ten years in business at Han Kow on his own account, and for a year at Hong Kong, which city he left for Canada, hearing that things were good and prosperous here.

When he came he brought in $1,000 worth of gold leaf, and at Yip Quong's request, went into business with him, holding $500 partnership interest in his Yip Gee Gong name, and being registered, so he had been told by Yip Quong.

Why did you come in under a wrong name, said Mr. McCrossan? Witness stated he came in under his old 'trade' name, and that the 'gentry' who got the passport for him took his name.

Mr. Gordon Grant asked witness his profits for the year? They did not make much. He got only $300 in addition to his wages of $300. He also had to look after the interior.

Sort of minister of the interior, said Mr. Taylor amid laughter.

Are you prepared to take the chicken oath that this is your trading name, said Mr. Grant in his very fiercest manner. Yes, mildly replied witness.

Judge Murphy—You will have to get the chicken, Mr. Grant. Counsel said he would not object, if he could have the chicken afterwards.

Before starting on the cross-examination of Kung Jung Sing, Mr. Dilldale, clerk with the Canadian Pacific railway telegraph department, testified to receiving a cable message at New Westminster for Hong Kong, and thought he could identify the sender. On Yip On and Yip Suh Foy standing up in court witness positively identified Yip Suh Foy, whom he had seen twice, when he had sent two cables. These cables were sent on October 12th and 13th.

Mr. Taylor sought, by questions as to how Yip Suh Foy was attired, to break down this evidence. Witness was very decided, however, remembered details, and knew that it was at night, about eleven, when few people were calling in. He clearly remembered that Yip Suh Foy was wearing a cap, and when Mr. Taylor suggested it was strange he should recollect one particular Chinese after that period, witness said 'it was pretty hard to forget that face once you had seen it.'

Mr. Taylor apparently failed to shake the evidence of witness, or at all to disturb his confident self-possession, and after half an hour witness left.

The interpreter's trouble was minimized here by the appearance of Mr. Hugh Arthur, who agreed to check the evidence.

Yung Jung Sing said his English name was Johnson, his school name Yung Gar Gip, and he had no married name, for the reason that he was not married.

Arriving in Vancouver in 1907, he gave as his name the name which was on the paper, which he had used all the way since he got the paper at Hong Kong.

Did he know that if he gave his right name he could not land? He did not know, he only knew that if he went under the assumed name he would land. He did not know he was defrauding the customs, or know anything about the law. He went, as told, just according to the paper. Witness declared quietly, on being questioned by Mr. Taylor as to his veracity, that he was prepared to tell the truth and was doing so.

As to his using the name of Lee Su Hung, and giving it to the customs here, he did not remember whether he signed or not. This could not be ascertained, as this particular passport was mislaid, but Mr. Taylor assumed that witness had signed it, and taxed him accordingly, but the latter did not remember. The reason he repeated, why he did not use his own name, was because the man at Hong Kong told him to use the other name. Before he hired to come to Canada, he lived several years in Hong Kong, as a typesetter on the newspaper 'Sut-Bo,' and was hired to come here by Lung Sun Hang of Hong Kong, whom he remembered he had not seen before or since.

How was it, then, that he had sworn that this man was connected with the Yah Wick Company?

The people of the 'Sut-Bo' in Vancouver sent a letter to Lung Sun Hang at Hong Kong, so he was told by the latter, who lived at the Yah Wick Company, at which place witness saw him before the latter left Hong Kong.

When did witness first meet Yip Yen?

On the morning of his departure. He was a very stout, heavy man, about his own height, five feet five, and about forty years old. He had since once seen Yip Yen over here, but not to speak to. When he saw Yip Yen the morning of his departure Yip Yen gave him a paper and a photograph. His ticket was handed to him that morning by Yip Yen with a letter. In all, he was handed three things, the passport, ticket, and the latter, the latter of which he did not open. A fellow passenger, whose name was Lee, asked for the letter, and he gave it to him in the detention shed here. He did not know what became of the letter, or the man, nor did he recollect to whom it was addressed. It was some funny name. The names of some dozen Chinese were mentioned, but it was none of these, and the judge wondered if Mr. Taylor would get more out of a Chinese witness than Mr. McCrossan had done.

'When you went through the customs you told Yip On you were a merchant and were going to enter business?'

Witness said that was his original idea. He was hired to work for the newspaper, but if he could get the money he would go into business. What he told Yip On was that he was going to enter into business, and now he had a $100 interest in a merchandise business here, Wung Sing's, 61 or 91 Pender street, into which he had, so far, paid $25. He did not remember how much money he had when he got here, perhaps about $30 or $40 Mexican. He thought there was a draft in the letter, the envelope being marked '$1,000' or something like that, but it was directed to Lee Su Hung, his other name, care of the firm whose name he did not remember.

He saw Yip On at the shed, but was not spoken to by him at that time, Yip On did not ask him if he had any drafts; Lee, who got on board at Hong Kong, had got the letter. He did not know why Yip On had given him the letter instead of giving it to Lee, and he did not understand why he should have handed that letter and envelope to Lee. He did so without question when the man said 'let me have it.'

'Did any one go to see him before he gave his evidence here?'

David Lew and another man, a white man, who was Detective William McLeod, called on him.

Mr. Taylor then suggested that witness, having read the evidence before the commission and set up type for the Chinese newspaper, knew that passport men were being sought for and was, therefore, in fear he might be found and punished for his illegal entry. Witness said any fine would not affect him. It was a matter for those who had hired him. He knew nothing of the head-tax at that time. He was served with a subpœna yesterday afternoon and came to court accordingly.

Yip On was told to stand up.

'Was this the man who gave you money?' 'No.'

'Who gave you the money?' 'Lee.'

'But you said last night it was Yip On.' No answer.

Judge Murphy said that was clearly the way he had interpreted it, and Mr. Gordon Grant said it was a typical instance how Chinese evidence would change from night to next day.

Witness swore he said yesterday it was Lee and not Yip On who had given him the money.

The judge stated that nobody could make him believe except what witness stated last night, which was that Yip On gave him the money.

Mr. S. S. Taylor asked how it was that yesterday witness had stated that it was Yip On, and he asked that the stenographer's notes should be put in during the luncheon interval, as it appeared clearly that Yip On was mentioned.

Addressing witness, Mr. McCrossan said he had told him yesterday that he had no money, and that some one gave him back the bag of gold, which he put in his pocket. He had stated that the interpreter gave him that money and that the interpreter took it away.

Witness here stated that he gave it back to 'Lee.'

'You told us yesterday that he gave it back, after the examination, to the interpreter.'

'I did not give it to Yip On. Lee gave it to me and I gave it back to Yip On.'

Did not Yip On and that crowd have control of the paper which witness worked for? Witness did not know.

'That paper in its editorials is strongly in favour of Yip On?' 'No, only fair.'

Then there was a dinner and it is just as well to read a little about it. The Prime Minister will be glad to know what a diner the Minister of Inland Revenue is. Mr. Glover is examined in favour of the Minister of Inland Revenue, and it is only fair I should give his side of the story:

Mr. F. R. Glover, assistant general manager of the British Columbia Electrical Railway Company, Limited, was the first witness called. He had read the statements regarding Mr. Foster and Hon. Mr. Templeman incident, and, considering them unfair, he wished to explain the facts. He would have done so before, but had been up country.

In reply to Mr. McCrossan witness stated he gave a dinner party to Mr. Templeman at the Vancouver Club on the evening referred to last September. There were also present Messrs. Harry Senkler, Robert Kelly, George Macdonald, E. J. McFeeley, Lieut-Col. Duff-Stuart and Capt. Sclater. After dinner Mr. Templeman remained in the smoking room talking to friends until eleven o'clock, when witness suggested going home, Mr. Templeman agreeing. Witness sent for a cab, but before he, Mr. McFeely, Mr. Kelly, and Mr. Templeman were going to it Dr. Munro came in and started to chat with Mr. Templeman. The latter then told the driver to go to Glenwood, where Mr. Foster was staying, and, on arrival Dr. Munro went upstairs, then returned, saying, Mr. Foster was in bed and would see Mr. Templeman tomorrow.' After driving to Mr. McFeely's, where Mr. Kelly left, witness and Mr. Templeman went to the hotel where Mr. Templeman went to bed.

Was Mr. Templeman drunk that night?

No.

Were you? I think not. There was nothing of that sort.

Judge Murphy remarked he did not see what all this had to do with this inquiry at any time.

Mr. Gordon Grant asked witness some questions. The dinner was a purely social friendly one it appeared, and witness had known Mr. Templeman for several years. They met at the club at seven-thirty, and Mr. Templeman did not leave until he went away with witness. Mr. George Macdonald did not go with him in the cab.

I am going to pass over some unimportant evidence which concluded the session at Vancouver, after which the commission went to Victoria and took evidence there. This is the report of that evidence as given in the 'News-Advertiser' of February 10:

Vancouver, Feb. 9.—That Chinese can evade payment of head tax by paying $100 or less into a business firm and crossing to Canada as merchants, thereby being bona fide merchants within the meaning of the Act, and that passports would have to be accepted were they printed in English or French instead of Chinese were points brought out at the morning session of the Royal Commission to-day. That the condition of affairs at Vancouver was astounding in view of the knowledge communicated in the department at Ottawa by Collector Newbury was another point made. Judge Murphy said: 'With this knowledge at the head of the department it seems astounding that things went on at Vancouver the way they did.' Evidence was also given that an investigation had been made by the collector concerning the work of Mr. Lee Mong Kow, and it had developed that everything had been carried on in a proper manner. It was shown that stricter supervision had been maintained over immigration at Victoria, and as Collector Newbury said: 'There had not been as much business done.'

Mr. Newbury explained in detail the method adopted in handling the Chinese business at this port, showing how two officers were always engaged in handling outward men and three to land returning men. There had not been much trouble with the exempt class at this port, the officials being strict and there had never been more than two or three on any boat.

He had been surprised that there were so many landed at Vancouver as merchants. He had not known how many there were until he had seen the totals in the papers. He pointed out that the eighteen taken from the 'Empress of India' were exceptional, having been booked to Vancouver and taken off by Mr. Foster at this port. More trouble had to be taken with merchants' sons than any other class of exempts, and the procedure was to hold a preliminary examination of the son, then to get statutory declarations from son, father and partner, with two certificates from white merchants. Mr. O'Hara, when he visited Victoria had looked over the local practice, and the government form had been adopted as a result.

Judge Murphy said the passports seemed to have been an open sesame at Victoria.

Collector Newbury.—I cannot understand that. I never accepted a passport for anything but corroboration. A man was not worse off with one; but I never considered him better with one. Examination was entirely apart from the passport. I had heard much how these passports could be secured in China. Any one who knew the ropes and was willing to pay for one could get one. I wrote to Mr. O'Hara about that. I believe he took it up diplomatically with Hong Kong. He was disgusted with the answer. The consul said he considered it his business to facilitate emigration, not stand in the way of it.

Mr. McCrossan asked if an inquiry had been held concerning Lee Mong Kow. Witness replied that indefinite allegations had been made, suggestions that he was 'in on it' with regard to admission of new men as returned men. Witness told the interpreter he would take over the work himself for a month and Peter Hing was brought in as interpreter. Nothing was ascertained to show that everything was not right.

Mr. Newbury said he had seen no need to change interpreters. Mr. Mong Kow had done good work. He was also a good clerk and the department made much of his services as such. There was, perhaps, too much economy in carrying out the work. He understood that at Vancouver the interpreter did no clerical work.

The Judge—His only clerical work consisted of making copies of records in the evening.

Mr. Newbury said that while the interpreter could be of great assistance he did not think an interpreter could swing the whole thing. He failed to see how the interpreter could do anything not correct without the officials knowing, if they were alive to their business.

The Judge—I don't know that you could exclude Chinese under the Act if they had, say, $100 in a firm and came as merchants.

Witness—It is difficult to define what is a merchant.

That seems to be the whole trouble under this Act—to get a proper definition of a merchant.

Mr. Newbury, continuing, said the finger print system was not used. Mr. O'Hara was opposed to it as being undignified. He did not think it necessary if the present system was properly carried out.

The Judge—If these passports were in English or French you would have to accept them.

Witness—I never construed that this was obligatory.

The Judge— I think it is.

At the afternoon session the question of the desirability of establishing a water patrol at Victoria to prevent the smuggling of opium came up.

Collector Newbury when cross-examined on this point, said that the port had now reached such a size that money spent in this direction would not be wasted. He considered, however, that other means could be adopted, such as giving more power to the police.

The chief customs clerk, Mr. Davey, on being recalled to the stand said that he had made a mistake in saying that the customs officers at Union Bay lived four miles from the wharf. Often vessels coaling at that point were brought within a few yards of the wharf, where the official was stationed.

The Inspector of Customs, Mr. William Marchand, was on the stand when the commission adjourned for the day.

In the Sunday issue of the Vancouver 'News-Advertiser' of February 12 appear the figures found by the commission, showing that at the port of Victoria there have been fewer than ten merchants landed since 1904, whereas in Vancouver the number landed in three years totals 548.

Having examined the officials at Victoria the commission met again in Vancouver, where a number of witnesses gave evidence. Our friend Kelly was put in the box, and a report of his evidence appears at page 17 of the Vancouver 'News-Advertiser' of February 21st:

At the reassembling of the commission, morning session, Robert Kelly was the first witness called. Mr. G. E. McCrossan represented the Dominion government. Mr. S. S. Taylor appeared for Yip On.

I might state that Mr. McCrossan is Kelly's brother-in-law.

Mr. Kelly, examined by Mr. McCrossan, said he was a member of the executive of the Liberal Association in this city. Asked what he knew of the telegram signed by Mr. Senkler to Sir Richard Cartwright, he said a certain telegram was sent recommending Yip On should be reinstated. Mr. Bowell brought it in, and witness suggested he take it to Mr. Senkler, after asking what was the matter, and being informed that the Chinese were crooked. He did not sign the telegram, but he approved of it, as he knew there was a certain element at work trying to get rid of Yip On and 'boost' themselves, and Mr. T. R. E. McInnes was at the head of this movement. Neither did Hon. Mr. Templeman ever send any such telegram.

Regarding the telegram of September 20, from Hon. Mr. Templeman to Sir Richard Cartwright, witness stated this telegram was sent at the request of Mr. Senkler, Mr. George Macdonald, himself, and several others, being assured there was nothing against Yip On. This was sent at the dinner given at the club. They had a very nice little dinner and every one was perfectly sober. Hon. Mr. Templeman signed the telegram after discussion on the subject had taken place.

On the judge asking what the discussion was about witness said it referred to the element at Ottawa who were trying to get Yip On discharged. Hon. Mr. Templeman met him the next day and told him he had seen Mr. Foster, who had assured him there was nothing against Yip On. As regards the bringing in of the name of Hon. Mr. Templeman he thought it very unfair. He had known Mr. Templeman for twenty years and had never seen him the worse for liquor. As a matter of fact, he was a man who drank very little at all.

Regarding the telegram of September 24 as to 'drastic action,' witness said he probably had seen it, but he did not sign it. At any rate he approved it. The Liberal Association or Hon. Mr. Templeman had never attempted to stop this investigation in any shape or form.

Did he know of any graft in connection with Chinese being brought into the country? No.

The Liberal Association, continued witness, never got subscriptions from Chinese, nor was this ever attempted. Being told that Mr. McLean had stated that witness controlled Hon. Mr. Templeman, Mr. Kelly stated he certainly did not control Mr. Kelly, nor did he think any other man in Canada did so. So far as Mr. McLean's remarks went he thought Mr. McLean was the only man who had tried to do so.

Mr. McLean had sent his brother Hugh to Ottawa, where witness met him at the Russell House, and where he was very pleasant. He stated that he wanted to get the matter of a lawsuit for $350,000 settled. He knew witness was an honest man, and he wanted him to see the minister, and witness agreed to do so. The claim was thrown out. He presumed they did not have any claim against the government.

In the opinion of witness, Mr. McLean was not fit to clean the dust off Hon. Mr. Templeman's feet. He might say that Mr. Templeman had never done anything for witness in his life, and he had never asked him a favour.

As to the visit of Hon. Mr. Templeman to Mr. Foster nothing was done at it. Mr. Templeman asked to see Mr. Foster and Dr. Munro said he was in bed, and it was left till morning.

By Mr. Gordon Grant: He was not sure that he was regarded by the people of Vancouver as a leader of the Liberal party. As Mr. Gordon Grant was proceeding to press him on that matter the judge stopped counsel, saying he was not interested in Mr. Kelly's position with the Liberals, but counsel could question him as much as he liked regarding the telegrams.

As to another telegram witness also assumed his share of responsibility for it. Mr. Bowell had brought in the telegram saying he was suspended and did not know the reason. On account of it the telegram had been sent.

Again as to 'the might of the party' at the club witness said he had not to his knowledge prior to that dinner, discussed the matter with Hon. Mr. Templeman. He did not remember who drafted the telegram. It was filed with the Canadian Pacific railway, and he signed it. He did not know where it was typewritten, nor could he say whether any member of the Liberal Association had anything to do with the drafting of it.

Asked to explain how Mr. Templeman's telegram was typed by the same typist who typed his own telegram he could not say anything about that. It was not a fact that the Hon. Mr. Templeman's telegram was typed at his office before he left to go to the club, nor, to his knowledge, was it taken to his office to be typed, nor, to the best of his knowledge, did any one take it from the club to witnesses' office to be typed. He did not remember if he saw the telegram after it was completed. As far as he could remember—'and my memory is not good sometimes'—said witness, he had no discussion with Mr. Templeman on the subject previous to the dinner.

Any assistance he gave Mr. Bowell or Col. Worsnop came from himself. He only did for them what he would have expected they would have done for him. They had never asked him to do anything.

Yip On had had no business with you?—No. His firm, Wing Hai On, had very little business with you?—Very little. What he did was for the Liberal party and with the idea that what was being done should be done by the Liberal party here and not from Ottawa. He thought this quite right. Witness felt Yip On and Mr. Bowell should be retained in their positions.

As to Mr. Foster, he was asked could he suggest any reason why he should not be continued in his work in the same way he admitted Yip On should have been continued in his, witness said he did not know of any reason Mr. Foster should not have been trusted, or any reason why he should have been interfered with in his work as to Yip On.

He did not, to his knowledge, ask Dr. Munro to send any telegram to Ottawa. He understood that Mr. Bowell was suspended on account of irregularities in regard to opium and bringing in of Chinese, and before sending the telegrams he heard from Col. Worsnop that all was right. He also got the same information from Dr. Munro. That was all the information he had, and he thought it justified him in sending the telegram requesting the 'reinstatement pending an investigation.' He did not know, at least he had not heard from Mr. Bowell or Col. Worsnop that all was right. He also got detention shed at that time.

As for Yip On, he sent for him to come in to see him. He had not said twenty words to Yip On in a year. He did not think he introduced Yip On to Mr. Ralph Smith, and he did not remember if the latter was in his office at the time. Had he been in town he might, of course, have been there.

He knew of no other reason for communicating with the Hon. Charles Murphy beyond that he was a minister whom he knew.

Reverting again to the subject of Hon Mr. Templeman and the club dinner, witness did not remember who had asked him where Mr. Foster lived. The time was 11 o'clock or half past eleven. He knew what they were going to Mr. Foster for, which was to ascertain if there was anything wrong with the interpreter and if not verified Hon. Mr. Templeman was going to send a telegram. The telegram was sent at 9.40 the next morning.

Concerning the telegram 'David Lew's claim should not be entertained,' he did not know what was the reason for that phraseology. He was satisfied Hon. Mr. Templeman would always back up a man if he was doing the right thing, not otherwise. He did not think Mr. Foster would give him any information if he asked him, and he did not intend to bother his head about Mr. Foster. He took the word of Mr. Bowell and Col. Worsnop.

You were, I put it, trying to influence the government?—The government in this case was Mr. O'Hara, and he ought to be here.

You took it on yourself to back up Mr. Bowell against the government?—Yes, and I would do it again.

Had you any reason to think Mr. Foster was not as sincerely honest in his department as Mr. Bowell was in his? Witness considered improper influence might have been brought in. He was concerned in this, that if Lew got control of the interpreter's position, the work would go to the Blue Funnel line, who spent no money here. He would support a line who spent money in the city, not one who bought their supplies on the other side. He thought, too, that Lew was not straight, and he also considered Mr. T. R. E. McInnes was pushing the whole bunch, and he was to fight them. 'I'll give it to you if you want it.' snapped Mr. Kelly.

I don't suppose it's much good asking the question, said Mr. Gordon Grant, but I will do so. Did you not think it fair to have gotten from Mr. Foster the facts on which he had procured the suspensions?

Witness said he was not concerned with Mr. Foster; he did not owe anything to Mr. Foster; he did not think him worth seeing, and he would not go across the street to see Mr. Foster. If Mr. Foster wanted to see him he could have come to his office to do so, he would not have charged him anything.

He knew inspector Busby as an efficient officer and never endeavoured to get him dismissed, or never saw the Minister of Customs at Ottawa to that effect.

Judge Murphy (to Mr. Grant).—Before you ask that question you must give Mr. Kelly the name of your informant. I have allowed a lot of latitude, but I am not going to allow it any further, either in Mr. Kelly's or any other cases.

Mr. Gordon Grant stated his information was that witness had seen the inspector of customs and Mr. McMichael, and had tried to get inspector Busby dismissed. Was there any truth in that?

Witness wished to have the name of the informant, and counsel agreed to furnish the name after reply to the question. Witness then stated that he had never seen Mr. McMichael in Toronto in his life. That gentleman had called at witness' office to get a box of cigars. What counsel had been told was a falsehood, and there was no man who could substantiate it. He never, in any shape or form, tried to get inspector Busby dismissed. It was quite the reverse. From all that was said about him, concluded witness, people might think witness was a sort of horse thief.

Mr. Gordon Grant then stated that the name of his direct informant was Mr. Norman McLean. 'Sure,' responded witness.

Asked by Mr. McCrossan for the name of his indirect informant Mr. Grant said it was inspector Busby himself, and the judge stated he would recall Mr. Busby on the subject. Witness having made a few uncomplimentary allusions to Mr. McLean, the subject dropped, and Mr. S. S. Taylor commenced his cross-examination, which was short. The signature of Mr. Senkler, representing the majority vote of the executive, was, witness agreed, known to be so at Ottawa, and was purely an official signature.

As to Yip On the Liberal Association or any member of it, to his knowledge, had never made a dollar through either opium or through illegal immigration. Their position was that they should make a stand against the proceedings of Mr. McInnes at Ottawa.

Mr. S. S. Taylor said that witness should have an opportunity to say something as to Hon. Joe Martin's general charges as to graft in connection with the Liberal party.

Mr. Kelly stated that he wanted to say he had never made a five cent piece by graft in the Liberal or any party, and rising in his chair and thumping the table in front of him, witness further stated that he defied any person to prove it. He did not get his living that way; he did not have to do so. And as to offering a judgeship for sale he had never done anything of the kind, and he would make the man who said so prove it. After giving some interesting personal details of his early struggles here, commencing with $200, and having since made money, witness concluded, amidst the broad smiles of the court, the bar, and the audience.

Ka Kim Yang came from New York to give evidence in place of Ching Hing, who was ill. He also mentioned the name of Tong Chung Wing, of the 'Sun Bow' Chinese newspaper in this city. Ching Hing was a student.

Now, I think I have placed on record the most important portion of the evidence taken by this commission in British Columbia. Unfortunately, in doing so, it has been necessary for me to occupy a certain portion of the time of the House. I have endeavoured, in putting this on record, to give not only the evidence that tells against the government, but also the evidence as to the goodness and excellence of the Minister of Inland Revenue. I trust the House will not allow this matter to drop, as it has been disclosed that a serious wrong has been done. The Prime Minister says that the people prosecuted in this matter have, unfortunately, left the country. But the report discloses the evils that have existed, and, so far as I can see, there is no reason why it is not proper that that report should be placed on the table in order that we may know what the conclusions of the commissioners were. I hope the House will take action on the matter at an early day, and, if possible, place itself on record. For, if we are going to allow any such practices to obtain in connection with the customs, in a short time we shall not have an efficient customs service and the revenue of the country will be steadily depleted.

I regret having occupied the time of the House so long but there was no other course open in the matter and having now placed the evidence before the House, I will leave it for the House to taken future and further action in this respect.

Mr. G. H. COWAN (Vancouver). I wish at the outset to draw your attention to the fact that this inquiry and this discussion which is, in fact, a very brief summary in three or four hours of the evidence taken at the inquiry, which extended over a period of two or three months, have to do with a matter of peculiar scientific interest apart altogether from its political significance. The inquiry has to do with a new and secret process, devised by oriental cunning, patented and operated by Caucasian rapacity, a process for diverting the people's money from the public coffers and with the least possible friction and waste to convey that money into the private pockets of the Caucasian Liberals and the Asiatic Liberals of Vancouver. That, I say, is a matter, apart altogether from its political significance, of peculiar scientific interest. Science is the accumulation of the wisdom of the ages, but when that wisdom is made up of oriental craft and Caucasian graft it is a combination that the world has never seen before.

I would like to pursue the scientific side of this question. Science has, in the matter of transportation, annihilated distance. In the matter of manufactures science has created the waters of the world into a force many times greater than the power of man. Science has done wonders in other directions, but has never before been applied to the study to which the good gentlemen, Orientals and Caucasians, of Vancouver, have applied it, and I can understand, when the report of Commissioner Murphy came in, that the Prime Minister would desire to kill time and pigeon hole the report because it contained what was to him a suggestion that if that were done the criminals would have time to get out of the country. Accordingly the report was pigeon-holed. The premier did not find it necessary to read the whole of that report, he was content to read the conclusions. The conclusions state that in the interests of justice certain parties should be prosecuted and in order to let the machinery of justice begin its work, in order to have the warrant served, it might be well not to make public this report. Another part of the report, however, was made public, and communicated to the newspapers. I read this portion of the report which deals with Mr. Bowell, the collector of customs at the port of Vancouver. We are glad to find that the commissioner did his duty in regard to Mr. Bowell. Everybody knew that Mr. Bowell had not been guilty of one single act of dishonesty. Everybody knew that this new device was not of Mr. Bowell's making and did not operate in his interest or to his advantage. But the fact remained that the report was made public, at least so much of it as concerned Mr. Bowell, and then it was pigeon-holed. Then, while justice, with lagging feet, was slow to execute her duty, the alert feet of the criminal carried him beyond the bounds and the reach of justice in Canada. Then the premier comes into this House and tells us forsooth the reason why this report was withheld from this House and from the people of Canada, was that a suggestion of that kind was made by Mr. Justice Murphy in his report. The suggestion of Mr. Justice Murphy was made in order that justice might be quick and sure and that the warrant should issue and be executed at once. Mr. Justice Murphy had no thought in his mind when he made that suggestion that justice should be so slow in Ottawa. When the premier made that public statement today he advertised to these fugitives from justice in Canada, the fact that it is better for them to remain, as W. T. R. Preston remained beyond the reach of justice. Who knows but some of these fugitives from justice may, like Preston, turn up one of these days as trade commissioner in Japan or some other oriental country. We know at least that this House and this country are not going to get from the government these trade secrets by which $1,000,000 have been filched from the public treasury of Canada. From the first I could see in the illumined countenance of my friend the Minister of Inland Revenue that he had no thought of attempting in the slightest degree to defend this charge. We know that at great sacrifice to himself and this country he snatched enough time from his needed rest and sleep to go to Vancouver and testify to the working of this new and secret process; but we know that when the offence was brought home to the criminals—we could see it in the light of his beaming countenance—that he had no thought of standing up in this House and defending his department or himself against the negligence which lies at their doors. I could see from the face of the Minister of Customs, after he woke up that he had some thought that this related in some degree to his department, that he had something to do with the Chinese Immigration Act—and $1,000,000 had leaked out of the profits of his department. But, I could see that he had no defence to offer. I could see that he had no thought of making a defence of any kind to the charge. It was left to the premier. We know that this new method of closer relations between the occidental and oriental population of British Columbia, and in particular of the city of Vancouver, is more or less in line with the policy which the premier has been developing in Canada during recent years. For example, we know that this scheme of plundering the public treasury and dividing the plunder between the oriental and occidental participants, and incidentally of allowing the oriental to evade the provisions of the Immigration Act, is exactly in line—and I speak with absolute accuracy—with that policy which hands over to the party heelers of British Columbia and their confederate Japs the licenses and right to fish in the waters of British Columbia. If you take, for example, the herring licenses issued in British Columbia for the years 1910-11, you will find that every single herring license was issued either to a party heeler of this government, or at the instance of a party heeler of this government, to a Jap confederate, and after being issued to the heeler it was traded off to the Jap for a consideration. The waters of British Columbia under the license of this government are fished by Japs and by Japs alone. I know myself of four reputable white fishermen, reputable citizens of Vancouver, who applied for herring licenses, but they might have known, as others have assumed, that no white man need apply. They were refused, and I say again that in harmony with this new, scientific device is the policy which hands over the fishing industry of British Columbia, not to the people of British Columbia, but to the party heelers of this government and their Jap confederates. These two things are entirely in line with the world-wide policy which we heard announced in this House, on the day before we rose, a policy conceived in the fruitful mind of the premier, brought into the daylight and given its place in the sun of beautiful things by the obstetric art of the Minister of Agriculture, which guarantees by solemn treaty to the Japanese, and which proposes to guarantee by solemn treaty to every Asiatic immigrant, that he shall enjoy a preference in Canada over British immigrants. The measure of that preference in dollars and cents is $50 per. Under the treaty with Japan, under the treaty which the Minister of Agriculture says the government proposed to make with other Asiatic nations, Japanese immigrants, of whom there is a possible number of 63,000,000 since the addition of Corea, are guaranteed the right of free entry and residence in Canada, a right which this government is not to be allowed to control or check, which no power on earth can control or check except the government of the country from which the Asiatic immigrant comes. Under the Immigration Act of Canada, on the other hand, the British immigrant, instead of being guaranteed the right of free entry and residence in Canada, is denied the right of entry or residence in Canada unless he has in his pocket the good round sum of $50 and unless he complies strictly with the other hard conditions of the Immigration Act as applied to the British immigrant. I can understand the premier's defence and his desire to have that report pigeon-holed until the operators can be far and away beyond the reach of justice. While they are safely beyond, it is desirable to make out that it is in their interest to stay beyond, less the Department of Justice may be compelled perforce to stretch out the strong arm of justice and bring them to bay and to book. I can understand that. I can understand that this Chinese and Japanese policy with regard to fishing, and this immigration policy are exactly in line with that larger policy which hands over to foreign states the power to control immigration into Canada from these foreign states, and which gives Canada no return. We see a new light in the firmament. We see the rise of the Asiatic preference, and we are here to consummate the decline of the British preference. Under this trade pact, for example, we see the attempt to exclude to a large extent the British trader from the Canadian markets as against the American trader, and under this policy of immigration we see a distinct and successful attempt to exclude the British immigrant from the Canadian field of employment, and give it in preference to the Asiatic immigrant.

In August last the Prime Minister of Canada was waited on in Vancouver by the working men of that city who are forced to live under the hard conditions which this policy of his creates, and to fight for a living every hour of their working lives. Would you believe it that in reply to these working men the Prime Minister of Canada, with an assurance not born of human knowledge, (he, being then on his 3rd visit to Vancouver in twenty years), told these working men that he had made a study of this problem for years, that he had mastered it, and that nothing they could tell him could add to his wisdom. You can imagine with what august reverence these hard working men looked upon this man who had probably spent five hours in twenty years in a country where the conditions of contact between Oriental and Caucasian had created profound economic and racial difficulties, and who could find a solution for this problem after three short visits in twenty years. One cannot help thinking that the Prime Minister on that occasion, enamoured perhaps of his Oriental policy, which discriminates against the Britisher in favour of the Asiatic in the matter of immigration, forgot what was due to people whose objection to Asiatic immigration of every sort is deep-seated and is not the result of shallow prejudice on the part of the white people of British Columbia, as the same Prime Minister in December, 1907, in the Russell Theatre in Ottawa proclaimed it was. I cannot help thinking that he forgot what was due to them as rational men when he flung it in their face that he did not care for their sentiments. I cannot help thinking that he has not made a study of conditions in the United States, Canada, Australasia and New Zealand, where that same deep-seated objection prevails. I cannot help thinking that the adulation which his followers, and the people of Canada have generously accorded him has given a very peculiar bias to his judgment upon this, and many other questions. It is the man who studies, and who has a sympathetic feeling for his fellow-man, and he alone who can reach a right solution of difficult social and economic questions such as this. It is he, and he alone who is not only a careful student, but who has lived under the actual conditions from day to day, who can solve these problems. The Prime Minister attempted to tell us in Vancouver that he was actuated by imperial motives, in explanation of his policy on this matter, but, in that he out-Heroded Herod, because when he adhered to the Jap Treaty in 1905 the imperial statesmen suggested to him that he should do so only on condition that Canada should retain the control of immigration over Jap labourers, and Jap artisans as well, and if he were actuated by imperial reasons surely he should have followed imperial suggestions. I give the Prime Minister notice now that in a few days I shall endeavour to ascertain from the government what, if anything, they have done during the negotiations on the new treaty between Great Britain and Japan, to find a sane solution of the difficulty arising from the objection of Anglo-Saxon people to large numbers of Asiatics residing in their midst, just as there is an objection by the Asiatics to large numbers of Anglo-Saxons residing in their country. I trust the premier will be able to tell us that something practical in this matter has been attempted, and accomplished by the government of Canada.

As I have said, I can see that this report is one of the things which this government desires to remain unrevealed to the people of Canada. For my own part, I avoided any reference to this investigation during its progress and until the report of Mr. Justice Murphy was made. I thought it was due to the commission, I thought it was my duty, not to make any comment of a public kind; and since the report was made and the evidence published, I find that so far as my own constituency is concerned, my duty is done by the press; the public have reached their conclusion, and the conclusion is one that is exceedingly damning, not only to the party locally but to the departments of the government which were concerned in the fraud. Personally I had no desire to take part in this discussion but I believe it is due to the people of Canada to know that crimes of this kind are being perpetrated under the noses of the Premier and the other members of the government. When the evidence and the report of these crimes are brought in, they are pigeon-holed only after they discover that the report recommends the prosecution of the criminals. I believe that it is due to the people to know that they have a party in power that have that conception of their public duty in the enforcement of the criminal law of Canada. I think the course the government is pursuing in this connection should be condemned in no unmeasured tone. I have a higher conception of the morals and the decency and the sense of right on the part of the public than to believe that they would condone offences of that kind once they are known. I believe that every attempt is being made to conceal this evidence and prevent the report coming before the public; but my hon. friend from New Westminster has served the public well to-day when, in three hours, he has summed up evidence which required nearly three months to take; and from that evidence he drew the right conclusion. I am well aware that the government dare not disclose that report before another general election, because it is in keeping with the disclosures in other departments of the government. The Premier displayed what seemed to me to be a lack of taste at least when he suggested that the hon. member for New Westminster was bringing this matter up to kill time. What was the object of pigeon-holing that report after the discovery that it recommended the prosecution of the criminals if it was not to kill time and to kill justice? I think it is right to fling that expression back in the face of the Premier. If there is an explanation why that report was pigeon-holed instead of being brought down to the House, if there is an explanation why the parties recommended in that report to be prosecuted were not prosecuted, I think it is due to this House and this country that that explanation should be forthcoming at once. If it is not forthcoming, then the only just and right inference is that the report was pigeon-holed to kill time and kill justice, to conceal the frauds and iniquities of the party in the constituency of Vancouver. Of course, the government is here under the fiction that they are going to pass reciprocity or something else in this House. Like boys in autumn, they are standing at the brink, fearful of the dip. If by this discussion or any other discussion we could inspire that government with any kind of courage, even Dutch courage, to go beyond the walls of this chamber, beyond the walls of Torres Vedras—to go to the country and ask the country, man fashion, to adopt the baby that President Taft has presented them with—if we could inspire them with even Dutch courage to do this, I believe the people of this country would say we had done well. If we could smoke them out of this burrow—if there is any courage left in the party to which we can appeal—if we could convince them that this chamber is not a gopher hole, that their duty lies not in this chamber, but before the people of Canada, that the people are waiting to give them exactly the reception they deserve—if we could do this, we would feel that we have served our country well. But apparently the courage, the inspiration, is gone and the appeal to their sand and their manhood is unavailing. It may be that the smoking process, too, would be unavailing; but I think, nevertheless, it is our duty to continue to exhort, to appeal, to persuade these people that when they have brought down a measure so new, so subversive of Canadian institutions and the fiscal policy of Canada, this is their duty, however fearful they may feel, however great the mistake our two dear mothers in Israel made when they journeyed to Washington. If we could convince them in any way that it is their duty or their profit or their glory or their renown to get out of the House and go to the people, their masters, and accept the verdict of their masters, I think we would be serving our country well. For my own part, 'hope springs eternal in the human breast.' I cannot say that as yet we have succeeded on this side in pointing out to them the path of duty and the path of glory which leads——

An hon. MEMBER. To the grave.

Mr. COWAN. That is too grave a suggestion to make. If we can get them in any way to amble along that path it would seem to me we have served our country well. As I said a moment ago, I am not without hope. Sometimes I think I can see the bright rainbow of hope and promise shining on the political horizon of Canada, and that the people will once more be given an opportunity of governing this country themselves. Sometimes I think we may have an opportunity of submitting some of these great questions to the people of Canada before their management and control shall have been handed over to another power. If we succeed in it, and if by chance the people of Canada should mete out to the government what the people of Canada are almost sure to mete out—their just desserts—let me say now to my good friends on the other side of this House that there is really no occasion why their countenances should be so drawn. It is the fortune and the fate of all men to have reverses. It is only delaying the hour. If you make it short, true you cannot make it sweet, but you can at least make it less bitter.

If there is any human instinct uplifting in its character still dormant in the breasts of our friends across the House, and if by any effort of ours we can make that instinct active, and thereby lead the government to the performance of its duty towards the people of Canada, then I apprehend it is but right that we should labour to awaken that instinct and awaken that sense of duty, and to aid so far as we can the government party in the performance of its duty.

I cannot think that there is the slightest doubt in the mind of any member of the government awake in this House at the present hour that it is the plain duty of the government to go to the country and go at once, and accept its Waterloo like men. If, on the contrary, I misread the signs, and if the fortunes of war are to be still with the government party, for my part I am content. It is the will of the people, and that is what I value. The will of the people is my pleasure and my duty. Could I get my friends across the House to feel and think in the same way, could I get the members of the Liberal party to realize that no divine right rests in them to carry on the business of this House after they have proposed to introduce legislation so entirely subversive of the policy and the institutions of this country, that the whole procedure is out of joint with the best constitutional practice of this and every other representative House in the English speaking world?

If I can persuade them that it is their duty under these conditions to go to the people, and go to them at once, I think that the solatium and the comforts which hasty appointments, judicial preferments and commissionerships afford, ought to be sufficient to allay the fears of the less courageous of the party. I cannot think that the low appeals of self-interest are the only appeals that can be made to that party. I cannot help thinking that there are members in the party actuated by higher motives—anxious to serve their country and to serve it well. If there are any such men in the Liberal party—and I believe there are—surely they have the courage and the force of character to impress upon their colleagues, not only the wisdom but the duty of submitting this great question of reciprocity to the people of Canada, as soon as the country is properly represented by redistribution; otherwise we shall have to continue to hold up the mirror which, in the hands of my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) and other hon. members, reflects with peculiar accuracy the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and we shall have to continue that process to the end. By the way, I sometimes think that there are gentlemen on the other side of the House who make too frequent use of the mirror. I have wondered when I heard the Prime Minister appeal to the people of Quebec and declare to them that he had gone to England to break a lance with the powers of darkness that would wrest from them their rights and their autonomy, and, after making this declaration, appeal to them to 'follow where the white plume leads.'

I have wondered whether he has not been making too frequent and too free use of the mirror. Can it be that it is reserved for our Premier to suffer the sad fate of that other gentleman who made too frequent use of the mirror? I refer to Narcissus who gazed into the limpid waters of the Castalian spring so long that he finally fell in love with his own image reflected there, and later died in adoration of himself. As a student, and somewhat interested in the old mythology may I apply these myths to the conditions of the present day—not in the way the Caucasian Liberals and the Asiatic Liberals of Vancouver have applied them. May I not counsel the Premier that it might be better instead of making too frequent visits to the mirror, instead of pursuing the course of the fate of Narcissus he should go before the people of Canada and discuss on its merits the question which to-day agitates our people. It is not a question of the white plume—as my hon. friend from New Westminster has most aptly said; if the delay is continued it will become a question of the white feather. Now, I think in all seriousness——

An hon. MEMBER. Hear hear.

Mr. COWAN. I thought that I heard some of the babbling and the murmuring of the limpid water into which the leader of the House gazes. Let me say in all seriousness that the time has come when each of us should go fearlessly, courageously, man-fashion to our masters and say: Have we done right? if we have, approve, if not, condemn. There is no use trying to dodge the issue; you will not succeed. There is no use in hybernating, or the reverse, in this Chamber; no use in delaying the fateful day. If the worst comes to the worst and you are driven from power, accept your fortunes like brave men and take that which fate and destiny provide for you. Waste not the time of this House and this country—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear hear.

Mr. COWAN. I noticed a smile when I said 'waste not the time of this House and this country.' Will the gentleman who owns the teeth that that smile discovered to this House tell me one bit of business, of real business that concerns the welfare of the people of Canada, that has been done in this House since this session opened on the 17th of November last? We are not in control of this House, allow me to correct, not in numerical control of this House. The party in control of this House, I say again, has not put upon the statute-books of Canada one piece of valuable legislation since the 17th of November. The party in control of this House, in numerical control of this House, has not done one single bit of administrative work to the advantage of Canada since the 17th of November last. In order to help to meet the political exigencies of this party, and of the branch of this party across the line, two of the members of the government journeyed unto Washington, and they came back with new gods for the faithful. The worship of these new gods has been not entirely unmixed with nausea. Indeed, the development of faith and belief in these new gods has been but slow. The development of faith in these new gods in the country is yet to begin. I do not want to discourage too much the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, and it may be that there is still a chance for them. But it may be that the thought of the slimness of that chance is bringing grief—even tears it may be—to some of the members of this government. But whether that is true or not, I again appeal to men of undoubted virility men of moral courage, men like—if I may be permitted to do such a thing as single out an example—men like the Minister of Labour (Mr. King). I appeal to that young mind to instil into the older minds of the government a new born faith in the party, a new hope a new expectation. It may be that the vigour of that young man can attain a success as yet unattained. And whether it can attain that success or not I feel it is his duty as a rising star in the Liberal firmament to shed some light on the fading stars of that party, even though it may be 'a little of the light that leads astray.' Then there is my friend from British Columbia. Can I not persuade him to rise to his accustomed vigour and energy and by the mere force and weight of himself and his character compel that party to go to the country and to do its duty.

I cannot help thinking that there remains to me an appeal that will be effective, an appeal to a man who, though of riper years, has yet preserved his health and strength into a vigorous middle life, and I hope will preserve it to a healthy old age, that man of single blessedness, my appeal is to him. It may be that by a shorter, a briefer use of his power of speech with a more vigorous and energetic exercise of his well-known virile nature, he can effect the desired result and induce the government to rise to the occasion and get to the country, to the tall timbers.

But, Sir, I know there is one member of that government whose keen sense of duty, whose high appreciation of the rights of the people, upon whom the moral restraints necessary for a proper exercise of the franchise and for a proper performance of the duties of a representative are strong, a man of influence, of credit and renown in his native province, a man whose fame has gone throughout the length and breadth of Canada, the Solicitor General. I cannot help thinking that without an appeal from this or any side of the House, that gentleman will rise to the occasion and do his duty. Can it be that we are to write upon the portals of this chamber: Abandon hope all ye who enter here. I refuse to think so meanly of the government party.

I know that there are motives to which I can appeal not far from this chamber, the judiciary, in the Supreme Court. Can we not at once add to the efficiency of that court and expedite an appeal to the country? I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to join me in this.

I look into the future far as human eye can see.

I can see that my appeal to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has not been made in vain. Again there is our eloquent friend who is always eloquent, always interesting, always theatrical, I appeal to him. There may be, away in the dim and distant future, the glories of leadership waiting for him. It may be that the future will be brought nearer to the present if the delay between now and election day is shortened. I know that the Postmaster General can see that political sagacity alone dictates that his party should no longer linger in this chamber devoting its time to Micawber-like hopes and aspirations that something may yet turn up.

The hour is late and I may have much more to say to-morrow.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is a fitting hour, and a proper, and that it would be a useful act, and a gentlemanly act if this House should adjourn now. There are other matters to which I would like to refer briefly. They have to do more or less with the investigation, perhaps more than less. In handling a question of this kind I attempt to be guided by this principle that I will not in my public career, I hope, charge dishonesty or fraud of any kind against a man private or public unless I have the proof. Our duty as public men, involving as it does a party system imposes it upon us to observe gentlemanly rules of conduct. One of these gentlemanly rules is that no man on the floor of this House should be charged with any wrong doing or dishonesty or fraud unless the proof is in the hands of the man who prefers the charge. It is for that reason that I have hesitated to use in a public way, either on the public platform or in this House, the material reported in the public press with reference to that investigation. I have hesitated to use it because I did not know how much of the evidence was reported correctly, how much of it was omitted, how much of it was distorted from its true meaning, and I regret, therefore, that the absolute refusal of the government to bring down to this House, and make known to the people of Canada the real evidence, and the real report based upon that evidence compels us in the interest of the public, and in the interest of justice to deal with the evidence such as we have it in the reports of newspapers. That evidence displays a condition of political degradation, induced by the policy and practice of this government for the last fifteen years, never surpassed in the annals of any Anglo-Saxon people governed by representative institutions. I can readily understand that your ear, Mr. Speaker, has never been offended with evidence going to show that two factions in one party had actually quarrelled, not because the law was being violated, not because the Immigration Act was being evaded, but because the profits and plunder arising from that violation, and invasion were 'hogged,' as it was put by themselves, and a portion not given to the executive of the party. I cannot understand human nature sinking to a lower level that that. I cannot understand how the premier of this Canada, a country forging ahead by leaps and bounds as no other country in the world to-day is forging ahead, a country that has a future that ought to have public men guided by high motives, and high principles, can listen to evidence of that kind, can allow the men who committed the offences to go unpunished, and can hide from the public eye, can conceal from this House, the evidence of that iniquity. I cannot understand by what moral principles a man can be governed who permits that. I cannot understand how he is regulating his life among his fellow men when he allows that sort of thing to go on under his eye, when he withholds the arm of justice, delays the lagging feet of justice, does everything to prevent bringing home the crime to the criminal, and does everything to prevent the formation of a healthy public opinion upon the question, and the condemnation of practices of that kind. I cannot understand why the man who has it in his power to expose this wrong doing, and to bring to bay, and to justice the men who are guilty of it will yet withhold his hand, and not exercise that power. The premier of Canada has the greatest power of any ruler of any country of the population and importance of Canada in the world, and why is that so? It is so because the premier of Canada is not tied down in formulating the policy of the country by the splendid sanctions of a resident Crown and by any great body of social opinion the result of the fine feeling of ages. He is allowed to plough his furrow where he will, and I say that a man in that position has a responsibility resting upon him that I fear the premier does not appreciate, but which I believe the people of Canada do appreciate, and because of that appreciation will mete out to him treatment appropriate to a man who fails to appreciate his public responsibility. The party which will uphold the premier in that position, knowing these offences, flagrant beyond any language which I have at my command with which to describe them, and which have been disclosed because of the quarrels of these people over the unfair division of the spoils, and the plunder, must share with him the responsibility for their action. It is a reproach upon the public morality not only of Vancouver, but of the whole of Canada, it is a reproach that can be wiped out only by bringing down the report of the commissioners, and acting upon its recommendations or acting upon better advice if it can be had. That is our bounden duty, that is the duty imposed upon me, and every member of this House by the solemn oath that we took when we became members of this House. If that oath of office, and that sense of duty are binding upon the public men of Canada that oath, and that sense of duty impel with irresistible force every man who has built up his character upon principles of morality to expose to the finish an offence such as this which has been committed against morality, and against the public life of Canada.

When we have men sitting in this House as deaf as an antediluvian boulder to the duty that devolves upon them, it is a black-letter day for Canada, and I believe in my heart that the people of Canada only await an opportunity to sweep them from the treasury benches. It seems strange that rational men, supposed to be guided by reason and judgment, but men so devoid of the sense of the duty they owe to the memory of those who established free government, should be able to climb to high places in the councils of the country. If the Prime Minister listens, he will hear the ground swell of indignation, coming from the people, because the mind of the people after all is pure and their motives high and altruistic. I appeal to the young members of the government that they listen to the principles inculcated in their minds in youth; I appeal to them not to listen to the siren song of the boodler, the grafter, and the camp follower. The time has come when the people will demand that the men who control the destinies of Canada shall rise above such influences. We are inducing the people of the Orient to come to our shores, we are telling them that if they will come to Canada they need not have $50 in their pockets as the beastly British immigrant has to have, and while we do this why do we not attempt to elevate their mental and moral nature. They are the product of a civilization older than ours; 2,000 years before Christ the Chinese empire had a civilization as developed as it is to-day, but it is a civilization that is not our civilization. If we induce these people to come to our shores, we should set them a good political and moral example and not teach them that when they reach Vancouver they can make a dicker with Mr. Party Heeler, living on Graft street by which they can discount their head tax of $500 by a large percentage and come in as merchant princes, instead of coolies and labourers. We should not let them see that the men who perpetrate these iniquities are not only allowed to go scot free, but are promoted to higher office, are sent as trade commissioners to Japan or China, and are placed in positions of honour and power. The callousness with which the governments looks on at wrong-doing of this kind must have a bad effect upon the public life of Canada and more especially upon the orientals, for whom the Prime Minister has so much care. Now, I want to speak of another and a very important matter. On Friday, the 14th of July, 1911, there was consummated a new treaty of alliance between Great Britain and Japan, and which is of peculiar significance to the people of Canada, inasmuch as it removes the apprehension which existed under the treaty of 1905, and the preceding treaty of 1902, that in case of trouble between Japan and the United States the mother land would be compelled by the terms of the treaty to take sides with Japan.

I am happy to say that this new treaty, entered into on Friday last, puts an end to the possibility of such a contingency ever happening. It provides in express terms that in case of war between the United States and Japan, the United Kingdom shall not be obliged to join on the side of Japan. That is a matter of rejoicing to the people of Canada, because we cannot forget that our good neighbours on the other side of the line are of the breed of our own sturdy race. For 2000 years we were of the same family; the common jurisprudence which they and we enjoy came down from Blackstone and Coke to Marshall and Story. Our common literature is enriched at times by a Tennyson, at times by a Longfellow. The two countries have much in common. To each country our German friends have added their intelligence, their industry, their thrift, and our French people have added not only these, but their brilliancy and their love of art. So that they and we have much in common. But I think the Premier, when he was induced after much reluctance to put his seal of approval upon the little document which the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs brought back from Washington, without even crossing a 't' or dotting an 'i,' after it left the hand of President Taft, forgot the fact that although we and our good neighbours to the south have all these things? in common, yet we do not keep house together. We each must clean our own doorstep and warm ourselves at our own fireside, and I think it is good and well that it should be so, and as long as that is the case, I think our good Premier, whose brilliant gifts in other respects, I will say, have been an enrichment of our public life, should discuss public questions on their merits. But he failed to see the merits of the situation when he forgot that we and our good neighbours to the south do not keep house together; he forgot that each country must solve its own domestic problems according to its own point of view, and that as long as Canada remains a part of the British empire there is imposed upon Canada the plain duty of having at least some regard for those interests which we have in common with the other parts of the empire when we seek to establish new relations with a foreign country. As to the application of this to the question in hand, I still have hope to pierce the thick veil of partisanship in some of our friends across the floor of this House, and reach the gray matter and influence the will and form the intelligence of those gentlemen. I still have hope to convince them that the cobweb robe with which they clothe themselves in regard to this Chinese inquiry, is indecent in the public eye, and exposes much that should not be exposed to the public eye of Canada. As these great events are marching down the grooves of change in the political history of the world, Canada should be up and doing as a prime and foremost nation amongst the nations of the world. Canada's duty is not to hold back, but to proceed with the other parts of the empire, and to strengthen the bond and to cast away that foolish fear that there may be found some one in some part of the empire thrusting at the rise of Canada and tearing away our autonomy. That figment of the imagination, fed to the minds of the people of Canada, will tend to mislead them, and it behoves the public men who can rise to the height of informing the electorate of Canada as to their real duty, instead of appealing to their fears, to assume the duty of protecting the destinies of Canada in the future.

If so, Canada will follow the course dictated by self-respect, nationhood and manhood, and that course will be that Canada will stand as a nation, and as the foremost in the great family of nations composing the British Empire.

As the hour is passed the usual time for adjourning, and the gentlemen in the back benches have returned refreshed and rested, but have not had an opportunity of giving any intellectual expression to that refreshment, it may be that under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I should defer the remarks which I would otherwise make, to another occasion.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. THOBURN (resuming). Owing to the fact that I spoke last night till after midnight, I would move that the committee rise.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. THOBURN. I question if there is such a case on record in the annals of this House that an hon. member is compelled, after speaking till after midnight last night, to speak again at such a late hour as this. Now, I appeal to the right hon. the Prime Minister if I cannot have the privilege I ask.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Go on.

Mr. FIELDING. I move that the resolution be adopted.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. THOBURN. Then I suppose I must proceed. When the committee rose last night, I was discussing the reciprocity Bill now before the House. I had referred to several items in connection with the Bill, and was about to deal with the preferential clause when the committee rose.

You will have noticed that reference has been made several times during the debate to this clause by hon. gentlemen opposite. Looking at it from a purely business standpoint, I have been unable to find a single instance in which the preferential clause is of benefit to the farmers of Canada. Can any hon. gentleman in this House name one single article of Canadian product that gets a preference in the British market either in Canadian manufactures or in Canadian farm products? Canadian manufactures and Canadian farm products of all kinds sell in the British market on their merits, and that is the reason why the Americans are so anxious that the Reciprocity Bill should pass. They want to import Canadian farm products into the United States, and export them into Great Britain as American products. But, Mr. Speaker, while the American government is anxious to have reciprocity in farm products, they take very good care not to allow these products to enter their country after being partly manufactured. We know that while they will admit a million bushels of Canadian wheat into their country free of duty, the very moment you turn that million bushels into flour they charge you a duty upon it. Why is it? Because the government of that country has always looked after the interests of the American workingman, and any labour that has to be done on that million bushels of wheat they want done in the United States. Take the case of lumber, it is said that they will admit lumber into the United States free in its rough state. That is true, but the moment you plane a board on one side, and export it to the United States there is a duty imposed upon it. Why? Because they are preserving that labour for the American workman, instead of having it done in Canada for the benefit of the Canadian workman.

I cannot think for one moment that our farmers are going to stand for any such fraudulent bargain as this. They have the British market now, and they are going to do their best to keep it. It is a well known fact that the preferential clause means a larger importation of goods into this country, but what does that mean to the manufacturers of the country? What does it mean to the working class of the country? The greater part of every million dollars worth of manufactured goods that comes into this country might be manufactured here and supply labour and wages to the workmen of Canada.

Then, Mr. Speaker, you cannot but have noticed that there has been a free trade element in the speeches of some of the hon. gentlemen opposite in reference to the clause now under consideration. I am very glad that the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) is in his seat to-night, because I wish to deal with some of the utterances of that hon. gentleman in the year 1909, as compared with his utterances in the year 1911. In the year

1909 the hon. gentleman moved the following resolution:

That in the opinion of this House such steps should be taken as may be deemed most effective in conserving the home market to the Canadian coal operators.

After giving a very exhaustive statement he went on to say:

I have reason to hope that the government will be equal to the occasion, and that this House will support the government in inquiring into the cause which is bringing about such a great influx of American coal into Canada, to the exclusion of the use of our own Canadian coal, and that whatever steps are necessary to conserve to us our own market and to exclude American coal shall be taken.

I regret that I have been obliged to speak at such length, but the question is a very important one. I am not presenting alone the case of the capitalists for whom I can assure you I have no retainer, but I feel that it is my duty as representing a large number of working men as near to the foot of the throne as I can, and as far as I am able to submit to the government and the people generally that some measures should be taken to enable these working men to have employment every day and to earn sufficient money to support themselves and their families in comfort. I regret that this winter they have not been kept in continuous employment because of this displacement of Canadian coal in the home market by American coal. It is not at all necessary for one to call himself a labour candidate or to sit in this House as a labour member in order that he should put those issues before this House. Representing as I do a large number of working people, although I do not pose as a labour candidate, I believe that it is my duty to the best of my ability to present to the country and to the House the interests of these people and to appeal for a remedy to the only institution in the land which had power to provide a remedy which will relieve us from any further imposition of this kind, and which will hold the markets of Canada for Canadian coal which we are capable of producing just as well as they can produce coal in a foreign country.

And a little further on he said:

I have presented my views and these statistics to the House in the hope that the government will take into serious consideration the circumstances of those who are dependent on this trade for a means of livelihood as well as those who have had the courage and the enterprise to invest millions of dollars in our coal areas in Nova Scotia and elsewhere in Canada.

What did the Minister of Finance say on that occasion?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I do not imagine that my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) desires to divide the House on this question to-night, especially as there is a very slim attendance of members present. I take it for granted that the purpose of a motion was to have an opportunity of presenting these very interesting statistics to us and to urge if it is necessary to urge the importance of the great mining industry. There will be no difference of opinion in that respect. We all recognize that the coal industry of the country not merely in Nova Scotia but in other parts of the Dominion, is a very great industry and that whatever may reasonably be done to advance the interests of our Canadian miners should be done. It is, however, a very vexed question. It is a question on which there will not be by any means unanimity of opinion. I do not imagine that my hon. friend desires to-night to challenge an opinion, and I would suggest therefore that the debate be adjourned so that at a later date when there is a better attendance of members any hon. member who desires may continue the discussion.

Now, that discussion was never continued to my knowledge by the hon. member for North Cape Breton until this present session. It is utterly impossible to understand what the hon. gentleman meant on that occasion when you compare the utterance that he made then and his utterance during the present session of parliament. I refer to page 5120 of Hansard:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to pay a little further attention to some observations that were made about the prosperous condition of this country, and before I reach that I wish to say something about the province of Nova Scotia, and the coal question. I suppose the coal industry is the largest of any one industry in Canada. The coal industry of Nova Scotia has a capital invested in it of something in the vicinity of $1,000,000,000, it has 10,000 or 12,000, possibly more, men directly dependent upon it, and for us in Nova Scotia the coal question is a very important one indeed. At the same time, we realize that we are part and parcel of the country, that it takes all kinds of people to make a world, and that all manner of agreements, give and take must be made in order that we shall get along peaceably and harmoniously the one with the other. That being the case, and knowing that, there must be duties raised in this country and that the consumer must also be taken into consideration of this question. Speaking as one representing the coal industry of Nova Scotia, while we would like to have seen the duty remain as it was, and while we think it would have been perfectly justifiable to let it remain, we are content to take our share of the burden of taxation upon the people, and if eight cents a ton has been taken off that coal we must put up with it, and do the best we can.

For utter political inconsistency, I do not know where you can find a parallel to this case. Was the hon. gentleman sincere when he made his statement in 1909? Or was he sincere when he made his statement in 1911. Speaking further on on the free trade question I wish to quote the remarks of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. M. Y. McLean).

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a little departure and in doing so I shall say in what I say, I speak entirely on my own responsibility. To use a sporting phrase I wish to cast a ball off my own bat. I know from expressions used by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, that he and the members of the cabinet are not prepared to follow as far as I would like to lead, and also that many of my hon. friends on this side would not agree with the sentiments and ideas I am about to express. I believe those ideas to be in the best interests of the country, and therefore that it is my duty to give them utterance.

I believe that the best fiscal policy for this country is absolute free trade, the public revenue to be collected by the simplest, and most inexpensive method of direct taxation that can possibly be devised.

Further on he says:

It has been stated by several members on this side of the House that they would feel better pleased if the government would increase the British preference to 40 or 50 per cent. Now, Sir, I am prepared to go a long step further than that. I say that Great Britain admits our products into her market free, and that we should admit her products into our market free.

We have been lead to believe that the preferential clause was enacted to show an increased loyalty to Great Britain, but we are told now it was nothing of the kind. In this connection I would quote from a speech delivered by the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell) who said:

Our hon. friends opposite may say that we introduced it in order to cater to the feeling prevailing at that time that we should do something to help out the British people and to prove our loyalty. I do not believe that was the object at all.

Further on he says:

I can assure the government that there is no way in which they can more ingratiate themselves with the people of Canada or do more good to the people of Canada than to bring down before this parliament adjourns a measure increasing the British preference to at least 40 per cent.

Those are the utterances of hon. members in this House in reference to free trade. We have also the utterance in the memorial presented by the United Farmers of Alberta, which stated that the association welcomed the reciprocity agreement as a first step towards free trade.

In addition to that we have the Americans clamouring for free trade with Canada in manufactured goods as well as in natural products. I quote the following extracts from a speech recently delivered by Senator Beveridge.

There must be reciprocity with Canada. Our tariff with the rest of the world does not apply to our northern neighbour. That policy already has driven American manufacturers across the Canadian borders, built vast plants with American capital on Canadian soil, employing Canadian workingmen to supply trade. That capital should be kept at home to employ American workingmen to supply Canadian demand. We should admit Canadian wood pulp and Canadian paper free in return for Canada's admitting our agricultural implements, our engines, pumps and other machinery free. We should freely admit Canadian lumber to American planing mills in return for Canada's freely admitting other American manufactured products to Canadian markets."

In addition to that we have the utterance of Senator Townsy supporting reciprocity:

Not only would he lend his support to the Bill now under consideration, the senator declared, but he would have favoured 'a treaty which would have included all of the products of Canadian and United States industries on the free list.'

Careful and unbiased study had convinced him that the agreement would benefit both countries.

'But I am convinced,' he added, 'that reciprocity with Canada can never be the greatest success until manufactured as well as natural products meet no customs walls in passing between the two countries.'

Senator Townsend argued that it was the duty of the United States and for its best good 'to enter into the freest trade relations possible with those nations where the conditions of living and industry are similar to those of our own country.'

Canada, he contended, came in this class. Personally, he said, he would have 'striven long and hard,' for absolutely free trade between the two countries.

I wish also to refer to some remarks made by President Taft in reference to the tariff between the two countries.

Washington, May 8.—President Taft indulged in some plain talk to-day in explaining to 25 members of the National Grange that he does not intend to play politics with the Canadian reciprocity agreement even if the enactment of that measure by congress costs him the farmers' vote. The president told his visitors bluntly that he was sorry to hear that Republican farmers would desert the party if the agreement goes through, but fear of such desertion would not change his conviction as to the wisdom of such legislation. He said that he believed reciprocity to be the best thing for the whole country and that he did not intend to argue it.

But my conviction with respect to the advantage of this treaty is very deep. So far as is the effect of this on my personal political fortunes, it ought not to influence me, and does not influence me in the slightest. I believe this treaty to be the best thing for the whole country, including farmers, merchants, labouring men and all, because I believe it is contrary to nature, it is flying in the face of Providence, to put an artificial wall like that between this country and Canada and not get the benefit that will inure to peoples of the same traditions, the same language, especially with the same character of labour. If we take down that wall we will benefit by it,——

I wish the House to pay particular attention to this utterance. They are not entirely enacting this measure for the benefit of Canada.

—for we shall sell more agricultural products to Canada than she will sell to us. We do now, and we shall sell her even more after the treaty goes into effect. That is my judgment. I am not arguing—I am merely stating my conviction. If I did not believe this, I should not have taken the responsibility of doing what I have done to put this reciprocity treaty through. I am willing to abide the judgment of history—the judgment that will come after the event. When you gentlemen come to see the result, I believe that you, as fairminded men, will admit that you have been wrong in your fears and that I have been right.

Senator Kenyon, of Iowa made the following statement:

Although President Taft has made several speeches of late, trying to convince the farmers in America that it will be the Canadian farmers who will suffer.

Just think of a statement coming from a senator that it is the opinion of the President of the United States that is the Canadian farmer who has to suffer if this reciprocity goes into effect. Can it be possible that the Prime Minister, or any cabinet minister, or any hon. member on either side of this House, would support such a Bill when the statement comes from the President of the United States that it is to be to the injury of the Canadian farmer? I cannot think so and I will never believe so until such a thing should come to pass Now, I do not wish to occupy the time of this House any longer. I want to put in as concise a form as possible my reasons for opposing reciprocity, and they are as follows:

1. Because I firmly believe that it will be injurious to the Canadian farmer.
2. The farmer has as much right to protection as the manufacturer has.
3. It is taking a link out of the chain of our moderate tariff that has done so much to bring this country to its present state of prosperity.
4. It is striking a fatal blow at the very foundation of our national resources.

Mr. BEST. Seeing that the hour is late I will move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. FIELDING. I regret I cannot accept the motion. I think I may say frankly now that the desire of the government is that this reciprocity debate shall be continued in a reasonable manner from day to day so that we may make progress. If intervening proceedings, I will not say obstructive proceedings—that might be objected to—but if intervening proceedings occur to prevent the consideration of reciprocity in what we think a reasonable manner, then we think we should sit later and advance what we regard as the paramount business of the House at this moment.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman in that regard is making himself the sole judge of what is in the public interest.

Mr. FIELDING. I am expressing my own opinion. I do not object to my hon. friend having his opinion of what is in the public interest, but I think I am doing no wrong in expressing what I believe to be in the public interest. My hon. friend and I differ, that is our mutual misfortune.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It may be my hon. friend's misfortune; I do not regard it as mine. I was about to say that if matters of public importance are brought forward by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, such, for example, as the loss to the people of this country of a million dollars by a system of boodling, I ask if it be reasonable that we should be obliged to sit to an unreasonable hour simply because that particular matter has been brought to the attention of the House today. However, the hon. gentleman is entitled to his own opinion on the subject. I am certainly entitled to mine and the proposition, as I understand the hon. gentleman, is that no man on this side of the House shall be at liberty to bring to the attention of parliament, or the country any matter of any public interest whatever except at the risk of being obliged to sit to a very late hour in order to make up that time by a continuation of the reciprocity debate.

That is the proposition as I understand it. No matter what the subject may be—it may relate to the danger to the west of suffering from a coal famine, it may relate to irregularities and abuses in the public service—no one on this side of the House is to be at liberty to open his mouth in regard to any one of these subjects except under the penalty suggested by the hon. Minister of Finance. That may be regarded as a reasonable proposition; certainly, I desire to enter my protest against it at the earliest moment.

Mr. FIELDING. I am afraid I cannot agree with the statement of my hon. friend as to what is in my mind on this subject, nor can I admit that his statement that there has been a loss of a million dollars in connection with boodling is to be accepted for a single moment. I do not say that there should not be, in the ordinary procedure of the House, inquiry into matters that are new, matters of urgency, matters which have not previously engaged the attention, and could not conveniently have engaged the attention, of the House at an earlier date. It is reasonable that there should be such an inquiry, but I do not agree that the reading hour after hour of columns of newspapers many, many weeks and months old is a legitimate contribution to the debates of the House. However, if the hon. gentleman differs from me again I say it is our misfortune.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The columns and columns of newspapers to which my hon. friend refers are no later than the evidence submitted of the boodling to which I have alluded. While I have heard the Prime Minister to-day state that there is an opinion expressed in the report that the report itself should not be laid on the table of the House, I have not heard a statement from any hon. gentleman on the treasury benches that there is any such reason to prevent the evidence itself being laid on the table of the House. It was urged by the right hon. Prime Minister that the commissioner had stated that his report should be kept private for some purpose that I have been as yet unable to understand, but even the right hon. gentleman himself did not state, and I do not think he will state, that the commissioner said that the evidence should not be laid on the table of the House. If that evidence had been laid on the table of the House as it ought to have been in common decency on the very first day we met here the reading of that same evidence in the form in which it had appeared in the public press would not have been necessary. It was necessary to go to the public press because of the neglect of this government to lay on the table of the House the evidence that in common ordinary decency should have been presented to the House the very first day that we were here. I do not know, speaking of my own knowledge, in regard to this boodling, anything of it except from the statements read from the public press, not contradicted up to the present time, that seem to establish that there was within the Liberal organization in British Columbia a scramble as to who would be entitled to the moneys plundered from the public treasury. I am not responsible for that statement. The witnesses who gave their oaths to those assertions are responsible for it, and up to the present we have been unable to appreciate the character of that evidence or to know really how correct, or how incorrect the statements in the public press may be simply for the reason that the government have not had the courage up to the present to lay that evidence on the table as it should have been laid on the table on the 18th of this month.

Mr. LENNOX. Of course, the Minister of Finance must judge for himself in reference to the position he should take in this debate.

The Minister of Finance has more experience than I, but my opinion is entitled to consideration just as his is. I would be glad to see this debate proceed from day to day and a full elucidation of this important subject, but at the same time we are not going, at the beck of the ministry or at the call of the United States, to surrender our rights in this parliament as representatives of the people. I conscientiously attend every sitting of the House and I intend to stay here as much as I can while the reciprocity debate is in progress; but the Minister of Finance is not reasonable in asking that we should stay here until after one o'clock in the morning, because some hon. gentlemen in the discharge of their duty have discussed an important matter as to which the government has offered no defence. This side of the House have no apology to make for entering on the discussion this afternoon. The Minister of Finance may do what he likes, but there are members of this House who intend to express their opinions on reciprocity at an hour when there will be an opportunity for these opinions to go to the public. I tell the Finance Minister with great respect that I shall use my privilege on the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means to bring before the House any matter which I deem of importance, and I will not ask the permission of the 'Globe' to do so. I am enumerated in the 'Globe' to-day amongst what they call the obstructionists and that because in the briefest manner possible I called the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that I was not enumerated in the census. If the Minister of Finance is not afraid of discussion then he should not deter this side from giving the public an opportunity to judge whether they want reciprocity or not. Until the people have an opportunity of saying whether they do or do not want to ally themselves with the people of the United States in this matter, I for one shall continue to protest against the action of the government.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I am informed that while I was out of the chamber, the Minister of Finance thought fit to reflect upon my course, in, this afternoon, bringing to the attention of this House certain rascalities which, if the government has not actually encouraged, it has done nothing to prevent. I might, if I cared to, have prolonged the discussion this afternoon for at least an hour by reading the evidence under my hand reflecting personally upon the minister from British Columbia, but I was good-natured enough to cut that out and it comes with ill grace from these gentlemen opposite to taunt me with wasting the time of the House when they very well know I had this damaging evidence here and could have read it had I desired. I have had this evidence in my possession since last December; week after week as it accumulated in the records of the committee it came under my observance and was ready for me to present to the House, but I thought it more decent to wait until the evidence and finding of the commissioner were presented before I discussed it. Over two months ago I inquired of the Minister of the Interior in a few words whether it would not be better to defer a Bill then before the House until this report was brought down, and speaking for the government the Minister of the Interior told us that this request was most reasonable. Two months later, knowing that this report was long in the possession of the government I inquired if a formal motion would be necessary to have it produced. I then learned for the first time that the word of a minister of the Crown given to me across the floor of this House was not of value, that it was not the intention to implement his word and bring down the report, that the report was in the custody of the minister shown to be delinquent, and I knew that if we waited for him to decide to bring it down we would never have it. Then I considered that I would be derelict in my duty if I did not take the earliest opportunity to lay before the people of Canada through this parliament the most scandalous condition of affairs that has ever arisen in any city of Canada.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will ask the hon. gentleman not to enter into the merits of the question at this moment, though I will allow him to defend his action in speaking

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I understood that I was attacked in my absence, and that is the reason I speak. For more reasons than one I do not want to enter into the merits of the question, for in my opinion it has no merits. I wish to resent the imputation cast on me by the Minister of Finance in endorsing the slur first cast by the First Minister, and afterwards withdrawn by him, that I was wasting the time of the House instead of serving the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. CURRIE (North Simcoe). I wish to say a word in reference to the aspersions cast on me, as one of the speakers, by the Finance Minister. If there is one man who on political matters has only one view, who as it were lives all his life in a barrel and only knows what he sees through the bunghole, it is the Minister of Finance. He seeks to coerce this House to discuss nothing but reciprocity and to force us to discuss that question until it is disposed of. Coercion is the weapon of tyranny, and the day has gone when people will put up with it. We have had a few tyrants on this continent. We have done away with Castro, Don Pedro and others, and recently another tyrant on this continent was disposed of, and the time is not long before Laurier and his crew will be dispensed with. The First Minister and the Minister of Finance cannot coerce a free parliament into passing something which is contrary to the constitution, and which should be submitted to the people. That is the question before this House: are we going to be coerced into adopting the views of the First Minister, who is in essence a coercionist? The very terms coercion and tyranny are distasteful to a British people, and they will not submit to it. The day is not far distant when this effort to coerce us to adopt a policy contrary to the genius of British people will meet with the same fate that befel another tyrant in another country not long ago. Six months ago there was no greater man on this continent than President Diaz in Mexico; he was the great immaculate; but to-day there is no one so mean or poor to do him any reverence. The Minister of Finance seeks to coerce this parliament into all-night sessions that it may pass a measure contrary to justice and to all the rules of public policy known to history. There has been nothing of the kind in any parliament since the days of the Long Parliament and ship money; and because we choose to discuss a public question of the most burning kind on the Pacific coast, he says we are wasting the time of the House. How long has he wasted the time of the House? If he has wasted the time of the House, he has been very well paid for it. He can afford to come back to this House and spend a few days here; he has a few dollars in his pocket to pay his board. Whom did he get the money from? If he got the money from honest and fair men, he should give the names of those who subscribed to his nice little purse. He of all men to talk of wasting the time of the House. He cannot understand for one minute how he stands in the eyes of the public of this country. The man who got $120,000—what for?—he to stand up and challenge honourable members with wasting the time of the House because they choose to discuss a question of this kind and put it on record. Mr. Chairman, I trust that all motion of that kind, especially from the Minister of Finance, will end to-night.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman says that I pressed for an all-night sitting. I pressed for nothing of the kind. The House frequently sits longer than this. I thought that the hour was late and that we might make some reasonable progress.

Mr. CURRIE (North Simcoe). I am very glad the Minister of Finance has apologized to the House.

Mr. FIELDING. If I had occasion to apologize, I would be ready to apologize, and I would not expect the hon. gentleman to do so.

Mr. CURRIE (North Simcoe). When it comes to a question of ethics, either personal or political, I do not take my ethics from the same book as the hon Minister of Finance.

Mr. BEST. If it is the wish of the House that I should proceed, I will do so.

Mr. FIELDING. I shall be very glad if my hon. friend will proceed, and if he purposes to occupy any considerable time, after he makes reasonable progress, I will offer no objection to an adjournment.

Mr. BEST. Seeing that in some of the remarks I want to make I wish to refer to the Minister of Customs, I would like him to be in his seat.

Mr. FIELDING. I will guarantee that the Minister of Customs will read what the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. BEST. He is paid to stay here and listen.

Mr. FIELDING. No, he is not paid to stay here and listen.

Mr. BEST. From the time the House met in November, for three or four months, there seemed to be an abundance of time. Members on the government side spoke for three or four hours, and there seemed to be very little objection. But things have taken a very sudden change to-night. The Minister of Finance suggests that the time is precious and that we should not take up the time of the House. It seems to me it is a policy of sit tight.

I have been looking for the time to come when we would hear from the ministers on the government side of the House what they were going to do for the people of Canada. We have heard them tell us that reciprocity was going to be a great thing for Canada—that it was going to enrich the farmer—going to do a lot for this country; but I have yet to find that they have ever made one tittle of proof that either nationally or financially we would be any further ahead than we are to-day. It puts me in mind of what happened last winter between two neighbours of mine—call them Jones and Smith. Jones had a very nice chesnut mare, and had been trying to get a mate for it. Smith was a professional horse trader, and he came along one evening about dark and said to Jones: 'I hear you have a nice chestnut mare. Now, I have a good mate for her. I will give you a trade for this horse.' Jones took him to be sincere, and asked him if the horse was all right, he said it was,' adding 'If you take this horse it will go very well with yours, and you can do a lot of work with them, or if you want to sell the team you can make a pile of money out of them.' The trade was made, the next morning when Jones went to look at his matched team he found to his surprise that the new horse was broken winded, was heavy, had ringbones and was bogspavined. In fact everything that was bad. When he hitched them up and tried to drive off the new horse baulked and would not go at all. Now, I am of the opinion that many of the arguments put up here in connection with reciprocity are similar to this horse trade.

From the time the House adjourned on the 19th of May last up to the present time, I have had the pleasure of meeting the great majority of the electors of the county which I have the honour to represent, and, knowing what I am talking about, I should say that at least 90 or 95 per cent of the people of that county are absolutely opposed to reciprocity. When you consider that about 85 per cent of these people are farmers, why should we not say that they are thinking justly and rightly. Just think for one moment of the position of the farmers in the Dominion of Canada. They claim they have not got justice, and I claim they have not got justice. For instance, this present government will spend in one year between $140,000,000 and $150,000,000, and the farmers of Canada—who are the source of wealth, constituting 63 per cent of the population of this country will get less than $1,000,000, for there is less than $1,000,000 spent on agriculture. I say the farmers of this country have not been rightly used, and I say further that this government would be doing very much more for the farmers of Canada if they would help them financially in their agricultural pursuits.

If this reciprocity treaty goes into force the farmer of Canada will be in competition with the world without any protection whatever. After growing his wheat he takes it a mile down the road to the miller, and the moment it is turned into flour there is a duty on it. If he takes a load of hogs to the market, he has to sell the hogs in competition with the world, but if he wants to take a pound of bacon home with him he has to pay duty. If he takes a steer or sheep to the market he has to sell it in competition with the world, but if he wants to take a pound of fresh meat with him he has to pay duty on it. I would ask the hon. members of this House if that is fair play for the farmer?

It is simply a matter of experiment with the farmer, who has been experimented with long enough, and I believe the day is not far distant when he will be experimented with no longer.

The farmers say to us: 'How is it that in 1900, 1904 and 1908, we never heard of reciprocity, yet it is thrown into the political arena now and we are told, here, take all or none.

The hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) made a statement here to the effect that he wanted the question discussed fairly and clearly, but on the very same column of 'Hansard' you will find that he gagged every member of the government and said that it must go through. He told them that the honour of the government and the honour of the House was pledged to this treaty. I would ask the hon. Finance Minister if the government was so particular about doing as the farmers of the Northwest asked, why is it that nothing was done for them? The hon, Finance Minister and the hon. Minister of Customs went to Washington and made a treaty with Mr. Taft and his legislators, which treaty they did not want to have broken. Seemingly they have no regard for the pledges made to the people of Canada, but they have respect for a pledge made with the American people or with the President of the United States—that is something which must not be broken.

We are asked who suggested this when it was brought before the people. I find that the hon. gentlemen on the government side tell us that previous to 1896 the Conservatives asked for reciprocity. Well, I make the statement, and I believe I am correct, that it is not on record in 'Hansard' that any Conservatives ever asked to make a treaty with the United States whereby the farmers would be divested of every vestige of protection and would, at the same time, have to pay duty for every article they use. Why did the present government not do as the Conservative government did in 1893? In 1893, the Conservative government sent some of the cabinet ministers to many counties throughout this Dominion to find out the needs of the farmers. Amongst others they came to the county which I have the honour to represent, and there were 20 farmers sent from different parts of that county to interview the cabinet ministers. These farmers were not Tories nor Grits, but Tories and Grits combined. It was a representative deputation of farmers, and with the exception of one man, who asked for free corn, we stood solid, asking the government not to take the duty off farm produce, but rather to raise the duty on it. Now, if the farmers of the Dominion, and especially of Ontario, wanted the duty raised on farm produce in 1893, why should they want it taken off to-day? To-day we have transportation facilities which we did not have then. We have spent almost $500,000,000 in building railways and canals, and to-day we have the British market nearer to us than the American market was at that time. No one will gainsay the fact that the British market to-day is far superior to the American market which we had at that time.

We have heard it said that the farmers made a great deal of money previous to the McKinley Bill coming into force. This may be true. But as a farmer, I know—as well as any other man—that if we got high prices sometimes for our products, for years we did not get so much.

But what was that leading up to the deterioration of our farms. I can say as a farmer that, no matter where you went, especially in the province of Ontario, the soil was depleted of its fertility. The farms were not growing, in most cases, within five or ten bushels of grain per acre as much as they do to-day. Our coarse grain was sent to the United States, and with it our steers were sent out to be fattened on the American side. The McKinley Bill came into force and many farmers thought they were hurt. I was one of of those who were of that opinion. We had to look about us and see what we were going to do with our coarse grains, and especially with our barley. We went to work to raise stock, of which, previous to this, very little was raised in Ontario. We started to raise hogs and cattle. And as soon as we began on this course we had the fertility coming back on the land, and that is the reason we have the land in a superior state of fertility to what it was at that time. And I can honestly say as a farmer that there is not a man in Ontario who is feeding his coarse grain to stock, as he should do, who sells his barley for less than 75 cents a bushel, and some of it is as high as $1.25. And this has been the case for the last ten years. Then, we have been compelled to build up the reputation of our farm produce and live stock in England. It took years to do that. I can remember when in the agricultural societies and farmers' institutes the idea constantly expressed was that we should try to build up a fine type of bacon hog. That took fifteen years to accomplish. But to-day we have that type of hog and our bacon stands second to none in the English market. Shall we allow the American hog to come in so that the American bacon shall be mixed with ours? Shall we allow Canadian bacon to be sent to the United States to be mixed with lower grade American bacon and sent to the English market there to lower the standard of our product? We are told that if the American market is not satisfactory we can still send to the English market. But we know that the Minister of Agriculture himself has been telling us to send our best quality of cured meat and grain to the English market. This we have done, and it is because of that that we have such a reputation in that market. I quite admit that, for a small percentage of our farm produce, those of No. 1 standard we should probably get a higher price in the United States. But, while we get a little more for twenty per cent of our farm produce we shall get far less for eighty per cent. If we sell this high quality cured meats and grain to the United States, we have only the lower grades to send to the English market. The result will be to lower our standard and our reputation and the reputation of our farm produce in England, so that it will take another fifteen or twenty years to regain what we have lost.

Now, we have been told that from 1854 to 1856 good times reigned in Canada because we had reciprocity. But times are different to-day from what they were then. Simply because the times were good then with reciprocity between Canada and the United States, is that any reason why we should expect prosperity now under reciprocity? We cannot judge of the future by the past. Our fathers lived in log houses, but we do not want to go back to houses of that kind. We have been progressing in the last fifteen or twenty years, and we want to still go on. But some people insist upon judging the future by the past. They would hark back to the days of 1854-1866 and say that because reciprocity was good for Canada then it must be good for Canada now. It is not necessarily so. I believe that it was a good thing then, but to assume that it will be a good thing now is to assume that the conditions now are the same as the conditions were then. But they are not, decidedly not. When a farmer is told of the high prices received for his products during the latter part of the time that that treaty was in force he should remember that peculiar circumstances existed then that do not exist now. The great civil war was wholly within this period. The prices of that time were enormous, and need not be expected to-day. Think of our condition as a country then. There was not even a confederation of the provinces. Now, the scattered fragments of those days have been brought together and made one great Dominion. Then there had been no combined systematic attempt to find a market for our goods. Apparently the United States was our only market. We had not learned of the possibilities about us. Now, the federated provinces have expended $427,000,000 on railways and canals to develop means of transportation; the provincial governments have spent $36,000,000, and the municipalities $18,000,000 in the same direction. Furthermore, the provincial and federal governments have guaranteed bonds for railway construction in Canada to the amount of $127,000,000 more. We are proposing a further expenditure of $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 for the Transcontinental railway. All this expenditure is to develop internal trade between the east and west, and make us independent of the markets of the United States. At the time of the last reciprocity agreement we were in large measure dependent on the United States for our markets. But we are not dependent on them now. The mother country has replaced the United States in this respect. Improved transportation and cold storage have brought the British market nearer to us to-day than the market of the United States was in 1854. In 1910, Great Britain took of our animals and their products $42,000,000 out of a total of $54,000,000 which was exported, equal to 77 per cent. Of our agricultural products they took $71,000,000 worth out of a total of $91,000,000, equal to nearly 80 per cent. In the same year the United States took of the first 20 per cent, and of the second 9 per cent. The United States took last year of our agricultural products only 7 per cent more than she took forty-two years ago. These figures show conclusively the ability of the mother country to take all our products, and at good figures. They prove our independence of the United States market. Let us disabuse our minds of the idea that because reciprocity was a good thing for the Canadians in 1854 we need it now, that because it was profitable under conditions existing then it would be profitable under the changed conditions of to-day. Circumstances alter cases. Before we consider the effect of the proposed arrangement we must consider three things concerning this reciprocity treaty. Mr. Speaker, I would ask for an adjournment.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Shall we continue the same discussion to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, continue this discussion.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 1.30 a. m. Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FRIDAY, July 21, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

CHINESE INVESTIGATION COMMISSION.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. With reference to the question which came up yesterday, and which was brought up by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. J. D. Taylor) in regard to the inquiry made by Mr. Justice Murphy as commissioner to investigate frauds in the administration of the Chinese Act at Vancouver, I stated yesterday that I had a conference with the Minister of Justice on the matter, but that I had had no time to read the report, and had only looked at the conclusions. The first conclusion is that Mr. Justice Murphy advises certain prosecutions be taken. The other recommendation was that the report should not be made public until the prosecutions had been taken, the reason being—I could not give the reason yesterday, but I can now—that if the report were made public before the prosecutions were undertaken, witnesses for the prosecution might disappear. I understand, on further conference that the parties indicated for prosecution are in China and therefore that no prosecution we could undertake would reach them. I have looked at the report and see no reason why it should not be given to the public even in the face of the recommendations made by Mr. Justice Murphy. Therefore, I lay it on the table. As hon. members will see, it is a rather voluminous document. What I have here is the report and the evidence. There is also about a trunkful of exhibits which I said might be sent to the office of the clerk.

MR. COURTRICE.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). I wish to refer to a question asked by the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid). The question was based on an item which appeared in the newspapers and referred to Mr. Courtrice, an employee of the Department of the Interior. I have made inquiries, and find that Mr. Courtrice applied for leave of absence without pay beginning on the 1st of July. He was granted the leave, but, on the reassembling of parliament he was told he must report for duty. He has been at work in the department at his ordinary duties since and including Wednesday afternoon.

THE CENSUS—OMISSIONS IN ENUMERATION.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) whether or not he has any further information about the alleged irregularities in connection with the census. I would like to inform him at the same time, that I have a letter from a gentleman residing in an apartment house in Toronto stating that people in that House to the number of twenty-two were not included in the enumeration. And when he asked the enumerator the reason for this, some very unsatisfactory reply was given, and the enumerator also stated that if any person were omitted they had enough in other respects to make up for any such losses. I have forgotten the exact expression, but it is something like that. I intended to bring the letter in, but omitted to do so. I do not know whether the minister has ascertained yet whether I have the honour to be enumerated or not. I would like very much to know.

Mr. FISHER. I should have preferred not to make a statement until I had had an opportunity for fuller investigation. I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) will send in the names of the people said to have been omitted, so that I may investigate the matter.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I will.

Mr. FISHER. So far as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) himself is concerned I can only make a partial statement, not yet having had an opportunity to investigate the matter fully. The statement given me is that the enumerator called at the hon. gentleman's house when he and Mrs. Borden were out. The servant told him so and said that if he would come back, no doubt they would be in. The statement I have is that he went back five or six times, and was not able to find any body in the house. I am making more careful inquiry to find out whether that means that he was not able to find Mr. or Mrs. Borden, or that he was not able to find anybody at all. The statement made to me, was that he was not able to find any body at all. He did what his duty required in such circumstances and sent an absentee card to the office, which is in the office, and was there when my hon. friend made his statement the other day. That card will ensure that the case will be worked out and fully enumerated.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I made full inquiry, and my information is that the enumerator did state that he would call again, but from that time up to the present, so far as my information goes, he never has called again. Of course, I have no personal knowledge of the matter, but that is the information that comes to me after careful inquiry.

Mr. FISHER. Was the house open all the time?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The house has been open all the time.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—REDUCTIONS ON OVER-CLASSIFICATION, &c.

Mr. LENNOX. I desire to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) if the computations have been made which would enable him to inform the House as to what reductions have been made in expenditure on the Transcontinental in reference to over-classification, overbreak and matters of that kind. The minister will recollect that I asked him, some time ago, in reference to this, and if my recollection is correct that hon. gentleman told me he could not put it in figures at that time because the matter would involve a good deal of investigation before the result could be known. The investigation had been made by the arbitrators and data obtained on which a computation could be made, but at that time it had not been worked out. Perhaps he can inform the House whether that has been done, and if so what is the result, if not, what is the probability of the information being available within a short time.

Mr. GRAHAM. My recollection is that I gave a portion of the figures. But the report of the arbitrator was made in technical terms, and I was not at that time able to have it reduced to dollars and cents. I will make inquiry at once and see if the matter is in the form the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) desires and will give him the information.

ST. PETER'S RESERVE.

Mr. BRADBURY. I desire to ask the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs (Mr. Oliver) with regard to the official documents in the case of the St. Peter's Reserve. I understand that the Royal Commission of Manitoba has made an official request to the minister for the documents and that the understanding was that if the commission made the request the minister would grant it. The commission sits on the 24th instant and it will be difficult to proceed without these documents.

Mr. OLIVER. The requests spoken of have been received, and measures are being taken to furnish the documents as requested, so far as we are able to do so.

CHARGES AGAINST HON. MR. OLIVER.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the orders of the day are called I would like to ask the Prime Minister what is the reason of the delay in calling the committee which the right hon. gentleman moved for. a short time before the adjournment, to inquire into certain matters which, in his opinion, affected the status of the Minister of the Interior. A committee was moved for, was constituted, and I believe had one or two sessions, and was to resume work on the 18th instant. Up to the present time, so far as my information goes, there has been no attempt to call that committee together. If the matter was worthy of public attention, and necessitated the appointment of a committee, I would think it was especially worthy of expedition. I am at a loss to understand why the committee has not been called before this.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Like my hon. friend, I am at a loss to know why it has not been called. I do not know any other reason except that the attendance of the House has been very small; I do not know whether the members of the committee are in the House. When the chairman is here, I shall ask him.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The chairman is waiting for the arrival of the members of the committee. One was here the second day of the session, one only arrived yesterday, and another has not arrived yet. As soon as all the members are here. it is the intention to call the committee together.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I may observe to my hon. friend that if delay in the arrival of the fifth member makes it impossible to go on, the committee might not go on at all this session. I would think the proper course would be to call the committee and to see who is present.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex.) I understand the other members will be here within a day or two.

WAYS AND MEANS—VOTERS' LISTS IN UNORGANIZED DISTRICTS.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. A. C. BOYCE (West Algoma). Before you leave the chair, I desire to refer briefly to the condition of matters in the northern district of Ontario as regards the preparation of the voters' lists for the unorganized portions. As the Prime Minister is aware, there was a good deal of discussion in the session of 1908 as to the methods which were prescribed by the then Election Act for the making up of the voters' lists, and a good deal of criticism was directed to the somewhat cumbrous procedure prescribed by the amendment to that Act. The amendment requires the services of a board of registration, comprising three judges chosen from the adjoining counties, the chairman of which was to be the senior judge of the electoral district for which the lists were to be made up. Now, I have received, as the sitting member, a semi-official notification that no voter' lists are to be made up under that Act, and that no board of registration is being constituted for that purpose. I am not aware, and my right hon. friend will be able to inform me, whether any special proclamation has been issued requiring the voters' lists in those unorganized territories under this Act to be made up at an earlier date than the period prescribed by the statute. If there has been no such proclamation, or if no such proclamation is to be made, then section 9a of the Act will govern, and the lists must be made up between two specified dates, namely, the 1st day of August and the 15th day of October in each year. Now since the discussion ensued upon the making up of these voters' lists a practical test of the workability of the Act has been made, it was made in the year 1908. I know that my right hon. friend will credit my words when I say that, with all the speed that could possibly be put upon the cumbrous machinery that was at the disposal of the district judges, by shortening the available time in a manner which was, according to my view, beyond the jurisdiction of the board of registration within those periods, from the first week in August up to the 26th day of October 1908, the judges were only able, with the kindly assistance of the Department of the Secretary of State, which opened the printing bureau on a Sunday and printed the lists, and then, by the kindly assistance of this government in sending a special train with the lists to the scene of the election, they were able, three hours after the election had commenced, three hours after the polls were opened, to get lists there, which were imperfect and irregular. During the course of revision by the board of registration there was a judgment written out by the board, of which I presume a copy is lodged in the office of the Secretary of State. It is not in my hand at the moment, but I can produce it shortly. The judgment was to the effect exactly as I contend, that under the provisions of this Act it was impossible, within the periods, and with the machinery at the control of the board, to revise and complete the lists within that time.

Now those are the conditions which prevailed in the northern districts in 1908. But the difficulties there are tremendously increased at the present time. There are polls, of which I have received a semi-official notification from the enumerator, which will be opened in the district of West Algoma, to get to which, and to get back again to my home, will require a journey of not less than 2,000 miles. Now what I am told is that the board of registration will have to be a law unto themselves that in making this Act workable and applying it to the preparation of these lists, they are going to cut down all the periods mentioned in the Ontario Voters' Act which governs the period for making up the list under this Act. Consequently the lists cannot be properly prepared. If the enumeration is to take place fifteen days after the notice, or ten days after the notice, as the case may be, there will hardly be time to enable anybody to get there in order to make the enumerator. I am told that in some instances a canoe trip is required, and a great deal of walking and railway travel is necessary in order to reach these polls. Therefore I draw this matter to the attention of the government in order that, before the work of the board of registration is organized and the enumeration of the voters' in these polls is commenced, careful regard should be had to the condition of things which arose in 1908, and that care should be taken to give the necessary time in order that proper lists may be obtained, and that everybody may have an opportunity of seeing that fair lists are made and that a fair revision is had. The lists of 1908 were very unsatisfactory. Names were put upon these lists by the hundred, wthout any attempt to obtain information as regards the qualification of the voters.

That was shown to be the case before the Board of Registration, and in one place many hundreds of names were dropped off. The revision was not so satisfactory in other ridings where that contention was not expressly insisted upon. I should like the government to give some intimation as to whether, under that condition of the law, the Board of Registration is authorized by this Act to shorten the periods which are fixed for the making up of these lists. It is of the most vital importance if we are to have a fair list up there. It is all very well for an enumerator, after having given notice which, by the Act governing the time, is said to be thirty days, and which the Board of Registration reduced to ten days, to be there and get the names of a whole lot of men on a pay roll or from a mine superintendent or a road boss and put them on the list without giving an opportunity for any one to investigate. The Ontario Voters' List Act, amended, of the Dominion Elections Act, is made to govern matters of this kind, provides that a longer time shall be prescribed for the making up of these lists. The section to which I refer reads as follows:

> In the preparation of such lists the provisions of the law of the province regulating the preparation and manner of revising and bringing into force the provincial voters' lists in the like cases shall, as far as possible, be observed and followed, but the revision of the said lists shall be had before the board of registration, who shall hear all appeals from the said enumerators, and no person whose name is not included in the voters' lists so prepared and revised shall be entitled to vote.

Under the Ontario Consolidated Voters' Lists Act of 1907, section 60, not less than thirty days is the time prescribed for posting notices.

Not less than thirty days after the posting of the notices the enumerators shall visit every part of the territory where by the statute or by proclamation of the lieutenant governor there is required to be a polling place, and shall ascertain the names of all persons who are entitled to have their names entered on such lists, including any who may deliver to him an affidavit according to form 22a or 22b.

It is all very well for the enumerator to go to satisfy himself by reference, perhaps, to incorrect information as to the qualifications of voters, but there is a period prescribed by the Ontario Voters' Lists Act for the preparation and making up of these lists just the same as there is under the Assessment Act or in connection with any other procedure in an organized district. Especially is it necessary that sufficient time should be allowed in these remote districts, as we have to face them for the purpose of the preparation and revision of the voters' lists. The polls are absolutely new and are in very recently opened up country and very remote and difficult of access. If the Board of Registration is arbitrarily to be permitted to shorten the period from thirty days to ten days or even less, or to usurp authority not accorded to it by statute in order to make that change, there will be no accurate list of voters in the northern country, and there will be no opportunity afforded to any persons desirous of obtaining an accurate list by means of a fair revision of the list. The Act as originally framed provided that the time for appeal should be thirty days. That appeal has been cut down by the amendment of the Act to ten days. I am most anxious in the interest of a fair voters' list to be prepared under the most difficult conditions, to bring to the notice of the government the fact that if the Board of Registration is to arbitrarily change the law, arrogate to itself the functions of this government, revise and amend the statute and prescribe other days or sets of days and other times than those limited by this statute for the preparation of these lists, there will be greater confusion in that north country in connection with the preparation of these voters' lists than there was in 1908, more inconvenience and very great dissatisfaction with the methods which are employed in the making up of these lists.

Mr. LANCASTER. And disfranchisement.

Mr. BOYCE. Disfranchisement to a very large extent, as my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) says. But that is not the worst danger that we have to fear in the preparation of these lists. The danger is accentuated by the shortening of the time, the lessening of the power to get information. The tendency is to put on the list holus bolus as it were, if I may use the expression, unqualified men who are not entitled to be on the list at all with an utter lack of any opportunity of enforcing the provisions of the Act or of ascertaining the qualifications of these men and of getting such particulars as it is fair and reasonable that every one should have in order to secure a fair list. I know of my own knowledge that in the preparation of the lists in 1908 men were put upon those lists who came upon the same train as the enumerator had come upon to prepare the lists, from an adjoining province not possessing the qualification of residence or other qualifications required by the Ontario Voters' Lists Act. These men were put on actually while they were in a condition of transit as being residents of a polling subdivision in which they had never set foot at the time the enumerator put their names on the lists. How was that done? That was done in the simplest possible manner and in such a way as to give the enumerators as little trouble as possible. He simply went to a camp foreman, an irresponsible person, a gentleman possibly concerned in promoting the interest of one side or the other, in this case interested in promoting the candidature of the gentleman who was seeking the suffrages of the people in behalf of this government, and got a list from him as of the persons in the polling subdivision who were qualified to be put upon the lists. That list, given to the enumerator by an absolutely irresponsible person, in so far as any oath of office or other qualification was concerned, was taken by this enumerator, sworn to discharge his duty and make up a list according to the requirements of the Ontario Voters' List Act. It contained hundreds of names while the qualified voters numbered somewhat under 100. The lists were made up, they were sworn to by the enumerator and they were published and went out to the world as the authorized lists of voters in that polling subdivision. That is not a fair administration of the Act. I think the right hon. Prime Minister will see that it was not that kind of an administration of the Act that in 1908 he proposed to have. I think he will agree with me that it was an outrage upon the provisions of this Act, and my purpose in addressing myself now to the House is to ask the right hon. gentleman and those directly concerned with the administration of this department to see to it that there shall not be a recurrence in 1911 of the wrongs and outrages which took place in 1908.

When this Act was framed in 1908 my right hon. friend, with some hesitation, said that he hoped it would be workable. Strong objections were made by myself and others as to the workability of it, we having some personal knowledge of the local conditions, but I hope that my right hon. friend will realize that it is undesirable that the conditions to which I have referred shall again obtain in that part of the country.

It was stated by my right hon. friend that the act was intended to procure a fair voters' list, but I would refer him and his Minister of Justice to the proceedings and records of the Board of Registration to ascertain whether the provisions of the Act do provide for a fair voters' list. There is a ruling in writing by the Board, in which all members of the Board concur, that the proceedings necessary to procure proper lists under this Act could not be performed within the time and in the manner prescribed by the Act, and the Board went so far in the first instance as to say that the election then pending would have to be postponed in order that proper lists might be obtained. The Board, finding it had no power to interfere with the currency of the writ then issued, reconsidered their finding and decided to make a law unto themselves and to have a special train for the Board to carry its court from poll to poll to revise these lists. We know what confusion ensued; where the lists had to be sent down, the Secretary of State fetched from his constituency in a motor car, the printing bureau working on Sunday in violation of the Lord's Day Act and a special train sent out with the lists to Sault Ste. Marie, and along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I desire that the government should give me this information: Has there been a proclamation under the Act of 1908 prescribing an earlier day for the making up of these voters' lists; if so, when will the work of enumeration be started and how long is it expected, from the most recent advice the government has, that it will take; and, will the government see to it that the Board of Registration is prevented in this instance from arrogating to itself the functions of government by abridging the time which by this Act is directed to be followed as far as possible. The words, 'as far as possible' are introduced into section 5 of the Act. But who can say that in a territory so vast that one has to travel 2,000 miles to go to and from these polls that the time limited by the Ontario Act is unfair. Who will say that when in order to get to a place to make up these lists one has to travel into an almost unknown region, that the thirty days prescribed by the Ontario Act for the preparation of the appeal and the holding of the Court, should, under the difficult conditions existing, be curtailed, or any other period prescribed by the Board of Registration, to the prejudice of those who are anxious to have a fair list. This is a vital subject, and I would urge the government to consider the difficult conditions existing in that country, especially in West Algoma, where it is exceedingly difficult to get to these far distant polls where up to a year or two ago no white man's foot had ever stepped. In this territory, I have been told, that two or three thousand names are to be put on the lists. I can scarcely credit that. In the face of the imminence of a repetition of the various irregularities of procedure of 1908, I urge upon the government the very great necessity, in the interests of a fair election, of seeing that the procedure prescribed by the law is strictly followed.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. The administration of the statute which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyce) has referred to is not in any way in the hands of the Department of Justice nor is it, I think, in the hands of any department of the government. The idea with which this statute was framed, and the intention of parliament in passing it, was that the preparation of the voters' lists in the unorganized portions of Ontario should be in the hands of the judges of the various courts of the districts constituting this unorganized territory, who were thought to be the best people for the practical administration of the provisions of the statute. The statute having been framed and passed with that intention it seems to me it is now in position to be worked out without reference to any kind of governmental supervision or control. The conditions which existed three years ago when this statute was for the first time coming into practical operation were of somewhat unusual character. Before, under the statute, it was possible to complete the lists the House was dissolved and a general election was called. That general election being fixed for the latter part of October and the lists being in preparation during the immediately preceding months it may very probably be that there was need for limiting, to the very briefest period which the statute would permit, the times during which the various steps towards the preparation of a voters' list should be taken. The Secretary of State of that day did, I believe, concern himself to a very considerable extent, in an effort to be of assistance to the judges in working out the provisions of the Act. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyce) says that the practical operation of the statute at that time was in its result not satisfactory. That is probably a matter of opinion. At all events I have never heard any complaint with reference to the result of the operation of the statute in question, upon that, the only occasion upon which it has been operated, except the complaint which has come from the hon. gentleman himself. I am encouraged to think that there has not been any need felt of amendment to the provisions of this statute, from the circumstance that not only has no suggestion of amendment at any time come from any of the numerous judges who were concerned three years ago in working under this statute, nor has there been so far as I am able now to remember any suggestion of amendment made by even the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyce) himself.

No amendment has been proposed to this House during the sessions that we have had, and I have been gratified to think from that circumstance that this statute, which, as I have no doubt everybody who hears me is aware, I myself framed, has been found to answer well the purposes for which it was passed. In regard to the present situation, fortunately we are not in the same position that existed three years ago. No one, I presume, has any expectation that the general elections which follow upon a dissolution of this House, are any where in sight, or are at all liable to take place until there has been at least one session or perhaps two sessions more. In these circumstances there seems no danger to be apprehended that it may be found necessary on the part of the learned judges who are at present engaged in the preparation of these lists to curtail at all the time which the statute provides for taking the various steps.

Mr. W. R. SMYTH (East Algoma). Mr. Speaker, I can speak as one who suffered somewhat from the iniquitous lists that were gotten up by this government in 1908, perhaps more so than any other member of this House; in fact, so much so, that it was necessary for the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice or the Secretary of State to send up eight or nine of the helmeted gentlemen who stand around the corridors of this House, and other parts of this city, to protect life, and property during the voting period in the backwoods of Algoma. The manner in which the lists were gotten up there ought to bring a blush of shame to the right hon. the premier, who now sits looking me in the face, when I tell him that there were 630 names placed on the voters' lists 50 miles from civilization, and placed under the control of followers of this government who controlled the camps where the men worked. One of the enumerators whom I questioned as to how he came to get so many names on the list, and as to whether he was satisfied that these men were still in the woods or were in the woods at all, said to me: 'I got some of them from the foreman of the camp, some from a certain gentleman in Blind River, a lawyer who was very friendly to this government, and some from men in the woods who were coming out.' These men who were placed on the lists were hired in the city of Hull, in the city of Ottawa, and in different parts of the province of Quebec, and their names were placed on the lists the moment they set their foot in Blind River or between that and the place for the polling. They were so unacquainted with that part of Ontario that the gentleman who took their names from them was not able to understand one-half of them; so he took a jump at them, and those who were placed wrongfully on the lists had substitutes on polling day when they came to vote. 630 appeared at the polling booth, and 230 voted. The balance of the 630 refused to take the oath, because they were conscientious men after all; but that was no credit to the government, who placed their names on the lists. To show you that the lists were gotten up in a partisan spirit, under the hands of those friendly to the government, at the dictation I have no doubt of some of the members of the government, those men were practically placed in the position of criminals, and your humble servant was placed in a very peculiar position. When I or my agent objected to those names being placed on the list, I sent a subpoena to every man on the lists who I knew had no right to be there, and because I did not accompany it with conduct money, these men did not appear at the revision, and the judges allowed every name to remain on the list. The result of the election in these bush polls was of course exactly what we expected. I had the magnificent number of 18 votes to my credit as against 200 or more to the credit of the gentleman who intended to have their votes, and got them. As my hon. friend from West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) has said, there should be no curtailment of time in getting up the lists in the northern parts of Ontario at any rate. The distances are great. Although I live within a hundred miles of some of the points in my constituency, I have to travel 570 miles to get to those points. Moreover, a great many people do not see the proclamation at all, because they are scattered in batches through the woods, while the proclamations are posted only where there are school houses or at other public places; so that in many parts of Algoma the men entitled to vote do not know that a proclamation has been issued, and that their names are on the lists until it is too late. Now we have a new condition of affairs in that district. There is now the district of Porcupine, with a great number of people there who were not there at the time of the last election. I am told that there are some 10,000 people there. Then, we have the Grand Trunk Pacific crossing the northern part of the district of Algoma, and that is hard to get at. So that it is necessary for this government to see that plenty of time is given, and that a careful list is made up in the northern parts of this province. I hope the government will not repeat what they did in 1908. I think it was a very unfair handicap. I am never afraid to go up against any reasonable proposition in an election, so much so that I have the honour, which perhaps no other member of this House has, of having won four general elections in six years. So that I am not any ways afraid where there is not such a handicap placed upon me as was the case in the last campaign. I was glad, however, that the good people who were entitled to vote knew what they were voting for, and placed me in this House. I hope the next time we shall not have the same handicap.

Mr. BOYCE. I yould ask for an answer to the question which I put.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sorry I cannot give any answer to my hon. friend. The administration, so far as this Act is concerned is in the hands of the Secretary of State (Mr. Muprhy) who is not in his seat to-day. He will, however, I have no doubt, read the remarks of my hon. friend and give an answer on Monday.

EXPRESS RATES, PARCEL POST SYSTEM.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). For a few moments I wish to refer to a matter which I brought before the House the other day, in connection with the principle of state ownership in competition with private ownership, in order to secure better treatment for the public.

I pointed out that in the province of Ontario, where there is state ownership now in regard to hydro-electric power, there is a great improvement, and I urged that by the same instrument a great improvement could be made in the telegraph and cable charges in this country, if we adopted state ownership. I also elicited from the Postmaster General the statement that state ownership was likely to obtain in the matter of telegraphs and especially in connection with cables, and that an understanding had been reached by the Postmaster General of England in association with the Postmaster General of this country to have state ownership, and, therefore, a reduction in the tolls. While I am referring to that I wish to say that I hope no agreement will be made by which, for a small reduction in the telegraph and cable tolls, the right of the state to intervene and to establish its own cables will be interfered with. No parliament should part with a sovereign right of the state. That was done some years ago to the great disadvantage of the province of Ontario, when the Ross government gave a monopoly to three companies to develop power at the Niagara frontier, and bound the state that as long as that franchise existed the state would not interfere. This was a wrong. The state cannot part with a sovereign right in that manner, and if it does any other parliament can rescind the Act. The same thing could happen in connection with the telegraphs and cables, if the state agreed, for a small reduction to postpone the experiment of state ownership.

Having said that, I wish to come to another practical point where state ownership will render great benefit to the people of this country. This is in connection with the post office and the parcel post. The people of this country are to-day paying exorbitant express charges. It is true the Railway Commission had undertaken to reduce them, but the process has been very slow, and the people of Canada are dissatisfied with the express rates obtaining in this country. While the express companies which are owned by the railway companies, are making an enormous profit out of their charges.

Just to show you what can be done in this matter, I may say that only the other day the Railway Commission of the United States intimated to the express companies that they proposed overhauling their rates. The result was that a great reduction has already taken place in express charges. It was not only the threat of the railway commission which reduced the rates in the United States, but rather also the well known fact that there is a widespread agitation in that country to-day for the adoption of the parcel post system of England. We have in Canada a better parcel post system than they have in the United States, but our system is not as good as the English system. The effect of the English parcel post system—and in fact of the European parcel post system—because they have a better one in Germany—is to give the people an express service which does not cost one-third of the rate prevalent in Canada, and there is no such thing in England or Germany as the tyranny of the express companies so well known in America to-day.

Some centuries ago, the greatest departure in scientific subjects was when Sir Francis Bacon came forward with his great work in regard to scientific investigation. He said he had found a new instrument or new method in regard to scientific investigation, which he called the principle of induction. This brought about a revolution in scientific discoveries and in philosophy. Well, the great political principle to-day in regard to economics is state competition, as against these great public service corporations.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not good for reciprocity.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I do not see the point of my hon. friend's remark. However, if we cannot have absolute public ownership in this country, we can at least have the state in competition with these companies. I have tried to show the other day that if the Intercolonial system were extended we would have a reduction in freight rates. This seems to me to be a self evident fact. To-day we have an organized parcel post system in this country which ought to be extended. The government is pledged not to extend it because the railway companies have told them they must not do so, using this pretense that if the parcel post rates are reduced the country storekeeper will be injured. There may be something in that, but it is a peculiar thing that every time I heard that argument, I was able to trace it back to the express companies. My contention is that all the people of Canada would be greatly benefited if the parcel post system of this country were extended and put on the same basis as the parcel post system of Great Britain, and still more if it were put on the basis of the parcel post system of Germany. Every citizen of this country feels the burden of these express charges, and while the Railway Commission has not yet been able to catch up with them and effect a reduction, I think we ought to go ahead and increase the weight of the parcels we allow to go through the parcel post. We ought to reduce the rates, and make them what they are in Great Britain or in Germany. If we do that a great benefit will be conferred on our people.

Just to show you that the railways dictate the policy in regard to these matters, I need only tell you what is admitted to be the case in the United States. It has been found that the railways control the express companies. The shareholders of the express companies are pretty well spread out, and have brought a great deal of influence to bear in arguing that the parcel post system cannot be adopted, much less extended. John Wanamaker, the late Postmaster General of the United States was asked while he was in office why the people of the United States could not have a parcel post system. He said there were four reasons, and the four reasons he gave were the names of the four great express companies operating in that country, every one of which is controlled by the railways. The railway lobby in the Senate of the United States has been all powerful for 20 years, and it is, apparently, all powerful yet. But the day of relief is at hand, and the widespread movement in the United States for the adoption of a parcel post system, in connection with the threat of the Interstate Railway Commission to reduce the rates, has brought about a great reduction in the express charges in force.

Every time the attempt has been made it has been stopped by some great influence, and that influence comes from the railways. We are told that we were to have an international court in regard to railway matters. The chairman of our commission, and the chairman of the United States commission in consultation devised a scheme, and I believe it was authorized by law. But somebody has interfered, and it is a dead letter. My information is that the railways have been sufficiently powerful with the government to have the proposal tied up, and made innocuous so far as they are concerned. If these corporations can exert such an influence, if for twenty years they have been able to prevent the expansion of our parcels post, the people of this country ought to know it, especially in view of the fact that an election is near at hand. The people ought to have an opportunity to say whether we are to have the benefit of the parcel post system. It is all very well to have a skeleton of the system, but that is not enough; you must have life in it. The life is this principle of state competition with these corporations. Extend your parcel post system, and the express rates in Canada will be cut in two to-morrow. I would remind the House, of the experience I had in the Railway Committee some years ago. I took some action with a view to bringing the express companies within the purview of the Railway Act. We had a special committee on the subject of which Sir William Mulock was chairman. At our first meeting the express companies appeared by their lawyers, and presented the argument that they could not be brought under the Railway Act, because they carried parcels partly by water, and only partly by rail. That was argued for two days. When the lawyers were through, I said: If that is your argument it would be better for us to seek relief in an expansion of the parcel post system. The lawyer came back next day, and withdrew his whole argument, admitting that the express companies could be brought within the operation of the Act. The railway companies which own the express companies feared the competition of a state-owned, state-operated parcel post system. Nothing would do so much to improve conditions in the west as to bring into operation the principle of which I have spoken. I challenge representatives of the west to say what they think of the efficacy of the parcel post system in reducing express charges. The competition of state-owned utilities with telegraphs, cables and express would be a great relief to the people of the west. The proposition is self evident, and only needs to be applied. And the only reason I can find why the people of the west, and of Canada generally to-day are paying exorbitant express charges is that the expansion of our parcel post system has been checked. The fruit men of Ontario, time and time again, have brought forward their grievances in connection with the transportation of their products. I may be told: The parcel post system could not handle fruit. Why, in Germany the post office handles all kinds of farm products. And it not only takes the farmers' products to town, but it markets the goods, and brings back the money, and the empty package to the farmer at night. And the farmers and florists, and other producers in England use the parcel post system in the same way. This system has been the great instrument in the reduction of express charges. And if that is done in Europe, there is no reason why it should not be done here. The system would be of great advantage to the farmers also in making purchases in the city, which purchases have to be carried over long distances. In the application of this principle that I advocate there is far more for the people than in this vaunted reciprocity. Give our people cheap transportation rates, and they will get better prices for their products. The return to the farmer is measured by the freight charge for the rule of the railway men is to charge all the traffic will bear. On the other hand, the state in competition with the railway that seeks to give the service at as low a rate as possible for the benefit of all. But here in Canada, and in America generally, which pretends to be the progressive part of the world is the most completely tied up to corporations. You cannot get for the people benefits that have been enjoyed by the people of Europe for fifty years past. It has been a surprise to me that not a single man from western Canada, so far as I know, has stood up in the House, and presented the high railway charges put upon the people of the west. I made a speech not long ago dealing with this question in connection with Canadian Pacific railway rates. There are members of the grain growers' organizations in the west who have defended their own rights. They have been in conference with the Prime Minister, and he has proposed to meet their grievances by giving reciprocity. I have had letters from some of these grain growers' associations, and one thing mentioned in these letters was the fact that when I ventilated the proposition not a single member from the west protested against the exorbitant and unfair charges of the railways. I contend that the relief to the people of the Canadian west is not to be found in reciprocity, but in reduced railway charges. Do not you suppose that the Canadian Pacific railway could reduce its passenger rates, with the enormous travel they have on all their trains? They could easily give the people a two cent rate. But they will never do it until they are forced to do it. And a railway commission will never force them to do it, but state competition will bring it about in a single day. If my voice can reach the people of this country—and it may be difficult for me to make myself heard beyond this House—it will make known to the people this new political economic principle, and its effect in helping the development of the country, and affording relief to the people from unfair treatment by great and powerful corporations. That principle is the competition of the state with these corporations. The state must either tie these corporations down or go into competition with them. We already have that principle applied in part. We have telegraph lines of our own, and we have a parcel post system. But these must be energized and made effective, and their tolls reduced. And somebody must be put in charge of the department who will realize that, as this is a great public department, public service is expected of it.

I give the Post Office Department credit for doing considerable service for the people of Canada. There have been improvements, but the greatest improvements that can be made is to follow the lines of the post office department in European countries, and give us an efficacious parcel post system, a system that will meet the wants of the people. It won't hurt the railway companies. The right hon. gentleman and his friends say they believe in the doctrine of competition. Let us have competition, but don't let us have combination. There is combination now. The railways combine to keep up the rates, and they terrorize the government so that the government will not provide competition. Now, let us give the competition, and let it be a state competition if necessary. But let us have that competition, and a great benefit will accrue to the people of this country, a benefit that will not depend upon the whims of another nation, but upon the action of our own government. It is for the state to see that the people get fair and just treatment, and an excellent and cheap service. My object will be served if, in some way, the attention of this country can be drawn to this great new principle, that of state competition against corporations, which are exorbitant in their charges, which are arrogant in their treatment of the public, and will only do their duty when they are compelled to. Now, I trust the Postmaster General will have even more to say than he said the other day when he admitted that he was doing something to reduce the cable tolls, and that, perhaps, something would be done to reduce telegraph tolls. But it is not promises we want, it is performances., The old Greek adage was that to play upon the heart you must play upon the heart, and the only way to bring the express companies to time is by establishing a parcel post system. If you do that we will then have, within one day, an improvement, we can cut the express charges in this country in two. There is something that the government can do for the people of this nation.

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). I am almost inclined to believe in telepathy, for I have been for several days working on a plan to establish a parcel post system. I have been much interested of late in reading a very able series of articles published in 'McClure's Magazine' of New York, and in one or two other magazines, on this very important question. In fact, my hon. friend probably knows that there is an editor in New York, a Mrs. Low, who for the past few years has made a special study of the application of a parcel post system to the United States. In my hon. friend's statement there are many things with which I agree. The parcel post system in Europe, especially in England, France and Germany, has been a boon to the people of those countries. It is surprising what distance a parcel can be carried at a cheap rate. When one compares the cost of carrying a parcel between Canada and Great Britain with the cost of carrying a parcel between Toronto and Halifax, one cannot but be surprised at the discrepancy between the charges. It costs more money to send a parcel from one Canadian town to another, or from one province to another, than it costs to send the same parcel across the Atlantic. You may ask why that is so. Wel, it is one of those things that can hardly be explained. You may ask why a letter sent from Dover to Calais, from the shores of England to the shores of France, costs five cents, and a letter sent from Halifax to the Yukon, or to Melbourne, Australia, only costs two cents. That is one of the secrets connected with the mail systems of the world. As I said, I have taken a great deal of interest in this question since I took office. My hon. friend will remember that about 1906 or 1907, I made an announcement that the department was preparing a parcel post system for Canada. My hon. friend states that the old enemy is the railway corporations. I cannot say that it is the railway corporations. I supose my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) would be better informed than myself on that subject. But this singular fact occurred at the time I speak of. The moment the announcement was made that a policy could be shaped within twenty-four hours—because the Postmaster General has all the powers to start a parcel post system within a very short time with the legislation already upon the statute book in the Post Office Act—as I was saying, the moment it was announced that we could readily establish a parcel post system in Canada, at once, for weeks and for months, the department was simply flooded with petitions against such a system. These petitions did not come from cities, but they were signed by farmers and by country storekeepers, and the argument which they used against the establishment of that system was that the departmental stores would get all the benefits of the system. One peculiarity which struck me at the time was that all these petitions from every province were couched in the same terms. they were all either printed or typewritten, and the language was the same. There is apparently an organization against the establishment of a parcel post. In my judgment a parcel post should benefit the farmers and benefit the outlying districts, and I was surprised to find these objections coming from farming districts and from the storekeepers. On many occasions I have tried to take up this question. I think that a good preliminary to the establishment of a parcel post system has been the rural mail delivery. This, I may say, is on a fair way to success. I am pleased to inform the House that this year, in the city of Toronto, we are manufacturing 100,000 boxes for the rural mail system. I am pleased to state that in many of the most populous counties of Ontario, in some of the western provinces, and in some of the eastern provinces, the system is expanding daily, the department is spending freely, and I believe intelligently in that direction.

Mr. LALOR. Has the minister, in connection with a parcel post system. considered what size or weight of package he would send through the mail?

Mr. LEMIEUX. This would require a detailed statement, which I am not able to give. I have some figures, and from the investigations which I have ordered, and which are now being made under the direction of Mr. Ross, of Toronto, if the parcel post is established we would have to provide for parcels of the same weight and dimension as those carried in Great Britain. I forget what are the weights mentioned, but I can give that right away.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I would like to ask the Postmaster General if, in view of the fact that he is considering the possibility of instituting a parcel post, he has found it advisable to consider the question of increasing the size of the rural post boxes. They would not hold a pound of butter or of sugar. I think they cost about $2 apiece.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend refers to what we call the King Edward or rural mail delivery box?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is a fair sized box. At all events it is only a matter of detail. I would say, speaking in favour of the parcel post, that the Post Office Department has the whole machinery in its hands and can within a short time start a parcel post system better than the railway or express companies can, because the express companies only reach certain points, whereas the Post Office Department reaches the 15,000 post offices that are spread from one end of this country to the other.

Mr. LALOR. That would depend on the size of the package.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Certainly. If we were to establish that system the railway companies would immediately apply for higher rates. They are at present applying for higher rates.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). What railway?

Mr. LEMIEUX. All the railways.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Has the Canadian Pacific railway applied for higher rates?

Mr. LEMIEUX. All railways—even the Intercolonial railway. We are paying mail subsidies to the Intercolonial railway —the government railway. The state-owned railways are also looking after their own interests. We have more difficulties with my hon. friend the Minister of Railways in the way of rates than with the private corporations. But, the first question to be dealt with would be to fix the standard of rates, because, of course, the mail cars would not only be filled with the ordinary mail matter, but the parcel post would take up a considerable portion of the space. Therefore, you would at once have to face the issue whether the railway mail rates should have to be raised. That is one part of it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would the Postmaster General tell me whether the arrangement with the railway companies at present is by weight or lump sum?

Mr. LEMIEUX. On the basis of mileage. It is 4 and 8 cents a mile. We have some old contracts with the earlier railway companies under which we pay less than 4 cents when it is a baggage car service, but the standard rates to-day are 4 cents if we use baggage cars and 8 cents if we use the railway mail cars. In the United States it is on a weight basis, but they are going to change it. They have experienced very many difficulties in coming to a settlement. There was a commission in session in New York for several months composed of officials of the United States government conducting an investigation and they found that the Post Office Department of the United States had been mulcted by the railways since the establishment of the mail service.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the minister know what the arrangement is in Great Britain in respect of parcel post between the post office and the railways?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I could not give my hon. friend that information. I did not expect that this question would come up this afternoon, but, in Great Britain they have the telegraph, telephone and cables, and a most perfect system of parcel post. What special arrangements they have with the railway companies I could not say, but of course they pay subsidies as we do.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). But they give a fine service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. A splendid service—the best in the world.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Let us try it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. But my hon. friend must not forget, and this must be credited to the post office system not only in Canada, but in the United States, that the conditions are very different. You can travel from London to Paris in less than a day, while here it would take more than a week to travel from one end of the country to the other. Therefore, that has always to be considered in the establishing of any such service. Several months ago, after the publication of those very able articles in the United States by people who have made a special study of this case, I gave Mr. Ross of Toronto, who is personally in favour of the parcel post system, authority to look around and consult with people, especially in Ontario, where I met, a few years ago, the strongest opposition, I am sorry to say, when this question was mooted for the first time. I have instructed him to investigate and prepare a report. I expect this report very shortly and then I will be able to say something more definite upon the question. I am glad that my hon. friend has brought this question before the House this afternoon, in order to invite the attention of the country and the House to the consideration of this very important system.

Mr. LALOR. I desire to say a word in reference to the matter of excessive rates brought forward this afternoon by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). I do not know of anything to-day in Canada that is a greater handicap to the business of the country than the rates that are charged by express companies. That applies more particularly to the north-western provinces than to any other part of Canada. I speak from experience because the concern of which I am president in my own town fills an express car every day with express parcels. Most of these parcels are small and they go to all parts of the country. During the fall of the year, the busy season, we probably ship to a greater extent than a car load a day. I find that the rates are most excessive. In the western Canadian provinces they are handicapped to such an extent that it is almost impossible for them to give you repeat orders for goods to be shipped to them when they have to go by express. They have to give you large orders, buy once a year, and get their goods shipped by freight for the reason that if they repeat and have a parcel sent to them by express they are unable to pay the excessive freight charges. I know that in one case where I shipped a parcel, and not a very large one either, to British Columbia, the express charges on it were $90—over one-third of the entire value of the whole parcel. The result of it is, as I have already stated, that business is handicapped in the west and it is handicapped in the east too, because wholesale merchants and manufacturers in the east are unable to get these repeat orders that they should have on account of these exorbitant and extravagant express charges. A further handicap when you ship by express is that if you happen to ship from your own station by a Canadian express company to a point at which they have no office and the parcel is handed over to the American express company, they charge you double rates. Altogether the people are actually robbed by the express rates in this country. I do not know of anything to-day in Canada that needs investigation and looking into to such an extent as do the express rates. Two or three years ago there was an investigation into some of these express companies and the profits they were making were so exorbitant that one could hardly believe the figures when he read them. We have, as the hon. member for South York has stated, transferred to the Railway Commission power to regulate freight rates. I do not want to find any fault with the Railway Commission.

That Board has been doing good work and I think the people of Canada appreciate it, but, I cannot understand what is the trouble with them in connection with these express rates. It is two years since this matter went before them and there has not been a word from them in connection with it. Are they making any effort to relieve the people of this country from these exorbitant rates and charges; if they are, we know nothing about it. I am also interested in a line of business in the United States and the rates there are far different from what they are in Canada because you can ship quite a parcel in the United States for ten cents, whereas in Canada there is no rate under 25 or 35 cents. The question of express rates in this country is of the greatest importance, and I hope the Railway Commission will move more expeditiously in the matter than they have done.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is there in Haldimand county the same prejudice on the part of country store keepers against departmental stores as there is in other parts of Canada?

Mr. LALOR. There is no doubt that the country merchants are very generally opposed to the parcel post system especially if large parcels are to be taken through the mails. The large departmental stores are a very great handicap to the country merchant, and it is very doubtful indeed whether they give the people much greater value than they get from the country stores. There is a strong inclination on the part of the people of the country to take a catalogue issued by one of these departmental stores and order something that is now sent to them by express, and if there was a parcel post system, it is very questionable whether this practice would not be carried on to an enormous extent to the detriment of the country merchants. The parcel post system is a debatable question, and it is possible that in the interests of the public generally, it might be carried too far.

Mr. SPROULE. Of late years it has become so easy for great corporations to coalesce under the same management or arrive at an understanding with regard to rates that the public are often unfairly treated in the matter of charges for the use of these public facilities. This applies to railway companies, express companies, telephone companies, telegraph companies and others. It is universally admitted that it is very difficult for parliament to interfere with these wealthy corporations for the protection of the people. So powerful are they and so far-reaching the influences they can bring to bear on governments that it is almost impossible to get any government with sufficient moral courage to grapple with them in the public interest. I was a member of a committee to inquire into certain rates charged by public utilities, of which Sir William Mulock was chairman. From every part of the country there were people coming to these corridors, lobbying the members, telling them what would happen to their political friends, what great injustice would be done these corporations, how the public would suffer, and bringing every influence to bear on the representatives of the people and of the government to stop interference. It has been said over and over again that but for the influence brought to bear on the government at that time to frustrate the plans of Sir Wm. Mulock, that gentleman would not be on the bench to-day but would still be a minister of the Crown. They made it so disagreeable for him that he chose to leave public life rather than to submit to the indignities heaped upon him. I was a member of that committee and I know what difficulties confronted him. In my judgment the solution is either independent competition which will afford reasonable charges, or otherwise absolute control of these utilities by parliament. Parliament must deal with that problem one way or the other. I believe the time has come when no government can remain in power that is not possessed of sufficient moral stamina to grapple with these problems. We have tried competition by subsidizing other lines of railway and granting other charters, but our experience is that when competition appears these interests get their heads together and come to an understanding for their own benefit and remove the competition we expected to get. We have in a measure tried control under the Railway Commission which, although it does not come up to our full expectations, is certainly doing something. Perhaps it is not doing all we expected of it, because we have not given it greater powers.

Now, what has competition accomplished? Have we examples from sources that are not controlled by corporations to show whether it does good or not? I cited an example to this House many years ago which will bear repeating—the carriage of grain by a private-owned railway as compared with its carriage by the government-owned railway at a figure which the government declared paid, but which the private corporations have not been satisfied with as sufficient to enable them to pay their enormous dividends. The Canada Atlantic railway, a private corporation, carried wheat, for instance, 346 miles for 2.27½ cents, a little over 2¼ cents a bushel, while the government railway carried it 828 miles, nearly three times the distance, for the same charge. That was healthy competition. When that fact was brought out, the Minister of Railways was asked if it paid to carry the grain at that figure. The answer was that having regard to the return cargo it did pay. That is one concrete illustration among several that I could give which will serve to show the advantage of healthy competition. If the Intercolonial railway had been extended to Parry Harbour so that it could have taken the grain from there instead of receiving it at Montreal from the Grand Trunk railway, it could have hauled it from Parry Harbour to Halifax for very much less than it cost to haul it jointly by the private-owned railway and the government-owned railway; and had the government railway been extended to the Georgian Bay, there is no doubt that the private-owned railway would have been obliged by the competition to reduce its rates. Let me give another example that came within my own experience a few years ago. I required to get a piece of machinery of only 400 or 500 weight from a firm between 30 and 40 miles east of Toronto. The charge for delivering that in Toronto was $5; yet a farmer offered to haul it with his team at the same price, although we did not give him any subsidy to help him to carry it, while we subsidized the railway very heavily. Then, I take the express charges. Farmers often have to get a small piece of machinery. I have had to do it more than once—a piece of machinery that cost me 25 cents, and I have paid 40 or 50 cents express to have it carried less than 50 miles. This is exorbitant and unfair, and there should be some authority in the land to see that justice is done to those who are compelled to use these public utilities. The same is the case with regard to the telephone and the telegraph system. I remember ordering a small article a part of a farming implement, through the telephone at a distance of less than a hundred miles. The article cost me 40 cents; and the express and telephone cost me $1.20. And that is called reasonable. I say it is little better than thievery, and so long as there is not some authority in the land to control these public utilities, so long will these exorbitant charges continue. On one occasion in this House, when the government was being criticised for not controlling the railways in the interest of the farmers, the Hon. Edward Blake made this remark: 'I have often thought of it and have searched my brain to find some means of controlling them, but I have long since come to the conclusion that it cannot be done, for two reasons, that these corporations, when they do wrong, have no body to be whipped, and they have no soul to be damned.' Therefore they go on with evidently no fear of the future. If these corporations were not earning big dividends, it might be pleaded on their behalf that they were not making exorbitant charges; but when you see the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway selling up to between 200 and 300 per cent, you can take this as evidence that their earning powers and their returns from the subsidies which parliament gave them, are yielding them more than they are entitled to. So it is with the express companies. The glimpse which the railway commission has recently given the public of what these companies have been doing has shown that what they have been making out of the public has been away out of proportion to what was required to pay a large dividend on every dollar they invested in the service. I join with the hon. member for South York every time in demanding that these public utilities should be brought under such control, if there is no possibility of having a healthy and permanent competition, as to secure for the people the service of these utilities at a moderate and reasonable cost.

The sooner parliament deals with it the better. Some may say it is a heavy task, but parliament is here for that purpose, and we should never shrink from any task that confronts us as parliamentarians or as a parliament. These problems are not impossible of solution if we apply ourselves to them, and until that is done I will be an advocate of government ownership of these utilities, or absolute control over them by some commission, power or authority which will force these corporations to do what they ought to do in the interests of the great users of these public utilities.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I was not present when this discussion started, but I have heard enough from those who have spoken to understand that this is one of the most important matters which could possibly come before this parliament. Originally, I understand the question had to deal with parcel posts, but it seems to have extended a little beyond that, and taken in the express rates and freight rates.

If there is any part of this country of ours where this question is all important, it is the west. I do not intend to say very much about freight rates now, because, if I understand it, it is not the intention of the hon. gentleman who first brought up the question to have the matter dealt with now, but when the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) introduces legislation into this House to give a guarantee of $35,000,000 to the Canadian Northern railway for a railway from Port Arthur east, and only gives $2,000,000 to build the Hudson bay railway, to use an expression far more forcible than elegant, I think that is simply rotten legislation, and had it not been that we were about to have an election we would never have heard of such rotten legislation being introduced.

We have no parcel post in this country, so I do not know that there is very much use spending time discussing it, we have, however, express rates and freight rates which are very unsatisfactory. I would like to have an answer from some member of the government. I would ask the government if the present Railway Commission has full jurisdiction over the express rates of this country.

Mr. GRAHAM. Personally I have no doubt that the legislation now on the statute-boks gives the Railway Commission full authority over the express rates in the Dominion of Canada, but it does not cover international express rates.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I was referring to the Canadian express rates only.

Mr. GRAHAM. To make it explicit, if my hon. friend will put his question on the Order Paper, it will be answered.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I will do so. There is no question about the freight rates and express rates being too high, and I agree with any hon. gentleman who says in this House that it is the duty of this government to take the matter up. It is one of the most serious grievances of the west, and if the government had been as anxious to settle the grievances over which they have control as they have been in running to Washington, in an endeavour to do something which a great many people think is of no use, they would have been doing something for the benefit of the country. Through rates are not so bad. If you go west of Winnipeg and ship goods to Port Arthur or further east, you get practically the same rates as they have in the United States for similar distances. That being so, why should the western local express and freight rates be so high?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to endorse very fully all that has been said by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), my hon friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner), and my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) in regard to the overcharges in express and freight rates. Without desiring to take up the time of the House with a reiteration of the arguments which have been so far laid before us, I would like to place on record one instance of the way in which the public of western Canada—and probably the whole of Canada—are being robbed by the railway companies in freight rates. The railway companies of the west advertise that pedigreed live stock is carried at half rates. On the face of it this looks pretty well. It looks as though it were in the interest of the farmers and of agriculture. But when any one happens to send a pure-bred animal from one point to another, he finds that instead of paying half rates he is paying full rate, because of the method followed by the railway company, which is to double the weight of the animal, and then cut the transportation rate in two.

I see that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) smiles, but I happen to have in my pocket the proof of what I am saying. I have here a bill which I received myself last week, for freight on a thoroughbred stallion. If my hon. friend knows anything about thoroughbred driving horses even, he will know that there never was a driving horse which weighed 4,000 pounds. Yet, that is the weight charged against me by the Canadian Northern railway. After figuring it out at 4,000 pounds, the transportation is cut in two. I think the government is blameworthy for this condition of affairs, because no man or company should have the right to charge more than the actual value of the transportation furnished. I think this is a matter that ought to be attended to at once by the hon. minister under whose control it comes.

Mr. BEATTIE. This debate, Mr. Speaker, started with a discussion of the question of parcel post in Canada, and led up to a criticism of the express rates prevailing throughout the country.

There can be no question that the express charges are too high; I do not defend the express companies so far as that is concerned. But it must be remembered that they carry an immense variety of parcels. One has only to notice the express wagons as they go about the city to see that they carry many parcels that the post office would not want to carry. And I should think that the small parcels, such as the post office ought to carry would be the very ones the express companies would not want. And this small class of business must be expensive for the express companies. When a parcel is to be picked up, they must send a man with a horse and wagon perhaps many blocks distant from their office, and in the city of its destination, equal trouble must be taken in delivering that parcel. There must be a great deal of expense involved in this business, expense which, I think, many people are apt not to consider. I am not defending the rates of the express companies, but they, like other people, are entitled to fair play. An attempt is made to compare our conditions in this matter with those of England. But no such comparison can be made with fairness. You can cross England in a very few hours; it takes days to cross Canada. Our population is very much more scattered than theirs. So far as the matter under discussion is concerned, the two countries cannot be compared. I am quite in favour of the government taking any reasonable course to reduce express charges. The charges on parcels should be regulated by weight, and that is not done to-day. I had proof of that only recently. I sent a parcel on which I paid 75 cents. When it arrived at my home, the expressman wanted 45 cents. I am not complaining of the attempt to charge twice; that was a mistake; but the fact that the charge was different at the shipping point and at the receiving point for exactly the same parcel shows that they have no proper scale of charges. Especially such small parcels as are referred to by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) should be charged for weight. Of course, there are parcels, millinery goods and articles of that kind, that take up much room yet are very light. But, as a rule the charge should be strictly by weight. It would be better, in the case of most of these parcels to leave the business to the express company rather than to try to do the business through the post office. The express company gives a receipt for a package and undertakes to deliver the goods in good order. I do not know that the government would want to carry parcels on that basis. I have had some experience in this kind of business, and I believe that some people are harsh in their remarks about the work of the express companies.

CHINESE INVESTIGATION COMMISSION.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I wish to refer briefly to a matter that I had occasion to mention yesterday, namely, the Chinese Investigation Commission at Vancouver. At the conclusion of my remarks I left it to the judgment of the House whether or not we should put on record our opinion as to the failure of the government to present that report. In consequence of the nature of the discussion which followed I thought it my duty to procced further, so I gave notice to the government of my intention to move a resolution to-day expressing the opinion of this House that that report and the evidence should be laid on the table. I am happy to say that on this occasion the view of the government has come to coincide with my own. The fact that the first minister presented the report at the opening of the House to-day relieves me from my duty to proceed with the motion of which I have given notice. But, with the permission of the House I would like to refer very briefly to the suggestion of the first minister that I wasted time in occupying three hours in presenting what I did of the evidence, and commenting upon it. I would like to contrast that statement of the Prime Minister with the volume of evidence he has presented here to-day. I have not yet had the opportunity to look at that evidence and report, but I should think, from seeing it as it was laid on the table that it must cover in the vicinity of 10,000 pages. I think that if the government can find a person to make a readable summary of evidence so voluminous including a little comment, and do it in less than three hours, that person must be a Jim Dandy indeed. In connection with the suggestion of wasting time, I believe it would be incumbent on some person to make a review of that report after its presentation. For my part, I should like very much to have made my summary from the official evidence, and also to have had the advantage of the conclusions arrived at by the judge, so that I might apply his conclusions if he had forestalled me, and present the view that I thought best to present to the House. But, as I had not the official report, I was compelled to do the best I could and use the reports of the newspapers.

I must express my disappointment at the suggestion made to-day that there will be no prosecution consequent on this investigation. From what I know of the evidence brought out I believe there are persons equally culpable with the few Chinese who have made their escape from the country since their complicity in these crimes has been brought to light. It seems to me that the detective force of the Dominion police could not be put to better use than in following up the inquiry started last summer, and so skilfully carried on, to run down the persons responsible for this conspiracy, to identify as many of them as possible, and to gather material upon which, I am quite sure, prosecutions could be sucessfully conducted. I have not had the opportunity to read the report, but I should like to have been told by some person on the government side who has had that opportunity whether or not the commissioner makes any remark upon the patronage system, and the manner in which it is administered in Vancouver, and the irregularities resulting from it. To my mind that is the crux of the whole matter. If we could have assurance from the government that the patronage of the government at Vancouver could be taken out of the hands that now control it, better still, if we could have assurance that the customs appointments at Vancouver and elsewhere—because they are very important—would be relieved altogether from political pull, and put into the hands of the Civil Service Commissioners or some other independent authority, I think we should have some valuable assurance that frauds of this nature would not be so likely to occur in future.

Now, just a few words in conclusion with reference to my good friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) the minister from British Columbia. A few weeks ago, that hon. gentleman took occasion to visit my riding. Because of the remarks of the speaker who preceded him, and the other remarks of the speaker who came after him, this member of the government had no time to say anything of consequence at New Westminster except that he had not time to go into his subject. Yesterday in this House, though evidence was presented to show that he is regarded in some quarters—and not without show of reason—as particeps criminis in these frauds at Vancouver, to the extent at least of being an accessory after the fact by exercising no diligence to secure punishment, again he had not time seemingly, to make any reply or defence. It seems to me the minister from British Columbia is the most untimely man in this country—he never has time for anything.

I feel like apologizing to this House for the minister from British Columbia I wish to say that he is not a fair specimen of what we have out there. I think that his prolonged and continuous residence at Ottawa must have deteriorated his quality, and that it would be a very good thing for the Minister of Inland Revenue if he could become again a permanent resident of British Columbia. I want to say to the House, what the minister from British Columbia knows very well, that the custom out there is when a man is attacked, to make some show of defence. He knows that even if Providence has not equipped us all with the same degree of manhood, that no matter what the inequalities may be between the attacker and the attacked, it is expected out there that when a man is told that he is put on his defence he should rise to the occasion and make some defence. Mr. Speaker, I think it is due to this House, and due to the government, and it is due to the minister himself, that we should have heard from him some explanation of the extraordinary course he is shown to have taken in connection with this Chinese investigation. I must express to you, Sir, and to the House my disappointment that the minister representing the province from which I come, should so utterly fail, in my estimation, to have regard for the duties, the responsibilities and the dignity of his office.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think I can dispense my hon. colleague from taking any notice at all of the charges which have been made against his character. I think the silence of my hon. colleague, in the attack which has been made against him, is quite justified by the report which has been laid to-day on the table of the House. When the House has taken cognizance of that report it will see that the commission altogether exonerated my hon. colleague from the insinuations which were made against him in the newspapers read on the floor of this House. With regard to the action to be taken by the government on this question, I have not said that no prosecution should be taken, nothing of the kind. I said simply that after reading the report cursorily—it is a report of more than one hundred pages—I could see that the commissioner's recommendation applies to only two parties, to the Chinese interpreter, Yip On, in the Department of Customs and to another man; these are the only two who were signalized to be prosecuted. But I have not yet seen any others, not having read the report minutely. With regard to the insinuation of the appointment in the custom house of men who are not fitted. I have only to say to the hon. gentleman, and he knows it—at all events he ought to know it—that the only party employed in the customs who has been suspected of anything wrong, is not an appointment of this government, but is an old officer who was appointed by our predecessors. No other man, so far as I know, has been charged by the commissioner or anybody else in the Customs Department, except the Chinese interpreter and the collector of customs. Of the only two parties who have been suspected of anything wrong, one is a fugitive from justice now and the other was not an appointee of this government.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Prime Minister might have gone a little further and stated that the appointee of the former government—because that seems to weigh with him a great deal—was exonerated by this same report.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is the only party who is charged with anything wrong.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Prime Minister said he had been suspected, but he omitted to say that he had been exonerated. I think it would have been only fair and just to have added that. But the Prime Minister did not touch one very important phase of the situation. The commissioner, in his report, said the collector of customs had had duties imposed on him in connection with Chinese immigration which, added to his duties as collector of customs, made impossible demands upon his time. But he went on to say something more. He pointed out the nature of the administration of this Chinese immigration law at Vancouver, and he said that in many respects the administration of that law had been absolutely farcical. He pointed out the reasons why. The Prime Minister has not alluded to these, nor has he shown in what respect the government have taken any steps to make that which was farcical really effective. We do not know up to the present time, so far as I am aware, in what respect the administration has been changed in that regard. I am not suggesting that it has not been changed, it may have been; but up to the present time we have no information before us whatever on this subject. I think information should be given, if not to-day at the earliest moment possible, as to how matters are at the present time with regard to that question. Then there is another matter upon which I would like to have some information, that is about what time did this inquiry end, at what time did the taking of evidence cease; how long after, or was it before this report was made and received by the government, and what steps, if any, have been taken since the receipt of the report in connection with any of these matters. It is said that the men who were indicated as guilty by the report have escaped from the country. When did the evidence disclose to the government that these men were in all probability guilty of some criminal act, and what is the reason they were allowed to escape after that evidence had been brought to the attention of the commissioners? These are all matters on which it is only reasonable that parliament should have some information. I do not know that the Prime Minister will be able to give it to-day, but I think he ought to give it on Monday, at the latest.

EXPRESS RATES.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). Before you leave the Chair I would like to refer for a few moments to the subject that was brought up by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). This subject of express rates is a very burning topic amongst the community at large, amongst the mercantile classes and amongst the farmers. I am pleased that it has been brought before the House, and that the discussion has thrown some additional light upon the future policy of the government. It is quite true that there is a division of views on this subject, there is a divergence of opinion as to whether the adoption of a parcel post system would be of benefit to the country as a whole or not. The arguments advanced, as already stated, are that if a parcel post system is instituted, the large departmental stores will benefit at the expense of the country storekeepers. Now that is a very important matter, because these catalogue houses and these departmental stores are now competing very strongly with the storekeepers. I do not suppose that, in the matter of price or quality, these departmental stores are actually competing with the country stores.

But the fact that they advertise so extensively all over the country gives them an unfair advantage over the local trader with the result that the people of the country send their money to the larger centres, such as Toronto, and get inferior goods to those which they could buy at home for less money. Nothing that could be said in this House or out of it could make any headway against the immense volume of advertising that these departmental stores indulge in. The great campaigns of advertising which they conduct invariably lead to the conclusion in the minds of the public that prices are lower in these departmental stores than they are in the home stores. When the discussion was at its height, when this question was at its hottest stage and before it was turned over to the Railway Commission, the fact was apparent to everybody that the departmental stores were obtaining much cheaper rates of express on their parcels than the average public could obtain. We will take an express parcel shipped by a departmental store a distance of 100 miles; the rate would be, say, 15 cents. Putting it in the reverse position the merchant or farmer shipping articles from an outside station back to the city would pay an express rate of 35 cents on the same weight of goods, so that there was a gross injustice done to the public in that way.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Do I understand my hon. friend to say that express companies discriminate in favour of departmental stores and against the public?

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). They did that extensively, and I have no knowledge that the commission has put in force rules against it. So much did they discriminate and so low were the express rates that were quoted to these departmental store people that I doubt very much whether this government could afford to carry goods by parcel post at such low rates. The public at large, and more especially the public who live in the cities, are very deeply interested in cheaper rates by express companies. Most of the articles that are consumed in the city—eggs, butter and other country produce—are articles that pay express rates. These goods are shipped to the city by express for the simple reason that if they were shipped by freight the time occupied in their carriage would be so great that, being perishable, they would be destroyed. I know that one small town in my riding sends an average of one car by express every week of farmers' produce to the city of Toronto and the express rates would be very exorbitant on that. I have no doubt that one of the chief reasons why the people in cities pay such exhorbitant prices for the food they eat to-day is the terribly high express rates which the farmers and dealers have to pay on the farm produce which they ship to Toronto and various other cities. I am told that fruit can be shipped by express in cold storage from California and other distant points in the United States to the great centres in Canada at a much lower rate than would be charged upon same articles procured 25 or 30 miles out of the city. A basket of cherries or case of peaches could be brought from California at almost as low a rate of express as that at which they could be brought from Grimsby or Oakville.

This question has been discussed pro and con and there has been a great deal of agitation amongst the public with regard to it. As already stated by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) and others who have spoken, the question of freight on express rates is a burning one all over the country. During the past winter the Manitoba 'Free Press' devoted a great deal of time and space to quoting figures in order to show that in western Canada the rates of freight were far greater than the rates charged in the adjoining states of the Union. In that discussion the 'Free Press' took occasion to comment on some remarks that I had made in this House on a previous occasion. I wish to make a reply to the discussion of the 'Free Press' as far as freight rates in the West are concerned. This discussion of freight rates by the Manitoba 'Free Press' would have some point and would be of some value to this House and benefit to the country had the figures which they gave in their comparison with reference to the state of Minnesota not been open to question. What do I mean by that? I mean that about four years ago the state of Minnesota established a board to govern freight rates. This board was to have absolute jurisdiction over all the freight and railway rates within the state of Minnesota. The board was of a socialistic character. It held its meetings and it issued a schedule by which it cut freight rates then paid throughout the state in two. The freight rates that were paid and had been paid in that state until recently were such that they were fully 50 per cent less than the freight rates paid throughout the Canadian Northwest. To carry on the agitation in the west in regard to these freight rates emissaries were sent to Canada and copies of the schedule published by the Minnesota board were sent broadcast all over the Canadian Northwest. The railways in Minnesota brought this question before the courts with a view of determining whether this board had acted properly and whether its jurisdiction were such that it could make this enormous, arbitrary cut in the freight rates. The railways succeeded in showing the court that the rates established by this board were absolutely wrong, that they were virtually confiscatory in their nature, inasmuch as it was impossible for the railways to carry freight for the rates that this revolutionary board had established there. The courts have given a decision against the state of Minnesota and its board in that respect and, as I say, the arguments advanced by the 'Free Press' in using this comparison of freight rates between Minnesota and Canada are not trustworthy and of no value.

However, it is apparent to any person that in many cases freight rates, even in Ontario, are very unjust and wrong. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) referred to some freight rates within his knowledge. I could have said to him that the principal town in my riding, Collingwood, is 35 miles from his principal town, Markdale, and I can ship freight by wagon from Collingwood to Markdale at a cheaper rate than I can ship the same freight by rail.

The reason is that where there is interchange of traffic each railway charges its local rate thus making the through rate exorbitant. It is time for us to consider means to compel railways to interchange traffic in the interests of the people. The consuming public are deeply interested in express rates and the government of the day should be up and doing to provide a remedy for the existing evil. There are three lines of action possible; one, government control over the rates, a principle we have accepted by the appointment of the Railway Commission and another, the establishment of competition by the government. I may belong to an antiquated school, but to my mind, I consider it wrong for government to take any action which would unduly destroy private investment and enterprise. The Minister of Railways told us, speaking on the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill, that we are no longer pioneers in Canada, but that the object of the government in assisting railway building in the west was to bring about competition. Our experience, however, is that when you bonus a railway to bring about competition you are simply doubling the charge on the public without attaining your object, for the railways get together and combine on rates to their own advantage. Can any one here say that when a new railway is brought into a town, genuine competition ensues. The only advantage a new railway affords the manufacturer is to save the expense of shipping over two lines, for, if he has only the Grand Trunk he can only ship over the Grand Trunk at carload rates, whereas if the Canadian Pacific railway comes to his factory he can ship to Canadian Pacific railway points also at carload rates. If the government compels railways to exchange traffic, one railway will afford the same facilities as two will; the cost of the extra railway will be saved and in the end the public would get cheaper rates than they could by such so-called competition as I have spoken of. When we are talking of railway matters we are prone to think that the United States and Canada are the only two countries in the world, but let me point out what France has done. After the great war the government of France realized that they had to take steps to reorganize agriculture and other industries and that the best way to do so was to encourage the building of railways and canals. The government of France grappled with the question and spent enormous sums of money and the following citation from the Cambridge Modern History, Vol. XII, 'The Latest Age' p. 101, will show what France did in respect of transportation matters:

In the matter of manufactures and commerce, the resources of the state were especially, and at this period lavishly, employed in creating for the nation a material equipment, which had been left in a singularly inadequate condition by the Second Empire, occupied as it had been with other matters. Credit is due to France that, immediately after her disasters, she did not shrink from this increase of burdens, but reasoned that by this means alone she could be enabled to liquidate the claims of her onerous debt. From this period dates the creation of roads and highways with such ramifications into country districts that the strivings of the new life from that time onward touched the tiniest villages and hamlets. The extent of the new roadways has been estimated at 200,000 kilometres, and at 1,200 millions the grants given since 1876 for this network; 120 millions are required for its annual upkeep. It has completed the great national and departmental highways, temporarily sacrificed to the need of railways, and since restored to high honour.

The time has come when in Canada we should consider whether the government ought not to direct its attention to co-ordination and co-operation such as the French people have brought about and which, to my mind is the only real method by which we will ever secure lower freight rates.

We shall never have lower freight rates in the west if we go on building transcontinental railways at the price we are doing. It is well known that the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway would have lowered their rates if it had not cost so much to build the transcontinental line. The great need of the west is not so much through lines as branch lines. The railway companies and other land companies have taken the bulk of the lands near the railway lines. You will find very few people living within three or four miles of the railways in the Northwest. The bulk of the farming population —the homesteaders—live eight or ten miles from the railways, some fifteen, twenty or thirty miles. These people expect and are entitled to railways, and the policy of parliament should be to build branch lines in the west, so that nobody would be obliged to haul his goods more than three or four miles to or from a railroad. Consider the case of the island of Prince Edward. That island is endowed by nature with everything necessary to make it a great and prosperous farming country, but it lacks transportation facilities. There is a government railroad running from one end of the island to the other. For many years, as long as I can remember, a tunnel has been advocated to offer the island closer connection with the mainland and the rest of Canada. I agree that that is a matter which should receive our earnest attention; but no engineer in Canada will say that that tunnel could be completed withing less than five or six years. But in the meantime the island is suffering for transportation facilities, and the government has not devised a practical plan for giving it immediate relief. How could it be done? The island railway is a narrow gauge railway. If the government would provide a landing place such as we have at Point Tupper in Cape Breton, and change the gauge of the island railway so that the people could move their produce in car-loads by car ferries direct to the mainland, the result would mean thousands of dollars saved to the people of Prince Edward Island every year. Yet neither the Minister of Railways nor anybody else in the government has offered any practical suggestion. At present everything that leaves the island or goes to it has to be handled two or three times at great cost. Some hon. members cannot understand why freight rates are greater for short distances than for long distances. It is because the railways have to do much more loading and unloading of the goods for the short distances than for long distances. To return to the question of express rates, there is a third method by which those rates can be reduced, that is, by the government buying out all the companies that control the express business of this country and nationalize the whole system. If they are allowed to go on as at present they may go on watering their stock by capitalizing their earnings until the government will have to pay a vast sum for them. The only fair and just method of dealing with them would be to nationalize these express companies at a fair and reasonable figure, and proceed to carry on the express business of the country on a just and equitable basis. Then we would have no more discriminatory rates and no more rebates to large concerns like departmental stores, but we would have fair and equal justice to everybody, and the man who would benefit most would be the farmer who produces truck and small produce for the cities. The store keeper would also benefit, because he would get his goods cheaper, having to pay smaller rates for shipping them. I am very pleased that the hon. member for South York has brought this matter before the House. I know that he would be the last man to suggest that the money spent properly for the cars, the offices and buildings, the equipment and the development of the business of the express companies should be either confiscated or subjected to unjust, unfair or arbitray competition. The most reasonable course would be for the government to establish a system whereby all the express business of the country would be done in connection with the post office service. I trust that this question will again come before this House at a time when we can discuss it at greater length, and when we can put our views on record by having a resolution of the House on the question.

PRIVATE BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 198) to incorporate the Quebec and Great North Western Railway Company.—Mr. Hodgins.

WAYS AND MEANS—PARCEL POST SYSTEM.

House resumed discussion of motion for Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HENDERSON. The subject on which I intended to address you to-night, Mr. Speaker, had reference to postal rates, and I would have preferred not to take up the matter until the Postmaster General was in his seat. However, he can read my remarks in 'Hansard,' and probably be in a position to answer them.

I did not intend to make any reference to matters which were discussed this afternoon—more especially the question of express rates. I would rather leave that in the hands of gentlemen who are more familiar with the subject, and who have more to do with the express companies than I have. Not being in the business, I confess that I do not come in direct contact with the express companies, therefore, any grievances I might put forward would simply be of a secondhand nature.

A great deal has been said during the past year with reference to the excessive charges of the express companies. Whether the companies have undertaken to reduce these charges or not is a point upon which I am not informed. Some of the hon. members spoke this afternoon with reference to certain advantages which the departmental stores of Toronto, for example, would receive on account of changes suggested in regard to the parcel post system, and of the advantages which they might also have under the express regulations. No doubt these departmental stores have very great advantages in the country. I think they secure these advantages by their peculiar mode of advertising—for instance, they will advertise that a certain article which sold for $2 yesterday will be offered for $1 to-day, or that an article which was worth $1.50 yesterday can be had to-day for 50 cents. There are a great many people in the country foolish enough to believe these statements, hence the business done by these concerns.

I am glad the Postmaster General has come in, because this is something which will appeal to him directly.

These departmental stores send their catalogues from one end of the Dominion to the other—you find them all over the country from Cape Breton to British Columbia. I was going to complain of the advantages which these companies enjoy in postal rates over other people or companies who do not do as large a business. Now I do not consider it fair that these departmental stores should have special privileges under the post office system—that is, that they should get a cheaper rate of postage than anybody else sending out a smaller number of catalogues, for instance. I remember within the last two years applying to the hon. the Postmaster General to get a like privilege for a constituent of mine; a man who was engaged in the manufacture of a spraying compound, and who was anxious to advertise it throughout the country, if he could get the facilities for sending his catalogues out at the same rates as other concerns doing a larger business. I discovered then that the departmental stores in Toronto, which were doing a very large business, were able to send their catalogues at a lower rate of postage than a man in my county, simply for the reason that he did not send out such large quantities.

I had always thought that there was no discrimination in postal matters, but that the man who sent out ten letters a day sent them at the same rate as the man who sent out one hundred. But it would seem that the man who sends out a large number of catalogues makes a special rate with the Post Office Department, and thereby gets an advantage in the way of advertising over the man who does not do so large a business. If I am wrong in my statement, I hope the Postmaster General will put me right, for, as the matter is now understood it is a grievance in a part of my county. An industry is being carried there in a material for spraying fruit trees, known as the lime-sulphur mixture. If this industry could advertise as cheaply as others do, it would be of great benefit. I think the Postmaster General might take into consideration the smaller concerns of the country, and put them on a par with the larger concerns.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would refer my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) to section 70 of the postal regulations, which reads:

> The articles of printed and miscellaneous matter comprised in the following list are subject to the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof.

And included in this list are catalogues. I will read what my hon. friend has said, and will inquire if there is discrimination against the industry he has mentioned. I cannot find authority for it under the law. But I will inquire into the matter.

Mr. HENDERSON. If I may be permitted, I would remind the Postmaster General that when I applied to him to get a special rate which, it was understood, was applicable to the large department stores in Toronto, the reason he gave me why it could not be given in that case was that the business was not sufficiently large to pay for the extra service that would be required where the catalogues were posted. I have not read the regulations, and have no doubt they are exactly as the Postmaster General has read them. But it seems to me, after what I learned at that time from the Postmaster General that the regulations are not being carried out.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will look into the matter.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS—RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL (South Toronto). The very extreme importance of this measure will amply justify, if any apology be needed, lengthy debates of the subject by the opposition as a whole or by individual members. The more this pact is investigated the more it seems to me, the matter calls for very grave consideration on the part of members of this House, and of the people at large. And the greater the opportunity the public has to investigate it the more the people justify the discussion by the very intelligent way in which they are now receiving the information that is being supplied them by members of this House, by the press and otherwise. The measure is not only of very great economic consequence, but it involves very grave considerations, political and national. In fact, so grave, in my opinion, are the objections to this pact from the political and national standpoint that it may be said really to affect fundamentally the very constitution under which we live, the underlying principles of confederation. None of us need be reminded of our country's early history, and the many struggles of our people for constitutional government, and for economic, and political consolidation. These things are a part of Canada's recorded history. The changes I have referred to culminated, as we know, in the compact of the provinces which now forms our constitution, the Act known as the British North America Act. It does seem to me that that Act was framed not only for the consolidation, and advancement of Canada, but also to assist in the consolidation and advancement of the Britsh Empire. If proof of this were needed, we find it in the very words of the preamble of the Confederation Act itself. It says:

And whereas such a union would conduce to the welfare of the provinces and promote the interests of the British Empire.

That being one of the objects, we in our day and generation should see to it that nothing is done that shall alter our position or undermine British institutions or our imperial relation. For it seems clear that anything that undermines our British institutions or our British connection strikes a blow at Canadian nationality. I think a reference of this kind is not inappropriate having regard to the importance of this pact. The very terms of confederation seem to have been based upon the idea that the provinces then separated desided to trade together, and to combine into a federal union for the purposes of common defence, progress and advancement as well as for the promotion of their various provincial enterprises. Section 121 of the Brish North America Act shows that the framers of the Act had this in view:

All articles of growth, produce, or manufacture of any one of the provinces, shall, from and after the union be admitted free into each of the other provinces.

Every hon. member is familiar with that section and I would ask them that it be viewed in that aspect. The provinces said: We are to trade together, there are to be no tariff walls between us, we stand back to back, and face the rest of the world.

As between us there is to be no tariff wall, everything is to be free that comes and goes between us; but we are to hold ourselves at liberty to shut out the rest of the world if so desired. Now that seems to have been a fundamental principle of confederation, and I do think that the extreme haste with which this government proposes to railroad this pact through the House without consulting the people is inexpedient and almost indecent, in face of the fact that there was ample time in which to have consulted the people. The provinces were not consulted as provinces; the people who are citizens of the various provinces were not consulted. Therefore I say that what has been called obstruction by the opposition is justified. and the opposition have done nothing more than their bare duty in that respect. This proposed change. in the opinion of many, is of such importance as to justifiy more than the hasty consideration which it received when it was brought into this House, and was entitled to very full consideration on the part of the public at large. As I said a moment ago, the more this pact is considered the more apparent becomes the fact that the people regard it as a fundamental change. . Their existence in many respects is proposed to be altered by it, and we are face to face with a new condition which may in time bring about a new nationality. Now it would seem to me that the very fullest consideration should be given to this question. The Minister of Finance, when he brought this measure down, brought it down hastily, as he himself, I think, admitted in a speech which he delivered in Windsor Hall, Montreal; he admitted that there was not adequate information before the people of this country on which to form their opinion. I will read the quotation later from his speech on that occasion. What information the people have received they have otbained, in great measure, from the members of the opposition in this House, aided by their friends and allies throughout Canada. Because in this great fight the opposition have made allies. History appears to be repeating itself, events are similar to those that occured in 1878. Men are breaking from their old party affiliations, and many of them are allying themselves with the party that is opposing this pact. They are men who formerly opposed this party, and so we find various organizations growing up from day to day in this country, all in opposition to this pact.

Now we are told that there is an invisible border line extending some three thousand miles across this continent. Well, one does not like to be reminiscent in certain matters, but that line is not an invisible line. It was not an invisible line when many of the founders and forefathers of this country came across that line long years ago, and left behind them all their earthly possessions in the then republic. That line is still there, it is a line of national demarcation. Tariff walls would not alter it if they were removed. The line is just as indelible now as it was then. I am not referring to that line with any hard feelings, nor do I desire to arouse any such feelings. But I say that the people who left that country long ago and came here to live under British institutions, which were guaranteed to them by the British government, have a right still to appeal to that guarantee. On the part of the people of this country there is a strong desire to continue those British instiututions and political affiliations with Great Britain. Now of course we are living in a utilitarian age. We are not dealing now with flag waving incidents, because it is to be hoped that the hundred years of peace which has prevailed between ourselves and our neighbours to the south will soon be celebrated and will be repeated in the ages to come.

We oppose this pact both upon political and economic grounds. It does seem to me that, both from a political and an economic standpoint, it deserves more careful consideration than has been given it. It seems to me that the opposition to this treaty has made many friends and allies during the time it has been up for discussion. Many people have been touched in their sentiments of nationality by its provisions. It was not thought perhaps by those who introduced it that it would have any sentimental aspect, or that it would be viewed from a sentimental point of view by the people of this country. But I can assure the hon. gentleman who introduced it that there are a great many people in this country who are opposed to it in their most sacred and patriotic sensibilities. They are opposing it because they believe it is calculated to endanger the political conditions under which they now live, is calculated to lead to profound changes in our commercial and political relations, and ultimately to political union with our neighbours to the south. There is that element who are opposed to it. Then we have the people whose interests are affected, people who view it from an economic standpoint, the great commercial interests of this country. It does seem to me that the great commercial and business interests of this country from end to end are opposed to this pact, men who have never taken any strong part in party politics in this country, or no part at all. One of the outcomes of this feeling is the Canadian National League, which has been recently formed with headquarters in the city of Toronto. It has been organized by a number of patriotic citizens who have inscribed upon the front of their literature their views and their reasons. These are men who, in private life and in business life, have not heretofore taken a prominent part in politics, and who have no notion of participating in public affairs, men who are not concerned which party is in power. These men have leagued themselves together to form this alliance. Permit me to read some of the objects of the Canadian National League:

> The Canadian National League was formed following the protest against 'Reciprocity with the United States of America,' which was signed by eighteen supporters in Toronto of the Liberal party in Canada and published in the press on February 20, 1911.
> The objects of the League are:
> To oppose the adoption of the proposed reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States of America, and to support such measures as will uphold Canadian nationality and British connection, will preserve our fiscal independence and will continue to develop our present national policy of interprovinical and external trade, under which the Dominion has achieved its present prosperity.
> The basis upon which the League has been formed is Canadian nationality, British connection and fiscal independence.

Now surely no intelligent Canadian can quarrel with the objects of this League—Canadian nationality, British connection and fiscal independence. These gentlemen have given numerous and weighty reasons in support of each and every one of these objects. Hon. gentlemen in this House are well aware of the formation of this League, and of the high character of the men composing it, and of their aims and aspirations. These men have no purposes to serve but the public good. They honestly belive in the necessity of such an organization, because they believe that Canadian nationality, British connection and fiscal independence are more or less menaced by this pact. Now we have heard a good deal about the city of Toronto in connection with this question. We know that the Toronto Board of Trade went on record against this pact by a vote of something like 280 to 13. I desire shortly to read an extract from the address which Mr. Gage, president of the Toronto Board of Trade, delievered on the 19th of January of the present year.

> Canada has never known a time of such universal prosperity. Our farmers are prosperous, our merchants and manufacturers are prosperous, our labouring classes have abundant employment with good wages. Is it not a good time to leave well enough alone?
> If our American friends wish to share in our unequalled prosperity, let their manufacturers continue to do as they have been doing in the past few years—locate branch factories in Canada—they will be welcome. If our American farmer wishes to 'get rich quick,' let him follow the well-beaten trail made by nearly a quarter of a million farmers from the United States, who have already found homes in the Canadian west.

Surely no one can quarrel with that. It is believed by the board of trade, as indicated by the president's language which I have read, and by the members' vote which I have mentioned, that if this pact passes there will be a discontinuance of the Americans coming to Canada with their money and establishing manufactores or branches of their large American industries. These are not idle words, they are not words said in jest, or said simply for the purpose of making conversation; they are words uttered because it is believed that they are true. These are the business men of the community. They do not confine their remarks simply to the manufacturing element, but they refer to the farming community and point out how, if the American farmer wishes to come here, he can do so. Let me give the counterpart of that reference which I have read. I desire to quote Senator Beveridge from the American point of view upon the same aspect of the question. We all know of Senator Beveridge. On the discussion of this reciprocity measure, he spoke as follows:

> There must be reciprocity with Canada. Our tariff with the rest of the world does not apply to our northern neighbours. That policy already has driven American manufacturers across the Canadian borders, built vast plants with American capital on Canadian soil, employing Canadian workingmen to supply trade. That capital should be kept at home to employ American workingmen to supply Canadian demand.

A perfectly natural thing for Senator Beveridge to say. It is perfectly natural that he should desire to manufacture in the States, sell in Canada and give their men employment. But the view of the Toronto Board of Trade is the reverse; it is that these men should manufacture in Canada, that they should come here if they desire to do so, make their bona fide residence here, put their business here, employ labour here, spend their capital here and manufacture here. Senator Beveridge made a further allusion to the same matter, but I think the quotation which I have read is sufficient.

The hon. Mr. McCall who brought the reciprocity measure before the House of Representatives in the last Congress, in speaking on this subject, even before negotiations were opened, used this language.

> Add to the tremendous influences that are pulling the two countries together, the entangling web that is woven by reciprocal trade, and the inevitable day will be more quickly reached when the two countries shall be politically one.

Mr. McCall is a public man of very great prominence and not given to making idle statements. He speaks of the 'entangling web' and he refers to the period of time when we shall be politically one. That is a very significant statement and one that a public man in this country cannot pass over. We are living in an age when communication is rapid, when men cannot disguise the words they use or the meaning of their words. We are living in a manly, frank and straightforward time. When Mr. McCall uttered those words he knew that they would be read and considered in Canada, he knew that proper weight would be attached to them and he openly said, in broad daylight to this country that the United States has woven an entangling web about this people by this pact, and he looks forward to the day when we shall be politically one as a consequence of it. Surely we cannot say that we are not aware of the public feeling of our friends to the south. We cannot say we are not aware of one of the objects which is impelling them to enter into this pact. I am not one of those who hesitates a moment to look the question of annexation squarely in the face and speak about it. We are in the habit of hearing people say 'hush, hush' when the word 'annexation' is spoken. I think that public men should be frank on public questions and if there is any public question that we ought to be more frank upon than another it is upon that affecting the national, vital existence of the country. Why should we hesitate to speak about annexation? American public men do not hesitate to speak about it. Annexation looks at us squarely in the face in connection with this matter. Why should we not look it squarely in the face back again? The time may come when those who will come after us will complain, and justly so, that in some quarters this annexation aspect of the case was never dealt with fearlessly and fully. Whether annexation is going to come or not, when it is openly discussed and when it is an important part of the American programme, Canadian public men ought to deal with the question fairly, according to their convictions, and as public men let them appeal to the people and be endorsed or condemned as the people may desire upon the stand they take upon this question.

Therefore, because of that statement, I hope I will be pardoned if I allude for a moment to what I may say has been the consistent, continuous, persevering, course pursued by the United States as to the annexation of this country. The question was first mooted in the very year of the American revolution. Away back in the year 1775, a proclamation was issued from Philadelphia by the then provisional government, to the people of this country and a very direct and straightforward, from the American point of view, appeal was made to the people of this country to join them in the then revolution. We know the effect of it and the reception it met with. That is history now, it has gone by and I mention it simply to show that there has been a consistent and continuous course of conduct from that time down to the present hour on the part of our neighbours to the south. The revolution was only three years old, in 1778, when a second appeal was made for annexation to the people of this country and in various forms and various phases from that day to this our American friends have been appealing to us to join in their national life. I cannot condemn them for it; I am not saying one word against them for it. They have a perfect right to do so. There was an occasion one hundred years ago next year when another method was adopted. I have no desire to refer to it. Happily that method failed. It is buried in the pages of history and of the past. But they have been making constitutional appeals to us since continuously. I think the last direct appeal and certainly the one that was perhaps the most serious because it was made in recent times and in very plain language was made at the very time that the Act of Confederation was passing through the British House of Commons. It is not perhaps generally known by the public at large that in the early part of the year 1867 when the British North America Act was being considered, our American friends passed a joint resolution of the Senate and Congress protesting against the formation of our country and in effect offering us this annexation which they had been holding out and which they are still holding out.

This important resolution is to be found in the 'Congressional Globe' (now the 'Congressional Record') of 27th March, 1867, page 392.

BRITISH AMERICAN CONFEDERATION.

Mr. Banks from the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported a joint resolution respecting the proposed confederation of provinces on the northern frontier of the United States, which was read a first and second time (it was afterwards read a third time).

The joint resolution, which was read at length, declares that the people of the United States cannot regard the proposed confederation of the provinces on the northern frontier of this country without extreme solicitude; that a confederation of states on this continent extending from ocean to ocean, established without consulting the people of the provinces, to be united and founded upon monarchial principles, cannot be considered otherwise than in contravention of the traditions and constantly declared principles of this government, endangering its most important interests and tending to increase and perpetuate embarrassments already existing between the two governments immediately interested.

Of course the reference in the resolution as to not consulting the people is incorrect. There was some dispute at the time as to whether the people of Nova Scotia had been consulted, but as we all know they had been.

Mr. FIELDING. Had been?

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). Yes.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend is entirely wrong. The people of Nova Scotia were not consulted. It is not material, but as a matter of history my hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). I think I am correct because the issue of confederation was before the people at the election.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend is mistaken historically.

Mr. MACCDONELL (Toronto). I think not, but at all events this resolution of Congress was passed at a moment when reciprocity was in the air and it was passed in consequence of the repeal of the reciprocity treaty at that time. Although, Canada met with certain temporary losses by the cancellation of this treaty, the American people were apparently unaware of the fact that we were able to take care of ourselves, and indeed, the very next year, we began to show signs of our ability to be able to do without reciprocity in the future. We know what our friend, Mr. Champ. Clark has said that we would joyfully become part of the republic and this and other similar expressions are used by American statesmen when referring to this pact, which at least shows what is in their minds when entering into the arrangement. In a recent speech in New-York, President Taft used this language:

I have said that this was a critical time in the solution of the question of reciprocity. It is critical because unless it is now decided favourably to reciprocity, it is exceedingly probable that no such opportunity will ever again come to the United States. The forces which are at work in England and in Canada to separate her by a Chinese wall from the United States, and to make her part of an imperial commercial band reaching from England around the world to England again by a system of preferential tariffs, will derive an impetus from the rejection of this treaty, and if we would have reciprocity, with all the advantages that I have described, and that I earnestly and sincerely believe will follow its adoption, we must take it now, or give it up for ever.

Such views are being constantly expressed by statesmen of the United States and circulated through their press. We know that Sir George Ross has declared it to be his belief that annexation lurks at the bottom of this pact in the mind of our American friends. As confirmation of his opinion I cite this language of the Hon. G. S. Boutwell, President Grant's Secretary of the Treasury, and a member of Congress at the time of the repeal of the reciprocity treaty:

ANNEXATIONIST HOPES.

The fact of the annexation of Canada to the United States whether the event shall occur in a time near or remote, depends probably upon our action on reciprocity. Canada needs our markets and our facilities for ocean transportation, and as long as these advantages are denied to her, she can never attain to a high degree of prosperity. The body of farmers, labourers, and trading people will favour annexation ultimately should the policy of non-intercourse be adhered to on our part, and they will outnumber the office holding class, and thus the union of the two countries will be secured.

We were told then that the repeal of the treaty was to drive us into annexation, and that such was the policy of the Americans, but it failed in its aim. The Minister of Finance in introducing this measure referred at length to the connection of Conservative leaders in times past with reciprocity, but he touched very gingerly the period from 1838 to 1891, because he knows the state of public opinion in Canada on reciprocity during that period. He knows that the defeat of the Liberal party in 1891, was largely due to its advocacy of that policy. We know that prior to 1891 Mr. Erastus Wyman was busy with his friends in New York, Mr. Carnegie and others, and he was helped by his friends in this country, Mr. Tarte and Mr. Mercier, the political allies of the Liberal party. We know the course taken at that time by the Hon. Edward Blake, and that he and Goldwin Smith declined to follow in the footsteps of these men who wanted to lead us into commercial union. The Minister of Finance said very little about that period.

The hon. Minister of Finance is on record on many occasions in regard to the Imperial preference, and we are now fed with preference pap, so to speak. When complaint is made of this reciprocity pact, the public is told: 'See what we have done for England; see the British preference.' Well, the British preference is going to become non-existent if this pact passes; there will be very little of it left. On the items enumerated in the schedule to this pact the preference will be zero, because the duty the American people will have to pay on them when they come to this country will be nil. At the time the Minister of Finance introduced the preference, there was no intention on his part or on the part of the government to give a preference to Britain alone. We are told now with great acclaim that the Liberal party gave the British preference. No one knows better than the Finance Minister that at that time it was a preference not to England alone, but to any nation that could qualify by giving us as favourable treatment as we gave it. When the Finance Minister introduced the preference in 1897, at page 1111 of 'Hansard,' he said this:

I stated that the tariff that I am about to read to you is the general tariff, but that before I conclude I shall be prepared to make a statement in relation to a special tariff that will apply to Great Britain and any other country which is prepared to accept the conditions which that tariff imposes.

Later on he spoke as follows, page 1131:

We do not by our resolutions offer anything to Great Britain alone. We recognize the fact that Great Britain by her liberal policy is in a position to avail herself of this offer immediately, but we make our offer not to Great Britain only, but to every nation which is prepared to accept it. We make it to every country which is willing to establish fair and reasonable trade relations with Canada.

On the same page, speaking of the favoured nation treaties, he spoke as follows:

I say that it does not seem fair and reasonable that we should be obliged, while we are offering certain terms, not to Great Britain only but to all countries which will place themselves in the same position—it does not seem to be fair and reasonable that we should be obliged to extend the privileges of this schedule, which we call a reciprocal tariff, to nations which are not willing to do anything in return.

Now, I have just two comments to make on that statement. One is that the offer was not made to Great Britain alone; it was made to any country that chose to accept it. Secondly, at that time at least the Minister of Finance was apprehensive of these favoured nation treaties, and was unwilling to grant anything in the nature of a treaty or tariff arrangement which would entitle the favoured nations to favoured nation treatment in our market. Things have very greatly changed since then. At that time the favoured nations were not to participate; rather than that he would change the Bill, and the Bill was changed in the following year. But now, when this reciprocity of another kind is going through, the favoured nations are let in. I do not see how the minister or the government can reconcile the two positions. When dealing with England they would not allow the favoured nations in; but in dealing with the United States in the present pact, so anxious apparently are they to get it through that they are willing to open the door so wide that thirteen other nations are allowed to participate without giving anything in return. That is one of the great objections to this agreement. With the United States it is very different. By their constitution their favoured nations do not participate with Canada in their market. When we are told that this looks like a fair arrangement to both countries, both giving up something and both getting something, that feature is entirely overlooked, and it has a very important effect.

Now, we are told that reciprocity when it existed in the old days brought prosperity. Well, certain interests in Canada were very prosperous. I have no desire to disparage reciprocity at that time or deal unfairly with it; but every man in this country knows that at that time, unfortunately for the powers engaged in it, but fortunately for us who had grain to sell, there was a very disastrous war in Europe, the Crimean war. For the first years of the reciprocity treaty wheat brought $2.50 a bushel in England. We participated in that prosperity. Whether we had reciprocity with the United States or not, our wheat was worth as much money as any other, or more, because of its superior quality, and we got no more for it by sending it to the States. Then during the latter part of that period, when the American war was raging, when tens of thousands of the farmers of the United States had to abandon their husbandry operations and take the field, and when the price of foodstuffs and breadstuffs soared high, we again participated in that prosperity. But it was not all prosperity in Canada at that time. Let me just refer to the shipping trade that languished during those years. Following the treaty, business in and out of the port of Montreal declined. The carrying trade of the St. Lawrence in 1854 was valued at $33,633,128. In the next year it dropped to $15,208,000. The ships' tonnage going to the sea from Montreal and Quebec decreased from 1,487,097 tons to 870,794, and the value of the exports from $42,000,000 to $28,000,000. On Canadian canals in the first fiscal year of the treaty the tolls fell off by 32 per cent. That in itself tells a very dismal tale of the effect of reciprocity, even at that early period, on the shipping and the foreign trade of the country.

We see that the shipping declined in tonnage and in value. The canals did not do the same work, and there was not anything like the same volume of business going through them. With the exception of the traffic going north and south there was very little business being transacted in the country compared with what there had been a year or two previous. But, our American friends were then after what they are now after. They were not so diligently in pursuit of it, it is true—still they were after it. I refer to the natural resources of this country. At that time the grass had not, so to speak, shortened for them. They still had a vast storehouse of natural resources, but as time has gone by this has been pretty well drawn on. One of the main reasons, and one of the avowed reasons, is that the American people shall have access to our natural resources, and not only have access to them, but take them away to a foreign country and manufacture them with foreign labour.

Let me just point out what President Taft said about that:

> Ought we not then to arrange a commercial agreement with Canada, if we can, by which we shall have direct access to her great supply of natural products? Should we not now, therefore, before their policy has become too crystallized and fixed for change meet them in a spirit of real concession, facilitate commerce between the two countries, and thus greatly increase the natural resources available to our people? By giving our people access to the Canadian forests we shall reduce the consumption of our own which, in the hands of comparatively few owners now have a value that requires enlargement of our available timber resources.

This is explicitly one of the American main objects of reciprocity, and it is equally one of the main reasons why it should be opposed.

I would refer for a moment to an article which appeared in the London 'Times,' and which I think most fittingly puts the case to the Canadian people. Hon. gentlemen will, perhaps, recollect the correspondent of the 'Times' who headed his article during the last two or three months, 'The Buttering of Parsnips,' with special reference to the right hon. gentleman who leads this House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Allow me to read an extract from one of these letters:

> The short sighted man says, 'let us sell our wheat and our timber.' The long sighted man replies, 'no, let us sell our flour and biscuits and furniture and paper. Let us not sell our raw materials, but the manufactured article. That is the only way in which we can reap the full profits on our products and establish ourselves in the community of interests that makes a nation.'

Surely no one could epitomize the protection of our natural resources in more clear language than this. 'But,' hon. gentlemen on the opposite side say, 'we are not going to interfere with your manufactured articles.' Well, the same writer in the same article deals with that under the caption 'The Spider and the Fly.' He says:

> You say it is restricted reciprocity, and we will go no further. But you remember the fable: the spider invited the fly to step into his parlour. The fly replied, 'I will only put in one foot, the rest of me will remain outside.' The spider was satisfied. Why? Because he knew the foot would stick.

What does that show? It shows that when the farmer finds his goods give him very little if any advance in price, and that all he produces is open to competition, and that he has no protection in anything he raises, but has to pay duty on everything he buys, he will not be satisfied. If the farmer realizes that he has to suffer competition from American farm products, I think there will be a very great hue and cry throughout the country.

The timber question was mentioned by President Taft, as it has been mentioned by many others. Two authorities on the subject who ought to be acceptable to the Liberal people of this country, are Senator Ross and the Hon. Mr. Sifton.. These are two gentlemen who have gone on record as being directly opposed to this treaty, especially so far as timber is concerned.

I do not desire to take up the time of the House with the reading of Senator Ross's remarks, suffice it to say that he has gone flatfooted on record as being in opposition to the treaty with special regard to lumber, and in that respect he quotes, with approval, what was said by the Hon. Clifford Sifton, as chairman of the Commission on Natural Resources—or as we call it now, the Conservation Commission. It is well to read and heed the warning of Mr. Sifton, who says:

> At the end of 20 years the United States would have no timber for sale, in the ordinary way. In Canada the supply was large, but if the supply in the United States ran out, the supply in Canada would last the United States for only seven years. The time must come, however, when the people of Canada would demand legislation prohibiting the export of marketable timber.

That is the natural view, and the only view which will do justice to Canadian interests.

Now, not only is this government, by its treaty, not protecting and conserving our resources, and especially our timber resources—not only is it not heeding the warning of the chairman of its own commission—a commission constituted for the purpose of collecting information, but it is exposing these very resources to the free exploitation of the American trust man and combine man, because by taking down the duty on timber or by making it free, you will no doubt give the lumberman of this country a very large and immediate profit on his timber, but we must bear in mind that much of this timber which is growing on this Canadian soil of ours is owned by Americans. We have no desire to interfere with any man's property rights in this country, but there is no reason why the exploiter should be facilitated in denuding and depleting our country of its natural resources, and of its timber in particular.

Both liberals and conservatives talk with pride and with pleasure about our great country. We are in the habit of hearing Canada praised, and it pleases us. Our British brethren, as well as foreigners all join in one accord in complimenting this country upon its almost inexhaustible store of natural resources. How, I ask in the name of common sense, are we to preserve these resources if they are not protected from exploitation? If any one and every one can come in and take out timber, our minerals, &c., at a nominal figure, as they have in the past, what benefit is it to Canada? Many of these resources might just as well be in Egypt or in Russia if they are simply for the exploiter, to be removed in the rough or natural state.

What benefit is it to the country? Take an American lumberman who came here years ago, and bought blocks of virgin forest for a trifle—what benefit is it to this country if he is allowed to take out that timber in the rough. Of what benefit are any of our natural resources unless there is some guardianship, some protection, some conservation? For these resources are inter-dependent. If you remove the timber, you make less favourable the conditions of agriculture. And so in other matters. But of what avail is it for us to boast of our great natural resources if those resources are to be exploited by any one who chooses to come and acquire them? The only affect is to make the rich man richer, and the poor poorer. The lumberman who has acquired the timber will increase his revenues—to him that hath shall be given. But what will become of the mechanic or farmer who wishes to buy lumber? Why, the great consuming public will have to pay more for their lumber than in the past. And that is one of the features of this pact that is most frequently attacked. It is said, and said truly in my opinion, that it is a pact for the trusts and combines; it will leave this country exposed, as the United States has been exposed to the exploitation of these men. A moment's reflection will cause one to realize that the American trusts and combines will extend their operations to this country. They are anxious to do it; they seek to enlarge their area from which to draw the resources they need. That is why this pact is welcomed so cordially in the United States.

Now, it does seem to me that the home market for the producer of this country is the best market. It is said that the home market is not large enough, but we know that about 80 or 85 per cent of all that is produced in this country is used in this country. We know that the home market has built up our neighbours to the south, and that the farmer in that country has been the best advocate of the factory. And so he should be, because the factory assures him of customers for what he raises. Let me quote on this subject no less an authority than Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture for the United States. He fills the position occupied by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher), who is now leading the House, and I think that hon. gentlemen will agree that the Minister of Agriculture should, and in some cases does, know a great deal about the agricultural conditions of his country. Mr. Wilson said:

> The American farmer brought about the building of the American factory, because he wanted a home market. That home market is the best to be found anywhere, because our people all live well and are all able to buy the best farm produce,—that is, all who are willing to work. It may be said, without much exaggeration, that the American farmer is responsible for the upbuilding of the factory. He has voted steadily for half a century to give protection to the extent of the difference in cost of production between this country and any country that desires to sell in our markets. Was that right or wrong? Was it wise for the farmers to do that? There was no market at home. They wanted a market as near the factory as they could bring it. Now millions of people who work in these factories and in occupations other than farming want food at reasonable prices. Who can condemn them for that desire?

All that is said by Mr. Wilson can be truly said by the Minister of Agriculture of this country. We are now embarking, as it were, upon the period that they have passed, we are experiencing the same conditions here that they experienced in their country a very few years ago, and we are finding that the best market for the farmers' produce, is in the towns and cities which are built up around the factories. Therefore, it seems to me that the true policy of the government is not to alarm the commercial and manufacturing industries as they have done, but by every reasonable means consistent with the keeping of prices at fair levels, they should encourage the home market, affording protection which, as Mr. Wilson says, is enough to place the home producer, having regard to the higher labour cost of his product, on an equality with the producer abroad. If that policy were adhered to, our market would be found in our own country, we should have a large influx of the farming community, and much greater stability of our manufacturing and business interests.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, especially the Minister of Finance, have spoken of members of the Conservative party having made many journeys to Washington. Well, they were not the only ones who did that. Members of the Liberal party, on many occasions, when in opposition, and since they were returned to power, have made these same trips. One gentleman went on many occasions—the late John Charlton. He attended the National Reciprocity Convention at Washington, on November 19, and 20, 1901. He was there pleading for reciprocity, and holding out inducements for them to enter into an arrangement with us. I do not believe hon. gentlemen opposite will repudiate Mr. Charlton. Here is the picture he painted for the Americans of what reciprocity would do for them. He gave quite a lengthy address. He said in part:

What we want is reciprocal free trade in natural products, as I remarked a moment ago, we buy three times as much in the way of agricultural products as we sell to the United States. With free trade the whole vast mining region of British Columbia and the Yukon districts would draw its supplies of food from Oregon and Washington. The maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island would draw nineteen-twentieths of their food supplies from the seaboard cities of the United States, and vessels bringing coal and lumber from those provinces would take back cargoes of flour, meal, &c., as return cargoes. The mining and lumbering regions of Ontario and Quebec would buy enormously of American farm products.

Now that would be very interesting reading for the farmers of British Columbia, the maritime provinces, of Ontario and Quebec. All these provinces were to be supplied with their foodstuffs by the American farmers. That is the exact condition today. Mr. Charlton was then speaking about a reciprocal tariff in natural products, just what we are asked to adopt to-day, and this is the inducement he offered the American people. We did not hear anything of that kind in this country. There, he was speaking his convictions, he was away from home, he was addressing strangers, and no doubt felt at liberty to unbutton himself and tell the people what was in his heart. And that was in his heart, that all the food supplies of these provinces should be drawn from the American people. Now the farmer here is told, as a reason why he should endorse this pact; it is going to improve everything; you are going to have the Augustan age in the rural districts of Canada, you are going to have a golden period; all you raise is going to bring very high prices; farms are going to improve in value, everything you have is going to be made more valuable; you are going to enter into a golden heritage, and practically your working days are over. Now let us see what effect this market of 90 millions of people has had upon the farming community in the States, and then we can form some opinion as to how reciprocity will affect farm values in Canada. It certainly will not improve them, if statistics are to be believed. Here is the record:

Advocates of reciprocity are making statements to the effect that the adoption of reciprocity will immediately increase the value of Canadian farm lands 25 per cent or more. Instead of making wild guesses let us get at the facts. Since the reciprocity negotiations began the United States government has had a report prepared by experts showing the comparative value per acre of improved farm lands in 1900 and 1910 in various border states and in the Canadian provinces adjoining them. This report states that between 1900 and 1910 the value of improved farm lands increased 67 per cent in Maine, 37 per cent in New Hampshire, 33 per cent in Vermont, 181 per cent in Nova Scotia, 120 per cent in New Brunswick, 70 per cent in Prince Edward Island, 80 per cent in Quebec, 43 per cent in Ontario, 39 per cent in Michigan, 77 per cent in Minnesota, 123 per cent in Manitoba, 201 per cent in Saskatchewan and 185 per cent in Alberta.

Now with this great market at the doors of the American farmers, we find nevertheless that their farms have not increased in value at anything like the same ratio as have the farms of the Canadian provinces adjoining. They have a market of ninety millions of people, where is their increased value? This big market does not seem to have brought riches to them. It may be said that the great increase in the value of our western lands is unusual because it is a new country. That may be so. But why the increase in the value of the farms of the older provinces? Look at the enormous increase in the value of farm land in the province of the Minister of Finance himself, most phenomenal, 181 per cent increase in Nova Scotia. Surely nothing better than that could be desired. It is two or three times the ratio of increase in the American States adjoining, and yet the farmers of this country are asked to make this change. Let us see what will happen if the tariff wall is taken down and natural products are allowed to pass freely between the two countries. Of course, the tendency and effect will be to produce a uniformity in values. Land is only worth what it will produce. If all the territory is practically one great field of agriculture, you are going to have the value of the farm lands on both sides brought down to something like uniformity. You will not have this great increase in value continuing in our Canadian farms, because the value will necessarily be brought down to the level of American farms, the same as the value of the produce on those farms. Granting that the quality of the land is the same, it seems to me that is self-evident.

Now permit me to make an allusion to the opinions of some prominent public men in the United States with regard to what is likely to happen when this treaty goes into effect. Senator Albert B. Cummins, of Iowa, is a well known public man who has delivered a great many speeches on this subject, in the Senate and elsewhere in the United States. In a very able article in the 'Editorial Review' he says many things which are well worthy of reproduction. I will extract the following:

With respect to live stock. I have taken some pains to discover what relative prices are, comparing Canada and the United States, and this is the result: the average value of horses in the United States is $108.10; in Canada, $133. Dairy cows in the United States, $35.79; in Canada, $43. Other cattle, without respect to age or grade, in the United States, $19.41; in Canada, $31. Sheep in the United States, $4.08; in Canada, $6. Hogs in the United States, $9.14; in Canada, $11.

Bearing in mind what has been already said, I predict that with nearly everything, except wheat, barley, and possibly hay, our exports of agricultural products into Canada will grow more rapidly than the imports of such products into the United States from Canada.

That is a very important statement, and if it is true, as we are told, that the American people now sell to us $3 worth for every dollar's worth we sell to them, what is likely to take place after this treaty goes into effect?

If, as Senator Cummins says, we are going to import into Canada very much more than they are going to import of our products, what is the ratio going to be?—six to one probably, or it may be double. So that instead of trade getting better between ourselves and the United States in so far as we are concerned it will get worse because, with the exception of two items, and possibly a third, in that long list, Senator Cummins is of opinion that the Americans will sell much more largely to us than we will sell to them. He ought to know. He is a well informed public man, he understands their capacity to export, he knows the surplus of the country, he knows what the prices are there and here and he makes that very deliberate statement advisedly.

I would like to make one more reference to Mr. Wilson. Mr. Wilson is the American Secretary of Agriculture, and he refers incidentally to a matter which has been very much discussed in this country. He refers to the milling industry. In an article in the 'Editorial Review' of May, he says:

I am firmly convinced that it would be to the advantage of both countries for us to take the export wheat of Canada, mill it and send the flour to the markets of the world, because the dairymen of the United States would then get the by-products of the mills and as the population of the United States increases, the dairy market will be greater and greater. We will get those by-products then, instead of having the wheat go as wheat to foreign countries where the by-products would be sold and used to great advantage by dairymen in those countries.

Mr. Wilson ought to know pretty well the capabilities of his country in that respect. He says candidly what many people in this country have said and have been called alarmists for saying, namely, that the wheat of this country, especially the No. 1 hard grade of wheat, would be exported to the United States and there milled. It is quite obvious, it is self-evident what the advantages will be to the American people from the milling of the wheat in their country. As Mr. Wilson very candidly puts it, their dairymen will have the benefit of the by-products. He, however, facetiously says that this will be good for both countries because the wheat of Canada will go to their country for milling purposes. How the benefit will come to Canada from milling Canadian wheat in Minneapolis and other wheat milling centres is more than I can tell. But, he is not concerned with Canada. He supposes that the interests of this country are being looked after by the public men of this country. He is a public man in the American union, and he is looking after the interests of that country, and apparently doing it very well. He points out very naturally, very properly, what an advantage it will be if the milling of our wheat is carried on in that country. We all know that although a comparatively large amount of wheat is produced in this country at the present time, still we are not by any means the first, or second, or third, or fourth wheat producing country in the world. The United States produces a very vast amount of wheat, more than any other country; Russia, I think comes next; France is a very large wheat producing country, then there is the Argentine Republic and possibly one other country. I think that all of these countries, at least produce a greater quantity of wheat than we do. But, in proportion to the quantity of wheat grown in these different countries no country exports the same percentage of the quantity grown as Canada does. Although our wheat production is praiseworthy, although it is encouraging, there is such a large home consumption of wheat in these other countries that the percentage of wheat produced in the country and exported from Canada is larger, I think than the percentage grown and exported by any other country. The export of our wheat becomes a very important matter. We are going to export an increasingly large quantity of wheat. Just in proportion to the quantity of wheat we export will rise and increase the importance of where that wheat will be milled. It is altogether unnecessary for any man to argue that it is a good thing for a country to mill its own wheat because not only does it give the millers employment, and all the incidental benefits and profits that arise from a great industry of that kind, but in addition to this, and perhaps of still greater importance is the fact that where the milling takes place the by-products remain. That is a most important thing. The by-products cannot be profitably shipped to any great distance, and it is all important that the wheat should be milled in this country, that the industry should remain in this country, and that the by-products and the benefits derived from these by-products should remain here.

I think it is only fair to say that perhaps the east and west feature of this agreement has been argued at very great length. But, if we are going to have this treaty, every man knows—it is self-evident—that to a very great extent the east and west transportation of this country is going to decrease. How much no one can tell. We know it from the history of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 that in the very next year after the treaty went into force there was an instantaneous and immense falling off in the shipment through the canals going east and west, and from the ports of Montreal and Quebec. Their shipping declined one-half practically in one year. With that example before us, and with our certain knowledge that history repeats itself when identical conditions are re-created we do know that there will be a great decline in the east and west transportation shipping of this country. How much no one can tell. We have not heard so much of the all-red route since this pact has been before the people. That seems to have dropped and very naturally and very properly so because I do not know just what it will have to do. Where will it take the traffic? What occasion will there be for it? We are getting along pretty well at the present time with our present conditions. The all red-route was proclaimed in anticipation of a largely increased shipping business to and from the ocean ports of this country. It is quite evident that that is not going to happen. There is a very significant and a very important silence upon that question.

Now, with regard to the east and west route, it is rather wonderful that the past statements of the government seem to be entirely forgotten by members of the government themselves and largely by the public. Therefore it is necessary perhaps to refer occasionally to what was said by the leaders of this government in regard to the east and west traffic of the country, especially in regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. I would like to refer to some statements made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). When speaking on the Grand Trunk Pacific and National Transcontinental railway in the House of Commons we recollect perhaps this rather striking statement:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

Heaven grant that if be not already too late; heaven grant that whilst we tarry and dispute, the trade of Canada is not deviated to other channels, and that an ever vigilant competitor does not take to himself the trade that properly belongs to those who acknowledge Canada as their native or their adopted land.

And the right hon. gentleman was followed by his Minister of Finance on the same occasion who said:

It is desirable that we should give our American brethren to understand that Canada is resolved to work out her independence in these things, and the present proposal will promote this object, and that even if still another railway should be necessary we shall be prepared to construct it. The attitude that the government has taken upon the subject . . . has already attracted much attention across the border, and there is much keener appreciation of Canada's independence than ever before.

The Minister of Finance was out heroding his chief; he was prepared to build two Transcontinental railways to move the trade of Canada east and west so that we might be for all time independent of our American friends. The very bargain itself with the Grand Trunk Pacific contains penal clauses compelling the railway to carry the trade east and west to Canadian ports. Section 43 of the contract which now forms part of the bill reads:

43. The company further agrees that it shall not, in any matter within its power, directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use its utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which public aid is granted, namely,—the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

Do I need to remind hon. gentlemen that the very same principle was embodied in the British North America Act with regard to the Intercolonial railway, declaring that it was essential to the consolidation of the union of British North America, and this same principle of east and west transportation was incorporated in the agreement with British Columbia in 1871, it being made an essential part of the union that the Canadian Pacific railway should be built. This is proof that in all sections of this country and at all times in her history there has been uppermost in the minds of the people of Canada the necessity for this east and west route until now this government agreed with the United States that her trade shall be diverted to the south. American public men are gloating over the fact that the American ocean ports are to handle our export freight, and I commend to the government the views of Governor Foss, of Massachussetts, who is strongly for the agreement, because he believes it will draw all kinds of trade away from Canadian ports; that there will be no more Montreal, or St. John, or Halifax, but that Boston is to be the great port for shipment of Canadian goods. We know only too well that that is most likely what will happen if this pact goes through. It seems most extraordinary that the right hon. gentleman and his Minister of Finance should have turned around in their own tracks, and gone back on their declared policy and are now proposing by this pact to undo much of what has been done by the legislation of past years to encourage national transcontinental east and west routes. Why, the right hon gentleman, who declared so often against reciprocity should now favour it, we do not know, but there may be a reason that will come to the surface later on. In the House of Commons at banquets and on other public occasions, and at the Colonial Conference we find him of late years pronouncing against reciprocity. In 1891 he fell fighting for reciprocity or commercial union or continental free trade or whatever you may choose to call it, and from that date to the date of this agreement he seems to have been opposed to it. In 1899 he said:

If we know the hearts and minds of our people at present, I think I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the general feeling in Canada is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians would have given many things to obtain the American market. There was a time when the market of the great cities of the Union was the only market we had, but these days are past and over now. We are not dependent on the American market now.

At a banquet in Montreal in 1901 the right hon. gentleman declared:

I remember, and you remember also, that since the abolition of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1866, we have sent delegation after delegation to Washington to obtain reciprocity. We are not sending any more delegations. But I rather expect, and I would not be surprised, if the thing were to take place in a few years—I say—I rather expect that there will be delegations coming from Washington to Ottawa for reciprocity. Having learned from our friends in the south how to receive such a delegation, we shall receive them in the proper manner, with every possible politeness.

In 1903, in proposing the Grand Trunk Pacific legislation the Prime Minister said:

I have found, in the short experience during which it has been my privilege and my fortune to be placed at the head of affairs, by the will of the Canadian people, that the best and most effective way to maintain friendship with our American neighbours is to be absolutely independent of them.

When he found himself in England at the Imperial Conference in 1907, he was more British than ever, and this is the language he used:

If we were to follow the laws of nature and geography between Canada and the United States, the whole trade would flow from south to north, and from north to south. We have done everything possible by canals and subsidizing railways to bring the trade from west to east and east to west so as to bring trade into British channels. All this we have done, recognizing the principle of the great advantage of forcing trade within the British Empire. . . There is no boundary line except a purely conventional one over the whole territory of North America. Their habits are the same as ours, and therefore we are induced to trade and cannot help it by force of nature. But so far as legislation can influence trade we have done everything possible to push our trade towards the British people as against the American people. . .

There was a time when we wanted reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside. We have said goodbye to that trade and we now put all our hopes upon the British trade.

Here he was apologizing even for trading with the Americans which he excuses on the ground that they were our neighbours and that there was only an invisible line between the two countries.

But in so far as legislation is concerned, we are not encouraging trade with the States; we are encouraging and are going to encourage trade with Great Britain. Again right-about-face. One can hardly understand the reason for it, unless, perhaps, it be the old love reawakened in the heart of the premier in this late day, because we all know that his old love was for reciprocity transactions and community of interests with the people to the south.

Now, I desire to differ very distinctly from the hon. gentleman who represents South Ontario in this House (Mr. Fowke).

That hon. gentleman, in several places in the province of Ontario, the city of Toronto among others, has been preaching the gospel of continental trade as opposed to interprovincial trade. giving his reasons for that preference. He has urged that it is better to abandon interprovincial trade and encourage continental trade. I think nothing could be more disastrous to this country than to accept any such doctrine. Our own people in these provinces want to trade with each other. How can it be said that it is better to trade with the people of the south than among ourselves—that it is better to buy the products of American workmen instead of the products of our own workmen who make and finish the materials in this country? Surely it is a most desirable thing that we should trade among ourselves, that the farmers of the west should buy the manufactured goods that come from the east, and that the great toiling industrial masses of the east should buy the products of the farm and the dairy of our own people than the stuff that comes from the United States. Surely it is wise to keep our money at home. Even if the prices were somewhat higher in this country it would be preferable to deal among ourselves and keep the money in the country rather than to send the money to build up foreign factories and foreign homesteads. Our friends opposite have been in the habit of going through the rural districts telling the farmers of the great benefits of this treaty. That is not being much done now; there is a marked silence. The figures which the people have got on this subject, not from the government, but from independent sources, have enlightened them. But our Liberal friends have told the farmers that they would get more money for the produce of their farms if this pact went through, while in the cities they have told the mechanics and workers that reciprocity is going to cheapen their cost of living. How these two statements can be reconciled is more than I can understand. I leave hon. gentlemen opposite to preach their different doctrines to different audiences, but they can never make the people of this country believe that the farmer will get more for his produce and at the same time that the mechanic will get his food supplies cheaper than he gets them now.

I wish now to refer to a matter of some importance to which the Minister of Finance devoted his life, that is, the money of the country. The Minister of Finance has had to do with money; he has grown gray in the service of money. He has probably had more money passing under his hand in many ways than any Canadian who has preceded him, and, therefore, I will appeal to him, because he knows the value of money. Where do we get our money today? From our American friends? Permit me to read an extract from an article which appeared in a very excellent magazine called the 'Round Table,' for February, 1911:

For federal, provincial, municipal and other purposes Canada is borrowing at the rate of $200,000,000 per annum. It is estimated that the Dominion has absorbed $1,000,000,000 of British capital. During five years ending 1909 (per Richard Gregg, British Trade Commissioner for Canada), outside investments in Canada have totalled $962,000,000, of which Great Britain has contributed $605,000,000. In five years we have borrowed $250,000,000 for railway construction alone. During the last ten years we have received 1,500,000 immigrants and these have brought money and settlers' effects probably to the value of $500,000,000. A calculation by the Toronto 'Globe' places the government, corporation and municipal borrowings for 1910 at $215,338,500 as compared with $240,000,000 for the previous year. In the distribution of bonds the United States took 1½ per cent, Canada 17½ per cent, and Great Britain 81 per cent.

It may be possible that this will continue to a certain extent; but if we want to do business with people we have to do it fairly. We get nothing for nothing in this world; every person has to pay for everything he gets, in money or kind; and if our trade is deliberately taken from England and turned over to the American people, we cannot reasonably hope to have the same lavish expenditure of British money in this country that we have had in the past. Many people think this is a commercial combination simply. A great many very wise people think that it means more, that though it may be merely commercial at the initiation, it will become political ultimately. The desire of the British investor is to invest under British institutions, under British conditions, which he knows and in which he has confidence. Mr. Paish, an eminent London authority on finance, says that Canada has absorbed £300,000,000 of British capital. We know that capital is very sensitive; nothing is more sensitive, and it is very easy to alarm the investor. I have no desire to make statements without giving particulars, but I venture to say that there is not an hon. gentleman in this House who has not heard of at least one intending British investment of capital in this country which has been withdrawn, or which has been delayed, at least, until the question of this reciprocity issue is decided fully and definitely. I know of a great many instances of British capital which intended to come here, and in which a halt has been called very naturally. They want to know what the conditions are going to be.

Now, if we are going to borrow our money from one man, and do business with another I do not know how long that method of trade will last. What would this country do without British capital? What would the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) do with regard to financing his loans? Perhaps the credit of Canada is now good enough to go to the European markets, but where does it naturally go? To the London money market of course. There is not a city or town in Canada whose streets are not lighted or paved or whose public utilities are not operated more or less by British capital, which was got at a time when capital could not be got at the same rate of interest from foreign countries. This capital is invested in exploiting the mines —it is invested in our agricultural lands— it is invested in every walk and sphere of our national life, and there is nothing more closely associated with business in Canada. It has always been so, and will continue so if we maintain our trade conditions as they are at the present time. How long these conditions will last if we are going to pass over our gold and silver to pay for American products, is a thing I do not know.

There is another matter kindred with the one of which I am now speaking. The right hon. gentleman has been full of hope that some day we would obtain a British preference. We on this side of the House have indulged the same hope and desire. What can be more advantageous to the great farming community of this country than some preference on the British markets for food stuffs they need and which we raise? Now, this is a hope which has some prospect of ultimately materialising. In fact some of the British public men are now committed to it—and when I say this I do not mean some of the men of to-day or yesterday, because the matter has been before them for the last ten or fifteen years, and they have been advocating the adoption of some preference for the products of the overseas portions of the empire. I have every reason to expect that when the time is ripe and proper some form of preference will be obtained by the overseas portions of the empire in the home market of Great Britain.

The agreement ignores one objection which has been urged with force and persistence in Canada. It has been contended that with free trade in natural products between Canada and the United States, reciprocal treatment of Canadian products in British markets would become impossible, inasmuch as American products would seek an outlet at Canadian ports in order to secure the benefit of British preferential duties. Certainly Canada has faced no such radical change in fiscal policy since the system of protection was established over thirty years ago.

Now, how can we hope to succeed in getting that preference if the proposed treaty passes? How can we expect a British preference if all the food stuffs and natural products of the American nation are at liberty to swarm over the border line into this country, and be reshipped to Great Britain as the products of this country? Surely that would make a British preference impossible, and it seems to me natural that it should be so, because the preference would be given to us as part of the overseas dominions of the British Empire. It would not be given to the products of the United States. Now, if reciprocity is enforced between ourselves and our American neighbours, it is, of course, quite obvious that their products would come in here, and intermingle with ours in such a way that there would be no possibility of distinguishing between the two, the result would be that Great Britain would naturally say: 'It is impossible for us to admit your products into our markets when they are accompanied by a great avalanche of American products which we cannot distinguish from your own.

The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) when introducing this measure, spoke delightfully about the certainty and the uncertainty of the duration of the pact. He told us in one sentence that this would only be a temporary affair—that if we did not like it we were not bound to anybody for any time—and if it were found to be inconvenient or unprofitable we could undo it, and revert to our former condition—that we did not have to abide by it, but could cancel it at any time. In the next sentence he told us that the hope was expressed by both prties to the transaction that it would be found profitable and that it would be enduring.

Let us see what the opinion of our American friends is as to the enduring of it. Mr. McCall, who introduced the measure into the House said in the debate on the reciprocity agreement:

> It is scarcely good form for us to regulate in advance, the internal fiscal policy of the British Empire. It will, however, always be within the power of Congress, if it shall appear that any undue advantage is hereafter given to Great Britain, to correct and change these rates, or repeal them all.

Before the pact goes into force, Mr. McCall says: 'If this does not suit us we are going to repeal it.' There is a condition of uncertainty created which is in itself, a very grave objection. We all know that the commercial interests of any country strive and struggle for one thing more than all others, and that is certainty and stability. Certainty of tariff and stability of trade. They cannot get on with a tariff which is changeable like a moving picture show, and which may alter at any moment—new scenes being rung up, and brought into the arena. That is not a condition which the mercantile and manufacturing classes in this country desire. It is quite obvious that that kind of a temporary tariff would be most injurious. It would not be a stable condition of affairs, after diverting our routes of transportation north and south, after changing our trade conditions, and adopting our commercial life to the new conditions, to have all this suddenly overthrown and wiped out. What condition would trade be in then? 'Disorganization' is scarcely a fair word to express the condition in which we would find ourselves.

The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) took exception to a remark which I made regarding his statement in Montreal. I have it before me now. Speaking at the Windsor Hall, Montreal, on March 25, 1911, the hon. minister said:

> We know that a great many things have been said about this agreement which are wrong; we know that a great many men have formed their opinions in relation to this measure without adequate information, and so it is our desire that as opportunities occur, we shall endeavour to remove some of the misunderstandings which exist.

If the people have not had adequate information regarding this agreement who is to blame? Surely, the government. It may be, with the extraordinary and undue haste that has characterized the government's action, they could not prepare for our people proper information on this subject. But apparently our American friends were warned and advised in advance. They had their information all prepared, and much of what has been used in this House and throughout this country is information we have gleaned from American sources. Had full information been before the country when this pact was brought into the House, there would not have been the lengthy discussion upon it. We on this side have insisted that the people should have the information necessary to form an opinion upon this question. Every man in this country is as much entitled to information upon the nature of this pact as were the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) when they were discussing it. It is an essential and fundamental change in our economic and national conditions. Every man is affected by it, and every man is entitled to the means of forming an opinion upon the matter.

The opposition have condemned and opposed this pact in the belief that it is bad for Canada and for British interests. That, of course, is merely an opinion. But what we have tried to insist upon was that the people should have the information necessary to form an opinion in the first place, and in the second place that they should be afforded an opportunity to express that opinion. We believe that the people may be trusted. And we believe that on this subject the people are being educated. Notwithstanding the complete absence of information brought down by the government, the people are getting the information. Public men are arising everywhere to spread the knowledge of the subject and people who are not in public life at all are engaged taking part in the work of public education. We hope the people will be given an opportunity of expressing themselves, pro and con on this question. That is all that the opposition asks. We believe that the people may be trusted; but we believe also that when the people's voice is heard on this subject it will be, not unanimously, of course, but by a heavy preponderance in opposition to this pact.

Mr. W. R. SMYTH (East Algoma). Mr. Chairman, I assure you of my sympathy in having to sit up so late listening to this debate. Perhaps you are tired because of hearing only from one side. And we on this side also are not only somewhat tired, but almost ashamed that in the House of Commons, representing this great Canada, we have a majority who sit as dumb as oysters. We know that these gentlemen have ability to discuss this question if they wish to do so. We also understand that they are taking advantage of their position for the purpose, as they think, of letting this side talk itself out. I do not know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) who is now leading the House is going to accomplish exactly what he has set out to do. But I am sure that every member on this side—I would like to include the 'colony,' but I am perfectly satisfied I speak for all the Conservatives—is willing to remain here until this time next year if our humble efforts may protect the interest of the people. Surely, we could have no other desire at heart than the interest of the people to leave our homes and businesses and come here to remain during the sweltering July nights, impairing our health, to carry on the debate on this question.

I feel it my duty to address this House, becaue my constituents have sent me here not to sit dumb, but to express to the powers that be my views on the questions before the House. It is not for me to say how hon. gentlemen on the other side shall meet their constituents and explain why they did not take part in the debate. Only a few of them have taken part. But apparently they would rather leave unsaid what they believe to be the right thing for the people, than to say what they would have to say under the dictation of the gentleman who leads the House. We on this side, thank God, are left untrammelled; no lash is applied to us. Who can think of our leader doing as the leaders of gentlemen opposite did?—going down to Washington where no doubt, the president entertained him kindly and gave him a good time. He certainly made them feel good and they evidently thought it their duty to tie this—(in their eyes)—little Canada to the United States. We on this side take issue with them. We are not prepared to hand ourselves and our country over to the United States. I have lived on the borders of the United States for many years and have had dealings with people of the United States. I have always found them honourable and honest in any dealings I have had with them. But I have also found that they were all well worth watching whenever you are making a trade with them, for they would get the better of you if they could.

In the many dealings I have had with them, I always took the precaution—perhaps it is because I am Scotch—to have my wits about me before I attempted to trade with them. It would have been well for this country if these gentlemen, before they hied down to Washington, had taken the precaution to be well on their guard. It would have been well if they had gone down there with some mandate, either from the people at large or from this House. But, instead of that, they did not give any hint to the people of this country of what they were going to do at Washington. I do not think they knew themselves, and if they did know, they knew it a year before. If they knew, they knew it when they went the previous year to do a little dickering with these same gentlemen in Washington. It is my belief that the gentlemen who went last fall to Washington to make this pact had promised the American negotiators that next year they would give them a little more. Now we find these two gentlemen tying up the people of this country to a pact which, I am satisfied, the majority of the Canadian people do not want, and won't stand for. The Conservative party in this House are numerically not as strong as the government party, but I think we represent, perhaps, the majority of the people of Canada. We conscientiously feel it is our duty to oppose this pact in the interests, as we think, of the great majority of the people of Canada. We believe that it has been entered into without due consideration. We believe that there are no two men sitting in this House who are able to go to Washington and, off their own bat, to use a slang phrase, negotiate intelligently concerning every interest that they are going either to make or to break.

Now, Sir, I understand that the hon. the Minister of Finance is neither a lumberman, a miller, a merchant, or a manufacturere. I think he is a retired gentleman, or soon will be. We know that the other negotiator, the hon. the Minister of Customs, makes very nice candies, very nice cakes, and all that sort of thing; he makes crackers, but he has given us a cracker now that we don't want to take. He took very good care to protect his crackers. However, I was going to say that the two gentlemen who went to Washington could not be familiar with all the interests they were dealing with. I have had some experience in life myself. I have not been a baker, but I have been a blacksmith, a soldier, a sailor and a farmer, and I would hate to take upon my shoulders to say that I knew all about either farming, or soldiering, or anything else in connection with the industrial life of this country. I contend that the two gentlemen who went to Washington knew but very little about the lumber interests of this country. If they had been alive to the lumber interests they would not have allowed the Americans to draw the wool over their eyes as they have done. It is of course well known that lumber has been allowed to come into this country free for years; we have had free lumber entering Canada from the United States for several years. We had been up against a $2 per thousand duty, until a short time ago, upon our lumber going into the United States. Now, as I understand this pact, lumber is going into the United States free. That looks all very well on the face of it. But how does our lumber compare with the lumber that is coming into Canada free of duty? It is well known that lumber is not manufactured solely into boards. Lumber has to be manufactured into other articles; it has to be planed, tongued and grooved in many instances, thereby not only reducing its weight because of the dressing, but reducing its weight because of the fact that it has to be dried before it is dressed. Now, the United States very carefully shut out dressed or partly dressed lumber. They knew that if we had to ship all rough lumber into the United States from the interior of Canada, lumber in its rough state, the addition to the weight of that lumber, in comparison with what it would be if it was dried and planed, would more than offset the price of lumber in its dressed state. When we talk of lumber we do not mean simply boards. Now, the Americans very wisely objected to allowing our shingles to go free into the United States. It is a well-known fact that the lumbermen to-day, in order to make a living and a fair profit out of their industry have to utilize every bit of the timber that is standing on their limits. It is a well-known fact that to-day the lumbermen are using up material, odds and ends, for lath, &c., that they wouldn't look at fifteen or twenty years ago. But they have to use that. They have a great surplus of that sort of material, but very little of it is going to be allowed into the United States because it cannot go in free. If I understand it right, all their rough lumber, partly planed, lumber, shavings and lath come into this country free.

Mr. FIELDING. No, we have made no change whatever in our lumber duties. The only change that has been made is that the Americans admit our lumber on more favourable terms than before.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). While you are at it you might have made a very material change to the benefit of the lumber interests if you had been alive to the necessities of the case.

Mr. FIELDING. But as we gave them nothing in the matter how could we expect to claim all those great benefits? We gave them no change in lumber; it remains the same.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). But you could have protected the lumber interests when you had the chance.

Mr. FIELDING. The protection remains the same in Canada; it is not touched one iota.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). I quite understand that it is not touched one iota, but you did not take advantage of the fact of being there. When you had the opportunity you could have placed $2 a thousand feet on lumber coming into this country.

Mr. FIELDING. But we did not want to do that.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). Why? If you had been wide-awake and understood your business you would have done something for the lumber interest.

Mr. FIELDING. We think it is bad policy; we do not want it.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). Perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware of the fact that the Americans require the better grades of our white pine lumber. They do not require our lower grades stuff such as hemlock and spruce (other than pulp wood), and low grade pine. There are lumbermen within the sound of my voice now who will tell you that every mill yard in northern Ontario at least is piled high with the lower grades of lumber that southern pine comes in competition with in this country. The profit perhaps of their whole operations is in the cull end of the lumber and how they can best market it. If they have a failure in marketing the cull end of their lumber they usually make no profits that year at least. Our Canadian lumbermen in my district—I do not refer to the American lumbermen—claim that instead of getting lumber into the United States free they would rather have had an import duty on southern pine coming into this country.

Mr. FIELDING. Is that the Conservative policy?

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). I am talking from the standpoint of the lumbermen's interests. I am trying to show the hon. gentleman that he did not know his business when he went to Washington, and I think I have succeeded perhaps in convincing him, because at least I got a response from him, that it would be to the interest of the lumber industry to shut out the southern pine as against our low grade lumber. I think that the hon. gentleman will agree with me in that respect.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I do not. I say it is not in the interest of Canada to increase the lumber duties at all, and if it is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite to increase the lumber duties let them say so.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). I am just saying that you might have taken advantage of the opportunity at the time. We have had some very wise legislation enacted in our province with regard to the preservation of our timber, such as spruce pulp-wood, and I am very glad that in the province of Ontario a very wise government—and the Liberal government were very wise at that time because they took the advice of the Conservative party—prohibited the export of spruce taken from Crown lands. I myself was at that time perhaps one of the largest exporters of spruce pulpwood. I was very glad indeed that I had the American market to send my spruce to, but I can say it was against the best interests of the province and against the best interests of the people of Canada that our beautiful material should go over to the United States to build up such cities as Alpena, Bay City and other places on the American side. We have to-day in my constituency perhaps more mills than any other member has in his constituency. It would have been a great deal better for me if we had not had some of them at the time of my last election, but notwithstanding all that we find on our shores to-day large mills erected on account of the restrictions that were placed by the Ontario government on the export of spruce, and the district all along the Georgian bay and on St. Mary river has been transformed from an idle waste into a scene of industry.

I am not perhaps as familiar with other matters as I am with the lumber and timber interests, or as I am in a small way with the farmers' interests. Dealing with the farmers for many years, buying their produce both as a lumberman and as a merchant, having dealt in every shape, manner and form with them, trucked and traded, it may be, I know pretty nearly where the farmer is benefited and where he is not benefited by a pact such as we have before the House. The farmers in the district I have the honour to represent were the first to petition me to oppose the reciprocity treaty. True, some of the American lumbermen would rather see reciprocity, but the farmers were the first to petition me to set my face against reciprocity, and I will show you why if you will allow me to localize my remarks a little and apply them to the district I have the honour to represent. All along the Michigan border the farmers of my district have to compete with American hay, notwithstanding the fact that an import duty of $2 a ton is imposed on hay coming into Canada. The farmers for hundreds of miles have to compete with the American hay coming in large quantities into Ontario. Lumbermen with American blood in their veins, having come from the American side naturally favour their own country and they would rather pay the $2 a ton duty sometimes than allow the Canadian farmer to have his own way a little. I have seen train load after train load of hay coming in with the $2 a ton duty added. What will that mean to the farmer if they can import it without paying one cent of duty at all? Then, how would it operate in the matter of beef and pork? It is all bosh to say that the farmer can get more for his beef and pork in the United States than he can get in Canada. It is a fact well-known to every lumberman, mine owner and large employer of labour, that they can buy their food stuffs, such as pork and beef in Chicago, bring it into Canada, pay the duty and get it cheaper than they could if they bought it in Canada.

I am not sure that it is any advantage to the Canadian lumbermen or others who use coarse grains such as oats, but I do know that you can buy these grains as cheaply in the United States as you can in Canada, and as to the cost of freight, vessels carrying lumber from the Georgian bay ports are only too anxious to get return cargo at nominal rates. I have had stuff brought into this country in that way just for the expense of loading and unloading it, so that the vessels might have ballast on the return trip. Then, with regard to foodstuffs and hay and that class of products, your reciprocity injures the farmers of my district, as I believe it injures the farmers in other parts of the country. I cannot see for the life of me why the Canadian government entered into this agreement at all. Canada was prospering better than ever before in her history, a thing for which I believe the leader of the government takes credit, although, personally, I am inclined to give more credit to the Almighty than to the right hon. gentleman. I have seen it placarded throughout my constituency in election times that it was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who caused the rain to fall and who brought the good weather for the crops; I have seen it set forth that he was greater than his Creator, but for my part I would rather take chances with the Supreme Being than I would with the present Prime Minister of Canada. We are told it was the farmers who asked for reciprocity, and all the blame is laid on the wicked farmers, particularly those in the west. I had the distinguished honour of being present in this House when the farmers came here in December. I chummed around with some of them and had a good time, but I never heard reciprocity mentioned all the time I was with them. The farmers came here not to ask for reciprocity, but among other things to ask for government ownership and operation of terminal elevators, and they were right in that contention, and we on this side of the House supported them in that, and I hope the day is not distant when the Conservatives will be in power and in a position to give them exactly what they asked for in that regard. At all events, one thing they will get from the Conservative government is fair and square treatment and no humbug. Then, they asked for government ownership and operation of the Hudson bay railway, but the reply of the Prime Minister was that he thought it would be a good thing to build it at the people's expense and then hand it over to somebody—he did not say to whom—who would help them to carry elections. We have been under the impression for a long time that the Liberal election funds come from those who build railways and some gentlemen who were poor a few years ago, but who got Grand Trunk Pacific contracts and are now candidates for parliament and are proclaiming that they will spend hundreds of thousands of dollars to get elected. Then, the western farmers asked for free agricultural implements, and the Prime Minister thought he would give them a little sop by reducing the duty 2½ per cent, which I believe is going to lose him a few supporters. The western farmers asked for assistance towards the chilled meat trade and cold storage, but the Prime Minister gave them no encouragement along that line. Then they asked for certain amendments to the Railway Act, which the Conservatives in this House moved for, but which the party in power refused to concede. But they did get something—they got it in the neck, and they went away dissatisfied. They were wrathy at the manner in which they had been treated by the government, but the astute Prime Minister thought there was a way out of it, and he kept three or four of the leading chaps over for a few days in order to fix something up. I don't think that many of those he held over were Tories; they were good Liberals, and then it was I believe this reciprocity business was hatched. They were told: If we do not give you free implements or government control and operation of the elevators, we will give you something else so that you won't have to say you are going away empty-handed. Then, these leading fellows that stayed over took a quick right-about-face, they sold the farmers of the west body and soul and boots and everything else, and the day that these gentlemen entered the precincts of the Prime Minister's chamber was the day the scheme was laid to sell the farmers, and these so-called representatives of theirs were to be the backbone of the Grit machine that is now operating under the guise of the Grain Growers' Association of the west. That was when the scheme was hatched to carry the west at the expense of the farmers themselves.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. They are Grit organizers now.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). Every man of them is a Grit organizer under the guise of a grain grower. But after the campaign of education that was carried on a few weeks ago by a very able member of this House, there are not so many of them sticking so closely to the so-called leaders of the grain growers. I had the honour and pleasure of being in the west myself for a few weeks, and I met a great many of the grain growers. I met a good many of the gentlemen who came down here demanding that the government should assist them in several ways, and went back convinced that the government were going to do something for them in connection with this reciprocity pact or something else. But when they found out that they were humbugged and sold out, that their so-called leaders were nothing but political heelers who had been trading on their credulity and their name as grain growers, they abandoned them, and to-day we do not find all the gentlemen who were here backing up those who stayed over the day after to confer with the premier staying with the machine. Now, the grain growers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta are a very intelligent class of men, especially those I met, and they had only to be shown that they were being misled by the so-called leaders of the Grain Growers' Association to realize the position that they had placed themselves in. In travelling through the west, I found one or two of my friends who were inclined to be in favour of reciprocity, one friend especially, a very intelligent sort of chap; but he had been hob-nobbing with bad company politically; and when I asked him to tell me just how he understood this reciprocity pact, he said, in the first place, the government is going to allow implements to come free into this country.' I said, 'Who told you that?' He said, 'the leaders of the Grain Growers' Association; and they issued pamphlets in my own riding telling the farmers that they were going to have free implements. If that is the kind of campaign with which this government think they are going to carry the country next time, they are greatly mistaken, because the farmers to-day are too wideawake to be humbugged with any such nonsense as that. While some who do not read very much may be persuaded at the first blush that that is the case, by discussion with their neighbours they soon become enlightened. That is the process going on through the west, and it leads the government to question whether they should give the west redistribution and increased representation. We on this side of the House want to see the west properly represented; we shall be glad to see its representation trebled. The west deserves it, because to my mind it is the greatest part of this country agriculturally, and in many other respects. Our friends opposite were very cocky a few months ago about what they were going to do when they got increased representation from the west. They are not so anxious now; they want to put off the evil day as far as they can. Now, we do not fear going to the country on this reciprocity pact. We will welcome the election at the earliest moment, and you can throw in a few bush polls if you think they will strengthen your chances very much, because your Waterloo on this very question is not very far distant, if I read the minds of the people of Canada aright. We are accused now of having all the wealth behind us, of being imperial jingoes, and last night I was sorry to see the Minister of Finance lose his temper and accuse us of being obstructionists and of reading from newspapers. I would like to know where we are going to get our information if we do not read from newspapers, because we cannot get it from the government. I often wonder whether they are to compile it or not; they certainly have not produced it here, and I do not think they want to produce it. I will not bother the House by reading much from newspapers, but I have a few documents here that I would like to read from, and they will be very interesting. It may take two or three hours to read one of them alone; but there has been so much reference to former treaties that I think it would be well to have these matters placed on Hansard so that they will be in the hands of every member of this House and of every citizen of Canada, and I am sure that the hon. gentleman who is leading the House to-night will bear with me an hour or two while I read part of that.

Mr. FIELDING. Certainly, with great pleasure.

Mr. SMYTH (Algona). Before I take up that document, I want to take up another matter in connection with this pact. We are told that there is no danger of annexation—that the United States can get all the advantages of us they like, they can own us root and branch, but we will still be British subjects. That is a grand feeling to have, that we will be able to control ourselves in that way, even when the United States controls everything we have. I would rather remain, feeling that the mother country was going to have a firm and solid hold on Canada for all time to come, than see the United States get one dollar's worth of our products, because we can live splendidly without them. Many years ago they told us repeatedly that annexation or starvation was staring us in the face. They told us and the outside world that we were hardly civilized, that we would never be able to take care of ourselves or build railways, because we had no land to build on except a little strip along the front.

They found, Sir, they were mistaken in that. They found that we had the land, that we had the men, and that we had the money, they also found that we did not have to go to the United States to get the money, but we went to the dear old land to get it to build our railways and our canals and our public works throughout Canada.

They have realized that while Canada may be small in their eyes, still she is great in the financial world, able to stand alone, and do splendidly without their assistance, they also realized that the natural products of this country are far in excess of the resources of their country and colonies put together, and they realize that in the paper industry, and many other industries they are absolutely dependent on Canada for the material to carry on their business. They are also dependent on Canada for their nickel. It is a well known fact that near the district I represent we have the greatest nickel mines in the world. It is also a well known fact that every one of these mines is owned by Americans. No doubt these gentlemen would be very glad to see us annexed to the United States.

As I said, Canada is greater in the eyes of the United States to-day than they ever dreamt she would be. They see our natural resources, our nickel, our timber, our wheat and everything else, and they are most anxious now to trade with us. I think if the hon. gentlemen who went down there had one ounce of pluck in their breasts, when they were invited to go they would have said: Nay. We want none of you. You turned us back many a time. Now we will turn you back.' Instead of that they hobnobbed with these American gentlemen and had the wool pulled over their eyes. The result is that to-day they want to bind Canada hard and fast to the United States, which will be nothing more or less than the forerunner of annexation. In this reciprocity agreement I see the danger of the United States having control of our markets, and of our industries, and I see that their eye single is to-day on Canada. They have turned our ministers back in years gone by and when they did so the Liberal party was very jubilant in its criticism of the manner in which the gentlemen from Canada went over to the United States. Would it not be just nice, when Canada is big in the eyes of the United States, and when she is in a position to give them some of their own medicine, that they should get it just when they asked our ministers to go over there? There was some excuse for our ministers in years gone by asking to have a little trade with their big brother, the United States, but there was no excuse for this government interfering with the wheels of commerce, or interfering with every financial interest throughout the length and breadth of this country by hanging over our heads a pact which is disagreeable, offensive, and I think, unconstitutional.

We, on this side of the House, ask you, Sir, to give us an opportunity to show that the people of Canada endorse the doctrine we have been preaching along that line. There cannot be anything fairer or more reasonable than that we should go to the people who elected us on that question. I do not think we are in any less position as regards a mandate than the right hon. gentleman and the hon. gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches, leading this government. The votes of the people were not given at the last election or the election previous on a question such as this at all. It was not before them, and they did not know anything about it.

I think we must give some weight to the sayings of the gentlemen who occupy the positions of senators and representatives in the United States. What do we find? We find these gentlemen saying that one of the advantages to be derived by the United States if this pact went through, would be that it would lead to greater things, along the line of annexation. We have been told that these gentlemen were not serious. Well, we might just as well say that the hon. gentleman who introduced this pact to the House was not serious.

President Taft knew something about our forests. He took the pains to educate himself and find out all about them, and a great deal about our other industries as well. While this government does not know anything about our forests, the Americans can give us all the information we want about them. They know more about our natural resources than we ever dreamt of knowing.

As you know President Taft is a very large man in the United States—nearly as big a man in his country as the right hon. the leader of the House is here. Surely, we must give him credit for being serious in what he said—surely President Taft is not trying to jolly somebody all the time, as he did our ministers. He said:

Should we not then arrange a commercial agreement with Canada, if we can, by which we will have direct access to her great supply of natural products?

Of course, this has been referred to a great many times, and I am reading something which has been read before, but I purpose reading it even if it is disagreeable to my hon. friends on the other side of the House.

Ought we not, then, to arrange a commercial agreement with Canada if we can, by which we shall have direct access to her great supply of natural products? They are coming. They are coming to the parting of the ways. Should we not now, therefore, before their policy has become too crystallized and fixed for change. . . greatly increase the natural resources available to our people?. . . by giving our people access to Canadian forests, we shall reduce the consumption of our own, which, in the hands of comparatively few owners, now have a value that requires the enlargement of our available timber resources.

He knew very well of our timber resources and that the time was not far distant when the United States would be compelled to pay practically whatever price we asked, and accept whatever terms we dictated for access to our natural resources. We are told by the Liberal party that the farmer will get more for his wheat under reciprocity, and that the lumberman will get more for his lumber. That may look very nice on the face of it. The lumberman will get more for his lumber this year- perhaps. I know some who have sold their year's cut, and they are going to divide $1.25 if this pact goes through. But in future years will it be our lumbermen on this side who will get the benefit? Will it be the consumer who will get the benefit? No, it will be the great lumber interests that absolutely control the market in the United States, for, when they have control, they will pay us what they please.

I have wandered from the question of annexation, but here is something of President Taft's that brings me back to it:

The reduction in the duties imposed by Canada will give us even a larger share of her market than we now enjoy, great as that is.

And here is something further. Shortly afterwards the president spoke at Columbus, Ohio, and said:

The greatest reason for adopting this agreement is the fact that it is going to unite two countries with kindred people, and lying together across a wide continent in a commercial and social union.

Next Mr. Taft went to Atlanta, and while there he developed his idea of commercial union. This is what he said:

When we entered upon the negotiations I asked the Secretary of State and his commissioners to offer free trade in everything, but this Canada could not grant us, because she has a protected system and she was afraid of the competition of our better organized industries. Canada is at the parting of the ways.

He still kept telling them that Canada was at the parting of the ways.

If we now neglect this opportunity to bring about closer business and trade relations, and insist upon the continuance of an artificial wall between the two countries, which differ no more in conditions of labour and production than do Kentucky and Tennessee or Georgia and Alabama, we shall throw away an opportunity for mutual benefit not likely to recur.

Finally, President Taft at New York at the end of April urged the editors of the United States to support the agreement and used these words as the crowning reason why they should do it.

He went on the principle to strike while the iron was hot. He had these gentlemen on the run, and wanted to keep them on the run, and here is another thing he said:

I have said that this was a critical time in the solution of the question of reciprocity. It is critical because, unless it is now decided favourably to reciprocity, it is exceedingly probable that no such opportunity will ever again come to the United States. The forces which are at work in England and in Canada to separate her by a Chinese wall from the United States, and to make her part of an imperial commercial band reaching from England around the world to England again, by a system of preferential tariffs, will derive an impetus from the rejection of this treaty, and if we would have reciprocity, with all the advantages that I have described and that I earnestly and sincerely believe will follow its adoption, we must take it now or give it up for ever.

He seems to think he can do more with the gentlemen in Canada who have charge of this pact than with his own people. But he is going to miss his mark if we are able to hold out, and I think we can. We are not going to let it pass without an awful struggle; make no mistake about that. And when the hon, gentleman who leads the House (Mr. Fielding) makes us sit up to all hours of the night, makes us weary of ourselves and of them, we will stay at it. And I hope that the people of Canada will give us credit for being earnest in our endeavours to keep from them this iniquitous pact that the government is trying to foist upon us. We have a right, and I do not suppose the hon. gentleman would deny it, to express our opinions upon the subject.

Another peculiar thing is seen in this situation. I have had some parliamentary experience, but never, in any House that I have sat in, has a great measure been discussed without those who were responsible for it being in their places all the time. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to make relays of their numbers to come and go. But they must not forget that they are responsible for the issue, and responsible for the waste of time since last November, and especially since last January, all because of the determination of two gentlemen who occupy the same position, plus the salary, that other members of the House do. It is all very well for them to tell us that they will freeze us out—or smoke us out, I do not know which—because they have their monthly allowance whereas we poor fellows will be at the end of our tether soon. But we replenished our girnals before we left our homes. We have plenty to eat and drink, our families are not suffering because of the fact that we are here battling in the interests of the people of Canada. Now it is getting late, and I know that the hon. gentleman who leads the House is weary, and I would ask him to consent to an adjournment.

Mr. FIELDING. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 11.31 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MONDAY, July 24, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

THE QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Mr. MONK:

1. Did the invitations for tenders for the construction of the new Quebec bridge call for a carriage way as well as a railway over the new bridge, or was the carriage way left to the option of the tenderers?

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma).

2. Did the government obtain a written report from its board of engineers before giving the contract for said bridge? If so, what was the date of said report and by whom was it signed?

3. On what date was the contract adjudged, and at what price?

4. Who are the president, directors and manager of the company, which obtained the contract for said bridge?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The official design provided for a railway, street railway and roadways, but tenderers were asked in addition, to submit designs of their own and alternate designs were submitted, in addition to tenders on the official design, by the following:

The Maschinenfabrik Augsburg-Nuremberg, A. G. Werk Gustavsburg, Bruckenbauanstalt (in Gustavsburg) Germany;

The Pennsylvania Steel Company and

The St. Lawrence Bridge Company.

The British Empire Company being the only one that did not submit an alternate design.

2. A report was made signed by Messrs. H. E. Vautelet, Ralph Modjeski and Charles Macdonald, dated 26th October, 1910, stating that a satisfactory bridge could be erected on the official design, or on either of the several designs submitted by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company. The Minister of Railways replied, requesting the Board to supplement that statement by a more positive one, as to which of the designs they named was the best, and requiring the Board to make a recommendation, as he considered that part of the duties for which they were engaged. A report was then made by Messrs. Ralph Modjeski, C.E., and Charles Macdonald, C.E., members of the Board, recommending the adoption of one design submitted by the St. Lawrence Bridge Company; the chairman Mr. H. E. Vautelet, dissenting. Under the order in council, appointing the board, it was provided that, where differences arose, two additional engineers should be called in to assist in deciding the difference. Under this order Messrs. Henry W. Hodge, C.E., member American Society Civil Engineers and M. J. Butler, C.E., formerly deputy minister and chief engineer of the department were called in. As a result of their meeting, on the 11th February, 1911, a report was made recommending the acceptance of design 'B' of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company. This design included all the accommodations for traffic provided in the official design. This report was signed by Messrs. M. J. Butler, Henry W. Hodge, Ralph Modjeski and Charles Macdonald, chairman, pro tem. In this report attention was also called to the fact that the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, had among their tenders, submitted a design omitting the roadways and stated that.

if the government desired it 'the highways can now be omitted without changing the above recommendation, or delaying the progress of the work.' After a full consideration, the government decided to build a railway bridge with footwalks, and on the 14th March, 1911, a report was signed by Messrs. Macdonald, Modjeski and Hodge, recommended that a contract with the St. Lawrence Bridge Company for the superstructure of a bridge of this character, by which a saving of $2,600,000 could be made, This design is, in every way, similar to design 'B' which was recommended by the Board, except that it provides, only, for the railway and footwalks.

3. 31st March, 1911, at 9.02 cents per pound.

4. President and manager, Phelps Johnson, vice-president, F. C. McMath, directors: Phelps Johnson, Charles Cassils, F. L. Wanklyn, G. H. Duggan, and J. F. Weber, Montreal; F. C. McMath, Willard Pope and Bernard Colbrun, of Walkerville.

*Mr. MONK:

1. What members at present form part of the Quebec Bridge Board of Construction?

2. What is the total amount paid to date for salaries and expenses of the Quebec Bridge Board of Construction?

3. Is it intended to maintain said board in activity during the construction of the new bridge?

4. Has a contract been signed for the construction of the new bridge? If so, on what date?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The members of the Quebec Bridge Board, are as follows: C. N. Montserrat, M.S.C.E., chairman; Ralph Modjeski, M.I. C.E., M.A.C.E.; C. C. Schneider, C.E., past president American Society Civil Engineers.

2. The total amount paid to date for salaries and expenses of the Quebec Bridge Board is $256,808.23.

3. Yes.

4. Yes. 4th April, 1911.

*Mr. MONK:

1. What amount did the British Empire Bridge Company deposit with the government as a guarantee in sending in its tender for the construction of the new Quebec bridge?

2. Was the said deposit made in money or was it an accepted cheque? If the latter, on what bank was it drawn?

3. How long was the said deposit or cheque kept by the government?

4. On what date was it received and when was it returned to the tenderers?

5. Did it produce interest in the meantime, and what was the amount of said interest?

6. Was the said interest allowed to the said tenderers?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. A large deposit was thought necessary and each tenderer was asked to deposit a cheque for $500,000. The following cheques were received: The Maschinenfabrik Augsburg-Nuremberg, A.G. accepted cheque for $500,000 on the Canadian Bank of Commerce payable, to the Minister of Railways and Canals and signed by the manager of the bank; The Pennsylvania Steel Company, accepted cheque for $500,000 on the Bank of Montreal, payable to the Minister of Railways and Canals, signed Pennsylvania Steel Company, per Edward M. Smith; The British Empire Company, accepted cheque for $500,000 on the Bank of Montreal payable to the Minister of Railways and Canals signed by the manager and accountant; The St. Lawrence Bridge Company, two accepted cheques of $250,000 each ($500,000) on the Bank of Montreal, payable to the Minister of Railways and Canals, one signed by the Dominion Bridge Company, Limited and the other by the Canadian Bridge Company, Limited.

2. The British Empire Company's deposit was an accepted cheque for $500,000 on the Bank of Montreal.

3. Cheques of the Maschinenfabrik Augsburg-Nuremberg A. G. the Pennsylvania Steel Company the British Empire Company were received on the 30th September, 1910, and that of the St. Lawrence Bridge Company, on the 1st October, 1910. Cheques were returned to the unsuccessful tenderers on the 6th April, 1911.

4. Received on the 30th September and returned on the 6th April.

5. No. Interest is not paid on such deposits, but interest is allowed to the successful tenderer when the contract is awarded and the cheque has been sent to the Finance Department.

6. Answered by Number 5.

LAURIER RECEPTION AT MONTREAL.

*Mr. NANTEL:

1. What amount has been spent by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal for the Laurier reception on the return of the First Minister from his recent voyage?

2. What special sums have been expended, respectively, in ornamentation of streets, buildings and public places, in illumination and flags, in fireworks, and other general expenses in connection with the said reception?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. and 2. The government has no information.

SPECIAL NEWSPAPER TRAINS.

Mr. BEATTIE:

1. What is the cost of the operation of the special train leaving Toronto at 1.55 a.m., each week day morning for carying Toronto newspapers to London?

2. What correspondence is there leading up to this departure in the mail service?

3. What were the trains by which this mail was formerly carried and the hours at which they left Toronto?

4. What is the cost to the Post Office Department of the new train?

5. Do the newspapers pay any share of the cost of this train? If so, to what extent?

6. Why was this special newspaper train established to run west of Toronto to London and not east of Toronto?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. There is no special train for the purpose of carrying Toronto newspapers to London at any hour. What is probably referred to is the regular mail train leaving Toronto at 2.55 a.m., and which costs the department $40,650.

2. There is no correspondence except the reports of the officers of the department who deal with these matters.

Action was taken in response to repeated representations by the representatives of the western peninsula of Ontario that, owing to the hour at which trains left Toronto at night, and the fact that trains left Toronto in the morning at an hour too late to make connection with trains leaving London and other points, unnecessary delay was occasioned to important mails, not only for the western and northwestern portions of Ontario, but for important points in the Central, Western and Eastern States.

3. The train leaving Toronto at 6.20 a.m., reaching Hamilton, 7.40 a.m. and London, 10.56 a.m., too late to make any connections with outgoing trains.

4. Answered by No. 1.

5. Newspapers contribute nothing to this train whatever.

6. The mail service between Toronto and Ottawa, Montreal and other eastern points, is a direct one to these points alone, and does not involve the delaying of mails for distant points, either in Canada or the United States owing to failure to make connections with outgoing trains; and the amount of mail accumulating for Montreal, Ottawa, and other points between the time of departure at night and that of the next morning to these same points is not sufficient to warrant the expense of such a train.

PORCUPINE FIRE SUFFERERS.

Mr. WALLACE:

1. When did the request for a supply of militia tents for the relief of Porcupine fire sufferers first reach the government?

2. What time elapsed between the receipt of request and the issue of the order for shipments of tents?

3. When were the tents shipped?

4. What was the reason for the delay, if there was any?

5. Was a guarantee required by the department before the shipment was authorized?

Mr. BEATTIE.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

1 The evening of Wednesday, July 12th.

2 The morning of Friday, July 14th.

3 Major Hallick of the Ordnance Corps left Ottawa Friday night, arrived in Toronto Saturday morning, where he found 500 tents and 4,000 blankets and a detachment of men awaiting him; he then immediately left for the burnt district with the men and stores.

4. No delay.

5. Before obtaining proper authority from Privy Council with a view to meeting the emergency, the full value of the equipment desired was requested by an official of the Militia Department. Free issue was however authorized by the Privy Council.

SMELT FISHING IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. JAMESON:

1. Have any requests or petitions been received from Nova Scotia smelt fishermen, or on their behalf, of recent years, for a change in the open season for the taking of smelts with bag-nets? If so, from what localities, and what alteration in the season was requested?

2. What action, if any, was taken by the department with respect to such requests?

3. Is it the intention to make any change in the dates of the open season to meet the conditions adversely affecting the smelt fishermen in the localities complained from?

4. What was the number of bag-net licenses issued to smelt fishermen in each county in Nova Scotia for the year ending 31st March, 1911?

5. What was the total number of licenses of the class mentioned issued for Nova Scotia during each of the past ten years, the quantity of smelts taken yearly by such method during the same period in that province, and the number of persons engaged in the fishery conducted under such license?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. Yes, such requests have been received from localities bordering on the Strait of Northumberland. Different alterations, looking to the closing of the season at a later date, were asked for.

2. After careful consideration the department decided that the present season for bag-nets is the most suitable one in the public interest.

3. Not as at present advised, for the reasons, given in answer No. 2.

These figures embrace smelts caught with gill-nets and hook and line, as the quantities caught by each contrivance has not been kept separately. The department cannot say how many in addition to the licences were engaged in this particular method of smelt fishing.

GOLD CIRCULATION IN CANADA.

Mr. MACDONELL:

1. How much gold is in circulation in Canada, including amounts in banks and in the hands of the government?
2. How much of the above is United States gold, and how much British?
3. By what authority is this United States gold accepted as legal tender in Canada?
4. Is the government about to arrange with the United States for the circulation of gold coinage in both countries as legal tender? If so, is the government going to coin and issue gold of the same weight and fineness as the United States gold, and has Canada thereby decided to adopt the United States standard of weight and fineness?

Mr. FIELDING:

1. There are no available means of finding the amount of gold in circulation in Canada. It is obvious that gold coin in the possession of private individuals or corporations cannot be ascertained.

The banks do not in their returns to the government indicate the amount of gold held, silver coin being included in the 'specie' item. Inquiry will be made from the banks, and when return of their gold holdings is made the figures will be given.

2. The amount of gold held by the Mininster of Finance, June 30, 1911, was:

British Sovereigns	$5,867,913.65
United States gold coin	77,642,009.00
Bullion—mint bars	222,933.99
Total	$83,732,856.64

3 Section 10, chapter 14, of the Acts of 1910—'An Act respecting the Currency'.

The same enactment was embodied in the first currency legislation after confederation—section 9 of chapter 4, Acts of 1871. The Act in which this section appeared was entitled 'An Act to establish one uniform currency for Canada'.

The enactment first appeared in the legislation of the old province of Canada in section 11, chapter 158 of the Acts of that legislature for the year 1853, and was continued in force, in the old province of Canada, at least, until its re-enactment by the Federal Act of 1871, above referred to.

No arrangements are being made with the United States for the circulation of the gold coinage of Canada, when struck, as legal tender in the United States.

The standard weights and fineness for the gold coinage of Canada are as set out in 'The Currency Act 1910'. The standard weights and fineness of United States gold coins correspond with these provisions.

CANADIAN NAVAL SERVICE AND CORONATION.

*Mr. MACDONELL:

1. What midshipmen or naval cadets of the Canadian Naval Service attended the Coronation, and why did they not all attend, in accordance with a statement that appeared in the public press as emanating from the government to that effect?
2. What was the method of selection, and who made the selection?
3. Did the Governor General make a request that all the cadets should attend the Coronation, and if it was decided that they should all go, why was the change made?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1. P. W. Nelles and V. Brodeur. The invitation issued by the Imperial Government was extended to 3 officers and 35 men; the officers consisted of a lieutenant in charge and 2 midshipmen.
2. The officers were selected to the best advantage for control of the men forming the contingent; selection was made by the director of the Naval service.
3. An application was made to the Imperial Government for the invitation to be extended to the remaining midshipmen; this was conceded, but the reply was received too late to admit of the officers attending.

RAILWAY SECTIONMEN.

Mr. MACDONELL:

1. Has the attention of the Minister of Railways been called to the statement made on or about 7th June last by the representatives of the railway sectionmen, before the Board of Railway Commissioners, that section gangs as constituted, had too much work to do to handle safely, and to the statement of the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners to the effect that the commission has no jurisdiction over the question of lengths of sections to be worked by section gangs on railways, or the number of men to compose such section gangs?

2. If it is true that the above statements or statements to that effect, were made, is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation conferring on the Board of Railway Commissioners the necessary power to deal with such matters?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The attention of the Minister of Railways has not been called to such statement.

2. Answered by number one.

DON POST OFFICE.

Mr. MACDONELL:

1. Who is the party who has the contract for carrying the mails between the Don post office, or Donlands, and the city of Toronto?

2. Was such contract let by tender, for how long and at what price, and on whose recommendation was it awarded?

3. When was the Don post office moved, why, and by whose request or recommendation?

4. Who is the present postmaster at Don post office, and when was he appointed?

5. Who was the former postmaster at Don post office, and why and when were his services dispensed with?

6. Is the present post office site as central as the former site, and who recommended the removal?

7. Has the government received any petition or other request that the post office should be restored to its former site?

8. Did the government obtain a report from Mr. Henderson, post office inspector, on the new and old site, and does such report recommend the removal?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. J. C. White.

2. By tender—4 years from 1st July, 1910. The lowest tender was reduced by negotiations carried on by the Post Office Inspector from $1,000 to $600 a year.

3, 4 and 5. James H. Smith, the former postmaster of Don, having tendered his resignation, Mr. J. C. White, the present postmaster, was, on recommendation of Mr. A. J. Anderson, appointed to the office on the 18th July, 1910.

6. As far as known to the department.

7. Yes.

8. No.

Mr. BRODEUR.

GRAND TRUNK TRAINMENS' STRIKE.

*Mr. MACDONELL:

1. Has the Minister of Labour received a copy of a resolution of the Order of Railway Conductors, passed at their grand convention held at Jacksonville, Florida, on or about the 21st May last, censuring the government of Canada and Mr. Chas. M. Hays for the failure to carry out the agreement entered into between the government, the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the men, in connection with the recent Grand Trunk railway strike?

2. If so, will the minister lay the resolution on the table of the House, or otherwise acquaint the House with its contents?

Mr. KING:

1. A copy of a resolution passed by the Order of Railway Conductors at Jacksonville, Florida, on May 9 last, making certain statements regarding the strike of Grand Trunk Railway employees has been received.

2. A copy of the communication received will be laid on the table of the House.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL—MINORITY REPRESENTATION.

°Mr. MACDONELL:

1. Is it the intention of the government to introduce the principle of minority representation or representation of minorities as applicable to the cities of the Dominion or some of them in connection with the Redistribution Bill which will be made necessary by the present census?

2. If so, upon what plan or principle does the government propose that minorities shall be represented?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This will be considered in due course at the time of the redistribution.

DRY DOCK AT QUEBEC.

Mr. PRICE:

1. Is it the intention of the government to build a dry dock in the harbour of Quebec?

2. If so, is it to be built by, owned and operated by the government?

3. If not to be built as a government owned work, will it be built on the three per cent guarantee allowed for such works?

4. Is the government now negotiating with any syndicate, company or person for the construction of such work?

5. If it is the intention of the government to have this dry dock built, when will the work be commenced and when will it be ready for operation?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The only provision for the construction of a dry dock at the port of Quebec, and this remark applies to all other ports in Canada, is that contained in the Dry Dock Subsidies Act of 1910. My hon. friend speaks of a 3 per cent guarantee. That is not what the Act provides for; it provides for a bonus and in the case of a dock of the first class—and this is the kind that has been spoken of at Quebec—a company would be entitled to a bonus of 3½ per cent for a period not exceeding 35 years upon the cost of the work, such cost not to exceed $4,000,000. That offer is open to any company which will undertake the construction of a dry dock at the port of Quebec.

With regard to negotiations, some time ago a proposition was submitted by a company, but upon examination of their proposal it was found that they had added to the estimated cost of the dock a very considerable amount which they expected would be represented by the discount upon the bonds which they might issue and my opinion was that under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act I could not undertake to pay a bonus upon that amount. The company were informed that if they would amend their proposition so as to bring it within the terms of the Act I would at once submit their proposition to council. Since that time I have had no further communication from the company. Apart from that there have been some verbal communications with different parties, but no formal proposal has been made, and I repeat that the government stand ready at any time, upon a company undertaking the construction of a dock of the first class, to give, not as a guarantee, as my hon. friend suggests, but as a bonus, an amount equal to 3½ per cent upon the cost, limited to $4,000,000, for a period of 35 years.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. minister has not stated if it is the intention to build a dry dock in Quebec, and if, in the event of no syndicate undertaking the work, it will be done as a government work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The government have no authority to build it as a government work, the only authority for the construction of a dock being that contained in the Dry Dock Subsidies Act, which provides for a bonus to the company.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Is it the intention of the government and of the Minister of Public Works to ask for authority and an estimate to go on with this work in case they are not able to go on with it under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sure my hon. friend is such an old parliamentarian that he will realize that any expression of the intention of the government would have to be signified by the submission of an estimate to parliament for the purpose, with the permission of His Excellency.

ATION CELEBRATION IN OTTAWA.

Mr. BEATTIE:

1. Was any gathering or celebration of any kind held in Ottawa on Coronation day?

2. What was the nature of such celebration or gathering?

3. What members of the Cabinet were present to take part in it?

Mr. PUGSLEY. In connection with the celebration of coronation day, the Department of Public Works decorated the grounds of the parliament buildings very handsomely, and also gave permission to the city authorities for the occupation of the grounds by the public and more especially by the school children upon that day. It was understood, I believe, that there should be a procession of school children of Ottawa and the presentation of flags to them. I was not in Ottawa upon that day and it happened that most of the ministers were out of the city. The three ministers who were in the city, I understand, received no invitation to be present, the affair being entirely a civic celebration. I am informed that in the morning notices were posted up cancelling the celebration in consequence of a very heavy rainstorm and that the programme was considerably changed.

NEW ISSUE OF POSTAGE STAMPS.

*Mr. WHITE (Renfrew):

1. Is the government aware that the new postage stamps of King George's reign issued by the British post office are generally condemned by the people of the United Kingdom by reason of the poorness of the design?

2. Is it the intention of the Post Office Department of Canada to have the new issue of postage stamps for the Dominion prepared from dies produced by the Royal Mint? If not, where will the dies be made?

3. Is the Postmaster General prepared to lay before the House, as promised by him on March 16 last, the designs for the new Canadian postage stamps before they are finally adopted?

4. By whom are the stamps being designed, and where will they be produced?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. No, except what has appeared in the press on the subject.

2. (a) No. (b) In Ottawa.

3. If any member of the House of Commons wishes to see the designs for the new Canadian postage stamps when submitted to the department, no objection will be offered to his doing so.

4. By the American Bank Note Company, the contractors for the supply of postage stamps for the Dominion of Canada, acting in co-operation with and under the instructions of the Post Office Department of Canada.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PAQUET:

1. What was the amount spent for Belgian immigration for the fiscal year 1910-11?

2. What was the amount expended for French immigration for the fiscal year 1910-11?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. $7,634.06.
2. $31,362.36.

It may be mentioned that emigration effort in France is discouraged by law.

Mr. PAQUET:

What was the amount expended for immigration from the United States for the fiscal year 1910-11?

Mr. OLIVER. $234,305.81.

Mr. PAQUET:

What was the amount expended for immigration from the British Isles for the fiscal year 1910-11?

Mr. OLIVER. $225,740.12.

Mr. PAQUET:

If a commission of $3 on a man, $2 on a woman, and $1 on a child, is paid to certain sub-agents in the United States for bona fide settlers induced by them to settle in western Canada, why are the other provinces excluded?

Mr. OLIVER. Because the Federal government has special responsibility for the settlement of the public lands in the prairie provinces.

Mr. PAQUET:

1. What amount was paid in premiums for the fiscal year year 1910-11 by the Canadian government for immigration?
2. What amount was paid in premiums for the same fiscal year for immigration from France and Belgium?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. $108,374.40.
2. France, £457 0 0—$2,224.06.
   Belgium, £233 10 0——$1,136.36.

It may be mentioned that emigration effort in France is by law discouraged.

AGRICULTURAL PDODUCE FROM UNITED STATES.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. What was the quantity and value of butter, eggs, cheese, potatoes, bacon and hams, other meats, poultry, vegetables other than potatoes, fruits, and sheep and lambs, imported into Canada from the United States for home consumption during the month of May, 1911?
2. What was the quantity and value of butter and of meats imported into Canada from Australia and New Zealand for home consumption during the month of May, 1911?
3. What was the quantity and value of cream, casein, and milk, exported from Canada to the United States during the month of May, 1911?

Mr. PAQUET.

Mr. PATERSON:

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE, 1890-1911.

Mr. EDWARDS:

What was the total revenue from all sources, and the total expenditure for all purposes of the Dominion of Canada, for each of the fiscal years, 1890 to 1911, both years included?

Mr. FIELDING:

The total revenue from all sources, and the total expenditure for all purposes of the Dominion of Canada for each of the fiscal years from 1890 to 1910, both years inclusive, will be found on pages 2 and 3, Part 1 of the Public Accounts for the year 1910, and are as follows:

	Total Receipts.	Total Disbursements.
1890..	$39,879,925 41	$ 41,770,332 73

The accounts for the year 1910-11 have not yet been published, but the statement of receipts and expenditures on account of that year appears in the 'Canada Gazette,' of June 17, 1911, page 4322, from which it will be seen that the total receipts for the year 1910-11 were $117,780,409.78, and the disbursements on account of consolidated fund $87,773,998.32, and on capital and special account—$33,696,222.17, making a total for that year of $121,470,220.49.

MINNEDOSA PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Has the site been decided on for the erection of the public building in Minnedosa, Manitoba?
2. If so, which site, what is its size, cost and from whom purchased?
3. Have the plans been prepared in whole or in part for the proposed building?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1, 2 and 3. No.

SICK MARINERS' DUES.

Mr. JAMESON:

1. What amount of money is in the trust fund resulting from the payment of sick mariners' dues by merchant and fishing vessels?
2. In what manner is the amount to the credit of the fund invested, and where is the standing of the trust fund shown in the Public Accounts of Canada?
3. What department of the government is responsible for the investment and administration of such trust fund?
4. By what statute was such trust created?

Mr. BRODEUR:

1, 2, 3 and 4. There is no trust fund in connection with sick mariners' dues. The collections from vessels are paid into consolidated revenue, and the expenses are paid out of the appropriation 'Care of sick seamen in the maritime hospitals.'

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

For a copy of all correspondence on the subject of the Society of Colonization and Repatriation of Lake St. John and the dates thereof, with the First Minister, the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Marine.—Mr. Girard.

For a copy of all correspondence between the government, or any member thereof, and any person, persons or body corporate, having reference to the water-power on the Ottawa river at Carillon, the lease of the alienation of the same previous to the 1st January last, the lease in existence at present of said water-power to the National Hydro Electric Company, Limited; a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government and any official of the said company; a copy of the lease at present in existence, as well as of the one which preceded the one actually in force; a copy of the order in council authorizing the present lease of said water-power, and of any deed referring to said water-power to which the government was a party since the 1st January, 1906.—Mr. Monk.

For a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Agriculture, or any officer of his department, or any member or officer of the government, and any person or persons appointed or proposed to be appointed as commissioners, enumerators, or other officials in the taking of the census during the present year, including all correspondence and inquiries as to the qualification or status of such commissioners or enumerators or officials, and all information in the possession of the government respecting such qualification or status.—Mr. Borden (Halifax).

For a copy of all papers, letters, petitions, applications, recommendations or other documents or material in connection with the removal of the site of the Donlands post office, and in connection with the appointment of the new postmaster, or the retirement or dismissal of the old postmaster.—Mr. Macdonell (South Toronto).

SOREL SHIPYARD, OFFICIAL INQUIRY.

On the orders of the day being called.

Mr. MONK. On the 6th of April last I made certain inquiries respecting an official inquiry at Sorel reported at page 6758 'Hansard' of this year. I asked:

Has an inquiry been instituted at Sorel by the government? If so, who is conducting it, and what is the object of that inquiry?

Mr. BRODEUR. Immediately after the charges were made in the House, as it referred to the department, an inquiry was entered into by the inspector of agencies and the agent.

Mr. MONK. Who is conducting the inquiry and what is the subject of the inquiry?

Mr. BRODEUR. Statements were made in the affidavits filed before the House that affected the department, and we are investigating these allegations. Previous to that, certain statements were brought to the attention of the department, and these also are being investigated.

Mr. MONK. When was the investigation ordered?

Mr. BRODEUR. After the charges were made.

Mr. MONK. Is that inquiry being conducted by Mr. Wiallard, the private secretary of the minister?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, but by the agent of the department in Montreal and the inspector of agencies.

Mr. MONK. That is, by Mr. Wiallard?

Mr. BRODEUR. Mr. Wiallard is one, Mr. Boyd is the other.

Mr. MONK. Is Mr. Wiallard the private secretary to the minister?

Mr. BRODEUR. He was formerly my private secretary, but not now.

Has that inquiry been carried on; has a report been made to the government, and if so will it be laid before the House.

Mr. BRODEUR. Some time before I left for England I gave instructions to have an inquiry made. Mr. Wiallard, our agent, became ill, but Mr. Boyd spent some time at Sorel making the inquiry and looking generally into the administration of the department there. I have not seen his report, but I suppose it is in the department.

Mr. MONK. Did the minister say there was a report?

Mr. BRODEUR. I suppose there must have been, but I have not seen it; I do not know.

Mr. MONK. If a report has been made will it be laid on the table of the House

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—OVER-CLASSIFICATION.

Mr. LENNOX. The Minister of Railways said that he would probably inform the House to-day as to the information I asked for on Friday.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have asked the Transcontinental Railway Commission to give me the information, but I have not received it yet.

DR. RUTHERFORD.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is it true that Dr. J. G. Rutherford has resigned from the Department of Agriculture, and if so has any explanation been given?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Minister of Agriculture will be here this evening and perhaps he will be able to inform my hon. friend.

WAYS AND MEANS—WINNER OF THE KING'S PRIZE AT BISLEY.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JOSEPH RUSSELL (East Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer briefly to an event of very great national interest of which the cable has brought the news since our last meeting. I refer to the splendid achievement of a fellow-citizen of Toronto, Private W. J. Clifford, in winning the King's prize at the meeting of the National Rifle Association at Bisley. This, I need hardly mention, is the crowning honour of the great competition in marksmanship participated in annually by upwards of three thousand of the riflemen of the Empire, all the overseas dominions being well represented, while the flower of the regular and volunteer forces of the mother country enter into the keenest competition for the honours of the meeting.

Private Clifford is of the Tenth Royal Grenadiers, a regiment that since rifle shooting has been in vogue as the pastime of the volunteers of Canada has been second to none in the distinctions it has achieved as a training school for marksmen. It is especially fitting, therefore, that the honour achieved by Private Clifford shall be shared by a regiment so generally recognized as worthy to bear it. It is the young rifleman's second visit to Bisley, but for several years Private Clifford has been conspicuous at the great Canadian meeting at Rockliffe, in 1909 for instance, winning one of the three prizes so generously offered by His Excellency, the Governor-General for competition here.

Besides winning the King's Prize, Private Clifford has won also, at Bisley this year, the Prince of Wales' prize for a competition entirely distinct, an achievement never before accomplished during the fifty years of the National Rifle Association competitions. Examination of the records shows that the same has figured only twice before since the very beginning, as the winner of these two prizes donated by royalty, but in each case the honour was achieved in separate years for each prize. Thus Sergt. Lawrence of the 1st Dumbarton won the Queen's Prize in 1882, and the Prince of Wales' Prize the following year; while Major Pollock won the Queen's in 1892 and the Prince of Wales' in 1896. It has remained for Private Clifford to set a new record for the new reign, and so to identify himself for all time with the generosity of His Majesty King George and Edward, Prince of Wales.

This is the third occasion, it is fitting for me to mention, that Canadian competitors at Bisley have brought distinction to their country as well as to themselves by winning the Queen's or the King's Prize. Hayhurst, already well-known as an Old Country rifleman, led the way in 1895, shortly after he had come to Canada and joined the Thirteenth Regiment of Hamilton. Then Private S. J. Perry, a young Canadian of Vancouver, was the King's Prize winner in 1904; and Private Clifford is our third Gold Medallist.

Rifle shooting means much more to us as a nation than does any other sport. It is generally recognized as the mainspring of the interest in the training of many regiments, and it is the sole bond of communication between our volunteers in the several cities and provinces of Canada and between Canadians and their comrades in arms from over the seas. In addition rifle shooting is recognized as involving the best development of physical manhood and of character. No one but a good citizen, an exemplary man, can be successful as a marksman. The honour won by Private Clifford il specially worthy of recognition, and I therefore extend to him my congratulations and those of his friends in this country.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence). I would ask the privilege, Mr. Speaker, as head of the Militia Department, of saying—and I am sure I am expressing the opinion of all the members of the House—how much I am obliged to the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Russell) for having brought this matter up. All Canadians must be proud of the unprecedented performance of Private Clifford in having won not only the King's Prize but the Prince of Wales' prize in the same year. The shooting has been particularly good this year at Bisley. The Canadian team won among other prizes the McKinnon Cup, and tied with the British team for the Kolapore Cup, but unfortunately for the Canadians the British team made a greater number of marks at the longest range and therefore retained possession of the prize. It must be specially gratifying to know also that this good shooting has been made with a Canadian rifle, so that we have not only the best rifle probably in the world, but we have men who know how to use it.

Mr. SAMUEL HUGHES. I am delighted to support the remarks so ably expressed by my good friend from Toronto (Mr. Russell) and by my friend the Minister of Militia. I may point out that the Grenadiers are not only splendid men on the ranges, but that on every occasion the Grenadier regiment of Toronto has had the opportunity of active service, the men have done credit to themselves and to the flag under which they fight. I may point out further, as an inducement to officers commanding regiments throughout the country, that not only are the Grenadiers to-day commanded by an officer, Col. Gooderham, who takes the greatest interest in rifle shooting, but it has had the good fortune in times past to have had commanding officers who have devoted a great deal of attention to the science.

I might also state that Clifford, the winner of the King's prize, is greatly assisted by his wife, who encourages him to go to the front, and inspires him with courage to do well for his country, and his corps. Furthermore, the Grenadiers on the ranges are coached by the wife of the colonel of the regiment, Mrs. Gooderham. In making these remarks, I desire, in the first place, to encourage officers commanding regiments to take greater interest in rifle shooting, and in the next place to point out that the wives and lady friends of the soldiers might perform a splendid service for the country by encouraging these young men in rifle shooting, as the ladies I have mentioned do. I cannot let this opportunity pass without saying a word for the officer commanding the Bisley team this year, and for the men composing that team. It was my privilege to see them at Bisley not long ago. Colonel Stimson, the commandant, was performing the work admirably, and he was fortunate in having with him his sisters, who rendered the lives of the soldiers in their quarters very pleasant by giving them every inducement to maintain the high spirit of Canadian manhood. The same characteristics are found in Major Burland, the adjutant of the team, and we were very fortunate in having an excellent coach in Mr. Richardson, who is well known to all our friends. I should not let this opportunity pass without supporting my good friend the Minister of Militia by saying a word for the weapon with which these prizes were won, namely, the Canadian Ross rifle. That rifle has established itself, not only in Canada, but in England, and in every country on the continent of Europe, and is to-day well known and appreciated. It is said that a prophet is not without honour except in his own country. The Ross rifle stands first among the serviceable rifles in the world to-day, and I would not be at all surprised, before many years roll around, to see the principles of the Ross rifle, with a different calibre and cartridge of course, adopted as the weapon of the British Empire. I might in justice to Clifford point out that one of the troubles of rifle shooting in hot weather is nickelling, and Clifford has invented a substance, which he gave to every man on the ranges, to prevent that; and his uniformly good shooting has probably been partly due to this invention of his own. I am sure that the House, and the country will join in congratulating Clifford and the Canadian team not only on their shooting, but on their splendid manly conduct.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, in connection with this matter, the Minister of Militia might go a step further and mark this event in an appropriate way, by introducing into this House a proposal to give a pension to the veterans of 1866, among whom no regiment has a better list than the Tenth Royals of Toronto. If the minister wishes to commemorate this event and encourage the volunteers of this country, he could not bring forward a more popular proposal. There came under my notice the other day the case of one of these veterans who died in the poor house. The time has come when we should recognize in a substantial way the services of these men on behalf of their country.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I would like to say that recognition has been given to these men, and it is one of the things that I am most proud of in connection with my record as Minister of Militia, that I was able to induce the British government to give to those who took part in resisting the attempted raid at that time recognition in the form of a suitable medal. For some 30 years, from 1866 to 1896, the services of those men had been utterly neglected and disregarded. When the present government came in and took the matter up, within a year of the time it took office, a medal was granted by Queen Victoria in recognition of their services. I wish to say too, that at that time the veterans from one end of the country to the other expressed themselves as entirely satisfied with what had been done.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes, and I can prove it. When the application was made, they stated that all they wanted was a recognition that their services were appreciated by the government of Canada —they did not want any tangible present of money or land; and they were satisfied with what they received.

THE RECIPROCITY DEBATE.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I would like to draw the attention of the House to an article which appeared in the Toronto 'Globe' of the 21st instant; though I am not complaining of this particular article, which is simply a sample of articles which have appeared in the Liberal press throughout the length and breadth of Canada since this House reassembled. There appears to be an organized campaign for the purpose of misrepresenting the attitude of the opposition. I have no doubt that before the House reassembled the government had determined to go to the country, because it found itself between the devil and the deep blue sea. The devil was the ever-increasing sentiment in Ontario, and the eastern provinces against reciprocity, and the deep blue sea was the fear that if they waited and bore the brunt of that sentiment they would have to bear the odium of refusing the west the additional representation to which they are justly entitled. But the government made their choice before we reassembled, of which I propose to give evidence later on; and so, having decided to deprive the west of the representation it is entitled to, they are trying to make the country believe that the opposition, by a reasonable discussion—as they say, by their obstruction—are preventing the government from giving the west that representation to which it is justly entitled; and they have come to this conclusion also because of the manly, straightforward and unanswerable argument presented by our leader, Mr. Borden, during his recent triumphal tour of the west, and the growing feeling against reciprocity there.

So I think I am safe in saying that it is part of the party tactics that the House should reassemble and when the opposition should express their views upon reciprocity the government should shout obstruction. I may say here that either the right hon. the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance (I am not sure which) has already stated in this House that every member on this side would be given an opportunity to express his opinions upon this measure, and that while they were so doing they would not be considered guilty of obstruction. Now, there are 55 members on this side of the House who have not had an opportunity of expressing themselves on the question of reciprocity, and none of the members who have spoken, have spoken twice. Notwithstanding that fact we are met with the statement in the Liberal press throughout the country that the opposition are obstructing. Now, what is the evidence before us, that the government had decided to go to the country before we reassembled. In the first place it is known that the government Printing Bureau is at work in the preparation of the voters' lists for the coming election. In the second place, while the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) made up his mind not to run again, since the adjournment of the House, he suddenly reconsidered his decision, and decided to become a candidate in North York, upon the assumption that the elections were to be held this fall. In the next place the Dominion Election Act provides that with respect to the unorganized districts in the province of Ontario, every year there shall be prepared a list of the voters in the constituencies, unless a proclamation is issued by the government stating that such list need not be prepared. I find that in the years 1909 and 1910, that such proclamation was issued, but on the 17th of July of the present year a proclamation was issued by the deputy of the Minister of Justice stating that the lists should be prepared in these unorganized districts, and that they should be accelerated, all this notwithstanding the fact the hon. Minister of Justice stated in the House the other day (21st July) that neither he nor any one else expected an election for one or two sessions yet. In addition to that, I have in my hand a document entitled 'Instructions for the guidance of returning officers,' printed in 1911, since we adjourned in May 19 last. I have seen cartloads of these documents around the building here, and I am advised that they are only printed in such large quantities in a year when an election is expected.

I think if these several facts are taken together, or even if the last fact is considered alone it is sufficient to prove that the government had made up their mind that they were going to the country before we re-assembled here, and that we are brought back for the purpose of assisting them in their party tactics of deceiving the west into the belief that the onus for non-redistribution is on us. I would point out to the right hon. the Prime Minister that on the 8th of March the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), made a proposition to the government which the government did not accept, but which if it had accepted would have enabled the west to have their representation. Upon that occasion, Mr. Borden used these words:

> Now, Sir, I regard these proposals as reversing the policy of the people of Canada for the past thirty years, given by an unmistakable mandate at every election which has taken place during that period. What should be the course of the government at this time? Take the census, give the west its increased representation, then submit this question to the people of Canada and let them decide.

The government turned the proposition down four months ago, when they might have accepted it, have taken their census and have given the west their redistribution. It is not too late to do it yet, according to my way of thinking. The government can even now, accelerate their census, bring down their Redistribution Bill, and let reciprocity wait for a few months, until the west have been given their additional representation. We have existed 46 long years without reciprocity, and I think we can wait a few months longer. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us this session that never in the history of this country was Canada as prosperous as she is to-day. He told us that the trade of Canada to-day is $765,000,000—a high water mark in its history, and our surplus this year $30,000,000 the highest on record. Surely it is manifest that we can wait two or three months longer without reciprocity, and in the meantime let the government bring down the Redistribution Bill, giving the west the representation to which they are entitled, and then go to the country. If that is not done, there is no other conclusion to be arrived at, but that we are here assisting the government in carrying out their farce, which will have the effect of depriving the west of their additional representation. We on this side would be only too happy to face the electors on this great question, but we can only regret the course of the government will have the effect of depriving that great and growing country of their just rights in the matter of representation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend rose for the purpose of trying to convince this House, and the country at large that His Majesty's opposition in this House is not obstructing the business of the government, and is not obstructing the reciprocity agreement, which has been before the House now since the 26th of January last. However, my hon. friend had not proceeded very far before he gave away his whole case. He protests that the opposition is not obstructing yet at the same time, he says: 'Let reciprocity wait.' If he is not obstructing, why should not reciprocity go on? That is what we on this side of the House want. We do not want reciprocity to wait. The hon. gentlemen, on the other side of the House told us what we already knew, and I thank my hon. friend for being so candid in the statement that they did not want reciprocity to go through, but wanted it to wait, and that they are trying in this House to prevent it from going on. We have had speeches of one kind and another—we have heard the same arguments repeated ad nauseam.

The other day one of the most respected members in this House prefaced his remarks by saying that there was nothing new to be said upon this question. That is perfectly true. Yet, he took three hours or more to say what had been said over and over again.

My hon. friends ask us: 'Why should we not have a redistribution?' Well, the question of redistribution, is not before the House to-day, neither is the census, but the reciprocity agreement is before the House, and we can go on with it. If the hon. gentlemen wish to prevent an election let us go on with the reciprocity agreement, and there will be no election. I have nothing to hide in this matter, but will speak to the House with perfect candor. When I saw evidences of obstruction taking place in this House day after day—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER—when I read the reports of the speeches made here, while I was in England, and when I learned that my hon. friend (Mr. Borden), the leader of the opposition was making a triumphal tour of the country——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I did not need these cheers to know that hon. gentlemen opposite are satisfied with cheap triumphs. Any way, my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition was making this triumphal tour of the country, and I saw it stated that the opposition would not allow this reciprocity agreement to go through. As soon as I saw this I gave instructions to my hon. friend the Secretary of State to prepare the lists so that if the hon. gentlemen opposite should continue to want reciprocity to wait, we could appeal to the people as to whether it should or not.

We do not want reciprocity to wait. We want it to pass, either in this House, or before the country. I have nothing whatever to conceal about the matter. We are before the people, and if government is to be made a farce—if the minority abuse the privileges of a minority in order to prevent—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then, Sir, there are judges over us to judge between the government and the opposition. Surely these hon. gentlemen do not object to an election. They say they want an election, and when I tell them that they do not object, they cheer; but when we take steps to have an election, they find fault. But we understand all this. The last thing they want is to go before the country. Well, there is one way in which it is possible not to go to the country, and that is to pass the agreement, that the farmers of Canada may have the markets of the United States opened to their products. That is our position. My hon. friend tells me that they want redistribution. Well, redistribution Bills have been passed before now, and the usual regular course has been to take the census one year, and have redistribution the following year. The census was taken in 1881, 1891, and in 1901, and upon every occasion the Redistribution Bill was passed the following year—that is in 1882, in 1892, and 1902 respectively. If we follow the usual course, we have plenty of time for redistribution. It is true, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) told us on the 8th of March that we should have passed the redistribution first. But he did not reflect at that time that the census could not be taken before the 1st of June. The law on that point was changed some years ago. At the time of confederation, the first of April was fixed as the date for the taking of the census. But everybody knows that the first of April is not a good season for taking the census. The roads in many parts are not then favourable for travel, but the first of June, as we all know, is a most propitious season for the census work. The date was changed and nobody objected. Does my hon. friend believe that it is possible to have redistribution in Canada within three months of the taking of the census? It is impossible to have it done. It never has been done either under a Conservative government or under a Liberal government. The country is too large and the means of communication too imperfect. You must wait until the last return is in before you begin your redistribution. We will have redistribution next year. If the opposition chooses to go on with tactics of obstruction, as they have been doing, then we shall have to consider what is to be done. And if, in the last resort, the only way is to appeal to the people and ask them to pass judgment between us and the opposition, we are quite prepared and ready for it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has alluded to certain instructions which he said were communicated by him to the Secretary of State while he was in London. I have a very strong suspicion that those instructions were given to the Secretary of State before the Prime Minister went to London. Of course, they may have been repeated from there. So far as the frankness of my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) is concerned, to which the Prime Minister has alluded, I want to call his attention to the fact that on the 8th of March, the very date referred to, I moved in this House that, in view of considerations set forth in the resolution, this reciprocity agreement —should not be proceeded with until the electors shall have an opportunity of pronouncing upon its merits.

The Prime Minister knew what my view with regard to the matter was at that time. He is pressing for a vote in the House. Well, we are pressing for a vote in the country, a vote of the people. The right hon. gentleman, who professes himself to be a Liberal of the British school and 'a democrat to the hilt,' is unwilling to afford to the people the opportunity to give that vote except at the sacrifice of redistribution. I gave my advice on that point on the 8th of March last. It has been already quoted, but I think it was very good advice and it will do no harm to repeat it. I said:

What should be the course of the government at this time? Take the census, give the west its increased representation, then submit this question to the people of Canada and let them decide. We held out to the United States for twenty years a standing offer of reciprocity, and they did not accept it. It will not lessen their respect for us if we permit them for a few years to put a standing offer of reciprocity upon their statute-book. We have worn some shoe leather in going to Washington; as I said before, let the Americans wear out some shoe leather in coming to Ottawa. They are submitting these proposals to a new Congress; let us in Canada submit these proposals to a new parliament.

I stand by those words. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister magnified altogether the difficulty of enumerating the people. I am informed that in Great Britain, within two or three days the enumeration of the people is made known, and I believe that if, immediately after the 8th of March, when I asked them to follow this course, the government had taken steps to hasten the enumeration, that enumeration could have been completed before the end of June. We might then have had a Redistribution Bill before this parliament at the present moment.

For, after all, what is the position of the government in this matter? Their position is that, although the people of Canada have got on without reciprocity for forty-five years and have prospered remarkably well during that time in their great work of nation building, they cannot wait for six months in order to give a redistribution of representation and allow the people as a whole to pronounce upon this issue of reciprocity. I say that is an unreasonable proposition. I say, the course I suggested on the 8th of March would be the reasonable one. The position at that time was that the old Congress had just come to an end—it expired on the 4th of March—without having ratified this treaty. Surely, under these circumstances, it would not have been an unreasonable thing for the government of Canada to say that, as Congress had dissolved through effluxion of time without ratifying the treaty and the treaty must be ratified, if at all, by a new Congress, it might very well be ratified in Canada, if at all, by a new parliament, and after an appeal to the people.

Now, the Prime Minister is very pronounced in his strictures upon the opposition, for the course they have taken. I would like to repeat what my hon. friend from North Grey has said. It was announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) himself when he introduced this proposition, if I remember his words correctly, that every member of this House should have the right to express his convictions with regard to the matter and to give his reasons to parliament and to his constituents why he either approved or disapproved of this treaty.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Mr. LANCASTER. He said the same thing on the motion referred to.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, I believe he said the same thing again as the reason why hon. gentlemen opposite should vote down the proposal I made. That course has been followed up to the present time. Hon. gentlemen on this side who have spoken on this question have refrained from taking up the time of the House a second time except in the case of a few when some matter of importance or urgency arose. The speeches made have been for the purpose of doing that which every member was invited to do—express his views on the subject.

The Prime Minister knows very well what the actual situation is. He knows perfectly well that he and his colleagues on the other side of the House have made a careful estimate of this situation weeks and months ago, as to how they would stand with redistribution, and how they would stand without redistribution; and taking everything into consideration, they decided it would be a prudent thing for them to appeal to the country without redistribution. But when the right hon gentleman talks about obstruction, I would like to remind him of some occasions when he has not entertained exactly the same view with regard to obstruction as that which he seems to hold at present. He speaks of the minority abusing its rights. How does he regard the minority of which he was a member in 1885? Was that minority abusing its rights? I venture to say that it was abusing its rights very much more than this minority has abused its rights up to the present time, and during the present session. What does he think of the course which he took in 1896?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend had better ask some of his friends on his own side.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am asking the right hon. gentleman at the present time. I am bound to say that I find him very unwilling to give me an answer. It may be that the right hon. gentleman had some assistance from men who were sitting opposite to him at that time. I do not know about that. But at all events, I want to say to him that he was very willing to be a party to that alleged obstruction, and very willing to profit by it, and very willing to send the government to the country without supplies for more than a month, I think, on that occasion; and then he was very willing afterwards to take a course with regard to the Governor General's warrants which, to say the least, was of extremely doubtful validity.

Mr. EMMERSON. The point is, You are another. Is that the idea?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does not my hon. friend think that sometimes that is a good retort? I think my hon. friend himself will bear witness that sometimes it is a very good retort. Now I was not putting it forward in the sense in which my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) suggested; I was putting it forward to the right hon. gentleman with a view to endeavour to bring him into a similar frame of mind to that which inspired him in 1885 and 1896. I was endeavouring to get him to look at this from the standpoint of a minority who are desirous, in the first place, that there should be a redistribution in order that all parts of the country may have their proper representation, and who, in the next place, are anxious that the people of Canada should have an opportunity to pronounce upon this agreement before the policy of this country for the past forty years is absolutely reversed; and surely that should not be done without any mandate from the people. The right hon. gentleman is apparently inclined to follow a portion of the advice which I gave him on the 8th of March last. I said this:

> Take the census, give the west its increased representation, then submit this question to the people of Canada and let them decide.

He is willing to submit this question to the people of Canada and let them decide, but he is not willing to give the west the increased representation to which they are entitled. He is following out our advice in part, he is not following it out in its entirety. I think he would have been well advised if he had taken the advice we tendered him on that occasion; that he would have been well advised to expedite the census, to have given the west its increased representation, to have given to every part of the country its proper representation, then to have gone to the people of Canada and let them decide whether or not the policy of this country for the past forty-five years shall be adhered to or shall be reversed.

Mr. FIELDING. There is a touch of humour in the present situation which serves to relieve what otherwise would seem to have been a rather tedious part of this session. For six months my hon. friends opposite have been shouting that what they wanted above everything on earth was an appeal to the people; and if there is anything they have made clear now, it is that if there is anything on earth that they do not want, it is an appeal to the people. We had a little premonition of this several months ago. In the midst of the outcry the hon. gentlemen were making as to the necessity of an election, there appeared in the chief Conservative organ an article saying that if they were not careful Sir Wilfrid Laurier would spring an election on them, and after the lapse of six months, they now say that the greatest terror of their lives is that they should be compelled to go before the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. COWAN. Take that back.

Mr. FIELDING. I would like to know what it is I have said that the hon. gentleman thinks I should take back.

Mr. COWAN. The Minister of Finance has never heard one word from this side of the House, or from any Conservative newspaper, to indicate that we were fearful of going before the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. COWAN. Let me say that when a minister of the Crown rises in his place in this House and dares to make a statement which we, and he, and every one believes is not true——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman's language is not parliamentary.

Mr. COWAN. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I say that it does not comport with the dignity of debate for a member of this House to state that which he and we believe to be absolutely untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is contrary to custom to charge a minister with saying anything which he knows to be untrue.

Mr. COWAN. That is the expression I have used. I wish to say that we believe there is absolutely no evidence, that there is absolutely no word from any member of this House, or in any of the Conservative press in Canada, to indicate that there is one word of accuracy in the statement the minister has made.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not very sensitive in these matters of points of order, and in nine cases out of ten I would rather allow a disorderly interruption to pass than to raise an issue upon it. If the House is willing to let my hon. friend violate all its proprieties, I do not know that I would complain. Now I want to say, and I want to repeat, and my hon. friend can characterize it within parliamentary limitations to suit himself—I wish to state that, according to my judgment, bearing in mind all the circumstances and facts surrounding us, in my judgment, giving it for what it is worth, there is nothing in the world that hon. gentlemen opposite are so much afraid of as an appeal to the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Try it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Why don't you bring it on?

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) knows that if he believed we were going to bring it on—

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The point I was making was that the government were endeavouring to make the country believe that we were afraid of the redistribution of the west.

Mr. FIELDING. And I say that the hon. gentlemen opposite are doing their utmost to prevent this government doing any business and that the business of this government is to give the country reciprocity. That is the first consideration——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING.—and in due course to give the country redistribution; and the hon. gentlemen, by the action they are taking are doing their best to prevent our giving either the one or the other

Now, let us look a little at this situation. On the 26th day of January last, almost six months ago, I had the honour to submit to this House, the terms of an agreement entered into by my hon. colleague, the Minister of Customs and myself with the government of the United States, subject to the approval of parliament, for the bringing about of a betterment of the trade relations between these two countries. If we had come before the House with an arrangement which was definite and binding for a given period of years we might well have expected that such an arrangement would have received the almost unanimous consent of the House, because, let hon. gentlemen opposite say what they like, I state that it is an historical fact that from the beginning of confederation down to this moment there has never been in existence in the Dominion of Canada, a government which did not proclaim and support reciprocity.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Finance Minister profess to say that this is reciprocity?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. That is the first I ever heard——

Mr. FIELDING. I am exceedingly sorry that my hon. friend and I do not agree, but in our innocence we think this is reciprocity.

Mr. HUGHES. Oh no.

Mr. FIELDING. This is the sort of reciprocity Canada has been seeking for 40 years. This is substantially and with very little change the kind of reciprocity that we had from the year 1854 down to 1866. This is the reciprocity that we begged the United States for 30 years to give us. This is the reciprocity that was in view when the leading gentlemen on the opposite side of the House went down to Washington—shall I say wore out much shoe leather in the elegant phrase of the leader of the opposition—they went there to ask for the very reciprocity that is now before this House.

Mr. BLAIN. Never, never.

Mr. FIELDING. This is the reciprocity that was offered by Sir John Macdonald in the National Policy of 1879.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. COWAN. Rip Van Winkle.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If that is the case why did the minister cut the reciprocity clause out of the tariff of 1897.

Mr. FIELDING. If the hon. gentleman will read the debate he will find that in the very speech with which I brought down that tariff, I declared that the government of Canada still desired reciprocity and were prepared to have it. This is the reciprocity which as an historical fact beyond question every government in Canada, from the first day of confederation down to this moment, has been endeavouring to get from the United States. This is——

Mr. HUGHES. Could the minister give us some evidence?

Mr. FIELDING. Oh yes, I could, but I am bound to tell my hon. friend——

Mr. HUGHES. I am afraid the minister cannot.

Mr. FIELDING. I gave an outline of it to this House on the day I brought the reciprocity agreement before the House. I then gave this history in general terms and if my hon. friend will be good enough to read it he will find that it is given with the utmost accuracy.

Mr. MACDONELL (South Toronto). A little illogical.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think it was more illogical than the speech my hon. friend made the other day, but I wish to do my hon. friend the justice to say that although he made a speech which I do not think was logical and with which I did not agree it was the speech of a courteous gentleman and as such was entitled to our respect.

Mr. CROCKET. What did the Prime Minister mean in 1907, when he said that Canada was not in favour of reciprocity?

Mr. FIELDING. The Prime Minister never said that Canada was not in favour of reciprocity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING. I say it now that there has never been a man of cabinet rank on either side of politics from the first day of confederation down to this moment who did not claim that reciprocity was desirable if we could obtain it, but what the Prime Minister said and what hon. members on both sides have said, was that we had made our offers to the United States to get reciprocity, and that they had not treated us generously in the matter, they had not responded as we thought they should respond, and there came a time when the self-respect of the Canadian people led us to say: 'We will no longer beg reciprocity from these people, we will stand upon our rights and work out the commercial salvation of Canada independently of the United States.' That has been the attitude of the Liberal party from that day to this.

Mr. BOYCE. Does my hon. friend say that the Prime Minister never made use of these words:

> Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians, beginning with myself, would have given many things to obtain the American market, but, thank Heaven, those days have passed away.

Mr. FIELDING. I will repeat those words. There was a time when Canadians would have given almost anything to get reciprocity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer the question.

Mr. FIELDING. There was a time when Canadians would have given a great deal to get reciprocity. When my hon. friends were wearing out shoe leather going to Washington, they would have given a great deal for reciprocity. Thank Heaven the day has come when we will only have reciprocity on fair and reasonable terms.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). What did the First Minister have to thank Heaven for at that time?

Mr. FIELDING. I am bound to tell my hon. friend that the First Minister was thanking Heaven for something which hon. gentlemen at that time did not thank Heaven for, but for which they are thanking Heaven to-day. The Prime Minister was thanking Heaven for the better condition of life in Canada which had been brought about under the policy of a Liberal administration, and at that time hon. gentlemen opposite were preaching the cry that the policy of the Prime Minister and his colleagues was ruining the business of the country. Now, the hon. gentlemen have come to the point when they, too, thank Heaven for the commercial and financial prosperity which has come to the Dominion of Canada, and which they say is so good that they want it let alone.

Is this reciprocity? Yes it is substantially the same kind of reciprocity that was proposed in 1891 when Sir John Thompson issued his card to the electors of Antigonish, and asked to be returned because he and his colleagues were going to Washington to endeavour to bring about a reciprocity treaty, and he believed they would succeed. It was the same kind of reciprocity that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) sought when he went to Washington. It is the same kind of reciprocity that was offered by Sir Charles Tupper in 1887 and 1888. It is the same kind of reciprocity that every public man of eminence from the first day of July, 1867, to the 26th day of January, 1911, stood for before the public with the declaration that he was willing to have reciprocity, and would be glad to have it, always provided he could get it on fair and reasonable terms. If we had come before the country with a reciprocity treaty in the ordinary sense of the word, even then we might justly have asked the support of this parliament. But we realized that after all these years while it was still important to us, we thought, that we should open up the American market, we thought it better that we should not enter into a binding engagement for any particular term. And what do we find now? Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who, at one stage, said: Let us not make any binding treaty, let us have no entangling alliance—some of them and their friends in the press now turn around and say: 'What is the good of this reciprocity; you have no guarantee of its continuance?'

An hon. MEMBER. Who said that?

Mr. FIELDING. I have read it in the press.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

An hon. MEMBER. The Globe?

Mr. FIELDING. No, I have not read it in the Globe. That is the attitude of a number of my Conservative friends in many quarters, and there is some force in it because a reciprocity treaty binding for a given period of years would give some parties encouragement to make investment which perhaps they would not make on the faith of an arrangement of this character, and to that extent I frankly admit there is room for criticism of this reciprocity scheme. But take it all and all we thought it better we should not bind the parliament and the government of Canada for a given period of years, and we therefore arranged with the American negotiators that each party would make concessions in its tariffs. We said; We believe that these concessions will commend themselves to the people of the United States and to the people of Canada; we believe that the arrangement when confirmed by the respective legislative bodies will continue, not because anybody is bound to it but because the arrangement will prove so beneficial to the people of both countries that they will desire to continue it. But if perchance that proves to be a mistake, if the arrangement is not satisfactory for one side or the other, then without breach of faith either party is free to terminate the arrangement.

Mr. HUGHES. In view of the remarks of the First Minister about the great good that is going to accrue to both countries from this measure, would the Minister of Finance have any objection to explain what construction he puts on the statement of Mr. J. J. Hill in the papers this morning, where he says the arrangement give very little but it prevents closer union between Canada and Great Britain.

Mr. FIELDING. I know of no more ridiculous argument than that; I am not referring now to the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) but to a class of argument to which this remark belongs.

Mr. HUGHES. It was Mr. J. J. Hill's remark.

Mr. FIELDING. I know.

Mr. HUGHES. The father of the Bill; the owner of the west.

Mr. FIELDING. On both sides of the line parties friendly to reciprocity make the best case they can for the agreement, and that is reasonable and proper. We point out the advantages we believe will accrue to the people of Canada from this measure, and we are not so much concerned in its advantages for the people of the United States; that is their end of the business.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. They looked after that.

Mr. FIELDING. If some member of the United States Congress takes a speech I have made in this House and says Mr. Fielding declares this is a great thing for Canada and therefore it is a bad thing for United States, there would not be much logic in that; and yet such is the kind of argument hon. gentlemen opposite are making. They find something that has been said in the United States Congress to support this measure and they say that because a member of congress has said something to help this Bill along it is therefore a bad thing for Canada. We are not concerned to explain or defend what has been said by any one in the United States concerning this measure. They are dealing with it from their point of view entirely.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear hear.

Mr. FIELDING. And I am frank enough to say that we are looking at it from the point of view of Canada, and how it will benefit the people of this Dominion. I am no more called upon to sutain or defend what any one has said in the United States than a member of Congress would be called upon to explain or defend what is said by any member of this House. I, therefore, think there is nothing in the interruption of my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes). I say that this measure is the very kind of reciprocity we have all been seeking for years, and even were it proposed as a definite treaty, we might in the light of history reasonably ask the support of this parliament for the measure. But, in its present form, we can point the country to how much stronger is the situation. It is distinctly set out in the correspondence which forms the agreement that while we hope that this arrangement will commend itself to the judgment of the people of both nations, nevertheless we do not undertake to interfere with the liberty of Congress or of the Canadian parliament to make at any time any change in the arrangement which they see fit. That being the position, would it not seem logical and reasonable that hon. gentlemen who may not view the matter with much favour, should, under these circumstances, say: We will let this measure go through, if it is a good measure we will all be delighted by and by, and no harm will be done, but if it proves to be a bad measure the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier will be condemned for presenting it, and then the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier will pass away, and hon. gentlemen opposite will come to power, and they can repeal the measure. I believe, Sir, that that view will be taken by fair-minded men in the country. There are men—we know it with regret—who honestly oppose reciprocity, and we are sorry for it, and we respect their views as we wish them to respect ours, but these very men will surely say: What harm can be done for putting this in operation; if it is good as the Liberals say the country will benefit by it; if it is as bad as the Conservatives say, it is another nail in the coffin of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and his colleagues, and in a very short time in the natural order of events an election will come on, and a change of administration will follow, and the new government can repeal the measure if they choose. I have heard that view expressed by Conservatives in personal conversation with myself, and it is a reasonable view. The people of the country generally will I am sure say since this agreement does not profess to bind the people of Canada, since it leaves the parliament of Canada absolutely free to make such change in the fiscal policy of the country as parliament may please, it should have a chance. If it be the will of the people constitutionally expressed, to say this is a bad measure, then the in-coming government can re-impose the taxes we now propose to take off. In view of that circumstance, surely there is no fair and reasonable ground for a policy of obstruction in regard to the measure. I therefore, hold that the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite from the beginning has not been fair and reasonable. Oh, but, they say, we want redistribution, and the west particularly wants it. Some hon. gentlemen opposite shed tears for the west because they are going to have an election without redistribution. Well, redistribution affects the whole country, but I suppose as a matter of fact it chiefly affects the west, and while the west wants redistribution there is one thing it wants more than redistribution, and that is reciprocity.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FIELDING. Your western farmer is pretty shrewd and keen.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. You bet he is.

Mr. FIELDING. He cannot very easily be humbugged; he cannot be humbugged by a Conservative member who shouts for free agricultural implements, while his leader votes against free agricultural implements. The western farmer is a pretty keen fellow; he is intelligent perhaps above the average, and he wants redistribution although I do not think he is bothered very much about it. He wants reciprocity any way, and he knows there is a great difference between the situation in respect to redistribution, and the situation with respect to reciprocity. You can have redistribution by the will of this parliament at any moment, but you cannot have reciprocity at any moment by the sole will of the parliament of Canada. For many years while the Canadian parliament was ready to have reciprocity the people across the line were not ready for it. Sometimes there was a movement favourable to reciprocity, but what did we find? Any change in the fiscal policy of the United States requires a combination of the House of Representatives, which is now Democratic, the Senate, which is now Republican, and the president, who is now a Republican. A combination of these three is necessary to effect a change in the fiscal policy of the United States. Every effort for years to secure that combination has proved a failure down to the time of the present reciprocity agreement.

Mr. FIELDING

Mr. LANCASTER. What about having equal safeguards in Canada instead of going it blind?

Mr. FIELDING. If my hon. friend thinks that the constitution of the United States affords better safeguards than British insitutions, I do not agree with him. Our safeguards are not of precisely the same character; but we have, as history shows, excellent safeguards, and we do not propose to give them up. There is one safeguard that we perhaps need, to prevent the business of the country being obstructed, but that, as Rudyard Kipling says, is another story.

Mr. LANCASTER. What I am objecting to is not applying the fundamental principle of British institutions, which is government by the people. The people have a right to pass on this question. Let the hon. minister apply the British constitution, and we will have no quarrel with him.

Mr. FIELDING. We are living under the British constitution, and my hon. friend, who is a lawer, knows that if in any respect we violate it, he has only to appeal to the court.

Mr. LANCASTER. You do it every day.

Mr. FIELDING. If my hon. friend knew of a single point in which the constitution was violated, he would be the first man to call attention to it.

Mr. HUGHES. Might I ask the hon minister if he considers it in harmony with the principles of responsible government for two men, however capable, to go to Washington and bind the parliament and people of Canada by a resolution which has never been submitted to them?

Mr. FIELDING. In the first place, as I have just shown, we do not bind them.

Mr. HUGHES. You try to, but we do not intend that you shall.

Mr. FIELDING. When this measure passes, if it shall pass, it does not bind the people of Canada one hour longer than they are content through their constitutional authority to accept it. When hon. gentlemen opposite talk of this agreement binding the country, I can only say that they are not correct.

Mr. HUGHES. Wherein does it differ from any other law?

Mr. MACDONELL. Did not the hon. gentleman say in this House that the honour of the government and the honour of the country was pledged to it?

Mr. FIELDING. That is hardly correct. We were asked to put off the consideration of this matter, and I stated that the government of Canada was bound to bring this matter before the House and push it to a conclusion. That is what we are doing. Parliament is not bound. My hon. friend is not bound; I could not bind him if I would. No member of this parliament is bound. The government is bound, and whatever a government does in the name of the country binds in a certain sense the whole country, but as a matter of fact every member of this parliament remains unbound and absolutely free.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the minister kindly point out any statute on the books of Canada that cannot be repealed by the parliament of Canada? Wherein does this differ from any other law?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. If the parliament of Canada were to pass an Act confirming a treaty for a given period of years, I say, in a sense, this parliament could not repeal that treaty.

Mr. HUGHES. It could at the end of the time.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend said at any time.

Mr. HUGHES. No, I did not.

Mr. FIELDING. I want to point out, first, that we do not bind the country; but I want to go and say that if we did bind the country, what right would these hon. gentlemen have to complain? They talk of two gentlemen going down to Washington, sitting in secret and binding the country. One hon. member made merry about this secret meeting at which the telephone was shut off and no one was allowed to come in. Has the hon. gentleman any idea that treaties or commercial arrangements of any sort are negotiated on the public streets? If two farmers want to make a deal about a mowing machine, they will probably sit down together in the kitchen of one of them and make an agreement. Do we not know that every business transaction between individuals in private life is negotiated privately? How was the treaty negotiated in bygone years under Conservative auspices? Was it negotiated on public streets? When Sir Charles Tupper went to Washington with Mr. Chamberlain in 1888 and 1889, and negotiated a treaty, which unfortunately the United States Senate never ratified, did he go on the public highway and invite the newspapers to come and listen to the negotiations? What childishness to put before the people of Canada. Every arrangement of this character, every important private negotiation, still more every important public negotiation, still more every international negotiation, is necessarily negotiated privately and in secret. But, Sir, in the previous treaties Canada has been in a measure bound—bound for a definite period of years. We have not bound Canada to any definite period of years; but if we had done so, hon. gentlemen opposite would have no reason to complain. But there is this important difference: the Americans have reached a certain stage in this reciprocity matter which is of vital importance to us. Hon. gentlemen opposite at one time advanced the view—it was perhaps the most rational point in their argument—that we were not certain how the American Congress would deal with this matter. We knew that in times past, after certain progress had been made in the negotiations, the American Senate failed to approve. Why don't you wait, it was said, until the Americans decide for themselves? Well, we were not so much impressed with that argument as some of our hon. friends opposite were; but if there was anything in that argument, it is swept away to-day. Every step has been taken by the government of the United States. Loyally has the president kept his faith with the government of Canada. He has put his great personality and his power behind that measure; he had quarrelled with members of his own party; he has called on patriotic Democrats and has said to them, 'I am sorry my own party is divided, come in and help this thing for the good of the country;' and he has won a response. Step by step he has done his part. The House of Representatives has passed the measure; the Senate of the United States has passed the measure; the president has recommended it, and the newspapers say that on Wednesday next, he will sign the Bill; and then, after having been for 40 years on the wrong side of the question, Uncle Sam will have put himself right. Are we to be right or wrong? We have been right in the past. We have always said to the Americans that we would deal with them on fair and reasonable grounds, but they would not consent. Now the current has changed. They have recognized the injustice—shall I say that?—at all events, the error of their way for the last 40 years in their trade relations with Canada. They have practically said, We think we have been wrong; we desire to come and make a fair and reasonable arrangement. They have made a fair and reasonable arrangement. The only surprising thing in the minds of many Canadians is that we succeeded in making so good an arrangement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FIELDING. It is a good arrangement for the great west, and the great west is anxious for it this very year, with the prospect of a crop of 200,000,000 bushels of wheat. The west wants to know which is the best market. Shall we sell it to England? Very well, if England wants it; but if there is a better market across the border, who will say the western farmer shall not have the right to send his wheat across the border?

A few years ago the government of Newfoundland entered into an arrangement with the government of the United States under which the fish of Newfoundland was to be admitted into the United States free of duty while the fish of Canada would not be so admitted. The Canadian government made a strong protest and for some years they succeeded in preventing the government of Newfoundland from making that agreement. Why? Because they said 'Canada wants free fish, and because we want to arrange matters so that Canada, as well as Newfoundland, shall get the benefit of the arrangement.

To-day we offer the fishermen of Canada that which the Conservatives wanted for them in that quarrel, and we know that the best farmers, the best representatives of the farmers, throughout the country all approve of it. It is a good thing for the grain grower. It is a good thing for the manufacturer, because we have achieved that which they said could not be done. We have achieved a reciprocity in natural products, without having to make any important concessions in the matter of manufactures.

This reciprocity is a good thing for the manufacturer, and I venture respectfully to repeat a word of advice which I offered them not long ago. I say unhesitatingly that from the point of view of the manufacturers of Canada this reciprocity agreement is a good arrangement, and if it goes through, we may reasonably say to the western farmer: 'Well, you cannot have all you want in this wicked world, but this goes a long way towards meeting your demands, and we can fairly ask you to give and take, and let the eastern manufacturer have a fair show,' and we believe they will do it. But, if perchance the manufacturers in their great power should unite in opposing, and possibly condemning, or even defeating this measure, then there will rise up in that western country a storm cloud bigger than a man's hand, and the end will be a change in the fiscal policy of the country, which the manufacturers will find much greater than anything they conceived of.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Neither the hon. gentleman nor his party would think of hurting the manufacturers. The right hon. the Prime Minister says he will not hurt the manufacturers.

Mr. FIELDING. We say we have not hurt the manufacturers. We know, nevertheless, that many of the manufacturers have been needlessly alarmed, and we know that to-day they are opposing us in this matter. However, I am free to say that I think they have made a mistake, because it will be in their interests as well as in the interests of the country to have the agreement go through.

Redistribution and reciprocity—the west wants both—but they do not want them both at the same moment, and they do not expect them both at the same moment. In the year 1891, the census was taken on the 1st day of April, yet on the very eve of that census—in the month of March, I think, Sir John A. Macdonald appealed to the people, and we had a general election. The census came along a few weeks afterwards. The west had to wait for its redistribution for three or four years, and it had nothing in particular to wait for. To-day I do not know whether the west will have to wait for redistribution or not, but if it has to wait, it will be because there is a more important measure than redistribution before it. As I stated, reciprocity in days gone by has been desired by all, but never before has it been within our grasp. At the present time it is offered to us, and the question is, 'Shall we take it?' We, on behalf of the Liberals of Canada, say, we believe the people want it and will take it. We challenge you to let it pass in this House, and a year hence we will meet my hon. friends in any manner they wish. If they believe this is a dangerous measure, it can only be dangerous for a few short months. The elections will come on, in the ordinary course of events, before many months have passed. Redistribution will come on, and then they will have an opportunity not only of sweeping out this government—which they desire so much—but they will have an opportunity of repealing this measure and putting on the taxes which we wish to take off.

After nearly half a century we have now found the psychological moment when reciprocity is within our grasp. Shall we take it? 'Yes,' will be the voice of the people.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Mr. Speaker, this is not reciprocity. It is revolution.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken on the motion.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). You can rule me out of order if you wish to do so, Mr. Speaker; however, I only spoke on an incident which arose.

Mr. FIELDING. We do not object. Let the hon. gentleman go on.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). This is not reciprocity. It is revolution. It is commercial union, or at least partial commercial union which must end in complete commercial union. The hon. gentleman who has just preceded me (Mr. Fielding) says that the agreement meets with the approval of the Republican party, the Democratic party, the Senate and President of the United States. This may be perfectly true. But why is it so? Because, for the first time, Canada has admitted the President of the United States into her councils in making the tariff of this country. It is the most humiliating thing that has ever occurred in this country. It is the first time a president of the United States by using the big stick—as he used it on the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in Albany, in connection with the Payne-Aldrich treaty—forced him to make a change in the tariff law of this country. 'Then,' he said, 'you must come back to Washington and make an arrangement in regard to the duty,' and the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) went to Washington and allowed the President of the United States, in secret negotiation, to participate in the making of the tariff of this country.

Where did we get our independence in regard to the tariff? We achieved it from the mother country, in days gone by. It was a hard thing to achieve, and once we had it we used it in bringing about a national policy, and making this country great. Now that national policy has been a success and our commercial and tariff independence has been vindicated, yet, we propose to give it over to the United States. No wonder all the parties of the United States are united in desiring to have this thing passed, because by so doing we are admitting them into participation in the making of the tariff of Canada. Surely that is not what we achieved our commercial independence for. We are putting the mother country out, to let the American people in.

An hon. MEMBER. No, we are not, and you know better.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes, we are, and I will give you my proof. I want to show how radical this change is, and how it departs from all the traditions of the past. In years gone by we have had tariff proposals submitted to this House, and argued from all points of view, and interest; but inasmuch as this tariff has the approval of the United States, and cannot be changed without their consent and without negotiations, a revolution has been proposed in the country. And the proof of it is that the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton), the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German), and the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Harris) has to leave their party because they could not go to the government to have the tariff changed but had to go to the President of the United States.

Mr. BLACK. That is rot.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). That is all very well for the hon. member from Nova Scotia (Mr. Black) he does not like it. But the reason he does not like it is that it is true. The Prime Minister, when in England recently, was not the friend of the Empire; and to-day, before the Empire and the world, he appears as the friend and colleague of the President of the United States. He has allowed the President of the United States to have a say in making the tariff of Canada. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has said we can rescind this tariff when we like. The President called a special session of Congress in order to deal with this matter, and they have passed this agreement. If Canada passes the agreement under those conditions, it is to be said that we can so disregard the President and Congress as to repeal that agreement within a year? The United States would have every reason for a hostile attitude towards Canada if we went into an agreement of this kind sanctified, as we may say, by legislation and then repealed it within a short time. We could not repeal it without entering into negotiations with the President of the United States, if we want to keep our good faith.

I have just said that this is a great organic change in regard to our tariff the like of which was never proposed in this House before. Hitherto, we have made the tariff of this country in this House. This time, it has been made out of the House, and that is a change that every Canadian should view with alarm. Heretofore, Parliament has been able to modify any tariff propositions brought down. I remember when Sir John Thompson and Mr. Foster proposed tariff changes, it was, as they said to lop away the mouldering branches. But their proposals did not meet with the views of the majority of this House, and the result was that the Government of the day had to modify their proposals. In this case there can be no modification and, this is to be said of a tariff which, as has already been pointed out, was made by two men who did not know all the trade conditions of this country. I could name a county in New Brunswick that will be injured by this agreement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What county?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Carleton.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We will see what the electors of Carleton say about that.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I have information that this will injure the Canadian farmers along the border. But here we have two men who do not know everything about tariff conditions in this country, and they assume to make this treaty, and, instead of our being able in the House of Commons to make changes, I say that power has been seized by the cabinet—by a section of the cabinet for not all were consulted—and that junta in the cabinet undertake to make the tariff of Canada in collusion with the President of the United States, and that tariff cannot be changed unless.

Mr. TURRIFF. That is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) to withdraw that word.

Mr. TURRIFF. If my statement is contrary to the rules of the House, I withdraw it, and I say that the statement of the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) is not in accordance with the agreement that is made.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). What is the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Turriff) opinion. I come back to mine that for the first time in the history of Canada our tariff has been made outside this House. And the proof is the rush the Americans make to grab it when the offer is made, and we are letting the President of the United States have a hand in making our tariff.

Mr. EMMERSON. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) allow me a question? I wish to understand his argument. Does he mean to say that we have made the tariff with the United States as evidenced by the Bill passed by the Senate of that country on Saturday last?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). There was no change made there. The gag was put on, and the same unconstitutional course pursued as is pursued here. And, for political reasons, they joined in it in order to have a say in this country. This is not only an organic change in our constitution, but it is the introduction of commercial union. In fact, it is partial commercial union. The right hon. the Prime Minister is still a commercial unionist, and it is the old commercial unionist who was discredited by the people in 1891 who will be discredited this year if he goes to the country. And when the right hon. gentleman said that he and his party were the champions of redistribution, and, though his organs demand it, yet, the responsibility for the failure to pass redistribution, should it not be passed, must be upon him and his friends. I wish to give a proof that commercial union is back of this. Commercial union was the thing that united Germany. These were scattered and divided states, but commercial union drew them together so that they became one country. And the design of the United States is to absorb Canada by a partial and then a complete system of commercial union, if they can get the people of Canada to go into it. Once the ball is started rolling, this will be the effect, unless the people of Canada unite. That is the real question in all this. Hon. gentlemen opposite have presented it to the people as a question of markets, of profits, of dollars. I hope that this question will be considered in its effect upon our national institutions. If the Americans can succeed in controlling our tariff, they will wipe out our British institutions. As President Taft said: This will wipe out trade between the mother country and other states of the empire. What are dollars compared with our institutions? We have British institutions which give the people of Canada better government than the people of the United States enjoy. Reciprocity is supported in the United States because the leaders, and the trusts there wish to divert the attention of the people from the problems with which they are faced. And another thing is to make their country greater and give it the right to intervene in the affairs of Canada. I say this is the most deplorable piece of legislation ever proposed in this country. And I believe that when the people come to vote on this agreement they will vote against it, because it means the sacrifice of our institutions. And, as I have said before in this House, I know of nothing so dangerous to the ideals of the people of Quebec—'Our laws, our language, our institutions'—as to give the United States a say in the affairs of Canada. They will drive British institutions out of this country if they can be driven out. But my contention is that no effort in this direction on the part of the United States or of hon. gentlemen opposite can be successful. The heart of Canada is sound, and it is British. It is for imperial trade all around the world, and we are going to have that band of English speaking people all around the world trading one with the other, in spite of Mr. Taft, in spite of the right hon. gentleman and his government. Our destiny is not with the United States, it is away from the United States. Hon. gentlemen are trying to drive us that way, as they tried to drive this country twenty odd years ago; and Sir John A. Macdonald said then, as every Canadian says now, 'A British subject I was born, and a British subject I will die. We will keep British institutions in Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But he was for reciprocity all the same.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). He did not propose that two members of his cabinet should go into a secret treaty, or anything of this kind.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? Has his attention ever been called to the dispatch which was sent by the Canadian government on the 13th of December, 1890, to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, reading as follows:

My Lord,—I have the honour to send to your Lordship to-day a telegraphic message in cipher, of which the following is the substance:

With reference to my telegram of the 10th inst., this government is desirous of proposing a joint commission such as that of 1871, with authority to deal without limitation——

Mark the word:

—without limitation, and to prepare a treaty respecting the following subjects:

1. Renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854, with the modifications required by the altered circumstances of both countries and with the extensions deemed by the commisison to be in the interests of Canada and of the United States.

And is my hon. friend also aware that the definition which Sir Charles Tupper gave in parliament to these words 'without limitation'; was that the Canadian government were making an unrestricted offer of reciprocity to the United States?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The hon. gentleman can read the dispatch, and he and the man who wrote the dispatch are responsible for it. I am responsible here for my position in this House, and to the trust that has been reposed in me by the people of South York, and they are against this proposition, they are against the raid that is made on the nationality of Canada, and they intend to vote against it. Now this proposal, as I have said, is revolutionary, and it is to be followed by the threat that the Minister of Finance made here today, and the farmers of this country will be justified, if they have no protection, in coming here next year and asking for the removal of what was once described in one of my election contests as the last vestige of the National Policy from the statute-book of Canada. That is what is ahead of the people of Canada today. We are to have no more protection of our industries, we are to allow the president and Congress of the United States to have a say in our tariff, and Canada is to become suzerain of the United States, or we will become states of the union and send senators to Congress. We will have Canada reduced to the position of being a number of states in the American republic. Now we do not want that, and the issue is before us. The Minister of Finance today made it a mere issue of profit, or dollar, what the western farmer was going to get out of it. Now I venture to say that the western farmer has had his eyes opened; I venture the prediction that the people of the west will return a majority against this proposition. A great change of opinion is going on throughout Canada over this pact.

Mr. BLACK. You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The hon. gentleman, on election night, will find out that he did not know what he was talking about.

An hon. MEMBER. The hon. gentleman is out for a senatorship.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. There will be a good many looking out for senatorships on that occasion.

Mr. TALBOT. It will be a long time before you get a senatorship.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). After the statements that have been made here today we demand that the west be given a voice in regard to this question. But the west is to be denied its full voice on this question by hon. gentlemen opposite, because they cannot wait, in turning over the destinies of Canada, and making the tariff of Canada in conjunction with the president and Congress of the United States.

Mr. BOYCE. The remarks of my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) seem to have raised a storm of dissent from the government. The government find itself in an extraordinary and pitiable condition. I confess that I never heard a more pitiable exhibition in the shape of oratory than that which has fallen from the lips of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance on this occasion. Why, Sir, of all the childish positions I never heard the like before. Schoolboy tactics, childish tactics, the most pusillanimous kind of tactics, the most feeble kind of protest, to come from hon. gentlemen who are supposed to have a sense of the dignity and responsibility of the government of this great country. Sir, what did the Finance Minister say on the floor of this House in February last? what did the Minister of Customs say in February last, and what have they said on the hustings? What did the Finance Minister say in the city of Montreal? Ever since they introduced this pact they have been saying that it will not be many months very much earlier than you expect, before this whole thing will be submitted to the people of Canada. And did the opposition dissent from that? Not at all, the opposition never have dissented. The government have been crying that only for us they were willing to submit this matter to the people at once. They are working off their bluff upon the opposition and the people of Canada, when the very last thing that the government desires is an appeal to the people. How did the Minister of Finance vote upon the motion of the leader of the opposition on the 8th of March? That was a concrete motion, a proposal by my hon. friend that this proposition should be submitted to the people before it passed this House. How did the Finance Minister vote on that question? He voted nay, that it should not be submitted to the people, but that it should be forced through this House by the force of the government majority, and their party had to be whipped into line by the lash of party discipline in order to obtain a majority. And yet, under these circumstances, the Minister of Finance can find it possible to say that his great concern was for the opposition, that the opposition forsooth, was the people. Why, Sir, the opposition is trying to have it submitted to the people. The Minister of Finance laughs, he doesn't believe it. Has the hon. gentleman ever manifested such concern for the feelings of the opposition before, that, though he knows they are afraid of a certain thing, he will not give them that thing at once? If he is sincere, and believes that the opposition is afraid of appealing to the people, all I can say is that he is not possessed of that ability that I think he is, of that far-sightedness that I think he has, if he does not give us an election within the shortest possible time the statute allows. Why doesn't he give us an election and test the feeling of the people? Why, it is not long ago that the hon. gentleman, as a responsible minister, announced that the opposition had no rights whatever in this House. His deep concern for us is very sudden; I fancy, Sir, that if the order were reversed and the party on this side of the House had control of the electoral machinery the people of this country would not have long to wait before they had an election upon this question.

The hon. gentleman says that the opposition is afraid of this question, and he speaks with all the confidence of having made an agreement which is hailed with united acclaim by a grateful and thankful people. The hon. gentleman seems for the moment to forget the lamentable difficulties of the gentlemen who sit behind him. He forgets that a gentleman in whom he professed to have some confidence, not long ago, the former Minister of the Interior, Mr. Sifton, and a loyal supporter heretofore of the Liberal government, condemned this compact from beginning to end. The hon. gentleman from Welland (Mr. German) condemned it. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Harris) condemned it, and there are other gentlemen not possessing the courage that these gentlemen exhibited who, in their hearts and minds condemn it and, I venture to say, have expressed their discontent to the right hon. gentleman and the Minister of Finance but who are hushed or lashed into silence by the members of the government. I would have been glad for instance to have heard from the hon. member for West Peterboro (Mr. Stratton). It is well known that he found himself in a very difficult position. He was opposed to this agreement and his constituency was opposed to it, and I would like to have heard his clear and candid opinion upon the subject, but he, like others, was not allowed to do so.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He made a very admirable speech in favour of it not long ago.

Mr. BOYCE. And the result is he has declined to accept the nomination for West Peterboro. He has received his reward, the promise of higher things, a seat in the Red Chamber where the wicked cease not from trouble, but from troubling. Perhaps if I were to get personal I might mention other instances. What about the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). We should like very much to have heard from him. We heard mutterings and murmurings from that hon. gentleman. He was very much dissatisfied, and while the debate on this question was going on that gentleman sat silent in this House although the mutterings and murmurings got into the papers of his own province. Strange things happen with regard to the hon. member for Pictou. I would ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) whether he made an admirable speech in favour of reciprocity?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sure he could do so.

Mr. BOYCE. Strange things have happened. That hon. gentleman was confronted with a party pistol put to his head in one hand and a soporific in the other. He had to take either the pistol or the soporific. He took the soporific, and he has been asleep ever since. Rumour has it the hon. gentleman is to be promoted for his sleepiness and his drowsiness on this subject to a very honourable position in the Cabinet. These are the rewards given to government members who keep their mouths shut although they are not satisfied with the government policy. And yet the Finance Minister says in a childish speech that the opposition are afraid of an election, an appeal to the people on this subject when the government is so lamentably weak, so feeble and in such a pitiable plight that it is absolutely unable to carry through a compact and will not submit that compact to the high court of the people who alone should decide a matter of such vital interest to them, because it fears to do so. That is the position of the Canadian government and it is no wonder that the member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) before you left the chair to go into the Committee of Ways and Means should draw attention to the pitiable spectacle presented by this government. The position of the government is like that of two school boys each afraid to take the ice cold plunge and each saying: You are afraid yourself. That is a sort of logic that might pass with a boy of ten years old, but coming from an experienced parliamentarian like the Minister of Finance it does not do credit to him, to his position or to his government.

The Minister of Finance made a statement on his responsibility which I did not like, and which I am sure he will correct. He said that the Prime Minister had never said that he was not in favour of reciprocity. I quoted to him the words of the Prime Minister and asked him if he would deny them, and, Sir, he evaded that question and never answered it. I would now ask him directly if he will answer that question and say whether the Prime Minister ever uttered the words I read.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know whether or not they were the words of the Prime Minister. I have known the Prime Minister intimately for a great many years. I have known his mind on the question of reciprocity as on others, and I never knew a time when he was not in favour of reciprocity. His fear was that he could not get it, and so he ceased to seek it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOYCE. I would ask my hon. friend why he went on record against it? I will quote the words again:

Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians, beginning with myself, would have given many things to obtain the American market, but, thank Heaven, those days are passed and over.

Does the Finance Minister now say that the First Minister did not make use of these words?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know whether he did or not.

Mr. BOYCE. My hon. friend did not know whether he did or not, but at the same time he asserts that the Prime Minister never made the statement.

Mr. FIELDING. I state again that I do not know as to the particular speech of the Prime Minister, I said that I know the Prime Minister's mind on this question. I am not prepared to say whether or not he used these words.

Mr. BOYCE. My hon. friend will allow me to state that he is shuffling. He stated that the Prime Minister never said he was not in favour of reciprocity; I quote to him a speech in which the Prime Minister declares absolutely against reciprocity and thanks Heaven—

Mr. FIELDING. No he did not.

Mr. BOYCE. And the hon. gentleman says he did not. I will give him something more to shuffle about. Has he read the proceedings of the Imperial Conference of 1907? Does he recognize this?

There was a time when we were wanting reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside and negatived. We have said good-bye to that trade and we now put all our hopes upon the British trade.

Does my hon. friend recognize those words? Will the Minister of Finance say that the Prime Minister never used these words.

Mr. FIELDING. I take it for granted the hon. gentleman is reading from the official report.

Mr. BOYCE. I am reading an extract from Hansard.

Mr. FIELDING. If that is from the official record, I have no doubt that the official report is correct.

Mr. BOYCE. Then how can the Minister of Finance justify his assertion that the right hon. gentleman never said that the Canadian people were against reciprocity.

Mr. FIELDING. He never said that.

Mr. BOYCE. Now, I address myself to the right hon. the Prime Minister himself and I ask him if he did not use these words:

Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians, beginning with myself, would have given many things to obtain the American market, but, thank Heaven, these days are past and over.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. And they have come back now.

Mr. BOYCE. Ah, that is the answer of the Prime Minister. If the right hon. gentleman thanks Heaven that the days when the Canadian people were agitating in favor of reciprocity are past and over, what power is he to thank that these days have come back again. If he is to thank Heaven that such days are past and over, must he not thank the powers of Darkness that they have come back again. At the Imperial Conference, May 7th, 1907, the right hon. gentleman said:

If we are to follow the lines of nature and geography between Canada and the United States, the whole trade would flow from south to north, and from north to south. We have done everything possible by canals and subsidizing railways to bring the trade from west to east and east to west so as to bring trade into British channels. All this we have done recognizing the principle of the great advantage of forcing trade within the British Empire. . . There is no boundary line except a purely conventional one over the whole territory of North America. Their habits are the same as ours, and therefore we are induced to trade and cannot help it by force of nature. But so far as legislation can influence trade, we have done everything possible to push our trade towards the British people as against the American people. . .

There was a time when we wanted reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside. We have said good-bye to that trade and we now put all our hopes upon the British trade.

I specially commend this to the Minister of Finance. The right hon. gentleman must confess to having used this language and yet he sits silent while his Minister of Finance thrice stated he had never declared himself as being opposed to reciprocity with the United States. I fail to understand such a thing occurring in a free parliament. The Minister of Finance was certainly in a desperate plight, and he made reckless statements. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, you now accept his apology for his missstatements and the manner in which he attempted to deceive the House. the position is this: this government is attempting now to force upon the Canadian people a policy which the government is aware is opposed to the wishes of that people, but by means of a servile majority behind the Prime Minister they are attempting to pass it into law. Then, they will go to the people and howl: 'Election.' They will send out their ballot-boxes and they will take to the hustings and say: Here is a treaty of reciprocity that we have been desirous of getting for many years; here is an agreement that was passed by parliament although actively opposed by the Conservative party; that agreement is now law and if by your votes you condemn it you will involve Canada in trade complications with the Uinted States and commercial ruin will befall this prosperous country. That is the kind of argument the government will use if this measure is allowed to pass and that is the kind of argument they have used before. They forced the Grand Trunk Pacific agreement through this parliament without consulting the people. They signed sealed and delivered it and then they went to the people and told them that it would invite disaster to the country to break that agreement. That Grand Trunk Pacific agreement was never submitted to the people. True, it is said by the Minister of Finance that this reciprocity treaty may at any time be set at naught, but he also told us that the honour of the parliament of Canada was pledged to make it law, and he knows very well that the very terms of the letter he signed with reference to this agreement pledged the support of the parliament of Canada to it. That the Minister of Finance cannot deny. I am entirely in accord with the sentiments upon this question which have been expressed by my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro). It is high time that the hypocrisy and childishness about this question shall cease. It is high time the people of Canada should know the feebleness of a government which can pretend to represent the wishes of the Canadian people and which at the same time admit that they are unable to carry on the business of this country and to further great public measures which according to their policy are of great moment to the commercial interests of Canada. It is childish for them to sit there and say that because in the House of Commons the opposition is opposing it, they cannot get such a measure through, and at the same time, fearing to go to the country with that policy. Such a course is an advertisement of the fact that the government is afraid to meet the will of the people upon this question. I say, speaking for myself, and as a public man: let my right hon. friend bring on this election and the sooner he brings it on the better. As a man of long parliamentary experience, who for years has had the destinies of the countrv in his hands, he should realize that this agreement which we, on this side of the House and many on that side of the House so strenuously oppose, should be referred immediately to the will of the people of Canada, the last, our highest tribunal.

Speaking for myself, I welcome the day when my right hon. friend will submit this question to the people. I am not speaking boastfully; I am not saying that the people of my constituency are unanimously in favour of this; but I say that it is in the interest of this country that an agreement which involves so much, which involves a change of history, perhaps a change in the map of North America ultimately, should be submitted to the people, so that the people's message should be sent to this House either by a majority of members behind the right hon. gentleman authorizing him to go ahead with this reciprocity, and all that it involves, or by a government which will maintain for Canada that proud position which it occupies at the present time as the chief star in the Crown of the British Empire—a government that will encourage her trade going east and west, that my right hon. friend gloried in—in London, not in Washington—and that all those instruments and institutions which are the means of building up that trade shall be strengthened, so that Canada shall be united more and more closely to the empire. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has made a great plea for reciprocity. He knows perfectly well what it will involve; he knows that it will involve the sectionalizing of trade, the destruction to a great extent of the east and west lines, and to a great extent bring back the condition of things that existed before confederation. I cannot help thinking of my hon. friend's position and principles in 1886, when in the legislature of Nova Scotia, he aimed the invectives of his eloquence at the very prop of the policy of confederation, and endeavoured to dissolve the ties that bound the east to the west in this great country of ours. I am sorry for the position of the Finance Minister, when, after fifteen years in that position, in which he has told us annually in his budget speeches of the great prosperity of this country due to the administration of the Liberal party, while now, at the end of that time, he demonstrates that deep down in his heart there is still lurking a seething canker of disruption. To what else can you attribute the sentiments that have been expressed by the hon. gentleman here to-day? I say it is time this hypocrisy should cease, and that the country should know that the party to your left, Mr. Speaker, desires nothing more strongly than that the true position of this government should be made known to the people, that this agreement should be submitted to the people, and that the people should have an opportunity of passing their judgment upon it.

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Speaker, although I am now and have been for a lifetime a strong advocate of a policy of freer trade relations with the United States, a policy of reciprocity, if you will, I would not attempt at this moment to make any extended remarks upon that question. I have, however, because of the interest I take in the question, sat here this afternoon and listened with some degree of wonderment, and with some degree of amusement, at some of the utterances that have fallen from the lips of hon. gentlemen opposite. I have learned something as well. But I have wondered what would have happened had the government of Canada, in December of last year, refused to accept the invitation of the President of the United States to sit together with him and his representatives, to see if some policy of freer trade, mutually beneficial to both countries, could not be arranged; and I wonder what would have been the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite if the government of Canada, instead of taking the attitude which it did take, had said to the President of the United States: We want none of you; let well enough alone; we do not propose to do anything; although we are prosperous, although we are progressive, and are developing our country, we have a slogan cry, we will not further advance, but will let well enough alone. I have been wondering what position hon. gentlemen opposite would have taken had there been that refusal, and I can imagine that we would have heard an entirely different song on their part when the matter came before this House. I have always had a great reverence and esteem for the public men of Canada. I have taken a pride in our institutions, in our government, and in the ability of the men, I care not on which side of the House they have sat, who have had to do, in years past and during recent years, with the administration of the affairs of Canada. But after listening to the doctrine preached by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean), that pride and esteem and respect has been greatly enhanced. My hon. friend has preached the doctrine that this whole movement has been a revolution in our constitution; and he or others on the other side of the House have stated time and again that Canada had listened to the wooing of the United States, and had sent two feeble and decrepit old men down to Washington, under the shadow of the Capitol, within reach of the claws of the American eagle, and my hon. friend preaches the doctrine that these two feeble old men went there and revolutionized——

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I did not make any reference to my hon. friends as being old and feeble men, and I did not use any such language.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not state, nor do I wish to be understood as stating or intending that my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) made any such remark, but what I want to make clear is this: my hon. friends preached the doctrine that negotiations such as this affect the constitutions of the respective countries, and that the people of the United States created, or were creating, a tariff for Canada. In reply to a question which I put to my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) he said that Canada with her 8,000,000 people, was represented by two men who have been characterized by my hon. friends opposite and by their press as two feeble old men, not knowing and not understanding the business—going down to Washington and revolutionizing the tariff and the constitution of the United States, as a matter of fact. They created sad havoc with that American constitution, and I have been wondering what the Daughters of the Revolution would say when they met in convention down in the New England states, and I have wondered what would happen when it was learned by the descendants of the signers of the declaration of independence what havoc had been wrought with the constitution which was based on the declaration of independence. But, this perhaps, only serves to show how utterly absurd were the arguments brought forward by my hon. friends. If our connection with the empire is to be in any way sapped or undermined, or is in any measure to be severed or loosened—it is a strange thing that the giants of the Conservative party in years gone by saw no such danger.

Sir Charles Tupper in addressing the electors at Charlottetown in 1878, in advocacy of the National Policy, said: 'Pass this. It is merely a readjustment. It is a National Policy designed to do, , , .' What? Designed to bring about a reciprocity in natural products between Canada and the United States—designed to accomplish that which we had failed to acomplish since the abrogation of the treaty in 1866.

An hon. MEMBER. Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question. Does it not also bring in the products from all other countries as well as from the United States?

Mr. EMMERSON. It is the same treaty. He was referring to the treaty of 1854, which was abrogated in 1866. In July 1878, when Sir Charles Tupper went into the province of Prince Edward Island, and was urging the people of that province—who were known to be strongly in favor of a free interchange of natural products between Canada and the United States—in order to enlist their sympathies and secure their support in favour of the Conservative party, he held out the bait, 'If you will place the Conservatives in power—in this policy there will be incorporated the idea of protection, and it will force the United States to her knees, and will force her to come to Canada and give us what we have sought.' In this advocacy Sir Charles Tupper did not point out that in bringing that about there would be any danger with respect to our British connections—perhaps he did not see it—perhaps he did not have the perspicacity of these modern lights of the party. If he had seen this danger surely he would never have urged it upon the electorate of Canada.

In 1884 Sir John A. Macdonald said from his seat in this House that he was in favour of the fullest possible interchange of natural products between Canada and the United States. He added to that statement that the more trade we could have with the nited States the better it would be for Canada. Surely Sir John A. Macdonald—giant that he was in the Conservative party—giant among the public men in Canada—surely he would have foreseen what hon. members opposite pretend to see to-day—what my hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean) has openly stated he sees, and what the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Boyce) sees so clearly—that by the execution of this agreement there was to be a readjustment of geography, that there was to be a reestablishment of constitutions—a reorganization. Sir John Macdonald saw no such menace. In 1888, when Sir Charles Tupper went with Mr. Chamberlain and negotiated the treaty with the representatives of the United States, and when he secured a treaty practically on all fours with the one which was secured recently, and which would have gone into effect had the Senate of the United States ratified it—Sir Charles Tupper saw no such menace, nor has there been any such menace seen during all the years down to the present time. When the clause relating to reciprocal arrangements was inserted in the tariff Bill of 1879, evidently there was no such danger seen from either side of the House. Nobody saw any recarving of the map of British North America. Therefore, if during all these years we have heard naught of this what are we to think?

Mr. LANCASTER. Mr. Speaker, is not this obstruction to the hon. minister's motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. EMMERSON. My learned friend (Mr. Lancaster) is the very last man in this House, or in any committee, to talk about obstruction. We have had experience, and we have witnessed my hon. friend's attitude before committees, and before this House.

Mr. LANCASTER. I appeal to you Mr. Speaker, as to whether there is anything in the argument of my hon. friend. I ask if the hon. Finance Minister should not seriously call the hon. gentleman to account for obstructing the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. EMMERSON. Sir John Thompson, in his address to the electors of Antigonish in 1891 said:

To the electors of the county of Antigonish:

Gentlemen,—At the election which will take place on the fifth day of March, I will be a candidate for re-election as a member of the House of Commons for the county of Antigonish.

The government of which I am a member is appealing to the country with a policy which we believe will be heartily endorsed by a great majority of the electors. We have made to the government of the United States, through the government of Great Britain, proposals for reciprocity in trade, which we have good reason to believe will result in an arrangement by which the markets of the United States will be re-opened to the products which our people desire most to send there.

A fair measure of reciprocity is what we desire, and we have no doubt that that can be obtained without undue sacrifices.

I respectfully ask your support and votes, and I pledge myself to serve the best interests of the country, if I should be honoured by a renewal of the confidence which was reposed in me at the last elections, and for which I shall be for ever grateful.

I remain, gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN S. D. THOMPSON.

Antigonish, Feb. 24, 1891.

Sir John Thompson was a leader of the Conservative party. He was an advocate of reciprocity. I assume that he would be an opponent of revolutions whether as to trade, constitution, geography or anything else. And I can assume that he had an intellect and foresight not often equalled either in Canada or out of it. I pay that tribute to that deceased statesman, a tribute which I am sure, will be concurred in by the people of Canada, regardless of their political faith and affiliations.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EMMERSON. Resuming where I left off before recess, I would ask what my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) had in his mind with respect to a possible severance of the ties of the empire, when, in 1891, he spoke upon the question of reciprocity. He was speaking in this parliament before the general elections of 1891, and before the conference was held at Washington at which he took part. He said:

With this National Policy, with this development of our natural resources, with this development of interprovincial trade, there is also a desire to widen the boundary of commerce on the other side. With the United States? Yes, and on the principles laid down in the order in council, taking the basis of the treaty of 1854, and adding to it, whatever may be agreed upon by the commissioners appointed on both sides. That is the principle as plainly as can be laid down. No one should be asked to say more than that in going into a trade negotiation with another country, and however the hon. gentlemen opposite may refuse to attribute to us an honest desire to carry out this policy, as they will in their great charity and distinguished probity, the government knows that the party behind it will trust it because it reflects the opinion of the men who support it.

Then, in the very same parliament, Mr. Foster read an extract, and the extract simply bore out what? (To use Mr. Foster's language):

It bore out this—that I said I saw no particular trend toward reciprocity in my reading of the sentiment of the United States, that from 1866 up to the present time, we had been counselled to watch and wait; to go upon the assumption of waiting and watching, to see whether or not the United States would not meet us with a reciprocity treaty, and I said that I thought the time had come and fully come when we should leave that position, and with the greatest courtesy and good will possible to the United States we should do our own fiscal legislating in our own interest, as we see it from the standpoint of Canadians. That is all I said, that is exactly what I stated, and I think I am perfectly consistent in that respect. Since that time, however, a change has taken place and on the invitation of the United States government itself we are to send delegates on the 12th day of October to Washington, to confer with Mr. Blaine and the President of the United States and see whether or not we can have framed or formed a reciprocity treaty on the basis which we have set forth in our order in council, and which is as plain as can be made.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). What year was that?

Mr. EMMERSON. That was just previous to the elections of 1891. My hon. friend will find it recorded in 'Hansard,' and that is the best record possible for the utterances of any hon. member.

Mr. STANFIELD. The hon. gentleman is reading from a paper—what paper?

Mr. EMMERSON. I was reading an extract; it is a matter of no importance what paper it is in. I can give the pages of 'Hansard,' but I do not think my hon. friend is curious with respect to that. Now, Sir, I did not intend to make any extended remarks on this question, but I feel that I shall have to add a few remarks at the risk of being termed, as my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) termed me, an obstructionist. I suppose my hon. friend from Lincoln will hail me gleefully, I become particeps criminis with him in obstructing the business of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON. I echo that hear, hear. Perhaps my hon. friend from Lincoln, and even my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), fail to see that every utterance they make in this debate is an obstruction, and viewing it from that light, I preume that is their purpose. Now the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Boyce), whom I now see in his seat, I regret to say, was somewhat personal. I would rather that this matter had been dealt with from an impersonal standpoint. He was ready to make merry with respect to the utterances of the Prime Minister in connection with the question of reciprocity. In 1878 Sir Charles Tupper argued that the support of the National Policy was but a means to an end, he said that to the people of Prince Edward Island; and, in effect, he said that the end justified the means, and if you don't like a National Policy, if you are not quite prepared to support this policy of the readjustment of the tariff for one purpose, then support it upon the principle that the end justifies the means, because you will thereby have reciprocity with the United States in natural products, which is so much in your interest, and which will add so much to your prosperity and development. I can only understand the utterances of the right hon. the leader of this government with respect to reciprocity in the light of everything he has said, I can only read in them that he was saying to the people of the United States, in effect. Well, we are not so particular, we are not dependent on reciprocity. And I say now we are not dependent upon reciprocity. I say we have never been dependent upon it. As strong an advocate as I have been of such a policy, I have never felt that the people of Canada needed to go down on their knees before the people of the United States and beg for reciprocity. But apparently the very indifference of the right hon. the Prime Minister with respect to the whole question as interpreted in his utterance, has served in a measure to bring about the psychological moment when the government of the United States are willing to give what we have asked them for, asked over and over again during the last 40 years. Now, they have offered it to us, and it devolves upon us seriously to consider the responsibility that is placed upon us. Now, I am sincerely in favour of reciprocity. I believe it will expand the trade of all Canada, I believe that it is particularly in the interest of eastern Canada. More than that, I believe that while our trade with the United States has expanded during the past fifteen years immensely, I believe it will expend in a greater ratio still when this policy is inaugurated between the two countries. But more than that, I believe it will develop and expand our trade with Great Britain in a way that it has never been expanded in the past.

My hon. friend will have an opportunity of reviewing that; I am giving it as my judgment, and I will give you the reason. I believe that the people of eastern Canada will become prosperous, that they will have a choice of markets, that the conditions wrought by means of such a reciprocity tariff in natural products will adjust the markets, protect the producers, stimulate production in the direction of agricultural, forest and fishery products; in fact stimulate the development of the natural resources of eastern Canada. As that is stimulated and extended it only increases the purchasing power of the people of that section of the country. Increase the purchasing power of a people and you find them indulging in luxuries. We must all concede that to a very large extent the luxuries that we as a Canadian people indulge in are very largely imported from, or through Great Britain, and if we thus indulge in luxuries our importations from Great Britain will largely increase, to the mutual advantage of the two countries, particularly of Great Britain. We cannot, nor could we complain with respect to any increase in importations from Great Britain. She has a wide open door to our natural products, for all she can possibly take of them. We have not on our side had any door open to her products; we have not given them any great advantage, but, with an extended trade, with the development of our resources, and the increase in our revenue which must necessarily follow, we could fairly well say: 'We can and will increase this preference from a 33⅓ per cent to a 50 per cent preference in favour of Great Britain.

Many hon. gentlemen in dealing with this question ask what the electorate are going to do. I do not pretend to have any prophetic sense, but I do say this, and I will make it as a prophecy that when the people of Canada are called upon, whether it be sooner or later, to deal with the question of reciprocity, or of the expansion of the trade relations between these countries, they will deal with it from one standpoint alone. It will not be with them as it is too often here, as a case of merely playing, they will not be indulging in the game of politics; the people of Canada, and particularly the people of eastern Canada, for whom I can more readily speak, will deal with it from a business standpoint, from the standpoint of their bread and butter; and I think I can fairly say, speaking from that eastern standpoint, that it is to the advantage of their bread and butter that they shall have an additional market, that they shall have at least the choice of an additional market, and that they shall not be confined to one purchaser, or even to two, but that they shall have as many purchasers as it is possible to have. It is all very well to say that this constituency, or that section of the country will do this or do that. I believe the people will largely deal with the question in the way I have indicated, and if the electorate of Canada do that, certainly I will be content and I think every hon. member in this House should be content.

My hon. friend has said that because this member or that member has not spoken there is some doubt as to his convictions. I would be very sorry to be judged from that standpoint. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) did not speak, it is true, in this House on the question of reciprocity. I did not speak, but I would not wish my views to be judged from that fact. I do know that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) during the month of June spent practically all his time campaigning, not only in Pictou, but in every county of the province of Nova Scotia. Doing what? Advocating reciprocity.

Mr. REID (Grenville). He never did.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend may be in a better position to know the facts than I am. I only know that what I am stating can be demonstrated beyond question.

Mr. STANFIELD. The hon. member for Pictou did not campaign in every county.

Mr. EMMERSON. I want to be accurate I would not wish to say every county, I would say almost every county. I think that can be very well taken in a Pickwickian sense, but there is this to be conceded that he was actively campaigning and he was advocating reciprocity. Whether he bearded the lion in his den in the county of Colchester I do not know but perhaps he thought discretion was the better part of valour in that case.

But the people of Canada are not concerned as to who made speeches and who did not, it does not matter much whether this man goes down and somebody else come up in his place. We should have at least the earnestness and the courage of our convictions and not hide ourselves behind our electorate or our constituency.

Mr. BOYCE. Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON. The hon. member for West Algoma says hear, hear. Then let us have a vote on this question. Then we will have at least a decision before the people of this country as to what the mind of the representatives of the people is as indicated by their votes and that must be the best indication. While challenges have been thrown out, if I were in a position to throw challenges to anybody I would throw a challenge not merely to hon. members opposite but to those on this side as well, let us have a vote, let us each one record his views. There need then be no occasion for aspersions on the attitude of this or that member, there need be no reflections upon the course that this or that hon. member has taken. The hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) had better refer to some very apt words once uttered by Abe Lincoln, if he will not consider me disloyal in making the quotation. Lincoln said: There is so much bad in the best of us and so much good in the worst of us that it hardly behooves any of us to talk about the rest of us. I think that is a very good motto to apply all around. However, it would not be a matter of reflection upon any hon. member in this House if he could stand in his place and give voice to his conviction by his vote as recorded on the journals of this House. I think it would be well to have such a record and to have it at the earliest possible moment. There certainly would be no obstruction, I am sure, as to that. Of course I would not for a moment insinuate that there is any desire to obstruct.

People can draw their own inferences, but I do think hon. gentlemen opposite are very anxious to change places, and they have the hope; or at least they express the hope, that they have a good chance of doing so. But, possibly, in striving to weave the purple robe of power, they have indulged in what some people may call, aye, what some people do call, obstruction. Are they going to pursue that course in the face of the attitude of the United States, when that great nation tenders us a contract signed and executed for the extension of our mutual trade. Under existing conditions, the responsibility resting upon us is, I believe, greater than has ever been placed before upon the legislators or the people of Canada. I venture to think that is the view the people will take of it. I believe they are wondering why a great political party should fling itself in the face of the wheels of progress, to prevent the consummation of that which it is believed will stimulate the development of our trade and commerce.

Mr. BEATTIE. If the hon. member admires the United States so much, would he please tell us why they took the great privilege of reciprocity from us in 1866.

Mr. EMMERSON. Somebody spoke about Rip Van Winkle to-day, but I would not be so discourteous to my hon. friend as to apply the reference to him; I do say, however, that the time for post-mortem inquests is past.

Mr. BEATTIE. I remember, Mr. Speaker, that at a large convention held at the city of Detroit to advocate the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty Senator Chandler declared: 'We will starve the Canadians until they beg of us to take them into the union.' Well, we are not in the union yet, and I fervently pray we never will be.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think the hon. member's question should be barred by the Statute of Limitations. At all events it lies in the mouth of no party to raise it because, since 1866, Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir John Thompson, the Hon. George E. Foster, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Alex. Mackenzie, Edward Blake, George Brown, and all the great statesmen of Canada, since the declaration made by the United States Senator at Detroit in 1866, have advocated reciprocity with the United States.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Emmerson) not dealing wholesale in post-mortems just now?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am merely trying to lay the ghosts that hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to raise. To-day, my hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean) raised the ghost of the disruption of the empire, and the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Boyce) raised the ghost of the termination of our national existence and presented a map of British North America carved into smithereens. I have, Mr. Speaker, strong views in favour of reciprocity, and I think it will be admitted that I have the courage to express my views. Had Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government taken the responsibility of declining to negotiate with the United States when they made the request to us I wonder what would have been the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite. I know what my attitude would have been. I have been a Liberal all my life, but strong as I am in adherence to Liberal principles, if this government had taken upon itself the responsibility of declining to enter into these negotiations, much as I respect Sir Wilfrid Laurier I would consider that he should forfeit my support and confidence and I do not think that I would hesitate to tell him so. I have expressed views in this House contrary to the views of the government, but I am happy to know that in this instance the policy they have adopted meets with my whole-hearted approval and shall receive my most cordial support.

Mr. GOODEVE. The argument addressed to the House by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) simmered down was in effect, an appeal to this side of the House to let a vote be taken upon this question. In answering that, it might be well to remind hon. members that the position of the Conservative party on this measure has been clearly set forth from the very beginning of this debate, and had the government seen fit to adopt the position taken by the opposition with regard to it there would have been no question of obstruction and this debate would have ended long ago. On the 26th of January last, the Minister of Finance brought down his resolution to amend the tariff of 1907, and after listening to his full presentation of the case and taking time to consider it in all its bearings, the leader of the opposition moved an amendment on the 8th of March which set forth clearly and fully the position which we have maintained up to the present time and which answers the question of the hon. member (Mr. Emmerson): why not take a vote upon it? Let me remind him of the exact position by reading that resolution, and I think he will be surprised, after his remarks of the last few minutes, to find that he is placed on record as having voted against the very position he now asks the House to take.

Mr. MACDONELL.

That all the words after the word that' in the proposed motion be omitted and the following substituted therefor:

The reciprocal agreement embodied in the resolutions submitted to this House by the Minister of Finance on the 26th day of January last, was also submitted on the same day by special message of the President to the Congress of the United States of America which was then in session.

That the said session has now expired and Congress has failed to approve and carry out the said agreement.

That a considerable length of time must necessarily elapse before the said agreement can be dealt with by Congress at a special session.

The next clause answers one other point made by the hon. member for Westmorland, when he referred to the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), who said that this involved great constitutional changes. This paragraph covers his entire argument and fully vindicates the position taken by the hon. member for South York:

That the fiscal changes by the said agreement are of a far reaching character and constitute a substantial reversal of the policy which has been approved by the people of Canada.

The final summing up was as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the said resolutions should not be proceeded with until the electors shall have had an opportunity of pronouncing upon their merits.

All that we asked, and all that we have continued to ask, is that the electors shall have an opportunity of pronouncing upon these merits; and yet at this late hour, after nearly six months of wasted time, we find the hon. member for Westmorland, in his place in the House, saying, why not vote upon it? actually accusing men on this side of the House of being afraid of their principles, of trying to hedge themselves about and taking two positions in regard to this question.

Mr. EMMERSON. I made no insinuation.

Mr. GOODEVE. The basis of his argument, if there was any argument, was that we were afraid to go to the people. He said he himself advocated going to the people. There is the resolution clearly and distinctly asking only one thing.

Mr. EMMERSON. Will my hon. friend pardon me? I think he must have misunderstood me. What I was advocating was that we have a straight vote on this question in this House. I was not talking about a vote in the country. Before we have that, let us have a straight vote here.

Mr. GOODEVE. Exactly, and it was a straight vote we had in this House on this amendment. We placed our position fairly and squarely before the country, that this agreement was so far reaching in its consequences that we should submit it to the people of Canada and ask their verdict upon it; and if there has been waste of time and obstruction, that is due to the government and the government alone.

I would like to say a word or two with regard to the very remarkable admission made by the right hon. leader of this government, an admission that I know was wrung from him much against his will by the strong argument advanced by the hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce), when he had placed before him his own words in which he had declared over and over again that we were through with reciprocity, that never again would this question be brought up; and I wish to point out to my hon. friend from Westmorland that these utterances were made since the date to which he has referred. I have the official documents to show that in 1899, in 1901, in 1907 and in 1909, at the Imperial Conferences in those years, the right hon. the Prime Minister said that Canada was through with reciprocity; and in the elections of 1904 and 1908 that question was not an issue. It seems difficult to impress upon hon. gentlemen opposite what these quotations from the speeches of the right hon. leader of the government mean. Indeed, I may say that as a young member of this House, during the three sessions that I have sat here listening to the various debates, I have been amazed at some of the things that I have learned with regard to the policy of the right hon. leader of the government. Over and over again I have witnessed the spectacle of various Hansards being brought in from the library and quotations read from them of absolutely contrary opinions advanced by the hon. leader of the government on every great public question before this country; and gradually the conviction has been forced upon me that he has no fixed principle, and that he is ever ready, by pleasant phrases, eloquent in themselves, to obtain the plaudits of the people regardless of what the practical results may be. One is forced to that conclusion, however much against his will. At the Imperial Conference, of 1907 the right hon. leader of the government said:

> But so far as legislation can influence trade we have done everything possible to push our trade towards the British people as against the American people.

Mr. ASQUITH. May I say I did not in the least dispute that. My objection was not, as I think I made clear, in any sense to complain of the Canadian preference; on the contrary, I recognize both its intention and its effect. My point was that natural conditions were such that it was inevitable that the Americans should get the best of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not only have we done it by preference, by legislation, but we have forced our trade against the laws of nature and geography. If we were to follow the laws of nature and geography between Canada and the United States, the whole trade would flow from south to north, and from north to south. We have done everything possible by building canals and subsidizing railways to bring the trade from west to east and east to west so as to bring trade into British channels. All this we have done recognizing the principle of the great advantage of forcing trade within the British Empire.

There is the whole kernel—if there is any kernel—of the remarks made by the right hon. the leader of the government. It is contained in this one phrase 'All this we have done recognizing the advantage of forcing trade within the British Empire.' It was not merely a matter of sentiment, it was not merely that they must give the mother country an advantage, but it was because he distinctly declared that he recognized it was an advantage for the people of Canada to force the trade within the Empire.

Then, why this sudden change of sentiment? If it was an advantage in 1907, why is it not an advantage in 1911? We had the quotation cited by the hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce)—'thank heaven that time has passed.' Let me read the exact words of the right hon. leader of the government:

> Canada to-day is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians, beginning with myself would have given many things to obtain the American market, but, thank Heaven, these days are past and over.

Yet when pressed by the hon. member from West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) as to why they were now asking for a renewal of the treaty the right hon. the Prime Minister said because those days had returned again. It would be interesting to have a frank admission as to what was in the mind of the right hon. the leader of the government when he said he thanked heaven that these days were passed for ever. Surely no man would thank Providence that something had passed away unless he felt it was for his own advantage or for the advantage of the country. Still, we have the right hon. gentleman thanking heaven that these days had gone for ever. Then, we have the most astonishing statement on the floor of the House that these days were back upon us. I think we should very much like to know what are these days which are now confronting us and compelling us to seek aid from the nation to the south. In that connection it must be appropriate to read what was said by another very prominent Liberal—A leader for many years, and premier of the great province of Ontario. This was not away back years ago, as my hon. friend from West Algoma said, but in the year 1910. Here is what Sir Geo. Ross said before the Toronto Club:

> In 1866, when the old treaty was repealed, we were poor in banking capital, in skilled labour, in agriculture and manufactures. A treaty then would have afforded some relief—to-day conditions are different—different because the repeal of the treaty removed every prop on which we had formerly leaned and the true temper of our Anglo-Saxon spirit was roused to action. I think no country in the world affords a better illustration of public spirit than Canada when the United States in 1866 flung our poverty in our faces and told us our only choice was starvation or annexation.

I wonder what was in the mind of the right hon. gentleman when he said that these days were upon us again, when it was necessary to call for the unlocking of the door which had been flung in our faces. I do not intend to weary you with following up this line of argument, but would like to call it to the attention of the House in order that the right hon. gentleman and the Liberal press may be able to explain to the people of Canada during the coming campaign what was in the minds of the present government when they said that these days of darkness, of distress, and poverty are upon us again so that we are compelled to seek succour from the great nation to the south of us.

Another argument was advanced this afternoon by the hon. the Finance Minister. It was a very specious argument and one that, I think, I am safe in saying, occupied at least three quarters of his entire address. This argument has already been taken on the platform by the Liberal speakers throughout the country and is one which is likely to play a very important part in the coming campaign. When I referred to this argument as being specious I spoke advisedly. The hon. Finance Minister said 'It is true there are those of my own persuasion, Liberals, who honestly differ from me in regard to this question. However much I may regret that, I would say I think there is an argument which seems to appeal to me and it ought to appeal to them and to every reasonable man—it is this—there is nothing fixed about this treaty. We have been blamed for going down to Washington and binding the people of Canada. However, I say to you that there is nothing to prevent a change being made at any time in regard to this treaty.' Now, I say unhesitatingly, that while technically he was stating the fact, yet in practical results he was speaking what would not and could not possibly work out. Indeed, the hon. the Finance Minister himself was so convinced of the weakness of his argument that a little later on he said he doubted whether it would not be better if the treaty had been for a fixed time. What are the facts in connection with this? Can we alter or change this treaty at any time? I would like to ask the hon. Finance Minister supposing we decided to allow this resolution to go through, and the agreement was duly signed and sealed, if within two months we wished to alter it would he, and would the people of the United States consider that we had honorably kept faith with them? Bear in mind the position he laid before this House in bringing down his pact, that we were not to change it by one iota. The agreement as made by himself and his colleagues was to be passed just as it stood. Over and over again he had stated to this House that we are in honour bound to pass it just as it was brought down. If that was the case, I would like the hon. the Finance Minister, or the Minister of Customs—who is in his place—to tell me the exact date when he would consider us as being absolutely free to alter or change this agreement. Would it be at the end of two months? Would it be at the end of six months? or would he feel that the people of Canada had done all they were in honour bound to do if they tried it for one year and then altered it because it was found to be unsatisfactory? I think not—at least I believe the United States would not so consider it.

And so I could go on to say, one, or two, or three years. And we see that on that account it certainly would not be keeping faith; so we are bound by this agreement as fully as if we had entered into a treaty, with the added disadvantage that it is not for any fixed time, and there is therefore, there is always the possibility, as the Minister of Finance has said of disturbing trade.

Now, another argument in the same line. On the 30th of March, 1910, a committee was appointed to meet with the representatives of the United States in regard to the placing of the surtax—because, forsooth, we had made an agreement with France affecting a certain number of articles, and for that reason the United States threatened us with this discrimination. And the Minister of Finance came on this floor and proposed giving them certain concessions and defended his course in so doing. He said we did not want a tariff war. Well, Sir, if, when we were not bound to them in any way, the hon. gentleman felt justified in saying to our people that we were compelled to make certain concessions to the United States in order to avoid a tariff war, how much more would that argument apply once this pact went into force.

There is a further argument on the same line. I have only been here three sessions. But again and again, as certain changes in our tariff have been asked for by some of our own people, I have heard the Minister of Finance, even while admitting that the changes proposed might be of some benefit to those who asked for them, yet a stable tariff is better for the people of Canada than constant changing and tinkering, and for that reason he refused to make the changes. And the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) says 'Hear, hear.' I agree with him; the argument is in itself a good one. But apply it to this pact. If the minister's argument is to be accepted, what would be our condition in regard to stability of tariff? If we did not know it from week to week when our tariff would be changed, what would be the condition of our trade? Take, for instance, the fruit trade. What will be the result of the Niagara fruit men, and the British Columbia fruit men? The handlers of the product, the commission men would make their arrangements wth the fruit producers of the United States, and the industry would be changed from the present channel into the new one. That itself would mean loss. But, once these changes are made, any man or government would hesitate to alter these conditions knowing the injury that would result. Any man who has followed the political history of the nation to the south of us knows how the commerce of that country is disturbed every presidential year. And why? Because in every presidential campaign the tariff issue has been to the fore, and commerce is practically at a standstill awaiting the result, knowing that the change in fiscal conditions would mean much loss or gain to the people. Are we to place ourselves in that position? Are we to be tied to the tail of the fiscal tariff of the United States? It is easy for the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs to stand on this floor and say: We can try this, and if we do not like it we can change it. As I say, technically that is true, but practically and in fact, as I have shown, there are reasons why it is impracticable and impossible, and no man knows better than the two ministers who made the pact, and brought it down to this House. So, I say, it is no wonder that the Finance Minister pleaded with his own side, and with the press gallery—for I saw him watching the reporters when he made his argument—and even pleaded with men on this side, that we should make the trial on the ground that it could do no harm. But he knows that this is not a question to be played with; it is too great, too far-reaching, too vital to the great commercial interests of this Dominion to be played with by any set of men. We are here to deal with these questions with a view to their broad national effect. For more than forty years we have gone on and prospered. Year after year in this House we have heard the minister say—and his words have been repeated throughout the length and breadth of Canada by the Liberal press—that the progress of the country has been marvellous under the fiscal system adopted in 1878. My hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) said that Sir John Thompson and Sir John Abbott and Sir John A. Macdonald had asked for reciprocity. But that was before they had adopted the great National Policy. But when that was put into effect, and as a result the poverty and distress—this hour of darkness so graphically referred to by Sir George Ross—passed away. We have developed our great natural resources while the people of the south have wasted and largely destroyed theirs. The time has come when we have reached the position in which we can manufacture our products against any people in the world; and at this time the people of the United States are very anxious to come in and partake of our great natural resources.

I do not propose at this time to go into that subject, though I should like to deal with the question of lumber and pulp as affecting particularly my own province of British Columbia. But I confine myself simply to the remarks of the First Minister and the Finance Minister. I say again, I would like these hon. gentlemen to lay before the people how the Finance Minister proposes to try this pact, as he says, without disturbing the commercial interests of this great Dominion.

On that ground, if no other, I say that before a measure of such far reaching consequences is placed on the statute-book of Canada, we should weigh it well, and we should give the people of Canada an opportunity of expressing their will with regard to it. Every man knows in his heart that once this pact goes into effect we cannot change it at our will. It seems that we are turning back from the promised land into the bondage of the fiscal tariff of the United States, there is no question of that. Undoubtedly we should be tied up with them, we are bound more or less to consult them in whatever we do hereafter with regard to it.

I wish to refer to an extraordinary remark the Minister of Finance made this afternoon. It is true, he says, that we sent a message to the manufacturers saying that this agreement would not injure them, that it would only help the farmers and consumers. Here one naturally asks how, if it is going to aid farmers by giving them higher prices, it is also going to help the consumers by giving them lower prices. But there is another phase of this matter. The minister's statement was carefully worded. As the member for West Algoma said, the government undertook with one hand to hold a pistol to the hon. gentleman for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and in the other hand they held out this soporific. And so I may say the Minister of Finance this afternoon, undertook with one hand to hold out a badge of peace to the manufacturers of this country, and with the other hand he held out a threatening pistol. There is no doubt of the meaning underlying his words. In almost these words he says: We have given the people of the west, not all they asked, but all we are prepared to give them at this time; and I would like to warn the manufacturers that if they continue in their opposition to this agreement the time may come when they will find themselves in a worse position than they are at present; but if they are prepared to lie low and to cease their opposition, they may receive no further harm. In other words, the Minister of Finance asks the manufacturers to give up their rights of citizenship in order to purchase immunity from the attacks of this government. That was the attitude of the Minister of Finance towards the manufacturers. But his government does not reckon with the people of Canada. This government will find that the people of Canada will not tamely submit to be trampled upon, nor will they allow any government to take from them their constitutional rights and privileges.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not spoken at all during the discussion of this question, therefore I may be permitted to make a few remarks in answer to some of the observations of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Goodeve), and also to refer to the quotations which my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) has made as to the attitude of the leaders of the Conservative party in the past. I understand my hon. friend from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) to admit that it was true that the Conservative party was at one time in favour of reciprocity, but that was before the promulgation of the National Policy of 1879. Did I understand my hon. friend correctly?

Mr. GOODEVE. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then my hon. friend must have forgotten that upon the very last occasion when the Conservative party appealed successfully to the country they declared themselves unequivocally in favour of reciprocity with the United States. That was twelve years after the National Policy had been put into force. Now, my hon. friend from Westmoreland quoted from an election card which was issued by Sir John Thompson, in February, 1891, when he was appealing to the electors of the county of Antigonish, in the province of Nova Scotia. Sir John Thompson was not an ordinary member of the House, he was Minister of Justice in the government led by Sir John A. Macdonald, and he was recognized as the second in command next to the great Conservative leader. Sir John Thompson was a man in whose judgment the people of Canada had very great confidence. He had occupied a position on the bench of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and was recognized as one of the ablest lawyers in Canada. After the death of Sir John A. Macdonald, he was called upon to assume the leadership of the Conservative party, which he did with credit to the party and with credit to the country. Every Canadan, whether Liberal or Conservative, deplored his sudden demise at so early an age. Sir John Thompson, in his manifesto, made reciprocity the only question upon which he appealed to the people of Nova Scotia, it is the only great subject to which he refers. He tells the people of Canada, that the government of which he is a member have entered into negotiations with the government at Washington for the purpose of bringing about a treaty of reciprocity, which he believes would be of advantage to the people of both countries. Now, surely the hon. member for Kootenay must have forgotten this fact when he said that the Conservative party was never in favour of reciprocity subsequent to the adoption of the National Policy. He has forgotten the election of 1891, when the government went to the country upon the policy of reciprocity. My hon. friend has called attention to a portion of the language of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), which will be found on page 60 and following of 'Hansard,' and in which that hon. gentleman, then a member of the Conservative government, stated that this government had done everything possible to extend interprovincial trade. He referred to the fact that the Canadian Pacific railway had been carried out by the Conservative party, and it had then been completed some six years, because it was completed from the Atlantic to the Pacific in 1885. He referred to the enormous development which had taken place in this country, and said that notwithstanding the development of internal trade, notwithstanding the wonderful strides Canada had made as a result of the construction of the Candian Pacific railway and the inauguration of the National Policy, yet the government had sought to widen and extend the bounds of commerce in every direction. Then he asked this question: With the United States? Yes he says, we are desirous, not only of extending our commerce with all the other countries of the world, but with the United States as well. He refers with pride to the fact that for many years the Conservative party had been taught to watch and to wait until a favourable opportunity should occur, and he referred gladly to the fact that at last the moment had come when the government had been invited to visit Washington and to open negotiations with Secretary Blaine and the President of the United States, to bring about what? To bring about a treaty of reciprocity, based upon what? Based upon the old reciprocity treaty of 1854, with such additions and extensions as the altered circumstances might show to be to the mutual advantage of the two countries.

Surely in the face of this evidence it cannot be said that the Conservative party had abandoned the policy of reciprocity after the introduction of the National Policy. This shows that upon the very last occasion when the Conservative party successfully appealed to the country they made reciprocity the principal plank in their platform, and it was upon that that they hoped to win, and did win, the approval of the people.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) said more than has been quoted by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson). He said at page 60:

> The government showed itself consistent, in the first place, by declaring that there was a door open for negotiations, and that a delegation would be sent to Washington after the 4th March, and, furthermore, by sending a delegation and being prepared to go again on the 12th October to do what no Canadian government has been asked to do from 1866 to the present time, that is, to talk over the trade matters and relations existing between this country and the United States, with a view to their better and final settlement. This statement which I make will be borne out by the papers, and I cannot see where we have been inconsistent or where we have prejudiced the intersts of Canada——

And will hon. gentlemen mark these words:

> —or have done aught which any government in favour of reciprocity ought not to have done.

There is the declaration of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in 1891, after the general elections of that year, showing that the government of which he was a prominent member was in favour of reciprocity with the United States. That course is entirely consistent with what the government had previously done because we find that prior to the election of 1891 and as early as December of 1910 the government passed an order in council in which it was provided that commissioners should go to Washington. And what were to be their instructions? They were to go to Washington with authority, without limitation, to make proposals towards the agreement for a treaty based upon the reciprocity treaty of 1854. I think it is important to bear in mind that they were not to be limited in their instructions, they were to, if possible, obtain a treaty for reciprocity not in natural products alone —it was to be based upon the old reciprocity treaty of 1854. But so anxious was the government of that day to obtain better trade relations with the United States, so much did they believe that it would be in the interests of the whole country that this arrangement should be made, that they placed no limitation upon the authority which was to be given to the commissioners, they were given authority to deal with these matters without limitation and perhaps there are some hon. gentlemen here who can remember seeing in the press of that day some remarks that were made as to what was the difference between the Liberal policy of that time of unrestricted reciprocity and the policy of the Conservative party in making an unrestricted offer of reciprocity to the United States. Sir Charles Tupper's attention was called to the fact that these commissioners were to go without limitation to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. Sir Charles Tupper said that was an unrestricted offer of reciprocity, whereas the Liberal party was in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, and Sir Charles said that he pitied the man who could not understand the difference between an unrestricted offer of reciprocity and an offer of unrestricted reciprocity. To the ordinary mind there is not much difference.

Mr. BLAIN. Was the policy of the two parties the same in 1891?

Mr. PUGSLEY. In 1891 the policy of the Liberal party was broader, it was to include manufactured articles.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Which was right?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is not necessary to say which was right, because the arrangement which has been made to-day is absolutely in accordance with the limited reciprocity treaty of which the Conservative party was in favour. If my hon. friend will read the speeches which Sir John Macdonald made in discussing this question, he will find that Sir John, while stating that the old reciprocity treaty had been a great benefit to Canada, while stating that no argument need be presented to show that and at the same time saying it was unfortunately discontinued by the United States government owing to a not unnatural irritation against England, he said that he felt it would be but little use to go to the United States then and seek a reciprocity treaty. He also intimated that he would be prepared to go even beyond reciprocity in natural products and to give considerable reciprocity in manufactured articles, for the purpose of obtaining reciprocal trade arrangements so far as natural products were concerned.

I would quote from another hon. gentleman whose loyalty I think will not be impugned in this House, because, although hon. gentlemen who are in the House to-day, members of the Conservative party, seem, so far as reciprocity is concerned, to have departed from the views of their old and their great leaders of the past, yet I hardly think they would impeach the loyalty of the hon. gentleman from whom I am now going to quote. I refer to the Honourable Sir Charles Tupper, who was for so many years a prominent member of this parliament, and who, for such a long period occupied a prominent position among the people of Canada. I find that Sir Charles Tupper, after the election of 1891, on the 4th of August, as reported at page 3346 of Hansard, said:

> The chief point now is, without any quibbling or cavilling, that this government has arranged for a conference with the United States government in October next, without any confession such as hon. gentlemen opposite insinuate, that we are in any sense more dependent upon the satisfactory arrangements than are the people of the United States themselves. We go there, relatively, in as strong a position as they meet us; we go there——

Willing to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, does he say? No, he says:

> We go there anxious to see whether an arrangement, consistent with the interest of both countries, can be brought about.

And yet to-day hon. gentlemen say that the man who is in favour of reciprocity with the United States is doing something which will imperil the position of Canada as a portion of the British Empire. They say that the man who is willing to improve the trade relations between this country and the great republic to the south is doing what in fact is an act of disloyalty to the empire because it will tend to draw this country away from the great empire to which we are proud to belong, from that great federation of nations which all of us hope and which all the people of Canada believe and hope will for ever remain united and be for ever in the van of progress and development and will last until the end of time. And yet, because this government has simply done what Sir Charles Tupper tried to do, what the hon. Mr. Foster tried to do, what all the eminent statesmen of the past upon both sides of politics tried to do, hon. gentlemen insinuate that they are willing to do something which will weaken the ties that bind Canada to the mother land.

I wish to quote something further, and this perhaps will be of more interest than the remarks which I have quoted, to the people of my own province.

There was not only the order in council providing for the appointment of commissioners, but after the general election in 1891 the speech from the Throne at the opening of parliament contained the following clause:

> My advisers, availing themselves of opportunities which were presented in the closing months of last year, caused the administration of the United States to be reminded of the willingness of the government of Canada to join in making efforts for the extension and development of the trade between the Republic and the Dominion, as well as for the friendly adjustment of those matters of an international character which remain unsettled. I am pleased to say that these representations have resulted in an assurance that, in October next, the government of the United States will be prepared to enter on a conference to consider the best means of arriving at a practical solution of these important questions. The papers relating to this subject will be laid before you.

The reply to the speech from the Throne was moved by the then member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) who is now the leader of the Conservative government in New Brunswick, and Mr. Hazen then used language which—if we did not know it was used by one of these younger Conservatives who have departed from the paths trodden by their leaders not very many years ago,—one would think was the language of a supporter of the Liberal party. His speech will be found at p. 8 and following of 'Hansard' 1891, and in it he expressed pleasure as the representative of the city and county of St. John, and as a member of the Conservative party, at the announcement made by the government that they were about to enter into negotiations for a reciprocity treaty with the United States. He went on to speak of the business and social relations existing between the people of Canada and of the neighbouring republic, he expressed the opinion that it would be an advantage to both countries if a reciprocity treaty went into effect, and he concluded by saying that he felt sure it would be gratifying to the people of Canada irrespective of party that steps were about to be taken to secure reciprocity. Nobody will charge that these Conservatives were any less loyal than the men who now lead the Conservative party; no one will venture to suggest that these Conservatives were less mindful of the best interests of Canada than those who now lead the party; no one will suggest that they would negotiate for a reciprocity treaty which they thought would have a tendency to draw Canada away from her allegiance to the mother country. But, these gentlemen opposite say to us: the times have changed, and what might be good for Canada in 1891 is not good for Canada to-day. Surely that argument does not apply to the contention that reciprocity is apt to lead to dismemberment of the empire; surely, if to increase our trade with the United States is likely to weaken our attachment to the mother country to-day, it must have had the same effect 20 years ago. Nay, Sir, there was greater danger of that 20 years ago because while Canada had then entered upon a stage of development, Canada was not so prosperous as she is to-day, and her people were not in such a position of self-reliance then as they are now. Since then, the population of Canada has increased, her resources have been developed, her trade has extended, and to-day our people are far more powerful than they then were and far better able to stand for what they believe to be the true interests of Canada and the empire. A few words as to the benefit which I believe will accrue to the maritime provinces from this arrangement. We in the lower provinces are very greatly interested in the lumbering, the agricultural, and the fishing industries. We have a great many fertile valleys where vast quantities of hay are produced, and to many farmers it would be a great advantage to sell at least a part of their hay product where they can find a good market. They have looked in the past to the United States but they have been met with a duty of $4 per ton on their hay, and there will be found on file, letters from producers of hay in New Brunswick and Quebec urging the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs then negotiating for this arrangement to secure a reduction of at least two dollars per ton in the duty on hay. It was pointed out that many farmers in these provinces would derive great benefit from such a reduction. Well, instead of getting the duty reduced by $2 per ton, the Canadian representatives succeeded in getting the entire duty wiped out and Canadian hay admitted absolutely free of duty to the American market. In the St. John river counties there is a very considerable production of potatoes, and were the duty removed the farmers of these counties would find in the United States an excellent market for their potatoes. It is a fact I believe that during the present generation there have only been two occasions, and then because of crop failures in Canada, when the price of potatoes in the United States has not been higher than the price in New Brunswick. We have very striking evidence of that in the fact that across the border opposite the counties of Carleton and Victoria, in the county of Aroostook in Maine, farms are to-day worth on the average about twice as much as farms of equal fertility on the New Brunswick side. A short time ago I made special inquiry in the county of Victoria, and the statements in this respect made some weeks ago in this House by the hon. member for Carleton were verified by statements made to me by a number of farmers. And so it is with other farm products. Make farm products of every kind absolutely free of duty, and there will be a large and profitable market for our farmers in the large cities of the New England states, and this they say, would add very greatly to the prosperity of our farmers.

Then, there is another very important interest in which our people are deeply concerned. If hon. gentlemen will look at the papers which are on file, they will find letters from gentlemen largely engaged in the lumbering business, in which they urge that, in addition to trying to get the United States to take the duty off lumber, they should also try to induce them to reduce the duty on shingles, which is now 50 cents a thousand, down to 30 cents. And these representations are not confined to lumber manufacturers of the province of New Brunswick, they also come from lumber manufacturers of the province of Quebec and the province of British Columbia. They report that the duty, which was raised by the Paine-Aldrich tariff from 30 cents a thousand to 50 cents, is very nearly prohibitive. I call to mind a letter from a large manufacturer of the province of British Columbia, who stated that, as a result of this change, quite a number of shingle mills in that province were idle; and I think representations were made from Nova Scotia as well as from Quebec, that it would seriously cripple the industry in that section of Canada. There is no duty on shingles coming into Canada. I remember that my hon. friend from the city of Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) went down to the city of Fredericton to enlighten the people there. That city happens to be the centre of quite a large lumber manufacturing industry, and he pointed out in all seriousness that as a result of this reciprocity arrangement cedar logs would be sent from New Brunswick into the state of Maine, manufactured into shingles and brought back to New Brunswick, where they would swamp the shingle market. My hon. friend did not know that for many years shingles had been admitted into Canada free of duty, and under this agreement the only concession made, is made by the United States, which is reducing the duty from 50 cents to 30 cents a thousand. Before the duty was raised to 50 cents, the shipment of shingles to the United States was a considerable factor in the prosperity of that section of Canada; and on the file there will be found a letter from the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket), who, I believe, has been going from platform to platform warning the people of that loyal county against agreeing to this arrangement, because it will tend to sap the loyalty of the people of Canada. That letter is addressed to the hon. Mr. Fielding, and in it the hon. member for York says that he has received a communication from a very large lumber manufacturing company which does business in his constituency, and which carries on operations in some three lumber mills, calling attention to the increase which has been made by the United States in the duty on shingles from 30 cents to 50 cents a thousand, and expressing the hope that in any negotiations for the reduction of the tariff between the two countries the Finance Minister will succeed in having the duty reduced.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Expressing whose hope?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hope of the hon. member for York.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Read the letter.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If I had the file here, I would be glad to do it.

Mr. BLAIN. I understood that the hon. member for York, in this House, denied that statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What did the hon. member for York say?

Mr. MEIGHEN. He denied that he was giving expression to his own opinion. He was simply communicating to the Finance Minister a letter from one of his constituents.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have read the letter, and any one reading it would take it as an assurance from the hon. member for York that in forwarding it he was entirely in accord with the sentiments expressed therein. If the hon. member for York thought that the entering into such an arrangement with the United States would tend to sap the loyalty of the people of Canada, it is a wonder that he did not say to the Minister of Finance: 'While I forward this plea on behalf of one of my constituents, yet I warn you, Mr. Fielding, that if you get the duty on shingles removed, so that these lumbermen will be able to send their shingles freely into the United States, it may tend to make them disloyal citizens; it is a very dangerous thing, and you ought to consider it most carefully before you get the United States government to reduce the duty on shingles from 50 cents to 30 cents a thousand.' The hon. member for York did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the hon. minister be good enough to point out where any one on this side of the House has ever objected to the United States reducing the duty on wheat or shingles, or on any other commodity going into that country, or where we have ever raised any objection to their managing their own affairs in their own way?

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It has been stated in this House over and over again that it would be a dangerous thing for us to encourage the United States government to take off the duty on natural products, because it would enable the United States manufacturers to draw from Canada its natural resources and take them into the United States and there manufacture the goods which ought to be manufactured in Canada; forgetting, of course, that the United States could do that to-morrow without any arrangement if it wanted to. All that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs have done by this arrangement has been to sit down quietly with representatives of the United States government and say: Let us talk over what would be to the mutual interest of Canada and the United States to do in the way of reductions of duty. They have made no agreement which binds the people of this country for a single day after this arrangement goes into effect. They declare that this country shall be absolutely free to make any change in its tariff on the items affected by this arrangement at any time; and while they express the hope that it will be found so advantageous to the people of both countries that it will be continued for a considerable time, they both take pains to make it absolutely clear that they do not undertake to bind either the Congress of the United States on the one hand or the parliament of Canada on the other. Now, take the matter of lumber. Shall I say my eloquent friend—my interesting friend? Because when the hon. gentleman gets towards the rear part of the chamber, where there are many empty seats at times, and where he can move back and forth and give full vent to his eloquence, he certainly does become exceedingly eloquent. My hon. friend told the people at Fredericton; lumbermen who knew very well the nonsense he was talking—if he will pardon the word—he told these people that under this reciprocity arrangement our lumber would be taken into the United States, manufactured there, and sent back into Canada to compete here with the lumber manufacturers of New Brunswick. My hon. friend forgot that for many years sawn lumber has been admitted into Canada free of duty.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Before leaving that point I would like to say I was present and heard the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) when dealing with the question of shingles say that their tariff is only reduced back to the old figures whereas shingles coming into Canada are free.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Shingles are not made free under this arrangement. Shingles have been free for years, and we are making no reduction.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That is what we object to. They hold them at 30 cents. Whereas shingles coming into this country are free.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is because we prefer it that way. It has been so for several years, and it has been admitted in the interest of Canada that shingles should be free. I presume it is because the shingle interests in this country do not require any protection as against the United States. At all events I have never heard any suggestion that there should be a duty placed upon shingles, so far as Canada is concerned.

For reasons which have appealed to the government lumber has been free. There have been suggestions made at different times in regard to putting a duty upon it, but these suggestions have been very seriously opposed by consumers in Canada, and more particularly by those who live on the prairies, to whom cheap lumber is a most desirable thing. Lumber is made free under this arrangement, but the whole concession is on the part of the United States, and when you bear in mind the fact that the lumbering industry is a very important interest in the maritime provinces, you will agree with me that this is a very important concession, not only for the maritime provinces, but for all sections of Canada. It is of great importance to the province of Ontario—it is of great importance to the Ottawa valley, and it certainly is of great importance to British Columbia, because manufacturers of lumber in these provinces find a large market in the United States for their products. If hon. gentlemen will look at the blue-book they will find the exports of lumber and its products from Canada to the United States for the year ending March 31, 1910, amounted to $22,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER. What were the imports?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know what the imports were. At the moment I am only dealing with the exports because this arrangement will not affect the imports for the simple reason that lumber comes into Canada free to-day.

An hon. MEMBER. What kind of lumber?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Sawn lumber. And sawn lumber forms a very important part of the lumber exports.

An hon. MEMBER. This treaty makes absolutely no difference in lumber coming into Canada?

Mr. FIELDING. None at all, but it makes a great difference on Canadian lumber going into the United States.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Might I ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if he would allow me to read this letter of Mr. Crocket's:

House of Commons,
Ottawa, March 11, 1910.

Honourable W. S. Fielding, Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Fielding,—I have a communication from the Scott Lumber Company, Ltd., who operate two or three mills in my constituency, requesting me to lay before you, in connection with the recent negotiations between the Canadian and the United States governments upon the tariff matter, the representation that the recent increase in American duty upon shingles has seriously affected the business of Canadian mills, particularly in the maritime provinces. They claim that the rate of 50 cents per thousand is unreasonable and almost prohibitive, and that in the interest of this trade, our government should at least endeavour to have it reduced to the old basis of 30 cents a thousand.

I trust that if the question of revision of the two tariffs is taken up, you will bear this communication in mind.

Yours truly,
OSWALD S. CROCKET.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What does that mean? What the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket) does is this—the hon. Minister of Finance is about to enter into negotiations at Washington. The hon. member for York receives this communication from one of his constituents, calling his attention to the fact that the increase of duty has made importation into the United States prohibitive, and Mr. Crocket expresses the hope that the hon. the Finance Minister will bear this communication in mind during the course of the negotiations. This the hon. Finance Minister did. I have no doubt in the world that the hon. member for York was absolutely sincere when he said that it would be in the interest of the manufacturers of this country that the duty should be reduced, and, as a matter of fact the duty was reduced from 50 cents to 30 cents.

Mr. REID (Grenville). You misrepresented him before.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will not contradict my hon. friend further than to say that his memory does not serve him correctly as to what was said.

Mr. GORDON (Nipissing). Might I ask a question? I would like to ask the hon. minister if in his opinion the following would be true reciprocity? Supposing I, as a manufacturer of shingles at the Canadian Soo send a carload of shingles over to the American Soo, and I am met at the border with a duty of 30 cents per 1000 according to the new arrangement, or a duty of 50 cents per 1000 according to the old arrangement; my competitors from the American Soo wish to send a carload of shingles over to the Canadian Soo and pays no duty —is that true reciprocity?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is nothing in the arrangement which would prevent Canada from making the duty just the same as in the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Why don't you do it?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Because it was never thought to be in the interest of the people of Canada to have a duty on shingles. So far as I know, we have not had a duty on shingles for years and years, if we ever had. So it is with regard to sawn lumber —we have no duty on that article. The United States had a duty of $1,25 a thousand, and they have thrown off that duty entirely; the concession is wholly on the part of the United States, for Canada in that respect makes no concession.

Mr. GOODEVE. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman a question. The United States took off the duty of $1.25 on lumber and made it free, because they have a surplus. But we can supply them with shingles and they put on a duty of 30 cents. Why do they not make shingles free.

Mr. PUGSLEY. All that the shingle manufacturers of British Columbia asked was that the duty be reduced to 30 cents, it having been raised from 30 cents to 50 cents.

Mr. COWAN. I desire to correct the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley); I happen to know that that is not correct. What the shingle mill men want is an exact equality of tariff.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I can only say that I have read the files showing the petitions from the shingle manufacturers' association in British Columbia, and all they asked for is that the duty shall be reduced from 50 cents under the Payne-Aldrich tariff to 30 cents as it was previously, and that concession was obtained by the commissioners on behalf of Canada. The matter of removing the duty on lumber is of great importance to the people of New Brunswick, especially to the people of St. John. We have had in force in the United States for sixty years past what is known as the Pike law. Under that law timber could be cut in the forests of northern Maine by American citizens, floated down the river St. John to the city of St. John, manufactured there in American mills by American citizens and shipped into the United States free of duty. I think I can safely say that that has been of enormous bentfit to the port of St. John. These mills have given employment to many hundreds of men. They have given employment also to many coasting vessels in taking the lumber from the port of St.John to the ports of the United States. Under the Payne-Aldrich tariff that law was repealed and on the fifth of next month that repeal comes into effect.

Therefore, this privilege will be denied to the American citizens who are living in the city of St. John and are manufacturing their lumber there. The result will be that they will have to pay on lumber going into the United States $1.25 a thousand. I am told that, in view of the very large stumpage they have to pay to the land owner in Northern Maine and the large expense in floating the logs down to the port of St. John, this duty of $1,25 will be prohibitive and in all human probability these mills will have to close. If, however, the proposed arrangement comes into effect, lumber manufactured in Canada will go into the United States free of duty and these industries will be continued. So far as that branch of the lumber business is concerned, it is of very great importance to the people of the city of St.John. I think the same remark applies to a lesser extent to the St. Croix river which is also affected by the Pike law.

Now, with regard to this question of loyalty: I cannot understand how the loyalty of our people can in any way be affected by this arrangement except in the effect it will have upon people who will be benefited by the reciprocal arrangement. The lumber manufacturers are going to be benefited. Are they going to become less loyal to the Empire by reason of this? The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Gorden). I believe, ships lumber to the United States. Possibly he will not deny that he ships almost his entire output to that country.

Mr GORDON. I do not.

Mr. PUGSLEY. At any rate that is the destination of a considerable part of his output. Under this reciprocal arrangement he will be able to ship a larger quantity than at present. That is not going to affect his loyalty. I venture to say that if his lumber output were increased tenfold he would be as loyal a citizen of Canada as ever and would fight for the old flag and teach his children to love the empire just as much as he does today. It is not going to affect the loyalty of the people simply because they ship more lumber to the United States.

Mr. BRADBURY. Will that make it cheaper in Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is that the argument that influences my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury)? Does he want to prevent the manufacturer from getting the best market possible in order that he himself may buy what he wants at a cheaper rate?

You will also find on file a letter from the Riordan Paper Co. of which, I believe the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) is vice-president. The general manager of that company urged very strongly that there should be a reciprocal arrangement so far as pulp and paper are concerned. If hon. gentlemen opposite would allow this question to come to a vote instead of, by taking a possibly legitimate course—though I do not think the country will so regard it—preventing a vote being taken, no doubt the hon. member for Argenteuil would vote against the reciprocal arrangement. But if that arrangement comes into effect, I am told it will mean $90,000 a year of a profit to the company of which he is vice-president. That speaks well for his patriotism you will say. Perhaps it does; perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Perley) may feel that the arrangement will go into effect just the same and his company will get the benefit of a reduction of duty, while he will be able still to say that he was patriotic enough to sink personal considerations at the dictates of his conscience and that he voted against the arrangement.

Mr. EDWARDS. That is pretty small.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think so. Here is a great Canadian manufacturing industry the product of which goes largely to the American market. If the result of this arrangement is going to be to add to the profits of that company this very large sum of money, that is an important argument as applying to other like industries.

Mr. EDWARDS. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) gives the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) credit for being unselfish, but before he finishes his sentence he abuses him for it. That is pretty small tactics.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The criticism itself is exceedingly small but that is not to be wondered at considering the source from which it comes. Now, Sir, havng reference to these large industries, having reference to the pulp and paper industries, having reference to the lumber manufacturing industries, while the result of this arrangement would add largely to the profits of those various businesses, I do not anticipate that these profits will all go into the pockets of the manufacturers. I anticipate that as the profits of the business increase, the thousands of men who are engaged in the forests cutting the lumber, who are engaged in the streams bringing the logs down to the mills, who are engaged in the mills working and toiling to convert the raw material into the manufactured product, I presume they will share a portion of the profits which will be derived as a result of this arrangement. I assume that the workingmen as well as the employer of labour will receive benefit from the increased profits which will come to the business, and therefore to that extent thousands of the workingmen of this country will benefit as a result of this arrangement.

Mr. RHODES. When this arrangement comes into effect, how will it affect the consumers of lumber in this country?

Mr. PUGSLEY. So far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned, and I believe the same remark applies to other sections of Canada, there is plenty of lumber for the consumers of Canada, and plenty of lumber to send abroad; and if the lumber is properly taken care of, that will be the case for generations to come.

Mr. RHODES. I was not concerned about the quantity of lumber, I was concerned about the price the consumer will have to pay.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would not object at all if the price of the natural product should be increased. I would not object if the farmer got more for his product, I would not object if the lumber manufacturer got more for his product, provided he shared it with the labouring man who helps to make his profit. For myself, I would not care if I had to pay more for it. I think it will be to the benefit of this country if the wages of the labouring men are increased, and if the labour of the farmer, the fisherman, the miner and the lumberman shall be better recompensed than it is to-day. I do not think that in this country, labour receives, or has received, its fair proportion of benefits from the wonderful development and progress which has taken place in Canada during the last 15 years. As a result of this development we have seen many people grow in wealth from being comfortable to becoming millionaires. And while the wages of the labouring men have increased, I do not think they have increased to the proportion I would like to see them increase. I trust that as a result of this arrangement, and as a result of the increased profits which will come to the farmer, the lumberman and the fisherman, the labouring men who are employed in helping to make those profits will receive their fair share of the increased benefit, as I think they ought to do.

Now, a few words more, and I will not detain the House further. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, when he was in the west, said I want it understood that I am unalterably opposed to this arrangement, and I am opposed to it, I think he said, principally because it will tend to draw Canada away from her allegiance to the British Crown, and draw her gradually into commercial, if not political union with the United States. I think that was about what he said, judging from what I saw in the newspapers. Now, my hon. friend the Prime Minister said, That is all nonsense. I think there should be an adjective put before the word 'nonsense.' It does seem to me difficult to understand how men can put forward such an absurd proposition as that—to say that because the people of this country can be given a wider market, because they can be given greater facilities for trade with the United States, their loyalty will be weakened, that they will be drawn away from the British Empire. I say that does seem to me a proposition too absurd to consider seriously. Why, Sir, if that were so, would Canada not be less loyal to-day than she was 15 years ago? Fifteen years ago what was the trade between Canada and the United States? It certainly was not over $150,000,000 or $200,000,000, at the outside. What is it to-day? According to the trade and navigation returns for the year which closed on the 31st of March last, our trade with the United States amounted to the enormous sum of $404,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER. Mostly imports.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What does that show? It shows that our people are trading with the United States to a vastly larger extent than they were fifteen years ago; I do not care whether the trade is in imports or exports. Our commercial relations with them are becoming more intimate, because a larger number of people are trading with the people of the United States than there were fifteen years ago. Now are we less loyal to-day than we were then? I think not. I think there never was a time in the history of Canada when the people were more loyal to the empire than they are to-day, when the young men of Canada were so ready to sacrifice their blood in defence of the old flag as they are to-day. But an hon. gentleman opposite says that our trade with the United States is mostly imports. Well, it is true. The imports were $285,000,000, and the exports were $119,000,000. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen speak of trade going north and south. Do they bear in mind that this trade which we have to-day with the United States is more than one-half of the whole trade which Canada carries on with the entire world, that more than one-half of our total trade to-day is with the United States? Surely that must be trade going north and south. The hon. gentleman says it is mostly imports. Of course it is. Our imports are double what the exports are. What does that mean? It means that we are bringing north into Canada $285,000,000 worth of goods, and we are sending south into the United States $119,000,000 worth. Is it desirable that that state of affairs should continue? What does it mean? It means that we are paying to the United States the gold which we draw from other countries of the world for exports that we sell to them. Would it not be to the advantage of the Canadian people that we should sell to the United States, at all events, as much as we import from them? I think it would. If we find it in our own interest to import $285,000,000 worth of goods from the United States, goods coming by train and by steamer, surely if we can send goods back in return we accomplish a two-fold object, we make it more profitable for the transportation companies who will have return freights, and, therefore, the rates ought to be reduced so that we shall get our imports to the people at a cheaper rate than at present, and it would accomplish the other purpose, that we would pay by the products of Canada for the goods which we buy from the United States, instead of being obliged to send our gold there which we draw from the other countries of the world.

No one can deny that it would be to the interests of Canada that we should at least send to the United States as much as we import from them, but, as I have said, the larger trade which has grown up during these years has not in any way affected the loyalty of the people of Canada and I am one of those who firmly believe that it will be to the interests of the people of the whole of Canada that we should get larger markets for the products of our farms, our forests, our mines and our fisheries. I know that down in the province of New Brunswick we have fisheries of very great importance, of enormous value; they are handicapped by the duty which the United States have imposed upon them. If that duty were removed it would greatly add to the profits of the fishermen. Hon. gentlemen may say that that will not be to the interest of those who consume fish in Canada. I say it will make but little difference in the price of fish; but even if it does we should be willing when we can get it so easily, to confer this small benefit upon the hardy fishermen of our country, we should remove this handicap from them, and enable them to carry on their business at a greater profit than to-day. They endure great hardships, what little they earn they earn in the hardest possible way and in the face of the great possible dangers, and any thing we can do to encourage the hardy fishermen along our coasts, to make their industry more successful and to produce greater profit to them, we ought to do most cheerfully.

Mr. GOODEVE. Does the hon. minister agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the regulations of the International Fisheries Commission will still continue in effect and that therefore the advantage that the fishermen would derive from this agreement will be destroyed by the regulations?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That has not a thing in the world to do with the matter, so far at least as the maritime provinces are concerned. The International Fisheries Regulations apply only to a very small body of water in the county of Charlotte at the mouth of the River St. Croix. It has no application to the fisheries along the eastern part of Charlotte, or the coast of St. John county or the northern coast of New Brunswick or the long sea coast of Quebec, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. They have no application whatever because they do not affect these waters.

Mr. GOODEVE. The regulations apply there in regard to the bait and they affect British Columbia in the same way.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend I think is wrong. They apply only to fisheries in what are called boundary waters or international waters which are defined in the treaty and the regulations have no application to the larger portion of the seacoast of Canada.

One other remark with regard to the lumbering and fishing interests of the province of British Columbia. The member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) says there is no market for lumber in the United States. A member of one of the largest lumber manufacturing concerns in the province of British Columbia, whose output amounts to about 875,000 superficial feet of lumber per week, enough to load a large vessel——

An hon. MEMBER. Name him.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The firm of Davidson & McRae, of New Westminster. I have been at their mill, which is one of the largest on the continent of America, and I believe they operate several mills giving employment at the woods and at their various mills to a good many thousand people. I have the authority of a member of that firm for the statement that in all probability, if this arrangement goes into effect, they will find a very profitable market in San Francisco and other cities upon the western coast of the United States for their lumber and that it will mean in all human probability an added profit of about $1 per thousand upon the output of their mills.

I was also informed that the removal of the American duty on fish oil will result in a profit to one of the big fishing companies being established upon the Canadian Pacific coast of somewhere in the vicinity of $200,000 a year. These are only samples of industries which are going to be affected by this arrangement. I use the name of these large manufacturers of lumber with their authority. They did not give me the information in confidence but gave me authority to use their name in respect to this arrangement and the advantage that would accrue to the lumbering interests.

Therefore, believing as I do that this arrangement will be greatly to the interest of the producers of Canada, to the great toiling masses of the people who are represented by the farmers, the fishermen, the lumbermen and the miners, I do not see how any one who really has the best interests of this country at heart can oppose this arrangement.

Honourable gentlemen opposite have intimated this afternoon very plainly that they intend to exercise their prerogative as members of this House to prevent this question coming to a vote. They intimated that as plainly as words can intimate any thing. In the British parliament it was found necessary to take a course which was approved of by both the political parties to prevent useless discussion and to prevent a minority from taking such a course as would prevent the transaction of the ordinary business of parliament. That course was taken and had to be taken in the British parliament; that course was taken and had to be taken in the American House of representatives. It has been assumed by those who have had control of this parliament in the past that gentlemen who come here would recognize that it was their duty to have a full and a thorough discussion upon all questions which are brought before parliament. It was believed that would be the case, but it was also believed that when the time necessary for that full and free discussion had passed, gentlemen would allow a vote to be taken and allow the will of the majority to prevail until at all events the people had an opportunity of passing upon their conduct and upon the conduct of the majority. The threats which hon. gentlemen have made this afternoon tend towards almost if not quite revolutionizing the theory which has hitherto prevailed. That theory has been that gentlemen would recognize not only their rights but their duty and that is that the will of the majority shall prevail. That is recognized throughout this country as governing all assemblies, all meetings in which people are concerned, and at any meeting attended by the people of this country, whenever there has been fair and reasonable opportunity for the discussion of any question, the minority have always recognized that the view of the majority shall prevail so far at all events as that body is concerned; and so in this parliament I ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether, after hon. gentlemen have had a full opportunity, as they have had during the time that this question has been under discussion, of expressing their views, it is not tending to destroy free parliamentary institutions for hon. gentlemen to rise as they have risen to-day and threaten that this question shall not be allowed to come to a vote until the people have passed upon it.

An hon. MEMBER. What about 1896?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I don't care what took place in 1896; I was not here in 1896. I say it is not in harmony with the principles which ought to govern parliamentary institutions that gentlemen should rise in their places and threaten, simply because their views are not the views of the majority, that there shall be no opportunity to vote upon this question, and no opportunity, in a constitutional way, of giving expressions to the views of the majority of the members of this House. That is revolutionary; it is not in harmony with the principles of constitutional government. And if as a result of the obstruction of these gentlemen; if, as a result of their threats, there shall be no opportunity of having the votes of the members of this House recorded; if it shall be necessary to consult the people before the time they ordinarily would be consulted, I venture to say that the people of this Dominion will express their opinion favourable to the government, not only with reference to this great question, which is before parliament and the people of the country, but also with reference to the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite, who although in a minority are seeking by abuse of the constitutional rules of this House to prevent the view of the majority from prevailing.

Mr. COWAN. I trust that the well-known sensitiveness of the Minister of Public Works will not be shocked if I first pay my respects to a man of less ability but of more pretentions, the Minister of Finance. This afternoon the Minister of Finance gave us an honourable instance of his veracity. Never since 1886-1887 when he declared that the welfare of Nova Scotia demanded that she should secede from confederation have we had such an honourable instance of his veracity. The Minister of Finance ventured to stand in his place on the floor of the House to-day and to declare that from the lips of opposition members of this House and from the Conservative press of Canada he had found evidence that they were afraid to go to the people. I want to tell any man in this House who has the like hardihood to distort the facts, that he cannot take the liberty that the Minister of Finance took this afternoon of spawning the brood of his diseased imagination on the floor of this House without castigation and without exposure. My conception of my duty when I became a member of this House was, that I should have a mathematical reverence for facts, and that if I was unable to draw the right inference from these facts then it was the privilege of the party opposing me to point out the defects. But I have yet to learn that it is embodied in any code of public or private morals that any man can dare to stand in the eye of the public and distort the things which are, attempt to misstate that which is a fact, and by that misstatement draw inferences which would bolster up his case. I trust that the Minister of Finance, at any rate not in my hearing again, will never again venture to do such a thing.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member is attributing to any member of this House an attempt to distort facts when addressing the House, he is not in order. I have understood the hon. member (Mr. Cowan) to convey that impression.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not charged the Minister of Finance with any such attempt. I say that he has given this afternoon another honourable instance of his veracity. Again, when he told the House to-day that he proposed to throttle and gag the will of the people and to go to the country without redistribution, he declared an intention to perpetrate the blackest injustice on western Canada that any public man ever attempted. For my own part I represent a constituency whose population is two per cent. of the whole of Canada. If my constituency were taken as the basis of representation of the House instead of 221 indifferent looking members here there would be less than fifty. I represent as many people as five ordinary members like the Minister of Public Works. Will the Minister of Finance dare to tell the people of my constituency that they should have only one voice in the councils of the country instead of the four or five they are entitled to, and on a question that reverses the policy which Canada has followed with success for the last forty-five years? Will the Minister of Finance dare to come into my constituency and tell the people that he will deprive them of their franchise and of their full voice on a question which concerns not only their future prosperity, but the destiny of Canada per se and of Canada as a part of the British Empire? If that Minister of Finance dares to come into my constituency I undertake that I will compel his candidate to lose his deposit. I am in one respect delighted to find that my appeal to the House two evenings ago has been effective.

It may be that the gentleman to whom I appealed for assistance added their efforts to mine and convinced this government that in these dog days this is no proper place for them, that their proper place is before the people of this country giving an account of their stewardship, giving some reason for the faith that is in them that this reciprocity thing is going to advantage any part of the people of Canada. It may be, I say, thay my appeal to the younger members of the government has been effective. It may be that, without an appeal to the Minister of Public Works, he has added his influence to that of the other younger members of the cabinet to induce the government to do its duty. I did not appeal the other evening to the Minister of Public Works. I recognized that the appeal to him would need to be of a different kind from the appeal which I made to the other ministers. The other evening, when I made that appeal, we were discussing the patented device by which the Liberals of Vancouver diverted from the coffers of the Dominion treasury into their own pockets no less than a million dollars. I was not sure at that time that that diversion would awaken in the breast of the Minister of Public Works that horror which I felt it might awaken in the breasts of the other members of the government. That sum is so far beyond $135,000 that I was not sure but that instead of horror at a moral outrage, it might be chagrin and envy that I would awaken in his breast.

But before I refer more particularly to the speech of the Minister of Public Works, I wish to refer to that interesting effort on the part of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) to uncover the moss-grown tombs of 1854. With Rip Van Winkle wisdom he went back to 1854 as if the conditions of to-day were the conditions of that time, and he is going still. He has evidently forgotten that this is 1911 instead of 1854. To do more than make that short reference would be, I think, a mistake. Apart altogether from the waste of ammunition, there is but little sport in shooting at a dead goose.

I come now to the benign, the complacent Minister of Public Works. The Minister of Public Works, feeling the sting that resulted from my short trip through New Brunswick, has come into the House and attempted to distort my statements made on the public platforms of that province.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the expression 'attempted to distort' is not parlimentary.

Mr. COWAN. I agree, Mr. Speaker, that it does not correctly describe the minister's attempt. In New Brunswick I was endeavouring to point out the effect of this reciprocity pact. You know that they call it a pact. They say it is not a treaty, it is not a convention; the most they will allow us to call it is a pact, and I sometimes think that is an appropriate name. It is packed full of all sorts of misfortunes and evil for Canada. In New Brunswick I was pointing out to the people of New Brunswick that men like the Minister of Public Works and men like the artist in truth who spoke this afternoon, are declaring to the people of Canada that in the main essentials this is a renewal of the old treaty of 1854, with the accent on the old; and, Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of truth in their statement. That old treaty, like this new treaty, does this. They both place natural products on the free list; but while they do that, they leave the tariff on goods not covered by the treaty twice as high, or almost twice as high, when entering the United States as when entering Canada. For example, under the old treaty of 1854 the average American tariff was 24 per cent, while the average Canadian tariff was 10¼.

Again at the present time the average American tariff is 46 per cent, while the average Canadian tariff is 24 per cent. I would point out to the good people of New Brunswick, as I venture to point out to this House, that as long as that inequality obtains between the tariff of the United States, and the tariff of Canada, so long will the effect of that treaty be to transfer the manufacturing business and the carrying trade of Canada from Canada to the United States. I pointed out in New Brunswick, and I wish to point out here, that our experience under the old treaty was that while the natural products of Canada flooded into the United States, the manufactured products of Canada were walled out of the United States by a high prohibitive tariff, but at the same time the American manufactured goods were flooding into Canada over the Canadian tariff walls like a gushing torrent from the mountainside.

I think I can almost repeat the idea I expressed there. I pointed out that it was no time for Canada to enter into a treaty of this kind with the United States, and that the time would not come for Canada to enter into such a treaty until the United States brought their tariff to a level with the tariff of Canada on all products. I mentioned the case of shingles; and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not oblivious to the fact that shingles have been admitted free into Canada since the session of 1898. At the tail end of that session, when many of the members had gone home, and when interest in legislation had dwindled, a provision was sneaked through this House that American shingles should enter Canada free. Ever since that I know very well that American shingles have been coming into Canada free, while Canadian shingles have been going into the United States by jumping a tariff wall, of 30 cents a 1000 at first and later of 50 cents per 1000.

If I might be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to disturb the peaceful slumbers of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, I would point out to him that if he could spare a few wakeful moments to the consideration of this question, he would find that the article in the 'Daily Times' of Victoria, under date July 12, is a little off colour in regard to the facts. In that article he says: 'It is our duty to point out that it is not a part of the proposal under the reciprocity agreement to allow American made shingles to enter Canada free.' The profundity of that article, and the wisdom displayed in it is well nigh beyond comprehension, especially in view of the fact that at page 20 of the official document setting forth the terms of this agreement between Canada and the United States, item number 502, it appears that shingles are to enter Canada free. The Minister of Inland Revenue is out in his statement merely by the omission of the word 'not' in this editorial or leader in the paper owned and edited by him. So that the hon. minister is a little wrong when he says that American shingles are not to be admitted into Canada free. Because, as a matter of fact, American shingles are to be admitted into Canada free. When he examines item 502 of the official document, I imagine that, like the good honest man he poses to be, he will see he has made a mistake, and that this is a discrimination against British Columbia, and that he will come over to our side and oppose this agreement. I knew that shingles have been free since the fall of 1898. I know at the same time that the effect of this agreement on the shingle manufacturers in British Columbia would be to compel them to locate upon the south instead of the north side of the boundary line. Because the reason with which I am endowed told me that the shingle manufacturer would not, for the privilege of paying 30 cents a thousand on his output, locate on the north side of the line when by locating on the south side of the line he could avoid payment of that 30 cents on going into the American market, and still have access to the Canadian market without paying a cent.

Mr. PUGSLEY May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. COWAN. I should be delighted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What hinders them from doing that now?—the Canadian market is free.

Mr. COWAN. They do it now, and have been doing it ever since this government came into power.

Mr. COWAN.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not in New Brunswick.

Mr. COWAN. Now, Mr. Speaker. I will get this convert. This Minister of Public Works has been converted before, and he shall be converted again. I believe I can give shape and form, and even beauty, to his intelligence. I want to tell that Minister of Public Works that, until 1898, the shingle mills of the west which are the shingle mills of the continent of America, were located on the Canadian side of the line. But in 1896—a black letter day for Canada—this government came into power. And because, forsooth it wanted to cater to a certain vote in Canada, it denied us in British Columbia that consideration which led us to come into the confederation, the right to reasonable protection for our staple product and free entry into the other provinces as against the country to the south. They placed shingles on the free list, and ever since that time the American shingles have been flooding the market of the prairie provinces, the legitimate market of the province of British Columbia.

Now, perhaps, the Minister of Public Works would like to ask me somthing else. I cannot help thinking—it is amongst the possibilities that the minister is actually seeking for information and that he is willing to be convinced. If so, I pause in order to give him an opportunity of asking another question. It may be that the answer I shall be able to give to his question will let into his mind a light which shall ultimately illumine the whole government and persuade them to do what is best in the interests of Canada, namely, drop this thing which is intended on the American side of the line as a scheme to encourage the transfer of the Canadian manufacturing and transportation business to the United States. Will the minister come again? I tell him the shingle mills that ought to belong to Canada have been induced by the policy of this government to locate on the American side of the line. And I tell him that this policy of reciprocity will have this effect on the one item that he has chosen as that which demonstrates that it will be in the interests of Canada to adopt this treaty. On this one item alone, I can demonstrate with mathematical accuracy that the tendency can only be what I said—to deny the workingmen of Canada any chance in the timber wealth of Canada except the rough poorly-paid work of felling the trees on the mountain side and booming them into the water or hauling them to the freight sheds for transportation to the United States to evade the payment of 30 cents a thousand on these logs for manufacturing into shingles. Have I reached the inside operations of the minister's intellectual battery. Will he go back to New Brunswick and tell the people there that my reasoning before them is unanswerable? If he will not, let him dare to tell me now what he will say. Let him dare to tell me I am wrong. He knows that I am right. He ventured, with less regard for my reasoning powers than I think he ought to display, to tell this House that the removal of $1.25 per thousand on lumber was a boon and blessing to the lumbermen of the west. If the minister can point out to me where a British Columbia lumbermen can sell one car of rough lumber in the United States at a price above the cost of production, I will crown him with a laurel of success. Does the minister know anything about conditions in the west? Does he know that the timber possibilities of the Canadian west are 3,000,000,000, while the timber possibilities of the United States Pacific west are 14,000,000,000 feet? Does he know that the Americans have an abundance, a surfeit, of rough lumber with which they have been glutting the Canadian market at slaughter prices for years, and with which they will continue to glut our market if the conditions are not changed.

If the minister will give me the name of one lumberman in the province of British Columbia who will say that he is prepared to sacrifice the interests of Canada for the possibility of profits to the lumber industry by this pact, then I will undertake to say that the minister's ambition to climb up higher in the councils of his party will be gratified. He has chosen one man well known to me, well known to every man from British Columbia, a man whose motives I could analyse this moment if it were in the interests of Canada that I should take up the time of this House in doing so. He cannot select another man from British Columbia to back him up. He ventured to tell us that the petition of the lumbermen showed that they were in favour of this reciprocity treaty. I have in my hand the petition of the lumbermen of British Columbia, presented to the government of Canada, the only petition that the Minister of Public Works has had the opportunity of perusing, and unless he was seeing double, unless his vision was distorted, he perused that document, as I am about to peruse it now.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I stated was that the petition of the Shingle Manufacturers' Association of British Columbia urged very strongly that we should endeavour to secure a remission of the duty on shingles from 50 cents per thousand to 30 cents. That is all they asked, and that is what I stated.

Mr. COWAN. Do I understand that the Minister of Public Works abandons his contention with regard to the lumbermen of British Columbia? He was speaking about the lumbermen of British Columbia, and he dare not in face of that record made by 'Hansard,' deny my statement, he was speaking of the lumbermen of British Columbia. I propose to read the petition to him, and to the other members of the government, to show their opinion in regard to the tariff. That petition, or resolution, reads as follows:

Whereas the coast and mountain lumber manufacturers have repeatedly brought to the attention of the Dominion government, as well as the public generally, the necessity for protection on rough lumber, with the exception of hardwoods; and

Whereas the representations of the lumbermen have had the endorsation on many occasions of every board of trade in British Columbia, and of the Canadian Manufacturer's Association; and

Whereas it is a matter of common knowledge, which the government can readily verify, that American lumber manufacturers use Canada as a convenient dumping ground for their surplus low-grade products, which at the present time is being sold in Canada from Washington, Idaho and Montana mills for less than the logs cost British Columbia manufactuers;

Whereas the American market is practically closed to Canadian lumber by reason of the protective tariff maintained by the United States government; and

Whereas the American market is known to be glutted with low-grade lumber, and is likely to be more so in the future, owing to the closer logging of timber limits; and

Whereas the lumber industry is the only industry of any magnitude in Canada not afforded some measure of protection; and

Whereas the lumber industry is the chief industry of British Columbia and its profitable operation in this province is practically made impossible through lack of protection on low-grade lumber;

It is therefore resolved that, in the judgment of the associated boards of trade of eastern British Columbia, the Dominion government is not only amply justified in placing a duty of $2 per thousand feet on rough lumber, with the exception of hardwoods, but in all fairness should do so forthwith.

Mr. FIELDING. What date?

Mr. COWAN. This was at a meeting held at Creston, British Columbia, on Thursday and Friday, January 18 and 19, 1911.

Mr. FIELDING. It does not refer to reciprocity at all.

Mr. COWAN. Of course, reciprocity was introduced on the 26th day of January, 1911.

Mr. FIELDING. The document the hon. gentleman has read deals with the general question of protection on lumber, and does not deal with the reciprocity agreement. One of its complaints is that the Americans maintain a high duty on lumber. That condition has been somewhat changed by the reciprocity agreement. Therefore, his resolution, while it has a bearing on the general question of protection on lumber, has no bearing whatever on the question of reciprocity.

Mr. COWAN. It may be there is some merit in the contention of the Minister of Finance. Let me put it with a little more clearness than he put it. He says that this resolution was passed while he and the other father in Israel were closeted with President Taft in a room in Washington, and before he had announced the birth of his new born babe. His contention is that I have no proof that the view of the lumbermen remains the same.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not say anything about that, I said the resolution the hon. gentleman read was passed before the reciprocity arrangement, and had no relation to it.

Mr. COWAN. He says I have not correctly stated his meaning. I regret very much if I have not, but I fear that his explanation is confusion worse confounded. If he does not mean that that resolution expresses the real feeling of the lumber men of the west in regard to reciprocity and the duties of the government in regard to the industry of lumber what does he mean?

Mr FIELDING. I say he read that resolution as having some bearing on the question of reciprocity now before the House. I say the resolution was passed, according to his own reading of it, before the reciprocity agreement was adopted and it complains in the terms of the resolution that the Americans have maintained a high duty on lumber. I say that condition has been to some extent changed by the reciprocity agreement. If the hon. member were discussing the general question of protection on lumber then outside of this question of reciprocity the resolution would be pertinent to such a discussion, but I say it is not the policy of this government to put higher duties on lumber and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), speaking for his party, has never said it was the policy of the opposition, and if my hon. friend wishes to convey that the policy of his friend was to meet the wishes of the British Columbia lumbermen and put a higher duty on lumber, I say we have no evidence whatever that that is the policy of the opposition, and if any hon. member of the opposition from the prairie provinces is present he will not agree with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. COWAN. I am prepared to discuss this either in the light or in the darkness of this reciprocity proposal. I want to remind you that in 1894 the Americans put upon their statute books a statutory offer to remove the American duty on rough lumber if Canada would remove the Canadian duty on rough lumber. In the following year Canada, believing in the good faith of that offer removed the Canadian duty on rough lumber. But the Americans forgot the pledge contained in their statutory offer and did not and have not to this day removed the American duty on lumber. In 1896 a new government came into power in Canada but they did not, as we, on this side of the House had a right to expect, seek to protect the interests of Canada as they should have done by reimposing that Canadian duty on lumber when the Americans made default in their statutory promises. As a result the American lumber came flooding into Canada and the Canadian lumber was barred out of the United States by a prohibitive tariff which they had promised to remove. The Minister of Finance says that under these conditions this resolution that I have read was passed. It was passed, however, under these circumstances, that the people of the West, as well of the people of the East, knew that the Minister of Finance was chasing after the powers that be at Washington and attenpting to get a reciprocity treaty. But, nevertheless, there may be some virtue in the statement that this resolution which I have read was passed prior to his announcement of the reciprocity proposal.

However, I am fortunate in having under my hand the view of the lumbermen of British Columbia since these reciprocity proposals have been made to the people of Canada. It is the view of the lumbermen of British Columbia voiced by Mr. J. E. H. Barnet, a lumberman who has made a success of his undertakings in Ottawa as in the West, made on behalf of the lumbermen of British Columbia on July 15, and I would ask the attention of the Minister of Finance to this statement in the hope that even in this eleventh hour.

Mr. FIELDING. Later, 11.25.

Mr. COWAN. Even at this hour of 11.25 he may be induced to return from his love and his desire to hand over the fiscal independence and the tariff autonomy of Canada to the people of the United States. Mr. Barnet's statement reads as follows:

'The red, white and blue, with its present number of stars, is sufficient for me, and I am not at all anxious to add another star to our neighbour's flag with my vote,' is the opinion on reciprocity forcefully expressed by Mr. J. E. H. Barnett, who arrived here yesterday from Renfrew, when seen at the Hotel Vancouver.

Though Mr. Barnet's timber interests in this and other provinces are figured in the millions, and since timber men on this side of the boundary line are commonly credited with standing to reap considerable benefit from any prospective reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States, Mr. Barnet is too loyal to the flag of his own country to permit himself to be swayed by sordid selfishness when the prosperity of the entire Dominion is at stake.

To my way of looking at it, this question of reciprocity lightly or altogether in the nature of a commercial agreement, for if such were the case I would soon be found on the side of those advocating it, but a step that is likely to create a chilled feeling between Canada and the mother country. Frankly, I believe the whole scheme is just in keeping with the almost imperial commercial policy of the United States. This reciprocity treaty is simply a bait held out to us in the hope that we will be beguiled into such a trap, under the guise of keeping dangling before our eyes an entry for our products into a market estimated at 90,000,000 inhabitants. But let the too-confident Canadian beware of the wily sons of Uncle Sam, who do not care a rap for our prosperity, but for their own. They are not so philanthropically inclined as to throw their doors wide open to us. What they will take from us is just a drop in a bucket compared to what they expect to ship into our markets. It is an absolute fact that American factories have been increased to such an extent for the past five years that if they want to continue to run at full blast they must find an additional market for their surplus products, as they put out nearly one-third more than the market of their own country can handle.'

In other words, unlike the Minister of Finance, the patriotism of the British Columbian is not measured by the price of a sack of potatoes on the Boston market, or the price of a car of lumber at the Chicago market.

The lumbermen of British Columbia are too intelligent to be fooled by a device of that kind. They realize that while $1.25 per thousand is taken off the lumber duty by the United States the effect of this treaty will be to increase the cost of living for the workingmen of Canada. If you increase the cost of living you diminish the return to labour and you diminish the purchasing power of wages. There are advocates of this reciprocity who maintain that the farmer of Alberta and Saskatchewan will get more for his wheat and cattle, but I remind hon. gentlemen that 80 per cent of the animal and agricultural products of the country are consumed in Canada, and if you increase the price of the 20 per cent sent out of the country you increase the price of the 80 per cent consumed within, and you necessarily increase the cost of living in this country. You lessen the purchasing power of wages and salary and capital; you interfere with that almost perfect equilibrium we have established in Canada between the three great industrial elements, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, by the national policy adopted in 1878 and in force ever since. That policy has brought about a condition of general prosperity in Canada in which the farmer, and the workingman, and every citizen of the country has had full and fair share. To disturb that equilibrium is to disturb the prosperity of Canada. Under the reciprocity treaty of 1854, the effect was that the railways and steamboats were busy carrying American manufactured goods into Canada, and return cargoes to the United States of Canadian natural products, not to be consumed in the United States but to be carried by American railways to American ports and thence shipped to the markets of the world. The government of the old provinces of Canada realized that that treaty was destroying the manufacturing industry of this country and handing over the carrying trade to the United States, and in 1860 they imposed a tariff on leather goods, wearing apparel, cotton and woollen goods such as we could manufacture in Canada and with the revenue from that tariff they began to develop railway and canal systems so as to retain the carrying trade which had been diverted by the treaty of 1854. So soon as the American authorities saw that Canada was adopting that policy, there arose a cry that this was an injustice to the industries and trade of the United States, just as if this treaty is adopted it will arise again if we attempt to change our tariff on any of the articles not covered by the treaty. That cry became so persistent that in 1866 the United States abrogated that reciprocity treaty. And they abrogated that treaty in the hope and belief that it would either drive Canada into the American Union or into bankruptcy. It did neither, but it did develop a crop of secessionists like the Minister of Finance, and a crop of commercial unionists like the whole party that constituted the Liberal opposition of Canada in 1891: a crop of unrestricted reciprocity advocates, a small, demoralized crop at the present day, who form the rump and remnant of the growth of 1866.

But, notwithstanding this crop, Canada had men equal to the situation; men who developed a policy of Canada for Canadians, Canadian development for Canadian labour and Canadian capital, a policy inaugurated in 1878 and in force at the present day. Now it is proposed to reverse that policy, which has developed the home market of Canada, a market able to take care of 80 per cent of the production of Canada. And how great is that production? The yearly production of Canada is greater per head of population than the yearly production of any other country of the known world, and the price which is received for Canada's annual production, in her home market at the door of the producer, is such that it makes the average Canadian a richer man than the citizen of any other nation of Canada's population in the known world. But, Sir, this policy would reverse that. This policy would revert to the old quagmire of 1854. It would ask us to return to that which in 1854 was a necessity, but which in 1911 would be a curse. How foolish, how fatal to the future of Canada is this blind indifference to the fact that this is 1911 and not 1854. When I heard the Minister of Finance in January last expound the policy of Canada in 1854, I was reminded of my student days, when I studied with peculiar interest the works of Washington Irving, and wondered if our Minister of Finance in Canada to-day was but the reincarnation of Rip Van Winkle. Had he forgotten that fifty-seven years have expired since 1854, that conditions have changed, that Canada has forged ahead to the very forefront of the commercial nations of the world, that Canada no longer is on the verge of bankruptcy, that her exchequers are no longer crippled, that her people are no longer scattered communities spread in sparse settlements from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I wondered if the Minister of Finance had been asleep for the last 57 years. I wondered if, with the prophetic eye of a seer, Washington Irving had predicted the life and work and experience of a Minister of Finance of Canada. And, again, when I remembered that this is a scheme for transferring the tariff jurisdiction of Canada from Canada to the United States, as the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) declared to-day, I bethought myself that this may be true. I remembered that the effect of this treaty was to destroy that which the Premier of Canada, with charming lip-loyalty, has declared to be a cardinal principle with him, British preference. I remembered that the mother land sent to us last year $3,500,000 worth of metals of different kinds, and that the effect of this treaty would be to wipe out and destroy for ever that British preference. I remembered that the mother land last year sent to us $2,000,000 worth of automobiles, clocks, watches and such goods, and that the effect of this treaty, if ratified, would be to reduce that British preference by at least one-half. But, Mr. Speaker, I remembered that the effect of this treaty would be to establish a new precedent in the history of the British Empire. For the first time one of the members of that empire is bargaining with a foreign country to exclude the rest of the British Empire from the preference which by that bargain this country is getting in that foreign country; in other words, by a bargain with a foreign country, we are agreeing with that country to discriminate and differentiate, not only against the mother land, but against the other parts of the British Empire.

In 1892, James G. Blaine, who was at that time a great power in the United States, made a proposal of that kind to the Canadian government. The government of that day was a Conservative government, and they rejected that proposal with scorn, on the ground that it involved a differentiation and a discrimination against the mother land. When I remembered that I was unable to understand why the Prime Minister of Canada should allow these things in favour of a foreign power and discriminate against the mother land. But, Sir, the explanation of the attitude of this government and of this premier is to be found in the declaration of the premier in London, in the month of June, when he said in effect, that we, base Canadians, were mere fair weather members of the British Empire, willing to accept the protection and the benefits that pertained to a member of the British Empire, but unwilling not only to share in the common interest and defence of the empire, but even to take counsel with the other members of the British Empire in regard to that common interest and that common defence.

Mr. LOGGIE. I have not yet said anything on this important question before the House so far, so perhaps I may express my views. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, but I failed to take in any real argument made by him against this proposed trade arangement with the United States. The argument used by hon. gentlemen opposite against this arrangement is that we have opened up markets with the United Kingdom, and that to divert our trade from the United Kingdom to the United States would not be in the interests of Canada. I would like to remind hon. gentlemen that if they look at the schedules they will find that there are a great many commodities exported by Canada which have no world market value, We have no market value, for instance, for many species of our fish in the United Kingdom, and we must look to the United States as our market for these species. I might also tell hon. gentlemen that if it be true that we have no market value for certain commodities, we must force these commodities on the markets of the United States, and inasmuch as the United States are willing to rebate the duty it will inure to the benefit of the producer in this country of certain commodities. From the northern portion of New Brunswick, for example, there are about 300 carloads of frozen smelts exported to the United States during the course of a year. The duty on these 300 carloads is approximately $50,000, which is paid into the United States treasury. Under the new arrangement that $50,000 will inure to the benefit of the Canadian fishermen.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I thought the consumer paid the duty.

Mr. LOGGIE. On general principles that doctrine is good, but it does not apply in this instance. I can give you concrete examples of cases where the consumer would get the benefit of the reduction of duty. I am now giving you an instance of where the Canadian fishermen will get the benefit of the duty remitted by the United States because the species of fishes I allude to are those which have no world market value. Therefore you force them on the market of the United States. They are sold on commission, and the returns are made less the charges. If no duty is collected so much more money comes back to the pockets of the fisherman.

Mr. MIDLEBRO. Are they not saying on the other side that if they pass reciprocity they will get their fish just so much cheaper?

Mr. LOGGIE. I am not particularly concerned with what they are saying on the other side. I think as the Minister of Finance says, they are making the best show of it.

I can demonstrate what I am saying in regard to species of fish which have no world market value. I do not mean, of course, that all the fish we export has no world market value, for I know different. Let me explain what I mean. There is no duty at the present time on lobsters either in the shell or in cans, but if there was a duty on canned lobster it would inure to the benefit of the United States consummer. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian fisherman and the Canadian lumberman will receive a large proportion of the duty remitted by the United States.

The hon. gentleman made a reference to the duty on shingles going from British Columbia into the United States, and stated that there was no duty on shingles coming from the United States into Canada. He went on to say he did not think that was reciprocity. I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that shingles are not the only item in the schedules covered in that way. Take for instance, cement, which is just the very reverse of shingles so far as the duty is concerned. While there may not be real reciprocity in shingles, the same thing applies to cement in the opposite direction. This disposes of the argument of my hon. friend. As the hon. the Finance Minister explained, there are a few commodities which neither country was prepared to put at the same rates of duty, but they are very few, as the schedules will show.

That seems to me the argument they are using in their press; and yet two hon. gentlemen opposite have stated on the floor of the House that there was no fault to find with the United States remitting their duties. If that be true, what is there in this arrangement? Is there anything more in it than Canada remitting a portion of the duties that are collected today?

Then, they tell us we have no mandate to reduce the rates of duty. But we are reducing duties by $2,500,000, and that money will go into the pockets of the people. We are lessening the cost of living to that extent. We certainly have a mandate to reduce the cost of living and to cut down duties on the necessaries of life as much as possible. It was my great pleasure to be in this city in 1893 at the convention of the Liberal party, and I can distinctly remember the plank in the platform asking for a tariff for revenue only, and also the plank in favour of reciprocal trade relations with the United States in natural products and in a certain well defind list of manufactured articles. What is this trade arrangement but a fulfilment of the promise made in 1893? We went to the country in 1896 and the country put us in power. We tried to put that policy into execution and whose fault was it that at first we did not succeed?

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma). Did you do it?

Mr. LOGGIE. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman asking me the question. He knows very well that as soon as the Liberal party came into power they framed the tariff known as the British preference and they also sent a commissioner to Washington in the endeavour to carry out their promise. And when our overtures were not received by the United States, our Premier, with the dignity that be fits his position, said that overtures in the future must come from the United States. And when, in a critical condition of the trade of this country some 12 months ago, when the United States threatened to put on a surtax on our exports going to that country did we not do our duty? I fail to understand the letter which has been referred to, written by Mr. Crocket. The duty on shingles is 50 cents a thousand, and with the surtax it would have been 75 cents a thousand. It is a thing to be dreaded. The proposed policy of the United States meant that whereas. on the fish we are sending to them they collected duties amounting to $500,000, under the surtax they would have collected another $250,000, out of the pockets of the people of this country for the effect of the surtax would have been to increase the duty 50 per cent. So, I say, it was in the interest of the country that some arrangement should be arrived at. And it was arrived at with very little sacrifice on the part of Canada. The principal article on which we made a reduction was cotton seed oil, and I do not think that reduction would hurt any manufacturer in Canada. So, I say, we have carried out the platform of the Liberal party adopted in 1903, and on which we came into power. In 1896 when this government came into power, the government was collecting from the consuming public about $19 for every hundred dollars' worth of goods that went through the Customs House.

Last year we collected about $16 on every hundred dollars' worth, which is a reduction of about 15 per cent. And if this arrangement goes through, it will mean a further reduction of about three per cent—that is, we collect about $70,000,000 through the Customs House and under this arrangement this would be reduced by about $2,500,000, which is about three per cent. Yet these hon. gentlemen have the audacity to tell us that we have no mandate, though we are carrying out the platform on which we returned to power and which we have repeated at every election. I admit that the question of reciprocal trade relations was not a live issue during the last three elections. But it was for the very reason I have already explained—that the Prime Minister had said that overtures in the future must come from the United States. But when those overtures were made we were called upon to act in accordance with the principles laid down by the Liberal party. Nor was this principle confined to the Liberal party, for, in 1894 a law was placed on the statute book making an open offer to the United States of reciprocal trade relations, in fish and certain other natural products. And yet, these hon. gentlemen tell us, forsooth, we have no mandate for reciprocity. It is greatly to the benefit of Canada to have many of these duties removed, because in the articles affected we find a market only in the United States. This is true of a certain species of our fish—we have no market except the home market and that in the United States. We have practically no market for shingles except in the United States, and the same is true of laths. Inasmuch as we must market these articles there, duty or no duty we say it is a benefit to our people to have free access to this market of 92,000,000 of people. It will be a boon to us when this trade arrangement is finally put into effect.

For the opposite side, I would say that it would be a great calamity to Canada at large and a great calamity to the maritime provinces. Another argument alleged by hon. gentlemen on the other side is that this trade arrangement would interfere with capital invested in our great transportation companies; it is alleged that the commodity of wheat will go north and south instead of east and west. Now, I would like hon. gentlemen to be reasonable in their criticisms. Does it not go north or south to-day? Is it not a fact that a man can buy a hundred carloads of wheat in Winnipeg to-day and take them down to Minneapolis, and have it ground, and exported to any foreign market, and have ninety-nine per cent of the duty he paid refunded? Is it not a fact that the same hundred carloads of wheat can go through in bond for export without any handicap whatever? So what difference will it make?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. What is the good of reciprocity if it does not go south?

Mr. LOGGIE. One of the good things I see in it is that the people of Canada will be two and a half million dollars richer as far as consumers are concerned.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Why?

Mr. LOGGIE. Because the duties are reduced to that extent, and it will decrease the cost of living to that extent.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Then you mean that the wheat will go to the United States?

Mr. LOGGIE. The hon. gentleman will see by the schedule that there are several hundred thousand dollars duties collected on pickled beef, pickled pork, lard and so on, they are reduced by three-quarters of a cent per pound, and it means that the consuming public will get the benefit of that. Then the producing public will get the benefit in a large share of the duty that is to be remitted by the United States. I do not mean to say that all commodities will be as cheap under this trade arrangement as they are to-day. For instance, on the native fish which I was referring to, the duty, when remitted, will inure to the benefit of the Canadian producer. If the Canadian consumers consume the native fish, they will pay more for their native fish. But there is another side to that story. There is quite a large amount of fish consumed which Canada cannot produce, and we are getting it free from the United States under this trade arrangement. For example, there are about 1,000 gallons of shell oysters coming into Canada every day of the year; the consuming public will get these oysters for the duty less. Canada is not in the same position as the United States regarding these commodities. We are a population of about eight millions and they have a population of ninety-two millions, and they have no surplus commodities such as natural products named that they force on the Canadian market. Canada produces a number of commodities that she must force on the Unitel States market, and these commodities that we force on the United States market the remitted duty will inure to the benefit of the Canadian producer, the fishermen, or the lumbermen, or whoever he may be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say one word about this loyalty cry. It does seem to me childish to say that because I can send a carload of smelts into the United States and market them there without paying duty into the United States treasury, and that I can get that much more money and pay that much more to the fishermen, I will be less loyal than if the United States taxed me. I cannot see any reason for such a contention. It is nonsense to say that because the United States is willing to receive commodities from Canada that Canada will send there, duty or no duty, we must be less loyal to the old land from which we came. So far as I am concerned, I cannot conceive where there is any basis for the argument that we will be less loyal with reciprocal trade relations as now proposed than we were before. If there is any argument I have not heard it, except the argument that we can make by holding up the flag and expressing sentiments of loyalty. But after all, if we are logical we will give some reason why this arrangement will make us less loyal than we are to-day. So far as I am concerned, my loyalty is just as good as that of hon. gentlemen opposite. Of course, I have no objection to their talk, they have their own opinion, and that is all I have. I do not think they believe what they say. I am afraid that they do not really believe the story they are telling the people as to the possibilities of annexation, I am pretty sure they do not mean it. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat said that the tariff prevents our manufacturers placing their products on the United States market. I would like to know what that has to do with reciprocity in natural products. This trade arrangement does not interfere with manufactured goods to any great extent. Agricultural implements, it is true, are affected, some of them are reduced by Canada two and a half per cent and others five per cent; but with those exceptions, practically speaking, manufactured articles are not touched at all.

Mr. STANFIELD. What about condensed milk?

Mr. LOGGIE. I do not know whether condensed milk is touched at all.

Mr. STANFIELD. It is reduced only fifty per cent.

Mr. LOGGIE. I do not know about condensed milk. I believe cotton seed oil has been reduced and made practically free, also typesetting machines. So I think the hon. gentleman is quite in error when he speaks of any large reduction on manufactured articles. I have read the schedules over very carefully, and so far as I recollect, there is practically no reduction on manufactured articles. So the argument that the United States bars by her heavy duties Canadian manufactured articles, does not apply. We are only making reciprocal trade relations in natural products, that is, the products of the sea, the farm, forest and the products of the mine.

Mr. COWAN. The hon. member put a question to me a moment ago, and I am curious to know if he really wants to know why this arrangement will work against the interests of Canada.

Mr. FIELDING. If my hon. friend rises to a point of order it is quite right, but not otherwise.

Mr. COWAN. He has put a question, if he wants me to answer I will do so.

Mr. LOGGIE. I have heard the speech of the hon. gentleman, and those of other hon. gentlemen. I confess that I may be very dense, but I have been unable to grasp any real reason——

Mr. COWAN. I know that.

Mr. LOGGIE. The gentlemen may have it in their minds, but they surely have not expressed it.

Mr. EDWARDS. During the last week it was quite evident to this House that if the government have no mandate from the people in regard to the introduction of this reciprocity pact, a mandate had gone forth from the Prime Minister to his followers that they were to keep quiet, and I am under the impression that if the right hon. gentleman had been present in the last five minutes, and listened to the last speaker, he would have reintroduced that mandate, and kept them quiet still longer.

I wish to give one or two reasons why I think the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite is not a logical one. First I shall refer to something said in reference to myself by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley). That hon. gentleman referred to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) as one who would benefit to the extent of $90,000 a year on lumber in the event of this compact going through. Notwithstanding that large financial benefit, when this hon. member opposed this pact the minister went on to impugn his motiyes for doing so. I ventured to suggest that that was a position unworthy of the Minister of Public Works. The hon. gentleman replied that he was not surprised, that such criticism should come from me. It is true I have not won for myself a name such as has the Minister of Public Works. I have not had the privilege nor do I want the privilege of taking part in any sawdust wharf transactions or McAvity deals. I would be perfectly willing for the rest of my life to occupy the humble position I do rather than to find myself in the limelight by such means as he has adopted. I can readily understand that to the Minister of Public Works the matter of an hon. gentleman placing his country and principle ahead of a matter of $90,000 would be something out of the question. We can all understand that would be something entirely foreign to the course he would pursue.

I have been somewhat interested to hear the hon. gentleman refer to Liberal principles. I have here a campaign document circulated very extensively by the Liberal party previous to the last general election, entitled: 'Party government in Canada, a western Liberal view.' Without passing any opinion on the contents in detail I would say it is on the whole very well written. There are one or two expressions in it which I wish to call to the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The writer of this pamphlet referring to responsible government says:

> The counting of the ballots on election night decides not only who shall govern during the succeeding parliamentary term but how they shall govern. The election of representatives to parliament is, in effect, a plebiscite or popular vote, rejecting or continuing the line of policy upon which the affairs of government, have, up to that moment, been administered. A general election is a sitting of the highest court of appeal, the court of last resort on all public questions. The decision given takes effect at once and in practice is only reversed at a future election.

Therefore, we have a guiding principle of our system of government that the election of a parliament decides the policy of the party which is to govern. By the proposal introduced by this government, if this reciprocity pact is put through at the present time, it seems to me it is placing the cart before the horse, that the government would put through a policy on which the people have given no decision, on which the people have not been consulted, and after the compact had been put through then the people would be consulted as to whether they liked it or not. That would be an entire reversal of the principle of responsible government as here set forth. The writer says further:

> The real question decided by the vote at a general election is not whether certain members shall be elected or a certain government returned but what line of general policy or particular policy shall be followed, the decision being given by the individual voters at the polls according to their own views and interests.

Surely if that principle was right previous to 1908 it is the proper principle to follow now, to give the public an opportunity to express an opinion on this at a general election, the only time at which the people can have an opportunity to express an opinion. Further the writer says:

> We cannot have successful responsible government without party, especially honest parties with whom principles are the end of party existence and not merely the means to party success. The evil of the party system is not in its use but in its abuse.

I commend that to the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and ask that if the policy they are pursuing now is not rather a means to an end than a following of well known and definite principles.

One other paragraph in this pamphlet. Referring to the matter of the old fight in 1891 he says:

> As Canada was entirely an exporter of natural products she clearly had the advantage, there was no hope of securing a renewal of the old treaty of 1854. The only possibility of securing free entrance of Canadian farm products into the United States was by giving free or preferred entrance to United States manufactures to Canadian markets.

That is the justification given for the course pursued in 1891 when the policy of the Liberal party was unrestricted reciprocity. Then it was set before the people that the only way in which we could get free entrance to the United States for natural products was to give a free entrance for American manufactured products to Canada. It seems to me that policy is now turned the other way round, and they are taking as the first step free trade in natural products to be followed by its logical conclusion, free trade in manufactured products.

We find the Liberal party following one course at one time and another course at another time, but each leading to the one end, namely, commercial union or free trade between Canada and the United States and the establishment of a common tariff on the North American continent against the rest of the world. It has been stated that if this compact goes into effect it will inure to the benefit of the farmers of Canada. If agricultural conditions in the United States are so much better than in Canada I ask any member of the government to tell me why it is that in the state of New York in the last ten years there have been 12,070 abandoned farms and 775,000 less acres of improved land; why is it that in Pennsylvania in the last ten years there have been 5,854 abandoned farms and 549,000 acres less of improved land in 1910 than in 1900; why it is that in the state of Ohio there have been 5,386 abandoned farms in the last ten years and 34,000 less acres of improved land in 1910 than in 1900; why is it that in the state of Vermont there were 506 abandoned farms in the last ten years and 494,000 less acres of improved land in 1910 than in 1900; why in New Hampshire there have been 2,411 abandoned farms in the last ten years and a decrease of 150,000 acres in the improved acreage; why is it that in the state of Massachusetts in the last ten years there have been 1,203 abandoned farms and a decrease of 130,000 acres in improved acreage. Why is it that in these six states just across the line there have been in the last ten years 27,380 abandoned farms and a decrease of the improved acreage amounting to 2,132,132 acres. These are official figures from the advance sheets issued by the Census Bureau at Washington and sent to me by Mr. Durand Chief Director of the United States Census Bureau. These are pertinent questions to ask those who argue that this reciprocity pact will advantage the Canadian farmer. Why is it that in the state of Massachussetts in 1909, 38 per cent of the farms were mortgaged and that in 1910, 41 per cent were mortgaged. And yet Massachusetts is alongside the Boston market so much vaunted by hon. gentlemen opposite, and it is within a few hours run of New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Philadelphia and other large centres of population. Our people are being told in Ontario that if they had an opportunity of getting to the markets on the other side of the line the conditions in Canada would be similar to the conditions in the United States, but if the result of reciprocity is that they are to have in Canada conditions like those I have mentioned in the United States we don't want anything of this kind because conditions in Canada are infinitely better than they are on the other side of the line. And, yet, hon. gentlemen who advocate this pact offer no argument to answer such facts as I have presented. Do these gentlemen think it a fair deal to the farmers of this country to submit them to competition with people who have an advantage in climatic conditions? I can understand why people in certain parts of the world are in favour of free trade, but I cannot understand how any one truly interested in the prosperity of the Canadian farmer can advocate free trade. Under this pact the farmers of the Argentine Republic will be allowed to send their stuff into our market. The population of the Argentine is largely composed of Spanish, Italians and Indian natives and the labourer is paid 64 cents a day out of which he pays his board. The people of the Argentine do not have to build expensive houses nor buy fuel nor heavy clothing to protect themselves from cold, nor stables nor barns to protect their stock which run in the open during the entire year, nor, have they to maintain the high standard of civilization Canadians have, nor do they feel the responsibility of educating their children and beautifying their homes as we do. Nothing can be more unfair than to ask the farmers of Canada to compete with the farmers of the Argentine and other countries similarly circumstanced. As to our wheat going to the American market, if it does go there the by-product of our wheat will go across the line also, and I would remind hon. gentlemen that the price of bran and shorts in Canada to-day is $6 and $7 a ton lower than in the United States, bran being quoted all through May and June in the United States at from $29 to $30 a ton and white shorts at $34 a ton. If this pact goes through the Americans will have the benefit of the shorts and the farmers of Canada will have the shortage, and instead of the people of Ontario paying $23 and $24 a ton and the American $29 or $30 a ton the conditions will be reversed and the Canadian farmer will be paying the higher price. Add to that the advantage they have over us in the matter of climate and the abundance of corn which we cannot raise as they can, and give to them these advantages in the raising of cattle, and the farmers of Canada will be put out of business entirely.

Mr. NESBITT. We will take our chances.

Mr. EDWARDS. It is all right for hon. gentlemen in this House to say they are willing to take their chances, but it is only fair to the people of Canada to give them an opportunity to say whether they are willing to take those chances or not.

An hon. MEMBER. Do not worry about the farmers.

Mr. EDWARDS. I am not worrying about the farmers at all. So far as the section where I live is concerned, the farmers who understand this matter have absolutely no use for it whatever, and I have every confidence that if hon. gentlemen opposite would submit it to the farmers of this country, they would find that they would not endorse the position they take. The fact that they are not willing to submit it to the people is a clear evidence that they have not any confidence in the policy that they are advocating at the present time.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SMYTH moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TUESDAY, July 25, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—MORNING SITTINGS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That from this date to the end of the session, the House shall meet on every sitting day at eleven o'clock in the morning, and that in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p.m., there shall be also an intermission every day, including Wednesday, from one to three o'clock p.m.

Mr. SPROULE. There are several Bills still on the paper and it can only be known to the government whether they intend to go on with them. If these Bills are to be gone on with and if others are coming up, it would necessarily involve changing the time of the meetings of the committees. I think that the right hon. Prime Minister should give us some information as to what Bills it is intended to go on with, because the committees must, if these Bills are to be gone on with, do their work at some time and this will be taking up a portion of their time. The Railway Committee, for instance, is said to be meeting to-morrow. I think it is at half past ten, but it usually meets at eleven. If there are any of these Bills that have to go to these committees, it will necessarily involve the changing of the time of the meeting of the committees.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The intention of the government is to go on with the measure that is before the House with regard to the reciprocity agreement. Everything will depend upon the result of that. If we pass it in a short time we can take up other measures. If we were not to pass it in a short time the government would have to consider the course we would have to take.

Motion agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF DR. J. G. RUTHERFORD.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to repeat the inquiry I made yesterday as to the resignation of Dr. J. G. Rutherford.

Mr. FISHER. Dr. Rutherford has handed me his resignation, which, however, has not been acted upon.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is he still discharging the duties of his office.

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. SMYTH (Algoma)

SOREL SHIPYARD—OFFICIAL INQUIRY.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up the inquiry I made yesterday respecting the report of the commissioner who was appointed to inquire into the state of affairs at Sorel. Has my hon. friend received the report, and would he deposit it on the table of the House?

Mr. BRODEUR. I made inquiries and I found the following: Immediately after I gave instructions to hold that investigation, Mr. Boyle, inspector of agencies, went to Sorel and he has been there for more than a month. Mr. Boyle, who is now absent, will return in a few days and his report will likely be ready then.

PREPARATION OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to ask the government to lay upon the table of the House a statement as to the voters' lists. A representation has been made to me that the voters' lists for a number of constituencies have been printed and have been delivered to the members or to the defeated candidates. I have no complaint to make in the matter in regard to my own case because the lists were sent to me, I think, about four weeks ago, but there are some complaints in regard to others. I would like to have laid on the table of the House a statement of the ridings for which the voters' lists have been printed, completed and delivered and a further statement as to when it is expected they will be ready for those ridings which have not been served in that way up to the present time.

Mr. MURPHY. I will have much pleasure in having a statement prepared and submitted such as my hon. friend has asked for.

NEWSPAPER STATEMENT WITH REGARD TO QUEBEC MEMBERS.

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a report which was published in the Montreal 'Gazette' on Monday as a special from Ottawa. It reads as follows:

Ottawa, July 23 (special).—The revolt of the supporters of the government from the province of Quebec against the calling of the extra session in midsummer for the sole purpose of carrying on a hopeless attempt to put through the reciprocity agreement, does not show any signs of dying down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TALBOT:

Up to Friday a large number of French Canadian Liberal members had ignored the urgent call of the whips and failed to put in an appearance at Ottawa.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TALBOT:

The indemnity has practically run out, and they do not see the imperative need of sitting day after day, gagged, in the overheated Chamber while Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding continued the farce of passing the reciprocity pact. It is well known that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was nettled at the result of the division on Tuesday——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TALBOT:

—when the normal majority was cut down to 16 on a straight party vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TALBOT. We must consider that the applause coming from the other side is an indication that this article meets with the approval of these hon. gentlemen.

There were only sixteen of the rank and file of the Liberals in the House, when the vote was taken, and seven only were paired. With the opposition determined to bring up from day to day matters of public importance on the motion either to go into Committee of Ways and Means or Supply, and follow these up with motions of censure and want of confidence, a strenuous effort is being made to whip the Quebec men into line.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TALBOT:

The situation in which the government finds itself is decidedly unpleasant.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TALBOT. I am very glad to hear this applause. We will make good use of it in time.

There is demoralization in its ranks; Laurier's control of his solid Quebec majority is vanishing;——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TALBOT:

—discipline is lacking, and those who are in attendance are chafing under the action in bringing them back when they could be much better employed, according to their way of thinking, in canvassing their constituents in view of the imminent elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TALBOT. The Montreal 'Gazette' is a paper for which I have had, for a great number of years, a great deal of respect and admiration. It is quite evident that of late bad company has corrupted its good manners. I must now say to you, Mr. Speaker, that my comment shall be very short because this article is contemptible, malicious and untrue in every particular. I do not know who is the author of this dispatch, but I hope that it is not the reporter of the press appointed to sit in this gallery and to occupy a place in the company of gentlemen.

It is quite true that French Canadian members of this House coming from the province of Quebec are not over burdened with wealth but there is one thing that I can say and which will appeal to the fair minded men on the other side of the House, and I hope they are many, that it is not money which brings us here in this House. We are under a strong feeling that we are discharging our duty before the country and I have to say that if the reporter of the 'Gazette', appointed in the gallery is the author of this article he deserves the censure of this House.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska). —(Translation.)—Mr. Speaker, the article of which the hon. member for Bellechasse complains is not an isolated one, but forms part of a plan of campaign. As a matter of fact, to-day's Montreal 'Gazette' contains the same unpleasant insinuations. Quebec Liberals are accustomed to the calumnies of the Tory press, and this new exhibition does not disturb us; it will, however, serve to show the electors of the province what measure of justice they may expect from such opponents.

An analysis of the vote of the 18th July, Mr. Speaker, will show that at least as many French Canadian Liberals were in their seats on the first day following recess as members from other provinces, Liberal or Conservative.

There are in this House 220 members exclusive of the Speaker. The vote taken on that day gave the following result: 61 Liberals and 45 Conservatives. Only 106 members voted therefore, less than half of the whole House. The opposition mustered 45 votes out of a total of 88 members.

Allow me to call your attention to the fact that out of the Conservative contingent from the province of Quebec two members only were present on that day, the member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley), who is the party whip, and the hon. member for St. Ann's (Mr. Doherty); the ten other French Canadian representatives of His Majesty's opposition in the province of Quebec were all absent. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) was not there, nor was the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Gilbert), the champion of the new doctrine in the province of Quebec.

But the narrow fanaticism of the 'Gazette's' views are more especially apparent in the vile insinuation that French Canadian Liberal members from Quebec were not here because they had no more indemnity to draw. I defy the 'Gazette' and all the Tory press of the country to point out one single French Canadian Liberal member who ever publicly or privately made such a dishonest declaration. Such calumnies will not help to maintain among the voters of the province of Quebec that reputation for fairness and moderation which the 'Gazette' had acquired. In any case there must be no misunderstanding on this point. The Liberal members from the province of Quebec are here, and here they will remain until the end of this important parliamentary struggle, and when the fight is transferred to another field, they will be found in the forefront of battle.

THE CENSUS—OMISSIONS IN ENUMERATION.

Mr. MACDONELL. Is the Minister of Agriculture aware that in Toronto, in addition to many incidental and individual inaccuracies in the census, a whole section of Rosedale has apparently been omitted, a very large part of North Toronto. A full account of this is given in the Toronto News. I would urge that the minister take the necessary steps to have that omitted district visited by the census people so that it may be included in the census. The newspaper states that they have gone to much pains to ascertain and verify the correctness of that statement.

Mr. FISHER. I need not say that any such inaccuracy as that will be carefully investigated and if the statement is found to be correct immediate steps will be taken to remedy the omission.

IMPORTATION OF AMERICAN FARM LABOURERS.

Mr. MACDONELL. Has any order in council been passed suspending the immigration regulations between ourselves and the United States so as to permit agricultural labourers to come into this country without being handicapped or bothered with the usual immigration questions and interrogations during the harvest so as to permit American labourers to enter Canada to assist in reaping the harvest.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no order in council necessary. We admit agricultural labourers coming from the United States during harvest or at any other time. There are no restrictions in regard to money qualifications upon people coming from the United States or any other country into Canada for farm work.

Mr. MACDONELL. I understand that farm laborers are subject to certain restrictions. Have those restrictions been suspended recently for the purpose of permitting those people, as well as any other American people, to come into this country?

Mr. OLIVER. There are no restrictions as far as I am aware in regard to farm laborers coming in, except the restrictions imposed by statute, which are not removable by order in council

Mr. LAPOINTE.

Mr. MACDONELL. There has been no order in council recently?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

ELECTIONS IN NORTHERN ONTARIO.

Mr. ARTHURS. I wish to call the attention of the ministry to an article appearing in the Montreal 'Star' entitled:

To-morrow's caucuses expected to determine question of election.

The last clause of this article reads:

While till to-morrow nothing will be conclusively known, the present outlook is for a speedy termination of parliament and polling at the end of August or beginning of September. In that event it is quite probable that elections in the Ontario constituencies with unorganized districts would be deferred. The seats are now all held by Conservatives. Under the statute, the lists for these districts are to be revised annually, between August 1st and October 15, unless otherwise ordered by special proclamation. The latter appears in Saturday's 'Canada Gazette' and it fixes the time for revision between July 18 and September 18. This is significant of what is coming.

I would ask whether there is any truth in this article, whether it is the intention of the government, in the event of an election coming on immediately, to defer the elections in the northern part of Ontario. There is absolutely no need for doing so, the people of northern Ontario should have exactly the same rights as any other citizens of Canada. They have already been put to the trouble of having special lists prepared where the ordinary lists are quite sufficient. I spoke to the enumerators in my own district after the last revision, and I found that in seven polling subdivisions there were only two changes, and these two were of men moving from one polling subdivision to another. It is also true that large numbers were added in bush polls. The Ontario lists are prepared on a far better system than the enumeration made by this government. There is absolutely no reason, legal or otherwise for deferring the elections in northern Ontario. The people of northern Ontario are willing to have an election, we are prepared to go to the country on the issue now before parliament, but we desire to have an absolutely fair chance.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is absolutely no occasion for such a question. My hon. friend knows that the election when it takes place, in northern Ontario, and everywhere else, will take place according to law.

Mr. CURRIE (North Simcoe). The answer of the Prime Minister appears to me to be entirely non-committal, it does not convey anything. The right hon. gentleman was asked if the elections would be held in the ridings in northern Ontario before the lists were prepared. His answer was that the elections would be held according to law. What we want to know is: Will the elections in those ridings be held before the lists are prepared, or will the elections be deferred—yes or no? If the elections are going to be deferred, the Prime Minister can take refuge in the quibble that that is according to the law; but if it is according to law it is not according to justice, and I think, in justice to the House, and the country he should state distinctly whether the elections in those ridings are going to be held at the same time as the other elections, or are they going to be deferred?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend knows that under the statutes elections can be deferred in certain constituencies and not in others. The constituencies of northern Ontario are not among those in which the elections can be deferred.

Mr. BARKER. I wish to call the Prime Minister's attention to important changes which have taken place in east and west Hamilton since the last election. I called the attention of the Secretary of State to this months ago, because it seemed to me that it was necessary that some legislation should be passed to remedy what may be an evil. Since the last election there has been taken from the county of Wentworth and added to Hamilton West a considerable district, and a considerable population. In East Hamilton there have been other changes of perhaps much greater extent. There has been taken from the county and added to the city what was perhaps equal to 50 per cent of the old riding of Hamilton East. The description of Hamilton East as it is in the Revised Statutes is made impossible to be understood. According to the statute Hamilton East consists of wards 1, 6 and 7. There is another ward added now, and wards 1, 6, 7 and 8 constitute Hamilton East; but ward 7 as it is referred to in the statute no longer exists; it has been cut in two, and one-half of the old ward 7 remains as ward 7. The other half of ward 7 and the new district from the country now constitute ward 8. According to the reading of the statute, all of ward 8 is out of Hamilton East. Then, a part of ward 7 having been put into ward 8, the people so removed into ward 8 are probably disfranchised. When I called the attention of the Secretary of State to this matter before Christmas, the answer I got from him was that there would be a redistribution before another election, and, therefore, no immediate legislation was necessary. I understand that the position is somewhat reversed to-day, and that we are likely to have an election before a redistribution, and, therefore, I think the matter should receive the attention of the government, because it may cause a serious difficulty in the three districts—the county of Wentworth and the two Hamiltons.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would like to know exactly what my hon. friend means. The ridings of Hamilton have been settled and decided by legislation of this parliament. As I understand, the new legislation to which he refers is legislation of the province of Ontario, and I do not see what effect it can have upon our own definition of our own ridings.

Mr. BARKER. The Revised Statutes simply declare that wards 1, 6 and 7 under the laws of Ontario constitute Hamilton East.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As they then existed.

Mr. BARKER. Ward 7 is not at all the same area that it was in 1906. Then where is ward 8?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. They are exactly where they were when our statutes were passed. They cannot be changed by any legislation of Ontario.

Mr. BARKER. I doubt that very much, and there is a great difference of opinion upon it. When in 1907 changes were made in the districts of Alberta and Saskatchewan this government immediately passed an Act amending the Revised Statutes in regard to those districts. Our statute speaks of ward 7, not as having particular dimensions, but as ward 7. Read that statute to-day, a statute is read as now speaking, and it refers to ward 7 as ward 7 is. I take it, that would be the legal effect of it, and ward 7 now omits a large portion of what was ward 7 in 1906. That portion, together with an addition from the county, is now ward 8. Those people from the county are not assessed in the county of Wentworth, and cannot take the oath as being residents of that country, because they are residents of Hamilton. I submit, with all respect to the right hon. gentleman, that there is great need of making this matter perfectly clear so that there will be no dispute as to what those constituencies consist of.

Mr. SPROULE. In that particular case, who would be authorized to divide the voters in that portion of the city which was originally in the county of Wentworth? The Act provides that it shall be done by the municipal authorities. Who would be authorized to divide the voters and establish the new polling subdivisions?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. But for the authority of my hon. friend from Hamilton, who is a legal light, and for whose judgment I have great respect, I should say that there is no question at all in this matter that the riding of Hamilton or West Hamilton to-day exists just as it existed when the statute was passed in 1906.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I have had considerable experience in the matter, and I must agree with the right hon. the Prime Minister. The impression has been in the ridings I have been interested in that the riding is, what it was on the day the statute was passed and it has been left to the returning officer in conjunction with one of the government officials to divide up the voters lists.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MONK. I regret to intrude upon the discussion of matter which appears to be not yet exhausted, but I think I am justified in presenting to the House the motion which I have in my hand respecting another matter not less important—a matter which I think deserves the immediate consideration of the House.

Hon. members will recollect that not many weeks ago we adjourned for the purpose of allowing my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to attend two very important functions in England, the Coronation of His Majesty King George and the Imperial Conference. I think the House agreed unanimously that it was absolutely necessary to suspend work here, and permit my right hon. friend and his two colleagues, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) and the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) to attend these functions. That conference has taken place and decisions of the utmost importance to our country have been arrived at. As the House is aware the policy of the Dominion is largely directed according to the decisions arrived at by our ministers attending these conferences. It seems to me this alone would be a sufficient reason to justify us in knowing what proceedings took place at the conference and what decisions were arrived at. I will even go so far as to say that I think it would be out of place for an assembly such as ours, not to show some solicitude under the circumstances as to exactly what conclusions were arrived at by the conference. If the presence of our ministers was absolutely necessary there, if numerous decisions were arrived at on questions which greatly affect the future policy of this country, it seems to me that these ministers should be anxious to place before the House the result of what transpired during the sittings of this conference. Delegates to a meeting of this kind act under ministerial responsibility. They are responsible to the House for the opinions they give at these gatherings, and for the votes they cast. Under the circumstances I think it behooves them, upon their return, to give the House a full, complete and sincere account of all the transactions of the meeting.

There has been an impression existing that the meetings of the conference are private. That is not by any means correct. It is sufficient to refer to the précis of the meetings of the conference, which was placed before the British House of Commons last June, to see that that is not the decision of the conference. The question of the procedure at the meeting came up for decision on March 23rd, and the proceedings of the conference on the point will be found at page 10 of the précis. It was decided that the deliberations would be private but the decisions would be published. As a matter of fact the decisions were communicated to the public press, and formed the basis of this précis, which contains many subjects of great interest to the House of Commons, and it is a matter of surprise to me that my right hon. friend and his colleagues have not found it possible to lay a similar résumé before this House. There is no valid reason, so far as I can see, why we should not have had such a résumé and a report of the proceedings of the conference. My right hon friend the Prime Minister admitted in this House the other day that we were entitled to have such a report, and told us that we would have it shortly. Hon. members will find in this précis numerous decisions concerning the declaration of London—a point of controversy most interesting to ourselves and to the entire British Empire. It also contains the decisions of the conference in reference to 35 or 40 other subjects of general interest. However, what I wish to point out to the House is that the précis in question throws no light whatever on naval or military matters. There is not a man in this House who will deny that these are matters of the most vital importance, or that they have been the subject of acute controversy throughout the country since the Imperial Conference on defence held in 1909. The matter was discussed at that conference and at the subsidiary conference held during the summer of 1909, and a new policy was agreed upon; yet there is scarcely any allusion to the important decisions arrived at upon these matters. The reason for the withholding of this information appears to be that military matters and naval matters were deliberated upon in the Conference of Imperial Defence, sitting apart from the conference, but there is proof abundant that the decisions of that committee were brought before the conference, submitted to it and approved by it.

Let me briefly refer to these allusions. At page 11, the president, the right hon.

Prime Minister (Mr. Asquith) in defining the procedure to be adopted at the conference gave indications of how the proceedings would be had in regard to these important matters:

Mr. Asquith explained that naval and military matters would be discussed in the Committee of Imperial Defence where they would have the advantage of the presence of experts. Certain other technical matters it would probably be found desirable not to bring before the conference until after preliminary discussion by the representatives of the Dominion governments interested with the departments of His Majesty's government immediately concerned.

Then there is a short reference, at page 79, to the reports of the committee on defence. It is stated that:

The conference received and approved the report of the committee on Military Imperial Defence, which had held two sittings in the War Office under the chairmanship of the chief of the general staff.

Finally, closing the proceedings, the right hon. Prime Minister, president of the conference spoke as follows:

So again our discussions, conducted also and necessarily under the same veil of confidence in regard to co-operation for naval and military purposes, have resulted, I think, in a most satisfactory agreement, which, while it recognizes our common obligations, at the same time acknowledges with equal clearness that those obligations must be performed in the different parts of the empire in accordance with the requirements of local opinion and local need and local circumstances.

Now, what I submit to this House is that there is no possible question as to the right and propriety of parliament to be informed on military and naval agreements which may have modified in some respects—in important respects—the agreements arrived at in 1909, and which have been communicated, as properly they should be, to this House. Surely, the right, the absolute necessity, of parliament being informed of these decisions and agreements cannot be called in question. We have the control of our own military matters; we furnish the money with which the whole militia of this country is maintained; what navy it is proposed we shall have is to be built with the people of Canada's money: and it seems to me there can be no possible reason for refusing to this House the full details of the agreements and arrangements made at this conference which will be the foundation of the policy of this country in respect of these two most important matters. It would not be pretended for a moment, I suppose, that these matters fall into the category of war secrets, of state affairs; that they are to be assimilated to undisclosed plans of mobilization on sea or land, plans of fortifications or any of these matters which under common agreement, under the law of every country are kept absolutely secret. These are agreements of a public nature, given over to the people of the great British dependencies, discussed in their parliaments; and surely nobody will pretend that we are to be refused communication of these decisions arrived at, for instance, on status with regard to the Imperial Admiralty authorities. But the conduct of my right hon. friend and his friends indicates that they have that intention; and I wish, for my part, to know if the House will uphold them in carrying out that intention.

The arrival of my right hon. friend and his colleagues returning from the conference was heralded throughout the ministerial press of this country, and details were given as to what had been transacted at that conference. Indeed, long before the conference was ended, the Ministerial press and other newspapers handed out to the public information respecting the decisions of the conference, which, under the circumstances, it seems to me, it is our right to have corrected. We have the right too to have before parliament the decisions arrived at on the matters laid before that important gathering. As early as the 26th of May, the 'Montreal Herald,' the official organ of the government in Montreal, said:

The difficult problems of the immediate authority of generals and imperial admirals, upon the armies and navies of the empire in time of war.

Surely, if that question has been solved at the conference, we are entitled to know in what sense it has been solved. A despatch appearing in the 'Star' of the 15th of June, stated that at Pontypool in England, the right hon. the First Lord of the Admiralty, Mr. McKenna, stated that at that conference 'most satisfactory arrangements had been concluded between the colonies and the British government, and that the dominions had united in order to furnish and maintain the necessary means of defence.

But it is in the ministerial press of this country more particularly that we have an interpretation beforehand of what was done at the conference, and in a sense, I submit to the House, at absolute variance to what is disclosed by this short précis which has reached us since the conference. Let me give some idea to the House of how public opinion, at any rate in my own province, and I think very much in the same way everywhere, has been instructed in regard to the decisions of the conference. Just as my right hon. friend arrived, a special souvenir album was published in the city of Montreal, giving to the public the transactions of the conference, and bestowing unstinted praise upon my right hon. friend because, at the conference, and so to speak alone, he withstood all those who were inclined to imperial confederation, those who would attack the autonomy of the dependencies. This article was reproduced with approval on the 13th of July, by 'Le Canada.' in Montreal, the ministerial organ. Let me give to the House some samples of the statements that are made there, and I think when the House reads these statements which have never been controverted in any way by the right hon. gentleman, they will agree that we are entitled to have the true version of what took place at that gathering. I will now read from 'Le Canada':

Upon the occasion of the return of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a souvenir album has been issued which contains a substantial article upon the work and career of the Prime Minister. We reproduce the following:

This popular ovation is but the just return for the work accomplished by Sir Wilfrid Laurier during his entire political life, and which he has just magnificently crowned at London, of work of harmony, of peace and of progress.

Speaking of one of the proposals made at the conference, the paper says:

Another proposal which at first sight seemed most attractive but in reality was fraught with danger, well understood by Sir Wilfrid, was the suggestion that the Imperial government should consult the dominions upon its foreign policy. . . A painful and even perilous situation which Sir Wilfrid, ever solicitous of the minutest particle of our perfect autonomy, wished to preserve us against, and he succeeded as well as on the preceding occasions.

Does my right hon. friend find this report exact and correct? The precis shows us that my right hon. friend took at the conference an absolutely different position from that which is laid to his credit in these lines of his own newspaper. Does he not admit that under those circumstances we are entitled to have the true version of the proceedings at that gathering? My right hon. friend knows perfectly well, in the first place, that no attempt was made, so far at least as the precis shows, to invade our autonomy. My right hon. friend did not on any occasion stand alone, and he acquiesced absolutely in a proposal under which a consultation of the Dominions should take place. Does my right hon. friend deny that? He admits it. How then can he take unto himself, as he is given in this newspaper, and in many other in our own province, credit for having withstood the adoption of a proposal which he himself acceded to very williingly? Continuing 'Le Canada' says:

We now come to the naval questions discussed at the conference. These questions have for us a lively interest, inasmuch as they permit us to better appreciate in what spirit the Canadian navy was created.

If that is a question of a lively interest for us why should the conclusions of the conference be withheld from us? Why should they not be given to us at once, as I maintain that the government should give them to us? The paper continues:

At a preceding conference, a discussion took place as to the share which each dominion would take in general defence. Canadian representatives had objected to every proposal of direct contribution, and, in general way to any control exercised by the metropolis on the Canadian parliament which must remain, according to them, masters and free to decide in the matter.

The Canadian parliament, in 1910, approved of the creation of a naval service as the best and only means of contributing to the general defence without breaking local autonomy, that is to say, to take unto the charge of Canada gradually, the defence of its own territory. It is in this very sense that the government presented its Naval Bill, that parliament adopted it by its Liberal majority, that Liberal speakers and the Liberal press favourable to the project explained it to the people.

Shameless adversaries, desirous to gain some party advantage upon a question so near to the nation's heart have tried to falsify the meaning of the measure, some using it as a proof of disloyalty and treason, others in denouncing it as imperalism and death to our race. These dishonest and blind talkers have now exhausted their prose and comments; the people, a moment disturbed by their noise, now knows the matter in its conception and principle. They know that the government has not deceived them. Their last doubts have vanished during this conference of 1911, wherein the autonomous character of our navy has been marked in indelible manner.

In order to set at rest all question as to the freedom of action of our navy and the control which we intend exercising upon it, Sir Wilfrid has established a free maritime zone both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, which zone shall be absolutely under our care.

In this is the confirmation authentic, definite and unanswerable of our autonomy in regard to our navy.

There was also the question of the flags. What will be our naval flag? It was strictly necessary in order to accredit us in the different seas of the world, and with foreign countries that we should carry the ensign of the English navy:

Canada, whilst gradually conquering the attributes of a nation, is not yet quite, in the eyes of other countries, an independent nation. But while maintaining its character of a British possession, Canada will hoist its flag upon its navy.

The Canadian navy will use, at the same time, the white ensign which will procure for its ships the freedom of all the seas, and the flag with the Canadian arms. In the British navy, there are the White Ensign and the Union Jack; in the Canadian navy the latter will be replaced by a flag with our arms.

The drift of these decisions is obvious; they settle the field of action of our navy, and the flag which must be unfurled at our masthead.

It affirms our autonomy and the perfect control which we exercise over it. . .

Mr. DEVLIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? Is the hon. member opposed to the attitude taken by the right hon. the leader of the government before the Imperial Conference?

Mr. MONK. If my hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) will give me the decisions arrived at by that conference, I will say what I think of the attitude of the right hon. gentleman. I am sorry that my hon. friend does not quite understand the gist of my argument.

Mr. DEVLIN. If the hon. member declares he is not a dissentient, what is he objecting to in connection with the attitude of the Prime Minister?

Mr. MONK. Objecing to nothing; I am asking for something that I know the House will sanction and it is a reasonable and legitimate demand. I am not going for a single moment to discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. DEVLIN. If the attitude of the Prime Minister is such as has been declared in the press is the hon. gentleman in favour of it?

Mr. MONK. Well, that is a hypothetical question. It seems to me that we have held sufficient public meetings in Quebec, to many of which I saw my hon. friend come as a spectator, to enable him to know what our opinion is.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer, answer.

Mr. MONK. Without discussing the merits of the question, will anybody deny having regard to the justice of what I am claiming we should be refused for a single moment information as to the decisions arrived at by the conference upon these two very important points? We know what was the decision arrived at with regard to naval matters in 1909. The right hon. gentleman told us, when he introduced the Naval Bill, that the object he had in view was to carry out the policy of the conference of 1909. Surely, when a conference has been held since and these matters have been touched upon, when we are told that a further solution has been arrived at, we are entitled at this moment and under these circumstances, on the eve of a dissolution of this House, when it is in the power of these hon. gentlemen to give it to us, to have this report upon these questions. We have stated time and again upon every occasion in the meetings we have held in our province that we were prepared upon all these questions to accept the verdict of the people of this country. What we claimed was that the people were entitled to such a consultation. No position could be franker, could be fairer and in face of the calumnious statements which have been circulated, I think it necessary to recall the attitude to which we have constantly adhered. I believe that we have in the past received the support of those who sit around me here upon this side of the House in our insistence upon the right of the people to pronounce upon these questions. Will the right hon. gentleman state in the House that it was not possible for him to lay that report before the House upon his arrival? Were not the proceedings of the conference taken down as its sittings proceeded? Did Sir Wilfrid Laurier state to the House the other day that he had taken any step whatever to procure that report for communication to our parliament? In answer to the last question I put to the right hon. gentleman on this subject, he said in a scoffing manner that I knew as much about it as he did himself. If the right hon. gentleman today, when these proceedings have been fully transcribed, cabled to have them, we could have them here and have a copy laid before the House before the adjournment. Will the right hon. gentleman deny that? We could have them within a week and they could be laid before the House. The right hon. gentleman stated the other day that as far as he knew they were on the way out. The right hon. gentleman seems to have lost consciousness of the fact that the House unanimously adjourned in order that he should represent us at that important gathering. Nothing whatever in his conduct shows that he took any steps whatever to bring to us a report of what he did there. He returned to the House, took his seat in this House, he gave no statement whatever of what had been done at that conference, and he only learned from those members sititing on our own side that the precis had arrived. I am loth to believe that the two ministers most directly interested, the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden) and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) have come back without notes of what was decided with regard to their own departments. Every day the proceedings were written up and placed in the hands of the delegates. Why should we not have the decisions arrived at in regard to those zones. We are going to be called upon in a few days, to vote the beginning of vast sums of money for naval purposes. Will the right hon. gentleman pretend that these definitions of zones are private matters? The House is aware that it was an open question for over twenty years in the important dependency of Australia. First, the delimitations of the zones were fixed for the Commonwealth of Australia and a subscription of, I think £100,000 sterling was granted. That zone was continued for some years then it was altered, the amount of the subscription was altered and then the zone was altered again. There never was any thought at any time that this was a secret matter; it was laid before the parliament of this dependency and was discussed, everything was published and above board. Why should not we be made aware of the decisions which were arrived at upon these subjects, when it is absolutely in the power of the government to give us this report and when we are entitled to it? I therefore move:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the main motion be erased and replaced by the following:

That in the opinion of this House a complete report of the proceedings of the Imperial Conference of 1911 should be communicated to parliament forthwith.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, to a great many of the propositions which have been asserted by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) I have no exception at all to take. In many statements which he has made I altogether concur. With the statement which he has made that the House is entitled to be apprised of what took place at the conference I altogether agree. With the statement which he made that myself and my colleagues, when we represented Canada at the conference, acted upon our ministerial responsibility, I also altogether agree. My action is not to-day before the House. It will be, I hope, before many days. The report of the conference will be placed not only before this House but before the Canadian people and then it will be open to the criticism of every one of His Majesty's subjects in this country. I may say to my hon. friend that I have no intention whatever of shirking the responsibility which I incurred on that occasion. The duties with which I was entrusted, I discharged to the best of my ability and judgment and so did my colleague. My action may command the approval of some; it may suggest the criticism of others. That is incidental to the duties which I had to discharge upon that occasion and to the duty which I have to discharge whenever I act in my present capacity.

And, therefore, upon this occasion my hon. friend has laid down a principle which lies at the base of parliamentary government. He only finds fault with me because the proceedings of the conference have not been laid before parliament. The objection of my hon. friend would have greater force if he could say that the Canadian Ministers who had attended the conference had been in any way derelict in the duty they owe to parliament in this respect. If the report of the conference had been placed before the Imperial House of Commons, and not before this House, my hon. friend would have legitimate cause for complaint, but, Sir, the fact is that at this moment I have no reason to believe that the report has yet been placed before the Imperial parliament so surely no one in this House can blame this government because the report has not been placed on the table of this House.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would blame the government if it had been given to the newspapers instead of to this House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What newspapers have got the report? Here is the report which has been obtained by the newspapers, it is the précis and nothing else.

Mr. MONK. Is our obtaining the report of the conference contingent upon its being laid before the British parliament?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend and every member will expect that the full report of the conference will be placed before all the parliaments represented at that conference. The organization of the conference was under the control of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the officers of the Colonial Office were the secretaries of the conference; it was they who prepared the précis to which my hon. friend has alluded and who were charged with preparing the full report. At page 78 of the précis will be found the report of the sitting of June 20.

The conference discussed the question of the publication of the proceedings and decided they should be published at as early date as possible.

The publication of these proceedings was entrusted not to the representatives of Canada or any other Dominion, but to the officers of the Colonial Office.

Mr. MONK. Are we dependent for that report of the conference upon what may be done at the Colonial Office? Have we not an inherent right to these proceedings?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend surprises me. Somebody must do that clerical work.

Mr. LANCASTER. Where did the newspapers get the report?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sure I cannot answer that question, they did not get it from me.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The précis was made and published in London, it was distributed among the press.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The other day my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) brought to the attention of the House a statement that the proceedings of the conference had been placed before the Imperial parliament. I was surprised at this, but it turned out that it was the précis which had been placed before the British House of Commons.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Who prepared that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Just, now Sir Arthur Just.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Was he an official at the conference?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. An official of the Colonial Office, and placed in charge of the reporting of the proceedings by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. He prepared the précis which was given to the press every day, and which has now been published in book form. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk), is anxious to have not only this partial report, but the full report of the proceedings. His motion specifically calls for the full report, and I have read the decision of the conference to have that full report published at as early a date as possible. It is not my business or the business of my colleagues who were at the conference with me to arrange for the publication of that report.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). It is his business to see that equal treatment is accorded to Canada and the other portions of the empire in the distribution of that report.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is exactly what I say, that if there had been any dereliction on our part hon. gentlemen would have a right to complain, but nothing of that kind has taken place.

Mr. MONK. Do I understand that we must wait until the report is placed on the table of the Imperial House?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I certainly tell my hon. friend that he must wait until the report of the proceedings which was ordered by the conference on the 20th of June, at its last sitting, has been published. I do not see how he can expect to get it sooner. I am as anxious as anyone can be to have my conduct discussed in this House. The views which I maintained at the conference have not received the approval of certain parties in Canada, they have been violently discussed and subjected to criticism by some parties.

Under such circumstances it is not unnatural to suppose that it would be for me a matter of pleasure, and more than pleasure, to be in a position to vindicate my own course. But at that time I was not in a position to do so, and it is not asked by this motion, that I should. If we had the report in our hands, and did not lay it on the table of the House, then my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier would have reason to call for it; but so long as this report has not been published, it seems to me that it is simply childish to ask that it be placed on the table of the House. My hon. friend is in great haste to discuss this question. I know what the attitude of my hon. friend has been of late and also long ago. He has referred to the policy of the navy and the army. I know some of his speeches, and I shall be glad to discuss that question with him when we have the full report.

Mr. MONK. You won't give us what we want.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is not the time nor the occasion to discuss the question, but the time will not be long coming, I hope, and it will come sooner than my hon. friend wants. My hon. friend has not waited for the report to discuss it He has discussed it, and has condemned my course. This is not the time to discuss this question; but, Sir, I appeal to the fairness and the common sense of men on both sides of this House. Here is a motion in the form of a motion of want of confidence, asking the House to censure us—for what? Because we have not put upon the table of the House a report which we have not, a report which has not yet been placed upon the table of the House of Commons in England so far as I know. I will make inquiry this very day whether it has been or not. If it had been placed on the table of the House of Commons in England, I suppose I would know that, because there would have been a despatch coming to us informing us of the fact.

Mr. MONK. Did my hon. friend cable for it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I did not, but I will. I shall be happy to give that pleasure to my hon. friend. I shall have the pleasure of discussing that report with my hon. friend as soon as it is laid on the table of the House, and the sooner it comes the better for myself. But, I ask, has there been any undue delay in the matter on the part of the government? Who is to blame because this report is not on the table of the House? Is the Canadian House of Commons entitled to greater privilege than the Imperial House of Commons?

Mr. MONK. We are entitled to exactly the same privilege.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Exactly—what I say also; and when the report is placed on the table of the Imperial House of Commons, if it is not placed on the table of this House, then my hon friend will have reason to complain, but not till then.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I entirely agree with the Prime Minister that the attitude of the government at the conference ought to be discussed with full information as to what did take place. I am not at all advised as to the differences which may make themselves manifest when we have the full report as distinguished from the precis. It may be that they will be important, though I would not have supposed they would be, because otherwise the precis itself would be misleading. I think it would be advisable in the meantime that the precis itself, which has been received, should be placed on the table of the House and become a part of the records of this parliament; and, as I understand, there is no objection to that.

Now, reference has been made to newspaper comments. I do not propose to go into the merits of those comments, for the reason that I have already indicated. But I think it is a matter of some concern to this parliament as to whether or not certain reports of what was done at the conference, which have appeared in the organs of the right hon. gentleman, have any foundation in fact or not. The right hon. gentleman says he did not communicate that information to those organs. It is perfectly manifest that they must have obtained the information either from himself or from some of his colleagues, because there was no one else to give it. There has been a good deal of reference to zones established on both the Atlantic and Pacific, and I think it is legitimate comment that the information in regard to those zones appears in the party press under the control of the right hon. gentleman, though it is not laid before parliament, and that its appearance in that press is for the purpose of assisting a political campaign on his behalf. I submit that that is not a fair use for any minister of the Crown to make of his position and of the confidential information which is given to him. I say that any member of that conference who uses his confidential position for the purpose of imparting to his party press confidential information of that kind for the purposes of a political campaign is not worthy of the position he occupies.

As far as the rest of it is concerned, I do not propose to deal with the question upon its merits, for the reason the Prime Minister has stated, that there may be important differences between the report which we have now and the full report which is to come later. We once more see the Prime Minister, according to his party press, in the well-recognized, but rather threadbare garb of the saviour of the autonomy of Canada. It is impossible for the right hon. gentleman to cross the Atlantic without saving the autonomy of Canada. He has been there in 1897, in 1902, and in 1907, and on every one of those occasions he came back after having saved the autonomy of this country.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It did not make any difference whether Balfour and Chamberlain were there, or whether Asquith and Haldane were there; it did not matter whether Selborne, Tweedmouth or McKenna were there; every one of these men was ready to destroy the autonomy of this country. That is the position that is cheered by hon. gentlemen opposite. If we are to believe these organs, Premier Asquith, Mr. Haldane, Sir Edward Grey, and all the other British statesmen at the recent conference were conspiring to destroy the autonomy of Canada, and the right hon. gentleman saved it; and the cheers which came from hon. gentlemen opposite just now indicate the character of the campaign which they propose to make. Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps we had better have a little information later on as to what the assault was which Mr. Asquith, the great Liberal Prime Minister of Great Britain, made on the autonomy of Canada. The Prime Minister will no doubt make us acquainted with that later on.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Both parties will have seen that Mr. Asquith was saving the autonomy of Canada.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then the right hon. gentleman should rebuke his supporters, because just now they cheered to the echo the statement that Mr. Asquith, the Liberal Prime Minister of Great Britain had been engaged in a conspiracy to destroy the autonomy of this country. Not only did the supporters of my right hon. friend cheer this statement, but a member of the government, the Solicitor General (Mr. Bureau) also wildly cheered it. I suppose Mr. Haldane, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Winston Churchill and the other distinguished members of the British government were all concerned in this awful conspiracy from which the right hon. gentleman with his sword and his shield, and his white plume saved the autonomy of Canada.

I have got down as far as 1907, and on every one of these occasions the autonomy of Canada has been preserved by the Prime Minister. It must be pretty well preserved —so much so that I think it might be put away in cold storage for a while, so far as debate is concerned. In 1909 the right hon. gentleman did not personally save the autonomy of Canada, but he did it by deputy. He deputed my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden), and my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur); and the autonomy of Canada was saved by deputy, and not by the right hon. gentleman in person. In 1911 the right hon. gentleman was again to the fore, and I would think that my hon. friends opposite would be grateful to us on this side of the House, because, as every one in this country knows, the right hon. gentleman did not intend to go, and did not want to go, and would not have gone had it not been for the offer that was made from this side of the House. So, so far as the efforts of the right hon. gentleman on this occasion are concerned, the opposition may be regarded as the direct and proximate cause of the saving of Canada. Perhaps this particular cry has about survived the usefulness which it has served on so many occasions. At all events, when we get the information which the right hon. gentleman promised us we shall learn what was the real character of the bloodthirsty assaults upon the autonomy of Canada made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain and his colleagues.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I have before me the London 'Times' of Saturday July 15, which deals with the Imperial Conference report. In it I find the following:

The issue yesterday afternoon of the minutes of preceedings of the Imperial Conference. 1911 (cd. 5745) come opportunely, before the conference itself has passed from memory, and when the last overseas member of it has only just left our shores, to remind us of the great issues debated in it, and the real work it accomplished towards the knitting together of the empire. The blue book contains a verbatim report of the proceedings of the conference, which have hitherto been published only in the condensed form of the official précis; but as was expected, it includes no record of the joint session of the conference and the committee of defence.

This blue-book was issued in London on July 15th, eleven days ago, and contains a verbatim report of the proceedings. Yet, Canada is not in possession of that blue-book to day; and, so far as the right hon. gentleman is concerned, he has never seen it. Now, there should have been equal treatment meted out to Canada in that respect, and if London was supplied with copies of that blue-book, why was not an arrangement made whereby a certain number of them should be sent over here?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If the report has been placed upon the table of the House, I have no doubt it is now on its way here.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). It was placed on the table in London on the 15th July, eleven days ago. There is a two column summary of the blue-book in this article, and hon. gentlemen can derive a good deal of information as to how much progress was made in the direction of imperial unity at that conference by reading this summary. This progress may have been made with the aid of the right hon. gentleman—perhaps it was made in spite of him. Any way the reading of these proceedings is satisfactory, and notwithstanding what was done to disturb the unity of that conference and to prevent its drawing the empire together, it was a most successful conference, according to this report, and it shows in what direction the empire is moving.

The other day the hon. Postmaster General referred to what had taken place in this conference in regard to state ownership of telegraphs and cables, but I am not able to find in the summary of that report that the representatives of Canada at that conference joined with the representatives of Australia in favour of public ownership of cables and telegraphs. If they had done so perhaps we would have had it. It was probably because we had as representatives there, men who were more or less reactionary that a decision was not reached in favour of state ownership of cables.

In order that the House may have full information as to what took place there, I propose to read part of the summary of the minutes of proceedings of the Imperial Conference:

INTRA IMPERIAL COMMUNICATIONS.

On June 15 and 16 the conference devoted itself mainly to considering proposals for the improvement of communications between the various parts of the empire. In this Australia and New Zealand, as farthest from the centre, were especially concerned, and were agreed on one point—that communication by cable should be made less difficult and less expensive. Since an improvement in this direction had been made ten years ago by the laying of a state-owned cable across the Pacific (which lowered rates to Australia by nearly 40 per cent), it was natural to suggest that a similar state owned cable across the Atlantic would produce a similar effect.

A state-owned cable across the Atlantic would reduce telegraph rates by 40 per cent, yet, so far as I know the representatives of Canada did not insist on that proposal being carried out nor on the state-owned cable across the Atlantic being constructed by Canada by Great Britain or by the United States jointly. When the hon. Postmaster General gave us his account of the proceedings the other day, he did not give us all the facts because I find:

The British Postmaster General, however, brought forward another plan, depending partly on negotiations with the private companies that own existing cables—such as, he pointed out, are already securing a 50 per cent reduction in the cost of uncoded messages; partly on the establishment of effective government control over rates charged on lines which land on British territory. The Australasian representatives were still inclined to press for a state-owned cable, but were persuaded by the other members of the conference to accept a compromise whereby, if Mr. Samuel's methods did not secure consid erable reductions, the state-owned cable could still be advocated at a subsidiary conference.

My contention is this—if the representatives of Canada had backed up the representatives of Australia we would have had state owned cables on the Atlantic, and a resulting reduction of 40 per cent in the cost of cable messages.

In order to show how much progress has been made I would like to read another paragraph relating to the results of the conference.

But these somewhat ineffective discussions were immediately followed by a striking demonstration of the empire's real unity. For three days the overseas members of the conference, sitting with the Committee of Imperial Defence, were initiated into the secrets of Britain's foreign policy——

There is Imperial progress. The representatives of the various overseas dominions, were, for the first time, made parties to the foreign policy of the Empire.

'Hitherto,' said the Australian Prime Minister, at a later date, 'we have been negotiating with the government of the United Kingdom at the portals of the household.'

You have thought it wise, Sir, to take the representatives of the dominions into the inner councils of the nation. . . I think no better step has ever been taken or can be taken by any responsible advisers of the King. I hope, as I feel, that there will be no going back on that sound principle.

And the summary goes on to say:

It is unnecessary here to dwell on the arrangement of ideas about the empire which must have preceded the taking of this step; but it must exert considerable influence both on the status of Dominion cabinets and on the scope of their discussions. No responsible Prime Minister can in future admit among his colleagues men unfit to be the depositaries of imperial secrets, and no oversea cabinet can construct its own policy without considering the effect of it upon the foreign relations of the empire as a whole.

Now, there is the first declaration of the unity of the whole empire, a joining of the empire for purposes of defence and the maintenance of the common cause; and that fact alone shows how important that Imperial Conference was, what great results have been attained and what greater results will come in the future when it is better established and there is a better understanding between the different members. Now, when there is so full a summary of these proceedings and when the full report has been published in London, I contend that we in Canada ought to be put in possession of the facts and ought to have that official report at the disposal of this House, and this country as soon as they have it in London, less the days it takes to cross the Atlantic. If the 'Times' can have that report and digest it, and if there is time for that newspaper summary to reach us, we are entitled to have the full official report here at the same time. In fact it ought to be here a little before, because it could leave before the 'Times' got it. But we know nothing about it; the Prime Minister does not even know whether it has been printed. Perhaps the gentlemen in the colonial office still regard Canada as a colony as in the old days of Downing street. It would be a good thing to wake them up and give them to understand that in handing out these documents Canada is not to be forgotten. The way to work that out was for those who represented us in the conference to have made arrangements before the conference separated that copies of the proceedings should be forwarded to this country. And I hold that it is the duty of the Prime Minister to set the cables at work so that this House may be put in possession of this document which was distributed in London eleven days ago.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). The question now before the House is one of importance. The right hon. Prime Minister was appointed to go to the Imperial Conference as the representative of Canada, and the House adjourned for the very purpose of allowing him to go. His first duty on returning here was to give a full report of the proceedings. He says it has not been printed. Well, it ought to have been printed. The précis was printed from day to day and every newspaper in London knew what was going on every day. And, at the end of the conference it was complete. I heard reports about what action the right hon. gentleman had taken in the conference, and I wanted to be fully informed upon the subject. I spoke to Mr. Foster about it and he told me he had a copy of the precis. I asked him where he got it. He said, 'I am entitled to it as a privy councillor, and I went and got it.' He was in possession of it on the 11th July. It is now the 25th of July, and we have no information before the House on this subject. That is a ridiculous position. But it is the same as in many other things, this parliament is completely ignored by the government. Surely, it is a matter that concerns Canada more than anything else—the arrangements made by the government of this Dominion in reference to imperial matters. It is no excuse for the right hon. gentleman to say that the report has not been printed in London. He ought to have seen that it was printed. But had he made inquiries he would have known that it was printed and at the disposal of every newspaper in London. The right hon. gentleman shakes his head——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The precis was printed, but the other was not.

Mr. HAGGART (Lanark). Is the right hon. gentleman certain about that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am certain of one thing, we have not yet received it.

Mr. HAGGART. (Lanark). I was very anxious to get the information, and I have already shown that my colleague had secured possession of it. Every one in London knew about it and knew of the position taken by the right hon. gentleman who represented Canada in the matter. It was public knowledge in London, yet fourteen days after that we have no information on the subject presented to this House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The right hon. gentleman will——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I may say to my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) that His Excellency the Governor General has been away. He is due here to-night. If the information has come, I shall know from His Exceellency and will communicate it to the House to-morrow. I do not think, however, that anything has come yet. So far as I have been able to follow the article in the 'Times' it is the précis——

Mr. MACLEAN (York). No, the full report. The price is given at which the public can obtain it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will see that he is mistaken. I have here the 'Times' of Saturday, July 11th, which says:

> The issue yesterday afternoon of the 'Minutes of Proceedings of the Imperial Conference, 1911' (Cd. 5745)——
>
> The précis is numbered 5741.
> —comes opportunely before the conference itself has passed from memory, and when the last oversea member of it has only just left our shores, to remind us of the great issues debated in it and the real work it accomplished towards the knitting together of the empire. The blue-book contains a verbatim report of the proceedings of the conference, which have hitherto been published only in the condensed form of the official precis; but as was to be expected it includes no record of the joint sessions of the conference and the committee of defence.

It is apparent that it is the fuller report to which the Prime Minister alluded; therefore, we have been ten days or more without it. Last Saturday was the 22nd, and this was on the 14th, eight days before. It should have been here last Saturday.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As I have said, His Excellency will be here, and if he has received it, it will be laid before the House to-morrow.

Amendment (Mr. Monk) negatived.

NORTHWEST SCRIP TO OLD SETTLERS.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Before you leave the Chair, I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter that I referred to on the 14th of last December. It has relation to certain claims that have been advanced by the pioneers of western Canada for the last 38 or 40 years. When I asked the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) on the 14th of last December as to the correctness of the report that the present government had finally denied all recognition to these claimants, I at that time gave notice that as soon as possible I would bring the matter up. Consequently he will not charge me now with being an obstructionist in carrying out my word. This is a matter, as I say, that has been more or less under dispute ever since the year 1870, consequently it has all the merits that belong to antiquity. Now the parties for whom I speak are earlier settlers of the Northwest who arrived in that country between the first days of January, 1836, and the 15th of July, 1870. Every one in the House is aware that the Northwest Territories, that is to say, the Red River country, was ceded to confederation on the 15th day of July, 1870. By that cession certain recognition was made to those who had rights of occupancy and possession in the Northwest Territories at that time. Subsequently, on the 26th of May, 1874, the recognition that was made in 1870 was altered, and a more extensive grant was made to those to whom grants had been made before, and to others by the Act 37 Vic., chap. 20. All I need to tell the House is the final result, what recognition was made, who enjoyed it, and what others were left out. In 1813 the Selkirk colony was established. Up to the time that the final settlement was adjusted on the 26th of May, 1874, settlers of many descriptions had secured rights in the Northwest Territories. They comprised five classes. There were the original Selkirk settlers themselves, there were the other British settlers, there were French Canadians, and there were the Indians and the Halfbreeds. As to the latter two classes my remarks have no bearing. There is no complaint as to the recognition by the Dominion of Canada, by what is known in law as an act of grace, of the rights of occupancy of the Halfbreeds and Indians. I will only compare the rights of the Halfbreed children that existed at that time in Manitoba with those on whose behalf I present a case this afternoon. However, as to the first three classes, a settlement was made of a very strange and arbitrary character, that is to say, as to the original Selkirk settlers, the other British settlers not of that class, and the French Canadian settlers, an arbitrary settlement was made with them. A line was drawn at the 1st of January, 1836; as to all who had arrived in the Northwest Territories prior to that time a grant of 160 acres of land was made. In the first place, when the adjustment was first made in 1872, a grant of only 140 acres was made, and that only to the original Selkirk settlers. But by the amended Act of 1874 a final adjustment was arrived at whereby the original Selkirk settlers, the other British settlers and the French Canadians were subjected to the arbitrary settlement arrived at, those who had arrived prior to the 1st of January, 1836, obtaining a grant of 160 acres, and those who arrived subsequent to that time being utterly ignored. Not only were those who arrived between 1813 and 1836 recognized by the land grant, but their children born prior to the 15th of July, 1870, were also recognized, and they received the same grant; in fact all the lineal descendants then living were entitled under that Act to the same grant as the original settlers. Not only did the Act of the 26th of May, 1874, go that far, but what is more astonishing, it went further, it made exactly the same grant to another class who were not even born at the time the territory was ceded to confederation, namely, to the descendants of the first settlers between 1813 and 1836 who were born between the 15th of July, 1870, and the 26th of May, 1874. So the ultimate result is this, so far as it relates to the British and French Canadian settlers, that those who came in at first between 1813 and 1836 and their lineal descendants born up to the 15th of July, 1870, when the territory was ceded, and all born after the cession of the territory prior to the 26th of May, 1870, received from the bounty of confederation this grant of 160 acres. Why the line was drawn I am at a loss to know, why it was fixed there, or fixed at all, I am also at a loss to say. Why it should be that those whose rights of occupancy and possession accrued between 1836 and 1870 should be ignored in the settlement, is at this distance hard to understand. The records of the department, I think, will be searched in vain for any reason why the arbitrary line was thus drawn, or why any line was drawn.

I venture further to say that the records of such settlements in other countries will also be searched in vain to establish the principle that any line should be drawn at any period. The rights of occupancy of territory should not be differentiated as to time at all, because all rights of occupancy are the same for different classes, whether for the early settler or the late arrival. I do not intend to press that argument just at the present stage. I want to outline the state of affairs that has resulted first. The number of claimants is not large. Of the first class, that is those who received recognition, being actual settlers between 1813 and 1836, the number, according to the best compiled figures—I presume they are accurate—is 244. But of their children and descendants born prior to the 15th July, 1870, the date of the cession, there were 477, and of those who were granted the reward of occupancy, although indeed they were not born at this time, they having been born between the 15th of July, 1870, and the 26th of May, 1874, there were 128. So that, summing it all up, it will be seen that to 45 per cent of those who had established rights of occupancy and possession at the time of the cession, grants were made and to 55 per cent no recognition was given.

This matter has been brought before this and previous governments. It has been a question involving considerable irritation in the west. I wish to trace the efforts that have been made to secure recognition, not so much to bring home a case against the government, but rather to present what appears to me a good argument against what is usually brought forward as establishing the absence of any right of these present claimants. The contention of the government, when the case was last presented to them, rested on two positions. The position, first of all, was that the claim is too old, that it is of forty years standing now, and that at this stage we cannot review it. They said, secondly, that the policy of the government is thoroughly fixed and final; we shall make no more land grants except to actual settlers. I do not purpose at this point to criticise the last position. I am not asking that the demands of these men, if there is at this stage a practical objection from that point of view, should be granted in toto, as they present them. What I argue is that some recognition is bound to be made to them before confederation has done its duty to them. What form that shall take or to what extent it shall go, I do not propose to argue. But I do say that Canada has not discharged her duty towards a class of her citizens, a class which is entitled to, I feel fair in saying, more than ordinary consideration. Why is that the case? When the United States made a settlement of claims under similar circumstances I know of no instance where they did not recognize rights of occupancy as complete and deserving of reward even though those rights were established but shortly before the cession. I would refer hon. gentlemen to the Oregon claims when the United States not only recognized the Indian title, not only by way of legal recognition, but also recognized every right of occupancy however brief the period was prior to the cession of the country to the United States. A right of occupancy is a right that does not depend upon time. A right of possession to a very great degree is the same. But, in this particular case there is more than the usual reason why time should not be recognized even in establishing rights of possession as well as rights of occupancy It has never to the best of my knowledge, been recognized in establishing rights of occupancy. In this case it should not have been allowed to interfere as to any rights which many of these old settlers had of both classes in the matter of a settlement of their claims upon their coming into confederation. Those who arrived in the country at an earlier period were not settlers in the usual sense of the word. They followed the trail, they were mostly employees of the Hudson's Bay Company, in the employ of speculators residing in the old land, and they did not at that time, as history will amply show, have the hardships to endure which subsequently were endured by those who came after them in the west. Between 1836 and 1870 the vanguard of the original Red River colony had to suffer hardships to a greater degree than those who preceded them and they suffered the hardships that are inseparable from early pioneer life. The case on this point is, at least prima facie, established. No one has yet, be it of this government or of the prior government, ventured to give a logical explanation why the settler who came in 1835 was entitled to recognition and why the settler who came in 1836 was not. No explanation on that point has been ventured, and I understand that the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) stated that he himself saw no reason for that. Consequently, on the face of it, the indebtedness is there, the right is there, and the only question is, can we in justice to our country now recognize it, and if we can, then certainly we ought to do it. I can see no reason whatever, in the defence that because the claim is old it must be ignored. It is true that in the law of every civilized nation the principle is established that as claims advance in age they become less and less deserving of recognition. Our statute of limitations is based upon that principle. The statutes of limitation of every civilized nation are based upon the same principle; that is that a private right that has been asleep, or dead, on which no claim in court has been made, cannot, after the lapse of stated periods, be advanced with success. Such statutes of limitation are doubtless based upon a sound and necessary principle, namely, that though the duty may still exist, though the duty still may be owing from one man to his fellow, from one individual to another, still the danger of enforcing the performance of that duty, the danger of compelling recognition of the obligation, is so great that it is impossible to insist upon it.

Claims of innocent third parties have come in and, therefore, the dangers of recognizing those claims that have been subject to laches, are so great as to justify their being ignored. That is the principle of the whole statute of limitations of every country. To that principle I make no dissent. But that principle has no application whatever to the present case; in fact it has always been recognized that in matters of trusteeship there is no statute of limitation that at any time does apply. This is a matter of trusteeship, and consequently on that first principle of general law of this country, and all other countries, there could be no such defence against the claim of the early pioneers of Manitoba, because certainly when this country took over the provinces of the west, when it took over the Red River colony, the Dominion became by that very act trustees for those who had rights of occupancy, and possession in that territory, prior to the cession, and no trustee can ever get rid of his responsibility to those for whom he is a trustee by pleading the passage of time or any principle of the statute of limitations. That may appear a technical argument. It is not technical, it is in the very nature of the case, it is a necessary principle that we ought at all times to recognize.

The principle on which we are justified in ignoring a claim because it is old is utterly absent in this case. There has been no laches, these men have been doing everything they are called upon to do, ever since they were denied their rights in 1874. They have exercised every diligence to secure their rights, they have been separated by large distances, they have had no common bond but these common grievances, they have had nothing to bring them together, they have had to present their case with obstacles strewn around them that made it almost impossible, particularly in the early stages of our history, to present any case to a government so far away. But no sooner were they denied their rights in 1870 than their claim was pressed, than an organization was instituted in the west known as the Prince Rupert Pioneers, and that organization, through its representatives in this House and by delegations sent to this parliament, pressed the claim I am now advancing. On what ground did they press it? First of all they based it on the proclamation issued to them by which their consent was obtained to enter confederation; they based it on the proclamation of the Governor General of that day issued with the authority of Earl Grenville the Colonial Secretary on the 6th of December, 1879, to the early settlers. In that proclamation it was stated that all such rights would be observed, that all settlers would be treated in the spirit of British justice. That proclamation was supplemented by a further letter on the 16th of February, 1870, by which the Governor General of Canada repeated the same assurance to Bishop Taché. I do not mention this to found again any technical right. Had no letter been written, had no assurance been made at all by the government of Great Britain or by this government to the early settlers of that country they would be entitled just the same to the British justice which was assured them by that letter, they would be entitled to a recognition of their right of property. I do not deny that they were partially recognized. Those who had rights of special property, those who had made settlements and had rights defined on special limited properties, were recogniezd, but those who had been in such a line of work, who had been leading such a life that they had no defined rights of property, were not recognized, although as a matter of fact they were just as much entitled to the full extent of the letter of the Governor General, they were just as much entitled in a word to their rights of possession and occupancy being recognized as any other class. They were utterly ignored so that I would not rest their claim on any letter of the Governor General nor on any assurance from the home office, but, relying on the general principles of equal rights on which every section of this country should be able to rely, I state that these men have not been done justice to.

I set about showing that they should not be denied because their claim is old. They petitioned for it in 1871. They had at that time as representative in this House the present High Commissioner for Canada, then Sir Donald A. Smith, and in the 'Hansard' of 1871 and 1872, will be found utterances by him, representing them, thoroughly coinciding with the claim which they made then and make still demanding that they be recognized in the distribution of this land just the same as the descendants of those who were prior to them. Consequently right at the first, it is clear that they took every step they could take, because not only were they represented and their claim pressed by their representative here, but they actually went to the expense, and a great expense it was to them, of sending a delegation to this parliament also to press their claim. That delegation consisted of Judge Black, Mr. Scott, and Father Richot. Two of this delegation were not able to return, the other, Father Richot, did return and made his report and in so far as that report, which was made to the legislative body at that time in existence at Winnipeg, can be found, it shows that while they did not receive a definite promise of the recognition of their claim as presented, it at least has an indication that they were promised recognition at some future day in some form or another, because there is a reference to the fact that when the other provinces of the west were to be annexed at a later time, recognition of those settlers who were outside the Red River colony would be made. Consequently there was to that extent a recognition by the parliament of Canada of the claim of these men.

They did not stop at that. Again in the year 1886 when, of course, another government was in office, further representations were made to this House and in the meantime, not only in 1871 and 1872, but later and up as late as 1886, resolutions were passed unanimously by the provincial legislature sitting at Winnipeg recognizing the rights of these men, and spurning the idea that any difference existed between their claim at that time, and the claim of those who had already received their grants, and urging that cold justice be done the Red River settlers, and the settlers further west who had arrived between 1836 and 1870. Those resolutions were forwarded to the Governor General in Council at Ottawa, and as a result an investigation was ordered to be made in the Department of the Interior in pursuance of an address from the legislative council of Manitoba which arrived on the 8th day of February, 1872. On the 26th of April of the same year an order in council was passed deputing the department to institute an investigation into the claim and to report. The deputy minister, Mr. Burgess, made the investigation and the report.

But I venture to say, with all respect to his memory, that he seems to have misunderstood the purpose of the investigation. He seemed utterly to have misconceived the spirit of the claim which was made against the Dominion of Canada. Mr. Burgess appears to have understood that his mission was to ascertain the legal rights of those settlers, that is to say, whether or not those who had actual legal rights to defined territory at that time had those rights already conceded, or whether there were claims outstanding, and whether or not the parliament of Canada was in a position to resist the claims of the settlers who arrived between 1866 and 1886. His report bears out the interpretation that I say he put upon his mission. It refers to the care that has always been exercised in the department to see that each claim, as established, was recognized, and it contains these words:

Treaty No. 1, of the 3rd of August, 1871, St. Peter's Indian reserve, provides as follows: 'It being understood, however, that if at the date of the execution of this treaty there are any settlers within the bounds of any land reserved by the band, Her Majesty reserves the right to deal with such settlers as she shall deem just, so as not to diminish the extent of land allotted to the Indians.'

Mr. Burgess goes on to say that 'it is difficult to understand exactly what is meant' by the claims of the white settlers after 1835, and he goes on to quote the Acts of 1873 and 1874, and concludes by saying: ,

There never was any other legal provision for making any grant of scrip or land to settlers going into the country subsequent to 1835, except the provisions contained in the Manitoba Act for quieting the title of those in possession at the time of the transfer; nor do I find any record in the department of any claim having been advanced or any other compensation than that provided for by the Manitoba Act.

Certainly he would not. No claim could be made legally on the department for any specific land unless it was specified with defined rights of occupancy. These are claims based on another principle altogether, namely, that those whose rights of occupation did not refer to particular lands at the time of the cession were just as much entitled to lands at the time of the cession as those who had particular lands. That Mr. Burgess seems to have missed. He further goes on to say that if an investigation were made as to the rights of those parties:

Such an inquiry could not fail, in my opinion, to have the effect of disturbing and disquieting the whole population of the province of Manitoba, and casting doubts upon the validity of every title hitherto granted by the Crown to claimants under the Manitoba Act.

That further establishes that nothing was done by the investigation of Mr. Burgess to ascertain the rights that these men advanced. How could the title to any lands already granted be affected by a general recognition of the right to 160 acres of land or scrip for it? It certainly could not. Those titles already recognized would of course be absolved from it, and they would be in the same position as any others entitled to make a selection just as those before them had done. I am utterly at a loss to understand the objections advanced by Mr. Burgess to the granting of this request. Well, the agitation continued to be kept up, and it was pressed with renewed vigour in 1905 and 1906. The reason of the agitation taking on renewed strength at that time was that those people relied on what they had already long considered—the original promise of the government that when the new territories were made into provinces those rights which at that time were ignored would be at last recognized. The territories were made into provinces in 1905, and from that time on a considerable body of settlers made the demand that their rights be recognized the same as those who had come earlier. Consequently the claim is utterly without foundation that the mere length of time that had elapsed since the original settlement was arrived at puts the matter past the stage of inquiry. In the first place, as I have stated, it falls because there is a trusteeship existing between the government and the people of Canada and those early settlers whose rights of possession and occupancy at least were not recogniezd by the settlement of July, 1870, and that that trusteeship exists absolutely puts it out of power to plead the lapse of time. Furthermore, it falls because the principle on which it stands does not exist in this case, namely, that they should have earlier pressed their claims to obtain recognition. Ever since the claims were advanced they have been pressed with as much persistency as we could expect under the difficult circumstances in which the settlers were placed. So that it cannot be maintained that we are entitled to ignore their claims simply because 30 or 40 years have elapsed. Further, it cannot be argued, because there is a considerable body of evidence to indicate that their rights were actually recognized in 1871, and that they were promised grants at a future stage in the development of Canada. On these grounds it does not lie in the mouth of the government to-day to say to these men: 'You have waited too long; the lapse of 40 years deprives you of any claim; the unwritten law as to limitations shuts you up, and although you may have had a claim originally, although we recognize that you should not have been denied when your fellow-settlers' claims were granted, we say that you are shut out by the mere lapse of time.' If that defense falls, what defense is left? How can we justify ourselves for saying to these men: 'It is quite true, you went in there in 1836 and 1837, and up to 1870. You bore the burden and the heat of the day in pushing the frontiers of civilization into that country. You endured the trials and suffered the hardships. You faced the dangers and the perils in order that Manitoba particularly and western Canada in general should reach the state of civilization which she has at present attained. You ceded your country under the distinct promise that you would get ample justice, and that all claims of occupancy and possession would be recognized. You came into the contract absolutely entitled to recognition, but we will not recognize you.'

I say unless it can be argued that by virtue of the lapse of time they are not entitled to recognition, there is no ground at all for refusing to recognize them. Now the government comes and says. 'It is because in the meantime we have adopted a policy—good though it may be—because in the meantime we have changed the policy of this country, we must refuse to make any land grants and we cannot recognize your claim, however just.' I do not need to spend much time in disposing of that, because it disposes of itself. These men are not to be affected by any change of the policy of Canada, their rights accrued long prior to this change. Although it may interfere with the form of the grant, it cannot interfere with the principle, and it cannot be urged in defence of the policy of non recognition. Their rights, whatever they were, were just the same as were the rights of those who came before them—they were greater than those who were born between 1870 and 1874—they were greater and on a higher plane than many which were recognized, and we cannot say to them now that because we chose to adopt a policy in which we could not grant that recognition in just the same form as we granted it before, we will not grant any recognition at all.

Now, that is the position taken by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) as I understand it. The government of this country speaking through the right hon. the Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of the Interior denied recognition to the early settlers who came in between 1836 and 1870. There was no other ground advanced, so far as I can see, and there is no other ground that could be advanced. I argue that it is the duty of the government to ascerain by what means they can give substantial justice to these later arrivals—to these men who stood the greater share of the burden, and who shouldered the greater proportion of the difficulties. This class of men cannot always come to parliament and ask that justice be done them. In the very nature of things they are to-day well advanced in years, and will before long have disappeared from the earth. Many of them are in more or less destitute circumstances. No doubt a good many of them are prosperous, but still some of them are in such circumstances as to warrant the government in general taking steps to see that justice is done to them. It is the duty of the government to see without delay if some method cannot be devised whereby the claim of these men will be recognized.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Huron). I wish to say a word or two in connection with this matter. I did not know that the question was to come up to day, or I would have had more information to lay before the House. However, there is one case which I would like to bring to the attention of the government. I remember when I was a lad, my nearest neighbour was one of the first men who settled in the Red River district in 1812 and 1813. His name was John Cooper. This man was accused wrongfully of a crime, after he had been long on his land. He was brought to the city of Montreal and kept there in confinement for nearly a year. At the end of this time he proved his innocence and was liberated. He went to work on a building in order that he might earn sufficient money to return to his home in the west. But during the course of his work he fell from the building and when I knew him he had been an invalid for many years. John Cooper had lived for years and years on his land where the city of Winnipeg stands to day. He had raised his family there, but after he was taken to Montreal his land was taken from them, and I understand, was sold by the Dominion of Canada. When he came to this country, Lord Selkirk promised to give him a deed to certain land, if he would settle on it. He fulfilled his part of the contract, yet the land has been taken from him and his family.

If I cannot do any more for my good old neighbour, I will put on 'Hansard' the story of the injustice which he suffered. We all know that Lord Selkirk in his will left one-tenth of his lands to be given to these settlers. That land extended not only through Manitoba, but all the way up to Fort Carleton, Saskatchewan, and also into the state of Minnesota.

This is a part of Minnesota that the American government have succeeded in wheedling and defrauding us out of. That was granted to Lord Selkirk, and one-tenth of it was left to the settlers. And here is a settler who, after living for years and years on his land has it taken from him, and I suppose it is now laid out in town lots and is sold at $30, $40 or $50 a foot. I think the government might do something for the descendants of John Cooper. If not, at least the whole story of the way he has been wronged and his descendants neglected will be recorded in ' Hansard.'

Mr. MONK. I endorse very cordially the claims made by my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). On more than one occasion since I have had the honour of a seat in parliament, I have heard the story of these settlers, and I have come to the conclusion that it is almost impossible to understand why their particular case was differentiated from those of other settlers of the same period and under the same circumstances. I have never to this day heard a reason given why a distinction was made in the case of this particular class of settlers. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie has gone fully into their case. I have a number of documents connected with the case myself and have gone into the matter at different times. The hon.

gentleman has admirably and fully exposed the merits of their claim. What is the reason that their claim has been neglected? I take it that the reason is that their claims must have fallen for consideration into the hands of employees of the department who viewed the claims in the purely legal aspect. Of course, it could easily be established that on strictly legal grounds they had no claim upon the government. And the report being to the effect that they had no claim, the ministers in charge at the time—I do not know what their colour was—would be glad to get rid of the claim without looking at the equitable side of the matter. I think that at this moment, in view of the settlements that are made in the west, the government might very well take up these claims and put these dissatisfied people upon the same basis as those around them. We are told the government has a policy, that it cannot without violating that policy take up these claims and render justice. But the policy of this government seems to be singular in the extreme, our immigration policy has led us to make the freest concessions to newcomers. That we should extend facilities to newcomers when they desire to settle in the northwest is reasonable enough, but why should we be so hard towards the old settlers, the Fenian raiders, for instance excellent Canadians who could put forth some claim to merit acquired and who would make the very best class of settlers for the northwest? Why should we treat the Doukhobors so generously when they arrived in this country and yet adopt the policy under which we make it so difficult for good settlers from the older provinces to get any advantage in going to settle in that country. Our policy it seems to me is too generous to strangers and too hard, too rigid, too much based upon purely legal considerations when we are dealing with our own people. On the contrary, with our own people we should be most openhanded and generous with the great wealth of land we have in the west.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). I do not wish to traverse the very carefully prepared and very elaborate statement of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) at any great length and would not have done so were it not for the support which he has received. But, in view of that support, and the attitude taken by those who give that support, I think it is necessary, perhaps, to say a few words on the subject. And, if I have to do so, I might as well begin at the beginning and allude to the apology which my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie offered at the beginning of his remarks, when he said he would not be accused of obstruction in bringing up this question. I would not have accused him of obstruction. But my hon. friend knows that 'to excuse is to accuse.' When he proffers an excuse he leaves an opening for an accusation; and it may not be out of place for us to consider just how far such an excuse was necessary in this case.

We have here a matter which was disposed of thirty-five years ago by the parliament of Canada,—disposed of finally by that parliament on a second attempt to dispose of it. That is to say, parliament dealt with the question in 1872 and again in 1874, and it has not dealt with it since. It seems to me that a question such as this might very well have stood for a little while longer under all the special circumstances of the case, without seriously damaging it. I notice on the Order Paper that this parliament has a great deal of business to do, pressing and important business, business which is not thirty-five years old, and has not been off the books for that length of time, but business that is on the books and awaiting action and for which the country is demanding action, or at any rate requiring it. May I just draw the attention of the House for a few moments to some of these matters which, at the instance of my hon. friend, have been compelled to give way in order that the claims of these old settlers should be brought before parliament on this particular occasion. First, we have the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means, to discuss, and to carry, if possible, a measure of tariff reduction which, I submit on the statement of our friends on the other side, has not been equalled in importance by any matter that has come before parliament since confederation. Surely, that was a matter that was entitled to precedence even over the claims of the old settlers, these claims of thirty-five years ago. But, even if we had disposed of that question, there are a number of other matters to which I think it might be well to draw attention. I notice, for instance, that there is a large body of legislation by orders in council dealing with the administration of the lands, timber and minerals of this country under the control of the Dominion of Canada which requires confirmation by parliament.

If it should happen that it does not receive that confirmation during this session of parliament, then this legislation by order in council becomes invalid under the statute. Surely this is a matter of somewhat pressing importance, and might well have had precedence after we had disposed of reciprocity. There is another matter I find here—speaking of matters that particularly concern my own department, and my duties in the House. There is the Manitoba Grain Act, which was brought down from the Senate after having occupied the attention of that body for a number of weeks; it is an Act that is absolutely urgent, if the views and requirements of the people of the west are to be met. This Bill was brought before the House immediately before adjournment, it was not possible to get the Bill passed at that time, but it awaits consideration by this House now, it pressingly awaits consideration, otherwise it cannot be brought into effect so as to be of any advantage for the crop of this year. There is a Bill regarding Chinese immigration. We have had a debate on Chinese immigration in this House; it is known that the Chinese Act requires amendment. The Bill was brought in some time ago, it did not receive consideration then, it claims consideration now, but it cannot get it; it has to take second place to the claims made by our friends on behalf of the old settlers of the Red river. There is an important Bill respecting banks and banking under the name of the Minister of Finance on the importance of which I need not enlarge.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was mentioning a number of measures of importance before the House which might have claimed attention in preference to the subject which is now under discussion without in any degree minimizing the importance of that subject. I mentioned among other things the Bank Act which is on the Order Paper for amendment. I had not reached a conclusion in regard to that. The Bank Act was so urgent that in view of the fact that it had not been possible to push it forward an interim Act had to be passed, and at the present time the country has failed to get the advantage of the Bank Act as prepared and made ready for the House. Another subject which is of some importance to some part of the Dominion which I might mention is an Act relating to waters in the railway belt and Peace river block of land, a matter upon the early adjustment of which depends the value of many thousands of dollars worth of property in British Columbia. A Bill of the same nature was introduced last session, it stood over, it was introduced again this session, and to-day these rights are being sacrificed for the lack of this or similar legislation. Another matter that I might mention is an amendment to the Railway Act which was under consideration in the last few days before adjournment, an amendment brought in by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) for the purpose of protecting the rights of owners of live stock which stock has been injured by the railway. It was not possible under the circumstances to secure the concurrence of the House in that provision at the time. It awaits the action of the House, and if I understand the situation the farming interests of the west certainly demand its passage at this session. I would not use the word 'obstruction' to characterize the very carefully prepared and well presented case laid before the House by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) in regard to these old settlers' rights, but I will say that with a question of such paramount importance as reciprocity before the House, unless the English language has lost its meaning, an amendment moved to the motion to take up that question must certainly be an obstruction of the discussion of the question, and therefore of the business of the House. I am sure that the ordinary elector will wonder how it is that, when there is this important question to be decided, and when there are these important matters upon the Order Paper which ought to receive the attention of the House, the House has plenty of time to spend in discussing the question of a right, which, to put it most mildly, is thirty-five years old, and which was decided upon by the House of Commons, and the government thirty-five years ago. Every thing in its place, there is a time during the session when matters of lesser importance, and which are less pressing may be fairly and reasonably discussed, but I do submit that a claim of this character brought forward at this stage of the session, with the Order Paper crowded as it is, and with a discussion such as that now before the House going on, can scarcely in fairness be called a subject of fair or proper consideration. But, however, whatever may have been the purpose of the hon. gentleman who made the motion, there is no question as to the purpose of those who support him. It was not more to secure certain so-called rights of people who are spoken of as the pioneers of Rupert's Land as to create sympathy for them in regard to the deprivation of these rights and therefore to secure disapproval of the government and its policy to a very much farther reaching extent. As to the merits of the question, I think the hon. member for Portage la Prairie stated the case very clearly and fairly when he said that the statute of limitations or the law of limitations was a right and proper law and must necessarily apply. The reason for that law is that as time goes on new conditions arise under which conditions it becomes impossible to give countenance to a certain claim because of other rights which have arisen under this new condition. In regard to the claim made by those pioneers, whatever may have been the merit of their claim in the first place, and they pressed it at that time, and it was decided upon by the government and parliament of that day and decided against them, there is no question that the concession of their request to-day would not be in the best interests of western Canada or of the people of western Canada, speaking at large. There is also a difference between the granting of a claim at that day and the granting of the same claim to-day. At that time the scrip right to 160 acres had a very minimum value. It might have been worth $160, and it might not have been worth nearly so much. I doubt very much if it would be worth that much. To-day a similar scrip claim upon 160 acres would probably be worth from $1,200 to $1,600. There is a difference of ten times the value between a grant made in those days and a grant as it would be made to-day. That is an important change in the conditions which no government could fail to recognize.

On this question of the issue of scrip, the conclusion has been reached by the government that there should not be any further issue of land scrip in the western provinces. It is recognized that the issue of land scrip in the past has not resulted in the well-being of those provinces, it has not resulted to the good of the people of the provinces, it has not promoted their settlement or welfare.

In the first place when scrip was issued it was intended to act as an inducement to settlement. A man was given a property right and on the strength of that he was expected some day to occupy the land and in that way add to the wealth and improvement of the country. But, as a matter of fact, in practice these scrip rights have been used for speculative rather than for settlement purposes in the proportion of probably five to one, and on behalf of the actual settler of the country, the man who goes in there as a homesteader to earn his right to his land, to whom the occupation of the surrounding land is of prime and vital importance, it is not advisable that there should be further issues of land scrip. If there is to be sympathy for any one it should be for the honest settler who is honestly and fairly endeavouring to establish himself on the prairie or in the woods, and who is handicapped to a very great extent by these issues of scrip which allow land to be held without occupation as half-breed or old settlers scrip does allow it to be held, I think it would be certainly an offence against the welfare and well being of the country if the government should, under any possible circumstances except the fulfilment of obligations already entered into, further issue this sort of scrip. The contention that the government occupies the position of a trustee towards these people is not well founded. In order that there shall be a trusteeship there must be a right and the hon. gentleman admitted in the very beginning of his argument that there was no right, that whatever grant was given to the old settlers who came in from 1813 to 1835 was given as an act of grace, and not as a matter of right. Then if there is no right on their part there can be no trusteeship on ours and their claim to this grant must rest on other grounds than that; as to what grounds they can rest their claims upon I am not here to say.

It is argued that because a certain grant was made to the settlers who came in between 1813 and 1835, therefore settlers who came after 1835 are entitled to a grant. I am unable to follow the reasoning. It may be that the grant to settlers between 1813 and 1835 may have been made without due warrant for aught I know. At any rate the fact that the parliament which made that grant refused to make a grant for the time following 1835 is surely sufficient reason for this parliament to say that the case is closed, that unless a good reason can be shown, unless some tangible ground can be shown wherein these people have a tangible right, this government or this parliament should not reopen the question. So far from the fact that the government of that day did not extend the right beyond 1835 being a reason for our extending it, I submit in all fairness and all reason that the fact that they, with all the knowledge they had of all the circumstances and of their responsibility did not extend it beyond that time, is certainly not a reason why we should, unless some tangible and definite reason is produced, such as has not yet been produced.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The minister treated the House to a number of reasons why nothing should be done at the present time. He says that the fact that parliament granted land to the settlers between 1813 and 1835, was no reason why the settlers coming in subsequently to that were entitled to any consideration. That might or might not be the case, but the fact that they granted land to settlers who came in between 1813 and 1835 when the conditions were much the same as the conditions after 1835, would seem to indicate that those who came in after 1835 were entitled to the same consideration. The minister has not given the House to understand that settlers who came in after 1835 came in under any more favourable circumstances than those who came in between 1813 and 1835. He says that because land is more valuable today scrip will be worth ten times as much as it was 30 years ago, and that that is a reason why we should not give a land grant. If the consideration would be too high parliament could reduce it to a reasonable and proper amount. The minister said that because this was a case 35 years old, it should not be settled. By the same line of reasoning the claims of the provinces for increased subsidies which have been twice granted in 40 years, should not have been granted.

The minister has criticised the opposition because we have not dealt with several Bills of great importance which might have been passed if the opposition had not wasted so much time over the reciprocity resolutions. If the government were so anxious to pass these Bills they should have brought them in and attempted to pass them. The opposition have never attempted to prevent the Bills passing.

Mr. OLIVER. The opposition certainly prevented the Grain Bill and the clauses of the Railway Act relating to the killing of cattle from passing.

Mr. SPROULE. The opposition only endeavoured to secure features that would have made these fair Bills. They did not try to prevent the Bills going through. He mentioned also the Chinese Immigration Bill.

Mr. OLIVER. I, myself, presented that Bill to the House, and at the request of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) it was allowed to stand.

Mr. SPROULE. Why? Because of the absence of information that had been brought out by a Royal Commission and which the government would not present to the House although it had been in their possession for weeks.

Only the other day we had to hold up the House to get that information which should have been presented before we separated on the 19th of May. Then there was the Act respecting copyrights. That was held up by the government, not by the opposition. We did not try to prevent it passing, but endeavoured to help the government to make it as useful a measure as possible. The Bill respecting banks and banking, a very important Bill, the opposition never prevented passing. We were willing to go on and discuss it, but it was held up by the government. They held it up for the whole of last session, and it was at the request of the Minister of Finance that the Bank Act was then extended for another year, to enable the government to get certain information which they thought desirable. Practically the same thing happened this year. So that in no sense can the opposition be held responsible for that Act not passing. Another Bill is an Act relating to the water in the railway belt and Peace River block of land. Surely the hon. minister cannot say that the opposition is responsible for that Bill not passing, for the government did not bring it on or attempt to pass it. Had they done so, the opposition would certainly have made no effort to prevent it passing at the earliest possible date. Then, there is the Bill to amend the Dominion Lands Act. Does the Minister of the Interior pretend to say that the opposition tried to hold that up? I heard nothing of it. So it is with a number of these Bills that he claims might have been passed but for the action of the opposition. In what way the action of the opposition prevented the government bringing on these measures and attempting to pass them I am at a loss to understand. I think that when the hon. minister thinks seriously over this again, he will feel that he did the opposition a great injustice when he tried to saddle upon them the responsibility of these Bills not passing, which they were ready to help the government to pass if the government had brought them on.

Mr. HAGGART (Winnipeg). The hon. the Minister of the Interior, by the statement he made in answer to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), has given me the text for a speech, and consequently has enabled me to contribute a little towards the obstruction of the opposition to the passing of this reciprocity matter. My speech, however, the first since the re-assembling of the House, will be a short one. The Minister of the Interior tells us that the opposition obstructed the passing of the Grain Bill. We have the pleasure occasionally of a visit in Manitoba from the hon. minister on his passage to and fro between here and the foothills of the Rocky Mountains. On those occasions he sometimes undertakes to preach a sermon. On a missionary tour through Manitoba a few weeks ago he preached the gospel of reciprocity. He did not discuss the Grain Bill in the city of Winnipeg, but he did so away in the northwestern part of the province, where no grain men live, and in Dominion city, in the southwestern part of the province, where no grain men live; and I will quote the words put into his mouth by two Winnipeg papers, the 'Tribune' and the 'Free Press,' and I will characterize this statement, taken from one of these newspapers—I do not refer to it as a part of his speech, because that would be unparliamentary—as one of the meanest representations ever made on a public platform. It contains just enough fact to make it stick, but it is an untruthful representation all the same. Here is the statement:

Turning to the terminal elevator question, Mr. Oliver stated that very powerful interests were opposed to government ownership, and the solution of a commission had been decided upon by the government as an experiment. When the Bill came to the House from the Senate, where it had been discussed at length, he had asked the House to pass it without amendment, but Alexander Haggart, of Winnipeg, and other western members, had refused his request, and had held up the Bill. Thus the chance of having the Bill in operation for this year's crop had been jeopardized. The west should deal with those members.

Now, let us see what was done. Important Bills of this nature are usually brought into the Commons first, and then go to the Senate; but for some unaccountable reason, the promoters of this Bill brought it into the Senate in the early part of the session, before the reciprocity resolutions were introduced into this House. There that Bill slumbered all winter, and into the early months of spring. The first opportunity we had of making any observations on that Bill was when the hon. gentleman moved the second reading; and when was that? On the last day before adjournment. It was a Bill of 242 sections. Why, it would have taken the whole of that sitting for the clerk to have read the Bill. I had the temerity to make a few observations on that Bill. Remember, it was introduced into this parliament before there was any thought of reciprocity. It makes changes in the old conditions that were asked for by the farmers, and not one section of it was objected to by the grain men. Here we have a Bill regulating the trade of one of the largest businesses in this country, in which millions of dollars are invested every year, which taxes the ability of our financial institutions to buy and store the grain and market it in foreign countries. In conversation with grain men in Winnipeg, every one of whom forgets every night more than the Minister of the Interior ever knew about the grain business, although they did not object to a clause in the Bill under existing conditions they said that it would make matters perfectly ridiculous. It would result in this, that the grain men, the merchants, and the institutions financing all that business would be sent to do business in Minneapolis, Duluth and Chicago, where they would not be subject to the discipline that is provided for in that Bill. I had the temerity to say a few words. I did not speak more than a few minutes. There were other gentlemen in this House who represented just as good a sentiment in that northwest country as the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) and who had the temerity to make some observations in reference to the Bill. That whole debate did not last more than an hour, and there was not an unnecessary word said. Then what happened? The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) rose in his place and said:

Mr. FIELDING. It is quite evident that this Bill can hardly be classed among the non-contentious measures; and as hours and even minutes are beginning to become very precious if we are to carry out our intention of adjourning, I would suggest that the debate should be adjourned and the Bill stand over.

Mr. KING moved the adjournment of the debate.

So much for this Bill, and I have no doubt that a great deal I have said is applicable to the other Bills which the hon. gentleman has cited as not having passed through this House. This claim of the old settlers is thirty-five years old. Has it lost any merits? Is it barred by the Statute of Limitations? Not at all. No Statute of Limitations runs against the King, whose representative the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) is. It would be a poor law that would not work both ways, and it would be no credit to the government if they asked for the protection of a statute which would not be any defence to them. The fact that this Bill is 35 years old does not detract in any way from its merits. I admit that these people have no legal claim, any more than the men who fought in South Africa, or the men who received these land grants in our Northwestern country. It is a matter of grace. However, their claim is as good to-day as it was when they first acquired it—I mean as a matter of merit.

We will continue to receive in good nature the lectures which have been given to us from time to time by the hon. gentlemen, but we shall continue to perform our duty and express our approval or disapproval of what may come from the other side of the House.

VOTERS' LISTS IN ORGANIZED DISTRICTS.

Mr. BOYCE. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer briefly to a matter which was mentioned in this House on Friday, 21st inst., in connection with the lists in the organized or unorganized portions of Ontario. I would draw the attention of the House to the statements made by the hon. Minister of Justice with reference to the position of things. By reference to 'Hansard' you will find that I drew the attention of the government to the position of the law with regard to the making of the lists in the unorganized districts of Ontario, and asked certain specific questions. I asked:

Has there been a proclamation under the Act of 1908 prescribing an earlier day for the making up of the voters' lists? if so, when will the work of enumeration be started and how long is it expected, from the most recent advice the government has, that it will take; and, will the government see to it that the Board of Registration is prevented in this instance from arrogating to itself the functions of government by abridging the time which by this Act is directed to be followed as far as possible.

To this the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) replied:

In regard to the present situation, fortunately we are not in the same position that existed three years ago No one, I presume, has any expectation that the general elections which follow upon a dissolution of this House, are any where in sight, or are at all liable to take place until there has been at least one session or perhaps two sessions more. In these circumstances there seems no danger to be apprehended that it may be found necessary an the part of the learned judges who are at present engaged in the preparation of these lists to curtail at all the time which the statute provides for taking the various steps.

I had pointed out to the Minister of Justice the very grave injustice which had been done to this country prior to the last general election by the Board of Registration being permitted to shorten the statutory periods fixed for the making up of these voters' lists, and I drew the attention of the Minister of Justice to the facts concerning the violations of the law in 1908 so that there might be no repetition of these violations at this election. I pointed out to the hon. gentleman, that the populated area in these unorganized territories of New Ontario, and for which voters' lists would be made up had been considerably enlarged since the last election, and that the means of communication were considerably more difficult than they were in 1908, therefore we were at more inconvenience than in 1908, and, if the inconvenience of shortening the time was great in 1908, it is greater still now, with the larger area and more difficult communication.

Under the machinery which governs the Dominion Elections Act, section 9a provides that the first step is a proclamation. This proclamation has to run for 30 days. After this we have the posting of the lists and then a further period of 15 days for appeal. These are all fair and reasonable periods, having regard to the immense expanse of territory to be covered and the amount of information to be obtained in order to get a fair list. In 1908, the statutory period from the 1st August to the 15th October was not sufficient to enable the preparation of the lists. As I pointed out to the House the other day, it took practically from the 1st August to midday October 26—the day of the election—to get these lists completed, and on the ground ready for the polls. As a matter of fact, by the opening of the Printing Bureau on Sunday, the running of a special train from Ottawa to Sault Ste. Marie at the expense of the government and a further train along the Algoma Central from Sault Ste. Marie to mile 68, also at the expense of the government, the lists were at the polls, completed and revised, three hours after the polls had opened. That ought to be sufficient to show that the statutory periods were short enough, and that there was little to be gained along the line of doing justice to the people by shortening the time any further.

Now the hon. Minister of Justice gave a very peculiar reply, as will be seen. He said:

In these circumstances there seems no danger to be apprehended that it may be found necessary on the part of the learned judges who are at present engaged in the preparation of these lists to curtail at all the time which the statute provides for taking the various steps.

According to the information which I hold in my hand, and which was within the knowledge of the Minister of Justice, that was an attempt to deceive this House. For, at that time, the Minister of Justice knew perfectly well that, prepared in his office and signed by his deputy was a proclamation by which the time under the statute for making up these lists had been shortened to two months. Instead of allowing from the 1st of August to the 15th of October, this proclamation directed that the lists should be prepared between the 18th of July and the 18th of September. This document which was known to the minister, is in direct contradiction of the statement he made on the 21st of July. I say that such a condition of things calls for protest and strong expression of resentment which I now desire to give. One does expect, when he asks in a reasonable manner for information from a minister of the Crown, especially on a non-political subject, or one that is supposed to be non-political, and more especially when the person of whom the question is asked is the chief judicial executive of the Dominion, that he will receive a fair statement of the facts as known to the minister. But when the minister deliberately descends to giving to the House information entirely contrary to what he knows to be correct, that calls, as I say, for a strong expression of resentment from members on both sides of the House. I ask the attention of the House to this matter, that my resentment of the minister's answer may be made known, and that the country may take knowledge of the lamentable and pitiable position to which ministers of the Crown descend to delude members on this side with inaccurate information. I hope the Minister of Justice will rise in his place now and give to the House some reasonable explanation of the extraordinary statements contained in his answer in contrast with this proclamation.

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). I do not feel that I am called upon to make any explanation of the matter. I am quite sure that every member of this House understood the remarks I made on Friday last in reference to the probability of an election within a short time in the future in exactly the sense in which I intended them to be understood. I am quite sure there was no one in this House who was deceived in any way by what I said, nor did I intend that anybody should be. And, especially with regard to the proclamation with reference to the preparations of the voters' lists in the unorganized portions of the province of Ontario, the hon. gentleman must attribute to his fellow members in this House a degree of lack of perception beyond the ordinary if he supposes that anyone could think another would be deceived on a subject of that sort by what was said on Friday last with a proclamation on the subject appearing on Saturday. At the time I was speaking, on Friday, I was, of course, perfectly aware of the fact that a proclamation was pending, that the proclamation had been prepared, and would appear in the 'Gazette' of the following day. What that has to do with what I said upon the Friday I am not able to understand. With regard to the whole question of the preparation of the voters' lists in the unorganized territory I have nothing to add to or subtract from what I said on Friday. I am not here defending the statute referred to; that statute is not at present under consideration. When it was before a previous parliament for consideration I defended it. I thought it was proper legislation; I stated so then; I think so still; I state so still. It is an Act which is not now under the consideration of this House, the provisions of which need not be, so far as I can see, debated; at all events, it is not my intention to debate them. Under the statute, this parliament delegated to the judges of the district courts of that territory the duty of preparing the lists, having regard, as far as possible to the dates for the various steps prescribed by the provincial statute. Upon the judges that duty and responsibility rests, and that duty and responsibility is not being interferred with in any degree by the Minister of Justice, or, so far as I am aware, by any member of the government.

Mr. BOYCE. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He states that he knew at the time he gave the information to the House that the proclamation had been prepared. And that was the very question that I asked and that he did not answer. For he said, at page 10095 of 'Hansard' 'the matter referred to is not in any way in the hands of the Department of Justice.' As he had the knowledge that the proclamation had been issued, why, when I asked him the direct question, did he not give the informaton to the House instead of giving the information that the matter was not in the hands of his department at all?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyce) reiterates in spite of what I said that I attempted to mislead the House, I have only to give that statement an unqualified denial.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Commitee of Ways and Means.

WAYS AND MEANS — RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. W. R. SMYTH (Algoma). Last Friday when we adjourned the debate, it was my misfortune to have the floor. And resuming that debate this evening, I do not expect to detain the House at any great length. However, the attitude of the government and its supporters leads one on this side of the House to the necessity of taking up a longer time than would be necessary had we not a lot of gentlemen on the opposite side who are not only bound but gagged and not able to take part in this debate. We might possibly shorten our remarks in this discussion had we enlightment from gentlemen who now sit opposite us as dumb as oysters.

There are some provinces of this Dominion from which no one has been heard, sitting on the government side of the House. But on this side, every province has been heard from, except Prince Edward Island, and the hon. member representing that island on the opposition side will be heard from in due time. On Friday last the Minister of Finance and myself had a little discussion over the lumber question, and I endeavoured to show that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs did not know their business when they were dickering at Washington on the lumber question. I was endeavouring to show that these two gentlemen, these two wandering, weary Willies, wandered away to Washington with the idea in their noddles that they understood every phase of every question in regard to every industry of this country affected by this pact, but we find that they were very remiss in regard to the lumber interest. We have heard a great deal in this House about its importance. We have heard of its importance in British Columbia the other day, and last night we heard of its importance from the Minister of Public Works who represents a constituency in New Brunswick. Now the Minister of Public Works last night, I thought, was endeavouring to come to the rescue of his friend the Minister of Finance, and was endeavouring to enlighten the House on the shingle question. He laid great stress on the fact that they had put the duty back to the old rate, from 50 to 30 cents a thousand on shingles. But that was not at all the argument this side was putting up. Here are two gentlemen invited down to Washington to make a bargain with regard to reciprocity, and the lumber question comes up, the lumber industries of the two countries. Now, my point is that, having been invited down to Washington to make this treaty, if they had had the interest of this country at heart, or the interest of the lumber industry at heart, they would have seen to it that Canadian shingles entered the United States on the same footing as United States shingles come into Canada. That would have been something like a reciprocity treaty. I endeavoured last Friday night to enlighten the Minister of Finance on this question, but the Minister of Public Works, in coming to the rescue of his colleague in regard to shingles, carefully avoided the question of the entry of lumber into this country, partly dressed, and in some cases fully dressed. He forgot to tell us that while the Americans are allowed to send their dressed lumber or partly dressed lumber into Canada free of duty, we are not allowed to send a single board into that country if there is one scratch of a plane upon it. I want to emphasize that. I say that if the hon. gentlemen who went to Washington to make this treaty had had the interest of the country at heart, they would have seen to it that the American duty, instead of being reduced from $1.75 to $1.25, was taken off altogether.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman says we should have asked for certain things in return for what we were giving. In this agreement, what were we giving the Americans in respect to lumber?

Mr. SMYTH. I am not taking that point at all. If the Minister of Public Works had known anything about lumber he would have seen to it that the Americans gave us reciprocity in lumber.

Mr. FIELDING. If my hon. friend will allow me—he says that in return for what we were giving we should have got certain things which he described. I ask him what were we giving in this reciprocity agreement to the Americans as respects lumber?

Mr. SMYTH. Have they not enjoyed free lumber from Canada for many years?

Mr. FIELDING. That is not the question.

Mr. SMYTH. You have got nothing at all from them.

Mr. FIELDING. As respects lumber we did not give them anything at all, they are getting nothing with respect to lumber, that they have not had for nearly twenty years.

Mr. SMYTH. The hon. gentleman is not going to be allowed to give away the trade and commerce of this country into the hands of the United States. I say he was remiss in his duty towards Canada when dealing with them in any shape or form, that he did not secure the free entry of Canadian lumber into that country the same as we give to their lumber. The hon. gentleman says that he was giving them nothing. I do not know why he should have been so anxious to deal with them at all. The Americans do not dicker with anybody unless they see some profit in it. They got everything they asked for from Canada, and if they had asked for more they would have got it. When I was speaking on Friday night I referred to the danger of this country dealing with the Americans in this matter at all, and in the way proposed. I was trying to show the House, as the hon. member for Vancouver says, in my weak and squeaky voice, that there was a real danger in this country entering into this pact with the United States at all. Yesterday the Minister of Finance, when he was trying to make a little campaign speech, made light of some of the statements made by the senators and representatives on the American side. I can hardly understand why the minister should make light of those gentlemen, in face of some of the remarks they have made. This House has heard quoted over and over again the remarks of Mr. Champ Clarke, of Mr. Wilson, the Secretary of Agriculture, of Senator McColl, of Senator Cummins, of Iowa, of Mr. Prince, of Illinois.

I am not going to trouble you with them all, but I have one or two that I wish to bring to the attention of the House. Mr. Prince, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives some time ago, made this statement:

> What is the history of the American people?

I want to lay this before the hon. gentlemen who have British blood coursing through their veins, and to ask them whether they feel like entering into a pact with the United States, when the gentlemen who represent the United States have in their breasts this sentiment, which has been expressed by them time and time again:

> What is the history of the American people? We might as well be frank and honest. Americans went into Texas, Americanized it, and it was annexed as part of this great Union. Americans went into Hawaii, Americanized it, and annexed it. And if these bright young men that the President speaks of in his speech—these clever, active, virile, vigorous young men from the farms of Illinois and the northern states, the thousands and hundreds of thousands of them—go up into that northland, 92 or 100 and more on this side, as against seven on the other, what do you think will be the effect of it?

That is how they feel about it. What will the effect be once they get the upper hand in this country? They will Americanize it as they did Texas and other parts. I am not going to bother the House with any more extracts. This is a feeling that exists with nine-tenths of the American people to-day. In travelling all over this country, as I have done during the time that this subject has been up for discussion before the House, I have met a great many American people and I am safe in saying that nine-tenths of them consider that this is the first step towards being annexed to them sooner or later. I am sure there are dozens of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and some on the other side of the House who know that these people take that view. There is a real danger of the American people getting the upper hand in this country. There is a real danger of the American people getting the upper hand of our farming interests. We are one as against twelve. There has been much stress is laid on the fact that we are opening up a great market for our farmers, but the fact has been lost sight of that we are opening up a great market for the American farmers, a market of twelve to one for the goods that come into this country. If you are entering into negotiations with a corporation, whether you go into the deal with them or not, they stand out always for the best end of it. In this matter they have stood out and got everything they asked for. I think I would be remiss in my duty to my constituents, and to the people of Canada, and that I would also be ignoring the traditions that I was brought up to believe in, and my devotion to British institutions if I were to record my vote in behalf of this pact. I intended placing on 'Hansard' some other matters here that are very pertinent to this question, but I will reserve them until some future time. They refer to the trade and commerce of this country. This is the second time that I have had an opportunity of placing my views before the House on this matter, and I was most anxious to have the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) in his place. He may be home sleeping but he is not attending to what he is paid to attend to by the people of Canada. Here is a question so important that, according to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), all other business before the House has to stand aside. If it is so important why is it not necessary for the Minister of Customs to be in the House. We have also the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Where is he—asleep in the Senate chamber? When we require any information from his department we are told by the right hon. Prime Minister, or some other hon. gentleman who might be leading the House, that in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, he is not able to reply, but he will find out from the old gentleman just as soon as he can, and will bring the information to the House. The people of this country expect active gentlemen at the head of every department of this or any other government. I am not casting any reflection on any gentleman who is sitting in this House in that regard, but it is an outrage when we have an important matter such as this is before the House that we have not the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Trade and Commerce in their places. I have perhaps taken up as much time as I ought, and unless the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) wants to tackle me on the lumber question, I do not know very well what I should say. But, just one matter comes to my mind in regard to the lumber interests as to how this measure affects the farmer. I said the other day that I would much prefer seeing a duty of $2 per thousand placed on southern pine and Michigan hemlock to seeing the duty removed from lumber entering Canada, and the Minister of Finance at that time said that it was not their policy and that they did not intend to do any such thing. But he forgot that he was throwing a stone in the face of the farmers in the newer parts of this country. The farmers of new or northern Ontario who are ocupying farms largely covered with hemlock and other cheap grades of timber heretofore have had a fairly good market, but owing to the fact that the gentlemen who own the southern timber have large tracts of land, and that their payments are now pressing them, they are making a dumping ground of Canada for their lumber. The gentlemen who own these limits in the south are only paying 50 cents per thousand feet stumpage, they are only paying a nominal yearly ground rent and they are geting their lumbering done at fifty and sixty cents per day by negro labour, as against the lumbermen and farmers of this country who receive from $2.50 to $3.75 per day. That southern lumber is being dumped into Canada as against the farmer of Ontario, at least,and I have no doubt the same condition obtains in Quebec, New Brunswick and British Columbia and is sold at much below the price at which the farmers are able to produce their hemlock and spruce timber.

As I said the other night, you will find every mill yard in the district which I have the honour to represent piled high with lumber that should be used by the Canadian people that is now standing rotting on the piles, while American lumber is allowed in to take its place. I hope our weak and humble efforts will have so affected the government and the gentlemen responsible for the delay and obstruction in the passage of the several measures referred to by the Minister of the Interior, that they will at once grant an appeal to the people. The Minister of the Interior says that some very important matters have had to lie over because we chose to act in the interests of our constituents and to debate this subject, and he says we are obstructionists. I say the whole responsibility for any loss of time or of anything else that has been caused by this reciprocity debate rests on the government, because, at the beck and call of the American President, they have introduced what I might call a crime against the people of this country, this pact with the American government. If they had not introduced this measure the wheels of progress would have gone on in this House and we would have been able to pass the important measures about which the Minister of the Interior is so much concerned. The right hon. the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance understand that the wheels of progress can only go on in this House when they give way to the will of those who represent the majority of the people, I ask them to advance it and to advance it in the quickest way we know, that is by going before the people who have sent us here and asking them to tell us how we should vote on this very important question.

Mr. S. SHARPE (North Ontario) I had hoped that the government and their supporters would have seen fit to withdraw from this unfortunate pact after having had an opportunity during the recess of consultation with their supporters and after reflection and analysis, and after having fully digested the details of this agreement. Of course I quite understand that such an attitude would have entailed heart burnings and humiliations and possibly withdrawal from the cabinet of the two ministers responsible for this unfortunate agreement. I suppose it is too much to expect such self-sacrifice from the hon. gentlemen who went to Washington to negotiate this important treaty on behalf of the farmers of this country. I would like to know where the champions of this agreement are to-day. Their voices are silent as the tomb; outside of the cabinet ministers no voices are raised in defence of this agreement, it has assumed the position of an undefended case. When the Finance Minister first introduced this agreement an hon, member supporting the government rushed from the House and telegraphed to the paper supporting the government in his constituency that it was the greatest act of diplomacy in the history of Canada, of great importance to the farmers of Ontario and showed statesmanship almost divine. After the hon. gentleman had recovered from his spasm and after the facts in regard to the twelve favoured nations had been extracted from the hon. gentleman, I might almost say at the point of the bayonet, by the leader of the opposition, after the subject had been thoroughly discussed and the hostility of the people of the country aroused, the hon. gentleman to whom I refer was as dumb as an oyster, he has refused to raise his voice in the House in defence of the agreement.

One of the most remarkable features in connection with this whole treaty is the absolute lack of information on the part of our plenipotentiaries when they went to negotiate it. Our representatives going to Washington had no data or statistics or detailed information upon which they could form an intelligent judgment or negotiate an intelligent treaty for the farmers of this country. In their hurry and anxiety to complete this agreement and to accomplish something to divert attention from their long record of maladministration, of departmental inefficiency and their foolish naval policy, they neglected to fortify themselves with the necessary data which was in the possession of the American government.

On the 16th of March, I moved for a return in connection with certain important commodities which I, in my innocence, thought the ministers would have had under their hands. The return for which I moved called for the average prices of butter and eggs in London, England, for the past five years in comparison with the prices respectively in eastern provinces, in Montreal, in Toronto, in Minneapolis, in Chicago, in Detroit, in Buffalo, in Boston and in New York. The Minister of Agriculture took no exception to the order going and said he would supply the information in the course of a few days. After many days they refused to bring down the return and this was the letter that was laid upon the table of the House.

Trade and Commerce Department,
Ottawa, 25th March, 1911.
Order of the House.

Sir,—I beg to return you herewith your reference No. 172 for statement showing comparative prices of butter and eggs in London, England, and certain points in Canada and the United States. This department has no information upon the subject. Such average prices of butter and eggs, however, are published in trade papers all over the world which can be referred to by any one desiring the information.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. C. T. O'HARA,
Deputy Minister.

Thomas Mulvey, Esq.,
Under Secretary of State,
Ottawa.

The butter and egg industries are two of the most important branches of farming in the province of Ontario, and you would at least expect that the two ministers negotiating an important treaty like this would have had detailed information in regard to the comparative prices in the three countries. I also asked some questions in reference to the lack of information on the part of our representatives at Washington. The questions and answers appear in the 'Hansard' of April 10, 1911. They are as follows:

1. Was the purpose of entering into negotiations for reciprocity with the United States to secure better prices for Canadian produce?

The answer by the Finance Minister was:

The purpose of entering into negotiations for reciprocity with the United States was to obtain that expansion of market for Canadian products which has been sought by all governments in Canada since the formation of the Dominion.

An absolute evasion of the question which conveyed no information to any one requiring the answer to that simple question. I further asked:

2. Were the representatives of Canada before entering upon the negotiations supplied with comprehensive data and statistics collected by experts and officials covering a considerable period and showing a comparative list of prices of all products in the principal markets of Canada and the United States?
3. If so, will data and statistics be available to the members of the House by laying them on the table of the House?
4. Generally speaking, how do the prices of farm products in the United States compare with the prices in Canada?
5. Upon what information is the answer to the preceding question based?

The answer to these questions was:

2 and 5. These questions have been fully discussed in the House since the hon. member placed his question on the notice paper and the views of the government thereon have been stated.

While the question was on the Order Paper, the discussion to which the Minister of Finance referred took place on the 6th of April, and during that discussion we had this remarkable statement by the Minister of Finance. Speaking of the commissioners appointed by the United States government to thoroughly investigate conditions in Canada, he said:

That commission has been conducting investigations not only here but in other countries, and the information was probably necessary for our American neighbours, when they were entering upon a new and radical departure from their past fiscal policy.

As though we were not entering on as radical a change in our fiscal policy as the ministers were in theirs. He further goes on:

No such tariff commission and no such information was required to enable this government to deal with the question of reciprocity in natural products. There was no need of statistics to satisfy this government that reciprocity in natural products was a good thing.

That is a most remarkable admission on the part of the Minister of Finance. He admits categorically that they had no information or statistics. He claims that they were possessed of sufficient knowledge in a general way that reciprocity in natural products was a good thing for Canada, and consequently, without fortifying themselves with detailed information such as was in the possession of the United States representatives, they went to Washington and negotiated this treaty. Therefore, they find that it is not meeting with the approval and endorsation of the people of Canada. The hon. Minister of Finance made this further statement:

What we have done is no departure from the policy of Canada; it is in accordance with the policy of Canada for forty years.

That was a most remarkable admission on the part of the Minister of Finance. Contrast the position of the representatives of Canada with the position of the United States government. The United States government during the previous months had a full staff of experts travelling through the United States and Canada gathering information in order to enable them to come to an intelligent decision upon these important matters. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton), in his discussion of this question, deals with this important phase of the matter. On page 4475 of 'Hansard' he says:

Then, we should have had, I think, some comparative statements of prices. This whole question relates to markets and to prices. It would have been a comparatively small matter for a body of experts employed by the government to have got for us a comparative list of the prices of the principle commodities, in the United States, in Canada, and in the other countries concerned. But we have not received it.

Then I ask, in the name of all that is reasonable, how can the members of this House come to an intelligent decision on this question without the necessary data and statistics which were in the possession of the United States plenipotentiaries when this treaty was negotiated? If we look at the documents prepared by the experts of the United States government, we shall see what mountains of information they were possessed of. They did not go into this negotiation blindfolded; they went with information that had been collected for months in the United States and in Canada. I have a copy of document No. 849 regarding reciprocity with Canada, prepared by the experts of the United States government, and containing 132 closely written pages. We could not get any information from our representatives. They refused to produce it if they had any. That information would be detrimental to their side of the case; it would show that the prices of staple farm products are higher in this country than on the American side, and that consequently the whole purpose and object of this agreement falls to the ground. Any reasonable man who looks at the matter in this light must come to the conclusion that the action of this government, in negotiating this treaty at this particular time, was both premature and unwise. It was premature, because they were anticipating the action of the Democratic party, who had won the elections for Congress on the promise that they would reduce the tariff. They were, in fact, negotiating a live treaty with a dead party. Both the Reform party in Canada and the Republican party in the United States were becoming discredited by their long terms in office, and they sought to divert public attention from their records of mal-administration. If this government had held its hand for a short time, this country would have got in a short time all the advantages, if there are any, of the treaty, without making the sacrifices therein entailed. Not only was the action of the government premature, but it was unwise, because the facts extracted from the Minister of Finance, and the facts prepared by the experts of the United States government, show conclusively that the prices of staple farm products in Canada are higher than they are in the United States, and consequently the whole purpose and object of this agreement falls to the ground. It is not much wonder that this unfortunate agreement has been prematurely and unwisely entered into by our representatives, when we have signal displays of ignorance of its provisions on the part of various ministers of the Crown. We find the Minister of Agriculture, in discussing this treaty on the 28th of March, speaking of the important commodity of potatoes as follows:

> In 12 years of high duties the United States accepted from Canada $11,000,000 worth of potatoes more than they sent into Canada.

Now, the trade returns prepared by the Minister of Agriculture's own department show that during the years from 1901 to 1910 we exported to the United States less than $2,000,000 worth of potatoes, and that the total value of potatoes exported from Canada to the United States during the ten years from 1901 to 1910 was $1,958,886 worth, and that we imported from the United States into Canada $1,419,651 worth, a balance, in our favour, in the ten years of $539,235. So that the Minister of Agriculture was out only $10,500,000. Then we had the Minister of Inland Revenue, who is the owner and editor of the 'Daily Times,' published in Victoria, writing an editorial in that paper of the date of July 12, 1911, containing the following:

> It is our duty to point out that it is not part of the proposal under the reciprocity agreement to allow American-made shingles to enter Canada free.

As a matter of fact, the agreement provides for shingles to come in free.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). They have always been free.

Mr. FIELDING. When the hon. gentleman makes the statement that they are free, it is an incorrect statement.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). It is in the schedules, and the agreement ratified it.

Mr. FIELDING. There is nothing in the agreement respecting the admission of shingles into Canada free.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). So far as the tariff law of this country is concerned American shingles are allowed to come in free.

Mr. FIELDING. And we can change it any time we wish.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). The hon. minister said it is not the object of this agreement to allow American made shingles to come into Canada free—another exhibition on the part of a minister of the Crown showing that he is not familiar with the terms of the agreement. We had another exhibition of this kind from the Postmaster General, who was dilating upon the excellencies of this agreement. The hon. Postmaster General is usually well informed, particularly in regard to matters connected with his own department, but when he comes to discuss the question of Fisheries and lobsters, he is in deep water. The hon. Postmaster General was telling us what an excellent thing it would be for the fishermen of the maritime provinces to have free access for their lobsters into the United States markets, when the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) arose and informed him that lobsters had been on the free list for a great many years.

Then we had the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) one of the plenipotentiaries who went to negotiate this all important treaty—a man supposed to know it from cover to cover. The hon. Minister of Customs was questioned with regard to an important commodity called talc. He said that talc was the material from which talcum powder was made, and that talcum powder was used as a toilet preparation. But, the talc contemplated by this agreement is the talc used for the manufacture of paper, which the Americans wished to import into their country free of duty. If hon. gentleman will refer to page 6 of schedule A they will find it covers 'talc, ground, bolted or precipitated, naturally or artificially, not for toilet use.' Even the agreement did not provide for talc used for toilet purposes, being exported into United States free of duty.

When you have two ministers of the crown, supposed to be familiar with the contents of the treaty, and the industrial and commercial conditions of this country, so unfamiliar with the terms of their own agreement; how can you expect the members of this House or the public at large to pass an intelligent judgment upon the agreement, unless they are supplied with all possible data and statistics? What else can you expect when two Ministers of the Crown, one an ex-newspaper editor and the other a biscuit manufacturer, who took precious good care that the industry in which his money is invested is not to be prejudiced in any way, go to Washington, and negotiate for 5,000,000 farmers; without the assistance or advice of the representatives of the interests affected, and this is the result. It seems to me we were sending a couple of political quack doctors down to that specialist, Dr. Taft, at Washington, and that they brought back a reciprocity pill, the ingredients of which and the effect of which they were ignorant, and are asking the Canadian people to swallow it. It reminds me of the old nursery rhyme; 'Open your mouth, shut your eyes, and we will give you something that will make you healthy, wealthy and wise.' 'But' say the Canadian people 'supposing the pill kills us?' The answer is 'Then you will be none the wiser.' 'But, supposing it almost kills us?' The answer to that is 'if perchance you survive, then you can punish us by turning us out of office.' 'But supposing by any possibility it might help us?' 'Then, we are the heaven born statesmen, our friends describe us.'

I placed a question on the Order Paper, but the hon. Minister of Finance did not give me what I could call an unequivocal answer. I desired to know the object and purpose of this agreement. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and other members of the Cabinet said that this agreement was for the benefit of the farmers, but the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) said that it was for the benefit of the consumer.

Mr. MURPHY. Where did the Secretary of State say that?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). In the Ottawa Free Press of April 7th, 1911, the hon. Secretary of State is reported to have said:

Finally, Mr. Murphy held that this was a poor man's agreement and that it cut down the vested interests and middlemen who were so clamorous against it.

The base of the agreement is the cheapening of the workmen's food; it is based on the elemental principle of the greatest good for greatest numbers (cheers).

The hon. Secretary of State was going around making campaign speeches and saying that this is a poor man's agreement, on the other hand other members of the government were saying that the agreement was for the benefit of the farmer—raising the prices. In the 'Ottawa Citizen' of April 2nd, the hon. Secretary of State is reported as follows:

'This was essentially a poor man's agreement,' continued the speaker. Onions, butter, cabbages, beans, milk and many other articles, staples of the workingman's domestic life, would all be cheapened. In fact, upon this the treaty was primarily based.

How can the ministry reconcile these two positions? They must either accept the one or the other Are they not fooling the country in some way or another?

On the floor of the House here we had the hon. Minister of Finance, the hon. Minister of Customs and the hon. Minister of Agriculture all stating that the object of this treaty was for the purpose of raising the prices for the farmers—that it was a farmers' agreement. The right hon. the Prime Minister in speaking in this House on March 7, 1911, used this language:

I stated a moment ago that the agreement we made is simply to get better prices for the products of the Canadian farmer.

In face of this we have the hon. Secretary of State going before the consumers and saying that this is a poor man's agreement, making for the lowering of prices. What has the hon. Secretary of State to say in reference to this matter. Or perhaps, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) will enlighten us upon the question, or maybe the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Black) would enlighten us?

Mr. BLACK. When a speaker gets so undignified, so flippant, the member for Hants (Mr. Black) has better business than to take any notice of him.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Not only are the members of the cabinet hopelessly divided on the objects and purposes of this agreement, but their candidates are also divided. When they address the mechanics and artisans, they declare this is the poor man's agreement, and say it will lower prices. But when they are in the rural districts, the agreement is to be of the greatest benefit to the farmer because it will enhance his prices. Mr. J. G. O'Donoghue was the government candidate in South Toronto last election. He is the representative and salaried officer of the labour unions throughout the Dominion, and is the possible candidate again on behalf of the government in South Toronto. Addressing the mechanics at Toronto he say:s

The workingman has his choice of the following articles of food: apples protected 40 cents a barrel, bacon and ham protected, 2 cents a pound, cheese, 3 cents a pound, butter, 4 cents a pound, potatoes, 15 cents a bushel.

What change in the above will reciprocity bring forth? How will it affect the workingman's food? The following list will tell:

Present and proposed rate:

Apples, 40 cents a bbl., free.
Pears, 25 per cent, free.
Peaches, $1 per 100 lbs., free.
Turnips, 30 cents a bush., free.
Onions, 30 cents a bush., free.
Cabbages, 30 cents a doz., free.
Beans, 25 cents a bush., free.
Eggs, 3 cents a doz., free.
Butter, 4 cents a lb., free.
Cheese, 3 cents per lb., free.
Potatoes, 20 cents a bush., free.
Fresh milk, 17½ per cent, free.
Poultry, 20 to 25 per cent, free.
Fish, 1 cent per lb., free

Reduced rates are provided for beef, bacon and hams, pork, lard, meats generally, tomatoes, and other vegetables, oatmeal, &c.

The result to my mind will mean cheaper food for the worker. That is something devoutly to be wished. The worker will have two markets instead of one to buy from.

Rents are lower the more landlords there are, trying to obtain tenants. Food prices will be lower the more food owners there are trying to obtain purchasers.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), at page 7418 of 'Hansard,' speaking upon this important question says that it is absolutely illogical to say such a thing, that it cannot raise the prices to the farmer and reduce them to the consumer—it is absolutely absurd and ridiculous. But, to cap the climax, we have the statement of the Prime Minister himself. A meeting was to be held in Toronto by Mr. T. C. Robinette, who was the government candidate in Centre Toronto in the last election, and is the alternative nominee for North York, in case the Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth), is defeated, he will try to carry North York at the following election. Mr. Robinette wanted something to read to the electors, so he got a telegram from the Prime Minister, which appears on the front page of the 'Globe' and dated 21st March, 1911, as follows:

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario).

We have not hurt the manufacturers and will not do so. We have benefited the farmer and the consumer. When the time comes we will sweep the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Did you ever listen to such absolute humbug and nonsense? It promises everything to everybody. Is it not a perfect classic of contradiction? If the right hon. leader of the government can convince the manufacturers that he is not going to hurt them, and then if he can convince the farmer that he is not going to hurt him; and if he can convince the consumer that he is not going to hurt him, but benefit him—if he can perform that impossible task, I should not be surprised if he could sweep the country. The farmers are to be benefited—how? By raising their prices. The consumers are to be benefited—how? By lowering their prices. What kind of mental gymnastics is required to perform a task like that? It has become definitely known by the investigation and report of the experts appointed by the United States government, who, as I have said, went throughout the cities of the United States and Canada, that the prices of staple farm products in Canada are a great deal higher than they are in the United States. On April 10, I asked the Minister of Finance the following question:—

1. Was the purpose of entering into negotiations for reciprocity with the United States to secure better prices for Canadian produce?

And the Minister of Finance answered:—

1. The purpose of entering into negotiations for reciprocity with the United States was to obtain that expansion of market for Canadian products which has been sought by all governments in Canada since the formation of the Dominion.

The hon. gentleman speaks of the expansion of markets for our products. A glorious expansion to get into a market where they are exporting the same produce that we have to sell! a glorious expansion to get into a market where the prices are lower than our own! A glorious expansion when this is obtained at the expense of throwing open our markets not only to the ninety or one hundred millions in the United States, but to the three or four hundred millions that make up the favoured nations.

Now, personally, I am unalterably opposed to reciprocity, upon a great many grounds. Some of these grounds have been mentioned by others, but I make no apology for repeating them. I do not expect that any expression of opinion that I give in this House will change hon. members on your right, Mr. Chairman. But I do expect that my views will be conveyed to my constituents, and they will see upon what grounds I am opposing this agreement. I think this is a most unfortunate junction in our affairs for the entering into a reciprocity agreement. As every person admits, Canada has been enjoying an era of great prosperity, and we should be content to allow ourselves to work out our own destiny without interference from or subjection to the United States. Hon. Sir George W. Ross, who occupied a prominent position in the ranks of the Reform party for many years, and who was premier of the province of Ontario, has spoken in no uncertain tone against reciprocity. He gave an illustration to the people of Canada of their position. He spoke about an aged man who, though in good health, wanted to get better. And his epitaph was:—

I was well; I wanted to be better; and here I lie.

There has been no demand or sentiment in Canada for reciprocity. In fact, the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) in an interview in Boston on the 28th of October last, while these negotiations were in progress, stated, as reported in the Montreal 'Herald' that 'the attitude of the people of Canada was to let well enough alone.' That should be the attitude of the government which is boasting of its surpluses, and of the prosperity of Canada, which they claim are due to their ability in administering the affairs of the country, but which we claim arise in spite of their efforts, and in spite of the effect of their administration.

Another reason why I am opposed to reciprocity is the fact that if we are not ingrates, if we have any gratitude at all, if we have any commercial favours to give, we ought to give them to our own kith and kin, who are furnishing us with the money to develop our natural resources. It was British, and not United States, capital that developed Canada. It was British capital that constructed the Grand Trunk railway, that constructed the Canadian Pacific railway, that constructed the Grand Trunk Pacific, that constructed the Intercolonial. It was British capital that constructed our great canal systems, the Welland, the Soo, the Cornwall, and the Rideau canals. We borrowed millions from Great Britain to build extensions to these lines. We are looking to the British market to-day to build our Hudson Bay railway, the Georgian Bay canal, and a new Welland canal. British capital built our cities, paved our streets, organized our banks, supplied us with capital for our commercial and industrial enterprises. Then if we have any favours to offer we should offer them to Great Britain, and not to the United States.

Another reason why I am opposed to this reciprocity pact is the fact that in days gone by, when Canada was in a position that she required the markets of the United States, our overtures were rejected. Time after time when our representatives went to Washington seeking access to their markets, they slammed the door in our faces. Consequently now, when we have climbed the long hill of prosperity, when we are not in need of their markets, when we are independent of their markets, there is no reason why we should make sacrifices in order to gain access to those markets which we no longer require. This country, and especially the older portions of this country, have been settled by the United Empire Loyalists, men who were driven out of the United States in 1776, dispossessed of their property, whose wives and children were subjected to the rigours of a northern clime on account of their loyalty to the British Empire. Since that historic occasion the United States has time after time endeavoured to gain control of this country, but we have always swept back the Americanizing influences. We find in the constitution of the United States in 1776, incorporated in one of the articles, a standing invitation to the provinces of Canada to join the American union. But upon that occasion we swept back the American influences. In 1812 when Great Britain was engaged in a life and death struggle with the dictator of the world, the United States attempted to take advantage of her necessities, and we had the war of 1812. And again we swept back the Americanizing influences on that occasion. In 1866 the United States denounced reciprocity in order to starve Canada into annexation or submission. But the result was that instead of being starved into submission, with Canadian pluck, and energy, and enterprise, we built up the Canadian confederation, and again we swept back the Americanizing influences. In 1866 and 1870 we had the Fenian raids, which were fostered and abetted in United States territory, and again Canadians swept back the Americanizing influence. In 1891 we had the Reform party under the leadership of the present Prime Minister, again pandering to Americanizing influences, and introducing a policy which they called unrestricted reciprocity, a policy which was instrumental in driving a great many noted men from the Reform ranks, just as the policy of 1911 is driving many noted men from their ranks to-day. We had the greatest intellect that the Reform party possessed upon that occasion, the Hon. Edward Blake, denouncing the policy of unrestricted reciprocity of 1891, and forsaking the party on account of the Americanizing tendencies of that policy. Again the people responded nobly when they were asked, and they swept back the Americaniz-ing influences. Now in 1911 we have our old friend reappearing in another guise. The unrestricted reciprocity of 1891 will ultimately come from the present agreement if it is carried into effect. The farmers of this country are not going to see their protection swept away, and allow the manufacturers to be in full possession of their protection. If the protection that is now accorded to the farmers is swept away, they will insist upon equal treatment being meted out to the manufacturers. Consequently the policy that is proposed to-day in this reciprocity pact if carried into effect will inevitably lead to unrestricted reciprocity, and we think to absorption and annexation to the United States. This present agreement is the skeleton of 1891. It reminds me of a story I heard of two small boys playing in the house of one of the boy's father who was a doctor. One of them was rummaging about the house and came to a closet where there was a skeleton. He asked the doctor's son what that was. Oh, he says, it is my father's first patient. This reciprocity pact is Doctor Laurier's first patient. We killed it in 1891, and I am satisfied that it will remain a skeleton after the election of 1911. We have, as I say, on all these numerous occasions swept back the Americanizing tendencies that have cropped up from time to time, and when the elections of 1911 are over I am satisfied the Canadian people will again demonstrate their loyalty to the mother of nations.

We have heard a great deal about the national effect of this agreement, what its ultimate effect will be on the future of Canada; and we have been taken to task some times very severely by hon. members to the right of the Speaker, notably by the Minister of Public Works only last night, ridiculing the suggestion that this agreement would ultimately result in Canada coming under the control of the United States. I want to show that these dangerous tendencies towards annexation with the United States have not been pointed out only by Conservatives, but that prominent Liberals all over this country, from one end to the other, have signalized the danger to our national institutions if this agreement is carried into effect. We had the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto, a representative body of men, condemning this agreement by 298 votes to 13. Mr. Gourlay, the president of the Board of Trade, voted in support of the resolution, and Sir Edmund Walker, who is a prominent Liberal, used this language:

For many years he had been in business in Canada and in the United States, and the people of the latter country he knew well. It was in the true interest of Canada, Sir Edmund said, for her to remain in the British connection, without interest or contact from the south. We should develop our own nation in our own way, and his experience had deepened the conviction that we should not become American.

Then we have the resolution of the associated Boards of Trade of the whole province of Ontario, by a vote of 97 to 18 condemning in the strongest language this reciprocity agreement. One of the preambles of that resolution was in this language:

And whereas the proposed agreement would weaken the ties which bind Canada to the empire, and to avoid the disruption of trade referred to, Canada would be forced to closer relations with the United States, which would still further weaken those ties, and make it more difficult to avert political union with the United States.

Be it, therefore, resolved, that in the opinion of this convention of the Ontario Associated Boards of Trade the proposed agreement threatens Canadian nationality and autonomy, and is opposed to the true interests and should not be ratified.

Mr. Gourlay, President of the Board of Trade and a very prominent Liberal, speaking upon that resolution, is reported to the Toronto press to have used the following language:

In this present agreement Mr. Gourlay declared that Canada was not trading on equal terms. 'The United States,' he said, 'have a population of 90,000,000, whereas we have barely eight millions. They have twelve traders who can come into the market for every one we can send into their market. It is practically a merger and we are asked to become minority stockholders in the continental partnership and any of you who have had experience with minority stockholding know what that means. . . The speaker felt that ratification of the agreement would do much to impair the strong autonomy and loyalty of the Canadian people as it would change the relationship of the whole of the provinces of the Dominion.

The Hon. E. J. Davis, who was in the Liberal cabinet presiding over the destinies of this great province of Ontario for a number of years, also spoke, strongly against the agreement:

Hon. Mr. Davis, while believing that the Canadian ministers and President Taft were sincere in their beliefs, was strongly of the opinion that the agreement spelled disaster to Canada. . . They should not make changes in the tariff except in the way pursued in 1897 after the people had been given an opportunity of expressing their views. He was steadfastly in favour of a United Empire. . . They should stand by the British flag and for the solidarity of the British Empire. Make it a tariff in the interests of Canada and the British Empire.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the Conservatives alone who are raising the annexation cry, it is not the Conservatives alone who are waving the old flag as it is contemptuously called by speakers sitting on your right, but it is prominent Liberals throughout the country. I have in my hand a very strong resolution passed by a number of prominent Liberals opposed to the ratification of this reciprocity agreement. It is not my intention to read the whole of the resolution, but I am going to read two or three extracts from it. One of their objections to this reciprocity pact is set out as follows:

Because the present unexampled prosperity of Canada is the result of the policy which has been pursued in the development of her trade and of her natural resources. Because this has involved the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars upon railways, canals, steamships and other means of transportation between east and west and west and east, and the obligation to incur further great expenditures for the same purpose; and because further developments along the same lines would be seriously checked by the proposed reciprocity agreement and the benefits of the expenditures referred to would be to a great extent lost.

3. Because it is essential to the continued national unity and development of Canada that no trade relations with any country should be agreed to by Canada on any basis which would check the growth and development of trade between the various parts of Canada with each other, or between Canada and the various parts of the empire; and because the proposed reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States of America would seriously check the growth and development of this trade.

8. Because the agreement as proposed would weaken the ties which bind Canada to the empire, and because the unrestricted reciprocity which would naturally follow would still further weaken those ties and make it more difficult to avert political union with the United States.

That is the language of fifteen prominent Liberals in the city of Toronto; it is not the language of flag-waving Conservative speakers throughout the country. It is the studied language contained in a resolution of fifteen of the most prominent men who have been identified with the Liberal party all their lives.

10. Believing as we do that Canadian nationality is now threatened with a more serious blow than any it has heretofore met with, and that all Canadians who place the interests of Canada before those of any party or section or individuals therein should at this crisis state their views openly and fearlessly, we, who have hitherto supported the Liberal party in Canada, subscribe to this statement.

Surely the language contained in that resolution could not be stronger, and surely the government ought to pay some attention to language which is couched in such strong terms coming from such prominent supporters as these gentlemen are. We find that all sections of the community from the Atlantic to the Pacific are opposed to this reciprocity pact. The Rev. Dr. McLeod, of the maritime provinces, a prominent Baptist conducting a religious and not a trade paper in the interest of his esteemed denomination, the Baptist denomination, expresses his opinion very decidedly upon this question. He was ill and unable to direct his paper and during his absence an item slipped into the paper unknown to him favouring this agreement. The moment Dr. McLeod noticed this article he gave expression to his disapproval of that sentiment in the following paragraph which appeared in the next issue of the paper:

The editor, still unable to do any work whatever on the paper, having had his attention called to the article, entitled 'Reciprocity,' on page one, of March 1, feels impelled to repudiate every sentiment and shade of sentiment in it which approves of the proposed reciprocal trade arrangement now under consideration by the parliaments of Canada and the United States.

He regards the proposed reciprocity agreement as a deadly blow at the true national life of beloved Canada. He wants this statement of his strong conviction to go to his readers, lest he may never pen another sentence. This is the day of our country's peril.

'GOD SAVE CANADA!'

It is very apropos at this juncture that I should read one or two extracts from that famous manifesto that was issued to the electors of Canada by our late, esteemed leader, Sir John A. Macdonald. On the first page, I notice this sentence which is peculiarly apropos at this juncture:

Our policy in respect thereto is to-day what it has been for the past thirteen years, and is directed by a firm determination to foster and develop the varied resources of the Dominion by every means in our power consistent with Canada's position as an integral portion of the British Empire. To that end we have laboured in the past and we propose to continue in this work to which we have applied ourselves of building up on this continent, under the flag of England, a great and powerful nation.

Further on he says:

It would, in my opinion, inevitably result in the annexation of this Dominion to the United States.

Speaking of the unrestricted reciprocity propaganda of the Reform party in 1891.

The advocates of unrestricted reciprocity on this side of the line deny that it will have such an effect——

Just as they are contending that this will have such an effect.

—though its friends in the United States urge as the chief reason for its adoption that unrestricted reciprocity would be the first step in the direction of political union.

Is it not a most remarkable parallel? We have hon. members of the government and their followers stating that the present reciprocity agreement will not have the effect that a great many reformers think it will have, namely, bring us into annexation with and absorption by the United States, while upon that occasion we had the warning of our old chieftain that unrestricted reciprocity in 1891, would inevitably lead to annexation. The positions of the parties are similar in 1891 and 1911.

Mr. FIELDING. Did not Sir John Macdonald afterwards send a delegation to Washington to get reciprocity?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Not the kind we have here.

Mr. FIELDING. Just the kind of reciprocity that is in this agreement to-day.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Not a jug-handled, lop-sided arrangement such as is proposed to-day. Imagine astute, capable Sir John going down and being taken in with a reciprocity pact such as we have to-day!

Mr. FIELDING. They went down and got nothing.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). It is true, Mr. Chairman, that Sir John Macdonald went down and did not get what he went for. The Minister of Finance says he got nothing. Well, we have got worse than nothing, because the sacrifices that we make more than overbalance any benefit we may possibly derive from this treaty.

Mr. DEVLIN. What sacrifices have we made?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). The sacrifice that these fifteen Liberals speak about who say that we are going to sacrifice our nationality. The sacrifice that we are allowing the farmers of the United States and twelve other countries to come in and take possession of our markets, when the prices are higher here than on the other side.

Mr. LAPOINTE. The farmers of Ontario are asking for it.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). The farmers of Ontario are not asking for it, and I am somewhat familiar with the conditions in Ontario. I am satisfied the overwhelming sentiment of Ontario is against this agreement.

The closing sentence of this manifesto, issued on February 7, 1901 is as follows:

As for myself, my course is clear. A British subject I was born; a British subject I will die. With my latest breath will I oppose the 'Veiled Treason' which attempts by sordid means and mercenary proffers to lure our people from their allegiance. During my long public service of nearly half a century, I have been true to my country, and its best interests, and I appeal with equal confidence to the men who have trusted me in the past and to the young hope of the country, with whom rests its destinies in the future, to give me their united and strenuous aid in this my last effort for the unity of the empire and the preservation of our commercial and political freedom.

The wording of that appeal is very appropriate to the present occasion, because the position of the parties and the policy they advocate are almost identical upon these two occasions. These are some of the sentiments that have been expressed by prominent members of both parties: Liberals in Toronto, Liberals in the west, Liberals in the maritime provinces, all state that this is a blow at our nationality. But what shall we say about the views of the Americans? If you wish to get at the basic reason for this agreement from the point of view of the United States, you must read the utterances of their public men. Their public men have practically insulted the intelligence of this country by frankly admitting that their object and purpose is the annexation of Canada. If we were a sensitive nation, if we were not lovers of freedom of speech, we would take offence and their utterances would become a casus belli. If Great Britain was not a protector of freedom of speech she would take offence at these utterances. What do we hear from Mr. Champ Clark, who practically to-day occupies the position of Prime Minister of the United States? He is leader of the Democratic party in the popular House and if the last elections are any criterion of what will be the outcome of the next election he will be the President of the United States. His utterances, therefore, bear a particular force and have peculiar significance to any one who desires to read them with intelligence. Why, of course, says Champ Clark,——

Mr. DEVLIN. What about Haultain?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I understand Mr. Haultain's last utterance was that a hundred reciprocity agreements would not justify any sane man voting for the Liberal administration.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is that why you are opposed to reciprocity?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). At page 2624 of the Congressional Record of the United States. Hon. Champ Clark, when asked whether he would be willing to give reciprocal terms similar to those of other nations, said:

'Why, of course, wherever we can get the better of the bargain.'

Again, at page 2625 the same hon. gentleman says:

It is my judgment that we are getting the better of the proceeding in this treaty.

It is my judgment that we get the better of the proceedings in this treaty.

Further on he says:

The intelligent farmers of America know that the agricultural products of Canada are inconsiderable when compared with the agricultural products of the United States; to use a common phrase they do not constitute a drop in the bucket. They also know that wages are as high in Canada in many lines as in America, and higher in labour pertaining to the production of lumber; so they know too much to be scared by the overworked cry of 'pauper labour.'

In a recent address at Holyoke, Mass., Governor Foss, of that state, said:

The United States have much to gain and nothing to lose by this reciprocity movement. New factories in all lines will be established here, for with these conditions our capital will no longer seek Canada for the purpose of building up those factories which it is now forced to build in Canada by unnatural tariff conditions.

Then, on page 2930, Mr. McCall, speaking of the Louisiana purchase, says:

Why, if it were proposed to add to this country to-day another Louisiana purchase, if it were proposed to add two or three agricultural states, who would there be to deny that such a circumstance would augment materially the prosperity and wealth of the two countries? And yet, to the extent to which this Bill goes that is just what we are doing. One has but to look at the map to have the case conclusively shown. The common frontier between the two countries is 3,700 miles long.

On page 3275 Mr. Sherwood says:

I was elevated and highly entertained by the closing remarks of the able and experienced gentleman from Missouri (Champ Clark), in predicting that this proposed compact, if enacted, will not only promote our trade with our near-by Canadian neighbours,

Mr. Champ Clark says, in another place:

Peace, commerce and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none.

Speaking of the Panama canal, he proceeds:

We are not spending that vast sum because we are altruists, but as a business matter. I am for it, because I hope to see the day when the American flag will float over every square foot of the British North America possessions clear to the north pole. They are people of our blood. They speak our language. Their institutions are much like ours. They are trained in the difficult art of self-government. My judgment is that if the treaty of 1854 had never been abrogated the chances of a consolidation of these two countries would have been much greater than they are now.

Mr. MARTIN.—Will the gentleman favour the abrogation of our tariff law entirely so far as Canada is concerned, and making free trade with Canada on all products?

Mr. CLARK—By taking Canada in to become part of the United States; Yes.

Mr. Champ Clark again says:

I look forward to the time when the American flag will fly over every square foot of British North America up to the north pole. The people of Canada are of our blood and our language. If the treaty of 1854 never had been abrogated, our countries would be much further advanced than now towards this end.

Mr. Martin of South Dakota—Will the gentleman favour the abrogation of our tariff law entirely so far as Canada is concerned, and make free trade on all products?

Mr. Clarke—By taking Canada in, to become a part of the United States—Yes.

Mr. Norris of Nebraska—As I understand it, the gentleman favours the Bill for at least one reason, that it will have a tendency in the end to bring Canada into the union?

Mr. Clarke—Yes, I have no doubt about that.

Why, Sir, in the light of these utterances by representative public men in the United States, what must we in Canada be made of if we continue to champion and favour this reciprocity agreement?

A straw shows how the wind blows. We had the other day in the city of Detroit, a meeting of the most influential character of any ever held in the United States, the National Editorial Association. I suppose the members of that association have more influence in moulding public opinion and directing the affairs of the United States than those of any other association in America. The Toronto 'Star' publishes a dispatch from Detroit which shows that the editors of the newspapers and magazines of the United States are talking nothing but annexation, they believe that this agreement will ultimately lead to the annexation of Canada to the United States. The dispatch reads:

There is much speculation among the editors as to what kind of reception they will receive during their stay in Canada. On the opening day of the convention several speeches were made in which 'Union' with Canada was strongly advocated. So much was said along this line that a great many of the delegates have been dubbed 'annexation boosters.'

Here we have a society of editors in a regularly organized meeting on our very border discussing annexation and called 'annexation boosters' to further the reciprocity pact not only in the United States but in Canada. The discussions were so repugnant to the feelings of Mr. Justice Sutherland, of the High Court of Ontario, formerly a respected member of this House, that he publicly rebuked them at the convention, and this is the report of what he said:

Judge Sutherland, of Toronto, Ont., on the floor of the convention took exception to the union sentiment and spoke warmly against it.

In the light of these expressions of opinion, in the light of the trend of the press of the United States, can we close our eyes to the fact that the leading men and the leading newspapers of the United States are absolutely convinced that the destiny of Canada, if this agreement is adopted, will be to fly the Stars and Stripes instead of the Union Jack.

Another reason that has been advanced in this House against this pact, and it is a very valid and strong reason, is the diversion of trade that it will cause from east to west to north and south channels—what has been called the sectionalization of Canada. After the denouncement of the reciprocity treaty in 1866 Canada had a difficult task to perform. Farmers were ruined and people were in distress, but there was no surrender. Canada commenced by forming a confederation in 1867, and began the slow climb up the hill of prosperity, and the people toiled and worked in order to form the country into a confederation, and a strong nationality. Sir John A. Macdonald constructed the Canadian Pacific railway in order to have a transcontinental system to bind the provinces together. The present leader of the government inaugurated the Grand Trunk Pacific for the same purpose, and in introducing the Bill into the House, and in arguments in favour of it throughout the length and breadth of the country, he pointed out the desirability of Canada being free and independent of the United States. He said that it was desirable that we should not be bound up with the bonding privilege, which might be withdrawn by the United States at any time, that if we wanted to be a self-contained nation as a part of the British Empire, and independent of the United States, we must have more transportation facilities; and for that reason, and that reason alone, he asked the Canadian people for their endorsation of the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme. Then two Canadians, captains of finance, Mackenzie and Mann, have constructed the Canadian Northern railway. If there is one province which is vitally interested in this question, and which has been struck to the heart by this reciprocity agreement, it is the province of Ontario. It is the richest and most populous province in the Dominion of Canada. The farmers of that province have mortgaged their farms, the people have pledged their future, for the success of these great enterprises. They furnished the greater share of the capital that constructed them; and now when we are in a position to derive some advantage from them, why should we, because a few partisan Liberal grain growers in the west may possibly get a few cents more for their wheat, allow the traffic of those lines to be diverted to the south, and prevent the provinces in the east obtaining some advantage from those transportation facilities which have been provided at so great expense? In the very first year after the old reciprocity agreement went into effect, we transferred from Canadian channels over one-half of our shipping interest between Sarnia and the city of Quebec. In other words, our parliament gave to the United States about one-half of our carrying trade between those points.

Mr. FIELDING. If the old reciprocity treaty did us so much harm, will my hon. friend tell me why all statesmen in this country for forty years tried to get a renewal of it? That is a fair question.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I am addressing myself at the present time to the shipping interest, in which the province of Ontario is vitally interested. The old reciprocity treaty may have benefited certain interests. I am speaking of an interest that is going to be vitally injured if the present agreement goes into effect, and I am going to show that the shipping interest was vitally injured by the old reciprocity treaty. In 1854 the Canadian carrying trade on the St. Lawrence amounted to $33,633,128. The very next year after the treaty went into effect this trade fell to $15,208,600, a decrease of over $18,000,000. In 1854 the vessels engaged in that trade numbered 1,416, rated at 618,926 tons with 20,301 sailors at Quebec. In the next year after the treaty went into effect these figures fell to 474 vessels, rated at 348,800 tons with 11,902 sailors at Quebec. In 1854 the tonnage of our sea-going vessels arriving and departing from four of the leading St. Lawrence ports amounted to 1,487,897 tons. The very next year after the treaty went into effect the tonnage fell to 870,794 tons. In 1854 the total value of the exports and imports at Montreal and Quebec was $42,000,000. The next year after the treaty went into effect they dropped to $28,000,000.

Another objection which has been raised and I think appropriately raised, against this arrangement, is its lack of permanence, the danger of entanglement with the United States, the danger of giving offence. Our trade routes have been established by successive governments from east to west. If this reciprocity pact goes into effect the trade routes will undoubtedly be changed to north and south channels. Eight millions of people have very little chance against one hundred millions of people. Uncle Sam will wield the Big Stick, as he has wielded it before. Once let our trade routes be turned north and south, and we develop and encourage vested interests which will fight to retain those routes, no matter how detrimental the arrangement may be to other interests in the country. If this agreement goes into effect, and the routes are developed north and south, the United States can force other concessions from us by threatening to abolish and denounce the agreement, and throw our newly established trade relations into disorder. We have the great, free, open and independent market of Great Britain. Why should we hesitate what we should cultivate and preserve?

There are a great many constitutional and economical objections, as well as national and imperial objections, to this agreement. We are supposed to be living in a democratic age, enjoying responsible government. But, as has been said by the hon. member for Brandon, who was a member of the cabinet during the election of 1900, 1904 and 1908, there was no mention in any of those elections of this reciprocity question. He was in charge of the campaign for the Liberal party in the western provinces, and at none of those elections was this question mooted.

We are charged with inconsistency because the leaders of the Conservative party in days gone by endeavoured to secure reciprocity with the United States upon fair and equitable terms. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, if that is a reasonable argument? We had the right hon. the leader of the government, the hon. the Minister of Finance, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and the hon. Minister of Customs reading extracts from speeches made in bygone days, showing that the Conservative party in these days were in favour of reciprocity. They have charged inconsistency on the part of the Conservative party. If the Conservative party has been inconsistent, how much more so have the people of the United States been? For 45 years the United States opposed reciprocity. Why should they now endeavour to get it?

Every one knows that conditions in this country have changed. Every one knows that when we were endeavouring to get reciprocity years ago we required the market of the United States. We were a young country, undeveloped, and reciprocity in these days might have been some good to us. However, conditions are altogether changed now. It would be just as reasonable to say that because a grown-up man required a nursing bottle when he was a baby he would require it all his life. Infant Canada might have cried for the nursing bottle and the soothing syrup of reciprocity in days gone by, but to-day Canada has attained the full status of manhood, and we no longer require the reciprocity medicine. Again the charge of inconsistency does not lie at the door of the Conservative party. because the reciprocity which the Conservative party advocated in years gone by certainly had no resemblance to the Reciprocity Act as introduced by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

Mr. FIELDING. What is the difference?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). The difference is that Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir John Thompson, and the other leaders of the Conservative party wanted reciprocity in its true sense. They wanted tariff for tariff and if they reduced the duty on certain articles coming into Canada they expected the United States to reduce their duties to the same level on the same goods. Would Sir John A. Macdonald or Sir John Thompson allow the products of 90,000,000 farmers in the United States to be shipped in here in competition with our farmers, when the prices are higher here than on the American side? Would they allow their products of 300,000,000 people belonging to the 12 favoured nations to be shipped in here in competition with our people?

Mr. FIELDING. That is exactly what he offered in 1879.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Sir John A. Macdonald would not have been guilty of such indiscretion.

I say that condtions in Canada have changed since 1879 when the National Policy was introduced and when the offer of reciprocity was made to the United States. In 1879 there was no home market in Canada. To-day 80 per cent of our products are consumed at home. Canada has developed into a great industrial country, and we are providing home markets for our farm products. In 1879 the Canadian Northwest was practically unknown, and the natural resources of the other provinces were undeveloped. We had no Canadian Pacific railway, no Canadian Northern railway and no Grand Trunk Pacific. There were no exports of any kind to Great Britain, because we did not have the shipping facilities to carry our goods, nor did we produce the goods to carry.

Mr. FIELDING. What about 1891?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). To-day our shipping facilities are fully developed. Then, there is another very important point which must be borne in mind. In 1879, every Englishman in the old country was a free trader, whereas to-day even in the old country the majority of the people are in favour of tariff reform, and they believe in a measure of protection. Now that we are on the eve of forming Imperial federation—on the eve of bringing about an arrangement with Great Britain whereby our farm products will be allowed into Great Britain on a preferential basis, is it not foolhardy to enter into this agreement, which is the grave yard of Imperial federation?

In 1871 our population was 3,500,000; in 1911 it is 8,000,000. In 1868 our total trade was $129,000,000; in 1910, it amounted to $677,000,000. In 1869, our bank assets amounted to $44,000,000; in 1911, they totalled $1,224,000,000. In 1877, our railway system covered 2,278 miles; in 1911, our railway system covers 25,000 mlies. In 1871 our manufactured products amounted to $221,000,000; in 1906, they amounted to $712,664,000. In 1871, our dairy products amounted to $1,600,000; in 1908, they amounted to $36,000,000. In 1871, we grew 16,000,000 bushels of wheat; in 1908 our wheat crop amounted to 120,000,000 bushels. In view of these facts and figures can any reasonable person say that what might have been good for Canada in the early days is good for it at the present time?

I want to read a most extraordinary criticism of the attitude of the Liberal party and the members of the Cabinet, taken from their own leading organ, published in the city of Ottawa. I have often wondered, when I listened to the hon. members of the government reading the old time speeches of the Conservative leaders in favour of reciprocity, if they ever noticed this editorial in the Ottawa 'Free Press'. It gives the Liberal leaders and the Liberal party a lot of wholesome advice which they should take to heart. This editorial appeared in the issue of the Ottawa 'Free Press,' of March 3rd, 1911, and is entitled 'Throw Hansard Away.' It reads as follows:

The weakest link in the argument of the Liberals in favour of reciprocity with the United States is the iteration and reiteration of the views and opinions of political parties and individuals in the past on that policy.

What on earth difference does it make to the people of Canada in the year of our Lord 1911 what some politicians or some party thought about the advisability of closer trade relations with the United States fifteen, twenty-five, fifty years ago?

Why bore us with long and dreary extracts from the long winded speeches of Sir Charles Tupper and his ilk in the 80's? What do we care about Lord Elgin's opinions on the policy of reciprocity years ago?

Does it matter a tinker's dam whether the Conservative party a quarter of a century ago favoured or didn't favour reciprocity?

Is it worth more than a trivial passing allusion that the Liberal party was at one time in favour of unrestricted reciprocity?

It does give us a pain to hear men on the Hill quoting dead speeches of the years ago, and to read in the party newspapers long extracts giving the opinions of men who, if they had not altogether passed from this sphere, are now incapacitated for public life.

In the last fifteen years a tremendous change has come over this country. We Liberals think that the splendid administration of the Laurier government was largely responsible for that change.

Mr. FIELDING. Hear, hear.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I am glad that this article meets the approval of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and hope he will take the advice here given, so that we may no longer hear these old dead speeches reiterated——

Mr. FIELDING. I am afraid you will have to listen to some of them yet.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario) reading:

You Conservatives attribute it to other causes.

But this is the point.

But whatever the object, we all admit that the change is there.

And I want to impress what follows upon the Minister of Finance; let it sink deep into his heart.

A policy, therefore, that might have suited Canada in 1896 may be the most unwise and inadvisable for Canada in 1911.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) say 'hear hear?'

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I am glad of it.

Consequently, instead of devoting so much time to drilling into us the history, with tables of dates, of the reciprocity movement in Canada, the gentlemen who are now asking us to endorse the pact which Messrs. Fielding and Patterson have negotiated at Washington would be better occupied in telling us just how that agreement is going to work out in practice from the day it is put into force.

Is that good advice?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Then, instead of reading speeches made at a time when conditions were entirely different from what they are to-day why does not the minister tell us what the effect of this arrangement will be upon our different industries. This agreement has never been referred to a committee composed of both political parties with power to summon witnesses and find out what the ultimate effect will be upon our industries. Instead of quoting speeches of bygone days, let the ministers busy themselves in telling us what the effect of this agreement is going to be.

They are wasting their time searching through 'Hansard' for opinions which nobody now gives a hang about.

When they should be directing a staff of experts in the obtaining of the fullest information as to the probable effect of the agreement when it is put into operation.

That is what I urged upon the minister —a staff of experts to obtain full information of the effect of the proposed changes in the tariff. Where are your experts on the probable effect of the agreement? Where are data and statistics to which the people are entitled? Why is this not handed over to committees as in the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States?—a committee who investigated it for two months. Why do not the ministers adopt that course and allow the interests that think they are going to be affected to appear before the committee of both Houses.

But there has been no investigation and there are no data, no statistics. In the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific, there was great haste because, as was said, Hon. George A. Cox could not wait. If this is the case it appears that the President of the United States can't wait.

Now I come to the closing part of this article:

What Sir John Macdonald or Sir Charles Tupper said twenty years ago is not going to affect in the slightest the opinion of the business man of to-day who is doubtful as to the proposed policy.

Why should we be bound by the opinion expressed twenty years ago when the conditions were different from what they are to-day. Why not face this policy in the light of present conditions and judge it on its merits. And here is the completing paragraph:

For goodness sake, let the liberal leaders chuck all the copies of 'Hansard' away and give us something up to date.

I put a series of questions on the Order Paper, and they are still on the Order Paper. The Minister of Finance asked to have them stand,—for what reason it is incomprehensible to me. The answers are well known to the minister——

Mr. FIELDING. If the answers are well known why does the hon. gentleman ask the question?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I want the people to read them. I want them put on record. And that, I fancy, is the reason he refuses.

Mr. FIELDING. No, my hon. friend will find that the questions will be answered.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). If the minister will answer these questions and answer them unequivocally, the effect must be to enlighten the people as to the condition of affairs in regard to this treaty, and these are the questions I asked the minister:

1. Referring to the White Book known as Document No. 849, entitled 'Reciprocity with Canada,' being the message from the President of the United States transmitting to the Senate a report from the tariff board, and on March 1, 1911, ordered to be printed and laid on the table of the United States Senate, in which occur the following passages, viz.:

(a) On page 107, 'It is to be noted that the farm prices of more than half of the oat crop of the United States range from $0.27 to $0.35 a bushel, and that the farm prices of about the same proportion of the Canadian crop range from $0.28 to $0.36.'

(b) On page 109, speaking of the prices of horses, 'In all the Canadian provinces except Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and Nova Scotia the prices are higher than in any of our states.'

(c) On page 109, speaking of the prices of dairy cows, 'The highest Canadian price quoted is $48 in Ontario as against $46.50 in Montana, the highest American price.

(d) On page 110, appears the following table of comparative prices, average value per head in 1910:

In the United States, horses, $108.19; dairy cows, $35.79; other cattle, $19.41; sheep, $4.08; swine, $9.14. In Canada, horses, $133; dairy cows, $43; other cattle, $31; sheep, $6; swine, $11. And comparing the State of New York with Ontario: horses, $125; dairy cows, $39.50; other cattle, $18.20; sheep, $5; swine, $1.50. Ontario, horses, $133; dairy cows, $48; other cattle, $34; sheep, $7; swine $10.

(e) On page 110 appears also the following statements:

Prices of other cattle vary in the United States from $14.30 a head in Minnesota to $27.40 in Montana, while in Canada the range of prices is from $31 in Saskatchewan to $34 in Ontario.

Prices of sheep are much lower in the United States than in Canada.

Prices of swine are slightly higher in Canada than in the United States.

(f) On page 113 appears the following:

As to horses Canada has no surplus of importance outside of Ontario.

During the spring of 1910 it is stated on good authority that no less than 20,000 horses were sold out of Ontario alone for shipment to the market just mentioned, and prospective loss of this trade is giving Ontario some concern at this time. The five provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, combined have but 1,863,744 head as compared with 1,600,000 head now in the state of Iowa alone.

When was the reciprocity agreement executed by representatives of Canada and the United States?

Mr. FIELDING. Does not the hon. gentleman know that?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I suppose that was in January.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman has it on record. Why does he ask the question?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I did not want to bother looking them up.

Mr. FIELDING. Then I am not going to bother looking them up for my hon. friend.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). What I desired, in putting these questions on the Order Paper, was that the Minister of Finance should answer them for the information of the people. I want the information officially from the Minister of Finance to lay it before the electors of this country.

Mr. FIELDING. Let the hon. member read the agreement, that comes from the minister.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). The next question I asked the minister was this:

Were the above statements and figures present to the minds of the Canadian ministers when they executed the agreement on behalf of Canada?

If the Minister of Finance had answered that question he would have answered, no, because no person, no representative of Canada negotiating the treaty in the interest of the farmers of this country, with those facts before him coming from the United States experts, showing that the prices of the staple products of the farm were higher in Canada than in the United States, would ever have entered into this agreement. Will the minister answer now?

Mr. FIELDING. I have told the hon. gentleman that he will get answers to his questions in due course.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). The next question, No. 4, was this:

Since the date of the execution of the agreement has the government made any effort to verify the above statements and figures as set out in the United States official document No. 849?

The Minister of Finance knew well yesterday the answers to all these questions; he knew yesterday that those facts and figures of the United States authorities, which were not made public until long after the treaty was signed, were not present to his mind, and he could have answered question No. 4. He knows whether the government, in view of those facts and figures, showing the prices on the Canadian side higher than on the American side, had made any effort to verify them. If the Minister of Finance answers that question correctly, he will answer that he has made no attempt to verify those figures. But the government had determined, obstinately and pertinaciously, to stand by the two ministers, no matter what their faults of judgment may have been in making this agreement, and now they are prepared, no matter what the consequences may be to the farmers, to force this agreement upon the country. Question No. 5:

5. Is the government aware that both the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States referred the agreement to committees composed of both political parties before whom evidence was taken for months as to the possible effect of the agreement on the United States interests?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario).

If the Minister of Finance answers that question he will answer it in the affirmative. He is aware that this agreement was referred to committees of both Houses of Congress, composed of both political parties, with a view of ascertaining what effect it would have upon the great interests of the United States. What information has this House in reference to this agreement? We can go out and read the newspapers, we have a little knowledge of our own; but the proper attitude for the government to take in reference to this great question was to summon the interests that are going to be affected, and to hear them in reference to it. Were the members of any intelligent body ever before asked to commit themselves so thoroughly blindfolded to a proposal of such importance as this?

6. Is it the intention of the government to take any evidence before any committees touching on the relative prices of farm products in the United States and Canada, or on the effect the agreement may have on Canadian interests?

If the Minister of Finance answers that question he will answer it in this way: It is not our intention to take any evidence before committees touching the relative prices of farm products in the two countries, because so soon as we commence to take such evidence, we will find that the prices on the Canadian side are higher than the prices on the American side, and consequently it would be detrimental to the interests of the Canadian farmers to consummate this agreement.

7. Has the government any information now in their possession dealing with the relative prices of farm products in Canada and the United States?

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance now if they have any additional information dealing with this important matter in the nature of comparative prices. Have they sent any experts? Have they any authoritative information upon these important matters in which the farmers are so deeply interested? I will give the Minister of Finance an opportunity to answer.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman ought not to seek two methods of procuring the same end. He has put his questions on the paper, and I have said to him that they will be answered. The hon. gentleman now goes on and presumes to answer them himself, so I suppose he does not want an answer from me.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I want an authoritative answer from the government so that the people of Canada may have some intelligent conception of what this agreement means. The fundamental position for the government to take is to find out what effect it will have. The Minister of Finance says that it is an agreement in the interests of the farmers. If it is in the interest of the farmers, surely the first step the government should have taken was to ascertain how the prices of farm products compared in the two countries.

Now, Sir, I was speaking, before I digressed, upon the charge of inconsistency that was made against the Liberal-Conservative party for having once advocated reciprocity, and now opposing it. I want to say that the reciprocity agreement that has been entered into on this occasion is not such a reciprocity agreement as was proposed by Sir John A. Macdonald; that was not the ill-advised, unfair and illogical agreement that has been negotiated by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs. I want further to say that since 1892 the Liberal-Conservative party has not been in favour of reciprocity, and since 1898 and 1899 the Reform party, under the present leader of the government, has been opposed to reciprocity. I want to read a few extracts showing the position the leader of the government took in days gone by. In 1899 Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking on this question, said:

If we know the hearts and minds of our people at present I am not making too wide a statement when I say that the general feeling in Canada is not in favour of reciprocity. There was a time when Canadians would have given many things to obtain the American market. There was a time when the market of the great cities of the union was the only market we had, but those days are past and over now. We are not depending on the American market now. It is possible they may come to us, if they do, we will teach them the lesson they have taught us.

In 1907 at the Imperial Conference the leader of the government made this statement:

There was a time when we were wanting reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside, and negatived. We have said good-bye to that trade, and we now put all our hopes upon the British trade.

Does any person now charge either the Liberal party or the Conservative party with inconsistency if they oppose reciprocity after the utterances of the leader of the government? At the Imperial Conference in 1907, the right hon. gentleman said further:

If we are to follow the lines of nature and geography between Canada, and the United States, the whole trade would flow from south to north, and from north to south. We have done everything possible by canals and subsidizing railways to bring the trade from west to east and east to west so as to bring trade into British channels. All this we have done recognizing the principle of the great advantage of forcing trade within the British Empire. . . There is no boundary line except a purely conventional one over the whole territory of North America. Their habits are the same as ours, and therefore we are induced to trade and cannot help it by force of nature. But so far as legislation can influence trade, we have done everything possible to push our trade towards the British people as against the American people. . .

There was a time when we wanted reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside. We have said good-bye to that trade and we now put all our hopes upon the British trade.

Mr. PATERSON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he would read an extract or an utterance, or a resolution of any kind passed by the Conservative party, against reciprocity.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Mr. Chairman, in the past three general elections, 1900, 1904 and 1908 it was not an issue; it was not in active politics.

Mr. PATERSON. I ask the hon. gentleman if there is any repudiation by the Conservative party, or by their responsible men, of reciprocity. I defy him to read it.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). If the hon. gentleman has been following the proceedings of this House he will see what the attitude of the Conservative party is upon the proposition that was made by the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Customs asks when the Conservative party was opposed to reciprocity. Why, was not the election of 1891 fought out on reciprocity? That is the kind of reciprocity that hon. gentlemen are trying to force upon the country now. Speaking about the constitutional objections, I said, Mr. Chairman, that I thought as a casual student of the principles of responsible government, that we were living in a democratic country, and that the people ruled, but we find that we are under a dictatorship headed by the right hon. leader of the government. The cabinet composed of a few members, meet in secret, they decide upon policies, they commit the country to them and then afterwards, when they have a general election, these matters are either passed over or by large campaign funds their policies are carried without a fair submission of them to the people. What do we find?—four matters of prime importance during the history of this government have been settled not by the people, but by the government themselves. The Grand Trunk proposition, by which this country was committed to an expenditure of $200,000,000, was made merely by the Liberal government, without the consent or knowledge of the then Minister of Railways and Canals, with Senator Cox and others. That was not submitted to the people until after it had been consummated. The honour of Canada was at stake and the country was so committed to this policy that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) stated that if the Conservative party were elected in 1904, they would feel constrained to carry out that policy and to carry into effect the agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway showing that instead of having a tentative agreement and going to the country on that policy in a democratic way they made an agreement and crammed it down the throats of the people without a fair election. Then, in 1904 we had a general election. Was there a word then about the Autonomy Bills and the creation of the provinces in the west? Was there a statement or a whisper as to the creation of the new provinces, as to the emasculating of these provinces and taking away from them the control of their mines, minerals, timber and educational affairs? Not a word, but during the next session they passed the Autonomy Bills that deprived these provinces of the rights of self-government that they are now claiming. Then we had the Navy Bill. We had an election in 1908, but the Navy Bill was never discussed. There was no submission to the people and no mandate from the people to enter upon an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars. Surely that was an extraordinary proceeding in a country where responsible government is supposed to obtain. Here we had a policy involving an enormous expenditure which was never discussed in any general election although the people demanded that they should be consulted before a permanent policy was carried into effect.

Now, we have the reciprocity arrangement of 1911, making radical changes in the fiscal policy of this country, a policy that has enabled Canada to grow prosperous and develop, which policy is being changed without any consultation of the people. Personally speaking I do not shy at the word 'blocking.' Personally speaking, I am here for the purpose of blocking reciprocity until the people have had an opportunity of being heard upon it. There is no use shying at the word. The position of the opposition was made clear by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in the west that, in so far as reciprocity, is concerned, reciprocity will not go upon the statute books until the people have had an opportunity to pronounce upon it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear hear.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Did I hear hon. gentlemen say anything?

Mr. BUREAU. Sure.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario).

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). It has been suggested to me, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. gentleman had the right to vote against the people being given an opportunity to express their opinon upon this question. We heard the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) grow eloquent last night. He said that they wanted a vote upon it. So do we want a vote upon it, but we want a vote of the people upon it, and not a vote of a few servile followers of the government——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario)—who will vote for whatever measure is introduced by the leader of the government and who have never been known, outside of the three gentlemen who announced themselves upon this important question, to take an independent stand upon any public question.

Canadians are living in a fool's paradise.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Some people imagine that we are living under responsible government. We are living under an autocratic government, a government that is ruled by a dictator who forces his policies upon his supporters and upon the country. There are a great many economic objections to this reciprocity treaty and as time is of no moment to the government I purpose entering upon a discussion of a few of these objections.

Mr. FIELDING. That will be a pleasant diversion.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). If time were of much moment to the government they would not remain here so long, they would dissolve and go to the country. We of the opposition have definitely made up our minds that we are going to stay here until this question is submitted to the people. Why do not the government be straightforward about the matter and let it go to the people? Why keep us here in the dog days, why bring us back in July and August to discuss reciprocity when the matter should be discussed on the hustings before the people who should be permitted to pronounce upon it? One of the greatest objections to this agreement is——

Mr. PATERSON. Cannot you vote on it and then let the people pronounce upon it?

Mr. SHARPE. (Ontario). I prefer that the people should pronounce upon it. I have not the slightest doubt that the Minister of Customs, if he had his way, would like to hang a man and try him afterwards. I prefer to give it a trial before the country and then we will come here and hang reciprocity after the elections are over.

Mr. BUREAU. Reciprocity may hang you before that.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I will venture to express the opinion that the Solicitor General will never hang anybody or anything. He has not made a practice in parliament of displaying energy enough to hang anybody.

Mr. FIELDING. Oh, he has hung several.

Mr. BUREAU. I am not a hanger.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario.) One objection to this treaty is that our natural products will become a prey to American trusts. Another is the fact that the United States with their hundred million people is an exporting country, exporting the very things that we have to sell. Another objection is that the United States and twelve other countries may compete in our market with our farmers. The fourth and strongest objection that I have discussed at some length is that the price of staple farm products are higher in Canada than in the United States. Speaking about our natural resources becoming a prey to the United States, everybody will admit that it is in the interests of every country to convert our raw material into the finished product within our own borders. We all approve of the pulpwood policy of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. What does that mean? It means that these two provinces are compelling the people who produce pulp from Crown lands to manufacture it into paper in our own country. That means the establishment of factories, the creation of industries, the employment of labour, and the building up of our own country. The same argument that applies to pulpwood applies also to our wheat.

We should grind our wheat into flour and save the by-products for feed. Our coarse grain should be fed to the stock and thus enrich the soil. Our stock should be converted into beef and pork ready for the market. Standing timber and saw logs should be manufactured into finished products, woodenware, furniture, pianos, &c. The United States want raw materials, our pulp wood, our saw logs, our coarse grains wheat and stockers. In document No. 1418, Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, in his open letter to the National Grange of February 9, 1911, says of the United States:

> We get into the Canadian woods, 90,000,000 or more of us, for timber products, things very much needed, as our home supplies are so much reduced that prices have gone up markedly in the last few years, and our own development in the future will draw heavily on what remains.
> The trains that bring farm products to the United States will take farm, orchard and manufactured products back.

Mr. PATERSON. Then farm products will go to the United States?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario) reading—

> The raw material that comes from the Canadian farm will be manufactured in the United States, and what is not needed will be sent to foreign countries.
>
> The Canadian can furnish us with feeders, a large per cent of the number that come to the United States are of that class.
>
> We can handle the Canadian export grain crop with facility. If it is brought inside our borders and milled as it would be, our dairymen could use with great profit the by-products of the mills. This is the feature, bran and shorts—that makes dairy products and robs the soil.
>
> The United States could with great profit and benefit to the land, take all the grain Canada has to sell, and devote its lands to less exacting crops, as is evidenced by the older prairie states farmers who grow no grain to sell, buy their flour and thereby keep up the fertility of the soil. In the western states where the farmer has turned from grain raising for sale to the production of crops to be fed to domestic animals on the farm, the new departure has been so profitable that lands in those states have risen in value to $100 to $200 per acre, and rents from $4 to $6 per acre.

Mr. Beveridge, who was here a few days ago, said in a recent speech, which will be found at page 2340 of the 'Congressional Record':

> We have used up out natural resources so rapidly that the belated policy of conserving them has become one of our greatest national anxieties.

President Taft's message, January 26, 1911, contains this passage:

> We have reached a stage in our own development that calls for a statesmanlike and broad view of our future economic status and its requirements. We have drawn upon our natural resources in such a way as to invite attention to their necessary limit. This has properly aroused effort to conserve them. to avoid their waste, and to restrict their use to our necessities.
> Ought we not then to arrange a commercial agreement with Canada, if we can, by which we shall have direct access to her great supply of natural products without an obstructing or prohibitory tariff?
> The Dominion has greatly prospered. It has an active, aggressive and intelligent people. They are coming to the parting of the ways.

Would the Minister of Customs be good enough to explain what President Taft meant by that?

Mr. PATERSON. My hon. friend might ask the president to explain.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). If that is the best answer he can give we will take it for what it is worth. The message continues:

> They must soon decide whether they are to regard themselves as isolated permanently from our markets by a perpetual wall or whether we are to be commercial friends. If we give them reason to take the former view, can we complain if they adopt methods denying access to certain of their natural resources except upon conditions quite unfavourable to us. A notable instance of such a possibility may be seen in the condition surrounding the supply of pulp wood and the manufacture of print paper for which we have made a conditional provision in the agreement, believed to be equitable. Should we not now, therefore, before their policy has become too crystallized and fixed for charge, meet them in a spirit of real concession, facilitate commerce between the two countries, and thus greatly increase the natural resources available to our people?

Free lumber we ought to have. By giving our people access to Canadian forests we shall reduce the consumption of our own, which in the hands of comparatively few owners, now have a value that requires the enlargement of our available timber resources.

That the broadening of the sources of food supplies that the opening of the timber resources of the Dominion to our needs, that the addition to the supply of raw materials will be limited to no particulaar section does not require demonstration.

Are these messages not pregnant with warnings to us who pride ourselves on being Canadians? What is the burden of their song? To what do they attach importance? Raw materials! Every page bristling with the words raw materials. Raw mater ials! Raw materials! They want us to cut down our timber our grain crops, our pulp wood, harvest our raw materials—ship them in that condition to the United States, let them with their labour and capital work them up to manufactured goods and sell them back to us!

Are we to be a party to such a policy? Are we to be a party to such self-suppression? Are we to be the hewers of wood and the drawers of water to the United States people?

Mr. FIELDING. Is there anything that gives the Americans access to our raw materials that they have not now?

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I say the minister by this agreement is facilitating the export of raw materials to the United States, and by thus encouraging that export and by allowing the clause regarding pulp wood to be inserted in the agreement, is trying to facilitate the export of pulpwood in the raw condition, and thus to put the screws on the provinces to change their laws in regard to the export of pulpwood.

I wish now to submit some figures that show that the United States are shipping less raw material, and more finished products from their country. They appreciate the advantage to any country of keeping within their borders the labour required to convert the raw materials into finished products, thus deriving the benefit of these secondary industries.

Figures showing United States is shipping less raw material and more of finished products each year:

I	Total Grain Export in 1906	117,062,000
	" " " 1909	99,953,000
	Decrease of Exports in Raw Materials	$117,109,000
II	Total Flour and Meal export in 1905	42,732,791
	" " " " " 1908	66,946,329
	Increase of exports of finished products	$24,213,588
III	Live Animals exported in 1906	49,139,563
	" " " 1909	22,645,438
	Decrease	$26,494,128
IV	Beef exports (cured and fresh) in 1905	47,055,040
	" " 1908	51,104,643
	Increase of finished products	$4,049,603
V	Pork (fresh and cured) 1905	106,085,977
	" " 1908	121,024,224
	Increase of finished products	$14,938,247

Showing that the United States is pursuing a policy of encouraging the working up of the raw materials into the finished product in their own country. The policy of this administration is to encourage the export of raw materials—to let the United States get the possession of our raw materials on which they can employ their own labour and capital, and send back the finished product to Canada. Such a course is suicidal. We should encourage the keeping of our raw materials in our own country, and working them up into finished products by our own Canadian labour, thus making the country more prosperous.

I would like to give a brief summary of the great natural resources of this country. It is estimated that the standing timber of Canada amounts to 500 billion feet; that our wheat fields are 600 miles by 1,000 miles in extent, making 117 million acres fit for wheat. Our coast fishing extends over 12,500 miles, our fresh water fishing over 440,000 miles. Our coal areas amount to 172 billion tons. We have inestimable riches in gold, silver, nickel and iron mines. Our gold mines have yielded $262,000,000 of production. Our silver mines are the richest in the world. Our nickel mines provide three-fifths of the world's supply. Our water-powers are estimated at 25 million horse-power. Our farm crops in 1910 amounted to 507 million dollars' worth. We produced $98,000,000 in dairy products, $90,000,000 in minerals, $63,000,000 in timber, $30,000,000 in fisheries. And this is only a partial list. We have the greatest undeveloped country in the whole universe. Is it any wonder that the United States desires to get access to this treasure house to exploit our natural resources for the benefit of their own people? I desire to emphasize the importance of the Canadian home market, built up under the protection of the National Policy, a policy that has not been materially departed from by the present administration. This country in a large measure owes its success to the fact that the National Policy has been maintained practically in its entirety by the present administration, and wherever it has been departed from or altered, that has been done to the detriment of this country. In 1910 the farm crops in Canada amounted to $507,185,000, the dairy crops to $58,000,000, a total of $605,185,000. Of this amount Canada exported only $105,079,300 worth, which shows that the home market consumes over $500,000,000 worth of those crops. The wheat exported to all markets amounted to $52,609,351. Of this we exported to Great Britain $49,267,736, and to all other countries only $3,331,615. The cheese we exported to all markets amounted to $21,607,692. We exported to Great Britain $21,481,566 and to all other countries only $126,126 worth. Canada to become a great country must develop its home markets. We must build up our home industries. No nation in the world ever yet rose in the scale of nationhood or amounted to anything that adopted a free trade policy. We must develop the different tastes, different aptitudes and different capacities of our own citizens. We must have diversified industries for that purpose. Every nation in the world except Great Britain realizes that, and over half of the people of Great Britain to-day are in favour of a moderate protection. Consequently I say that every nation except Great Britain believes in high protective duties for building up its home markets and creating diversified pursuits for the diversified tastes of its people.

As I am not through, Mr. Chairman, and as the hour is late, perhaps the minister who is leading the House will consent to an adjournment.

Mr. FIELDING. I will consent.

Committee rose and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 11.32 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WEDNESDAY, July 26, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

THE RAILWAY COMMITTEE.

Mr. NESBITT moved that the Select Standing Committee on Railways have leave to sit during the sessions of the House, as recommended in the report of the Committee.

Mr. SPROULE. Are we trying to revive such resolution passed before the committee this morning. We have only one Bill to deal with and as the next meeting of the committee is called for 10 o'clock instead of 11 o'clock on Tuesday next when the House sits there is no need of this motion.

Mr. NESBITT. It was recommended by the committee on the 16th of May.

Mr. SPROULE. Oh, that was on the eve of adjournment, and when there were a lot of Bills to be disposed of, but there is only one Bill before us now.

Mr. BLAIN. I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) that this motion is absolutely unnecessary under existing conditions. The work before the committee is not heavy now.

Mr. NESBITT. The work is not very heavy, but the talk is.

Mr. LANCASTER. That one Bill before the committee will have to be carefully considered and it will probably be opposed by nearly all the members of the House when they understand it. I can well understand that certain interests would want this motion to pass, but they are not the interests of the people. If it does pass it will have the effect of compelling members to neglect their duties in the committee or else neglect their duties in this House. This Bill refers to a charter that has been absolutely dead for three years and that never was heard of in the House of Commons until the day before adjournment after we had been in session for six months.

Mr. EMMERSON. Did this Bill come from the Senate?

Mr. LANCASTER. This Bill came from the Senate, but they must have been late in introducing it in the Senate or else it would have got to this House before it did. It is a Bill entirely in the interests of a private corporation, and in view of the urgent public business before the House it can very well wait until next session.

Mr. DEVLIN. The Bill could have passed the Committee this morning, as the great majority of the committee desired, but upon the request of the hon. member for East Grey and others we consented to allow the Bill to stand over in order that those who might possibly have any interest in opposing it should be notified. We did not touch upon the merits of the Bill this morning.

Mr. MACDONELL (Toronto). The hon. member (Mr. Devlin) says the majority of the committee were seized of the Bill this morning, and prepared to pass it, but now he says they did not even consider the merits.

Mr. DEVLIN. What I said was that the Bill was fully discussed and the majority of the committee quite prepared to pass it, but now these gentlemen opposite want to kill it entirely.

Mr. SPROULE. We are not endeavouring to kill the Bill but we are pointing out that the committee has adjourned until Tuesday next at ten o'clock, which is an hour before the sitting of the House, and we think there is plenty of time to consider the Bill, without passing this motion.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. member for East Grey will himself speak for an hour against the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. Not at all.

Mr. DEVLIN. We will get to eleven o'clock when the House meets and then the committee will have to rise.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think I spoke more than five minutes on the Bill this morning. The consideration of the Bill was adjourned in view of the fact that the committee were notified that the city council of Montreal and the board of trade desired to be heard and had no notice, and that the R. & O. Co'y had their representatives before the committee saying that only late yesterday did they receive intimation that the Bill would be considered to-day, and they desired to consider carefully whether or not it would prejudicially affect their interests. It is for that reason we asked delay.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is not a public Bill and the public interest can in no way be affected. The Bill came to us from the Senate and has been before parliament for a considerable time. In view of the attitude some hon. gentlemen assume towards the Bill it would seem to me that in the hour between 10 o'clock and 11 o'clock no progress could be made. It is to give those who oppose the Bill the fullest opportunity to be heard that this motion has been made.

Mr. GOODEVE. The government has thought it vitally important to call special morning sittings of the House for the consideration of an important public measure, and under these circumstances it is unfair that members of this House should be prevented attending to their duty here by obtruding on them the consideration of a private Bill in the committee. There is ample time to consider this Bill between ten and eleven in the morning and between two and three in the afternoon, if necessary, when the House is not in session. As a member of the Railway Committee it is unfair that I should be compelled to neglect my important duties in this House with reference to a measure in which my constituents are deeply interested, simply because I am forced to attend a meeting of a committee.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The Railway Committee is composed of practically nearly all the members of the House, and this motion would compel them to neglect their duty in the committee or to be absent when a public measure of vital importance is being considered in the House. The Minister of the Interior told us last night that many measures of great public importance would not pass this session because of insufficient time. He told us that the Grain Bill which was introduced in the interests of the farmers would have to stand aside, that the Bank Act, and important amendments to the Railway Act would not be allowed to go through this session for the same reason.

Mr. OLIVER. If the hon. member says that I stated that these measures would not be allowed to go through this session because of press of business he misunderstood me entirely. I said that these measures were claiming the pressing attention of the House, but had been compelled to give way to the discussion of the matter now before the House. I did not convey the impression that they would not be dealt with later on.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The Minister of the Interior said that these were more important than the matter brought up by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, and we all understand him to say they would not be able to get through this session. The minister said that the Bank Act would not go through because of want of time, and so we had to pass an interim Act.

Mr. OLIVER. I stated the fact with regard to the Bank Act, but Hansard will bear me out that I did not convey any impression such as the hon. member (Mr. Middlebro) has referred to.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the Minister of the Interior think that the Grain Act, the Bank Act, and the amendments to the Railway Act, are less important than this private Bill?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not considered that question at all.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Will the minister say that we should give precedence to this private Bill before these important measures?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not thought of that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Such a proposition as this is entirely unreasonable under existing conditions, and it should not be forced on us.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know even the title of this Bill, nor what its merits are, nor the matter to which it refers, but hon. gentlemen will realize that there is a more important measure before the House, and that is the reciprocity agreement with the United States. This discussion is not only so much time consumed from the discussion of that important matter, and therefore I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) not to press the motion but to withdraw it.

Motion withdrawn

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario):

1. Referring to the White Book known as Document No. 849, entitled 'Reciprocity with Canada,' being the message from the President of the United States transmitting to the Senate a report from the Tariff Board, and on March 1, 1911, ordered to be printed and laid on the Table of the United States Senate, in which occurs the following passages, viz.:—

(a) On page 107, 'It is to be noted that the farm prices of more than half of the oat crop of the United States range from $0.27 to $0.35 a bushel, and that the farm prices of about the same proportion of the Canadian crop range from $0.28 to $0.36.'

(b) On page 109, speaking of the prices of horses, 'In all the Canadian Provinces except Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and Nova Scotia the prices are higher than in any of our states.'

(c) On page 109, speaking of the prices of dairy cows, 'The highest Canadian price quoted is $48 in Ontario as against $46.50 in Montana, the highest American price.'

(d) On page 110, appears the following table of comparative prices, average value per head in 1910:—

	Horses.	Dy. cows.	Other cattle.	Sheep.	Swine.
United States	108.19	35.79	19.41	4.03	9.14
Canada.	133.	43.00	31.00	6.00	11.00
And comparing the
State of N.Y.	125.00	39.50	18.20	5.00	11.50
With Ont. ..	133.00	48.00	34.00	7.00	10.00

(e) On page 110 appears also the following statements:—

'Prices of other cattle vary in the United States from $14.30 a head in Minnesota to $27.40 in Montana, while in Canada the range of prices is from $31 in Saskatchewan to $34 in Ontario.'

'Prices of sheep are much lower in the United States than in Canada.'

'Prices of swine are slightly higher in Canada than in the United States.'

(f) On page 113 appears the following:—

'As to horses Canada has no surplus of importance outside of Ontario.

'During the spring of 1910 it is stated on good authority that not less than 20,000 horses were sold out of Ontario alone for shipment to the market just mentioned, and prospective loss of this trade is giving Ontario some concern at this time. The five provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, combined have but 1,863,744 head as compared with 1,600,000 head now in the state of Iowa alone.'

2. When was the reciprocity agreement executed by representatives of Canada and the United States?

3. Were the above statements and figures present to the minds of the Canadian ministers when they executed the agreement on behalf of Canada?

4. Since the date of the execution of the agreement has the government made any effort to verify the above statements and figures as set out in the United States official document No. 849?

5. Is the government aware that both the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States referred the agreement to committees composed of both political parties, before whom evidence was taken for months as to the possible effect of the agreement on United States interests?

6. Is it the intention of the government to take any evidence before any committees touching on the relatives prices of farm products in the United States and Canada, or on the effect the agreement may have on Canadian interests?

7. Has the government any information now in their possession dealing with the relative prices of farm products in Canada and the United States?

Mr. FIELDING:

1, 2 and 3. The document referred to shows on its face that it was sent to the Senate of the United States by the President on the 28th of February, 1911, and on March 1 ordered to be printed. Consequently it could not have been in the possession of the Canadian ministers on the 21st of January, the date of the correspondence which constitutes the reciprocity agreement.

4. Consideration of the statements was not deemed by the government essential to the consideration of the reciprocity agreement. The desire of all Canadian governments for reciprocity in natural products was clear beyond question and did not require any statistical support.

The quotations from the document contained in the question are incomplete and, in some respects misleading. For example, a quotation in the question reads:—

'Price of sheep are much lower in the United States than in Canada.'

What the document in question says concerning the price of sheep is as follows:—

'Prices of sheep are much lower in the United States than in Canada, due to the fact that Ontario specializes on pedigreed flocks, as appears later on.'

And, later on, on the same subject, the document says:—

'Unfortunately Ontario conditions are such that no fairly comparable figures can be made up. No flocks approaching in size those shown by the Ohio tables are to be found. There is apparently no such thing as exclusive sheep farming known there, except in those instances where farmers are maintaining pure bred stock to be sold at special values for breeding purposes, and costs of production in such cases would range too high to be fairly compared with sheep raising as carried on in the great sheep-rearing counties of the United States.

In another case prices of oats are quoted in the hon. member's inquiry in such a manner as to apparently show that the United States prices range from 27 to 35 cents per bushel, while the Canadian prices range from 28 to 36 cents per bushel. In making this quotation no account is taken of the fact that the American bushel is thirty-two pounds, while the Canadian bushel is thirty-four pounds. A fair comparison, even according to the figures quoted, would show that the American prices are a shade higher.

5. Yes.

6. No.

7. The government have now, as they have always had, access to the various agricultural and other journals containing quotations of farm products in Canada and the United States. Some compilations made from these have already been submitted to the House, and there are others which will be brought down immediately.

MARRIAGE LAWS.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

1. Has the parliament of Canada the power to legalize or validate any or every marriage solemnized in Canada?

2. Does the government consider it desirable that steps should be taken to prevent cruelty and injustice by reason of marriages contracted in good faith before a duly ordained clergyman but afterwards declared invalid?

3. Does the government propose to take any steps for this purpose or in this connection?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH:

1. The question calls for an opinion upon a matter of law in regard to which the government would desire to be advised if necessity arose.

2 and 3. The government is of opinion that it has no power or jurisdiction in the premises.

PRODUCTION OF CEMENT.

Mr. SEXSMITH:

What has been the total production of cement in Canada, annually, since 1900?

Mr. FISHER. The production of cement in Canada in the years 1900-10 is as follows:

Year.	Natural Rock Cement. brls.	Portland Cement. brls.
1900..	125,428	292,124
1901..	133,328	317,066
1902..	127,931	594,594
1903..	92,252	627,741
1904..	56,814	910,358
1905..	14,184	1,346,548
1906..	8,610	2,139,164
1907..	5,775	2,436,093
1908..	1,044	2,665,289
1909..	....	4,010,180
*1910..	....	4,753,975

* Subject to revision.

THE DUMPING CLAUSE.

Mr. MACDONELL:

Is it provided or proposed that the dumping clause in the tariff shall apply to articles enumerated in the schedules to the reciprocity agreement?

Mr. FIELDING. The agreement referred to contains no reference either to the dumping clause of the Canadian tariff laws or to the somewhat similar provisions of the United States tariff laws. Any questions that may arise with reference to the application of these provisions, on either side, will have to be decided by the customs authorities of the respective countries.

EXPRESS RATES.

Mr. SCHAFFNER:

Has the Board of Railway Commissioners full jurisdiction to regulate and determine the tolls or rates to be charged by all express companies for the carriage and delivery of goods and parcels in Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, under Revised Statutes of Canada of 1906, chapter 37.

THE SEAL FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the orders of the day are taken up, I would like to ask the right hon. the First Minister whether he is prepared to lay on the table the Seal Fisheries treaty and papers and correspondence in connection therewith. I notice that it has been ratified at Washington some days ago.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As soon as my hon. friend the Secretary of State comes to the House he will lay the papers on the table. They are ready.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST CHOLERA.

Mr. SPROULE. I have noticed that some days ago certain cases supposed to be cholera were quarantined below Quebec, and I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has any information on the subject that he is able to communicate to the House so as to relieve the anxiety of the people of the country in regard to this dreaded disease.

Mr. FISHER. The cases referred to were somewhat suspicious, and the physician in charge detained them for separate examination. A bacteriological examination has been made, and the doctors have declared that the disease is not cholera, so that there is no case of quarantine at present.

Mr. SPROULE. Are the cases discharged from quarantine, or are they still detained?

Mr. FISHER. They are still detained to recover from acute dysentery.

PRIVILEGE—MR. PERLEY.

Mr. PERLEY. I rise to a question of privilege. On the night before last, when I was not in the House, the Minister of Public Works made reference to me personally in connection with some correspondence addressed to the Minister of Finance by the Riordon Paper Company, in which I happen to hold some stock. Considering the statements made in the House by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, I am rather surprised that he should have allowed this correspondence to be used in this way. On the 3rd of February the Minister of Finance said this in this House with regard to correspondence on the subject of reciprocity:

> With regard to correspondence respecting reciprocity with the government there is practically none. Many people made representations to the government but beyond a polite acknowledgment of their letters, there is no correspondence. In some cases these representations, although not marked confidential, are such as I would hardly feel free to bring down because they relate to particular interests that might be, or thought they might be affected by the negotiations, and I could not without their consent publish these.

This matter was discussed a good many times in the House, and I understood that the Minister of Finance was firm in the position that this correspondence was private correspondence.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is the hon. gentleman not aware that this correspondence was brought down months ago and is on the files of the House?

Mr. PERLEY. I was not aware of that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was from the files that I got it.

Mr. PERLEY. Even now I do not understand how that could be done after the remarks made by the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. MEMBERS. It was not brought down.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was, months ago.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Was all the private correspondence referred to by the Minister of Finnace brought down?

Mr FIELDING. There was no private correspondence from anybody brought down —no letter marked private, or which in its nature was private. I do not remember the particular letter referred to. I happened to be engaged when the Minister of Public Works was speaking, and beyond some reference to that company in which the hon. gentleman is interested I did not notice any reference to the letter. But I can only say that if there was anything in that letter intended to be private, I would not have brought it down. I did not give it to the Minister of Public Works. I presume that he must have got it from the public files. I do not know when it was brought down, but up to this moment I have not heard that there has been any objection on the part of the company to its being brought down.

Mr. PERLEY. I have no objection to this correspondence being brought down at all. I did not know that it was on file, and I would like the Minister of Public Works to tell me when it was placed on the table of the House and why that was done.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know why it was brought down. It was brought with a great deal of other correspondence. I happened to see it with a letter from my hon. friend from York (Mr. Crocket) referring to a communication from a large lumber company urging a reduction in the United States duty on shingles, and with letters from people dealing in hay, which were laid on the table of the House a good many months ago.

Mr. FIELDING. If my hon. friend will allow me, I will answer the question why it was brought down. It was brought down in answer to a demand of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), if I am not mistaken, that all correspondence on this subject should be brought down, and all the correspondence which either was not marked private or was not, from its very nature obviously intended to be private, has been brought down.

Mr. PERLEY. That, I take it, is only another way of saying that the minister has brought down just what he thought fit to bring down, and nothing more. I have no objection to these letters being brought down, but it seems to me the minister ought to have some general rule in these matters and not apply special rules to suit the purposes of the government.

Mr. FIELDING. What rule would the hon. gentleman suggest?

Mr. PERLEY. I think that either everything not marked 'private' should be brought down or nothing should be brought down.

Mr. FIELDING. Can my hon. friend (Mr. Perley) tell me of any case of which he complains? I do not think that in the case of the letter from this company in which the hon. gentleman is said to be interested, that the manager who wrote it ever complained, and I do not think he would complain of our action. There was nothing private in the letter, nor anything to indicate that it was intended to be private.

Mr. PERLEY. I quite understand that, but it seems to me that all the letters should be treated alike.

Mr. FIELDING. They have been.

Mr. PERLEY. Has the hon. minister brought down every letter connected with the reciprocity pact not marked 'private?'

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PERLEY. How does the hon. gentleman decide?

Mr. FIELDING. I received letters from my colleagues on this side, which though not marked private, were by their nature manifestly intended as private, and these I did not bring down.

Mr. PERLEY. In other words, the government brings down such correspondence as suits its convenience. However, I do not wish the House to think that I have any objection to the bringing down of these letters, or that there is anything in them that might not be made public. But I wish to say, in the first place, I have nothing to do personally with the active management of this compnay. I have so much work to do here that I have not tried to take part in the other. So, I found it necessary to telephone to Montreal to find out regarding these letters. I find that, in the first place, the statement of the Minister of Public Works, that this company urged very strongly that a reciprocal arrangement should be entered into, is not in accordance with the letter. This company has a large output of sulphite pulp, and it so happens that the ordinary terms 'pulp' and 'paper' as used do not include sulphite pulp, and this company simply wished to bring that point to the attention of the government in order that, if any treaty were made with the United States, the wording should be such as to cover sulphite pulp. This company is not a political company nor a Tory concern; it is a Canadian company. And if there were to be an arrangement with the United States they simply wished to bring proper information to the attention of the government. Now, the Minister of Public Works has said that he has been told that it would mean $90,000 to this company. It is easy for the minister to get up and make that statement. But there can be no foundation for it. This company will certainly derive some advantage, but the information the minister gives, if he has not got it from his inner consciousness must have been given him by somebody who knew nothing about the matter. It is utterly impossible that there should be such a benefit to the company. Further, the minister says that this will come about if the proposed arrangement goes into effect. The pulp and paper clauses depends on the will of the provinces, as this parliament has no power to put this into effect. It is true that if it comes into force immediately, pulp wood from private lands will be affected. But it is well known that the greater part of the business done by all these companies is done on Crown lands.

Now, with regard to the hon. minister's (Mr. Pugsley's) personal reference and insinuations regarding myself. I can only say that I am opposed to this reciprocity pact, because I think it is a bad thing for Canada; I am opposed to it on principle. And I extend to the hon. minister my sincere sympathy and pity that he seems utterly unable to understand how any one can regard a public question from any other point of view than the effect upon his own pocket.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am very glad to get the information which my hon. friend has given to the House that he has nothing to do with the active management of this company. Otherwise he would know of the very considerable quantities of pulp and paper which this company is to-day shipping to the United States and would realize the great benefits which would accrue to the company if pulp and paper were admitted free to the United States. I presume he knows something of the details of the work of the company.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does not the hon. gentleman think that my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) knows as much about the subject as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley)?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Minister of Public Works has had the very great advantage of reading the admirable letter written by the manager of the Riordan Paper Mills Company. And I wish to congratulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Perley) being, as he says simply a stockholder of the company, upon the excellent ability and excellent judgment of the young man who is now in the position of general manager of the Riordan Company. I do not know that there is any man in this country or in the United States engaged in the manufacture of pulp and paper who is more qualified——

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If we are going to have a debate on this sub——

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has heard enough?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). On the contrary we have heard too little from the hon. gentleman; we are likely to hear more from him particularly with regard to some of the insinuations he gives out, which insinuations do not come very well from a gentleman with the record in dealings with the treasury of New Brunswick that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) has.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) not to make insinuations. I have heard many insinuations in the past not only from the hon. gentleman himself but from others, and I think it is due to the position which the hon. gentleman occupies, that he should make no insinuations against another member of this House. But if he has any statement or charge to make let him make it openly and publicly. And I venture to tell the hon. gentleman——

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr Speaker——

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not through yet. I tell the hon. gentleman that if he and the gentlemen associated with him in this parliament, and associated with him politically in the province of New Brunswick, would produce the correspondence and the records which some of them at all events have in their possession, there would be disclosed to the people of this country and to this House as great a conspiracy against myself as ever was concocted against any public man in this country. I have made the statement before in the press that this conspiracy was concocted against me, and I have dared the gentlemen whom I have accused to come into the courts against me and bring an action for libel for the charges I made against them. And I tell the hon. gentleman that if the correspondence which they have in their possession—I do not say my hon. friend has, but the gentlemen who have been associated with him in this House, and who are allied with him as prominent members of the Conservative party in the province of New Brunswick—if I do not show that they have been guilty of this conspiracy, that they have been guilty of making false reports, and being parties to false reports against myself, I will forfeit my seat as a member of this House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am not referring to any correspondence; I am referring to the records of the legislature of New Brunswick. Since the hon. gentleman wants them produced, I think they can be produced, and he can make his answer with regard to them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If there is anything the hon. gentleman can find out he is welcome to it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think perhaps the hon. gentleman will not be so entirely satisfied with the statement of facts with regard to that as he professes to be at the present time. I rose for the reason that the hon. gentleman made a most uncalled for insinuation against the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley), and then was proceeding to deal with a matter that was absolutely irrelevant to the question raised by the member for Argenteuil, dealing with the internal affairs of the Riordan Paper Company. That is what the hon. gentleman was doing, and I said that the insinuation came with very bad grace indeed, and I repeat it, from a gentleman having the record in the public life of this country which is possessed by the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am quite content to allow my record in public life to stand side by side with that of the hon. gentleman. From time to time, during twenty-six years, I have appealed to the people of my native province on my record, and I have always been sustained upon that record. When the last appeal to the people of New Brunswick upon my record was made, I came back with a majority of ten supporters, and when we go to the people again, be it very soon or be it at a later date, I venture to say that we shall come back with twelve supporters at least from the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order. Discussion is not possible on a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the House that the debate is very irregular at this time.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was replying to the hon. member for Argenteuil, and I was saying that the letter——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I accept your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. When a question of privilege is raised the custom of the House is that the member raising it has the floor. I allowed the Minister of Public Works to speak because I thought he was making some personal explanation. Beyond that, the debate was irregular, because there is nothing before the House.

SOREL SHIPYARD, OFFICIAL INQUIRY.

Mr. MONK. Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I would like to ask again when the report on the Sorel affair will be laid on the table of the House. It is required for the purpose of discussion. I do not know if my hon. friend has acquired the habit of withholding documents.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I told my hon. friend yesterday that Mr. Boyle, the inspector of agencies, has made an inspection in Sorel and has been there for some time. He has not yet put in his report; he is away from town just now, and is expected back at the beginning of next week, when he will make his report forthwith.

WAYS AND MENAS—DREDGING AT GASPEREAU HARBOUR.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. O. S. CROCKET (York, N.B.) Before you leave the Chair, I desire to call attention to a matter which has been investigated in the Public Accounts Committee, and which I think deserves the serious consideration of the House. I refer to the contract which was awarded by the Public Works Department to the Marine Dredging and Construction Company for dredging at the Gaspereau river, New Brunswick. I do not know whether this is another case of a conspiracy to destroy the character of the Minister of Public Works, but I leave it to the members of the House to judge after they have heard the evidence that was adduced before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would my hon. friend tell me the date of that investigation?

Mr CROCKET. The investigation was held during the last session of parliament. I think the minister has the documents before him.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, I have not.

Mr. CROCKET. I see the minister has been examining the evidence since he came into the House, so he is just as familiar with the facts as I am. The evidence shows that this contract was illegally awarded to the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, which I think the members of the House are aware is owned and controlled by the minister's personal and political friends, Mr. George McAvity and Mr. John A. Moore. The contract was not only awarded illegally to that company, in contravention of the law, but under it the sum of $33,900 was paid to the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company for work which the resident district engineer in charge of the work reported was of no value. Now this transaction began, so far as the records of the department disclose, in the month of July, 1908. Previous to that date there had been two reports sent to the Public Works Department upon the proposed work. One of these reports was made by Mr. Day, the resident engineer of the department, on the 13th day of May, 1903, when that officer estimated that the cost of the proposed work, which was a channel giving twelve feet at low water, would be $168,000. Mr. Day based his estimate on 20 cents a cubic yard. The matter rested then until 1907, when, on the 5th of March, Mr. Geoffrey Stead, Mr. Day's successor as resident engineer, made another report, estimating that the work would require about 330,000 cubic yards to be dredged, costing, at 20 cents, $66,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. What is the date of that?

Mr. CROCKET. March 5, 1907. There the matter rested until the 15th of July, 1908, when the general elections of that year were approaching. Then we find it suddenly revived by this direction from the deputy minister to the then engineer:

> Kindly let me know as soon as possible just what quantity of urgent dredging is required at the Gaspereau river.

The resident engineer was accordingly asked by the chief engineer for his estimate of the quantity, on the 16th of July, and on the 17th of July, Mr. Stead sent this telegram to the chief engineer:

> In reply to your telegram at Gaspereau river, a cut to give six feet at low water through bar necessitating removing 48,000 cubic yards, barge measurement, is most urgently required. Basin, 350 feet long, 200 feet wide; at wharfs also very necessary, requiring 14,000 cubic yards barge measurement, of dredging.

On the 20th of July the acting deputy minister, Mr. Hunter, instructed the secretary of the department to have advertisements sent out calling for tenders for dredging at Gaspereau river, at Buctouche beach and at Buctouche harbour and at Point du Chene in the province of New Brunswick.

The advertisements issued on the 28th and bears date the 28th of January calling for tenders for dredging at these places. On the 31st of July, three days after the issue of the advertisement calling for tenders, we have this extraordinary telegram received by the chief engineer at Otawa:

Chatham, N.B., July 31, 1908.

To the Chief Engineer, .
Dept. of Public Works, Ottawa, Ont.

John E. Moore, of St. John, says he has dredge ready to work on Gaspereau river, N.B., and expects to start Monday. Am I authorized to lay out the dredging for him there.

GEOFFREY STEAD,
Resident Engineer.

Hon. members will observe that although the advertisement for tenders was issued and bears date 28th July and called for tenders to be received up to the 14th of August, on the third day after the issue of that advertisement, the minister's friend Mr. John E. Moore had his dredge upon the site and intended to go to work on Monday, which would be the 2nd day of August, and ten or twelve days before the date fixed for the receipt of tenders. Then, on the 4th of August, Mr. Stead receives this reply to his inquiry of the 31st of July.

August 4, 1908.

Sir,—The work of dredging in the Gaspereau river has been given to the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, of Saint John, N.B., providing they are willing to accept, in payment, per cubic yard, scow measurement, the lowest price to be obtained by tenders which are now being called for. Kindly place the company's dredge at work immediately, if they accept the conditions. You will please, however, note that the lesser work only is to be engaged upon.

Yours obediently,
(Sgd) Chief Engineer.

Geoffrey Stead, Esq.,
Resident Engineer.

So that the record shows the rather novel and ingenious method which has been adopted by the Public Works Department since my hon. friend took charge of it, of awarding a contract for the performance of work and of receiving tenders for that work after the contract has been awarded.

Mr. SPROULE. A very good idea.

An hon. MEMBER. Evidence of conspiracy.

Mr. CROCKET This would appear to be not evidence of a conspiracy against the character of the Minister of Public Works, but of conspiracy and fraud upon the public treasury of this country with the connivance of the Minister of Public Works. On the same day, the chief engineer informed Mr. Graham, who was Superintendent of Dredging in North Sydney of the awarding of this contract to the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, assuming apparently that the Gaspereau river that was referred to was in Cape Breton.

Mr. SPROULE. He was out in his geography.

Mr. CROCKET. Now, the 14th of August, was the day fixed by the advertisement for the receipt of tenders and on that day tenders were opened and we find that but one tender was received, it being from the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, to whom the contract had already been awarded, and it was at 90 cents a cubic yard or four and a half times the figure estimated by two district engineers of the department. That fact became known to the department on August 14th, but we find that the intimation of that fact to the superintendent of dredging in New Brunswick, Mr. McCordock was deferred to the 29th of September. On the 29th September, the chief engineer advised Mr. W. J. McCordock, superintendent of dredging, St. John, N.B., as follows:

September 29, 1908.

Sir,—The only tender received for dredging in the Gaspereau river was the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, for 90 cents per cubic yard, scow measurement. At the time the tender was received, I thought that this price was considerably more than that for which the contract should be awarded. However, it has been represented to the department, that the conditions are such as to make this price fair and reasonable. I, therefore, have to ask you to go to the Gaspereau river immediately, looking to the circumstances in the case, and report by wire immediately.

Yours obediently,
(Sgd.) Chief Engineer.

W. J. McCordock, Esq.,
Superintendent of Dredging,
St. John, N.B.

When Mr. Lafleur, the chief engineer was upon the stand he was asked if he could state by whom the representation was made to him that on account of the difficulties that had arisen this price was fair and reasonable. The chief engineer could not answer that question. He was asked if he had learned it from the minister and his reply was, that he could not say whether it was the minister or not who informed him of the fact that there were difficulties existing there which made fair and reasonable a price of 90 cents per cubic yard, when the two district engineers on the ground had certified to the department that the work was worth only 20 cents per cubic yard. The next memo. of interest which the file discloses is a telegram which was sent to Mr. Lafleur, the chief engineer by the hon. Minister of Public Works from St. John, on the 3rd of October, and this is the telegram:

Kindly wire instructions to Scammell to visit Gaspereau as arranged.

(Sgd.) WM. PUGSLEY.

The House will observe that in the meantime the engineer had intimated his opinion that the price of 90 cents, the tender of the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company was excessive, and it became necessary, therefore, to overcome the opinion of the resident engineer, so that this telegram signed 'Wm. Pugsley,' is very suggestive upon that point. The telegram to Mr. Lafleur was to wire instructions to Mr. Scammell, not the resident engineer of the district in which the work was being done, but the resident engineer of the district of St. John, and the telegram shows that the minister had intervened personally and arranged with Mr. Scammell for the purpose of visiting Gaspereau, manifestly Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of bolstering up the price which he desired should be paid to his favourite firm the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company. On the 5th of October, two days afterwards, the chief engineer telegraphs Mr. Scammell:

Ottawa, October 5, 1908.

J. K. Scammell,
Resident Engineer,
St. John, N. B.

Certain difficulties have risen in connection with dredging Gaspereau river. Please see the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, of St. John, who have the contract, and report.

(Sgd.) Chief Engineer.

On the same day the chief engineer telegraphed the Hon. William Pugsley at St. John to say that he had wired Mr. Scammell instructions to visit Gaspereau as arranged, and, as arranged by the minister personally with the resident engineer Mr. Scammell. There the record stands until the 9th of October when we have a communication received by the chief engineer of the department from Mr. McCordock, superintendent of dredging at St. John, passages of which I would like to put on record.

Offices, Department of Public Works of Canada—Dredging.
St. John, N.B., 9th October, 1908.

The Chief Engineer,
Dept. of Public Works,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir.—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 29th ult., No. 5615, as follows:

Then Mr. McCordock quotes the letter. The letter of the 20th September was the letter notifying the superintendent of dredging for New Brunswick for the first time of the receipt of the tender on the 14th of August some seven or eight weeks previously. After quoting the letter Mr. McCordock continues:

Expecting to receive the papers immediately from Mr. Graham, which you referred to, I immediately set about seeing where the Gaspereau river was located, to find one in Nova Scotia,——

This explains how it was that the first notification is sent by the chief engineer to Mr. Graham, of Cape Breton, there being a Gaspereau river in Cape Breton, and the officers of the department imagined that this river where the work was to be done was in Cape Breton.

--one on the Grand Lake, N.B., and one on the line of the Canadian Pacific railway in Sunbury county, N.B., but no others shown or the charts. I asked Mr. Shewan and Mr. Scammell if they knew of any other Gaspereau river, and they both looked over the charts with me and said they knew of no other.

Both Mr. Shewan and Mr. Scammell there referred to are resident engineers in New Brunswick, but they were unaware of the existence of this river in which the Minister of Public Works had, six or seven weeks before, his friend Mr. Moore dredging.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend does not suggest they were the resident engineers of the district, in which Gaspereau river is situated.

Mr. CROCKET. Not at all. They were the resident engineers at St. John, and they ought to be pretty familiar with the work going on in the province of New Brunswick and they were under Mr. McCordock the superintendent of dredging at St. John.

On inquiring of the minister, I found the work proposed at Port Elgin in Westmoreland county, N.B., and have visited and examined the place, and only to-day received from Mr. C. M. Graham the papers you directed would be sent to me.

We have the very peculiar fact that the superintendent of dredging in the province of New Brunswick was not able to ascertain from any of his own engineers or from the department at Ottawa, where this work was going on, and had to resort to the minister personally to ascertain the location of the river.

Mr. SPROULE. He had been running the whole job himself.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Crocket) allow me to correct him?

Mr. CROCKET. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. McCordock was the superintendent of the government dredging, and he had nothing whatever to do with contract dredging and, therefore, this was not at all within Mr. McCordock's jurisdiction.

Mr. CROCKET. Mr. McCordock was superintendent of dredging with jurisdiction all over the maritime provinces.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Only of government dredging.

Mr. CROCKET. What difference does that make about his not knowing where the river was. If he had nothing to do with contract dredging, why did the minister place the contract dredging under his charge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend is entirely wrong. This was not in Mr. McCordock's charge, but he was appointed as an expert by reason of his having thirty years' experience of government dredging work to go there and examine into the conditions and make a report.

Mr. CROCKET. Yes, to make a report upon this contract, because it was not government dredging, and that is the statement I made. Then, Mr. McCordock reports the result of his visit after having discovered the whereabouts of the work.

I report that up to yesterday 21,268 cubic yards are reported by the inspector as being removed. In many places in the river there is but two feet of water at low water, and to move the scows ahead to the spoil from the bucket may be deposited into the scow, first the dredge requires to dredge a trench twenty-five feet wide to eight feet depth at low water, throwing the spoil to one side, then when this trench is dredged a distance, the dredge is removed back to take out the remaining width, 35 feet, and the scow is floated in the trench just made.

I am of the opinon that from the exposed position of the dredging and the detention, from shallow water, and the difficulty in getting coal and water from the shore out two miles to the dredge, where it has to remain at anchor in all weather, that the amount of ninety cents named in the tender is a fair rate per cubic yard.

Notwithstanding that two resident engineers of the district had previously reported it at 20 cents per cubic yard, which of itself was a very liberal estimate, as I am advised, because the material to be removed consisted of nothing but sand and mud, and residents of the locality state that it was not really worth ten cents per cubic yard to remove it.

The contractor claims that he is, by custom, to receive an equivalent in yardage for the time spent in trenching and throwing on one side the spoil taken out of the trench, this to be calculated by the amount removed in the barges and time of dredging the same as compared with that during trenching.

The contractor has removed in 36 days working, 21,264 cubic yards, an average of 596 cubic yards per day, or, counting days not working, making 45 days, an average of 472 cubic yards.

This report will only refer to work on the Gaspereau river, Port Elgin, Westmoreland county, N.B.

I have the honour to be,
Yours obediently,
Sgd. W. J. McCordock, Esq.
Supt. of Dredging,
St. John, N. B.

Now, the next fact of interest which the record discloses is that on the 16th of October, the department had no record by which it could determine at headquarters the price of the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company's tender.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is not correct.

Mr. CROCKET. I say that it is correct and that the record shows it, and I propose to put it on 'Hansard' right now.

Ottawa, October 16, 1908.

Hon. Wm. Pugsley,
Minister of Public Works,
St. John, N.B.

Deputy minister informs me that you have Maritime Dredging and Construction Company's tender for dredging Gaspereau river, Westmoreland county. Would you kindly let me know prices quoted for ordinary materials and castng over so that progress estimate may be made out and paid.

(Sgd.) Chief Engineer.

Here we have a telegram sent to the Minister of Public Works at St. John, on the 16th October stating that he himself had in his possession at that time, and had carried in his pocket down to the city of St. John, the tender of the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, and that the department had no means of finding out what the price of that tender was, and for that reason they found it necessary to telegraph the minister who had the tender in his pocket down at St. John, and from the minister, and from the minister only, did Mr. Lafleur get his information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crocket), stated was that up to the 16th of October they had no record in the department.

Mr. CROCKET. I said that 'on' the 16th of October.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The record was on file with the department, and was taken by me to St. John.

Mr. CROCKET. What I intended to say, and what I am sure I did say, was that 'on' the 16th of October.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman said 'up' to the 16th of October.

Mr. CROCKET. The minister will not contradict the statement which he made because he cannot, being confronted with this telegram sent to himself.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I contradict the statement I understood the hon. gentleman to make, namely that up to the 16th of October they had not the record.

Mr. CROCKET. On the same day the minister replies:

St. John, N.B., 16th Oct., 1908.

E. B. Lafleur,
Chief Engineer,
Department of Public Works,
Ottawa.

Price materials Gaspereau river ninety cents. Have mailed tender to deputy.

(Sgd.) WM. PUGSLEY.

St. John, N.B., Oct. 16, 1908.

Dear Mr. Hunter,—I return you tender of Maritime Dredging and Construction Company for work at Gaspereau river, &c. I understand that Mr. McCordock has reported that the price asked for Gaspereau is reasonable. I shall be glad if you will confer with the chief engineer and have the necessary recommendation to council prepared.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) WILLIAM PUGSLEY.

J. B. Hunter, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

On the 19th of October there is a report from Mr. Scammell, with whom the minister had personally arranged to visit the ground, with a view to certifying to the fairness and reasonableness of this excessive tender, and I will read Mr. Scannell's whole letter:

No. 1824.
Subj., Dredging Gaspereau river.
Ref., Westmoreland Co., N.B.

Department of Public Works, Canada,
Office, Engineer-in-Charge Dredging,
St. John, N.B., 19th October, 1908.

Sir,—In reply to your telegram of the 5th inst., I saw the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company of St. John, N.B., and visited Gaspereau river on October 7, where a personal inspection was made of the work being done at that place in connection with dredging a channel 60 feet wide to a depth of 8 feet at low water and making a face of from 5 to 7 feet in order to secure a passage into the village of Port Elgin, parish of Botsford, Westmoreland county, N.B.

I found the dredge 'Iroquois' at work at that place with a tow boat, 'The Calluna,' and two barges. The work there is progressing with extreme difficulty, which I have reason to believe will increase as the season advances and much time will be lost on account of the high winds as the dredge is very much exposed to easterly and southeasterly gales, and there is no shelter afforded in the least.

I found that dredging commenced on August 17, and from the 17th to the 26th, 2,946 cubic yards were removed, being 34 scows in nine days or an average of 325 cubic yards per day. Up to September 5, 7,677 cubic yards were removed, or 87 scows in 18 days, being an average of 426 cubic yards per day. During the two days previous to my visit, viz., October 5 and 6, I found 1,159 cubic yards removed on the first day or 5 barges, and 1,324 cubic yards or 6 barges on the second day, which shows that under favourable working conditions the dredge is capable of doing good work.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that this favourite firm of the minister's made over $1,100 on the 5th October and over $1,300 on the 6th October. Yet we had a certificate against the first judgment of the engineer of the department that this price was fair and reasonable.

At high water the place of deposit of soil is half a mile, and at low water two miles from the site of the work, the materials dredged being clay, sand and oyster shells.

Neither the dredge or the tug can get into the creek except on the spring tides and this necessitates the water supply being pumped by a gasolene engine and towed out to the dredge at a great expense, this also applies to the coal used.

Under the circumstances it would be fair and reasonable to pay the present rate as called for under the contract with the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company.

Yours obediently,
(Sgd.) J. K. SCAMMELL,
Resident Engineer.

That is the resident engineer of the St. John district with whom, the letter shows, the minister himself, personally, arranged to visit and examine the work with a view to getting that certificate. On the 26th October, there is a letter from the engineer of the district, covering the county of Westmoreland in which the work is being done, Mr. Stead. He writes to John E. Moore, Esq., manager of the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, St. John.

In reply to your letter of the 23rd inst., I have been sending the reports of dredging at Port Elgin to Ottawa each week, but several have been returned to me, through a misunderstanding of the reports. I wrote explaining the matter and received a telegram on Saturday asking for the returned reports, which I at once forwarded.

Would you kindly make up your accounts, four copies of each, for dredging during the months of August and September. These must be certified by the inspector, and I will then forward them.

Though I have asked for it, I have had no notification of your having been awarded the contract and do not yet know your price.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) GEOFFREY STEAD,
Resident Engineer.

The resident engineer who was certifying these accounts as fair and reasonable on the 26th October, two days after the work was completed, states in his letter to Mr. Moore that he was not aware up to that time of the price of the contract. On October 28 there is a telegram from the chief engineer to Mr. Stead, the resident engineer at Chatham, as follows:

Dredging returns for Gaspereau river work do not state quantity cubic yards cast over.

This information required, please forward it immediately.

(Sgd.) Chief Engineer.

Mr. Moore was looking for some funds then, and it became necessary to have some further information. Mr. Stead replies on October 29:

Am on way to Gaspereau river to obtain information re dredging requested in your telegram of 28th inst.

(Sgd.) GEOFFREY STEAD,
Resident Engineer.

On the 30th a further telegram from Mr. Stead to Mr. Lafleur:

In reply to your telegram dredging inspector in dredging at Gaspereau river was removed when widening cut and is included in quantities in scow loads given in inspector's reports.

On October 31 the chief engineer wires Mr. Stead:

Telegram re Gaspereau river received. Dredging returns do not give number of cubic yards cast over, and that is the information I want. Please wire it immediately.

Stead replies on the 31st October:

In reply to your telegram dredging inspector Gaspereau river kept no account of cubic yards of material cast over. Therefore cannot give exact amount. I estimate about 6,000 cubic yards.

There is the statement of the engineer who was in charge of this work that there was no account kept of the material cast over and the department was dependent upon an estimate made by the resident engineer. On November 4 Mr. Stead is instructed by the chief engineer by telegram to ascertain from the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company their price for casting over at Gaspereau river. On the 6th November Mr. Stead telegraphs Mr. Lafleur:

In reply to your telegram, the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company state that two-thirds the barge measurement price is their regular price for casting over. They claim that 8,000 cubic yards were cast over at Gaspereau river.

Although the resident engineer estimated 6,000 cubic yards, the claim of the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company of 8,000 yards was recognized and payment recommended to them on that basis. Now, on the 7th November, we have a certificate from the secretary of the Department of Public Works which was required in order to enable some payments to be made to the contracting firm:

I hereby certify:

1. That tenders were called under date of the 28th July, 1908, and were received until August 14, 1908, for the execution of dredging in Gaspereau river, N.B.;

2. That a tender was received from the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company;

3. That this tender being found correct in every respect was accepted by the department;

4. That the price of the above bid, viz., ninety (90) cents per cubic yard, was reported by the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works as being fair and reasonable;

5. That the cost of this dredging is to be charged against the appropriation of $650,000 for dredging maritime provinces;

6. That on the 4th November, 1908, the chief engineer has recommended that, pending the settlement of the company's account for dredging performed in the Gaspereau river, the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company be paid the sum of $13,700 (thirteen thousand seven hundred dollars), work to that amount having been performed by them.

And I have signed.

(Sgd.) Secretary, Public Works Dept.

On the 10th November Mr. Stead, the resident engineer who had reported that he estimated that only 6,000 cubic yards of material were cast over, was directed by the chief engineer of the department to send duly—

Certified accounts in duplicate, favour Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, for 8,000 cubic yards cast over at Gaspereau river, at 60 cents a yard. This should be accompanied by your report stating how figures mentioned were arrived at.

A document on file shows how this communication became necessary. The Auditor General had smelt a rat and had asked for some inquiry and some explanations. The letter is from the chief engineer to Mr. Stead, dated November 19:

Sir,—I would like you to try to ascertain by soundings and calculating the actual quantity of materials cast over at Gaspereau river, N.B., by the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company. A satisfactory explanation must be given the Auditor General before payment can be made the company. Kindly, therefore, give this matter your careful and immediate attention.

The next document on file is a copy of the order in council authorizing the contract to be entered into for this work. It is dated 20th November, 1908, nearly one month after the work was completed. This is the order in council:

The Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works, advise that authority be given to accept the tender of the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, of St. John, N.B., to perform dredging in the Gaspereau river, province of New Brunswick, at the price of ninety cents per cubic yard, scow measurement, the above bid being the only one received in answer to public advertisement. The tenderers have furnished an accepted bank——

The word 'cheque' apparently is omitted.

—for $6,000 as security for the due fulfilment of their dredging contracts in the said province. The expenditure in connection with this dredging is properly chargeable to the appropriation of $650,000 for dredging, maritime provinces, granted by parliament at its last session. The chief engineer of the Department of Public Works has reported that the price above quoted is fair and reasonable.

Such contract to be for work done up to close of calendar year.

(Sgd.) RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

So that we have the peculiar anomaly of an order in council passed upon the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works on the 20th of November to authorize the department to enter into a contract for work which had been completed on the 24th of October and for which the contract had been actually let on the 4th of August Then we have on the 8th of January a further certificate from the accountant of the department, Mr. Kingston:

This is to certify that the work has been performed by the Maritime Dredging & Construction Company, under their contract with this department, for dredging at Gaspereau river, N.B., to the value of $16,669.60 in excess of all payments, which amount I have been authorized to pay so soon as funds for that purpose shall have been voted by parliament.

And this firm were paid the sum of $33,969 for the performance of the work.

One other document to which I wish to refer is a letter or report from Mr. Stead, the resident engineer, dated the 9th of March, 1909, in which Mr. Stead describes this work as being of no value. The letter is addressed to Mr. Lafleur, the chief engineer, and is as follows:

I have received your letter No. 8510 of the 4th March, asking a report on what further dredging is required in the Gaspereau river, Westmoreland county, N.B.

In reply I have to say that last season dredging, to the extent of 33,744 cubic yards at a cost of $33,969.60, was performed by the excavation of a channel 100 feet wide across the estuary of the Gaspereau river, but that the shoalest point of the estuary had not been affected.

That is the way the copy reads that was furnished to me from the Department of Public Works; but when the original letter was produced, we found that these words were omitted from the copy on the file which was brought down: 'But the shoalest point of the estuary had not been reached at the close of the season, and therefore no improvement in navigation has been effected.' And these words are reported in the proceedings of the Public Accounts Committee. The letter goes on:

Moreover, if the cut is left unfinished, it will probably fill up rapidly.

So that we have the statement of the resident engineer of the department that this work, which had involved an expenditure of $33,969, was of no value and resulted in nothing more than the digging of a hole which would probably fill up rapidly and which had effected no improvement in navigation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No value unless continued.

Mr. CROCKET. I may say that it was not continued during the next year until the month of October. A government dredge, I think the 'George Mackenzie,' was sent in and worked a week or two in the month of October, and extended the cut, as reported by the Public Works Department, 500 feet. Everybody in the locality knows that that work was an absolute waste of public funds. It was the laughing stock of that community, the work going on at that time, and I have no hesitation in saying that the only object and the effect of that contract was to put into the pockets of the minister's personal friends, Mr. McAvity and Mr. Moore, the profits of this illegal expenditure, to help them discharge obligations which they had assumed with the Minister of Public Works in connection with the purchase of newspapers in the city of St. John.

Before I leave this return, I want the House to note these facts which have been disclosed by this evidence, produced from the department itself:

1. The well-timed arrival of the dredge of the minister's friend upon the site of the work within a day or two of the issue of the call for tenders.

2. The novel and ingenious proceeding of awarding the contract pending the call for tenders on condition that the contract price should be fixed by the amount of the lowest tender which should be received for work already awarded.

3. The result of this ingenious proceeding—the receipt of one tender from the contractor who already had the job at 90 cents per cubic yard, 4½ times the figure estimated by two district engineers.

4. The remarkable promptitude with which the superintendent of dredging in New Brunswick was notified on September 29 of the receipt of this tender on August 14.

5. The fact that the superintendent of dredging, six or seven weeks after the work had been in progress, found it necessary to apply to the Minister personally to learn its location.

6. The fact that when the chief engineer intimated his opinion that the price was excessive, the minister personally arranged with the resident engineer of another district to visit the work and report upon the reasonableness of the price.

7. The fact that upon October 16, the department had no record of the amount of the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company's tender, and that when the information was required at headquarters, it was found that the minister had the tender in his pocket at St. John.

8. The fact that the formal contract was signed on November 7, two weeks after the conclusion of the work.

9. The fact that the order in council necessary under the statute to authorize the contract to be entered into was passed on November 20, two weeks after the formal contract was executed, and nearly a month after the work was completed.

10. The fact that on March 9 following the resident engineer of the district reported that the work as left was of no value and effected no improvement in navigation.

Now, I have stated that the awarding of this contract was in contravention of the law of this parliament. In this connection I desire to quote section 36 of the Public Works Act, as follows:

Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of any department of the government, the minister having charge of such department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works, except in cases,—

(a) of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest; or

(b) in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the department; or

(c) where the estimated cost of the work is less than five thousand dollars, and it appears to the minister, in view of the nature of the work, that it is not advisable to invite tenders.

2. Whenever in case of any work tenders are required to be or are invited, the minister having charge of the department concerned shall submit all tenders received therefor to the Governor in Council and the contract for the work shall be awarded under the direction of the Governor in Council.

By the documents from which I have quoted, being documents furnished by the Public Works Department, it is established beyond question that this contract was let in violation of that provision of the Public Works Act. That, I think, justifies my statement that it was an illegal contract, and the report of the engineer, Mr. Stead, of March 9, justifies the expression that it was a wasteful expenditure. This is just one of many matters that have been investigated by the Public Accounts Committee during the last year or two which illustrate the utter laxity, recklessness, illegality and, I think I am justified in saying, corruption which characterize the administration of that department of this government. We have had all sorts of cases investigated during the last two sessions of this parliament. We have had cases galore showing irregularities and crookedness in the awarding of contracts and the payment of bills. We have had cases exposed where untrue statements were contained in memoranda submitted by the Minister of Public Works to the Governor in Council. We had one case in which a contract involving over $1,000,000 was awarded upon an untrue representation to Council, the contract being awarded to this same Maritime Dredging and Construction Company, but at the Dominion Dredging Company's figures, in violation of the law.

Mr. EMMERSON. What were those figures?

Mr. CROCKET. The Dominion Dredging Company's figures were 39½ cents per cubic yard and the tender of the Maritime Dredging & Construction Company, 50 cts per cubic yard. The tender was awarded to the Maritime Dredging & Construction Co., at the Dominion Dredging Co.'s lower figure on the statement that tenders had been called for when tenders were not called for.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crocket) makes a statement of that kind he should produce the papers. I challenge him to produce the papers and prove his statement. It is absolutely untrue. Every representation made in the recommendation to council is absolutely correct and is verified by the record.

Mr. CROCKET. I will bear in mind the minister's challenge, and on another occasion——

Mr. WILSON (Laval). Do it now.

Mr. CROCKET. I will undertake to produce the proof of the statement I make which is absolutely contrary to the statement which the minister has just made. We have had other cases where it was shown that public moneys were expended for the improvement of private property, in one case a private property in which the Minister of Public Works himself was interested as a stockholder. We had another case in which it was shown that public moneys were expended illegally, as in this instance, without a proper tender for the performance of a private work for a company in which another member of this parliament was interested as a stockholder.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Where was it?

Mr. CROCKET. At Bathurst.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What member?

Mr. CROCKET. A member of the Senate.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What name?

Mr. CROCKET. Senator Edwards. We have had other cases investigated where dredging was done which was of no possible utility. We have had one case where a rum-seller was appointed a dredging inspector on the personal recommendation of the Minister of Public Works who had to employ a man to write out his dredging returns. We have had other cases where dredging contractors started dredging operations without any authority whatever from the department or any one else, and their bills were paid on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What cases? Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to give these cases?

Mr. CROCKET. One of them, the minister will remember was at Loggieville. He has not forgotten it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman said 'cases.'

Mr. CROCKET. Another was at Bathurst.

Mr PUGSLEY What year?

Mr. CROCKET. In 1908.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Did the hon. gentleman say that had been paid?

Mr. CROCKET. I will undertake if opportunity is afforded me, to present a brief in each of these cases and to substantiate every statement I now have made.

Now, I think I have stated enough to show that a condition of affairs prevails in the Public Works Department which is absolutely rotten and alarming. It is, however, precisely what the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) might have expected when, though well aware of the malodorous record of that hon. gentleman in the government of New Brunswick, he called Hon. Wm. Pugsley to Ottawa, and placed him in charge of the greatest spending department of his government. Hon. members of this House have already heard the story of the connection of the Minister of Public Works with the corrupt and illegal payment to his friend George McAvity of the sum of $36,000 as a rake-off in consideration of his political influence with the Public Works Department. Hon. members have also heard in this House the story of the Minister of Public Works' connection wtih the New Brunswick Coal & Railway Compnay, of which he was the managing director and leading spirit, and with reference to which a royal commission appointed by the government of the province of New Brunswick reported that $134,000 of the public money was missing and could not be traced. Hon. gentlemen are also aware—for it has been unfolded in this House—of the minister's connection with the Richibucto Sawdust Wharf steal, by which a favoured political heeler, Mr. Thomas O. Murray was paid by the Public Works Department $5,000 for the Sawdust Wharf which he bought for $700, the evidence in that case showing that over $2,000 of that sum was paid by Murray to a member of the Grit committee in Kent County, in five-dollar and ten-dollar bills a week or two before the last Federal election.

So, I say that the condition of affairs which prevails in the Public Works Department in this country is just exactly what the Prime Minister might have expected when he called the Hon. Wm. Pugsley to administer that great spending department. One would have thought that, these exposures having taken place in the matters to which I have referred and in reference to which the House already has the evidence, would serve as a warning to the Prime Minister to keep a more vigilant eye on his Minister of Public Works. But not so. The illegalities and irregularities have been accumulating at such a rate since the Prime Minister stated that he was 'prouder of Pugsley than ever' that it has become practically impossible for one to follow them. I have to-day submitted one of the cases which was investigated last year, and which there was no opportunity of presenting to the House during the last session of parliament. There were at least a dozen others equally flagrant and equally indefensible which can be presented, and will be presented if we are afforded an opportunity of doing so before the close of the present session.

Therefore, I move in amendment, seconded by Mr. Barker:

Resolved that the evidence reported by the Public Accounts Committee respecting a payment of $33,969.60 to the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company for dredging at Gaspereau river, N.B., as set out at page V 290 of the Auditor General's Report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1909, discloses a wasteful and illegal expenditure of public money which deserves the censure of the House.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland). I think it is a very unfortunate circumstance for my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Crocket), that, in order to sustain a charge of misappropriation or misdirection of public money, he has to resort to vilification and abuse, and show an unwarranted animus in order to support the motion which he has just placed in your hands. My hon. friend has indulged, and I regret that it is characteristic of him, in conjecture and suspicion, and I would almost say, if it were parliamentary, in low insinuations against the hon. the Minister of Public Works. My hon. friend says there have been many cases brought out in the Committee of Public Accounts of misdoings of this kind. I can only say, with a knowledge of the facts, with a knowledge of this particular case from its very inception down to the present moment, that if they are all as baseless as the one which has been brought to our attention to-day, the right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and his govern ment, and the people of this country need have no fear with respect to the administration of public works by the present minister. In matters of this character something more is needed, even by the members of this House, than mere insinuation and conjecture; and if it is not needed by hon. members in this House, it is demanded by the people of this country that men who sit in parliament and indulge in nothing but insinuation shall produce some evidence, or stand branded as worse offenders than those whom the hon. gentleman has sought to brand. I am willing to discuss this question upon its merits, and I shall strip it entirely of all extraneous matters of political animus, and leave it with the bare facts. I think I can demonstrate, even to the good sense and judgment of hon. members opposite, that there is nothing whatever in this structure which my hon. friend has sought to erect upon a foundation of sand.

In 1900 I had the honour of being elected as representative of the county of Westmoreland in this House. At that time, and for some years previous, the locality of the harbour of Baie Verte and Port Elgin had claimed the attention of previous representatives of that county, and the condition of those harbours and of the approaches thereto were matters of deep concern to the people interested. Under a previous government an attempt was made to afford transportation facilities by the erection of a ballast wharf in the open bay at Baie Verte, lying between Baie Verte and Port Elgin, between the streams known as the Baie Verte stream or creek and the stream known as the Gaspereau, which flows down by the village of Port Elgin. This ballast wharf was built there as a sort of loading wharf. There was no possibility of small steamers approaching the landings by the River Gaspereau, or up in the river of Gaspereau, or to approach near the village of Baie Verte. A former government, some twenty-five years ago, constructed this ballast, or load landing wharf, right out in the open, and it was necessary to scow out to that landing. It was thought that they could make improvements affording reasonable transportation and shipping facilities for the people of those communities. That had utterly failed, in fact it had been so constructed that soon afterwards it became a little restive in its position, and began wandering around the bay, and people were afraid that if they put anything upon it it might go adrift. So after a time it became obsolete as affording shipping facilities. Then the people of Port Elgin thought it was important that dredging should be done, so that vessels drawing at least 12 or 14 feet of water might have access to the wharfs, and to the mills and other industrial establishments in that community. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the village of Port Elgin, while small, has many industrial establishments. In 1903, when the engineer of the department went there to inquire into the matter, it had five sawmills and four fish-curing and fish-smoking industries. At that time it was struggling to be recognized as one of the industrial centres of the county of Westmoreland. To-day it has reached a measure of its ambition. and is steadily improving and developing. Now those were the conditions. It was necessary to afford these facilities for the people, and in 1901, at the first session of parliament, when Mr. Tarte was Minister of Public Works, I brought the matter to his notice, and as a result of my conference with him, he sent officers of his department to make a survey. In February and March, I think, of 1901, Mr. Day, an officer connected with the Department of Public Works in the province of New Brunswick, under the direction of his chief, Mr. Shewan, went to Port Elgin, and there, during the winter months, on the ice, made a thorough survey and borings to ascertain the dredging that would be necessary. The report of that engineer is before this House, and it shows what dredging was necessary. There was at the very mouth of the river a bar, 1,200 to 1,500 feet in width, that would have to be dredged out.

A channel was necessary that they might make use of that and then they have penetrated that bar in order to reach the main channel to Gaspereaux river. He pointed out the necessity of widening the channel of the river and then going up to what is known as the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island drawbridge. There is a railway bridge across the stream, which bridge was supposed to have a draw, which did have a draw and which has one now, but it was necessary that the river should be widened and deepened in order to reach the basin where are the wharfs, private and public, and also to reach the Hickman & Co. mills.

Mr. CROCKET. What depth did the engineer recommend at that time the dredging should go to—four feet?

Mr. EMMERSON. Eight feet. At that time there was a little water in the basin at low water, but in the river there was from 4 to 6 feet of water at low water. Here were milling establishments, here were fishing establishments which required shipping facilities. They wanted a depth of water that would enable ordinary schooners and sailing craft to enter the basin in order to enable them to reach the point of shipment.

At one o'clock House took recess.

House resumed at three oclock

Mr. EMMERSON. When the House took recess I was calling attention to the fact that a survey had been made by the Engineer of the Department of Public Works in the months of February and March, 1901 and a report was made to the Department shortly after the survey was made. A survey was made of the River from Port Elgin to four miles beyond the mouth 'for the purpose of accertaining the nature, extent, and probable cost of dredging that section of the river and entrance, to make it navigable for vessels frequenting the place.' The report of the Engineer, together with the plans, was sent to the Department and copies thereof have been presented to the House. The Gaspereau River takes its rise in Westmorland County, twelve miles or more from the point where it enters Baie Verte on the Southwestern side of Northumberland Strait. The officer of the Department reported that Port Elgin had then, May 1903, between 600 and 700 inhabitants; that it is practically the only town on the River Gaspereau, that it is situated about one mile from the outlet of the river. The engineer says that Port Elgin is situated in the Parish of Botsford, but, as a matter of fact, it is situated in the Parish of Westmoreland, which makes but little difference. It is situated on the line of the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway about twenty minutes from Sackville on the Intercolonial railway and about seventeen miles from Cape Tourmentine, the Eastern terminus of the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, and the nearest point on the main line to Prince Edward Island. At Cape Tormentine, between 1886 and 1892, a pier was constructed by the Department of Public Works and the Engineer reports:—

The pier is now much used during the season of navigation as a place of shipment for most of the deals cut along the line of the N. B. and P.E.I. railway, and that section of Westmoreland county.

At and in the vicinity of Port Elgin are five saw mills, three cheese factories, four smoked fish factories, several lobster factories, and a number of mercantile stores.

Three miles to the south-west of Port Elgin and at the head of Baie Verte is situated the village of the same name. This with Port Elgin and the intervening section of country has a population of about 2,000. All vessels have to enter and clear at Baie Verte, whether discharging or loading there, at Cape Tormentine or Port Elgin. It is therefore very difficult to separate from the total shipments the actual amount shipped from each of the three places as the entries are made under one port, that of Baie Verte.

From the head of Gaspereau river to Port Elgin the river is not navigated and otherwise is little used except for log-driving, this during the stages of half tide to high water or vice-versa, there being but little water at low tide for that purpose. From Port Elgin to the mouth the channel is narrow (50 to 100 feet) and crooked, and is limited from 1 to 2 feet at low water spring tides. At the mouth, there are depths of from 4 to 5 feet, while a short distance outside the mouth, a bar 1,200 to 1,500 feet wide (between the 3 feet contours) is found, on which the limiting depth is 8 feet at low water spring tides.

Beyond the bar from 3 to 5 feet is found at low water while depths of 6, 12 and 15 feet are found in further distances of four-fifths, one and four-fifths and three miles respectively.

From the mouth to Port Elgin, the channel is bounded by sand and mud flats elevated from 2 to 3 feet above low water, and these are terminated by marsh and low lands on either side.

Lumbering, fishing and farming form the principal occupations of the people of the surrounding country.

Of the former, deals, laths, boards and shooks are the main cut of the mills. The deals are mostly taken by rail to Cape Tormentine and shipped from there while the other materials are exported from Port Elgin by schooner or rail. The value of the lumber shipment from Port Elgin and vicinity is placed at between $140,000 and $150,000 annually.

Of the fisheries, herring, lobster and smelt are the principal catch, the estimated yearly value of which is placed at $180,000. Most of the fish is taken to Sackville by rail and shipped from there again by water.

Of farming, potatoes, hay, cattle, hides, wool, hogs, lambs, poultry, butter and cheese constitute the exports and are valued at about $40,000 annually.

The imports consist mainly of coal and general merchandise. The shipping owned at Port Elgin in 1901, consisted of 5 schooners, having a draught of from 5 to 11½ feet, and a total tonnage of 223, and one tug boat of 25 tons.

About 155 boats, of 4 feet draught, and 20 feet keel are also owned at and in vicinity of Port Elgin, which are engaged principally in lobster and other fisheries.

From 1897 to 1902, the number of vessels entering and clearing for Port Elgin and Baie Verte was as follows: 1897, 136; 1898, 101; 1899, 97; 1900, 62; 1901, 41, and 1902, 83. These vessels varied from 25 to 100 tons.

At present, only the smaller vessels can ascend the river to Port Elgin, and then generally at high water.

To improve the entrance and river to admit of vessels of upwards of 200 tons navigating same, it is asked that a channel 100 feet wide giving depth of 12 ft. at low water be dredged from the 12 ft. contour up to the wharfs at Port Elgin and that a basin 200 ft. wide, giving same depth as the channel, be made at the latter place between the wharves and the railway bridge, also that another channel 75 ft. wide giving 8 ft. at low water be dredged from the railway bridge up to what is known as Hickman's Mill wharf, situated 900 ft. above the bridge.

It is claimed that if the above improvements were made, the trade of the place would be considerably increased and that the large amounts of shipments now made over the railway to other points and eventually exported by water would be shipped direct from Port Elgin.

On the plan herewith enclosed is shown in red, a proposed channel 100 feet wide with sides sloping 2 to 1, giving depth of 12 feet at low water, from 500 feet below the railway bridge out to the 12-foot contour, a distance of 3 miles; a basin 325 feet in mean length and 200 feet in width, giving 12 feet at low water, and a channel 75 feet wide, giving depth of 8 feet at low water, extending from the upper side of the railway bridge to Hickman's mill wharf, a distance of 1,.90 feet.

To dredge the proposed basin and channel below the bridge would necessitate the removal of 799,400 cubic yards (barge measurement) of mud and clay, and for the channel above the bridge 41,000 cubic yards of the same kind of material, a total of 840,400 cubic yards, which placed at 20 cents per yard would involve an expenditure of $168,000.

In consequence of rock being found underlying the mud and clay bottom, the curvature of the proposed channel is unavoidable as will be seen by referring to the accompanying table of borings.

Figures in blue on the accompanying plan denote depths in feet reduced to low water spring tides. Figures in red denote heights in feet above low water spring tides. (Spring tides rise 9 feet.) Borings are in green, a table of which is attached to this report. Many more soundings and borings were taken than the scale of the plan would admit of being plotted.

As most of the deals cut, at and in the vicinity of Port Elgin for the European markets will, no doubt, continue to be taken to and shipped from Cape Tormentine, the vessels that will visit Port Elgin will generally be of the schooner class drawing 5 to 10 feet and engaged in the carrying of small lumber, fish and produce to local and other ports.

As the improvement asked for is extensive, no doubt much more so than the people of Port Elgin and vicinity think, or the trade warrants, I would suggest, that a channel 100 feet wide be dredged, giving depth of 4 feet at low water, and also a basin at the wharfs giving same depth and sufficiently wide to admit of vessels turning. This would, I think, be ample improvement for the class of vessels that frequent the port and would reduce the quantity of dredging to about 185,000 cubic yards and the cost to $37,000.

This report contains a recital of the conditions which prevailed at Port Elgin in 1903. Since that time the growth of business in that locality has been large, a number of fishing establishments have been erected, and yet it will be noted that year by year the numbers of vessels sailing in and out of the port of Port Elgin has decreased. It was alleged by the prominent citizens of that locality that something would have to be done, that the river was filling up with sawdust from mills up the stream, and that it would be necessary to remove these obstructions which had grown year by year, and were the cause, as they alleged, of decreasing the shipping in that port. They were very anxious indeed that these improvements should be made so that those who had invested money would have advantages which were their due, and in order that there might be further inducement to the investment of moneys in that locality. Although they did not get this improvement, although there was delay year after year, the business of the place has advanced and grown, and the manufacturers and producers have had to pay additional railway freights which has been a handicap to them. Appreciating the situation, familiar with it as I was, I from time to time, since I had the honour and responsibility of representing the county of Westmoreland, have brought this matter to the notice of successive Ministers of Public Works. My first application was made to the Hon. Mr. Tarte. Nothing was done because the cry then was that there were no dredges, the government had too few dredges, and it was impossible to get private owners of dredges to engage in this work. There were then practically none in the maritime provinces. The result was that during Mr. Tarte's regime I failed to accomplish anything in behalf of the people living in that locality. Hon. Mr. Hyman, during his term of office, also found it impossible to get dredges. During the interim, while Hon. Mr. Fisher was acting Minister of Public Works, I besought his interest in the matter, and repeatedly urged it upon his notice. Finally, I secured an amount in the estimates providing for the commencement of this work based upon the report then in the possession of the department, from which I have just read extracts.

Mr. CROCKET. Was there a specific vote for that particular work?

Mr. EMMERSON. I think it was specifically mentioned in the estimates in 1906 or 1907. The amount was not expended because of the department's inability to induce any private contractors to engage in the work, and because of the dearth of government-owned dredges. The serious difficulty that suggests itself to any one who looked over the situation was that in order to get a channel through the bar to a width of 1,200 to 1,500 feet, the dredges would have to be out in the open roadstead, a place of very great danger, open to the severe, and sometimes destructive, storms that are felt in that locality, particularly in the all of the year. It was almost impossible to have the government dredges meet the requirements of the maritime provinces, and so it was difficult to secure a government dredge for work at that point. I would say most frankly to this House that, having, as representative of the people, pledged myself to the carrying out of this work, because I deemed it to be of great public interest, I was determined that that work should be done. I was strongly determined that the work should be attended to in accordance with the wishes of the people and, I am candid enough to say, in accordance with the assurances that I had repeatedly given to my constituents. The efforts that I had put forth in 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906 and 1907, had been unavailing; but I felt that the time had come when it was necessary, in the public interest, as well as in the keeping of faith with my constituents, and with the public, that this work should be carried on. There were no dredges in the spring of 1907, and I was disappointed again. Although money had been provided, the work could not seemingly be accomplished. In 1908 I went to the Minister of Public Works, and I said: This work must be done in the interests of the trade and navigation of that whole section of the shores of Bay Verte, in the interests of over 2,000 people who were engaged in agriculture, fishing, milling and lumbering operations. Efforts were made, and I did have hope, and I knew the Minister of Public Works at that time did have hope, that one of the government dredges could be sent, and would be sent in the early spring. But I was disappointed again, and I came back, because I do like to show some persistence and perseverance in these matters when they are matters of public interest.

Mr. CROCKET. And when elections are coming on.

Mr. EMMERSON. When elections are coming on, I want to stand before the electors as one who carries out his promises, and I am not ashamed to say it; and I am afraid that my hon. friend will die of a strange starvation, the starvation of a small nature, if he will bring up a matter of that kind in the face of this report, in the face of the interests and requirements of the port, in the face of the business that was carried on. Should I hold my hand because an election is coming on?

Mr. CROCKET. No, plunge it in.

Mr. EMMERSON. It was an additional incentive, I admit, and I am not hypocritical enough to contend otherwise. I was anxious that if I came before the people of Westmorland again, I should come before them with this feeling, that I had carried out my promises and had been true to my pledged word, and therefore it was that I insisted on the department doing this thing. The action was taken. The government dredge could not get there, and my hon. friend was in a position to secure this particular dredge, and he asked for tenders. It is true that pending the receipt of those tenders he made an arrangement with those people, who were taking a dredge from one section of the coast to another, that they should in the meantime commence this work, and if as the result of the tenders, another corporation should secure the contract, they would go on and engage in the work which they were under contract to do in another section of the province; but that, pending the determination of the call for tenders, they should do the work upon the express condition that they should receive only so much as the amount of the lowest tender, which would be the best way to determine the value of the work and the reasonableness of the price. My hon. friend indulges in conjectures, in small insinuations that are not worthy of him, that are not worthy of any man in this House. I am not here with any brief on behalf of the Minister of Public Works, nor on behalf of anyone connected with the Maritime Dredging Company.

Mr. CROCKET. The hon. gentleman has said that I indulged in small insinuations. I challenge him to name a single insinuation that I indulged in, in the course of my speech. What I did was to make straight, specific statements, which I substantiated from documentary evidence furnished from the files of the Public Works Department. The hon. gentleman may talk as he pleases of small insinuations. I wish he would address himself to the specific statements I made.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I ask your ruling if the statement made by the hon. member is permissible, that my hon. friend was indulging in small insinuations unworthy of him. If I understand the rules correctly, that is not permissible.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. CROCKET. I ask the hon. member to name a single insinuation that I made.

Mr. EMMERSON. If my hon. friend will possess his little soul in patience, I will answer. If the speech of my hon. friend contained anything else than small insinuations, I failed to discover it. But the insinuation which I had in mind was this, that my hon. friend referred to the fact that the Maritime Dredging Company, which had secured an arrangement to do this work, comprised two gentlemen who were personal and political friends of the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Mr. CROCKET. Will the hon. member deny the statement that I made? I challenge him or the Minister of Public Works to deny it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the hon. gentleman will explain what he meant by the very eloquent word 'cronies,' I will answer his question. He said they were cronies of mine.

Mr. CROCKET. I stated that the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company was owned and controlled by two personal and political friends——

Mr. PUGSLEY. And cronies.

Mr. CROCKET. Yes, and cronies of the Minister of Public Works; and I stated further, that the Minister of Public Works was financially associated with those two men in an important business venture. I ask the minister if he will deny that statement.

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member contained an insinuation. Even if those gentlemen were personal and political friends of the minister, how does that fact in any way affect this matter? It is unworthy of my hon. friend to incorporate that into this matter. It may be a truth, and it is no disgrace to have either of these gentlemen as one's friend; and I hope that my hon, friend can count in the list of his friends gentlemen as high in the opinion of the citizens of St. John, as they are. But I say that in dealing with this matter we should rise above these puny insinuations.

I care not who it is that controls the Maritime Dredging Company, the point is simply this: How was it that tenders were asked for, and why was it that this company was engaged to do the work? Because of the necessity of the work; because I had urged it upon the government, in the interests of my constituents. I cared not who were the contractors. I would have much preferred it had the government been able to send a government dredge. But they did what they could, and the work was commenced. And what was the result? The figure is given at 90 cents per cubic yard, and that was the amount under the tenders received.

Mr. CURRIE (Simcoe). I desire to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Emmerson) a question. He understands this subject very well. Was that price for rock dredging, for boulders or for clay? If that is made known, the public will understand the matter.

Mr. EMMERSON. It was for the necessary dredging to be done there. I am not familiar enough with these specifications or the borings or any of the data furnished by the engineers to be able to say just what portion was rock, what portion boulders and what portion clay or other soft material. But that makes no difference. The invitation for tenders had been issued, and there was nobody else who offered, although it was open to the dredging companies of all Canada to make an offer. Now I state it as a fact, that the dredging there at that time involved great danger to the dredge, the scows, and the steamer in attendance. As a matter of fact this firm lost their steamer in a heavy storm that season. The work had to be done at a season of the year when storms were to be anticipated, and as an actual fact the company did meet with very serious loss. Now, if this were a 'soft' contract, if it was one by which anybody could put dollars in his pocket would it not be reasonable to expect that this company would wish to continue the contract until the work was completed?

But, as a matter of fact, they left in the fall and did not come back, very much to my regret and to the regret of the people of that locality. They have never come back to this day and decline to continue their work though they had only a small portion of it to complete. I know from the statements of gentlemen upon whom I can rely that the company lost money by engaging in that work. But I was glad to have had that company operating there, because I was measurably in a position to show the people that I was true at least to my word on their behalf. As this company would not come back, I urged upon the department the necessity of sending one of the government dredges. But they were unable to meet my wishes in that respect. It was not until 1909 that, responding to urgent appeals made not only by myself, but by those who represented the trade interests of that port and by the citizens generally, the Minister of Public Works was enabled—disappointing, I believe, some other places—to send the government dredge the 'G. H. McKenzie' to the point and so continue the work. My hon friend (Mr. Crocket) has dwelt upon the fact that some statements appeared in the evidence that the work done was entirely thrown away. It would have been thrown away unless it had been continued. I am bound to say that unless you cut that sand bar and provide a channel that will carry out the silt that is borne down by the river the money expended would have been absolutely lost to the country, and of no avail to the people whom this improvement was intended to serve. The dredge 'McKenzie' continued the work there as long as the weather conditions permitted. In 1910, and since then, it was impossible to bring back other dredges, though I have seen to it that strong efforts in that direction were made. But I believe the work is now being attended to or is about to be attended to with a view to completion. And I want to say to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) and his associates in the government, that if it is not completed, they forfeit whatever support I have and I am sure they will forfeit the support of the people in that locality—as, indeed, on such grounds they would forfeit, and would deserve to forfeit, the support of the people of Canada, for where necessary work is to be done and can be done any government neglecting that work should forfeit the support of the people. But I am proud to say that every effort is being made, and that the work will proceed. And I want to tell my hon. friend (Mr. Crocket), though he seeks to give the impression that this is a waste of the public money, and the work was not required, and will be of no service to anybody, but was done by the Minister of Public Works simply to aid some of his friends in the city of St. John, that nothing could be more contrary to the facts. He desires to assail and vituperate the Minister of Public Works. But let him bring facts before this House, and I am sure the House, irrespective of sides, will approve his action. He desires to have a motion passed condemning the Department of Public Works and the government because of the course they have taken in this matter. But when did these facts—he alleges them to be facts—come to his knowledge. In 1909, I believe, the matter was before the Public Accounts Committee. In 1910 last session—the matter was threshed out on this floor in Committee of Supply. I remember having something to say on the subject myself. Knowing the facts as I did, I confess I thought the case was merely trifling; I thought it was brought forward for the purpose of taking up time—and it is open to that suspicion to-day. But, if it be serious, why has he sat dumb so long this session, and why did he fail to bring forward in the session of 1910 the motion which he now proposes? If the facts justify the charge and the motion, if there is anything mysterious or corrupt or negligent involving misappropriation of the public funds, he should have had the courage to stand forth in this House a year ago, or certainly at some earlier moment of this session, to bring the matter to the attention of the House and the country.

I can only imagine that my hon. friend is bringing it up to-day for a purpose, it may not be simply for the purpose of obstruction. He may anticipate an election, and at that time he will be going from house to house in the back districts in his county and other sections of New Brunswick, and retailing for facts that which is only to be found in his diseased brain and imagination.

Mr. CROCKET. Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to the language which the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) has seen fit to use towards a member of this House. So far as I am concerned, I care not what language the hon. gentleman indulges in, having regard to the source from which that language comes. At the same time I am interested in the decorum of this House, and in the maintenance of its dignity.

Mr. SPEAKER. I was engaged at the moment, and did not hear what was said. What was the expression the hon. gentleman objects to?

Mr. CROCKET. He used the expression 'diseased imagination' or 'diseased brain,' I forget which.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is true that I am at loss to find language that can properly characterize the attitude of my hon. friend.

Mr. CROCKET. Come to the point.

Mr. EMMERSON. I am answering my hon. friend's complaint about the language I made use of. If he complains of the expression 'diseased imagination,' I may put it a little more mildly, and say that he is affected by a brain storm.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is better to allow all personal allusions to remain outside of the debate.

Mr. EMMERSON. I think my language has been moderate, and there is no one more desirous than I am that decorum in debate, that manliness and courtesy, should prevail in this House. But this is a matter of which I have a personal knowledge as a representative of the people, and when statements are made before the House in order that a wrong impression may go abroad, I feel it my duty to characterize them in terms that are mild, having regard to the utterances of the hon. gentleman. Because I have suffered from such insinuations, I know just what is the effect of insinuations against public men, whether they are uttered in this House or out of it, as I know what the effect is with respect to the character of men and women when made even by a shake of the head. I would prefer that men should stand up in their places and manfully speak out what they have in their minds, rather than indulge in these insinuations and inferences.

Mr. HUGHES. Dont be too hard on the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not think it is necessary for my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) to interject himself into this debate; we have enough unpleasantness about it now. Bear in mind that the instructions given by the officials of the department to the Maritime Dredging Company were that they should merely do the lesser work, that is in connection with the reports of Mr. Stead. They went there and faithfully performed their work, they earned every dollar that was paid to them, and indeed, as I am informed, they lost by reason of the dangers incidental to the situation of the work.

Mr. MEIGHEN. There is no evidence of that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is evidence, the statement made on March 10. On my honour as a member of this House, they lost their tug in a storm, and declined to go back because of the dangerous conditions there.

Mr. MEIGHEN. There is absolutely no evidence.

Mr. EMMERSON. Now my hon. friend has said that this contract was illegal, and in violation of the Public Works Act. I am bound to say that that is not a correct statement of the case. This was a work of urgency, a work of necessity that justified the sending of dredges there. Has the public treasury of Canada suffered in any way? Men are engaged to do work that is absolutely necessary, and upon the best terms possible. How? Not by any hole and corner arrangement between the Minister of Public Works and the contractors, but on public competition throughout Canada. The amount was fixed, and I understand that the 90 cents which was paid applied only to a portion of the work, and that only 60 cents was paid on another portion. I would be glad to see the estimate of the engineer adhered to, if it could be, 20 cents per cubic yard. I can only say that the engineer must have had in his mind dredging within the river banks and within the harbour basin. The bottom of that harbour and of that basin consisted largely of silt and sawdust, and sand and clay, and perhaps he thought that his work would all be of that character. But we must remember that the work out on the bar, out in the open roadstead, was of an entirely different class, that it involved greater dangers and greater risks; and I venture to say that because of that fact there were no lower tenders, and because of that fact there were no owners of dredging plants who were disposed to engage in the work. I have understood, and think I can state it as a fact, that since then an earnest attempt has been made to find suitable dredging plant to go on and engage in that work. If it is to be put up to tender again, that bar being out of the question, the dredging of that channel through this bar across the harbour mouth, out in the open bay and roadstead, being finished, I think the work can be done much more cheaply within the river and within the harbour and basin.

Now I want to emphasize this fact. There are large industrial establishments there to-day that are handicapped. The Hickman Milling Co., Limited, is a concern doing a very large business. In the manufacture of deals they are compelled, and will be compelled, to avail themselves of the transportation facilities afforded by the railways from Port Elgin to Cape Tormentine, where shipments are made in steamers from the government pier to the ports in Great Britain. Incidental to the manufacture of deals—and there are other mills there, four I believe—incidental to the manufacture of deals for the markets of Great Britain, there is produced a quantity of small scantlings, boards and laths.

These must find markets elsewhere than in Great Britain. Despite the fact that there has been a duty of $1,25 a thousand on lumber going into the United States these people have been obliged to send their surplus in the United States and although they have open to them the market of Newfoundland and the local markets of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, while they avail themselves of all of them, they are still obliged to send a great proportion of their lumber to the United States much to their disadvantage. They are obliged to transport that from Port Elgin by rail at additional expense to Sackville and Cape Tormentine and there ship to Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, and United States ports. Would it not be an incalculable advantage to them if this dredging were completed? They would be enabled to have their schooners that could sail into the ports of the United States come to their wharf, take in their cargo, and they would thereby save expense and I am glad to say that with the prospect of a reciprocity treaty whereby lumber will go free into the United States and whereby they would have an open door they would have an additional advantage.

It seems to me that my hon. friend attempts to create a mountain out of a little ant hill so desirous was he of getting at the Minister of Public Works. I am not going to refer, nor need I refer, to any of the courtesies in which he indulged himself in his reference to the Minister of Public Works. The Minister of Public Works is quite able to defend himself and to deal with my hon, friend. We who do not go to the Public Account Committee and who perhaps are not always familiar with what transpires there might be led to assume that there are other transactions which demand at his hands a motion such as he has proposed to the House this afternoon. But if there is no more in these others which he has hinted at than there is in this my hon. friend certainly has my sympathy because he is attempting to travel up a high hill and a very stony road in his anxiety to get at the Minister of Public Works. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this motion should be negatived. There is nothing in it. There is nothing in the statements which have been attempted to be alleged as facts. The work is a public work, a public necessity, it has been done by open competition, it has been done faithfully so far and I hope it will be speedily completed.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). Mr. Speaker, being a member of the Public Accounts Committee and having been present during this investigation, I feel that I would like to say a few words on this motion moved by my hon. friend from York, New Brunswick (Mr. Crocket). I listened to the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Emmerson) and I was very much amused. I remember the time when the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) acted as counsel for the hon. member for Westmorland and the result of it was that when the case was ended the Minister of Public Works was Minister and the member for Westmoreland was a member of this House. I wondered as the hon. member was speaking if he was acting in that capacity for the Minister of Public Works and expected that after this debate he would be Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Public Works would be occupying his seat in the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I followed the hon. member, it seemed to me that he took the whole of the time that he spoke in trying to prove that this work was absolutely necessary. He did not dwell to any extent upon the proposition or try to prove that the amount paid by the government was fair and just. He claims that it was a matter of urgency and that was the reason why it had to be let in the way it was. But, is that not a strange reason to advance with regard to a work that has stood for eight or nine years? The government did not think it was a work of necessity or urgency until just before the general election and until the Minister of Public Works with Mr. Moore and Mr. McAvity decided that they were going to purchase the St. John Telegraph. Then they decided that it was necessary to do this dredging at Gaspereau and not only at Gaspereau, but also at York Point and St. John. It was decided to do the work as a matter of urgency and that it should be let without tender just before the elections were coming on in order that they should get money enough to buy up the 'St. John Telegraph' so as to convert it from a Conservative newspaper to a newspaper working in the interests of the hon. member of Westmoreland. Is it not a fact that just at this time the hon. member for Westmoreland was afraid that he would lose his seat and the Minister of Public Works wanted to do one kind act and let this contract in order to assist him in his election?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was a needless alarm in view of my 1,400 majority.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Another point is that just after the election was over it was not a work of urgency or necessity, but just now when there is an election coming on the hon. member for Westmoreland and the Minister have decided that it is very urgent and they are going to start the work again. That is what the hon. member has just stated here a few minutes ago. What my hon. friend from York, New Brunswick (Mr. Crocket) has stated is this; we have never raised the point as to whether the work was needed or not. That question was not raised. The question that we have raised is: was that contract given by the Minister of Public Works fair and honest? The evidence proves that it was not. In addition to that the hon. member who has just taken his seat has shown what the amount of the contract meant. He states that the report of Mr. Day showed one recommendation of 840,000 yards at 20 cents a yard. It was to be a contract that would amount to $168,000 according to his own admission. Here was a contract for $168,000? if at 20 cents a yard which was to be awarded without tender. Then, if the work had been proceeded with on the original estimate of 840,000 cubic yards at 90 cents a yard the total amount of the contract would have been $756,000. That is what the total contract amounted to, but in the end they saw it was going to be too much robbery to take $700,000 out of the public treasury and they reduced it to 185,000 cubic yards at 20 cents a yard, or, they say, that it was a contract for $37,000. But, 185,000 cubic yards at 90 cents a yard would amount to $166,500, of a contract that was let without tender.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Of a contract which was not let.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Of a contract which was let because there was an allowance of 90 cents a yard for all of that amount.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why does my hon. friend make those misstatements? That contract was simply for the amount in the outer bar consisting of 40,000 yards.

Mr. REID (Grenville). But the contract was for all that was to be dredged there.

It is all right for the Minister of Public Works to make that statement here, but these people had the contract for all the work that was to be done at Gaspereau at 90 cents a yard. That was the contract.

There is something wrong about letting such a contract to a man like John E. Moore, who is running the St. John 'Telegraph' and never was in the dredging business, and knew nothing about it. On July 10th, John E. Moore went to Montreal, purchased a second-hand dredge from the Gilbert people and went straight back to Gaspereau, and on August 4th he is at work on this contract at ninety cents a yard. The minister did not authorize the department to advertise for this work until some time afterwards.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was advertised at that very time.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Yes, but the tenders were not to be received until some time after they were at work

Mr. PUGSLEY. A few days afterwards.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Moore was at work on the contract before the tenders were opened, and if any one went there to inspect the work to be done, Moore would tell them he had the contract and say: If you put in a lower price I will have to take it, so what is the use of cutting me down. Every one knows that most of the contractors are Liberals now, and Moore could tell them: We want this money to help the member for Westmoreland to be elected, and we want to buy the St. John 'Telegraph.' If I understand it aright, the St. John 'Telegraph' is practically owned by John E. Moore, McAvity and the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sorry to say that is not correct as to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Minister of Public Works is interested in it, and here is the money coming from the Gaspereau dredging to buy up the St. John 'Telegraph.' Outside of McAvity and Moore, I would like to know who are in that Maritime Dredging Company. But there was other work given in the same improper way, and with reference to the contract at York Point, I quote this letter from the report of the Committee of Public Accounts, 1903, page 315:

St. John, N.B., 28th Oct., 1908.

J. B. Hunter,
Deputy Public Works,
Ottawa, Ont.

Department Railways very anxious to have dredging done immediately at Intercolonial railway, York Point, and Intercolonial railway ballast wharf here. Kindly advertise for tenders and meantime authorize Maritime Dredging and Construction Company to proceed with the work on agreement to accept price of lowest accepted tender. Also have company notified that they may withdraw dredges from Gaspereau and Maquapit as season getting late and cannot work longer this fall.

(Sgd.) WILLIAM PUGSLEY.

Does any member of this House believe that a minister who will let a contract in that way at an exorbitant price, is administering his department in the public interest? He had a report from his engineer saying the work was only worth 20 cents a yard, and yet he gives the contract at 90 cents a yard to one of his personal friends, and from it he will receive personal benefit through the influence of the St. John 'Telegraph,' because the member for Westmoreland and the Minister of Public Works are receiving the benefit of the influence of that paper. I do not believe there is one member of this House who will say that it is fair and just to charge up to the people of this country that difference between 20 cents and 90 cents a yard for such a purpose. The member for Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) censured the member for York (Mr. Crocket) because he did not bring this matter up last session, but he knows it could not be brought up last session because it was before the Public Accounts Committee, and it was only at the end of the session the report was presented to the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was all discussed in Committee of Supply in November, 1910.

Mr. EMMERSON. Why was it not brought up earlier this session?

Mr. REID (Grenville). It does not make any difference when it was brought up. Why did not the member for Westmoreland tell us earlier in the session that he had arranged to have the Gaspereau work gone on with, because there is a general election this year, and he let it lie idle for the last three or four years?

Mr. EMMERSON. It would not be correct to say that.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It would be correct. The hon. member told us that nothing had been done there since the last election.

Mr. EMMERSON. Excuse me; the Dominion government dredge was working there last year.

Mr. REID (Grenville). This work was not going on

Mr. EMMERSON. They have thrown up the contract.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Who threw it up?

Mr. EMMERSON. The Maritime Dredging Company

Mr. REID (Grenville). They threw it up because the contract was going to amount to $700,000, and the Minister of Public Works knew the people would not stand for that, and he was forced to have John E. Moore withdraw. The member for Westmoreland admits that if they call for tenders again they will get a much lower price.

Mr. EMMERSON. I said that the dredging to be done now would be within the harbour, and necessarily the price would be lower. The Maritime Dredging Company had the hard part of the work to do at 90 cents a yard, and any one who does the present work will have a softer snap.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I never before heard of 90 cents a yard being paid for dredging mud or sand.

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Mayes got 90 cents in the harbour of St. John.

Mr. REID (Grenville). But it is 30 feet in St. John harbour and only 6 feet at Gaspereau, and that makes a great difference.

Mr. EMMERSON. There is a vast difference between the position as to the danger to the dredges.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. member is quibbling.

Mr. LOGGIE. I can tell the hon. member (Mr. Reid) that dredging in five or six feet is more difficult than in thirty feet.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It is well to hear the hon. member (Mr. Loggie) defending this, because he knows the dredging the Loggie Company got down in Bathurst and Loggieville which was given without tender in the same way, and John E. Moore and Loggie and others are walking around the maritime provinces with money they robbed from the people of this country.

Mr. LOGGIE. The hon. member has no proof that dredging was done at Loggieville or Bathurst without tender, unless it was for work under $5,000. There is nothing in the evidence before the Public Accounts Committee to sustain his statement.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. member's recollection is very bad. It does not matter whether it is $65,000 or $5,000, if it is wrongfully given and they have succeeded in robbing the country the principle is exactly the same. In the Public Works Department we have brought up matters of this kind where there is no question in the eyes of the people of this country that public robbery has been going on, and the Minister of Public Works has taken no steps to stop it. We brought up, for example, the amount expended for the sawdust wharf, where the difference between $700 and $5,000 was robbed from the people of this country through the neglect or influence of the Minister of Public Works, I do not know which, but by one way or the other, either by the minister in not attending to his business or else by giving this man the option of getting this $4,300.

Mr. LOGGIE. Would it not be fair for the hon. gentleman to say that the large part of the difference was repaid to the government for a part of the property sold?

Mr. REID (Grenville). The way it was repaid was that when the Minister of Public Works was in a hole in the eyes of the people of this country he sent down for the Loggie Dredging Company, and they came up and paid $3,700 for a part of it and it has never been used since.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman is speaking absolutely without evidence when he says that I sent down for the Loggies. There is not a particle of evidence of that, and if we can truly characterize a gentleman who keeps so far away from the truth as my hon. friend by saying that he has a diseased imagination, I think his imagination is even more diseased than that of the hon. member for York (Mr. Crocket).

Mr. REID (Grenville). If I have a diseased imagination the Minister of Public Works must have a diseased brain when he allows such rascality to go on in his department. He tells us he did not send for Loggie. Did he not bring Loggie here as a witness in the Public Accounts Committee? He was subpœnaed by the Minister of Public Works, not by Mr. Crocket.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The charge or insinuation made by the hon. gentleman was that I had sent for Mr. Loggie to come here to Ottawa to make a proposition to buy a part of this property. Is that not what the hon. gentleman meant to convey to this House? The hon. gentleman knows there is not a particle of evidence that could give a shadow of foundation for a statement like that.

Mr. REID (Grenville). What I wish to state to the House is that Mr. Loggie was brought here by the Minister of Public Works to try and prove that the sawdust wharf was worth $5,000. That was what he was brought here for and when he came here the only way in which he could prove it was to get Mr. Loggie to make an offer of $5,000 or whatever it was.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He was not brought here, so far as I know, for any such perpose. It appeared in the evidence that he had said to Mr. Stead that the property, in his judgment, was well worth $5,000, and that he would give more for it, and had made an offer to Mr. Murray for it. That is why the committee subpœnaed Mr. Loggie. I had nothing to do with the subpœna.

Mr. REID (Grenville). But that was all after the hearing of the evidence was started and the case was before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Loggie did not come till after that.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Then, of course, Stead was sent by the department to Loggie because Loggie had been advised of what he was to do. He was to make this offer in order to help the Minister of Public Works out of the hole on the sawdust wharf; there is no doubt about that at all. So far as the Department of Public Works is concerned, with all this rascality and robbery and thievery, that is going on in that department, we wanted to have an investigation of that department; we asked for one some time ago. I believe it would have been in the interest of the Minister of Public Works to have allowed that investigation, because it would have either shown that these charges were quite unfounded or the minister would have had to explain it in a different way, because the people of this country believe that the Minister of Public Works either knows something about all this and is allowing it for the purpose of benefiting his friends or for political purposes, or else is interested in it himself. That is the impression that is going all over this country and the minister has not tried, except for some slight explanation here, to explain these serious charges. The very fact of his being interested in the St. John 'Telegraph,' and awarding to John E. Moore, who had never done any dredging before, contracts that would enable Moore to buy out the St. John 'Telegraph' out of the public treasury without his putting in a dollar of his own, is a disgrace to this country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it is simply scandalous that the hon. gentleman should make statements that have not a particle of evidence to support them. There is not a tittle of evidence anywhere that the owners of the St. John 'Telegraph' paid for it out of money they received for dredging contracts. If the hon. gentleman had thought that was the case, surely the time for him to make these statements was before the Committee on Public Accounts, and he should have subpœnaed these people to come here.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. gentleman knows that just at the time these things happened the St. John 'Telegraph' was changed from a Conservative newspaper to a Liberal paper, supported by the Minister of Public Works, and these contracts were all let at the same time at prices which not one man in the Dominion of Canada believes were fair and upright. But we have other cases in other departments, and it seems to me that the Prime Minister and other members of the government do not seem to care how much robbery goes on. Even when the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) was Minister of Railways and Canals, look what went on in his department. If his brain is like that of the Minister of Public Works this must have been the time when it got warped or diseased, and he allowed these heelers to get in and rob this country. He remembers the land deals at Halifax when Pearson was down there robbing the country. Then, when they wanted land for the Intercolonial railway, the hon. member sent down for the proprietor of the Halifax Liberal paper, let him get in the scoop and rob the country there.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend is again drawing on his imagination, there is not the slightest evidence of anything of that kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is all very well to say 'oh, no,' but apparently the hon. member has no case, and he now wants to throw mud all around.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The evidence all came out.

Mr. EMMERSON. There is no such evidence.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Pearson was sent for at the time to see about these lands. We wanted an investigation, but we could not get it, hon. members opposite voted us down, and now the hon. member for Westmorland has to come to the defence of the Minister of Public Works because at that time all the hon. members came to his defence and would not allow us to expose the robbery and rascality that went on in the department he was running at that time. How is it with the other departments? They seem to be all getting in the same way. Seeing that the Minister of Public Works and others are allowed to act in this way, those in charge of other departments think they have the same right. Every one of these spending departments is practically in the same position, and it is impossible to prosecute the offenders because every one of the men guilty of this robbing of the public treasury does so with the knowledge or consent of the minister. What is the use of prosecuting them, because they are all like Moore and McAvity, men who are heelers and are putting up the money for the elections. We have seen how the Public Works and Railway Departments are run. But other departments are just as bad. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries will remember the investigations that were made into his department.

Mr. TALBOT. What has that to do with it?

Mr. REID (Grenville). It has a lot to do with it. It shows how members like you are ready to swallow everything, whether it is public robbery or not, in order to back up these men who allow it to go on. When we had these investigations into the Marine and Fisheries Department, were there any prosecutions? The minister knows that he dare not prosecute, because they would look after him. He was responsible, and I cannot understand how a minister who is sworn to do what is right, will allow this rascality to go on without prosecuting somebody.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman is absolutely mistaken. Somebody has been prosecuted and put into jail.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Name one of them. I would like to know who they are.

Mr. BRODEUR. If the hon. gentleman will consult the record of the proceedings of the court in Quebec last spring he will find the names.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The minister should tell who they are. He did not prosecute Merwin or Roy, the man who padded the lists at Sorel and then left this country.

Mr. TALBOT. The man is dead and buried.

Mr. REID (Grenville). He was not dead for a long time afterwards, but he was not prosecuted. Instead of prosecuting him, the minister promoted him to a higher position.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is not correct. The man was dismissed.

Mr. REID (Grenville). He was dismissed because we brought the matter up in this House, and raised so much trouble about it.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman stated that Roy was promoted.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Wasn't he transferred to Quebec at the time?

Mr. BRODEUR. Not at all; he was dismissed.

Mr. REID (Grenville). When a man robs the country, is dismissal all the action that the minister will take?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I think you will agree with me that the hon. gentleman is wandering a long way off from the question before the House. The motion is to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the amendment is to condemn the government for expenditure in the Gaspereaux river. I think in all fairness he ought to confine himself to the motion before the House. If we are going to take the vote on reciprocity in the near future——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.
