Because of modern communications methods, computer centres for electronic data processing can be located almost anywhere, even thousands of miles from the user of the services or the head office of the organization, with little or no functional difference in the operation's output of the centre. The computer's raw material is information; its finished product is information, and information can be transmitted electronically by cable, satellite or microwave. Information is thus almost completely freight-insensitive. Nevertheless, in direct contravention of at least two key government objectives, decentralization and elimination of regional economic disparities, Air Canada is locating its computer in Montreal.

If hon. members require factual data rather than theoretical argument to convince them that the computer could just as well have been located in Winnipeg, let me draw these facts to their attention. United Airlines, in the United States, has its head office in Chicago. Its main reservations computer is in Denver. Its overhaul base and computer for overhaul are located in San Francisco. Eastern Airlines has its head office in New York city, yet its computer centres are located in North Carolina and Florida. Clearly, Air Canada could have assisted in the regional development of computer processing skills, but it chose not to do so and the government has said nothing. Air Canada has promised no reduction in employment in Winnipeg as a result of its decision. Leaving aside any consideration of the calibre of the jobs to be left in Winnipeg, permit me to say I view Air Canada's promises with a highly jaundiced eye.

[Mr. Rowland.]

Let me review the record. In 1948, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, then minister of transport, stated that 95 per cent of TCA's activities would remain in Winnipeg. In 1948-49, TCA moved its headquarters' personnel to Montreal. In 1949, appearing before a federal transport committee, the president of TCA said:

> TCA's long association with Winnipeg has been a very happy one and will continue as long as I can see.

In 1950, the staff of the TCA publications department, the company stationery department and a number of technical functions, were moved from Winnipeg. In 1950, J. C. Bain, maintenance manager of TCA, stated that it would cost $1 million per year over ten years to move personnel, clearly implying that such was unthinkable. In 1951, a major portion of the engineering department and the radio technicians were removed from Winnipeg. In 1952, it was the communications laboratory. In 1956, it was the radio shop. In 1957, following assurances by the president that overhaul operations would not be transferred, a further 100 employees were removed to Montreal. In 1960, the instrument shop and processing laboratory were moved. In 1960, engine overhaul and stores were moved. In November, 1963, then Prime Minister Pearson said in this House:

> I am therefore now able to announce the change from the previous expectations announced a year ago that the overhaul and maintenance base in Winnipeg will begin to be phased out early in 1966. For at least as far ahead as planning now extends, that is at least ten years, the Winnipeg facilities will continue to be used.

On October 5, 1967, Air Canada announced that it intended to close the base, and that has been done. So forgive me if I do not believe a word Air Canada says. Winnipeg wants that computer centre and by any standards you care to apply, moral, economic or political, Winnipeg has a right to the computer centre. If the federal government really means what it has been saying about western economic development since October 30, 1972, let it begin to offer concrete proof of its commitment by instructing Air Canada to locate the computer centre in Winnipeg. If management does not like it, find a new management, because there is certainly no point in having a Crown corporation if that corporation does not act to assist in accomplishing the stated goals of government, and even less point if it acts directly contrary to government objectives.

I will go further. There are rumours that Air Canada wishes to purchase a number of Boeing 727s and 737s. If this course is pursued, then I would suggest Air Canada should be instructed to establish a Boeing service centre in Winnipeg capable of maintaining not only its own Boeing aircraft but also those of the Canadian armed forces and regional carriers which lack appropriate major overhaul facilities.

Alternatively, Air Canada could contract out its Boeing maintenance to the CAE in Winnipeg, thus enabling that company to provide a Boeing maintenance facility. In any event, let us get some of the highly skilled jobs now increasingly concentrated in central Canada out west or into the Atlantic provinces. In this case, because of its long association with Air Canada and its central location, Winnipeg would seem to be the logical spot. Just once I would like to see a minister tell Air Canada to do something. I would bet the sky wouldn't fall!

I have spent some considerable time attempting to illustrate the need for the government to develop a transportation policy which would enable transportation to be effectively employed as an instrument of national policy. To me, the first step in any such program beyond that of producing a well-researched and documented discussion paper and, ideally, draft legislation, would be to amend the legislation establishing the Canadian Transport Commission so as to replace references to "profitability" with "service to the public". Were that done there would no longer be any danger of carrier economics being equated with public convenience and necessity as in the recent decision, already alluded to, to permit Transair Midwest to abandon its Brandon-Dauphin-Yorkton run. Surely in this case it must be obvious that Transair was granted the lucrative Winnipeg-Toronto run not so as to provide additional competition for Air Canada but, rather, as a cross-subsidy which would enable it to maintain other less profitable routes.

The same in the case with CN and other railroads. The legislation must make it plain to the CTC that its role is not that of sympathetically nodding its head as the railroad trots out arguments to demonstrate that this branch line or that, this passenger service or that, is losing money and therefore should be abandoned. Rather, the CTC's role should clearly be that of pointing out to the rail companies that the large grants of land and mineral rights given to them by the Canadian public were designed to permit the rail companies to provide a service to the public and that the losses, if any, of the railroad operations should be balanced against the investment profits which have resulted from those grants of land and mineral rights.

For too long we have had governments which have judged the efficiency of our Crown corporations engaged in transportation exclusively on the evidence of the balance sheet. It is about time we began to judge their efficiency in relation to the service which they provide to the public and the degree to which they further the accomplishment of national objectives.

There are so many areas relating to the operations of Air Canada and the CN requiring comment that the difficulty lies not in discovering what to say but what may legitimately be left out. What is the government doing, for example, about the inadequate maintenance carried out on rights-of-way by CN? Why is CN not devoting more of its resources to the research and development of rapid intercity rail transportation? Why, for that matter, is the government, which is providing an $80 million subsidy for the development of short take-off and landing aircraft, not spending equivalent amounts to improve rapid intercity rail transport? The potential benefits in terms of spin-off are just as great, given the interest in rail transportation in the rest of the world.

I could go on, but I will take the time only to draw one further problem to the attention of members of this House and the minister in particular, namely, the plight of the railroad pensioner. For some time now the railways employees pension association has been drawing to our attention, the attention of the public and the attention of the railroads and the railway unions, the need for improved pensions. I hope that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) will see fit to appoint a commission of inquiry or to expand the terms of reference of the Deutsch commission now attempting to determine the actual cash value of the railways pension plan, expand those terms of reference or create another commission which will allow an inquiry into the entire range of problems associated with railway pensions. This proposal has been put to the Minister of Labour before in the House and he has indicated that he intends to give it sympathetic consideration. I see him nodding his head, and I hope that that sympathetic consideration will result in some concrete action in the near future.

The demands made by the pension association, after all, are relatively modest and quite in keeping with the pension legislation recently passed in the House modifying old age security legislation, the guaranteed income supplement legislation, public service pensions legislation and other measures. We have all received cards listing the desires of the railway pension association. I think it is worth while to put those demands on record. Their first demand is a 2 per cent pension retroactive to entering the service. The second is an escalator clause in line with the cost of living index, including a minimum increase of 2 per cent a year. The third is early retirement without penalty on a voluntary basis. The fourth is improved survivor benefits. The fifth is a request to upgrade railway pension plans in line with the provisions contained in the Public Service Superannuation Act, 1970, and its amendments.

Those are relatively modest demands which, I submit, the CN could meet and which the CP could certainly go a long way toward meeting. CP could afford to meet them, but there is less chance of government action affecting the decisions of CP, unfortunately. In other years the Minister of Transport has given assurances during debates such as this that he would do all in his power to influence the railway companies to improve benefits for pensioners. The exercising of that influence, with the backing of the House, has in the past produced benefits for the pensioners, in some cases rather substantial benefits. I would like very much to hear a similar undertaking from the Minister of Transport before we allow the debate on this bill to end.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, our country is experiencing a most remarkable development. This is encouraging for us all and from every point of view. It is more and more normal that transportation and communications between citizens and the various locations in the country progress also at the same tempo as the population and the production of necessary goods and services for all Canadians.

If Canada's development is achieved by the work of its citizens, thanks to its nearly boundless natural resources, it is essential that the government finance the development or the creation of transport bodies requiring too much capital to be left solely in the hands of individuals who cannot dispose of sufficient funds.

This is why, in view of these circumstances, we must vote supplies so as to ensure the development of the Canadian National Railways and Air Canada. In principle, Mr. Speaker, I can only approve the provisions of these funds by this government or the guarantee by this government on securities or bonds and debentures to be issued to finance these developments of the CN and Air Canada.

Without dealing with all the details, I note that the CN is authorized, in 1973, to make capital expenditures including investment in securities of affiliated companies not exceeding in the aggregate $225,500,000, to enable the National Railway System to make capital expenditures of $75 million during the first six months of the calendar year 1974 for discharging obligations incurred prior to January 1, 1974, and to enter into contracts not exceeding $167,500,000 before July 1, 1974, for equipment, additions and conversions requiring payments after the calendar year 1973.

I spare hon. members some details in order to save time. But one can also see, in this list that we must recommend the provision of loans or the guarantee of securities to Air Canada not exceeding $140,000,000 for discharging obligations of the airline that become due and payable in the period January 1, 1973 to June 30, 1974.

I leave a few more details aside and come to the clause that ends up the whole thing, and which is designed to authorize Her Majesty to make loans to the Canadian National Railways Company and Air Canada to meet deficiencies in operating revenues to June 30, 1974, any such loans to be repaid from revenues of the Railway Company and Air Canada or, if revenues prove insufficient by subsequent deficit appropriation by Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, in clause 15, one can read that section 3 of the Canadian National Railways Refunding Act, 1955, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, the National Company may issue notes, obligations, bonds, or other securities (in this Act called "substituted securities") in respect of any refunding pursuant to this Act, to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding one thousand million dollars, and the Governor in Council may authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty in right of Canada, of the principal and interest of the substituted securities."

Mr. Speaker, we are being asked to give Canadian National and Air Canada officials some sort of a blank cheque for the amount of $1 billion that they can borrow under the terms they want and at the interest rate they will determine both for things already mentioned and things to be determined.

Here again, Mr. Speaker, as a new member I am surprised at such a way of giving carte blanche to employees, and I cannot help noting it before our ministers and hon. members who wonder why Crown corporations always incur deficits while the Canadian Pacific makes profits.

It is often said that small private businesses must not be administered as the government or government businesses are because they will soon be bankrupt. The aforementioned examples show it well.

So far as the CNR is concerned, the most important fact that makes that large business nearly impossible to administer with profit is the build-up of huge capital that contributed to the creation of that company, the construction of railway tracks, that ribbon of steel and wood that crosses Canada from east to west and from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

I would not want my remarks to be interpreted as a general blame because it must be recognized that those railways were necessary and that in the main they contributed to the development of Canada. This country would not be the same today had those railways not been built.

When we look today at the annual statement provided by the company itself for 1972, for instance, we notice that the administration by itself is making a profit but that this administrative profit is consumed and surpassed by the interests alone on the debt accumulated since the beginnings of the company. This eternal debt will never be paid and involves increasingly higher interest rates each time there is a renewal of bonds which have expired and can only be reimbursed by the current revenue and expenditures administration.

If we look at the main figures of the 1972 statement, we see that the Canadian National has made net profits of nearly $24 million on the administration of the railroad, but that the interests on the debt eat up this profit and have even caused an increase in the deficit of nearly $18 million. This must be paid by floating a new issue which contributes to boost the total and eternal debt of the Canadian National. New interests will have to be paid on this debt at increasingly higher rates, as long as the decision is not taken to make reforms in this area, particularly as concerns interests on the capital.

In the present circumstances, the important thing is to understand what is going on, without intending to bring any changes. If we can do this, we shall see what needs to be changed because there is no limit to human intelligence, except that which it creates itself by leaving things as they are. This is much easier than changing our methods and it is also much more profitable for some people.

There is only one question to ask if we want to see things as they are and bring the required changes as easily as possible and that is: Whom does it profit? Who benefits from interest on capital? Who supplies this capital? How do they manage to generate it? And finally, if some people can provide us indefinitely with this capital, why could we not find it ourselves here in Canada?

I may be going a little far in my remarks on capital and interests that we are considering concerning the CN, but what is true here is also true in all other cases of capital issues at the rate of millions and billions of dollars. We might perhaps understand these financial problems a little better if we wanted to take a little more time to examine this phenomenon of everlasting debts which burden our annual operations. In 1973, we must still authorize the CN and Air Canada to borrow, to capitalize with the guarantee of the state or Her Majesty for an amount not greater than $1 billion.

Since we are talking about the CN, I would like to comment on the fact that the recent strike could have been prevented if the authorities had striven for good management and if the managers had been aware of and felt responsible for their own interests as well as those of the population.

In recent times, three railwaymen and one foreman were responsible for the maintenance of seven miles of track. There are now only two workers for the maintenance of 20 miles of track. Naturally, it follows that tracks are less safe, derailments more frequent, thus causing thousands of dollars in losses and damages to all kinds of materials.

One can say that these are cheese-paring economies. However, as I was saying, shrewd administrators would have prevented the recent railway strike. When amounts lost in transportation revenues, salaries and taxes are considered, as well as the wages paid to employees that were moved by bus throughout the country, at a daily cost of $28 per employee, which employees were often brought back to their starting point without getting any job or doing any work, economies would have been realized. This was going on during the work-to-rule strike that lasted about three weeks.

If we add all these unnecessary expenses made during the strike, we would be surprised to find that they would have been sufficient to pay the increase asked for during the strike. Again one can be sure that the government's billion dollar corporations cannot be administered like small private enterprises. It remains however that the administrative processes are almost always the same whether they have to do with big, average or small concerns. There must always be revenues, expenses and profits; but one must not make excessive expenses on purpose. For instance, I know that in my constituency of Rimouski, a man came all the way from Campbellton, New Brunswick—100 miles—to replace a window pane in the railway station. Ridiculous, is it not?

I was told that a car and an unlimited credit card were made available to Canadian National employees on a year-round basis, for a fixed and round sum of $50 a month. At that rate, Mr. Speaker, nobody would buy a car in his own name. Corporations would provide cars for all their employees with expenses paid by the corporation, and everything would be added to the yearly administration costs, which would increase the cost of products as well as the annual deficit of those corporations. If that can be done for corporations financed by the Canadian government, it is impossible in private industries, be they small, average or big.

Another comment one often hears is that along the railroad tracks between Vancouver and Halifax there is material going to waste—enough to pay for the employees' salaries for many years to come.

We hear a good number of similar comments, on numerous subjects, especially on the shameless waste that goes on in the Canadian National administration. That could be the object of a royal inquiry on the general administration of that national corporation where senior employees are nevertheless pretty well paid, so that private companies could take a leaf out of the administration's book. But what happens is the opposite.

The more capital is borrowed to subsidize the company, the higher the interest and even the interest rates. The more the company expands, the deeper it gets into debt and standing expenses. It reminds us of a bogged down car. Every turn of the wheels sinks it deeper in the mud.

Mr. Speaker, what is the use of talking about it since the custom is established. The government makes up the losses whether the administration is good or not. That is what must be in the minds of the administrators of the big publicly financed companies where profits are not incentives to further a good and healthy administration.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have sat in the House during this debate and listened with great interest to my colleagues on all sides speak of the advantages and disadvantages of the service of Canadian National Railways, of railroad problems generally, of airline problems and of the advantages that various areas of Canada enjoy or the disadvantages that they suffer. Some who spoke were concerned about the island economies of Canada which suffer a certain kind of geographic remoteness. They have indicated that this geographic remoteness is complicated by further remoteness caused by inefficient and ineffective transportation facilities which affect the growth and lifestyle of those island areas.

Members from other parts of Canada, notably the west, have spoken of the abandonment of rail lines and the feelings of isolation which are generated as a result. There is isolation from the point of view of a way of life and from the point of view of the operation of businesses and farms. If we accept what members from the west have said, and I think it ought to be accepted, there are some great difficulties with railroads.

I think it is important, Mr. Speaker, that we remember that railroads did not come about by accident. They were instruments of Canadian national unity and the togetherness of the disparate areas of Canada which were separated by great distances where between points of emptiness there were pockets of people. The railroads brought those people together. It is not by accident that the largest committee room in this building is called the railway committee room. I think that is an indication of the significance of the railroads in our early life.

There is another kind of isolation that I should like to deal with, namely, the kind of isolation that we in eastern Ontario feel. This is one of the last areas of Ontario to develop industrially. I speak now from the point of view of secondary manufacturing industries which are so important to this area if we are to provide the number and the variety of jobs for the young people who grow up here. This is necessary so that fewer will leave and that we may retain their talents and skills. I believe that railroads in this part of Canada can lessen this isolation in the sense that I use the term.

I speak now of that area of eastern Ontario which I represent, and perhaps cities to the east and west and up the Ottawa Valley. As time has passed there has been a deterioration in the service that the railroads have offered with respect to freight and passengers. In this part of Ontario we have had to rely to an increasing extent upon the highways for the delivery of goods and people. As a result, the highways have become cluttered with trucks, buses and automobiles and the quality of life has been affected. So in a sense we have been isolated from the service that should be provided by an efficient, well accepted railroad system which should grow and change to meet the new needs and new desires of the community.

The experience in the area has not been that of an expansion of service but, rather, a diminution. It is not exemplified so much by the removal of tracks as perhaps by the closing of stations, of telegraph services, freight services and the other things that formerly served these communities. In the time that I have lived in this area, the very valuable rail service that linked Ottawa, the national capital, and the St. Lawrence region has disappeared. The bus service has been augmented to replace it, but that is not desirable in relation to the quality of life. The freight office which formerly served what we hope is a growing industrial part of Ontario along the St. Lawrence has been closed and people now have to go to the larger centres for this service. This is regrettable and I believe the railroads, particularly the Canadian National Railways, have not been too concerned about serving the area. They have been concerned with the difficulties of the balance sheet, I believe, and have not sought to improve and augment the service for a growing area.

In eastern Ontario, Air Canada does not provide the type of service which ought to be available to the national capital. It is difficult to obtain a reservation between Ottawa and Toronto or Ottawa and Montreal. I believe this is because the airline does not offer the right kind of service for the short haul and tremendous passenger load involved. This matter was raised in the House yesterday by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) who put a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). The hon. member inquired about the possibility of an airbus service between Ottawa and Toronto to begin with, and perhaps later between Ottawa and Montreal similar to the service operated so successfully between Calgary and Edmonton. The answer of the minister was that this matter was on the agenda of the transport commission and he hoped a solution would be found.

If adequate service is to be provided within the foreseeable future, this item ought to have been off that agenda a long time ago, because the problem has been developing rapidly for many years: the government ought not still to be in the process of considering it. The problem is with us. Planning ought to have been undertaken many years ago. That sort of planning has been brought to fruition in other areas of Canada and certainly, in the United States.

If there is to be a proper service for those who want to visit the national capital or leave it for business reasons or personal reasons, I think it is essential that there be provided continuing service with economical equipment. It is hard to conceive that in 1973 the minister should stand in this House and say that the matter of air transport between the national capital and the rest of Canada is on the agenda of the transport commission. That sounds as if the matter has not yet been attacked, let alone solved. I think that we of this area in particular will suffer as a result of this lack of action. All parties in the House, indeed all the residents of this area as well as many other areas of Canada, would support the implementation of this sort of program even on a pilot basis.

[Mr. Baker.]

I also wish to deal briefly with the importance of railroads in urban development. This government has brought forward the semblance of a plan—I do not know if it will be implemented—which provides for the development of new towns and urban areas around existing towns. The plan applies to my particular area of Canada and to many others. It is an important plan because anyone who now lives in a large, urban area feels the effect of the packing into fewer and fewer acres of more and more people. We see what is happening almost wherever we go. We see high-rise buildings sprouting like dandelions in our urban areas.

There is good reason for such development in the national capital area. The reason is this: for all the time that I have been in this area, and for many years before that, there has been inconclusive discussion between the national government, the government of Ontario and the government of Quebec with respect to the provision of rapid transit service in the area. If we are to make the system of new towns viable, or for that matter succeed in developing population centres around existing towns, we will need to tackle the problem of interurban transit. The railroads of this country, particularly the national railroad, will have a big part to play in that development. It will need to do what it already does to a great extent in and around metropolitan Toronto.

That is why we must view with some reservations announcements by the minister responsible for urban affairs with respect to the tearing up of rail lines leading to the centres of towns. We may need to relay some of those rail lines, if we are to move the population which we hope will go out to the new towns and centres of our metropolitan areas. One of the major difficulties that the present government and the government which will succeed it will need to tackle concerns the development of interurban transit, that is to say, inexpensive interurban transit which will persuade those who wish to live in the core areas of cities to move out, and persuade others who wish to move into cities to stay outside. Such a system, if it is to be viable, ought to be rapid and convenient. That is the service we must provide from outlying areas to the central core.

Further, it ought to dissuade those who would use automobiles from using their vehicles and encourage them to use the public transportation system. It ought to be a system that works, that could move masses of people over fairly large distances in a short time and meet the requirements of their working day. It is important for us to consider that aspect, and the part that railroads would play in the life of a community which is changing. Our community is changing: as it changes we will need new equipment and new methods of moving people.

I think the government ought to encourage the railways to undertake research to an extent that we have not hitherto seen in this country. In my area of the country there is a debate going on as to whether a multilane, limited access highway should be built. It would run from Ottawa, south through the large populated area of Nepean township, and eventually connect with Highway 16. It would also connect with Highway 401 which links Toronto and Montreal, the nearest large centres. The necessity for the highway is being debated because of North American dependence on the automobile. This dependence on the automobile has changed our way of life and has made us look away from other modes of transportation.

If this country a long time ago had begun thinking of the importance of railways, there would not have been abandonment of rail services but, rather, their augmentation. They would have served the area in which we live. Furthermore, we would not be considering today the kind of highway which will run through, and perhaps ruin, some good residential areas merely because we want to move cars and trucks. We might be looking at a system which augments an existing rail system running north and south which, incidentally, does not exist today.

We ought not to look on railways as a means of connecting sparsely populated areas separated by great distances in Canada. Rather, we ought to consider railways as means of transporting great numbers of people over short distances. Thus, the railways would fulfil a new purpose. I think that shows the dilemma we face in Canada. We have tended to look on transportation on a piecemeal basis, tending to consider in isolation trains, trucks and other modes. Perhaps the time has come to do what has not yet been done in this country by any government, that is, develop a national transportation policy in which the railroads would play an ever increasing role as time goes on. That ought to be the conscious aim of such policy.

In my area we hope to develop the tourist industry and secondary industry. These industries will depend upon the railways. If we are to depend only upon existing rail services, these industries will not develop and my part of Ontario, as well as other parts of Canada, will be the worse for it. That would be the result, generally, if there were a failure to adopt a national transportation policy.

• (2140)

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to prolong this discussion. Indeed, the members of the official opposition would like to see this matter referred to committee so we can deal with the many unresolved problems that have been brought to the attention of the minister and the government during the course of this debate. However, there is one urgent problem I have been wrestling with during the past two weeks and I would like to place it on the record this evening.

I have been in correspondence with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). I have also had conversations with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), who is the minister from the province of Manitoba. I believe the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Guay) is in the House this evening.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am listening to you.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is good. I hope that hon. member will become part of the Manitoba group which on a non-partisan basis is trying to bring forcibly to the attention of the government an area of very sad neglect in the field of air transportation. Briefly, the story of air transportation as it affects the keystone province has been one of gradual deterioration over the past ten years. It was always expected that the city of Winnipeg would be one of our major international air centres. It is designated as an international air centre. Unfortunately, because of government policy its role in that regard has been gradually downgraded.

When minister of transport, that able political gentleman the Hon. Jack Pickersgill used to talk about the role of Winnipeg in the international air scheme of things. When he was later transplanted and became the first chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission he used to make speeches across the country. I have in my hand a newspaper report of a speech he made in the city of Winnipeg on September 9, 1969. The headline reads "Air gateway status hinted for Winnipeg". The hon. gentleman was still hinting as late as 1969. I quote from the article:

> The possibility of Winnipeg becoming an international air gateway was hinted Wednesday by Jack W. Pickersgill, president of the Canadian Transport Commission.
> Speaking to the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce, the former minister of transport said talks between the federal government and Canada's two main air carriers had already taken place and that a proposal might be placed before the International Air Transport Association in the near future.

It is all "hinting, "maybe" and might". I think the time is long past when we should say that it "might" or "could" be possible, and the government should move to do something concrete in this regard. I am sure the hon. member for St. Boniface is heartily in agreement with what I am saying. Winnipeg's position on the polar route places it in the most strategic position possible. That route is 400 miles shorter to Europe. I cannot understand why this government persists in spending a billion dollars to establish a satellite airport for the city of Toronto at Pickering, which is opposed by the residents of Pickering, when they have the logical location at the Manitoba international airport which has been waiting to be utilized to the maximum since 1969.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: In 1969, the then president of the Canadian Transport Commission hinted that the great breakthrough was about to be achieved. Let us all work together for that end so that the growing problems of air transportation which have been outlined will be resolved. At present you cannot get reservations out of the city of Winnipeg because of the growing number of people using the airlines. The facility has to be expanded.

There is another aspect of this problem to which I shall refer briefly. That is the role of regional air carriers. The same gentleman, the Hon. Jack Pickersgill, when minister of transport announced a regional air policy. When it was announced, it was hailed by the then president of TransAir, the regional carrier for the central part of Canada, in these words:

> The new policy is the greatest announcement made in Canadian aviation history since the time Trans-Canada Airlines was formed by act of parliament in 1937—

That was recorded in the Manitoba Business Journal of October-November, 1966. Unfortunately, the dawn of a new age has not yet appeared. The record since that time with regard to regional air policy has been one of gradual deterioration. When Air Canada was responsible for supplying air service to western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan we had a regional air service that extended right through to Calgary. During the intervening period the responsibility was transferred from Air Canada to TransAir. TransAir received the subsidy because the route must be subsidized. We recognize that air transportation is basic. We also recognize that at this stage of economic development, transportation cannot be provided at an adequate level without an air subsidy. However, that was removed. That was also done under the then minister of transport, the Hon. Jack Pickersgill.

Today we are faced with the possibility that air service on the western lateral by the regional air carrier, TransAir, will be discontinued absolutely effective January 1. This precipitates a crisis. This is the reason I wish to briefly bring the problem to the attention of the government and hon. members. It was obviously the intention of the government to upgrade that service, because over $1 million was expended in the early 1960s to expand and upgrade the quality of the main runway.

A few years ago an excellent new terminal facility was opened at the Brandon airport. While it is designated as the Brandon airport, it is actually beyond the boundaries of the city of Brandon. It was designed to serve the whole western Manitoba region. Just at the precise moment the new air terminal facility was opened, the air transport committee was giving authorization to TransAir to downgrade its class A service to a class B commuter service. The latest decision of ATC, which seems to be flying in the face of the declared policy of the government to upgrade this facility and the regional air service, is to accede to the request of TransAir to discontinue completely its responsibility of supplying air service to western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan. This involves a population of some 200,000.

I recommend to the Minister of Transport and to the government, as I have already done by letter, that it suspend the decision brought down by the air transport committee early in October which permits TransAir to abandon its responsibilities completely, and while this whole matter is in a state of suspension the government should authorize the air transport committee to conduct a thorough review of its regional air policy on the western lateral of TransAir. I see the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport nodding his head in approval. On this basis, the basis of a thoroughgoing review, the government should then go forward to formulate a policy which would deal adequately with the circumstances I have outlined.

I do not wish to pursue this matter further at present, other than to remind the Minister of Transport that when he was the minister responsible for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion it was under his leadership that western Manitoba was designated as a major growth area under the DREE program. I am sure he would not have allowed or arranged such a designation unless he was in sympathy with the view that an adequate air service should be provided. I trust, therefore, that this question will be considered further in committee when the bill advances to that stage, and that the government will be making an announcement in this connection. Many of the new industries which DREE helped to establish are concerned about losing direct air transportation into their market area. I trust we shall see some positive, vigorous action on the part of the government at the earliest moment.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would find it difficult to say what I have to say in five minutes. I notice that all the "late show" performers are in the chamber, and I wonder whether the House would agree to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion that we call it ten o'clock and proceed to the adjournment debate. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE—MILK SUBSIDY—REASON FOR DELAY IN APPLICATION TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, listening to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I found myself thinking of the quotation "O, most excellent man!"

On October 18 I addressed a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) concerning the delay in making the federal milk subsidy operative in Prince Edward Island. The minister said he was confused by the complimentary remarks with which I prefaced my question and for that reason he could not give me an answer. Tonight I shall delete any compliments lest I trouble the parliamentary secretary. The issue is naturally one of great concern to the people of Prince Edward Island. In the Guardian of October 16, Premier Campbell is quoted as being "extremely disappointed". He said that as minister of agriculture he had made representations to the federal Department of Agriculture the day after milk prices were advanced. He went on to say:

> I cannot understand why a federal subsidy is not now immediately committed to Prince Edward Island and I intend to keep after them for the payment, which should be automatic.

I say "amen" to those words, and I hope Premier Campbell is doing just what he said he would do. I feel exactly as he does on this issue. On September 4 I was in this chamber when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced measures relating to the high cost of living. He said:

> The federal government wishes also to alleviate the burden of the price of milk for Canadian families and insists that any measure taken shall benefit consumers. The government is therefore willing to guarantee payment of a 5-cent subsidy per quart of milk to provinces where marketing boards will agree to maintain or reduce the cost of milk for at least one year. At the same time, the government will set up a program aimed at reducing by an equivalent amount the price of a package of powdered skimmed milk. In this respect, it will hold meetings with provincial representatives without delay.

The date of the Prime Minister's announcement was September 4. That is quite a while ago. The expression "without delay" seems to be somewhat overstated, to say the least.

The cost of living in Prince Edward Island is extremely high. I have here the consumer price index recently received from Statistics Canada covering the cost of food at home in September of this year. Taking 1969 as 100, the figure for September, 1973, is 134.6 for Halifax, 139.9 for Saint John, and 145.2 for Charlottetown. Needless to say, these figures are all far above the figures for many Canadian centres. The recent 6 cents a quart increase in the price of milk on Prince Edward Island is naturally bearing down heavily and painfully on consumers in Charlottetown and elsewhere.

I do not fault the producers, nor have I ever done so. They are facing vastly increased costs and the dairy industry is vitally important to our provincial economy, as it is to the whole country. It is a source of pride to me that though my constituency is largely urban, there are in the rural areas of Hillsborough some of the finest cattle in the country and all sorts of breed prize-winners. It is not the producers I blame.

It is apparent from Premier Campbell's statement that the problem is here. There are surely no valid reasons why the measure of relief offered to consumers cannot be applied to our people. If there are reasons for delay, let the minister or the parliamentary secretary tell me about them. More important, let the wrinkles be ironed out and the subsidy applied. There is no excuse for further delay. The Premier of Prince Edward Island, the leader of the opposition there, and the press have all expressed views similar to mine. I join with them in expressing concern. The leader of the opposition said the problem lies in the provincial area. The premier has very definitely declared that it lies with the Minister of Agriculture. I bring the matter to his attention most forcibly because of the great importance which is attached to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member opposite asked a question concerning the subsidy to milk consumers of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Speaker, I should perhaps take this opportunity to tell the House about the negotiations held with each province. Up to now, agreements have been concluded with seven of them and eight companies of instant skimmed powdered milk. Once the subsidy became effective, the price of milk to consumers was reduced by 4 cents in Quebec on September 17, by 3 cents in Saskatchewan on September 24, by 3 cents in Manitoba also on October 1 and by 2 cents in Nova Scotia; it was reduced by 5 cents in Alberta on October 15 and by 4 cents in British Columbia on October 22. Three provinces, namely Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, have not yet concluded an agreement but negotiations are under way. We hope to reach an early and satisfactory agreement with those provinces so that their consumers may take advantage of the subsidy.

Adjournment Debate

[English]

GRAIN—WHEAT—SUGGESTED CHANGE IN CROP YEAR TO EQUALIZE PAYMENTS TO FARMERS WHO MADE EARLY DELIVERIES

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on October 16 I asked the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) the following question:

● (2200)

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that many smaller producers delivered their grain during the old crop year in June and July in order to meet financial obligations and debts and therefore lost out on the announcement regarding new prices on July 31 or August 1 for the new crop year, would the minister inform the House whether the government is considering making an equalization payment from the new pool account so as to assist those farmers who took a beating as a result of the new prices?

This is an extremely important question and obviously for the minister and the government, as well as for the Wheat Board, a very difficult one. What am I addressing myself to? I am addressing myself to the fact that in the months of June and July western Canadian farmers delivered in the neighbourhood of 134.2 million bushels of wheat to the Canadian Wheat Board. During that period the Canadian Wheat Board, as the minister rightly pointed out, threw the quotas wide open so the farmers could deliver as much as they wanted.

What happened was that unfortunately, either because the elevator agents at given points did not clearly describe the situation to the farmers or the situation was indeed never clearly spelled out, many farmers delivered wheat, for example to the elevators, took their initial payment in the old crop year and never held their grain over into the new crop year in storage. They were told the world market needed those deliveries.

If some 50 million bushels out of the 134 million bushels delivered were not held over into the new crop year, then as a result of the initial price jump on August 1, the new crop year, of somewhere around $2 at the elevator, with a final projected price in the area of well over $5 on the international market, this would mean a loss to those farmers of around $150 million.

Why did some farmers not hold over their wheat, Mr. Speaker? They did not do so at that given point in the year because they had to meet their financial obligations in terms of bank loans, petroleum costs, fencing, if they had cattle—you name it. In my constituency, just during my office hours many farmers brought to me examples of what happened. Say a three-quarter section farmer delivered 5,000 bushels of wheat. He took his initial price or payment at the elevator, and in doing so lost somewhere between $15,000 to $20,000 when the new price came in. In other words, he bore the brunt of carrying our wheat sales commitments at prices lower than the climbing international price. On the other hand, a producer who was farming a considerable amount of land and could deliver a lot of bushels which he would hold over into the new crop year would earn, if he delivered, say, 20,000 bushels, an extra $60,000.

This situation has created considerable inequity in terms of pool accounts, equal pricing, international market prices and the farmers' share of the price, whether high or low. The board's principle of pooling prices is put into jeopardy, and I know immense difficulties are created for the minister in trying to solve the problem of correcting the injustice suffered by particular farmers. I know a producer in the Willow Bunch country who on July 31 delivered 900 bushels. He talked to the elevator operator, who told him that it would be advantageous to hold it over to the new crop year. He thought about it, but decided to let the 900 bushels go, and then he woke up one morning to find he had lost between $3,000 and $3,500.

Another producer who was on the point of retiring had a farmer take charge of his land and work it in the summer. When the quotas came off, his hired hand delivered every bushel that he had grown to the elevator at the old crop year price. That man lost thousands of dollars in the very year he was trying to retire. Other producers were caught in a situation of delivering 2,000, 3,000 or 5,000 bushels of grain and because of not holding it over, lost because of the new price.

If the open market system were in operation, I would say that is the problem and one should take what one gets: in other words, one should take the rap. However, when you have a Wheat Board which is supposed to work on the principle of orderly marketing and pooling incomes, but tinkers in this situation, you create immense problems. The minister pointed out that backdating the new crop year to July 1 instead of July 31 would be too cumbersome. I agree. That is a cumbersome suggestion and I accept his point of view.

I have a suggestion, however, and perhaps he will consider the possibility of making a payment above the final payment on the crop year, per bushel, out of the funds or revenue to be taken in the new crop year, say in the neighbourhood of 50 cents which would equalize the two. Maybe that is much more radical, but obviously he knows and I know the cause of concern on the Prairies is the idea of taking the two pool accounts and putting them together. I would appreciate the minister's comments on this matter.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fair way in which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) has set forth the problem, and the serious difficulty some farmers feel they are in in comparing their own position with that of others who thought that better prices would be available in the new pool and therefore held their crop. I have one reservation in remaining completely aloof and non-partisan in this particular discussion: that is my need to observe that I believe the reason some people sold their grain in the old pool without thinking there might a better price was that at least some honourable and right honourable members in this House were suggesting that a good deal of grain had been sold two or three years ahead at such low prices that it really did make any difference. They were being rather mislead by this kind of Tory advice.

The real difficulty I see in what the hon. member is suggesting in his own solution, and indeed in any solution that takes money out of one pool and puts it in another, is that this is a law which has stood for a long time in relation to pools. There was a storage opportunity available, but of course not equally available to everybody in the real sense of the word, having regard to small farmers not being quite so able to hold. But I can hardly see taking money which belongs to some farmers under the law, the farmers who are in the new pool, and sharing it with a different group, some who were in and some who were not in one or the other.

I would be glad to consider whether for the future we should look at some such provision which, with adequate notice, would then be fair to apply. It is, of course, the nature of pools that at some point you have to draw a line, and we have chosen the pool instead of the day to day price which exists in the open market. But when it was chosen many years ago it was chosen for a year at a time.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to look at the question for the future as to whether or not we can adopt some formula to protect against this situation that would allow averaging of some sort, but I can hardly see doing it at this point in time, retroactively, when it would be the money of one group of farmers which would have to be applied to a different group in order to make such a formula work.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, on September 11 last I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) whether, in view of the Prime Minister's statement of September 4, consideration was being given by statute or otherwise to increasing the minimum wage. The minister said it was under consideration then.

In reviewing the matter, I find that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) asked approximately the same question of the same minister back in April of this year. The minister then said that the matter was being given consideration. He said then that the matter was "now" under consideration. The word "now" is pretty important. It was being considered for six months or six weeks, depending on how you look at this. Presumably "now" to this government means never.

We have in this country an inflation rate of 8½ per cent. What was a year ago $1.90 is $1.74 today. We have many people working for wages that are pretty small because of the inflation factor, and we have had brought into this House provisions amending the Income Tax Act to provide for people who pay income tax the beneficial results of a reduction in taxes in accordance with the depreciation of the dollar. Recently measures were brought in dealing with increases in the old age pension and the veterans allowance, and on the order paper there is a bill to increase pensions under the Canada Pension Plan and to index those pensions.

However, what I ask the minister tonight is a question about the working poor. What about the man who is trying to support a family on the kind of minimum wage that is set in this country? What happens to him? If he works for 40 hours a week—and that is the work week—he receives $76. That is $304 a month for a four-week month. He receives less than a man and his wife on the old age pension, because in October they will be getting $341 a month.

So we have the ridiculous situation that those receiving social assistance will receive more money than those who work. Indeed, in make-work projects sponsored by this government, such as LIP, the wages are $100 a week. This is considered a wage. But the working poor, the people who do some of the jobs in this country that are not all very pleasant, are treated, collectively, darned poorly.

It is a ridiculous situation when welfare payments made by provinces or welfare payments through various statutes and assistance programs sponsored by this government pay those on social assistance more than those who work. It may be said that the minimum wage does not apply to that many people in this country under federal jurisdiction, but it is up to the federal government to show leadership, and it is indeed a sad reflection on the leadership of this country when the province of British Columbia has a minimum wage of $2.50 an hour, the province of Saskatchewan went up to $2.50 an hour and the province of Ontario has the matter under active consideration while the province of Quebec is providing for a higher minimum wage. I even see that the Board of Trade in the province of New Brunswick is recommending considerably more than the minimum wage offered in this country. It is high time that we had leadership from the federal government, leadership which the nation requires. We cannot develop a work ethic and give people a sense of belonging to a society when we expect them to bend their efforts and their energies for less than we are prepared to pay people who are not required to work.

What we need in this country is a basic minimum pay for those who are working, and it must be in excess of that received by persons on social assistance. It may be that the basic minimum represents more than the productivity of some people in industry. But what is productivity? Who values productivity? In our society it is valued on a competition basis. If we raise the minimum wage across the board, then that is the minimum of competition because they cannot go below it and we destroy the competitive problem. As a result, those who hire labour must pay more than the minimum or at least the minimum.

The whole argument that you are going to go out of business, that you are going to go broke, that somebody will steal your customers, that you cannot make the restaurant go because you have to pay a minimum wage on which a man can live and raise a family, is utter drivel. What we need is leadership. We must have some action from the government. We must have the action that was promised by the minister in April, and promised in September. That action is a statement that something will be done "now".

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, a periodic revision of the minimum wage is provided for under section 35(1.1) of the Canada Labour Code, part III (Labour Standards) which provides as follows:

> ... the governor in council may from time to time, by order, increase the minimum hourly wage established by subsection (1), but no order made under the subsection is of any force or effect until a date is specified in the order that is at least three months after the date of publication thereof in the Canada Gazette.

Thus, the governor in council is empowered under the act to review and increase the minimum wage of workers in industries under federal jurisdiction. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) has already indicated, in replying to a question from the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn), that a revision of the federal minimum wage, which is now $1.90 per hour, is under consideration. A revision of the minimum wage must take account of various social and economic factors including, for example, changes in productivity and changes in the consumer price index. All these factors are now under review in the Department of Labour in consideration of possible revision of the existing federal minimum wage of $1.90.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:20 p.m.

BROADCASTING

TABLING OF SIXTH REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS ON PETITION RESPECTING ADVERTISING ON CHILDREN'S PROGRAMS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the sixth report of the Clerk of Petitions.

The report was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

The Clerk of Petitions has the honour to report that he has examined the petition of Mrs. Ann Young, Mrs. Marilyn Lister and Mrs. Natalie MacPhee, all of the city of Ottawa, Ontario, in relation to broadcast advertising directed exclusively to children and advertising directed to children from American programming distributed on the Canadian cable systems, presented by Mr. James A. McGrath, Member of Parliament, on Tuesday, October 23, 1973, and finds that the petition meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members have heard, the Clerk has read the report of the Clerk of Petitions which indicates that the petition in question, presented to the House by Mrs. Marilyn Lister, Mrs. Natalie MacPhee and Mrs. Ann Young, in relation to broadcast advertising meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

I owe it to the hon. member for St. John's East and to the House to indicate that I have strong reservations as to the acceptability of the petition on substantive grounds. As I am sure the hon. member knows, there are precedents to the effect that the House should not interfere by way of petition in a matter in which jurisdiction has been assigned by parliament to another body. If the hon. member has any comments to make for the guidance of the Chair I would be pleased to hear him.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of Bill C-22, an act to amend the Broadcasting Act, was referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. That committee reported a list of five recommendations to the House on July 16. Two of the recommendations are set out in the body of the petition. These recommendations were that the Canadian Radio-Television Commission should pass certain regulations.

Section 16(1) of the Broadcasting Act states in part:

In furtherance of its objects, the Commission, on the recommendation of the Executive Committee, may . . .

(b) make regulations applicable to all persons holding broadcasting licences . . .

(ii) respecting the character of advertising and the amount of time that may be devoted to advertising—

So, Mr. Speaker, the House by way of legislation has already given this power to the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. The chairman of that commission said, when he appeared before the Standing Committee:

If parliament, as a result of the studies of the committee, comes to the conclusion that a fundamental principle is involved and that, no matter what the other circumstances may be, the basic objectives of Canadian broadcasting should preclude children's advertising, the commission will, as it should, implement this objective as it has to implement other fundamental objectives contained in the Broadcasting Act.

The first recommendation of the committee was that the CRTC should pass regulations which would provide that advertising must not be directed exclusively to children.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the committee stated in its report:

However, it is the opinion of your committee that any code, regardless how excellent in itself, would need a much tougher enforcement system . . . your committee feels . . . that a CRTC regulation should be brought into effect in order to enforce a new and more restrictive code.

There is no other recourse but by way of petition to this House to bring to the attention of the House that the CRTC, which draws its authority from parliament, not from the government, and answers to parliament, is ignoring the unanimous recommendations of parliament because, Mr. Speaker, the report of the broadcasting committee, with the five recommendations contained therein, was concurred in by the House on July 24.

On October 16 the commission made a statement in which it said it would not proceed by way of regulations but would rely entirely on the broadcasting code. Furthermore, the commission in its statement of October 16 ignored the second most important recommendation of the committee, that dealing with American television advertising directed at children and coming into Canada under the cable system.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Radio-Television Commission has the authority given to it by parliament under the Broadcasting Act in section 16, as I have already set out. The House of Commons, by way of concurrence in the committee's report, recommends to the commission that it proceed to implement regulations under the Broadcasting Act. The commission, for reasons unknown, ignores the recommendation of the House.

I am hoping that somehow Your Honour will find this petition in order and that the House will be disposed to consent to have this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts where Mr. Juneau, the chairman of the commission, can appear and explain to the committee why he chose to ignore the unanimous recommendation of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his comments but, with respect, perhaps I should point out to him that they did not refer very much to the procedural difficulty with which I am faced. In fact, it may be that the comments of the hon. member substantiate the suggestion I have made that it is difficult for the House to consider by way of petition a matter over which jurisdiction has specifically been referred by parliament to another body.

These are the precedents which have been quoted from time to time in the House in similar circumstances in the past. I am sure hon. members will appreciate that in relation to petitions, which is a very ancient and historical right, the Chair must exercise all care and attention to ensure that petitions, when they are in order and acceptable from a procedural standpoint, should be given an opportunity to be considered and referred, if necessary, to the appropriate committee. But I must tell the hon. member, with the greatest respect, that I do not see how I can overlook the precedents, to which I should like to refer briefly.

I refer hon. members to a precedent reported on page 163 of the Journals of the House for Thursday, February 16, 1956. It was ruled that the petition was irregular in that it did not set forth a case in which the House had jurisdiction to interfere, since parliament had vested in the Governor in Council and in the Minister of Transport the exclusive authority to approve and issue licences for the operation of private television stations. That ruling also referred to a citation from May's Parliamentary Practice, 15th edition, at page 814. That citation is brought forward into the 18th edition at page 795.

A more recent precedent is recorded on page 2921 of Hansard for June 7, 1972. I would also refer hon. members to Dawson's Procedure in the Canadian House of Commons, page 241, which I might read briefly:

> A petition must, of course, relate to a matter over which parliament has control. In a federal country this stipulation limits at once the range of subjects which may be raised. The House will not receive a petition relating to a matter which has been delegated to another body. Ever since 1874 when it gave the courts its privilege of judging controverted elections, the Commons has refused to receive petitions which related to such electoral problems. On a more recent occasion a matter which had, by statute, been allocated to a public corporation was judged to be beyond the authority of the House and a petition which requested interference by the House was rejected.

In the petition now before us the petitioners complain that certain recommendations of the House were not implemented by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. The recommendations in question are contained in the second report of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts presented to the House on July 16, 1973. The report recommended that consideration be given to the advisability of certain action being taken by the CRTC. It seems clear to me that the grievance has reference to a matter over which jurisdiction has been delegated by parliament to the CRTC. In this respect I suggest it is not open to the Chair to disregard the well established practice of the House and the precedents to which I have referred.

I appreciate the position of the hon. member and his suggestion that this is a matter which ought to be considered either by the House or by a committee of the House. I respectfully suggest to him, however, that the procedure which should be adopted should be some procedure other than a petition. With regret, I can assure the hon. member, after having given the matter much thought and consideration I find I have to rule that the petition cannot be considered.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the petition, not with respect to your ruling. Standing Order 67(8) says:

> No debate shall be permitted on the report but a petition referred to therein may be read by the Clerk of the House at the Table, if required.

I suggest, in view of the discussion of this petition that has taken place and in view of the general interest in it, that its full text should be placed on the pages of Hansard. If the Clerk of the House will read the petition, that will put it on Hansard, or perhaps the House might consent to it being inserted in Hansard as if the Clerk had read it to us.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may be acceptable to the House by consent. It must be appreciated, however, that, in view of the ruling of the Chair the petition is not before the House. It has not been received and, therefore, if it has not been received it cannot be read. There are precedents to support this suggestion. At the same time, I understand that there is general interest in the matter. I judge this to be so from the questions that have been asked and the debate that has taken place in past days and weeks. If there is consent, I am sure that from the point of view of the Chair there would be no difficulty about requesting the unanimous consent of the House to have the petition inserted in Hansard as though it had been read. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The petition referred to above follows.]

TO THE HONOURABLE THE COMMONS OF CANADA IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED

THE HUMBLE PETITION of the undersigned Canadians, resident in Canada, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable house will therefor provide a remedy,

SHEWETH:

THAT, on the 24th July 1973, your honourable house was pleased to concur in the Second Report of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, presented to your honourable house on the 16th July 1973, as by reference to the Journals of your honourable house will more fully appear;

THAT your honourable house, in so concurring, recommended that consideration be given to the advisability of taking whatever action is necessary to accomplish, inter alia, the following objectives:

(a) that the Canadian Radio-Television Commission pass regulations which will provide that advertising must not be directed exclusively to children; and

(b) that the Canadian Radio-Television Commission require the deletion of advertising directed to children from American programming distributed on the Canadian cable systems.

THAT, on the 16th October 1973, the Canadian Radio-Television Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "CRTC") publicly announced that the Canadian Association of Broadcasters had amended, effective the 1st October 1973, the Broadcast Code for Advertising to Children, and that

(i) the Code, as so amended, meets the requirements and preoccupations of the CRTC concerning advertising to children;

(ii) the CRTC will ensure that the methods and procedures used to enforce the Code are effective; and

(iii) if it should become evident during the coming months that the Code is not providing satisfactory control, the CRTC will take regulatory action.

THAT your honourable house did concur in the recommendations hereinbefore recited knowing of, despite and notwithstanding the said Code, as so amended, as the following comment extracted from the said Second Report confirms:

"In the wake of your Committee's study . . . The Canadian Association of Broadcasters, by its own volition, tightened up their Code;

"However, it is the opinion of your Committee that any Code, regardless how excellent in itself, would need a much tougher enforcement system . . . your Committee feels . . . that a CRTC regulation (should) be brought into effect in order to enforce a new and more restricting Code.";

THAT the public announcement of the CRTC, hereinbefore cited, makes no reference whatsoever to action taken or abstained from by the CRTC with respect to advertising directed to children from American programming distributed on the Canadian cable systems;

THAT it appears from the matters hereinbefore recited and set out that the CRTC has wilfully failed to implement the aforesaid recommendations of your honourable house and has wilfully pursued a course that has been explicitly rejected by your honourable house;

THAT your petitioners, as well for themselves as for other Canadians resident in Canada, are personally aggrieved thereby by reason that they and each of them are interfered with and are prejudiced in their and each of their private enjoyment of a public right;

THAT this grievance, so caused, presently exists and will continue to exist for so long as the recommendations of your honourable house are not implemented by the CRTC and, moreover, is a grievance that is aggravated during this pre-Christmas season;

THAT therefore the grievance of your petitioners is a present personal grievance requiring an immediate remedy;

THAT except by petition to your honourable house no remedy is available to your petitioners whereby they may obtain relief from this grievance;

WHEREFORE your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable house will find means of prevailing upon the CRTC:

1. forthwith to make regulations to provide that broadcast advertising must not be directed exclusively to children; and

2. forthwith to make regulations to require the deletion of advertising directed to children from American programming distributed on the Canadian cable systems; and that your honourable house will provide such further and other relief in the premises as to your honourable house seems just and meet.

AND your petitioners, as in duty bound, now prayeth and will ever pray.

AND your petitioners have, and each of them hath, signed at the City of Ottawa, in the Province of Ontario, this 23rd day of October, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Nine Hundred and Seventy-Three.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Third report of Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs—Mr. Herbert.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL-MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF FEDERAL BACKGROUND PAPERS AND STATEMENTS AT SECOND TRI-LEVEL CONFERENCE

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table in both official languages the Federal background papers and statements from the second national tri-level conference held in Edmonton this week relating to the management of growth, housing and land strategy, urban transportation and public finance.

ALLEGED DIVERSION OF OIL SHIPMENTS DESTINED TO CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a motion of national importance. In view of the fact that multinational oil companies are diverting to the United States shipments of Middle East oil and also as of today, according to my understanding, Venezuelan oil originally destined for eastern Canada, and in view of Venezuela's reported desire to deal directly with the Canadian government on oil matters, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instructs the government to introduce legislation as soon as possible to establish a publicly-owned Canada Petroleum Corporation which would have, among other powers, exclusive jurisdiction over the importation of crude oil into Canada.

Mr. Speaker: This motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Public Service

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

CALLING OF COMMITTEE TO DEAL WITH WIRETAPPING BILL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity relating to continued delays in the calling of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to deal with the wiretapping bill.

● (1420)

My motion has been made necessary as a result of the refusal since October 15 of the committee chairman and vice-chairman to call a meeting of the committee despite requests from the opposition parties. This delay has been brought about apparently with the concurrence of the government, which may now have reservations about proceeding—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was recognized for the purpose of indicating which motion he would like considered by unanimous consent. He is not allowed to submit argument in support of the motion.

Mr. Atkey: In view of recent unfortunate events involving unauthorized illegal electronic surveillance, I move seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. O'Connor):

That this House request the chairman or vice-chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to call a meeting of that committee at the earliest opportunity to complete consideration of Bill C-176 as a matter of urgency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member proposes a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. It requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion, therefore, cannot be put.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SALARY OFFER TO CLERKS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an urgent situation, namely the ridiculous wage offers made by Treasury Board to clerical employees of the Public Service of Canada who earn about $5,000 a year and, consequently, cannot make both ends meet.

I move therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House request of the government, through Treasury Board, an order that the senior officials involved show judgment and realism in the division of the CR group wages so as to grant increases similar to those received by most civil servants and thus consistent with cost of living increases.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion of the hon. member cannot therefore be put.

PROPOSED MOVEMENT OF ALASKAN OIL THROUGH JUAN DE FUCA STRAIT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the announcement yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) of the establishment of a Canada-United States joint committee to exchange information on national energy and planning and the co-ordination of energy resources, and in view of the present government's failure to obtain any agreement which would avoid movement of tanker traffic through the Strait of Juan de Fuca to Cherry Point, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources withdraw from negotiations on all matters of energy planning with the United States until we receive assurance and agreement that Alaskan oil will not be transported through the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

RAILWAY ACT

PROVISION FOR APPLICATIONS RESPECTING COMMUTER TRAIN SERVICES

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-225, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to permit applications in accordance with subsections 2 to 7 of Section 261 of the Railway Act with respect to commuter train services. The bill is designed to encourage the provinces to develop satisfactory commuter rail services in order to humanize the business of getting to work and to relieve some of the pressure on our environment.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INCOME TAX ACT

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

September 5, 1973—Mr. Reynolds—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act".

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member is aware, the Chair has serious reservations about the procedural acceptability of the hon. member's bill. I gather he would like to submit argument at this time and perhaps he could be heard for that purpose. I would remind hon. members, however, that we shall have to ring the bells for the division on the motion under the special order in about three minutes.

Mr. Reynolds: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I shall not take much time. I presented my argument to you in writing and I do not wish to take up the time of the House now by reading that argument, because it is quite lengthy. I am quite prepared to let my argument stand and perhaps resubmit the matter in the form of a motion.

Mr. Speaker: I have given serious thought to the argument submitted by the hon. member. I believe it should be sufficient to indicate to him that in 100 years or more of practice in the House of Commons there has never been a bill accepted similar to the one put forward by the hon. member. There is one instance when an attempt was made to propose such a bill and it was ruled out of order on the ground I have mentioned previously. The Chair appreciates the hon. member's co-operation and his suggestion that the subject matter might be presented to the House by way of a motion rather than a bill.

BELL CANADA

Question No. 2,034—Mr. Boisvert:

Does Bell Canada receive money from the government under any scheme?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): No.

Order Paper Questions

PRIVY COUNCIL

Question No. 2,302—Mr. Alexander:

1. Who are the present members of the Privy Council?

2. How many times has the Privy Council met since, and including, 1967?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. Members of the Privy Council include all Cabinet Ministers and former Ministers, ex-Speakers of both Houses, the Chief Justice, ex-Chief Justices, and various distinguished citizens who have been appointed to it. Membership is for life. The members of the Privy Council are listed in the 1973 edition of the Parliamentary Guide at pp. 29-31. Since the time of publication, the following Privy Councillors have died: the Hon. Henry Herbert Stevens, the Rt. Hon. Louis Stephen St. Laurent, the Hon. Joseph Jean, the Hon. James M. Macdonnell, the Hon. Leslie M. Frost. There have been no appointments to the Privy Council since the publication of the 1973 Parliamentary Guide.

2. The British North America Act provides for a "Queen's Privy Council for Canada", appointed by the Governor-General to "aid and advise" him. In fact, this body as such seldom meets, and then only on very special occasions. For example in 1947 a formal meeting of the Privy Council was held to hear the King's message giving consent to the marriage of Princess Elizabeth. In 1952 a meeting was held to hear the proclamation consequent on the death of George VI and the accession of Queen Elizabeth. In 1952 the Privy Council met, with the Administrator presiding, for the induction of the former Governor General, Lord Alexander, as a Privy Councillor. In 1959 the Queen held a Council in Halifax attended by Privy Councillors in the government where Prince Philip was also present. The cabinet, which is a "Committee of the Privy Council", normally meets once a week. From the beginning of 1967 to the end of June 1973, it met 535 times. There are several cabinet committees which also meet frequently. A "Special Committee of the Privy Council" meets to adopt Orders in Council and it has met 486 times between the beginning of 1967 and the end of June 1973.

INTERCONNECTION BETWEEN TELEX AND TWX IN CANADA

Question No. 2,603—Mr. Bawden:

Is it the intention of the Minister of Communications to consider a requirement that Telex and TWX in Canada provide interconnection between their systems, in view of the fact that this has been done in the United States and that Canada has in fact two major communications networks which cannot contact each other?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): The government is currently formulating a communications policy for Canada, based upon consideration and discussion of the proposals outlined in the Position Paper of March 1973. The issue of interconnection between Telex and TWX networks in Canada is being examined within the framework of this process. In this respect there has to be recognized an interest on the part of the provinces, particularly those having jurisdiction over telephone companies offering TWX service.

*GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO MEMBERS OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Question No. 2,613—Mr. Forrestall:

What steps are being taken by the government to provide a measure of protection and assistance to members of the Canadian Armed Forces stationed in the Federal Republic of Germany, who face not only inflation in basic living costs, but who have also seen a reduction of the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar, in which they are paid, due to the revaluations of the mark?

Hon. James A. Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The steps taken by the government to provide protection and assistance to members of the Canadian Armed Forces stationed in Germany against the combined effects of inflation and currency revaluation are as follows: (a) An index was established to measure the relationship between price levels in Ottawa, and price levels in Lahr, and Baden-Baden, Germany. (b) This index is computed each month. (c) A variation of the index by five points results in an immediate payment of a salary equalization adjustment to personnel stationed in Germany. For those personnel not living in married quarters an additional equalization adjustment is made to their living-out allowances. From May to August 1973 the index increased thirty points and salary equalization adjustments were increased progressively to a current level of $107.70 per month for a corporal and by $255 per month for a lieutenant-colonel. From January to August 1973, the living-out allowance adjustment increased from $50 per month to $105 for a corporal, and from $76 per month to $158 for a lieutenant-colonel.

GOVERNMENT POLICY OF PLACING HARDENED CRIMINALS IN MINIMUM SECURITY

Question No. 2,651—Mr. Reynolds:

Does the government intend to continue to maintain its policy of placing hardened criminals, particularly those on the RCMP most wanted list, in minimum security institutions and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): It was never the policy of the Canadian Penitentiary Service to initially place the type of person alluded to above in a minimum security institution. Individuals who at any time have been on the RCMP most wanted list, are, upon admission to a penitentiary, incarcerated in maximum security institutions. Transfers to reduced security are only effected where there is sufficient evidence to support the probability that the individual concerned will function satisfactorily in a reduced security institution, coupled with due consideration of the security risk involved in all such transfers. The Classification Staff, in considering inmates for transfer to medium security from maximum security, weigh carefully all facets of the individual inmate's character. The inmate must be considered to be unlikely to make an active attempt to escape, to pose little threat to the community should he escape, and that he would benefit from the program of a medium security institution. In considering an inmate for transfer to minimum security, he must be judged as presenting little likelihood of attempting to escape, pose no threat to the community in the event he does escape and is capable of benefiting from the program of the minimum security institution for which he is being considered.

TECHNICAL AID TO CUBA

Question No. 2,662—Mr. Dick:

With respect to the announcement by the government in January, 1973 of its intention to invest one million dollars in a program of technical aid to Cuba (a) from what source of funds will the moneys be made available to send professors to Cuba (b) what will be the specific functions of these professors in Cuba (c) will the government of Cuba be sending professors to Canada as part of the same program?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): (a) The sources of funds for the program of technical co-operation with Cuba are the parliamentary appropriations Vote 30 for fiscal year 1972/73 and Vote 25 for fiscal year 1973/74. (b) Canadian engineering professors will be teaching approximately 118 short-term courses, of four to six weeks duration, during the three-year life of the project. These courses are part of a program leading to the MSc (Eng.) in the fields of Civil, Electrical Industrial, Mechanical and Chemical engineering. (c) The government of Cuba will be sending approximately 90 Cuban students for short-term training (periods of four to six weeks), to consult on research work and thesis matters as part of this program. Cuba will not send professors to Canada.

CONFEDERATION BUILDING—COST OF REFURNISHING

Question No. 2,679—Mr. Stevens:

1. What was the total cost of refurnishing the Confederation Building?

2. To whom and for what amount were contracts signed for such furnishings?

3. To what extent, if any, were amounts finally paid or payable in excess of the initial contract prices and to whom were the amounts paid or payable?

4. For what reasons was the work not put out to tender?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): 1. The total cost of refurnishing the Confederation Building was $607,407.47.

2. The following firms were awarded furnishings contracts for the total amounts indicated:

Metalsmiths Co. Ltd., Don Mills, Ontario	$ 70,429.05
Sunar Industries Ltd., Toronto, Ontario	2,739.60
Taylor-Evans Ltd., Montreal, Quebec	4,050.00
Foto Blohm Assoc. Ltd., Ottawa, Ontario	291.70
Anna Warner Lamp Co., Toronto, Ontario	3,426.00
Central Marketing Services, Ottawa, Ontario	1,715.00
Interiors International, Toronto, Ontario	81,063.33
Eric Jensen Greenhouse, Agincourt, Ontario	19,403.00
Craftwood Products, Scarborough, Ontario	18,625.60
Bostlund Industries Ltd., Oak Ridges, Ontario	640.30
Office Specialty Ltd., Ottawa, Ontario	1,854.00
Canadian Guild of Potters, Toronto, Ontario	948.00
Sunar Industries Ltd., Ottawa, Ontario	1,237.20
Taevan International, Toronto, Ontario	3,306.00
G. W. Furniture Ltd., Montreal, Quebec	40,139.76
Leif Jacobsen Limited, Willowdale, Ontario	10,533.48
Sunar Industries Limited, Montreal, Quebec	41,099.40
Klaus Nienkamper Ltd., Toronto, Ontario	7,050.00
Business Accessories Ltd., Toronto, Ontario	4,230.00
Steelcase Canada Ltd., Don Mills, Ontario	68,171.60
Du Barry Furniture Ltd., Toronto, Ontario	5,426.40
Concept Furniture International Ltd., Toronto, Ontario	47,512.32

Furniture Forum Ltd., Ottawa, Ontario	652.00
Standard Desk Ltd., Laval, Quebec	19,293.79
Office Specialty Ltd., Toronto, Ontario	61,268.00
Primavera Interior Accessories Ltd., Toronto, Ontario	950.40
Gabriel Textiles Ltd., Montreal, Quebec	20,863.55
Supply and Services—modular stock items ± 5,903.99	70,487.99

3. A contract with Craftwood Products of Scarborough at the initial price of $17,227.60 was increased by $1,398, for a revised price of $18,625.60, to provide for installation and transportation charges originally omitted.

4. Tenders were not called for the furnishings because of the limited time available between the date of the treasury board decision of May 18, 1972 to renovate the Confederation Building for House of Commons accommodation and the proposal for occupancy in October 1972. It was not possible to determine requirements, call public tenders and achieve delivery of the furnishings by that date. Following consultation with the Department of Supply and Services it was agreed that furniture selections should be made on the basis of the capability of individual firms to meet the delivery schedule at competitive market prices.

IMMIGRATION—MR. JOGINDER SINGH SANDHU AND MR. LEHMBER SINGH BHANGAL

Question No. 2,680—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Would Mr. Joginder Singh Sandhu and Mr. Lehmber Singh Bhangal, citizens of India, deported as illegal immigrants on December 17, 1972, be eligible under the amended immigration regulations to come forward and apply for landed immigrant status?

2. Will the government agree to reconsider its refusal to refund the $2,000 bond posted by Mr. Ajit Singh Gill of Smiths Falls, Ontario on behalf of Mr. Joginder Singh Sandhu and Mr. Lehmber Singh Bhangal when they first entered Canada as tourists and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Presuming that the reference to amended immigration regulations relates to the current adjustment of status program, the answer is no. This program is applicable only to individuals who were in Canada on November 30, 1972 and have remained in this country continuously since that date. However, the men in question may apply for immigrant visas at a Canadian Immigration office abroad but would have to meet the normal immigrant requirements. They would also require ministerial consent to their return under section 35 of the Immigration Act.

2. No. Messrs. Sandhu and Bhangal were allowed into Canada as tourists provided that they deposited a cash bond of $1,000 each to ensure that they would leave Canada on or before a specified date. Both men were fully aware that failure to leave by that date would result in estreatment of the bonds. They both failed to fulfil this condition and the bonds were estreated.

STATISTICS CANADA

Question No. 2,706—Mr. Gauthier (Roberval):

1. What are the names of the directors of Statistics Canada?

2. What are the names and addresses of the investigators of Statistics Canada assigned to projects in the constituency of Roberval?

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: 1. The names and titles of the members of the Statistics Canada Executive are as follows: Dr. Sylvia Ostry, Chief Statistician of Canada; Mr. V. R. Berlinguette, Assistant Chief Statistician of Canada, (Business Statistics); Mr. A. Boisvert, Assistant Chief Statistician of Canada, (Marketing Services); Dr. I. P. Fellegi, Assistant Chief Statistician of Canada, (Statistical Services); Dr. P. G. Kirkham, Assistant Chief Statistician of Canada, (Economic Accounts and Integration); Mr. R. A. Wallace, Assistant Chief Statistician of Canada, (Census); Mr. L. E. Rowebottom, Assistant Chief Statistician of Canada, (Household and Institutional Statistics); Mr. G. R. Labossière, Director General, (Administration); Mr. D. A. Worton, Director General, (Policy, Planning and Control).

2. The names and addresses of Statistics Canada interviewers in the constituency of Roberval, as of September 18, 1973 are: Mrs. G. Boivin, 455 St. Cyrille St., Normandin, Que.; Mrs. C. Lavoie, Rang 6, St. Prime, Que.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

Is the government currently undertaking any definitive studies of the advantages or otherwise in terms of cost-benefit analysis of nuclear energy for industrial and municipal use and, if so (a) to what level has funding been appropriated for this fiscal year (b) what is the present status of such studies (c) on what date can they be expected to be made public?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): A study is being undertaken by the Ministry of State for Science and Technology, in collaboration with other interested departments, to assess the impact of certain industrial and municipal uses of nuclear energy. (a) The ministry has appropriated $16,000 for this fiscal year. (b) A preliminary report is currently being prepared with the final report to be completed by the end of fiscal year 1973-74. (c) The findings of this study can be expected to be made public during the fiscal year 1974-75.

COST OF PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT TO CHINA

Question No. 2,955—Mr. Stackhouse:

What is the total cost of the Prime Minister's tour and visit to the People's Republic of China, including the costs of all those travelling with him?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The actual costs which would include the return expenses are not known at this time.

PAIT GRANT TO COLLINS RADIO CANADA LTD., TORONTO, ONTARIO

Question No. 2,075—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What was the value of the PAIT grant to Collins Radio Canada Ltd. of Toronto, Ontario to develop single side band marine radio?

2. Is Collins Radio Canada Ltd. controlled by shareholders in the United States?

3. Is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce aware that the same radio mentioned in Part 1 was already developed and in production by Triton Industries Ltd. of Richmond, British Columbia, a wholly-owned Canadian company?

4. Was one of the reasons Collins Radio Canada Ltd. received their PAIT grant because they have received a Canadian Coast Guard contract from the Department of Transport for approximately two million dollars?

5. For what reason did the government award a contract to Collins Radio Canada Ltd., of Toronto for the single side band marine radio when Collins had not developed the radio while a Canadian company already had the item ready for sale?

6. (a) Was a letter dated January 31, 1972 sent by Mr. J. C. Dobby, Engineering Procurement Officer, Electrical and Electronics Branch, Division No. 1, Department of Supply and Services to Mr. W. Courage, Director of Marketing, Triton Industries Ltd. and, if so, what information was provided concerning the listing of Triton Industries Ltd. as a potential source of SSB communications equipment (b) was Triton Industries Ltd. allowed to tender and, if not, for what reason?

7. Was a letter dated April 23, 1971, sent by Mr. R. J. D. Brown, Acting Chief, Purchases and Contracts, Department of Transport to Mr. W. Courage and, if so, what information was provided concerning the listing of Triton Industries Ltd. as a potential supplier of SSB communications equipment?

8. Is this a violation of the government tendering process and, if so, for what reason?

9. Will the Minister cancel the original tender and re-submit it for bidding?

Return tabled.

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed, from Monday, October 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: It being two thirty o'clock, pursuant to the special order of Monday, October 22, 1973, it is my duty to interrupt proceedings now before the House and put forthwith the question on the motion for third reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Allmand) which was agreed to on the following division:

And the Clerk proceeding to announce the result of the division:

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I intended to vote the other way but in the confusion of the free vote I misplaced my vote.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might allow the Chair first to hear the result of the division and then, with the consent of the House, we will see what can be done to correct the record.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I respectfully suggest that if the results are announced and we then go back to change the votes cast confusion might result. It would be more desirable to make the changes first. This is an entirely new procedure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might consider one point of order at a time. I think hon. members know there is a considerable body of precedents to indicate that once a vote is cast it should not be changed unless with the consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I know that this is a very important vote and all hon. members, individually, on both sides of the House are anxious to ensure that they have an opportunity to register their votes in the way they intended to. It is perhaps as a result of confusion in this type of voting that a mistake can be made. If it is the wish of hon. members that the record be corrected immediately, certainly the Chair has no objection.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I think that in fairness to all hon. members this is what should be done because hon. members will notice that it is at the start of recording votes to the left of the Chair that this mistake occurred in the case of three hon. members.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish my vote to be recorded as against the bill.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I wish my vote to be recorded as against the bill.

And the Clerk having announced the result of the division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: I believe that when we interrupted the proceedings at 2.30 p.m. we had reached the item, notices of motions for the production of papers.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, when the bells rang I was about to rise on a point of order in connection with question No. 2425 which has been on the order paper since June 28 and has not yet been answered. I appeal to the minister responsible to have the officials of his department prepare the required answer at an early date.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, on July 19 I placed starred question No. 2543 on the order paper, with regard to Air Canada centralizing its computer services at Dorval. I believe that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Guay) have an obligation to see to it that Air Canada provides an answer to this very important question. It is almost four months since I placed the question on the order paper. We are entitled to a firm answer from Air Canada on this matter.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, while these notices have been allowed to stand, I would like to point to two motions I have placed before the House, Nos. 241 and 242, on September 12, almost a month and a half ago. The first was:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the guest list for the Prime Minister's reception on August 7, 1973, at the National Arts Centre in honour of Her Majesty the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh.

The second was for an order of the House for the guest list for a dinner given by the government in Calgary in honour of Her Majesty the Queen.

I am not affected by either one, but the government has the record. It knows exactly who were present. It is holding back the answer. I would like to know who are the politically select and who are the rejected.

ENERGY

OIL—ALLEGED DIVERSION OF TANKERS DESTINED TO EASTERN CANADIAN PORTS—ASSURANCE BY COMPANIES THIS WILL NOT HAPPEN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has he been able to confirm that oil tankers destined for eastern Canada have recently been diverted and, if so, whether these tankers are now on their way to eastern Canadian ports or are still being diverted to other ports?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, further to my telegram yesterday I have had replies from Canadian refiners, particularly the two refiners mentioned by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville yesterday. In both cases the Canadian firms categorically deny that there was any diversion of tankers, saying that in both cases if it had been done by their affiliated companies they would have been advised, and that there has been no interruption in shipments. In relation to the allegation by the hon. member in regard to Imperial Oil, and his suggestion that a shipment from the Arab states was diverted, I should say that in fact Imperial advises that all of its oil stock comes from Venezuela.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, last week the minister met with representatives of the major oil companies. At that meeting did he seek any assurance and, if so, did he receive any assurance that tankers destined for Canada would not be diverted? I ask this particularly in the context of the Arab states in the Middle East having cut their deliveries to the United States.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Sir, I sought that assurance. The companies in question indicated that, of course, this would be subject to whatever sanctions might apply at the point of shipment. I have since been advised that a shipment to one company at least, to Portland for transit to Montreal, has been held up by the Arab states.

OIL—POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF CANADA IN CURTAILMENT OF DELIVERIES BY ARAB STATES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand from this reply that the Arab oil states are now reducing deliveries of oil to Canada and that Canada is now definitely included in the list of countries to which deliveries from the Arab states are being reduced as a matter of government policy in those states?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated we have heard of one shipment that has been interrupted. Through diplomatic means we are trying to define with a little more clarity the positions of the various shipping states with regard to Canada.

OIL—ALLEGED DIVERSION FROM CANADA OF TANKER BY EXXON—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of more information I received this afternoon from officials within Imperial Oil that Exxon is buying Venezuelan oil on Canadian accounts and then diverting that oil, with their own marine tankers, to American ports, can the minister say whether or not he is carrying out an independent investigation personally or whether he is just relying on the telegram to the particular oil company?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any way in which I could have access to Exxon's accounts. I would have to say that Imperial Oil Company assures me that there have not been any diversions from their account and that all shipments are coming to Canada from Venezuela.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact I have information from officials of the company that a confidential memo was sent from Exxon in New York, and also from Texaco, New York, to their Toronto based companies referring to some of these issues, and also in light of the fact I am informed that Texaco is prepared or almost prepared to admit diverting at least one oil tanker, can the minister say what sanctions or other action he has in mind to prevent any diversion of this sort, be it by Exxon or by a Canadian subsidiary?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, at a time when we are pushing to get the maximum number of shipments into the Canadian market, I am not sure that sanctions against a particular company would be effective. I am faced really with a conflict of credibility between the source that the hon. member is relying on and the assurance given to me directly. All I can say at this stage is that I will repeat his allegation to the company.

POSSIBLE LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH PUBLICLY OWNED PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I would like to ask the minister whether or not, in view of the present crisis in oil internationally, he is considering introducing legislation to establish a publicly owned petroleum corporation that would have, among other powers, jurisdiction over imports of crude oil into this country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): That is a question under consideration—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —although I cannot see any way in which such legislation would be available at this time. It is not so much the ingress of the commodity into Canada as its egress from the supplying states that is the problem.

REQUEST THAT SALARY OFFER TO CLERKS BE INCREASED

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the hon. President of the Treasury Board.

In view of the fact that his department has granted $3,000 and $4,000 increases to hundreds of executives in the Public Service, can the hon. minister tell us whether he intends to seriously consider the 12 per cent salary increase requested by the 40,000 CR employees who are unable to balance their budgets with a salary of $5,000 a year?

Hon. Charles M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are negotiating with several groups of these employees in order to sign collective agreements.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, would the minister consider cutting out some of the fat and waste in the upper echelons of the public service so there would be more money available for these clerks?

ENERGY

ELIMINATION OF TARIFF ON PETROLEUM PRODUCTS—ASSURANCE THAT SAVINGS WILL BE PASSED ON TO CONSUMER

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the fact that elimination of customs duty will mean a cut of one-third to one cent per gallon on certain petroleum products, what measures is the minister taking to ensure that these savings will be passed on to consumers?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. gentleman knows, Mr. Speaker, we are in close contact with the industry, particularly in eastern Canada, with regard to its products, and we will make a point of making certain that the reduction in the cost of any shipments coming in after this point will be reflected in the price.

OIL EXPORT TAX—POSSIBILITY OF SIMILAR LEVY ON OTHER FORMS OF ENERGY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): In view of the export tax on oil, is the government considering implementing an export tax on electricity, coal and other forms of energy?

Oral Questions

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with the other forms of energy we have not had the dramatic increase in price due to international events that has occurred with petroleum.

EMERGENCY MEASURES ORGANIZATION

REDUCTION IN FUNDS—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of National Defence concerns the recent declaration in the rather jigsaw defence policy announced by the minister of a reduction in the Emergency Measures Organization which was set up under my administration. Was that done after consultation with the provinces? Why was this cut made in this organization that has brought together people in all parts of the country whose devotion to the public good has been excellent, as shown recently in connection with the floods in New Brunswick and the gas leak in Alberta?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there will be no cut until the next fiscal year and therefore there will be plenty of opportunity for consultation with the provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am simply asking about what was in the report given by the minister. Is there not to be any cut? Is that the answer? If so, then it is the very reverse of what the minister announced so flagrantly when he said what the new defence policy was going to be. I simply ask this: is it a fact that there will be no reduction?

Mr. Richardson: No, Mr. Speaker. The program I announced envisaged a cut beginning in the next fiscal year in emergency measures payments from the federal government to the provinces, but as I have just indicated we will have plenty of opportunity to discuss that with the provincial governments in the intervening months.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the intervening months will the minister put an end to this suggestion which has no justification whatsoever?

COMBINES

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF INQUIRY INTO OIL INDUSTRY AND PRICE OF GASOLINE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can the minister inform the House when the inquiry will be completed by the Combines Branch into the oil industry and particularly the pricing of gasoline in this country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to check with the acting director and see what information I can give the hon. member.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Mr. Lawrence: In view of the urgency of the matter and in view of the fact that on February 15 the minister assured the House that it had top priority, can the minister not do better than that and can he also assure the House that the public will be informed of the contents of the report when it is made?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, it is the practice of the Combines Branch to inform the public of the results of their investigation either through the director's annual report or action in the courts. With respect to the first part of the question, the director, an official with a high degree of autonomy, is aware of the interest of the House and the public in completing this inquiry at the earliest possible date. I will ensure that he continues to be aware of this interest.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PASSING ON OF BENEFITS OF CORPORATE TAX AND CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCE REDUCTIONS TO CONSUMERS—RESULTS OF QUESTIONNAIRE TO MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the assurance given by the minister that the benefits from corporate tax reductions and capital cost reductions would be passed on to consumers in the form of lower prices, is the minister now in a position to provide that evidence to the House from the results of the questionnaire he sent to manufacturers?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the questionnaire has not been completed but it is furnishing the information that will form the substance of the report which I gave an undertaking to the House to table before the end of March.

Mr. Saltsman: May I ask the minister whether the information that will be provided by the questionnaire will distinguish between capital cost allowances and corporate tax reductions? Also, can the minister tell the House whether the information was requested on a voluntary or compulsory basis and whether the information that is to be provided was under the condition of truth as outlined in the Statistics Act?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the questionnaire was prepared by Statistics Canada and of course is being requested on a voluntary basis. There is nothing in the law to compel a reply. I am assured, however, that the questionnaires will constitute a very valid survey of the effects of these corporate tax reductions.

Some hon. Members: Rubbish!

TRANSPORT

REDUCTION IN SERVICE BY DIGBY-SAINT JOHN FERRY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and had given him notice. In his absence perhaps I might address it to the Prime Minister. There is a matter of urgency in southwestern Nova Scotia with regard to the forthcoming cancellation of trips of the Princess of Acadia, the ferry running from Digby to Saint John, with substantial losses to the economy of southwestern Nova Scotia and Saint John. Would the Prime Minister undertake to give the House a statement or have the Minister of Transport give the House a statement on what program the government has to ensure continuation of that ferry service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to draw the hon. member's question to the attention of the minister.

URBAN AFFAIRS

POSITION OF MINISTER AT TRI-LEVEL CONFERENCE ON POSSIBILITY OF MUNICIPALITIES RECEIVING SHARE OF FEDERAL REVENUES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs concerning the national tri-level meeting. In view of the fact the representatives of 4,500 municipalities of Canada, supported by the governments of Ontario and Alberta, wanted a study of the feasibility of local governments sharing in federally raised taxes, would the minister explain why he opposed even a study of this critical financial problem, and how will it be solved if it is not at least studied?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has serious doubts about a question asked in those terms. When a member asks a minister to explain why a certain action was taken, that is debate. Perhaps the question might be asked in other words, or a supplementary might be asked.

Mr. Roche: Will the minister tell the House how many provinces will be required to approve the task force that has been recommended by the tri-level meeting to study public financing without any reference to tax sharing throughout the various levels of government?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to speak for the provinces here. The proposal for a study of the creation of an in-depth analysis of local government finances was the consensus of the conference and was the position put forward by myself. I would hope that all provinces would agree to an appointment of that kind of task force to examine the development of common data bases with respect to the comparative revenue and expenditure flows of each level of government and rising and emerging trends. I could go on and would be happy to table the statement that was agreed to as a consensus which will allow for an extremely useful analysis of the financial needs of local governments and from which, hopefully, progress can be made in the solution of financial problems at all levels of government.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Kent-Essex.

Mr. Roche: In view of the fact the consensus was arrived at as a result of a compromise to save future tri-level meetings, would the minister tell the House why he opposed a study on public financing and revenue sharing?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are back where we started. I suggest to the hon. member that a question asked in those terms is inviting debate and should not be accepted by the Chair.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF SURCHARGE ON IMPORTS—INQUIRY AS TO DECISION

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister say if he has had representations from the Minister of Agriculture and the Canadian Cattlemen's Association regarding the chaotic condition of the Canadian market for beef, and can he state if a decision has been made on their request for a temporary surcharge to be placed on imports of live and dressed beef? If not, can the minister tell the House when a decision might be expected?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to accept all the premises of the question. I received a copy of the telegram to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, from the cattlemen. I am in communication with him and a decision will be made shortly one way or the other because of the importance of the question.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has a supplementary to the previous question following which I will recognize the hon. member for Joliette.

POSSIBILITY OF MUNICIPALITIES RECEIVING SHARE OF CORPORATE INCOME TAXES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact the governments of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba support the principle that municipalities should obtain a share of corporate and other income taxes and, indeed, the government of Manitoba as of this year has implemented such a policy, can the minister assure the House that the federal government is committed to the principle of urban areas sharing in such taxes?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position is that we are sharing a very substantial portion of income taxes with the provinces and they are free, under the constitution, to make what arrangements they wish with their municipalities. The province of Ontario, for example, which takes the lowest percentage of any province in Canada of the personal income tax, could by bringing that percentage up to the national average of the other provinces raise by that one simple step $300 million for its municipalities.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROVISION OF RIDING SECRETARIATS FOR MEMBERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last spring, the parties negotiated for a supplementary credit in order to set up secretaryships in each constituency. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether his government is still in favour of such a measure and how the negotiations with the political parties are going?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The government has kept its promise as the hon. member will see in the next supplementary budget estimates which will be submitted very shortly.

FINANCE

ALLEGED OVERCHARGING BY BANKS ON FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As I brought to the minister's attention about a month ago the fact that banks were overcharging fishermen with respect to fisheries improvement loans and as the answer of his own department confirmed that the banks are overcharging fishermen on such loans, can the minister indicate what action he will take against the banks for deluding fishermen who are trying to get ahead in the fishery?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to examine that premise again and communicate directly with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister investigate the facts which show that banks are charging fishermen a greater rate of interest than guaranteed by the government purposely, thus deluding fishermen who are trying to get ahead?

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to look into the matter in so far as it comes within my department's jurisdiction.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

SUGGESTED FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR CITY OF OTTAWA PLANNING

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the zoning freeze that was imposed or voted upon by the city of Ottawa in the early hours yesterday, as this area forms the real heart of the national capital and as the freeze is for a period of 12 months, I would ask the minister if, in the interests of the national capital area, in the interests of all those persons who wish to have a better place in which to live and in the interests of the orderly development of the community, he will consider providing direct financial support to the city of Ottawa so that it can retain adequate additional planners—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, quite some time ago there were negotiations between the National Capital Commission and the city of Ottawa along those lines, which came to no result. I think the idea put forward is an exceedingly good one. I have asked the chairman of the National Capital Commission to meet the mayor of Ottawa and see whether some joint planning process can be established.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EFFORTS OF GOVERNMENT TO ASCERTAIN POLICY OF ARAB OIL PRODUCING STATES TOWARD CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and arises out of the information given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about our present position vis-à-vis oil shipments from the Middle East. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate what country diverted a vessel destined for Canada and what he is doing, through diplomatic channels, as indicated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to determine what the policy of the Arab oil producing countries is toward Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources gave me this information just a very short time before the House assembled at two o'clock. He informed me that it was a shipment which had been held up by Saudi Arabia. We are not sure yet what the significance of this action may have been. I have given instructions to my department to ask the ambassadors from all the Arab states who are accredited and resident in Ottawa to call on me. I have also given instructions that the same questions are to be raised in the capitals of the countries where we have representation.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has issued these invitations, these instructions, today? Is there any explanation as to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Department of External Affairs have been doing for the past week since the Arab countries announced their cuts? What has he been doing to find out whether this policy applies to Canada? We have been asking questions in the House about it.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, until we received this news today, this was the first indication we have had that this policy would apply to Canada in any way, and we are not even sure whether it is a policy or whether there is some other explanation.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is now Acting Prime Minister, explain to the House what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources meant when he said that Canada was trying to find out from the international community—he said this one week ago—whether this applied to Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, needless to say, I do not have to answer for my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I can assure the hon. gentleman that this is the first indication we have had from any source whatever that Canada might be included. Perhaps my hon. friend wants Canada to be included; we do not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: Therefore, we are not taking the position that any decision—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You have just begun to fight.

Mr. Sharp: We are not taking the position that the Arab countries have made such a decision. We hope that is not the case, and we believe this is the best way of pursuing the matter. We do not believe that there should be any policy of confrontation, no matter what the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, if, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs today has suggested, the best policy was to ask no questions, what did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources mean by indicating to the House several times last week that the government was trying to find out from the international community what the position was?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SUGGESTED CONSULTATION WITH INTERNATIONAL CORPORATIONS TO DETERMINE OIL DELIVERY POLICY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources referred merely to contacting Canadian companies and Canadian refineries, while in fact it is international corporations that decide where oil supplies are to come from and where they are to be delivered, will the Acting Prime Minister contact directly the head offices of multinational corporations such as Exxon, where these decisions are made?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if that is necessary, we will do so, but I believe that the Canadian government should deal with Canadian companies. We certainly object when foreign governments deal with Canadian companies directly. This is the policy that has received widespread support throughout Canada, and still continues to do so. We will act here as the government of Canada dealing with Canadian companies.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBLE LOOSENING OF REGULATIONS APPLYING TO NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Yesterday, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for York East, the President of the Privy Council agreed to give consideration to the introduction of legislation with respect to the tightening up of unemployment insurance. Can the Minister of Manpower and Immigration now tell the House what plans he has to loosen up the regulations which apply to Newfoundland fishermen?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would be interested in getting the hon. member's recommendation. If he can bring forward specific cases in which he feels that my people are being unfair in dealing with claims involving Newfoundland fishermen, I will be glad to look into them. Generally speaking, my understanding is that that is not the case, but I will be glad to consider specific cases.

Mr. Carter: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What action has the minister taken on the recommendations of the President of the Newfoundland Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers Union in that regard?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, consultations have been taking place and there has been consideration and examination of the benefit policy relating to fishermen which, as you know and as the hon. member knows, is quite separate, and was intended to be separate at the beginning, from the general Unemployment Insurance Act. This is being examined. If and when a new policy is determined, it will be announced in the usual manner.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary, and then the hon. member for Elgin.

Oral Questions

POSITION OF FUND—REASON FOR DELAY IN REPORT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, if I may ask a general question about unemployment insurance in order to elicit some information from the minister. I wonder if the minister can advise the House whether the fund to which employers and employees contribute is running at a deficit and, if so, by how much?

● (1530)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, these figures will be available to all hon. members in due course. I will be making a statement on this matter in the not too distant future.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Elgin.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: Can the minister assure the House—

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. The Chair undertook a moment ago to recognize the hon. member for Elgin, which I have done. I will return to the hon. member in a moment if he will allow me to do so.

[Later:]

Mr. Alexander: Can the Minister of Manpower and Immigration inform the House when he will be making the statement? I hope it will be in the not too distant future. Will he touch on the entire cost, including the administrative cost of the fund? Also, will he touch on the fact that, as he indicated before, the administrative cost will not exceed $145 million? Will he give some reason why the advisory council has not submitted its second report as it is certainly very instrumental in seeing what happened with the Unemployment Insurance Commission? Can he give us that assurance so that he will make a clean breast—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Alexander: This is an extremely important matter. The minister was about to stand and answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member please resume his seat. The minister will be recognized for the purpose of answering the question.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to examine all facets of the hon. member's representations and do my best, as the hon. member says, to carry out what I hope I have always carried out, that is making a clean breast of things.

[Mr. Speaker.]

URBAN AFFAIRS

DATE OF LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO MUNICIPALITIES FOR RAILWAY RELOCATION

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Will the minister inform the House as to the date on which he intends or will be able to introduce his bill to provide financial assistance to urban municipalities for railroad relocations?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister of Transport will be able to introduce that bill some time in the month of November. We have completed all of the processes required for introduction of the bill and we are simply waiting for the drafting to be completed.

LAND ASSEMBLY PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO WINDFALL PROFITS FOR PRIVATE SPECULATION AND NO RESALE TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs arising out of the tri-level conference in Edmonton and the emphasis given to the federal government's land assembly program. What arrangements will be made in establishing the purchase price of land assembled under the program to ensure that federal funds for land assembly will not simply amount to windfall profits for private speculators at the expense of taxpayers?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I certainly give the hon. member that assurance. That, of course, is obviously not the purpose of public intervention in land assembly. The proposal will be to dispose of the land in public land assemblies, either by way of sale or lease at below market rates and assign certain parts of it to low income housing. If lands are sold at market or close to market prices, that element of profit will not be returned to the government, as has been the case in the past. It will be applied within the land assembly for the provision of municipal community services, taking that cost off the municipality involved and thereby making public land assembly more attractive to municipalities.

Mr. Nelson: Can the minister assure the House that land acquired under the program will not be sold back to the private sector, but will be held or made available for leasehold arrangements?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the land will be disposed of by either sale or lease. I am hopeful we can do a good deal of leasing to show the value of that technique in lowering the price of land and housing. However, I think it would be unwise, especially because these are federal-provincial relationships, to make an unequivocal commitment that there will be no sales.

EFFECT OF GRADING OF IMPORTED UNITED STATES BEEF ON CANADIAN MARKET—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that directed to the Minister of Finance by the hon. member for Kent-Essex. I direct it to the Minister of Agriculture. As a result of the abnormally high import of United States cattle into Canada, Ontario in particular, which is graded under U.S. standards as No. 3 and No. 4 but has been railgraded in Canada as No. 1 and No. 2, does the minister have any definite plans to immediately offset this practice which is further jeopardizing our Canadian beef market price structure?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that cattle from the United States being brought here for slaughter do not meet the high quality standards we have set. They are of an inferior quality to Canadian beef. I just received the final reports on grading in Canada. When buying American beef, people are buying a lot of fat; I can tell you that. I have submitted a paper to my colleague to be considered tomorrow.

FLOODS

HIGH WATER LEVELS OF GREAT LAKES—SUGGESTED ASSISTANCE OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. It concerns the continuing hardship faced by residents along the shore of the Great Lakes as a result of high water levels. Has the minister followed up his commitment to consider the use of technical and personnel facilities of his department to assist municipalities and individuals who will be facing renewed difficulties this approaching winter? In short, will the federal government at this late date finally step in to assist those residents facing this difficulty?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I have explained before, and I think the hon. member knows this, I cannot move National Defence personnel in to correct a flood problem without an invitation and request from the provincial authorities. We have had no such request, although we have been in contact through the Emergency Measures Organization with the province of Ontario.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—FORMULA FOR ALLOCATION OF FUNDS—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF ALLOCATION

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. What formula will be used in the allocation of funds to each constituency under the current LIP program?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the allocation between provinces is based on a formula reflecting unemployment, with an adjustment for native people who may not be in the labour force. As between constituencies, the allocations are based on a similar formula adjusted as a result of consultation with the provincial governments.

[Later:]

Mr. Towers: Can the minister advise when the announcement will be made as to the allocation of funds for the LIP program?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we will be dealing with allocations within the next few days. I will let the hon. member know shortly what his constituency can expect.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COUNTY COURTS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES TO FILL VACANCIES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. There have been vacancies in the county courts of British Columbia for a number of months resulting in a situation where cases set down for trial this month will not be reached until May or June. Will the minister advise when the appointments will be made to fill the three vacancies so the work in that court can continue?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, a number of appointments, including some to the county courts, were made last week in the province of British Columbia. We are very energetically continuing our now common practice of trying to seek out the best possible candidates for the available positions. As soon as these can be put in place, appointments will be made.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I understood the minister to say a number of appointments had been to the county courts in British Columbia last week. I would ask the minister to check his information and advise me.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to send the information to the hon. member.

ENERGY

SUPPLYING OF CANADIAN OIL TO CHERRY POINT AS ALTERNATIVE TO ALASKAN OIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement made to the House that the government is now reconsidering the guarantee of supplies to the Cherry Point oil refinery as an alternative to the Juan de Fuca Strait route for Alaska oil, will the minister advise specifically the alternate proposal of the government in order to avoid the consequences of that? In other words, we not only want to know when we are going to fight, but how we are going to fight.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, following up my answer in the House on October 22, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made an offer yesterday to supply oil to Cherry Point. The United States said it was not at all interested.

SUPPLYING OF CANADIAN OIL TO CHERRY POINT AS ALTERNATIVE TO ALASKAN OIL—ALLEGED CHANGE IN POLICY—DISCUSSION WITH DR. KISSINGER

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Could I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs how it is that earlier this week, on October 22, our policy was not to supply, yet, yesterday, we offered the Americans the oil?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member says that is what I stated in the House, but if he would look at the record he would find I said our policy was under consideration and reconsideration. I did not say we had decided not to do that.

An hon. Member: Known as the revolving door policy.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Can the minister assure the House that this matter will be given top priority when Dr. Kissinger visits this country in November?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is one of the first items on our program.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN CONCERNING NEED FOR PROTECTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the statement made yesterday by the Chairman of the Food Prices Review Board that she was "naked of protection" because she has no minister to whom to report, I ask the hon. gentleman if he is prepared to be a modern Sir Gallahad and provide this modern-day Lady Godiva with legislative clothing?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The lady already has an important legislative garment given by parliament in the form of the Inquiries Act. I understand the board is meeting with the food prices committee next week. The hon. member would then have an opportunity to discuss directly with the chairman the need for additional couture.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the minister whether he shares the view expressed by the lady yesterday when she said she did not anticipate any decrease in food prices? Does the minister subscribe to that view?

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question asked in those terms is irregular.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SUGGESTED INDEPENDENT INQUIRY INTO RIOT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of continued tension at British Columbia Penitentiary, and in view of the request of inmates and of the guards for an independent inquiry to be made, will the minister now reconsider the position he has previously taken and appoint an independent inquiry into the circumstances of the riot at the penitentiary?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I must point out to the hon. member that we did hold an inquiry by a management review group in September, and yesterday I asked the correctional investigator, the ombudsman, to conduct an inquiry at the B.C. Penitentiary also, and I will await her report. I must repeat that I do not think the answer to the problems at the B.C. Penitentiary is another inquiry.

POSSIBILITY OF INTERIM PAYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. It follows from one I asked on October 16. Since western grain farmers are receiving approximately 45 per cent of the expected final payment, can the minister assure the House that no later than the first month of the new year, that is, January, we can expect to see an interim payment made to farmers who have delivered grain to the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Under the Wheat Board act, the question of a recommendation as to an interim payment and, thus, the initiative, is one for the Canadian Wheat Board. I know the Board has very much in mind the question whether a payment should be made. The Board is receiving recommendations that it not be made until the end of the year. I am sure they would, at that time, reconsider the position in accordance with the circumstances then prevailing.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ACCELERATED COVERAGE PLAN—DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that in March of this year the CBC finalised its five-year accelerated coverage plan whose object is to bring radio and television coverage to all unserved communities in Canada with populations of 500 or more, may I ask whether this plan has been submitted to the Secretary of State and to the cabinet for consideration and approval?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): It has been submitted to me, but it has not yet been submitted to Cabinet.

Mr. Nesdoly: Bearing in mind the fact that many urban areas are getting all kinds of media coverage, including a planned extension of FM radio and the CBC, may I ask when the people who live in the rural areas, especially of the north, can expect a decision to be reached on this matter, one which has been hanging fire for the last six or eight months while the government has been sitting on its fanny?

Mr. Faulkner: That is a lot of nonsense, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that as the hon. member will see, when we come forward with the accelerated coverage plan, there are inherent problems in it. I attach a great deal of importance to this undertaking. I have said so in the hon. member's constituency, and I am proceeding with it as rapidly as possible.

HIGH WATER LEVELS ON GREAT LAKES—CONTINGENCY PLAN FOR USE OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL—NEED FOR REQUEST FROM PROVINCE

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to return to the Minister of National Defence for the purpose of clarifying one of his earlier answers. The minister told us he had been in touch with officials of the Emergency Measures Organization of the Province of Ontario. Can he tell us whether there are contingency plans for the use of the forces available to the Department of National Defence, and of expert services, and that the only thing needed to put those plans into operation is a formal request from the Province of Ontario?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is correct.

ARBITRATION AWARD TO NURSES IN YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—REQUEST FOR RE-OPENING OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as minister of health for the Yukon. a question which also affects him in his capacity as minister of health for the Northwest Territories. Has he today received a telegram from various nursing stations, hospitals and health centres throughout the Yukon requesting negotiations for the purpose of relieving the nurses from the imposition of the disgustingly low arbitral award they have received under his department?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have received various telegrams in the course of the last week but I have not seen the telegrams received today.

Mr. Nielsen: Will the minister assure the nurses and their organizations in these northern communities that negotiations will be recommenced for the purpose of coming to a more realistic settlement?

Mr. Lalonde: I will assure the nurses and the hon. member that my department is greatly concerned about the welfare and health of all the people in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. We hope that the laws of parliament and Canada will be obeyed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are a number of members wishing to ask supplementaries. We have reached the end of the question period, but perhaps the House might allow the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands to ask her supplementary before Orders of the Day are called.

ARBITRATION AWARD TO NURSES—REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH MINISTERS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): In view of the current salary crisis affecting nurses throughout the whole of the federal civil service, would the minister undertake, along with his colleagues, the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Solicitor General, to meet personally with representatives of these nurses to discuss the arbital award and the salaries paid to them which placed them in a lower salary bracket than their counterparts outside the federal service?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will check as to whether I have received such a request. I am sure my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs and I, myself, will be available, as usual, to all groups for whom we are responsible and who want to see us. I wish to stress, however, that the level of remuneration and the question of salaries is not my responsibility, nor is it that of the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

CONTRIBUTIONS OF MEMBERS OF CERTAIN RELIGIOUS SECTS, INTEREST RATE ON DELAYED PAYMENTS, PAYMENT OF LEGAL EXPENSES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-190, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Canada Pension Plan

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before putting the motions which are before the House at the present time, I think I should refer, first of all, to two of them, motions one and two in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). The Chair has studied these motions and has some reservations as to their procedural acceptability. There is, to my way of thinking, a distinct possibility that these motions are beyond the scope of clause one which they seek to amend. I would be pleased to hear whether hon. members wish to enlighten and guide the Chair as to the acceptability or regularity of these two motions. If after hearing hon. members my judgment is confirmed, then these two motions cannot be put, in which case I suggest we proceed with motion No. 3, which I believe also stands in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot.

● (1550)

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise to speak to your point of order in which you suggested that you are, if I understood you correctly, in doubt as to whether motions Nos. 1 and 2 are in fact in order. Basically, motion No. 1 provides for the deletion of provisions relating to certain tenets and teachings, and substitutes the provision that anyone who can prove that he or she has an assured income and can look after themselves in their later years should be given the same opportunity as those of certain religious faiths. I really do not see how this is beyond the scope of the bill; it makes the bill applicable to all Canadians.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I take it that at this moment we are discussing the procedural acceptability of motion No. 1.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as I suggested a moment ago to the hon. member for Crowfoot, that motions Nos. 1 and 2 appear to be in doubt for the same reason. This is why I mentioned both. If the hon. member wants to argue separately the two proposed motions, I am prepared to allow him to do so; but what I suggested was that if these two amendments were found to be out of order, we then proceed with motion No. 3, which appears to be in order, at least as far as the Chair is concerned and unless arguments are submitted to the contrary.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to make my brief remarks respecting motions Nos. 1 and 2 at the same time. My previous comment was simply that I thought we were dealing with No. 1 only.

It seems to me that both these amendments, Nos. 1 and 2, are in effect amendments to the original act rather than to the amending bill. They propose to introduce into the Canada Pension Plan, the original act, conditions that are not there, namely the requirement of Canadian citizenship and the making of certain insurance or annuity arrangements. It is for that reason that I support Your Honour's view that both these amendments are not in order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, without discussing the merits of these amendments in any way, I must say I find the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rather strange. The object of Bill C-190 is to introduce an exception to the general category of persons who shall pay premiums to the Canada Pension Plan. It categorizes certain people who shall not pay. The hon. member for Crowfoot has merely introduced a restriction, and if there is to be a limitation on, or a closer definition of, those people who are going to be excepted, then it has to be introduced by way of an amendment at this stage. It certainly could not be introduced as an amendment to the original act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is not a restriction. It goes further.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is a restriction on the category of people who are going to be exempted from the provisions of the act by Bill C-190. In essence, the hon. member for Crowfoot is simply saying that these people have to be more closely defined by the minister by the introduction of a restriction on those exempted. With the greatest respect, in all logic I cannot see how an amendment can be introduced other than at this time. I am not saying one way or the other whether the exemption of the hon. member for Crowfoot is a right one, but procedurally I cannot fault him.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like merely to say a few words on the procedural aspects of the first two motions. It seems to me that the motions named by the hon. member considerably extend the very narrow limits set in this bill whose subject matter is to restrict it to certain religious groups whose some tenet of their faith prohibit them from contributing to group insurance plans.

As drafted, the hon. member's amendment would considerably extend those limits, not only to groups but especially to individuals, and also greatly expand the scope of the bill.

Indeed, the subject matter of the bill is so much extended that it seems to be effectively altered and that we are now moving a proposal which is, for all practical purposes, entirely different from the subject matter of the bill already considered by the House. Consequently, I feel that such an amendment should rather be moved as a private bill.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Crowfoot has already submitted his argument.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I have an additional argument.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to be unfair to him, but having given the matter serious thought before suggesting at this time that I had some reservations procedurally in relation to these two amendments, I am sure the hon. member will appreciate I would not have made this suggestion unless I had felt we should take another very close look at them.

I think the point made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare is worth considering. I have looked at motions Nos. 1 and 2 and to me they appear to be defective in that they purport to substitute a financial qualification in lieu of a requirement of a religious nature, as set out in the bill and passed on second reading. It seems to me that the amendments proposed by the hon. member go beyond the scope of the clause under consideration. I think they are a new proposition.

I think there is merit in the comment of the minister that this proposal is so different that perhaps it should be brought forward in an entirely new legislative measure. I think the House would expect the Chair to look at a matter such as this as subjectively as possible, which is what I have done, and I cannot see how procedurally I can accept the motions and put them to the House. I, therefore, suggest at this time that we put motion No. 3 and postpone any procedural debate on other possible difficulties until later. With the consent of the House, the Chair will at this time put motion No. 3, in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot) moved:

That Bill C-190, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be amended in clause 1 by deleting the words "general level" in line 13 at page 3 and substituting therefor the words:

"Canadian standard".

He said: It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that we are dealing with the motion listed as No. 3, which deals particularly with Clause 1 appearing at page 3 of the bill relating to the general level of living.

The bill sets out an exemption in respect of certain members of the Canadian community who will not be paying into the Canada pension plan and will not be drawing pensions when they become pensionable, that is widows, disabled or those of retirement age. It sets certain members of the Canadian community aside and says they no longer have to make contributions so, naturally, they will no longer receive pensions.

The minister has to satisfy himself that these people belong to certain religious organizations which have certain tenets and teachings. I understand in this case it is the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) rather than the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) who must be satisfied that the dependents of these people will be supported to their general level of living.

Surely, there is not a member of this House who would like to see the establishment of certain ghettos in our Canadian community which would be reduced to living on a lower standard than other Canadians, but surely this is the danger we are facing. Certain people provide for themselves in a very meagre manner. They live a very plain and simple life as their teaching instructs them. What this bill provides is that they must maintain the general level of living to which they are accustomed.

We in our society continually boast that our standard of living is improving, and that we are now second to the United States or perhaps second to Sweden, but we continue to hope that our standard of living will continue to improve. I have been trying to equate our standard of living with something that can be easily understood, but I think it is something different to different people. By this bill, we are suggesting that these people can continue to exist at the level to which they have been accustomed as far back as their beginnings in the early 1500's in Czechoslovakia.

To my way of thinking, we will be creating, by the adoption of this bill, ghettos with a lower standard of living for certain segments of our Canadian population, and I believe this is a mistake. The amendment substitutes certain things for what is referred to here as "their general level of living". What is meant in Canada by "the standard of living"? I suggest it has something to do with education, something to do with our birth rate, something to do with the number of deaths per thousand births and so on. I suggest it also has something to do with the wellbeing of the individuals of our society. Are they free to do what they want or are they contained by certain strict laws or regulations?

If we pass this bill in its present form, I suggest we will be turning a blind eye to what might well become a serious problem in years ahead. I was disappointed that representatives of a second group of people in Canada were not asked to appear before the committee considering this matter. There are two obvious groups which will seek exemption under this clause. One of the groups is the Old Mennonite Order in Ontario, representatives of which did appear before the committee. The other group which will seek exemption is that group of Hutterites in western Canada. There are more than 30 colonies in the province of Alberta, some 20 colonies in the province of Manitoba and probably in excess of 10 colonies in the province of Saskatchewan.

I would like to examine representatives of those groups to find out exactly what is their general level of living and what is meant by this term. I think this is important because those who belong to the Old Order of Mennonites live as individuals farming their own lands, whereas those who belong to the Hutterian Brethren on the Prairies live in a communal way, and they are strictly confined to living in those communes. Their education is confined to that provided by the commune. I was disappointed that the acting chairman of the committee did not feel obliged to call representatives of that group before the committee, and I was disappointed that I was called away from the committee to make a speech in the House on the matter of CNR financing. I feel that, in a way, the committee members were not very diligent in their duties in not asking that representatives of that group be called before the committee to justify this request for exemption.

The argument has been advanced that their standard of living has been good enough for them and, therefore, we as parliamentarians should not interfere. I wonder if this attitude would have been all right 100 years ago in respect of our Indians, and whether it would be all right today in respect to the Canadian Eskimo in the north. I suggest that we say it is not all right and that we must show these people the modern white man's way of living today. We suggest that we will take away their dogs and give them ski-doos, and that our ways are better. On the other hand, we are saying to these groups that their standard of living is good enough as long as they do not interfere with us.

That is all well and good, but we must remember that people are leaving these groups and coming into the general Canadian community with a much lower standard of education and a much different concept. It might be said that I am talking about only 20 per cent of the young people living in Hutterite colonies and that some who leave do return. Perhaps more will leave in the years ahead. If they do, they will be entering our communities with a severe handicap. Whether we acknowledge the handicap that we are indirectly placing upon these young people is one matter, but this is an obligation we cannot escape today.

It has been argued as well that if we allow certain groups within our Canadian community to be exempt from contributing to the Canada pension plan, we should allow other groups if they can justify the request in the sense that they are satisfied with their present standard of living and believe their young people will look after them in their old age. Why can we not allow these people to be exempt? I have always felt that the Conservative party has stood for the rights of the individual, that the individual was all supreme and should be allowed out of a scheme if he wants out. There should not be any compulsion to join.

However, I noted that in the committee the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated he believed that for the sake of the over-all effect of the pension plan, in order to be portable, it must include all people, but he felt that we should accept the application of these two bodies to be excluded from the Canadian community because contributing to it was against their religion. This argument is made from time to time, but it does not stand up. They can pay the premiums but they can never collect the pension unless they take out a social security number. If the department does not force them to take out a social security number, they do not take part in an insurance scheme, according to their way of thinking.

When the Mennonite people were before the committee they stated quite clearly that some of their members were tempted to pay the premiums and take advantage of the plan. One witness admitted that one of the members of the community in which he lived had, in fact, applied for and received the old age pension. However, this is against the teachings of their church and therefore that person either was asked to return it or to leave the church. There is no real record showing whether or not these people accept the security of insurance. No one can really tell because, in the application for family allowances or old age pensions, religious qualifications are not set out. So there is no record of whether or not they obtain insurance or welfare benefits. They are prepared to give out all the welfare they can but, because they are subject to receiving payments under the plan, they consider it to be insurance.

If they never take out a social security number, they cannot receive any payment, and therefore the contributions can be treated as welfare so far as they are concerned. The possibility exists for the members of those religious groups to leave their sheltered communities and join our society, at which time they can join the Canada Pension Plan. Once they enter the labour force, they automatically find themselves making contributions to the Canada Pension Plan and accepting our standard of living as well as our welfare security when they become disabled, of pensionable age, and so on.

[Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).]

It is interesting to note that in the province of Alberta the Hutterites make payments into the medical insurance scheme. So, the differentiation between welfare and insurance made by the Old Order of Mennonites who believe that taking out insurance is against their religion but accepting welfare is not, is not made by the Hutterites. This is one of the reasons I was disappointed when they were not called before the committee. I might point out that the Hutterites farm over one million acres of land in the province of Alberta alone. They have big farms and they make a separation between their religion and their business. As I pointed out previously, the Income Tax Review Board made a finding in a test case involving five Hutterite colonies. As recorded at page 19 of the judgment, the judge found the following:

> I have reached the conclusion that the appellants were farmers in the full sense of the word.

So, in many respects they can be considered in our Canadian community as farmers, but they also try to keep their religion separate. Their whole lives evolve round the church, and they suggest that this bill goes against their religious beliefs. Members of the Old Order of Mennonites, when they were before the committee, pointed out that in their view there could be a separation between the church and the government and that this bill really causes the two to conflict. I should like to read the following section in the bill:

> (i) is a religious organization that has established tenets and teachings that oppose the acceptance of benefits from any private or public insurance . . .

As I pointed out, the Hutterites in the province of Alberta may take out medicare because their tenets and teachings are not necessarily opposed to that form of insurance. The section goes on to read:

> (ii) does, as a practice, make provisions for the support of dependant members that are reasonable in view of their general level of living,

In some of his speeches made over the past few years, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) appeared to be saying that we must ensure in Canada a guaranteed annual income because a certain percentage of our population lives at an unsatisfactory level. He hopes to convince the other members of the cabinet some day that 30 per cent of our population, or whatever percentage Professor Bates, the secretary of the Welfare Council of Canada suggested, are in fact living at a lower than satisfactory standard of living. The minister suggested that everyone in our country deserves an adequate and fair standard of living. Yet, we have before the House a piece of legislation which sets aside a segment of our Canadian population which wants to continue to live their lives at a standard which could be compared to the standard of the nineteenth century or, I may even say, to the sixteenth century.

I think it is only fair to point out that we are speaking here of around 7,000 people in the province of Alberta, and I do not know how many thousands in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. We were told in the committee that this legislation would affect in the neighbourhood of 2,500 of Old Order Mennonites in the province of Ontario and 3,000 children in the same province. We are now saying to those

3,000 children that the standard of living which their forefathers had is good enough for them, and that they will be locked into it. Mr. Speaker, I have always been proud of the standard of living which my father was able to give me, but many of us today would not want to go back to the standard of living of our forefathers.

The question might well be asked as to how we are locking these children into an earlier standard of living by exempting them under the provisions of this bill. As an individual, I earn a salary and pay premiums to the Canada Pension Plan. If I become disabled, in theory I have security. If I reach pensionable age, I know I have a nest egg of some kind, although whether it would enable me to enjoy the standard of living to which I am accustomed could be debated. But these children as they grow up will not pay premiums to the Canada Pension Plan, and will not have that nest egg when they are old.

What happens if 20 or 30 years from now they want to leave the Old Order of Mennonites? All their security is represented in the toil they have put into their own sheltered communities. It could be argued that their religion binds them in this way, but it is strange that only 4 per cent of the Mennonites in Canada are applying to be exempted under this bill. What about the other 96 per cent? Are they less religious? Do they not believe in the Mennonite teachings? They believe in those teachings, Mr. Speaker. But as pointed out by the deputy minister before the committee, many of the Mennonites have asked that their missionaries abroad be allowed to make contributions to the Canada Pension Plan so that when they return to spend their retirement years in Canada they will have a nest egg in the Canada Pension Plan. This destroys the argument that contributing to the plan is against their religion.

If it is against their religion, I point out that they do not have to take out a social security number. I well remember the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) stating in this House that nobody would be forced to take out a social security number. If the Mennonites do not take out social security numbers, then their payments become welfare payments and not insurance premiums. Then, the minister would not have to make this severe judgment with regard to their standard of living, whether it be comparable with that of the rest of Canadians or not.

Many have argued that in the communal type of living carried on by Hutterites, the young are able to look after the elderly people and have done so since about 1500. But in Ontario the Mennonites farm and live as individual families, and looking after the elderly may not be so easy. Any piece of legislation that sets aside a certain group of Canadians and says that laws affecting all other Canadians will not be applied to that group should be examined very closely. If we allow 4 per cent of the Canadian Mennonites to be exempted under this bill, will the other 96 per cent come along at a later date and say, "You did this for the Old Order of Mennonites in Ontario, why not do it now for the Old Order of Mennonites in Alberta?" What answer will the Minister of National Health and Welfare give when confronted with that argument?

Perhaps the minister will stoutly maintain that they did not come forward at the right time, and therefore he will be heartless enough not to listen to them. I see him nodding his head in the affirmative. I would not think he would do that because I have always found him to be a gentle, kindly person, sympathetic to people's problems. If members of the Old Order of Mennonites in Crowfoot constituency approach him later on this question, I hope he will be sympathetic to them.

As I pointed out earlier, the report made under the Communal Properties Act in Alberta sets out the population and the land they farm. The extent of that land has grown since that report was published. It shows these people farm over one million acres in Alberta, and gives their number as 7,000. These are people only of the Hutterite faith. I think this bill is creating a ghetto, and some day a percentage of the young people in that society will regret that they have been excluded from the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan. As a matter of fact, some 20 per cent of the members are leaving that society right now and joining ours.

I should like the bill to be more specific about their standard of living and the Canadian standard of living as well as the "established tenets and teachings". When asked about these tenets and teachings the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was before the committee, and the deputy minister, could not tell us what was meant. It is generally accepted that they look after the elderly members of the group, but one of the members of the Old Order of Mennonite community admitted that one of the senior gentlemen had applied under the Canada Pension Plan. This would suggest that he, at least, was not satisfied with their standard of living and wanted something better. Many of them do that and many apply for the family allowance. One does not have to reveal his religion on the application forms for these benefits, so neither the Minister of National Health and Welfare nor the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) has any way of knowing who is applying. Many of these people do apply and thus are expressing dissatisfaction with the standard of living provided to them within the Order.

As is the case with our own young people, their children do not know what life holds for them and what road they should follow. They have to be guided by their parents, and if we pass this bill without amending that clause we are assisting their parents in holding their children to a narrow, old standard of living comparable to that of their grandfathers. We are not satisfied with that approach for them as we have not been satisfied with it for ourselves, nor for the Indians or Eskimos. We should not set up ghettos and reserves to shelter people.

I should like to read an excerpt from the judgment in a case which went before the tax review board concerning five Hutterian brethren. After quoting at length from the book "Confession of Faith" the judgment reads this way:

> That is enough to conclude from the above texts that paying taxes is not against their religious beliefs and practice and neither against the teachings of their philosophers and theologians. Income tax is a necessity to make sure that the citizens of Canada will benefit from it. It is a necessity to make Canada a better country for all Canadians including the Hutterian Brethren church's members.

If we set up these reserves within our community, will these people live solely unto themselves? Is that what they are doing? No; they market their products through our marketing system and therefore should pay part of the cost of making that system effective. But if we allow their standard of living to be below ours, will it not also affect their ability to produce, to compete and to provide food and necessities for the Canadian community of which they are part, whether or not they want to separate from it? There is no question in my mind but that it will. If we consider that the standard of living includes the educational level of a group of people—and it must—then if we allow them a lower standard of living, we will impose on them a handicap in their production of goods within our marketing system.

I am not in any way being derogatory to the Hutterian Brethren in the province of Alberta; they are a very industrious and hard-working people and so far have been able to keep up with the rest of the province. Many people say that they are only farmers and that somewhere in their teachings it is said that they must remain on the land. That is not really the fact, Mr. Speaker; actually their teachings protect their concept of communal living and their concept of that protects them from sin and shelters them from trading and dealing with people. They take their teachings from one of their early writers who states—and I am speaking from memory—that they shall not be dealers but shall be producers of primary goods, that "sin lurketh like a hinge on a door between the door and the door jamb" and if they become dealers they will be tempted to sin. Therefore they want to remain primary producers, thus sheltering themselves from the evils of our way of life. Many of us would be far better off if somebody had sheltered us, but in the long run we would be worse off if we were not prepared to meet the troubles of today and tomorrow. We would fail to develop character as men prepared to play our part in building a peaceful world.

This is really what we are saying: set this group aside and let them continue their way. We do not really need a cultural, technical or medical contribution from them; we will go and prosper without their help but let them live in our community. Mr. Speaker, it is wrong, morally and spiritually, for us as Canadians to allow that situation to exist. I know all about the Bill of Rights and freedom of religion and I have dealt with that. It is not against their religion, provided they do not take out a social security number. Nobody has yet said that anybody in Canada will be forced to take a social security number, so it is not against their religion and that is not an influence until they themselves make it so.

I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to consider the amendment very closely. It suggests that instead of their general level of living, the Canadian standard of living be applied to determine whether their parents, their elderly and their disabled are properly provided for. We would not then have the ghetto, those pockets in our society which will continue to send out people who are perhaps not as healthy or as rugged and able to stand up to the trials and tribulations of today and tomorrow, and who perhaps have not sufficient education to cope with our society.

● (1640)

Having said that, I urge this House to move cautiously on this bill. Apparently the Minister of National Health and Welfare is under an illusion. He thinks that he alone can introduce a guaranteed income for all Canadians, so that all those not enjoying the standard of living which he thinks ought to be enjoyed by Canadians will be able to enjoy that standard. Yet, he suggests that there are some who will not be affected by the guaranteed income plan. How can a minister, who is a stalwart believer in the idea of all Canadians enjoying an adequate and equitable standard of living, come forward with a bill and say, "But we will allow people who are farming over one million acres in Alberta and probably one million in Saskatchewan or Manitoba not to contribute to the plan. We will allow them to be subjected to the same standard of life that their grandfathers and their grandfathers before them enjoyed in years gone by." I am puzzled to understand how the minister can advocate these two courses, especially as he wants to eradicate poverty in Canada. How can he allow this situation to exist?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I rise to lend my support to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). It is difficult to add to what the hon. member has said without being repetitious, because he has pretty well covered the waterfront, so to speak. There are a couple of concerns I wish to underline with regard to this legislation and the amendment before us.

I think most people espousing a small "c" conservative philosophy are in favour of a society in which every person lives at the level he wishes. Of course, the ideal is never attainable in this world in which we are fortunate or unfortunate, depending on one's outlook, to live. Society must organize itself and abide by certain rules and regulations. I think it has been shown that a society is probably happier if there is not a great divergence in standard between those at the so-called top of the heap and those at the bottom. I am trying to say that, possibly, a society should be homogenous. Perhaps there ought not to be too great a variation between the level of those at the top and those at the bottom, so that there is less room for conflict, envy and several other human failings.

Let me say a word or two about the price that certain people are prepared to pay for their beliefs. I do not think any of us can exist in society without making some sort of contribution, financial or otherwise, towards the maintenance of that society. We do that in order that we may live with our fellow citizens. One can cite examples taken from all religions which show that people must make sacrifices, monetary or otherwise, in order to maintain that way of life in which the people believe.

Actually, I would support some sort of legislation, which might be presented to this House, which would allow a person's contributions to the Canada Pension Plan to be completely voluntary. As I said when I spoke on this bill on second reading, I have no sympathy for the concept of the Canada Pension Plan and did not favour that legislation which was introduced and passed some years before I was elected. As a means of protesting personally against this plan, I have failed to take out a social insurance number. I still do not have a social insurance number, even though I get periodic messages from the Department of National Revenue saying that I do not have a social insurance number.

I dare the minister, who is sitting on the other side of the House, to instruct the department to lay charges against me for not taking out a social insurance number. The messages from the department tell me that I am in breach of the legislation. Time will tell if the department will ever catch up with me. The department has wasted a great deal of postage in trying to encourage me to take out a social insurance number. Actually, the government of Canada paid for a young employee to go from Calgary to Drumheller, a distance of 90 miles; that employee visited me and reminded me that I had not taken out a social insurance number. An attempt was made to persuade me that I should take out such number. However, I do not believe in the Canada Pension Plan. If I do not believe in it, I do not think I should participate in it. On the other hand, if I cannot get out of my obligations under the Canada Pension Plan, I do not see why anybody else should escape them, either. That is my position in a nutshell.

I would be happy to let anybody out from under, so long as that right is extended to everybody who wants to get out. So long as the plan is compulsory and applies to everybody in this country, I do not see why certain small groups should be allowed to opt out, merely because they do not want to participate, as the hon. member for Crowfoot said. If they do not want to take out social insurance numbers, they can look on the contributions to the plan as a tax, because they are a tax. The Canada Pension Plan will never be sound actuarially. It is very much like the unemployment insurance plan, although it is really quite wrong to use the term, "insurance" when talking about that part of our statute law.

As I said before, when you find various groups living together in society, life is much easier for everybody if their respective levels of life are not too different. Federal and provincial legislatures in this country set minimum standards and, minimum wages. They establish health standards and various other standards. In the end these all add to the cost of doing business.

As the hon. member for Crowfoot said, the people about whom we are talking at present are primarily interested in the business of farming. I suppose many city dwellers think that somehow the seeds get in the ground, that the rain makes them grow, the wind threshes the grain and the crop sort of falls into bins, without anybody making too great an effort. The truth is that food production is a pretty specialized operation in this country, and certain costs are associated with that business. I have still to be convinced that contributions to the Canada Pension Plan are not part of the cost of doing business. As the Hutterite brethren of our community farm one million acres or more in Alberta alone, it is evident that they are engaged in the business of farming in a large way. If they are not subject to this tax, which in fact is what the Canada Pension Plan contribution is, they will have an unfair competitive advantage over their neighbours. They should be subject to the same cost of doing business as everyone else.

We can go on to the amendment, level of living. In my opinion, this is just another step toward giving more arbitrary power to a minister of the Crown. If we continue on this way, we will not have any laws that are real laws. We will have regulations that some individuals can interpret. No one in this country will know where he stands. However, the fact remains that to have orderly development in this country, we must know where we stand and not be at the mercy of some chief administrator.

After all, most ministers are merely the political heads of departments. In many ways, they do not have too much input in the actual decisions made in their departments. They tend to be at the mercy of the bureaucracy. The more we allow the bureaucracy what is, in effect, taxing powers without any responsibility to the electors of this country, the more we will go down the road toward political serfdom.

This amendment should be given favourable consideration by members of this House. After all, how are we going to define a level of living? What are the parameters? How are we to look at that objectively? The Canadian standard of living is probably high enough. However, we all recognize the fact that it varies from coast to coast. It is not the same in every region, but at least there has developed some sort of underpinning for a definition of the Canadian standard of living.

Possibly Statistics Canada now has the situation in hand. Maybe they can tell us what the various provincial standards are across the country. This could be used as a basis for some measurement. What are to be the guidelines to determine the level of living? I think that clause could raise no end of problems in the administration of this act. I urge all members to give serious consideration to allowing the amendment of the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if there are no other points to be raised, perhaps I can comment briefly on the arguments that have been made.

I wish to point out that the amendment would not seem to accomplish what the mover had intended because it would make the section read that the test would then be "their Canadian standard". I am sure this leaves the House in complete confusion as to the intention of the clause as it would be amended.

Apart from that, as hon. members know, the Canada Pension Plan is an earnings related plan. For each individual, the general level of living for the contributor is the test for those who contribute. It does not seem unreasonable that the general level of living for this particular group, or the individuals making the applications for exemption, would be the test in this section.

Even if the hon. member had drafted his amendment, as I think he intended, to try to relate this criterion to a Canadian cross-country standard, members will realize very quickly the extreme difficulty of defining and interpreting that phrase. As the minister who would have to be responsible for making that interpretation, I appeal to the House not to impose such bureaucratic chaos on the department and on the people who would have to be subject to a ruling.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is necessary, but possibly I might move a sub-amendment adding the words "their general level".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member has already had the floor. If he is rising on a point of order, he will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for drawing this to my attention. The amendment should read "by deleting the words 'their general level'" and adding the words "Canadian standard". This was a typographical error on my part. In my rush to file these amendments, I deleted the word "their". If the House agrees, I will move that subamendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Perhaps the Chair could make a much simpler suggestion. A decision would, of course, be taken later. I suggest the simplest way would be for the hon. member to seek the unanimous consent of the House to modify his amendment by adding the word "the" in front "Canadian" and delete the word "their" in front of "general level".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) took the words right out of my mouth with regard to an error when drafting the amendment. I wonder if I could have the privilege of drawing to the attention of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) that his French version is correct. His French is better than his English. The French version of the amendment takes out the word "their" and puts in "the Canadian standard of living". All he needs is the authority of the House to treat the English version as though it says what is said in French.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member suggesting that we proceed in French for the remainder of the debate? From what has been said, I think the House should allow the Chair to make the correction to make the amendment read the same as it reads in French.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I think we could agree to that provided the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) does not make the same speech now in French.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I would like to, but I don't think I could.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

● (1700)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour will please say, yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

[Mr. Stanbury.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those against will please say, nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 25, the recorded division on the proposed amendment stands deferred.

Order. The Chair is at this point questioning the validity of the amendment in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). It would appear, at first glance, anyway, that motion No. 4 is consequential upons motions 1 and 2 which have been declared unacceptable, and it may be that the hon. member would not wish to proceed with motion No. 4 in those circumstances. There is, however, no difficulty about dealing with the motion from a strictly procedural point of view, because motion No. 4, as it reads, is acceptable, even though it might be consequential on the first two motions.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Your Honour will correct me if I am wrong; I understood you to say that the motion, itself, is acceptable, but you wonder whether it is not consequential on motions Nos. 1 and 2. I believe it stands on its own. It deals with the form of certification a religious order or sect would need from the minister in order to qualify for the exemption set out in the bill, and I should like to speak to that point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Chair has said that procedurally the motion is acceptable, and in the light of what the hon. member has said, I think the best way to proceed would be to put the motion before the House at this time.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot) moved:

That Bill C-190, an Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be amended.

That clause one be amended by deleting lines 20 to 22 inclusive at page three.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment attempts to clear up the basis upon which the minister will make his decision. It proposes to delete the words "religious sect or division thereof has applied to him in prescribed form for certification." In other words, which groups can apply for certification from the minister for exemptions from the Canada Pension Plan? I think I should read from the committee proceedings of October 18, issue No. 17 of the Minutes of Proceedings of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. A Mr. Snyder was appearing before the committee on behalf of members of the Old Order of Mennonites. He is the executive director of the Central Mennonite Committee of Ontario. I draw the attention of the House to the following exchange of questions and answers:

MR. HORNER (CROWFOOT): Does the Old Order of Mennonites live as individuals? Do they farm as individuals, or do they farm in communes like the Hutterites?

MR. SNYDER: No. They live as individuals and farm as individuals. They own no land corporately.

MR. HORNER (CROWFOOT): If I understand you correctly, the Bishop will determine whether or not they should be allowed out of the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Martin, who is a member of the Old Order of Mennonites, and who was appearing as a witness along with Mr. Snyder, stated:

If this bill passes, the person's standing will determine it.

MR. HORNER (CROWFOOT): Pardon?

MR. MARTIN: The person's decision on these matters will determine it. The Bishop will only be the tool who will be responsible to say yes or no. It is not a dictatorship. The Bishop will never say . . .

MR. HORNER (CROWFOOT): The Bishop will never be able to veto an application?

MR. SNYDER: No.

MR. MARTIN: No.

MR. HORNER (CROWFOOT): In other words, each individual will make his own applications? Anyone can get an old age pension in Canada if they fill out a form.

I will pause there. I then went on to deal with another matter. So the individual would make his own application. But the bill says applications must be made in prescribed form for certification. The minister concerned is, I suppose, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury).

Clause six says the minister shall certify a religious sect or division for the purposes of exemption in certain circumstances. I should like the minister to answer this question. If the bishop of the Old Order of Mennonites, for example, were to apply for certification, would that application automatically include all his following, the whole flock among those wishing to opt out, or would each of the individuals concerned need to apply for certification? I go on to deal with this point in a series of questions reported at page 26 of the same committee proceedings.

MR. HORNER (CROWFOOT): Anyone can get an old age pension in Canada if they fill out a form. How do you know, Mr. Snyder, that absolutely none of your people, the people you are representing are getting an old age pension? There is no religious form. The Department of National Revenue has no way of knowing what a man's religion is when they send out his old age pension.

MR. SNYDER: Our information is based on the circulating of the ministers who know who is in good standing. I think you can appreciate that when you live in a small community and you live so closely together as the Old Order Brethren do, and I am talking about close associations with persons, it is almost impossible for one person to be doing too much that other people do not know about. I know there have been cries in parliament about bugging and this, I suppose, is a form of bugging when you know what your neighbour is doing all the time.

What has this specifically to do with the old age pension? It has this to do with it. If the bishop could certify his whole flock, then any individual member of that flock could supply a social security number and pay premiums if he wanted to, because nowhere in the application is it specified that a person's religion need be mentioned. So, the department would not know whether he had been certified by the Bishop or not as desiring exemption. Mr. Snyder went on to say:

I am simply saying that on the circulation of the bishops we have this information. Now, if you want to press me to the wall and say there is not one person in the whole group who has ever made application, obviously, I could be tried, but I am . . .

MR. HORNER (CROWFOOT): In other words, nobody has proof.

MR. MARTIN: Personally, I know of such a situation in the brotherhood where an older man at the prison—

● (1710)

I think that must be a misprint; I think it should be "community".

—decided on his own behind the curtains, but the situation has been corrected. It is not tolerated.

Certainly, the bill is not clear. The clause provides that the minister shall certify a religious sect or a division of a religious sect. Do those words mean that each individual will have to be certified, or the whole sect? As I have said, before the committee the Old Order Mennonites stated that the bishop would not be able to veto any application. In other words, if an individual member wanted to get out of the Canada Pension Plan, then as I understand it he would apply to do so and the bishop would not have the power to veto his application. I suppose such an individual could also apply to join the Canada Pension Plan. If the bishop found out an application had been made, I suppose he could ask the applicant to leave his church or following; but that is beyond the purview of our study. That is their concern, not ours.

Under the provisions of the bill, any money collected since 1970 will be returned to the individuals concerned, I suppose on their application. I believe that it should be for the individual to declare whether he is in the Canada Pension Plan or out of the plan, rather than a whole group being certified. If it is left up to the individual, there is a certain degree of freedom. A member of the modern Mennonite faith can apply to get out of the CPP, but leaving it to the bishop is directly opposed to the wishes of the Mennonites who appeared before the committee. Because Mr. Martin clearly said:

If this bill passes, the person's standing will determine it.

Then, I asked them whether the bishop would be able to veto, and both Mr. Snyder and Mr. Martin said no. The clause refers to a religious sect or a division of a religious sect, and I should like to know what that means. Is a division of a religious sect one-half of the following, one-quarter or one-tenth? Or is it just one person within the following?

For some strange reason, the Minister of National Revenue was not asked to appear before the committee which studied this bill to explain exactly how this money that has been collected from these people is going to be returned to them or how these people will be exempted. Surely, we should be able to ask the minister a couple of questions on that, particularly the question who can apply to get out of the plan, and whether if an individual applies the Department of National Revenue will automatically check off his name with the bishop, thereby giving power of veto to the bishop. Or is a person going to make an individual application to have himself and perhaps his family exempted? These questions make a major difference to the application of the act. If application is left to the individual with no power of veto given to the bishop, then anyone can apply to be exempt from the Canada Pension Plan on religious grounds providing they can convince the minister that their religious tenets and teachings are such that they wish to provide for themselves if they become disabled or retire.

I know my hon. friends in the NDP party—I always add the word "party"; they are just a group really and I should call them the NDP group—will shudder at the thought that this is the beginning of the erosion of the compulsory aspects of the Canada Pension Plan. Four per cent of the Old Order Mennonites in Canada want to get out of the plan; the other 96 per cent may at some later date, if premiums rise and it is beneficial for them to do so.

I read the newspapers and am aware that this government follows very closely the teachings of Quebec. If Quebec says that the pension plan should be changed, then the government will change it. In Quebec, the premiums are now nearly double because of the amount of money collected, so without alarming anyone unduly we can rest assured that our contributions to the plan next year will be nearly double what they are this year, and that in the next session of parliament the Minister of National Health and Welfare will bring in another of these little bills and change the whole concept of the plan.

Taxes never go down, it seems; they just go up and up, and without a doubt the stage will come when many individuals want to get out of the plan and will ask for certification by the minister because they say their tenets and teachings are such as to enable them to provide for themselves when they become old or disabled, or for that matter widowed.

I hope the minister will clear up this question. I realize I can only speak once on any motion and this does handicap me to some extent because I should like to pursue a line of questioning with the minister on this point. As I say, the committee never called him before it, and this is part of my complaint about the way the committee handled the bill. They were slightly less than diligent in their examination of what may be the beginning of the erosion of the Canada Pension Plan if the minister readily certifies the exemption of too many people, or if he takes the bishop's word that his flock is really several times larger than it actually is. The plan, in other words, will fail to be universal in its application if we continue to allow people to get out of the plan. The principle on which the plan was founded was that of universality. This is why participation was compulsory. This aspect is now being eroded. This particular part will determine how great that erosion might be in years ahead.

Perhaps the minister could explain what is meant by "certificate" and who will apply for certification. Will it be the bishop of the church or a minister in charge of one single Hutterite community, or will the bishop of the Hutterite group in Canada apply for a certificate across the board? As I understand their religion, there are two groups of Hutterites in Canada and perhaps one from each group would be required to apply for certification. I think this is a matter that should be cleared up, and perhaps the minister could give us an explanation.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if that is the only question I will try to answer it. There is a clear provision in the bill requiring certification by a spokesman for a sect or division, as well as application for exemption by the individual. The bill attempts to allow enough flexibility, recognizing that not every religion is monolithic, to administer the intention of parliament as it will be stated if we should pass this bill.

[Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).]

The amendment proposed would remove the need for religious groups to apply for certification. Of course, it is this information which would allow the minister to satisfy himself that the criteria had been met. I suggest it would be quite impractical to simply delete the lines proposed by this amendment. This would, in fact, deprive the minister of the means to exercise the controls I think parliament would expect him to exercise in order to see that the exemptions offered here are not abused.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Would the minister permit one question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the minister permit a question by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner)?

Mr. Stanbury: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): May an individual apply for certification for himself and his family? Did I understand correctly that this is the minister's answer?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I referred to the provisions in the bill which require that not only may an individual apply for an exemption, but that there must be a certification obtained by the minister from a spokesman of the sect or division to which the individual belongs.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): In other words, you are giving the bishop a veto?

Mr. Stanbury: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on amendment No. 4 proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 4 (Mr. Horner (Crowfoot)) negatived on division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Having regard to Motion No. 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), I should advise the hon. member that the Chair has some doubts as to whether this motion should be put to the House. It would appear to the Chair that the motion involves a new proposition, and as such is not relevant to the clause or the bill itself. However, I would give the hon. member an opportunity to be heard regarding the point raised by the Chair.

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, I thank you very much for this opportunity. I proposed this amendment as I felt that the clause dealt with the membership of a group which either obtained the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan or declined its provisions. Primarily, the clause in question will allow certain groups to opt out. I think that is its general purport.

On the basis of the old rule of what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander, I believe that if you change a clause allowing somebody to opt out it should be changed to allow others to come in. I say there should be that optional spirit in the legislation. The proposed amendment would merely allow spouses to contribute on the basis of either their own incomes or the incomes of their partners to a marriage. I submit that if the Canada Pension Plan can be amended by this clause to allow some to opt out, the clause should be amendable to allow those who want to come in to do so. I suggest there is really not a new concept being introduced here but merely a change in the provisions in respect of membership, allowing certain people to opt out and other people to come in if they desire, both on a voluntary basis.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It's your baby.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his contribution on behalf of his proposed baby.

The recommendation affixed to the bill states in part:

to provide under the circumstances prescribed for the return of contributions to a contributor who, being a member of a certified religious sect or division of a religious sect has elected not to make contributions;

The hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) has made an interesting contribution in respect of the rule relating to what is sauce for the goose and sauce for the gander as opposed to the Royal recommendation. On balance, I think the Chair must decide that his proposed motion goes beyond the bill and assumes that spouses of contributors should be allowed to make contributions in respect of this pension plan. I would think, and I gather that most hon. members would agree, that if this motion were adopted it would amend provisions of the main act which are not before the House at this time.

Secondly, I suggest the proposed motion would be inconsonant with the main purpose of the bill as stated by the Royal recommendation. The Chair has many times used the Royal recommendation as a reason for not allowing an amendment, as, in accordance with our democratic system, the Royal recommendation must be heeded at all times. For those reasons, and in spite of the charming argument of the hon. member, the Chair regretfully rejects the proposed motion No. 5.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot) moved:

That Bill C-190, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be amended in clause 2 by deleting the word "greater" in line 32 at page 3 and substituting therefor the word: "lesser".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, this is a relatively simple and clearcut amendment. What the bill does is to allow certain people to be exempted from the Canada Pension Plan. This amendment attempts to put a less severe penalty on the rest of us. Clause 2 on page 3 reads as follows:

(6) Every employer who fails to remit to the Receiver General the total amount that he was required to remit at the time when he was required to do so is liable to a penalty of 10% of the amount that he failed so to remit or $10, whichever is the greater,

So, if he failed to remit $1,000, 10 per cent of that would be $100. His fine would be $100 rather than $10. All my amendment is doing is to leave the choice to the individual. Since we are letting some people off, letting them be exempted, let us allow the minister to be generous toward the others in this regard.

Some members might think that I am the only one who thinks this way. Let me point out that the vice-chairman of the committee, as recorded at page 1615 of the proceedings of the committee on September 20 said:

It is up to us then to see that we carry out our promises. I think if we carry out our promises, we will accept the bill and let them get away with it.

When the vice-chairman was accused by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) of making this unkind statement, he said he sticks by his guns, that he made that statement and was not retracting it. I admire him for that. Certainly, we are letting them get away with it. Whether or not they deserve to be let off is not the point. The committee did not even bring up the point of the large number of people who also want to be exempted from the Canada Pension Plan. We are saying that if they can get away with it, then we should change the word "greater" to "lesser" and let us have the choice of whether we are fined $10 or 10 per cent, whichever is the lesser penalty.

I know that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) is a kind man and would be generous if somebody failed to remit a portion of his premium. I know the minister would be understanding and would not want to levy the higher penalty. But the fear I have is that this minister may not be Minister of National Revenue forever. He has his eye on the Prime Minister's position. Another fellow may come along and take his position, someone who might not be as generous as he is. In any case, I do not believe that this provision would be applied too often. I do not see why the minister cannot give the rest of us a break, now that he is letting certain people off whose religious tenets qualify them to be exempted from the plan. Surely, he can allow us who have remained under the plan to have the choice of paying the smaller penalty.

Without delaying the proceedings any further, let me say that the amendment is clear and succinctly worded. It merely gives the person who has failed to remit to the Receiver General the total amount required the choice of having to pay the lesser penalty. The minister might argue that the word "lesser" might mean $1. It says somewhere in the bill that if the amount is less than $1 the whole matter can be dropped. One can argue that if it is less than $10 the matter should be dropped. Surely, we do not want to cajole people into remitting the proper amount by making them pay harsh penalties provided in a bill which allows other people to be exempted completely from paying, people who are not contributing at all. Surely, we should be a little more humane and change the word "greater" to "lesser".

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I wish to indicate complete opposition to this amendment. I suggest that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) really understands the Canada Pension Plan better than one would think, judging from some of the things he just said. He talked about giving us a break. He talked about some of us having failed to remit our payments. May I remind him that in the case of employed persons, no individual remits his Canada Pension Plan premium to the Treasury. All remittances to the Treasury on behalf of employed persons are made by employers.

An hon. Member: What about the self-employed?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought my hon. friend down there understood it better as well. There is a different part of the act altogether dealing with self-employed persons. This section of the bill that is being amended by the clause now before us does not deal with self-employed persons at all, it deals only with employers.

I suggest that it is a very serious misdemeanour for an employer not to remit moneys that he has collected from his employees, and to which he should be adding his own payments. Indeed, persons can lose some of their pension rights if their employer fails to keep the law. I suggest, therefore, that it is a proper penalty to say that if an employer fails to remit the payments he should be making there should be a penalty for it.

The act now provides a penalty of 10 per cent of the amount that he did not send in or $10, whichever is the greater. That means that, for example, if an employer has failed to send in $10,000, the penalty would be $1,000, but the hon. member for Crowfoot would make the penalty for failing to send in $10,000 only $10. That is not a deterrent at all, to use a word that has been used a lot around here in recent weeks. If it were $100,000 the fine under the legislation would be $10,000, and I think that would not be unfair at all for that kind of misdemeanour. But the hon. member for Crowfoot would let the persons get off with a $10 fine. Surely, the purpose of this penalty is to make sure that employers do not jeopardize the pension of the individual. I suggest that the amendment should be defeated.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the explanatory note to the bill indicates, the purpose of the amendment in clause 2 is to make the rate of interest charged on any amount that an employer fails to remit to the Receiver General capable of being adjusted to the rate of interest charged for unremitted amounts under the Income Tax Act, which may be fixed by regulation. It is important, from the standpoint of equity as well as administration, to maintain uniformity between income tax, Canada Pension Plan and unemployment insurance deductions. The hon. member's motion would defeat this purpose.

With respect to the limiting of penalties to $10 as proposed by the hon. member, that of course would be a change of the existing law and, as has already been pointed out, we are speaking here of trust funds which belong not to the person remitting but to his employees and the people participating in the Canada Pension Plan. Clearly, the hon. member's motion would encourage late remitting and delinquency. For example, a large employer who had deductions of $50,000 a month and who failed to remit that amount would be subject to a maximum penalty of $10, plus interest at 7 per cent on the amount that should have been remitted. Surely, this is not the intention of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). If he considers the implications of this, he will see that his proposal really is an encouragement to take advantage of deductions which belong to employees and to the plan. I do not believe he would want to be party to that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? The motion is not adopted.

We will now proceed to motion No. 7. It is the feeling of the Chair that Nos. 7 and 8 might be grouped for the purpose of debate and that a division on No. 7 would also dispose of No. 8. If hon. members do not agree perhaps they could raise the matter with the Chair, otherwise we will proceed along the line indicated.

Order. Up here on this lonely plateau we are always susceptible to advice, and I gather that I should have asked for the yeas and nays on the motion of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 6 (Mr. Horner (Crowfoot)) negatived.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was right the first time. In any event, we will now deal with motions Nos. 7 and 8, and I gather it is the will of the House that these be grouped for the purpose of debate and that a division, if called for on No. 7, would also dispose of No. 8.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot), seconded by Mr. Skoreyko, moves:

That Bill C-190, an Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be amended in Clause 2 by deleting the words "a prescribed rate" in line 33 at page 3 and substituting therefor the words:

"a rate of 7%"

Perhaps I could put the second one also, since they are being debated together. Mr. Horner (Crowfoot), seconded by Mr. Skoreyko, moves:

That Bill C-190, An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be amended in clause 3 by deleting the words "a prescribed rate" in lines 4 and 15 at page 4 and substituting therefor the words:

"a rate of 7%"

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motions?

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, basically the act now sets out that a rate of 6 per cent applies in both these sections, and in this bill the minister is suggesting that the 6 per cent be deleted and be replaced by the words

"a prescribed rate." This is a government of high interest rates. We have watched interest rates climb.

This is the government that removed the 6 per cent ceiling on bank interest rates, and now people tell me the rate is over 10 per cent if you want to borrow money to buy a house or anything else. The government is doing the same thing in this bill. It is removing the 6 per cent ceiling.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten per cent.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): The hon. member says it is 10 per cent in the act. It is 10 per cent in one place in the act, but not in all places. Now, when the 6 per cent rate is removed the interest charge will rise to 10 per cent, 11 per cent and 12 per cent. By spring it may be 14 per cent.

The Liberal government believes in high interest rates to absorb all the careless, foolish, extravagant expenditures in which it becomes involved. The wasteful, inefficient administration of government requires the minister to charge higher interest rates to cover all the extravagance. This is really what the government is doing in this bill.

The government wants to allow the interest rate to go up, up and up. People may ask why I settled on the figure of 7 per cent. The fixed ceiling on bank interest rates used to be 6 per cent. Then, we were told that banks were not making enough money, and that the interest rate had to go up. At that time I moved an amendment allowing the bank interest to go up only one per cent, to 7 per cent, and that is what I am again doing here.

Because of the inefficiency and careless administration of the government, I believe interest rates should be allowed to rise only one per cent. Parliament must carefully scrutinize the administration and expenditures of government departments. One of the ways to do that is to put a limit on interest rates so that the government must strictly account for its administrative practices. I think it would be wise, Mr. Speaker, to accept the amendments suggested in motions Nos. 7 and 8. It is clearly set out that interest on instalments will be at 7 per cent rather than at a prescribed rate. The minister has suggested that he would like provisions similar to those of the Income Tax Act or the Unemployment Insurance Act so that there is a parallel. He might as well say that we should do something similar to what is done on mortgage loans under Central Mortgage and Housing. Interest on those loans is over 10 per cent now. He might as well say that, because that is the interest rate that will be charged under this bill.

Somewhere along the line we have to take a stand and say that we will not allow the department to prescribe the interest rate. We will say that it should be only 7 per cent. We are all living in a credit world and surely we want to hold down the interest rates so that credit will not cost us so much. My purpose in moving these two rather simple amendments is that, rather than change the bill to agree with the old act and put in 6 per cent, we are putting in 7 per cent. If the minister were to assure the House that the prescribed rate will never be higher than 7 per cent, then the amendment would not be necessary. Most people in Canada are alarmed at the present high interest rates. It is all very well for the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to say that we must have high interest rates because of our place in the international world and on the North American continent; that if we did not, too many people would be coming here to borrow money.

The minister might claim that all the government's interest rates cannot be equal. That was not the case when this bill was passed in 1966. The government of that day changed the Bank Act a year or so before the Canada Pension Plan came into operation and the 6 per cent figure was used then. What is wrong with it now? Well, the government feels that it is too low, and they want a higher rate of interest on instalments and on unpaid contributions which is comparable to other rates of interest. How much higher? If the minister is prepared to say that it will be less than 7 per cent that is fine but if not, when I recommend these two amendments.

If we, as members of parliament, concerned about high interest rates, say to the minister that he will only be able to charge 7 per cent interest on unpaid contributions and on instalments, the minister will immediately claim that many people will not pay their interest on instalments because the interest rate is cheaper than that of the banks. That may be so, but we must encourage the government to lower interest rates to the people of Canada so that they can buy homes and the things they need. If we take the wraps off interest rates and allow the government to do what they like, then we are derelict in our duty. This is just a little piece of legislation, but it is a measure of the sincerity of the government in managing their affairs. We must make sure that the government is forever conscious that the people of Canada want lower interest rates. I think this is one of the prime causes of inflation, particularly in today's credit oriented society. Everybody is borrowing money and perhaps living beyond their means.

I suppose it could be argued that the Canada Pension Plan contributions would not come forward too quickly if people could just pay the interest on the contributions. This may be so, but it is what the government would have to suffer because of their careless handling of our finances. I do not mind saying that from time to time the government should be reminded of its job in this regard.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BROADCASTING

PETITION RESPECTING ADVERTISING ON CHILDREN'S PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hope, Sir, that as the custodian of our ancient rights and privileges in this House you will hear my point of order. It concerns yesterday's Votes and Proceedings which record your ruling on the petition presented by me under Standing Order 67. The rationale of that ruling was that the petition concerned a matter over which parliament by statute had delegated control to the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. Various precedents were cited in support. However, in determining whether this House has divested itself of control it is the appropriate statute to which one must refer. The precedents are an aid in the interpretation of the statute. Parliament never gave up control of the CRTC. Section 32 of the Broadcasting Act provides:

All expenditures for the purposes of this part—

That is the part that constitutes the CRTC and sets out its jurisdiction.

—shall be paid for out of moneys appropriated by parliament therefor.

I make this point of order in recognition of your ruling and the observation that the right of the people to petition "is a very ancient and historical right" which should not be—and here I quote Shakespeare—"cabined, cribbed or confined" in any way by precedents decided on particulars.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to indicate certain agreements that have been arrived at by all parties. Apparently I was trying to demonstrate the universality of agreement by rising to speak from a seat other than my own.

● (1410)

Today, Sir, is an opposition day, with the motion being moved today by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). I think you will find there is agreement that the time limits on speeches today be as follows: 30 minutes for the mover of the motion, as provided in the Standing Order; 30 minutes for the minister responding; and 20 minutes for the lead-off speaker of each of the other two parties; but 15 minutes for all other speakers today.

There is another matter on which we have reached agreement. Shall I deal with that while I am on my feet?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the other matter on which we have reached agreement has to do with any division that may be called tomorrow related to the business that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) will be announcing. Perhaps we could deal with both these matters now.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I understand we have agreed that any division that might arise tomorrow on any items before the House will be dealt with later at a time to be agreed upon after discussions among the House leaders. Tomorrow we would begin with the CNR financing bill, then the Canada Pension Plan Bill No. 1, followed by the National Parks Act bill. On Monday we would begin with the Canada Pension Plan Bill No. 2 and probably follow that with the report stage of the foreign investment bill.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the official opposition may I say that we concur in the arrangements that have been discussed and agreed upon in the usual way.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PURPOSE OF CERTAIN FLIGHTS TO QUEEN CHARLOTTE ISLANDS BY ARMED FORCES AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a question of urgent and pressing necessity to seek leave to move a motion. The question of urgent and pressing necessity concerns the intensified feelings on the part of residents of the Queen Charlotte Islands, in my riding, about the nature and purpose of visits there by Canadian Armed Forces personnel aboard military aircraft from the air force base at Comox. I would therefore like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), the following motion:

National Defence

That there be presented to this House for referral to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence the information from all flight plans of aircraft operated by the Department of National Defence which departed from the Canadian Forces Base at Comox, B.C. and which landed at Sandspit, B.C. or at any other location on the Queen Charlotte Islands from August 1, 1973 to today except such information as may be classified as being of a security nature.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

TRANSPORT

REDUCTION IN DIGBY-SAINT JOHN FERRY SERVICE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 43, to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. It relates to the curtailment of ferry service in the Bay of Fundy scheduled to become effective next Sunday. In view of the serious cutback, in view of the large investment the Canadian government has in the service which will thereby be wasted, and in view of the substantial loss of jobs and economic opportunities in southwestern Nova Scotia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. O'Connor):

First, that the Ministry of Transport be instructed by this House to underwrite all legitimate losses suffered by CPR after October 28 in relation to the operation of the Digby to Saint John ferry, Princess of Acadia, operating on a twice daily schedule.

Second, that the Ministry of Transport be instructed to enter into negotiations with CPR to either provide a subsidy which will ensure the continued operation of the ferry or alternatively to purchase the ferry and include it in the operations of the recently commenced, or announced, Atlantic ferry administration.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PERSONNEL AND PURPOSE OF CERTAIN FLIGHTS TO QUEEN CHARLOTTE ISLANDS BY ARMED FORCES AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same basis and for the same reasons as I rose previously to seek leave to move an additional motion under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). I would move:

[Mr. Howard.]

That there be presented to this House for referral to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence the names of, the rank held by, and the purpose and duration of the visit of all Armed Forces personnel who flew from the Canadian Forces Base at Comox, B.C. to Sandspit, B.C. or anywhere else on the Queen Charlotte Islands aboard aircraft operated by the Department of National Defence from August 1, 1973 to today, except to the extent that the said purpose may be classified as being of a security nature.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARAB-ISRAELI WAR—RESOLUTION OF NON-ALIGNED SECURITY COUNCIL MEMBERS FOR EMERGENCY FORCE TO MAINTAIN CEASEFIRE—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the government support the eight-nation resolution, with the proposed amendments, to establish an emergency United Nations force to guarantee maintenance of the ceasefire in the Middle East? If so, does the government of Canada believe the resolution provides a satisfactory basis for immediate Canadian participation if this is requested?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, Canada is not a member of the Security Council. Therefore we have not been required to take a position on this particular proposal put forward by the non-aligned members of the Security Council. In general, as I stated in the House during the special debate, we believe it may be very useful to have an emergency force in operation in the area during the period when negotiations are going on. At that time I indicated that, provided we could play a useful role and were under United Nations auspices, we would be ready to participate. We have not yet been asked to participate. Indeed, the proposal to which the hon. gentleman referred has not yet received the support of the Security Council.

ARAB-ISRAELI WAR—DEPLOYMENT OF CEASEFIRE OBSERVERS—PRESENT SITUATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Can the minister confirm whether the United Nations military observers have yet been fully deployed on both fronts? If so, has the government any new information as to the military situation at this time, particularly with regard to the ceasefire?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, UNTSO, the United Nations supervisory organization is redeploying its members on both the Syrian and Egyptian fronts. We have personnel who are involved. I understand the Secretary General is considering enlarging the organization, the numbers. We have not yet had a request to provide additional membership but we would certainly be prepared to do so. Indeed, we have men standing ready who could take on these responsibilities if they were requested to do so.

ARAB-ISRAELI WAR—CEASEFIRE—UNITED STATES MILITARY ALERT—POSSIBLE UNILATERAL DISPATCH OF TROOPS TO AREA BY RUSSIA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary related to the state of military alert adopted by the President of the United States. Is the Canadian government in possession of any evidence that the Soviet Union is preparing unilaterally to send forces to the area for peacekeeping or other reasons? If so, what position has the Secretary of State for External Affairs expressed to the Soviet Union on behalf of the government of Canada with respect to any such development?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the forces of the United States are on a general alert. This does not affect us. We have not been requested to do so. I understand that the Egyptian government proposed that forces of the Soviet Union and the United States might form a peacekeeping mission in the area. The Secretary of State of the United States is opposed to this idea. Indeed, I gather that in a broadcast just a few moments ago he proposed that any peacekeeping force not include permanent members of the Security Council.

Mr. Stanfield: With all respect to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he did not answer my question. I am sure he would wish to do so. Has the government of Canada any information in its possession that the U.S.S.R. is preparing unilaterally to send forces to the area?

Mr. Sharp: I cannot answer that question. I have no direct evidence. All I know is that it is, I think, in light of this likelihood that Dr. Kissinger has expressed his very strong opposition to any such movement on the part of the Soviet Union. The United States has said it is not prepared to participate along with the Soviet Union in any such activity. It is for this reason, I gather, that the forces of the United States have been placed on a general alert.

ARAB-ISRAELI WAR—PROPOSED WITHDRAWAL TO LINES OCCUPIED AT TIME OF SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION OF OCTOBER 22—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): In the resolution presented by the non-aligned members of the Security Council there was, I understand, in addition to the matters mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, a proposal that both sides be called upon to withdraw to the lines occupied at the time of the first Security Council resolution last Monday. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether Canada would also support that particular part of the resolution.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The House may recall that I welcomed the resolution of the Security Council of that day, and by implication, therefore, I would support maintenance of the position as it existed on the day the ceasefire was approved by the Security Council.

ARAB-ISRAELI WAR—WILLINGNESS OF CANADA TO SUPPLY TROOPS FOR PEACE ENFORCEMENT—RUSSIAN POSITION RESPECTING RESOLUTION NO. 242

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I think the questions raised by the Leader of the Opposition and the answers given by the minister require clarification. Is Canada prepared to supply troops for peace enforcement in the Middle East rather than peacekeeping units? I mention this because that seems to be the distinction in what has been advanced by the U.S.S.R., which at the moment has not been accepted by the United States.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There are various forms of activity, as the right hon. gentleman knows, which, generally, have been divided into two kinds of activity, one of them observers such as we had in Viet Nam and the other, peacekeeping forces which stand between the combatants such as we have in Cyprus. Whether there are distinctions within the peacekeeping function as to the amount of armament and the degree to which they would resist is a question that has not yet been settled. Therefore I could not give a clear answer unless I had a much better idea of the exact functions that would be performed by a peacekeeping force in the Middle East.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to know from the minister whether Canada is prepared to supply troops for peace enforcement. That requires armed forces. That is question No. 1. Second, arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood, what attitude does the U.S.S.R. take as a basis upon which an armistice or a ceasefire would be determined in connection with the implementation of Security Council resolution No. 242 of 1967 which provides, among other things, for Israel's withdrawal from occupied Arab territories in return for Arab acceptance of secure and recognized borders for Israel. That particular portion of the 1967 security declaration was accepted the other day in the Security Council. I ask the minister this: does not the U.S.S.R. take the stand that this means that, before there can be any basis for a ceasefire or an end of the hostilities, Israel must withdraw from all of the areas occupied since the six-day war?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, one of the points that I made very clearly in my speech in the special debate the other day—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, it was not clear at all.

Mr. Sharp: —was that we accept resolution 242 in its entirety, that we resist any efforts to interpret it, that we believe it does provide a framework for settlement and therefore we do not accept any particular interpretation such as the one put on it by the Soviet Union. We believe it was very carefully drafted and that any attempts to interpret it publicly and to get acceptance of a particular interpretation is only going to interfere with prospects for peace. So I must make that very general answer to the right hon. gentleman.

As to the first part of the question, it is interesting in this connection that some time ago Canada presented to the United Nations a draft plan for peacekeeping activities which represents the Canadian point of view. It is the kind of force in which we would be prepared to participate. If I am asked a hypothetical question whether we would agree to participate in a plan for peace enforcement, as the right hon. gentleman has mentioned, then I must ask him to define his terms a little more carefully.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the right hon. gentleman for a supplementary. A number of other members are also seeking to ask supplementaries. They will be recognized and the order will be the hon. member for Selkirk, the hon. member for North York and the hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the U.S.S.R. has always taken the stand that Security Council resolution 242 of 1967 requires the entire evacuation by Israel of the areas occupied since the 1967 war. When Mr. Kosygin was here a communiqué was issued by the minister and Mr. Kosygin which stated that Canada and the U.S.S.R. are in agreement as to the meaning of resolution 242. I would ask the minister what that meant. The U.S.S.R. says it means get out, but is Canada now saying that when it agreed with Kosygin it really did not mean to agree?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the reading that the right hon. gentleman has put upon the communiqué issued by Mr. Kosygin and the Prime Minister. Canada's position is very clear on this question. It is that Israel should withdraw to secure and recognized borders, which I understand is also the position taken by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Selkirk.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want words that I did not say placed in my mouth.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister what he meant by saying that Kosygin and he had agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Selkirk.

[Mr. Sharp.]

ARAB-ISRAELI WAR—U.S. CONTINENTAL AIR DEFENCE COMMAND ALERT—STATE OF READINESS OF CANADIAN COMPONENT IN NORAD

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact the Continental Air Defence Command, which is the United States component in NORAD, has been placed on alert, or at least an increased state of readiness, I should like to ask the minister whether this has in any way affected the state of readiness of the Canadian component in the NORAD forces.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Armed Forces are always alert.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: To answer the hon. member's specific question, it has not been necessary in these circumstances for the Canadian component of NORAD to move to an increased level of alertness.

ARAB-ISRAELI WAR—POSSIBLE LANDING OF TROOPS BY RUSSIA IN MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, may I put a further supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the Canadian government directly seeking assurances from the Soviet Union to the effect that it will not act unilaterally in the Middle East by landing troops there? Is it seeking that assurance actively?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, these developments have arisen only within the last few hours, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that this is the attitude of the Canadian government which will be conveyed to the Soviet Union.

ARAB-ISRAELI WAR—NECESSITY OF ISRAEL WITHDRAWING TO PREVIOUS BORDERS BEFORE PEACE TALKS

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs following the response given the hon. member for Greenwood. I should like to ask the minister whether, in referring to Canada supporting the position that Israel withdraw to previous borders, he meant that to be as a precondition to peace talks or as a consequence of peace talks?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it has been the position of the Canadian government that Resolution 242 is a package and all parts must be observed and must be part of a simultaneous implementation.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I was thinking of the present situation where the borders have certainly changed since Resolution 242 was passed by the United Nations. I refer to the existing situation and the ceasefire. Prior to peace talks is it necessary for Israel to withdraw to the previous borders, or will peace talks take place before this withdrawal occurs?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if peace is going to be effective in the Middle East the two parties must first agree to be in negotiations, and it will be for them to decide the conditions, not for us.

Mr. Brewin: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Greenwood on a point of order, but I remind hon. members that we are still on the first subject. I appreciate that it is very important, but after the point of order and a question by the hon. member for St. Paul's perhaps we should attempt to move to the second subject.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that I think the hon. member for York North has unwittingly misunderstood or misstated the question I asked. I was not referring to withdrawal to the boundaries before Resolution 242; I was referring to withdrawal to the ceasefire line at the time the ceasefire was decreed last Monday. That is all I was referring to.

ARAB-ISRAELI WAR—DISCUSSION BY MINISTER AND ARAB AMBASSADORS OF ADHERENCE TO CEASEFIRE AND SOVIET TROOP BUILD-UP

Mr. Ron Atkey (St.Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In his discussions with Arab ambassadors today concerning delivery of mideast oil to Canada, did he have occasion to raise the question of securing adherence to the terms of the ceasefire in the Middle East, set last Monday, and did he express concern about the unwarranted build-up of Soviet troops in the area apparently in support of some of the Arab states?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. The subject of my discussions this morning, as I said to the House yesterday, was the refusal of the State of Abu Dhabi to load a freighter with oil destined to the Portland-Montreal pipeline. It took us long enough to discuss that question and we did not have an opportunity to pursue the other subject. In any event, that would be a subject which would more properly be raised by our ambassadors in the countries to which we are accredited.

SECURITY OF OIL SUPPLY FROM MIDDLE EAST—RESULT OF DISCUSSIONS WITH ARAB AMBASSADORS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he tell the House the results of the meeting he held this morning with the Arab ambassadors, can he now guarantee security of supply of oil to the Canadian consumer, and did he assure the Arab ambassadors that any oil destined to multinational corporations in Canada would not be diverted to American refineries?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in my discussions with the Arab ambassadors this morning I emphasized the point that Canada in its commercial dealings had never allowed politics to have an effect upon the destination of our commodities, nor upon the way in which we give aid to countries. I emphasized that we have always kept politics outside and we hoped the Arab countries would do likewise in their relations with us.

Mr. Nystrom: With deference, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Secretary of State for External Affairs answered my question. My question was specifically whether he was able to get a guarantee from the Arab states that there would be security of oil supplies to this country, and whether he assured them that if they sent oil to American-based multinational corporations in Canada that oil would not be diverted to American ports?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to paraphrase what was said to me as I would not in any way want to be incorrect. I think it is fair to say that the Arab ambassadors were not aware of the reasons which motivated Abu Dhabi to refuse to load a tanker with oil for Canada. Therefore it was impossible for me to pursue the matter any further. What I wanted them to convey to their governments was the very serious concern Canada would have about relations between Canada and the Arab countries if they took the position of supporting any of the Arab states in cutting off oil to Canada.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated in response to a question by me that it was the State of Saudi Arabia which had prohibited the shipment. Was this an error on his part, and can he tell us whether he is taking any measures at all to ascertain whether the State of Saudi Arabia, which is the leading producer among the mid-eastern Arab states, is cutting off or refusing shipments of oil to Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House for having passed on information that we had received from the Petrofina Company. Their information was that the ship had been loading in Saudi Arabia. That was not so; it was loading in the State of Abu Dhabi. I do not believe that is a matter of any significance in so far as the action itself is concerned. We are just as concerned about the action of any Arab country in cutting off oil shipments to Canada. We are making representations in all Arab countries, not only those that supply oil but others, so as to make it clear that Canada is very interested in continuing the ordinary commercial and other relations with the Arab countries and that it would be quite inexplicable to Canada for them to take action of this kind against us.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. Leader of the Opposition, attempt to have a few questions from other hon. members on different subjects and perhaps return after five or ten minutes to this important matter.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in reference to the veto or prohibition against the shipment, was this not directed to Aramco which is the producing company in question, and has the Secretary of State for External Affairs or anyone on behalf of the government attempted to ascertain from the producing company the particular significance of this move that was made with regard to Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it was not Aramco that was involved which, as the hon. gentleman knows, is a producer in Saudi Arabia but rather Shell International in respect of its production in Abu Dhabi. We have pressed through Petrofina to find out whether in fact this represents a conscious decision by Abu Dhabi not to ship to Canada or they do not understand that in shipping to Portland, Maine, the oil then moves in bond by pipeline from there to Canada. At the moment I do not have any further information on that.

Mr. Stanfield: What about instructions to Aramco?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as far as I am advised at the moment by Canadian firms which receive oil from Aramco, they have not had shipments interrupted.

Mr. Stanfield: Do they have instructions?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Pardon?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ENERGY

PROPOSED OIL PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—EFFECT ON EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and is in connection with the possible extension of the oil pipeline to Montreal. In view of Governor Love's statement yesterday that the United States would probably allow looping of the United States part of the line provided no cutback of oil supplies to the United States midwest resulted, will the minister tell the House how he would plan to serve the Montreal market through the pipeline extension without reducing exports to the United States?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that in terms of pipeline construction this depends very much on the level we intend to put into Montreal. My understanding from Interprovincial is that 250,000 barrels a day would not require substantial construction west of Sarnia, although an amount over that would, of course, require such construction. Basically we would take the position, as indeed the United States takes, that we should move to a position of self-sufficiency to the degree that we can. Of course, we would have the priority that Canadian oil would be used to meet Canadian requirements.

OIL—SUGGESTION THAT PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL BE THROUGH NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the statement he has just made and in view of the growing national concern about security of supplies for eastern Canadian markets and the government's recognition of the necessity of building an oil pipeline to the Montreal refineries, would the minister assure the House that full consideration will be given to the building of the pipeline from Sault Ste. Marie through northern Ontario in lieu of a line from Sarnia to Montreal?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We certainly would give that consideration, Mr. Speaker. The concern, of course, would be whether the increased financial cost involved in an extension from Sault Ste. Marie would be warranted by the additional security that might be obtained.

Mr. Blais: Can the minister advise the House when the study relating to costs will be available to the House so that future discussion can be had on that particular subject.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would hope to be able to report more fully in connection with the pipeline at an early date. I cannot give a precise date.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASES VIS-À-VIS HEALTH OF ECONOMY

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. When the Minister of Finance states, as he did last night in London, that the problem of unemployment grows in large measure from the strength of the economy rather than its weakness, does he mean to suggest to parliament and the people of Canada that in future unemployment rate increases should be read as a measure of the health of the economy—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hellyer: —and the government's satisfaction with the results of its own policies?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity knows he cannot ask a question in those terms relating to a statement made outside the House.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING SALARY INCREASE FOR CLERKS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, when he asks for restraint by business and labour in granting wage increases he sees as an example of that restraint the current policy of Treasury Board against adequate wage increases for the CR group in the civil service?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the President of the Treasury Board and I see eye to eye on the problem.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Trinity on a supplementary, followed by the hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister give the House the name of one deputy minister who on merit is entitled to an increase of $10,000 when the government refuses to give these clerks—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SOCIAL SECURITY

OLD AGE PENSION—POSSIBILITY OF LOWERING AGE OF ELIGIBILITY TO 63

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the fact that National Health and Welfare technicians are preparing the documentation on the payment of old age pensions from the age of 63, can the hon. minister tell us when he intends making a statement on this subject?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the facts upon which the hon. member's question is based are unfounded. Consequently, his conclusion does not apply.

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO DIVERSION OF SHIPS DESTINED TO CANADA FROM MIDDLE EAST TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I think he is coming back from behind the curtain, Mr. Speaker, if he can find his way in. He is hunting for tankers. Other than the shipment of oil referred to yesterday from Abu Dhabi, can the minister say categorically if he knows of any other ships of any other company or country that have been diverted to United States refineries which were originally destined to refineries in eastern Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I know of none other. I checked again after the question the hon. gentleman asked yesterday and I again received the insistence of the two companies he mentioned that they control their own ordering and shipping and that there has been no diversion from supplies intended for Canada and they are not missing any cargoes.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville has had a question and I do not know how many supplementaries. I lost track of them a while ago. Perhaps the Chair might be allowed to recognize some other hon. members. The hon. member for Palliser.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

VALIDITY OF INDICES MEASURING EMPLOYMENT AND BUSINESS ACTIVITY

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the Governor of the Bank of Canada finds great difficulty in reconciling the unemployment statistics with the level of the indices indicating business activity, I should like to ask the minister whether he has any reason to doubt the validity of the indices that measure employment and business activity in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the governor was not doubting the statistics. He was suggesting it was difficult to reconcile them with some of the evidence in the country. I said to the hon. gentleman's leader a day or so ago that I was awaiting with great interest the report of the Economic Council of Canada on the meaning of statistics as they affect the labour force.

PROVISION OF ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF FERTILIZER TO FARMERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Because of the tremendous demand that greater quantities of food be produced for the coming year and since there seems to be little doubt that we are headed for what could be called a major fertilizer crisis not only in Canada but also in the United States—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Murta: —I suggest this is a very serious matter and ask the Minister of Agriculture what the government is doing at this time to ensure that Canadian farmers will have an adequate supply of fertilizer?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all, if we could can the bio-mass material in this House we would probably have an ample supply. I just want to say that we have met this morning with the Canadian Fertilizer Manufacturer's Association and with some of the independent fertilizer producers in Canada and are meeting again later this afternoon with another group. I can say, from the meetings we have had so far, I do not think we will have any crisis. The farmers are using far more fertilizer than they ever have. We have asked the companies to produce more and they are doing that. The farmers used 50 per cent more last year in western Canada because I asked them to do so. They are going to do that and we are going to see they have the supplies of fertilizer they need.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, that was the most ridiculous political answer I have ever heard to a question. In view of the fact that major grain companies that handle and in some cases produce fertilizer are going to experience shortages without a doubt this year, what does the government intend to do about these shortages in the future? Does it intend only to hold discussions and talk and not really meet the problem?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, some companies have already shown us their production figures for this coming year. They have been increased from 500,000 to 650,000 tons in one plant alone in western Canada and it is cutting off export of 100,000 tons. So in that plant alone this represents over 200,000 extra tons for the farmers in western Canada. We are prepared to take action to make sure that the fertilizer stays in Canada for the use of the Canadian farmers to make them as productive as possible. We have taken action in regard to other products to make sure—I refer to protein for one—that they stay in Canada to make our people productive so they do not have to compete in an unfair manner with other countries which might otherwise get our product.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I will allow the hon. member for Lisgar to ask a further supplementary, after which I will recognize the hon. member for New Westminster.

● (1450)

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask one last supplementary. Instead of giving short speeches such as the minister has now given, what specifically is he going to do since he has said that the government will do something if such a situation occurs? What specifically is going to happen?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we have to get all the facts. I have just outlined some of them. Hon. members may want me to outline them all at this time but I know that you, Sir, would not allow me to do that. I have confidence in the ability of the fertilizer producers to look after the needs of our people. If they do not and they want to continue exports, we can, of course, stop them. There is no doubt about that. As the hon. member knows, we are huge exporters of nitrogen and potash, and we import phosphate. Surely we can make a deal to get the best possible advantage for our manufacturers. This is what the manufacturers have been telling me this morning and will probably do so again this afternoon.

Mr. Whittaker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the Minister of Agriculture is fully informed. I have evidence that there is a shortage of fertilizer in British Columbia—

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that is hardly a point of order. There are only five minutes left before the end of the question period and I think we should try to move to the next subject.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED CHANGES IN BAIL REFORM ACT TO PROTECT FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the peculiar conditions which were imposed on bail in the case of Dr. Henry Morgentaler of Montreal, namely, that the bail provisions not only deny him the freedom to discuss his case publicly, which is usual, but also deny him the right to make any public appearances whatsoever or to discuss anything whatsoever, is the minister considering changes in the Bail Reform Act so that the fundamental right of freedom of speech can be protected for persons presumed to be innocent until proven otherwise?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate to comment on a particular existing case. A great deal of discretion in our judicial process is inevitably left to the judiciary, and I think that that is as it should be. We are, of course, looking at other matters in relation to the Bail Reform Act, and so did the Commissioners on Uniformity. We will be bringing proposals before the House before too long.

AMOUNT OF INCREASES OFFERED BY GOVERNMENT TO THOSE AT LOWER LEVELS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Trinity. Is it the government's view that it will help restrain inflation by offering people in the junior levels of the civil service, nurses in particular, wage increases that are significantly less than the rate of inflation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, not accepting the premise of the hon. member's question I have difficulty in forming an answer.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, there has been a suggestion of a 20 per cent increase in pay for deputy ministers, and this minister says that he does not accept that as a fact. Will he answer this question: Is the government trying to restrain inflation by reducing the pay of junior civil servants?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The answer is a categorical no, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance confirm or deny that the pension payable to his deputy minister will be more than his annual salary today as minister?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is correct.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows he cannot ask a question like this.

Mr. Lawrence: May I rephrase—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. Lawrence: May I redirect the question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Vancouver South will bear with me for a second, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham wishes to ask a related question. Will the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham resume his seat. Hon. members know that it is entirely out of order to ask what is the amount of salary paid to an individual or whether one salary is higher than another. That is obviously not a question that can be asked at this time. It can be placed on the order paper or, if there is urgency, raised at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, we have difficulty in getting questions answered when we put them on the order paper. That is why we have to use the oral question period.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver South and will then have to call orders of the day.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

OPERATIONAL STATE OF AIR SQUADRON 442 BASED AT COMOX

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that Squadron 442, which is based at Comox, is responsible for search and rescue operations over 690,000 square miles of British Columbia and the Yukon, and since that squadron is unable to meet normal operational tasks because of worn-out aircraft and lack of parts, can the minister advise what immediate steps will be taken to correct this situation?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the question.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, it has been reported by Jes Odham in the Vancouver Sun—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: This is a very serious matter because it affects the lives and safety of people who are lost.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: With regard to the search for pilot Neil Carey, which started on September 18, it was not until September 28, ten days later, that the squadron was able to put all of its aircraft into the air. Will the minister either replace these worn-out aircraft or increase the number available, and when will this be done?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the search and rescue capability of the Canadian Armed Forces has an excellent record on the west coast, as elsewhere, in the number of discoveries that have been made of lost planes. In the new modernization and renewal program that I have announced there are funds for new equipment which will be going into search and rescue, as well as into other areas.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I have one other supplementary question. At the present time, given the fact that we cannot get replacement parts for these aircraft because they are all stored in Toronto, causing long delays that keep these aircraft out of the air, will the minister reconsider the information he has been giving, come back to the House in a few days and say what he is going to do about the situation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon has a supplementary and also, I believe, the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

INVESTIGATION INTO LOSS OF TRACKER AIRCRAFT IN SEARCH

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Have the armed forces yet concluded their investigation, which I assume they made, into the loss of a Tracker aircraft in the search just referred to, which resulted in the loss of four members of the forces, and, if concluded, are the results going to be made public or made available to members of this House?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries concerning the result of that particular investigation.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again there are a number of supplementaries. The Chair has said it will first recognize the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

ABORTION

REQUEST THAT MINISTER MAKE REPRESENTATIONS TO PROVINCIAL HEALTH DEPARTMENTS FOR INCREASE IN COMMITTEES AND FACILITIES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for New Westminster and is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): In view of the extreme shortage of facilities for legal abortions in various parts of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members are protesting that the question being asked by the hon. member is not supplementary. I am quite willing to hear the hon. lady ask her supplementary. I think hon. members should be prepared to allow her to ask her supplementary, although it is not relevant to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South. If there are supplementaries to the previous question, other hon. members will be recognized.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): In view of the extreme shortage of facilities for legal abortions in various parts of Canada, as emphasized by the case of Dr. Henry Morgentaler, would the minister make representations to the provincial departments of health, and through them to the hospital boards of the provinces, to set up adequate numbers of abortion committees and other necessary facilities.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the case of Dr. Morgentaler supports the point of view expressed by the hon. lady.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST THAT ADDITIONAL CREWS BE PROVIDED FOR RESCUE PLANES

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South. Will he provide the crews to make the rescue planes he now has fully operational before he gets around to providing new equipment instead of having them, as at present, on a five-day week and a standby weekend?

● (1500)

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): I will give consideration to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. The Chair, with the consent of the House, allowed a supplementary. The minister may, if he wishes, reply to the question of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. If not, the hon. member for St. John's East will be recognized on a last supplementary, after which we will call orders of the day.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I indicated that I would look into the matter raised by the hon. member.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway).]

SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF TRACKER AIR SQUADRON FROM NOVA SCOTIA TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is in the interests of saving life, not destroying life. I should like to ask the minister if it is the intention of the government to place the Tracker squadron now in Nova Scotia in eastern Newfoundland, which would add 1,000 miles to its capability and hence provide that part of eastern Canada with search aircraft capability?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated on earlier occasions that it was not practical for us to do that.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago we dealt with the business of the House for the balance of this week. I wonder if I could ask the government House leader his intention with respect to the business of the House next week and perhaps beyond, as far as he can see.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on Monday it is the intention to call the Canada Pension Plan Bill No. 2; following that the report stage of the Foreign Review Investment Act, so I would think that would take us well into next week.

Mr. Stanfield: Well into Tuesday.

Mr. Baker: One further matter, Mr. Speaker. Could the government House leader inform the House when he intends to bring in the supplementary estimates for consideration.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board advised me that the target to date is a week from next Wednesday.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—SUGGESTED MEASURES TO ENSURE SUPPLY OF OIL AT FAIR PRICES TO ALL CANADIANS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands) moved:

That this House expresses the opinion that the government should give consideration to the taking of immediate steps to ensure that available petroleum supplies are used to ensure a continuity of supply at fair and just prices to all Canadian consumers and as a preliminary step to this end should implement the following measures:

1. The setting up of a publicly-owned National Petroleum Corporation to enter into bi-lateral arrangements with oil-producing states and to supervise the marketing of oil in Canada.

2. The extension of the oil pipeline to eastern Canada and the bringing of the inter-provincial pipeline under federal government ownership.

3. The ensuring of future oil supplies by entering into negotiations with the provinces concerned for the development of the oil sands by a joint federal-provincial Crown corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting this motion for the consideration of the House, I think it is a most opportune time to discuss the oil situation in Canada because at this moment we face some very serious problems. For years voices have been raised in this country warning of an impending oil shortage. Very few have listened and nobody has acted. Successive federal governments have refused to face up to the consequences of an archaic oil policy and more recently, no policy at all.

There is no reason why Canadians should be unable to secure adequate supplies, particularly at fair and just prices. Canada is a net exporter of oil. We are one of the few countries in the world which produces more oil than it consumes. Why then should the people of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces face the possibility of oil shortages this winter? The unpalatable fact is, Mr. Speaker, that we do not have a national policy in Canada; we have a Standard Oil policy in Canada.

In 1961, the government of that day established the Borden line running through the Ottawa Valley. West of that line was designated as the exclusive market for western Canadian crude and east of the line was to be served by offshore oil, mainly from Venezuela. It is noteworthy, Mr. Speaker, that Standard Oil is the major operator in western Canada and also in Venezuela; Canada has been parcelled into two captive markets. At the present time Canada is exporting western crude to the United States midwest at a rate of 1.2 million barrels of oil per day and importing offshore oil to an amount of about 800,000 barrels per day. This leaves eastern Canada completely at the mercy of oil importers, both with reference to security of supply and to price.

We have been told frequently that the government has a contingency plan in the event that offshore oil is cut off. Such a plan did operate in 1956 and 1967 during the Arab-Israeli conflicts through a swapping arrangement by which Canadian oil exports to the United States midwest and to the Rocky Mountain regions were increased in exchange for increased U.S. oil supplies being shipped to eastern Canada. Mr. Speaker, that plan worked because the United States had spare production capacity but that is no longer the case. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has been telling us for months that the government has a contingency plan to meet the possibility of offshore oil being unavailable. Today when he speaks I hope that he will tell the House of Commons what that contingency plan is, and how he proposed to meet the present situation in eastern Canada.

We have to face the fact that the amount of oil and gasoline the people of eastern Canada will be able to consume, and the price they will be required to pay is not in the hands of the government but is in the control of the major oil companies. The production, refining and distribution of petroleum in Canada is in the hands of foreign controlled multinational corporations. Some 91 per cent of our production and 99 per cent of our refining capacity is in the hands of this gigantic octopus, which is not concerned either with security of supply or with fairness of price. Their concern is making money. If that means leaving Canadians short of their requirements or compelling them to pay exorbitant prices, so be it.

We saw that this last winter when oil shortages in the United States pushed up prices to the point where it was more profitable to export Canadian oil to the United States, even if Canadians were going short. Only when the minister summoned up enough courage to impose export controls, first on oil and then on gasoline, were Canadians west of the Ottawa Valley given some security of supply. But this did not stop the increase in the price of oil which has gone up some 37 per cent, an increase of 95 cents per barrel in less than a year.

On September 4, this faint-hearted government finally acted, not to cut back the unjustified price increase but merely to hold the line. Now, we are witnessing the major oil companies playing the same game in eastern Canada. For years we have had the bland assurance that if we shipped our western crude to the United States we need have no fear about security of supply in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. The NDP has always contended that in an emergency, the U.S. based oil companies would ensure supplies for the United States at Canada's expense. At present there is said to be a gap of 100,000 barrels per day between eastern Canada's need and the quantity of oil being imported. Some western crude has been diverted to eastern Canada by four companies, which have shipped the oil down through the seaway. When the freeze up comes this will no longer be possible. The quantity that can be moved by road and rail is insufficient to prevent hardship.

The inquiries made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the diversion of offshore oil intended for Canada to the United States have, in my opinion, been superficial and the replies we have received would not deceive anyone less naïve than the minister. Yesterday the minister said, as recorded at page 7182 of Hansard:

> . . . I have had replies from Canadian refiners, particularly the two refiners mentioned by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville . . .

It is significant that he made no reference to the marketing branches of the parent companies. Apparently he did not ask them whether there had been any diversion. It is significant that no reference has been made to the shipping register. Therefore, we do not know whether or not ships which were destined for Canada, ships carrying oil to Canadian ports, were diverted and, if so, by whose orders?

The minister said today that he knows of no ships having been diverted. The oil industry seems to think that ships have been diverted; otherwise, how does one explain the shortage which is being experienced in eastern Canada? A report from Calgary, which appeared in the Globe and Mail on October 23, gives the views of persons in the oil industry. I shall quote from that report, as follows:

Oil

The recent diversion of several ocean-going tankers loaded with oil destined for Canada to U.S. ports is said to have contributed to the present shortage of crude oil in Quebec and Eastern Canada.

Industry sources suggest that diversion of tankers from their original Canadian destinations to U.S. ports began as a ploy in the final week of September to circumvent the Arab restrictions on the direct flow of oil to the United States.

The tankers are either owned or leased by the same international oil companies that operate within Canada and overseas and which are mostly headquartered in the United States.

According to information in Calgary, the tankers destined to Canadian ports have 'not been hijacked' but merely ordered to change directions 'under the complex and global marketing and supply patterns of major companies.'

If one wants to know who really decides where oil will go, one ought to read the next paragraph in the article, which says:

An industry expert with the Canadian subsidiary of an international oil company who asked that he not be named said that there was 'nothing sinister' in diverting Canadian-bound tankers to the United States and added that most U.S. planners believe that Canada 'could get by' with the remaining oil imports.

We have come to a pretty pass when United States planners decide whether or not we can get by, and whether or not oil destined for Canada can be diverted to some other port.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: This country desperately needs an oil policy as part of an over-all energy policy. Most of the government's views, as contained in the energy report tabled a few weeks ago, have already been repudiated by the government or overtaken by the rush of events. In this debate it is not possible to cover the whole field of oil policy. Nevertheless, some decisions ought to be taken without delay if our present situation is not to deteriorate into a Canadian oil crisis by the end of this decade.

My colleagues and I have put forward three proposals that should be acted upon immediately. The first is:

The setting up of a publicly-owned National Petroleum Corporation to enter into bilateral arrangements with oil-producing states and to supervise the marketing of oil in Canada.

Many nations are seeking to bypass the oil cartel. They want to deal directly with governments. Japan and West Germany have both entered into bilateral trade arrangements with oil producing countries. Exporting countries represented by OPEC have also rebelled against exploitation by multinational companies and have publicly indicated their desire for bilateral agreements. This is true of countries like Libya, Nigeria and also Venezuela. The minister himself said, after returning from a visit to Venezuela, that the government of Venezuela would like to deal with a national petroleum corporation. As recorded on page 7183 of Hansard, the minister said:

It is not so much the ingress of the commodity into Canada as its egress from the supplying states that is the problem.

Of course that is the problem. The best way to resolve it is by following the example of other countries which have entered into state trading agreements with oil producing countries. That way we can be assured of continuity of supply.

A national petroleum corporation would also ensure continuity of supply and stability of price in this country.

[Mr. Douglas.]

That is what consumers of Canada have the right to expect. They do not want to be at the mercy of foreign-owned corporations which are responsible to nothing except the balance sheet. Such a petroleum corporation would also be able to allocate oil supplies, so as to ensure that every region of Canada has its needs met. As well, it would be able to encourage the processing of more of our oil in Canada and the development of a petro-chemical industry in Canada, an industry which we have the capacity to develop.

The second proposal which we are putting forward in a motion is as follows:

The extension of the oil pipeline to Eastern Canada and the bringing of the Inter-Provincial pipeline under Federal Government ownership.

I, for one, have been arguing in this House for ten years now in support of the advisability of extending that pipeline to Montreal. The present minister and his predecessors had given us a variety of reasons to show why this could not be done. There have been arguments about economic viability, which the independent petroleum producers of Canada completely demolished in their brief. We were then told that there would be enough oil in the Atlantic provinces to meet the needs of eastern Canada. That hope, of course, has turned out to be unfounded.

On September 4 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced a policy for the extension of the pipeline to Montreal, something that should have been agreed on at least ten years ago. We have no right to leave large sections of our population at the mercy of the world's oil producing companies, especially when we have adequate supplies in Canada to meet our needs. The building of that pipeline should be begun just as quickly as the government can make the necessary arrangements. I believe that public opinion in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces will support the government in this regard.

Further, we think that such a pipeline ought to be publicly owned, because pipelines will be the future means of transporting many commodities. They are too important to be left in the hands of oil companies which have no responsibility whatsoever for ensuring proper distribution and providing adequate supplies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: We believe that such a pipeline ought to be reversible so that when offshore oil is cheaper, it can be used and moved further west, thereby conserving our own oil which is rapidly running out. If we are in danger with regard to price or supply from oil producing countries, western Canadian crude could flow into the Quebec and Atlantic provinces when it is needed. As a matter of fact, I agree with the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) who was pressing this afternoon for extending this pipeline through Canada rather than leaving ourselves completely at the mercy of another country by having it pass through the United States, with all the complications that may arise if we decided to loop that line at any time.

The third proposal we have put forward is the ensuring of future supplies by entering into negotiations with the provinces concerned for the development of the oil sands by a joint federal-provincial Crown corporation. While it is true that Canada can meet its oil needs for the present, our supplies of conventional crude have a life index of only 10 to 12 years. There are some authorities who would set the figure much lower than that. By the end of this decade, our oil production will have peaked and we will be required to look at other sources of energy.

We are fortunate in having one of the largest potential sources of oil in the world in the oil sands of Alberta and Saskatchewan. The potential is many times the quantity of potential crude we had at the turn of a century and, if properly developed, could meet our needs for many decades. We are not talking about a small quantity of oil. The estimated potential is some 300 billion barrels. When we consider our present conventional supply is about 10 billion barrels, we will be aware of the fact that the oil sands in Alberta and Saskatchewan could be a life saver for Canada, if properly developed and the production made available to our people. If we have learned anything from the past, it is not to allow such a vital resource to fall into the clutches of the major oil companies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: We must not repeat the mistakes of the past, the mistakes we made when we allowed 91 per cent of our oil production to fall into the hands of foreign controlled companies. If we are to develop these oil sands for the benefit of the people of Canada, it should be under public ownership and it should be through a federal-provincial Crown corporation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: If we are going to develop the oil sands through a joint federal-provincial Crown corporation, it should be for the purpose of making sure that the oil from those sands will be available to the Canadian people, not only today, but tomorrow and for generations yet to come.

The oil companies which make up the consortium that is seeking to build the Syncrude plant are talking about approaching the federal government. They want to be exempted from price controls, export controls and export tax. What does this mean? It means only one thing. The three major companies involved in that proposed development have in mind the development of the oil sands for the purpose of shipping oil to the United States where they can get a much better price than they can get in Canada. I will fight to the death against any move to turn this tremendous deposit over to companies which want to take this oil, as they have taken so much of our other oil, out of Canada for the purpose of making a profit by selling the birthright of the Canadian people wherever they can make a fast buck out of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I believe the federal government should open negotiations with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan with regard to the immediate development of these oil sands. The federal government is levying an export tax of 40 cents per barrel on all oil shipped out of this country. I support that move. I think it was a good one. However, I believe that 40 cents a barrel should be returned to the provinces which produce the oil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I believe the federal government should negotiate with the provinces to see if they would be prepared to use that money as their equity share in a joint corporation to develop the oil sands. That would enable these two governments to put in $180 million a year. I think the federal government ought to match that.

In a way, the federal government owes these two provinces that amount as a result of fixing the price in Canada on September 4. I supported that move and still do. However, these provinces did lose some money on the royalty they would have collected if the domestic price would have kept pace with the export price. I am not suggesting that the federal government can rectify that, but in view of the fact they have not put a price ceiling on any goods other than oil, Alberta and Saskatchewan have a just complaint.

In my opinion, the federal government should, as a quid pro quo, say quite properly to the oil producing provinces, we are prepared to put in another $180 million along with returning the export tax to them. That would total $360 million a year. It would supply the equity capital plus what loan capital could be floated on the market to begin building plants for the extraction of oil from the oil sands in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I am sure hon. members realize the seriousness of the situation. By the year 1980, we will be in trouble with regard to our oil supplies. As far as Canadian crude is concerned, it will not cut off instantly. It will begin to phase out. We will probably pass our peak by 1977 or 1978. By the end of this decade, we will be facing a very serious situation. If we do not do something about it now, we will probably panic at that time and unnecessarily spend huge sums of money on a crash program which could be avoided by starting now.

It is estimated we will have to build a plant approximately every 18 months in order to have sufficient capacity to produce oil from the oil sands by the time our normal conventional crude has run out. That means we have to start soon.

I hope the minister will tell us today whether he is interested in opening negotiations with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. No one is going to tell me we cannot raise the money to develop the oil sands. If the federal and provincial governments will put in the equity capital and offer participation by the Canadian public, I am sure thousands of Canadians would invest in the development of it. For the past few years the government has been talking about a $6 billion pipe line to bring Prudhoe Bay oil down to the United States, a project which will do no good at all for Canada but which will be a convenience to the United States. No one can tell me that the government and the people of Canada cannot find sufficient money to develop these oil sands so that when our children and their children face the prospect of being without oil, the oil sands will have come into production and will meet their needs not only in this century but for several decades into the next century.

I believe this is one of the most important decisions facing the people of this country. We must not wait until the crisis is upon us. We must begin to plan now so that when our conventional sources of supply dry up, plants in the oil sands will be ready to go on stream. I need not remind hon. members that ours is a technological society. It is true there could be some reduction in our consumption of oil. We might be able to persuade people to drive smaller cars and insulate their homes better so that they would use less gasoline and home heating fuel. The fact remains that our transportation system, much of our industry and practically all of our agriculture production are dependent upon adequate supplies of oil at reasonable prices.

I wonder whether hon. members have ever considered that if we had to go back to the horse to produce the food the people of Canada need, 40 per cent of our population would be needed on the land instead of 10 per cent as at present. We could not feed ourselves if we lacked oil for tractors, combines and other farm equipment. We can no longer leave our future development in the hands of foreign oil companies. Parliament, this parliament, must take the initiative in pressing for a workable oil policy to meet Canada's needs before it is too late.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Douglas: Yes, of course.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am trying to clarify the hon. gentleman's position on the disposition of the export tax. Do I understand him to say that if the royalty which the provinces would have received from the increased price was made good to the provinces he would still insist that the additional amount which would have accrued to the company benefit should be given back to the province as well?

Mr. Douglas: I am not suggesting the federal government should pay the province the amount the provinces would have collected in royalties from an increased price in the domestic field. I sought to make two points. First, the federal government should return the 40 cents a barrel to the provinces but I would make it conditional that they be prepared to use that money for the development of the oil sands. Second, in view of the fact that these provinces are not getting a royalty on domestic oil they would have received had the federal government not, quite properly, applied a price freeze, I think the government has some moral obligation to put a considerable amount of federal funds into the development of the oil sands.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry I must interrupt the hon. member who is replying to the minister's question, but his time has expired.

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): It is not possible Mr. Speaker, to read the motion put before this House by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) without reaching the inescapable conclusion that the New Democratic Party has once again sacrificed the public interest to party survival, and sought to conceal that betrayal of the public interest with a mask of compassion.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Speaker, the opening paragraph appears to deal with the current urgent crisis in oil supplies, a crisis which threatens Canadians in the immediate winter months ahead with difficulties in connection with transportation, heating, industrial unemployment and rising prices. The motion urges the government to take immediate steps to solve these difficulties. Mr. Speaker, what "immediate steps" is the House to ask the government to take?

As a preliminary step to the "immediate steps", the government is asked to set up a national corporation to contract with oil-producing states and, once the oil is obtained, to supervise the marketing of the oil. Parliament has set up a number of national corporations. We might estimate that such a corporation, once constituted by parliament, will take a couple of years to negotiate and contract at the international level.

As another preliminary step, Mr. Speaker, the House is asked to authorize the government to extend the oil pipeline to eastern Canada and to bring such a pipeline under federal ownership. It is common knowledge that construction of such an extension will take at least until 1976.

Then, as the final preliminary step, we are to ask the government to ensure future oil supplies by negotiating with the concerned provinces for the development of the oil sands by another Crown corporation. Even the NDP draftsman boggled at describing this project in any other time context but "the future"; yet he managed to include it as a "preliminary step" to be taken before any "immediate steps".

These "preliminary steps" that are to be taken before any "immediate steps", are long-term projects, Mr. Speaker. They are, whatever their merits, simply not relevant to ensuring that there is continuity of supply to Canadians at fair and just prices this month, in November and December of this year, and in the winter and spring months of 1974. Canada, eastern Canada in particular is facing a crisis in the energy field. Contrary to the view put forward by many, however, I suggest that this crisis is not one of an inadequate supply of energy fuels in Canada but, rather, an organizational crisis caused by failure to arrange for adequate supplies of energy to be at the appropriate place in terms of consumer demand at the appropriate time. It is, in other words, a crisis created by the lack of a coherent energy policy on the part of the federal government, concerning which much has already been said. A great deal more will be said, I am sure, in the weeks and months ahead.

If Canadians now and throughout the winter months become caught in a situation of inadequate supplies of energy fuels, blame for the situation must rest squarely on the shoulders of the present government because of its failure to undertake meaningful consultation on energy matters with the producing provinces, with the industry itself and with the foreign crude oil suppliers as well as its heavy-handed approach to policy implementation and the complete lack of a national energy policy consistent with the conditions prevailing at the present time.

Instead, we are presented with a policy-making process which can only be described as ad hocery with the government appearing to lurch from energy crisis to energy crisis and, in the process, antagonizing the western provinces, the petroleum industry and our American customers to the south. Eventually, I predict this antagonism will be shared by the eastern Canadian consumer if he finds during the winter months ahead that he is short of fuel for his home and gasoline for his automobile. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the main victim of the current energy crisis in Canada is the Canadian consumer.

The current energy crisis has a national character. In the Maritimes, failure to protect sources of supply has left the provinces at the mercy of middle east oil cut-offs and tanker diversions to other destinations. Dependence in these provinces on offshore oil supplies may leave maritime consumers at the mercy of the OPEC countries. In Quebec and Ontario, consumers may have insufficient oil this winter. As much of this oil comes from the Caribbean area, and as much of these supplies may be diverted to the United States to meet shortages there, the industry is now scrambling to implement emergency plans to prevent possible shortages this winter. But can the federal government assure the consumers of Quebec and Ontario that there will be no shortages during the winter months? In Quebec and Ontario, as elsewhere in the country, the price of gasoline, home heating oil and other oils has been rising rapidly. What measures does the federal government propose to protect the consumer from unreasonable price increases for his fuel supplies?

In western Canada, the federal government's mixture of arrogance and complacency has created resentments and antagonisms that will long endure. Imposition of the export tax without prior consultation with the producing provinces, and without a clear-cut commitment to these provinces that the revenue so generated by their oil would be returned to them in total, has further weakened the cause of federalism in Canada and will not soon be forgiven or forgotten by the provinces concerned.

In its approach to formulating national energy policies, this government is once again resorting to techniques developed and discredited during its first term of office. A flattering name for its participatory democracy. In practice, however, it amounts to leadership from the rear. Its loose-jointed experiments in policy formulation in parliament are largely responsible for this government's unimposing legislative record. But here we go again in a matter of vital national concern, a national energy policy for which the government has repeatedly stated it gave high priority.

In December 1972, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced that the government expected to have a national energy policy ready to present to parliament in June. There was no policy in June, or in July, or August, or September, or October. Instead, there have been a series of ad hoc policy decisions implemented in a heavy handed manner and of questionable utility. Canada has a pressing need to establish clear national policies on energy matters to ensure that Canadians get the clean energy they must have at the best possible price with the least possible disruption of the rest of the economy and with a minimum impact of the environment.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the time is long overdue for this government to define clearly and precisely for the Canadian people energy policies at the national level which, in turn, must be based on broad national objectives. I further suggest that the most important such broad national objectives would include the basic need to maintain a secure supply of energy for the Canadian people, to be available to it at competitive prices; the need to safeguard our national security; the need to ensure that any export of energy supplies be on terms that produce a net benefit to our nation; the need to maintain a vigorous and healthy energy industry; the need to align energy policy goals with other national objectives, including environmental protection, control of our own economy and the protection of the rights of our native people; and finally, the need to maintain a flexible energy policy posture so as to be capable of responding to changing world conditions.

I submit that Canada is not experiencing an energy crisis in terms of a long-term capability to meet our supply requirements. However, by its inertia, by its lack of a comprehensive policy, the government is in grave danger of creating such a crisis. Unless the current uncertainty affecting the future operations of the industry in our frontier areas is resolved so that exploration and development may proceed in an orderly and economic manner, future shortages may very well result; and therein lies our greatest danger.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in the motion that the hon. gentleman has brought forward today he has included several concepts that have been very much under discussion, either because they have already been canvassed frequently over the years—such as the Montreal pipeline extension—or because they were canvassed very extensively in the energy analysis or in other public statements that I have made. I find in the three different points that he makes, some points to agree with, some points which have already been stated and which he knows go in the government's direction, but there are other viewpoints that I do not share.

Basically, the three questions that he raises are all related to the substantial issues that are facing us at the present time, and which have faced us particularly during these past several weeks as a result of pressure from the external changes in energy supply and the fact that that supply of oil that North America has in relative terms has been declining, with increasing dependence being placed on overseas supplies, supplies which as I say have already been put under pressure by reason of political events in the Middle East.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) reviewed the historical events by which we got to this point. However, he very carefully left out, in the course of his analysis, what was really the substantial and the critical factor involved in the energy policy which was enunciated in 1961, and which until recently we have been following, namely that western Canadian oil—that is, Alberta and Saskatchewan oil—was at a substantial price disadvantage and was substantially more expensive than oil that was available elsewhere throughout the world. Overseas oil was available at the beginning of that particular decade at relatively low cost and, contrary to what the hon. gentleman said, it was available till toward the very end of the decade at even lower cost.

Let me say on behalf of the policy that was enunciated by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) and carried forward by subsequent governments that, on the whole, it made basic sense to put Canada in the position where we could buy cheaply for our market and sell abroad at higher prices. I think the policy at that time was good from the standpoint of Canadian consumers. Perhaps the only group of Canadian consumers who suffered from the policy was those that I represent in central Ontario. But from the standpoint of Canadian consumers east of the Ottawa Valley line, they were at a distinct price advantage in terms of cheaper off-shore oil; and from the standpoint of the producers in western Canada, the policy provided them with a protected market, which in the years of over-supply during the late 1950's and early 1960's had proved to be a substantial depressant on the growth of that industry. The industry has grown and prospered because of that policy, and on the whole I think it was a sound one.

The two principal external events which brought about a change in this policy, events which have accelerated in the last several years, were firstly the very substantial shift in North American demand, and principally United States demand, which theretofore was very substantially self-sufficient in oil; secondly, the combined action by the governments of the member states of the OPEC countries in getting together to agree to force up the international price of oil.

The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that there were high profits made. I do not think there is any doubt that this has been a very profitable industry for the investors and companies involved. But the problems which the Canadian consumers have in the eastern Canadian market today, and indeed throughout the whole Canadian market, I think it is fair to say are not the result of company action but rather the result of foreign government action. I made a careful note of his reference to the OPEC action, and in terms of international relations I think it has been a very legitimate action.

The hon. member referred to the efforts of the OPEC countries to rebel against the low prices that had been forced upon the producers in those countries by the actions of the international oil companies. On the one hand, it may be commendable that this group of member states, most of them in the third world, should be able to recoup a better return for their resources; after all, this is what we in Canada say. On the other hand, it is fair to remember that the other side of the coin is that we, as Canadians, are going to wind up paying more money for our oil supplies. Judging by the motion that has been put forward by the hon. member, I take it that neither he nor his party is proposing that we should totally eliminate foreign oil from the Canadian market but should indeed remain dependent, to some degree at least, on supplies of foreign oil.

The fact of the matter is that for a period of time—and I think here of the OPEC action in combination with a price increase—there has been general collective action toward greater state involvement which has been taken in different ways, depending on the country concerned. For example, the action in Iran, with its history of struggle in the oil industry, has been different from the action taken in Venezuela. However, a precise trend leading to greater state involvement on the producing side has been taking place. There is, therefore, concern on the consuming side, in this case Canada, as to whether the structure of our market should be left to the internationals and their affiliates in the producing and consuming countries, or whether state action should now be taken.

As the House knows, I had an opportunity of reviewing this question in the very recent past with the minister concerned in Venezuela who indicated frankly it was their intention not to wait until concessions expired there in 1983, but to seek action and agreement with the companies requiring closer control of Venezuelan oil companies or producers in order that the public interest in Venezuela would control production. Venezuela made it clear to me that, in terms of security of supply agreements—and I will just interpolate here, whatever one might plan with regard to the Montreal refining market, it would appear that the effects of geography and economics would indicate some dependency in some parts of the eastern Canadian market on overseas supplies—in future planning for the Canadian petroleum market some portion of the petroleum will continue to come from overseas. It would be desirable if possible, as the hon. gentleman said, to try to establish that supply in terms of long-term contracts.

Indeed, Venezuelans indicated they would be prepared or interested in negotiating a long-term contract, but indicated that the primary vehicle for this purpose should be a national government entity rather than an affiliate or affiliates of various corporations in Canada. It is for that reason that this is one concept the government will have to take into account in its current consideration of policy to establish a national petroleum corporation in this country.

The term "national petroleum corporation" has become something of a pressman's cliché, being passed on from newspaper editorial to newspaper editorial without any real evidence in my opinion that the authors of the articles approving the concept have really thought about what substantive questions a national petroleum corporation would solve that other policy measures or private organizations in the market could not solve.

I should like to take a minute to comment on at least two areas which may be relevant in Canadian terms, and may be a cause for consideration in this country. The first possible role for a national petroleum corporation is again what I have just referred to, that is a vehicle for acquiring a government-to-government agreement to ensure the long-term supply for the Canadian market. I am quite confident that no OPEC country is going to tie its hands in respect of price. We in Canada in our export policy have at no time been prepared to tie our hands in respect of the price of export oil, and we cannot expect that they would do so abroad. I think we should be entitled to assure ourselves of whatever the reasonable international price may be as determined from time to time by comparison with competitive conditions, and we should at least be assured of supply. A national petroleum corporation, as I have said, could be a vehicle for an agreement of that kind.

The second of the ways in which a national petroleum corporation could be of value, and potentially could be of direct assistance in executing Canadian oil policy, would be in respect of the collection of economic rent which in future in the petroleum industry will arise very substantially from lands both in the high Arctic and offshore which fall under the jurisdiction of the government of Canada. In effect, an international petroleum corporation would be taking a role on the production side and possibly through the industry would be involved directly in the exploration and development field, or by taking the government of Canada benefits arising from oil and gas land regulations as they may be from time to time, and by taking these assets of the oil in kind, be itself a producer, or acquire the commodity for sale on the Canadian market.

The hon. gentleman made reference to this concept not being without precedent in Canada. Indeed, it has been one that has been experienced in Canada in the petroleum industry. Of course, the most outstanding and successful example in the recent past has been that in regard to Panarctic Oils. In the more distant past, we have had the experience of Eldorado and Atomic Energy of Canada, both in the energy area although in respect of nuclear power.

So, the concept of a national corporation for the purpose of collecting economic rent is one that is neither novel to us nor one we should disregard as a possible means of making sure that as these non-renewable resources are developed a very substantial portion of the benefits should remain in Canada, either indirectly through the economic activity they create or directly through the payment of economic rent to the Canadian public interest for the benefit of Canadians.

There is a third role here, and this is where I think there may be some relevance to the third part of the hon. member's motion, and that is with regard to the role of the government of Canada in relation to the development of our oil sands. If I may say so, I was a little surprised to hear from a former premier of Saskatchewan a full reference to oil sands, some of which are in northern Saskatchewan, but principally in Alberta, but no reference to the heavy oil in the Lloydminster field. Whether we talk about Cold Lake or Lloydminster, we also have some very substantial deposits of petroleum in both Alberta and Saskatchewan which, if the technological problems of lifting the heavy oil can be solved, will along with the oil sands provide a very substantial reserve for the future in Canada.

In both these areas, I think it is perfectly evident that a great deal of expenditure is required in terms of research and development of the resource. In the case of the Athabasca oil sands, while a great deal is known by individual lessees about individual properties, I think I am correct in saying there is not very substantial knowledge about the full dimensions of the deposit, about its qualitative differences from level to level, about the impact of certain kinds of in situ recovery processes, or whether if the right kind of process is not used you might make it more difficult rather than less difficult to get the oil out. Above all, of course, not much is known about the most efficient in situ method to get to the oil resources.

Certainly, a critical fact with regard to the oil sands, it seems to me, is not with regard to the 65 billion barrels which the energy analysis estimated was accessible through the customary open-pit mining techniques, but rather how we get at the 250 or more billion barrels of oil which at the present time are not regarded as recoverable by conventional techniques and in respect of which an in situ technique will have to be developed.

I agree with the hon. gentleman that there will have to be substantial public expenditures involved. Indeed, the government has already declared itself on this point at the Western Opportunities Conference, when it indicated at that time its willingness to enter into research and development programs in conjunction with western provinces for the purpose of not only developing and determining the limits and best means of reaching these various western deposits, but also for bringing them into development.

That proposal was not confined only to petroleum of the various non-conventional kinds to which I have referred, but referred as well to the possible development of the coal resources in that particular area. I think a lot of public money will have to go into this, and one of the least advantageous ways as far as I am concerned would be research and development grants made available to the existing petroleum corporations. I think if public funds are to be expended for the purpose of developing the technology to deal with this unique Canadian resource, we should be thinking in the same terms we thought of in respect of Eldorado and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. So far as the federal government is concerned, the know-how, the patents and the other information developed from this should be held in a public form in a public corporation, and this should be carried out, because of the jurisdictional division, in conjunction with a similar corporation on the provincial side.

So, this represents a further very important area of endeavour in the development of additional Canadian petroleum resources at a time when we have identified, as detailed in some length through the energy analysis, conventional Canadian resources which are accessible by present gathering systems, and at a time when we are moving into the non-conventional resources in order to ensure a substantial supply of petroleum products for the future.

The hon. gentleman referred to the question of the export tax, a question which we will have occasion to debate in this House when, in due course, the ways and means motion comes up for consideration. In connection with the export tax and division of the proceeds, this is a question on which I hope to have further discussion next Monday in conjunction with my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) with the Alberta ministers who are coming down to talk about this and the Syncrude project. It seems to me—this is the position I have taken and I think the hon. gentleman disagrees although I am not sure I quite understood his answer—that in effect the provinces should be made good on the royalties that they would have obtained, not so much if the export tax had not been put on but if we had not put a domestic freeze on the price.

In other words it was not the export tax that has deprived the provinces of revenue; it is the fact that we have put a freeze on the price whether for export or for sale to the Canadian market. So I would agree that if 40 cents a barrel appears to be the differential in any particular month, it is not unreasonable for the provinces to expect that the royalties they might have received would be returned to them. I am not sure I would quite agree with the hon. gentleman that they should receive the additional funds, which in effect once the provincial royalty is paid would have gone into the company account, would have been exigible for federal income tax or available for company use, either in that province or more probably as has been the experience in the last year or so for diversion outside the province, and even outside Canada for engaging in other exploration activities.

I am not all together sure that it necessarily follows that, too, should be paid directly into the provincial account. I do think there is a nexus here between the windfall, if you like, or a fund both for the province and for the federal government, and the subject I was previously discussing, namely the very heavy expenditures in a research program. As I have indicated already to the Alberta ministers, we would see substantial sums of money being placed to back up that undertaking we made at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference for the purpose of developing these resources in western Canada, and developing them of course for the benefit of western Canadians but also for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Stanfield: With a tax on their produce.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman says "with a tax on their produce". There is a tax on the produce of all Canadians.

Mr. Stanfield: Not like this.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It seems to me that if the province has chosen to pick a particular level of royalty as being the best and equitable return to that province from the resource, then we should take their word for it. The additional revenue, of course, is one that the province itself could not have raised by any form of export or removal tax. To that extent, it is a revenue in the public area that they would not have obtained by any tax method.

Several other questions are raised by the motion of the hon. gentleman which it seems to me were not very fully dealt with in his remarks. In particular it is not clear to me, to pick up the last part of the first sentence, how the national petroleum corporation would supervise the marketing of oil in Canada. Certainly, the experience with national corporations in other parts of the world has been that on the whole, at least down at the refining and retail marketing level, a national corporation instead of being a fully competitive entity has almost provided a price umbrella under which the internationals have been able to compete without any difficulty at all.

I think the real question to be decided in our mind is whether we need to put the national corporation to work at all the levels of the highly vertically integrated industry, or whether there are some levels particularly at the production and wholesale supply end in which a national corporation could operate most effectively. It was not clear to me from what the hon. gentleman said, given the relative shortage of these large sums of capital in Canada, what particular advantage would accrue from nationalizing the pipelines in Canada. It is difficult to pick a type of company which is more subject to regulation in this country than a pipeline company is in relation to other elements of public policy by the setting of the tariff and by the other controls established through the province, if it is under the jurisdiction of a province, or a national pipeline corporation where the jurisdiction is established through a regulatory tribunal.

The pipeline does not ensure the supply. The supply comes from the production which is held elsewhere. Pipelines really only perform a service in relation to the supply. If private capital is prepared to be placed in that particular area on the whole, given only a limited pool of public capital, I would rather put it in the area where the big public gain is to be made in terms of the return from the resource with necessarily the lower return which may be safer but which is available in terms of a pipeline owned by a pipeline corporation.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, we are in a position where, with rapidly accelerating events in the energy scene, particularly in the petroleum industry, we are at the moment in the process of changing from the oil structure we had known before, not only nationally but internationally. We have come to a situation where the major international corporations play the dominant role in seeking and developing the resources, and then later marketing them and controlling the price.

From the situation of control of companies which first brought OPEC into existence, we have moved into a situation where the companies are increasingly losing their power to control the situation and must increasingly go to government in order to get the support to carry on their operation. Whatever the political philosophy, whether one likes it or not, the fact of the matter is that the producing countries are moving into a situation where they are placing government more directly into the action and, ultimately, I think there is a trend toward closer government-to-government involvement. In that sense, a national entity under the Government of Canada can have increased leverage in dealing with this situation. It is the possible role of such a national entity in our over-all petroleum policy that is being given consideration by the government at this time.

If I could, just for a moment, I should like to make some reference to the security of supply question. This is a question that is of particular concern at the moment. The security of supply question has been a continuing concern ever since the commencement of our national oil policy, given the fact that some portion at least of the oil supply was coming from an area of the world with a certain political instability. There were interruptions in the supply to the Canadian market in the past in 1956 and 1967. In both cases, they were not prolonged interruptions and were ones in which the United States and western hemisphere sources were able to make good to the other oil users with not too much disadvantage by increasing production and increasing overseas shipments. The difference between those two crises and the present one is that the United States has now lost its capacity to pick up the slack.

The problem which is a matter of grave concern for us in eastern Canada is, of course, of monumental proportions to a country like Japan which has no indigenous supplies. From the standpoint of the Canadian government, we have followed a series of actions in attempting to handle the situation. The obvious and first starting point was to know whether an agreement could be achieved with the government of the United States in terms of assuring supply to eastern Canada, either from United States sources or from sources controlled by the United States government in the event of interruption. The obvious quid pro quo in this situation was that we have a very substantial delivery of oil into the United States market which at the present time is 1.2 million barrels a day, and the undertaking would be to assure that supply to the United States if they could supply a comparable assurance to us in Eastern Canada. In fact, it was not possible to get an American assurance in that regard. The best they could do was to assure their best efforts in the event of interruption, recognizing on the one hand that they would have intense political difficulties in certain parts of the United States if they had to divert oil from oil short parts of that country to Canada in order to honour such an agreement.

At the same time as those discussions were under way there were discussions within the framework of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. Those discussions broke down essentially because of the different positions of a number of the principal states involved, and Japan, being the most exposed, was the one most concerned about the slow development there.

As a result, the various countries went abroad on a bilateral basis to see if they could secure their supplies. It was on that basis that I indicated my intention, and later followed up the indication, to go to Venezuela to see under what circumstances that supply could be assured to Canada. While the indication there at the present time was that they did not expect to see a reduction in the supplies coming to the Canadian market, in the longer run a government arrangement would be necessary, of the kind I referred to earlier in my speech today. We have at the present time, in relation to security of supply, stocks of petroleum products which vary according to the nature of those products. In crude and certain other products we have about 45 days supply, and with regard to heating oil up over 100 days supply.

The capacity of the Canadian system, the Canadian productive system, to meet the requirements of eastern Canada is limited to a degree by the productive capacity in Alberta, but the greater limitation is the fact that there is not an effective delivery system from the end of the line in Sarnia to Montreal. It was really to overcome that security risk that the government undertook the decision in principle in favour of the Montreal pipeline, provided satisfactory arrangements could be worked out, among other things with the province of Quebec, to make certain that the province's plan for petroleum industry development would not be deflected by a pipeline. I am confident that in the aftermath of current events some of the reluctance on the part of Quebec to enter into that system will be overcome, and that we will see an extension of a pipeline of that kind. As I indicated earlier today, in answer to a question, that will be one of the priorities in ensuring supplies to the Canadian market.

The government entered into discussions with the eastern Canadian producers and importers, commencing as early as June last, to deal with heating oil supplies because of the general international shortage of this refined product, and but for the potential interruption in supplies from the Middle East there was a general feeling in the industry that heating oil requirements could be adequately covered by the supplies that would be made available through the winter. This will bear careful attention and examination as time goes on, and indeed the National Energy Board is monitoring certain of the markets on virtually day to day basis, and on a basis of several times a week in other cases. The critical period is within the next 45 days, when the navigation season is open, and one of the questions we have to meet is to make sure the product is moved to the right place to be available in time for winter supplies.

I am obliged to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands for creating this occasion today to talk about some of these matters, allowing me to give the government's views on these various issues. I will listen with interest to some of the other contributions made to this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Absolutely.

Mr. Stanfield: It is on the subject of the immediate supply problem. I am not sure that the minister understood my question during the question period. Has his department or the National Energy Board been informed, not necessarily directly by the producing company in Saudi Arabia, either directly or indirectly, that that company has been instructed by the government of Saudi Arabia to ban shipments of oil to Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we were given advice that ARAMCO had received instructions of this kind from the Saudi Arabia government. We have also had conflicting—

Mr. Stanfield: You were given that information?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We received information that that kind of instruction had been given. We also received conflicting information as to whether or not this would be the case, as to whether or not the government of Saudi Arabia would distinguish Canada from the United States in terms of its embargoes. Very naturally, the Canadian purchasing companies that purchase oil from ARAMCO are pursuing this question. The government of Canada will be pursuing it also. At the moment, I do not think it can be confirmed that there will be an interruption in supply from Saudi Arabia.

May I just say that it is my earnest hope that there will not be any such interruption and that, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) said, Saudi Arabia will see that Canada has attempted to play a balanced role in this issue, and that neither the interests of Saudi Arabia nor of Canada would be served by that kind of interruption.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I, of course, share the minister's hope, but in the interests of informing the Canadian people on an important subject, may I again ask has it not been indicated to the government that such instructions were given by the government of Saudi Arabia to the producing company, although the minister is seeking clarification? I do not think we should keep information from the Canadian people.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think I am correct in saying that the information which came to me from one source was that this has happened. Another source says that this is not necessarily so. We intend to have the matter clarified.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister a further question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): If we are to pursue the questioning of the minister, we should at this time get unanimous consent because, while he was answering the previous questions his time expired. Does the House give unanimous consent to allow the minister to answer a few more questions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: Last Thursday the minister said that he was making inquiries as to whether or not the 5 per cent reduction per month proposed by the Arab states was applicable to Canada. Has he been able to secure any information on whether that reduction is applicable to Canada? Secondly, has he received any indication that the action by Saudi Arabia or Abu Dhabi is due to the fact that there has been a report of a diversion of oil, destined for Canada, to U.S. ports, and that therefore any shipment to Canada is suspect as being a smokescreen for shipping oil to the United States?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is not clear to me, although the question has been pursued, whether or not this reduction will be applied to Canada. So far as we know, and this comes from the Canadian companies which themselves are in the direct role of purchasing and shipping, delivering to Canadian sites, supplies have not been interrupted. There is the instance I gave of Petrofina for which, I gather, the parent company buys and ships. In the case of Petrofina, a cargo invoiced for Canada through Portland was interrupted. We are seeking to clarify this situation with Abu Dhabi, as to whether they would recognize that that oil passing in bond through Portland would be regarded not as a U.S. invoice but as a Canadian one, and would therefore be exempt from that standpoint.

I would repeat something I said previously in comments to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) about the Arab governments, that in their actions they would, I hope, regard Canada as a country that tried to play a constructive and fair role in the crisis.

With regard to the internationals, I consider it would be an act of the grossest stupidity on their part to take action which would prejudice supplies of oil to Canada. They will have problems enough in supplying the American market, and it would be folly to go out of their way to put Canada in jeopardy. I think I might adopt what someone has said that such action would not be a crime but worse than a crime. It would be a gross blunder. I hope we have made that message very clear to the companies operating in Canada, and we hope it is understood by them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I find of great actuality the debate brought about by this motion. Explanations were given which satisfy Canadians more or less as there is increased fear of a shortage of resources. It is a very serious question that must be examined carefully if we want to make sure that Canada has sufficient oil supplies.

This situation has many causes that can be discussed this afternoon. There have been many suggestions from both sides, but I cannot say that I necessarily agree with what has been said up to now on methods of operation. First of all, we must make an evaluation of our natural resources, which is not difficult. We can see that Canada has oil wells that can supply its population and enable it to withstand difficult periods like this one.

I hope—at least I wish—that there will be some regulation for the benefit of the Canadian population.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the development of oil and gas deposits must secure sufficient revenues to industry to offset unprofitable expenses and cover all production costs, including depreciation, working expenses, overhead expenses, transportation costs and sufficient returns on invested capital. Revenues exceeding this amount are defined as being an "economic profit" and can be returned either to industry, or to the owner, that is usually the state, in some cases, of course.

In Canada, there are mostly private businesses; this practice should be perpetuated. Canada could take advantage of economic profit in two different ways: direct taxation by the state, in the form of royalties, various duties, entry fees or a discount to energy consumers, through a price reduction.

Both systems have some disadvantages. The first one, related to royalties, only applies at the production stage, except for possible returns from transportation, refining and marketing. Besides, consumers do not realize right away the advantages. To be 100 per cent efficient and to prevent misuse or a waste of energy, controls exercised over oil and gas prices should not only apply to wellhead production but as well, in a selective way, to a whole range of refined oil products.

The present system of collection of the economic profit at federal level is not flexible enough to be efficient in many situations of variable costs. While including provisions that provide for the reduction of royalties to encourage the development of small or medium deposits that have a low capacity at the wellhead, it allows industry to get an overly high profit in case of an important discovery and a particularly profitable operation.

It is not very useful or significant to compare fiscal and financial conditions in effect in Canada—duties and royalties—with those of other countries. Operating costs and market conditions vary a lot with countries and Canada must set financial conditions reflecting the very great differences between our resource capital and our degree of current expansion.

A revision of the present way of collecting economic profit in Canada is necessary if this country is to take fullest benefit from its natural resources. I think that the increase in oil marketing was highest at the tax level. Federal and provincial taxes on gas increased by 6.6 cents a gallon from 14.5 to 21.1 cents. In view of that, would companies be justified in increasing their prices, or should governments reduce their taxes on gas or oil?

We shall see later that oil companies do not seem to be justified in raising their prices because they make ever-increasing profits as a result of higher production.

Furthermore, governments do not seem to be ready to reduce their taxes on gas because they represent a good source of revenue and allow them to redistribute incomes from natural resources and, finally, can either discourage gas consumption which would result in less pollution or allow governments to further tax gas consumers, provincial and national highway users.

The reaching of an overall agreement should be considered so a true policy of oil marketing in Canada can be arrived at. I think we can do it. There is talk about a pipeline, about different organizations. However, if one considers oil-producing countries, Arab countries, for example, one finds in the first place that those countries incurred income losses as a result of the devaluation of the dollar. The same old dollar problem again. They want to be compensated and demand higher sale prices. As they have almost cornered the market, it is rather difficult for them to refuse to pay, unless they have other oil supply sources.

For example, let us consider the situation in the United States. They need oil imports. If supplies become more difficult to obtain, due to the requirements of Arab leaders who would like to see Washington let Israel down, there will be a shortage of oil in the United States unless they find other supply sources or develop other forms of energy.

The Canadian traveller in the United States was aware last summer of the real or artificial scarcity of oil. It seems, however, that the scarcity was indeed in the first place to get consumers to accept price increases for natural gas, gas and heating oil. As their known oil stocks can only last some ten years at the present rate of consumption, the United States must import. They are turning towards Venezuela and Canada.

Venezuela is not a safe source because of the political situation in South America, while Canada, if it wants to export its surpluses to the U.S., must rely on supplies from the Middle East to meet requirements in Quebec and in the Maritimes.

The situation is becoming complicated. Western oil companies want to export more to the United States because of the overproduction. Canada would like to get reserves but it would have to renegotiate the Canada-United States Automotive Products Agreement of 1965. The solution regarding the price we will have to pay for our gasoline probably lies around these two problems. Should we increase our exports, prices will have a tendency to rise. However, as we depend on the Middle East for supplies in eastern Canada, we should also expect a price increase. A trans-Canadian pipeline which would carry oil from the west to the Maritimes could ensure the independence of Canada regarding oil but we will have to pay the price.

So the members of Parliament are faced with a monetary problem. Yet we have all the necessary resources for providing adequate supplies for the Canadian people. Paradoxically, we are crippled by a price problem. We have the natural resources, but the members of this House are reluctant to find the means to develop them.

What would be the role of the government in the construction of a pipeline? Of course, this subject can be debated for three months before a final agreement is reached.

How do we finance the construction of a pipeline? Would we use the Bank of Canada or foreign capital? This question would result in another lengthy debate. Yet the natural resources are abundant in Canada. If the Canadian people had a monetary system suited to their needs, they would not be concerned about the oil supply.

All those questions need to be answered before we decide on a real oil policy. I do not intend to dwell on this subject, but in ending I would like to go back to a particular aspect which strikes anyone who has considered Canada's position as regards oil supply, well development and transport organization.

I wish hon. members would become aware of their responsibilities regarding the supply of oil, a product that is essential for driving and heating purposes. Members of Parliament should therefore resolve once and for all to use the famous Bank of Canada to develop our natural resources for the benefit of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I cannot stress enough the importance of this debate on energy, oil, the security of fuel supplies for Canadians and the price that Canadians must pay for fuel. That oil is the lifeblood of the nation is a truism, yet few Canadians stop to consider how great is our dependence on this fuel. Oil is used for heating as well as for moving automobiles and industry as well as farmers are dependent on this precious fuel.

Canadians have been alarmed, shocked and bewildered by the recent trend of events in the energy field. We have long been accustomed to the idea that we are, supposedly, a resource rich country; yet in eastern Canada we face the spectre of fuel rationing and the certainty of rising prices. Canadians are looking to the federal government for leadership and protection but are finding that the Liberal government too often reacts to the immediate turn of events instead of planning ahead and acting on the basis of that planning. We need careful planning and management with respect to our petroleum resources.

I listened with interest to the comments of the spokesman of the Conservative Party—

An hon. Member: One of them.

Mr. Symes: Yes, one of the spokesmen. He criticized our proposals in the motion as being long-term proposals which would take some years to implement. I waited to hear some immediate counterproposals put forward by his party, but none were forthcoming.

I listened with interest also to the comments of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). I feel, rather optimistically, that he may consider the contribution of my party as being worthwhile and accept our policy proposals concerning the national petroleum corporation, the extension of the pipeline to eastern Canada and the joint federal-provincial development of the oil sands. Spokesmen for the NDP will elaborate on these suggestions. I will deal with the extension of the pipeline.

We must examine the situation in Canada today if we are to see how past policies have brought us to the edge of the present crisis. Canada's energy demands have doubled during the past 12 years and are expected to increase at a faster rate in future. At present rates of consumption, our known reserves of oil will be depleted in 15 years. Some industry experts and reports now say that we will not be able to meet domestic demand seven years from now unless we develop the oil sands of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Thus, there is a problem concerning supply.

There are also difficulties concerning price. The market price is not controlled. As world oil prices have gone up, the multinational oil companies have used that upward price movement as an excuse to increase western Canadian oil prices. The price of Canadian crude has jumped by 40 per cent at the well head. This increase has been reflected in price increases of gasoline and heating fuels. Gasoline prices have risen by 10 per cent. Northern Ontario has been especially hard hit by these increases, as gasoline prices in my part of the country even before these increases, were higher than in the southern parts of the province. The price of heating oil and natural gas has also risen and the average householder can expect to pay about $70 more for heating this year than last year. We can only anticipate further price hikes.

As a result of the lack of a national energy policy, the consumer is suffering. Not only are the commodities mentioned affected; food prices also will be affected. They will go up because, as fuel costs to the farmer go up, food prices which reflect those costs will go up. The price of manufactured goods will increase, because industry must pay higher prices for fuel.

Inevitably, of course, the profits of the oil companies are going up. In 1972, the oil companies increased their profits by 20.4 per cent over 1971. For the first quarter of this year, those profits rose by 31.7 per cent over profits for the same quarter one year earlier.

We also face a predicament regarding supply, in the sense that Canada, a resource-rich country, must import 50 per cent of the oil used to meet domestic requirements. Why, Mr. Speaker? The reason lies in the government's past policy of drawing a line through the Ottawa Valley. Under that policy, western Canadian oil could not be transshipped to eastern Canada, and eastern Canada had to rely on oil imports to meet its needs. As the minister said, this policy worked to our advantage in the past in that the imported oil was cheaper than domestic oil. However, the government's lack of foresight is catching up with us. Not only are we facing the prospect of increased prices; we are facing the problem of lack of security of supply for eastern Canada.

The whole of eastern Canada depends on the Arab states for about 25 per cent of its oil imports and on Venezuela for about 50 per cent of its imports. Now, as a result of the situation in the Middle East, Arab states are threatening to cut back their supplies of oil to Canada, their reason being based on reports that American oil companies are diverting oil tankers bound for Canada to U.S. ports. There is the prospect of fuel rationing in eastern Canada.

Canadian consumers are without protection in the face of rising prices of oil on world markets. The consumers of eastern Canada are without protection, as they depend on imported oil, it being impossible at present to ship to that area sufficient quantities of western Canadian oil. We cannot allow this situation to continue. If we reduce exports to the United States to earlier levels and, more importantly, extend the oil pipeline to Montreal, we shall be able to meet Canadian domestic requirements. Incidentally, that has been the long standing policy of the NDP.

This fall, the NDP exerted pressure on the government and on September 4 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced that the oil policy concerning the Ottawa Valley line would be lifted and that the government would consider extending the pipeline from western Canada, which now dips down through the United States and re-enters Canada at Sarnia, to Montreal. The government is now negotiating with Quebec.

We still have no definite commitment on the extension of this line. During the minister's remarks this afternoon, I waited for some kind of commitment. We still have not got it. The oil companies are now desperately trying to bring some western Canadian oil to the eastern markets by the St. Lawrence Seaway. The problem is that it will freeze over. In addition, there is only a limited number of tankers available to carry that fuel. Meanwhile, eastern Canada remains dependent on foreign supplies. It is faced with cutbacks, rationing and price increases.

Obviously, we need a pipeline through eastern Canada. What would be the effects of such a pipeline? First, it would guarantee security of supply for western Canadian oil, and future oil from the tar sands could be transported to eastern Canada. We want to see a pipeline that is reversible. In other words, if for some reason world crude became less expensive, or if there were an oil find off the coast of Nova Scotia, that oil could be shipped to western Canada. In effect, there would be competition. I know the word "competition" is loathesome to the oil companies, but the consumers would benefit from this reversible pipeline. Canadians could purchase whichever fuel was cheaper.

The third thing I would like to see in addition to the extension to the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal would be a Canadian route through northern Ontario. That is the only way we can really have guaranteed security of supply. If we get into a nasty situation with the United States involving some kind of trade war with regard to oil, the United States could impose a throughput tax on oil which traversed pipelines through their territory. Canadians could end up paying more for western crude. If we had a Canadian route, we would avoid that predicament.

We would like to see all interprovincial pipelines brought under federal ownership. The minister said this would be expensive. Because of existing regulations, he could not see the advantage of such a move. Obviously, pipelines are going to be essential to a whole national energy policy, where they go and how they are looped. The question of pipelines involves the whole problem of transporting goods in the future. All existing pipelines should be under government control so that the government can plan with assurance for the supply of various regions of Canada in such a way that the national energy policy will work to the advantage of Canadians. Only with an extension of a pipeline, and future Canadian route, can we guarantee security of supply at a fair price through the concept of a reversible flow.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) outlined in some detail our porposal for a national petroleum company. I have examined some of the reasons we feel there is a need for an extension of the pipeline. Others will be developing the theme of the Athabasca tar sands.

Canadian oil resources should belong to Canadians and be used in the best interest of Canadians. Today, 91 per cent of our oil or gas wells are foreign-owned as well as 99 per cent of our petroleum refineries. As long as we allow the multinational oil industries to have a free hand in decision making and the control of marketing, they will exploit Canadian oil for their use and maximize their profits to the detriment of the Canadian consumer. It is time we as a nation regained control over what is rightly ours. We can only do this by implementing a national energy policy along the lines outlined by my party.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my opening phrase must be that I am deeply disappointed with the developments of the past three or four months. I think the reasons will become apparent as I say what I have to say.

In the debate on a similar motion by the New Democratic Party on May 29, I stated that in view of the great danger to Canada in the present situation and also the great opportunity, all parties should approach this question of an energy policy in a non-partisan way. With the efforts made in the standing committee, and with the rational type of debate that took place on May 29, the Canadian people had a right to expect that this attitude would continue.

In spite of the great opportunity that exists in Canada in this situation and, at the same time, the danger, I am deeply disappointed when I see this posing of politicians, pretending they are the friend of the consumer when everything they are doing is going to cause higher prices for the consumer. They pretend they are the great champion of the Canadian people against the great corporations. In these statements and in this attitude, I do not see any sincere effort to take advantage of the present opportunity that this world situation gives this country. Therefore, I begin my remarks with this feeling of pessimism and disappointment.

I took the minister at his word last spring when he assured us in committee, and in this House, there would be discussions with the provinces, industry and members of all parties to try to arrive at a type of national energy policy with both immediate and long-term implications, one that would help all Canadians achieve what is our manifest duty to achieve. I took the minister at his word. However, suddenly last month we had a rash of decision making. These decisions turned out to be gaffs, awkward movements. I suddenly realized there was no intention to carry out what I thought was a pledge to consult with this House, industry and certainly the provinces that own the resources, before embarking on actions or measures that may cause great harm. These actions may not only cause great harm to the consumer who has to pay for these amateur actions but, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) stated, to this very important and precious federal system that we have.

My remarks today are made against a background of feeling. I do not think I am harming anyone in Canada when I recall that this opportunity to Canada in the energy context really became clear to us when, in 1952, in a report to the United States president of that day, the Paley Commission told the American people they were running short of strategic resources, oil, gas, minerals. This report recommended that private industry in the United States should go about the world seeking access to these resources, supplies of which were likely to be severely restricted in the 'seventies and 'eighties.

The United States legislature passed taxation laws which gave incentives to United States investors to go into Brazil, into Africa and into Canada. These investors had a double advantage over Canadians because Canadian tax law was imposed on the premise that there should be a penalty imposed against Canadians investing in their own country. United States tax law provided there should be incentives and inducements for Americans to invest in Canada. Our provinces played their sad role. They set up laws and regulations which, in effect, killed the golden goose by taking all the money they could get quickly. The companies which had established themselves were only able to keep going because of circumstances which made it possible to pay these charges levied by the provinces. There is no one else to blame for the fact that a great bulk of our oil, and other natural resource industries in Canada, is owned by outsiders—no one but the provincial governments and the federal government. We could not have done a better job if we had tried to do it systematically.

So when this Paley Report came out, men of my generation who had travelled this country in the old fashion by canoe and on foot, did our level best to get Canadians to realize that there was a great opportunity open to them, even though the provinces had sold us out because of their ignorance as to the way in which our resources should be handled. Our position was that nobody was going to take our territories, and the land beneath the seas adjacent to our coasts, away from us.

I do not think members of my own party will mind if I recall that in 1957, within days of my becoming a minister on August 22, an order in council was passed which did away with the old oil and gas regulations and advised that new ones would be introduced giving Canadians facilities to own and develop their own resources. The first action of the new parliament in 1957, was to set up the Borden energy commission. In 1958, the Roads to Resources program was introduced—and well I remember sitting on the other side of this chamber and listening to the scoffing on this side. Roads from nowhere to nowhere, they said. There followed the doubling of the hydrographic service to measure the depth of the seas around our coast, and the establishment of the Institute of Oceanography in Halifax to chart ocean currents. Nations attending the Law of the Sea Conference in Geneva in 1958 heard the Canadian proposal that the land at the bottom of the sea should belong to the country beside that sea. This proposal was unanimously accepted and, today, half the bottom of the Atlantic, the Arctic and the Pacific off our coasts belongs to this nation.

In 1959, we set up the National Energy Board to control the export of gas, oil and electric power, and to control the building of pipelines because we felt that the best opportunity for Canadians to exercise any control over these natural resources was in the pipeline field. In 1961, we set up a national oil policy in response to the unilateral action taken by the United States in implementing policies placing impractical quotas on Canadian oil entering their country. We knew, from long observation of the way in which the oil business was conducted in the world, that the United States government had no more power over the international oil companies than did any other government. We knew enough about the working of the system to be able to say: We expect a barrel of oil to go out of this country for every barrel of oil that comes in. The international oil companies met this demand, so there was stability. A word in passing: Even though the oil business of the world, since the 'twenties, has been run by the seven big international companies, it was in their private interests to ensure that the policy was one of plentiful supply at minimum prices.

If hon. members will examine the wholesale price of gasoline in Montreal or Toronto they will find it has not varied in 50 years more than 2 cents, one way or the other. Not only did the companies benefit as a result of this worldwide policy, but every consumer who drove a car or heated a home benefited. All this has changed. National aspirations have emerged, and become stronger. The Arab people, the Nigerians, the Venezuelans, who now realize they have been robbed blind with regard to the price of oil for 50 years are setting up controls, and in a few years those controls will become more stringent and will present more problems for the oil companies who have run the business for the last 50 years.

What I have said indicates that a long time ago some of us were thinking in terms of policies which would give Canadians a chance to benefit from the resources which exist in this country. Go back and examine the records this spring. When the House met in January, who was it asked in this House about the security of the Montreal-Portland pipeline? Who was it asked about the possibility of emergency rationing and related planning should a war break out between the Arabs and Israelis? Who was it asked in this chamber about the extension of the pipeline to Montreal—reversible, because I know of the possibility of oil being developed off the east coast? It was not my friends in the New Democratic Party. That was not a favourite issue at that time; they did not get on to it until later.

I am not saying all this with any intention of trying to prove that I am smarter than anybody else. I am saying it simply with a feeling of sadness, because there was no corresponding activity on the part of the government. We were told there was an agreement with OECD on sharing oil reserves around the Atlantic area. We were told there would be consultation with the United States. Now, we are told there has been failure in both these directions. I asked in committee that the minister go to Venezuela because the Venezuelans had made it clear in 1968, in a public statement to the whole world, that they would not deal with private companies but only on the basis of government to government. I asked the minister to contact the Nigerians who have set up a national oil company and who are selling oil around the world.

On May 29 in this chamber I told the government that Nigeria was offering 100,000 barrels a day on a definite contract. There were no Canadian takers. Then, all of a sudden rush action is taken this fall. It was brought on by some exterior force which I can only surmise. This exterior force I expect was someone picking up a phone somewhere and saying "Give me all the proposals you have so that we can put on a big show in the House of Commons that we have a policy to meet inflation". In addition to things like indexing of fixed pensions, we had the proposal of a Montreal pipeline and a two-price system by using an export tax. All of these proposals were worked out in an afternoon. Certainly, they were not thought out and the provinces were not consulted. Any person who knows the first ABC's of the oil industry would know that an export tax is designed to destroy.

In the debate last May 28, I took no exception on behalf of my party to the concept of a two-price system. I have known for years and years that under the pricing system of the oil companies Canadians have always had a differential applied against them ranging from 25 cents a barrel to $1.25 a barrel. Why did the minister bring in an export tax of 40 cents? Because it happened to be the approximate differential on the day he announced his policy. During most of our oil buying history—and we are an importer of energy in this country—we have had a differential applied against us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him under arrangements made earlier for this debate has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may continue if he has unanimous consent.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not for too long, though.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I thank the House for its courtesy and I will not abuse it by continuing with all of the remarks I intended to make. I will wind up by saying that I still believe that, in spite of the awkwardness of the situation and the reasons given by the minister in the last month to six weeks, the situation is not fatal but can be restored. I know the minister does not really want to attack our federal system, but when you put an export tax on the products of one province, then to be fair it should be placed on the products of every province. The minister does not intend to put an export tax on the lumber of B.C., the potash of Saskatchewan or the steel of Ontario.

I am simply saying that this was a crash program, dangerous and not thought out, which will raise prices. The record will show that last week I asked him whether, when he met with oil industry representatives, he suggested to them the technique of the differential, and the minister said no. Let us not close the door on any of the proposals that any party makes. Let us look at them. On future occasions I hope to be able to speak in a more positive manner of the great opportunity that the energy situation in the world gives to this nation. All of the things that Canadians ever dreamed about are possible if we realize that the key to them is the use and control of our energy resources, along with the other things that we have.

I will not abuse the courtesy of the House further. I ask the members of this House, and I hope all Canadians, to rally round, to take counsel with each other, consult their provinces, business and other parties, and see whether we can come up with a policy that will take full advantage of this great opportunity.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the next participant it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), Veterans Affairs—Request that pay award to nurses be reviewed; the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney), External Affairs—Chile—Possible extension of credit to military government—Alleged denial to Allende government; the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), Urban Affairs—Position of minister at trilevel conference on possibility of municipalities receiving share of federal revenues.

The hon. member for Nipissing.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—SUGGESTED MEASURES TO ENSURE SUPPLY OF OIL AT FAIR PRICES TO ALL CANADIANS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Douglas:

This House expresses the opinion that the government should give consideration to the taking of immediate steps to ensure that available petroleum supplies are used to ensure a continuity of supply at fair and just prices to all Canadian consumers and as a preliminary step to this end should implement the following measures:

1. The setting up of a publicly-owned National Petroleum Corporation to enter into bi-lateral arrangements with oil-producing states and to supervise the marketing of oil in Canada.

2. The extension of the oil pipeline to eastern Canada and the bringing of the Inter-Provincial pipeline under Federal Government ownership.

3. The ensuring of future oil supplies by entering into negotiations with the provinces concerned for the development of the oil sands by a joint federal-provincial Crown corporation.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I hasten at this point to take issue with some of the comments made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). I have the greatest respect for the hon. member and his opinions, but on two or three occasions when the hon. member has risen to speak in this House on matters that he deems of national importance he has chastized members who have spoken before him and regretted that partisan views were being taken by members of the various parties in this House. He indicates that the issue is one of national importance which should not be considered on partisan grounds. He then proceeds to use some very partisan arguments in attempting to put his own views across.

Mr. Paproski: The truth hurts, doesn't it?

Mr. Blais: A review of the content of his speeches will show that it is political, of the most partisan nature. If I can review the speech given by the hon. member at this time, he chastizes the government for not presenting a policy.

Mr. Stevens: And rightly so.

Mr. Blais: Then, he indicates that he has no solutions to the problems but hopes solutions can be arrived at with proper consultations between the federal government and the provinces. However, he fails to indicate that in June of this year a report was presented to the House by this government called "An Energy Policy for Canada, Phase I", which report invited contributions from the provinces and opposition parties on the basis of the information transmitted in that particular document.

What has the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain done since June? What have the opposition parties done since June?

Mr. Baker: What has the government done since June?

Mr. Blais: It has done exactly what it said it would do. The government has been forced into a position, as a result of the absence of constructive contributions from opposition parties, or from the party bearing the same political label as the official opposition in the province of Alberta, and from other provinces.

Mr. Baker: Pure sophistry.

Mr. Blais: I take strong exception to posturing. The hon. member accuses other members of posturing, yet his own speech was an untenable posture. He indicated that the government had advised the House that there were fixed agreements between OECD and the United States. There never was any such statement. There was an indication that there was an attempt made to enter into arrangements with the United States regarding security of supply for the eastern provinces, but there was no indication that there were any fixed agreements.

Surely, the hon. member recognizes that, given the fluid situation faced today by the oil producing and oil consuming countries in the world resulting from the international situation, it was impossible to arrive at any fixed agreements. With the OECD facing the same problem of security of supply and hastening exploration in the North Sea, how could we have any fixed agreements with OECD for security of supply in Canada? In view of international instability, how could we have encouraged those countries to enter into any fixed agreements with Canada?

Then, the hon. member contradicts himself by stating that he does not agree with the policies being argued and presented in this House. On the other hand, he states he agrees with the Arab oil producing countries and their recognition that they have been robbed for all these years. I suggest to you what we are trying to do now is prevent Canadian non-renewable resources from being stolen from under our noses. That is the whole thrust of this particular debate, and that is the direction in which I should like to move.

Indeed, this is a serious and important question, and in that I agree with the hon. member. I may indicate to you that I am not in complete agreement with hon. members of my own party in this regard. I would indicate that the policy I should like to espouse is one which is not posturing, but one which contemplates a long-term benefit for Canada and, contrary to what some of the older members on the benches opposite think, I plan to be around for a long time. I intend that my children be here after me for a considerable time, too.

When we are dealing with non-renewable resources, these policies being debated now will have long-term effects on the availability of these resources. The motion presented by the NDP speaks of primary steps. I suggest to you that we are not dealing with the steps enumerated in the motion as being primary steps but as fundamental and ones which essentially concern principles that are being presented. I do not agree with the formulation of the ideas presented. I agree fundamentally, however, with the principles I intend to describe, and which I think fit in with the ideas that have been advanced.

In the first paragraph of the motion, the NDP indicates it would like to set up a publicly-owned national petroleum corporation. I agree with that principle. However, I suggest that I am not speaking of a national petroleum company which would displace all the present exploiters of petroleum in Canada in the fields of extraction, refining or retailing. What I am speaking of is that sort of a national petroleum corporation described in a document which evidently the members of the opposition have not read entitled "An Energy Policy for Canada". Perhaps I may refer to that document, and I note that none of the previous speakers for the NDP have done so. At page 186, where arguments in favour of a national petroleum corporation are set out, there are 10 factors listed which are deemed advantageous in the establishment of such a corporation.

An hon. Member: Are they for or against?

Mr. Blais: I suggest to the hon. member that those arguments against are not as sound as these 10 arguments in favour. There are three I would like to emphasize specifically.

Mr. Paproski: You are going to be the next leader of the NDP, you are doing such a good job.

Mr. Blais: I can tell that the riding of the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) is indeed a weighty one.

Mr. Paproski: It sure is.

Mr. Blais: National energy policy, which evidently the hon. member for Edmonton Centre has not contemplated, would indicate substantial advantages in the establishment of a national petroleum company. First of all, and I think this is the most important, we find in paragraph 2 the following:

> There is a need to increase the level of knowledge of all phases of the operations of the petroleum industry.

I am sure there is no one who will deny that fact, Mr. Speaker. The paragraph then continues as follows:

> While Canadian-controlled companies in the private sector are active in some spheres of petroleum industry operations, only a few foreign-controlled fully integrated companies have the broad knowledge and experience associated with the total spectrum of the petroleum industry.

We need more information. I am concerned about security of supply, and I am concerned that in the event that foreign interests and foreign technology are removed from Canada for any cause, Canadians would have at least a six-month time lapse before they could operate these particular refineries and extracting plants on a reasonable and profitable basis.

The second point is cited in paragraph 3 which states that a national petroleum company:

> . . . could play some role in determining the criteria on which the government might base its policies regarding economic rent collection.

That is what we have been talking about, economic rent. After the payments and all expenditures for extraction, refining and retailing the petroleum products, how much is left over for distribution for the Canadian public good?

That is the important question, and how do we determine this question of economic rent?

The minister has imposed a 40-cent surcharge on exports. This is a flexible amount and may be increased depending on the circumstances. This represents an economic rent, an amount which ought not to fall into the pockets of the exporters because that would not be justified. This is an amount owing to the Canadian people, those people to whom the resource belongs, and some would say Alberta.

Mr. Paproski: That's right.

Mr. Blais: Others would say it was the Canadian federation that brought about the exploitation and development of this resource in Alberta and, therefore, there has to be some sort of a division of return.

The question of economic rent is something which has to be determined, and can only be determined once the information is available to the Canadian people and the Canadian government. This could be achieved through a national petroleum company. I would suggest to those hon. members who have paid some attention to my remarks that they now turn their attention to a national energy policy for Canada.

Before my time expires, I want to launch into an item dealt with by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), however lightly. I suggest it was brought to his attention during the question period this afternoon by my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). I refer to the question of a pipeline from Sault Ste. Marie to Montreal. I espouse the view that, indeed there has to be security of supply. The first criterion is that Canadians should control the transportation of this essential resource. As it is now, the oil is piped from Gretna, Manitoba, through the United States, a friendly territory I will agree, up to Sarnia. A total of 974 miles of this line is or could be directly under United States control at any time.

I suppose in opposition to my suggestion that the line should be built from Sault Ste. Marie it might be argued that we would still have that line going from Gretna to Sault Ste. Marie. I agree, but we would then be that much closer to the Manitoba border, and we need that pipeline not tomorrow but right now. There should be steps taken at this time to build that line from Sault Ste. Marie. Having built that line there should be some plan so the line could then be extended from Sault Ste. Marie to Gretna via the north shore of Lake Superior. That is the point I want to put forward.

The essential question involves security of supply. I must admit that I am parochial in my interest as this would develop that area of Ontario in greatest need of development, namely the area north of Lake Nipissing. It was initially developed by that other Canadian transportation system, the CPR, and I need not remind those historians among the members of this House of the effect this particular development had on the development of Canada as a whole. I suggest to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie that perhaps his constituents would still be travelling in canoes in that fair city were it not for the CPR. I am sure he would agree with me.

The third point that was brought to my attention in the motion relates to the development of the Athabasca tar sands. That particular subject will be discussed by a member of our party this evening, and I shall not belabour the point save to indicate that I agree there ought to be government control over that resource. I am not as idealistic or as dreamy as are members to the extreme left, members of the NDP. I do not believe, in the present situation, that you can have a joint federal-provincial Crown corporation. There are obvious reasons for this. One has merely to read the recent editions of newspapers to understand the difficulties that arise when one starts to try to develop national resources within one province by giving the responsibility for such development to the federal Crown. However, I suggest there are reasons that the control and development of that particular resource should be in the hands of the province of Alberta, because basically we are speaking of the province of Alberta.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him by the special order made earlier today has run out. Is it agreed that the hon. member may continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blais: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also thank the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) whose voice boomed over all. The point I should like to make in respect of the Athabasca tar sands, first of all, concerns the size of this resource. We are dealing with an area of 11,000 square miles and an amount of 625 billion barrels in reserve. The immensity of the investment needed for the development of this resource requires that there be some sort of collection agency. That collection agency could be either the multinational corporations, which could use their collateral to raise and deliver the capital, or it could be the provincial government which could use its facilities in order to develop this resource.

The second point is that we are dealing with a labour intensive investment for the plant structure in respect of the oil sands. We are dealing with a matter of one million barrels per diem, and we are dealing with the cost of a plant projected to 1980. We are talking about an amount of $8 billion. Surely, this is an immense amount of capital. If we tolerate the control of that capital in the hands of foreign-owned companies we would be in a serious situation. The technology necessary for the exploitation of the tar sands is in its infancy. It is in the beginning of its development and it is essential as the technology develops that it be under Canadian control and Canadian jurisdiction. The technology is as essential in respect of the exploitation of those reserves as is the capital.

My last point is that there is no problem about selling the reserves. There is an adequate demand. There is no question about having to spend money in research and exploration. The availability is there. Therefore, all that is necessary is the raising of the required capital. Then, it would simply be a matter of developing the technology and establishing the plant structure necessary to develop those reserves. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to speak during this most important debate and I thank hon. members for their attention.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this motion immediately after the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais), I should like to point out that he, like myself, represents a riding in the province of Ontario. I find it interesting that a member supporting the government would be so defensive of the government in connection with the debate today because we must bear in mind that in Ontario we presently rely on sources beyond our borders for some 80 per cent of the energy we use. There is little reason to anticipate that with the growing energy demand we will succeed in significantly altering that dependency. That is why I think it is particularly important that the members of this House from the province of Ontario take an active and almost desperate attitude concerning the lack of a national oil policy in this country.

I refer to the province of Ontario because it is my native province. I would point out, however, that there are many provinces in this country in a like position. I would also point out that although this government has been in power for ten years, and that the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has been in office almost two years, we find that the national government is still grappling with ten significant crisis decisions.

I refer, first, to the question of a two-price oil and gas proposal with relation to taxation. I refer, second, to the suggestion mentioned in this motion of the establishment of a national petroleum corporation. I refer next to the negotiations, which the minister referred to earlier today, in an effort to secure a supply on a long-range basis from the government of Venezuela. I would emphasize, as the minister pointed out, that this was a last ditch attempt to negotiate that contract after, as he points out, the government had tried to make an agreement with the United States which failed after discussions with the OECD countries broke down.

Fourth, I would point out we have a crisis situation and that measures should be taken to prevent a fuel shortage this winter in this part of Canada, and certainly in the eastern provinces, and perhaps in the long run to prevent an undue escalation of price to the consumers of fuel. Fifth, what really will be the long-range government policy be in respect of oil and gas exploration in the north in this country? Sixth, how and when will Canadian fuel be made available to Quebec and the Maritimes? On that particular point it was only last February, when the minister appeared before the energy committee of this House, that he said the government certainly at that time had no intention of changing the Ottawa Valley concept or to build a pipeline through to Montreal.

We might ask what happened so suddenly to change the minister's attitude, because today we find, as we have for the last few days, that the minister has suggested indeed they may build an extra pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal to help relieve the imminent crisis in that city. On that subject, however, I would point out the inconsistency between what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told us today and the testimony of the National Energy Board before our committee. The National Energy Board indicated that in fact there was no extra capacity available in our pipeline system to Chicago unless exports to the United States were cut back; whereas the minister, if I understood him correctly today, estimated a 250,000-barrel per day capacity in that line if it could be linked through to Montreal. I want to emphasize that the question of security of supply for eastern Canada is not a new problem. It is one that has been before the government for many years. It is the government's indecision that is making it a crisis today.

Seventh, when is the government going to give clarification as to who actually owns the resources in the areas adjacent to our maritime provinces and Newfoundland? Eighth, when will we have a clear position from the government with respect to development of our Mackenzie Valley pipeline system for oil and/or gas? Ninth, when will we have a plan for the conservation of energy or the development of alternate energy sources? Tenth, when will the haphazard and late reaction to the problem of oil spillage, both in British Columbia and on the Maritimes coast, be dealt with in a proper way by the government?

Those are ten problems that the government should have solved before this debate became necessary today. Having summarized those ten points, I must indicate that I am indeed disappointed by the tone of the NDP motion which is before us. When I heard initially that they intended to have an energy debate, I assumed the NDP would not use it simply as a starting-off point to mention various socialistic principles that they like to talk about and to belabour their much belaboured point about multinational corporations.

Read their motion, Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind that the crisis we have is not a crisis in the distant future: it is a crisis that may hit us in November, December, January, February or March. Their suggestion is that we set up a publicly-owned, national petroleum corporation which would, as has been indicated by my colleague from Regina, take about two years to set up. They suggest that there be an extension of the oil pipeline to eastern Canada, which it is generally accepted would be a 1976 project. Then they go on to more distant oil suggestions.

In short, the NDP motion is only a gesture, as the minister, perhaps inadvertently, indicated during his speech when he thanked the mover of the motion for giving him a platform to be able in some way to try to defend his very indecisive national position with respect to fuel. Let us be specific. If the NDP contingent in this House seriously wanted to challenge the government on this subject, it had every right to request a confidence vote. Let members of this House stand up and be counted as to whether they feel the government any longer deserves the confidence of the House.

On the question of energy alone, I would say that the government has demonstrated that it no longer has the right nor the will to govern. In short, this is a government that had the presumption to hold itself out to the people of Canada as a unifying force within the nation. I suggest that instead of being a unifying force, the government has introduced an atmosphere of distrust and uncertainty across Canada, an atmosphere of uncertainty and distrust between the federal level, with regard to the oil and gas industry, and several provincial governments, including Ontario, Alberta, Quebec and British Columbia.

It is a strange thing that those provinces have brought in their own provincial fuel policies. It is a strange thing that those provinces, meeting in Charlottetown, unanimously endorsed the holding of a federal-provincial energy conference in order to have provincial participation in working out a national energy policy. But in spite of all that, the government to date has not moved to take a constructive step to solve the problems that are before the nation.

It is true, as has been pointed out, that we are a self-sufficient country with respect to oil and fuel—indeed, one of the few in the world. But we must not forget that we have only about 1.4 per cent of the total world-proven resources of oil. In short, Mr. Speaker, we must be sensible in our national oil activities. I suggest this means that the government must do something in addition to bringing in what the hon. member for Nipissing referred to as an energy policy for Canada, phase one. I sat through the presentation of that phase one. I know the government thought it had 18 months in which to have it talked about, to throw the ball around to everybody, hoping that somebody would come up with a satisfactory answer. The ugly fact is that time has caught up with the government and its ineptitude is now being demonstrated hourly to the voters of the nation.

In this connection I refer simply to this week's Hansard where some very interesting illustrations of indecision by front bench members of the government can be found. I refer to the issue for October 22. This is only the first of eight clear examples of total indecision and uncertainty by the government. I refer to a question asked on that date of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources by the leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis), who said:

> Last Friday after he . . .

Meaning the minister.

> . . . had met with representatives of the oil industry he announced, according to press reports, that the government would probably agree to an increase in the prices of gasoline and home heating oil in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces and that it might have to consider similar increases for the part of Canada west of the Ottawa valley now served by oil from Canadian sources. May I ask the minister whether he has made such a decision and, if so, what the increase will be?

The short answer by the minister was:

> No, sir. No such decision has been made yet.

He went on to point out that the increase in the price of crude oil, so far as the Arab states are concerned, is 70 per cent. Later, my colleague from Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) pressed the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) on the present position of the government concerning the proposal to give the Americans an alternative oil supply to Cherry Point so that the tanker route might be discontinued. The Secretary of State for External Affairs replied:

> . . . we have been reviewing our oil policies. We have not made a decision yet on this question.

Later, my colleague from Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) what the government was doing to assist in the conversion of thermal-powered generating stations in the Maritimes to the use of coal. The minister's bright reply was:

> We have been discussing . . . the whole question of energy—

On the same date, the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) put this question:

> . . . can we expect that the government will be accelerating its program of nuclear plants and, in particular, will the first decision, the one in which New Brunswick is interested . . .

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources replied:

> . . . I hope that the question of a heavy water plant can be decided by the government before the end of this month.

Mr. Speaker, I would emphasize that this government has been in power for ten years, but still has not made up its mind. On the following day, October 23, my colleague the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) asked what the government's tax position was with reference to the Syncrude proposal in the province of Alberta. He directed the question to either the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) or the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury). This was the answer:

> My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue says that he replies "no" to that question.

The government still did not know what their answer should be to Syncrude's request with respect to taxation. On the following day, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member and inform him that his time has expired. He may continue, of course, with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I remind the House that the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) will be called next. If he wishes to finish by six o'clock he should be given an opportunity to begin in about one minute.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was saying that on that day the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville put the question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which I quote in part as follows:

> . . . he is considering introducing legislation to establish a publicly-owned petroleum corporation . . .

The minister replied:

> That is a question under consideration . . .

Mr. Speaker, I have two similar references and I am simply trying to demonstrate that this government is literally lurching from crisis to crisis. The government is in a total state of disarray and disorganization concerning a proper oil policy for Canada. I am particularly disappointed because I feel that we in Ontario have more to lose through the government's ineptitude than possibly any other part of this nation.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I think the concluding words of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) about the great mishandling of this crisis by the government is a good place for me to start, particularly in view of the comments made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) this afternoon about the meetings he had with representatives of the Arab states earlier today.

I asked the minister in the House if he could inform us whether he had arranged with the Arab states for security of supply for the eastern market and whether he could guarantee that any oil that came from the Arab states would not be diverted to American ports or refineries. The minister could not give us this assurance. But a few minutes later the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) referred to a report from ARAMCO which suggested that Saudi Arabia was cutting off supplies to Canada. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that he was trying to confirm that rumour.

What did the Secretary of State for External Affairs discuss with the Arab ambassadors when he met them this morning? Did he not discuss security of supply? Did he not discuss whether Saudi Arabia would be guaranteeing the supply of oil to the Canadian market?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentleman asking me to answer the question, or is he just talking?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville has the floor, and unless he advises the Chair that his speech is completed, the Chair cannot recognize the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to participate in this debate. We will be back at eight o'clock tonight, and I am sure the minister will be participating then because this is an important question of national concern. If we have a crisis, we must move western oil to the eastern market—and that means higher prices. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources could not even guarantee that the 5 per cent cut-back announced by the Arabs with regard to some countries would not affect Canada. The government do not seem to know what is happening. Despite the fact that they met with the Arab ambassadors this morning, we still do not have any guarantee. The minister did not tell us what happened about the security of supply from Saudi Arabia, and now there is a rumour that Saudi Arabia might be cutting us off.

I think the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should go to Saudi Arabia or Kuwait either tonight or tomorrow morning and seek assurances that there will be security of supply for eastern Canadian refineries. He should not just rely on hearsay, or react to a situation when he is notified by certain companies or some members of this House about activities in the oil business. While the Secretary of State for External Affairs is in the House I want to say a word about the type of representation that we have in the Arab states. I did some research this morning and found there are in this country only three or four ambassadors from the Arab states. We do not have representation in many of the Arab states either, so perhaps we are not getting the type of information we should. Perhaps there is some mistrust here.

Mr. Sharp: I do not think that is so, and I do not think it should be on the record.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Mr. Nystrom: The question is very, very serious. Because of the situation in the Middle East, this government must act, and act now, to guarantee security of supply. I have said in the House before, Mr. Speaker, that the information I have from various oil companies leads me to believe that some tankers have been diverted. I have information from the Texaco oil company in New York. According to my information, a confidential memorandum was sent from Texaco, New York, to Texaco, Toronto, which discussed the possibility of making greater use of their supplies in Canada because there might be some change in supplies to them from abroad. Exxon has also sent a similar memorandum to their Toronto office, according to my source, telling their company there that they should make greater use of the reserves we have here because there might be some interference from abroad.

I am told that at least six tankers have been diverted since the last week of September which were carrying 3½ million barrels of oil to American refineries from the Middle East and Venezuela. Imperial Oil company, according to my source of information, has purchased some oil from Venezuela on Canadian bookings and diverted it to the United States. The minister should be investigating this matter. I appreciated it this afternoon when the minister said that if this type of practice is being carried on by the multinational corporations, it should be stopped because it will jeopardize security of supply for Canadian customers.

I wish the minister would investigate the situation, Mr. Speaker. All he has done is send telegrams to Canadian subsidiaries of the multinational corporations. He has contacted the refineries, and so on, and naturally they are all saying they are not guilty. It is like asking Spiro Agnew if he is guilty of income tax evasion. What kind of answer are you going to get? These are American subsidiaries, not Canadian companies. They are owned and controlled by their parent companies and are not responsible for the arrangements for getting crude oil to their markets. In the case of Imperial Oil, it is done by Exxon, the parent company; and it is the parent company—the minister knows this—which makes the decision to divert oil from a Canadian destination to a destination in the United States.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is not true.

Mr. Nystrom: The minister should not just ask the Canadian subsidiaries but parent companies which are based in the United States. Why does he not check with the harbours people to ascertain whether ships destined for Canada have failed to show up in this country? Why does he not check with the Arab states to ascertain whether cargoes which might have been sent to Canada have gone astray and have been shipped elsewhere? I am asking these questions because they are of concern to my party. The minister's attitude makes no sense to me.

There are indications that there is now a shortage of fuel in eastern Canada. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) said this afternoon that there is a shortfall in supplies of oil of 100,000 barrels per day. The reason for that shortage could lie in the fact that multinational corporations have been diverting crude oil from Canadian ports to refineries in the United States. That development does not surprise me at all. The multinational corporations involved are more or less sovereign states in their own right and are merely shifting their product from one destination to another.

You can compare this situation to that of a farmer who is combining grain on the Prairies and hauling his grain by truck to a bin, then suddenly halfway across the field he changes his mind and instead of delivering to one grain bin he diverts it to another. The companies are merely shifting their product from one destination to another. The oil companies control the oilfields; they use or lease their own tankers; they deliver oil to their own refineries and sell the finished product through their own retail outlets. Their operations are vertically integrated. That being so, one would expect them to shift their product to where demand is greatest and prices are highest.

Yesterday I spoke to one of the leading petroleum people in British Columbia. He said he did not know whether companies were diverting shipments but said his experience with the industry would lead him to believe that if he were in charge, oil shipments would probably be diverted because, after all, an oil company aims to maximize its profits. He said this is probably happening because it would be the natural course for a multinational oil corporation to follow. I ask the minister to investigate thoroughly the reports that a number of us have brought forward concerning tankers being diverted from Canadian to United States destinations.

Until we can prove this is not happening, the Arab states may be nervous about supplying us. They have cut off deliveries to the United States as a result of conditions in the Middle East. If they think that oil carried by tankers owned or leased by American-based multinationals may end up being diverted to the United States instead of being unloaded in Canada, they may want to cut back our supplies as well as those of the United States. If that happens, what will the minister do this coming winter?

Let us look at the security of our supplies from Venezuela. The Venezuelan oilfields are under the control, basically, of the same multinational corporations which control Middle East supplies. If there is a real pinch in the United States, it is possible and probable that large companies such as Exxon may consider seriously diverting more of their product to United States refineries instead of transporting it to Canada.

That is the background against which we are debating this question. The problem we face concerns security of supply of oil, and if ultimately there are difficulties in this regard, the Canadian consumer will pay. My party is making a couple of positive and direct suggestions in this regard. We think we ought to establish a national petroleum company which ought to be publicly-owned and would deal directly with oil-producing areas such as Venezuela and the Middle East states. In that way we would not need to deal with any intermediary such as the multinational corporation which has its head offices in the United States. I think Venezuela is interested in dealing directly with oil importing countries. It would be to our advantage if such an arrangement could be made. By that means we could control the importation of crude oil and, similarly, the amount of oil being exported from Canada.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands pointed out that there is enough oil in Canada to supply the needs of Canadian consumers. Although we currently export about 1.2 million barrels per day, we import about 800,000 barrels, a large proportion of that oil being Venezuelan. Clearly, we have a balance in our favour of some 400,000 barrels per day. We are currently more than self-sufficient. The difficulty at present stems from the fact that our eastern provinces rely on oil imports, basically from the Middle East and Venezuela. What will happen if that oil supply cannot be secured? What will happen this winter if we must begin transporting huge quantities of western oil to the eastern market? We do not have a pipeline, and we cannot build one immediately. For that reason I suggest we should begin building such a pipeline immediately in order to supply the eastern market in the future. What will happen in the meantime if the security of our oil supply from the Arab states cannot be guaranteed? That, really, is the picture which is unfolding.

In the one or two minutes remaining, may I say that so long as we leave the matter of oil supplies and prices in the hands of the private multinational corporations, the consumers of this country will not profit; we shall face problems associated with high prices and supply. Let me put on record statistics showing the tremendous profits and power of companies such as Imperial Oil. For example, statistics show that the gross income of Standard Oil of New Jersey roughly equals that of the government of Canada. That gives one some idea of the tremendous power and wealth of the company. That is only one of such companies. As well, Imperial Oil made profits in Canada between 1963 and 1972, after taxes, of some $1,010 million. If you add to that figure deferred taxes, which are really an interest-free loan, you will find that the company's profits between 1963 and 1972 were $1,134 million.

In conclusion, I say it is about time the Canadian government, on behalf of the people, took control of the gas and oil industries in this country and regulated the importation of oil, the future developments which must take place in co-operation with the provinces, as well as pricing and export policies. Only the federal government can act in these fields. It is up to it to act. I think the minister should begin doing this right away.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Paul S. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I find it very easy to support the intent of this motion and a good deal of the detail contained therein.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: In only one or two minor ways would I like to see the motion amended. My real concern, however, is that in some respects it does not go far enough, particularly in the matter of an oil pipeline. Later in my remarks I will be more specific about this proposal. Canada is in many ways the most fortunate country on the face of the earth, yet it is perhaps one of the most fragile. We are a country of diversity, of peoples with different points of view and of geography with extreme variances. We are so diverse that we seem to be always going in different directions.

There is one common element which, when called upon, will always, I believe, pull us together and in a crisis will always see us through. That common element—is our love for Canada—Canada, that magnificent, fragile flower, that land that makes us perhaps the most fortunate people on the face of the earth. When Canadians are threatened, when our security is questioned, we are as one. I believe that in the growing energy problem and in the degree of our indebtedness to foreign powers, compounded by the sudden threat of the Arab nations to withhold oil supplies to the area of the country east of the Ottawa valley, we are threatened, our security is questioned, and we will react as one.

I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that we are in many ways the most fortunate power on the face of the earth. What other country, for example, has reached our degree of industrialization and has adequate proven and potential energy reserves? I contend that no other country on the face of this earth is in such a fortunate position. Yet it would be very easy for us to squander these resources. It would be very easy, for short-term gains, to give or sell these resources to a foreign power or powers and then find ourselves in short supply in the not too distant future.

I believe that as Canadians who are concerned, not just for our own generation but for our children and our children's children, we must take positive action to ensure two things. First, we must insist on the security of supply of our energy resources. Second, we must see to it that these resources are developed by Canadians for Canadians. Anything less would be to sell ourselves short and to deny future generations of Canadians the opportunities for full participation in the magnificence and largesse of Canada.

I will dwell shortly on the notion of security of supply and, specifically, the supply situation itself. However, I would first like to make a few remarks about our energy policy. For reference purposes I will refer to phase I of "An Energy Policy for Canada", volumes I and II—a very comprehensive document. This document has been criticized, and the government with it, for not adopting an immediate energy policy. If the critics would look carefully at this document they would see it embraces most, and perhaps all, of the elements of a complete policy and is most useful when we are faced with sudden changes in the energy scene such as those caused by the Arab-Israeli war.

The real merit of the document, I feel, is that it gives us a basis for debate and consideration of all the elements involved in an energy policy in a rapidly changing world. We are encouraged to look at the whole notion of growth and whether there are limits to growth. I happen to be one who is very concerned about these limits to growth. I think that increasingly we shall have to consider this question. The document deals with Canadian resources, present and potential, and with the whole question of Canadian ownership. It talks about foreign investment and the amount of foreign investment.

I think we have strange notions about the amount of foreign investment which any country should accept. If $40 billion, $50 billion or $60 billion are to come into Canada over the next 10 or 15 years, we could be in very serious trouble, both because of the effect on the Canadian dollar and because we might not be able to sell other goods should the country to whom we would normally be selling these goods expend most of its foreign exchange in buying energy. This would present a new problem, one which we have not yet considered.

This document deals, also, with the argument about public versus private ownership in the resource sector, and with the debate about industrial strategy, including research development by Canadians. These issues are well documented. Finally, we are encouraged to consider the effects of our energy policy on the environment, both physical and human. In this debate, we must consider, for instance, whether the environmental and social diseconomies involved would make James Bay or South Indian Lake viable projects. I believe that they are not, that they will most certainly lead to disaster, environmental and social. We are encouraged to look at the same effects in connection with nuclear power plants and various pipeline projects. Only when all these and other considerations have been reviewed and debated can we begin to adopt a really comprehensive series of policies. The debate today will bring us, I hope, closer to that set of comprehensive policies.

Now to the supply side of our problem. Since the motion deals with petroleum, I shall confine my remarks to this area. However, I would remind all hon. members that ultimately the debate concerning supply must take into consideration the various alternate energy forms and their intermodal aspects. Our most immediate concern must be for the major current supply—Alberta crude and the future of this commodity in our economy. We are told—I refer here to page 87 of volume 1 of the document to which I have referred—that the proven reserves of conventional crude amount to 9.7 billion barrels, of which over 99 per cent are to be found in western Canada, exclusive of the Territories. Of the potential reserves we might expect to recover, only 5 billion barrels out of a possible 83 billion will come from western Canada. When I use the term "western Canada", I principally mean Alberta but I am also including Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Thus, the western Canada supply, both proven and potential, consists of less than 15 billion barrels—less now, since these figures were arrived at in December of 1972.

I had the opportunity last winter to comment on the remarkable equanimity displayed by the three to five opposition members from the province of Albera on the National Resources and Public Works Committee on the subject of this potential supply. We are told that at current rates of production Alberta crude will last not more than 15 years or, in accordance with the present exponential growth rate, perhaps less than ten years. How, last winter, could these members have been so sanguine about the bleak future?

I visited Alberta on three occasions last summer and early this fall. I detected in the earlier visits a sense of well-being in relation to this matter. However, during my visit last weekend I was startled to hear expressions of concern such as I had not heard before. The people of Alberta are beginning to realize that they have been deceived, that their economic security depends upon, virtually, a single industry—in an industrial sense—in addition to agriculture and ranching, and that this security is in danger. The government of Canada and the government of Alberta must immediately address themselves to the fact that the industry surrounding the production of Alberta crude could be wiped out in little more than ten years.

It was, I suspect, the debate surrounding the tar sands project which sparked the present concern about the short term of Alberta crude. It was only when Mr. Lougheed struck out in his efforts to justify the immediate letting of some spicy contracts that he admitted the short duration of conventional oil and used this fact as justification for rushing headlong into the tar sands approach.

I believe that eventually we shall need the tar sands, that eventually they will become Canada's greatest single energy source. I do not, however, believe there is any real need to launch into this project without a great deal of care and concern. I do not believe there is any need to let ourselves panic into giving these resources away to the lowest bidder. I said "lowest bidder" because I believe that eventually the people of Canada will have to make a much higher bid for these resources if they are disposed of now.

There is in existence a very fine document labelled "confidential" but which has nevertheless been given fairly wide circulation. It was prepared for the executive council of the cabinet of Alberta by a large group of top civil servants. It is entitled "Fort McMurray Athabasca tar sands development strategy." Let me read just one or two choice extracts from this document, which I consider to be a very fine document. There are many other extracts I could read expressing similar views.

> Alberta is not under any pressure to develop synthetic crude oil from the bituminous tar sands for the purpose of meeting either Albertan or Canadian petroleum requirements. The pressure to develop synthetic crude from the tar sands emanates from markets external to Canada.

Here is a further quotation:

> The tar sands offers a unique opportunity to change the historical trend of ever-increasing foreign control of non-renewable resource development in Canada. Here is a reserve of the greatest magnitude which does not require highly speculative investment to find and prove.

That is not a document of the Committee for an Independent Canada; it is a document of the Alberta government. Another statement talks about research into the extraction process, mining methods and experiments in situ. It reads:

> We are not aware of any research with respect to tailings disposal, reclamation or revegetation. This apparent emphasis on winning the resource is again an indication of the heavy influence of the conventional crude oil industry.

There is a whole series of statements of this kind in the document. What has Mr. Lougheed done with this excellent document containing advice from a committee of 41 top government employees from every department of government, including the Research Council of Alberta, the Alberta Housing Corporation and the Energy Resources Conservation Board? He has completely ignored this exhaustive report and based his policy on odds and sods, including a report from a New York consulting firm. What, Mr. Speaker, must be done with these reserves? I believe the resolution before us today holds the real answer and is entirely consistent with the report of the Alberta government.

I believe the Government of Canada must acquire an interest in the tar sands along with the government of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: I do not exclude the private sector. As a matter of fact, I would welcome it provided it had a very high component of Canadian ownership. How would the Canadian government go about acquiring, say, a 50 per cent share of this invaluable resource? Once again, I think the document to which I have already referred points to the answer to such a question. It uses the phrase "for Albertans and for Canadians."

Mr. Speaker, there are no finer nor more devoted Canadians than in the province of Alberta, and it is their generosity and national spirit which will prevail in this issue. But there must be a quid pro quo. We cannot ask this single component in Canadian society to do all the giving. That quid pro quo cannot take the form just of cash. It must offer more than that. It must include real concern and real support for Alberta in facing the problem of conversion from a one-industry to a multi-industry base. It must include a transportation system and policy which will tend to reduce the industrial inequities that exist in the country. At a time when the mayor of the city of Toronto is saying we should move growth out of Toronto, it must include policies which will redistribute growth throughout Canada and bring diversification to Alberta. There may be a quarrel at present between the Premier of the province of Alberta and the federal government. There is no quarrel, however, between Albertans and other Canadians where the future well-being of Canada is concerned.

Time does not permit detailed analysis of ownership in the petroleum industry. It is sufficient to say that percentages of from 75 to 90 per cent are certainly reliable figures. As a self-respecting nation, this kind of ratio cannot continue, especially in an area so vital as natural resources. The place to start is with the 300 billion or more barrels of crude potentially recoverable from the tar sands, our most valuable energy resource. Similarly, time does not permit a detailed discussion regarding the establishment of a national petroleum corporation. Suffice it to say that I firmly support this proposition, although I am not sure I agree with the functions as set out in the motion. I would propose, for instance, that a petroleum marketing board, or even a marketing board covering all energy sources, should be established separate from a Canadian petroleum corporation. One of the roles of the corporation would be to monitor other members of the same sector. I believe it should also have a pace-setting role.

I have never felt easy about the way the pipelines were constructed in the fifties and sixties. I have always felt that the oil line which went through Duluth should have gone through the lakehead. I expressed my extreme dissatisfaction that the second gas pipeline should have been constructed from Emerson through Minnesota and Wisconsin to Sarnia. I did so at the time the line was built. I feel that if members of the opposition party had supported these elements in the government who favoured the northern route, instead of maintaining their chastity on this issue, this gas line would have been an all-Canadian project. I was convinced then, and I am even more convinced now, that this was the proper course to take. However, we now have the benefit of hindsight and a new problem has arisen.

I should like to conclude my remarks with the plea that we give serious consideration to extending the pipeline, not just from Toronto or from Sault Ste. Marie to Montreal but that we build an all-Canadian pipeline extending from Manitoba to Thunder Bay, Sault Ste. Marie, Sudbury, North Bay, Ottawa and Montreal. As the building of a railway was the act that built the nation, so the building of an all-Canadian pipeline will be the act that will revive the spirit of a nation, Canada, because it will be the symbol that our resources are to be developed for this and future generations of Canadians.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) has about as much knowledge of Alberta as the Liberals in Alberta, and this probably explains why there were 19 Conservative members elected in the province in the last election.

As for the motion introduced by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), I think it was dealt with quite effectively by my colleague, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour). The NDP stated that immediate steps are required to change Canada's energy policy and proposed three steps which, at the earliest, will only take effect in two or three years. The effect that they will have in that time will only exacerbate any difficulties that we might be having at this stage.

With regard to the energy situation in Canada today, a lot of people would like to term it an energy crisis. Far from it. In fact, Dr. George Govier, chairman of the Energy Resources Conservation Board of Alberta, one of Canada's most knowledgeable individuals in the oil industry who certainly knows more about the industry than any spokesman I have heard on the other side of the House, termed today's situation as Canada's energy opportunity. In a paper delivered to the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, he outlined the opportunities available to Canada in this situation. As the hon. member for Fort William mentioned, we are the only western industrialized member nation of OECD that is self-sufficient in energy, and barring any further mistakes by this government we will be self-sufficient for the next 600 years or so. He then adds a caveat in these words:

> I hope we will not see the development of irrational restraints on trade in energy resources. I believe Canada can benefit from imports where these are logical and there is no question that we may benefit from the export of energy resources surplus to our own requirements. We must, however, make sure that we only export resources surplus to our own needs and that the maximum practical processing be done in Canada before they are exported.

[Mr. McRae.]

That is good advice and I wish the government would follow it. Looking at the history of the oil industry, during the 1950s in Alberta there was a good deal of exploration and drilling for oil without markets. By the end of the 1950s most wells in Alberta were prorated near shut-down, producing at a fraction of their capacity. Fortunately, in 1961 the Diefenbaker government introduced a very progressive national oil policy under which the area west of the Ottawa River would be reserved for Canadian crude oil production, giving a tremendous spurt to the industry and resulting in its healthy state today.

However, during the decade from 1961 to 1971 repeated delegations from Alberta, from the industry, from government, from groups like the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, the Canada Petroleum Association, and others, visited Ottawa and Quebec City requesting that a pipeline be built to Montreal so that western crude could supply this market as well. But they were told no, that although offshore sources were insecure, they were cheaper. Cheaper by two cents a gallon, but nevertheless cheaper. Therefore, this pipeline would not be built. We do not take much consolation from saying, "We told you so," but we are now in this situation today with the possibility, though I hope not much of a possibility, that some areas of Canada this winter will have difficulty finding heating fuel.

Do we have a policy now that will correct this situation? Do we have a policy that will prevent this situation developing in the future? Do we have a policy that will take advantage of the opportunities being presented to Canada as a result of this situation to which my colleague, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), alluded earlier today? I am afraid we do not. I am afraid we have no policy. We have no policy to Canadianize the oil industry.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), in answer to repeated questions, stated last fall that the policy would come in the winter. Then he stated it would come in late winter, then it was early spring, then it was late spring. Finally in July, Brinks trucks and all, came forward this energy policy for Canada document, volume I. It is an analysis, not a policy. However, let us give credit where credit is due: it is a well written document and contains a lot of very useful and good information as well as good advice. There is one piece of advice in particular that I would bring to the attention of the minister. It is on page 9, and reads as follows:

> Federal and provincial responsibilities and interests in the energy field are intimately interrelated. No national policy can be contemplated without the fullest of intergovernmental consultations and consensus.

That was good advice in July. But on the Labour Day weekend, after labouring all weekend trying to find something to say on September 4 to demonstrate this government's apparent interest and concern about inflation, the government came forward with a freeze on the price of crude oil, applauded by the NDP.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is your policy.

Mr. Andre: That was their policy.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is your policy too.

Mr. Andre: However, it was apparent that the government did not look at its own legislation, the National Energy Board Act, section 83(b) of which provides that the board will not allow exports unless the price of the energy exported is just and reasonable in relation to the public interest. Therefore, the National Energy Board was not able to allow the nominations for October. This meant the government was forced to bring in a 40 cents surtax, again after the greatest of discussion—if I am correct, I think about ten minutes' worth. To this the premier of Alberta was forced to respond:

> This appears to be the most discriminatory action taken by a federal government against a particular province in the entire history of confederation.

This is the sort of National unity that this party of national unity, this party which thinks it is the only party for all of Canada, is promoting, to the applause of the NDP which thought this move was getting at the big, multinational corporations. In point of fact, the companies which were hurt the most by this move, the companies most affected by it, were the small Canadian independents who at long last were starting, in spite of the regressive taxation policies of this government, to become a significant element in Canada's oil industry.

Mr. Foster: Are you part of the Calgary oil lobby?

Mr. Andre: The Minister of Finance said that this is our policy.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Talk about a freeze! We are listening to a frozen line.

Mr. Andre: Is the government concerned about inflation? During the last year the price of lumber has gone up by over 100 per cent. I have a letter from a Calgarian, an ordinary working citizen, not a member of the oil industry, who points out that in 1923 a gallon of gas cost 40 cents. At that time he built a house with lumber costing $26 per thousand board feet. It now costs $260 per thousand board feet. The cost has gone up ten times per thousand board feet. Has the government done anything in this regard? The ordinary workingman spends a far larger percentage of his income on housing than for gasoline for his car, but the government is not interested in that. Perhaps there are a lot of lumberjacks and lumber companies in the constituency of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas): that may be one of the reasons for this mood.

We did not see such a freeze in respect of other commodities. We did not see the type of freeze for which this party has been calling. We just saw the wrong type of freeze which was bound to create problems. Again referring to the minister's own document, at page 67 it is clearly indicated in the second paragraph that it is assumed throughout the document that the price of crude oil will reflect world prices because the market price will dictate to a considerable degree the quantity of new energy sources that can be developed in Canada. It states specifically:

> As later chapters will show if Canadian prices are held down the resources available are reduced and, at the same time, a greater domestic demand than projected may develop.

This is the government's own document. It contains good advice, and hon. members should read it. In addition to this short-term consumer protection we have the question of our long-term interest. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) is correct in saying that today there are proven conventional resources which will last for approximately 15 years. If the policies of this government continue, we have the guarantee that in 15 years we will run out of our proven conventional resources. If, in fact, this government adopts progressive policies that take advantage of the opportunities available to us, developing the non-conventional resources off the east coast of the Maritimes, in the Northwest Territories and in the Arctic island, and more importantly the tar sands, I am sure we will avoid becoming a have-not country like so many others in the world so far as energy is concerned.

The NDP, evidently with the approval of the government, feels there should be a Crown corporation to develop the tar sands. Obviously, members of that party know nothing of the risks involved and nothing of the agreement worked out between Premier Lougheed and the Syncrude group. Under that agreement, 50 per cent of the profits would return to the province of Alberta. Under that agreement, the Alberta energy company, owned 50 per cent by the government of Alberta and 50 per cent by the people of Alberta, will own 80 per cent of the pipeline connecting this plant to Edmonton. I do not know of a pipeline that has ever lost money. Pipelines represent great investments. Under this agreement, the Alberta energy company would own 50 per cent of the power plant associated with this company, and this energy company would have the option to purchase 20 per cent of the tar sands plant if they prove to be economically viable. In other words, with no risk and very little money invested the government and people of Alberta will get upward of 56 per cent of the profits from this company.

The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) said there was no risk associated with the tar sands plant, and evidently NDP members agree. They obviously know nothing of the Great Canadian Oil Sands plant which has yet to make a profit.

An hon. Member: You seem to know everything.

Mr. Andre: I am a chemical engineer and I think I know a little bit more about this subject than you do. The risks are enormous. A deal where you can get 56 per cent of the profits and take no risk is a sweet deal to me. More important than ownership is having these tar sands developed, the effect this will have on Canadian northern areas in the so-called mid-Canada corridor and the effect, as well, on western Canada. Of importance also is the effect this will have on diversification and carrying forward the promise of regional economic expansion. That makes this project, and subsequent tar sands projects, enormously important.

I plead with the minister to enter into negotiations at the earliest possible moment with the Premier of Alberta and the Syncrude group in order to clear up the obvious uncertainties that exist. The minister indicated to the House that the Syncrude principals were satisfied and that the tax dollars were adequate to allow this group to carry on with this particular project. But the president of the company immediately issued a press release stating that no such agreement had been reached and that the discussions which had taken place had not been at all satisfactory.

An hon. Member: The consumers will bring Lougheed around.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. At no time did I make that suggestion. I said there was agreement not with the president of Syncrude but with his principals only; but this was not on the subject of taxation but, rather, on the subject of pricing.

Mr. Andre: In answer to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) indicated he had been able to satisfy the principals, yet the president of Syncrude said he was not satisfied. This project is still in jeopardy if that statement by the president of Syncrude is accurate. This matter is far too important to Canada to be playing around with. Let us settle it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Are you talking about taxation, or pricing?

Mr. Andre: I am talking about the questions that remain in the air. In terms of prices the minister indicated last Friday that he would let the western crude of Syncrude float on the Montreal market; but the question of taxation has not been satisfactorily concluded, according to the president of Syncrude. He has indicated they will not be able to go ahead unless this point is cleared up. In the interest of Canada I plead with the minister to straighten it out in order that we may carry on with this very important project, important not only to Alberta but to the future of Canada.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Are you a chemical engineer, Max?

Mr. Saltsman: There seems to be some question about my credentials when speaking on the subject of oil. All I can say is that although I do not come from Calgary Centre as does the hon. member who preceded me, and I am not a chemical engineer, one can be born on top of an oil well and still know nothing about oil. I do not know whether the hon. member was born on top of one or just played with it when he was a kid, but it seems to me that the logic of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) leaves a lot to be desired. On one hand he tells us what a good idea the national oil policy was in 1961, and then turns around and condemns the government for not having built a pipeline to Montreal since that time.

Let me point out that one of the central features to that national oil policy was that a pipeline would not be built to Montreal. I do not see how the hon. member can praise two objectives which are contradictory to each other. This national oil policy was put forward as an alternative to a pipeline to Montreal. In fact, it was never a real policy; it was really the result of asking the oil companies what they could do for us and turning over the organization of the industry to them. They organized and have done a great job, and we are paying present-day prices as a result of that great job. The hon. member for Calgary Centre referred to prorated oil sales from Alberta. I suggest there was probably no greater criminal expenditure of capital in this country than that for the development of the oil industry in Alberta. You do not have to be born on top of an oil well to realize that.

The west has a legitimate grievance. I, for one, am not going to suggest that Alberta does not have things to grieve about, that Saskatchewan does not have things to grieve about or that other western provinces do not have grievances. However, it is often forgotten that Ontario, which gets its brains beaten out all the time by the west, has some pretty substantial grievances as well. From the 1961 national oil policy onward, the oil policy was based on providing Alberta with the opportunity of getting this oil out of the ground at a time when the United States would not take it, and when it was arranged to end the pipeline at the Ottawa valley and that west of the Borden line people would have to pay higher prices.

From 1961 until very recently, consumers in the province of Ontario have paid five cents more a gallon for gasoline than was necessary, because of the national oil policy. This represents $1½ billion a year in the form of a subsidy to the province of Alberta. That is in fact what the national energy policy was. It was a subsidy from the province of Ontario to the province of Alberta. Let us not forget that. I do not begrudge it. Alberta was entitled to that consideration. That was one of the principal industries which she had to develop around, and she was entitled to consideration from Ontario. After all, she put up with tariffs for a long time, so why should not Ontario put up with somewhat higher prices as well? I cannot quarrel with that. However, I am suggesting to Alberta members that they should not forget this.

Now that they are in the driver's seat and the shoe is on the other foot, it is as though they say that Ontario has always gouged them, that they have got nothing out of it and that Ontario does not give a damn. That just is not true. That kind of talk is destructive of national unity in this country. So they should just watch the stones when they are throwing them around.

An hon. Member: What about tariffs?

Mr. Saltsman: I mentioned tariffs. I said you have legitimate grievances. I do not deny that. All we want the horsemen from Alberta to do is not forget that Ontario is part of Canada also. Ontario has not been without some sympathy for the west and some understanding of its problems. So let us not start acting as if we are in countries which are foreign to each other and as if Alberta can do exactly what it pleases without any regard for what goes on in the rest of Canada. Some members of this House may speak that way, but I refuse to believe that really expresses the sentiments of the people of Alberta. I have spoken to too many people from Alberta who share my feelings about belonging to a national entity and who are willing to share with the rest of Canada just as other Canadians are willing to share with them.

One starts off with a kind of organization of his speech only to find it must be put aside because someone has made statements prior to one's intervention which must be dealt with. It seems to me that the Liberal government, in spite of itself, is stumbling into semblances of a national energy policy—and we will help them. We do not mind at all if they pick up an item from us, or if a Liberal member supports our resolution, because what we suggest would work for the advantage of the country as a whole. Many things contribute to the establishment of a national energy policy. I say "national energy policy" because this goes beyond oil, gas and electricity. Forms of energy are largely interchangeable.

The Middle East crisis has forced us to go to Venezuela, which has always dealt fairly with us, to see what kind of arrangement can be made. I think arrangements can be made with Venezuela. The story is that Venezuela wants to deal directly with the Canadian government and bypass the multinational oil companies. It is difficult for them, because the multinationals in fact market the oil from Venezuela. It is difficult for them because we cannot provide any shipping for them.

But knowing that this is what the Venezuelan government has in mind, the Canadian government should move immediately to open negotiations with them. I would like to suggest that we already in fact possess an instrument for doing that. We do not have to set up a new corporation, although I think in the long run it probably would be necessary: we should use the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which does over a quarter of a million dollars' worth of business a year in buying and selling on behalf of the government of Canada, using people from various government departments. This corporation could be used immediately. I see in its brochure that it has purchased shipping interests in the amount of $124 million. It is already engaged in the business of hiring ships and arranging for shipping and transportation of goods. I think this corporation should be used immediately and that we should tell the Venezuelan government we are prepared to make a government to government agreement with them.

Under no circumstances should the tar sands of Canada be allowed to fall under private ownership. We have been strangled in this country by private ownership. It is a great little gag which the people going into the tar sands development are using. You know the kind of logic we hear from the people in the oil industry. We had a sample of it just prior to my speaking this evening. When you go to them and mention all the money they are making, and suggest they are not paying any taxes, they say they have not made any money. They say the amount of revenue they have received to this point is exactly equal to the expenditures they have laid out, and that their books do not show them as having made any money—except for one thing: they forget to tell us what they have in reserve in the ground, which is already paid for.

The reserves in the ground represent something in the neighbourhood of ten billion barrels. At roughly $5 a barrel, which the market price will soon be, that is not bad. It represents $50 billion worth in the ground, free for profit in the future except for one thing: they are just liable to have to pay some tax on it. If they get into the Syncrude operation, if they get into the tar sands, and start giving us the mumbo-jumbo about how much money they have sunk into it and how much money they have lost in these various installations, and start taking their depreciation and then take their depletion allowance because they are investing in exploration, then they do not have to pay tax.

So far as I am concerned and so far as my party is concerned, rather than giving the oil companies handouts to exploit us we should do our own exploiting. It is our money they are using, and it is our money they have been using largely up until now. They buy the expertise, and we can buy it too. There are many people who know how to build these plants, and they will work for the government just as well as for the oil companies. It is essential that the government start making some decisions along these lines. For instance, we must have a decision from Venezuela and know where we stand with that country in terms of security of supply.

It is becoming obvious that we must build a pipeline. I agree with the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) that it should be an all-Canadian route, and I believe C. D. Howe would applaud that. In order to build a pipeline to Montreal we must have some idea of the amount of offshore crude we can expect to come in at that point. Until we have some long-term assurance from governments, we do not know what size that pipeline should be and we do not know whether it should be a reversible pipeline or should go straight through. Therefore, it is essential that the government move rapidly on this question.

I think the government must go further and bring in controls on energy expenditures. This country has seen an example of the most wasteful use of capital that is imaginable. That must be prevented in the future. The projection into the seventies indicates that we will need something like $60 billion to meet our energy requirements. If we become involved in a wasteful process in respect of private enterprise as experienced in the thirties, forties and fifties, there will not be enough money around to meet our requirements.

I think any sizeable expenditure on energy operations should go through a national planning board and that the federal government should have a say in how this money is used. If there should be an expenditure of $2 billion or $3 billion in one part of the country, it is not only that part of the country which is affected: the supply situation of other industries is affected, the dollar situation is affected and other borrowers are affected. It is the federal government that must take the lead and do the planning; we cannot leave it to the generals in private industry. I hope the government's reply to the province of Alberta will be, "Thank you very much for your letter regarding your request that we release you from taxation on the development of the tar sands. We appreciate your desire to do that, but the answer is no."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: There have been enough giveaways from this country without that. Those tar sands can be developed by a partnership between the provincial and the federal government, without gigantic giveaways and tax shelters granted to the oil industry. On item (c), where he requests that the federal government should not regulate, directly or indirectly, the price of synthetic crude, the answer should be that that is something which lies within the sovereign power of Canada, not of a province. The Canadian consumers are entitled to ask the Government of Canada to protect them from those who would gouge them because the market is riding high.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (London West): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on the subject of energy resources this evening. My comments will be a pot-pourri dealing with the reaction of the Alberta government to the export tax, the proposed pipeline to Montreal, the development of the tar sands and the unique position of Canada with respect to energy resources.

After the anouncement was made concerning the export tax, all of us heard vigorous and violent reaction from the Premier of Alberta, part of it relating to consultation and part relating to the substance of what had happened. As to the consultation aspect, I do not intend to comment. I was not involved and am not aware of exactly what transpired. As to the substance, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to all Canadians, and to the citizens of Alberta in particular, that they take with a grain of salt the vigorous reaction of the premier. When the export taxes were announced, Premier Lougheed said:

> I don't feel we can be bound by the 1972 statement on oil royalties (that there would ne no change for five years) because of the federal government's statement on an export tax.

The situation in 1972 was that the Premier of Alberta had in fact given an undertaking to the oil companies, when the royalties were established, that they would not be changed during the ensuing five years. Thus, the province of Alberta, as the situation evolved, was locked into an extremely unattractive, extremely costly and bad situation for its own citizens. I suggest that instead of making unkind remarks about the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), the Premier of Alberta should be offering up a little prayer of thanks for that minister, on a regular basis, for having got him off the hook in what was an extremely costly and disadvantageous arrangement for Albertans.

In effect, Alberta was locked into a situation which over the next few years would have cost its citizens hundreds of millions of dollars. But the Premier of Alberta, because he was taken off the hook by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, was able to say, "I am no longer locked in. I can now change the lousy arrangement that I made one year ago and use a posted wellhead price to determine the figure on which I am going to base my royalties." There is nothing strange about this, Mr. Speaker. The Venezuelans have been using that system for the past ten years and the Premier of Alberta intends to start using it next year.

It is interesting to look at some of the arithmetic. The price of oil has gone up 90 cents a barrel over the last ten months. On average, the province of Alberta realizes 18 cents per barrel in royalties on that increase—roughly 20 per cent. On some oil production it realizes 18 per cent and on others 22 per cent; but 20 per cent is a good average. As the world price increased rapidly, providing tremendous windfall gains to the oil companies in Alberta, it is easy to see why Alberta would want to get a more significant slice of the pie for its citizens. In that situation, and being able to get out of the locked-in system, thanks to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the province could arbitrarily set the posted wellhead price and assume an increase of $2 per barrel, rather than 90 cents, and base its royalties on that figure. By doing that the province would realize 40 cents a barrel in royalties, 22 cents more than would have been realized under the locked-in system during the previous period.

Mr. Nielsen: By George, we have another gas expert!

Mr. Buchanan: We grow in the trees out there.

Mr. Nielsen: I think you are out of your tree.

Mr. Buchanan: On the Alberta production of 1.8 million barrels a day, that works out roughly to $400,000 more per day that Alberta could be collecting; and now, thanks to the action of the federal government, it feels free to do that. That is what Alberta is going to start doing on the 1st of January. I am not condemning it. I think it is a wise move. I think it is a fine thing for the citizens of Alberta to be getting a significant part of those windfalls basically resulting from the actions of Mr. Gaddafi and King Feisal in the Middle East. That is what will happen when they start to use a posted wellhead price rather than the actual wellhead price that must be used now. The citizens of Alberta in particular will be the direct beneficiaries, and they and the citizens of Canada at large should take the objections of the Premier of Alberta with a grain of salt. I think he is extremely grateful for getting off the hook. Now he is able to break that commitment.

There are a couple of other aspects of this question that are rather interesting. An Albertan economist, Professor T. L. Powrie of the University of Alberta, has made certain calculations based on last year's production of oil. He estimates that the savings, as a result of the export tax, in lower prices to Canadian consumers will be $21.4 million for the citizens of Alberta, $32.8 million for the citizens of the balance of western Canada, and for the citizens of Ontario the savings will work out to roughly $55 million. The theme has been played by the Premier that the export tax is for the advantage of Ontario. From Professor Powrie's calculations it is interesting to see that the savings are split right down the middle, with $55 million for citizens of western Canada and $55 million for citizens of Ontario.

Professor Powrie also estimates that the export tax causes a net loss to Alberta of $22.8 million because of the $44.2 million loss of royalties, which is partly compensated for by a saving of $21.4 million to Alberta consumers. This net loss is equal to about 16 per cent of the proceeds of the federal export tax. If Alberta is paid over 16 per cent of the revenue from the export tax, it will share in the net gain to the over-all national income. He goes on to say that Alberta might as well try for 81 per cent, that figure being its percentage of total Canadian production.

I would like to move on and point out that Canada is unique in the world among the developed nations, with the exception of the U.S.S.R., in that we will be self-sufficient in energy—oil, gas, uranium, hydro and coal—for a very lengthy time into the future. This is a fact of which Canadians should not be oblivious. We should be aware of the benefits that can accrue to us as a direct result of the fact that we are in a position to power our industries, our manufacturing operations and our transportation with lower cost fuel. That is a significant factor that can go a long way to offsetting the disadvantages of our large land area and relatively small population.

Mr. Stanfield: And a lousy government!

Mr. Buchanan: In the area of manufacturing we are at a disadvantage compared to a great many of the countries with which we must compete and our uniquely advantageous position regarding energy should not be ignored.

To digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, and to consider other resources, in the area of minerals I believe we should be looking very seriously at the benefits of stabilized costs to our manufacturing and processing industries based on our actual production costs rather than international costs caused by the various commodity shortages throughout the world. This would help us build a more economic industrial and manufacturing base and offset the disadvantages of a smaller market and higher transportation costs caused by the size of the country.

One of my colleagues made reference to the proposed development of the Athabasca tar sands. A report has been prepared by the civil service of the province of Alberta, I believe by some departmental people and by some who worked for agencies and boards. It is entitled "Fort McMurray-Athabasca tar sands development strategy" and was prepared in Edmonton in August of 1972. It is interesting to read some of the excerpts and then endeavour to square the advice given to the province with the action it has in fact taken. The report reads:

> Alberta is not under any pressure to develop synthetic crude oil from the bituminous tar sands for the purpose of meeting either Albertan or Canadian petroleum requirements. The pressure to develop synthetic crude from the tar sands emanates from markets external to Canada.

If my memory is correct, Mr. Speaker, Alberta's production is somewhere around 1,800,000 barrels of which 1,200,000 or 1,250,000 are for export. The report continues:

> It is also a basic premise that the demand for the synthetic crude oil will be sufficient to enable Alberta to control the basic terms and conditions for development.
> The basic feature of the development—should be—deliberate policy decisions by Albertans—to ensure that the development complements and supplements the over-all development requirements of Albertans and Canadians. The policy decisions should be guided primarily by the perceived benefits that will accrue to Albertans and Canadians.

This is the recurring theme—that we should be concerned with what is of benefit particularly to the province of Alberta and more generally to the citizens of Canada. To continue:

> Only after Albertan and Canadian policy parameters have been fulfilled should foreign constraints become operative. In short, Canadian policy parameters should take precedence over all other factors. Foreign energy demands should not be the only force influencing development.
> Axiomatic—is the desire that the envolvement of this "tar sand technology" should be led by Canadian technologists; that is, developed, shaped and influenced by Canadians for the benefit of Canadians.
> The tar sands offers a unique opportunity to change the historical trend of ever increasing foreign control of non-renewable resource development in Canada. Here is a reserve of the greatest magnitude . . .

This is in contradiction to the comment made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre).

> . . . which does not require highly speculative investment to find and prove.
> The essential characteristic of our suggestions is their pro-Canadian and pro-Albertan flavour. The basic premise that the demand for synthetic crude oil is from markets external to Canada, combined with the assumption that substantial net benefits will be derived only if the development is firmly controlled in a manner which complements and supplements the development requirements of Alberta and Canada, leads to the adoption of a pro-Canadian and pro-Albertan policy position.
> The attitude and expectations of the multi-national corporations will be the same in the development of the tar sands as has persisted in the conventional crude oil industry . . . Traditionally their concerns have been to win the resource and transport it to the market in its crude state. Technologically there is no reason . . .

I think Albertans feel very strongly about this, Mr. Speaker.

> . . . why the synthetic crude oil could not be upgraded for various energy forms or used as feedstock in the petro-chemical cycle, although this is not usually done in Alberta. The reason why this has not been done is that it is contrary to the corporate policy which does not consider questions such as Canadian economic sovereignty.
> Massive capital injections into the Fort McMurray region at the rate . . . estimated as the requirement of the American crude deficiency . . . would result . . . in . . . the dislocation and instability caused to the Canadian and especially Alberta economy and labour force (which) would be directly contradictory to the economic objective.

Later, the report reads:

> Alberta must stand firm in the conviction that the tar sands make up approximately one third of the known world petroleum reserves . . . Alberta should be able to utilize the tar sands as a lever in the socio-economic development of the province. Nuclear energy, geothermal energy, or the Colorado oil shales as a substitute for petroleum products will not be competitive economically or technologically with the tar sands for some time.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but basically the point that we as Canadians should be aware of and should give considerable thought to is that at various stages—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him by the order made earlier today has expired. He may, of course, continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Two minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Buchanan: I was going to say that Canadians at various times in history have decided that for their own national interest and well-being it is important to control and own certain of our national industries or operations. We decided it was in our interest to control and own the communications media, the transportation industry and the financial industry. I think that at this juncture in our history we should be looking very seriously at taking control of and owning our energy resources. I suggest that at this point we should not be using energy as a commodity for export but, instead, we should be using it as a catalyst for our industrial development.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, the preceding speaker, the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan) had me literally holding my breath as he told us of the benefits Canadians have received from the action taken by this government in their oil policy. As he worked his way from west to east, reciting the benefits province by province, I was waiting until he got to the Maritimes so that he could tell me what benefits we have received from the government's oil policy or any other policy. To my disappointment, he only came as far as Ontario and announced that eastern Canada had received benefits. I think he was referring to Ontario then; he did not get far north and he did not get far east.

I am a newcomer to this House, Mr. Speaker, but since my arrival I have noticed that the hon. gentleman sponsoring this resolution has been seeking to have enunciated the government's policy on energy. What has happened in the time that I have been here—a year now? The minister has issued a green paper or a white paper—a conversation piece. It has been very helpful in discussing some of the problems facing the Canadian oil industry and Canadians in general, with respect to energy, but the next stage of the procedure is unknown. The National Energy Board has initiated a review of export policies and they hope to be in a position to make some recommendations to the government some time in the next year.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, through you to other members, that the export policies of this country involve the whole gamut of oil policy and energy policy generally. But it is late in the day, tragically late for British Columbia which is in an uncomfortable position. It is uncomfortably late for the rest of us, too. Where was the government's policy last year and the year before that? British Columbia is facing a crisis. What the policy of the government is in view of that crisis, we do not know. We face tight supply situations across this country with respect to gasoline and other fuels. What is the policy of the government in view of that situation? Again, we do not know.

The war in the Middle East has brought about unusual shortages which perhaps could not have been anticipated. Apparently the Department of External Affairs still does not know who to blame for the interruption in our oil supplies from the Middle East. No doubt we have come to an end in this country of the era of cheap oil and gas. Certainly the time of cheap hydro in this country has passed. We must plan how we are to use our resources, and plan very carefully. In view of the current energy crisis the world will need to come to terms with the idea that supplies from traditional sources of hydrocarbon fuels are limited. On this continent and in this country we use far more than our share of the world's reserves of energy. We cannot always expect to bring supplies of energy in from underdeveloped countries as many of those countries are developing and their consumption of traditional energy fuels will increase.

We must plan to meet higher costs. Further, we must plan to use our energy resources efficiently and not waste them. In this country almost as much energy is wasted as is utilized. Let me illustrate what I mean. The President of the United States has asked the people to turn down their thermostats. If Canadians were to turn down their thermostats a bit, they would make a worth-while contribution to the cause of energy conservation. We could design cars which use less gasoline and thus help to conserve our energy sources. As well, the government could insist on installing switching apparatus in government buildings which would turn the lights off at the appropriate time. It costs more to install such gear, but the saving in energy would be useful.

I wish to refer to a newspaper article. The report in my hand says that a University of Toronto professor has predicted substantial changes in Canadian life styles as the cost of energy rises in the next 20 to 30 years. He says we are likely to see smaller cities and a check on urban sprawl, that there could be a demand for more efficient appliances, and that "Energy such as oil, gas and electricity will continue to be used for the same purposes but people will adopt attitudes and substitutes that use less or little energy." Those words deserve consideration.

Speaking as a maritimer—and those to my left, as well as those across the floor, have advocated this—I say that big pipelines are not the panacea for my area. I suggest the only hope for the maritime provinces lies in cheaper oil from our traditional offshore supplies or, possibly, in our own oilfields. The construction of mammoth pipelines across the country is not likely to help us much.

What has the lack of policy on the part of government in this field meant? It has meant, first, that a crisis has come about in British Columbia. Tight supply conditions are forecast for other parts of the country as well. Further, it has meant that there is no integrated oil supply system in Canada. If one part of the country runs out of oil or gas, as has happened in British Columbia, there is no way to replace that fuel. Substitutes are not available. We cannot make available other types of energy to meet the shortage.

Another result has been the distinct loss of confidence on the part of the industry. Speaking as an easterner, some of the niceties of the industry may escape me but one thing is apparent. Although I can speak with better authority about our electricity system than about oil, it is apparent that very substantial lead times are needed to get pipelines approved, built and operating. Similarly, a great deal of lead time is needed to develop oilfields, that is, oil wells, and the proving of new reserves. There has been a lag in exploration and development because of the uncertainty existing in the industry. Although Canada has vast potential reserves, we still do not know their extent. Discoveries of energy are being slowed down because of the uncertainty on the part of the oil industry.

I suggest the motion outlines the government's responsibility clearly in that part which says that it must "ensure a continuity of supply at fair and just prices to all Canadian consumers". How can one say that the government is fulfilling its responsibilities in view of the crisis in the British Columbia supply situation? Speaking as a layman and as an eastener, I was shocked to learn that there was an inadequate scheduling of fuel deliveries to British Columbia and that as a consequence fuel supplies in B.C. are tight.

In view of our winters and the dependence of our industries on regular oil supplies, that situation is intolerable. The daily volume of supplies delivered to British Columbia is, if I understand correctly, very close to the total capacity of the pipeline. If the velocity of the fuel going through the pipeline is cut, if water enters the pipeline or if there is some disruption in flow, great difficulties are the result. There is no reserve capacity in the pipeline which might be used to rectify any breach. Alternative sources of supply are not available in an emergency. That situation is totally intolerable.

What can the government do? First, it can encourage, by taxation measures and other means, oil and gas-producing companies to provide for reserves at the wellhead over and above expected demand. More should be available at the wellhead than is necessary to meet contracts. Companies should be encouraged to build facilities which will beef up pipeline capacity and pipelines should not operate at maximum capacity all the time. Obviously, this will cost money. The extra cost would be included in the increased price of gas and oil which is supplied through any particular system.

The government, as well, could insist on the establishment of some sort of grid system similar to electrical grids which could be used to transport oil and gas. The volume to be moved perhaps would not meet the total requirements of any particular market in the country but might meet, say, 20 per cent of total requirements. If there were a shortage on the east coast or on the west coast we should have the capability of supplying limited amounts of gas or oil via an alternate route, via the grid system. The cost of this could be borne by the general revenues of the companies and perhaps by the government. Certainly the government has a role to play in this field. Perhaps it could look at this idea. It is intolerable that our natural gas and oil supply systems are entities unto themselves which are closed off from the rest of the country.

In addition to providing for alternative means of supply, we should provide some storage capacity. That brings me to my next recommendation. I suggest that the government should take it upon itself to provide storage facilities for fuel at strategic points throughout the country. As an easterner, I perhaps know a little more about fish than I know about gas. I submit that the salt mines of Nova Scotia could be used as storage areas for vast quantities of gas and oil. In the event of an emergency, these reserves could be put back into production. They could replace offshore resources the supply of which is temporarily interrupted, or oil coming from other areas. Reserves like that would be useful in meeting an emergency. Just imagine the situation of this country if, in time of war, Trans-Canada Pipelines happened to be put out of commission for any length of time.

This government has not seen fit to provide any sort of reserve: there is no cushion whatever. We should have a substantial cushion. This could be provided by a storage system. We do not anticipate that oil and gas companies could sustain the cost of additional inventories, having once produced the oil and gas. However, this would be in the national interest and something the government could afford to do.

In conclusion, I want to paraphrase something said this afternoon by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). He said we can no longer leave our future in the hands of foreign oil companies. I suggest we can no longer leave our future in the hands of a government that has no oil policy.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, if one puts together the interesting and thoughtful speeches made by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Haliburton) and the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan), one would see there is slowly but surely emerging in this House some degree of consensus that Canada, in relation to energy supplies and resources, should move in the direction that those in my party have been asking for over quite a period of time. Certainly one or two of us at least recall the kind of crescendo our advocacy of that kind of approach reached during what is often referred to as the pipeline debate of 1957.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): 1956.

Mr. Barnett: I am being corrected by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I was thinking of the aftermath in 1957. At this stage of the debate it is temping to follow through with the sort of observations that have been made by other speakers, but I wish to take a few minutes to draw to the attention of the House somewhat different considerations.

All members realize that, complex though the consideration of an oil policy may be in the energy policy as a whole, it cannot be considered in a vacuum. The main thrust of the debate has centred around the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) which calls for government action to provide a continuity of petroleum supplies at fair and just prices to all Canadian consumers. It goes on to make three specific suggestions as to how we might move in that direction. I am sure all my colleagues would agree that, while that is an important objective we must move toward and is very important and necessary to our economy, the matter of continuity of petroleum supplies at reasonable prices to Canadian consumers, both domestic and industrial, is not of itself the whole concern when discussing the question of petroleum.

We want fair prices, but we do not want to move to have continuity of supply at any price. When talking about importing oil or moving it from coast to coast we must not do so in terms of such urgency that we forget all other considerations. When thinking of the world situation and obtaining part of our supply by transportation across the oceans because of what appears to be an emergency at the moment, we should not agree that this is necessary at the price of turning the oceans of the world into deserts.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands stated it would be very difficult to grow grain across the prairie provinces if we had to use horse power as did the pioneer farmers. I suggest it would be even more disastrous if there were to be a film of oil out of the Alberta oilfields covering the plains of the Prairies to a depth of one-quarter or one-eighth of an inch. We would no longer be regarded in any part of the world as being the breadbasket for the production of wheat and other grains.

In our desire to secure supplies of oil from Venezuela, the Middle East or anywhere else, it is equally important that we consider the possible exploitation of oil that may exist in our offshore banks. We must not do this at the expense of eliminating the potential productive resources of the oceans of the world, their resources of oxygen and other requisites for our existence as human beings on this planet. In light of recent claims of a world shortage, which have perhaps been accentuated by the disturbances in the Middle East—which we hope will not continue much further into the future—I have been fearful about being stampeded into throwing to the winds what has become a genuine and growing concern for environmental matters, particularly with regard to the oceans of the world.

Prior to events in the Middle East, many Canadians were extremely suspicious that much of the so-called oil shortage may have been artificially created by the multinational oil firms. This immediately brings to mind, especially to those of us from British Columbia, actions being taken by oil interests in the United States with regard to the development and transportation of Alaskan oil to the southern states. Those suspicions are not without some foundation. The Middle East situation has certainly revealed that many nations are really vulnerable. The one that is cited most frequently and in this context is Japan. Nevertheless, such nations as the United States and Canada should not cast aside the concern that certain multinational corporations are going to attempt to take advantage of current prices to stampede us into throwing aside what should be our legitimate concern in the field of protecting the environment.

I read a recent report in the New York Times arising out of the International Marine Consultation Organization meetings which have been going on in London. It stated that every year several million tons of oil are dumped into the oceans of the world. This is largely due to the fact that shipping companies interchange oil tanks for ballast, and so on. This is a contributor to the shortage. I do not profess to be an expert, but according to that article much of the oil that is being dumped could be salvaged and utilized to help meet the current oil crisis if the so-called shipping states, their lines and the interests that operate under their flags were not so careless and unconcerned about the wasteful practices in the shipping field that have been followed helter-skelter for many years.

All the reports coming out of that conference are discouraging. I recently spent a week at the United Nations, and my main interest was following the proceedings in connection with the planning for the Law of the Sea conference. Many of the coastal states and developing nations with which we normally align ourselves are concerned that there should be a sensible law of the sea, one which would introduce a new world order. Unfortunately, the so-called shipping states were still maintaining an inflexible position and insisting that no progress ought to be made to bring in new shipping practices, particularly those which might extend to the transport of oil by tanker.

We should not lose sight of these considerations when we discuss our own immediate energy requirements and what can best be done to ensure a continuous supply of oil to the various regions of Canada. They are very much to the fore in the province in which I reside, principally because of the dangers inherent in the proposed tanker route from Alaska to the refinery complex at Cherry Point. When we asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) the other day when Canada intended to get its teeth into this matter, we were expressing a legitimate concern. It is a concern which is still genuinely felt in British Columbia even though there may be preoccupation at the moment with the oil export situation and the possible shortage of fuel.

I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs understood that my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) was not thinking in terms of a shooting war with the United States in a literal sense. But we do have a feeling that the hon. gentleman, as our spokesman in dealing with the other nations of the world, has soft-pedalled the issue a good deal. We recognize that it has been a fast-changing situation. Though we did put forward some half-hearted proposals about moving oil through Canada, they were rejected by the United States and it does appear now that a pipeline will be built across Alaska. The other day we were told by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) that the United States did not react to a proposal that we offset the supply to the Cherry Point refinery from Canadian sources against a withdrawal of the idea of moving supplies in by tanker. And so it goes!

In the few minutes left to me I shall try to recognize my responsibility by suggesting to the Secretary of State for External Affairs the kind of "bullets" he might use. One proposal which has been put forward by members of my party is that a pollution control zone be established. This is one of the subjects to be considered by the conference on the Law of the Sea; it may or may not be written into an international code when the conference completes its discussion.

The other day I heard Canada's representative talking about the theory that international law is sometimes made by what he called state practice. This is, in effect, what we have been doing. We suggest to the government that one of our strongest weapons in dealing with the United States would be to take the same action off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts as we have taken off the Arctic where the exercise has been largely academic. We might not be able to enforce it but, as I have said before, at least we could enforce it with respect to any ships using a Canadian port. We could say; "Unless you comply with certain standards, you do not come in." If we were to take action of this kind, the United States would know we meant business and I think they would be shamed into observing the appropriate standards in waters close to our coast.

Second, I believe, it would be a strong point in our favour if we were to take strict action in respect of tanker ports on our own eastern seaboard. There are certain very questionable projects under development there at the present time; no proper environmental assessment has been made in connection with the proposed tanker landings in the gulf or in the lower St. Lawrence. We must attend to matters of this kind if we wish to convince the United States that Canada means what it says when we express concern about the tanker route into Cherry Point.

There is a third consideration which relates particularly to the situation in the Strait of Juan de Fuca, Puget Sound and Georgia Strait. As far as I know, the suggestion I am putting forward now is being made for the first time. It is that we should say to the United States "If you insist on moving Alaskan oil to a refinery—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him under the special order made earlier today has expired. I would ask the House to give unanimous consent so that he may continue, but I would point out that two hon. members, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) have indicated to the Chair that they wish to make a contribution to the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Two minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the hon. member have further time in which to continue his remarks?

An hon. Member: Five minutes.

Mr. Barnett: I will try to be brief. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says he will time me. I was about to say that the government might suggest to the United States that they look into the possibility of establishing a tanker port at the entrance to the Strait of Juan de Fuca between Port Angeles and Cape Flattery. There is a shipping terminal of sorts already. I believe an examination would show that if this were done, the environmental risks would be infinitely less than if tankers were moved through the inner waters, in which case, as oceanographers have well established, virtually all the pollution which might result from any spill would flow into Canadian waters. Perhaps I could find an opportunity of expanding on this subject at some future time.

When we talk about fighting the United States we are saying, basically, that Canada should take constructive and positive action to prove that we are not prepared to shut up until they are prepared to follow the example and the lead we have given.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take advantage of the consideration of the motion moved by the hon. member for Nanaïmo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who proposes an exchange of views on the crisis now experienced throughout the world concerning the supply of oil and, not unlike my colleague, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae), I regret that this motion—an excellent one—does not have greater scope.

I would have liked to see a supplementary measure included in it, one which would have, for instance, advocated establishing a research program to save the oil that we use now and also to develop new techniques for the recovery of oil from the tar sands of Athabasca Mr. Speaker, we might say that the energy crisis affects almost all industrialized nations. Because, as Canadians, we have been told every Saturday night over a great many years to put a tiger in our tank, we are somewhat under the impression that our natural resources in Canada are inexhaustible and, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) stated a moment ago, we are inclined to take them for granted and believe that we shall forever be able to obtain these commodities easily and cheaply.

We have indeed the reputation of being the granary of the world and we certainly fulfil this function well. We have accepted the responsibilities which this function imparts; thus, we are under the obligation to keep important supplies of wheat and grain in order to live up to our reputation as the granary of the world.

Nevertheless, we realize that those great resources, those non-renewable natural resources can run out and we have a rather hard proof of that to accept in the new policy adopted by OPEC oil-producing member countries as well as the conflict in the Middle East that is partly responsible for the difficulties we know.

It was said this afternoon that Canada lacked an energy policy and that this government or others before are partly to blame if we are now faced with such a situation. I say that as early as 1961 our country adopted an energy policy that ensured at least that western production would be sold on an interesting market in western United States and the east, that is east of the Borden line, would be supplied by the Middle East as well as Venezuela.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that it was a policy that suited us because, as was indicated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (M. Macdonald) this afternoon, we get top price for our oil from the United States, and we had a more viable market east of the Borden line which was more economical than bringing in western oil. On the other hand, as I indicated earlier, there were changes because of that new policy on the part of OPEC member countries as well as the conflict going on in the Middle East.

Surely there will be ways of levelling out those difficulties that we will meet and there is already talk about eventually rationing oil and gas although Canada produces enough petroleum and oil to meet domestic needs.

Before I enter the core of the subject I want to discuss, Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk about the production in the different provinces. Of course, the biggest producers of that natural resource is Alberta. I hope people of Alberta will not be offended when I talk about our natural resources; I think they accept the fact that those resources belong to the whole nation. Alberta produces 1,493,000 barrels of oil a day; Saskatchewan, 239,000; British Columbia, 61,000; Manitoba, 14,000; the Northwest Territories, 3,200, and eastern Canada, that is the region east of the Borden line, which includes the province of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, 2,223.

What I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, is the lack of oil products in eastern Canada. As you know, there will soon be a provincial election in the province of Quebec, which I represent and from which I come, and a political party which is as marginal as they come has chosen for its mission to separate Quebec from the rest of the Confederation. I would like to draw your attention to the vulnerability of Quebec if one day—and I wish that this will not happen—it opted for separation. I would like my compatriots to be conscious of this danger and of the difficulties which Quebec would have to obtain supplies, particularly oil, especially in view of the climate which we have in Quebec, as in the rest of eastern Canada.

At this time, the province of Quebec needs at least 500,000 barrels of oil a day. These 500,000 barrels come from the Middle East and 25 per cent come from Venezuela.

What would happen if the province were isolated as a few of my compatriots wish and had to negotiate agreements with Middle East countries or Venezuela without the support of the natural resources which we have in Canada and which can be useful in such negotiations. Mr. Speaker, there is only one point that has me worried when I see the irresponsibility of those who want to lead the people of the province of Quebec down this dead-end avenue which would be a policy of independence. This will not happen fortunately, and we have found means to solve difficulties brought about by an oil shortage.

The minister told me this afternoon that during November, 10 per cent of supplies to the province of Quebec will be assured by tankers on the St. Lawrence Seaway.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I do not have to insist further on the problems facing the government of a poor country with six million people, an island in an industrial sea, if it were told: Now that you have taken the chance and went the way of separation, find your own oil and leave us in peace. I think that our population is sensible enough not to fall for it. I will not press the point, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to bring out the stupidity—and I restrain myself with difficulty—the stupidity, as I was saying, of some of my fellow countrymen who discuss the chances of survival of a country with six million people that must, for example, import 80 per cent of its food and 100 percent of its fuel oil.

These are some of the points that I wanted to emphasize during the few minutes I have contributed to this debate which has enabled us to study the motion presented by my good friend, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, and which it gives me pleasure to support.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed honoured to have the opportunity of closing this debate, a debate of fundamental importance to all Canadians. There have been charges made today and politics has been played, but the time has now come when Canada can no longer afford to have politics involved in an issue as vitally important to Canadians as the issue before us at this time.

A minister of this government has fouled up Albertans twice within the last three or four months. I suggest you will find no better Canadians in Canada than you will find in Alberta, but they will not be fouled up continuously. As soon as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) and this federal government recognize this fact, the better off Canada and Canadians will be.

A series of meetings are scheduled to commence at the beginning of next week at which provincial representatives will meet with the minister. This minister should realize that the Premier of Alberta is an ex football player. He has the ball, he is running and he does not intend to lose it. This does not mean he will not play ball with the federal government if it will play ball with him.

An hon. Member: He has been playing without his helmet for too long.

Mr. Towers: In spite of all the charges made here today, there has been no recognition of the fact that the government of the province of Alberta has increased royalties from the base of 16 per cent when it took office to 22 per cent at the present time. These royalties will continue to increase, and this is one of the things this government must recognize. The government of Alberta has a responsibility to the people living there, and it will look after its residents. The federal government had better realize that fact. I encourage the minister to be honest and straightforward. When we are talking about Syncrude we are talking about 4 per cent of the potential of the Athabasca oil sands.

When the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was premier of the province of Saskatchewan, he had an opportunity to do something about the development of these resources. Successive NDP governments have had the same opportunity, but little have they done. Now when there is a movement taking place which will be of importance to Canada, everybody is crying "foul". I suggest that the smartest thing this government of Canada could do at the moment is allow Syncrude to go ahead in developing this 4 per cent potential of the Athabasca oil sands, allowing the industry to do something to counteract the effects of Mid-East oil cutbacks.

It has been suggested that present Alberta oil reserves will be depleted in a number of years. I suggest this is true unless new development takes place. We must recognize this fact and develop the alternatives. If we are left to the discretion of Mid-East countries, I say "God help us all" because we will certainly be paying much more for the oil used in this great dominion. That is why it is so fundamental for the minister at the present time to make no further mistakes when engaged in discussions with members of the Alberta government.

Syncrude is not to be a foreign company. Some 98 per cent of the personnel of Syncrude will be Canadian. The president and the vice-president of the organization are Canadians. One vital fact—this is something that the NDP have forgotten—is the technology required to develop this potential resource. We now have to go to England and Germany in order to obtain the expertise to carry forward the Syncrude project with the maximum benefit to Canadians. We must be very careful and use a great deal of discretion in developing this industry in Alberta.

There is no reason in the world for the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) to suggest that Albertans are against Ontario or any other province in this great Dominion of Canada. They are good and compassionate people, but they certainly will not be shoved around. I entreat the minister to use every means at his disposal to deal in a compatible way with members of the Alberta government when he meets with them in the forthcoming week, in order that Canada and Canadians will be the benefactors.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—REQUEST THAT PAY AWARD TO NURSES BE REVIEWED

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in looking across the chamber I miss the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). However, I rise to express dissatisfaction with the answers I received from him on questioning him in the House this week about the serious problem which has arisen as the result of the slowdown by nurses in federal employ during their protest against a recent arbitration award.

My question had to do with the specific problems of nurses in veterans affairs' hospitals across the country and the fact that this particularly dedicated group, as are their colleagues in the over-all federal employ, is receiving less pay than their provincial counterparts. As a matter of fact, the variation in pay runs from around $500 in some provinces to over $1,400 in others.

I do not want to be presumptuous by varying from the particular question I am debating tonight, but the protest does take in a wide range of federal nurse employees. I was really surprised when, on questioning the minister as to the effects of the slowdown on the care of veterans, he replied that from information he had received the patients were receiving good care, morale is good and the nurses are doing a good job. I agree with some parts of that statement. Of course the nurses are doing a good job, and will continue to be so because of the needs of veterans, particularly those under chronic and domicillary care. But when he says that morale is high, he is not aware of the facts—although he should be.

Surely the minister gets more representation than members of parliament, certainly more than opposition members. Surely that section of his department which has responsibility for treatment services must keep him advised of what is going on in veterans' hospitals. I know for a fact that the minister is dedicated to the cause of veterans, but he is being less than sincere when he tries to tell this House that morale is high in veterans' hospitals.

I suggest this problem will get worse and worse and that if his government insists on discriminating against various regions of the country and against federal employees in respect of federal pay, the morale will get so bad it will be impossible to recruit new staff. Surely this government, which pledges equality for all Canadians wherever they may live, should realize that nurses in every province are doing the same type of work and should be considered equal. Surely, too, the patients in hospitals are as sick in one part of the country as they are in another, and deserve equal professional nursing care.

Evidently the minister is not being told the facts, as there is no doubt he is telling the story which he is being told by his department, unless the fact is that he is not being told the facts as they exist. If this is the case, I suggest to the minister that he should call in some groups of nurses similar to the group with which I met just a few hours ago. I further suggest that he get his officials from treatment services, who sit as advisers on the Treasury Board committee on pay matters, to get off their butts and visit the veterans' hospitals and talk to the nurses about their problems.

Is he not aware of the fact that in one province, Nova Scotia, one of the poorest provinces, the discrepancy in pay is over $500, and that that province is paying its provincial nurses more than their federal counterparts? Is he not aware, Mr. Speaker, either that the treatment requirement per 50 patients is one head nurse, four regular nurses, three registered nursing assistants and six orderlies per shift, and in at least two of the hospitals from which I have had representation the same shift for 50 patients is being handled by one regular nurse, one assistant and one orderly? Does this fact and the overburden when three do the work of 18 and have to care for 50 patients not prove that morale must be low? I have two examples to prove that morale must be low. The first is a telegram from the nursing subgroup, Victoria veterans hospital, to the nursing group of the professional institute. It reads:

> Unanimous decision by nursing subgroup Victoria veterans hospital that we ask immediate 10 per cent cost of living bonus for years 1972, 1973 and 1974. We strongly urge that all groups support this decision please reply.

Next I should like to quote a couple of paragraphs of a representation sent to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) from the provincial staff nurses' council. This points out the situation. It reads as follows:

> The arbitration award will only serve to perpetuate and worsen the present problems encountered at Deer Lodge regarding maintaining a safe level of professional nursing care. Only the new graduates or the nurse who has worked at Deer Lodge for one year will receive a salary that compares favourably with that which can be earned elsewhere.
> The problem is the application of the salary scale as much, if not more than, the actual amount of the salary. The hospital cannot now attract experienced registered nurses because of salary rates that are well below that paid by other hospitals in the same city. The registered nurses with anything less than six years of previous experience will be starting at an annual rate of $7,303 at Deer Lodge. At other city hospitals a nurse with one year's experience starts at $7,500; with two or two and one-half year's experience at $7,800; with three or four year's experience at $8,100. Many hospitals also grant additional increments on the basis of performance. Deer Lodge does not.

The few new graduates that are attracted at Deer Lodge do not remain long because of the lack of experienced nurses making it necessary for these nurses to have to assume too great a responsibility too soon.

Nurses actually lose money by remaining at Deer Lodge. The amount of annual increments is less than $20 per month—so much below what other hospitals pay that nurses are not inclined to remain long at Deer Lodge.

I think the matter may be summed up in this way. In the motto of that particular nursing group it is said that to care for nurses is to care for patients. I ask the minister, or whoever replies, not to say that morale is high. He should not mislead the House. I respectfully request a proper answer to this problem.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the Staff Relations Act under which the nurses bargain for their terms and conditions of employment, they have a right to choose which method of dispute settlement they wish to use from either of two alternatives: first, conciliation or, second, binding arbitration. In this instance the nursing group chose binding arbitration.

The arbitration award was rendered by the arbitration tribunal under the chairmanship of Justice René Lippé on October 16. It was apparent that the award of the tribunal was not satisfactory to the nurses, many of whom refused to come to work on October 22 through October 25. The largest number of nurses who withdrew their services was 219, on October 24, but the majority have returned to work and as of today only 24 are still absent. We can assure the House that no major inconvenience has been experienced by the patients under the care of the federal nurses.

The officers of Treasury Board are already making arrangements for the nurses to receive the retroactive pay cheques, and we hope that these will be issued shortly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CHILE—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF CREDIT TO MILITARY GOVERNMENT—ALLEGED DENIAL TO ALLENDE GOVERNMENT

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago in this House I rose to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) with regard to Canada's credits to Chile. I asked what had affected Canada's policy, with the result that it had effectively cut off credits to Chile. I was answered with the very short, terse and rather testy reply to the effect that Canada had not cut off its loans to Chile but had approved as late as April, 1973, a $5 million loan for the purchase of aircraft and telecommunications equipment. My further question was to the effect that the House would appreciate having a very thorough accounting of Canada's performance in terms of credits to Chile over the past three years. I rise tonight to pursue this question and to give an indication of what kind of accounting the House should have.

We all know the extremely tragic events that occurred in that country in September of this year. Many Canadians, many of whom do not support the socialist conviction, felt very bitter about those events because the duly elected democratic government of Chile was overthrown in a bloody coup. Of course, we in Canada can take some satisfaction that we were not involved in any way, and I am suggesting that we did nothing to bring the coup about. But sometimes in international events it is not simply what we do but what we fail to do that counts.

If we go back over the record of Canada's loans to Chile in the 1960s we find a very good performance indeed. Through the Export Development Corporation, Canada advanced some $24.6 million, a not inconsiderable sum. And through the Canadian International Development Agency, Canada advanced loans, here through the agency of the Bank for International Development, amounting to $8.6 million. These loans date back to 1968.

But in the 1970s our performance was minimal. For example, the only new CIDA money was an agreement to advance some $87,000 in 1972. It is important to realize that Chile's performance in repaying these loans had been excellent over the years. We had lent them, through the EDC, some $24.6 million and they returned $12.3 million over the years, an excellent performance by any standard and a performance which should have assured us of Chile's continuing intention to honour its obligations.

At the end of the 1960s and the beginning of the seventies we found our loan pattern shifting to other countries that we perhaps considered safer bets. As our performance vis-à-vis Chile went down practically to zero, we began to lend substantial sums of money to such countries as Brazil, countries which have governments that, without doing injustice to the term, are right-wing.

It is fine to be told in this House that we did advance a loan in 1973 of $5 million, but the fact is that this loan has not been made. What happened in April, 1973, was that the board of the development corporation approved continuing negotiations on that loan. That loan has never been signed. But it is not what happened then that is so important as what failed to happen before that. In effect, in the year 1972 Canada participated in the international credit squeeze on Chile. There is no doubt that there was an international credit squeeze. Let me read for a few moments from a speech made by Dr. Allende to the United Nations on December 4, 1972. He said:

It should be stressed that in the years immediately preceding nationalization the large copper companies initiated expansion plans. However, those plans—which were unsuccessful for the most part—were not financed from their own resources, despite their huge profits, but by means of external credits. In accordance with legislative provisions, Chile has had to take over responsibility for those debts, which amount to the enormous sum of more than $727 million. We have begun to pay those debts, including one which one of those enterprises had contracted with Kennecott, its own parent company in the United States.

The international community turned on Chile, Mr. Speaker, and we went along with them. We put our credits to Chile under review. That is to say, we forwarded no new credits—and Chile absolutely needed these to survive. It is not good enough to say that we did not do anything; it was the very fact that we did not do anything which hurt the economy of Chile. Of course, the EDC took part through its own chief officer in the Canadian delegation that went to the Paris Club meeting in the fall of 1972 at which time the credits to Chile were reviewed and Canada agreed to roll back some of these credits.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know, as well, what Canada's role was in the Latin American Development Bank and the World Bank during that period.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of setting the record straight on the Export Development Corporation in Chile, especially in view of the unworthy suggestion made by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) that Canada participated in the international credit squeeze on Chile. Just as the Export Development Corporation has performed its function of facilitating trade with capitalist countries and with eastern European countries and China, it continued to do so in Chile. The only change in pattern which occurred, arose because the election of the Allende party in Chile and the subsequent election of the late Dr. Allende as president in 1970, coincided with grave domestic and external financial problems for that country.

Hon. members will appreciate that EDC is not a giveaway corporation. It exists to facilitate trade—and trade means getting paid on the due date. Bad debts and slow payments do not help the balance of trade. Nevertheless, during this period of difficulty for Chile, applications for insurance were reviewed on a case by case basis. Where there was a reasonable prospect of payment, the EDC insured. Such prospects existed for sales made on short-term credit, that is, credit up to 180 days. The case by case review of applications for support for sales to that country resulted in continued approvals of insurance for such supplier credits.

In the Paris Club talks for rescheduling of Chilean debts, the EDC and Canada played a leading role in helping to solve Chile's problems. It promoted the 1972 rescheduling of 70 per cent of the debt. In its financing to buyers of capital goods normally sold on credit terms longer than five years, EDC took advantage of the trade opportunity. It approved on April 11, 1973, the $5 million loan to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) alluded in the House. In July, 1973, it agreed to guarantee a $2 million loan to Chile proposed by a consortium of Canadian banks. This was at a time when only one or two other countries in the world were prepared to grant credits to Chile.

Negotiations to settle with the Allende government the details of the loan, such as agreement on the documents, continued through the months that followed. These arrangements were largely complete when the coup of September, 1973, occurred. During the uncertain days that followed, EDC had no one to deal with. When the junta was recognized and when it expressed itself as bound by existing and future debt obligations, the case by case review policy for insurance approvals was resumed by EDC. Presumably, the junta will soon ask to have the Allende government's loan arrangements implemented.

URBAN AFFAIRS—POSITION OF MINISTER AT TRILEVEL CONFERENCE ON POSSIBILITY OF MUNICIPALITIES RECEIVING SHARE OF FEDERAL REVENUES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) for making it possible for parliamentary observers to attend the national trilevel intergovernmental meeting this week in Edmonton. I ask the government to maintain the principle of having parliamentary observers at all important meetings which are not strictly closed.

The Edmonton conference dealt with the super problem of urbanization and how to manage our urban growth. The rate of urbanization is nothing short of phenomenal. Before the end of this century, 94 per cent of Canadians will be urbanized and three-quarters will live in 12 major centres. The special problems of urbanization—public assistance, transportation, environmental management, leisure, recreation and housing—interact on one another and demand more money which municipalities have no way of raising.

Municipalities are becoming more and more dependent upon provincial and federal government grants. The quality of life issues are faced most directly by the municipalities because the problems are right on their doorstep. Yet the municipalities have little or no influence on provincial or federal decision-making. Complexity and fragmentation of government has resulted as we live within the confines of a constitution written at a time when the social problems of urbanization were never dreamed of. The joint Senate-Commons Committee on the Constitution found a possible solution to meet the municipalities' demands for restructuring of revenue-generating capacity. Recommendation No. 67 of the joint committee's report reads:

> In the light of the injustice done municipalities by their having to rely on the property tax for the bulk of their revenue, there should be a sharing of tax fields between governments that would allow municipalities direct access to other sources or revenue.

The key to the trilevel conference in Edmonton was the attempt by the 4,500 municipalities represented to have a task force set up that would consolidate all information about public finance and "develop feasible options for implementation of the concept of local revenue-sharing in Canada." That proposal was strongly supported by the governments of Ontario and Alberta. But it was blocked by the intransigence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who was clearly expressing the refusal of the federal government to even study this difficult and crucial question. The minister even threatened the municipalities that if they persisted with their request for a task force to study tax-sharing, it would wreck the trilevel process. Because trilevel meetings are still in their early stages, and because such hope is held out for them as a way to clear a path for modern, urbanized society through the jungle of government in this country, the municipalities accepted a compromise.

This compromise was foisted on them by the minister who proposed a task force to study public finance, period. If ever there was a "big daddy" slapping down an adolescent son, it was the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. He gave the municipalities a lecture about how generous the federal government is in grants for land assembly, sewage treatment and rail relocation. But this was a diversionary tactic because he refused to consider the possibility that the municipalities know best their own needs and should have a way of meeting those needs without having to come to Ottawa with their hand out.

The municipalities, Mr. Speaker, are not proposing higher taxes for Canadians. What they are proposing is better value from the tax revenues now available. The urban governments want to share in the management of growth in Canada. All they can do now is react to and cope with problems. The federal government maintains that its programs should have a higher priority than local needs. Is this actually justified in the national interest?

Last Sunday I went through the new Mill Woods development in Edmonton, a typical example of urbanized Canada. I saw the need for physical and social services. The school board has a sign warning prospective home buyers that no school will be built in the foreseeable future. Are the hundreds of millions of dollars Ottawa spends on unemployment insurance, Information Canada, LIP and OFY projects really more necessary in the national interest than better services in Mill Woods? These are the problems the federal government will not even study, and in this refusal shows its continuing arrogance.

By 1976, Mr. Speaker, government at all levels will be spending more than 50 per cent of the gross national product. This is too much government. They must get together to manage growth. Mayor Ivor Dent of Edmonton has expressed the reason cogently in these words:

> Senior levels of government must accept the principle that funds can be transferred unconditionally to municipalities and in so doing they can transfer responsibility as well and make municipalities accountable to the people of this nation for its use. The time for revenue sharing is now. Municipalities must be given a greater share in the resources of this nation by way of an allocation of the personal and corporate income tax. It is only reasonable that municipalities should share in a revenue directly related to the economic growth of Canada and one that properly reflects the taxpayers' "ability to pay."

The federal government used the tri-level meeting as a showcase for announcements of new programs. It did the same thing at the Western Economic Opportunities conference in Calgary last July. It is time Ottawa started cooperating with the rest of the country, instead of dominating it. A study of tax-sharing would at least be a start.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Edmonton tri-level conference, on the recommendation of the co-chairmen, reached a consensus in favour of the following proposal, on the understanding that delegations would submit it to their governments for consideration and report back to the co-chairmen by December 31 of this year. The proposal of the co-chairmen was to appoint an independent task force under their direction to carry out an in-depth analysis of the present state of public finance in Canada, with special reference to local government finance.

Its primary focus is to include, first, the development of a common data base with respect to the comparative revenue and expenditure flows at each level of government and recent and emerging trends, including such geographic and functional breakdowns as are found to be relevant and necessary for the analysis; secondly, detailed fiscal relationships, interdependencies and financial flows between the three levels of government; and finally, specific revenue and expenditure data for selected units of local government as are considered relevant and necessary in each province. The task force will report to the 1974 tri-level conference.

The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), who I think it is fair to say was interested in making progress and preserving the tri-level process rather than in long and frustrating debate, took a position of leadership, and was instrumental in the development of a consensus position which will allow for a sensible solution to the matter.

I was pleased to note that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) referred to the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. As the former joint chairman of that committee, I was pleased he referred to our recommendation No. 67. He might also have referred to our discussion on page 59 in which we said that on balance we did not favour the approach of a specific and guaranteed percentage of income tax.

What the committee actually had in mind was that the provinces should declare themselves willing to allocate on a more or less permanent basis to their municipalities a specified share of tax, especially the income tax. In other words, the federal government would pay to the municipalities directly but only on the agreement of the province that part of its share should be so allocated.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CRITERIA FOR CONDUCTING RAPESEED MARKETING POLL

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it has already been indicated in the House on several occasions that it is the intention of the government to conduct a poll of rapeseed growers in western Canada before the end of the year to determine the system they prefer for the marketing of their product. On June 1, I announced the appointment of a supervisor for the poll, Mr. George S. Turner, to take charge of the task of consulting with rapeseed growers and overseeing the conduct of the poll itself. On the basis of Mr. Turner's consultations with growers and their organizations the following criteria for the conduct of the poll were recommended and accepted by government:

1. A producer eligible to vote in the poll will be defined as a Canadian Wheat Board regular permit holder whose permit indicates acreage seeded to rapeseed in any two out of the three crop years, 1971-72, 1972-73 and 1973-74. Also eligible to vote will be new permit holders who grew grain for the first time in 1972 or 1973 and whose permit books indicate acreage seeded to rapeseed in at least one year.

2. The ballot will be worded so that the rapeseed grower may indicate his preference for one of two options for the marketing of his rapeseed, that is, the present system or the Canadian Wheat Board, plus the opportunity to register an undecided vote.

3. A majority of at least 60 per cent of the ballots returned must be in favour of the Canadian Wheat Board alternative before such a change could be made.

4. Ballots will be mailed to producers in early December, 1973.

Information concerning alternative marketing systems for rapeseed will be distributed to growers prior to the poll to assist them in deciding on the system they prefer for the marketing of their product. Manitoba Pool Elevators, Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and Alberta Wheat Pool, at our request, have jointly prepared an information brochure stating the case for including the marketing of rapeseed under the Canadian Wheat Board. The Rapeseed Association of Canada, again at our invitation, has prepared a brochure stating the case for the open market method of rapeseed marketing. The pools and the rapeseed association have borne the cost of preparing the material for their respective brochures while the government is bearing the cost of printing and distributing the material. The brochures will be jointly mailed on November 16 to those rapeseed growers who are eligible to vote in the poll. The ballots will be mailed on December 3 and voters will have until December 14 to return their ballots to the supervisor of the poll, Mr. George S. Turner. The results of the poll will be made known to the House immediately following the conclusion of the poll.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by thanking the minister responsible for the Wheat Board for sending us a copy of his statement a few minutes before he rose to make the statement in the House. It is a good idea for the government and various organizations to keep farmers well informed, and it was a good idea for the minister to make the kind of statement he made today well in advance of the intended rapeseed plebiscite.

The vote that will take place in the first part of December will be most important. A great many people see it as possibly a turning point for agriculture in Canada in relation to the Wheat Board form of marketing, which is basically negotiation and the pooling of prices, as against the concept of futures marketing in which prices are determined by supply and demand in the marketplace at any given time. There have been requests by organizations to postpone the plebiscite because of the complexity of the task of explaining the differences between open or futures marketing method and the Wheat Board selling method. The minister did not allude to this, but I understand they have been turned down and the vote will be taking place in the first part of December.

I am glad to see that in the plebiscite there will be an opportunity to register undecided votes. I take it from the minister's remarks that undecided votes will be counted as votes for retention of the present futures marketing system for rapeseed and flax.

When one looks at the whole situation concerning rapeseed and the tremendous growth of this crop over the past few years under the futures or open marketing system it is obvious that the growth has been phenomenal. I believe that for a good many producers across western Canada it has been a very satisfactory way of selling their product.

While it might be improper for us as politicians to get involved at this time on one side or the other inasmuch as this is a good opportunity to let the issue be decided by the growers associations and the people directly involved in the plebiscite, I hasten to say that when one looks at the whole situation at the present time it seems that the present method of marketing rapeseed is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, when one looks at the statement made by the minister on the question of the rapeseed marketing poll one wonders how far the government is going in the direction of government by plebiscite. It seems strange that when there is an issue whether this commodity should be sold on the open market or marketed by the Canadian Wheat Board we suddenly have a plebiscite. Where is the plebiscite on the action taken with regard to feed grains? There is none.

If 51 per cent of the producers who return the forms say they want the Canadian Wheat Board to market their rapeseed, it will not be done. If 59 per cent say that is what they want, it will not be done. The plebiscite requires 60 per cent. That must be what is called Liberal democracy. The question should be decided on the basis of a simple majority one way or the other. If a 60 per cent majority were required to form a government in this country, we would not have a government at this time.

An hon. Member: Maybe we don't have one now.

Mr. Knight: Maybe we don't.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knight: The Conservative critic stated, as the Tories have done with regard to every major policy that has come before the House, that they want a hands off policy. They do not want to take a stand. Not taking a stand in the debate that will take place on rapeseed simply means one thing, a stand for an open market. All members of the House should take a stand. In fact, the minister should take a stand. Where do the politicians stand in regard to marketing rapeseed? This party stands for putting flax, rye and rapeseed under the jursidiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knight: Under the open market system farmers sign contracts for $3 a bushel and the brokers and shysters resell the rapeseed at $6 to $7 a bushel. I say it is time we moved into a position of orderly marketing through the Canadian Wheat Board.

The leaders of the farm organizations and the members of the government should state where they stand. It is nonsensical to hold a poll now when last year the government brought in amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act which raised the question of the marketing of these commodities outside that board. The New Democratic Party moved an amendment in committee to the Wheat Board Act to provide for the marketing of flax, rye and rapeseed under the jurisdiction of the board. The government party and the Official Opposition defeated that amendment. Now there is to be a plebiscite and the law does not even allow the Wheat Board to market these grains even if the farmers vote in favour of the proposition.

Does the minister in charge of the Wheat Board give western farmers the assurance that if they vote for Wheat Board marketing his colleagues will allow him to bring such an amendment before the House? Will the Conservative party allow the government to give the Wheat Board jurisdiction over rapeseed? I think the manner in which the plebiscite has been set up, and the manner in which the government is carrying it out, amounts to an attempt to weigh the procedure in favour of the open market system.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I think that the minister's statement that a consultation of producers would be held in late November or early December is an undertaking to enable an important area of our economy to express itself and choose a process for the marketing of its production.

As stated in paragraph (2) of the minister's statement, the ballot will be worded so that the rapeseed grower may indicate his preference for one of two options for the marketing of his rapeseed, that is, the present system or the Canadian Wheat Board, plus the opportunity to register an undecided vote.

Mr. Speaker, this process seems to me altogether democratic and enables producers to choose their own marketing system for their products. I understand that in other fields of production, they do not operate this way and I would suggest that the Department apply that consultation policy not merely to rapeseed growers but also to all other Canadian farmers.

AIR SEARCH AND RESCUE OPERATIONS ON WEST COAST—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to seek permission of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the deteriorating situation of the search and rescue activities or operations of the Department of National Defence on the west coast and the inability of that group properly to fulfil its functions. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be authorized to conduct an immediate inquiry into the search and rescue operations of the Department of National Defence on the west coast with instructions to report its findings and recommendations back to the House not later than November 30 of this year in order that whatever corrective measures are deemed necessary may be put into effect as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

IMPRISONMENT OF RONALD PATRICK LIPPERT IN CUBA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 arising from the fact that there is justifiable reason to believe that acceptance and passage of this motion would result in the release of Ronald Patrick Lippert imprisoned in Cuba. I ask unanimous consent to move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That on the occasion of the tenth anniversary this week of the imprisonment in Cuba of Ronald Patrick Lippert, this House requests the government of Cuba to give consideration to permitting him to return to his family in Canada on humanitarian grounds.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member under Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that there is consent but I will inquire again. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There is agreement. Therefore the motion will be put.

Motion agreed to.

WHEAT BOARD MARKETING AND PRICING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Mr. G. N. Vogel, Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, points out that wheat available for export to a hungry world will be 100 million bushels short of last year's export sales, and western farmers will not enjoy this greater percentage of the new world prices as has been initially stated by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly):

That the House instruct the government to refer the latest report of the Canadian Wheat Board to the Standing Committee on Agriculture in order to call before that committee the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board to examine the present marketing and pricing activities of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

ALLEGED USE OF AIRCRAFT BY PERSONNEL FOR HUNTING, FISHING AND RECREATIONAL PURPOSES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on another matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Perhaps if we can curtail waste in one direction we may be able to expand the search and rescue operations of the Department of National Defence. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be authorized to conduct an inquiry into the use of armed forces aircraft to transport hunting, fishing and recreational purpose parties comprised of armed forces personnel (officers in particular).

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate that the Chair has reservations about this kind of motion, but I will inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

POSSIBLE BANNING BY SAUDI ARABIA OF OIL SHIPMENTS TO CANADA—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the admission by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the course of yesterday afternoon's debate that his department had received a report that Aramco, the producing company in Saudi Arabia, had been instructed by the government of Saudi Arabia not to ship any more oil to Canada and the minister's further statement that there had been other reports in conflict with that report. Has the government of Canada now clarified whether the government of Saudi Arabia has instructed the producing company there, Aramco, to ban shipments of oil to Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, we have had no confirmation of that report. As my colleague said, we have had contradictory reports. We are trying to establish the facts but have not yet been able to do so.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, what steps has the minister taken to clarify this important question? Yesterday he said the government was making representations to all Arab countries in respect of oil shipments. Has the government of Canada been in direct contact with Saudi Arabia on this question? Has this question relating to these instructions to Aramco been put to the government of Saudi Arabia and, even more important, has the Canada case been put to the government of Saudi Arabia?

Mr. Sharp: As I said yesterday in the House, Mr. Speaker, and I think the day before, as referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, I called in the ambassadors who are the representatives here in Canada of Arab countries and put the Canadian case to them. The same case was put in cables which have been sent to all our ambassadors abroad, including the ambassador who is accredited to Saudi Arabia, instructing them to make these views known to the governments of the countries to which they are accredited. The latest information I have is that our ambassador has not yet been able to make an appointment with the governments of these countries, but an effort is being made at the present time.

Mr. Stanfield: I have one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the difficulty the Department of External Affairs has in presenting the Canadian case, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs ask the Prime Minister whether he will consider sending Mr. Ivan Head to Saudi Arabia?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Ivan Head is a very good officer in the Prime Minister's office. We also have excellent ambassadors abroad.

OIL SUPPLIES FROM MIDDLE EAST—SUGGESTED REPRESENTATIONS TO MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement he made to the House a couple of days ago that he might consider direct contact with the head offices of the multinational corporations since basically they are responsible for the shipment of oil, and in view of the incident regarding Abu Dhabi and possibly Saudi Arabia, would he now consider direct contacts with the multinational corporation heads and their marketing agencies?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. On a question of principle, I think it will be agreed that it is better international practice for governments to deal with their own companies and not deal with companies that are located in other countries. This can be done informally from time to time, but I believe we in this country resent it when foreign countries come in and deal directly with Canadian companies.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION TO DEAL DIRECTLY WITH MIDDLE EAST COUNTRIES AND VENEZUELA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there are no Canadian oil companies but just subsidiaries of American companies, will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources now consider the immediate establishment of a petroleum energy corporation in this country so that we can deal directly with the Middle East countries or Venezuela?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the debate yesterday was not totally decisive in that regard. I would just point out to the hon. member again that, with regard to at least the companies he has referred to, the ordering and shipping of oil are the responsibility of the Canadian company, not the responsibility of the parent.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF BASIC RATE OF CLERKS' WAGES AND ARBITRAL AWARD TO NURSES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that percentage increases in low wages and salaries really mean nothing, will the government undertake a review of the basic rate of wages to its clerks in the employee of the federal public service, and can he say whether a review has been undertaken of the arbitral award in the case of the nurses?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman suggests that we make a basic review of all pay rates in the public service. I do not think any such general review is contemplated. In respect of the recent arbitral award to nurses, representatives of the association have been seeing a number of ministers as well as members of parliament in Ottawa. I have not yet met with them, although I would be glad to do so to hear their problems.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the question may I ask it again and remind the minister that it related not to a review of all basic rates in the public service but a review of the lower rates just as the government has had an outside report on the rates in the upper echelon, namely, those of deputy ministers.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the relationship between the low rates and the high rates in respect of those employees who come under the Public Service Staff Relations Act is determined through the collective bargaining process. I do not think the hon. gentleman would suggest it would be appropriate for the government unilaterally to bypass the collective bargaining process.

ALLEGED DICTATION TO MEMBER FOR TÉMISCAMINGUE CONCERNING REMARKS TO BE MADE BY HIM ON CERTAIN PROGRAMS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the minister responsible for CBC telecommunications and I am making it a question of privilege also.

Everybody is aware of the program called "Les Affaires de l'État" in French and "Nation's Business" in English, which is broadcast every week or so. Now, I am scheduled to make videotape recordings this afternoon as part of "Les Affaires de l'État" in French for tomorrow night, and for "Nation's Business" tonight at 11.15, a program which is usually aired on Sundays but which will be seen earlier this time on account of the Quebec general elections. Mr. Speaker, I received a phone call from the CBC a while ago. Here is the question I want to ask the Secretary of State: people call me up to tell me what to say and what not to say. And I am quite sure that all the political parties which send members to this telecast do not let the officials of this public corporation dictate what they must do.

Mr. Speaker, I told them that I could decide by myself what to say on the CBC network. But I should like to ask the minister if the CBC has a right to dictate what I must say on a program, or if it should respect my freedom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Since the Secretary of State is not here, I should like to ensure the hon. member that I shall bring this matter to the attention of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. As for giving an opinion as he asks me to do, I believe that this would be out of order.

ENERGY

CAPACITY OF PRESENT PIPELINE AT SARNIA TO DELIVER ADDITIONAL OIL FOR TRANSFER TO MONTREAL MARKET

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister now confirm whether the interprovincial pipeline at Sarnia, without any additional construction west of Sarnia and without having to cut back the supply to Ontario or current exports to the United States, has a sufficient capacity and capability to deliver additional oil for transfer to the Montreal market should normal supplies to that region be cut off or diverted?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I could confirm that but I would have to double check on the figures the hon. gentleman used. I will do so and will be glad to report to him.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the minister that I did not use any figures in my question.

INQUIRY AS TO DECISION ON PRICE INCREASES FOR GASOLINE AND HOME HEATING OIL IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): On October 22, as recorded on page 7082 of Hansard, the minister indicated that a decision on price increases for gasoline and home heating oil in eastern Canada might be taken in this current week. Can the minister now indicate if such a decision has been taken and what the decision is or, if the government is still indecisive on this subject, can he tell the House why the government has found it so difficult to determine this important issue?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate a decision of that kind might be taken next week.

OIL—SECURITY OF SUPPLY FOR SOAP PROJECT IN SARNIA

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary to the minister and ask him whether he has received any communication from the sponsors of the SOAP project in Sarnia regarding security and assurance of supply? If he has received such a request from them, would he inform the House what his answer was?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I met with the principals of the SOAP project who expressed concern on a number of points, one of them being security of supply. I pointed out to them that under the provisions of our law supplies to Canadian firms, whether refineries or petrochemical firms, were a priority for Canadian feedstock and that on that basis they could rely on the fact that they would have feedstock for their proposal. There are some further aspects of the proposal which would involve the export of certain refined products. At the moment, export is under the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board. I indicated to them they would have to consult with the board and possibly consider an application in order to get board approval for exports which might be integral to the project.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, in view of the conversations the minister has had with the people involved in the SOAP project and since the supply of petrochemicals to Canadian manufacturers is becoming very critical, did the minister receive assurances from the sponsors of the SOAP project that they intend to go ahead with the building of their petrochemical complex?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it was clear to me it would be critical to the economics of the process that they should have export access for some at least of the products, and I pointed out to them that this, of course, was covered by the jurisdiction of the board. So far as we are concerned, certainly we support very much the concept of additional petrochemical facilities at both Sarnia and Edmonton.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST TO CANADA TO CONTRIBUTE TO MIDDLE EAST PEACEKEEPING FORCE, INCREASE CYPRUS UNIT OR PARTICIPATION IN UNTSO

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada in fact been requested by the Secretary General of the United Nations to contribute to the peacekeeping force being sent to the Middle East war zone as a consequence of yesterday's Security Council resolution and, if so, what is the response of the government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer to the question is no. The Secretary General has not as yet asked Canada to contribute any forces. It is my understanding he is calling upon the traditional neutral countries, Sweden, Finland and Austria, which have troops ready and available in Cyprus, to make the initial contribution.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if the transfer of Austrian, Finnish and Swedish troops to the Middle East zone has caused a consequent request to Canada for alteration or augmentation of our force in that peacekeeping group?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have not yet received such a request. If it were made we would, I think, look at it sympathetically if this were a way to help establish a peacekeeping force in the Middle East. We would want to be sure, however, that the peacekeeping force in Cyprus would remain a truly international force. It would not be our wish to change the character of that peacekeeping force in any way.

Mr. Macquarrie: I have one final supplementary, Mr. Speaker, with reference to a statement by the minister yesterday, I believe. Have we been asked to supplement or augment our UNTSO contribution?

Mr. Sharp: Not yet. We can expect that we may be, although it is not clear yet until we know the terms of reference of the new peacekeeping force that will be established pursuant to the Security Council resolution. It is my understanding that the Secretary General will be announcing the terms of reference of that peacekeeping force at three o'clock this afternoon, at which time the situation may be a little clearer.

REPORTED OBJECTION BY EGYPT TO CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN MIDDLE EAST PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister any information which would either confirm or deny reports that Egypt has registered specific objections to the idea of Canada participating in a truce supervisory force in the Middle East?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. We have had no information of that kind. I can, if I may, add that I can understand the desire of the Secretary General in the first instance to rely particularly upon the traditionally neutral countries, and I think that if I had been in his position I would have taken the same view.

● (1140)

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Selkirk on a second supplementary and then the hon. member for Vegreville.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

POSSIBILITY OF SOVIET UNION INTERVENING UNILATERALLY IN MIDDLE EAST CONFLICT

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): With respect to the Middle East situation, has the Secretary of State for External Affairs received any information which would either confirm or deny reports that the Soviet Union was or is prepared to act unilaterally in the Middle East with respect to the landing of troops and, if the reports confirm such an intention on the part of the Soviet Union, have we made representations expressing our disapproval of any such action?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think that question was settled by the support that the Soviet Union gave to the resolution of the Security Council in which the idea was quite clearly established that in this peacekeeping force none of the forces of the permanent members of the Security Council should participate. I believe that originally Egypt had suggested that the forces of the Soviet Union and the United States might engage in some peace enforcing role, but this seems now to have been changed. Therefore the answer must be that whether or not they had the intention of supplying troops unilaterally that no longer is the case.

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF BOXCARS FOR LUMBER AND GRAIN—SHORT AND LONG-TERM MEASURES TO BE TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT OR RAILWAYS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On Monday he indicated that he would be meeting with the railway companies yesterday. Did this meeting take place, and can he indicate to the House what measures will be taken by the government or by the railway companies to relieve the immediate shortage of boxcars which has detrimentally affected the grain and lumber industries. Also, can he advise the House what steps will be taken of a longer term nature to alleviate the chronic shortage of boxcars which has been experienced over the past years and which has detrimentally affected these two major industries?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the House, yesterday afternoon I met representatives of both railways CNR and CPR. We discussed the situation in Newfoundland, the situation of the Digby-Saint John ferry, the situation at Thunder Bay, and the situation in British Columbia. I received commitments regarding a few of those subjects, and on others I am likely to receive reports early next week. For example, CN told me that they would meet their commitment so far as grain movement is concerned, and CP agreed to postpone any changes in the ferry service between Digby and Saint John. So far as Vancouver is concerned, they will report to me next week, and I hope I can complete then what I am saying today.

Mr. Mazankowski: Since a very large part of the problem stems from the undue delays in boxcars coming back from the United States, in other words, boxcars are being held there for unduly lengthy periods of time—I am informed that in the case of shipments of lumber it is approximately 45 days—has the minister discussed this subject, and what action does he propose to take to correct the situation?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I do not think that the United States is responsible for the delays in this case. It is the lumber shippers who are responsible because they use the boxcars as warehouses in the United States. This is something, I think, that we will have to try to correct because it is a distinct abuse.

INQUIRY AS TO COMMITMENT BY CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS TO REDUCE BACKLOG OF FREIGHT AT NORTH SYDNEY DESTINED TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated that he discussed the Newfoundland situation with CNR. Did CNR make any commitment to alleviate the backlog still remaining at North Sydney? I understand there are still 500 freight cars backed up at North Sydney and this is still causing some shortages and a great deal of difficulty in Newfoundland.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is true there is still a backlog of 500 boxcars in North Sydney. Right now, however, neither the CNR nor Mr. O'Brien representing the Newfoundland government have complained about anything. I think all the needs are met. I believe they have done a tremendous job because in the last month the decrease in the number of backlogged cars is almost 500 on top of what they regularly do. So I think this is a good job and nobody is short right now. All I hear is that by the end of November we might have to use Hercules aircraft in Labrador because there might be a shortage there.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East on a supplementary, but we have to try to get on. The Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Skeena, the hon. member for Portneuf, and then we will return to the hon. member for Vegreville.

Mr. McGrath: It is evident that the minister is only hearing what he wants to hear because that is not the way I hear it at all. May I ask the minister if the CNR gave any undertaking it would have this backlog cleared up and the situation back to normal before the end of the year, because at the rate we are going the backlog will be there for some considerable time?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It all depends on the increase in the movement of goods to Newfoundland. On boxcars alone in relation to last year there has been an increase of 35 per cent. I think that the DREE programs are working very well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): With regard to taking care of the backlog due to the strike, this has been done. Now what we are fighting against is the backlog created by the increase in freight movement to Newfoundland brought about by a prosperity that has never been known there in the past.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: We will suspend the debate for a moment on this matter and I will recognize the hon. member for Skeena, as I said a moment ago, followed by the hon. member for Portneuf. If hon. members want to continue the debate on this point, we will return to it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

WEST COAST SEARCH AND RESCUE OPERATIONS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION BY STANDING COMMITTEE—ALLEGED USE OF PLANES FOR RECREATIONAL PURPOSES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact the three Buffalo and three Labrador helicopters that are assigned to search and rescue operations on the west coast are inoperable 40 per cent of the time—and this limits their activities—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard: —would the minister be agreeable to authorize, by presenting a motion to the House, the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to conduct specifically an inquiry into search and rescue operations on the west coast so that we can see just what is taking place?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Howard: Since the minister intends to let the situation continue to deteriorate, I wonder if he is aware that with respect to the operations of the Department of National Defence at the Comox airport base on October 1, 5, 8, 12, 14, 18, 19 and 22, and the month is not over yet—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might like to ask a question. He knows that the purpose of questions is not to convey information but rather to seek information.

Mr. Howard: The minister certainly needs information, Mr. Speaker. On those dates in question the recreational parties comprised mostly of top military brass were flown to Sandspit. Will the minister put a stop to this waste and extravagance in the hope that perhaps the saving in money can be used to develop the search and rescue squadron?

Mr. Richardson: I have seen reports in the press of the flights that are referred to. They were pilot training flights.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Portneuf.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

QUEBEC—ALLEGED DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since some unemployed must wait between three and four months before getting their unemployment payments and those delays are apparently caused by the malfunctioning of a computer in the Montreal regional office, does the minister intend to have the equipment repaired or the rental contract cancelled so that the computer may be replaced by one that works?

● (1150)

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, having checked as recently as last night on this general situation, I really cannot agree with the premise of the hon. member's question. I would ask him, as I have repeatedly, to give me specific cases and not generalize because I think it is not accurate.

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF BOXCARS FOR LUMBER AND GRAIN—ACTION TO ACHIEVE FASTER RETURN OF CARS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to my previous question. The response of the minister indicated that the undue delay in the return of boxcars from the United States was specifically the responsibility of the lumber companies themselves. May I ask the minister if he recommended any specific action to the railways to overcome this situation, such as increased demurrage charges, so that the boxcars could be returned sooner to Canada and used for further shipments of lumber and grain?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I specifically asked the railways to see about that and to determine what steps they are going to take to reduce this delay cycle which is now 45 days. It could be 20 days very easily. They are going to look into that and report to me some time next week.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I seek the co-operation of all hon. members. As I have often suggested, if there are two, three or four supplementaries by each member we get into difficulty and the 40 minutes goes rather quickly. Perhaps the hon. member for St. John's East might be recognized for a supplementary.

MOVEMENT OF FREIGHT TO NEWFOUNDLAND—FUTURE PLANS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, since it is evident that the planning and forecasting done by this government are inept, may I ask the Minister of Transport whether his department plans to make any long-range forecast to take into account growth in the province of Newfoundland? It is obvious that the 35 per cent growth in freight was not foreseen by the department and has resulted in the backlog at North Sydney today. What is the minister doing about future plans to carry freight across the gulf?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. gentleman knows how those forecasts are arrived at. As far as lumber is concerned, in British Columbia the railways go and ask the people in the lumber industry what they think their business will be in the following year. They themselves said there would be a 6 per cent increase but it was 18 per cent. This is where there are mistakes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley for a last supplementary but I suggest to hon. members that this is much more debate than a series of questions and answers. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley, after which I will recognize the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

DIGBY-SAINT JOHN FERRY SERVICE—POSTPONEMENT OF REDUCTION—STUDY OF POSSIBLE SUBSIDY OR TAKEOVER

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I was going to direct my question to the Minister of Communications but in view of the response of the Minister of Transport in that part of the answer dealing with the Digby-Saint John ferry I want to ask him for clarification. The curtailment that was going to take place on Sunday is not to take place. Is that correct? Secondly, has there now been a decision within the government that a cabinet committee or a committee within the Department of Transport will work with officers of the CPR to see how to cover the losses and/or take over the ferry?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, what I said or wanted to say was that the curtailment is not going to take place on Monday as foreseen and I think announced by the CPR. I asked them to postpone it for a few weeks. In that period I think we will have time to make a decision in cabinet.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a further supplementary.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate your generosity, Mr. Speaker. As I understand it, for several months the CPR did not know whom to talk to and did not have a set committee within the cabinet or the Department of Transport—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Nowlan: —with which to discuss proposals. Has there been an agreement with the Minister of Transport or his officials and are meetings to be held in the next two or three weeks to discuss the question of a subsidy or a takeover?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the CPR knew very well what to do. They came here a few months ago and met with me and discussed the matter. I said I have to discuss it with cabinet, and this is the way the decision should be taken.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE BANNING BY SAUDI ARABIA OF OIL SHIPMENTS TO CANADA—SUGGESTED SEEKING OF INFORMATION FROM CANADIAN COMPANIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would put my question to the Acting Prime Minister since the Secretary of State for External Affairs seems to be unable to make contact with Saudi Arabia to get an answer. Has the government of Canada received any information from the Canadian companies which are normally supplied by Aramco indicating that Aramco has received instructions from the government of Saudi Arabia to cut off oil supplies to Canada? If not, has the government of Canada taken the very simple procedure of asking these Canadian companies whether they have received any word from Aramco about supplies from Saudi Arabia being cut off?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the direct way of dealing with this matter is to have consultations now between the government of Canada and the governments of the countries concerned. This is the procedure we have taken and intend to follow. I do not believe that we had any reason to have done this in advance. As I said yesterday, we had no reason to think that Canada would be included in any restrictions. We have had the one instance which we are trying to get explained. I am sure the hon. gentleman would believe that the best way of getting answers is by direct contacts now with the governments concerned.

Mr. Stanfield: If the Secretary of State for External Affairs really desires the members of this House to believe that the government of Canada wishes to get an answer to this question rather than avoid getting an answer, why will he not follow the very simple procedure of making inquiries in Canada where the information is surely readily available?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would think that it is very desirable, and I would hope the Leader of the Opposition would agree, that we should make our case very forcefully to the governments of these countries before any decisions are made.

An hon. Member: Start fighting.

OIL SUPPLIES FROM MIDDLE EAST—GROUNDS FOR BELIEVING CANADA WILL BE EXCLUDED FROM EMBARGO

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the 5 per cent, now 10 per cent, reduction in oil production on the part of the organization of Arab oil producing and exporting countries was intended to apply to all importing countries except for such countries which, and here I quote from a document, "have or will come to the aid of the Arab cause in a concrete and effective manner", has the minister any concrete grounds for believing, or was he given such grounds in his meeting with the Arab representatives yesterday, that Canada is excluded from this general embargo?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the case I made to the ambassadors here and that is being made by our ambassadors abroad is that we do not allow politics to interfere in our commercial policy or our aid policy and that we hoped the Arab countries would follow the same rule in dealing with us. Surely this is a position the hon. member would support. He would not want us to invite the Arab countries to apply restrictions to Canada.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, my question was very specific. I asked whether the minister had any grounds for believing that Canada would be excluded from the general embargo applied by the Arab oil producing and exporting countries some time this month in a document which has been published around the world but is rarely seen in the newspapers of Canada? Has he any grounds for believing that Canada will be excluded?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the information we have is very contradictory on all of these points. I think it is very desirable that we should get the explanation from the governments themselves. I can assure the hon. gentleman that I have seen these reports and I have seen other reports that are quite different.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Scarborough West for a third question or a second supplementary to his original question. Then I will see the hon. member for Hastings.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, considering that we all have difficulty in obtaining adequate information and that this difficulty applies particularly to the government benches, and considering the fact that we have very little direct representation in the Arab countries that export oil to Canada, will the minister consider increasing our representation in this area in the very near future?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this has been under discussion. It was under discussion before this present situation arose. We have been gradually increasing our representation in various parts of the world and the Middle East is one we have under consideration.

AIR TRANSPORT

WALK-OUT BY TRAFFIC CONTROL ASSISTANTS—THREATENED STRIKE BY FLIGHT ATTENDANTS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact air traffic control assistants walked off the job today in Moncton, Gander, Toronto and Montreal, and in view of the fact Canadian airline flight attendants are threatening to strike, has the minister looked into this and what action has he taken?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have looked into this. I am told they are supposed to go back after 24 hours so that means tonight or tomorrow. This group has chosen to fall under the arbitration part of the act, which means they do not have the right to strike. They are supposed to settle their grievances through arbitration.

● (1200)

Mr. Ellis: Can the minister assure the House that there will be no cancellation of commercial flights due to these disruptions?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any such assurance.

Mr. Paproski: Why not?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Because I am not a pilot.

STUDY SUGGESTING RAILWAYS OBSOLESCENT BECAUSE OF EXISTING REGULATORY LEGISLATION—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Transport is listening, my question is for him also. Perhaps the minister would come down to earth for a minute. Since a recent study suggests that the obsolescence of Canadian railways is mainly the consequence of existing regulatory legislation and its implementation by the Canadian Transport Commission, the CNR and CPR, will the minister conduct an inquiry into this matter?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is something that is constantly under review.

GRAIN

INTENTION OF WHEAT BOARD RESPECTING RESTORATION OF 250 MILLION BUSHEL INVENTORY

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Has the Canadian Wheat Board informed the minister of its intention in the present crop year with regard to allocating enough grain to put its inventory back to the normal amount of 250 million bushels?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with the Canadian Wheat Board about their intentions. After exporting three years in a row more grain than the country has produced over consumption needs, it is anticipated that we will be able to do so once again this year. The Canadian Wheat Board will be expecting to sell more wheat than was produced this year by drawing down stocks still further, as it would also do in the case of barley. The exact extent of the draw-down to August 1 will be determined as that date approaches.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF ICEBREAKERS BY WEST GERMANY FOR USE IN CANADIAN ARCTIC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister comment on and clear up stories indicating that a West German firm, Weser A.G., intends to construct—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the question might not be asked in other terms. The hon. member might start by resuming his seat. I suggest to the hon. member that a member cannot ask a minister to comment on a news story. I know that members very often ask a minister to confirm or deny a story. That is out of order. Perhaps the question might be asked directly without too obvious a reference to the story.

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he advise the House if it is the case that the West German firm, Weser, A.G., intends to construct icebreakers for use in the Canadian north, and whether or not the West German ambassador has had communications in that regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when the foreign minister of West Germany was here a few weeks ago, I had discussions with him about this subject and I told him that the Canadian government would be willing to have Canadian officials meet with their German counterparts for initial, exploratory talks on potential areas of co-operation regarding aspects of technology and research concerned with the development of multicargo ocean carriers with icebreaking capability, and if such areas of co-operation can be identified we will carry on these discussions. I want to make it quite clear—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: —that there are no adverse implications for Canadian sovereignty.

REDUCTION IN SERVICE BY DIGBY-SAINT JOHN FERRY—DATE OF GOVERNMENT DECISION

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. As we are still confused about his reply regarding the Digby-Saint John ferry, and because we will be receiving protests this weekend, may I ask the minister if we are right in assuming, regardless of what the CPR is doing, that the cabinet now has this matter under study and that there will be an announcement by the government within three weeks. Are we correct in assuming that?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman understood very well what I said, although I did not mention three weeks. I asked the CPR not to change the service for a couple of weeks because I think that during that period we can reach a decision on the different proposals we have submitted.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR DEFERMENT OF LIVESTOCK PRODUCERS' INCOME FROM 1973 CATTLE SALES TO 1974

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As many livestock producers in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan and the southeastern part of Alberta will find it necessary to dispose of a large percentage of their herds due to the shortage of feed caused by drought, and as this will increase their incomes for the current taxation year and bring about large increases in their taxes, has the minister considered introducing legislation, even of a temporary nature, to permit livestock producers to defer cattle sales until 1974 in the same manner as grain producers will be able to do?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take that as a representation by the hon. member.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-164, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1973 to the 30th day of June, 1974 , and securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that it will come as no surprise to the members of this House when I say that I intend to devote my remarks in this second reading debate on Bill C-164, having to do with the financing of Canadian National Railways and Air Canada, to one subject, pensions. Towards the end of my remarks, I shall make a few comments about the pension package that has been agreed on in the collective bargaining process. That has now gone to arbitration. In the main, however, I want to concentrate on the position of retired railway workers; in other words, those out of service, those now on their pensions.

When we raise questions about retired railway workers, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific, we get certain stock answers. One of those answers is that the whole question of pensions has at long last been put on the collective bargaining table and that we should not, therefore, be discussing it on the floor of the House of Commons. I remind the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), who is one of those who gives us this stock answer, that the retired railway workers were not represented at the collective bargaining table and that the arrangements arrived at in the process of collective bargaining relating to pensions did not provide anything at all for those already retired.

There is nothing new about this situation. A few years ago, when the question of Canadian National pensions was before the appropriate standing committee, many witnesses appeared before the committee. Some of them were retired railways workers who, in their working days, had been general chairmen of their unions. They admitted to us that when they were general chairmen and giving leadership to and working on behalf of their unions their main interest centered on those who were working. In those days they did not express any great concern, if, indeed, they expressed any concern at all, about those already retired.

When those same general chairmen joined the group of workers who are retired and tried to live on their pensions, their viewpoint was quite different. Clearly, the situation is not a new one. It is one that this House ought to face. The position of retired railway workers, those already on pension, does not get adequate consideration in the normal collective bargaining process, and thus it is our responsibility to speak on their behalf on the floor of the House of Commons.

I wish to point out also that the few times when we have secured something for the retired employees of Canadian National Railways, and in an ancillary way for employees of other railways, it has come about because of debate in parliament, either on the floor of the House or in the standing committee. Each time something has been done to improve the pensions of retired railway workers, the announcement has been made by the president of Canadian National Railways or in the case of Canadian Pacific, by the president of that organization, but the activity that brought about those changes took place on the floor of this House of Commons or in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I feel it is our duty as members of parliament, and most of us in this House represent railway workers or retired railway workers, some a few and some of us many, to speak for those for whom the case is not made when the collective bargaining process takes place.

I know that in the revised setup of the board that administers Canadian National pensions, there is one representative of those who have retired, but that does not seem to be the place where policy is made. That seems to be a place where administration is supervised. The fact is that in terms of the policy for those now working, it is a matter that is dealt with at the collective bargaining table. For those already retired, the only way their voice can be heard is by forming their own organizations, issuing press releases, writing members of parliament and so on, or by our stating their case on the floor of parliament. That is the reason I choose in this debate on Bill C-164 to direct all of my remarks to the question of pensions and, as I say, mainly to the position of those already retired.

It is sometimes suggested to us that one reason we should leave this subject alone is that the question of railway pensions has been given to Dr. John Deutsch, who was recently appointed as a commissioner by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). May I remind hon. members of the limitations imposed on Dr. Deutsch. He has not been given a commission to study the whole question of railway pensions. His commission is only to assess the monetary value of the pension package agreed to at the bargaining table. The railway companies put a certain value on it in percentage terms. The unions put a lower percentage value on it. All that Dr. Deutsch is commissioned to do is arrive at a fair evaluation of the pension package and if it is different from what has been submitted by the companies, Mr. Justice Emmett Hall is to take that into consideration in the final award arising out of the rail dispute of last summer.

When the appointment of Dr. Deutsch was announced in this House by the Minister of Labour, some of us pleaded for his terms of reference to be enlarged to include an examination of the railway pension plans in their entirety or, alternatively, for another commissioner to be appointed to look into that broader question. The Minister of Labour expressed some interest. In fact, I think it is fair to say he agreed this should be done, but he pleaded that now was not the time to do it,—

Mr. Douglas: It never is.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —that we should first wait for the job to be done by Dr. Deutsch. As my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), interjected a moment ago, the time never is right to do something like this.

A commission similar to that given to Dr. Deutsch should be given to him or some other competent or impartial person to go into the whole question of the fairness of railway pension plans. In my view, such a commission should not only include the fairness or otherwise of the plan to which working railway employees are now contributing, but the fairness of the plan in the way it treats retired employees. In any event, I submit these two answers that are given to us, first that pensions are the subject of collective bargaining and, second, that Dr. Deutsch has been appointed as a commissioner, do not touch at all on the problem and the plight of retired railway workers who are already on pension, for whom there is nothing in the new pension package and whose case is not to be considered under Dr. Deutsch's commission.

With regard to railway workers already retired, the first thing that must be done, and frankly I think that any delay on this is completely unforgiveable, is that the escalation of railway pensions should be put on a basis equal to that which has now been accorded to old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, the pensions of retired public servants and of armed forces and RCMP personnel, pensions and allowances awarded to veterans and soon, because the appropriate bill is now before the House, on pensions paid under the Canada Pension Plan. The day of a 2 per cent ceiling on the annual escalation of pensions should end. It is over for all those groups I have just named. It should be ended completely.

I submit the government does have responsibility for the Canadian National Railways. It should say right now that just as there is no longer a 2 per cent ceiling on the escalation of pensions for federal public employees and a whole host of other persons whose pensions come under the responsibility of the federal government, there should no longer be imposed a 2 per cent ceiling on the annual escalation of railway pensions, either Canadian National or Canadian Pacific.

One of the arguments the railways have advanced against an escalation of higher than 2 per cent is and has been for some time that they were not allowed to do so by the law. Unfortunately, that statement is correct. There was a section in the income tax regulations which denied registration for the purpose of income tax deductibility to any company whose private pension plan provided for an escalation greater than 2 per cent per year. However, that has been changed. Only a few days ago the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) circulated an information bulletin in which it is made clear that this ceiling no longer applies. The new regulation says a pension plan can be registered and can qualify for tax deductibility provided any escalation is not greater than the actual percentage increase in the cost of living. The door has been opened wide. Canadian National now faces no barrier whatever against escalating the pensions of its retired employees on the same basis as all government pensions. I urge and insist that this be done. I do not intend to be put down by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) or the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) saying this is not the place in which to discuss this matter. It does not get discussed anywhere else. In the past, efforts of ours in the House of Commons or in the standing committee have produced an effect. Our purpose in pressing this issue now is to make the government realize it must tell the CNR to match what the federal government has done in this area. I would point out that the escalation of all the pensions I listed a few moments ago, from old age security right down to the Canada Pensions Plan bill that is now on the order paper, whether annual or quarterly as in the case of the guaranteed income supplement and old age security payments, is provided for by law. It is automatic. It takes place without any question. Not so in the case of CNR pensions. The CNR has on three or four occasions made escalation benefits available at the rate of 2 per cent a year. But this was done out of the goodness of the company's heart. I suggest it should be automatic—it should be made part of the pension rules, part of the regulations, so that retired employees can count on an escalation every year without question. They ought not have to depend on a meeting of the pension board or of the directors of CN reaching a decision that this should be done. It should be automatic, and the escalation should be made equal to the actual increase in the cost of living. I want to see this provision put into the plan for the future, for those who are presently working. They are pressing for it, and I support them in that effort. But as far as those who are already retired are concerned, nobody speaks for them unless we do so here. I am doing so today, as I have done so often, because I want to see action taken.

I argue, too, on behalf of those workers who are already retired, that they have a case for the recalculation of the basis of their pensions. It is certainly better to calculate the escalation on the basis of the actual cost of living increase rather than on a basis of 2 per cent but when one is dealing with pensions which start at very low levels, percentage increases often mean very little. Some change in the formula is coming about. The package worked out at the bargaining table includes a new formula but nothing in that formula applies to those already retired. A recalculation of the basis of the pension paid to all retired employees should underpin the amount of the escalation for which I have been arguing.

A third point I press is the unfairness of a pension system under which a widow's pension is only 50 per cent of what her husband would have received. I know this situation arises out of a deep, dark, mythological past when it seemed right to retire a man on a pension of 100 per cent even though his wife had predeceased him, but expect the widow to get by on 50 per cent. I think pensions should be paid on an equal basis across the board, though at the moment I am concentrating on the case of retired railway workers. I think the time has come to increase that figure of 50 per cent. In my view the pension should be the same for either spouse. I do not see why, when the man is the one who survives, he should get 100 per cent though the woman, if she survives, gets only 50 per cent. After all, they each helped to do the work and provide the pension. It is, really, their pension, not just his. This is a concept I have raised a number of times and I intend to continue to do so. The least we should insist on is that just as our widows, the widows of Members of Parliament, will get 60 per cent of our pensions the widows of railway workers should also get 60 per cent. I think it should be more than this. I think it should be at least 75 per cent. In any case, this is one of the things which in my view should be adjusted, and, to begin with it should be adjusted in the case of widows of those who have already retired.

Because Bill C-164 refers to Canadian National Railways I have, of course, talked mainly about CN pensions, as is necessary if I am to stay in order. But I have made the odd reference to the Canadian Pacific pension plan and I should like to point out now that if there are deficiencies in the Canadian National plan there are far worse deficiencies in the CP plan. I emphasize in particular that its escalation provisions do nothing at all for the old-timers who retired before 1956. Indeed, even for many of those who retired after 1956, no credit is given for escalation purposes for service prior to 1956, the result being that the escalation benefits some of these old-time employees get is in terms of dimes or quarters, not in dollars. I think it is scandalous that a company which has received so much from the government and the people of Canada should be able to get away with this sort of thing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I said I would concentrate on the case of those who have already retired, and I have done so, partly, as I say, because there is no one to speak for them unless we do so, and partly because this is the place where we can put pressure on the government to put pressure on the railways. To summarize, I believe we should press for action on three main points: first, an escalation formula equal to the rise in the cost of living as is the case with federal pensions; second, that this should be provided in the rules or regulations instead of leaving it at the mercy of management; third, the percentage paid to the widows of retired railway employees should be increased.

I should now like to say a few words about the package which has been agreed to by management and the unions. I suppose I should choose my words carefully because these terms have been agreed upon at the collective bargaining table as part of the total deal which will come out of the arbitration being conducted by Mr. Justice Emmett Hall. However, I must say I hope this agreement is not the end of the story as far as railway pensions are concerned. I am talking, now, about those in the service. There is an improvement. They are to get a 2 per cent formula for some years of their service and a somewhat better deal in case of early retirement; in other words, workers can retire early without a severe penalty; those who have served for a time beyond what the new package allows for will be permitted to enjoy that extra credit. But it seems to me there are very real deficiencies in the plan which has been accepted.

For one thing, there is nothing at all in this package to benefit anyone who retired prior to January 1, 1973. Even those who retire after January 1, 1973, will find that that new pension package does not change by one cent the credit they get for their service prior to 1956. The idea was that the time had come for a 2 per cent pension, a 2 per cent credit for every year of service in the way the public service pension plan operates and also Air Canada's. Instead, we have a one per cent, a 1.5 or 2 per cent pension for a few years, or a 1.3 per cent scheme integrated with the Canada Pension Plan, and so on. But we do not have an across the board 2 per cent per year of service formula which I think must yet be incorporated into the pension plans of railway workers.

I do not like the way in which the integration between the railway pensions and the Canada Pension Plan has been built up. As a matter of act, I think it was a mistake right from the start that the Canada Pension Plan was not stacked or decked in the case of railway workers, and many railway workers feel that out of this deal they are not getting the kind of terms of benefits that they ought to get.

I said that there is nothing in the package to cover any service prior to 1956. That means that older workers in our railway systems who are still working and had a fair amount of service prior to 1956 will not get a pension that is much better under this package than if the package had not been agreed to at all.

I am deliberately keeping my remarks with respect to that part of the deal brief because it is the subject of collective bargaining, as I say, and it is up to the parties to fight it out. But I make the suggestion that they should press hard for a 2 per cent formula across the board. I think they should press for absolutely no penalties on early retirement, they should press for the Canada Pension Plan to be stacked instead of integrated, and they should press for an equal pension for the widow as for the employee when either one of them is bereaved.

I feel very strongly that those who are still in service and are represented through their unions should press for improvements of that kind in their pension plan; and of course they should press for the full escalation of their pensions after they retire in accordance with the actual rise in the cost of living. I offer this advice to those in service who are still trying to build up their pensions to what they ought to be, and they know they have my full support.

I close by pleading with the House to tell this government to instruct the Canadian National Railways—and it can talk to the CPR too; after all, that railway owes a great deal to this place—that the time has come, so far as railway workers already retired are concerned, for their pensions to be escalated by the actual increase in the cost of living; that it is time for recalculation of their basic pensions in line with an improved formula; and that it is time for widows of these workers to get a much better deal than the 50 per cent pension now provided. I hope that our keeping this debate going a bit longer to press these points will have its effect and that the government will realize that members of all sides of the House want a fair deal for our retired railway workers, including those who worked for the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific and all the rest of this country's railways.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make two or three, what I hope will be, relevant and pertinent remarks with respect to the current operations of Canadian National Railways. While I realize that this discussion has gone for some days, even for some months now, commencing as it did on Friday, April 13 of this year—I do not know whether there is any significance in its commencement on that date—one of the things that has made the debate not as useful as it might have been is the almost total lack of involvement of the government in the numerous questions, comments and criticisms that have been put forth about our national railroad system.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We can deal with all of that in the committee.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am a little surprised that the minister has so little regard for the usefulness of debate in this place, Mr. Speaker. As the mover of the bill, I would have expected him to speak to it, but he did not even take the trouble to address the House at the opening of the debate on April 13. His parliamentary secretary was supposed to be piloting the bill through at that time and he made a few remarks, but he has since vanished. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) has told us that he is not piloting the bill through. Perhaps both of them have gone out together to learn to be pilots, and hopefully they will be able to land something in the right spot. Certainly, it would be a mark in favour of the government if it were to take seriously the many legitimate comments that have been made in respect of this bill. Quite frankly, I think it is a bit of an affront to the House that during the time the debate has continued no minister has spoken, neither the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who is in charge of piloting the bill through the House, nor the Minister of Transport, who perhaps has a more direct responsibility in relation to the CNR.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Minister of Finance is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this bill has been before the House for a year or so now. When it was first introduced, ministers did address themselves to it. I would hope that hon. members, all of whose points have been very carefully noted by the government, would find the committee a very useful procedure not only for calling ministers to answer questions but also the executives of the railway.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the minister would indicate on his point of order that he was in fact prepared to participate, but it seems he is not. I would remind him that, while there have been other bills relating to CNR financing in other years which were not completed, this particular bill was introduced in March and, as I say, was moved and debated on April 13.

The specific issues to which I want to address myself have relation to the recent railway strike which took place in the latter part of August of this year which had a very detrimental impact on two Canadian provinces in particular and, of course, on all provinces in general. During the course of the debate on the special legislation that was enacted to put the railroads back into service, namely on August 31, I raised the question of the increasing frequency of ferry tie-ups as a direct result of a national rail strike, the first in 1950, the second in 1966 and the third this year, 1973.

Tragically for the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, all of these strikes occurred at the peak travel and tourist time,—I think tourism in both provinces is now the second or third largest industry—tying up ferries for a considerable number of days during the month of August. I would, therefore, be remiss in my duty as one representative from Prince Edward Island if I did not continue to press, immediately following the resolution of the work stoppage that occurred in August, for a procedure that would be implemented by CNR, in concert with the government, that would insure against, or at least would give the strongest possible assurance against, such disruption in the future.

As I said during the debate on August 31 and in subsequent correspondence both with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) and the Minister of Transport, ferry service to Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland can only be regarded as essential. Indeed, it has been regarded as essential since confederation, both the confederation of a century ago in the case of Prince Edward Island and the confederation of one quarter of a century ago in the case of Newfoundland. Written into the terms of confederation in both instances is the iron-clad guarantee by the federal government that there shall be no interruption, no break whatsoever, in the kind of communication and transportation that is necessary for a province to function effectively within the Canadian framework. I think it is regrettable that this party presently in power, having experienced in three successive instances such a major dislocation of transportation facilities to and from our island provinces, should not have acted effectively to introduce measures either following the 1950 strike, the 1966 strike or the 1973 strike to insure the people of our island provinces against any further disastrous disruptions.

At the time of the debate on the legislation to end the rail strike, I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), particularly because he was at that time piloting the special legislation, whether he would take firm action following the immediate crisis to convene a meeting at the highest level. Perhaps I may read again the comment I made on August 31 to be found at page 6143 of Hansard:

> All I am saying to the Minister of Labour at this point is that now we have to realize, having gone through this situation three times since 1950, that we must not put these two provinces in the same jeopardy again. In order to achieve that purpose I think the minister must give an undertaking that in the course of the next few months we will work out a new structure which will prevent the same situation from occurring again, not in total terms because we know we cannot prevent it in total terms, but to go a good deal beyond the present situation which is merely a bandaid approach.

The Minister of Labour, if I may quote him, responded to me at that point and is recorded here as having said:

> I hope to achieve that.

Following that verbal commitment in the House on that date, I wrote a more detailed letter to the Minister of Labour, copies of which I sent to a number of people mentioned in the letter, particularly those directly responsible such as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), the premiers of both Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, the executive of the Canadian National Railways and the representatives of the various union brotherhoods directly affected. I asked the Minister of Labour, again because he had taken the primary role in piloting the legislation related to the immediate strike difficulties, whether he would convene a meeting to be held with the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Transport, the Hon. Jean Marchand, Premier Frank Moores of Newfoundland, Premier Alexander Campbell of Prince Edward Island, plus representatives of the appropriate unions and the Canadian National Railway.

As I said in the letter:

> I believe that you are amenable to this suggestion. I am hopeful, therefore, that plans for such a meeting are going ahead.

I received an acknowledgment of that letter some weeks following indicating that the minister felt that primarily it was not his reponsibility but that of his colleague the Minister of Transport. I sent a copy of that letter to the Minister of Transport, and subsequently wrote the Minister of Transport directly, as well as the Premier of my own province of Prince Edward Island in which letter I again advanced the importance of a high-level meeting to resolve this recurring difficulty. In addition, I put on the table one specific proposal whereby the situation might be resolved. I am going to mention that proposal in a moment so it can be on the record of this House and, hopefully, so there can be some comment not only from the Minister of Transport but perhaps from other members either in this House or on the committee in respect of some workable formula.

We are in a difficult situation. We have increasingly enacted legislation in this country to provide free collective bargaining for almost every employee in every industry, except those in the very few services thought to be so essential to the public interest it is not considered wise or fair to the general public to grant such rights. In the course of developing our transportation system, certain collective bargaining arrangements which have been achieved by railway employees have affected directly the operations of our car-ferry system, and this has resulted in the loss of an essential service three times in the last two decades.

We are now faced with having to try to reconcile what, at the outset, seems irreconcilable: How can we operate a modern essential car-ferry link between the two island provinces, assuring that service through all kinds of various labour disputes and disruptions, without either taking some chance with the general public welfare and interest or adopting restrictive measures in respect of the car-ferry employees? This is not an easy problem to resolve and if anyone suggests it is he would, I think, be extremely superficial about the nature of the difficulties.

In recent days the premier of Prince Edward Island has advanced the proposition that what we now need is a Crown corporation. He has been somewhat unclear as to whether this would simply be a provincial Crown corporation or a federal one, but he suggests that such a Crown corporation would be mandated to operate the car-ferry services and its employees would essentially be prohibited from having the right to strike. This would be for many a reversal of the current development of labour relations within governmental departments, agencies and Crown corporations. While such action may be popularly received by a large segment of the general public, it would not be considered to be a very progressive approach toward those who would be employed by such a Crown corporation.

If such legislation came before us in the House of Commons, we would certainly be faced with passing legislation that would, in a sense, be a backward step from the direction in which we have been moving, in addition to which it is not entirely clear that in establishing a separate entity we would in fact be providing better or improved transportation services to the island provinces. Nor is it clear that to those directly employed we would be providing them with the most fair and just employee framework possible. Until we know a great deal more about this proposal, I think at the outset it would seem to have a considerable number of difficulties related to it. Other questions have been raised about the possibility of the ministry of transport directly operating a car-ferry system, but until we solve these rights of the employees we really have not in any way escaped the essential issues.

On March 9 I wrote a letter both to the Minister of Transport and to the Premier of Prince Edward Island, again suggesting that a meeting should be convened at the earliest possible moment in respect of this problem, but more than that suggesting that I should like to put on the table for serious consideration one possibility of overcoming the increasing frequency of these disastrous car-ferry tie-ups.

What I suggested, and I will quote largely from the correspondence, is that a contingency plan be prepared within the next few months jointly by the Canadian National Railways, the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence, and that this contingency plan would provide for a special operation procedure to be instituted by the Canadian armed forces in the event of a labour walkout that would tie up the car-ferry system. I suggested that this plan should be capable of being instituted in a very short time period, within 24 to 48 hours, that the obvious seafaring capabilities within the armed forces be made use of and that the men and other resources necessary to effect this alternate operation would be adjacent to the ferry system so that problems of transportation and the allocating of a number of employees would not be all that difficult.

This would satisfy the first and perhaps most major concern, that is of providing continuous ferry service. It would also allow employees to use their full rights in a bargaining sense and, if the whole process of negotiation broke down, to in fact have a walkout. They would, of course, in any walkout be penalized in the sense they would no longer be drawing their regular rates of pay. Such strike pay as would be available to them would be of some assistance, but they would suffer the usual penalties on a personal basis from going out on strike.

The essential difficulty in this proposal would be the fact that with car-ferries continuing in operation there would be no great direct pressure on the railway company itself to achieve a speedy settlement to the dispute. Therefore, I also suggested that when a work stoppage occurred, and the Canadian armed forces were called in, the Canadian National Railways would experience two direct penalties. The first would be that the normal day-to-day revenues they would receive during the period that the ferries would be operated by this alternate manpower would not go to the CNR but would return to the federal treasury. This would mean a deprivation to the extent of some thousands of dollars, depending on the length of time the strike was in effect.

Second, and perhaps most importantly in terms of the economic pressure on the CNR, I suggested that the annual subsidy which now runs into millions of dollars would be pro-rated during the strike period, and that that amount of money would be withdrawn as an additional penalty thus providing a stronger economic pressure on the railway to effect a speedy settlement of the dispute. I realize that this is a somewhat different approach to the problem and one which requires the assistance of other departments. It would set in play a different kind of operation. However, I have been intrigued to note to date that there has been no extensive criticism, no suggestion that there is a fundamental weakness in the proposition, although I am quite prepared to consider such fundamental objections and, indeed, would not want such a plan to be implemented until it had the most thorough kind of scrutiny.

It would seem to me this, at least, is one possibility for ensuring the continuation of service between the province of Prince Edward Island and the mainland, as well as continuing basic employee rights within the framework of the present car-ferry operation as operated by the Canadian National Railways. If we are to have some proposal in which all interested parties are included, the employer, the employees and the two levels of government, I believe now is the time for the officials in the railway company, along with governmental representatives, to get together in an effort to directly face some of these problems.

We have been told there has been some form of communication between some of the people directly involved, but it is quite obvious to us that there has been no serious meeting of minds between the federal officials responsible and the government of the province of Prince Edward Island. I would say, and I hope this is not an indication of the current state of the CNR, that the Canadian National is about the only interested party which has not yet replied to either of my two letters concerning this major difficulty. Since this company has a basic responsibility to operate the ferry service on a day-to-day basis it would seem that this should be a fundamental concern to it. Certainly, the suggestions I have advanced, with the penalty which would be involved should another car-ferry tie-up occur in the near future, could involve an amount of some tens of hundreds or thousands of dollars. If the Canadian National should have a modification of the proposal I have produced, I would hope they would place it on the table fairly quickly.

I believe the citizens of our country in the two island provinces will not accept again the kind of difficulties from which they have not yet even now, two months after the strike, fully recovered. It is not possible to say either in economic or human terms the difficulty created for those two provinces. There is a responsibility upon the CN and the two levels of government to work out an acceptable procedure to prevent this happening again.

I wish to make one or two further comments because I think they are important in respect of the transportation problems of Prince Edward Island. In particular, I wish to speak about the ferry system that is operating there which resumed operation following this recent strike. I think we are rapidly approaching another time of great difficulty in respect of the continuous transportation of both passengers, goods and heavy equipment to and from the province. It is a well known fact that since roughly the Second World War we have had only two car ferries capable of handling the freight and traffic to and from the province, the Abegweit, which is now 25 years of age, and until recently the John Hamilton Gray.

We know that the Abegweit, which has been a very efficient railway car ferry, is coming to the point of needing a major refit in the very near future. We have been told for the past two or three years that it has been operating at slower than normal speed. We know it would not take too much to put it out of service for a considerable length of time. For the total kind of refit and overhaul required, it would need to be out of service for at least a year. That would be an impossible situation because the other car ferry, while built originally for Prince Edward Island, has operated on a half-year basis serving the province of Newfoundland.

We islanders are patient and understanding people, and know that our fellow islanders in Newfoundland have similar and sometimes greater transportation difficulties. However, we think it inconceivable that we should be faced in the next year or so with a situation in which our basic ferry should finally go out of service, and that the other car ferry might be off some hundred miles away serving the province of Newfoundland. This government must make a commitment now with the Canadian National Railways and with the Department of Transport to provide a car-rail carrying ferry service that can, in effect, ensure that the basic goods, particularly the most basic commodity of all in terms of the agricultural industry, potatoes, are transported on a regular basis.

I was impressed by a recent report of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which met in Prince Edward Island this past June. It recommended that the Maritime Provinces Chamber of Commerce continue to prevail upon the Government of Canada the urgent need for a new, modern ice-breaking ferry to serve between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick as soon as possible. I shall not read the preamble because of the shortness of time, but I think it is incumbent on the government with the CNR to make, within the next few months, a definite commitment so that Prince Edward Island will not find itself again in a situation of totally inadequate transportation facilities for the movement of its basic goods and services.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It might be important for the Chair to know whether the hon. member is calling it one o'clock or whether another member is to take the floor.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this endless debate on the CNR-Air Canada financing bill C-164, I would like to speak in a very general way about something that is obviously basic to a country such as Canada. The paradox in the development of Canada was that, in spite of the problem which transportation presented, it was transportation through the CPR which finally welded us together from coast to coast. In that very paradox, we are brought face to face with the problems of present day Canada for it is the lack of transportation in this modern day of technology, of computers and of science which we have at our disposal, that is creating some of the fundamental problems in this country. I wonder, as we deliberate on the CNR-Air Canada financing bill which gives hon. members a chance to speak in both a general and a specific way about transportation and about Air Canada and CNR in particular, whether anyone in positions of authority in CNR, Air Canada or the CTC will be listening and, I hope, reacting to some of the concrete proposals that have been put forward during this debate.

I, personally, believe that what the western premiers tried to do last July at the western economic conference, which now is more or less forgotten because of the other problems that have flowed swiftly thereafter—as my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) says, there has been much flowing but there have been a few bumps along the way and in the result we are all shaken up a little—was to convince Ottawa that transportation should become an instrument of the national development policy for the regions of Canada. This would seem to me to be almost axiomatic in a place like Canada and something with which a federal government exercising federal leadership should agree. To put it in another way, a provision should be included in the National Transportation Act that transportation should become the instrument for development for the regions. Of course, if you develop the regions and give them strength, you will have a stronger country.

I really could not understand the reluctance of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand)—who unfortunately is away this afternoon, but I gather he has been absent for the greater part of this debate—to accept this fundamental principle. After all, it was a man called Macdonald, who is popularly called the father of this country, who developed the national policy on various tariffs and rates which helped in building the central core of this country and helped to define the boundaries of the country above the 49th parallel. We had a policy that developed this country, and now all that the west and the east, and I think even some people in the central part of Canada, are asking for is that an attempt be made to redress the balance that is somewhat out of kilter because of the over concentration and development of the industry in the central core of Canada, by including the principle in the National Transportation Act that transportation should be a tool of national development. The fact that the federal government could not go along with that very basic premise concerns me.

The National Transportation Act was only passed in 1967 and it is based on compensatory rates. You are supposed to get from the shipper only what he is willing to pay, or in other words, you are supposed to do away with subsidies over a long period of time. I will have more to say about subsidies in a minute. Can you have transportation as a tool for regional or national economic development, and on the other hand, as is presently written in the National Transportation Act, agree with the principle that transportation should be based on compensatory rates? I think that in many parts of this country, in so far as the passenger service is concerned but even more with regard to the freight service, rail transportation is fundamental to the growth of the region. It may be that the compensatory rate that the railway would like to charge is going to be too high, and almost too confiscatory for that industry or that part of the country to grow. I think there has to be a review of the Transportation Act to try to balance transportation as a tool of economic development against the present section in the act which provides that transportation must only flow on the basis of compensatory rates.

Here, we have the irony of debating the CN financing bill with all the mythology of rates that was built into the infrastructure of CN financing, especially in the forties and fifties, and the refinancing of their capitalization which was supposed to do away with subsidies or grants from the government. We have this paradox. There was a great teacher around the Sea of Galilee many, many years ago who taught in parables. I think the political scene in Canada can almost be taught in paradoxes. You can see the political fabric of our country and coming to transportation there is a paradox that we all know. The strike last summer brought it home again. It is that although rail may not be the most popular mode of transportation for passengers service, railroads are fundamental to growth. Balanced against that is the compensatory rate structure that is built into the national transportation system, and which I say is not helping to develop the economy of the country.

In trying to revise the principle of the Transportation Act to make it a tool of economic development, I do not suggest that the taxpayer of Canada should be asked to subsidize inefficient forms of transportation. As members of parliament and the transportation committee, whether the CN, the CP or any other group came before the Transport and Communications Committee, we should be looking for ways to make the railway system more efficient rather than doing what is so easily done, and that is letting the taxpayer pay because in the end the money comes out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. This is what other governments have done, and it is just subsidizing the inefficiencies of the system. We should be looking at transportation as a tool of economic development, and not using the criteria that the railways can charge what the shipper can bear. Let us change the system and make it more efficient rather than perpetuating its distortions, inadequacies and inefficiencies.

I will give some precise example of the inadequacies of the present system, Mr. Speaker. On the east coast, as Your Honour and other members from the east coast and central Canada are aware, we have a container port where the ships of the world bring their container traffic. There they are supposed to be loaded on to unit trains which, in theory and to a degree in practice, flow through the heartland of the United States and Canada. You would think that this would have brought unremitting loud hosannas from all Canadians, let alone those in Atlantic Canada.

But, Mr. Speaker, while the container facilities have been of value to the export shipper or the import shipper and of some benefit to Atlantic Canada, they have not necessarily been of benefit to the domestic shipper. For instance, the shipper in the Annapolis Valley who uses the Canadian National to send goods to Toronto finds that it costs him more to do that than it costs his competitor to ship from Hamburg, Germany to Toronto. That is a fact, Mr. Speaker. As my poor frustrated shipper says, "Mr. member, we are supposed to be the wharf for the Atlantic." We are told that we are lucky to live by the sea, smell the fresh air and watch Johnathon Livingstone Seagull go up and down and philosophize about his rhapsody as he soars down to try to catch a fish. Yes, it is a great place to live, but when it comes to hard economic facts there is geographic discrimination; we are far from the markets of the world and of central Canada. We understand that and we like to live there, but we cannot understand why the discrimination of geographic distance has to be compounded by the rate structure of the national railway system. It is strange that a Hamburg shipper can land his goods in Toronto cheaper than a producer in Atlantic Canada. We have the largest wharf in the world, Mr. Speaker; it stretches from Toronto to Halifax.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

I will give another illustration of why we are frustrated with this system of transportation, and why members take the opportunity during the debate on the CN financing bill to try to point out that something has to be done. Let us talk about rates and not just the anomaly of Hamburg versus the Annapolis Valley. You can turn that around. My shipper cannot ship cheaper from the Annapolis Valley to Hamburg than the shipper in Toronto. I can prove that point by bills of lading.

I should like to read from the newsletter put out by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, a non-government agency of interested businessmen and, boards of trade with support from the four Atlantic provinces which deals with Atlantic problems. I do not think I could do it justice by paraphrasing, so I will read it as I want to give a little more detail than that of the Annapolis Valley-Hamburg situation to show what confronts us in Atlantic Canada when we talk about rates.

I might say that we are glad that at least the west had a conference about transportation. We are as convinced as they that provincial governments will finally have to look at the cost structure of railway operations. During the debates on the transportation bill in this House, many members spoke of the problems the bill was going to create unless we could see what the variable costs were. What does the railway charge against fixed or variable costs? This type of information is difficult for members of parliament or provincial governments to obtain, but I believe that in future provincial governments will be able to get some insight into the costing structure of the railways on a confidential basis. Of course, the CTC is going to study freight rate anomalies which prejudice the west; perhaps it could also study the freight rate anomalies that prejudice us in the east.

I should like to read from the APEC newsletter of August, 1973, which, among other things, says this:

> As an example of the lack of alternatives and competition in the Atlantic region, due to the lack of volume there is no pool car service for less-than-car load traffic from Halifax to central Canada. But daily pool cars operate from Toronto to the Maritimes.

We are small down there. We cannot get the railways to get together to collect small shipments from small shippers into a pool car so that we can get a preferred charge for sending goods to central Canada. Every day pool cars come to the east under preferred charges, because the volume of traffic that can be picked up from central Canada warrants that arrangement. So, we cannot get pool cars going west, but they do come east, and we must compete in that situation.

● (1420)

I do not blame this government for this state of affairs. All governments are to blame. Let me say that there is much talk about alienation, dissatisfaction and frustration in my part of Canada. Do not think that we, who come from the east, the cradle of this land, are all that happy about our transportation system. I well remember, when I was just knee-high to a grasshopper, that two places close to my home—and this was not Quebec—used to raise the black flag on July 1. I am not speaking of 1867, 1907 or 1927. I am talking about 1947 and 1957. The black flag ran up because some people thought that their prosperity had gone when we entered confederation. They have reason to wonder. I continue quoting:

The pool car alternative would introduce additional and desirable competition. Government should therefore consider partial sponsorship for the initial operation of a consolidation warehouse—

Could not the railways or the government consider establishing consolidation warehouses, so that we could have the benefit of the sort of pool car service that is available to central Canada for shipments to eastern Canada? I continue quoting:

—and regular pool car service from the Atlantic region to Central Canada.

Other anomalies and problems abound in the Atlantic region. In Eastern Canada the railways are capable of profitably shipping a minimum of twenty 20-foot containers a week, in any one direction, carrying exports or imports between Halifax and Toronto for $207 each. For a minimum annual contract of 18,000 export and import containers shipped between Central Canada and the Maritimes the rate falls to $132 each.

Let me make clear those figures. If you do not handle any great volume of containers, you will pay $207 for each one, but if you are a large conglomerate, or tied in with the trans-Atlantic shippers, or with CN at Halifax, you are going to pay only $132 for the same container. I continue quoting:

Present volume rates for import-export containers cover variable costs and make a net contribution to railway fixed costs; otherwise there would be no point in the railways offering special rates designed to attract container traffic carrying exports or imports which might otherwise be shipped through Montreal, the Seaway or an American port. In any case, as CTC President E. J. Benson stated on July 19:

'Section 23 of the National Transportation Act refers to Section 276, 277 and 278 of the Railway Act, and those sections require that the fixing of freight rates have regard to minimum and maximum levels:

(a) No rate can be below the compensatory level—it must exceed the variable cost of the movement of the traffic concerned as determined by the Commission; and

(b) A captive shipper who qualifies for a fixed rate is entitled to a rate which does not exceed variable cost by more than one hundred and fifty per cent.'

Thus it becomes difficult to understand why it costs $335 to send a domestically originated 20-foot container carrying only one-quarter of its maximum load, when it costs only $132 to send a comparable import container, carrying the maximum load, from Halifax to Toronto. It is even more difficult to accept a charge of $1,340 for a maximum load domestic container. That is a rate ten times as high as the minimum import container rate—import containers average about three-quarters of maximum load—despite the assistance received by the railway under the Maritimes Freight Rates Act.

For a fully loaded 20-foot container carrying 40,000 lbs. of domestic dry goods, the rail charge may rise to $1,656. This exceeds the minimum rate for a comparable loaded export container by 1,155 per cent.

I know that when you quote figures you can become completely bulldozed, so to speak, and lose the attention of the audience. But we are not speaking for the audience; we are speaking for the record, in the hope that some of those who read these debates will wonder, as we wonder, why the east cannot compete with central Canada. We are far removed from the markets of central Canada and our container volume is not high. Our containers start their journey in Halifax, Annapolis Valley, Pictou and other regions. The rates given to our shippers are higher than the preferred export rates given to larger shippers who ship in large volume.

That brings me to my second point. I can understand that the railways will give preferential treatment to exporters who may export something like 18,000 containers per year. Obviously, the greater your volume is, the better is the rate you can command. Once that volume of traffic has been established flowing east and west, once you have containers going from Halifax to Toronto, why could you not give the Atlantic shipper a rate that is not the same, perhaps, but very close to that given to the importer or shipper who ships in large volume? That is the question we are asking, and we want some answers. The volume of traffic is there; large shippers are given preferred rates, but domestic shippers are discriminated against. That is not fair. Certainly, in view of the volume of traffic that the railways handle, there should be no discrimination against domestic shippers. They ought not to be discriminated against by an unreasonable rate.

On or about October 11, there was a transportation seminar in the Maritimes, when the Roads and Transportation Association of Canada met in Halifax. An interesting speech was made at that association meeting by a fellow called Robert Manuge who is executive vice-president and general manager of Anil Canada Ltd. of East River. He said, among other things:

The facts indicated that the railways may be deliberately discouraging the use of containers by domestic shippers in order to bolster box car traffic and rail revenues and prevent the circumvention of high commodity rail rates by captive Atlantic region rail shippers, . . .

He went on to say:

It costs Anil, for example, $468 to send 40,000 pounds of its products from Nova Scotia to Toronto by rail. It costs $132 to send a comparable import container, carrying the maximum load, from Halifax to Toronto.

'Why must a local firm accept a charge that is 164 per cent to 255 per cent higher than the rate available to imported containers, perhaps carrying the same products from an overseas competitor, despite the assistance under the Maritime Freight Rates Act?' . . .

Earlier, he had said that the east coast is really the gateway to Canada. I suggest that we are just a pipeline. Goods are piped from Halifax to Toronto and, under present rate structures, the benefit does not accrue to us.

The next question is this. Why should we continue the present rate structure which encourages the development of the inner core of the country and the development of secondary industries which do the processing and developing in central Canada. Again, with a little imagination, effort—

An hon. Member: And common sense.

Mr. Nowlan: —and common sense, it should be possible to help the Maritimes in this regard. We do not want big cities like Toronto springing up on the east coast; on the other hand, we would not mind a few little Oakvilles, Port Credits or similar areas. We do not want the megalopolises and metropolises which are causing so many problems in other parts of Canada. I do not want to overstress that. I know other hon. members want to speak and will limit my remarks.

The point is that the federal government should consider a transportation policy of the kind that was envisaged in 1867 when all parts of the country were considered equal. That is how they should be now. Transportation policy is a tool for national economic development of the regions. If the regions are strong, the whole country will be strong. This applies to apples, to life, and to transportation.

Further, the system should be changed so that it is more efficient than the one we have now. Now, we take the taxpayers' money to subsidize inefficiency.

My third point is that the domestic shipper should not be discriminated against merely because he does not send out the volume of container traffic that the importer or exporter sends. He should be given a fair rate, so that he can compete with that type of shipper. There are many other areas one could mention and about which one could ask questions. When talking about efficiency, why does it take 35 hours for the so-called unit train out of Halifax to reach Montreal? It is only 780 miles, so that must be one of the slowest rates of progress anywhere in Canada.

Mr. Baker: Almost as slow as the government.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know whether you can say that. You cannot compare doughnuts with zeros. Sometimes there is a real difficulty in seeing any forward motion in this government. It is more of a backward motion. However, I do not want to get political. I am trying to be objective. Some day the Minister of Transport will face members on this side of the House who are a little more enraged. We are getting short of fuse because we are not getting answers to the questions we are asking.

As I already mentioned, the transportation act set up compensatory rates between competing modes of transport. Why in this bill are CNR and Air Canada lumped together, let alone the fleet of trucks CN uses to carry its goods? Where do you have the competing mode of transport between the hierarchy running Air Canada and CNR, which has as many trucks on the road as Smith Transport, the trucking firm of CP. Where is the competing mode? Perhaps one of the reasons the railways are not interested in passenger service between Halifax and Montreal is that they do not feel they should build up the service. Anyone who does not want the service can fly CN or Air Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Fly CN?

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Nowlan: Air Canada service is definitely much better than when I first came to this House. It used to take between six and eight hours to travel from Ottawa to Halifax. You had to transfer in Montreal and there was a wait of from two to four hours. Fortunately, there is now one plane a day that flies directly to Halifax from Ottawa. It takes one and a quarter hours or one hour and 20 minutes. My point is, how can there be competition between different modes of transportation that are owned by the same company. Nevertheless, we still work under this mythology of compensatory rates when it helps others, but forget about it when it hurts us.

I know there are other members who want to speak on this bill. I just want to mention that the railways are as much a part of this country as the tides in the Bay of Fundy. Those tides are the highest in the world. We on the shores of the Bay of Fundy wonder which will change first, the tides that flow in and out or the transportation system. If we can be assured that when this bill is referred to the committee, officials of CNR, CPR and Air Canada will appear before the committee to give more detailed answers to some of the questions we have been asking, this might help the Minister of Transport in trying to work out some of the fundamental problems of this country.

We talk about regional disparity, the problems of bilingualism and the sincere efforts of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to develop those areas in Canada which do not receive the benefits of other areas. However, I say in all seriousness there will never be an effective policy of regional economic expansion in the hinterland and periphery of this country until we have a transportation system that will develop in a more meaningful way the very areas that DREE is supposed to help. I can give examples of this in my own constituency. Companies are receiving DREE grants to cover customers west of the Lakehead. Because of the successive freight rate increases in the past two or three years, they received DREE grants to expand their facilities to serve the market west of the Lakehead. However, because of the seven, eight or nine freight rate increases in the past year and a half or two years, they can hardly service the customers they have east of the Lakehead.

I plead with the Minister of Transport to accept what was requested by the western premiers. I know the Atlantic premiers would ask for the same. Frankly, any Canadian would ask that transportation be a fundamental tool of economic development, no matter where he lives. In this way, all Canadians would benefit.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I want to use this opportunity to reiterate a plea I made ever since coming here. That is that the government of Canada, the Department of Transport and other agencies which deal with the various aspects of transportation should begin to look at the whole question of transportation needs in this country in its entirety rather than in separate compartments, as has been done over the years. It seems that at present the one objective of each agency and department is to not let the other know what it is doing. In no other country can that kind of attitude have such a detrimental effect as it does in Canada. There are 22 million people in this country who inhabit some three million or four million square miles of land, yet we use our transportation facilities on the most illogical wasteful manner that can be imagined. I wish to give an illustration of what I mean.

When I was first elected to this House 12 years ago, there were six or seven trains a day between Ottawa and Montreal, and the same number between Montreal and Ottawa. They departed at various times during the day. They moved quickly and provided an easy and comfortable method of travelling between Ottawa and Montreal and return. What has been done? We, the government of Canada—

Mr. Baker: You are right this time; we, the government of Canada.

Mr. Orlikow: We, the parliament of Canada, allowed the railways, with the blessings of the Canadian Transport Commission and before that the Board of Transport Commissioners, to cut back on the number of trains per day and the meal service. We allowed them to change the times to the point where it now seems they do not want people to travel on their trains. What we found, of course, was that more people used their cars. There was an expansion of bus service—buses left every hour on the hour. What could be more stupid at a time when we are concerned about the fuel shortage and the befouling of the environment than to cut back on railways which can carry people in large numbers quickly and relatively cheaply?

• (1440)

But that was not enough. Though we apparently have no money to subsidize rail transport from Ottawa to Montreal, another branch of the government is proposing to invest $200 million or $300 million in a STOL aircraft system which instead of taking two hours from downtown Ottawa as the train does to downtown Montreal will take half an hour by air, but passengers will have to spend half an hour getting to the airport and another half an hour getting from the airport at the other end to downtown Montreal.

An hon. Member: And for double the price.

Mr. Orlikow: That is just one instance of the failure of the government, and of the Department of Transport in particular, to provide the kind of overall efficient service which the people need.

I want to talk for a few minutes about Air Canada and the CN. I do not think I need explain to members of parliament that I am a supporter of Air Canada and of the principle that air transport should be operated mainly, if not exclusively, by a publicly-owned corporation or under its jurisdiction. If I express criticism of Air Canada, as I intend to do, I do so with a great deal of regret; I wish I could spend my time complimenting Air Canada on the work it is doing. It did a magnificent job for many years. The decline began during the period when a Conservative government was in power, and the so-called regional carriers were given the short runs while Canadian Pacific was permitted and encouraged to get into the trans-Canadian and international air transport business in competition with Air Canada. Air Canada is not performing well at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: The relationship between the company and its employees is poor. The morale of the employees at all levels is bad. Air Canada's relationship with its customers leaves a great deal to be desired. I want to document what I say because I think the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) has the responsibility to take whatever steps may be necessary to change this situation. I intend to put forward one or two suggestions as to ways in which this ought to be done.

A few years ago, Air Canada, or Air Canada in consultation with the government, arranged for a study of its organization to be carried out in depth. This study was undertaken by a United States company—why a United States company was chosen, I do not know. But as a result of that study, and the recommendations forthcoming from it, a large number of changes were made in senior personnel. Many of the senior staff from Vice-Presidents down were retired. I know that many of them really did not want to retire. New people were brought in to take over their jobs. The number of vice-presidents was increased; today, I understand, there are some 19 vice-presidents.

I can see no improvement, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the wholesale changes which were made. It is fairly obvious there is a great deal of discontent among those who have remained and evidence of this is the fact that Mr. Baldwin, who was the number two man in Air Canada, has announced his retirement before reaching the retirement age. Then again, there have been a whole series of disputes between the management of Air Canada and its employees. There was the strike of machinists which tied up operations completely some time ago and, more recently, there was a strike of employees working in the finance department in Winnipeg.

The issues which led to the strike, and which made it necessary for the employees to withdraw their labour for a long period, were not particularly difficult to solve had there been understanding and goodwill on the part of management. The employees were afraid that following the development of a computer centre in Montreal the work they were doing in Winnipeg would be transferred to Montreal. They were afraid they would be obliged to move to Montreal if they wished to keep their jobs. It is true that the management of Air Canada assured them this would not happen. But we in Manitoba, regardless of whether we live in Winnipeg or in rural areas, regardless of whether we are members of a chamber of commerce or of a labour union, and regardless of the political party to which we may belong, cannot help but remember what happened a number of years ago when, despite denials by Air Canada management that the overhaul base in Winnipeg would be, first cut back, and then eliminated altogether and moved to Montreal, such a move did, in fact, take place. The overhaul base in Winnipeg, which at one time employed 2,000 workers is now a thing of the past and all that work is being done in Montreal, despite denials by the company, denials persisting for years, that such a step would be taken. It is not surprising, in these circumstances, that the workers to whom I have referred, along with others, are suspicious of Air Canada management, and this atmosphere of suspicion does not lend itself to efficient work and the provision of satisfactory service to customers.

As one who travels frequently on Air Canada I want to say that I consider the food which is served to passengers to be, on occasion, of a very inferior nature. In fact, on occasion it is a disaster. I have discussed this matter both publicly and privately with representatives of Air Canada with absolutely no success. When I raise the matter I am told I am the only person who does so. But when I asked certain questions in parliament about that aspect of the matter, the answer I received was framed in such a way that it was virtually impossible to know how many people had complained. I am sure I did not get this indirect, roundabout answer by accident. I am sure they did not want to tell me how frequently complaints are made. I wonder how much monitoring of the quality of the food provided is carried out by Air Canada personnel. I wonder whether Air Canada has looked into the advisability of preparing its own meals. I am told that CP Air prepares its own meals. I do not like giving a private carrier credit, but on the few occasions I have travelled CP Air I found the food superior to that served by Air Canada.

I should like to give a third illustration—and these illustrations come to mind without my doing an in-depth study of Air Canada. Let me talk about timetabling. Ordinarily, I go to Winnipeg on Friday, leaving Ottawa at five o'clock. During the supper hour, which I suppose is a period lasting about an hour and a half, the situation at the Winnipeg airport is such that the following Air Canada planes arrive. There is one 1011 which has a capacity of about 300 passengers; there is one DC-8 stretched which has a capacity of about 200 passengers; there are two DC-9's each with a capacity of about 100 passengers. At this time of year those planes are travelling almost at capacity, if they are not overbooked. At the same time one plane arrives in Winnipeg from the United States, a Northwest Airlines plane, and so does one CP Air plane.

Air Canada says that this is not their responsibility, that they did not build the airport facilities. However, they are responsible for their own timetabling. They could stretch their air arrivals at this time so that four aircraft did not arrive at virtually the same time. At the present time you wait for your Air Canada baggage for up to an hour or more at this particular period of the day. I wish the Minister of Transport would go to Winnipeg and examine this situation, because it means there are literally hundreds of cars which have to park in areas where no parking is allowed. You cannot blame people who come to meet their friends or relatives, because there just is no other place to park; parking areas are fully occupied. Then when someone gets a ticket and pays a fine for over-parking because the person he met had to wait for his baggage, his thoughts about Air Canada are not very complimentary.

Let me now mention a situation which does not affect me personally all that much since I am one of those fortunate people who fly from Ottawa to Winnipeg direct, which accounts for about 95 per cent of the flights that I make during the course of a year. I do not have to travel via Toronto, but if there ever was a monstrosity which seems to be have been designed with the express purpose of making things difficult, uncomfortable and unpleasant for passengers, it is terminal 2 in Toronto. I realize this is not Air Canada's fault either. I know this because on one occasion when I did have to spend a little time at Toronto airport I wrote to Mr. Baldwin, and he told me the truth in his reply that it was not Air Canada's fault. The Department of Transport had designed terminal 2 and had it constructed. But, as I say, if there ever was a monstrosity, an abortion, a total disaster area, it is that terminal.

An hon. Member: Constructed by a Liberal government.

Mr. Orlikow: Somebody interjects that it was built under a Liberal government. It was completed under a Liberal government, but it may well have been planned in the days when we had a Conservative government.

Mr. Dick: That is speculation.

Mr. Orlikow: It is speculation, but whoever was responsible should certainly have his head examined by a psychiatrist. One has to walk miles at terminal two. In the Montreal Star for yesterday or the day before, I noticed a short letter, which I should have clipped and read to the House today, written by someone who was reporting that his sister needed a wheelchair when she arrived at the Toronto airport. However, even though notification had been given in advance, no wheelchair was waiting and she had to walk miles on her crutches to get from where she deplaned to the taxi or bus. I hear there are motorized carts, but the number of times I have seen passengers riding from one part of the terminal to another are few and far between. There are no comfortable chairs or couches on which to sit if one has to wait. I could go on and on, but I am sure hon. members who use Toronto airport more frequently than I can wax much more eloquent about the terminal's shortcomings.

I should like to give another illustration before leaving the Toronto airport terminal. The department seems to feel that the present situation is not bad enough and it is going to extend the terminal, doubling its size so people have to walk five miles instead of two. I suggest that the minister make sure that his department knows what it is doing and uses some common sense before he permits any extension of that facility.

Let me make one further personal observation. Several years ago, supposedly because it was more efficient and would save money to do so, the reservations office in the Ottawa area, which used to be reached by dialing the phone and speaking to someone in Ottawa, was moved to Montreal. I am not criticizing Montreal for this; we were told it would be more efficient to make this move. Last Thursday, at about 11.30 in the evening, I wanted to check whether the flight I was taking on Friday morning had in fact been confirmed. I dialed the reservations number for Air Canada repeatedly for two hours, and each time my call was answered I heard a recording which told me that the lines were busy and I should hold. I held the line on a number of occasions for up to ten minutes but no one came on the line to answer my call. Eventually I gave up. Fortunately for me the next morning I was able to confirm my flight and I was able to travel. This kind of service is intolerable and inexcusable. If this is what efficiency means, then I think Air Canada should return to its old system which it said was less efficient. It was probably a little more costly, but at least you could find out whether or not you would get a seat.

One last word about air travel. I suppose I shall be told this is not Air Canada's fault either but the fault of the Department of Transport. People in Winnipeg and Manitoba have been making a case for a number of years that they are entitled to a Canadian route from Winnipeg to Minneapolis and Chicago. At present we are served by only one carrier, a United States carrier, Northwest Airlines. This carrier has a record of poor relationships with its employees. Several strikes have shut down its operations over the past number of years, strikes lasting, in one case at least, for substantially more than one month. So in fact there was no direct service from Winnipeg to the midwestern United States. Winnipeg has been pleading for a Canadian line and I should have hoped it would be operated by Air Canada, but I would settle for one of the other airlines.

A few weeks ago the minister announced they were close to an agreement after long negotiation with representatives of the United States on the extension of air routes to the United States by Canadian carriers and to Canada by United States carriers. The minister announced there would be 18 new routes for Canadian carriers. That announcement was welcomed by all Canadians. Let me tell the minister that western Canadians, Manitobans in particular, were unhappy, to say the least, to find out that the agreement negotiated on behalf of all Canadians did not provide for a direct Canadian route from Manitoba to the midwestern United States until at least 1978. If I were to use the language I have heard about this, Mr. Speaker, you would immediately suggest that I was using unparliamentary language.

This means we will have to wait five more years before we have a direct Canadian route. This is the kind of treatment western Canadians have been receiving for generations. This is the kind of treatment that has led to the alienation, which is increasing, I am sorry to say, in western Canada and the kind of treatment that leads to a situation in which the Liberal Party has been almost eliminated in terms of members of parliament from the three prairie provinces. Let me say to the Minister of Transport and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that if they wish to change what has happened during recent elections in western Canada, they should take another look at the kind of treatment they have permitted—I do not use the word "encouraged"—to take place in western Canada.

I think I have said as much as I want to on this occasion about Air Canada and I hope some of the people who have responsibility in this airline will pay attention to my criticisms. I do not want to be only critical of Air Canada, because criticism alone does not help to improve conditions which have led to the kind of problems I have illustrated. Let me say to the Minister of Transport and to the government that the situation which has developed in respect of Air Canada will continue at least until the government does several things.

First of all, the government ought to take a very hard look at the membership of the board of directors who supposedly run Air Canada. The situation in respect of Air Canada is so serious that the time has long passed when people should be appointed to the board of directors simply because they belong to the right political party or because they come from a geographic area that should have representation. If Air Canada is to be drastically changed, as I believe I have illustrated it must be changed, it needs a new, vigorous and competent board of directors. I would not presume to suggest who should replace those now on the board but I urge the minister to completely change the composition of the present board.

Second, I suggest to the minister that the performance of the senior management of Air Canada must be examined thoroughly. I do not believe they are doing the job that ought to be done, and a great deal needs to be done. I think the illustrations I have given of the incompetence of Air Canada bear that out. I was not the greatest admirer of Mr. Baldwin when he was deputy minister of transport, but when I read that he was retiring several years early I could not help asking myself—I hope the minister will give this some thought—whether in fact the wrong man was retiring. To put it mildly, I would say I am disillusioned with the job being done by Mr. Pratte, president of Air Canada, and the kind of people who have been appointed, I presume on his recommendation, as vice-presidents.

I urge the minister to give serious consideration to the kind of people leading Air Canada, particularly those in the upper echelons. Until the employees of Air Canada have the feeling that the company is operating efficiently and in a way which gives them fair treatment, and that the company cares about what is happening to its customers and its services, nothing will improve.

Let me say one more thing about terminal 2 to demonstrate that what I have suggested is not exaggerated. The management of Air Canada arranged for a survey of customer services and customer feelings about Air Canada particularly in relation to the proposed movement to the new terminal in Toronto. That survey was carried out by a Miss Farnen. I will not take the time to put on the record what she said, although I can and will do so probably at a future meeting of the transport committee. A more damning indictment of Air Canada and its operations could not be found.

As things now exist, it is as though that report prepared at the request of Air Canada management was never made. The report has disappeared, and as far as I can tell very few employees at the senior, middle or lower levels of Air Canada have ever seen it. From my reading of the report and its recommendations, it would seem that virtually none of the problems have been corrected and none of the recommendations have been implemented. I suggest that not all of the recommendations would be difficult to implement and many would not have cost much money. One recommendation in the report was for the employment of more staff. This recommendation was ignored until the management of Air Canada saw how bad the situation was and decided a move had to be made. This is being carried out to at least a partial degree. I would urge the minister to take a serious look at the operations of Air Canada.

Let me say a few words about the entire operations of our railways. I do not fault the CNR exclusively, although I do fault what seems to be the attitude of CNR management. That attitude seems to be that the CN can only do those things the CPR is prepared to do. It seems they feel they cannot compete with the CPR in order to give cheaper, better and faster service, but that they should do everything possible along with the CPR to provide worse service than was provided before.

I give a small illustration of what I mean. If a person in Ottawa wished to take a train to Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg or somewhere else and wanted to know the time of arrival or departure of a train, he would pick up the Ottawa telephone book and look under the listing for CPR or CNR. Until a year or two ago the first number listed under the CPR or the CNR heading was "train information." Now one would have to have a better pair of glasses than I have in order to look down the page about a column and a half in order to find the "train information" listing.

In my view, this has not occurred as a result of an accident; I suggest it is a deliberate attempt to discourage people asking questions and indeed to travel as passengers on either railway. This has been done jointly, rather than separately. I could not begin to make the case for improvements in rail service as a whole and particularly for improvements in rail service in respect of freight as well as was done by the four western premiers at the Western Economic Opportunities conference in July of this year. I think it is significant that the proposals on what should be done, and the criticism of existing practices that was made at that conference were made by the four premiers, three of whom lead NDP governments and the fourth of whom is the Conservative Premier of Alberta.

It was interesting and important to me as a westerner to read the report which appeared in all the newspapers. They all reported the same fact, to the effect that the spokesman on the question of transportation for the four premiers was the Conservative Premier of Alberta. It is not my intention to place on the record everything they said, but what they said was so convincing that I am certain no one in western Canada, regardless of political affiliation or social or economic background—and, indeed, no fair-minded thinking person in central Canada or in the maritime provinces—could disagree, because they said essentially that the railway systems of this country were established primarily because without them there would have been no country.

They were established at a time when the manufactured goods which were being produced or processed in central Canada had to be shipped to the Maritimes and to western Canada, and the raw materials, the products of our forests, the minerals, the fish and everything else which was produced in western Canada and in the maritime provinces, had to be moved by rail to central Canada. The whole system of freight rates was established with that in mind.

One hundred years have now gone by. Situations have changed, and now we have resources in the prairie provinces, in British Columbia and in the maritime provinces which can be processed and manufactured as cheaply and as efficiently near the source of growth, near the source from which they are brought out of the ground, as they can in central Canada. This was not the case until now, to large extent because the whole system of freight rates is designed to guarantee the situation we had in the first 75 years of the history of this country.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

The people of western Canada and the maritime provinces are not content to let that situation continue. They are not content to see the job-creating manufacturing industries, to a large extent because of discriminatory freight rates, be expanded in central Canada so that people from the Maritimes, the Prairies and British Columbia are virtually forced to move to Ontario or to the Montreal area of Quebec. They want, and are entitled to have, their fair share. We are not asking that the manufacturing industries or the processing of our minerals, our forests or our fisheries, be carried out in our own areas regardless of cost. We are asking, as indeed the prairie premiers were demanding on behalf of the people of their regions, that the discrimination which has existed should be eliminated and that a new system of transportation with a new system of calculating freight rates be established.

I shall give a few illustrations of the type of discrimination which exists. My colleague, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) listed some of them in an article he wrote in the Toronto Globe and Mail. I could do the same thing by quoting from the briefs which the prairie premiers presented to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at that conference. It costs $2.90 a hundredweight to ship livestock from Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, to Toronto. If the livestock were slaughtered and dressed in Prince Albert, thus providing jobs to the people of Saskatchewan, it would cost $3.37 a hundredweight to ship the meat to Toronto.

Unprocessed rapeseed shipped from Saskatchewan to Vancouver costs 35 cents per 100 pounds, but if it were processed into oil before shipment it would cost $1.21 per 100 pounds to ship it from Saskatchewan to Vancouver. It costs $38 to ship a ton of Manitoba nickel to eastern factories, but $138 a ton to ship the product of the processed nickel from eastern factories back to Manitoba. It costs $2.01 per 100 pounds to ship a 60,000 pound minimum carload of canned foodstuff from Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, to Vancouver, while the rate to ship the same item from Toronto to Vancouver is $2.08; yet the distance from Toronto to Vancouver is about twice that from Portage la Prairie to Vancouver. Why does this type of situation develop?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), but this time has expired. The hon. member may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I say, first of all, that I shall be as brief as possible. I recognize that many members wish to speak in this important debate. First I should like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for once again having raised in this chamber a matter which I think is of very great importance, the pension question in respect of retired railway workers. Of course, this is not the first time the matter has been raised, but I think it is time it was raised again and I am grateful to my hon. friend for having raised it in the debate earlier today.

● (1520)

During the unhappy debate on the "back to work" bill of nearly two months ago, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, myself and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) touched on this problem. Since that time, despite the fact that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) suggested that some action would be taken to study the situation of the railway pensioners, nothing has happened. I am not directing my remarks especially to colleagues on the government side but to other members in the chamber and I ask them to use what influence they have to approach the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and encourage them to bring about a study of railway pensions, especially those of retired railway workers.

I would remind hon. members that when this matter came up—it is reported in Hansard of August 31, 1973, at page 6135—I put the following question to the Minister of Labour:

> So my question to the minister is, can he give us some assurance that this whole question will be gone into? If the minister does not want to go that far at this time, can he give us the assurance that he will meet as soon as possible, which means almost immediately—and I recognize the demands on his time at the moment—with representatives of this pension group so that immediate negotiations can take place with a view to setting up an inquiry to send once and for all this running sore . . .

The Minister of Labour replied as follows and I ask members on the government side to pay attention to these words:

> Yes, with reference to those already retired. I think this is quite a legitimate position, but I do not think it can be accomplished relative to the bill before us today.

He was referring to the fact that he had announced the appointment of Mr. John Deutsch to look into certain aspects of the pension plan. Myself and other hon. members whom I mentioned wanted him to appoint a committee to look into all aspects of the pension plan, especially from the point of view of retired railway workers. The minister said that there were certain options, as follows:

> There is the question of whether it could be done through a joint committee, something similar to what was done before with assistance from governmental officials, if you like, from my department and the Department of Transport.

He then went on:

> . . . perhaps an industrial commissioner should look into the whole broad question. So, as I assured the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I am now assuring the hon. member for Vancouver South that I would be prepared, as would the Minister of Transport, to bring the parties together to see what further significant changes can be made to improve these pensions.

This is the commitment from the government. That is why I again ask government members to remember that this commitment has been made, and in the next few days to take the time and trouble to speak to their ministers, because I know the concern for retired railway workers is not confined to one side of the House. I know there are hon. members on the government side, as there are in the Social Credit party and in the NDP, as well as in my own party, who are equally concerned. This is part of the whole problem within the railways. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar pointed out the following in the debate a month and a half ago:

> If the minister or this government think that they can divorce the matter of pensions from the over-all settlement of this rail dispute, then let me tell them that they are wrong.

I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar in that statement and I ask hon. members to remember that the problems which lie within the railway trades at the moment will not go away. There is every expectation that they will be recurring, and I say to all hon. members that the question of pensions is one of them. The matter was raised again on September 14, 1973, as recorded at page 6597 of Hansard, again by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he asked the Minister of Labour what was being done about the commitment he had given. The Minister of Labour replied:

> I did say that a supplemental study of the benefit structure of the pensions as opposed to the costing was under consideration, and I advise the hon. member that it is still under consideration. Discussions will have to be held with the railways concerned, the Minister of Transport and the union leadership, and we will get these discussions under way as soon as we can.

That is all very well, but again I ask hon. members to take note that these discussions must take place. It is not enough to tell us that the matter is continually under study. In the minister's remarks, may I point out with respect, there is a very important omission, that is, there was indication that the minister or his officials would speak to the Association of Railway Pensioners of Canada which, as some hon. members know, numbers some 20,000 people. These people have their own organization and they must be brought into these discussions. I point out to government members, to the Minister of Labour and to the Minister of Transport, that the commitment is there and we expect them to fulfil it. We say earnestly and sincerely that this is a serious matter and should not be left too long.

I want to mention another matter, that is, the continuing serious difficulty regarding the morale of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in my own city. During the committee stage of this bill I asked that the representatives of these workmen be brought before the standing committee to explain to hon. members just what is the problem as they see it, because once again this problem will not go away and it ill behooves us to pretend that this is just a union dispute or just a disagreement between some of the workers and the companies.

This is a matter that is striking right at the heart of the efficiency of the transportation system of Canada, and in the process is causing a great deal of hardship and anguish to the railwaymen involved. I say, and it is important that it be remembered, that we are not dealing here with a group of people who are in any way irresponsible. I have met with some of them. At a meeting I attended some time ago with about eight or nine of them, not one of them had less than 19 years' service with the CNR. These men are not irresponsible, and because they are making as much of their grievance as they are I say that as parliamentarians we must listen to them and give them a proper forum in which they can be heard.

There will be time to further discuss the general matter of CNR financing. I would say one thing about airport terminal No. 2 at Toronto. There is no changing it because it is there now. But I would ask the Minister of Transport to do one simple thing—go down there during a weekend and find out how many times he does not know in which direction he is going because there are no signs.

Mr. Baker: He does not even have to go there to run into that difficulty.

Mr. Fraser: The minister will realize, then, that a good part of the problem could be solved immediately if proper signs were erected there. I recognize that other members wish to take part in this debate and I urge all members, especially those on the government side, to remember that there is a commitment made to the railway pensioners by the government and that it must be honoured.

● (1530)

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the bill before us today I should like to touch upon what I feel is the unfortunate failure of the CNR and the government to supply commuter service in our urban centres. My area of York-Simcoe is particularly hard hit by this neglect. For many years residents have asked for the re-establishment of the passenger service that once existed between the Aurora-Newmarket area and Toronto. The present lack of such a service is due, in the main, to unfortunate jurisdictional confusion and indifference on the part of many, including this government. In my opinion, this neglect must end.

It was not enough for this Liberal government simply to provide an experimental train that commenced to run in my riding on November 1, only two or three days after the last election, but which was discontinued eight weeks later. A commuter train service is urgently needed by the residents of York-Simcoe which has grown greatly in the past 12 years. In 1961 the riding had a population of 72,000; in 1971 it was 99,000 people, and today it is estimated to be over 102,000. In April last year I surveyed the residents and found that 94 per cent wished to have a commuter service. Of the number answering the inquiry, many indicated that they would use the service if it were available.

The GO transit Gray Coach service between Newmarket and Toronto has been well received and is now running at near break-even point. I understand from the GO transit officials that a commuter train would be complementary rather than compete with the present GO transit system. It was the original intention of the province of Ontario that the service be an integrated one between the railroad and the bus line, namely, Gray Coach. Unfortunately, when the province of Ontario attempted to negotiate a satisfactory running contract with the CNR they were unable to do so because of the high costing methods instituted by the CNR with respect to this line.

I would suggest that accounting procedures and conflicting philosophies add to the confusion when attempts are made to cost-out a commuter train service in Canada, and certainly in my riding. For example, in the 1971 annual report of the CNR it is stated that CN policy is as follows:

> to make the provision of passenger services as far as possible a paying proposition for the railway within the framework of the National Transportation Act of 1967.
> As part of that policy the company is pursuing vigorously all the advantages available to it under sections of the act which provide that passenger services uneconomic to the railways but needed by the public may receive federal government subsidies of up to 80 per cent of the losses on such services. Accordingly, during 1971 CN submitted to the Canadian Transport Commission applications for discontinuance of all intercity railway passenger services including its transcontinental service. This move was dictated by a provision in the act which stipulated that a railway must apply for discontinuance in order to qualify for subsidy payments.
> Legislation provides for different procedures in the case of commuter service. In accordance with these procedures the company also applied to the commission to have the actual losses declared for its Montreal commuting services and for a recommendation to the governor in council for assistance in respect of such losses.

I found that statement most interesting, Mr. Speaker. Although the CNR and the government have denied that the government has covered deficits in connection with urban commuter services across Canada, for some time it has been suspected that the commuter train service in Montreal has been running at a deficit and that the federal government has been picking up that deficit directly or indirectly. In this connection I would draw the attention of the House to a statement by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), who is not in the House today to listen to the debate I am extremely disappointed about that. In answer to a written question which appears at page 5863 of Hansard for July 23, 1973, the minister said:

> The management of Canadian National Railways advises CNR incurred a deficit of $2.1 million in 1970, $2.2 million in 1971 and estimates of a deficit of $2.4 million for 1972.

That refers to the operation of the Montreal commuter train service in those years. I think this is particularly significant, Mr. Speaker, because I can show to any member who is interested letters and representations indicating that the government in no way was picking up the deficit on the Montreal commuter service operated by CNR. Yet we have on record an admission by the minister that something like $2 million is being absorbed in losses by the CN to provide those services in Montreal, which in turn is a loss to the people of Canada.

Turning again to the annual report of the CNR, I would point out that the balance sheet as at December 31, 1972, reflects property investment of $3,476 billion after depreciation of $1,392 billion. Government of Canada loans are shown at over $1 billion and Canada's shareholder equity in Canadian National Railways was set at $2 billion. In that year the railways net interest paid on debt was $66 million which, by coincidence, was equal to the entire revenue received by the railway for their passenger services. In short, Mr. Speaker, the entire revenue that the CNR earned in that year from supplying passenger service was diverted into an interest charge which was mainly a payment back to the government.

In addition, the road property was depreciated in the amount of $62.9 million, and the CN paid $62.7 million in various forms of taxes to various governments. These three items, totalling $191.6 million, represented over 15 per cent of Canadian National Railways total railway revenues in 1972. In reporting on the 1972 financial statements of the CN, the company's new auditors—I emphasize "new auditors"—pointed out that in January 1, 1923, all properties and equipment brought into the system at that date were included in the CN values and since that date all additions have been recorded at cost and depreciated thereafter. One wonders who is the net loser in this practice of so capitalizing, depreciating the items and in the meantime carrying interest-bearing debt mainly in the name of the federal government. Surely it works to the detriment of the persons who wish to use the railway as a public service.

Certainly if our highway system in Ontario were handled in a similar way, it would result in greatly higher annual costs which would have to be borne by the general taxpayers or by the users of our highways. In this connection it is interesting to note that on March 31, 1967, the province of Ontario wrote down to $1 approximately $3 billion worth of highways and thus ended the earlier practice of depreciating such highways on a 30-year basis. Since that write-off the province has spent almost $200 million per year for railway construction, but each year the amount is written off and paid out of general taxation in the province. In addition, the province has extended municipal grants for roadway construction totalling approximately $150 million a year, which again are written off each year. As a result, Ontario has a relatively good highway system which is used by motorists at relatively low cost.

It can be seen that the province could place a $4 billion value on our road system, which at 6 per cent would result in an annual charge to somebody of $240 million per year; and if the capitalized road system was depreciated on a 30-year basis it would require a further $130 million per year. Partly due to an historical quirk and partly due to different philosophies, our highway system has been structured to give the user a break while our railway system is structured to give the passenger an unduly heavy load.

I also wish to point out that, offsetting a low-cost road system, we have high-cost automobiles in this country. The financial cost to the average passenger car commuter is prohibitive. Take, as an example, my riding of York-Simcoe. The average person who commutes to Toronto has to travel 80 miles per day. It is generally accepted that a person's cost of driving an automobile is 12 cents per mile, or $9.60 per day. Assuming that there are 1½ passengers per motor car, it can be seen that the average commuter spends $6.40 per day travelling to and from work if he lives in my riding and works in downtown Toronto. Putting this another way, he would spend $30 per week, or $1,500 per year. That is what the commuter must spend. Before taxes, such a worker has to earn over $2,000 per year in order to pay his way by car to and from work.

It is often forgotten that any subsidy at the municipal, provincial or federal level which would assist the commuter to get to and from work at the lowest cost is really a saving, not a subsidy, for the general community. I emphasize that it is the federal government's wrong philosophy that has allowed the present situation to arise. Let me also stress that highways are dangerous; travelling on those highways in a motor vehicle is particularly dangerous. In the York region, 66 people were killed in highway traffic accidents in 1972, compared with 59 the year before. Every year the number of accidents on our highways increases.

Of course, the increasing volume of traffic merely highlights the congestion of our roads. Let me give some examples of what I mean, Mr. Speaker. Highway 400, for example, carried 67 per cent more people in 1972 then it carried in 1968. In 1972, the average daily traffic on that road was 34,900, compared with 23,476 in 1968. I point out, also, that pollution is a natural by-product of automobile usage. The report of the Ontario Advisory Committee on Energy, dated March, 1973, reads as follows:

> ... transportation accounts for over half of the man-made pollutants emitted to the air in metropolitan Toronto.

The report says, as well, that the automobile is "by far the largest contributor in this category." It goes on to say:

> ... the automobile is the main, man-made source of pollutants such as carbon monoxide, nitrogen oxide, hydrocarbons and lead.

Dealing specifically with carbon monoxide, the report states:

> In high-density population areas with a high concentration of motor cars, the burden of carbon monoxide in the air can be an increasingly serious hazard to health.

At page 62 of the same volume, the report states:

> Public transit contributes on the average much less pollution per passenger mile than does the private automobile.

In addition, the report points out that transportation is probably one of the most serious social and aesthetic problems associated with land use. It says:

> High concentrations of automobiles in large urban areas have resulted in the development of massive expressways which are exceedingly costly, use large amounts of land needed for housing and other purposes, departmentalize cities, increase congestion, and generally lower the quality of life in their immediate vicinity.

Again I say that the government has been completely negligent in this area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Let us consider the question of energy. When we debated the question of energy yesterday, I think it was well demonstrated that the government has no energy policy; there is a total lack of energy policy.

Mr. Paproski: What's more, the government doesn't care.

Mr. Stevens: I again point out that energy is not available in unlimited quantities in Canada or in the world. Certainly, it should not be squandered and unnecessarily used for commuter travel. In 1970, 17 per cent of the total energy consumed in Ontario was used in the transportation sector. As I said yesterday, 80 per cent of the energy used in Ontario has to be imported into the province. The fuel consumption of motor vehicles accounted for about four-fifths of this energy consumption.

The transportation sector in Ontario utilized, in 1970, 394 trillion BTU's of energy. By 1990, if present trends continue, the transportation sector will utilize 1,100 trillion BTU's. The utilization of commuter train services would help to minimize this large consumption of non-renewable resources. Already there is gasoline rationing in the United States. The authorities in that country are considering the imposition of a 50 mile per hour speed limit and other ways in which to conserve fuel. It is only prudent for Canadians to minimize the needless use of the automobile, especially when commuter train facilities are so readily available. We can use trackage and railway stock that is already available in this country.

Historically, the residents of my area have fought for passenger train service for over 120 years. In 1849, 1,100 residents petitioned the federal government as it was then constituted to incorporate a railroad company which would serve the area with passenger and freight facilities. As a result, the Toronto, Simcoe and Lake Huron Union Railroad Company was incorporated and subsequently financed through lottery tickets which were sold throughout the district.

On May 16, 1853, the first steam train in Canada West ran from Toronto to Aurora carrying passengers and freight. Today, the powers conferred in 1849 to build and operate this railway are vested in the CNR, a federal Crown corporation. Those in control of the operation have chosen, however, to discontinue the passenger service but to keep the line for freight service. CNR officials have stated they make money on freight but passengers are trouble. Commuters may be more trouble than freight, but I believe we have now gone full circle. Rail systems were needed when the country was being developed, to carry both people and freight. That is why the railways received their franchises. Today, railways are needed for the same two purposes but of the two, people must come first.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: To hold otherwise would be to allow the railway system to enjoy the more profitable side of its concession and to ignore the less profitable. It would be like the Liquor Control Board of Ontario telling a tavern keeper that he may discontinue his food sales if, according to his figures, he finds those sales unprofitable, so that he may concentrate on retailing liquor which he claims is more profitable.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stevens: In short, that is what the government has allowed the CNR to do in this country by accepting that railway's accounting philosophy which I have tried to demonstrate this afternoon.

Mr. Paproski: It is shameful.

Mr. Stevens: Commuter train services are needed in our urban centres, particularly in areas such as Toronto and the one I have the honour to represent. Such a service has been promised by many governments. Certainly, the provincial government of Ontario has indicated repeatedly that, given the proper working relationship with the CNR, it will be more than willing to institute commuter train services in the Toronto area and other parts of Ontario where they are required. That co-operation has not been forthcoming up to the present time.

We want to know why the government sees fit to subsidize the Montreal area, with respect to commuter service, to the extent of over $2 million per year, but will not even meet with the appropriate Ontario authorities in order to try to arrive at a working relationship regarding the institution of a commuter train service in Toronto. In this connection I would emphasize, as most members are probably aware, the GO transit service that the government of Ontario is now running in the Toronto area is completely paid for by the provincial government. They have a net running cost arrangement with the CNR where the CNR, in spite of their method of costing, is paid 100 per cent of what they say is the cost of running that service.

The province of Ontario is picking up any deficit between the revenues they are able to earn and the actual running cost charged by the CNR. Even at that, I think it is wise to note that most of that service is now running at a breakeven point as far as the province is concerned, and on average it is resulting in a net loss of about 40 cents per person per day. The province has acted, but not the federal government.

I suggest that if a rail commuter service were instituted in my area, it would be successful and any loss would be an accounting loss, not an actual loss on the service. Such a service would be cheaper for commuters. It would certainly be safer. Pollution from automobile usage would be lessened and energy would be conserved.

May I conclude by saying that I sincerely hope the government will give to my area in 1973, or certainly in 1974, a passenger train service and in so doing at least restore us to the position we had in 1853.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have only four or five minutes before private members' hour at four o'clock. I begin by saying that the CNR financing bill before us is important to all members of this House for many and various reasons. In a constituency such as mine it is very important because there is a large area of the city of Melville in which about 600 people work. It is also important in a constituency such as mine that is basically rural, because of the farming population and problems associated with rural Canada.

This debate provides members with an opportunity to talk about the problems of transportation and rural Canadian life. The transportation system is vital and central to most of us who come from the so-called hinterland areas of this country. All you have to do is look at the freight rate structure in places like the Prairies, most of Quebec outside the Montreal area, the Atlantic provinces, northern Ontario and other parts of northern Canada to know what I mean. The transportation system, the freight rate structure and the anomalies in it are a large part of the reason for the rapid shift of population from rural Canada to urban centres. This can easily be seen by looking at events in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan in the past few years. There is lack of development because of the freight rate structure, a structure which provides lower freight rates for shipping raw materials out of the Prairies than finished goods or products.

I will give only one example of this because I think it will demonstrate what I am talking about. In the city of Prince Albert, which the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) represents, it costs $2.90 per hundredweight to ship livestock to Toronto. If the livestock are slaughtered and processed, it costs $3.37 per hundredweight. That means only one thing: we are exporting jobs from Saskatchewan and other parts of rural Canada to places such as Toronto. The freight rate structure is organized in such a way that it is more profitable to do the processing in the golden horseshoe area of southern Ontario or in the city of Montreal. We must get rid of that type of system if we are to develop this country in an economically planned fashion where the younger citizens of rural Canada have job opportunities in their own locals. A transportation system is vital to that end.

The problem is not only freight rates. It is also the abandonment of rail lines which serve small areas of Saskatchewan. Plans are for the abandonment of about 3,000 miles of rail lines in my province by Canadian National and Canadian Pacific. What will happen when that is done? Many little villages and hamlets exist only because they are service centres for the farmers. They have grain elevators to which farmers deliver their grain. If they are abandoned, these small communities will lose one of their focal points and will have little reason for being. It will be more expensive for the farmer who will have to transport his grain a greater distance.

There is also the question of station agents. This, again, takes away from the service that is being provided to people in rural communities. It makes things more difficult and costly for them. When we talk about the transportation system we are talking about something that is absolutely fundamental to the way of life of a great many people whether they live in the Prairies, in Quebec, in eastern Canada or in the northern parts of this country.

I see it is four o'clock, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I could call it four o'clock at this time and continue at a later date.

Mr. Speaker: It being four o'clock—

Mr. Paproski: Carried.

Mr. Speaker: Because of the interjection I have cause to wonder whether there is a desire by hon. members to pursue this very interesting debate until five o'clock. Is this the wish of the House? I am inquiring whether it is the wish of the House that we pursue this debate and suspend private members' hour.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, we will not be considering a motion by a member of this party. I think it is a Social Credit motion. I wonder whether Your Honour was heard at the far end of the chamber.

Mr. Speaker: I will try to speak louder.

I wonder if the House would be willing to suspend private members' hour to carry on the debate on the bill now under consideration. To that effect, we would need the unanimous consent of the House. The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), I think, could perhaps indicate whether it is his wish—

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I remember that I was asked that some time ago. I accepted and today I would accept again. I wonder if we should not stick to the regular agenda in order to give other members next week the opportunity to discuss again the bill on the CNR financing.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member suggests that the debate should be suspended as provided and that we should pass to the consideration of the items standing in the name of hon. members. We will in a moment be dealing with a motion.

It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private member's business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions (documents), public bills and private bills. I recognize the hon. member for Portneuf.

The hon. member might perhaps indicate who seconds his motion.

Mr. Godin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think that it is the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin).

Mrs. Morin: Who, me?

Mr. Speaker: There is obviously a practical difficulty. The hon. member must find somebody to second his motion.

• (1600)

[English]

It may be that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton would wish to second the motion.

Mr. Baker: For the purpose of permitting the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) to proceed, I would be very glad to second his motion.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure it is a motion which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton will be proud to second.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[Translation]

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED TAX REBATE EQUAL TO MORTGAGE INTEREST PAYMENTS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of granting an income tax rebate equal to the amount paid in mortgage interest on a family home and in municipal taxes, the whole not to exceed $1,000 per year.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I first thank the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who graciously seconded the motion.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss the famous motion I submitted last January and which has been on the order paper under number 38 since then.

Since the purpose of this motion is for the benefit of all Canadians who own single family houses, I obviously hope to have the support of all memebers, all the more so because we can discuss this motion while dealing first with its application concerning our country's resources.

On the material side, this country is obviously one of the wealthiest in the world.

And although our trade always favoured England and our natural resources were generally developped for the Americans, we are nevertheless citizens of a country where the standard of living is rather high. Our young country having been generously endowed by nature, they have not succeeded in exploiting us completely. However, exploiting was felt chiefly at the housing level and as a result our country is suffering from a lack of decent housing for poor and low income people.

Inquiries made by the government have shown that it was impossible for a couple earning under $8,000 a year to consider buying a house. On the other hand, the government introduces local initiatives programs under which the salary is $100 a week for three or four months. Among those earning only $7,000 to $8,000 a year, Mr. Speaker, it is needless to say there are many government employees at the Federal, provincial and municipal levels. There are more than just a few people with annual earnings from $5,000 to $6,000 and unfortunately that kind of money is also too often the wages of a great number of trade or industry employees.

In short, all those people are not earning an income that would enable them to make a down payment on a house with high mortgage payments, to pay insurance and municipal and school taxes. In spite of all the measures introduced by the government, one realizes that not only has the problem not been solved but the situation is getting worse every day. As a matter of fact, in 1969, a three-bedroom single family house cost about $18,000 in the Quebec City area. In 1970, the cost of the same house, in the same area, had gone up to $20,000 and this year a three-bedroom single family house, or a 1,000 square-foot house, goes for $23,000 while it seems that houses of that kind in the Toronto area would sell for about $28,000.

It is also obvious that those who purchase a house are faced with interest rates much higher than in 1970.

I remember that during the election campaign Liberal candidates made some commitments in this connection. And yet interest rates keep on increasing. Because municipal and school taxes have been raised we have reached the point where some government programs and mainly those of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are out of reach for most people. Some programs are even out of reach to the very people they were supposed to help.

The fact that family heads cannot afford a house even though they earn $6,000 or $7,000 a year is a tragedy. This is due to the fact that the down payment, monthly mortgage payments, maintenance costs, service costs and taxes never stop increasing.

As for those who qualify for loans from caisses populaires and CMHC we know how much they must pay. For instance, a $30,000 loan at 9 per cent, which is the current interest rate of the CMHC, means that monthly payments of $248 will be required for 25 years. Therefore, after those 25 years, the owner will have paid $74,520, namely $30,000 for the repayment of his loan and $44,520 in interest charges and this does not take into account the municipal and school taxes and service costs. As I said, this is in the case of people who qualify for the CMHC program which we know well or who applied to a caisse populaire.

Besides if we know what happens to those who qualify this does not apply to everyone. As a former carpenter I am always most interested in visiting housing projects in my constituency.

About two months ago, during one of those visits, I met a young couple who had requested their mortgage company to review their payments. They were paying $189 a month. After two and a half years of this, they had paid back only $112 of the capital, with the rest of the payments going for expenses, insurance and interests. Obviously, you cannot pay for a house in such a situation. While there may be many who cannot afford to become owners, I think that we should not forget the category of people which I have just mentioned.

The case of the young couple which I gave as an example a moment ago is not unique. Many owners who succeeded in obtaining financial means a few years ago now face serious problems. And these problems have become so difficult to solve that many people ask themselves: How long shall we be able to keep our house?

Middle income families, and even what were once considered well-off people, are affected. They find out that after they have bought a house, they will have to pay for it three times. They will have to pay for it once to the contractor and twice to the finance company.

This situation is really unacceptable and I think that as far as interest is concerned, the problem cannot be solved today. The government, however, must bring forward a program designed to improve living conditions of Canadians who own single family dwellings.

Among improvements that would have both essential and efficient results, there is the implementation of the motion before us, that I introduced early in this session. I suggest that this motion can easily be carried out and meets the wishes of all Canadians.

All the people who have access to Hansard have seen as well, I guess, that during the previous years, our party emphasized on many occasions in this chamber the importance and urgency of carrying out measures to relieve Canadian homeowners. When asking that municipal and school taxes be deductible for income tax purposes, I feel this is not a special favour but rather a sort of justice, since municipal and school taxes are already deductible in the case of "big wheels" or companies that own apartment houses.

You will all recall, I think, a letter received early in September, that was directed to every member of Parliament by the Chairman of the Canadian School Trustees Association, Mr. Walter W. Robson. The latter referred to a meeting of the School Trustees Association of all the provinces, that was held in Quebec City, in May 1973. The following resolution had then been passed:

"It is therefore agreed that the Canadians School Trustees Association file a petition with the Minister of Finance of the government of Canada and the ministers of Finance of all the provinces so that they take financial steps that will enable homeowners and tenants to deduct the amount of their school taxes from their taxable income."

The letter goes on to say that the resolution had been sent to the Minister of Finance in Ottawa (Mr. Turner) and that copies were being prepared to be sent to his provincial counterparts.

These school trustees from a great many Canadian communities, urban as well as rural, state that they are speaking on behalf of a majority of men and women who have responsibilities in respect of Canadian taxpayers.

Because hon. members of this House also have responsibilities in respect of taxpayers, those of the Social Credit Party of Canada are pleased to join with the school trustees to claim for all taxpayers the right to deduct from their individual income tax returns the amounts paid as school taxes to the various school boards.

The position of the Social Credit Party of Canada is that ownership of his home by the head of the family contributes to the development of individuals, the welfare of their families and the health of society. If the platform of the party, as far as housing is concerned, is widely publicized during election periods, it is also true that, between general elections, we continue to call for various means of action on the part of this government.

To improve the well-being of Canadians, we propose various means. First, the incentive for building single family dwellings by guaranteeing long term loans at an interest rate which should not exceed 3 per cent. Second, the abolition of impediments to building constituted by present taxes and especially by the sales tax of 12 per cent on building materials. Third, the owners of single family dwellings should also benefit from an income tax exemption on their mortgage interest payments as well as on municipal and school taxes; however, this exemption should not exceed $1,000 a year.

The program of our party in the area of housing reflects the needs of the Canadian people, which were expressed and proved publicly during Creditist conventions held each year in different parts of the country. The hon. members of our party having been elected without the election fund of big finance, it is easy for us to fulfill our role honestly and to be the spokesmen for our electors in order to claim in this House the measures which are urgently needed to safeguard the freedom of families and assure them utmost security in a rich country like ours.

Creditist members have always been ahead and we are pleased today to note that we are not the only ones who request efficient social measures. Several groups, several associations and intermediary bodies have exposed their views on this subject.

In Le Soleil of September 17, for example, we can read, and I quote:

The Saint-Jean-Baptiste Society (SSJB) of the Chaudière area, in order to promote residential construction, invites all governments to favour income tax deduction of mortgage interest payments on a new property for a period of three years and to grant a deduction of municipal and school taxes on a residential property.

That is what stands out in the main resolution passed by the membership of SSJB Chaudière at the annual convention that was held last week in Ville Saint-Georges de Bauce under the chairmanship of Mr. André Breton . . .

People are generally aware of the benefits that would flow from the implementation of that motion to make property taxes deductible for tax purposes. Mr. Speaker, even Liberal supporters are in favour; all newspapers in the country mentioned that Liberal supporters gathered at the convention around mid-September in the federal capital passed a resolution asking that interest rates be reduced and even that amounts paid as interests on mortgage loans be made deductible for tax purposes.

Mr. Speaker, I earnestly hope that all members, Liberal members included, will have the courage to forget about bagmen for a moment and vote in favour of my motion.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to discuss this very important subject. That concept is well known in the United States, for example, and in Canada, Manitoba and Ontario.

The only question that could perhaps be asked now is, is it worth it for the citizens of St. Catherine or Lac-Saint-Joseph, for example, or would that not rather help the residents of Westmount or Forest Hill?

[English]

Before I discuss the idea further for a few moments I should like to permit myself a spot of Friday afternoon humour by indicating that I am delighted to see that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), a member of the Official Opposition, has supported a motion which seems to favour the wealthier taxpayer to a greater degree than it does the poorer taxpayer.

Mr. Baker: That is because you have one eye closed.

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I should resume my seat and allow the hon. member to comment on the bill.

Mr. Baker: Go ahead.

Mr. Blaker: I think I should continue. The question posed by motion No. 38 is whether or not it will truly benefit those citizens who must need such benefit. The motion provides, not for a tax deduction but for a tax credit which is applied against income tax owing by a citizen. If this concept were presented to the House as a bill it would permit an individual to deduct from his taxes owing an amount equal, apparently, to the combination of the interest payable on his mortgage in a given year and his municipal taxes payable in the same year.

I think it follows, very obviously, that to the extent that an individual pays more income taxes, to the extent that he pays more mortgage interest, to the extent that he pays more municipal taxes—all of which are indicators of the wealthier individual—he would receive greater benefit under this proposal. I would go further and say that in general terms this motion is contrary to the provisions and the spirit of our tax law.

[Translation]

The Income Tax Act now grants abatements or, to use a more common expression, tax credits, only when it is established that the income received by the taxpayer has already been taxed. It is called the Foreign Tax Credit and it applies when the taxpayer gets from abroad an income that was taxed in the other country. The Income Tax Act then provides for a credit to be applied against Canadian taxes for an amount not exceeding that paid to the foreign country.

[English]

That is one of the few exceptions under the foreign tax credit where we do permit one area of taxation to be credited against another area of tax payable. The proposal in the motion of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) goes even further. Essentially it argues that although an individual has not spent money pursuant to a business, or an adventure in the nature of trade, if I recall the expression used in the Income Tax Act, he will none the less be entitled to deduct from his income tax that amount of money which he has spent for his comfort.

While it is understood that a home is essential, it is an essential that does not have to be purchased. So the result of the motion would be very considerably to favour the individual who has adequate funds to buy a home and to leave out in the cold, so to speak, those individuals who choose not to buy or cannot afford a home in that they would not receive an equal or similar advantage in regard to their own income tax which is payable.

The question I might turn to next is that of specific examples within the income tax system itself as to how such a motion might apply to various individuals paying income tax. I know other members of the House wish to speak on this motion and I think it would be better to restrict my comments to the more general aspects of this question, as I have been doing up to now. I should like to mention one or two areas which I think are of interest. This motion would very substantially run counter, in its present form, to a similar idea which has been found workable in the provinces of Manitoba and Ontario.

[Translation]

Incidentally, I wish to note that, in co-operation with the federal government, the two provinces I mentioned, Manitoba and Ontario, have established a tax-credit program in order to ease the local taxpayer's burden. But as for its big four original features, the program was first conceived so as to bring as much relief as possible to people on low income.

[English]

That is in considerable contraction with the present motion which does not seem to assist those in the lower revenue brackets but, rather, those in the higher revenue brackets.

[Translation]

Then, the provincial tax is reduced rather than the federal tax, so that provinces subsidize their own municipalities. Furthermore, provincial programs help both tenants and owners.

[Mr. Blaker.]

[English]

The present motion does not go to the question of what taxation aid might be given.

[Translation]

Finally, we pay money directly to the people involved when the credit is greater than the amount of income tax to be paid.

[English]

Therefore, for the general reasons I have mentioned—and I am led to believe that other speakers may wish to go into specific details in terms of actual taxation concepts—I would be opposed to the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I know it is rather strange that I should rise to support the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) on this motion. However, I do so for two purposes. The first is so he can have the motion brought on and, second, because I think he has introduced into this House today a concept which is not new but which would, if adopted, provide a new form of relief and incentive to those in our society who to a greater and greater extent are concerned about housing. I think this is perhaps an even more important reason than the first one.

I am not terribly shocked to learn that the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore (Mr. Blaker) takes exception to what I might describe as a progressive proposal in respect of housing, because in dealing with housing the government he supports is notorious for its dinosaur attitude in respect of new innovations in this field. When we are speaking about a conference to which the minister can go and talk about new methods of bringing forth better housing for more Canadians, then of course the minister and members of his party are great at talking. When they have the instruments of power in their hands to provide some relief from this dreadful shortage in a land of plenty, there is a superabundance of talk and a poverty of progressive action in housing.

I rise today to support this motion as I think, contrary to what the hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore says, it will not provide relief for the very limited wealthy class in Canada but as wage rates increase it will provide a measure of relief, incentive and hope in Canada for those who find themselves in the middle income group which has been burdened to a greater extent by the tax load of modern society. This is not a new concept. On April 9, 1973, on motion of the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour), a Progressive Conservative member, and later on May 14, 1973, on motion of the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Morgan) this matter, in terms somewhat different though nonetheless consistent with the motion of the hon. member for Portneuf, was discussed by members of this party in the House.

I say as a matter of faith in this party that we are dedicated to the first principle that housing is a universal need; and the fact that homeownership is too expensive in Canada, a land of plenty in the 1970s, makes it a matter for government action and government priority. It is significant, in terms of considering the extent to which housing is a priority to this government, to realize that even at this late date, in spite of all the urging upon the government, it has refused to take off the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. This is a most regressive tax. This government has also refused to follow the lead of the province of Ontario in establishing a ministry of housing as a regular government department reporting to its own standing committee of this House.

I do not have to convince hon. members of the House who want to see that there is a problem, and I do not have to convince members of the House who care to see that this government has not really progressed very far in spite of its talk, its press releases and its propaganda regarding the position it takes on housing. It has been established that 80 per cent of Canadian families want to live in single-family dwellings. If 80 per cent want to do that, it is the duty of this government to provide the opportunity. The proposal of the hon. member for Portneuf would effect a dramatic reduction in the cost of housing for Canadian families, perhaps to the extent of almost $1 billion per year. The deductibility of mortgage interest rates would reduce the impact of inflation, of land and construction costs and of interest rates which over the past ten years, partly through errors of omission and partly through errors of commission by this government, have been far out of proportion to the general increase in the cost of living, but all of which have increased the cost of housing.

Let me refer as one example to the recent report on housing in the Toronto area. Housing in that area now costs 11 per cent more than it did one year ago. While food costs rise, people still eat; while clothing costs rise, people are still clothed. But an increase in housing costs deprives many Canadians of the prospect of home ownership and commits them to a life of paying rent.

I had the privilege of going through a number of high-rise buildings in my area during the course of the last election campaign. I have told this story on the floor of the House before. I met a young couple one night in the course of campaigning who told me they were saving money. The young fellow had a position in an institution here, a position of trust, and was managing to save money. But to use his words, he felt imprisoned in that apartment building. He was one of those who wanted to get into a home of his own and to bring his family up in that atmosphere.

There are others who do not, and I respect their wishes in that regard. However, the overwhelming number of Canadians wish to have a home of their own. Under the present situation, with inflation which is running rampant without control in this country, with the regressive taxes on building materials, and with a government which refuses to tackle the number one social problem in this country, thousands of Canadians will find themselves continually imprisoned in apartment buildings. I have never forgotten what that young person told me. We all know the main components in the cost of a house are the land upon which the house is built, the construction of the dwelling and the cost of the money. I believe it is fair to say the largest single cost contributor in recent years has been the cost of money in respect of the building and ownership of a home. It is primarily to that I understand the motion of the hon. member is directed, namely, the cost of financing a home.

I should like to give an example to illustrate how expensive this cost is. The rise in the interest rate from about 6 per cent to about 9 per cent, and now even higher, has added more to the monthly payment of an average mortgage loan than the average $5,000 increase in the price of a building lot would have added without a change in the interest rate. For example, a mortgage with a principal amount of $16,500 payable over a period of 25 years at 6 per cent would have a total interest cost of $15,200. The same mortgage, with principal of $16,500, carrying interest at the rate of 9 per cent, would have a total interest cost of $24,500, a difference in interest cost of $9,300 on a mortgage loan of $16,500. Furthermore, high interest rates may be substantially raising the level of annual income needed to secure a mortgage, compared with previous years. It is to that phenomenon that the motion of the hon. member is directed.

The hon. member for Lachine-Lakeshore seemed to say that this motion, worded as it was, could apply only to a single-family home. I have read the motion and am afraid I cannot apply to it that very restrictive interpretation; but I am not surprised that the hon. member has been able to do so, because he belongs to a very restrictive party. However, I have read the motion and it is possible under it to grant an income tax rebate equal to the amount paid in the form of mortgage interest on a family home. I think in our society it is possible, with the development of condominiums—some condominiums such as high-rise buildings and other condominiums of perhaps lower rise—for people to have a family home of this type.

The motion also deals with the provision of a reduction or rebate in respect of municipal taxes which a condominium owner would have to pay. Surely the motion is not so restrictive that it could not apply also to that proportion of the rent. It represents an increase in the rent paid by a renter of an apartment building as opposed to a condominium where the municipal taxes become part of the monthly payments in respect of that building. It would seem to me that such a provision would be of great advantage to people who rent. This is a unique attack and I know this government is not prepared particularly to accept a unique attack on anything, even on itself. However, it is an attack on one part of the spectrum, the difficulty that faces Canadians in all parts of this country. This will continue to be a problem facing Canadians to a greater and greater degree as they become more urbanized. This is part, not all, of the attack which must be made on what I believe is Canada's number one social problem.

I, for one, believe that how we solve the housing problems of Canadians, which have reached astronomical proportions, will be reflected in how this and other governments in Canada generally meet the social problems that will affect us as our society changes. We talk about many things, such as crimes in the streets, respect by children for their families and the breakdown of the family. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, I believe with great conviction that at the root of many of those problems is the inadequacy of housing and the variety of housing available for Canadian needs.

I shudder, frankly, to think of the communities we will be developing as we move into the latter part of the 1970s. In a few years, 85 per cent of all Canadians will live in an area along the St. Lawrence River and in the major cities generally between Windsor and Montreal. I shudder to think of the problems that will develop when we continue to pack more and more people into fewer and fewer acres. I shudder to think what will happen in respect of our educational system which will suffer as a result of this development, with teachers teaching larger and larger classes. The burdens which are being placed on the municipalities in respect of recreation are horrendous, in my view, and I have had some experience in another capacity with regard to municipalities.

The problems generated by not attacking the housing problem are things I do not look forward to seeing. These are the things that are at the root of a national housing policy. The hon. member for Portneuf is not saying his motion is the be-all and end-all of a national housing policy. But I think he is saying, and I agree with him, that it is the beginning of a concrete plan for a real attack on this problem. Of course, it will cost the treasury money. I tend to think rather progressively, however, in respect to the future of Canada, and I believe that despite the inability of this government, notwithstanding its backward-looking attitude and notwithstanding that it would rather restrict than give incentive, this country is capable of moving ahead and providing this kind of incentive to Canadians to own their own homes.

In the debate of April 9, 1973, myriad reasons were given by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc), speaking for the government, concerning why we should not venture into this kind of thing. I read that speech with absolute dismay. But having sat in this House since April 9 and having watched the government in action when dealing with other matters, I am not surprised as I read the speech again. This government has tended to put thumbs down on every practical idea that has come forward except those it can steal for its own advantage.

● (1640)

Mr. Baker: I suggest that in the atmosphere of harmony that exists in the House at this time, as you can see, Mr. Speaker, perhaps this is another idea that they may steal, and this would not surprise me at all. I say to the hon. member for Portneuf that he may be very proud to see this motion making part of the Liberal platform in the next election.

In spite of all the reasons in the world that can be advanced against it, there is one overwhelming reason why this House should approve the motion, that is, that it is part of the attack on a national problem. This government had better listen to the wisdom of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) who a few days ago chastised the government for its neglect of transportation problems. I want members over there who are jeering at me to stand up, look the problem in the eye and chastise the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) for taking the attitude he has with respect to a serious Canadian problem. They would show more courage by doing that than by skulking near the curtain and jeering in the face of Canadians who suffer from neglect and who are asking this parliament, as the hon. member for Portneuf did, to begin at least in this small way an attack on what has become a national problem and, may I point out with great respect, a national scandal.

Mr. Yves Demers (Duvernay): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief: nevertheless I would like to make a few comments on the motion before us.

People are now talking about an income tax rebate of $1,000. I often heard that some were considering reducing the income tax by the amount paid in taxes and interest. Now, I think this is going beyond all bounds: it is no longer a question of a rebate but of a tax reduction of $1,000.

I believe this policy would favour the wealthier people, those who own houses worth $50,000, $60,000, $75,000 or even $100,000, while we, in the Liberal party, are working very hard to try to help the Canadian worker who, through his labour, contributes to the development of Canada. Often, this Canadian worker who earns maybe only $8,000 a year owns a small and very modest house for which taxes and interests amount to only $500. In other words, this worker would be unable to save $500 contrarily to much richer people.

There are also the tenants who pay rent and cannot benefit from this tax deduction because they do not own the house. I know several people who are tenants in Montreal or Toronto but who own a $100,000 cottage in the north. And we would like to grant them a $1,000 tax deduction? I fail to see the rationale of this policy.

Furthermore, the people who own properties in Canada have an advantage that I would like to point out. They can make capital gains. Such gains are not taxable, not even at 50 per cent because there is an exemption for the main residence. This is in itself an advantage and we would like the federal government to give them $1,000 more. Finally, if that policy were implemented for income tax returns we would have to hire a few more civil servants as it would be necessary to increase control over income tax returns.

I think we should concentrate on the creation of productive employment so that our national gross product continue to grow and that would increase our exportations since our Canadian dollar is high on the international market.

But the more we create—what I call non-productive jobs—I would not say unnecessary—we weaken our Canadian dollar. In his motion, the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) compares this deduction with the income deductions for foreigners. I wish to point out to my colleague that these same deductions are also applied in other countries and that after all we do not lose a cent. He also compares these deductions with the deductions on dividends. These deductions on dividends, Mr. Speaker, are only intended to avoid double taxation, because the company before paying a dividend has already paid taxes. If that amount became taxable a second time, the taxpayer would be subject to double taxation. Therefore, I do not see any relation.

It has often been stated, in support of that measure, that the owners of income-producing properties are entitled to deduct their taxes, their heating costs and their insurance. But we must understand something: Before being entitled to deduct those expenses, the taxpayer must firstly state his income in his return and then he can deduct his expenses. Normally, someone who buys an income-producing property does so to realize profits. The taxpayer must finally pay more taxes. Moreover, if he could reduce his income to a depreciation expenditure, it would be useless because since January 1, 1972, depreciation expenditures can no longer be claimed as a loss.

One last point I would like to make is that I have some feeling that this policy would also run counter to provincial laws. We often hear about autonomy, that the federal government interferes with provincial and even municipal policies. I think this is a case where we would really interfere with municipal administration.

Finally, I would like to suggest that direct taxes, sales taxes and municipal levies are one of the most equitable means of taxation because we know that in Canada today, even though we have an excellent Income Tax Branch, many people manage to evade taxes. And one thing is certain, it is that direct taxes have to be paid even by tax evaders and this is at least one aspect of justice from which Canadians benefit.

[English]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of speaking on this matter. However, in view of the irresponsible statements made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) I feel obliged to bring forward facts which are indisputable. What I find most regrettable in the remarks of the hon. member is that he said this government has not advanced in the matter of housing.

I wish to inform the hon. member that in my latest discussions with the manager of CMHC in the city of North Bay I have found that the response from the public in my riding to the recent amendments to the NHA, including the home assistance plan, has contributed to making that office the busiest it has been for years. It is helping to increase the number of construction starts of homes and apartments in my riding so that we expect there will be an approximate increase of 20 per cent over the housing starts of the past year. I want, further, to indicate that according to the latest estimate there will be up to 250,000 housing starts in the next four years. This is contemplated as continuing because of the encouragement given to the housing market by the progressive policies adopted by this government. The new housing starts that will take place in the next few years and that have taken place since 1968 also point out the untenable position adopted by the mover and seconder of this motion.

If we envisage an increase in housing starts of 250,000 in the next four years, it means that for every four years we will be losing $1 billion in tax revenue, as we have indeed since 1969. When we consider that housing starts since that time have gone up by nearly 10 per cent, we see that in the past four years we have suffered a loss of $1 billion in revenue. When we consider that the total federal budget this year is $18 billion, we see quite clearly the percentage of income and revenue which would be lost as a result of this suggested measure being adopted.

I would suggest that such absence of extra revenue would mean the government would be looking for additional funds in order to assist people who do not have adequate housing. It would not have been able to implement those programs which are now receiving such popular acclaim, and indeed it would have depressed the labour market in the construction field and the construction industry itself, which could have had very serious results.

Mr. Speaker, I wished to say only a few words to set the record straight on those particular issues. I thank you for your attention.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (London West): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that this suggestion recurs frequently. I was at the United Nations in New York last week and discussed this very subject with a friend down there. As hon. members may know, in the United States they are permitted to extend the interest costs on mortgages. He said, "I will trade you. You let me have the $4,000 deduction that you permit people in Canada for the contributions they make to registered retirement savings plans or the $2,500 to registered pension plans. That would do more for me. It would save me taxes in the long run and provide more for retirement." We should not lose sight of that fact, Mr. Speaker. We have that benefit, and our colleagues—

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member permit a question from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)?

Mr. Buchanan: It would be a pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: It is always a pleasure to ask the hon. member a question, and always a pleasure to receive his reply. Would he tell the House the level of income enjoyed by his friend?

Mr. Buchanan: This particular individual was in a substantial income bracket, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: That is why the retirement plan would be so good for him.

Mr. Buchanan: That is true, but anyone in Canada receiving an income of $10,000 a year can take up the $1,600 or $1,800 which is more than is proposed in the motion before us. So in Canada a large income is not needed in order to take advantage of the saving in income tax through a registered savings plan. If we look at the over-all perspective, it is apparent that Canadians enjoy a substantial benefit through their contributions to pension plans even though they are not allowed to extend these savings to mortgage interest.

When the Royal Commission on Taxation thoroughly reviewed the income tax system several years ago, it recommended that the principle of not allowing a deduction for personal or living expenses be retained. It did not recommend a deduction for municipal taxes or mortgage interest. When tax reform was introduced, it was recognized that the encouragement of home ownership was desirable. On the other hand, it was thought best not to deviate from the basic rule regarding deductibility of personal expenses.

The Income Tax Act, therefore, provided two major incentives to home ownership. The first incentive was to allow a taxpayer to make a capital gain on the sale of his home without incurring tax liability. This is something, of course, that is not available to the person who rents an apartment. The second was to continue the practice of not including in the taxpayer's income the economic benefit which he receives from home ownership. This benefit, which is the value of his accommodation, may be looked upon as the return he has received on the capital he has invested. It is interesting to note in passing that other countries, including Great Britain, have added this imputed income to the taxpayer's income for tax purposes in years gone by.

I should like to look at two or three examples of how the hon. member's proposal would work. Let us look, first, at the taxpayer who has an income of $5,000. His federal taxes in 1972 would be $85, and his provincial taxes if he lived in Ontario would be about $26, totalling $111. If he had municipal taxes of $200 and interest payments of $800, it would appear that he would be entitled to a rebate of $1,000. However, the hon. member's motion speaks of a rebate against income tax. The federal government would give him a credit of $85 and his tax bill would be nil. At the same time, because provincial taxes are calculated as a percentage of federal taxes, his provincial tax rate would be nil. The total benefit which the taxpayer received would be only $111, or just over 11 per cent of the expenses in connection with his house, and of this amount $26 would have been contributed by the province in which he lived.

Now let us look at a taxpayer in a higher income bracket who owns his home and has no mortgage. He lives in a very expensive home and the municipal taxes are $1,000 per year. He gets the benefit of a tax deduction of $1,000 from the federal government, and $305 from the provincial government. In effect, he has made a tax-free profit of $305, or 30.5 per cent simply by paying his municipal taxes. These examples demonstrate some key propositions. The rebate would favour the higher income taxpayer over the lower income taxpayer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

TRADE

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON MISSION TO SOVIET UNION AND VISIT TO YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a brief statement about the mission which I led to the U.S.S.R. between October 14 and 19 in connection with the Third Mixed Commission under our intergovernmental agreement on co-operation in the industrial application of science and technology. In addition, I would also like to report that after the mission to Moscow I visited Belgrade to sign the first bilateral trade agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

During my stay in Belgrade I had discussions with a number of senior Yugoslavian officials, including Prime Minister Bijedich, Dr. Vratusha, Vice-President of the Federal Executive Council, and Dr. Ludwiger, the trade minister, on a wide range of questions affecting trade and economic relations between our two countries. Yugoslavia has become a promising market for Canadian manufactured goods and I look forward to further growth in this trade in the future.

These visits are part of a pattern to seek out new and promising trading opportunities for Canadian exporters.

Accompanying me on my visit to the U.S.S.R. were 36 senior Canadian industrialists representing a large number of companies. This is by far the largest delegation of businessmen a Canadian minister has led to the Soviet Union. This initiative on the part of the Canadian government highlights the business thrust of the activities which have been taking place under our agreement with the Soviet Union.

During the visit, Canadian businessmen associated with the eight working groups set up under the intergovernmental agreement held a large number of meetings, over 80, with their Soviet counterparts. We concluded, as page 4 of the protocol makes clear, that there were a number of important specific opportunities already under negotiation that should be continued and, indeed, some of the businessmen of the delegation remained in Moscow to carry out this work. There was a general consensus among the members of the delegation that the work of our mission represented an important step forward in Canada-Soviet trade and economic relations.

The Soviet Union is becoming an increasingly important market for high technology machinery and equipment from western countries. I am convinced that there are significant opportunities for Canadian manufacturers to compete for this business. My department has been making vigorous efforts to ensure that Canadian exporters are placed in the best possible position to take advantage of these opportunities.

In addition to my discussions with L. N. Efremov, First Deputy Chairman of the State Committee for Science and Technology, who led the Soviet delegation to the third meeting of the Mixed Commission, I had the opportunity to meet with the First Deputy Chairman of the Council of Ministers, K. T. Mazurov, and other Soviet ministers and senior officials. In these discussions we agreed that there is substantial scope for expanding and diversifying Canada-Soviet trade.

Pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to place on the table of the House, in both official languages, the protocol which I signed on behalf of the Canadian government on Friday, October 19.

• (1410)

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House is pleased to see the minister back safely and to note the additional groundwork undertaken by him in anticipation of increased trade with the Soviet Union.

We read in an Associated Press despatch from Moscow that although the minister felt solid progress had been made in the talks, a breakthrough had yet to occur. The minister is reported to have said: "It is like building a house. You have to clear the site, design the building and lay a foundation. Perhaps not much shows, but a lot of solid work has been done. The test will be to see what appears above ground in the next two or three years." Like the minister, we shall watch the results with great interest and anticipation.

We note, also, that the minister visited Yugoslavia. We hope he managed to visit Dubrovnik for a couple of days, a favourite spot of many people who travel to that part of the world. Yugoslavia offers interesting possibilities for expanded trade. As a matter of fact, it is possible that the rate of expansion of trade with Yugoslavia may be even greater than with the Soviet Union. This is partially, at least, attributable to the fact that the Yugoslavs have been turning more in the direction of personal initiative, including some private enterprise.

The minister tells us his visit was part of a pattern. We welcome the pattern to the extent that the minister, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and other members of the government visit countries abroad with the idea of establishing better relationships and developing opportunities for trade. We would hope, however, that in doing so the minister and the Prime Minister will not neglect those areas of the world which have traditionally been our major trading partners, in particular, the United States, Britain, Japan, the European Community, and now the Pacific rim countries and South America which offer a tremendous potential to Canadians.

So we hope that in the dying weeks of the present administration—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hellyer: —the Prime Minister and his colleagues will do all they possibly can to repair and invigorate the trade relationships that exist between our country and the established trading nations of the world and to augment our opportunities in the less developed areas as well.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the minister back from his visit to the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia.

I join with the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) in expressing hope that the contacts that have been made so far will soon lead to concrete contractual relationships in terms of orders for goods from our country by the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia. In turn, of course, it is anticipated that such orders would be reciprocated by Canadian orders for goods to be supplied by those countries. The talks are making progress, the minister informs us, but up to this point we have not seen concrete results on either side. I certainly hope we shall see them soon.

There is one problem to which no reference was made either in the minister's statement or in the protocol tabled by the minister, probably for understandable reasons. I refer to the problem of foreign ownership of so much of the sophisticated industrial plant located in this country in relation to making sales to either the Soviet Union or Yugoslavia. It would be interesting to know what proportion of the businessmen who accompanied the minister on this trip were, in fact, representatives of United States-owned or other foreign-owned companies in Canada. It seems to me that if there were a substantial number the results of this trip would not necessarily be of benefit to this country.

We have seen the development of a good rapprochement between the U.S.S.R. and the United States, a cooling down of the high level of heat in terms of the tension that existed between these two countries in the past, with increasing trade talks between them. Therefore the conclusion seems to be rather ominous for us in terms of increasing trade in the precise areas regarding which the minister says the Soviet Union may require exports from the west. Why should Canadian subsidiaries of American companies expect to get orders from the Soviet Union? It seems to me much more likely that United States parent firms of Canadian subsidiaries, either through offering lower prices or by other means, will make sure that contracts go to the United States. This illustrates there is a need to move much more rapidly than the government has indicated it is prepared to in order to regain a greater degree of control over our own industry, particularly advanced, technologically sophisticated industry.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

I welcome the minister's return from his attempts to expand trade with the Soviet bloc countries. In welcoming this initiative I should like the minister to note that since he was away we have increased our deficit with our major trading partner, the United States, in automotive products this year for the first time in three years. The size of this deficit would make look like peanuts by comparison any sales we might obtain from the Soviet Union in the near future. Now that the minister has returned I hope he will come to grips with improving our trading relationship with the United States.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the minister for his trip in the Soviet Union aimed at promoting mutual understanding between our countries and I should like to tell him how hopeful we are for the success of these meetings since, in looking at the terms of agreement that we have been given, we note that these agreements are aimed at advertising Canada and Canadian products. This shows in my opinion that Canada is becoming more mature because instead of exporting only our raw materials to one or two countries like we used to do, we are now proving to other countries that we can profit from technological advances.

As for the meeting with Yugoslavian representatives, we are told that this country has become a promising market for Canadian products. I therefore believe that the time has come for Canada to export manufactured products. If we want Canada to develop, we must stop exporting regularly all our raw materials so that other countries may benefit from them. We are able to manufacture our own products from raw materials here in Canada and we have proved that we are able to export them.

The minister said that he was accompanied by more than 36 Canadian industrialists. I hope that there are many true Canadian industrialists. I am thinking here of the regional industrialists. As everyone knows, in my region we manufacture the biggest slasher-trimmer in the world and we export it all over the world.

I believe that the time has now come for the minister to promote the manufacture of Canadian products.

I therefore congratulate the minister and encourage him in his efforts to conquer world markets.

AIR CANADA

MOVING OF WINNIPEG COMPUTER OPERATIONS TO MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that senior officials of Air Canada assured employees of the company in Winnipeg who are on strike that no transfers of employees to Montreal would be made, and these are taking place, I should like to move:

That the action of Air Canada in moving its computer operations from Winnipeg to Montreal, with the consequent forcing of another group of employees to move from Winnipeg, be referred forthwith to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMPUTER OPERATIONS CENTRE AT WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the House is not prepared to send this matter to committee, perhaps unanimous consent would be given to the making of a declaration by the House. I therefore ask leave under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That in the opinion of this House the government should call on Air Canada to establish the centre for its computer operations at Winnipeg and thus avoid yet another exodus of Air Canada employees from Manitoba.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

PRINTING CONTRACTS IN ONTARIO

Question No. 1,667—Mr. Lawrence:

In relation to the answers to Question Nos. 1034, 1035, 1036 and 1037, what geographical divisions or boundaries are used by the Department of Supply and Services when it desires to award printing contracts in any of the areas contained in the Counties of Northumberland and/or Durham in the Province of Ontario?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): No geographical divisions or boundaries are used in selection of sources in Canada for contracts for nationally used items awarded by the Department of Supply and Services from Ottawa. The opportunities to tender is limited only by the lead time made available by user departments to DSS, which, by limiting the time available for tendering and delivery of finished goods, may restrict the area in which the opportunity to bid can be offered.

Order Paper Questions

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY THE PRIME MINISTER IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS ON JANUARY 8, 1973

Question No. 2,285—Mr. Cossitt:

Did any person or persons employed by, on loan to, or attached to the Office of the Prime Minister assist in writing, compiling or composing in any way the address delivered in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister on January 8, 1973 and, if so (a) what is the identity of such person or persons (b) what is their job designation (c) what is their annual salary?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): (a), (b) and (c)—See reply to Question No. 2,286 answered this day.

SPEECHES AND STATEMENTS MADE BY THE PRIME MINISTER

Question No. 2,286—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What member or members of the staff of the Office of the Prime Minister have any part whatsoever in the writing, compiling or composing in any way speeches or statements made or issued by the Prime Minister?

2. What is the job designation of such a person or persons and what are their annual salaries in each case?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. The responsibility for the compilation and composition of public statements by the Prime Minister varies considerably depending upon the nature of the statement and the occasion of its delivery or release. This work does not always take place entirely within the Prime Minister's office, nor is participation in the work within that office limited to any given person or persons. Contributions are made from time to time by a number of persons according to the information available to them from the pursuit of their normal activities.

2. Only one member of the staff of the Prime Minister's office is engaged solely in activities relating to public statements. He is Alan Grossman, Special Assistant; his annual salary range is $21,000 to $25,000, appointed 1 May 1973.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER—EMPLOYMENT OF MR. ALAN GROSSMAN

Question No. 2,399—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mr. Alan Grossman a member of the Prime Minister's staff or does he in any way assist the Prime Minister with any tasks?

2. What is his exact position and function, what is his salary and on what date did he join the staff?

3. (a) Does Mr. Grossman have any part in preparing speeches or public statements made or issued by the Prime Minister (b) did Mr. Grossman have any part in preparing the address delivered in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister during the recent debate on the bilingualism resolution and, if so, what was his part?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1, 2 and 3. See reply to question 2,286 answered this day.

LETTER CARRIERS UNION OF CANADA—TAKING OF REQUEST FOR SPECIAL LEAVE WITH PAY TO ADJUDICATION

Question No. 2,586—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Did the Treasury Board take the request for special leave with pay, made under Article 23.05 of the collective agreement with the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada by A. Ozuk of Winnipeg, to adjudication and, if so (a) what was the amount involved (b) what was the decision of the adjudicator?

2. (a) What is the per diem fee of the adjudicator plus expenses (b) what was the cost of his transportation to Winnipeg and return (c) what cost was incurred for (i) legal fees (ii) observer's fees (d) what was the total cost of the adjudication?

3. Since the Public Service Staff Relations Act came into effect in 1966, how many appeals between the Treasury Board and the Unions have been made (a) up to April 1, 1972 (b) between April 1, 1972 and March 30, 1973 (c) how many of the latter appeals have been lodged by the Treasury Board?

4. Is it the intention of Treasury Board to appeal this matter further?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): 1. No. Taken to adjudication by A. Ozuk represented by the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada. (a) $30.24; (b) to sustain the grievance and that the employee is entitled to one day of special leave with pay.

2. (a) $180. (b) $84. (c) (i) None; (ii) None. (d) $596.

3. Taking appeals to mean references to adjudication there have been: (a) 586. (b) 162. (c) None.

4. No.

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE—SECRET DOCUMENTS

Question No. 2,602—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Prime Minister or anyone on his behalf distribute, reveal or comment on a document labelled Secret by the Privy Council Office to any or all the Commonwealth leaders or to any members of their delegations who were recently in Ottawa and, if so (a) what was the nature of this document (b) does the government intend to release it publicly or make it available to Members of Parliament?

2. Is it government policy to classify certain documents and surveys as Secret in so far as Members of Parliament and the Canadian public are concerned but not Secret in so far as representatives of foreign governments are concerned?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. In preparation for the meeting of Commonwealth Heads of Government, the government of Canada agreed, at the request of the Commonwealth Secretariat, to prepare a document that could form the basis of discussion about techniques of government. The Secretariat, in accordance with their practice about documents in advance of such meetings, classified the document although the contents as such were not considered confidential by the government of Canada. The document was released publicly on August 9, 1973.

2. There are instances where documentation prepared for use by governments on bilateral and multilateral negotiations, including the Commonwealth and NATO, is given an agreed classification which is observed by participating governments. Classified documents of this nature are not made public.

INFORMATION CANADA—BUDGET

Is it the intention of the government to reduce the size of the budget of Information Canada for the fiscal year 1974-75 and (a) if so, what steps are being taken this year to accomplish that end (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): It would be contrary to government policy to make public the size of a department's budget for the next fiscal year prior to the tabling of Main Estimates for that year.

GOVERNMENT DEPOSITS WITH CHARTERED BANKS

Question No. 2,663—Mr. Stevens:

1. For what reason did Government of Canada deposits with Canadian chartered banks rise from $336 million in July, 1970 to $2,224 million in July, 1973?

2. What interest rate is currently being paid by Canadian chartered banks on such Government of Canada deposits and what was the average rate of interest received and the dollar amount of interest received by the government on such deposits for the six months ended July, 1973 and for each of the years 1970, 1971 and 1972?

3. Does the Bank of Canada pay interest on the $1,900 million currently deposited by the Canadian chartered banks with the Bank of Canada and, if so, what is the rate of interest?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Finance and Supply and Services as follows: 1. Government of Canada deposits with the chartered banks rose from $308 million July 31, 1970 to $2,092 million July 31, 1973. This increase of $1,784 million in Canadian dollar cash balances at chartered banks is accounted for by an increase in unmatured debt of $5,770 million, offset by an aggregate accumulated deficit for the period of $3,927 million and an increase of government deposits in the Bank of Canada of $59 million. These changes may be summarized as follows:

	Accumulated July 31, 1970 to July 31, 1973 ($ millions)
Budgetary deficit	1,102
Non-budgetary deficit	2,825
Cash requirement	3,927
Net change in unmatured debt	5,770
Increase in cash balances	1,843
Opening cash balances at chartered banks	308
	2,151
Less: increase in cash deposit at Bank of Canada	59
Cash deposits chartered banks	2,092

Order Paper Questions

2. The interest rate paid by Canadian chartered banks on government of Canada deposits in the week September 7-13, 1973, was 5.6 per cent per annum. For the six months from January 26 to July 26, 1973, actually 26 weeks, the average rate of interest received was 4.28 per cent and the interest amounted to $43,078,625.14. For the year ended December 31, 1970, the average rate was 5.53 per cent and the amount was $32,443,399; for the year ended December 30, 1971, the average rate was 3.27 per cent and the amount was $41,727,943.57; for the year ended December 28, 1972, the average rate was 3.19 per cent and the amount was $39,519,131.68.

3. No interest is paid on chartered bank deposits with the Bank of Canada.

GOVERNMENT INCENTIVES TO CANADIAN ENTERPRISES FOR ALL PHASES OF INNOVATION IN COMPUTER-COMMUNICATION FIELD

Question No. 2,690—Mr. Stevens:

What incentives have been granted by the government in each of the past three years to Canadian enterprises for all phases of innovation in the computer/communications field, particularly in application software and ancillary equipment development?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): In the past three years the government has granted incentive to Canadian enterprises for all phases of innovation in the computer communications field in the amounts shown below. It should be noted that the sums shown indicate the year of approval. Payment of these sums is scheduled in each case over periods of up to several years. The number of enterprises receiving such grants is shown in parentheses.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—"3,000 PIEDS: LA RICHESSE DES AUTRES"

Question No. 2,698—Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue):

1. What is the director's name of the film produced by National Film Board under the title 3,000 pieds: La richesse des autres (film No. 106-c-0273-019)?

2. What was the total production cost of the film?

3. What are the detailed costs of the film (a) travel expenses to Chile (b) travel expenses for Théo Gagné and the other stars (c) the amounts, if any, paid as fees (d) was René Lévesque paid for his numerous appearances in the film and, if so, how much did he receive (e) the use of a plane to fly over the North West part of Quebec?

4. What is the name of the official who authorized the trip to Chile and the expenses involved?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows: 1. Directors of the NFB film, Richesse des autres: Maurice Bulbulian, Michel Gauthier.

2. Total cost of production: $154,000.

3. (a) Travel expenses to Chile: $10,952.63. (b) Travel expenses for participants in film including Théo Gagné: $2,555.17. (c) Nominal amounts were paid to two participants, Mr. Gosselin and Mr. Provencher. (d) No. The appearances of René Levesque in the film were shot during two public events. (e) $165.

4. Normal procedures were followed for authorizing the production and the specific request for shooting in Chile was approved by the Director of Production (French).

NORTHUMBERLAND FERRIES—EXPENSES INCURRED IN RECENT RAIL STRIKE

Question No. 2,711—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Has the government received a bill from the government of Prince Edward Island for expenses incurred by that government in arranging for maximum utilization of Northumberland Ferries during the course of the recent rail strike and, if so, on what date and in what amount?

2. What has been the response of the government to such presentation by the government of Prince Edward Island?

3. Has the government of Prince Edward Island proffered any suggestions relative to the avoidance of any future cessation of the Borden-Cape Tormentine ferry service and, if so, what was the suggestion and the response of the government?

4. Has the government any plans for preventing the isolation of Prince Edward Island from the national transportation links?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. No, the government has not received a bill from the government of Prince Edward Island for expenses arising out of the utilization of the Northumberland Ferries during the strike.

2. No response by the government was necessary in the absence of any claim.

3. There has been no formal communication between the province of Prince Edward Island and the federal government in this matter.

4. The continuance of alternative routes should guarantee that Prince Edward Island is not completely isolated in the event of future work stoppages.

MOUNT HOPE AIRPORT

Question No. 2,716—Mr. O'Sullivan:

1. From the period October 30, 1972 to September 10, 1973, did the government carry out any improvements or other works at Mount Hope Airport and, if so (a) what was the description and nature of such improvements or other works (b) under the authority and direction of which department or departments was such work done?

2. Were tenders called for such improvements or other works and, if so, were such tenders sealed and, if not, for what reason?

3. To what companies were contracts awarded for such improvements or other works and, in each case (a) what was the value of the contract or contracts awarded to said companies (b) were the tenders submitted by each of the companies awarded contracts the lowest tenders and, if not (i) what were the lowest tenders in each case (ii) by which companies were these tenders submitted?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The federal government did carry out improvements at Mount Hope Airport between October 30, 1972 and September 10, 1973. (a) A contract was called to Strengthen Runway 11-29, Hamilton Airport, Hamilton, Ontario. This contract was to accomplish the following purposes: (i) Runway 11-29—to upgrade by reconstruction the middle section of Runway 11-29 for the taxiing of the Boeing 737 aircraft and resurface the remaining portions for light aircraft up to the DC aircraft category; (ii) Foxtrot Taxi—to upgrade by reconstruction "Foxtrot" taxi for taxiing of the Boeing 737 aircraft; (iii) New Parking Apron—to construct new Parking Apron (190×280′) to accommodate the parking of aircraft up to the Boeing 737 aircraft level. (b) The work was done under the authority and direction of the Ministry of Transport.

2. Public tenders were called for this contract, and in keeping with normal requirements, tenders were sealed.

3. The above contract was awarded to Cayuga Materials and Construction, Cayuga, Ontario on June 27, 1973 (tenders had closed on June 26, 1973). (a) The value of the Contract was $441,730.05. (b) This was the lowest tender. (c) The only other tenders received were: Dineen Construction Ltd., 795 Main St. W., Hamilton, Ontario., $448,-636.55. Dufferin Construction Co., 1925 Barton St. E., Hamilton, Ontario., $508,188.48.

EXPO '74 SPOKANE, WASHINGTON—GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Question No. 2,718—Mr. Schumacher:

1. How much was expended by the government on architectural, consultant or other fees for the purpose of determining the cost of erecting a pavilion at Expo '74 in Spokane, Washington?

2. How much was expended by the government on obtaining designs for such participation at Expo '74 in Washington?

3. How much was expended by the government on salaries of individuals regarding (a) the proposed participation (b) site investigation (c) other, in relation to Expo '74 in Washington?

4. How much was expended by the government on travel and accommodation for individuals in relation to the proposed Canadian participation at Expo '74 in Washington?

5. Was Canada required to pay any cost or a penalty to the organizers of Expo '74 as a result of the decision to withdraw support and, if so, what was the amount of such cost or penalty?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Nil. In a special category World Exposition such as Expo '74 all pavilion structures are erected by the organizer.

2. $52,564.35 to Information Canada/Expositions (for research, project administration, design of pavilion improvements, exhibit and landscaping proposals) and $2,753.12 to the National Film Board (for a film storyboard). As stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House on September 13, there will be a revised Canadian participation at Expo '74. The bulk of the expenditures remain relevant.

3. These activities go hand in hand; thus it is not possible to isolate costs between (a), (b) and (c). Several officers have been working part time on plans for Canada's participation in Expo '74.

4. $5,185.44, including $2,203.53 on behalf of Information Canada/Expositions technicians. The expenditures enumerated in 2 and 4 include the cost of briefings and negotiations with the provinces in respect to their participation.

5. There was no penalty payable to Expo '74.

PROPOSED AIRPORT—SURVEY OF BIRD FLYWAYS

Question No. 2,733—Mr. Stevens:

What was the nature of the survey related to the proposed airport in Pickering that required government employees to count birds flying past the moon (a) how long did the employees take to count such birds (b) what was the cost to the government (c) what was the result?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): After the announcement of the site for the New Toronto International Airport, certain statements and allegations were made concerning the location of the airport and its relationship to bird flyways in this area. In particular, it was stated that the effect of birds on the operation of the airport had not been considered adequately and that they would pose a serious hazard to safe flight operations. Assessment of this factor had in fact been made during the site selection process. However, it was subsequently felt that a much more detailed analysis was required in view of the allegations made by residents of the area. Accordingly, the Ministry of Transport engaged a well qualified environmental research firm to do a detailed ornithological study and we assume that this is the study in question. The study commenced in September of 1972 and will conclude in December of this year. This length of time was required in order that a detailed analysis of nesting habits, diurnal flight patterns and seasonal migration statistics could be assembled. The total cost of the study by the firm of LGL (Environmental Research Associates) Limited will be approximately $253,000. The results to date tend to confirm that the probability of bird hazards affecting aircraft operations in the area of the proposed airport is typical of that which might be expected in this part of southern Ontario and that no undue hazards will be presented. The study is, however, continuing in order to assess the fall migration period.

Order Paper Questions

AVERAGE EARNINGS OF NON-FARM WORKERS

Question No. 2,746—Mr. Stevens:

In each year 1967 to 1973 to date, what were the average (a) weekly earnings after taxes and allowing for inflation, for non-farm workers expressed in 1967 dollars and assuming a family of four (b) personal debts of non-farm workers in Canada expressed in 1967 dollars (c) personal income taxes paid by non-farm workers expressed in 1967 dollars and assuming a family of four?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Statistics Canada and the Department of National Revenue (Taxation) as follows: (a) Statistics Canada does not collect the information as requested, but does produce data on annual average family income before taxes for selected years, for 4-person families whose major source of income came from wages and salaries (would exclude most but not all farmers).

Year	Average Income
	Current $	1967 $
1967	8,551	8,551
1969	9,930	9,131

[1]Statistics Canada does not produce data on weekly family income since such factors as seasonal employment make this difficult to calculate accurately.

(b) Average personal debt for all Canadian non-farm families and unattached individuals was estimated to be $1,040 in the Spring of 1970 or in terms of 1967 dollars, $930. Data for other years are not available. (c) Statistics are not kept in such a way as to make possible a meaningful response to this question.

GRANTS TO NATIONAL SPORTS GOVERNING BODIES

Question No. 2,756—Mr. Marshall:

Of the $270,820 in grants to 15 national sports governing bodies, what is the breakdown of the amount of the grant to the (a) Canadian Amateur Baseball Association (b) Canadian Federation of Amateur Equities (c) Canadian Cycling Association (d) British Commonwealth Games Association (e) Canadian Women's Field Hockey Association (f) Canadian Association of Amateur Oarsmen (g) Canadian Amateur Football Association (h) Canadian Amateur Hockey Association (i) Canadian Horse Council (j) Canadian Amateur Synchronized Swimming Association (k) Canadian Water Ski Association (l) Canadian Curling Association (m) Sports Federation of Canada (n) Canadian Amateur Diving Association (o) Canadian Ladies Lawn Bowling Council?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

	Association	Amount
(a)	Canadian Amateur Baseball Association	$ 69,615
(b)	Canadian Federation of Amateur Aquatics	41,086
(c)	Canadian Cycling Association	34,936
(d)	British Commonwealth Games Association	30,000
(e)	Canadian Women's Field Hockey Association	27,800
(f)	Canadian Association of Amateur Oarsmen	21,065
(g)	Canadian Amateur Football Association	18,088
(h)	Canadian Amateur Hockey Association	6,755
(i)	Canadian Horse Council	5,955
(j)	Canadian Amateur Synchronized Swimming Association	4,375
(k)	Canadian Water Ski Association	3,463
(l)	Canadian Curling Association	2,950
(m)	Sports Federation of Canada	1,787
(n)	Canadian Amateur Diving Association	1,600
(o)	Canadian Ladies Lawn Bowling Association	1,325
	Total	$270,800

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—SEPARATION OF AIR ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION DIVISION FROM OTHER BRANCHES

Question No. 2,757—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is it the intention of the government to separate the Air Accident Investigation Division of the Department of Transport from other branches of the Department and, if so (a) on what date (b) for what reasons?

2. Is the Division subject to scrutiny and possible interference from other branches of the Department?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The Accident Investigation Division of the Canadian Air Transportation Administration has been separated from other branches since its formation in early 1958.

2. No, because it reports directly to the Director General, Civil Aeronautics of the Canadian Air Transportation Administration.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—REPORTS OF AIR ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION DIVISION

Question No. 2,758—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What other agencies of the government than the Air Accident Investigation Division of the Department of Transport have access to the reports of AAID prior to their being published?

2. What authority do these agencies have to make any alterations, however significant, to such reports before they are made public?

3. In how many instances, in the past two years, have such alterations been made and for what reasons?

4. Is it the policy of the government that agencies that are charged with the investigation of accidents can function best when they are subject to various types of outside pressure?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. None. However, legal counsel to the Canadian Air Transportation Administration is consulted to ensure that the reports drafted by the Accident Investigation Division do not contain any drafting ambiguities from a legal point of view.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

4. No.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—AIR ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION DIVISION

Question No. 2,759—Mr. Forrestall:

In what specific ways is the Air Accident Investigation Division of the Department of Transport guaranteed the total independence in its task of (a) investigating air accidents (b) publishing full reports of its investigations?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): (a) A guarantee of total independence is not possible irrespective of the organizational location of the Accident Investigation Division, because in all major accidents the investigation is conducted by a team of experts from the aircraft industry, air carrier industry, research laboratories, Ministry of Transport, and air associations such as the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association. Further, the Accident Investigators of the Accident Investigation Division are delegated authority by the minister to investigate aircraft accidents in accordance with Air Regulation 829 and this authority is not delegated to any other specialists within the Department of Transport. (b) The minister has no obligation under the Aeronautics Act to publish accident reports but accident reports are published in the interests of communicating the findings to the aviation community for the improvement of aviation safety.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—AIR ACCIDENT INVESTIGATORS

Question No. 2,760—Mr. Forrestall:

What steps (a) have been taken in the past two years (b) will be taken in the immediate future to ensure that the Air Accident Investigators are so placed, organizationally, that the public and international community can have full confidence in their ability to produce full, impartial and usefully objective reports?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): (a) None. (b) The Canadian Air Transportation Administration is planning to introduce a review procedure for specific categories of accidents to enable the aviation community to examine and comment on the findings of the reports prepared by the Accident Investigation Division.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—INDEPENDENT TRANSPORTATION ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION BOARD

Question No. 2,761—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Is it the intention of the government to set up an independent transportation accident investigation board, fully funded, to provide the type of impartiality required by the industry and the international community and, if so, what progress has been made in such considerations?

2. To the knowledge of the government, has such an independent transportation accident investigation board been set up in the United Kingdom, the United States and virtually every other government outside the Soviet Bloc?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. An independent study was ordered by the minister to examine the need for an independent transportation accident investigation body and the report is expected in the near future.

2. Accident investigation boards have been set up with some degree of independence in the United Kingdom and the United States but the department has no knowledge of similar action by other states.

UIC—DISQUALIFIED CLAIMANTS IN DARTMOUTH-HALIFAX AREA

Question No. 2,836—Mr. Forrestall:

1. How many UIC claimants were disqualified from receipt of benefits in the Dartmouth-Halifax area between January and June 30, 1973?

2. Of those (a) how many appealed to the board of referees (b) what percentage were (i) successful (ii) unsuccessful?

3. Of those rejected by the board of referees (a) how many appealed to the umpire (b) what percentage were (i) successful (ii) unsuccessful?

4. What is the national average for successful appeals to the (a) board of referees (b) umpire?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Commission does not collect information of the nature requested on a constituency basis. Therefore, we are supplying information which pertains to the whole Province of Nova Scotia. 1. 21,807.

2. (a) 1,121. (b) (i) 20.8 per cent; (ii) 79.2 per cent.

3. (a) 2. (b) (i) 50 per cent; *(ii) not applicable.

*NOTE: One decision outstanding.

4. (a) 15.6 per cent. (b) 34.4 per cent.

SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA EXPENDITURES

Question No. 3,007—Mr. Mitges:

What amount was spent for the Science Council of Canada for the fiscal years 1971-72 and 1972-73?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): In reply to Question 3,007 by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges), following are the expenditures of the Science Council of Canada for fiscal years 1971-72 and 1972-73: 1971-72, $1,184,740.97; 1972-73, $1,339,368.68.

GOVERNMENT POLICY COVERING RENTAL OF AUTOMATIC TYPEWRITERS

Question No. 2,205—Mr. Forrestall:

What is the general policy of the government covering the rental of automatic typewriters for sending form letters and have they ever been used in giving responses to Members of Parliament and, if so, on what occasions?

Return tabled.

RENTAL OF AUTOMATIC TYPEWRITERS

Question No. 2,206—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What departments or agencies of government employ or have employed automatic typewriters to type form responses to inquiries, on an intermitent basis or on a continuing basis, for each year since 1966 inclusive?

2. What is the rental cost per month for such machines?

3. How many such machines were rented and for what periods, as of April 30, 1973?

4. What, to date, has been the total cost of renting such machines?

5. Are any such machines currently in use in or for offices of Ministers of the Crown and, if so, for what Ministers?

6. How many letters can such machines put out in a day, fully utilized?

*REMOVAL OF MINERAL RESOURCES NORTH OF 60TH

Question No. 2,482—Mr. Forrestall:

Does the government have contingency plans to secure for Canadian interests and Canadian ships the exclusive right for removal of mineral resources north of the 60th parallel and, if so (a) what are they (b) how quickly can they be implemented?

Return tabled.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Question No. 2,664—Mr. Stevens:

1. Since its inception, what was the percentage change for each year from the preceding year in the cost of living index?

2. What would be the current All-items Consumer Price Index if calculated from 1913 to date expressed in terms of 1949 equalling 100?

3. What was the All-item Consumer Price Index, if calculated from 1913 to date, expressed in terms of 1949 equalling 100, as of January 1953, 1958, 1963, 1968 and 1973 and what was the percentage change from the preceding five year period for each such period?

4. What would be the current Consumer Price Index for each of (a) food (b) shelter (c) services excluding shelter (d) goods other than food, if calculated from 1913 to date expressed in terms of 1949 equalling 100?

5. What was the Consumer Price Index for each of (a) food (b) shelter (c) services excluding shelter (d) goods other than food, it calculated from 1913 to date expressed in terms of 1949 equalling 100, as of January 1953, 1958, 1963, 1968 and 1973 and what was the percentage change from the preceding five year period for each such period?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED NATIONS REQUEST THAT CANADA CONTRIBUTE LOGISTICS ELEMENT TO MIDDLE EAST PEACE FORCE—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs based on the report that the Secretary General of the United Nations has officially asked Canada for a contribution to the Middle East peace force. Can the minister advise as to the nature and extent of the contribution asked for from this country and can he indicate the government's response to such request?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm, as I announced last night after receiving confirmation of a request from the Secretary General late yesterday afternoon, that he has asked Canada to contribute to the logistics back-up for a United Nations force in the Middle East.

Immediately upon receiving such request officers were sent to New York from the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs to ascertain exactly the nature of the assignment that was contemplated. These officers are still there. We do not yet have details and therefore no reply has yet been sent.

Mr. Macquarrie: Is the minister in a position at this stage to indicate even in rough terms the number of personnel required and whether it is the intention of the government in this case to bring before the House an approving resolution following the example of his illustrious predecessor, Mr. Pearson, with reference to the Cyprus force?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, when a decision is made by the government we will announce it. If the commitment is of the nature of the past for which parliamentary approval was sought, the precedents will be followed.

REQUEST THAT APPROVAL OF HOUSE BE SOUGHT FOR PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN ELEMENT IN MIDDLE EAST PEACE FORCE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the minister may have intended to give an assurance but I would like him to give an unequivocal assurance to the House that the approval of the House will be sought for any decision to commit Canada to participate in a peacekeeping force in the Middle East by way of logistics support or otherwise?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if our commitment is of the same general nature, for example, as in 1956—and it may well be—certainly I would bring forward a resolution seeking the approval of parliament. But until we know exactly what it is we are being asked to do and the nature of our response as to how far we can fulfil this commitment, I cannot give as categorical an answer as the hon. gentleman might wish.

Mr. Brewin: Can the minister give an undertaking that before any troops or other personnel are actually dispatched there will be consultation with the House?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the constitutional practice followed in the past is that the government makes its decision and, if it is of a nature that seems to require parliamentary approval, parliamentary approval is sought of the decision made by the government, not in advance of the decision and not in advance even of its implementation.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF BANK OF CANADA ACT TO PERMIT LONG-TERM LOANS TO PROVINCES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Has his department or the government received any request by the provinces to amend the Bank of Canada's charter to allow long-term borrowing from the Bank by the provinces?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Not recently, Mr. Speaker, but in the past several provinces, including Quebec, made proposals to that effect from time to time.

ENERGY

OIL—IMPACT OF VENEZUELAN PRICE INCREASE ON PRICES OF PRODUCTS IN CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister give us an assurance that his visit to Venezuela and the increase in the tax reference price of oil by Venezuela of some 56 per cent were purely coincidental? Was he given any notification in advance of this increase in the tax reference price of oil and, further, what in the view of the government will be the impact in Canada of this move in respect of the prices of petroleum products here?

● (1430)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my visit to Venezuela, which took place two weeks ago today, was as I recall, the day before the Arab states decided to make their approximately 70 per cent increase in the tax posted price. The Venezuelan decision, as I understand the official statement, was really a following up by Venezuela of the Arab increase to get the same price on the world market for all customers as the Arabs are getting.

Mr. Nielsen: They saw you coming.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The impact on the Canadian market, regrettably, will be substantial. Approximately 63 per cent or just under 60 per cent of the supply to the eastern Canadian market comes from Venezuela, and it is anticipated that this increase in cost will find its way into the Canadian market within a month or so.

POSSIBLE BANNING BY SAUDI ARABIA OF OIL SHIPMENTS TO CANADA—SUGGESTED FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETING TO DEVELOP CONTINGENCY PLAN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question relating to some of the other oil that is imported into Canada. Has the minister yet been able to find out whether Saudi Arabia has ordered the suspension of shipments by Aramco for delivery to Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I think this is a situation where no news is good news. We have had no word of any additional interruptions to the one I mentioned the other day. My understanding at the moment is that Aramco will continue to ship to Canadian customers.

Mr. Stanfield: I hope the minister's optimism with regard to Saudi Arabia is justified and that he will not be tempted to visit that country himself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the increase in the price of imported oil to be expected now, will the minister arrange for an immediate federal-provincial meeting with the provincial ministers or governments for consultation to develop a supply and pricing contingency plan for petroleum products in Canada this winter? Will the minister face this emergency situation by taking this step?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am not sure whether a general meeting of ministers would be the appropriate basis for doing this. We have already had discussions with a number of provincial governments in this regard and of course they will be very much involved in the contingency plans we are developing.

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING PETROLEUM PRODUCT PRICES IN LIGHT OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF VENEZUELAN OIL—DURATION OF FREEZE ON WESTERN CRUDE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the 56 per cent increase in the price of Venezuelan oil landed at Montreal and the resultant request by the oil industry for an increase in gasoline prices, will the minister tell the House what pricing policy the government proposes to follow in view of these events? More particularly, I want to ask the minister whether an increase in petroleum product prices will be approved by the government and, if so, by how much, and will the present freeze on western Canadian crude be maintained at least until January 30?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should indicate to the hon. gentleman that the requests for a price change which have been referred to in the House and which are now before the government are related to increases in the Venezuelan taxation at the end of August and at the end of September. The announcement of this weekend would, of course, not be covered by any decision which is now before the government. It is before the government at present and I hope to be able to clarify the situation a little later this week. At the moment, of course, we are still in a market situation where we have the September 4 price maintained both in the east and west sections of the Canadian market. The request has been with regard to a price change in the eastern section only.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the minister's public statement that after January 30 the price of western crude will be based on the landed price of offshore oil in Montreal, and in view of the fact that by that time the Montreal price may be higher than the present Chicago price, with a resultant windfall for Canadian oil producers, what criteria does the government propose to adopt to establish the posted price for oil produced in western Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Perhaps I can remind the hon. gentleman that the price in Chicago will be based on the competitive price of imported crude there, so our anticipation is that the Chicago price will remain above the Montreal price. The government has not taken any decision to extend price control beyond the January 30 period, and the price basically will be determined on the basis of the criteria I mentioned in the House last week.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on a supplementary and then the hon. member for York-Simcoe on a supplementary.

OIL—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that if a national petroleum corporation were established this mechanism could be used to pool oil supplies in Canada and to standardize prices, can the minister give the House any assurance that he hopes to establish such a mechanism by January 30?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I think it is a little difficult to suggest that it can standardize prices. Whether it be a national corporation or subsidiaries of the internationals which are importing oil, they have to meet the prices set by foreign governments. The decision regarding a corporation, as I have said a number of times, is before the government, but it does not appear at the moment that there will be an early announcement on this.

EFFECT OF REDUCTION IN TANKER RATES ON PRICE OF OIL

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question also is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. With world marginal tanker rates having plunged by 50 per cent over the weekend, resulting in oil transportation costs of up to $2 per barrel of oil being saved in transportation from the Middle East to this continent, would the minister inform the House if our tanker delivery arrangements are such that we can take advantage of these savings to offset world prices?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The arrangements, of course, will be between the different companies, but I can say, in agreement with the hon. member, that of course the Montreal price is made up of a combination of the basic price of oil plus the tanker price, and any drop in the tanker price will ameliorate the effect of any price increase.

Mr. Stevens: I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Can he at least inform us, in view of this uncertain world situation where certain oil costs are rising while other costs such as transportation are falling, that he will not permit a retail price increase in gasoline or fuel until the companies are in a position to state their actual cost position?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is the position we have taken, and one of the reasons for the delay is to determine the actual cost increase since the September 4 announcement.

INDUSTRY

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO SMALL AND MEDIUM SIZE COMPANIES TO FORM CONSORTIA FOR EXPORT PURPOSES

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Before the minister left for Russia a press release was issued from his office stating that financial assistance will be provided to small and medium size companies to form a consortia for the export market. Can the minister explain to the House what his definition is of small and medium size companies as there are different definitions in the Small Businesses Loans Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question asked in those terms is not in order. I am sure the hon. member will agree that to ask the minister to give a definition of a word used in such circumstances is hardly in order. Perhaps the question might be asked in some other way or in other terms to make it acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

Mr. Hellyer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the minister can tell us the cut-off point for the size of companies, and at the same time could he explain the percentage of Canadian ownership required in manufacturing concerns in order to qualify?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is no provision with respect to the percentage of Canadian ownership in order to qualify. As to the specific cut-off point, I cannot assist the hon. member. Each case will be looked at on its own merits. Clearly the emphasis of the program is on small and medium size Canadian companies rather than on large ones, those that can support their own marketing operations externally.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister assure the House that in refining the regulations as he goes along he will make every possible effort to make sure that the major benefit from this new program goes to struggling Canadian companies rather than to multinational corporations which have benefited from many of the government's projects?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, this program is organized to support the Canadian export efforts of Canadian firms.

FOOD PRICES

STEPS TO ASSURE DECREASE IN WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX PASSED ON TO CONSUMERS—LAYING OF CHARGES INVOLVING MERCHANDISING IRREGULARITIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact the wholesale price index released today by Statistics Canada shows a slight decrease in the price of food, what steps is he taking to ensure that these decreases are being passed on to consumers, particularly in view of a growing body of opinion which seems to indicate the contrary?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this parliament has not given me the authority to control prices, but I, my colleagues, and all members of the House are certainly going to be interested in what retailers do to see that this welcome reduction in the wholesale price index is reflected in retail prices.

Mr. McGrath: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether charges are being laid with regard to the 100 cases of merchandising irregularities involving double pricing and other practices brought to the minister's attention by Mrs. Plumptre and her posse? Are charges in fact being laid?

Mr. Gray: Work is being completed on the files to see which of them, in light of further investigation and on the advice of the law officers of the Crown, provide sufficient evidence for charges to be laid. I expect to have this work completed shortly.

TRADE

CAUSE OF DEFICIT IN AUTOMOTIVE TRADE WITH UNITED STATES—ACTION TO INCREASE INVESTMENT IN CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. While the minister was away Statistics Canada reported a net deficit of $68 million in automotive trade between Canada and the United States for the first six months of this year. Considering our surplus during the same period last year, this represents a turnaround of some $240 million in trade in favour of the United States. Have the minister's officials looked into the causes of this significant shift in trade in favour of the United States? If so, will he inform the House what is the main cause?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have looked at the figures, we have looked at some of the underlying causes, and quite clearly the reason is that there has been a quite unprecedented demand on the part of Canadians for North American made cars.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact that answer is largely spurious but, more to the point, in view of the statistics for the last three years which show that during that period more than 95 per cent of the investment in that industry occurred on the American side of the border and hence is likely the principal cause of this shift in trade, can the minister inform the House what he and his officials have done about getting commitments from the automotive industry to ensure that we get our share of investment on this side of the border?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which we have under review on a continuing basis with the automobile companies.

Mr. Broadbent: Can the minister inform the House whether or not the trade talks between Canada and the United States on the auto pact as well as other matters have completely broken down, and is it now government policy to allow the Americans to deal with their grievances by undermining the trade pact through permitting over investment in this industry on the American side of the border?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there has been no breakdown in discussions with the United States with respect to potential improvements in the automotive pact to my knowledge.

GRAIN

PROVISION OF ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF OATS FOR ONTARIO LIVESTOCK FEEDERS AND DEALERS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Recently livestock feeders and feed dealers in Ontario have been unable to get feed grains from the Canadian Wheat Board, particularly oats, and have not been assured of a continuity of supply during the winter. Would the minister look into this situation and have it rectified at an early date?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the Canadian Wheat Board about the supply of oats. The rail strike and the congestion that followed from it have left supplies of oats in a difficult position. The Board is considering the steps that are required to ensure adequate supplies.

Mr. McKinley: From his discussions with the Canadian Wheat Board can the minister say how far away is the time before he can promise supplies of oats to feeders and dealers?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that depends on the solutions which the board considers to be suitable to deal with the problem. I will try to obtain further details about the steps the board now proposes to take and inform the hon. member.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE IN WESTERN ONTARIO

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Recognizing the obvious fact that up to the moment gasoline prices have increased substantially and that in fact additional increases are inevitable, will the minister, as Canada's leading transportation figure, not the presidents of the CNR and CPR, order the re-initiation of railway passenger service in western Ontario as recommended by 20 members of this House, and in other areas of Canada as it becomes feasible?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the opposition recognizes the effective way in which the hon. member has put his question to me. I can assure him that this is a very serious problem. This week, next week or very soon I expect a report from the Canadian Transport Commission, since it was agreed that the CTC should look at the matter. After that we will have a tri-level meeting with the government of Ontario and the municipalities involved so that we can try to solve this problem which, due to the price of gasoline and fuel, is becoming more and more important.

REQUEST FOR EMBARGO ON IMPORT OF FAT CATTLE AND DRESSED BEEF FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the farm input price index rose 7.3 per cent in the third quarter of this year, will the minister impose an embargo on American overfat cattle and dressed beef flooding the Canadian market?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact I am in almost constant communication with the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, and this is one of the problems we are discussing.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VENUE OF NEXT LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the statement made in Halifax on Friday last by the Minister of the Environment that it would not be possible to hold the Law of the Sea Conference at Santiago, Chile, next April, and in light of the importance of this conference to Canada, will the minister advise if an alternative host country has been secured and whether there has been any change in the dates of the conference?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, discussions are still going on in New York and elsewhere on this question. No decision has yet been reached on an alternative site to Santiago which, I agree, is hardly likely to be suitable for this conference. We looked at the question of whether or not Canada might offer the conference the opportunity of meeting here. However, we came to the conclusion that this would not advance the cause of Canada, that it would be better for us not to be in the chair but to be able to advance our own views. In any event, I believe that the alternative site preferred is likely to be in the same general area, namely, South America.

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR ALLEGED DELAY IN GIVING APPOINTMENTS TO CANADIANS WISHING TO SPONSOR ENTRY OF RELATIVES

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact it takes a minimum of one month to get an appointment for Canadians who wish to sponsor relatives for immigration to this country, can he inform the House of the reason for this long delay?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member is referring to applications made from overseas posts. I can inform the House that applications from abroad are up some 30 per cent, partly resulting from the fact that our economic situation in Canada is improving rapidly and partly by virtue of the fact that we have cut off landed immigrant applications from people within Canada. We are doing our best to cope with these increased applications but inevitably, until we can supply further resources to the posts involved, there will be delays in processing in light of the increased volume.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): May I ask the minister if it is a fact that directives have gone from the Department of Manpower and Immigration instructing district offices throughout the country to give preferential treatment to illegal immigrants who surfaced during the recent 60-day amnesty? Could this be the real reason for the present delay?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, most certainly, during the period of the adjustment of status program, most of our resources and facilities were devoted to that crash program. I make no apology for that. I am afraid that this may have resulted in other delays. However, that program is over now; it is not being extended. I think we are settling back to normal.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, a further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary, then the hon. member for York West on another supplementary and then the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would answer the question? Are they or are they not getting preferential treatment over legal immigrants to this country?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the answer, as far as I understand the question which I thought I had answered, is no.

SITUATION WITH RESPECT TO APPLICATIONS FROM CHILE

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary to the minister in reference to inquiries regarding delays connected with immigration applications from foreign countries. Can the minister say what the situation is at this point with respect to applications from Chile since the overthrow of the Allende government?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have had information as recently as this morning from the United Nations High Commission for Refugees indicating that, according to their estimate, there are some 3,000 people who may wish to leave Chile. They have positively identified 2,017 of these and have declared 1,175 as refugees according to the UN protocol. Only 30 of those have expressed a desire to come to Canada, and we are processing and treating these as a top priority. We have an indication that perhaps up to 70 will seek Canadian immigration, and we will certainly give them top priority as well.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE BANNING BY SAUDI ARABIA OF OIL SHIPMENTS TO CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to Saudi Arabia. Taking note of the view of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that no news is good news but recognizing also the desire of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to pursue a more active diplomacy, may I ask him whether he has succeeded in making contact yet through some ambassador with the government of Saudi Arabia to check out the report which he indicated last week he was seeking to do?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have now made initial contacts with all the Arab oil countries.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the minister what word he has received with regard to the views of Saudi Arabia on Aramco shipping oil to Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the information we have is of two kinds. First, there is no indication that oil to Canada is to be boycotted. Second, on the contrary, the initial reaction has been to express doubt that Canada would be subject to the boycott, given the positive relations that Canada has maintained with the Arab states.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether Canada yet has an accredited representive in Saudi Arabia?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Questions

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBLE EXEMPTION OF IROQUOIS INDIANS WISHING TO MOVE TO CANADA FROM HAVING TO APPLY FOR LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that Iroquois Indians born in the United States must now apply for landed immigrant status when moving to Canada, that regulation being contrary to the traditional and historic rights of the Iroquois, is the minister considering changing the new regulations so that the Iroquois confederacy will be exempt from this regulation of last November 30?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think this question could be more appropriately referred to my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I can say we have not, so far as I know, any intention of recognizing the Jay Treaty and therefore, Indians or other people born in other countries who wish to become Canadians will have to apply in the usual manner.

Mr. Blackburn: Does the minister intend to issue deportation orders against those Iroquois Indians living in Canada who entered several years ago without going through the regular process of applying for immigrant status?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we would examine the circumstances in light of what I said in the House the other day about compassionate treatment in some of the cases, with regard to the length of time that this has been a traditional pattern. We will certainly look at the possibility of exercising my discretion under the act, but we will not treat Indians either worse or better than other people in the same circumstances.

Mr. Barnett: A supplementary—

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys, and in due course the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. At the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST THAT BILL C-125 BE WITHDRAWN

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. Before posing my question may I extend to him my congratulations on the honour paid him Thursday night in Halifax by the Prime Minister, members of the cabinet, other members of his party and others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Say it in Gaelic.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Muir: The Prime Minister suggests that I say it in Gaelic. I doubt that the translators would be able to interpret what I would say. The minister was congratulated on the twentieth anniversary of his election to the House. I think he deserves congratulations.

In view of the continuing difficulties being experienced by those, particularly in the Atlantic provinces, who have truly legitimate claims for unemployment insurance benefits in receiving such benefits, would the leader of the House give us his assurance that Bill C-125 will be cremated without ceremony and not brought back before the House?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, before replying directly to the hon. member's question, may I thank him for his kind remarks and for the telegram which he sent to the dinner. It was read to great applause that evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the form of burial will be, but it will be fully parliamentary.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has a supplementary to the previous question and also the hon. member for Hamilton West. We will attempt to dispose of these supplementaries as soon as possible and then recognize other hon. members who have new questions.

INDIANS—REJECTION OF JAY TREATY BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Before I ask it, perhaps I might be allowed to add my word of congratulation to the President of the Privy Council as one who was elected at the same time as a rookie Member of Parliament and who comes from another island.

I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister arising out of the questions asked by the hon. member for Brant. Can the Prime Minister tell us when and under what circumstances the government of Canada has rejected the validity of application of the Jay Treaty, which affects the arrangements between Canada and the United States so far as the movement of people of Indian ancestry is concerned?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that question should be asked at this time. The hon. member might place the question on the order paper or, if there is urgency, it might be raised at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Barnett: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REASONS FOR DELAY BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE IN MAKING SECOND REPORT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister responsible for manpower and immigration, and particularly unemployment insurance. Can the minister advise the House as to what reasons have been given by the advisory council to the Unemployment Insurance Commission for the unacceptable delay in filing their second report, which apparently is extremely important to the minister because of the criteria set? Is there any reason for this unusual delay?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have been in almost constant communication with the chairman of the Unemployment Insurance Commission Advisory Committee. He tells me that he has been discussing this matter with both parties on the Committee. I say "both parties" advisedly, because four members are representative of union and four are representative of management groups. I believe the problem is that there is not agreement on the report that they should tender. I have indicated to him that if they cannot make a unanimous report, to please give us even a divided report so we can examine it, table it, and get on with the job.

FISHERIES

ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN AFFECTED BY STORM LAST JUNE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister now indicate, and I ask him as earnestly as possible to do so, when the fishermen of eastern Canada can expect an answer as to what assistance they can expect from this government in helping to restore their fishing capabilities which were so severely affected by the storm last June? I ask this question of the Minister of Finance because the Minister of the Environment indicated that he is now seized of jurisdiction in this matter.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government is actively considering a formula for providing compensation to fishermen for storm damage, and the appropriate announcement will be made soon by the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries.

INDUSTRY

COPPER—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT INQUIRY TO SECURE DOMESTIC PRICE REDUCTION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact the continual increase in copper prices, particularly since January, 1973, is causing a substantial strain on the electrical industry, the result of which can be predicted as being disastrous for many electrical manufacturers, will the minister launch an immediate investigation with the producers of copper with a view to holding and/or reducing their prices to more realistic levels when dealing in the domestic market?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my officials are in contact with the copper producers on a regular basis. It may be of some interest to the hon. member to know that Canadian copper prices are significantly lower than the LME price which prevails internationally but not on the North American continent.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

INQUIRY AS TO WEDDING GIFT FOR PRINCESS ANNE

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. It arises from this government's newfound affection for the monarchy. Can the Prime Minister advise what the government will be presenting to Her Royal Highness Princess Anne as a wedding gift so that the Canadian people, on whose behalf the gift will be sent, may be assured of its suitability?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question might place the Chair in an embarrassing procedural position. Perhaps the Prime Minister might be allowed to reply, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should, before replying, be inclined to ask the hon. member on what his premise is based.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the attention of hon. members there are just two or three minutes before the end of the question period. Before getting into a debate on this question, the hon. member might like to follow the advice implicit in my comment.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NORTHERN ONTARIO—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT FOR DEVELOPMENT—DEGREE OF CO-OPERATION BETWEEN GOVERNMENTS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the answer given by the minister in the House in September, 1973, that an announcement would be made within a few weeks or a month with regard to development in northern Ontario, and since it is now over a month, can the minister inform the House when he now intends to announce such a strategy?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think I have explained on a number of occasions that work is proceeding on a number of specific undertakings in northern Ontario but that these will be implemented co-incident with the signing of a general development agreement with the province of Ontario. It is the working out of the general development agreement that is taking considerable time. I can say, however, that in the meantime quite a number of incentives have been granted in parts of northern Ontario in recent weeks.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of Premier William Davis' statement in northern Ontario this past weekend that the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can ask the question directly without basing it on a statement made outside the House under circumstances such as those referred to by the hon. member. We are running short of time. The hon. member may ask a brief supplementary. I will then recognize a few other members before calling orders of the day.

Mr. Rodriguez: I will rephrase my question. In view of the denial by provincial officials that there is such co-operation going on between the two departments, will the minister inform the House whether such meetings have in fact been taking place?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, obviously they have been taking place. If there is not co-operation it certainly is not our fault.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: This is the first I have heard of that particular comment. I find it surprising because most of the comments are that we have been working together quite successfully.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

EXCESSIVE USE OF LIGHTS IN EXTERNAL AFFAIRS BUILDING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the report that the minister very commendably returned to his office and worked hard and late last night, and in view of the energy shortage, did the minister make certain all the lights in that giant energy consuming building were out before he left?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, but I made sure that during my absence I was kept constantly in touch with the departmental officials working long and hard during that weekend. They needed some light.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister seriously take the matter of leaving the lights on in his building under advisement since the consumption of power per month is enough to light 2,092 average homes?

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I tend to share the hon. member's concern. I have raised the question myself. I hope that the next time the Department of Public Works erects a building it will be possible to turn the lights off individually in each office.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ALLEGED EXISTENCE IN QUEBEC OF CENTRE OF ANALYSIS AND DOCUMENTATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Erik Nielson (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Solicitor General whether he is aware of the existence in the province of Quebec of an agency of the government of that province called the Centre of Analysis and Documentation which concerns itself with secret policing of matters affecting national security? If the minister is aware of the existence of that group, has it been established with the knowledge of this government? Is it operating with the co-operation of this government and does any similar group exist in any of the other provinces?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the group but I will be pleased to check into this and find out. I might say we have relationships with the Quebec Provincial Police through the RCMP, but I am not aware of that particular committee.

ALLEGED WIRETAPPING OF MEMBERS OF ST. JEAN BAPTISTE SOCIETY—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION OF SECURITY PLANNING AND ANALYSIS GROUP

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. In view of the revelation last week of the wiretapping of telephones of two members of the St. Jean Baptiste Society, allegedly by members of the group to which the hon. member for Yukon referred, will the minister advise whether there was any relationship with the police and security planning and analysis group in his department and whether they had any advance knowledge of this so-called operation 95? If so, what part did that group play in the planning of these acts of political espionage?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will also check into that. I am virtually certain the group in my office had nothing to do with this particular incident. I will get a full report and give it to the House.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

The House resumed, from Friday, October 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-164, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1973 to the 30th day of June, 1974, and securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railways Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, just before the House recessed for the weekend on Friday, I started to participate in a debate on Bill C-164 on financing the Canadian National Railways. I was commenting on the importance of transportation in areas such as Saskatchewan, in view of our farm population and innumerable small communities. I also stated that in Melville we have a large CNR terminal.

We on the prairies sometimes get very angry with Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway because it is a fact that these two railways have been responsible for some of the lack of development, high freight rates and discrimination against the prairies. I gave some examples of this in the debate last Friday. This afternoon, I want to spend a few minutes going over the immense power of CNR and CPR to show how these huge corporations affect the lives of people living in the prairies and, indeed, right across Canada.

What is the difference between CNR and CPR? I suggest they are basically the same type of beast. They just have different hides. CNR is publicly owned. CPR is a privately owned corporation. CPR operates in eight provinces, CNR in 10. CPR has a highway transportation organization. CNR has a highway transportation organization as well. CPR has coastal steamships. CNR has coastal steamships. Both have hotels. Both have a telecommunications company and network. Both are involved in the air transportation business. Both are involved in pipeline research in this country. Both are involved in tax ripoffs from the Canadian people.

In my own province, the Hotel Saskatchewan in Regina just last year started paying taxes to the city of Regina. Last year they paid $350,000 in taxes. That will be their annual tax rate from last year on. However, prior to that, the Hotel Saskatchewan did not pay any taxes at all, despite the fact it is owned by the CPR and has been in operation for many years. The city of Regina still pays the complete water bill for that huge hotel. In other words, these two rail lines have a virtual monopoly on the rail, air and water transportation in this country. Because of that, they exercise considerable control over national policy across this country.

I want to go back in history for a few moments and express my concern about the monopoly grip these companies have on Canadian life. I urge the government to take the initiative when it comes to freight rates and national transportation policy. The CPR was started in 1880 when they were given some $25 million by the federal government. At that time they were also given 25 million acres of land, the site of which they could choose over the next 20-year period for their roadbeds, for their stations, docks, workshops, sheds and so on, which went along with their rail transport system. They were given tax exemptions by all three levels of government on everything connected with the railway system. They had tax exemptions on the lands which were given to them for the 20-year period after that land was obtained. The federal government itself built 700 miles of railway during that period, the cost of which, including the land, was some $140 million, and which today would be worth considerably more than that. The CPR was also given exclusive mineral rights as well as all kinds of land.

You may wonder why the CPR at that time was given such huge welfare cheques or hand-outs by the federal government of the time. There were 40 MPs in the House and 12 Senators, and on checking the records I find that many, if not most, of these MPs and Senators had an interest in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and were thus serving their self-interest by giving huge handouts to the CPR. The government also guaranteed, very interestingly at that time, the shareholders of the CPR that freight rates would be kept high enough so that there would be a minimum profit of 10 per cent on the capital invested in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. In 1897 the Crowsnest Pass agreement subsidized the building of the CPR into southeastern British Columbia. So that gives you a bit of the background of the Canadian Pacific Railway in this country which was started by rugged individualists by the use of huge handouts and concessions from the federal Conservative government of the day, in mineral rights, taxation, direct subsidies and so on right down the line.

Now, what has the CPR become today? Is it exclusively a railway company? It certainly is not, Mr. Speaker. I have been able to tabulate some of the interests the CPR has, and I am sure this will be of interest to the House as an example of transportation in Canada. The Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas people have petroleum rights in over 23 million acres of land in western Canada. Canadian Pacific Railway Hotels, which is part of Canadian Pacific investment along with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, owns and operates 11 hotels across this country. Marathon Realties owns a monstrous $310 million worth of assets and the $35 million Place du Canada in Montreal. Cominco, which was formerly the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, owns or controls National Hardware Specialties Limited in Ontario, which is a zinc die-casting plant. Western Steel Limited is owned and controlled by the CPR in Vancouver. Another company the CPR owns is Pinepoint Mines Limited in Trail, B.C. They own Pacific Coast Terminals Limited in New Westminster. They own Ricken Mines in Yellowknife. They own Coast Copper in Trail, B.C. They own Sunco Mines Limited, which is also a copper mine.

The Canadian Pacific Railway, has interests in the United States. There is a zinc interest in the country of India. It has fertilizer, lead and electronic plants in the United States, and a lead smelting plant in Japan. There are Canadian fertilizer plants. There are six hydro-electric power plants in the Province of British Columbia and some pipeline interests as well. The CPR, with its fully-owned Canadian subsidiaries, had a net income last year of close to $70 million; Cominco, which is owned 53 per cent by the CP Investments Limited, has a net income of over $35 million; Pinepoint Mines Limited, which is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's as well, had a profit of over $35 million. These are some of the interests which Canadian Pacific Railway has and which show how it has become a huge monstrosity in the last few years in this country. And the CNR is not far behind the Canadian Pacific Railway when it comes to a corporate octopus with immense power in this country as well. In fact, Mr. Speaker, when I go back over some of the reports of the CPR I see that from 1920 their net profits have been $1,279 million. That indeed is immense and that, indeed, makes the company very, very powerful.

Now, Canadian National Railways has a very similar history. It is involved, as I say, in very similar enterprises across this country. Canadian National was formed by the amalgamation of several railways after 1920, railway companies that went broke, railway companies that a Conservative government again at that time bought out, fully compensating the owners thereof. The Canadian government guaranteed bonds of the Canadian National Railways to the tune of $860 million. This does not include the forgiveness of debt which occurred in 1937. It does not include the converted half of the $760 million debt which existed in 1952 in the form of preferred equity shares, and this does not include the forgiveness of interest for ten years, ending in 1961, of $100 million. Despite that, the debt I am told is still almost $2 billion.

Now the CNR, like the CPR, is also involved in all kinds of enterprises across the country. We have the railway system itself. We have CN Express. We have Canadian National Railways Limited in France. We have Canadian National Realties, Canadian National Steamship Company, Canadian National Telegraph, Canadian National Transfer, Canadian National Transportation. We have Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company, which is owned bh the CNR. We have Chapman Transportation Company, which is owned by the CNR; Eastern Transport, Empire Freightways, the Great Northwest Telegraph Company of Canada. We have Husband Transport, Husband International Transport, Midland Superior Enterprise Limited, the Minnesota-Manitoba Railroad Company, Minnesota-Ontario Bridge Company, Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, all owned by the CNR.

I could go on and on listing the companies that are owned by the huge Canadian National Railways Company here and beyond our border. They own the Northern Consolidated Holding Company, Provincial Tankers Limited, the Quebec and Saint John Railway Company, Royal Transportation Limited, Scobe's Transport, Swan River-The Pas Transfer, Toronto-Peterborough Transportation Company, Central Vermont Railway, which is operated, of course, in the United States, the Duluth-Rainy Lake and Winnipeg Railway in the Duluth and Winnipeg area, and so on. These are the companies that are run by the Canadian National Railways here in this country.

If we look back at the history of the CNR in this country we find they have been much more willing to provide aid and service to industrial developments than they have to the ordinary citizen through decent transportation service, passenger service and working conditions for the employees. We find that in 1952, the CNR and the government of Canada combined to offer great incentives to build a railway to Kitimat and a bridge across the Skeena river for mining industries in that area. The same thing happened with the Lynn Lake developments in Manitoba where the CNR and the government of Canada combined to build a railway called the Sherritt Gordon line.

So you can see as you go back through the history of the CNR that they have been very, very quick to use the taxpayers money to build services for some of the private mining companies and private interests in this country. And now we get down to 1973. What do we see the CNR trying to do in conjunction with the CPR in this country? Members hear about the terrible passenger service, about Air Canada, among other things, and I want to mention one or two more specific items relating to the prairies. We find now applications before the Canadian Transport Commission to abandon 3,000 miles of railway track in the Province of Saskatchewan alone. And this is in addition to the elimination of station agents during the last few years.

Why do they want to abandon railway tracks when they have this immense empire behind them which has made enormous profits over the last dozens of years? There are a number of reasons why they want to abandon railway lines on the prairies. First of all, the National Transportation Act provides that in order to qualify for subsidy a railway must first apply to abandon the lines in question. This is one of the reasons the railways have applied to abandon 3,000 miles of railway line in my province.

The CPR and CNR have both said that one reason they must abandon certain lines is competition from trucking companies, which is becoming so severe that they are losing money. But, Mr. Speaker, who owns a lot of the trucking companies in Canada? The CNR and CPR. What we have is their rail operation competing against their highway transport operation, and this is used as another excuse to abandon rail lines in my province. The railways also wanted to abandon grain elevators, but the farm organizations are disputing that kind of application. What they are really trying to do is maximize their profits because the rail lines serving these small towns are not returning to them a very high profit, certainly not the profit they would like to see.

I ask, why not use the port of Churchill more than we do to export grain from the prairies? This would save the farmers 10 to 15 cents a bushel because Churchill is closer to the prairies. But the railways refuse to do so, because when grain is shipped through the Lakehead and down the St. Lawrence seaway system the CPR and CNR receive more revenue through freight rates than they would if grain were shipped through Churchill.

Another reason the railways want to abandon lines is that it costs about $35,000 per mile per year to keep the track in shape. This figure relates to railway lines all across the country, not necessarily to the specific ones they are trying to abandon. There are 3,000 miles of track in my province of Saskatchewan, which works out to a figure of $105 million a year for maintenance. In other words, they want to save $105 million a year in my province alone. Where would the saving go, Mr. Speaker? I am sure it would not go to the farmers in the form of increased assistance, because they would have to haul their grain much greater distances from the farm to the elevator terminal. I am sure the saving would go into the general treasuries of the two railways concerned. If the $105 million a year which would be saved in Saskatchewan if the railways' attempts to abandon the rail lines were successful were invested at a reasonable rate of return over a period of 20 years, it would produce some $4 billion, to say nothing of similar savings in other provinces in Canada if rail lines were abandoned.

Then, of course, there are other costs incurred by rail line abandonment. For example, what would happen to people in small towns, villages and hamlets if local grain elevators were closed down? This represents about half of their economic base, and therefore they would be unable to exist. The municipalities will lose a lot of their tax revenue, services would become more centralized, people would be encouraged to leave the areas and go to larger centres in order to seek jobs, bring up their families and even retire there. I suggest this is a serious issue. Before the minister allows the CTC to grant the applications to abandon these lines, the minister should understand not only the economic consequences of such an act but also the social consequences for the people in rural Saskatchewan, and others living in different parts of rural Canada similarly affected.

The government of Saskatchewan has stated that rail line abandonment should be postponed in this country until at least 1980. I urge the minister to listen to what the government of Saskatchewan has said since they, like other governments on the prairies, know what their people living in rural areas want. If that were the case, better services would be provided to these people and they would have a better way of life. The very set-up of the board of directors of our two railways militates against the interests of people on the prairies. For example, of the 24 members of the board of directors of the CPR, only three come from western Canada, 19 come from eastern Canada, and there are three from foreign countries. There are 14 directors of the CNR; only four come from the west and 10 from eastern Canada.

In a debate of this sort, I and other members from the prairie provinces want to take the opportunity to put forward the argument that our transportation system be used to the benefit of all people in this country, not just those who happen to be fortunate enough to live within the golden horseshoe of southern Ontario in and around the city of Toronto. The freight rate structure in Canada should be organized in such a way as to remove any anomalies. For example, unprocessed goods can be shipped from Saskatchewan more cheaply than finished goods. This should not be the case, but as long as it is the case rural Saskatchewan will remain undeveloped, as will our north, most parts of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

I would encourage the minister, in all seriousness, to inform the railways that they will not be allowed to abandon their rail lines. In addition, I suggest he remove freight rate anomalies and thus serve all of the people in this country. One way to do this would be to nationalize the CPR and run just one railway system in this country. With regard to compensation for the CPR, according to the ledgers that I have seen it would not cost much to buy out the CPR, because most of that empire was built with the taxpayers' money in the first place. They have been getting welfare cheques from us for years. It is now time that the people of Canada owned, operated and controlled that particular railway along with the CNR. Let us have one railway system in this country that will serve all of our people from coast to coast.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is one, possibly two, more speakers to follow me. It is not my intention to take up too much time, but there are one or two points I should like to bring forward in this debate.

Bill C-164, which we are presently debating, gives the members of this House an opportunity to discuss the many transportation problems we have in Canada. Having listened to the debate over the past few days, I find a number of very interesting proposals have been put forward by members of all parties which I trust will be given very careful consideration both by the Department of Transport and by the committee that will deal with the bill once we give it second reading.

I welcome the opportunity to raise several transportation problems in my riding of Kootenay West. As hon. members know, a number of members have spoken on pension matters, abandonment of railway lines and so on. Similar problems exist in other parts of Canada, and I think all arise because of the fact that the transportation policy of this nation is inadequate. It is the lack of a unified transportation policy that has led to much of our current difficulties on our transportation system in Canada. I feel that the lack of adequate national policy in this field can have disastrous results, particularly on the growth of certain areas. Coming from a rural area I find that sometimes these weak transportation policies can seriously harm the potential economic growth of those rural areas in which we are very interested in seeing jobs retained. Certain economic ventures, too, are often destroyed when rail lines are abandoned.

Canada is a country whose economy is dependent on vast amounts of both exports and imports. Large quantities of raw materials are to be found in every part of our nation, and fast and efficient transportation facilities are required to get these products to market so we can be competitive. In addition, we find that Canadians travel a great deal. Whether they are commuting to and from places of employment or travelling for business or pleasure, we find that some method of transport comes into the picture. Our country, with its huge area and vast distances, uses many modes of transportation including rail, air, ship and, of course, our ever increasing truck transport. It is essential that all these methods be welded into a closely coordinated system to ensure that we receive the fast and efficient movement of goods and people that is required in this day and age. There is no reason all aspects of such a transport system should not be fully coordinated, owned and controlled by Canadians. It is for this reason the members of our group have been pressing for years for a Canadian merchant marine. I am not going to go into this because other members have spoken about the need for a Canadian merchant marine, but it does seem odd that Canada, a country with the longest coastline in the world, should have practically all its shipping trade carried in ships of other nations.

There are several transportation problems, however, which affect that part of B.C. I represent and to which attention must be paid to prevent further deterioration of transport facilities in the area. I should like to deal first with a problem which has been settled by the present B.C. government, but which could become a problem at some future date unless some legislative changes are made to prevent it. I refer to the recent plan to build the Kootenay and Elk railway to connect with the Burlington Northern at the United States border for the purpose of hauling coal from the east Kootenay to the Pacific coast via a United States railway line.

I firmly believe that Canadian raw materials and goods should be transported, wherever possible, by our own Canadian transportation systems, and as a result I welcomed, as did most residents of British Columbia, the action of the present B.C. government in stopping the export of Canadian jobs by the proposed plan to haul Canadian export coal over U.S. rail lines. The point I should like to make here is that the application to build the Kootenay and Elk railway should never have been allowed in the first place. This railway was only an appendage of a U.S. rail line and was to have no rolling stock of its own. Despite this, the lack of adequate federal legislation allowed the Kootenay and Elk to be incorporated under provincial law, although it was in no sense a provincial railway. This indicates that a legislative change is required in our Railway Act, and I urge the minister to proceed with it at an early date.

I might point out in passing that there are a number of products that various companies might be interested in having hauled over competing U.S. rail lines. I think legislation should be updated to make certain that appendages of U.S. rail lines cannot come into Canada and take away some of this lucrative rail freight haul. The former Social Credit government of British Columbia encouraged the building of the Kootenay and Elk railway. It would have meant the loss of many hundreds of Canadian railway jobs and would have been a severe blow to the Canadian economy. Their argument was, however, that it would provide competition for the CPR and, more important, it would provide an alternate route to the Pacific coast to ensure that our coal export contracts with Japan would not be placed in jeopardy. I might point out that there is already an alternative route to the Pacific coast and it is one which lies entirely within our own country. I refer to the Kettle Valley Line which more or less parallels the United States border. It runs from the East Kootenay area and now joins the main line of the CPR as it comes down the Fraser Canyon.

I believe there is a need for an alternate route to the Pacific coast from eastern B.C., but it should be confined to Canadian territory and, in my opinion, the Kettle Valley route would make an excellent alternative. It would relieve the growing pressure on the main line of the CPR and could be the safety valve in the event of a long and serious tie-up on this main line. It appears, however, that the company is reluctant to spend the necessary funds to make this line a viable alternative. It has reduced services and diverted traffic elsewhere in the hope, I presume, that eventually it will be able to persuade the Canadian Transport Commission that portions of the line should be abandoned. I would urge that a major upgrading of the Kettle Valley line take place. For a start it could be used to assist in the lucrative coal haul, perhaps by being used as the route to return the empty coal trains to east Kootenay, thus relieving some of the pressure now on the CPR main line.

At one time the Kettle Valley line went through the Coquahala Pass which gave it access to the Fraser Valley without having to go through the dangerous Fraser Canyon. This particular pass was abandoned a number of years ago by the CPR and, as a consequent result, all the rail traffic to the lower mainland, both CPR and CNR, must go down the Fraser Canyon. We can still vividly recall the immense traffic tie-up in the Fraser Canyon from the heavy snowfall of two years ago in which both our two transcontinental rail lines were involved. I understand there is a feasible route to get rail traffic into the Fraser Valley to the west of the dangerous Fraser Canyon. This matter should be investigated and, if found feasible, should be advocated by our National Transport Commission. Our increasing dependence upon continuous supplies of goods both to and from our Pacific seaboard is becoming of increasing significance as time goes on.

Many members during this debate have mentioned the economic upset and trouble which will be caused by the proposed abandonment policies of both our national rail lines. I find the same situation arises in my constituency of Kootenay West, where rail lines have been abandoned by the CPR, and the company is making moves to abandon more of its small branch lines. I might add that once a rail line has been removed from the area the chance of economic development taking place is greatly reduced. Once the rail line goes, we see a considerable number of small economic job-producing enterprises go with it, and as a result these little communities become less attractive because of a decreased number of job opportunities. There has been talk of diversification of industry throughout our country in an attempt to cut down on many of the major problems which now confront us with a growing concentration of citizens in urban areas. Unfortunately, the transportation policy of the present government has done nothing to ensure the continuity and growth of our smaller rural centres and is leading to increased urbanization as time goes on.

I understand that in 1975 the CPR will try to abandon the rail link between Rosebery and Nakusp. The company would very much like to get rid of this phase of its operation. Over the years there has been a gradual erosion of service by the company in this area, and this is no doubt directed toward the final abandonment of service to the area. It is my intention to oppose any further abandonment of rail lines in Kootenay West. The entire area has tremendous economic potential and this will gradually be developed over the next few years. We must not allow the CPR, with its faulty transportation theories, to slow down or stop the type of economic development which should and could be taking place in British Columbia.

This is the reason so many members have stressed the need for Canada to make some major changes in this whole policy in respect of transportation and communication. This bill deals with Air Canada and with air service in general. I should like to speak very briefly on air communication service in and out of Kootenay West. It should and could be improved. For example, in this day and age we find there is not a daily service from Castlegar airport to Calgary and the east. This just does not make sense. Pacific Western Airlines, which has the franchise for the area, should be obliged to institute a daily service. Once travellers are certain a daily service is available this helps generate passenger travel. It is disconcerting to air travellers to be forced on certain days to either stay overnight in Calgary or fly to Vancouver and then return several hundred miles to Castlegar. The additional cost involved is an unfair levy on those travellers who are forced to take the Vancouver route.

Another aspect of air communication which requires more attention is the growing need for improvement to existing municipal air fields and the development of new ones. This is an area of communication which is showing rapid development and one which needs far more attention than it has received to date. Rapid communication within a region is essential, for many centres are a long distance from those airports which are serviced by a licensed airline. Facilities are required to ensure that charter flights can provide services if required. There is also a rapidly growing use of private planes for both business and pleasure. This phase of air travel also needs attention, and I would urge the Department of Transport to allocate far more funds to the development of facilities for this type of air travel.

There are some immediate requirements in my area for improved service in this field. Every existing airport needs improvements. The priority in this regard is certainly at the Trail municipal airport at Columbia Gardens where the immediate need is for a paved runway. The department is aware of the problems, and I will press the government to see that action is taken on them.

There are a host of other problems, but this is second reading of this particular bill. Most members have covered other aspects of transportation and when this bill comes back to the House for report stage it is my intention to again raise several of the points I have briefly mentioned here this afternoon and to suggest other points I should like to question the minister about. I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words and trust that some time today this bill will receive second reading in the House.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill with a feeling partly of sorrow—and partly of anger—sorrow because this bill reveals in a striking manner all the weaknesses for which this government has become notorious. We have another case like the budget measures where the bill is presented to this House more than a year too late to do the job for which it is intended. This bill should have come before the House prior to the election, but the government was so disorganized by panic that it just shelved everything, the budget and CNR financing. The government had time only to change the auditors. It forgot the essentials and looked after the patronage. We do not mind when a little gravy goes to a Liberal firm, but surely a little discretion could be shown. It is a strange spectacle to see that those occupying that front bench over there in the House have gravy all over their faces. It is no wonder people refer to "the gravy train". I mentioned anger, and I emphasize that because the bill and the way it has been received emphasizes the iniquitous relationship between the government and the sunshine socialists to my left.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Give us a good Halloween speech.

Mr. Paproski: We have seen the spectacle of member after member of the once dedicated NDP-CCF party, a party that once knew how to fight for the west, rising in their places and offering mealy-mouthed words of praise for this and other legislation in this House. They can see nothing wrong. When was the last time they could see anything wrong with this government?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Last Friday when I spoke.

Mr. Paproski: There is an exception to the rule, and I will come to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The awful corruption of power was written all over that performance. Here is a party once noted for its conscience. Under the present leader, it has checked its conscience at the door. It clings to the skirts of power. Perhaps "NDP" stands for "no damn principles". They had two reasons for lavishing praise on the CNR financing bill. First, the CNR, a government-owned corporation represents the ultimate in the vocabulary of socialism, the Nirvana of the Socialist state, government-owned, government-controlled, a sacred cow that can do no wrong. We have had problems with cows on the tracks. In this debate for the first time we witnessed a sacred cow on the tracks and the NDP want us to take away the cowcatcher.

Here is a party of dedicated socialists, full of pious platitudes about the common man, the rights of the little fellow and, during the debate as I recall it, they rose one after the other defending the sacrosanct privileges of an organization which has shown signs of both bureaucratic arrogance and bureaucratic incompetence. Worse than that, in all those reams of words, these defenders of the people could not find time to say a word in defence of those who had given their lives to the CNR and the people of Canada, the CNR pensioners. I say that with the one exception of the hon. gentleman who rose on Friday, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Their pensions into which they paid over the years are an insult to the generosity of the Canadian people.

Canadian National Railways and Air Canada

The CNR has built up an enormous fund out of their contributions and the contributions of the people of Canada. They have invested those funds in a number of curious ways. But they have consistently refrained from passing on the benefits of those investments to the workers whose contributions made the fund possible. In terms of today's living costs and similar pension systems in other organizations, it is time the CNR passed on some of the benefits of the huge pension accrual to those who earned it. This matter has been brought to the attention of the government on numerous occasions.

Perhaps at this point I might refer to an item in the Edmonton Journal of October 4 entitled "CN Pensioners seek 10% Increase".

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What paper?

Mr. Paproski: A good Liberal paper, the Edmonton Journal.

This newspaper report states in part:

> . . . the retired railwaymen say they were servants of the Crown and should be given the same consideration as the civil servants who got the 10 per cent increase . . .
> CN instituted the two-per cent yearly pension increases Jan. 1, 1970. The increases were also retroactive to the time a man retired. For example, a man in 1970 who retired 15 years previously would receive a 30-per cent pension increase, and two per cent thereafter.

This is the type of benefit these pensioners should be receiving and are not. There has been delegation upon delegation, brief after brief, submission upon submission, and very little or no action. This is why I find it strange that in all the outpouring of words from the conscience-stricken members of the socialist group so very little was said about the plight of the CNR pensioners whose pension fund has gone up and up, while their pensions in real terms have gone down and down.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do you agree with what I said?

Mr. Paproski: Yes, I do.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then why do you not say so.

Mr. Paproski: This is an injustice which should not be tolerated in this country. Surely, the NDP for once, representing ridings in which CNR pensioners are living, and in view of the principles they have paid lip service to, could think about breaking ranks with their wagon masters in the Liberal government. All it takes is a little courage, the courage of their convictions.

● (1550)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): To think that we kept this debate going so that you could take part in it!

Mr. Paproski: When one considers all the speeches about rights and justice, here is a case crying out for rectification. I say to the government: pass on the increment in that pension fund, now nearly $1.5 billion, to the pensioners. Surely, this is one case in which those who speak loudly of rights, justice and welfare might stand up and be counted.

[Mr. Paproski.]

This government has so bungled and botched the welfare system in this country with its futile handouts to spur of the moment groups, would be reformers and world changers, that people are losing their respect for legitimate welfare needs. Let me say that there are people in this country who belong in the ranks of the unfortunate, people who have suffered illness, death, the loss of a breadwinner, accidents, and have seen their savings dwindle away. While our friends on the NDP benches are making pious speeches about being on the side of the angels, real suffering exists and real suffering calls on the resources of this nation for assistance. Many CNR pensioners are in the category where suffering has taken its toll through age, illness or neglect. Yet, the CNR, in its arrogance, this sacred cow maintained at the taxpayers' expense with the approval of the NDP, refuses to lift a finger to restore the pension rights of veteran CNR employees.

We have now seen everything. The NDP, which over the years has paid lip service and mouth service to the pensioners, is now afraid to speak up because they are in bed with the Liberal party and terrified out of their wits to face an election.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Nonsense.

Mr. Paproski: I do not know when the election will be. All I can say is that if the only cement to hold this House together is the cement between the NDP and the Liberal party, then the sooner it cracks the better.

I also want to bring to the attention of the CNR authorities the crashing nuisance of the hump yard in Edmonton. I use the word "crashing" advisedly. I would just like the president of the CNR and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) to come to Edmonton and try to sleep anywhere in the city within a mile of the hump yard. Let me assure them that they would not get a wink of sleep that night. All night long this symphony of distraction continues—crashing, groaning, whining, screaming—as boxcars are shunted up and down making sleep impossible. The continued existence of the CN hump yard in the built up areas of a modern city like Edmonton is a transgression on the good nature of the people of Edmonton. Once again we find that this arrogant institution does not give a damn for anyone. Either the hump yard must be moved to the outskirts or shunting must be banned between the hours of midnight and 6 a.m. I ask the minister most seriously to look into this matter about which many representations have been made. We have found that the CNR in its arrogance has turned a deaf ear to our requests.

I want to speak about Air Canada and the refusal of the appendix of the CNR to inaugurate a direct air link to Edmonton, the capital of western Canada, and may I say the oil capital of the world. Surely, it is ridiculous for travellers going to the metropolis of western Canada, the Mecca of the west, to be routed through Toronto and have their whole vision of Canada spoiled by the mindless turmoil and inextricable jumble that exists at the Toronto airport. The people of western Canada are entitled to a through service to Edmonton, and if we cannot get it under this government we will darn soon put a government in power that will be able to secure the services and the recognition to which we are entitled.

For too long we have had the policy in force of everything for the east and nothing for the west. In view of the fact that western oil and western wheat contribute in a major way to the prosperity of Canada, while a great part of the east simply lives off western resources, we feel we are at least entitled to recognition. Under this government the policy is not only to bleed the west white, but the west is expected to say thank you.

In closing, may I say thank you to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who had the vision to construct that great airport in the Edmonton area, which at one time was thought to be a white elephant, but now with the bilateral agreements, will become one of the foremost airports in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

CANADA PENSION PLAN (No. 2)

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ANNUAL INCREASES AND LEVEL OF INCOME ON WHICH CONTRIBUTIONS BE PAID

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved: That Bill C-224, An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (No. 2) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pursue the point of order of which I gave notice on Tuesday, October 23, as recorded in Hansard at pages 7136 and 7137. I realize that it is rather unusual for a member to raise a point of order with respect to a bill the terms of which he fully supports. Nevertheless, rules are rules and should be held in high regard. I also feel that there are certain consequences from the point I wish to make which should be considered, indeed certain rights which should be preserved. The point of order that I raise has to do with the fact that when this bill was placed on the order paper and given first reading there was attached to it what we call the royal recommendation. That recommendation, which is given by His Excellency the Governor General, is required in all cases where a bill involves the expenditure of public money or, to put it in other terms, in all cases where any money has to be paid out of or charged to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

It is my contention, and I think it is so well supported it hardly needs to be argued, that that is not true with respect to the Canada Pension Plan. It is a completely self sustaining plan. In fact, its self sustaining character is so complete that even charges for rent, telephone and all other kinds of administrative services are made against the plan or against the fund which is set up under the Canada Pension Plan.

The Canada Pension Plan was first brought in 1964 but it was passed in 1965. At that time there was a resolution that preceded the bill. This was before the days when we had abolished the resolution, but it took the same form as the Governor General's recommendation now takes. Some questions were asked about this at that time. The answer given by the then Prime Minister, the late Right Hon. L. B. Pearson, was to the effect that when the plan got operating it would of course be completely self-sustaining, but to begin with there were certain costs involved in getting the plan established, certain expenditures that had to be made before any receipts came in, and that in that sense there were initial charges that had to be paid by the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

However, one of the requirements of the original act, the Canada Pension Plan as passed in 1965, was that any of these costs that had been incurred before the plan came into effect were to be paid back to the Consolidated Revenue Fund out of the fund established under the Canada Pension Plan. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because the Canada Pension Plan as it now operates is a plan which does not draw on the Consolidated Revenue Fund in any way, it seems to me that it is an act of supererogation or, to put it in simple language, it is wrong to attach a Governor General's recommendation to this amending bill. Someone might say, "No harm is done. Let's be on the safe side." But of course the harm that is done is that if the Chair rules that such a recommendation is required then private members are denied the right to make any amendments, even though their amendments might not require any payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

With regard to the fact that no charges are made against the Consolidated Revenue Fund may I remind hon. members that if they look at the public accounts of Canada from year to year they will see that there is an account known as the Canada Pension Plan account, but it is completely separated from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Also it will be noted that some of the expenditures that are listed as charged to the Canada Pension Plan are administrative costs, rental of space and all the rest of it. In other words, the principle that everything must be paid for out of the contributions that employers and employees pay into the Canada Pension fund is well protected. Indeed this is guaranteed in section 110 of the Canada Pension Plan itself, which is found at page 849 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, vol. 1. It fills a column so I will not read it in full, but it does say very clearly that everything that is received by way of Canada Pension Plan contributions must go into the Canada Pension Plan account, and every payment that is made out with respect to the Canada Pension Plan must be charged to the Canada Pension Plan account.

Then, there is subsection (4) of section 110 which says:

> No payment shall be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund under this section in excess of the amount of the balance to the credit of the Canada Pension Plan Account.

In other words, it is very clear that not one cent can go out of the federal treasury, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, for the payment of any of the costs of the Canada Pension Plan, whether it be the paying of pensions or other benefits or whether it be the paying of administrative costs. This has been argued a number of times. It seems to me that the arguments that took place in 1964 and 1965 on this point were not really conclusive, because there was a mixed bag at that time, but since then the expenses involved in getting the plan going and any expenses that were paid prior to the starting of the plan, have been paid back.

A more recent discussion of this point is one that took place on April 20, 1971. I am looking at a number of pages in Hansard for that day, pages 5093 to 5097. I may say at the outset that I find it interesting in addressing you, Sir, as Mr. Speaker, that two of the persons who took part in the debate that day were a predecessor of yours, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, who is now the occupant with you of what he calls that lonely plateau.

Since both of these esteemed gentlemen, one a former speaker and the other the present Deputy Speaker, made statements about the matter I think it will be interesting to have Your Honour's view on the matter as well. When I first looked at these pages I thought that maybe my quoting of these two gentlemen would be offset by the fact that you said something that day. But no, Sir, you were not in the chair that day. It was Mr. Honey, deputy speaker in the last parliament who was in the chair. So, Sir, this is your golden opportunity. You have not ruled on this point yet, and you have such excellent authorities as the hon. member for Edmonton West, a former occupant of the chair, and your present colleague, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave).

On that occasion the bill being discussed was a private member's bill which had been presented by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and the arguments I have given today in brief were given then by all of us who took part on the side of private member's rights. In the end Mr. Honey ruled against us, but I draw attention to the fact that he based his ruling almost exclusively on the fact that Bill C-34 in that session, a bill in which the hon. member for Hillsborough sought to amend the Canada Pension Plan in a certain way, did include a clause which said:

> Expenditures under this Act shall be provided under section 104 of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1970.

There was that element of weakness in the bill that was before the House on that day. But, Mr. Speaker, I point out that there is not one jot or one tittle in Bill C-224 now before us that says anything shall be paid as provided under section 104 of the British North America Acts, 1867-1970. In fact Bill C-224 does not touch at all the sacred provision of section 110 of the Canada Pension Plan Act which says that not one red cent—I will come back to that phrase in a moment—shall be paid out of the federal treasury for the purposes of the Canada Pension Plan. Therefore it seems to me that this bill is not a money bill in the normal sense and that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), in whose name it is, should be able to proceed with it without the royal recommendation.

Let it be quite clear that one of my motives in raising this matter is that I want to protect rights that I think we have as private members. Once this bill is before us of course the Canada Pension Plan is open, and I think we should have the right to make suggestions, and even to move amendments that would make improvements in the Canada Pension Plan if we can demonstrate that this can be done without involving any charge on the treasury.

I realize that any such amendments which we might make would have to be considered when they would come along, but of course we are locked outside to begin with if it is ruled that this is a money bill and that there has to be a royal recommendation, because then we are faced with the citation that says that the royal recommendation lays down once and for all the terms of the bill.

I said earlier that we had an interesting debate on April 20, 1971. I should like to quote a few words from one of the authorities who spoke that day. In the present context he is probably the one whom we should most like to quote. As recorded at page 5095 of Hansard for April 20, 1971, the hon. member said:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to join briefly in the arguments that have been presented to Your Honour and to recall some of the wording in the resolution that was presented to the House when the Canada Pension Plan was introduced on October 28, 1964. But before I read portions of the resolution, I agree that up to that point the moneys had been spent by government departments with reference to the setting up of the plan, particularly with reference to the studies that had preceded the setting up of the plan, in that very special sense, involved an expenditure of tax moneys, of Her Majesty's revenues, in relation to that legislation. These moneys had to be spent so that the expertise established for publication of these ideas could be incorporated into the Canada Pension Plan itself.
> As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has recalled, the then member for Rosthern raised with the prime minister of the day the question of why there should be a resolution when the Canada Pension Plan was to pay its own expenses. There were exchanges between them, and perhaps I should read what the prime minister said then:
> The hon. member then quotes Mr. Pearson as follows:
> The fact is that it will cost some money to get this plan into operation, as my hon. friend must know. Afterwards, when the plan is in operation, the expenses will be borne by the fund.

It is no secret that the person whose words I am quoting, as recorded in Hansard of April 20, 1971, is the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. He went on, from that basis, to argue that the resolution as attached to the original Canada Pension Plan bill was there purely for technical reasons but, now that the plan is paying its own way, it should be possible for a private member to move amendments to the legislation. As the hon. member pointed out, no money was to come out of the federal treasury.

I alluded awhile ago to "not one red cent" coming out of the federal treasury. Of course, I was in part repeating what the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants had said. Discussing the bill on that occasion and pointing out that it did not involve any charge on the treasury, the hon. member put it this way:

> When could there be any requirement whatsoever that so much as one red, black or blue cent of public money be put into its operation? I suggest you could look from one end of the plan to the other, whether in its present form or, hopefully, as amended by the hon. member for Hillsborough, and not find any such obligation.

The hon. member went on to say:

I would respectfully suggest to Your Honour that it would work a hardship on the backbench members of Parliament if a very narrow construction were placed on the rule about the introduction of measures calling for expenditures. I think, first, the rule would have to be pretty severely twisted to cover the circumstances that arise in the bill of the hon. member for Hillsborough, but in any event it would be a most narrow and unfortunate construction if the Chair were to say that this bill was outside the competence of a private member.

It is no secret that, sometimes after four o'clock, Mr. Deputy Speaker is in the chair. It is after four o'clock now, but Mr. Deputy Speaker is yet not in the chair. It would have been interesting to quote his own words to him. However, the ruling, when it comes, will be a most important one, which will need a great deal of consideration.

Using the past words of our present Deputy Speaker, I suggest, Sir, that if you look from one end of Bill C-224 to the other, you will not find any obligation for one red, black or blue cent of money to be paid out or charged to the Consolidated Revenue Fund. In view of the very cogent argument, the very strong case, presented by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, as he then was, on April 20, 1971, I ask Your Honour to rule that this bill is not one placing any charge on the treasury and, therefore, that it should not have attached to it the royal recommendation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the numerous arguments which have been advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I hope I will not traverse the same ground. In drawing his particular point to the attention of the House, the hon. member referred to a debate which took place in 1965. On March 9, 1965 the House voted on a certain matter involving an appeal against a ruling made by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. That matter involved precisely the same principle we are now considering.

The House was considering an amendment put forward by the then hon. member for Perth, the hon. Mr. Monteith, and at that time the then hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka carried the ball from a procedural point of view. A ruling was given, dealing with the amendment, and the ruling, and I say this inferentially, challenged the right of a private member to move an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan and any of its provision regarding distribution. Shortly thereafter, I debated with the then minister of finance, Mr. Benson, precisely what was the nature of the contribution made by the Canadian citizen to the Canada Pension Plan fund. The then minister of finance refused to debate whether or not this was a tax. Any reference to that debate will show that, actually, such contribution was considered to be a tax.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He was then the minister of national revenue.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I stand corrected by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The minister was then the minister of national revenue. He did not wish to become involved in that debate because, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said and as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), as he then was, said, there was not one jot or tittle of evidence within Bill C-5, then under consideration, to support the authorization of the payment of one red cent out of the fund. May I say that the ruling on the matter that precipated the debate on April 20, 1971 was, as I have said before, erroneous. Having reread all the material referred to and the debate of April 20, I am still convinced that the original ruling was erroneous and should not be followed.

First, if the royal recommendation is to be carefully and scrupulously followed by the Chair, as Mr. Deputy Speaker suggested the other day, there is a corresponding obligation to make sure that the recommendation is required. Second, there is the obligation to make sure that the recommendation is couched in correct terms. I say that because it cannot be used, shall we say, to stand off private members. If it is included for that reason, I suggest it is not proper. I suggest that this is what we are debating today.

I put it to Your Honour that there is no need for a recommendation in this particular case, as the bill seeks a change in the distribution of funds paid into the Canada Pension Plan by the contributors. From that plan the government of Canada cannot derive one cent for ways and means, and it cannot spend one cent for administration. The late Prime Minister Pearson remarked at one stage there would not be any money required to get the program in operation. The money was not paid back from the sources. The money was provided under item L60(b) in an appropriation bill which was passed and received royal assent as Bill C-150 of 1964-65. The Canada Pension Plan Act went through as Bill C-151.

In the revision of the statutes in 1970-71, if one looks to the historical index of what happened to all appropriations, we still see that opposite L60(b) is marked "spent". Therefore, the whole of that appropriation has gone. It is cleaned out. The loan has been repaid. Here is a little known fact. The government derived more money, and attempted to get even more money out of the fund, than it had spent with regard to the expenses of getting the plan geared up and under way.

An attempt was made to collect the expenses of public servants who had devoted time, travel and expenses in the 1950's in connection with the establishment of the Canada Pension Plan. The government of Canada tried to reimburse itself from a fund that belonged to the citizens of Canada. However, it was determined that until there was an amendment to the Canadian constitution in 1964 authorizing and permitting the government of Canada to get into a Canada Pension Plan, there was no authority to recover any moneys. The recovery of the so-called expenditures was stopped as of 1964.

That is an aside, but it indicates that the government of Canada cannot use any of the moneys under this plan for general purposes under the consolidated revenue fund. In any event, all of the expenses of organization and so forth have long since been repaid and there are funds far in excess of the requirements of the plan. It is argued that the citizens of Canada are being shortchanged by reason of the fact that loans made from the Canada Pension Plan fund are at a much lower rate of interest than the market. Therefore, the fund could provide moneys for the payment of the increase that is now being asked if the current interest rates were being charged. There would be sufficient moneys to make these payments. There would be no difficulty.

Many arguments could be made, but I come back to what I think bothers most members. In particular, it bothered Deputy Speaker Honey in 1971 when he considered that if it was not a tax, it was an impost. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the impost arises out of an old method of classifying or drawing up taxation statutes.

Prior to 1830, taxing statutes provided for the purpose for which the money was to be used. There were, therefore, limitations on the expenditures. For example, if a particular bill imposed a tax on tobacco for health purposes, the total amount of that tax had to be used for health purposes and no other purpose. It was in 1830 that the consolidated revenue fund was established by the United Kingdom government of the day. Therefore, we have a consolidated revenue fund into which all taxes are paid. Taxes are generally exacted under the Income Tax Act, the Customs Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act.

This left parliament free to exact a statute that dealt solely with the purpose for which the expenditure was to be made and, instead of including a tax, provide only that a certain sum was to be paid out of the consolidated fund either in the statute itself or in a subsequent appropriation act. The old method is still, but rarely, used. The Old Age Security Act is a classic example of an impost because it provides that a proportion of the expenditures were to be provided by an additional 2 per cent sales tax.

If Deputy Speaker Honey was right in his ruling on April 20, 1971, then the provisions of the Standing Orders relating to Ways and Means apply. A Ways and Means motion must be tabled under Standing Order 60(1) and, if adopted, a bill then brought in based on the provisions of such motion. The bill now before the House must be ruled out of order as not complying with Standing Order 60.

That is the dilemma that comes about from considering the contributions and the whole scheme of payments under the Canada Pension Plan Act as being part of a tax or an impost. Our Standing Orders and Section 54 of the BNA Act say we must proceed via another way if this is a tax, but this is not the way. This act is then bad. On the other hand, if this act is to be right, there cannot be any Ways and Means application. There cannot be any question of a tax or impost. Therefore, the recommendation is unnecessary. If the recommendation is unnecessary, the bill is then amendable. That, in essence, is the nub of the problem facing Your Honour at the present time.

I repeat what was said on March 12 as it appears at page 12290 of Hansard and subsequent pages.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What year?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): 1964-65. This was in consideration of clause 44 of the Canada Pension Plan Act.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

One cannot have it both ways. If it is not a tax and does not affect Ways and Means, there is no requirement for a recommendation. On the other hand, if it requires a recommendation because it is a tax or it affects Ways and Means, then the procedure adopted by the government in presenting this bill is wrong and they have to start over.

• (1630)

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the arguments which have been advanced this afternoon. Standing Order 62(1) reads:

> This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

It seems to me the arguments which have been put forward this afternoon by the two hon. gentlemen who have preceded me do not really hit home in their entirety. Surely, the funds involved here are not only part of the revenue of the federal government, but go back to the provinces; they are used, for example, by local school boards and I submit they are part of public revenue. It has been argued, apparently, that these funds are not paid out of consolidated revenue. Surely, they are. It is said they come from the Canada Pension Plan fund, a fund in which money must always be available in order that applications for payment may be met. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that what are involved here are not only payments from the Consolidated Revenue Fund but payments by the federal government into the Canada Pension Plan fund on behalf of the 250,000 or 275,000 employees of the federal government. This contribution represents a direct expenditure on the part of the government and for this reason a recommendation by the Governor General is needed. I have no idea how many millions of dollars these contributions will amount to, but the total sum is bound to be a very large one.

It seems to me the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) really tipped his hand when he said he and his friends wanted to see this done without a recommendation in order that in private members hour they could bring in bills to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or to amend this bill.

Mr. Foster: The Canada Pension Plan is an integral part of the social security program of the present government or, indeed, of any government, and I suggest it is the government which must take responsibility for it. It should be the prerogative off the government to bring forward amendments. It is not something which can be done by a private member. After all, we do not have a congressional system here. The government has to be responsible for legislation, especially where the expenditure of funds is involved, so it seems to me that the precedents by which we have so long been guided require the royal recommendation, and for good reason, and that the point of order raised by the hon. members should not be upheld.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, the issue has been well covered by the first two speakers in this discussion, but in answer to the query which has just been raised regarding the application of Standing Order 62(1), I suggest that the Canada Pension Plan as now established amounts to a 100 per cent private scheme, operated freely by a trustee which happens to be the state. I believe this is the answer to the last argument which was put forward. The other two points have been ably advanced, so the case rests.

We do take this matter seriously, Mr. Speaker, and, I trust I can say without being misunderstood that if the Chair does hide behind the royal recommendation we have a democratic right to make certain that the other point of view comes forward.

Mr. Lalonde: I shall be very brief, Mr. Speaker. Listening to the learned arguments put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I was reminded of advice given to me when I was a young lawyer—the weaker your case, the longer must be your argument.

The only point I wish to stress is that the funds are collected by the Receiver-General of Canada and put into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may, indeed, have let the cat out of the bag when he quoted that section of the Canada Pension Plan legislation which refers to the Canada Pension Plan account. It is true that there is an account, but there is no such thing as a Canada Pension Plan fund, that is, a whole lot of money put into a special corner where no one can touch it. It is merely an accounting format.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is no Consolidated Revenue Fund either; it is just a form of words.

Mr. Lalonde: Disbursement dispersion is made from the Consolidated Revenue Fund and, likewise, what is collected—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is there a Consolidated Revenue Fund?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No. It is just a form of words.

Mr. Speaker: If there are no additional contributions to this very important and interesting procedural debate, I shall attempt to make a ruling. The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) has suggested that he, and the hon. members who sit around him, consider this procedural matter very seriously, and I expect them to do so because it is an important procedural point. It was raised some days ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and it is in response to the caveat received from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the Chair undertook to make a thorough study of precedents and citations from learned authors to determine whether there was substance in the suggestion that the royal recommendation was not required in this particular case.

Hon. members appreciate the difficulty with which the Chair is faced. There is a long established principle at stake here, a principle which has been confirmed for many, many years, and in all instances, I may say, by Speakers who have preceded me. I hope hon. members will not expect the Chair to go into all those rulings. I have tried to come to what I consider to be the substance of the matter in order to reach a conclusion.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) raised this point in relation to Bill C-224 and to the royal recommendation, which reads as follows:

> His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure to amend the Canada Pension Plan to remove the limitation of two per cent in the annual increase in the pension index within the meaning of the Act, to fix the year's maximum pensionable earnings for 1974 at $6,000, for 1975 at $7,400, and to provide thereafter that increases in the consumer price index be fully reflected in the escalation of benefits payable under the Act.

Hon. members have suggested that there was no need for such a recommendation since, in their view, the expenditures which may result from the adoption of the bill would be paid out of the Canada Pension Account and would not be any charge on the treasury. This, at least, is the way I understood the argument which was suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he first broached this subject, and the three hon. members to my left who (spoke) pretty well followed this line.

I have carefully studied Bill C-224 and have listened attentively to the arguments which were put forward earlier this afternoon. As I understand it, Bill C-224 seeks to change the Canada Pension Plan by increasing the year's maximum pensionable earnings for 1974 and 1975. As a result of the amendments proposed, contributions by both employees and employers would be increased. The federal government itself is an employer, and consequently its contribution to the fund would be increased. I say this with great respect, since I have much admiration for the wisdom of the hon. members who have taken part in this debate, but it seems to me that this is perhaps an aspect of the matter that they have not touched upon, at least in detail. Section 119 of the Act provides that contributions to be made by the Crown as employers' contributions in respect of persons employed by the Crown shall be charged to the Consolidated Revenue Fund and credited to the Canada Pension Plan Account.

The suggestion that this constitutes a charge on the treasury finds support in a citation from Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Procedure, 18th edition, page 745 which reads as follows:

> The imposition of charges on funds, other than the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund does not require the royal recommendation, unless it involves an increased payment out of those Funds, or increases the liability (e.g. through a guarantee) upon them, or automatically attracts a grant from moneys provided by Parliament. The National Insurance Fund and the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Fund are examples of this kind of fund; and proposals to increase the benefits payable out of them do not require the royal recommendation . . .
> But any increase in exchequer contributions to these funds or in the expenses incurred in administering them—even though ultimately recoverable by the exchequer must, of course, be recommended by the Crown.

This is where I have some difficulty finding in favour of the arguments advanced by hon. members. They suggest that moneys paid out of the Canada Pension Plan account are not moneys paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Yet section 110, of the Canada Pension Plan Act to which hon. members have referred, clearly provides that there shall be established in the accounts of Canada an account to be known as the Canada Pension Plan Account; that there shall be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and credited to the Canada Pension Plan Account all amounts received under the Act as or on account of contributions or otherwise. Subsection (4) of section 110 provides:

> No payment shall be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund under this section in excess of the amount of the balance to the credit of the Canada Pension Plan Account.

I fail to follow the argument proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who quoted section 110(4) as evidence that no moneys will be paid from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. It seems to confirm that all payments actually made and authorized under section 110(3) of the Act would have to be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund in accordance with section 110(4).

May I also refer hon. members to Bourinot's Fourth Edition, page 417, which reads as follows:

> Besides the grants voted in the estimates there are certain payments which have not been provided for annually, but are defrayed out of the consolidated fund in conformity with various statutes. These payments comprise: costs and charges incident to the collection and management of the revenue; interest of the public debt; salaries of governor-general, lieutenant-governors, judges, etc.; loans, grants to provinces under the Union Act; and all other permanent payments. Whenever it is necessary to make any changes with respect to these permanent grants, they must be introduced in the shape of resolutions in committee of the whole, and bills founded thereon.

It is a fact, of course, that the resolution stage of a bill containing charges on the public revenue is no longer part of our procedure, but the requirement of a recommendation of the Crown still forms a fundamental and essential part of our procedure. May I refer hon. members to section (2) of citation 246 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, which reads as follows:

> The Governor-General's recommendation to any resolution involving a payment out of the public treasury must be formally given by a privy councillor in his place at the very initiation of a proceeding, i.e., as soon as the motion has been proposed for the House to go into committee on the resolution.

All hon. members are familiar with the provisions of section (1) of Standing Order 62, to which hon. members have referred, which is based, of course, on the relevant section of the British North America Act.

Hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, have referred to private members' bills amending The Canada Pension Plan which either have been allowed or disallowed. I should like to refer in particular to a bill sponsored by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) which came forward on March 29, 1972. After due consideration this bill was given the benefit of the doubt and allowed to proceed, even though it was moved by a private member and was not accompanied by a recommendation. The bill provided that housewives might become part of the plan where they contributed both for the employee and the employer. With respect, that was quite a different proposition from the one now before us. In addition, the Chair did enter a caveat about the possibility that the financial initiative of the Crown might be involved.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. members have also referred to a bill which, I believe, was introduced by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) entitled "An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (Pension Index)", which by the way is another purpose of Bill C-224. This bill was ruled out of order on April 20, 1971 as infringing the financial initiative of the Crown. This and other precedents which were quoted for the guidance of the Chair were all instances where the amending bills were ruled out of order.

Hon. members have suggested that perhaps the time has come for the Speaker to overrule the former Deputy Speaker, and even to overrule himself, in relation to a decision which had been made in committee of the whole by the then Chairman, appealed to the Deputy Speaker in his capacity as Acting Speaker and confirmed by the Deputy Speaker in that capacity, and then confirmed by a vote of the House.

I suggest with great respect to hon. members that it is extremely difficult for the Chair to accept the suggestion that all these precedents should be disregarded and a different decision reached at the present time. I fully sympathize with hon. members regarding the ability of private members to introduce bills or to propose amendments, including amendments to the present act, but hon. members will appreciate and agree with me that the Chair is bound by precedents, particularly by the Standing Orders, which reflect the position proposed by the British North America Act, and by our practice and cutoms regarding the requirement when charges on the treasury are involved.

I am fully appreciative of the fact that I may not have dealt with all aspects of the arguments which were advanced, particularly the very interesting and forceful argument of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). But I doubt that the majority of hon. members would feel I would be justified in disregarding all the precedents and past practices of the House in reaching the conclusion that the royal prerogative in this case should be disregarded, that we should communicate with His Excellency and tell him that we would like to return his recommendation, that it is not needed and is superfluous in the present circumstances. Therefore, I must reach the conclusion that I should not entertain the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

● (1650)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased this afternoon to launch the debate on Bill C-224. There are only a few minutes left before five o'clock and I hope I shall be able to go into details when the debate resumes later this evening.

Six months ago last Thursday, the government tabled its Working Paper on Social Security in Canada. This signalled the start of the joint federal-provincial review of Canada's total social security system that had been suggested by the government of Canada and the provinces.

Since this review began, legislation has been introduced to reform and substantially increase family and youth allowances in Canada.

Today, Bill C-224 deals with amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and we are about to debate it. It constitutes the third major piece of legislation the government is introducing as a product of this comprehensive review of Canada's social security system.

Shortly after I tabled the working paper of the federal government, I met with provincial Ministers of Welfare, and I conferred with them again two weeks ago on the reforms that should be made in the Canada Pension Plan. In the intervening period, federal and provincial welfare officials met on numerous occasions, and had jointly prepared a number of detailed studies to assist the ministers of welfare at their October meeting.

In addition, during this interval, I consulted with members of the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee, and representatives of labour and business organizations. The results of these extensive studies and consultations with the provinces and private organizations can be found in the communique which the provincial Ministers of Welfare and I issued on October 11, 1973 with respect to the agreements we had reached on the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you would allow me to review very briefly the principal areas of agreement between the provinces and the federal government that are outlined in the joint communiqué. The government of Canada and the provinces where the Canada Pension Plan operates, and the government of Quebec, where the Quebec Pension Plan operates, have agreed that legislation whould be introduced so that, first, starting in 1974, pensions paid under both the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans will be fully escalated in response to increases in the cost of living; second, the earnings ceiling for pension calculations, and contributions to both the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans will be $6,600 for 1974, and thereafter will be increased by 12 ½ per cent a year until the ceiling reaches the average earnings of Canadian industrial workers. At the present time, the earnings ceiling is $5,600 under the Canada Pension Plan, and $5,900 under the Quebec Pension Plan; third, the level of earnings exempted from Canada Pension Plan contributions will be $700 for 1974 and thereafter will be set, under both the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan, at 10 per cent of the earnings ceiling for Canada Pension Plan and Quebec Pension Plan contributions. At the present time, the level of exempt earnings is $600 under the Canada Pension Plan, and $700 under the Quebec Pension Plan; and, fourth, effective 1974, the earnings test which now applies to persons drawing CPP retirement pensions between the ages of 65 and 69 will be eliminated.

The federal and provincial governments also agreed that other issues which had been raised, in many quarters, in connection with the reform of the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans such as those relating to equality between men and women with regards to contributions and benefits, non-contributing spouses, early retirement provisions, and the level of survivors and disability benefits under the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans should receive priority attention.

These agreements, if enacted by the Parliament of Canada and the Quebec legislature, will have a profound effect on the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans. They mean, among other things, that maximum CPP retirement pensions, which now run at about $90 a month, could reach a level of $250 a month by the end of this decade.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark)—Multiculturalism—Request for program to assist ethnic press in light of postage rate increases; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—National Defence—Operational state of Air Squadron 442 based at Comox; the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt)—Agriculture—shipment of horses to Europe for slaughter.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE TO STUDY ALL ASPECTS OF CRIME AND ITS TREATMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should introduce a measure to establish a parliamentary committee to investigate all aspects of crime and its treatment in Canada, which should have specific terms of reference to closely examine (a) the subject of crime prevention and the work of the Correctional Consultation Centre of the Solicitor General's Department (b) the subject of punishment—its deterrent value and relevance to the rehabilitative process—with particular attention to capital punishment, by collecting factual information and holding public hearings (c) the correctional process, including the Penitentiary and Parole systems.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in some ways I hope the debate we will have during this private members' hour will give us an opportunity to deal with some of the basic underlying problems we have dealt with in such an exhaustive, but not very effective, way during the prolonged debate this session on capital punishment. I do not want to spend too much time talking specifically about the motion, but rather would like to deal with the need for the passage of this or a similar motion. Let me explain at the outset that I am not committed to every phrase and nuance of the motion which was in fact put down almost a year ago. Since that time, I have expanded on some of my own thoughts in respect of things to be done in our responsibility, and if I seem to be slightly in advance of the motion I hope this will be accepted in that fashion.

I want to begin by quoting from a book which I would recommend to each and every hon. member of this House. Indeed, if it were possible for members to read this book and not hear my speech I would urge them to do so. If any member wishes to read it now, and if I can get agreement now, Mr. Speaker, I will sit down. The book is entitled "The Crime of Punishment". It is written by Karl Menninger and was published about five years ago. I wish to quote from one section of his book which, in a sense, is a quotation from Dr. Hans W. Mattick, associate director of the Center for Studies in Criminal Justice at the University of Chicago. He says this about the present approach in North America to crime and punishment:

The most securely imprisoned population tnat exists is the general public that is uninformed about the nature and consequences of imprisonment as practiced in America today. They are imprisoned in a mass delusion which, in the long run, punishes society far more severely than society can ever punish a convicted criminal.

That is what I want to speak about this afternoon. I wish to say at the outset that our prison system, both federally and provincially, has failed miserably. I do not think there is any member of this House who could stand up and dispute that statement. I believe it is a shocking statistic. I know of no other branch of public endeavour that has such a high failure rate! Most of the people being turned out of penal institutions, both federal and provincial, come out not as reformed, rehabilitated individuals but as people who have grown exceedingly hardened to a life of crime. As late as today, I attempted to obtain the actual figures in respect of recidivism from the federal standpoint but it is impossible because there are so many different ways to define whether or not a person can be considered as being reformed or as being repentive of his criminal activity. We are told that roughly half those who serve time in federal institutions upon release will commit further and possibly more dangerous crimes, and will eventually be convicted and returned to an institution for incarceration.

We know that in many cases the list is as high as 80 per cent. I believe the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) said some months ago that roughly four-fifths of the inmate population, upon release, would commit further crimes, be detected and eventually reimprisoned. This statistic should shock and disturb every thinking Canadian. In fact, we can go so far as to suggest that the present penitentiary system is really nothing more than a crash course for some, and a continuing course for others, in a life of anti-social or criminal behaviour. Our penitentiaries, in fact, become postgraduate institutions in continuing crime. I think it is absolutely unbelievable that all of us on both sides of the House for years have regarded this as a normal and acceptable situation. We say we place men in prison in order to protect society, that we hope in the course of their imprisonment they will be reformed and rehabilitated, but that if not we have at least offered some security to the general public.

But, what security have we offered when we have only given the Canadian public the assurance that, regardless of how long any particular man or woman serves in a federal institution, upon release three out of four inmates will commit further breaches of the law or heinous crimes. Does that offer security for your family or mine? I cannot see that it does. In terms of security, perhaps there is the short-term problem of whether or not someone will escape. If that likelihood is lessened, then perhaps it is a limited security, but not one that is particularly comforting to me. I do not believe it is particularly comforting to know that we have improved our security today so that we are ensured that instead of 100 people breaking out of institutions we may reduce that figure to 30. That is not the essence of the issue of security. The real security is to be assured that the largest a number of people who serve time in a federal institution will, in fact, be able to come out into society and act positively, constructively, responsibly and not in an irrational style or in an anti-social manner as is currently the case.

So there is no security worth recommending in our federal or provincial penal system. If our system has worked so badly, one may wonder whether we have been putting enough money into it. This is where, in terms of our responsibility, if we have exercised some measure of control over the public purse, the situation becomes almost ludicrous were it not so tragic because we know that on a per capita basis in respect of those serving time we are spending about $10,000 a year. This could be regarded in some perverse way as the first instance of a pretty well paid, guaranteed annual income but not a guaranteed income that would do much either for society or for the particular recipients involved. This is a guaranteed income plan about which we want to know a good deal more and possibly revise it.

Added to the aspects of breakdown and violence I mentioned, the one most disturbing of all is the rapid rise in prison population. It has increased this year by 14.5 per cent. I think the Solicitor General mentioned an increase of some 1300 prisoners in federal institutions this year over last year. There has been a particularly large increase in my area, the Maritimes, of some 20 per cent and an even more disturbing increase among women of some 30 per cent. This is not a large figure when one considers it is an increase from 108 to 152, but none the less it is a significant increase. What is the reason for this monumental failure in our prison system, federally and provincially? Why have we managed to deal with this aspect of society in such an inadequate way? I should like to say—and this is the primary purpose of my motion today—that we have not examined for some little time—I do not mean "we" in terms of some special group but rather generally and in terms of members of this House—such basic considerations as what is crime, how it is defined and what is the real function of our prison system.

I suppose some would say the reason we do not have an effective prison system today is that we have not thoroughly studied the problem and have not gone into it in detail. Here is where we come upon the most amazing paradox. Even though we have had problems in this country pertaining to language and culture, and problems in respect of adopting medicare and health care as well as introducing massive changes in our tax system and in each case have appointed royal commissions to estimate the task for us, in the field of correction and penalogy we have not had one royal commission but three since 1938. I brought the documentation along in order to show the weight. I am sorry the visual size cannot be recorded in Hansard. The first is the Archambault Commission of 1938, followed by the Fauteux Commission in 1956 and recently the Ouimet Commission in 1969.

Each commission in turn provided an enormous number of recommendations. In addition, if these royal commissions were not sufficient to impress us concerning the amount of headwork that has been done, at the present time we have a subcommittee of our own House and a major committee of the other place both studying various aspects of this question. There is an unbelievable amount of information available. But I suspect the information that is available has not, in most cases, been rationally considered but that the sort of snap responses of public opinion to violent events in the news and bizarre criminal aspects have been the operational principle in terms of governmental response.

People are just not aware—and I include people who make up the membership of this place because I think we had a pretty clear indication in the debates which ranged over the months on capital punishment—how little time and attention we have given to the general subject of crime and punishment, and specifically in relationship to the most difficult concept of punishment, that of capital punishment. I can think of no other area of public consciousness in which we have so misled and deceived the general public as that of the relationship of crime and criminal activity to judicial decision, to rehabilitative programs and to the effective protection of society. In a general way, I think that we have been confused about the difference between morality and crime, and perhaps as a clergyman I can say that we must get our thinking straight on what we mean when we talk about crime. While we may talk about the fact that the law treats all men equally, and we can report bizarre stories about multi-millionnaires and people in high-class positions being involved in crime for which eventually they are convicted and serve time, the fact of the matter is that 90 per cent of those serving time in federal institutions come out of seriously disadvantaged situations. There are so many reports on the subject that it is difficult to know from which to quote. Let me refer to the report of the Task Force on Community-Based Residential Centres submitted to the Solicitor General recently which contains the following statement in its opening paragraph on reasons or excuses:

> The members of the Task Force on Community-Based Residential Centres believe that most criminal conduct is spawned in the community, contributed to by the social, economic and political circumstances of the community. Thus, criminal behaviour is a function both of the offender and of the community, and the solutions must be sought in both.

I am afraid that we have been living with a great number of delusions about the nature of crime and its treatment, perhaps because it has been regarded as the kind of subject you do not talk about at the dinner table with your family. Crime, after all, in the parlance of most people is sinful; you do not expose children to it or indulge, in polite or genteel society, in a discussion of the facets of criminal behaviour. We have not really considered where morality leaves off and our whole concept of capital punishment debate is a good example of our failure to deal rationally with the subject. I would say to my fellow abolitionists who participated in the debate that we did not deserve to win that vote, because during the last five year period we have done damn little to explain why we should abolish capital punishment, and why there should be other sweeping changes in our whole judicial system as well as our system of penology.

I am not a prophet, but I would say that if we do not take the opportunity over the next five year period to explain how the abolition of capital punishment, in relationship to other changes in our prison system makes sense, then I doubt very much that the House of Commons, say, in 1978, will have the public support to extend the abolition or partial abolition of capital punishment. Fundamentally, what we need to do is to alter public opinion. I think that that must begin in this place. That is why I am suggesting that we need a parliamentary committee. I think it must be a special parliamentary committee which, I hope, would comprise members of this House and the other place, and would have suitable staff as well as a large computer which would be fed all the information presently available. Then, this material would be collated in some rational and sensible way. We must have the opportunity to educate both ourselves and the general public.

I really cannot be very hard on the Solicitor General, because he is caught in a very difficult situation. On the one hand, he has the general public, represented by many members of parliament in the House, ready to jump on him the moment there is any detection of a weakening of security procedures or any bizarre crime that occurs as the result of what appears to be a change, an adjustment in the present penitentiary system. On the other hand, he has a staff,—a very mixed staff I might say—some of whom would understand a great deal more than I would about the need for sweeping reforms in the penitentiary system, but many of whom have lived inside a very punitive set up. I refer particularly to those who serve at the very personal level, those who exercise functions of guards and security officers and who have come in—and I do not hold this against any individual—with a very limited amount of training and experience. Often, they have been caught up in the confusion that exists within the internal set up of the penitentiary service.

How in heaven's name can we expect any cabinet minister to function in that kind of set up and make the necessary changes to produce the improvements that must occur in our penitentiary system? I think that can only happen as we expose the question, and expose all this information, to the general public as well as expose ourselves as members of parliament to the essential issues involved. That is why, in spite of the fact that we have a parliamentary committee in this place and one in the other place doing things in a piecemeal manner, there is a real danger in piecemeal activity. I would suggest that one of the reasons we have had a rapid increase in the prison population this year is the fact that we have had piecemeal changes, mandatory supervision, cutting down on paroles, stiffer sentencing, greater police efficiency, all of which has been brought about by certain changes or potential reforms in the system but done on an ad hoc basis. This method endangers the present structure because we have overcrowding in many federal institutions, and that has caused some of the disturbances and riots and may well cause more if we do not treat the situation as a total concept.

While it is true that, as members of parliament, we have a basic duty to reflect and exchange the views, ideas and concepts of the public we represent, we also have the basic responsibility to provide leadership. I can think of very few areas where leadership is required more than in the whole area of crime and the treatment of crime in our federal institutions. I know there will be a federal-provincial conference in December, but the trouble with so many of these conferences is that often they consist of the converted preaching to the converted. These reports are full of all kinds of notions. The Ouimet report, in the opening of the fourth chapter, contains the following statement:

> Throughout this report we stress the need for public understanding of the issues involved in crime and corrections and for direct citizen participation in the correctional services.

That is what we must achieve. But we will not achieve it just because we set up another royal commission or have another inquiry from the Solicitor General's Department or because a university group produces a report, and there are many such reports now. We must make the Parliament of Canada aware, we must sensitize it to the basic problems that exist within our penal system, and in that process we must have a dialogue with the Canadian people so that the reforms that must be instituted by this parliament can be achieved. I think that is our basic task, and I hope that the suggestion for a joint committee can go a long way toward achieving it. I will be very interested to hear the views of the other hon. members. I hope that they will, in a large measure, support this proposal.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think that all members on this side of the House will generally agree with the suggestion which the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) has made with respect to the inadequacies of the prison system and the need for reform. In fact, we agree with this so much that the government which we support has, in effect, been doing all of the things about which the hon. member for Egmont has been talking. But there remains the problem to which he refers, namely, that there is insufficient public support to enable these reforms to go forward as fast as many of us would wish.

Without at this point getting into the fundamental question of value judgments, the value judgments which, say, the hon. member for Egmont and many other people in this country would make, we can at least agree that there is not really enough publicity given to these problems, and not really enough public awareness of the details such as the actual situation in the prisons, the actual success of our rehabilitative practices, and so on. On the one hand, there is certainly some disillusionment with the work our prisons are doing, but on the other hand, obviously public opinion may be split between those who feel there should be a more repressive attitude taken in prisons and those who feel that the approach should be different and stress the rehabilitive rather than the punitive aspect.

The hon. member frankly stated at several points that, he did not want to be held too closely to the words of the motion that he has put before us. Yet at the end of his speech he did return to the substance of his motion, and so I think it is fair to look at the motion which he has put before us and to consider the debate in those terms, and not in the broader terms of reform of the whole prison system, which he also portrayed in his speech.

The exact motion which the hon. member for Egmont has moved is:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should introduce a measure to establish a parliamentary committee to investigate all aspects of crime and its treatment in Canada, which should have specific terms of reference to closely examine . . .

Here a series of particulars are given:

> . . . (a) the subject of crime prevention and the work of the Correctional Consultation Centre of the Solicitor General's department (b) the subject of punishment—its deterrent value and relevance to the rehabilitative process—with particular attention to capital punishment, by collecting factual information and holding public hearings (c) the correctional process, including the Penitentiary and Parole systems.

There appear to be several elements in the motion which we are being asked to approve today. The request is made that this committee should investigate all aspects of crime and its treatment in Canada. That would seem to suggest, if the words are taken literally, that in dealing with "all aspects of crime" we should be dealing with questions of law enforcement as well as questions of treatment of crime. But from the emphasis which the hon. member has given I would take it that the aspects he is particularly concerned about are those concerned with the treatment of crime in Canada, which somewhat limits the terms of reference.

The fact is that all of the recommendations which are made in this motion are actually under way, and in many cases have been under way for a great length of time. I will not take the time of the House to go through all of the ways in which we are now carrying out these various proposals. But I would draw the attention of the House, in slightly more detailed fashion than has been done by the hon. member, to the work of the special subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

This subcommittee has been actively involved now for some months, with some six or eight members, in visiting penal institutions across Canada. I understand they have visited the institutions in the west, and are now probably about to proceed to those in the eastern part of the country. They have received submissions from inmate committees and from many other people connected with prisons. They are concerned with the general problem of the administration of the penitentiaries. The hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin), who has recently been the centre of much attention in this House as the sponsor of one of the amendments to the capital punishment bill, is the chairman of that subcommittee. I am sure that under her able guidance the committee has been doing not only an excellent job of studying the situation but will make a report which will prove enlightening to the standing committee and to all hon. members of the House.

The Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in the other place has been equally involved with the study of matters which are recommended for our concern in this motion. That committee has had an examination of the parole system of Canada under way for some two years. It has heard roughly 115 briefs from after care groups, inmate groups, and from public organizations such as the Canadian Bar Association. I understand that the committee itself has not held public hearings outside Ottawa, but the staff of the committee has gone across the country to make a tour of the various prisons and to talk with officials and inmates. This committee is looking at all aspects of parole and other types of release, and particularly at such questions as temporary absence, day parole, mandatory supervision, the question of federal-provincial responsibility, the composition of the National Parole Board and questions as to whether it should be regionalized, parole eligibility, and also parole hearings and decisions.

This committee has not, I understand, studied the laws and practices of other countries as such, but it has looked extensively at the model legislation in the United States, and I have no doubt that after a two-year study of this kind, it will be coming forward with a report which will be very important indeed both for parliament and the country.

In sum on this point, all of the matters which it has been suggested here we should look at are being looked at, and in fact some of them are being looked at by parliamentary committees. This brings me to what I believe might be stated to be the second point of the motion, the first being the investigation of crime and its treatment in Canada. The second is that this should be done by a parliamentary committee. In a way, this is probably the most essential point which the hon. member is raising because he, himself, has remarked on the unbelievable amount of information which is available and yet, in contrast with the amount of information, the emotional and snap response which the public often makes to the information and to the situation.

In particular, he has commented on the failure of all sides of the argument to deal rationally with the subject of capital punishment. There is no doubt that this is a failing, but it is not one which is very easy to cure by a parliamentary committee or in any other way, because in fact what is involved in issues such as the capital punishment issue is a deep clash of values between various segments of our population.

Canadians simply do not all believe the same kinds of things and, as the hon. member has suggested, some are not seeing the evidence. One might even say they are not prepared to see the evidence that can be put forward on this subject. And since the result is one that comes from very deeply felt attitudes towards life, it is not easy to see how the work of a parliamentary committee, or indeed of parliament itself, could change such deeply seated views. Yet I would not want to be despairing of the expectation that any of us, indeed all of us, could change our minds on questions such as this.

Now, we really come to the question which the hon. member has most directly placed before us, the question of public understanding, and he has included in that the understanding of members of this House, of the issues. He believes that the best way to have an effective public understanding of all the issues connected with crime and its treatment would be through dramatizing the issues through the public acts of a special parliamentary committee. One thing which I cannot refrain from saying in a debate such as this, and I say it all the more because it certainly does not apply to the hon. member for Egmont, or indeed to any other hon. members I see in the House at the present time, is that there are some hon. members of this House who, it seems to me, for political advantage rather shamelessly exploit various aspects of the penal situation. When problems arise many of the members opposite will make political capital of them in a way which will inflame public opinion.

I believe this is one of the sources, perhaps one of the major sources for the continuation of this problem which we have, the fact that it is not something on which members of this parliament are showing positive leadership. This is a matter with respect to which some members are showing negative leadership. Only if that factor can be changed can we begin to make progress in guiding the public.

If a parliamentary committee is to be useful in resolving the sort of conflicts that arise in parliament and in the country generally on issues such as this, that parliamentary committee should not be a special committee. I think we should work through the ordinary standing committees of the House. After all, if the issue we are considering is one of the great issues confronting our country at this time, it should be brought before a parliamentary committee. Our parliamentary standing committees have been established to deal with such matters and they have been dealing with them for a long time.

Several years the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, of which I was and still am a member, studied the penitentiary system. That study fizzled out. It was undertaken during the course of our study of the estimates. We went west and looked at some penal institutions. I think that experience was an eye-opener for many members of this House who had not been inside such institutions. We saw not only what was being done, which was all too little, but we saw the tremendous difficulties that are encountered in doing anything to rehabilitate prisoners in our institutions, especially in the kind of prisons which we have traditionally established.

Without pursuing all the details of that investigation, may I say the failure of that justice committee to pursue this matter adequately was the result of a failure of determination on the part of members of the committee. That failure should not be taken as an indication of what the standing committees of this House can or cannot do. For many reasons I feel that an inquiry such as the one suggested should not be undertaken by a special committee. The only advantage that I can see flowing from the establishment of such a committee would be that it would include members of the other chamber. This might be an advantage in helping us to co-ordinate all our views on the subject.

Quite apart from any considerations involving our committee system, I believe that even if we were to set up, first, a special committee which would look into the problem, we should still need to bring it back to the justice committee or whatever committee of the House may be most directly seized of this subject matter. The special committee somehow would need to involve the members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. In other words, the justice committee being the committee that is charged with dealing with matters of this kind, it being the committee that works with the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, it would be the body which in the final analysis would have to see to it that progress was made. If that body was separate and apart from the body undertaking the investigation, I do not think the purposes which the hon. member has in mind as set out in the motion would be well served.

As many hon. members wish to take part in this debate I will say no more except to observe again that we on this side of the House share the hon. member's concern about reforming the system. Some of us harbour reservations about our ability to accomplish what the hon. member wishes. We do not think you can do it by setting up a special parliamentary committee. However, I would very much favour, as I know other hon. members would, giving such further terms of reference as are necessary on this subject to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to enable it to pursue investigations that are even more wide-ranging than those it is at present pursuing.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member introduced the motion standing in his name he spoke sincerely and, if I may say so without giving offence, he also sounded frustrated and in some ways disillusioned with respect to this subject matter. The parliamentary secretary went on at length recounting the work of the committees. He made special reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which has been seized of many matters coming within the general ambit of the motion before us.

As I listened to the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), who mentioned that three major royal commissions have looked into these matters since 1938, and as I listened to the parliamentary secretary and reflected on the various pieces of legislation and reports of various commissions with respect to which the committee reported to the Solicitor General, it seemed to me the last thing we need is another parliamentary committee to do what the motion proposes. It seeks the establishment of a parliamentary committee which would look into all aspects of crime and its treatment in Canada.

Much of the time, particularly in the last ten years, the attention of this House has been devoted to the investigation of crime and its treatment. Increasingly, people of this country have come to feel that this exercise is becoming more and more futile. Indeed, as I was listening to the hon. member I looked at a newspaper that had come from my constituency today. The headline, in big, black letters reads, "War declared on vandals". The article which follows reads in part:

> Broken windows, garbage dumped in the street and other rowdy activities showing an apparent total disregard for law and order were typical of this group . . .

The article continues:

> The underlying problem, according to the Cumberland mayor, is that the 'laws are taking the teeth out of law enforcement.'

The article then refers to a recent letter sent to the Attorney General which blames—

> . . . 'the leniency of the courts and the lack of support given to the police by the courts' . . .

Apparently the matter was of great concern to the council. The letter continued:

> 'In many cases the police are severely handicapped in dealing with situations because of the permissiveness allowed and perpetuated by senior levels of government. Often, when violations do result in convictions, the penalties are so inadequate as to make a mockery of the whole process.'

I quoted that excerpt to illustrate this point: although parliament has been concentrating more of its efforts in this area, and although members are becoming more expert on the fine points of administering our penal system and developing new approaches to parole than at any time in our history, the kind of sentiments expressed in the article are on the increase. Dumping garbage on the streets is not a crime in the sense that committing murder is a crime; nevertheless, in many ways the two crimes are not so different one from another.

The hon. member's notice of motion has been on the order paper for some time. Certain events have taken place since it was first put on the order paper. I have referred to garbage being dumped on the streets and to acts of vandalism. In my view, the last thing that we need is a parliamentary committee, special or otherwise, which would spend further time looking into "the subject of punishment—its deterrent value and relevance to the rehabilitative process—with particular attention to capital punishment". Capital punishment has been examined in greater depth by this House than perhaps any other aspect of crime, probably with little or no effect on the incidence of murder.

Instead of trying to have a committee of this House look into all aspects of crime and its treatment, it might be a more useful exercise if this House, either as a body or through some special mechanism, spent a little time looking at crime and its causes. By and large we have completely ignored the root causes of crime in discussions about changes to our penal laws, parole acts and all the other matters which come under the administration of the so-called correctional system. We have not done anything in so far as focusing the attention of this House and the Canadian public on the whole question of the causes of crime.

Because I have not taken part in any of the committee meetings I wish to say a few words in this debate. Quite frankly, I am a little sick and tired at the fact that we have increasingly been conducting microscopic examinations into little changes this way or that in connection with the question of crime and its treatment. Perhaps that is one of the main failures of governments of this country in the past ten years. In my view it is one of the basic failures of the whole outlook and thrust of action we get from Liberal governments.

While they tend to be composed of well-meaning, humanitarian-minded individuals, as is the hon. member for Egmont, they refuse to look squarely in the face the kind of society which has been growing in our country. They refuse to recognize that the very foundation of our society is greed which is surrounded by a halo of something, in sort of glorious quotation marks, called free enterprise. In the name of free enterprise we have built a society that is now starting to react increasingly in the way I have suggested. There is increasing vandalism. When I say we should start looking at the causes, I mean we should have an economic debate in this House. If we want to get at crime, let us get at some of the real causes of poverty and injustice which seem to be the nature of our society.

I am old enough to have been born in an age when 80 out of 100 Canadians were born on farms. Most of us lived in a rather healthy, rural kind of community. Unless we went to one of the larger centres we could go for years without ever seeing a policeman. Yet in the little village referred to in this newspaper article, the only thing that has happened is that they have increased the police force. We have become increasingly a people dispossessed of any real ownership or feeling of participation in what makes our economy tick. When people feel dispossessed, lost and rootless it is axiomatic, when they see others who have legally amassed great control and wealth and are sitting at the top, that there will be resentment against this basic injustice.

As well-meaning as the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Egmont is, I submit that setting up a committee to do the kind of job suggested would not accomplish anything. It would not accomplish any more than the other dozen standing or special committees, or royal commissions we have had in recent years. If the hon. member really wants to see a turnabout in this kind of attitude, as do we who have taken the position that murder by the state is not an answer to murder by an individual, he should be asking the House to concentrate upon these kinds of things. I know this is a nettle that people like the hon. member for Egmont do not want to grasp. But unless he is prepared to come to grips with and grasp firmly a desire to deal with these things and recognize this is a society whose foundation is based upon greed and the grabbing of profit, which is bound to breed crime among those who have been dispossessed, he will not achieve the purpose which in his heart I know he desires.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable sympathy for the motion of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) that I rise to speak on this subject. While I tend to agree with some of the comments made by previous speakers that perhaps a special parliamentary committee on this subject is not necessarily the right way, it strikes me that many of the comments made by the hon. member are worthy of further thought and, certainly in my case, admiration for the consideration which went into his remarks on this problem.

I may be incorrect because I am working from memory, but I believe recidivism is approximately 80 per cent in the case of individuals who have been incarcerated for more than one year. Where they have been incarcerated for less than a year, the rate of recidivism is approximately 20 per cent. Taking another aspect of our whole concept of punishment of crime, it is almost stunning that in an effort to reform an individual—and surely punishment is not the only aspect we are interested in, in terms of crime—and to return him or her to a normal, productive life as a citizen, one of the big things we should think of is placing such an individual in the same building and in the same environment as hardened criminals.

There can be little doubt that whatever our intentions may be with regard to the correction of criminal mentality, it is none the less a fair accusation against the penitentiary system to say it constitutes a school for criminals. In all fairness, mention should be made of the other aspects of the penitentiary system and the very substantial efforts which have gone into correcting and improving that situation. However, there remains enough of a problem that I believe the comments of the hon. member for Egmont on that subject are perfectly valid.

I wish to underline the comment made by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), I say this with all due respect for the hon. member for Egmont, but I ask him at the same time to acknowledge that it is a very sad practice on the part of some members of the House to seek to derive political advantage from every escape which occurs. They play to the media. This attitude does none of us any good. It is certainly not good for society that we should use an escape from prison as an opportunity for political gain. It is most regrettable that this practice should continue.

I think it is most timely that the hon. member's motion should have come forward today. As he may know, commencing today and lasting for the next three days is a national conference on youth services in crime prevention which is being held at the government conference centre. This conference has representation from departments of the federal government, the provinces and volunteer agencies. This goes to the merits of what is suggested in the hon. member's motion. There is considerable hope that the experience gained from such a conference will be valuable in enabling us to make further advances toward the goal we have in mind, that is, to prevent crimes taking place and to prevent individuals becoming criminals.

I shall be more brief that I had intended, Mr. Speaker. I had thought to discuss action taken through the Department of the Solicitor General, in co-operation with other departments, in terms of crime prevention among young people. I shall only say that the broad activities of the department and of other departments are concerned with planning to prevent delinquency through the development of interventional procedures prior to a youth's entrance into the criminal justice aggregate, the expansion of relations between the police and the community, activities reflecting innovation in the police role, the expansion of community corrections and the development of manpower planning in diversifying the utilization of human resources in social defence. I might also in parentheses mention the study to which the hon. member for Egmont referred.

A considerable amount of work has already been done, though work still remains to be done. There is a reasonable expectation, in line with the contemplated expenditure of close to $1 million in the next two years, of doing something along the lines proposed by the hon. member in terms of working out a new and refreshing way of dealing with the whole question of crime and punishment. The government and the department of the Solicitor General are well aware of the type of thinking which has been expressed in the House today. I certainly share with the hon. member for Egmont the hope that it will begin to change the almost Middle Ages mentality which exists today when it comes to the whole question of crime and punishment, particularly as it relates to young people who seem to be placed in the position of having virtually no hope of returning to a normal life once they have been convicted; at least, their chances of doing so are increasingly becoming very slim.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I can see that time is passing but I sincerely want to congratulate the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) for his motion.

I am not in favour of establishing a new committee. In my opinion, as stated by the hon. member, we are well enough documented to be able to reach a political decision with regard to penal reform.

Because of the lack of time, I will simply call the House's attention on a point which I consider most important. I have practised criminal law for seven years and I have always been irritated by all that time spent at determining conviction, determining whether someone was guilty or not while the sentence aspect was neglected, that is what to do with the accused once convicted.

I think that much time was devoted to conviction by opposition to sentencing because the lawyer could see the inadequacy of the penal system and of the means available to the criminals and found it advisable to tell his client not to plead guilty and be rehabilitated in those institutions but to plead not guilty so as to avoid the harmful experiences which are the current results of those institutions.

The Prévost report which was submitted to the Quebec legislature pointed out that we should have a distinction between the sentencing system and the convicting system and I am in perfect agreement. In closing my remarks, I think we should adopt the principle of two judges, one to determine conviction and a second specialized in sentencing.

Mr. Speaker, that was my contribution to this debate.

CANADA PENSION PLAN (No. 2)

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ANNUAL INCREASES AND LEVEL OF INCOME ON WHICH CONTRIBUTIONS WILL BE PAID

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-224, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the applause you heard has very little to do with the present bill. None the less, I think we should go back to our business and carry on with consideration of Bill C-224 which I had begun to talk about shortly before five o'clock.

[Translation]

When debate was adjourned at five o'clock, I was saying that, if enacted by the Parliament of Canada and the Quebec legislature, the agreements reached at the last federal-provincial conference would have a profound effect on both pension plans. Among other things, they mean that maximum CPP retirement, which now run at about $90 a month, could reach a level of $250 a month by the end of this decade. They also mean that the bonds of national unity as they affect Canadians in their daily lives, now and in the future, will be strengthened in that differences which had developed early this year between the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan with respect to contributions, retirement pensions, and the escalation of benefits will be removed for 1974 and future years. In other words, employers and employees in all provinces will, once again, be subject to identical CPP-QPP contributions, and citizens in Quebec and the rest of Canada will receive virtually the same retirement pensions, which in turn will be escalated in a common manner to take account of changes in the cost of living.

Clearly, this will contribute to the mobility of workers between all parts of Canada. Important differences between the two plans will still exist, notably with respect to the so-called flat-rate component of survivor and disability benefits, but these will be reviewed on a priority basis with my provincial colleagues.

The changes to the Canada Pension Plan which the federal government has developed in conjunction with the provinces, and which I am committed to place before Parliament, present the government with a difficult dilemma.

As I mentioned a few moments ago, these changes will, if enacted, have a profound and long term effect on the Canada Pension Plan. Many Canadians, organizations, and Parliament will naturally wish to examine these proposed reforms thoroughly, and with a great deal of care. This is as it should be and as I would wish it to be. On the other hand, the government is anxious that increased benefits be placed in the hands of the 500,000 beneficiaries, who would immediately be affected by full escalation, in the earliest month possible, which is January 1974.

In addition, the government does not believe that 7 million CPP contributors and their employers should be placed in a long period of doubt as to the level of their 1974 contributions, nor should they be required to make retroactive payments to the CPP Fund.

This possibility could arise if enactment of the proposed earnings ceilings for next year is delayed beyond January 1, 1974.

To meet these conflicting objectives, the government has decided to split its legislation for amending the Canada Pension Plan into two bills—one bill would concern itself with the most urgently required changes, and the other one, with various other changes. The government hopes that with this approach, and the co-operation of Parliament and Canadians generally, it will be possible to meet the immediate needs of 1974 CPP beneficiaries and contributors, and at the same time leave Parliament and the people of Canada with ample opportunity and time to scrutinize the proposals that will have a fundamental and long-term effect on the Canada Pension Plan.

Bill C-224, therefore, represents the first of the two major CPP amendment bills which the government proposes to introduce, and contains the most urgently required reforms—that is, full escalation of CPP benefits, and increased earnings ceilings for CPP contributions for 1974 and 1975.

The second bill, which I hope to introduce later on, will concern itself with the other reforms mentioned.

[English]

The first major objective of Bill C-224 is to provide fully escalated benefits for the 500,000 persons who I estimate will be drawing CPP retirement, survivor and disability benefits as of December 31, 1973.

More specifically, the bill will achieve the following: Firstly, it would provide that from January 1, 1974 on, CPP benefits would be fully escalated according to increases in the cost of living. Secondly, it would fully restore the purchasing power of benefits which became payable between 1967 and 1973 and which are still being paid on December 31, 1973. In other words, for payments in 1974, the 2 per cent limit on the cost of living escalation of CPP benefits that now applies would be treated as though it had never existed for those monthly benefits still in pay. Thirdly, it would place the escalation of CPP benefits on a more current basis. At the present time, CPP benefits are adjusted according to movements in the consumer price index that occur over a 12-month period ending on June 30 of the previous year. This bill would advance this 12-month period to October 31.

In addition to allowing more current adjustments for the future, this amendment would require the 1974 benefit adjustment on the basis of a 16-month cost of living change. By referring to the bill hon. members will see the actual clause in that respect.

These changes, when taken together, mean that the retirement pensions that are being paid on December 31, 1973, would be increased in January, 1974, by rates ranging from 8 per cent to 20 per cent, depending upon the year in which they began. Perhaps for the record I should give these figures for each year, starting in 1967. I will not mention the individual years, but the years can be considered in ascending order. For retirement benefit, beginning in 1967, the January, 1974, escalation would be approximately 20 per cent, and in the subsequent years it would be 18 per cent, 15.5 per cent, 13.5 per cent, 11 per cent, 10.5 per cent and 8 per cent.

Orphans benefits would all be increased by about 20 per cent without regard to the year in which they first became payable. Basic orphan benefits would, therefore, rise from their present level of $28.15 a month to about $33.75 per month.

The effect of these changes on widows, disability and disabled widower benefits cannot be calculated as readily, for these benefits are comprised of differing combinations of flat rate components, which would be increased by 20 per cent, and earnings—related components which would be increased from 8 per cent to 20 per cent.

The increases for these benefits would, however, fall in the range of 8 per cent to 20 per cent for widows over 65, 13 per cent to 20 per cent for widows under 65; and 11 per cent to 20 per cent for disability benefits. Generally speaking, the largest percentage increases would apply to those drawing benefits for the longest period and to those drawing the smallest benefits. The cost of making these escalation improvements is estimated at approximately $30 million for 1974.

The second objective of the bill is to increase the earnings ceiling for Canada Pension Plan contributions for 1974 and 1975. The act, at present, provides that this ceiling which, to use the language of the act, is called the year's maximum pensionable earnings, is determined, up to and including 1975, by the consumer price index, subject to a 2 per cent annual increase ceiling. This formula would produce earnings ceilings of $5,700 and $5,800 for 1974 and 1975 respectively. The government, through Bill C-224, is proposing that these ceilings be raised to $6,600 for 1974, and to $7,400 for 1975.

In my meetings with the provinces, with labour and business organizations and with members of the Canada Pension Plan advisory committee, I encountered the virtually unanimous view that the current earnings ceiling for CPP coverage is grossly inadequate. This view coincides with the one held by the government. Generally speaking, the view was expressed that the ceiling should move according to the movement of average wages in the Canadian economy, but different views were expressed as to whose wages should be used to adjust the earnings ceiling and how the adjustments should be calculated.

The issue of the criteria that should be used for adjusting the earnings ceiling on a continuing basis will be covered in the next CPP amendment bill. I might mention here that there has been unanimous agreement among the provinces and the federal government as to the basis for this adjustment. This present bill only establishes the ceilings for 1974 and 1975 only.

Although the proposed increases are substantial, it should be noted that they are still well short of reflecting the movement of Canadian wages since the inception of the plan. Average earnings this year are about $8,400. Next year it is estimated that they will rise to $9,000, and in 1975 to $9,600. The ceilings proposed have been determined on the following basis: for 1974, the CPP ceiling would be raised first to $5,900 to coincide with the one applying now to the QPP, and then by 12½ per cent to a level of $6,600. For 1975, the ceiling would be determined by increasing the 1974 ceiling by 12½ per cent to $7,400. In other words, the earnings ceiling for 1975 will, if the bill is enacted, be slightly in excess of the level that would have existed if the $5,000 earnings ceiling of 1966 had simply been increased by the full rise in the cost of living.

I should mention that establishment of an earnings ceiling for 1974 is an urgent requirement to enable employers to make CPP contribution payroll deductions from the start of 1974, and to avoid subjecting employers and employees to retroactive adjustments. However, establishment of an earnings ceiling for 1975 is also desirable to obviate an administrative difficulty for the Department of National Revenue.

To illustrate the problem I might mention that our desire to escalate CPP benefits in pay on the most current basis has led us to relate the cost of living adjustment of benefits to movements in the consumer price index to the end of October. The consumer price index, however, also determines, as the law now stands, the earnings ceiling for contributions up to and including 1975. While relating the adjustment of benefits to movements in the consumer price index up to October 31 is highly desirable, this date, if used for adjusting the earnings ceiling, would not allow the Department of Revenue sufficient time to give employers and employees adequate notice of payroll deduction requirements for 1975.

To remove this difficulty, the bill establishes the earnings ceiling for 1975 as well. Future arrangements for determining the earnings ceiling will be dealt with in the next bill which I plan to introduce on this question, and it may very well be that at that time we will want to repeat the provision for 1975.

The increases which the bill proposes in the earnings ceilings for 1974 and 1975 will have two important effects for new beneficiaries and contributors. That is, they will raise the level of retirement pensions and the earnings-related portions of survivor and disability benefits that will come into pay in the future. Secondly, they will increase total contributions for contributors who have earnings in excess of the present ceiling. The current contribution rates of 1.8 per cent for employees and employers, and 3.6 per cent for self-employed persons will, of course, not be changed by the bill.

I should like very briefly to illustrate the effect of these ceilings on retirement pensions. Under the present provisions of the act, maximum retirement pensions will reach $90.71 a month this December, just before the bill would come into effect. With the new ceilings, and operation of the transitional features of the plan, maximum retirement pensions would reach $109.60 a month in December, 1974, and $134.96 a month in December, 1975. This represents an increase of approximately 50 per cent over a two-year period.

● (2020)

Increasing the earnings ceiling to $6,600 for 1974 will, as a byproduct, have the effect of increasing the contribution exemption from $600 to $700. This means that the contribution exemption level under the CPP and QPP will be the same for 1974. It also means that contributors with earnings of less than $5,700 in 1974 will find that the total CPP contributions they will have to make for 1974 will be slightly less than the ones they are making for 1973. Employee contributors with earnings in excess of $5,700 for 1974 will be required to contribute an additional 15 cents a month for each $100 of earnings in excess of $5,700, to a maximum additional contribution of $1.35 a month for 1974.

In other words, the maximum employee contribution for 1974 will increase from the current figure of $90 to $106.20. This would be matched by the employer. For the self-employed, who pay double rates, the maximum contribution would increase from $180 this year to $212.40 next year. On balance, it is estimated that the new earnings ceiling for 1974 will raise the level of contributions coming into the Canada Pension Plan fund during 1974 by about $100 million.

The most significant other provision in Bill C-224 is found in clause 8. This clause waives, for this bill only, the requirement that provinces must be given at least two years' advance notice of substantive amendments to the Canada Pension Plan. If this requirement were observed in this instance, it would not be possible to introduce full escalation of CPP benefits until January 1, 1976. The bill does, however, preserve the normal provincial consent provisions of the act, which means that if this bill were enacted by parliament it cannot come into force until two-thirds of the provinces having two-thirds of the Canadian population have signified their consent to the enacted amendments.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that I fully expect that this consent will be given. In fact, the provisions of the bill before this House tonight have received the unanimous endorsement of all provinces at the federal-provincial conference of October 11, in Ottawa.

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-224, if enacted by parliament, will increase the CPP payments now being received by some 500,000 Canadians by amounts varying from 8 to 20 per cent of current payments: it will increase the level of CPP retirement pensions and other benefits coming into pay in the future; and it will restore parallelism between the Canada and the Quebec Pension Plans in the areas of contributions, the escalation of current benefits, and future retirement pensions. I hope hon. members will agree that these important improvements should be passed on to Canadians as quickly as possible.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it will hardly come as a great surprise to the minister if I say to him that I see little likelihood that we will be opposing this measure, fighting it to the death or in any other way trying to make difficult the passage of a measure which, as he pointed out, has already the unanimous approval of the provinces. This, of course, is one of the aspects to which I made reference not long ago, that there is something akin to a fait accompli when the House of Commons takes up measures which have been dealt with by two levels of government in executive conclave. Indeed, much of the administration of this country is moving into this particular area of dual governmental administrative procedure.

I must observe, also, that the minister's making a speech and my following him is becoming quite a habit, and I am wondering if none of his colleagues in the cabinet has any legislation to bring before parliament, or is he the only working minister in the whole lot? It seems we did have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), in a rather gentle and detached way, presiding over the CN financing bill within the last few days; but we all know that bill has been around for several years and one has to look through one's notes in order to recall when it was first brought to the baptismal font of this legislative cathedral.

Although it is not because I want to go out and hear the Quebec election returns, because I do not think there is a great deal of contention about them, I wish I could stand up and say in a few sentences that this is an excellent measure and we are for it. However, we live in times and under conditions whereby measures of this kind, measures that are very commendable, even in the process of their discussion, agreement and presentation become outdated. It is not possible, it seems, under current dispensation for this minister who is working very hard in this particular area to keep up with the needs of the people.

The problem is that this change was decided and agreed upon some months ago. I believe these figures came out, certainly in the orange paper and perhaps in the Speech from the Throne. One wonders, in view of escalating living costs, whether they have become somewhat unrealistic.

I quite agree with the minister's statement—I do not know whether or not he was quoting the provincial ministers—that the ceilings were grossly inadequate. They certainly were, and the movement upward is to be heartily commended. Certainly we want the movement upward in respect of these pensions not delayed for one single day. Needless to say, I rejoice in the departure from that unrealistic and iniquitous 2 per cent figure. We on this side of the House are not recent converts to that particular point of view. My distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), in the previous parliament, on one of the allotted days under Standing Order 58, moved a no confidence motion which read as follows:

That this House condemns the government's failure to contribute to pensions, allowances and other benefits granted or administered by the government a yearly percentage increase corresponding to the percentage increase in the consumer price index for Canada.

That is what my colleague moved in 1972 in the month of March, some months before a certain event took place in October. In 1971, as was alluded to this afternoon in that very interesting discussion on procedure in which the minister made a brief intervention and I, with greater caution, made none, reference was made to a bill which I brought before the House which, had it been in order, had it been accepted and passed, indeed would have put into effect the actual cost of living increase two years ago instead of at the present time.

So, with all the modesty which I always display, I may say that I personally am not a recent convert to the idea of knocking out that unrealistic—now pathetically unrealistic—figure of 2 per cent. I can assure the minister that we all are behind him in this or, perhaps if we want to be nasty, he is behind us; but it does not make any difference who is behind whom—we are all trying to help the Canadian people, and that is what really counts.

One notes the minister's suggestion that we have yet another Canada Pension Plan, No. 3, and that we should therefore move to discuss and pass with reasonable expedition, this bill dealing with the raising of the ceilings in effect and making realistic the cost of living increase. I think that is a good way of proceeding, although it means that he and I again will become the workhorses of the House of Commons in the legislative sense. So there will be a time for ampler discussion on broad concepts with particular reference to the question of the Canada Pension Plan and, indeed, the whole question of the social security system of the country generally.

I was impressed by the reference in the dominion-provincial communique, to which I believe the minister made an allusion this afternoon, to the following effect:

... effective in 1974, retirement pensions will become payable at age 65 to any person who has ceased to contribute to the plan, regardless of his or her earnings. Thus the earnings test which has been applied to people between 65 and 69 will be eliminated. The Government of Quebec has already liberalized the earnings test under the Quebec Pension Plan.

This is something which we look forward to discussing with great seriousness. I have said before in the House that I think this country has reached the stage where its citizens should be able, if they wish, to withdraw from the active labour force at 60 years of age. I think also—and I have said this before—that it is not incumbent upon the government either to put people at that age out to pasture or on the shelf, whichever metaphor one prefers. But I think there should be that level of security from this state that they may be able voluntarily to withdraw from the active working force, and the state should be able to provide them means whereby they can live a full and interesting life, one without fear of economic disaster.

I believe that that is a very important goal. I have always been slightly intrigued by the situation under the Canada Pension Plan where, if you carry through with some brittle logic, you would say that we discourage the guys from 65 to 69 from working, but it is quite all right for the fellows from 70 to 99 to enter the working force and they will not suffer. Of course, that is carrying the logic to a brittle conclusion.

Another thing which is obvious in the structure of the Canada Pension Plan, as we talk about ceilings and as we compute pension rates, is that so many people will find that as they carry through the Canada Pension Plan they will get no uplift; if they are in poverty, they will remain there. Of course, this is the flaw if the potential return is geared solely to earnings, and this is an aspect which requires careful consideration.

I know we do not assume that the whole program of security is vested in or rests upon the Canada Pension Plan, but I was looking through the latest report a while ago and I saw some figures which were pretty upsetting. The average amounts of monthly benefits in March 1971 were as follows: retirement pension, $23.03. We know the CPP had not run its full course, but $23.03 is a pretty small amount. The widow's pension was $59.38. Even the improved figures—and we welcome and salute them—which the minister mentioned tonight, and I presume I have them somewhere in my voluminous files, show a maximum of $109.60 in December, 1974.

According to my arithmetic, the figure is something like $1,619.52 a year. I think that the Senate poverty report set out $2,650.00 a year per person as the poverty level, plus OAS if he is old enough. As I said earlier, I am not suggesting that the whole plan rests upon this, but we have to realize that we are not dealing here with any great generosity. I do not think the minister can be accused by anyone of recklessness. I think these projected figures are by no means too high, and indeed we must constantly improve the lot of the people of this country, and especially of those in the upper age bracket.

Another group which we must consider—and it is always a pleasure to look at this group—is the group of women in our society. I think that in this age of enlightenment—I look at a particular expert on this, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) who was so well honoured in his native province the other day—we must look into our existing legislation. I do not believe it is sufficient to say that the housekeeper, the mother, the wife is not in every way entitled to become a full-fledged participant in the Canada Pension Plan. I do not think that she need be tagged in there as a dependent. I would like to see the housewife become, not the dependent of the male wage earner but enter into the plan in her own right.

I think that is not only the proper treatment for a very important segment of the kind of society which we believe in and which we have, but the people who know these things in an actuarial way, my business friends and colleagues in my party who have learned how to make money—something I have never been able to do—and who understand economics tell me that this would strengthen and improve the plan itself. Certainly it would do a great deal to recognize—to use an old-fashioned expression, and I do not know whether it is adequate at the present time—the equality of the sexes. This is an area I am looking forward to discussing in greater detail. I am sure my colleagues, particularly the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), will want to express views further to and in elucidation of those which have already been advanced by her.

Although I know other ministers are not bringing forward very much legislation, I think this minister, with his activity, is allowing the House, indeed prompting the House to take a careful look at the whole question of care for the aged. Last week it was legislation for the young, for the children. We have got miles to go in reference to the disabled. I do not know whether it is because the two parties are nearly in balance now, whether the people of Canada believe that it will not be too long before there may be changes, but I have found an absolutely phenomenal increase in my correspondence. My staff have found it too, as a matter of fact. The magnitude of the problems people are facing in this field is simply overwhelming. I think it is well that we are dealing with these questions, trying to make the best of what is available, to bring our best thoughts to bear on improving the lot of our people.

I would say that we are just beginning to get into the orange paper. When I first spoke on it some months ago, I said then that the references to the Canada Pension Plan and to family allowances were the two things I could detect as tangibles. We have to go a lot farther than that. I think in this country we will have to move into more serious consideration of integrating our whole concept of the well-being of our citizens. I think we will have to look into private pension plans. I think we will have to consider carefully those people who are excluded from existing plans. We must look with far more generosity and compassion on the disabled. I received a letter just last week from a man who cannot get out of his bed, who has one retarded child, two other children and a wife working at low wages. He gets $60 a month. How do you answer a man like that? What do you say?

So I say to the minister—I know some of my colleagues will be picking up the detailed provisions in the bill—that he need not worry about passage of this measure. I enjoyed his remarks very much. I think, from what I can gather, that the meetings which he had with the provincial ministers were fruitful and useful. I was impressed by the communique. We will be asking some further questions in committee, but we want to expedite this measure, to help the 500,000 people he has mentioned to gain some improvement in their status, to give them some support in their attempts to cope with the cost of living situation which is very painful, very prevalent; and for so far as this goes to improve the lot of our fellow citizens, naturally we support and will support the passage of the bill. We look forward to the minister's next performance, and we will give him that same attentive, sincere, impartial, non-political assistance which we have always vouchsafed him in all his efforts.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in spite of my effort this afternoon to get a procedural ruling that would permit private members to make amendments to this bill, and in spite of the fact that we may still try, I want to say at the outset that we very warmly welcome Bill C-224. I noticed the valiant effort of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) to say that in reverse. I thought he succeeded in doing it very nicely by saying he was not against the bill. He leaves me no option but to come right out and say that we welcome it; but of course I can always add the phrase "so far as it goes".

I noted the minister's statement on why he is presenting two bills to deal with the matters to which the federal government and the provinces have agreed, namely, that the items in this bill are so important, and that it is so urgent to get them onto the statute books before the end of 1973, that it was better to bring them in now rather than waiting until the finishing touches had been added to the other changes that are proposed.

The importance of removing the 2 per cent ceiling and of raising the yearly maximum pensionable earnings on which persons can contribute is such that I accept the minister's word on this point, namely, that this bill should not have been delayed until the other points were completely resolved. But I urge him very strongly to get that other bill in just as soon as he can. I was not very happy some days ago when he said something to the effect that he might not be able to get the other bill introduced before Christmas. I still hope he will find it possible to do so, because some of the other points that are going to be dealt with in it are likewise very important.

As an incidental benefit from this bill, I wish to share in the sense of satisfaction that it puts the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan back on parallel paths. As the record will show, I expressed considerable concern during 1972 at the extent to which these two plans were following separate paths in certain respects. The then minister of national health and welfare did not seem to think it was terribly serious. At any rate, I did. I am glad that now, with respect to such things as the escalation formula and the yearly maximum pensionable earnings, the plans will again be parallel with each other.

Sir, the minister has outlined in very clear terms the things that this bill does. Therefore, it is not necessary for me to go over them as we sometimes do just to make sure that we understand. I do want to say how welcome is the decision to abolish that 2 per cent ceiling on the annual escalation of pensions and other benefits paid under the Canada Pension Plan.

I suppose it is inevitable that because there are four parties in this House we should all want to get the inside track or be the ones to have made the first pronouncement. I was interested to note that the hon. member for Hillsborough pointed out that the proposal to remove the 2 per cent ceiling was actually made in 1972 by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard), and in a bill proposed by the hon. member for Hillsborough in 1971. There is some argument, therefore, as to which one of the two main parties was before the other in making this suggestion.

May I remind both the Liberals and the Conservatives that when the Hon. Judy LaMarsh in 1964 or 1965 first announced the escalation formula of 2 per cent and made the statement on motions, it was my privilege to respond on behalf of my party. Accordingly, that very day I criticized and attacked that 2 per cent limit as grossly inadequate. When we got the first Canada Pension Plan into the joint committee and dealt with it, I did my best to persuade the government of the day that it was not good enough, for example, to apply the wage index to the escalation of pension entitlement before retirement and then to use only the cost of living index up to a 2 per cent ceiling with respect to the escalation of pensions payable after retirement.

So while my friends on both sides of the House are arguing as to which of the two old parties is ahead of the other, when they talk about 1971, 1972 or 1973 let me remind them that we were fighting against the 2 per cent ceiling in 1964 and 1965. In a sense, since we have had to wait that much longer to win, I suppose the joy in our camp is all the greater.

The past state of affairs has been a disgrace, especially in the last few years when the cost of living has been mounting by a much larger percentage than the annual increase in Canada pension benefits, limited as that increase has been to an annual increase of 2 per cent. The value of the Canada Pension Plan which is, without doubt, a most important piece of social legislation has been severely tarnished by that 2 per cent limitation. I congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) for having been able to persuade his cabinet colleagues to remove that ceiling altogether. I congratulate him for getting rid of the ceiling and for the formula under which there is to be established a catch-up factor, the result being that in January, 1974, benefits under the Canada Pension Plan will increase not just by the actual percentage rise in the cost of living in the previous year. For those who had been getting Canada Pension Plan benefits in earlier years there will be a percentage increase, going back to 1967, which will make up for what those people did not get during earlier years.

I thank the minister for putting on the record the actual percentages for each of the years in question, so that persons who are drawing benefits will be able to determine what their increase will be this coming January. It will range from 8 per cent for those whose pensions began in 1973, up to 20 per cent for those whose pensions began back in 1967.

As I say, this is a significant development. A significant step forward has been taken by removing the 2 per cent ceiling and relating pensions to actual cost of living increases. But I must not let this part of my remarks go by without saying to the minister that, although he has the honour and privilege of being the head of his department when this particular battle is being won, he must remember that this is not the end of the matter. He knows that under the Canada Pension Plan, the formula for escalating entitlement during the years that contributors are working is based on the wage index which, over the years, has moved up faster than the cost of living. He knows, also, that a very important joint committee of the Department of Veterans Affairs and organizations representing veterans some months ago recommended that veterans pensions should escalate, not just by the rise in the cost of living but in accordance with the rise in the standard of living.

One of these days, when we have won this cost of living principle across the board, the new crusade will begin. Actually, it is already under way but it will really get going when we push for pensions to reflect, not just the full rise in the cost of living but the full rise in the standard of living. I have pressed that point a good many times and I am doing so again tonight. Wonderful though it is to have pensions escalate by the full percentage increase in the cost of living, it is not good enough to say to our older and retired people, "All you will get in your retirement years is enough for you to be able to buy the same total package of goods and services that you were able to buy at the time you retired."

Those who happen to be working are earning or seeking to earn not just enough to cope with the rise in the cost of living; they are earning or seeking to earn enough to enjoy the rise in the standard of living. I contend that that is a right which belongs to our retired people as well. This is not the end of the story, important though it is to get all pensions to the point where they escalate by the full rise in the cost of living.

I do not detract one iota from the congratulations which the minister deserves for having brought us to this point. Let him, let the government, let this House and let the country know that there is an even greater battle yet to be won, that of escalating pensions by the full rise in the standard of living so that our older and retired people will be part of our total society, our total community, and not segregated into a group which has to do with less than those who are still working. As I say, we welcome most warmly the step which has been taken. The House will hear further from us about the crusade that must yet be carried on.

We also welcome the increases that are now proposed in the yearly maximum pensionable earnings, the YMPE, and the consequent adjustment that will take place in the yearly basic exemption, the YBE. This piece of legislation is as full of alphabetic symbols as American life was in the days of F.D.R. In particular, the raising of the YMPE to $6,600 in 1974 and to $7,400 in 1975 will, as the minister says, put us on the road toward an YMPE that is closer than is now the case to the average earnings of our people. Surely, if a pension plan is to be really worthwhile, it should be based on average earnings and not on just a small portion of those earnings. I will have something to say about this later when I come to the things that I want to propose to improve the bill further. At the moment I simply say that we welcome these increases. I thank the minister for explaining how we get to the figure of $6,600 for 1974 and to that of $7,400 for 1975.

I look forward to that other bill yet to come which will put a formula into the act so that we will know several years in advance what is going to happen to the YMPE. When we use these alphabetical phrases, some may wonder what this is all about. Even when one turns YMPE into yearly maximum pensionable earnings, one may wonder what is the significance of that.

The minister pointed out that this represents the level upon which employees may make their 1.8 per cent contribution, which is matched by the employer. However, even more important, it is the figure that determines the maximum pension a person can get at the time of retirement. After all, the maximum pension one can get out of the Canada Pension Plan is a 25 per cent factor of what one's earnings have been through his career, escalated by the formula that is in the act. The higher we get the level of earnings on which one can contribute the 1.8 per cent, the higher is the pension prospect at the end of the road. I hope to see this go up quite a bit yet, but I will come to that later in my remarks.

The minister has also done a service by telling us about the details in the act. The arrangements and the special clauses in the bill, under which anyone who starts drawing a pension or benefit under this act during the year 1973 will get the benefit of the full escalation, are excellent.

I have examined the bill with a fine toothcomb. As an opposition member it is my duty to see whether anything has been missed in terms of these details. As far as I can ascertain, a pretty good job has been done. This bill, considering the extent to which it goes, is welcomed by us. Like the hon. member for Hillsborough, I can say to the minister that he need not look for much trouble in getting this bill through. Of course, if he wants to look for trouble the way he can do that is by stalling the bringing in of the other bill. We will be glad to get this bill out of the way so the other one can be brought in.

After all these words of praise and welcome that both the hon. member for Hillsborough and I have given to the minister, we had better watch out or some people will be asking us if we are still members of the opposition. Accordingly, I move on to express regret that some of the things the minister promised are not in the bill before us. Some very important matters do not seem to be in prospect very soon.

I am glad to know the minister has the agreement of the provinces to remove the work test or the earnings from employment test from the Canada Pension Plan with regard to those who are between the ages of 65 and 69. As the hon. member for Hillsborough said in his delightful way, what is the logic of discouraging people between 65 and 70 from working and then encouraging them to work when they are between the ages of 70 and 99? I do not know why anyone who looks as much like a Father of Confederation as he does stopped there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There may have been some sense to that work test at age 65 when the Canada Pension Plan was first brought in, but there is certainly no sense to it now. If the minister has the agreement of the provinces to remove the work test, I do not know why it is not in this bill. If he is holding it back as a bargaining piece, he might say so. I do not think he needs to do that. He is getting along very well with the provinces. If it was agreed to, why is it not in this bill? If we can persuade him to put it in when the bill is in committee, that would be a good idea.

Let me say quite frankly that one of the reasons I am glad to see the work test removed for those between age 65 and 69 is that I feel very strongly, as I have argued many times, that the time has come to lower the eligible age, both for old age security and the Canada Pension Plan, to age 60. In advocating that, I have said many times that I am prepared for it to be done on a voluntary basis. In other words, the only people who should draw old age security and Canada Pension Plan benefits at age 60 should be those who are out of the labour market. One of the reasons I am glad to see the work test removed between ages 65 and 69 is now, that we know how it works, it can be applied instead to those between 60 and 64.

Whether that precise test is applied or not, the point I wish to make in this connection is that I press upon the minister tonight, as I have pressed on him in every speech on the subject of pensions I have made in the course of this session since he became minister, that this question of lowering the pensionable age simply will not go away. It is something that is held very strongly by members of all parties in this House. It is put forward in a number of ways. Some talk about lowering the age for women if it cannot be done for men. Others talk about lowering it for spouses, and so on. I think there will be real problems if it is done that way, because if it is done for spouses, what about widows and spinsters?

The fairest way to do this would be to say to everyone who is over 60 and out of the labour market, whether he has ever been in it or whether he gets out of it, that he is entitled to the pension. That would be a fair way of working it, and I push that on the minister very strongly.

I now come to a question to which the hon. member for Hillsborough also alluded. Others will do the same. He made some reference to what the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) might say in this area. I shall refer to what the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) will say in this same field. I am referring to the rights of women.

There is one change, or one group of changes that I really think ought to be in this bill. I refer to those changes that would make things equal in the Canada Pension Plan as between a husband who dies and a wife who dies. Maybe you do not do much for women's liberation by being concerned about what happens to a woman after she dies, but surely if rights are to be equal, the rights that a wife leaves when she dies should be the absolute equal of the rights a husband leaves when he dies. This is a change in the act that could be made rather simply. I believe the interdepartmental committee that has been working on implementation of the Florence Bird report, the report on the status of women, is agreed on that. Frankly, I do not see why this kind of change is not in the bill before us tonight.

I think we ought to go a lot further. The hon. member for Hillsborough was on the right track in what he said in this connection. Some of my hon. friends have argued that housewives be allowed to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan. Some people I know who are professionals or technocrats in this field say it cannot be done because the Canada Pension Plan is an earnings-related scheme. Even in those terms, is it not a fact that when a man and wife decide that one of them is out in industry or business and the other is at home doing what has to be done at home, the income which the one of them brings home is the joint income of both of them? Surely it is the family earnings. A married man who goes out to work knows that what he earns is not his alone; it is the income of both of them.

This being the case, it would not take much wit on the part of those who work in the Department of National Health and Welfare—and I can say there is a lot of it in that department—to amend the bill before us in such a way as to permit contributions on the total income of both spouses, so that pension rights are there in equal terms for both husband and wife on the basis of their total income whether it is made by the husband alone, or by the wife alone, or by both of them. This business of constantly treating the wife or the widow as having only such rights as flow from her husband is certainly a far cry from equal status as between man and woman. In discussing what I have just proposed, it is sometimes suggested that wives might make special contributions, or that husbands might make extra contributions. Difficulties arise, one way or another. But I see no difficulty in accepting the concept that even though the contribution may have to be increased above 1.8 per cent to some higher percentage, pension rights should be equal as between man and woman.

I digress for a moment. I think the whole question of survivors pensions for widows under the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retirement Allowances Act, the Canada National pension plan, and all others across the board, need to be reviewed. We have grown up with this concept and accepted that it was perfectly in order to approve pension plans which provide for what we call 100 per cent pensions to a man on retirement. If his wife dies first, he continues to draw the 100 per cent; but if he dies first, her pension drops to 50 per cent. The sense of this escapes me. I suppose the idea is that the widow needs only a 50 per cent pension because she might pick up another husband, and that the hushand needs the 100 per cent in order to look after another woman if she picks him up. But it really belongs to a mythology of the past.

I do not know why women's lib does not have more to say about this. I expect I will get some letters now saying that women's lib has been pointing these things out. But in the public service, male employees pay 6½ per cent and have survivor benefits, while female employees pay 5 per cent and have no survivor benefits. It does not matter whether a female employee is married or whether the male employee is a bachelor. I suppose this was all right when pension plans were first set up in the public service around a century ago, but certainly it should not apply now.

I am saying that the problem is one which goes beyond the Canada Pension Plan, but certainly within the Canada Pension Plan equality should be established. I hope that in the other bill which the minister will bring in before 1973 is over there will be an increased measure of equality as between men and women. And if the minister does not solve the whole problem then, I trust he will get the very capable people in his department to work on the question of how to operate the plan in such a way that the earnings of man and wife represent a unit on the basis of which each of them has rights which in my view must be equal.

I move, now, into another area in which I believe work should be done by those who are deeply involved in improving the Canada Pension Plan. I relate this to the growing sense of dissatisfaction and concern about private pension plans. One of my hon. friends says too many of them are rip-offs. In too many cases employees at the point of retirement find they are getting much less than they thought they were going to get. There have been various examples of the money not being there. Some improvements have been made. There is the Pension Benefits Standards Act which covers all pensions coming under federal labour jurisdiction, and four provinces have passed similar legislation affecting plans under their own jurisdiction. But these measures really do not go far enough. And even if, by improving the Pension Benefits Standards Act, you could cut down on the number of defaulters and bring about improvement in the plans which some of these employers operate, the plain fact of the matter is that for the masses, for the great majority of Canadian people, the best old age security they have is the security provided by the state.

At the moment it is a combination of old age security and the Canada Pension Plan. Everyone 65 and over qualifies for old age security. If I have my way, that will soon apply at age 60. But I feel the plan should be enlarged in a number of ways so as to try to meet the need which for so many has not been filled by private plans. That is why, when I referred earlier to the YMPE and to the fact that pensions are 25 per cent of one's average earnings, I suggested that pensions paid under the Canada Plan ought to be higher, say 50 per cent of the average earnings, or maybe even more. The minister might tell me that this would involve a higher percentage of contributions than 1.8. I would agree to a higher percentage.

One of the difficulties that would arise is that some people are making payments into private plans and if you require too many percentage points there is not enough left to live on. But surely some way of integration between private plans and the Canada Pension Plan could be worked out. Surely some way could be found whereby employees who are in employment where there is no pension plan in operation at all could pay double that 1.8 per cent and have the prospect of a better pension at the end of the road.

It is fair to say that society will move in this direction. It has taken a few decades to build up the idea that pensions are a social right. People will want this right to be more secure in the years ahead, but they will not get it out of private plans. They will only get it out of a state plan, out of still further improved old age security legislation and a still further improved Canada Pension Plan. I do not look for this massive improvement to appear in the bill the minister will be presenting, hopefully, at the end of this year. But I do ask the minister to put the people in his department to work on this problem of arranging for the Canada Pension Plan to take over in many areas, and certainly to provide the much broader pension protection that all Canadians desire. Many Canadians are in private plans which are unsatisfactory, or do not have anything else except their potential old age security and their potential benefits under the Canada Pension Plan.

Not many were expressing ideas like this when the Canada Pension Plan was first brought into being, because at that stage it was experimental and one could not ask for too much. Now it has proved successful. It has proven itself as the best way of supplementing old age security so that people can have adequate pensions, and I submit that the principles and practices of the Canada Pension Plan should now be greatly enlarged.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, we welcome this bill and the things it does. It escalates all Canada Pension Plan benefits on a basis equal to the full percentage increase in the cost of living, and it raises the amount of earnings on which contributions can be paid, which means greater pensions at the end of the road. We look forward to the other bill that the minister will be bringing in, I hope soon.

In addition to that, I hope the minister will put his people to work on the task of making the Canada Pension Plan a plan that really treats men and women on a basis of absolute equality. I hope the minister will also make the Canada Pension Plan one that will solve the problem of adequate pensions for all our people, bearing in mind the inadequacy of so many private plans. We welcome the progress that has been made in the field of pensions and social security in the last 40 to 50 years, and we look to still greater progress in the years that lie ahead.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join in the hearty praise of this legislation that was so eloquently expressed by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). This legislation is important and it is certainly praiseworthy.

Bill C-224, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, is such an acceptable and popular piece of legislation that any protracted debate of its principle is really quite unnecessary; therefore, my remarks in support of these amendments to the Canada Pension Plan will be appropriately brief.

The sharp rise that has taken place in the consumer price index over the past several months has been a matter of very deep concern to all hon. members of this House and to the government. Inflation has been of concern to all of us because of the squeeze it has put on the budgets of most Canadians, with its oft-times serious effect of eroding the value of their savings. In an inflationary economy the fixed income situation must be eradicated. This is especially so in the case of persons who, as a result of inflation, find themselves in desperate financial circumstances.

Bill C-224 is one of the several responses by this government in its determination to deal with inflation by restoring the purchasing power of those who have been adversely affected by the rising cost of living. These amendments to the CPP will raise to a more acceptable level the pension benefits that have become payable between 1967 and 1973, and will continue to escalate those benefits in accordance with the consumer price index and the growing incomes of the wage and salary earners of Canada.

These amendments to the CPP are further examples of the progressive social legislation of this Liberal government—

Mr. Nielsen: Ugh!

Mr. Penner: —and are in keeping with the well-established traditions of Liberalism to give leadership in social programs that help all Canadians regardless of where they live and work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: Ugh!

Mr. Penner: I hear a few guffaws from the other side of the House. I can only say that there are a great many Canadians who would be frightened of the day, if those members opposite are ever given the opportunity to sit on social legislation programs, when they would be taking no further action.

Mr. Crouse: So you admit the day will come.

Mr. Penner: Bill C-224 represents another step along the way in the federal government's comprehensive overhaul of Canada's social security system. More particularly, all hon. members will applaud the good effects of these changes as they apply to the benefits paid to widows and to those who are disabled. These are especially worthy of applause by all hon. members, as are the other aspects we are considering.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: Certainly I must commend the government for the open approach it has taken in the preparation of this very important legislation. The bill now before us is the result of very active consultations with the provinces, with labour, with business organizations, as well as with members of the Canada Pension Plan advisory committee. It truly represents a Liberal approach to law-making and helps to explain why our party more than any other political party, in the drafting of social legislation that helps to upgrade and improve the quality of life of our citizens, has the confidence and support of the Canadian people.

In his working paper on social security in Canada, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has endeavoured to take into account the whole sweep of social security policy in this country and to develop a more comprehensive, logical and imaginative approach. This working paper is the federal government's contribution toward a joint federal-provincial review of Canada's total social security system. The aim of the exercise is to find new, workable and constitutional arrangements in order to achieve the kind of integrated social security system that will best serve the needs of the Canadian people. The document to which I refer is more than just another study; it is a working paper which establishes some immediate priorities, such as the increase in the family allowances from what was close to $8 to $20 per child per month, and changes to the Canada Pension Plan.

With regard to pensions, the Government of Canada and the provinces have agreed that pensions paid under both the Canada and the Quebec Pension Plans should be fully escalated in response to increases in the cost of living. They have also agreed that the levels of earnings upon which benefits and contributions are based should be raised.

The new strategies which are outlined in the working paper on social security seek a nationwide consensus. They are not being unilaterally imposed by the federal government. It is the aim of our government to ensure national minimum standards while allowing for provincial flexibility in setting priorities. It is not the intention of this government to suggest "cut and dried" or "take it or leave it" proposals. Legislative steps and administrative arrangements must be satisfactory to the provincial governments as well as to the federal government.

Co-operation with the provinces is vital and necessary, greater flexibility and more innovation are needed and consultation and negotiation are expected; but none of these ought in any way to diminish the role which the Parliament of Canada must continue to play in further development and improvement of our income security system. We in this House have a responsibility to combat poverty by way of a fair distribution of income disparity across the country.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has given this country outstanding leadership in proposing and bringing forth legislation to change, in necessary ways, our social security system. The launching of such a social security review, however, is in no way an indication that our present system is fundamentally unsound or in need of total tranformation. Such is simply not the case. The truth is that Canada's social security system is one of the most advanced in the western world, and this is thanks to the continuing efforts of a succession of Liberal governments in Canada.

Our system of social security today provides a very solid foundation upon which to build, in the context of today's needs. Such is the case with the Canada Pension Plan, an excellent plan now being amended or adjusted to make it an even better plan, more suitable to present circumstances and conditions.

I noted with satisfaction, as did the hon. member for Hillsborough and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the minister will shortly be proposing other changes to the Canada Pension Plan, including further boosts in earnings ceilings for pension calculations until these ceilings reach the average earnings of industrial workers in Canada.

I am also delighted with the minister's assurance that the earnings test, which now applies to persons receiving Canada pensions on retirement between ages 65 and 69, will be eliminated. I hope, as well, that the minister will give most serious consideration to provision for the participation of housewives in the Canada and the Quebec Pension Plans. It is true, of course, that these plans at the present time do not entirely ignore housewives since they provide for a pension for a widow of a contributor, but further steps are required. I draw the attention of the House to the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada which in one of its recommendations states the following:

> The housewife who remains at home is just as much a producer of goods and services as the paid worker, and in our view she should also have the opportunity to provide for a more financially secure future. Canada has given some of its workers an opportunity to do this through the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans. To neglect to do the same for some three and one-half million other workers in the home is to ignore the essential nature of their work.

I personally favour an approach which would permit a housewife to build up a pension by means of the contributions she herself makes. If anyone doubts that the housewife is an earner, I suggest that he or she stay home for a few days and try to carry out the chores with which she has to cope.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Where does she get the money?

Mr. Penner: To conclude, Mr. Speaker, in passing this bill we are increasing the level of Canada Pension Plan benefits now being received by some 500,000 Canadians, and we are raising the level of Canada pensions and other benefits coming into pay in the future. In brief, we are improving a government-sponsored plan, a part of our social security system, a part which benefits Canadians who hold to the value of independence or self-dependence. Most Canadians expect to meet their own needs through their own efforts and they expect others to do their best to do the same. The new, improved Canada Pension Plan helps to make that possible. This plan is no welfare scheme but is an earnings-related plan which benefits those who contribute to our economy and so also contribute to the plan, thereby providing for their own retirement and their own future.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I feel somewhat inadequate in speaking on this bill tonight following the deliberations of my two illustrious colleagues, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), both of whom have a record in this distinguished chamber of speaking on this matter many times before over the ages—and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre goes as far back as confederation! Of course, I have not such a record in this House, but I am happy tonight to be able to join the crusade to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred.

I also feel somewhat inadequate because the preceding speaker from the Liberal Party outlined all the answers and all the problems. I am not so capable, nor is any member of my party nor anybody else in Canada. I must give that hon. gentleman credit for taking so much for granted.

Let me join my colleague the hon. member for Hillsborough in congratulating the minister for this bill. I hope its passage will be swift. I am particularly happy that he is able to assure the House of such an eloquent record of consultation with the provinces and such unanimity in his approach to this further step in the over-all field of security. I have some reservations. The minister said he requires the assurance of the provinces that they all agree to waiving the consent provisions, but he admitted in his speech that he does not have this assurance. I hope the deliberations and discussion in this House will not be meaningless if it should happen that the provinces do not agree to waive this provision. I am also happy that this bill and the one to come are designed to restore parallelism, as the minister calls it, with the Quebec Pension Plan. That will certainly be a step in the right direction.

We are again indulging in what I am sure will be a long debate. We will be discussing a broad range of benefits, welfare matters, social matters, old age pensions, security of the underprivileged, and so on. There is, however, another segment of our society to which I should like to refer. This includes those people who formerly depended on their savings, such as perhaps housewives or persons who were fortunate in their early years and did not fulfil the 60-year commitment to the Canadian labour force. Of course, because of the inflationary trends in our economy, the savings of such people are eroded and eventually they will have to look toward a pension plan to provide for their future.

I came across an interesting article by an illustrious Canadian economist who speaks about such savings. In one paragraph he says one should never buy government bonds. He states that the cost of government will escalate, that there is a limit to the tax burden people will carry, and thus that governments will finance to deficits through the sale of bonds to those innocents who will buy them. He says that these people will be taxed on the interest they receive and will be paid back in devalued dollars. Further, he states that the more the government borrows, the more it will contribute to inflation and the less real purchasing power it will pay back to the unhappy bondholder. He suggests the bonds should be left to people who can afford to lose money.

A previous speaker touched on these unfortunates who have lived the dream that one could accumulate some savings in this country and provide for oneself. Eventually they have to live on some kind of social assistance handed out by some form of government. This bill certainly is an improvement. I cannot argue with the legislation it provides. However, the bill, again, is designed by the same people whom I sometimes call intellectual socialists. I define these people as those who think that the provision of money is the solution, really, to all problems in Canada and in the world. They believe, in other words, that if there is a social problem, the question is how much does it cost to make people happy; or if there is any other kind of problem, how much does it cost.

We talk about old age pensions and argue whether the amount of the pension should be $95, $100 or $105 and each party takes credit for suggesting the greatest amount. I recall the other day when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that if it were not for him and his party, the old age pensioner would still receive $35 a month. It disturbs me that we should be talking about money all the time when we also talk about a comprehensive plan such as the minister has called social security. These intellectual socialists are people who simply do not recognize that in Canada there are such fundamental inequities as hunger, illiteracy and exposure to the elements. They refuse to believe there are small towns in Canada the economy of which is based, to the extent of from 30 per cent to 50 per cent, on some form of social assistance which its citizens receive every month.

These intellectual economists refuse to believe that one-third of our population lives on some kind of social assistance, and that we are wasting 20 per cent of our human resources by not demanding and ensuring that they achieve some stage of life in which they can be productive and make a contribution to the life style which we have established for ourselves.

If we continue to use money as a basis for a solution to our social problems, it seems to me we must motivate some more people to work, particularly the 20 per cent to which I referred a little earlier. It would seem that only if more people in Canada become productive can we generate or can the government generate sufficient money to pay the cost of the welfare state which we are about to establish in this great land of unlimited opportunity.

There are a great number of people in Canada who are keeping us on our knees. They demand from government the right of a decent living. The right the government owes them is the right to work, a chance to participate. For some, the measures contained in this bill are totally meaningless. The steps the minister has proposed have not, and will not, solve the problem of those people unless the cheques, no matter from which department they come, are accompanied by a blueprint for living in our complex society. This should be a package of brotherly love and understanding, which is perhaps the old-fashioned way.

Perhaps the cheque should be accompanied by a commitment from the government to find a way in which we can help those citizens who are deprived, so that they may find a way in which to make a worth while contribution to the productivity and prosperity of our land. It must be a way which does not necessitate the punching of a clock, because these people would never do that or go to the trough at a given time. However, a way must be found to provide these people with an opportunity to experience the pride of accomplishment and joy of giving, instead of receiving.

When we do anything for these people, Mr. Speaker, we must consider whether there is any more horrible or disastrous situation that this 20 per cent of our citizens could live under anywhere else in the world. It is much harder to be poor in Canada than anywhere else in the world because our standard of living ranks among that of the leading nations. The potential in Canada is much higher than it is anywhere in the world. It is so much tougher to be poor in Canada, because there are so many rich people. I know the pain that a mother or a father must endure knowing that their children know their deficiency, and the pain of knowing they cannot get off the path they have made through the snow, a path that leads nowhere, a path with no purpose, no beginning and no end.

In light of that, does the bill go far enough? Perhaps the welfare cheque that we are paying out should include enough money so that the Canada Pension Plan premiums could be paid with it. Perhaps the old age security should be amalgamated with the Canada Pension Plan some day, so that when a person reaches a certain age it should not matter what kind of contribution he has made in earlier life because, again, we are basing everything on this productivity and the dollars he has earned during his productive years.

In looking at the bill, I find that the removal of the 2 per cent ceiling is certainly a step in the right direction. Our senior citizens, however, would have liked it much better if we could have found a solution to the problems posed by the ever-increasing cost of living and inflation. They would have liked it much better if we could have managed our affairs in such a way that the increase would not have been necessary.

I, too, would like to exchange ideas regarding the retirement age. The bill, of course, does not provide for the gradual reduction of the retirement age down to the age of 60. I would like to qualify this by stating that I do not think we should make it compulsory for a person to retire at any age, but we should certainly make it possible for a person to retire at the age of 60 if he wishes it, and not penalize him for making way for a younger person who wishes to put his shoulder to the wheel.

I think that the monitoring agency should make an annual report instead of a report every five years, as is the case now. The way things are going, it is not adequate to assess the functioning of this fund every five years. I would have liked to explore the possibility of making all Canadians eligible for retirement benefits. In that respect I would like to echo what all my colleagues have said, that is, I would like to think it possible that women in our Canadian society be given an equal chance of receiving equal benefits to those received by men when they reach a certain age.

In light of that, we should not overlook the fact that this would be a saving to the fund because under the plan it would not be necessary to provide benefits to a widow who has not contributed. In 1967 we started to pay benefits to retired contributors, which are now being made to pensioners at the age of 65. As I said, we should have kept going; but it is not too late now, and I hope that the minister in the next bill he will introduce will have the foresight to consider very seriously allowing people to retire at the age of 60.

There should have been an assessment of the plan in order to find a solution to the problem which unwed mothers, and single-parent families face. We should examine the contributions which the provinces have made to the deliberations to which the minister referred earlier. People from Newfoundland, and particularly Anthony Murphy, believe that programs of this kind contribute to one's security and enhance one's sense of independence. It would be a wonderful thing if pensions and social insurance were universal and sufficiently adequate to meet the basic needs of all Canadians in their retirement or in their disability.

There are thousands of Newfoundlanders and thousands of Canadians in other parts of the country who do not contribute to the Canada Pension Plan or, indeed, to any other pension plan, and until they have the means and the opportunity to do so they will remain in a disadvantaged position. I hope we can do something to strengthen our Canada Pension Plan and other programs and make them the hub of our social security system. I take it from his statement that Anthony Murphy feels as I do, that some day we will not need many other programs if we round out the opportunities that the Canada Pension Plan provides.

Adjournment Debate

MULTICULTURALISM—REQUEST FOR PROGRAM TO ASSIST ETHNIC PRESS IN LIGHT OF POSTAGE RATE INCREASES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to turn to a matter which was first raised in the House on June 18. That, you will recall, was when the country discovered the Minister of State who is a little bit responsible for multiculturalism. You will recall that the minister spent about one-tenth of his total budget on an advertisement which featured a campaign picture of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and purported to advertise a program of grants which was already oversubscribed. To add to the excitement, the minister had been chastised by the assistant undersecretary of another department who, it turned out, had more authority over the minister's program than did the minister.

That storm has blown over. The minister's assistant who authorized the ads has disappeared. The assistant undersecretary has remained firmly in control. The minister has come back to the House, anxious to resume any responsibilities anyone will give him. An agency, controlled at least 50 per cent by prominent Ontario Liberals, is counting its commission on the account, and the most enduring momento of the affair is the response of the Minister of State who, having been asked why no tenders were called on the ads, said that he was "not aware of any tendering procedure for advertising programs of the federal government".

That flurry erased several important issues. One of them was the attitude the government should take toward the ethnic and periodical press of the country because, apart from patronage and politicking, the other reason for the ads was that they provided a means by which the government might provide some tangible support to the Canadian ethnic press. I want to argue their case tonight, not just in relation to the ethnic papers which generally deserve and require support, but also in relation to the community press generally in Canada which serves needs which larger media cannot meet and which has special problems, some of them caused by the government.

Government support to the community press should be open and above board—by the front door, rather than by occasional back door subsidies in the form of the extravagant and pointless advertising program we saw this June. In passing, I should also point out that even the present program of advertising in the ethnic press seems to treat some periodicals, like the Toronto Jewish press, in a less favourable way than other periodicals.

Mr. Haidasz: That isn't true.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): There are two kinds of newspapers operating in Canada today, the large and the local. They are generally distinguished by their size, their wealth and by the intensity with which they serve their particular readership. The dailies might help us to understand the world; the weeklies help us to understand ourselves. They are called ethnic or community papers and they are particular to a heritage or a place. Both kinds of papers need ads to live.

[Mr. Oberle.]

At one time, governments and other advertisers treated both kinds of papers almost equally. But in the 1950s and 1960s, as our attitudes became more urban and international, the people who place and pay for ads became bemused by mass markets, and the so-called "institutional ads"—the ads an editor could get a loan on—drifted away to mass media. That was done thoughtlessly, without examination either of the relative impact of an ad in a local or a mass medium, or an examination of the effect upon the vitality of the particular communities these local papers serve. The government was as guilty as anyone.

There are signs that times are changing, and I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the government for giving the community press a fair shot at the ads concerning both the new tax form and the LIP program. But those cases are exceptions; they are not a policy. I understand that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), that great progressive, has a proposal before him to gather data on the effectiveness of advertising in the community press. Member papers of the CCNA were enthusiastic about the proposed study and were geared up to co-operate, but the President of the Treasury Board is sitting on the initiative and the enthusiasm of editors is beginning to wane.

There are other problems. The Post Office has established a so-called free zone within a 40 miles radius of small communities and within that zone cheap postal rates apply to local papers. But in Ontario and British Columbia, changes in provincial law have created new local government boundaries, incorporating several towns. They change the status of a town but not its nature, and the Post Office Department, legalistic to the last, has denied free zone status to small towns so incorporated.

Again, newspaper plants which do not have a printing press are disqualified from eligibility for IDB loans, yet the offset revolution, leading to a different style of printing, means that most plants ship out their printing to a central press and so cannot go to the Industrial Development Bank. These are accidental prejudices, just as it was accidental that advertising shifted to mass markets and made survival more difficult for local papers.

We need these local papers, just as we need a multitude of strong ethnic groups and places which have a distinctive sense of community. I ask the government to recognize that need directly and to encourage the various local media of Canada at least as much as we encourage book publishing, the arts and other activities which contribute to a sense of Canadian identity.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity, replying to the hon. member this evening, to speak about certain aspects of advertising, particularly advertising by the various government departments in the ethnic press and especially as this concerns the policy and programs of multiculturalism.

As the hon. member knows, the Prime Minister's statement on October 8, 1971, announcing his government's official policy of multiculturalism revealed that a study would be undertaken to determine what more could be done to assist the ethnic press. This study was included in the survey on language retention and an evaluation of it is being conducted at the present time.

On May 17, 1973, I announced in the House that the multicultural programs are being expanded to a considerable extent. I also mentioned that we will be devoting a very substantial amount of funds to assist the ethnic press and to use the ethnic press to convey our messages and information to the Canadian people. It is, of course, of the greatest importance that an awareness of these multicultural programs and of the programs of other federal departments be extended to all citizens of Canada. An important role in this increased information program will be played by the ethnic press as well as by the weekly periodicals.

So far as advertising the program of multiculturalism is concerned, I am happy to say that we included the ethnic press which is printed in languages other than English and French, as well as Jewish newspapers, and other ethnic newspapers which are printed in English and French. All in all, about 125 newspapers were used to inform the Canadian public of the federal government's policy programs on multiculturalism. Many other federal departments and government agencies are also participating in this increased effort on the part of our government to convey essential information to our citizens. I may mention for this year in particular the extensive programs of the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and the Department of National Health and Welfare. The Canada Ethnic Press Federation has been assisted with federal grants in the holding of meetings and the carrying out of surveys. Recently, the Ethnic Press Club of Manitoba was assisted with a multicultural grant.

I am sure that this program of information and of special projects will facilitate our task in communicating with all Canadians, as the hon. member suggested in his remarks. It also provides increased financial assistance to the ethnic press and enables them to continue in fulfilling an important role in Canadian society. In the meantime, of course, we will be awaiting the reports and special studies being carried out at the present time. I am sure the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and other ministers who are especially involved in matters of communication will be able to come up with improved programs.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—OPERATIONAL STATE OF AIR SQUADRON 442 BASED AT COMOX

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last, October 25, I raised a question in this House concerning the operational capability of Squadron 442 which is based at Comox and which has a large role to play with respect to search and rescue in the 690,000 square miles of British Columbia and the Yukon. My question was based on the premise that the squadron is unable to meet normal operational tasks because of worn-out aircraft and lack of parts. The question is recorded at page 7213 of Hansard. I asked: "Can the minister advise what immediate steps will be taken to correct this situation?"

The minister, who is present in the chamber this evening and who has shown us the courtesy of not asking his parliamentary secretary to reply, answered: "Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the question." Nothing would please me more than hearing that the premise of my question was wrong. Let me point out, however, that the premise of my question is based on a newspaper article which appeared in the Vancouver Sun. It is dated October 20, 1973, and was written by Mr. Odam. According to the article—

> In two recent major air searches in B.C., 442 Squadron was unable to throw in all its resources right away . . .

The article further says:

> When pilot Neil Carey of North Vancouver was reported missing September 18, one of the Buffalo aircraft was being overhauled at Comox—an overhaul that became extended because maintenance crews had to wait for parts to arrive from eastern Canada.
> Another Buffalo was unserviceable in Whitehorse, where it had just come off another search. The third Buffalo was taking parts up to Whitehorse so the second could be repaired.
>
> The next day, when the search should have been in full swing, only one Buffalo was available—the one which had been on the parts run.
> Of the squadron's three helicopters, one was undergoing a routine inspection; another took the searchmaster as far as Williams Lake before having to turn back to Comox because of bad weather. The third did get into the search.
> It was not until September 28—ten days after Carey went down somewhere on a flight from Quesnel to Terrace—that 442 Squadron was able to put all its six aircraft out at the same time.

Further examples are given as follows:

> When a light plane with two people on board went missing last Saturday on a flight from Nelson to Edmonton, two of the three Buffalo aircraft were unserviceable and the third was engaged on a mercy flight.

● (2210)

> Two of the three helicopters were available in Comox, the third had left for a major overhaul in the east and is not expected back for six months.
> The following day, one of the helicopters left Comox at 1 p.m. to join in the search, which was handled initially by the rescue centre at Edmonton. One Buffalo was still being overhauled, one was unserviceable until 3 p.m. and the third was on another mercy flight.
> On Monday, 442 Squadron was able to throw two Buffalo and one helicopter into the search. A second helicopter joined them the following day after crews at Comox changed an engine overnight.
>
> By then . . .

This is important.

> . . . three days had gone by since the light plane disappeared in bad weather in the East Kootenays.

Further examples are given. I again quote from the article:

> For three days at the beginning of September, 442 Squadron had none of its Buffalo aircraft available to fly . . .

It goes on to describe why that happened. If we look into the records that are contained in this article, between April 1 and October 15, a period of 198 days, one Buffalo aircraft was unserviceable for 74 complete days and 46 part days. The article continues:

> The second buffalo was unserviceable 46 whole days and 38 part days; the third, 58 full days and 44 part days.
> Of the three helicopters, one was unserviceable 30 full and 23 part days; one, 61 full days and 18 part days, and the third for 40 full days and 25 part days.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) said he rejected the premise on which I asked the question. I think it is very important that the minister, who is in the House tonight, completely answer the charges that have been made in this article. They were obviously made by somebody who was able to look at the logs and records of this particular squadron.

I want to make it perfectly clear that in no way do I criticize the personnel, the squadron leader, the efficiency or the effectiveness of the people in that squadron. As a matter of fact, in the article that drew this to the attention of the public in the province of British Columbia there is no suggestion that anyone in our armed forces in that particular squadron was not doing everything he could to make the squadron as operational as possible.

The fact of the matter is that because of apparent budget savings the spare parts are kept in Toronto. There are long delays in bringing them from Toronto to Vancouver. There are further difficulties getting them into commercial aircraft to fly them to Comox. The budget saving means we have limited the number of aircraft available for search and rescue in this area.

The minister says the record of the squadron and Canadian armed forces' squadrons generally is very good in terms of search and rescue. But the question is, what is the minister now going to do about these allegations? Has the minister looked into them? Is the minister going to give an answer which will satisfy the public as to the competency of this particular squadron in terms of materiel to carry out its allotted task? I think we are entitled to the minister's answer. He has had time to look into this matter.

I think the minister ought to advise us tonight whether similar situations exist anywhere else in the country. I am sure the minister realizes that this is a serious matter; I gather so from his presence in the House. It is indeed a matter of life or death for lost pilots.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) may I first of all say I am always pleased to learn of the interest of any member of the House in the very important subject of search and rescue.

This is an area of our work to which the Canadian forces are particularly dedicated, and I believe also an area in which they are particularly proficient. Some of the search and rescue operations in which Canadian forces personnel have been involved are among the most heroic and the most selfless passages in our national life.

As this may perhaps seem to be an overstatement, let me provide some facts. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver South will be encouraged to learn that out of a total of 130 aircraft searches last year, only four aircraft were not found. This outstanding record is even more impressive when we realize that unfortunately some aircraft go down and disappear into lakes and rivers and are beyond the technical capability of even the most dedicated and efficient search teams. During the same year, the Canadian forces flew a total of 5,230 hours in search and rescue work and contributed either directly or indirectly in the rescue of 122 people.

[Mr. Fraser.]

In this respect I would be remiss if I did not acknowledge the outstanding support contributed by civilian flyers who participate enthusiastically and effectively in search operations. As evidence of their contribution, let me say that of a total of 126 aircraft successfully located in 1972, 40 were located by civilian aircraft participating in the search.

As to the serviceability of the aircraft employed, the question the hon. member raised in connection with 442 Squadron, I am able to confirm that the serviceability of the Labrador helicopters belonging to the squadron averaged 73.7 per cent, and that during some period serviceability of up to 90 per cent was achieved. For a complex, rotary-wing aircraft this is a good serviceability ratio by any standards, military or civilian. The serviceability ratio of the Buffalo aircraft went up from 45 per cent in 1971 to a current level of 63.1 per cent. This is an availability factor almost 10 per cent higher than is set for this aircraft by Air Transport Command.

I believe these figures demonstrate not only a standard of serviceability but also a level of efficiency which is a credit to 442 Squadron and to the aircraft and the service personnel of this west coast unit.

AGRICULTURE—SHIPMENT OF HORSES TO EUROPE FOR SLAUGHTER

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, on May 30, 1973, I asked the House for unanimous consent to amend the Criminal Code, asking that all horses shipped to Europe be first inspected under the terms of the Canada Shipping Act. I was very sorry to see that several hon. members left the impression of being inhumane.

On June 6, the Prime Minister's office sent a letter to a woman in Ottawa stating that as of June, 1971, all shipment of horses to Europe by sea were banned: following a review by officials of the Department of Transport and the Department of Agriculture and the adoption of a special code for shipboard transportation of horses, shipment was again permitted in 1972. The code states that horses must be in good health and not older than 16 years before being transported. Veterinarian officials must be present during the marshalling to examine them with respect to age and fitness to travel.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), in a letter to the Ontario Humane Society, also stated that it was the policy of the government of Canada that horses would only be allowed to be exported for work or breeding purposes. Yet everyone in the business knows that most of the animals go directly to the slaughterhouses. The cruelty lies in what the horses have to go through to get there. They have to be trucked in, branded, haltered, loaded on trucks or trains, unloaded, then reloaded on a boat with whips or cranes. From the time a horse leaves its home, it never eats the same again. It gets homesick and fevered up. It cannot stand long trips. Some of the horses brought from the United States to Canada for slaughter barely make it to the plant. Just think what they go through, Mr. Speaker, to get to Europe.

It is illegal to send live horses from the United States to France, so they are brought to Canada, mostly to the province of Quebec, and after a couple of weeks are certified as Canadian horses and shipped off. When a horse is shipped live, it must have a certificate of health for a preceding period. But how can anyone tell, when the horse has been in the United States for most of the time? It is a tragic joke.

The inspectors of the last shipment of horses were representatives of the Ontario Humane Society and the Canadian Wild Horse Society. These inspections and observations were carried out independently and proved beyond all doubt that the majority of the horses that were shipped from Canada on the steamship Athene were in fact slaughtered immediately upon arrival in Europe.

How much longer are we going to accept trade in horses across the Atlantic? The Government of Canada has defended the trade by stating that they see nothing wrong in the principle involved so long as the animals are in satisfactory condition to ship. Obviously, the Government of Canada is not concerned with the welfare of the animals after they arrive at their destination. With the modern processing methods that we have today, it is most inhumane to ship slaughter horses live to Europe.

With unemployment running rampant as it is today, we could very easily set up another industry in Canada; we could have our own plants that could ship dressed meat to Europe. I would have no reservations about suggesting that this would take some people off the already confused and blinded unemployment insurance rolls. As a man who has shipped thousands of head of livestock to eastern Canada, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you it is bad enough shipping to eastern Canada, let alone shipping to Europe.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this is a topic which was debated once before in this House not too long ago. I draw the hon. member's attention to the parliamentary secretary's statement on this matter which can be found on page 4926 of Hansard.

I have stated that I, too, share the concern of all hon. members with regard to the humane treatment of animals. With respect to the shipment of horses to Europe, the Department of Agriculture has instituted a program designed to ensure the humane treatment of horses shipped by sea. This program, which began in the fall of 1970, consists of a seven to ten-day preconditioning period around the port of loading and requires that the horses be less than 11 years old, in good condition and free from sickness, that mares not be in a state of advanced pregnancy and that a veterinarian accompany any shipment of more than 25 horses.

The hon. member also spoke of the Canadian processing industry. As I have said before in this House, Canada's trade in horsemeat to Europe has increased dramatically in recent years, and appears to be growing. The movement of live horses has not increased by the same amount. For the information of hon. members, 5.3 million pounds of horsemeat were exported to Europe in 1969-70, whereas in the 1972-73 fiscal year 19.1 million pounds were exported. During the same period the number of horses shipped declined.

It is our position that the livestock trade is an important part of Canadian agriculture. Rather than ban the movement of any type of livestock, we feel it is in the best interests of Canada's farmers to do everything possible to make certain that shipments are efficient and humane.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PARTICIPATION BY CANADIAN TROOPS IN UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Security Council of the United Nations demanded on October 25 by resolution 340 that an immediate and complete ceasefire be observed in the Middle East and that the parties return to the positions they held on October 22 when an earlier Security Council resolution had first called for a ceasefire. In the resolution of October 25 the Council decided to set up immediately, under its authority, a United Nations emergency force. Canada was asked to participate in this force by a note from the Secretary General dated October 27 and in a further note of October 29 the Secretary General confirmed that this request was acceptable to both sides to the conflict. The government gave this request the most serious and urgent consideration and toward this end a team of officials from the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence joined the Canadian delegation to the United Nations to consult with officials of the United Nations Secretariat about the precise nature of the contribution requested from Canada.

According to the report of the Secretary General, which was adopted by the Security Council on October 26, it is intended that this force be of a temporary nature to assist in facilitating conditions under which negotiations toward a settlement can take place. The force is to supervise the implementation of the ceasefire and the return of the parties to their positions of October 22. It will use its best efforts to prevent a recurrence of the fighting. The force is an impartial peacekeeping force composed of formed military units which will be interposed between the parties: it will thus operate on the assumption that the parties to the conflict are taking all necessary steps to comply with the relevant decisions of the Security Council. The force will be under the command of the United Nations, vested in the Secretary General and under the authority of the Security Council. The command in the field will be exercised by a force commander appointed by the Secretary General and responsible to him. The force is to be of a defensive character only and is not to use force except in self-defence.

The force at full strength will probably number about 7,000 men. Aside from Canada, Austria, Finland, Sweden and Ireland have been requested to provide troops and the first contingents of Austrians, Finns and Swedes arrived in Cairo from Cyprus on October 26. The only areas of operation contemplated at this time are the east and west banks of the Suez Canal system from Port Said through Ismailia to Suez. In the fulfilment of its tasks the force will have the co-operation of the miltary observers of the United Nations Truce Supervisory Organization.

On October 27 Canada was asked by the Secretary General to provide the logistic component of the force including, in particular, air support, transport, communications, ordnance and related logistic facilities. The Secretary General considers it vital to the efficient and effective operation of the force that Canada provide the logistic support.

Canada has consistently stressed a number of conditions for its participation in peacekeeping operations and observer missions. A basic condition is met by the fact that the United Nations will be the continuing political authority to which the force reports. Moreover, the Secretary General will make his reports public. He has listed the following essential conditions for the force. It must (a) have the full confidence and backing of the Security Council; (b) operate with the full co-operation of the parties concerned; (c) function as an integrated and efficient military unit; (d) enjoy freedom of movement and communication and other facilities that are necessary for the performance of its functions, and (e) be granted all relevant privileges and immunities provided for by the United Nations convention on privileges and immunities.

Given these conditions which lead us to hope the force should be an effective one and able to contribute to a climate in which negotiations between the parties can take place, the Canadian government has decided to inform the United Nations Secretary General, in response to his request, that Canada has agreed to participate in the United Nations emergency force for the Middle East for the initial six-month period described in the Secretary General's report. I am further informing the Secretary General that the Canadian contribution will consist of a logistics component in accordance with his request and with the conclusions reached after discussion of details of this contribution between Canadian and UN officials. Finally, I am informing the Secretary General that we intend to conclude with him financial and other arrangements to regulate Canadian participation and that the treatment accorded Canada should be no less favourable than that accorded to other contributing countries.

We shall be placing on the order paper a resolution seeking the approval of parliament for the government's decision to participate in the UNEF.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I can hear shouts of glee from the other side of the House. I would point out that we all rejoice about the fact that the federalist option has prevailed over the separatist option.

However, Mr. Speaker, seeing the smiles of my friends on the other side, I fear that the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada (Mr. Caouette) does not share the same impression.

Mr. Speaker, it would have been better a few moments ago if the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) had given us his statement in time so that we could consider it. Unfortunately, as usual, we received it two minutes before the House met and we have been unable to read through it. I think that hon. members will end up rising on a question of privilege. If members of all parts of the House wish for dialogue and solidarity, they on the other side of the House will have to extend to us a minimum of courtesy.

Generally speaking we are in agreement with the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Once more, the world nations called upon Canada and once more Canada is prepared to serve. The parties involved must admit Canada's impartiality on the national scene.

On Monday, October 22, my party, through my colleague from Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) welcomed with the Secretary of State for External Affairs the cease-fire requested by the Security Council under the joint auspices of the United States and the Soviet Union. Made again since then, this call for a cease-fire received a positive answer. The cease-fire is really a first step and fruitful negotiations may be expected now.

The application of the cease-fire calls for the co-operation of unbiased countries, of competent and representative countries at the world level.

We are delighted by the fact that Canada meets those sets of criteria and may contribute to the cease-fire and bring peace back to this part of the world.

It will be noted that, this time, important factors should be considered which distinguish the government's position from that we occupied at the time of the Viet Nam crisis, since today first the cease-fire exists, second, the UN, an international organization, is playing a major role in the application of the cease-fire and, third, the parties involved through normal diplomatic channels have clearly stated their position, expectations and reserves.

We approve Canada's participation to the extent of our resources and competence, both in the logistics field and in the communications field, to the peace effort in the Middle East. My colleague for Hillsborough stated as recorded on page 7075 of Hansard for October 22, 1973 and I quote:

[English]

I am sure all the people of Canada would want us, their representatives, to indicate that this country is prepared to make some efforts and, indeed, some sacrifices if, under the proper auspices and with reasonable hope for success, the kind of force the minister mentioned should be set up. I believe we should sacrifice something for peace in the Middle East because in doing that we would be doing much more. We would be sacrificing something for the peace of the whole world.

[Mr. Speaker.]

There is no question that Canadians are desirous of a lasting peace and a lasting settlement in the Middle East. In this regard any participation on the part of our government through which we can assist in bringing that settlement about is worth while. Our previous experience in the Middle East and our experience in Viet Nam surely make any warnings I could offer the minister redundant. The perils of involvement without acceptance from both sides are obvious and clearcut. As my leader has stated, we have a duty to participate in any reasonable effort to bring peace in the Middle East. The government has a duty to satisfy itself that our involvement in the peacekeeping force will represent a meaningful contribution that cannot better be made by some other country. If that is the case, then involvement in the peacekeeping force is more than justified.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to preface my remarks with a brief and mild protest over the fact that we received this important and sensitive statement about two o'clock as we walked into the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Brewin: However, Mr. Speaker, we in this party welcome the decision of the government to bring up for approval in the House this commitment by Canada to contribute to a peacekeeping force in the Middle East. In our view a commitment which involves Canadian personnel, substantial Canadian expenditures and risks outside Canada should be approved by the elected representatives in parliament even though the government may have the responsibility of making the decision in the first instance. This obligation is particularly clear in the situation of a minority government which we have at the present time.

Having said this, I can now say it is our view that the government's decision to participate as requested by the Secretary General of the United Nations is a decision which we will support. We think the government has a right to insist upon any such commitments being made through the United Nations which would have the moral authority of the Security Council and, through it, of the world community as a whole. Second, we think such a commitment should rightly be only undertaken with the consent of the immediate parties involved. We agree with the third condition made by the government, namely, that there should be some prospect that the peacekeeping force can serve a useful purpose. In our view these conditions have been fulfilled and, therefore, the commitment should be made.

The primary reason for saying this is that it is a contribution toward preserving the peace in one of the most explosive areas in the world. It is not simply that we deeply deplore the hostilities between Israel and her neighbours, not simply because we wish Israel in accordance with her creation as an independent state by the United Nations to continue to exist as an independent state and a state whose security is guaranteed by agreed and secured boundaries and the commitments of the world community as well as her neighbours, but also because the continuance of deeply felt differences between Israel and her neighbours is a threat to the peace of the world.

It is only through the maintenance of peace by the interposition of an international force that the process of negotiations between Israel and her neighbours will be made possible, and in turn it is only through such negotiations that a settlement of the deeply divided issues facing Israel and her neighbours can be resolved.

We think it appropriate that it should be the United Nations which acts in this matter. We all know that the United Nations is imperfect and that it can be no better than the decisions of its members. Many people have become disillusioned with the United Nations, but we believe that the present crisis has shown once again that the United Nations is indispensable. Anything that strengthens the United Nations is of vast importance to the very existence of a peaceful world.

We know that previous peacekeeping efforts have sometimes been attended by frustration rather than by the settlement of basic disputes. It is often forgotten that without the intervention of these peacekeeping forces bloody wars might have broken out or would have been continued. One illustration is Cyprus.

The conflict between Israel and her neighbours is so deepseated that we do not believe the mere existence of a peacekeeping force will be an adequate guarantee of peace, although it will aid in the creation of a situation in which peace is at least possible.

For these reasons, and because of Canada's experience, ability and knowledge in respect of the important logistics contribution we are asked to make, we believe Canada can make an effective contribution to such a peacekeeping force and we approve of the Canadian contribution. We do not do so without deep anxiety and a recognition that the existence of such a force cannot by itself guarantee a lasting peace, but we believe it can contribute to it. It would be entirely inconsistent, in our view, with Canada's reputation as a good member of the world community to refuse to accept the invitation of the Secretary General of the United Nations, speaking in this instance on behalf of the world and in the interests of world peace.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, since I represent a constituency in the province of Quebec, I hope you will allow me to comment briefly on yesterday's provincial elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope that the hon. member will be able to keep his comments for another time. I believe that at this time his comments and those of all other hon. members should pertain to the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. I admit that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe took the liberty of saying a sentence or two in reply to the reactions of others. The hon. member for Abitibi will certainly understand that it would be preferable if we could keep to the statement made by the minister, at least for the moment.

Mr. Laprise: I thank you for your comments, Mr. Speaker. As Quebec is still in Confederation I thought I could make such a comment.

Mr. Speaker, as the two previous speakers opposite, I received the statement of the Secretary of State at 2.10, precisely when he had finished reading it.

However, it was difficult for me to study it thoroughly, but on behalf of my party I approve the decision taken by the Canadian government to support the dispatch of a force to supervise the truce in the Middle East, because we feel that this decision is valid. However, I remain quite pessimistic considering the requirements laid by the Security Council of the UN to the belligerents. In the statements made at the Security Council and during the numerous debates which followed and which I heard at the UN, I felt sorry that no mention was made of the heart of the problem existing in the Middle East since the establishment of the State of Israel, that is the Palestinian refugees. Unfortunately, it seems that this essential point was forgotten over there. In the declaration handed out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and according to resolution 340, there is mention of the decision taken in the night of October 21 to 22, I believe, and of resolution 338 regarding the ceasefire and the return to the boundaries set on that date.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, the events of 1967 are forgotten. I think that the war of 1967 was the prime cause of the resumption of hostilities in October 1973. Once again the recommendation of resolution 242 is forgotten. Mr. Speaker, I think that even a force of 7,000 fully-armed men, with all possible communications equipment, would find it difficult to maintain peace in this part of the world because the basic cause is still present.

I am nevertheless happy, Mr. Speaker, that the United Nations have stated that Canada is considered as a possible participant in the force and that it is the only country with the military means and experience. So, I think this is something which should not necessarily cause us to brag about: our armed forces have experience not only in the Middle East but also in the international field. They are known everywhere for their efficiency.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion we should go far beyond the Security Council's recommendations if we really want to restore peace in that area and that is what everybody wants.

We approve such a decision and we would like very much to do much more in this line than what is now being done.

PRIVILEGE

MR. O'CONNOR—BUILDING OF CINDER BLOCK WALL ACROSS ENTRANCE TO OFFICE

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On returning to my office after lunch today I was confronted by a crew of workmen constructing a cinder block wall across the entrance to my office in the Confederation building. The workmen could offer no explanation except that they had tendered the job last Friday and were ordered to have it completed by today.

On election to this position exactly one year ago today I assumed it was to last for more than one year. In fact, I assumed that the job would last until I was defeated in a subsequent election, until I resigned, or until I died. So far as I am aware, none of these events has occurred. I would suggest that this action constitutes a breach of my privileges and I ask you Mr. Speaker, to order it stopped.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member has a very valid question of privilege. If I were Caesar I would say: let the wall come down. But I will only say that the matter will be looked into. I am sure there must be a misunderstanding somewhere. The hon. member can count on my co-operation to ensure that the matter will be looked into forthwith and I will report to him within the next few minutes.

AIR CANADA

DISCONTINUANCE OF SERVICE BETWEEN SUDBURY AND TIMMINS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in view of the severance of Air Canada's service between Sudbury and Timmins, and also in view of the CTC's refusal to make a decision until December 31, 1973, regarding an alternate carrier, and in view of the hardship and inconvenience this places on residents of Northern Ontario, I ask leave of the House, under the terms of Standing Order 43, to move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to order Air Canada to maintain passenger service between Sudbury and Timmins until the CTC makes its decision.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES RESPECTING GRAIN AND CATTLE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under Standing Order 43. Because of the distress, disruption and confusion caused to the grain farmers and cattlemen of Canada by federal government policies devised and implemented by academics with no practical experience on the land, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

[Mr. O'Connor.]

That the government institute an internship program whereby academics who are devising and setting agricultural policy be required to spend at least two years on a farm, ranch, or feed lot every seven years so as not to lose touch with the practical problems of farming and new developments in the agricultural industry.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The motion is proposed under Standing Order 43. As such it requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

ENERGY

VOLUNTARY PRICE FREEZE ON PETROLEUM PRODUCTS—EFFECT OF INCREASE IN PRICES IN QUEBEC BY ONE COMPANY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of the announcement of the Prime Minister on September 4 that a voluntary price freeze would be imposed or adopted with regard to petroleum products in Canada except to the extent where, to the satisfaction of the minister, an increase in the cost of imported crude warranted an increase. I would like to ask the minister whether the increase announced yesterday by one Canadian company for prices in Quebec constitutes a breach of the freeze, and whether the freeze now stays in place?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in our view the announcement yesterday by the company does indeed constitute a breach of the freeze. The company had indicated its intention to do so. We specifically requested the company not to do so, and that it should await a government decision in this regard. I anticipate being able to make an announcement to the House in this regard on November 1. I regret that the company has not pursued the request that we have made, which has been honoured by all other companies, not to increase prices either east or west.

EFFECT OF LATEST INCREASE IN PRICE OF VENEZUELAN CRUDE ON PRICE FREEZE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated recently that, within a matter of weeks, the most recent increase in the price of Venezuelan crude imported into Canada would have a substantial impact on retail prices in Quebec and the Maritimes. I would like to ask him whether this indicates that the government is abandoning the freeze altogether as a result of this substantial increase in petroleum prices or whether there is simply a partial thaw, and if it is just a partial thaw does the government intend to determine the amount of increase in retail prices that would be justified?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As I said to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I intend to make an announcement covering both the eastern market and any other possible changes on November 1.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the announcement to be made by the minister on November 1 indicate what will happen to gasoline and other petroleum product prices in the rest of Canada west of the province of Quebec? Does he intend to indicate, for example, that prices of petroleum products in Ontario and western Canada will increase by an amount corresponding to the increase in the east?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my statement on prices will be quite full.

OIL—PROJECTED INCREASE IN DOMESTIC PRICES IN LIGHT OF LATEST VENEZUELAN INCREASE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On the basis of the minister's statement yesterday that the announcement made by this company yesterday of a one cent per gallon increase was based on the increase announced by Venezuela on September 1, or earlier is he in any position to project what might be the increase in a month's time, say based on the 56 per cent increase in the price of crude announced by Venezuela this past week?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Not at the moment, Sir. I think we will have to keep a close watch on the landed cost of oil at Montreal to make a more precise evaluation of the impact on the domestic price in Canada that this would cause.

SECURITY OF OIL SUPPLIES FROM MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact he has said he has now contacted all of the Arab states that export oil to Canada, can he report to the House whether or not Canada will have security of supplies from all of the exporters in the Middle East?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope so.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the very ambiguous answer of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, can he tell us when we will know for sure whether or not Canadians can expect security of supplies?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in this world most things are uncertain. I express once again the hope that Canada will continue to receive the oil which it usually gets from its sources abroad.

DETERMINATION OF EFFECT ON COST OF LIVING OF INCREASES IN PRICES OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS—ACTION TO OFFSET

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact the increase in the price of Venezuelan crude and the breaking of the voluntary freeze on prices by one oil refinery will contribute substantially to the consumer price index by increasing the cost of fuel, gasoline and so on and also contribute to the increased cost of food production, what steps is the minister taking to determine the effect this will have on the cost of living in Canada, and what steps is the government taking to mitigate this increase?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, along with my colleagues, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I am following the situation closely, and I am co-operating with them closely in their efforts in this matter.

Mr. McGrath: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, and in view of the fact that this will contribute substantially to the cost of living in an area of the country where it is now higher than in any other part of the country—I am referring specifically to the Atlantic provinces—does the minister intend to have this matter looked into with a view to providing the government with advice on action to offset this increase in the cost of living in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Gray: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN WAGE OFFER TO NORTHWEST TERRITORIES NURSES BECAUSE OF WORKING CONDITIONS AND COST OF LIVING—DANGER PAY

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the high cost of living in the north, and in view of the adverse conditions under which nurses in the Northwest Territories frequently work, is the Treasury Board thinking of substantially increasing its wage offer to these people to bring their pay levels at least to parity with those of nurses under western provincial jurisdiction?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1440)

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the pay arrangements for nurses have recently been determined by an arbitrator appointed by agreement of the parties. I think the hon. gentleman is aware that with respect to nurses serving in the north there are special allowances that are periodically reviewed to take into account changing cost of living standards.

Mr. Firth: In view of the much greater responsibility of nurses working north of the 60th parallel than that of other nurses employed by the federal government, such as working without a doctor's supervision and evacuating emergency cases in light aircraft usually under adverse conditions, would the minister give consideration to danger pay for this group of nurses?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, we are looking at the question of danger pay in respect of all those who are subject to it.

REQUEST BY NURSES IN YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES FOR REOPENING WAGE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as minister of health for the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Has the minister received a telegram, to which I referred a day or two ago when I asked this question, from the various nursing associations in the Yukon and Northwest Territories requesting the reopening of negotiations to see whether or not a more realistic accommodation can be made with respect to those now coming under his jurisdiction?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, indeed I think I did receive such representations, but as I have already indicated, bargaining for nurses' salaries does not fall within my jurisdiction.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—DATE OF SUBMISSION OF PROJECTS TO ADVISORY COMMITTEES IN CONSTITUENCY

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

When will local initiatives projects be presented to the constituency advisory groups?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): To answer very shortly, Mr. Speaker, we have received in excess of 14,000 applications totalling an estimated $419 million. We are processing these applications for delivery to the constituency advisory groups and others as quickly as possible.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—HOURS OF SERVICE OF MEMBERS OF CONSTITUENCY ADVISORY COMMITTEES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can the minister indicate what action has been taken by his officials on the complaint that constituency advisory committees are being asked to meet during working hours rather than in the evenings as was the impression of many of them when they agreed to their nominations? Will he be advising his officials that these committees are to meet at such times as are suitable to the committee members rather than to the civil servants as is now the case?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are grateful to those people who have agreed to serve with these voluntary organizations. To the maximum degree possible we will try to accommodate the hours to their own working conditions, but we will on occasion possibly have to ask them to sacrifice some of that time since we are trying to meet fairly tight deadlines.

ENERGY

DETERMINATION OF PETROLEUM PRODUCT PRICES FOR EASTERN CANADA IN LIGHT OF PRICE FREEZE WEST OF OTTAWA VALLEY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the minister's answer to me yesterday that the request for an increase in the price of petroleum products would apply only to the eastern section of Canada, are we to assume that the government intends to retain the price freeze for the area west of the Ottawa valley until at least January 30 and that any adjustments in the eastern section will be permitted by order of the National Energy Board in compliance with any increase in the price of imported crude?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, I would hope to make an announcement on this question on November 1. One of the questions we have to consider with regard to the western section of the market is whether a price differential would be capable of creating a shortage of supply problem in Ontario.

OIL—RESULT OF MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER AND MEMBERS OF ALBERTA GOVERNMENT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister inform the House of the outcome of the meeting he held yesterday with ministers of the Alberta government in respect of the energy crisis? Were any new federal policy positions placed before the provincial ministers at that time?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there was anything new that had not been discussed with them before. I think I can say there was an exchange on the question of the taxation of the Syncrude project and also with regard to the disposition of the proceeds of the export tax. We were engaged really in discussions anent to negotiations with regard to the disposition of those proceeds.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed a last supplementary and then I will recognize the hon. member for York East.

Mr. Lawrence: I have a supplemenatry question in relation to the disposition of the tax revenue. Can the minister inform the House if any firm offer has been made to Alberta on the disposition of this income?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the matter was discussed on a negotiating basis only in consideration of other arrangements that might be made.

GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL—DETERMINATION OF ACTUAL COST INCREASES RELATED TO RETAIL PRICE INCREASES SINCE SEPTEMBER 4

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister has assured the House that on November 1 there will be a comprehensive statement regarding gasoline and fuel prices. Has he requested the National Energy Board, under the provisions of the National Energy Board Act which grant him such powers, to determine, prior to the formulation of his statement, the actual cost increases related to retail price increases in gasoline or fuel oil that have taken place since September 4?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Board has been working with officials of my department in determining the costs in this industry in its very general sense.

Mr. Arrol: Can the minister assure the House that he will not allow any such retail price increases to be made until a study of cost increases has been conducted and made public?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that is what we have been studying and my intention is to make it public on Thursday.

GASOLINE PRICE INCREASE IN QUEBEC—VIOLATION OF GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister on September 13 supplementary to his initial statement on September 4 extending the price freeze requested by the Prime Minister to prices of gasoline, diesel oil and home heating fuel, would the right hon. gentleman confirm that the recently announced price increase is a direct violation of his government's guidelines?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Abitibi. Order, please. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris rises on a point of order.

[Translation]

I apologize to the hon. member for Abitibi for not recognizing him right now.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: In the applause, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the Prime Minister's reply. Was it yes or no?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer was no, Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm that.

[Translation]

SUGGESTION THAT PRIME MINISTER DISCUSS WITH PREMIER OF QUEBEC REMOVAL OR REDUCTION OF PROVINCIAL TAX ON GASOLINE AND HEATING OIL

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since a totalitarian government was swept into power in Quebec last night, could the Prime Minister get in touch with his Quebec counterpart and discuss the possibility of the Quebec government removing or at least reducing the tax on gas and heating fuel in order to prevent the forthcoming price increase?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the smiles which greeted the hon. member's question can be explained in the same way as those which greeted the remarks of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. We do not smile because of the Liberal victory but rather because of the hon. member's prediction at a press conference that the government elected yesterday would be a minority government.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I should ask a supplementary or return to the first question. I think the right hon. Prime Minister forgot to answer it.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to point out that there certainly is a difference between what the hon. member calls a totalitarian government and what the other hon. member calls a minority government.

Mr. Laprise: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Abitibi is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I think I asked the Prime Minister a fairly clear question, that is whether he would consider getting in touch with his Quebec counterpart in order to convince him to remove or reduce the tax on gas and heating oil, to avoid the imminent price increase.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe I shall be meeting the Premier of Quebec very soon. First of all, I will want to congratulate him on his brilliant victory. I can assure the hon. member that in our discussions we will bear in mind the respective jurisdictions of Quebec and the federal government. I do not intend to suggest to him a particular course in the taxation field which comes under his jurisdiction.

OIL—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF MARKETING BOARD TO PURCHASE DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN CRUDE IN ORDER TO AVERAGE PRICE ACROSS CANADA

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that crude oil west of the Ottawa line is now at a lower price and hopefully will continue to be a lower price, while east of that line the price will be higher, is the minister giving consideration to establishing a marketing board that will purchase both domestic and foreign crude with a view to averaging the price so that all Canadians will pay the same price and, hopefully, a lower price?

TAR SANDS OIL—RELATION TO TAXABLE INCOME OF PROVINCIAL ROYALTIES PAYABLE BY SYNCRUDE

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary arising out of a previous question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does the government accept the position that provincial royalties payable by Syncrude will be calculated as a pre-tax charge on income, and is the minister now satisfied that no federal impediment remains to the development of the Syncrude project?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a question of taxation of that kind would relate to the responsibilities of my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Then I direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday four ministers representing the government of Alberta, together with my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and myself, reviewed the arrangements between the companies comprising the consortium called Syncrude and the province of Alberta to see whether they could be made to fit in with the announced guidelines for mining taxation policy. Further to that, officials met yesterday afternoon. I had a further meeting this morning with Gordon Miniely, the Minister of Finance of Alberta, and we will continue these negotiations.

BEEF—IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES—PROTECTION OF CANADIAN PRODUCERS

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In light of the placing last August of an embargo on Canadian beef going to the United States, which was considered by the government important enough to call a special cabinet meeting before putting it into force, why is it, considering the disastrous position in which Canadian beef producers now find themselves, a special cabinet meeting was not called last weekend to consider the steps necessary to protect these beef producers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt as to a question asked in those terms. The hon. member is not seeking information. He is presenting an argument in support of his case. Perhaps he would like to ask his question in other terms.

Mr. Frank: Is any special cabinet meeting now being considered as was the case when an embargo was imposed last August?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, cabinet meetings are called at my behest. The matter of time is one of internal administration. I call them as often as I find it necessary.

Mr. Frank: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In light of the minister's statement yesterday that he has been in constant communication with the Canadian Cattlemen's Association discussing imposition of a further tariff on American overfat cattle and dressed beef coming into Canada and in light of the Statistics Canada report that the farm input price index rose 7.3 per cent in the third quarter of this year, can the minister inform the House of any further results of those meetings?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with my colleagues, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. If there is anything to be said changing current policy, it will be said.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO SALE OF FEED GRAINS BY WHEAT BOARD TO MANITOBA MILLS AT LOWER PRICES THAN SET BY PROVINCIAL COMMISSION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Is the Canadian Wheat Board offering feed grains for sale to feed mills in Manitoba at prices lower than those set by the Manitoba Feed Grains Commission? If so, is it violating the regulations of that provincial commission?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure the regulations would have any effect. The price at which the Canadian Wheat Board is prepared to offer is based on its selling price out of Thunder Bay, less freight. I am not sure exactly what price is being charged or set in Manitoba by the government because it seems to change that price quite frequently. I will determine the comparative levels and try to get an answer for the hon. member.

Mr. Ritchie: In view of the fact the Manitoba Feed Grains Commission set the price on barley at $2.24 on Monday, considerably less than the Wheat Board, who has jurisdiction over the price of feed grains in the province?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, obviously that is asking for a legal conclusion.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT INQUIRY INTO RIOT

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the continuing tension at the British Columbia Penitentiary and the fact that a gun was found there last weekend as well as a box of shells, will the minister reconsider his position and set up an independent inquiry into the penitentiary riot?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House on a previous occasion, we do not think the answer to the problem at the British Columbia Penitentiary is another inquiry. I want to say that since last weekend we have transferred out of the B.C. Penitentiary 43 inmates in addition to the 60 already transferred. Also, included in the recent number of transfers were eight of the most difficult inmates. They were transferred to other maximum security institutions across the country.

Mr. Reynolds: Can the Solicitor General advise to which maximum security institution the eight of the worst offenders were sent?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, four were transferred to the Ontario region, two who were French speaking were transferred to the Laval temporary maximum institution in Quebec and two were transferred to Dorchester, New Brunswick.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I pose to the minister the prospect that another inquiry into the penitentiary riot is not required but rather an independent inquiry into the headquarters staff of the penitentiary service here in Ottawa from where most of the problems emanate. Will the minister engage in that kind of inquiry?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, there have been many inquiries of that nature. I repeat that last week we asked for an independent inquiry into the B.C. Penitentiary by the correctional investigator. I am awaiting her report.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): In view of the apparent misinformation the minister has been supplying to members of the House, including the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta and the fact that apparently this misinformation is funnelled to the minister by his own staff, and in view of the potentially explosive situation requiring urgent attention at the B.C. Penitentiary, will he consider the prospect of an independent inquiry, not only into present conditions there but into the apparent breakdown in the administration of that penitentiary, before something really serious happens and the place becomes a parking lot after the next incident?

● (1500)

Mr. Allmand: I would be interested to know what misinformation the hon. member alleges I am giving to the House. We have been taking action at the B.C. Penitentiary. We have held two inquiries since the summer. We have transferred 100 inmates or more. I might say also that the director of the penitentiary will be retiring shortly, a new director will be appointed. Improvements are being made at the institution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY

LEGISLATION COVERING OIL EXPORT TAX—DATE OF INTRODUCTION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that notice of a ways and means motion dealing with the oil export tax has been before the House for over a month, and in light of the fact the government has been collecting this tax without the approval of parliament for 30 days, can the minister tell the House whether legislation is being prepared in this regard and when we can expect it to be brought down?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Sir, legislation is being prepared. This is one of the questions now under discussion with the government of Alberta. I would want to clarify the position taken by that government to a somewhat greater extent before we bring the matter forward for debate.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN ELEMENT IN MIDDLE EAST PEACE FORCE—EFFECT ON OTHER COMMITMENTS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence relating to the statement we heard this afternoon about the sending of a force to the Middle East. I think the House and the country would like to know the composition of this contingent, which units and support services have been selected, what materiel they will be required to take with them by way of aircraft, communications equipment and so on, and where they will be stationed.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): I believe we will be able to give the hon. member and the House this information in great detail during the debate. I can say, however, that the organizational structure of the force being sent overseas will be based on the Canadian Airborne Regiment in Edmonton. Other specialists will be added to that structure. We will be sending trucks, some aircraft and also communications equipment.

[Later:]

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): My question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. Can the Minister of National Defence tell the House exactly how many troops this Middle East commitment will involve? Is it 1400, as reported, or is it less or more than that figure? Can he also tell the House whether the provision of such troops engaged in logistics support will in any way comprise our operations in Canada, Europe, Cyprus or anywhere else where they are stationed?

Mr. Richardson: The planning is still proceeding. The exact number of troops is not known but it will be at least 1,000 and not more than 1,500, so the figure of 1,400 mentioned by the hon. member is in the range. The equipment and personnel we will be sending will not adversely affect our operations in Canada or our commitments to NATO.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice there are perhaps five or six members who are seeking supplementaries on this subject. I wonder whether hon. members ought not to feel they are anticipating an order of the day since it is my understanding there is to be a debate or a statement on motions. It seems to me hon. members are seeking information which normally ought to be given by way of a statement on motions which I hope will be made very soon. Perhaps we should try not to ask too many supplementaries on this subject.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SEIZURE OF PINBALL MACHINES AND GAMBLING DEVICES—POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF MAFIA

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Solicitor General arising from conflicting information concerning the seizure of pinball machines and other gambling devices. Has this action been ordered by the federal government, and is there any evidence that the Mafia is involved?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I have no information regarding that matter, Mr. Speaker. I will check and give an answer to the hon. member later.

FISHERIES

DATE OF REPORT ON EFFECT OF CLOSING EAST COAST PORTS TO FOREIGN FISHING FLEETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this question is addressed to the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. When can we expect a report on the special study into the possible effects of closing east coast Canadian ports to foreign fishing fleets, presently being carried out by Mr. Ernest Weeks, Chairman of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Toward the end of the year, Mr. Speaker.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL APPLICATION B—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO APPROVAL PRIOR TO HEARING

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Communications whether, in view of the fact Bell Canada is currently installing equipment which can only become operational upon the approval of its application B, he is in a position to assure the House that Bell Canada has not received any prior indication that any part of this application will be approved by the CTC?

Mr. Speaker: While that question is being considered, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lisgar.

AIR TRANSPORT

BILATERAL AGREEMENT ON ROUTES WITH UNITED STATES—SUGGESTED RENEGOTIATION TO MEET MANITOBA'S REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the recent statement by the Manitoba Minister of Industry that the recent air route agreement falls short of meeting Manitoba's regional requirements as discussed at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, will the minister renegotiate the terms of the agreement which allocated 28 routes to the United States and only 18 to Canada?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): This is something I intend to look into, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Murta: In view of the fact that Transair Limited of Winnipeg has been denied the opportunity to compete with Northwest Airlines Incorporated of St. Paul, Minnesota, on the Winnipeg-Minneapolis route, and in view of the fact this perpetuates Manitoba's dependence on United States carriers, will the minister do more than simply look into this? Will he work on behalf of Manitoba by competing for these economically beneficial routes which would certainly help the province?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This is a matter which is related to the bilateral agreement with the United States which has not yet been ratified either by Washington or by Ottawa.

FERTILIZER—ALLEGED SHORTAGE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Last Thursday the minister stated that the fertilizer association had told him there was no shortage of fertilizer in Canada. In view of the fact that farmers in the Okanagan Valley are presently short 1,000 tons of fertilizer, with no commitments received from the manufacturers, would the hon. gentleman cause an investigation to be made into the shortage of fertilizer in British Columbia?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): We have already finalized our meetings with the fertilizer manufacturers. I am asking for reports on fertilizer shortages and tracing these shortages down. We had found none up to the time I entered the House.

Mr. Whittaker: It is the users and distributors of fertilizers that are short and the manufacturers are not entering into any commitments with them. Would the minister check with the users and the distributors and carry out an investigation of the shortage in British Columbia?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume that is a representation. The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore might be allowed at this point to return to his earlier question to see whether a reply is forthcoming.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL APPLICATION B—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO APPROVAL PRIOR TO HEARING

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question to the Minister of Communications is: In view of the fact that Bell Canada is currently installing equipment which can only become operational upon the approval of Application B which is shortly to go before the CTC, is the hon. gentleman in a position to assure the House that Bell Canada has not in fact received any prior indication that this portion of its application will in fact be approved?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Apologizing for my absentmindedness a few moments ago, I think I can give such an assurance to the hon. member.

AIR TRANSPORT

BILATERAL AGREEMENT ON ROUTES WITH UNITED STATES—POSSIBLE CONCESSIONS—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF CANADA'S CHARTER POSITION

Mr. Elmer MacKay (Central Nova): I have a supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Lisgar. In light of the statement made by the Minister of Transport yesterday to the effect that Canada will have to make concessions in relation to the air agreement with the United States, can the hon. gentleman briefly indicate the nature of those concessions or tell us when he will be doing so?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Of course not, Mr. Speaker. Negotiations are being carried on right now and I do not intend to say what kind of concessions are going to be made.

Mr. MacKay: Keeping in mind that the air charter routes are more beneficial than direct routes because of present traffic patterns, will the minister assure us he will stick to his guns and commit himself firmly to hard negotiations affecting Canada's charter position?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, the hon. member has made a representation. We might try to allow two or three quick questions before the end of the question period. The hon. member for Assiniboia has a supplementary, I believe.

● (1510)

BILATERAL AGREEMENT ON ROUTES WITH UNITED STATES—POSSIBLE RENEGOTIATION OF ONE ROUTE FOR SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that in the negotiations regarding air routes with the United States the province of Saskatchewan was entirely left out in terms of any north-south routes, and in view of the fact the Attorney General of the province of Saskatchewan has tabled with the minister a complete economic study showing why these routes would be feasible, would the minister inform the House whether he has taken it upon himself to attempt to renegotiate at least one route for the province of Saskatchewan, either from Saskatoon or Regina?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been briefed by the government of Saskatchewan on this and it is something we are now studying, but to relate the whole negotiations to that particular aspect is quite difficult at this moment.

POST OFFICE

RURAL MAIL CARRIERS—ACTION TO INCREASE PAY IN LIGHT OF HIGHER COSTS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. NATIONAL REVENUE

REQUEST FOR SUFFERANCE WAREHOUSE IN RENFREW—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that communications and correspondence relating to a sufferance warehouse in the town of Renfrew have been going on since March of 1973 between the minister and me, and for two years prior to that with my predecessor, would the minister indicate whether or not permission for such a warehouse will be granted?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that question could be put on the order paper. If there is urgency, perhaps the hon. member would not mind giving me notice and he would be given priority on the order of business for the adjournment debate.

Mr. Dick: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With respect, I did try to indicate that not only have I written to and communicated with the minister, which is just as good, I think, as putting a question on the order paper, but there has been no response on this question which is vital to this community and has been for two and a half years.

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a point of order. I appreciate the hon. member's point, but that is the very purpose of what is referred to by hon. members as the late show. When the Speaker is judged to be wrong, as he very often is, hon. members have an opportunity of giving notice that they wish to have an urgent matter considered a few hours later. If the matter has waited two and a half years, perhaps it could wait a few more hours and I will ensure that the question is given priority.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. I do not suppose Your Honour knows what it is yet so perhaps I can at least state it.

Mr. Speaker: The minister rises on a point of order.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the impression should be left that I do not answer the hon. member's inquiries. The answer, unfortunately, has been no.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DATE OF DEBATE ON CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN MIDDLE EAST PEACE FORCE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I assk the government House leader whether he can tell us when we should prepare ourselves for the debate on Canada's participation in UNEF.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it would be my intention, if a debate is required, to put the resolution before the House on Friday so that hon. members would have an opportunity to prepare.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

CANADA PENSION PLAN (No. 2)

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ANNUAL INCREASES AND LEVEL OF INCOME ON WHICH CONTRIBUTIONS PAID

The House resumed, from Monday, October 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-224, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, last night before the adjournment hour I had pointed out to the House, as had some of my colleagues previously, that the bill does not offer a solution to the problems faced by one or other partner in a family unit who outlives his or her spouse. This is particularly true of the housewife who is denied the privilege of participating in the fund since society has never considered her activities important enough to qualify for recognition as a member of the labour force. I also pointed out that the fund must provide in the future for those people who have not worked up to the age set by the fund but have felt that their savings would carry them for the rest of their days. Those people in our society must also be allowed access to the fund.

I congratulated the minister for his apparent success in dealing with his provincial counterparts, but I would point out to him that some of the concern expressed by my colleagues and myself was also expressed by the provincial ministers. For example, Norman Levi, the minister from British Columbia, had this to say:

In particular we would like to see alterations to the Canada Pension Plan to provide for substantially higher retirement, widows, widows with dependent children, and disability pensions. We would also like to see consideration given to the possibilities of extending coverage to spouses of contributors and to a lowering of the age when retirement benefits can be made available.

Other provinces pushed for three basic objectives. First of all, they asked for a substantial increase in benefits and contended that Canada Pension Plan benefits should be increased significantly to bear a realistic relationship to the needs of pensioners as living costs and wage levels increase. Second, they asked for immediate steps to be taken to reorient the CPP to more adequate pension levels. With regard to parallelism, they contended that in order to rebuild national pension harmony the third objective should be to re-establish parallelism between the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan. This objective should be sought in line with, not at the expense of, the first two objectives.

The province of Ontario proposed that the earnings ceiling be raised to $9,500 in 1975 compared with the federal proposal of $7,800. Under the Ontario proposal, the maximum pension would be $192 a month beginning in 1976, compared with $160 a month under the federal proposal. The Ontario proposal also called for the elimination of the earnings test for pensioners between the age of 65 and 69; for CPP retirement pensions to be made available to people between the ages of 60 and 64 on a reduced basis; for increased benefits for widows aged 60 and over; and for equal treatment for men and women with respect to survivors benefits.

The Hon. Bruce L. Stewart from Prince Edward Island said that this plan should provide a one step benefit station, without the need for further resources, to provincial assistance schemes or other benefit plans. This, of course, is in line with what I said last night, as did others before me, namely that some of the OAS and CPP schemes be amalgamated. Numerous other suggestions were advanced by the provinces and, hopefully, the minister will consider them at the time some of the final steps in his total social security program are taken.

Looking very briefly at the performance of the fund over the years from 1965 and 1966 and the present day, we find that many or all of these proposals are possible for the future. At the present time the fund has an excessive amount of money in it. In order to keep my figures correct I shall come back to this later; I cannot find them in my notes at the moment.

The task force on social security said of Canada's pension plan that it had had little effect on poverty in Canada so far, and questioned whether the plan will ever have the effect that the government expected it to have and which the minister said it would have. Even if the plan were to reach maturity in 1973 the combined annual income from the CPP, the QPP and the OAS would only be $2,600 per year, and the $1,400 CPP or QPP pension would preclude anything but a token payment under the guaranteed income supplement program. The combined total of payments under CPP and QPP and OAS do not compare very favourably with the 1973 Senate poverty line for a single individual which is set at $2,650.

As an anti-poverty measure the CPP suffers from the same basic defect as unemployment insurance because benefits are related to income. Therefore, if you tend to live in poverty before retirement this pattern will be perpetuated by the pension scheme. It should also be noted that in the calculation of eligibility for the income-tested guaranteed income supplement CPP and QPP benefits must be counted as income and, hence, for every dollar received through these programs there is a 50-cent reduction in the guaranteed income supplement.

The task force also makes a serious analysis of the dilemma in which housewives and divorced mothers find themselves, and points out that CPP and the QPP are designed to complement old age security but displace and improve upon the guaranteed income supplement for the aged who have been in the labour force. However, this raises a serious question as to why housewives are not included in the pension plan. Housewives are now eligible for both old age security and the income supplement. Should a woman, therefore, who has spent the better part of her life raising children and tending to family matters be excluded from the Canada Pension Plan? If a wife is predeceased by her husband who is eligible for CPP or QPP payments, the wife can claim a widow's allowance, but what of women whose husbands have deserted or divorced them? A wife who is divorced by her husband loses all rights to the widow's pension and, under these circumstances, has to fall back on the acknowledged inadequate payments offered by old age security and the guaranteed income supplement.

My distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), paid tribute to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) last evening for the diligence with which he applies himself to his job. He has in this parliament been more productive than any of his colleagues. He has introduced several bills all designed to push up the ceiling on some things. He has dealt twice this year with old age security measures, and has made adjustments to the family allowances program as well on two occasions. This has all been done in order to protect those unfortunate Canadians from the growing cancer in our economic system, inflation.

Maybe this bright new star in the government ranks could be motivated to assist his colleagues in the serious dilemma in which they find themselves, and in finding a solution to the increased cost of living and inflation problems. I give the minister credit for not repeating what his colleague, for instance the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), has done. The Unemployment Insurance Commission had a ceiling of $800 million on its borrowing from the government when parliament commenced this session in January. Rumours have it now that contributors and taxpayers will have to find some $2,400 million to keep some of Canada's work force idle. These are the hard facts, regardless of how the statistics are adjusted, seasonally or otherwise. The minister has pushed up the ceiling so high he has not yet realized that the lid has blown off and the roof has caved in. I just worry about how we will ever face the impossible task of cleaning up the mess after Canadians have had the opportunity of relieving the present government and their friends to my left from their jobs, in which they have displayed a high degree of incompetence.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by repeating briefly what has been said very thoroughly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We wish to compliment the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) on this piece of legislation, as far as it goes. Let me say that it does move in a direction very much to our taste. We like the idea of fully escalating the benefits, which I understand will run from the beginning of the plan as though there never had been this 2 per cent ceiling. We also like the new earnings ceilings which have been established for 1974 and 1975. This is a good feature of the new bill.

Let me now say something about the Minister of National Health and Welfare which has not been said during this debate. We worry a good deal about the stresses and strains which tend to pull the provinces apart. When I heard the minister state yesterday that the changes to be made by this bill had been agreed to unanimously by the provinces, I made up my mind to express the feeling that this minister is doing more than any other member on the other side to achieve a measure of unity in this country. He has not tried to browbeat the provinces like recalcitrant children, but has outlined his schemes to the provinces. He has not acted like a father who knows best and suggested they would have to sign on the dotted line, but has asked for their opinions, their suggestions and proposed amendments. Furthermore, he has listened and taken account of their suggestions in drafting his legislation. I believe he has done a great deal for this country, allowing us to realize that no matter what the differences of opinion are, and they are very deep and dividing among the provinces, there is a possibility of making social security measures work in a co-operative way by finding common ground among the provinces.

If a minister of national health and welfare had risen in this House a few years ago and said there was unanimous agreement in respect of a social measure of this type, we would have been inclined to think he was dreaming or that we were dreaming. This minister has proven that this can be done and I compliment him on his method of working with the provinces. I hope this method will be extended to many other fields. Before I complete my remarks I will be pointing out some of his shortcomings, but I wanted to make those remarks today because I firmly believe them.

One thing which seems most regrettable in connection with this piece of legislation is the fact that it is being considered as the type of bill the opposition will not be able to amend. I think it would be a very good thing if it were left open for us to move appropriate amendments, which could be considered in the committee and then later in this House. I know the point of order involved to the effect that this involves the expenditure of money, but anything that is worthwhile in this House does involve such an expenditure. It would be better if members were given leeway in respect of moving amendments instead of having to plead with the minister to introduce certain amendments which he might find it difficult to do.

If we could introduce amendments we might even have some hope of getting them through, but if we should ask the minister to introduce amendments, most of which perhaps he has been pressed to introduce already and has turned down, then I do not think there is a likelihood of having them adopted. However, I should like to mention some of the important amendments we have in mind. I wish to begin by pointing out that the main amendment that is necessary is one to provide equality in the Canada Pension Plan for women along with men. I realize this point has been discussed, but I wish to go into it more thoroughly. I believe it is not only a bad oversight, but is a very definite wrong to the women of this country not to include this amendment in the Canada Pension Plan bill which is before us.

It is three years since the Royal Commission on the Status of Women completed its report which was tabled in this House. At page 81 of this report I find the following:

> The most significant sex difference in the Canada Pension Plan lies in the benefits provided for the spouse and children of a contributor. The husband of a female contributor is not entitled to any pension unless he is disabled at the time of her death and was being maintained wholly or substantially by her before her death. Nor are children of a female contributor entitled to any benefits unless 'the child was, in prescribed circumstances, being maintained wholly or substantially' by her. Under section 527 (1) of the Canadian Pension Plan Regulations, being maintained 'wholly or substantially' means that 'the support in cash, kind or services, other than services provided by way of normal household or family duties as a mother or wife, that a deceased female contributor had provided for the necessaries of life, health, welfare, care, education or advancement of her dependent child or her disabled husband was, in the opinion of the Director, equal in amount or value to more than 50% of any such support provided for those purposes by (a) all persons in respect of her dependent child; or (b) all persons except his or her dependent child, in respect of her disabled husband.'

I have read this because it is three years since, in very clear and unmistakable language, the Commission which travelled all over Canada and registered the opinion of the women of Canada laid down the principle that the survivor benefits under the Canada Pension Plan should be made equal in respect of men and women. This, I believe, was a very clear and unmistakable line of operation.

Since that time the ministers in charge of implementing measures concerning women have said they are studying the matter. We know that this proposal to have the survivor benefits equal as between men and women has been discussed, not only at the departmental and ministerial levels but also with the provinces. So far nothing has issued from these discussions. We know that every large womens' organization in the country has been seeking this particular measure. Just yesterday the National Council of Women, probably the largest and best known of any womens organization in this country and certainly I believe the most representative of the various types of women across this country, said this in a précis of its brief:

> In the matter of fringe benefits and pension plans, Council asks that all references to sex and marital status be eliminated so that women would benefit equally under the provisions of the Canada Labour Code.

The National Council of Women, the Status of Women Organization, the Business and Professional Women and all womens' groups have been pressing for this amendment. What does the government do? The government welcomes these women with open arms and, while it folds them to its heart, it says no so far as giving them this equality. This is not good enough. The women of this country want an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan now to provide that, following the death of one spouse the benefit of the Canada Pension Plan will be paid to the surviving spouse and the dependent children on the same basis, regardless of the sex of the surviving spouse. That is what they want. It is perfectly clear.

Not very long ago the Liberal convention made very clear that this is indeed what it wanted. It was the same thing. I shall quote from some information that was sent me following the meeting. They say, for example, in respect of the Canada Pension Plan a man's dollar buys a pension for his widow if she has dependent children or if she is over 25 or if she is disabled. They say further that a woman's dollar buys a pension for her widower only if he is disabled, was disabled at the time of her death and was dependent on her for support prior to her death. For example, a man's orphans get benefits if they can prove relationship; a woman's orphans get benefits if they can prove relationship and if they can prove that there was major financial dependence on her. So, the resolution of the Liberal Party was that the Canada Pension Plan be modified so that the survivors of all contributors receive equal benefits.

That is the first amendment I would ask the minister now to consider bringing to the Canada Pension Plan. We opposition members are precluded from so doing by the rules of this House. In other words, under the Canada Pension Plan when a woman is on the paying end she is equal, but when she is on the receiving end she is second class. Women wish to receive the same benefit in respect of their payment into the Canada Pension Plan that men receive in respect of their payment. I do not think there is any excuse for this being denied any longer.

The second amendment I would like to see is an amendment to make full benefits under the Canada Pension Plan available to the surviving spouse of a contributor who, by reason of illness, injury or death was prevented from making sufficient payments to qualify for a pension under the Canada Pension Plan. All of us in this House have received many letters of distress from people who point out that the payments made by them or their spouse were not sufficient to qualify for pensions under the Canada Pension Plan. In all justice, I believe this situation should be corrected because many people are in a position where benefits are not received automatically in the face of injury, disablement or death. When a man contributes to the Canada Pension Plan, immediately he dies the full benefits go to the widow and the dependent children, but if a woman contributor dies these benefits are not automatic. They go to the estate, and then all those conditions which I earlier laid out are very carefully looked at. This is not right. We must have equality or the pension plan is not fulfilling its purpose.

The third amendment is the one on which I believe we must place the greatest stress. This is the matter which has been dealt with already by a number of members, although they have not all dealt with it in the same way. It is in respect of the situation where there is a married couple, one of whom is out earning the bread and contributing to the Canada Pension Plan, while the other is doing the work of the home. But it is only the one person who is covered under the existing legislation. There are members of all parties who now say where there is a married couple and where the housewife, mother or partner is at home, he or she should be entitled to share in the Canada Pension Plan as a contributor and as a full recipient.

There is a difference of opinion as to how that should be done. Yesterday, one hon. member said that the housewife should be able to contribute herself, pay the contributions herself. I ask you: how many housewives with small children at home are in a position to pay their share to the CPP? That is the good old question that used to be asked of our party so often: where will they get the money? I suppose they could go through the old man's pockets if he is unwary enough to leave his money lying around where they can have access to it—if there is anything left, which is another matter. However, I do not think that is a fair position in which to put a woman. She has no money of her own, but why should she have to go to her husband and ask him for enough money to allow her to contribute to the CPP? Women are not of that type any more.

Perhaps there used to be women who just adored getting down on their knees and begging their lords and masters for a few cents with which to buy something they really needed. But that type of woman disappeared a long time ago; she no longer exists. The present day woman wants to stand on her own feet, economically and emotionally. I see the minister shaking his head. Oh, yes, she does. If any of you have the other kind of woman, watch out because she will not stay that way long in the modern world. They are changing very quickly. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) put the matter in the correct perspective, in my view, when he said that marriage is a partnership. Any decent kind of marriage is. When one of the partners is out in the community doing work and the other one is doing work at home, they are none the less both carrying a fair measure of the work of that partnership and both of them should be entitled to share fully in the benefits of social security in all its phases.

There are many people in the minister's department who could very well work out ways and means of achieving that. For example, we could take the joint income of the couple. In some cases the woman has a job; perhaps she has part time work. Let the incomes of both husband and wife be put together, and let them together make a contribution from whatever joint income they have. Let this be considered as a partnership in respect of the CPP. If the woman has no other source of income, heaven knows that she is doing her full share with a group of small children at home, looking after the home, her husband and his needs, and that kind of thing. If that is not satisfactory, why not take another look at my proposal from away back, which is to make available to that woman a salary for the work she is doing in bringing up the future citizens of this country? If she is given a salary, she will be able to pay her own way in CPP and she will have her own money with which to do it.

Let the minister not think that he will get away much longer with having these groups of women coming patiently down here to Ottawa, groups such as the National Council of Women, the Business and Professional Women's Association, and the Status of Women groups from all across the country, being polite and impressed with what they hear. Furthermore, they will not go on believing him because for three years now they have been told: "we will seriously consider the matter. There are many ways in which the matter of pensions can be looked at". That is what the orange paper said, and the white paper said something similar. The women want their recommendations embodied in the Canada Pension Plan now.

Something has occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, and now I must put in a word of criticism. I think that yesterday the minister was very cavalier and offhand in the way he treated the delegation of the National Council of Women when they came to ask that old age security pensions be raised to $150 a month. After all, they are asking for something that has already been requested, something that is popular in many sections of this country. Indeed, in the province from which I come a pension of about $200 is assured to elderly people who have no other means of support. So, these women were not asking for something impractical. Yet, according to the newspapers—perhaps the newspapers are wrong and I hope they are—the minister brushed them off with impatience saying that this would cost a big sum of money and was not practical.

I was around here long before the minister, and I remember the very first time members of the small CCF group here asked that jobs be made available and means be provided to keep the unemployed from starving. They were told by the then minister of labour—who unfortunately met his untimely death in an airplane accident since then, a fine man—that this could not possibly be done, that to put the unemployed to work would cost $25 million and would bankrupt the country. Later, whenever proposals for social security measures were put forward, they were fought on the same grounds, that they were not financially possible.

In this case the minister said that the women had not done their homework. Perhaps they have been doing their homework but the minister has not been in the home long enough to do some of his. The minister must know that $150 is not unreasonable for our senior citizens. Furthermore, unless the minister and his government can find a way of coping with inflation, the demand of these women will be renewed, and I predict that it will not be very long before it is granted, no matter what government is in power. So, I regret that the minister brushed them off in that cavalier way. Had he said that undoubtedly this will come before very long because we are having to consider measures for shoring-up income, that would have been a different story because the minister has been doing that in many fields. I do not like to hear the minister give stereotype answers which go way back to the time of the Ark, when it has been proven time and time again that the demands have been met when they have been strong enough.

There is one thing that I like about the minister's outlook, and that is that he is considering the matter of social security, not as a group of unrelated measures but as an interrelated concept. That is what we must have. I wish that my colleagues to my right would stop being so schizophrenic. They make me smile because, first, they start pushing a measure forward, such as old age pensions, the Canada Pension Plan, and so on, and half way through they become frightened and say to themselves that they cannot go on with it because of the effect it will have on the tax rate. Later, they forget and go back to it, saying to themselves that we must have more of these things so that people can live.

Let me suggest to my friends to the right, hon. members in the Progressive Conservative party, that if they could only forget the second half of their name and become a little more progressive they would realize that when you impose a tax you are not throwing money down the drain. When you consider the paying of taxes, you must look at the value of what you get for the taxes you pay. If you get peace of mind and physical comfort for the elderly people, you get something worthwhile. If you get a chance for women to stand on their own feet, economically, politically, socially and emotionally, you get something for which it is worth paying money. If you are getting all these things, it is worth while paying money for them. Just consider that before you become frightened at the idea of what these measures will cost the taxpayers, because so long as the large corporations make the kind of money they are making these days there are some taxpayers who are not paying nearly what they should.

These are the things I wanted to say today, Mr. Speaker. I wish the minister would provide us with a large and pleasant surprise, realizing our inability to move these amendments because of the rules. I wish he would take a sober second look at the Canada Pension Plan and, if he cannot make these changes in this bill, at least tell us that he intends to make them when he gets around to introducing the promised second bill. If they will not fit into that second promised bill, let him tell us they will be incorporated in another bill. Anyway, as long he gets these things done before Christmas nobody will worry. That would be a nice Christmas present this year.

Let me urge on the minister that it is not good enough for the government to go around giving lip service to the rights of women. We have not begun to touch most of the major recommendations in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. The government may not have too long to do this before it plays the death bed scene. It is not a moment too soon for it to begin going through this bible of women's rights and seeing which recommendations can be implemented now. The Canada Pension Plan is an excellent place to start.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity that is given to us to consider all steps taken by the House of Commons in the field of pensions since the opening of the present session last January.

This form of security has been considered as very important, first in the Speech from the Throne and then in details on January 11 by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), whe even dealt in with family allowances and all welfare measures for disadvantaged families and adult citizens continuously unemployed.

The speech of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, delivered on January 11, 1973, gives a summary of the results of many studies that have been carried out over 40 years in the whole field of public social security.

I think we must be grateful to the minister and his close assistants for the real effort that was made this year in this House to clear up this complex area of both personal and family social security, which is the main subject of our parliamentary work.

Looking at it from the point of view of ordinary citizens, those who most need these pensions, grants and allowances of all kinds, I note three main expressions of everyday's language: all these plans are much too sophisticated, we do not understand anything in them; despite all the increases, we are not better off; notwhthstanding increasing misery, companies are expanding.

That is what the people say, this is their everyday way of speaking. Here now is how the Minister of National Health and Welfare put it, as recorded on page 197 of Hansard for January 11 in his maiden speech as member of Parliament of Canada, and I quote:

> ... that the Canadian people have clearly indicated to the House of Commons ... that the social security system which the federal and provincial authorities built over the years as a patch work job no longer meets their wishes. ... They also see in it contradictions and even some confusion and, moreover, weak spots unequal to the needs the system is supposed to meet.

Mr. Speaker, we see that the minister is well aware of the disorderly situation concerning the administration of social security measures in Canada. If there is general confusion in the pension plan, subsidies and allowances, can we say that things are clearing or clouding up furthermore?

In the amendments now before us, for instance, is the escalation of pensions based on the cost of living increase a process likely to satisfy the people who need this legislation?

I draw to the attention of the House the one following point. Even though, in the past, pensions were increased by 2 per cent where the increase in the cost of living was 6 or 7 per cent, we see here a slight improvement in that the increase will be proportionate to the cost of living increase without a 2 per cent ceiling. But after thinking about the fact that this piece of legislation is aimed at helping those on low income we noticed that here again they will least benefit from higher pensions and the rich will get more out of it. With that 7 per cent raise those with an annual income of $7,400 will get an increase of $500 a year whereas those receiving allowances of $12 a month will be richer by only 84 cents a month.

● (1600)

All that is part of the same government policy which is felt at all levels. For example, they never fail to increase big salaries from $40,000 to over $50,000 or $60,000 for departmental officials. Interest rates range between 5 per cent and 7½ per cent on government bonds which means that a millionnaire will receive an interest of $75,000 a year on his million instead of $50,000, an increase of 50 per cent.

I also point out those two striking examples to save time but I could quote a host of other items which show that it has been the policy of this government for many years always to help the rich and large corporations to the detriment of human beings, families, and small or middle companies or co-operatives.

All this shows quite well that the time has come to make a more thorough investigation not only of our whole system of social security as it affects underprivileged individuals and families living on a single man's salary but the whole system as revenues, expenditures, surpluses, reserves and privileges granted to national or multinational, millionnaire or multimillionnaire companies. That is the essential point on which I felt I had to bring the attention of this House if the national economy is to be really straightened out for the benefit of all Canadians. If during the last 30 years the government of Canada agreed to administer old age security pensions and family allowances according to simple and very understandable formulas for the citizens who needed it most, why not go on administering in the same way instead of submitting these pensions and allowances to a very complicated and incomprehensible system of comparisons, indexes and algebraic ratios which ordinary citizens cannot fathom?

I quite agree that the superior knowledge of the government is useful to great specialists who launch satellites towards the moon. They can use their mechanical or electronic brains to figure out the millions and billions of dollars but when it comes to cents and dollars to ensure or to complete the personal guaranteed income of Canadian citizens without work or capital, I think the people would be more appreciative of the government if it used clear figures and fixed amounts within the grasp of the intellectual faculties of interested citizens.

Everybody knows that pensions in 1944 stood at $20 a month and today they amount to $100, with a supplement of about $70, which makes $170. But now the pension amounts to $179.16; we do not know how or why and Canadians are beginning to grumble precisely because we no longer know where we are going. I think these remarks have some weight because they are the expression of the people's language which we should try to understand, even when one becomes Minister of National Health and Welfare. I mean no harm to the minister or to his close officials who certainly have all the university degrees recommending them to the qualified authorities.

Let us leave great complicated works to high science and keep simple and accurate figures for the essential needs of the people who give their naive confidence to university graduates who control governments and big national and multinational, private or public companies which have millions and billions of dollars. All this would be possible by being simple with simple people, even if we like complicating reasonings and laws with the help of learned and complicated citizens. The greatest causes of misunderstanding do not lie between languages, but between various levels of communication within the same language. The second remark of the people concerning pensions, grants or allowances is as follows: In spite of all increases granted, we are not better off.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, when aged people received their pension cheques last month and when people on welfare got their allowances, it was thought appropriate to eliminate the monthly increase of $9.46 that the federal government had granted them. They could therefore claim that they are never better off at any rate. What is given by one hand is taken away by the other.

Mr. Speaker, the people are right. It is up to us to realize it and to act accordingly. We are here to represent the people. If the people understand the millionaires and the large corporation presidents and directors, they also understand the citizens without job or capital and that segment of the population deserves all our attention.

I congratulate the present Liberal government which was the sponsor of the main legislation regarding pensions and family allowances at the request, of course, of the Social Credit Party which has been recommending the payment of these allowances for many years as well as their increase in various instances.

Today the question is whether or not we go far enough in those areas particularly if we intend to be fair by raising pensions, allowances and all kind of subsidies. Let us not forget—it is not my opinion but that of the population—despite all the increases we stay at the same point. The more we receive the more prices rise and we do not progress and only regress from one year to another.

Since 1958, Mr. Speaker, we have been talking about inflation. All university graduates are racking their brains to find formulas likely to satisfy the people, to control inflation, check unemployment and eliminate poverty. But despite all the sincerity and goodwill of those experts who manage the country and the large corporations we go backward instead of forward in every field related to poverty, unemployment and inflation.

Even if this is a universal problem it is one more reason to try to find a remedy. Because if it is a problem, we must correct it. For that we have to start somewhere, then why not here in Canada?

It was in 1934 during the international crisis of the 30's that the Bank of Canada was created with the support of American and European financial experts following many royal enquiries. We are living through another international crisis in 1973, forty years later, after World War II, and the prosperous years from 1945 to 1958, and we are still facing inflation, unemployment and poverty. Do we have to wait for another world war to recover our balance in Canada?

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will find the solution to the present national crisis, before we come to the last solution, unwished for by the population.

Instead of being influenced by the international situation, let us see what can be done here for the population in order to achieve an atmosphere of peace, goodwill and economic balance between big and small, between individuals, families, and companies, big, medium, and small. While keeping everyone in his present position, even the Ministers of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), of Finance (Mr. Turner) and of National Health and Welfare, it would be possible to restore the national economic equilibrium for individuals, by a close study of the following four points which are the popular expression of everyday needs:

1. Family heads and single persons earn today equal salary for equal work.

2. Mothers today earn no salary for their housework.

3. Children and students are costly today and have no regular income.

4. Companies today make the highest profits and are taxed less than individuals.

● (1610)

Mr. Speaker, here is what could be used as a basis by the greatest scientists and university graduates in all their calculations to put some order at last between incomes, expenses and profits, between taxes—and reserves, between citizens, families and companies, between employers, employees and dependent citizens without work or capital, in order to provide them with a basic income, to provide them with at least economic, individual and family security, according to their particular case, in the center of our national economy which should respect life and the quality of life for any citizen, having regard to his language, race, religion, nationality, education, health or profession, and especially his age if he is too young or too old to look after himself.

Mr. Speaker, considering that situation, in spite of all the efforts of this government to iron out the difficulties in that field, I believe it is necessary at this stage of negotiations and of the drafting of legislation to come to a stop, to avail ourselves of the royal boards of inquiry, to analyze openly the particular goals that are to be reached in order to initiate the real national economic policy that will improve the quality of life for every Canadian.

Considering our outstanding national production, it should be possible to do much better than guaranteeing more than $20 a month to children from birth to majority, at 18 when everyone can earn his living, unless he would rather keep on studying so as to become a more informed and better educated citizen within society.

And even as a student providing services to society, does he not deserve a quality of life corresponding to his vital obligations and this strictly from a financial and monetary point of view, that is as far as a guaranteed personal income is concerned?

This is, Mr. Speaker, what should be established during our consideration of the amendments to Bill C-190 and Bill C-224 advocating increases in pensions, grants and allowances and their escalation based on the cost of living, especially if we want those who are asking for it to be satisfied.

Despite increased poverty, companies are developing. This is another word currently heard. I have to quote once again from a statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare during the speech he delivered on January 11, in the early days of this session. On page 201 of Hansard, we find this very wise comment and I quote:

> It is obvious that desirable goals whatever they may be, whether in the public or private sector, cannot be reached without the necessary resources. We have not discovered yet a magic wand or an alchemical formula allowing us to reach economical or social objectives effortlessly.

The government is forever torn between the natural reluctance of Canadians when faced with a tax increase, and its concern for improving assistance to the underprivileged. Once again, Mr. Speaker, I think that we should reconsider the government's position with respect to our national economy and with regard to those who take advantage of any economic distortions such as inflation, unemployment and poverty, and those who suffer because of these economic disturbances and would like to see them corrected.

It is essential to consider seriously where the money needed for the welfare of citizens should come from.

Although I have been elected as a Social Credit member by the citizens of the Rimouski riding, who put their trust in me by giving me a clear majority over candidates of the other political parties, I studied all the existing laws and their amendments and I can assure this House that I do everything possible to think out and express my opinions as a citizen really present and living in the present monetary, economic and political systems.

I apply myself to look at things as they really are and not as if we were already in a system that we wish to see in the future, and if Canadians are really fed up because they are paying too many taxes, it is on account of the present system. I also know that even in the present system it could be possible for everyone to pay fewer taxes and even to participate more generously in the welfare of those citizens without a suitable or adequate income, in spite of a more than plentiful national production. Thanks to the knowledge we have acquired through the Social Credit doctrine, we are probably in a better position to see the shortcomings of the current capitalist system, shortcomings that as we know may be corrected even under the capitalist system without it being necessary to turn everything upside down, to fall into socialism, communism, separatism or narrow nationalism.

The earth belongs to all human beings. The sun shines for everyone. This is the ideal which our current capitalist system can fulfill immediately as soon as we agree to take a few specific measures or make certain provisions regarding the present distribution of income and taxes, of the amounts intended for capitalization over the next few years on the 1973 production achieved through the work and capital of the 9 million citizens making up the labour force out of 22 million Canadians. However, do the 13 million dependent citizens without work or capital deserve to be considered as full citizens in our capitalist society? Why are there poor and needy people among wealthy people and millionaires in an affluent country?

To reach a decent balance between rich and poor in Canada there is no need at all to take money from the income derived from the work or capital of producing citizens to pay a guaranteed income to dependent citizens without work or capital as is too easily suggested by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

It is not necessary either to look for a magic wand, the philosophers' stone or an alchimic formula. No, we simply have to draw, year after year, from our plentiful national production the amounts needed to pay a guaranteed income to all dependent citizens, as we have found in this very same national production of the current year the salaries to pay for the work of citizens in the active labour force and to pay the interest or the dividends on the investments of capitalist interests also actively contributing to national production in the current year.

I do not perform miracles nor do I make exceptional discoveries, Mr. Speaker. I simply look at all the things that the Creator made available to us, the raw materials, the natural resources as well as the human intelligence which can be put to work not only in this government but also in each of our big or small businesses, in each of our houses, where Canadians would like nothing better than to produce to full capacity for the welfare of their countrymen and all the people in the world.

It is difficult to give further details, but it is the key to national economic equilibrium between individuals, families and companies. This is no mystery, or miraculous discovery, or alchemical formula, or magic trick. You have simply to go to the secret reserves of the large millionaire, multi-millionaire, national and multi-national companies and you will find all the money required to give a guaranteed annual income to everyone of the 13 million citizens dependent on welfare, who are also entitled to live a good life in a society to which they belong fully even though they cannot earn a sufficient income by working or by gathering the interests on their capital.

I can give you all the necessary figures to support this statement, but it would be useless to do so without a sufficient explanation. You have the basic solution, you only have to use it.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I had written down my comments last Thursday, well before the opposition critics and some other hon. members took the floor yesterday and today.

So, any similarity with their remarks is sheer coincidence or, in fact, purely accidental. I do intend to reflect in my speech ideas, opinions and representations, or even requests made to me by many of my electors. I am pleased, of course, to take the floor once more during this session to support a bill which will benefit hundreds or even thousands of Canadian men and women when comes the day of retirement which is so much longed for and deserved. However, people who are already retired will see in this initiative of the government of Canada the will to provide adequately for the needs of the people as a whole.

● (1620)

In fact, we cannot help noticing the giants steps taken since the previous Parliament which had also been productive in the social field. Suffice to recall for example the major amendments to the Income Tax Act whose advantages we will certainly be able to see when we fill in the income tax returns for the current year and for subsequent years.

I am pleased to recognize the energy and the determination shown by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in the pursuit and accomplishment of the main objectives of the government, whatever the yellow press from New Brunswick may say about it. The current series of discussions between the minister and his provincial counterparts are going well and it is normal that he be attributed a large part of the credit for the progress realized up to date.

Of course, some people can make sly comments; other people will want to claim all the credit for these measures, others will say we are not going far enough. One thing is certain: the government under direction of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) deserves credit for piloting all these good legislative measures which we are examining and which Parliament agrees to pass.

The bill we are studying aims at amending the Canada Pension Plan in order to remove the 2 per cent ceiling on the yearly increase in the pension index. It also tries to set at $6,600 the amount of year's maximum pensionable earnings for 1974; for 1975, the maximum will be $7,400. Now it amounts to $5,600. When the pension plan came into force in 1967, the maximum of allowable gains was $5,000. Until this year, the maximum has been increased to $5,600, which, according to the government, is not enough. In 1974 and 1975, the maximum pensionable yearly earnings will have increased by $1,800.

This bill will ensure that from now on the benefits will truly reflect consumer price index increases; 500,000 Canadians, some of whom receive a retirement pension and others who receive death or disability benefits, will gain from it.

The purchasing power of retired consumers will therefore be gradually restored. The setback suffered since 1967 following the fixing of a 2 per cent ceiling on increases will be corrected so that the people who received benefits between 1967 and 1973 and still receive them on December 31 will get increases ranging from 8 to 20 per cent according to individual cases. There is no doubt that most of my constituents, if not all of them, will be very happy about this government legislation. Of course, the maximum contributions will go up from $90 to $106.30 a year, and the employer will have to pay an equivalent amount. This means that the contribution of the self-employed worker will go up from $180 to $212.40

Unchanged in this regard, the act provides indeed that the employer and the employee each pay 1.8 per cent of pensionable earnings, and the self-employed 3.6 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, one can hardly find fault with the proposals contained in this bill. At the most, this debate allows those of us that wish to take this opportunity to discuss in general terms some aspects of the living conditions of our fellow citizens, the aged and the retired, and to indicate to the minister trends to follow in the future.

Which brings me to say that because of the rising cost of living and the reduced purchasing power, the government had to amend the Canada Pension Plan. The minister has seen the need and the government, as a good manager of the public welfare, has done its duty.

Even during the so-called normal years of economic activity, the purchasing power of the dollar is constantly being eroded by inflation, and I find it ridiculous that some politicians, in the hope of making some political capital, become unduly fidgety and easily shocked by that phenomenon.

I am almost 40, Mr. Speaker. I thank God for it and ask Him to grant me a long life. However, one does not need a doctor's degree to realize that the price of all goods and services tends to go up at any time throughout the world, and that Canada is more successful generally in fighting back inflation.

I find the charges of the opposition too easy, too partisan and too childish, because they blame only the government for inflation for the increased cost of living and the erosion of the purchasing power of older citizens with regard to their present income.

I do not deceive myself, and I don't believe that a life insurance policy of $5,000 bought at 25 will help me to deal with inflation when I am 65. In this connection, I read in Le Droit last night an article by a financial columnist of the Canadian Press. I should like to quote it in full, because it gives us a lesson in respect of financial arrangements for our retirement years.

Whether we like it or not, we have to grow old, but generally, we don't know how to plan our future income.

It would be better to start planning a retirement fund as early as 40, since it is the most productive period of one's life. Of course, it has always been necessary to plan one's retirement, but it is even more important at a time of high inflation, in order to provide for a suitable income during the unproductive years.

At first sight, this seems complicated: however, a solution is possible if one works systematically towards a well defined objective.

According to the Canadian National Bank, sound financial planning must include:

—A deposit for current expenses;

—a reserve fund for contingencies;

—a life insurance policy to protect the family;

—a long term investment fund.

The trouble mostly is the difficulty of knowing exactly what one wants for the future.

In its monthly newsletter, the CNB states that the wisest thing to do is to plan early and to follow one's plans as closely as possible.

Actually, any person is inclined to raise his standard of living when his income increases: 65 seems so far away.

Take, for instance, a married man, aged 40, who earns $10,000 a year and intends to retire at 65. He thinks that he will then be able to live on $8,000 and maintain the same style of living because of fewer expenses.

But due to inflation, he will need in 1998 a $16,750 income to live as well as he is living now with $8,000. His pension will therefore have to be adjusted accordingly, which is not as difficult as one would think at first.

By that time, the old age security pension will probably amount to $5,000 a year. If our man earns more because of inflation or promotions, his firm will probably pay him a $5,000 pension.

Furthermore, if he has managed to invest $1,000 a year in a registered pension plan—which is not impossible—he should then have a capital of $80,000 which, converted into a life annuity, would yield about $9,500 a year. He would then have an annual income of $19,500, which would be more than enough to maintain his usual standard of living.

● (1630)

Of course, the government is aware of this situation, Mr. Speaker, and that is why it has taken a major step today through this bill, in order to ensure a greater income security to retired Canadians.

And to use the words of the press release issued by the federal-provincial conference held recently: The retirement benefits will no longer be subject to the eroding effects of the rising cost of living. This is a major breakthrough, as I said, almost as important, I think, because of its scope, as the setting up of the Canada Pension Plan in 1967, and as the minister said on pages 5 and 6 of his statement:

> ... these changes will (...) have a profound and long term effect...
> ... proposals that will have a fundamental and long-term effect on the Canada Pension Plan.

Since I referred to the press release of the recent Federal-Provincial conference of the ministers of Social Affairs, I should also like to make one or two remarks on the last two paragraphs of that press release. I was particularly happy that the ministers should have expressed their concern for the equality of contributions and benefits between persons of both sexes and especially with regard to spouses who did not contribute and who, therefore, do not now qualify for benefits.

When we touch upon this matter, we evidently do not speak about anomymous persons, that are merely considered as statistics. In fact we think in real terms, of people we come into contact every day and especially about our mother, wife, sisters and fellow workers. It sometimes happens that some bureaucrats find it difficult not to think in abstract terms about human facts. Politicians who have become fully aware of those realities of our daily life in view of the fact that they receive many telephone calls, letters, and personnal representations, understand better the need to further improve the present plan.

My wife, Mr. Speaker, like all good mothers, runs a house, a home, a training school, most of the time without the help of the father who is busy discharging his legislative, parliamentarian and electoral responsibilities. Many men are not only chauvinist but they are prejudiced against the woman who stays at home. Women's lib sometimes goes too far, even in the opinion of many women, and I remember some remarks made recently by the hon. Thérèse Casgrain. But on the other hand, this so-called Women's Lib has the advantage of making us aware of the social status of women, and in that respect, it is worthwhile.

The inquiry on the status of women in Canada found out a great many facts on the inferior situation of women as compared to men, on the labour force, their working conditions as social partners of men; above all it was demonstrated that we still have laws openly discriminating against them in addition to the fact that they are the constant object of the lowest prejudices mainly on the part of men.

This government has obviously undertaken to correct abuses, to eliminate discrimination and very substantial progress has already been observed, especially where matters coming under federal jurisdiction are concerned. I will not recite all those measures today, Mr. Speaker, because I wish to concentrate my remarks on the subject before us and, besides, I already had the opportunity to deal with that question during the election campaign last year and I believe that a great majority of my constituents appreciated the government's intention in that regard.

Surely I am in favour of a serious study designed to bring about major changes in the Canada Pension Plan so that our wives and mothers may become eligible to the same extent as the main family support, where contributions and benefits are concerned. I may also add at this point that during its recent political convention, the Liberal Party readily recognized such a need and asked that women, housewives, be admitted to the Canada Pension Plan on a contributory basis. But the law says that two thirds of the provinces have to be in agreement. It will be interesting to see how the provinces will respond to that suggestion.

I suggest that the Ministers of Social Affairs should tackle that problem which in my opinion amounts to social inequity, and that they should do so as soon as possible. I am happy to see that such is the intention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I am happy about it.

To sum up my remarks, and that is not the least of my concerns, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with what the minister in his official statement has described as the need to enact certain provisions concerning advanced retirement under both plans. I was quoting from the French text. The English text is still clearer and I quote:

> The suggestion that early retirement provisions should be built into the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans.

If I translate this technical language in brayon, the language spoken in the Republic of Madawaska that I have the honour to represent in this House, this simply means, for all practical purposes, lowering the eligibility age for retirement benefits down to 60. This is the suggestion that is often put forward by an increasing number of my constituents. I have dealt with it recently in a speech on family allowances and I also referred to it in this House on October 19, 1971, I think.

Of course, some people will say that a few arguments support this matter, which I am most concerned about as others work against such a proposal. But I suggest that experience is the important factor in this regard. All I ask is that this matter be carefully considered and that we be given once and for all the reasons, if any, that prevent us from including these advantages in the Canada Pension Plan or, as the case may be, from taking immediate steps to amend the Canada Pension Plan in order to satisfy the public's request.

Workmen of my region who work in the forest, who perform farming or manufacturing chores, who work for railways during very hot summers and very cold winters, in pulp and paper plants, in sawmills and who often have been working since they were 20 years old and sometimes less, are physically worn-out, tired out unable most of the time to do a job that becomes increasingly difficult for them when they reach the age of 55 or 60.

I feel that these people who have worked so hard for so long to build up a country would deserve that more consideration be given to their wish for early retirement without being obliged to undergo a series of exams that I consider as red tape.

I have found most advisable the minister's intention to eliminate for the contributors to the Canada Pension Plan aged from 65 to 69 the obligation of undergoing this series of examinations.

I am therefore glad that the government of Canada is studying this proposal with the provinces and I am looking forward to the findings of this study. But I think it would be a good thing for a parliamentary committee to ponder over this proposal some day, either before the examination of this matter with the provinces, or immediately after, before reaching a binding conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, this is what I have to say for the time being about the Canada Pension Plan. I will keep my remarks for a later debate and I wish to conclude by again congratulating the minister and assure him of the best sentiments of all my electors and constituents who are quite in favour of this measure.

[English]

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my young friend from Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) and his suggestion about retiring every member at 60. We will soon have to get rid of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and a few others. I would have gone long since.

Mr. Corbin: No, that was not my suggestion.

Mr. Rynard: Then I apologize. I thought the hon. member was saying he would retire people from here at 60 and suggested this should be done. I suggest to him that as long as we are able to work it would be a lot better if we kept on working, because we would continue to pay money to the government which would provide the very pensions that we are talking about. The one thing he should not forget when he brings up that argument is that there is a lower birth rate in Canada today, which will mean less people working and less revenue for the government. Some people would like to retire at 50. I agree with the suggestion that, unfortunately, there are some people who should not be working even at 30 years of age. When you are talking about geriatric aid, I should like to remind you that this can apply as early as age 18 rather than the age of 50 to which you referred, and I just want to put that on the record.

Perhaps I should compliment the minister for bringing this bill forward, although it seems to take him a while before he sees that justice is done. I think he is attempting to do something that should have been done quite a while ago, but I do compliment him because it is better late than never. I do not blame this government for all the inflationary problems we are now facing because, as the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria said, inflation is a worldwide problem. However, I think inflation is worse in Canada than in many other countries, and I want to straighten the record in that regard. We must continue to adjust our social security programs if we want to deal fairly with the people.

Recently I attended a meeting of people from the Canada Pension Plan, people from the Unemployment Insurance Commission and people from the manpower program. It was very interesting to hear the remarks of certain accountants in attendance at that meeting. They suggested that only about 5 per cent of the people understand this legislation or can properly interpret the Canada Pension Plan. I should like to know what the government is doing to remedy this situation.

I was interested to learn that offices are being opened in various cities to deal with Canada Pension Plan applications and problems, but I understand that the men who are sent to operate these offices spend only two days a week in the office and it is very difficult to make appointments with them. Apparently there is no one answering the telephone for the other three days a week. It is amazing that the biggest corporation in Canada with the largest payroll cannot afford to locate all these offices in one building in order that the people can get the service they require. There should be someone in attendance five days a week to at least answer the telephone so that people do not drive 20 or 25 miles only to find that they must wait in line or cannot see the individual on that day. I feel that these government offices should be located in one building in any given city. In this way we would have manpower officers, unemployment insurance officers and those associated with the Canada Pension Plan all available at the one location.

As the minister suggested yesterday, as of January there will be 500,000 people benefiting from the Canada Pension Plan. He also referred to the 20 per cent increase in inflation we have witnessed since 1967. This has had a marked effect by depreciating the value of our dollar. The main things required by an individual who retires at age 65 are food and shelter. These are basic necessities, but I draw the minister's attention to the fact that the cost of food has increased by about 14 per cent and the cost of housing has increased by about 12 per cent. The proposed changes in the Canada Pension Plan will by no means meet those specific needs of the retired individual.

The minister has also indicated that something is to be done in respect of Canada Pension Plan benefits for those from age 65 to age 70. If a man is able to work after his retirement why should he be penalized? After all, he is adding to the coffers of the government, and he is reducing the amount the government would have to pay in guaranteed supplement payments. I suggest that he should be given his Canada Pension benefits because this is something to which he has contributed and has a right to receive.

It seems to me that we are also treating women differently than we treat men in respect of Canada Pension Plan benefits. This is a matter which was raised at the meeting to which I earlier referred. Many people felt this was an injustice. When a working woman dies, her husband receives the full pension, but when you reverse the situation the woman only receives about 70 per cent. I think the survivors should be treated the same.

Another thing I should like to refer to is the $650 death benefit under the Canada Pension Plan. If a man dies and his brother collects this death benefit I understand he must pay taxes on that amount, but if the government takes over and buries the man no taxes are collected. This is another situation I draw to the minister's attention.

Let me speak for a moment about the medical aspects of this situation, particularly in respect of disabled persons. The fact was brought out at this meeting that an individual must be helpless and almost confined to a wheelchair before he can get a pension. Perhaps that is not exactly true, but there is enough truth to warrant a closer look at the situation. This situation has been referred to on numerous occasions by myself and other hon. members, such as the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). The minister will recall that on a previous occasion he said he would look into the situation to see what could be done.

Often a physician will send in a report indicating that an individual is disabled. When that report reaches Ottawa it is considered and often sent back with an indication that the man is not disabled for the purposes of the Canada Pension Plan. The minister will recall that in the case of appeals from such decisions, about 40 per cent are allowed and pensions are granted, particularly following examination and confirmation of the general practitioner's findings by a specialist. This fact by itself would indicate that something is seriously wrong with the system of communication between the examining doctor and the people here in Ottawa. I suggest that these people should make more use of the telephone when there is a point in question. I have asked doctors on many occasions why they did not telephone Ottawa to straighten out the differences and have been informed that they did not know to whom to telephone.

One is amazed how far it is from the city of Toronto or the city of Orillia to Ottawa when it comes to straightening out these matters of opinion. Many of these people who are academics and well educated do not know where to phone. This is something that might be passed on to the medical staff here in Ottawa. When there is a matter of doubt, instead of going through all this redtape, writing letters back and forth, these people should pick up the telephone and get a little action.

Let us take the example of a disabled person. He does not receive an examination immediately. I do not know whether the minister has ever checked to find out how long these people wait before they are examined. They might wait a month. The report is then made. It remains in Ottawa for a while and the application is either rejected or approved. If it should be rejected, the person immediately sees his doctor and perhaps his federal member of parliament. He points out that he should not have been turned down. He asks why he was turned down. The doctor states that he should not have been turned down because he is a sick man and unable to work. Then, the doctor writes to the department and the decision is made to have a specialist see this person. That is fine, but let us consider the length of time that elapses between the time it is decided a specialist must see him and the time when the people here agree and he receives the examination.

The point I am making is that months and months of bitter frustration are involved. Such a person is not treated fairly and squarely. Many of these people are helpless. They may not have had a good education and depend on their family doctor who is busy and often cannot see them. They also sometimes depend on their member of parliament or on someone else. Perhaps the matter might be resolved in this way. The family doctor and the Canada Manpower office in the area could certify that the person is unemployable. Why should such a person not receive the Canada Pension? Why do we have this difficulty in respect of the term "totally and permanent disabled"? Is a person not totally and permanently disabled if he is unable to earn a living?

I recall seeing a person one night who had been turned down for a disability pension. The grounds are about the same. He came in the door to meet me and I did not think he would make it to his seat. His feet were swollen up and he was short of breath. It had been decided that this person was able to get around and look after himself. In a fashion he could do this, but one might wonder who bought the food, clothing and other things that were needed at home. I was concerned about his case and immediately called Ottawa. When I advised what shape this person was in his application was approved, but this situation had gone on for two years.

I bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that there must be easier ground rules in respect of determining whether or not a person is eligible for the Canada Pension. I know the minister will agree that if a man is unemployable and cannot earn a cent, he is entitled to the Canada Pension on the grounds of disability. We should cut out the tremendous amount of red tape and a great deal of the bureaucracy.

The other point I wish to bring up is that I believe the Canada Pension should be available to people, probably at age 60 if they are disabled. I believe that a person who is beyond age 65 should work if he is physically able to do so. This is especially true of professional people because a great deal of money is tied up in their brains and their ability. It is difficult to replace these people. Replacements may be available now, but the minister will realize that, as a result of the falling birth rate, we will soon have a situation in Canada where there will be four million people over age 65. How many of these people will there be in the work force? This is a problem which puzzles me.

I believe the minister should be giving some leadership in the field of geriatrics and health. I hope the minister will give leadership in the development of a geriatric department in every hospital in the same way there are paediatric departments. The other day I was astounded to notice a statistic published by a very honoured person from the province of Quebec, Dr. Gingras, who was president of the CMA a year ago. He made the statement that there are some 800 paediatricians in Canada and about five million or six million persons under the age of 16. He said also that there are 1,700,000 people over age 65 and that we have only 24 geriatricians. I think we should consider allowing these people to draw the pension after age 60 or age 65, and those who are disabled should be allowed to do so at a younger age. Unfortunately, people do become disabled at much younger ages than 60. The greatest disabler today is the accident. Many of the people involved in accidents need attention.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Supply and Services—Possible contract to American Chain and Cable Company for mail sorting equipment—Suggested postponement of decision; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Air transport—Date of announcement of allocation of route to Milan and new routes to United States; the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain)—Fisheries—Action to ensure continuing supply of vegetable oils from United States for processing products.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I think there is agreement to pass over the first five orders and consider item No. 6, Bill C-40. There may be a slight delay. I believe the hon. member is on his way to the chamber.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, it seems there was a misunderstanding. However, the member is on his way to the chamber now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed that the first five items be stood, but retain their priority on the order paper, and that we will proceed to the sixth order, Bill C-40, in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) as soon as he reaches the chamber.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

ABORTION PLEBISCITE ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE PLEBISCITE ON REMOVAL OF ABORTION PROVISION FROM CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved that Bill C-40, to provide for a national plebiscite on the removal of the abortion provisions from the Criminal Code of Canada be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for being a little late but I had some constituents in my office and time escaped me.

Bill C-40 is very similar to Bill C-117 which is on the order paper now under my name. They both call for plebiscites. Bill C-40 deals with abortion and Bill C-117 deals with capital punishment. I wonder if it would be possible, since both bills ask for the same thing but deal with two different issues, to deal with both of these bills at the same time? I regret that I did not have time to bring this matter to your attention, Sir, but I did ask the people in our party and they suggested I might raise this matter at this time in order to avoid debating Bill C-117 on another occasion because, as I said, both bills seek plebiscites on two different issues but I think the theme of both bills is the same.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that the other bill deals with the abolition of capital punishment. I think it would be farfetched to suggest we should have a debate on abortion and on capital punishment at the same time. Although both bills seek the same remedy and suggest the same conclusion, I doubt that it would be good practice to have two motions dealing with different matters before the House at the same time.

Mr. Reynolds: The main reason for introducing this bill is the letters and comments from my constituents in which they say that this government, as well as past governments, have often introduced legislation which does not reflect the will of the people. I told my constituents in the last election that I would present private members bills on this and on other issues so that plebiscites could be held to give the people of Canada an opportunity to express themselves, but not on every issue. I do not believe parliament is elected to conduct plebiscites on every issue, but they should be held on certain issues that are presented to parliament, such as abortion and capital punishment, on which the will of the people is not always being followed in the House.

I think that the people of this country have the right to determine some of these moral issues themselves, and this is why I presented this bill. I will not argue it too long because I would like to hear some of the arguments that I am sure members on the government side will advance against it. All I will say now is the reason for presenting this bill is that the people of Canada should be allowed to settle this issue of abortion, as well as the issue of capital punishment.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to inflict myself upon you again on one of these very controversial subjects. I seem to have been dragged into this debate at the last minute, and having spent the last two hours on the telephone, my thoughts cannot be called very orderly. My speech, therefore, cannot be construed as an attempt to impress people with oratory. I simply want to give my views as to why I do not agree that this bill should be passed.

Bill C-40 states that the word "abortion" should be deleted from the Criminal Code, and that the division to delete it should be made by a plebiscite which should take place at the next general election following the passage of the bill. In other words, there would be the possibility of an election being fought on the issue of abortion. I think that is fairly evident. Also, the bill underlines the fact that this measure would have to be brought to parliament after the election and passed. I think these are three rather important considerations.

However, before going into the matter of the desirability of a plebiscite to settle a question such as this, or the technicalities of when it should be held, I would just like to say that this matter has been brought to the minds of all members of the House of Commons by their constituents. We are flooded with telegrams and letters expressing both points of view. The letters are not just from those who are for abortion or those who are against abortion. We get shades of opinion, thank goodness, and I do not think there is a preponderence of one opinion over the other. The matter of abortion is approached with a great many misconceptions and has a long history. As you know, abortion is nothing new. It has been performed ever since homo sapiens walked the earth and woman found herself in an undesirable state, in her opinion. Being ingenious, the old wives soon found ways to start an abortion, anything from aknitting needle to a twig, and then finally bits of bark and things which would swell after insertion. There are all sorts of ways of doing it, and of course in many cases these caused infections and a great deal of danger to the pregnant woman.

Abortion was carried out in back rooms and dark corridors. We all know those stories. However, people today do not worry too much about ethics, moral values and that sort of thing. I would say half the population has that outlook, whether it is about abortion or anything else. We have to admit that everybody is mildly dishonest. Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, for always alluding to my early years in practice, but they were interesting years. I remember that in my first year of practice I was out on one occasion looking after some confinements, travelling by horse and cutter. A woman came to my house and asked if the doctor was in. My wife replied, no. The woman then said, "I guess you will do. How do I get rid of a baby?" That was just straight talk, and it was common among a certain group of people. They never felt badly about it. This woman wanted to get rid of a baby, and she thought my wife knew everything about it. In those days abortion was practised, but in dark rooms and in a clandestine manner.

Now, in our modern times—I do not say they are any better than the old times in some ways—abortion can be performed in a very slick manner. It can be performed in illegal clinics or whatever. As everybody knows, the big argument is that the wealthy can get abortions when they want, and the poor cannot. This is an argument we cannot play with; we have to decide what we are doing. We all know the changes that have occurred in hospitals, and in attitudes toward abortions and sterilizations. I rather deplore the easy approach to sterilization. It has almost become available on demand. I do not think it should; I do not think abortion should done on demand either, by any means.

At present the question of abortion goes to a committee, and I hope this approach will continue. A committee has to consider the danger to the mother, and the desirability from the standpoint of society. Perhaps doctors should not have the right to decide these things, but so far nobody else wants to get into these discussions. I think that possibly the types of people on the committees should be broadened. I believe that, for the good of society, some control over abortion should be retained. We have gotten into this question of abortion, of abortion on demand, because of changes that have taken place in society in the last number of years. There is no doubt that we are living in a permissive society. As I say, Mr. Speaker, abortions were known, if not condoned, since the dawn of history, and the same holds true with respect to contraception.

Contraception has never been accepted in certain circles, although it is more or less accepted now even by religious denominations. Contraception has been condoned really because the question of a newly formed life, or a so-called life, is not involved. Contraception itself is, of course, questionable if we really feel that anything once begun should be immutable and unchanged, and that we should never modify what nature starts. But of course none of us really believe that, completely. Now that medical science is able to produce a contraceptive pill which can be taken by mouth, every woman of child bearing age would be rather foolish, if she believes in this progressive society, not to take the pill. However, I think all these things are making the question of abortion easier for people to accept.

I think you have to realize that there are many things in the world today which have to be settled by common consent before certain practices are adopted. Long ago world population began to increase by geometric progression. We are right now in danger of over population, not just in countries such as China and India but also in Canada. However, we do not have to accept abortion on demand to deal with that problem. Contraception is good enough. The birth rate has gone down in most western countries and, surprisingly enough, we had a good debate about that on the bill on family allowances. It was interesting to see how the provinces had changed their attitudes. It was very interesting to me to see how the birth rate in Quebec, which up to 20 years ago was noted for its large families, has declined to the point of being among the lowest, if not the lowest in Canada. This certainly reveals a change in attitude, and has nothing to do with the baby bonus.

But I must say that the world, through the United Nations and other world agencies, will have to introduce programs to reinforce family counselling, medical family planning, and all that sort of thing in every country so that we won't have overcrowding, so that we won't have so much difficulty in feeding the vast numbers of human beings that populate this planet. There is a great danger there. It is as great as the shortage of oil in the world today. We can look after the shortage of oil, but the other problem has not really been tackled yet.

When it comes to the question of why we should or should not condone abortion, I think we have to realize that even the religious and ethical views and "mores" of the world are changing. There are more and more people who are really quite conversant with the origin of life, the origin of, shall we say, the solar system, the origin of the universe, than ever before. We know that the sort of things we look at here, such as the wooden desks in front of us, are made up of atoms and electrons, and that one atom probably will have electrons going around it which are just as far away from the nucleus as the earth and the planets are from the sun, in a relative way. Therefore, what we think of as being solid, such as the desks, are really not solid. There are great spaces in this piece of wood in front of me that are completely invisible, even under the microscope.

Going right back to the ultimate there is nothing in this physical world but positive-negative charges of electricity, and these small bits of energy. What is energy? What is light? What is matter? And what are living people, living beings? What of the whole evolution of life which began a billion or 2 billion years ago? I refer of course to some very simple forms like bacteria, although it is not too simple, to the synthesis of proteins, and all these things which appear inanimate. We are just as much akin to them as we are to each other. When we die, our positive and negative charges of electricity go back to a great reservoir of matter which in turn goes to make up all living things and the whole universe. So where does life begin? Life does not begin with the act of conception or the very instant that the sperm unites with the ovum. It started a few billion years ago. To try to make some artificial definition of when life begins is really quite ridiculous.

I think that all the planning that goes into laws about abortion, sterilization, world population and all those other things should not be based upon simple emotional ideas about whether we believe people were created in an instant by a word from the Great Being or whether life began 6,000 years ago by God breathing into a lump of clay the breath of life, when man became a living soul. These things are really beyond us and we do not know the answers. I do not think that questions like "when life begins for an individual" can be settled. I think the only basis on which we should try to settle the question of the taking of life or destroying a fetus should be what is best for society so far as we can tell. This takes a great deal of thought, and I do not think it should be settled by an emotional outburst. About an equal number of people are for or against this question and I do not see any need for a plesbiscite. This matter should not be taken out of the hands of parliament. People have sent us here to use our heads and all the knowledge we have to settle problems. If we cannot do that, then I think we are avoiding our duties as members of parliament.

I do not know why this question of a plebiscite should be brought up at all. As Clementine Churchill said, the first thing that a member of parliament must remember is his duty to his country; the second thing is his duty to his constituents and the third thing is his duty to his party. That can be taken further. If anybody were to tell me that I had to vote in a certain way because the majority of my constituents felt that way, and if it were against my best judgment I would say "Sorry, I am not your delegate, I am your representative". I think this is the first concept that a member of parliament must get into his head. All this time we have spent since last January 1, starting with the capital punishment debate, really has not settled the question of the role of the member of parliament in the minds of our members. This has bothered me a great deal.

I have heard members say "My constituents all want such and such or 80 per cent of them want such and such". Mr. Speaker, I think the people of my constituency elected me because they felt I had half decent judgment; they thought I had some integrity and they wanted me to represent them. Of course, this may change. However, it does not worry me if the change is made democratically, but if it is made on an emotional basis, and with some kind of hoopla, I would say that would be too bad but I certainly would accept the will of the majority.

Coming back to the very well-intentioned bill that the hon. member moved today, I must say I do not think the matter of abortion can be settled very easily. It can only be settled after a very genuine attempt by each member of parliament to settle it in his own mind after a great deal of thought. The very idea of settling this question by plebiscite appalls me. Members of parliament should stand up and be counted. Do they always have to feel that they are mere delegates of a constituency? In my opinion, a lot of the confusion in our society today is the result not only of permissiveness but of lack of thought. As Marshall McLuhan has indicated, the trouble with society today is television. Half of our worries and our ills and the silly arguments we get into are due to the fact that television has made this society of instant participation.

[Mr. Railton.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member who has the floor but I believe his time has expired. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert).

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-40 would provide for a national plebiscite on the removal of the abortion provisions of the Criminal Code. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) gave us his reasons for introducing the bill. His commitment to his constituents during the election campaign was that he would bring some of these contentious issues forward to see if they could be determined by way of plebiscite.

Let me hasten to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a bill with regard to abortion; this is a bill with regard to a national plebiscite on abortion. The hon. member who introduced it also wanted to bring in the question of capital punishment, so I imagine he thinks that both capital punishment and abortion should be determined on a plebiscite basis.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall the bill in 1970 or 1971 to amend the Criminal Code with regard to abortion. The government at that time acted on a report which had been submitted by the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs which had gone into the problem of abortion in depth and had made certain recommendations. If I remember correctly, there was an extension made to the law to include therapeutic abortion where the life or the safety of the woman was in jeopardy. We still have that legislation and I have not heard any great furore about it.

In 1967, we had amendments to the Criminal Code with regard to capital punishment and there was a full debate at that time. We did not have a plebiscite, but the changes were enacted to abolish capital punishment for a five-year period except in the case of murder of policemen or prison guards. We had that authority for five years. It expired in 1972 and we had a debate in 1973 which took considerable time in this House. It was resolved last week and will be the law when it is finally completed in the other place and proclaimed.

● (1730)

I was pleased to hear the previous speaker say that he is a representative of his constituency. We are all representatives of our constituencies, but our first duty is to the country. We were not sent here as mere automatons to reflect the feelings and wishes of all the constituents in our communities. We were sent here to exercise our good judgment with regard to the problems that face Canada whether they be economic problems or social issues.

We have a responsibility to come to this place and inform ourselves with regard to the various issues, especially with regard to capital punishment and, if need be, the problem of abortion. After hearing the arguments and gathering all the information we have a duty to this country, to ourselves and to our constituents to exercise in all honesty our best judgment. There is no duty upon us to reflect the wishes of the various constituents. As Your Honour knows, the wishes of the constituents change from day to day.

Many people whom I met in the past few months spoke to me about their feelings concerning capital punishment. Those feelings were possibly changed as a result of discussions not only with myself but with other people. This is the democratic process, a process we must maintain. To come here and just be a rubber-stamp with regard to the wishes of the people does not reflect well on we as members or on the parliamentary process.

We had one example of a plebiscite in Canada. That was in 1942. The plebiscite was on the question of conscription. What did it prove? It proved, first, that Mackenzie King and his cabinet colleagues did not have the moral courage to make that decision. Second, the conscription issue created a great deal of ill-feeling across the country. I imagine a national plebiscite on abortion or capital punishment would obtain the same result. This is not why we are here.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has given me a copy of his "bible", which is called Beauchesne's. I quote as follows from section 17 on page 14 of the fourth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

> Every member as soon as he is chosen becomes a representative of the whole body of the commons, without any distinction of the place from whence he is sent to Parliament . . . that every member is equally a representative of the whole has been the constant notion and language of Parliament. Every member, though chosen by one particular district, when elected and returned, serves for the whole realm. For the end of his coming thither is not particular, but general, not barely to advantage his constituents, but the commonwealth.
> In November, 1774, Edmund Burke was invited, on short notice, to stand for one of the two vacant seats at Bristol. He was a stranger to the place, but his colleague was a local gentleman of accommodating nature, who expressed his willingness to carry out any instructions which he might receive from his constituents.

If I remember correctly, this is one of the reasons the hon. member brought forward his bill.

> Burke was duly elected, and in his subsequent address to the electors he touched on the topic of instructions to members. This is what he said:
> "Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfactions, to theirs; and above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interest to his own. But, his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion.
> "My worthy colleague says his will ought to be subservient to yours. If that be all, the thing is innocent: if government were a matter of will upon my side, yours, without question, ought to be superior. But government and legislation are matters of reason and judgment, and not to inclination; and what sort of reason is that, in which the determination precedes the discussion; in which one set of men deliberate, and another decide; and where those who form the conclusion are perhaps three hundred miles distant from those who hear the arguments?
> "To deliver an opinion is the right of all men; that of constituents is a weighty and respectable opinion, which a representative ought always to rejoice to hear; and which he ought always most seriously to consider. But authoritative instructions, mandates issued, which the member is bound blindly and implicitly to obey, to vote and to argue for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgment and conscience—these are things utterly unknown to the laws of the land, and which arise from a fundamental mistake of the whole order and tenor of our constitution.
>
> "Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests; which interests each must maintain, as an agent, and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but Parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation, with one interest, that of the whole; where, not local purposes, not local prejudices, ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole. You choose a member indeed: but when you have chosen him, he is not a member of Bristol, but he is a member of Parliament."

● (1740)

That was Sir Edmund Burke in 1774, and what he said then applies with equal force today, or perhaps with even greater force because of the social issues which we must face. We must face them in good conscience and with the exercise of good judgment, and to abrogate our responsibility by demanding legislation determined by a plebiscite with regard to these issues is not worthy of us as members of the House of Commons. Sir Edmund Burke said we have a duty not merely to our constituencies but to the whole country. We have a duty to exercise our judgment and our conscience after hearing all the arguments relating to a particular issue.

It is for this reason I oppose very strongly the idea of a national plebiscite, whether on abortion, capital punishment or any other issue. We must not become mere rubber-stamps, and it is for this reason I totally oppose the bill.

[Translation]

Mrs. Albanie Morin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I think it is my duty today to say a few words for or against abortion.

[English]

I rise to speak in opposition to the bill which has been presented by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds). I congratulate him on his desire to raise the matter in the House of Commons and on his initiative in presenting the measure. I cannot support him however, because I do not believe the solution he proposes is the correct one.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had suggested for instance helping the unwed mother either by improving her conditions of life or by providing some assistance for her in society, or by creating day care centres to help her with her child, I would have supported him wholeheartedly. But what he suggests will not solve these problems.

He speaks of referendum. First of all, how would you explain the problem to the Canadian people? He would want a referendum on abortion, and he would like the following question to be asked:

[English]

Are you in favour of deleting from the Criminal Code of Canada the provisions relating to abortion: yes or no?

[Translation]

It is not as simple as that. We must first ask ourselves what abortion is. Is it a murder or not? The question of whether the foetus is a human life or not has not been settled. Some theologians say there is life from the moment of conception, others deny it. There is no agreement on this matter. Moreover, jurists say there is no life as long as the child has not been born viable.

So until the whole problem is solved, how could there be such a referendum? The people would have to be extremely well informed before they could decide. Should the Criminal Code be amended or remain as it is? What the hon. member suggests seems to be an impossible thing to do.

[English]

What he wants is this: he wants to hold a national plebiscite at the next convenient opportunity, and then attempt to tie the hands of the government to bring in legislation to enact the result of the poll. I think such an approach is entirely inappropriate both from a traditional, constitutional and parliamentary point of view, and having regard to the nature of the issue involved. It is on this latter point I should like to dwell for a moment or two.

Should Canada decide upon the kind of abortion laws it ought, or ought not to enact, on the basis of a national poll? First, the bill proposes to hold the poll in conjunction with the next federal election, whenever that might be. To link such a vote to a general election could exercise a serious distortion of influence on that election in terms of the turnout, the focusing of issues, and so on. It would be surrounded by all the election politicking which normally attends a general election campaign. This could seriously distort the issue. The two votes should be kept entirely separate if an accurate expression of public opinion is desired.

Yet how can a plebiscite be taken on such a question? I should like to refer now to two surveys which were made some time ago. In March, 1971, in that month's edition of Chatelaine a report was made of a survey conducted by the magazine involving 6,000 respondents. The author of the report came out, apparently, in favour of abortion on demand. The results of the survey, according to the author, "overwhelmingly bore out opinions we have expressed that abortion should be permitted on demand up to the twelfth week of pregnancy." The report went on to say there was increasingly strong support for abortion on demand as the age of the respondents decreased.

The CBC made another survey. The CBC discovered many subtle modifications and shades of meaning in views expressed by the public on this issue, one which could not be settled with a quick yes or no answer. The CBC reported:

> Older people tended to be more inclined than younger people to feel that the law was already too permissive. Younger people were more inclined than their elders to feel that greater permissiveness was required.

So nothing at all was proved.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, had the hon. member emphasized instead the prevention of pregnancies among teenagers, students, or still, more extensive sex education in high schools, I could have supported his bill. But, at the present time, before suggesting a referendum on abortion or even the advisability of deleting from the Criminal Code the relevant provisions, the public would have to be informed, which is practically impossible at present. That is why I could not support the bill introduced by the hon. member.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, apparently, it would seem that I have the honour today of aborting the discussion on Bill C-40. Of course, there are many things that I should like to see go wrong in the world in which we live today, but I am not prepared to agree that there is a need to go so far as to eliminate human life in a mother's womb. For example, I could talk about the necessity of aborting a proposed political union of the maritime provinces or the necessity of aborting a proposed corridor in the state of Maine, but that is not the case in point.

I found the bill rather interesting and I feel that it takes a lot of guts to bring such bills before the House. The issue of abortion should be considered more seriously than has been the case. It was often described at first as an issue which should not remain at a strictly emotional level. We live in an ever changing society and I know by experience that the ideas of some of my colleagues on this subject change from day to day, so to speak.

We live in an essentially dynamic society, dynamic in its concepts of welfare programs, dynamic also in its way of considering public morality. The legislator cannot indifferently consider abortion merely from an emotional or moral point of view. There is more than that to it, something specific to the very integrity of a person. I do not intend to engage in a theological or moral debate. I might do so under other circumstances. Above all, I would like to consider at some length the objective sought by the sponsor of the bill today. But before making any comments on the object of the bill, I would like to consider immediately section 5 which states that according to the result of a referendum during the first session of the House of Commons, next following such plebiscite, the Minister of Justice shall introduce a measure to amend the Criminal Code of Canada to provide for enacting into law the result of such plebiscite. What I do not like about this clause 5, Mr. Speaker, is that the sponsor seems to have taken for granted that the results will be favourable and in accordance with the objective that he is seeking.

And I know by experience that there could be some surprises. Is it really necessary to try to find out what Canadians think about this matter, as proposed in the bill?

In clause 4 of the bill, the sponsor has drafted the question he would like the electors to be asked and which reads as follows:

"Are you in favour of deleting from the Criminal Code of Canada the provisions relating to abortion?

1) Yes

2) No

It seems to me that this is really not the proper way to put such a question. I think I am right in saying, and this probably applies throughout the country, that less than 10 per cent of the electors would understand the meaning of the question and, in all likelihood, wrong conclusions would be reached.

This type of question is obviously difficult to draft so that it is legally acceptable and clear and that it shows unequivocally the will of the people on the subject.

But I disagree entirely with the way it is presented and I think it should be put in more direct terms: "Are you for or against abortion?" Personally, I am against; I want this to be well understood by the hon. members and also by my constituents who sent me many letters expressing their feelings, their desires, their wishes as to the position which they thought I should take on this matter.

When issues as sensitive as this one are discussed, it must first be asked who has the responsibility to decide whether something has to be done or not.

The government is not there to lead the citizens of a country. They can do it in some cases and it is obvious that it has been done in the realm of regional economic expansion. The present government gives a very strong leadership in this area.

They are right to do so because they have the necessary financial resources to reach their predetermined aims. But on the individual level—and I want my wife to agree with me on this subject—, when we have to discuss such a serious matter as abortion, we want to discuss it and to take a decision together. This matter depends on the most intimate right of the family to protect itself and consequently also on the right of society to protect itself.

I regret that our children are submitted to a publicity which is really too noisy and which, in my opinion, is openly advocating free abortion, abortion in all circumstances, without any control and very often without any worry about the individual's health.

This kind of publicity is very often done in a sly way by leading people, for instance, who in the accomplishment of their job, do not openly favour abortion but who, in their private lives, make it known through the use of newspapers that they are for it.

When we see their faces on TV ... Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the Chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

CANADA PENSION PLAN (No. 2)

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ANNUAL INCREASES AND LEVEL OF INCOME ON WHICH CONTRIBUTIONS PAID

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-224, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in the debate on Bill C-224 to amend the Canada Pension Plan. Let me add my words of congratulation to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to those he has received from both sides of the House on the introduction of this measure. There can be little question about this being a most significant bill to the benefit of a good portion of our Canadian population. I understand that in fact some 500,000 Canadians will receive increased benefits when the bill is passed, commencing January 1, 1974. These increased benefits are quite significant, ranging from 5 per cent to 20 per cent.

In addition to the immediate effect, there are significant changes proposed to the Canada Pension Plan which will have an impact on all generations of retired individuals who receive the benefits of this legislation. The minister is also to be congratulated in that he received full support from the provincial ministers of welfare during meetings held earlier this fall. This area of funded pension plans is shared by the federal government, and the provincial governments; it is an area of provincial as well as of federal responsibility. Indeed, the existing act requires the federal government to give the provincial governments two years' notice of changes, and that the provinces must support those proposed changes.

In this regard, I read an article in the Ottawa Citizen last night written by Don McGillivray under the heading "Pension changes could be illegal". Mr. McGillivray proposed that changes to the act may in fact be illegal. This is simply nonsense. All the provinces have agreed to the changes taking place as a result of amendments to the act which parliament previously passed. What parliament can do, it can undo. In this case, clause 8 of the bill before us sets aside the two years' notice which must be given to the provincial governments. This is simply changing or setting aside by legislation that provision for the purposes of this bill. Surely there is no foundation whatsoever, in a legal or parliamentary sense, for the type of suggestion made by Mr. McGillivray.

The minister is to be commended, as well, for the response he has received from members of this chamber, especially those on the other side of the House. I detected a note of support for the legislation he has brought forward in this bill.

The provisions of the Canada Pension Plan have many ramifications in that it involves retirement pensions, survivors pensions, disability pensions and provisions for orphans pensions. Compounded with federal-provincial jurisdictional aspects is the fact that the Canada Pension Plan is interlocked with the Quebec Pension Plan in order that we have a plan which is portable across the country. The bill before us, in conjunction with amendments to be made to the Quebec Pension Plan, will bring the benefits close to a parallel position and will facilitate the movement of Canadians from one part of the country to another.

Our system of pensions in Canada is based upon the universal old age pension and is tied to the cost of living. Benefits increase whenever there is a cost of living increase. In addition to the Canada Pension Plan, many groups of workers have their own private plans. The bill before us implements many of the agreements made at the welfare ministers conference of October 11 and 12 of this year. Many aspects of the agreements of those dates await another bill to be brought before the House very soon, as indicated by the minister last evening.

I was interested in the communiqué from the conference of welfare ministers, especially the part about other areas on which they did not reach agreement but which need further discussion before action can be taken. I read a short section of this communiqué as follows:

> The federal and provincial governments noted in the course of the conference that there remain a number of additional concerns about the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans including, for example, the equality between men and women with regards to contributions and benefits; non-contributing spouses; the suggestion that early retirement provisions should be built into the Canada and Quebec Plans; the level of survivors and disability benefits; and other matters. These will receive priority attention.

This is most encouraging as I believe there is great support in the country for equality between men and women in respect of the Canada Pension Plan. I certainly support this and feel there is need for change so that housewives are eligible to contribute. I have in mind various small businesses which are not incorporated and where the wife is very active; perhaps it is a small family business or farm. I think we should look into this aspect. If an individual does not have a private plan, these benefits, although they are good, would not provide a complete source of income on retirement.

I should like to refer to another matter that should be considered, although it does not specifically relate to the Minister of National Health and Welfare but to government activities so far as the Canada Pension Plan is concerned. I refer to the person receiving the disability pension. In order to receive a disability pension under the Canada Pension Plan a person must be, so far as medical evidence can indicate, permanently disabled. It seems to me that in the amendment made to the Income Tax Act a year or so ago, provision was made for an additional personal deduction of $1,000 for a disabled person. However, this is a rather restrictive type of deduction: it requires a person to be bedridden or severely handicapped.

If a person is disabled to the point he will receive a permanent disability pension under the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan, I think he should be entitled to the additional deduction under the Income Tax Act. I have written the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) on this point and he has assured me, and a constituent who inquired about this matter, that it would be considered in the future. I hope this suggestion will receive the support of the government.

I believe that to place this bill in complete perspective we must consider the overview that it is part of the government's complete review of its social security program which was outlined in the booklet entitled "A working paper on social security" which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) introduced last April 18. I certainly like this approach of setting out definite objectives in the social security field. I believe we should do this in other fields as well.

I am not suggesting that we should bring down positive solutions but, rather, that we should define the problems, set out possible ways to correct them and then go to work in an orderly and constructive way to solve them. This is what has been happening since last April when a time limit of five years was placed upon the phasing-in of the program and two years to adopt it.

The field of social security is a complicated one because there is shared jurisdiction between the federal and provincial governments. Certainly much progress has been made. We realize that 1973 perhaps will be a year in which a long step forward will be made in the field of social security in Canada. Some people may be interested in the economic development of our country and the 7 per cent or 8 per cent increase in our rate of growth; but many people also will be concerned with the progress which has been made in respect of social security.

When we look at the old age pension we see that it was increased from $82 to $100, and subsequently to $105. Hon. members will recall that in 1972 this pension became subject to escalation tied to the cost of living. This fall, again, that provision was tied to a quarterly rather than an annual increase. In the field of family allowances, likewise, there was an increase this fall from an average of $7.21 per month to $12 a month. There is now a bill before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to increase it to $20 effective January 1 next. As well, there is provision in that bill for escalations to be made to family allowances in future years. Of course, this is subject to a debate in the House of Commons.

Likewise, the guaranteed income supplement, which really is part of the old age security, has been increased. This guaranteed income supplement was designed to fill the gap which would occur between 1965 and 1975 while the Canada Pension Plan is reaching full maturity as a funded program, at which time full pensions would become available to the beneficiaries. It seems to me the next item we should be dealing with in our review is the guaranteed income supplement, especially as it relates to the situation where the spouse of the retired person is under age 65. I believe there is some urgency in this regard.

I often receive letters from constituents to the effect that the husband—it could be the reverse; it could be the wife—has retired and the wife is five or ten years younger. In such case only one benefit is received under the guaranteed income supplement. I believe there are many occasions on which there are very serious, almost tragic circumstances because in most of these cases there is little other benefit available to these people. In the near future I should like to see a move to provide that in the case of a dependent spouse of a person retiring, the couple will be in a position to receive the full guaranteed income supplement.

I am not aware of the total cost of such a program, but anyone receiving the guaranteed income supplement receives it on the basis of a means test or because there is real need. It would seem that many people would not qualify for this, and often in a case where the husband and wife differ in age by only a year or two it would be payable only for a couple of years. Perhaps we could consider moving the age to 60 or even 55 in the near future.

There would seem to be a real need that this bill pass and become effective on January 1 because of the benefit it will provide to recipients under the Canada Pension Plan due to the impact of inflation and rising costs. The bill will raise the yearly maximum pensionable earnings to $6,600 in 1974 and to $7,400 in 1975. As the minister indicated in his speech last night, in the near future another bill will be brought forward which will increase this figure at an annual rate of 12½ per cent per year until it reaches the average earnings of Canadian industrial workers.

The bill removes the 2 per cent ceiling on escalation of benefits to compensate for the rise in the cost of living. This is tied to the consumer price index. It is likewise proposed that the purchasing power which has been lost due to inflation since 1967, when the benefits first started being received, would be restored by having a catch-up clause in the bill so that a person who started receiving benefits in 1967 will receive a 20 per cent increase as of January 1, 1974. Those who started receiving benefits in 1973 will only have an 8 per cent increase. There will also be an increase in exempted earnings from $600 to $700 a year.

I understand that in the future the minister will be introducing a bill to reduce the present 12 per cent increase in this regard to 10 per cent. It seems to me this provision is very important because this amount should reflect escalating costs in the country, and the casual worker who works for a week or two in a year does not want to have to contribute to a fund if he will not be eligible to receive benefits from it.

It is my understanding that the earnings test, likewise, which was agreed to between the provincial governments and the federal government will be removed for persons between the age of 65 and 69. However, that provision is not incorporated in this bill but will be contained in the next bill which the minister indicated will be brought forward in the near future. I know a person in this age group who is 67 or 68 years of age and who was working at a job. He was receiving a rather low income and would have been better off receiving the guaranteed income supplement. However, he wanted the feeling of dignity, of being able to pay his own way, that working at this part-time job gave him. Yet he was penalized because he could not receive the benefit.

So that feature, when it is brought forward in the next bill, will be most important. I think the present measure is a disincentive for people in this age group. We want to see those of our senior citizens who are well enough, able to go out to work and be active. They have a great deal of experience and knowledge and should be contributing in a way in which they want to contribute. Therefore I welcome that change.

It is interesting to note that the changes in the bill before us will increase the maximum benefit from $90 a month this December to $134 a month by 1975, a period of only two years but a 50 per cent increase in benefit. It is projected that by the end of this decade the benefit will reach $250 a month. Likewise, there are increases in the benefits for orphans of some 20 per cent, in widows' pensions, disability pensions and disabled widowers benefits.

Therefore it seems to me we do have before us tonight an important bill that will bring a great deal of benefit as of January 1, 1974, to 500,000 Canadians receiving benefit, and to all of us when we retire.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity tonight of making a few comments on the bill that is presently before us, for we realize that a number of fundamental issues are dealt with in the bill under discussion. The minister has indicated that this bill will be followed by another measure designed to take care of several other matters, perhaps of lesser urgency than these. We are looking forward to seeing that bill as well because, putting them all together, we trust they will result in improvements in the operation of benefits of the Canada Pension Plan that will be shared by Canadians across the country.

May I say at the outset that I appreciate the problems that are faced by the government in its attempt to negotiate satisfactory solutions to income security problems with the ten provinces in view of the fact that such a high degree of accord is necessary before any premiums can be introduced. We are given to understand that the bill now before us is the result of a long period of negotiation between the federal government and the ten provincial ministers of health and welfare across the nation.

The two measures which we are asked to approve are, to say the least, long overdue. I would refer hon. members to Hansard for March 23, 1972, when my colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Rynard), moved a motion of non-confidence in the government over its failure to do the following:

> contribute to pensions allowances and other benefits . . . a yearly percentage increase corresponding to the percentage increase in the consumer price index for Canada.

Of course, the government voted against that motion. Perhaps this is understandable; nevertheless, they did refuse to accept the suggestion that the measure they are now bringing forth and the provisions they are now introducing were in order at that time. However, since that time—especially since October 30, 1972—the government, for some not so strange reason, has become somewhat more sympathetic to the needs of pensioners in general across Canada.

I would like to join other members in congratulating the minister for adopting in this bill one more of the many constructive proposals made by the party to which I belong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: We have been pushing for this action for some time and again, as in other instances, the government has seen the light. Because of this, we commend them. It is interesting to note in this respect that in the document "Review of issues in amending the Canada Pension Plan" a number of tables are used to illustrate various aspects of the plan. These tables were taken from the Canada Pension Plan actuarial report published in Ottawa on December 31, 1969, and are based on what appears to be, in retrospect at least, a rather ludicrous assumption about the rate of inflation in this country.

We can hardly blame the authors of the "Review of issues amending the Canada Pension Plan." They were probably using the only figures available to them at that time. However, I do feel that the government department which prepared this report was somewhat misinformed, or at least ill-prepared in basing its statistics on what is termed moderate inflation of 3.4 per cent a year. If this matter were not so serious, I am sure it would cause some mirth in the House. Not many Canadians can remember when inflation in this country was only 3.4 per cent. In 1968 it averaged 4.8 per cent, in February, 1971, it was 8.1 per cent, and over the last year I believe the rate has been in the vicinity of 8.7 per cent, with the very important categories of food and shelter at a much higher rate than that. So it can hardly be classed as moderate inflation. Now, at least, under the provisions of Bill C-224 Canadians will not be victimized by runaway inflation in respect of their Canada Pension Plan benefits, for provision is made to tie the benefits payable under the plan to the cost of living index.

On the subject of the escalation of maximum pensionable earnings from $5,600 this year to $6,600 in 1974 and $7,400 in 1975, I can only say that this is an improvement, although I feel that consideration should be given, when the bill reaches committee stage, to raising the maximum pensionable earnings even more. From the information that is at hand, I do not think the government would have any difficulty in going to the provinces and saying that parliament wants the earnings level set at $7,800, $8,000 or some higher figure.

● (2030)

I note that in the statement made by Mr. Rene Brunelle, of the province of Ontario, at the meeting of ministers of social services and rehabilitation held on October 11, 1973, he said, "Ontario would favour that the earnings ceiling be raised to $9,500 in 1975." I also wonder why the federal government has abandoned its proposal of $7,800 in 1975. Here I would like to quote from a document entitled "Working paper on social security in Canada," commonly known as the orange paper, distributed under the signature of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). The following appears at page 21:

For its part, the Government of Canada would favour full escalation of the pension benefits, and the increase of the year's maximum pensionable earnings to $7,800 by 1975.

Perhaps when he speaks again in this debate the minister can tell us what has happened to that proposal. In so far as the bill would restore parallelism between the Canada and the Quebec Pension Plans in the area of contributions, the escalation of current benefits and future retirement pensions, I can state categorically that I agree that this parallelism must exist so that individuals who move from Quebec to other parts of Canada, or vice versa, will not be penalized in relation to their pension plan contributions or benefits. However, there are other matters with respect to the Canada Pension Plan that I feel need examination and change.

I am not one who cares to use the word "discrimination" indiscriminately, for I believe it is largely overused and overworked; but there is one element of the Canada Pension Plan which leaves the government and parliament open to the charge of discrimination. There is a general oversight in the Canada Pension Plan as it relates to housewives. I know that I am not the first member to bring this matter to the attention of the House; others who have preceded me have done so. But I think it is a matter of real concern which should be taken under advisement and dealt with favourably.

It would probably be more correct to say that the Canada Pension Plan does not relate to housewives, and that is why I say it is an oversight. I feel, and I am sure many in my party feel, that the government should devise some mechanism whereby housewives could contribute to the Canada Pension Plan and benefit upon retirement or upon reaching retirement age. Of course, there is some question as to whether a housewife ever retires. In the event of the death of her husband, a housewife could then receive a more adequate income.

I am sure many hon. members, if not all, could relate many instances of this kind that have been brought to their attention. Personally, in my records I have many instances of widows who now find themselves with inadequate income. They are not able to go out to earn supplementary wages and are in serious straits. If they were brought under the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan, this at least would give some assistance to them in their efforts to make ends meet.

I could mention other categories. I do not know if they would fit under the provisions of this measure, but I would like to state that there are many, even in the age bracket below 60, who because of physical disabilities are unable to enter the labour market and cannot make ends meet. Yet they have been completely unable to obtain any form of assistance, either from provincial or federal agencies, and have reached the point of desperation. This is a category that should be given immediate consideration, because while we recognize the importance of providing a better income for those who are receiving at least some income, there are others who find it practically impossible to cope with the increased cost of living and, as I say, some are reaching the point of desperation.

I have just received a communication from a lady for whom I have been making representations for some time. She tells me she has received word that one of her sisters took her own life, and she writes that perhaps she should have been the one to do that. This just shows that there are categories of citizens in Canada who are sorely in need; yet no matter which way they turn, the doors are closed. The authorities should see to it that such situations do not materialize in this country, a country which we consider to be so affluent.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I would favour the complete elimination of the earnings test for pensioners aged 65 and over. As it stands now, individuals between the ages of 65 and 69 cannot earn extra income over $960 a year. Consideration should be given to raising the total permissible earnings. I realize we want to make sure that a person is retired before he starts to receive the Canada Pension, but at the same time we should be aware that many of our older people are having a difficult time. If they do try to supplement their income through part-time work bringing in over $960 a year, we should not penalize them by taking away part of their contributory pension.

I am not going to read all the letters that I have before me; I will make reference to only one or two. I have a letter from a man who was superannuated and found he had to go out and supplement his income. Now he finds that if he continues to work he will lose some of the benefits available under the Canada Pension Plan. He believes that people in that position should receive some relief and the ceiling should be raised possibly to $2,000.

I have another letter from a gentleman aged 68 years who is retired and receives a small amount under the Canada Pension Plan. Because of physical needs he had to secure a part-time job. Now he finds that if he continues with his job he will lose part of the little pension he currently receives. I could mention other instances of people in the same position. These individuals should not be penalized because they go out and make a little extra money in order to meet unforeseen expenses caused by illness and other circumstances over which they have no control.

Thirdly, I would like to see the government lower the age of retirement for guaranteed income supplement, old age security and Canada Pension Plan purposes to age 60 beginning with an immediate reduction to age 64 and a yearly reduction thereafter. I have made this point before, as have other members of this party, and I feel action should be taken immediately in this connection. My position then, is that the retirement age should be progressively lowered to age 60.

If there must be an earnings test for those aged 60 to 65 for Canada Pension Plan purposes, consideration should be given to raising the amount of permissible earnings to in excess of $960 per year as it is today.

I understand from the communiqué which was issued by the conference of ministers of health and welfare on October 11, 1973, that a degree of accord has been reached on this point. The communiqué reads in part as follows:

> It was also agreed where the Canada Pension Plan operates that, effective in 1974, retirement pensions will become payable at age 65 to any person who has ceased to contribute to the plan, regardless of his or her earnings. Thus the earnings test which has been applied to people between 65 and 69 will be eliminated. The government of Quebec has already liberalized the earnings test under the Quebec Pension Plan.

I would urge the government to bring forth legislation to that effect quickly so that parliament can act on it in time for it to take effect in the new year. The bill before us is basically a good one, but it is long overdue especially as it relates to the cost of living index.

I do not know whether the government will be prepared to receive amendments to the bill at the committee stage. Although I was not in the House at the time, I understand there was some argument about whether this would be permissible because of its effect on the financial prerogative of the Crown. Nevertheless, I think some amendments should be introduced.

We find ourselves in a very difficult position in view of the minister's statement that these measures have been approved by the provinces. We agree that there must be consultation with the provinces, but it seems strange that when a measure is brought before us we are almost rubber-stamping something that has been agreed upon and approved by other levels of government in consultation with the federal government. I think there is room for amendment on that score.

It seems to me, however, since the Canada Pension Plan is financed, not by public funds but by employee-employer contributions, that this bill should be amendable at the committee stage and some thought should be given to raising the maximum pensionable earnings and/or the inclusion of other items which I and colleagues of mine have mentioned today. I realize it is important to pass this bill quickly, that any amendments would require the consent of the provinces, and that conceivably could delay implementation of the bill. However, from the reports that we have heard and read, and the report that emanated from the conference, it would not appear there would be much difficulty in obtaining agreement on some of the items to which reference has been made.

In conclusion, I would strongly urge the government, whether by amendment to this bill or by new, immediate legislation, to act upon the suggestions it has heard from this party and thereby make the Canada Pension Plan more effective and responsive to the needs of the Canadian people.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to participate in the debate on second reading of Bill C-224, another one of the important measures introduced by the Liberal party to control the sometimes nefarious effects of inflation especially if one considers those people who are least able to defend themselves, namely the pensioners in this country.

Before getting to the thick of the matter, I think it would be in order to speak about the speech made by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) this afternoon. He stated, like several members had done before him, that the Liberal party was responsible for inflation and that it is more serious in Canada than in other countries. I was just reading tonight in La Presse an article under the heading: World inflation persists when consumers rule. I quote:

> The rapid inflation witnessed in North America is a worldwide and contagious disease which comes from an imbalance between demand and production capacity.

The present inflation is the acceleration of a movement which began around 1940 and has now resulted in an overall yearly increase in prices of 8 to 15 per cent in the United States, in Europe and in Japan; food prices increase even more.

Inflation is greater in the twentieth century than in any previous century. Prices have nearly tripled since 1900!

This proves that inflation is not Canada's prerogative. It is a world wide problem, as shown by the above article.

Moreover, during the debate on inflation brought about by Conservative members on September 10, 1973, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) delivered a speech on the problems of inflation, unemployment and economy in general, and he quoted some statistics relating to the level of inflation in different countries. I want to quote an excerpt from his speech:

In spite of the threatening pressures, Canada's performance record, both over the long and short terms, compares favourably with that of other nations. Throughout the 1960's Canada, together with Germany, experienced the lowest rate of increase in consumer prices of all the western industrial nations. Between 1970 and the middle of this year, the increase in the cost of living in this country was the second lowest among the eight leading industrial nations, namely Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom, Japan, France, Germany, Italy and Holland.

In the 12 months period ending in June, the rise in the Canadian consumer price index ranked third lowest among the eight nations.

● (2050)

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it was important to make the House aware of those facts. Throughout the debate on the Canada Pension Plan bill, there have been several references to inflation, obviously a related problem since this bill is a further measure aiming at offsetting its often disastrous effects.

Another member raised the matter this afternoon, that is the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) who eloquently denounced the discrimination that seems to exist against women. She made a very good speech as she does every time she rises in this House. However, I will refer her to the press release issued on October 11 and 12 by the conference of welfare ministers where the following can be read in part and I quote:

The federal and provincial governments have noted during this conference that still other questions concerning the CPP and the QPP will require their attention, especially those relating to the equality of sexes, the contributions to be paid and the benefits for spouses who are not contributors.

And it goes on listing other existing problems which will be put right through the eventual introduction of a bill as announced by the minister himself.

In my opinion, Bill C-224 originated on January 4, 1973 when the throne speech contained this very explicit paragraph which resulted in the introduction of this bill:

Subject to the appropriate agreement being reached with the Provinces, changes to improve the Canada Pension Plan will be introduced to provide higher pensions for widows, widows with dependent children and the disabled and to make other needed amendments.

To emphasize this objective set forth in the Speech from the Throne, on September 4, 1973, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a speech in the House of Commons on the food, cost of living and inflation problem. He said:

[Mr. Leblanc (Laurier).]

Second, legislation will be introduced to remove the 2 per cent ceiling on the annual escalation of pensions paid under the Canada Pension Plan. The provinces will be asked for their support of this change, as required by law. Parallelling this change in the CPP, legislation has been introduced today to remove the 2 per cent ceiling on cost of living increases of pensions paid to retired employees of the Government of Canada.

As we all know, that last measure has already been passed by Parliament. We are now dealing with the first measure announced by the Prime Minister in the Speech from the Throne and the statement he made on September 4. Surely members of the opposition should not take the credit for that bill as did two members when we discussed the bill on family allowances. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) took the credit for the increased amounts of family allowances. I think it would be rather difficult at this time to try and take the credit for this bill on the Canada Pension Plan introduced by the minister.

I think that the tremendous work done by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) since January 4 should also be noted. Indeed, I have been sitting in the House of Commons for 10 years and I have yet to see a minister introduce over a period of 10 months six bills one after the other, pilot them himself and always be present in the House. That means that the minister took the time not only to pilot the bills he introduced, but also to supervise their drafting. He also had, as we all do, to look after his constituents.

The following bills were introduced since January 4: Bill C-147, and Act to amend the Old Age Security Act; Bill C-190, an Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan; Bill C-211, an Act to provide for the payment of family allowances; Bill C-219, an Act to amend the Old Age Security Act; Bill C-223, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act.

And today we have Bill C-224, and the minister assures us that there is another bill under preparation.

● (2100)

Once again, I think the opposition members should be applauding the minister for the enormous amount of work he has accomplished.

When you consider that the minister's budget stands for more than a quarter of the total budget of the federal government and that because of the adoption of many pieces of legislation the supplementary estimates will have to be increased, it must also be considered that the minister's budget is more significant than that of any province. Indeed, if you compare his budget with that of Quebec, you will find that the minister alone is doing the work of 110 members of the Quebec National Assembly since he is administering by himself a budget in excess of $6 billion.

I think one point must be emphasized. The whole of the Quebec population did realize yesterday how the federal government was helping Quebecers since they have massively voted for the Liberal party while the other parties have been flatly beaten and this thanks only to the good federal-provincial relations maintained by our minister with his ten provincial counterparts.

Last spring, in preparation for the conclusion of the federal-provincial agreement, the minister tabled an orange booklet entitled "Working Paper on Social Security in Canada". On September 25 and 26, a conference of provincial ministers was held in Charlottetown to discuss the problem of social assistance throughout the country. Finally, on October 11 and 12 a conference was held in Ottawa which resolved the current problems connected with the Quebec Pension Plan.

The agreement concluded featured five points, including the following:

First, escalation of benefit reflecting the cost of living; second, higher maximum earnings used for the calculation of benefit and contribution rates, two items that are contained in Bill C-224; third, maximum pension benefits under the Canada Pension Plan; fourth, change in employee residence; fifth, suppression of earnings and employment income evaluation for contributors aged from 65 to 69 under the Canada Pension Plan.

Since then, the minister in co-operation with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) explained in detail Bill C-224 in his press release No. 118 dated October 22 that mentions also, as you can read on page 3 in the French version of the release:

Both ministers have pointed out . . .

—of course the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) is involved as he is responsible for collecting the contributions—

Both ministers have pointed out that passage of the bill would ensure higher benefits for the 500,000 Canada Pension Plan contributors; furthermore it would provide an increase in future pension, death or disability benefits. This legislation would also restore the parallelism between the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan concerning contribution rates, escalation of present benefits and future pension benefits. This implies that the Quebec government will amend its pension plan to mesh with the Canada Pension Plan as they agreed at the last meeting of federal and provincial welfare ministers.

It is not the only field in which Federal-provincial agreements were successful, particularly those entered to with the province of Quebec. It might be good at this stage to set the record straight, because some candidate in the Quebec election tried to make the people believe that Ottawa and Quebec were always wrangling. Some claimed that those clashes were becoming more frequent at the expense of the taxpayer. There was even talk of squandering, duplication and mess.

Obviously, if those accusations were founded, there would be cause for concern, because in fact, under a federal system, the citizens elect governments, pay taxes to both levels of government and on the other hand they get services from the federal and provincial governments. They want to get their money's worth and who can blame them. They then have the right to require that the governments they elect and finance co-operate. The Ottawa and Quebec administrations are aware of that right and try to respect it.

Here are some examples of a common commitment in the interest of Quebecers that was made a short time ago: firstly, the federal-provincial agreement on family allowances. As of January 1st, 1974, every Quebec family will receive $15 a month for the first child, $20 for the second, $33 for the third and $37 for every other child, thanks to the influx of federal moneys; the ventilation of which was prepared by the provincial government.

Here is another example of federal-provincial agreements: along with other governments of Canada, the province of Quebec participates in the review of the Canadian social security system which originated, as the minister said, with the Castonguay-Nepveu report. Also, what about what was done concerning manpower centres: the federal and provincial offices already cooperate in training Canadians through manpower centres. Also, in the field of economic development, the province of Quebec and the federal government are developing a general agreement which, as the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) has announced, will allow both governments to jointly identify opportunities for economic progress and apply resources to these opportunities.

There is another area, I suggest, that must be underlined, that of environment: Quebec shares with the federal government and the Ontario government in the preparation of studies on the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence River and the Ottawa River. The federal government and the province of Quebec succeeded in cleaning the St. Charles River.

Moreover, agreements were reached on the development of national parks like Forillon, Cartier-Brébeuf in the Quebec City area and another in the St. Maurice Valley; the federal government is making arrangements with the province of Quebec for staging the Jeux de la francophonie to be held in 1974.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I might go on quoting other matters on which agreements have been reached between the federal and the provincial governments but, in my opinion, in order to bring supporting evidence for what I said earlier, namely that federal-provincial relations are very good, even with the province of Quebec, I suggest that the examples I quoted are sufficient to show up to what extent this is true, and to contradict some memorable statements that were made during the election campaign that came to an end yesterday in the province of Quebec.

There is a point on which I would like to draw the minister's attention and about which I made a speech in this House on February 22, 1973, namely private pension plans. I suggest that the federal government might intervene, although, from the constitutional point of view, private pension plans fall within provincial jurisdiction; I suggest that this very important matter which was influenced to a certain extent by the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan might be put on the agenda of meetings to be held between interested parties from various provinces and the federal minister. Besides, I think that the minister himself has mentioned the influence these amendments will have on private pension plans. If I am not mistaken, this has been reported at page 7326 of Hansard for October 29, and I quote:

The changes to the Canada Pension Plan which the federal government has developed in conjunction with the provinces, and which I am committed to place before Parliament, present the government with a difficult dilemma.

As I mentioned a few moments ago, these changes will, if enacted, have a profound and long term effect on the Canada Pension Plan. Many Canadians, organizations, and Parliament will naturally wish to examine these proposed reforms thoroughly, and with a great deal of care. This is as it should be and as I would wish it to be.

I agree with the minister that the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan will surely have an impact on private pension plans. In my speech of February 22, I made some suggestions in terms of creating, or at least of considering with provincial ministers the advisability of creating a mechanism to make pension credits universally portable.

In other words, Canadians 45 years of age or over are now experiencing difficulties finding employment when, for one reason or another, they lose their job, especially because of the pension fund but quite often also for some other motives. If we had a universally transferable plan, companies would not have to pay extra money when they hire a new employee because he would bring his retirement fund with him as is the case under the Canada Pension Plan.

Obviously, this is not an easy problem. I also suggested the establishment of a central agency. Some unions have done so and all employee retirement funds are brought there. When a worker takes another job but remains in the same union, his fund follows him since it is in this central agency. Maybe it would also be possible for this country to establish a central fund that would hold the credit on behalf of all concerns. At this stage, I suggest the federal minister should perhaps urge provincial governments to standardize their laws in that field as is the case now with the Canada Pension Plan. We would thus avoid what happens whenever an employer dips into funds already contributed by employees to build up a pension fund for themselves. Besides, in his very eloquent speech of October 29, the minister himself said as recorded on page 7326 of Hansard:

> ... the differences which had developed early this year between the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan with respect to contributions, retirement pensions, and the escalation of benefits will be removed for 1974 and future years. In other words, employers and employees in all provinces will, once again, be subject to identical CPP-QPP contributions, and citizens in Quebec and the rest of Canada will receive virtually the same retirement pensions, which in turn will be escalated in a common manner to take account of changes in the cost of living.
> Clearly, this will contribute to the mobility of workers between all parts of Canada.

And I think such standardization should also be reflected in private pension plans across this country, which is very important since those private pension plans represent just the same an economic value of $12 billion, which is a very significant amount when it comes to making investments and, if I remember rightly, it is the third most important source of investment funds in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I obviously do not want this debate to go on any longer, and I hope that hon. members will hurry and finish the debate on second reading of this bill so that it may be passed as soon as possible in the best interests of the Canadian people and especially the 500,000 recipients who are in dire need of their money.

[Mr. Leblanc (Laurier).]

[English]

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of participating in this debate. May I say at the outset that I concur in what the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) said when he indicated our support for Bill C-224 presently before the House. I should like to add my hope that the bill is given quick passage.

During the past few months it has become apparent that there is consensus among the provinces regarding the present amendments to the Canada Pension Plan. I think typical of the provincial response was that enunciated by the minister of social services of Ontario, the Hon. Rene Brunelle, on October 11, 1973. He described three basic objectives which he felt were important to the social services program in the province of Ontario. The first of these three objectives was the need for a substantial increase in benefits. He suggested the Canada Pension Plan benefits should be increased substantially and significantly to bear a relationship that would be realistic to the needs of pensioners as living costs and wage levels increase.

The second objective was the need for immediate action in this entire area, and he indicated that steps should be taken immediately to reorient the Canada Pension Plan to more adequate pension levels. The third objective was that of parallelism. He stated that in order to rebuild national pension harmony, the third objective should be to re-establish parallelism between the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan. This objective, of course, should be sought in line with, and not at the expense of, the first two objectives.

The present amendments are in keeping, in part, with these specific objectives, although of course Ontario proposed a higher earnings ceiling as has been indicated by other hon. members. I should like to note in passing that the Ontario proposals call for the elimination of the earnings test for pensioners aged 65 to 70. In addition, the Canada Pension Plan retirement pension should be made available to people aged between 60 and 64 on a reduced basis; there should be increased benefits for widows aged 60 and over; and there should be equal treatment for men and women with respect to survivor benefits.

This is but one example of provincial consent to amend the Canada Pension Plan, and I must congratulate the minister for responding with this initial legislation. He has also indicated that further amendments will be presented to this House delineating the priorities as established by the minister and his provincial colleagues.

At the outset of the debate yesterday, the minister made reference to the working paper on social security in Canada and to his consultations with the provincial ministers of welfare, members of the Canada Pension Plan advisory committee and representatives of labour and business organizations. If I may quote from Hansard, as reported at page 7318 the minister said:

> Six months ago last Thursday, the government tabled its working paper on social security in Canada. This signalled the start of the joint federal-provincial review of Canada's total social security system that has been suggested by the government of Canada and the provinces.

Then further on the next page the minister said:

Shortly after I tabled the working paper of the federal government, I met with provincial ministers of welfare, and I conferred with them again two weeks ago on the reforms that should be made in the Canada Pension Plan. In the intervening period, federal and provincial welfare officials met on numerous occasions, and had jointly prepared a number of detailed studies to assist the ministers of welfare at their October meeting.

In addition, during this interval, I consulted with members of the Canada Pension Plan advisory committee, and representatives of labour and business organizations. The results of these extensive studies and consultations with the provinces and private organizations can be found in the communiqué which the provincial ministers of welfare and I issued on October 11, 1973, with respect to the agreements we had reached on the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan.

The minister is to be congratulated for this kind of consultation with the provinces and other interested bodies. However, there is one fundamental question I should like to pursue which I cannot find answered by the minister. This is a question I feel must be answered if we are to debate intelligently the present and subsequent amendments to the Canada Pension Plan; and this question must be answered no only as it relates to the Canada Pension Plan, which had its inception in January of 1967, but also as it relates to the working paper on social security in Canada introduced earlier this year by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

In the model social security system which was outlined by the minister in his orange paper he made reference to a social insurance strategy in which the Canada Pension Plan received top priority. I think the question that should be asked at this time, and that has to be answered is, will the Canada Pension Plan retain the features of a social insurance plan similar to workmen's compensation plans, or will it take on additional features more in keeping with a welfare plan or income supplementation plan?

If I may review for a moment the provisions of Bill C-224, which has been adequately described and outlined by the minister, I would reiterate that this proposal to amend the Canada Pension Plan will remove the 2 per cent limit that is presently imposed on annual pension increases, these increases being based on the consumer price index. This, of course, has been complemented by a retroactive clause which will allow for cost of living adjustments dating back to the year 1967 when recipients first started receiving benefits.

It is also my understanding that this catch-up clause will mean increases of at least 8 per cent for people receiving benefits since 1972, and a maximum increase of 20 per cent for those who have been receiving benefits since 1967. We agree with these proposals. The second provision in the bill is the escalation of pensionable earnings to $6,600 in 1974, and $7,400 in 1975.

To adequately assess the proposed legislation as it relates to the Canada Pension Plan and the orange paper on social security, I would like to place in perspective some of the background as I understand it. The act establishing the Canada Pension Plan was proclaimed into force on May 5, 1965, with collection of contributions commencing in January, 1966. In January, 1967, the first retirement pensions were paid, with disability pensions commencing in February, 1970.

Of course, the plan is universally applicable and portable throughout Canada, with benefits payable to beneficiaries whether or not they live in Canada. Participation requires a person to be between the ages of 18 and 70 and earning more than $600 a year, with employees contributing at a rate of 1.8 per cent of the contributory earnings and with a matching contribution by their employers, while self-employed persons contribute at the rate of 3.6 per cent.

Benefits from the plan are of three types: first, retirement pensions; secondly, survivors' benefits consisting of a widow's pension, a disabled widower's pension and orphan benefits; and, thirdly, disability benefits consisting of pensions for disabled contributors and benefits for their dependent children.

It is important to recall, in summarizing, that the Canada Pension Plan was introduced as a contributory social insurance program for members of the Canadian labour force with three basic objectives: first, to guarantee an income-related pension to every member of the labour force; to provide basic social insurance to each labour force member and direct dependents in the event of death or total disability; and to provide a source of capital to the provinces.

Whether by design or accident, the Canadian people have interpreted the Canada Pension Plan as a pure social insurance program, when in reality it contains important provisions such as non-earnings related benefits, giving it many of the characteristics of a welfare plan. This fundamental problem is poorly understood by the Canadian people, and the problem is compounded by the complexity of the plan and the restraint on the part of the government to clearly define the role of the Canada Pension Plan within the context of over-all income security policy.

Let me illustrate this if I may. When the guaranteed income supplement payments began in 1967, the same year in which the Canada Pension Plan commenced, the guaranteed income supplement was initially intended as a temporary program to be phased out when the Canada Pension Plan matured in 1976. With the 1970 white paper on income security, the government proposed to establish the guaranteed income supplement as a permanent program, to continue universal old age security payments and to amend the Canada Pension Plan. The proposed Canada Pension Plan amendments at that time were to eliminate two problems as defined by the white paper: first of all, gaps remaining in the income security system, particularly for widows and disabled people; and, secondly, the problem in relation to the fact that Canada Pension Plan contributions and benefits had not kept pace with the growth in average Canadian wages.

Without giving illustrations or figures, the suggested changes to the Canada Pension Plan were intended to substantially increase widows' and disability benefits and to increase retirement benefits through selective increases in the earnings ceilings. Clearly, these changes placed emphasis on the welfare aspect of the plan. It is perfectly true that the minister in presenting the orange paper on social security indicated it was a working paper. Perhaps I may quote from page 2 of the preface to that paper on social security, the so-called orange paper, as follows:

This working paper has been prepared as the Government of Canada's contribution to the launching of this review. It is not designed to present a prescription or a panacea for every weakness in Canada's welfare system. Nor is it meant as a set of fixed proposals put forward by the Government of Canada to parliament and the provinces, for early legislative implementation. Rather it is designed to outline the broad directions of policy which would, in the view of the government, lead to a more effective and better co-ordinated system of social security for Canadians.

On the same page the minister makes reference to two specific proposals, the second being a proposal to amend the Canada Pension Plan. Perhaps I may quote again from this page as follows:

Two specific proposals are contained in this paper and the Government of Canada would like to see them implemented as soon as possible. The first would involve a very substantial increase in family and youth allowances. This is a priority which seems generally to be accepted by the provinces, and ought therefore to be capable of early implementation. The second is a proposal to amend the Canada Pension Plan so as to remove, or at least raise, the present ceiling on the escalation of pension benefits (in relation to changes in the consumer price index) and to increase the year's maximum pensionable earnings (and thus increase, over time, the maximum pensions payable). Under the Canada Pension Plan, it will be necessary to gain the support of two-thirds of the provinces representing two-thirds of the Canadian people in order to implement these proposals. We hope that this support will be forthcoming.

Again in the working paper on social security in Canada, the so-called orange paper, at page 20 the minister has outlined very specifically the social insurance strategy. In this paper he makes reference specifically to the Canada Pension Plan, the workmen's compensation Plan. the unemployment insurance plan, the Quebec Pension Plan, and more specifically proposition No. 4 which perhaps I might quote:

● (2130)

That government should continue to encourage people to save to meet the contingencies of life, and to provide for retirement, through social insurance plans. The benefits from these plans, like income from employment, should be supplemented where required from an income supplementation plan.

What is readily apparent is that at this time we once again have a discussion of a social insurance strategy in which the Canada Pension Plan has received top priority. Once again we have the impression, as we read the orange paper, that in effect we are talking about a pure form of social insurance and that once again the government has failed to define the role of the Canada Pension Plan in its over-all social security system.

We are, therefore, once again confronted with a plan that has features of social insurance not requiring internal subsidies, and in addition has features consistent with welfare including subsidies similar to other income support programs. Since it is apparent that the Canada Pension Plan can emphasize either the welfare or insurance aspects of the plan, since the minister has asked for a reasoned and sympathetic debate concerning how best to provide for the security of income for all Canadians, and since he has indicated the vital importance of the Canada Pension Plan in the total picture of income security, surely it is absolutely essential that the minister outline the specific role the Canada Pension Plan is to play in our social security system.

One additional point which concerns me is the accuracy of the actuarial data one sees associated with the Canada Pension Plan. I am no expert in this regard, but it is my impression that the experts not infrequently have differing opinions in analysing the actuarial data associated with a normal insurance program. Surely where the problem is compounded by an insurance welfare scheme, the validity of actuarial data is doubly suspect to interpretation. I think it is important, and I hope that at an appropriate time the minister will outline the philosophy regarding this fundamental and very important issue in respect of the Canada Pension Plan with relation to the whole social insurance structure.

In conclusion, may I say I have indicated my support for this bill but I would also ask the minister to pursue those matters which have been referred to by other members of this House. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) this afternoon spoke about specific matters. He referred to the delay in having pensions approved. I would concur in that observation.

In addition, there was reference to survivors' and disability benefits and to the fact that the spouses and children of male or female contributors should receive benefits on the same basis. At the present time, husbands of deceased female contributors are not eligible for a pension unless the wife contributed more than 50 per cent of the family income.

Again, I congratulate the minister for the significant amendments but I would ask him at an appropriate time to see whether it is possible to answer some of the questions I have raised.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, as I always am, I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc). Perhaps he did so whimsically, I do not know, but certainly he heaped a multitude of praise upon a rather embarrassed minister. The minister was once known as the grey eminence; but as I looked over at him as the hon. member for Laurier was speaking, he could have been described as the red eminence. I feel that the minister is really quite self-effacing; perhaps that is why he was embarrassed by this praise. He is not accustomed to it. I feel, also, the minister is deserving of some praise but I do not intend to prostrate myself before the font of "St. Marc."

The hon. member for Laurier made some suggestions. Naturally, he was pleased about the results of last evening in the province of Quebec. I would remind him that a year ago tonight perhaps members of his party were not quite so pleased about the results all across Canada. The hon. member for Laurier gave his litany of the accomplishments of the minister and other ministers in obtaining federal-provincial agreements. Naturally, we all take credit for everything we can, but I have a feeling that had the result of one year ago been a little different and we had a majority rather than a minority government, some of the many and very valuable reforms about which the hon. member spoke this evening might never have seen the light of day.

I have listened all afternoon and this evening and have read the debates of yesterday in respect of this bill. It seems to me that there are a number of recurring themes, with variations, which seem to enjoy the support of members from all parties. I certainly hope because of the widespread support for three points I will make that the minister will become convinced there is a substantial sentiment for these reforms on all benches of the House.

Perhaps in summary I might mention the three things we should be thinking about in terms of improvement to the Canada Pension Plan, and then I will try to elaborate as fully as time will allow on each item. The first item which seems to keep recurring is that we should be broadening the base of publicly-funded pensions, specifically the Canada Pension Plan, so that much larger benefits will result to the public from this broadened base. I shall go into some details about this later, but it seems to be one of the things which keeps recurring.

A number of members have touched on the second point. We should be moving toward a voluntary earlier retirement option for Canadian workers. A number of members have spoken very eloquently on the fact that we have been lowering the demand in terms of the number of years necessary to qualify for such things as the old age pension, and have asked whether we should be thinking about lowering the age in terms of the Canada Pension Plan perhaps year by year down to age 60 depending upon the resources of the country, our economic situation and the priorities of the government in respect of welfare benefits.

We know there has been much argument concerning whether this is a welfare scheme, or an insurance scheme, or some bastard mixture of both. I think perhaps the third definition might be more suitable. The third point which I think keeps coming up is that we should be adopting legislation that would permit reciprocal survivor benefits for spouses regardless whether the spouse is male or female. I know there is some interest in this particular topic, certainly by the minister because he has indicated that this is an area in which he would like to have a certain indication of support in order that he may proceed with a broadened or more important piece of legislation than presently exists.

In dealing with the first point having to do with broadening the base of all publicly-funded pension plans, I should like to congratulate the minister, as other members of the House have done, for the improvements he has made. There is no doubt about it, he has exhibited great leadership in this area. The fact that the pension will reflect the cost of living rather than having a 2 per cent ceiling is certainly a recognition of the justice of that move. I think it is in keeping with the other amendments we have made to such measures as old age security and the guaranteed income supplement in recent weeks.

The fact that these benefits will be made retroactive to 1967, bringing retroactive catch-up benefits of 8 per cent to 20 per cent is a step in the right direction. No one can quarrel with that. After all, you cannot shoot Santa Claus. Certainly, the raising of the yearly maximum pensionable earnings from the current $5,600 to ultimately $7,400 is also a step in the right direction. But here is a point I should like to make, because the minister has indicated that this $5,600, or $5,900, if you talk about the Quebec Pension Plan, to $6,600 is roughly 12½ per cent and the increase from $6,600 to $7,400 is again roughly 12½ per cent. I believe the minister indicated that he is considering increases at the rate of 12½ per cent in the future.

My question—and I think it is crucial in terms of my own motivation, my own value system and judgment—is: how long does the minister intend to continue doing this, because if this is to be a yearly move, the Canada Pension Plan, instead of being a supplementary plan to a plan that will pay much larger benefits, perhaps even up to 75 per cent rather than 25 per cent, moving up to 50 per cent, will be the basic plan; and then I think it is a step in the right direction and I urge the minister to take that step. But the minister has not given us a clear indication. Perhaps he will be able to do so when he consults the provinces. Perhaps he will be able to tell us how long he intends to keep pumping this plan by 12½ per cent a year. If he intends to do this for the next few years, I will certainly give him my support. I am certain that this will be explained in more detail in the next bill which will form part of this package of CPP amending bills which we have before us, have had before and will have before us.

I hope this 12½ per cent will apply for a number of years to come, because it will help to bring about the first point that I made in terms of larger benefits. The CPP, as I have said earlier, has always been considered as a supplementary plan. Now, even under the minister's old amendments, we can expect that the benefits will be raised only to a maximum of 50 per cent of whatever the average earnings were for the last three years. What I am concerned about is why we as legislators should always be content to consider the CPP as a supplementary pension plan. Why are we doing this?

The hon. member for Laurier made some excellent suggestions in terms of making private pension plans more responsive and more helpful, making them portable—a central clearing house. I think his suggestions are worth while if what we are interested in is improving private plans. I happen to be of the conviction or, if you like, have the philosophical prejudice that a goodly number of private plans are used by companies for their own ends. I have made references to this before in the House, but there are a number of disadvantages in certain private plans. Often the funds from the private pension plans are used as a cheap form of loan capital by the companies to lend, in turn, to themselves at a rate set by the companies, which is not always a competitive rate in the outside world.

Let us consider for a moment the CN pension funds. There are many millions of dollars in the CN pension plan. They are lent to investors, frequently at competitive rates of roughly 8 per cent to 11 per cent, depending on the month. But the CN's only obligation is 3 per cent in terms of earnings. Therefore, anything extra earned by that pension fund goes to the benefit of CNR. Further, frequently in these private pension plans, in spite of the fact that the bulk of the money in those plans is put forward as contributions by the employees, there are no employee representatives on the board of management.

So if you consider the fact that the major contributors have no say in how their money is to be invested, you can see that is a major flaw in the private pension plan. In many cases in Canada, unless the company wishes to reveal the trust agreement of its pension plan, there is no legislation in Canadian books, in contrast to American law, that requires them to do so. For instance, if you consider pension plans as deferred wages, it seems to me that only the employees, and not the company, should have the control of both the company's and the employees' contributions.

What I am really trying to illustrate is the fact that the $12 billion in private pension plans does not, by and large, return benefits to the workers. This means that the Canada Pension Plan must be a supplementary plan because one of the major cultural shocks, which is an economic shock, that faces anyone on retirement is the dramatic decrease in his standard of living, occasioned by the fact that he suddenly moves from his peak earnings to what is a supplementary, marginal or poverty level income because we have not ensured that the money he has invested in the private plan will pay off to his benefit in the way it should. So we come along with the Canada Pension Plan. The CPP is really doing the same thing: it is just supplementing what the private plan does inadequately. The whole thing adds up to an inadequate package; that is my major criticism.

I would like to see the CPP broadened to include a provision for greater input in terms of employee-employer contributions, if necessary, to pay larger benefits earlier. We are now providing 1.8 per cent. We could quite easily go up perhaps to 2 per cent or 3 per cent. I do not think that if a person is concerned about his retirement security he should mind contributing to a portable plan under the CPP which will provide him with benefits adjusted in relation to the cost of living, so that he can have a decent standard of living when he retires.

What happened in 1967 was that the CPP and most private plans were integrated. Here was a perfect chance for them to be stacked—but most employer and employee groups, I am sorry to say, opted for the integration of those plans. I think that in terms of the benefits they produce and the inflation factor that we have seen over the last ten years, this was a rotten decision. I think that the average person would welcome a portable contributory plan so that he would not be put in a position, if he has to retire early and has no other income, of having to face this kind of change in his standard of living at an age when he is least prepared to do so. I think we should do all we can to avoid that kind of trauma.

The other point on the broadening of the base—in spite of the clock I am still on point one of my remarks—is that I said perhaps 3 per cent would do it in terms of contributions. But maybe raising the maximum pensionable earnings beyond the $5,900, $6,700 and $7,400 up to perhaps $20,000 would provide for an earnings-related pension plans which would be quite acceptable to many people as an alternative to company plans. At least the provinces would have the benefit of that loan capital. At least the people who are recipients under such a pension plan would not have a supplementary plan as they would have one adequate plan for their needs.

Let us take the example of our own pension plan, as members of parliament, based on $18,000. It is stacked; it is not integrated. If it is possible to have a plan for a certain segment of society like members of parliament, which after six years can pay certain benefits, probably better benefits than any public benefit and certainly better than the Canada Pension Plan can after maybe 30 years, then surely for the average person a portable contributory pension plan that would come into force after a matter of 30 years is not actuarially impossible.

All we have to do is set our minds to do it, and ignore the lobbies of the financial institutions that are out attempting to sell supplementary plans themselves simply because the plans we have, in terms of old age security, the Canada Pension Plan, the guaranteed income supplement and the private pension plans of the companies are inadequate. So what we have is a huge market with all kinds of sales gimmicks, all based on people's fears of insecurity.

The second point I made in my introduction was that I feel we should be working toward provision of voluntary early retirement under the Canada Pension Plan. I touched on this earlier. I know the minister has considered it. I know that when he was speaking previously on amendments to the old age security plan he gave us the figures in terms of the cost of lowering the eligible age to 60 years. I know he has faced this fact and I know he has considered it. Nevertheless, the answer we always get when we ask about pension benefits in terms of the public is, "Where are we going to get the money?"

I point out that we have kept on raising benefits. True, we have scarcely kept up with the cost of living, but we have always found the money. It depends on the value system in terms of our own priorities as a government, as a parliament or as a people, in terms of how we wish to treat our older people. I get a great deal of mail in support of early retirement. There are very many people who are looking forward to retiring early, perhaps not to do nothing but to do something else with their lives because they are locked into rather boring, unrewarding and not meaningful—I do not like that word, Mr. Speaker; there must be a better word—jobs and they would like to do something else.

About a third of the people who are on our six months' unemployed list are people who are 24 years of age or under, and this has been the case for the last two or three years. It seems to me that there might be a relationship between voluntary early retirement and employment for the young. The minister might dispute this and say that it is not the problem, that the problem with the young people who are unemployed is that they lack skills; and possibly if you let people off their jobs to retire early, they would take other people's jobs, like the RCMP retirees working as benefit control officers, or retired servicemen who take jobs that other people could fill. I suggest that if pension benefits were adequate in terms of family obligations at that time in their lives, in their forties of fifties, they would be less inclined to do so. I suggest that it is possible in certain countries to do this. In Germany, railway workers can retire on 75 per cent of their best five year's income after 25 years on the job.

I see it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I think this is a good point to stop.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has a third point to make, so perhaps it could be agreed that it is ten o'clock. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—POSSIBLE CONTRACT TO AMERICAN CHAIN AND CABLE COMPANY FOR MAIL SORTING EQUIPMENT—SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF DECISION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) in the House tonight, because I asked him a question on October 19 and at that time the hon. gentleman replied that he was aware of the subject I was raising in the question period and he would be pleased to review the particulars and inform me as soon as possible. Tonight we are going to give the hon. gentleman that opportunity.

I am concerned about the progress of mechanization that is going forward with some extreme speed in the Post Office Department. The responsibility for supplying the equipment has been placed in the hands of the Department of Supply and Services, and judging from statements of the Post Office Department they are speeding up the operation toward mechanization in an attempt to sort out the growing confusion in the Post Office Department and the rapid deterioration in the quality of service.

As the official spokesman for the opposition on this matter, I am inundated daily with complaints by hon. members from all parts of Canada that the postal service is far from satisfactory. When these matters are brought to his attention, the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) invariably says, "Wait until we mechanize." Apparently that will be the dawning of the age of Aquarius.

The question I asked had to do with an important contract which will be vital in the success of the mechanization program. I do not think I have to give the details because I believe the minister is fully aware of them, but it is a contract for provision of bulk sorters in the major centres across Canada. The delivery date of this new equipment is vitally important. In order to meet the requirements of the delivery date it will be necessary for the manufacturer handling the task to be technically qualified, and also to have had some experience in the production of this mechanical sorting equipment. My investigations reveal that very few companies have had any experience in this field, largely because it is new; and countries that are already mechanized, primarily the United States, have only recently become so. Of the companies submitting tenders for this contract, only one has really had the necessary experience and has demonstrated the competence required. They are now into three generations of production equipment. Huge expenditures are involved and the total cost will be around $100 million. Of that amount, $80 million will be for the coders and sorters.

● (2200)

The day I asked the minister the question he indicated that the contract had already been awarded to a company that did not meet the specifications for a performance-type contract. However, I do not think that information is correct. One of the major deficiencies was the failure to provide a mechanically-assisted sorter. The Canadian Post Office project officers on the project objected, so too did the consultant, Cole Sherman and Associates Limited of Toronto, who had been hired by the Post Office Department. These objections were overruled by the Department of Supply and Services' officials and the project officer for this specific contract was withdrawn from the evaluation process at the request of that department.

As a result of the negotiations that are going on behind the scenes there will be a delay in delivery from the proposed date of October, 1974, to January, 1975. The cost of the time slippage is approximately $100,000 a day, because if the machinery is not in place it is necessary to have two parallel staffs, those who will operate the equipment and those who will carry on in the normal sorting manual process in the event of failure of the mechanical process to go into operation at the prescribed time.

It will be readily seen, Mr. Speaker, that if there is a foul-up in the mechanization process, the confusion that currently reigns supreme in the Post Office Department will be compounded to a state of chaos. The other companies which have submitted tenders are competitive in their bids. I raise this question now because I think all hon. members are aware that one of the difficulties which arose in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Commission was the failure of its computerization program. I am still getting complaints daily because this problem has not been entirely corrected.

I am sure the minister will agree that the most precise care will be necessary to ensure that the most qualified bidder is considered for this contract.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to apologize to the hon. member if I gave the impression that the contract had already been awarded. As a matter of fact, the contract is not yet awarded; it is still under active consideration. I am sure the hon. member will understand that it would be improper for me to disclose the negotiations which are presently taking place.

I should like to assure the hon. member, however, that I spent a lot of time reviewing this question with my officials, and the fact that the hon. member is still attracting my attention to the question is appreciated. The hon. member placed the question on the order paper on October

25. It was a very long question, with many points raised of much interest. I should like to assure him that in a very short time I will be in a position to give an answer. In the meantime, however, I cannot, of course, accept the premises of his question.

With a little hope and a little help from my officials in the Post Office, we will come to a conclusion on this very important question which has been raised.

AIR TRANSPORT—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF ALLOCATION OF ROUTE TO MILAN AND NEW ROUTES TO UNITED STATES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the question period on September 17 I raised two questions, neither of which was answered in a satisfactory way by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). The first question I asked was, when would the government announce which Canadian carrier would be given the right to fly from Canada to Milan? Over the years, it seems to have been the policy of governments to chip away at the ability of Air Canada, a publicly-owned airline which was organized under a Liberal government administration. Over the years, Air Canada has given excellent service to the Canadian people. It seems to have been the desire of recent governments to make it impossible for Air Canada to provide the kind of service which it should provide to the Canadian people. In past years, regional routes have been taken away from Air Canada.

In more recent years, many of the most profitable international runs have been given to Canadian Pacific Airlines. For many years, CPA was given the right to fly to Hawaii and the Asian countries. Europe was reserved for Air Canada. For reasons which have never been satisfactorily explained, CPA was given the right to fly to Amsterdam, a most profitable and lucrative run.

Canada now has an opportunity to establish a service to Milan. It is obvious that Air Canada should be given that run, particularly in view of the recent rights given to CPA in various parts of the world. I cannot understand why the minister and the government have taken so long to make the announcement that Air Canada will have the right to fly to Milan. One cannot help but wonder what political clout CPA and its friends have with members of the cabinet.

There is another question I want to deal with very briefly. On September 17 I asked about the failure of the government in its negotiations with the United States to get for Canada a fair share of the new air routes between Canada and the United States. For every route which Canada gets, the United States will get two. As most of the traffic between Canada and the United States is Canadian, Canada should have done much better in these negotiations.

I know I speak for all the people of Manitoba when I say that Manitobans are incensed by the fact that the proposed agreement does not give Manitoba a Canadian carrier for passenger service between Winnipeg, Minneapolis and Chicago until 1978. Until then we must continue to depend upon an American carrier. I say to the minister and his parliamentary secretary, who comes from my city, that that agreement on the part of the government has been met with universal disapproval. I would be ruled out of order if I used the kind of language I have heard in Winnipeg to describe the agreement reached by the government. I urge the minister to reconsider and then to renegotiate the agreement he has made with the United States and to provide Winnipeg with the Canadian carriers to which it is entitled, not in 1978 but now, in 1973.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member's first question with regard to Milan, may I say that the government is fully aware of the importance of designating a Canadian airline to serve Milan. This question has been with us since last year when, under the revised agreement with Italy, we obtained the right to serve Milan in addition to Rome as well as onward traffic rights beyond Italy. The Italians, of course, received the right to serve Toronto in addition to Montreal and have been doing so since last November.

Unfortunately, it has not been possible to deal with the Milan question in isolation. Canada's international civil aviation policy is under review at the present time, including the assigning of international routes to our two flag carriers. Including among the considerations taken into account in this review are maximum benefits to the Canadian travelling public and the welfare of our airlines. The Milan designation is part of this larger issue, and the government feels the decision must await the results of this basic policy review.

In his second question, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) made reference to a "fair share". He did not mention this in his question of September 17 as reported in Hansard at page 6623. However, I will answer that question. In a market as widespread as that between Canada and the United States, it obviously would not be possible for us to participate in all the new routes from the beginning, nor perhaps is it feasible from an airline resource standpoint that we should do so. In order to meet the needs of the Canadian travelling public, it would seem sensible that new services be introduced as quickly as possible. This means that in a number of cases either a Canadian or a United States airline would have to operate the route first where the current traffic offering is not as heavy as to justify parallel services.

This was a matter for negotiation, and on some routes it was decided that some United States carriers would open the routes, with Canadians to phase in, and that in other cases Canadian carriers would open the routes, with United States carriers to phase in. For example, Canada opens the Edmonton-Calgary-San Francisco route and the United States follow in phase two. Canada opens the Toronto-Dallas-Fort Worth-Houston route and the U.S. follow only in phase three. Canada opens the Montreal-Cleveland route and the U.S. enter at the very last phase. I am sure this will be understood by the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us about Winnipeg.

FISHERIES—ACTION TO ENSURE CONTINUING SUPPLY OF VEGETABLE OILS FROM UNITED STATES FOR PROCESSING PRODUCTS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is so long since I asked a question pertaining to the supply and regulation of protein and vegetable oil materials in Canada that it may seem useless to discuss the matter at this late date and at this late hour. It is regrettable that this issue was not debated at a much earlier moment. But it is still, I think, of value to discuss it, inasmuch as what happened should be a lesson to Canadian governments both today and in the future and a reminder that the same blunder should never be made again.

I believe the Government of Canada panicked when it received notice that the United States had decided to place an embargo on protein and vegetable oil materials. Canada reciprocated by imposing identical legislation or regulation. But the government did not take into consideration the international aspect of the trade between Canada and other nations in these commodities. It did not take into consideration the fact that western Canada might well obtain a large portion of its requirements from the area immediately south of the border in the United States. Nor did it take into consideration the fact that the eastern seaboard of Canada exports practically all its fishmeal to the United States and the European market. It took no account of the fact that Canadian manufacturers had geared production of protein materials and vegetable oil to international demand.

It did succeed, in this restrictive measure, in disrupting the trade patterns of all these people. There was a very obvious alternative, I think, and that was that there should have been an approach to our neighbour to the south to make a deal for a trading basis on which we might exchange shipments of protein material on a unit by unit basis so that neither protein supplies nor vegetable oil supplies would be depleted. Rather, the opportunity would present itself for each individual who required these supplies to obtain them from their traditional source at better prices than would otherwise be available. The price of protein material required for livestock feed in the west was escalated because the normal source of supply was removed and transportation made up costs which were not convenient for them.

This was so precipitant and mandatory that ships already at the dock sailed unloaded with protein materials. It was so mandatory that inventories built-up in eastern fishmeal plants to the point where they could not be accommodated and the plants had to cease operations, or planned that they might have to. It was so serious that food processors could not get vegetable oils; they paid exorbitant prices for the sources that were available to them, and had to substitute to a degree that was not attractive.

I submit that had this been undertaken with the intelligence which we expect of government, and with the knowledge of the consequences of the policy, these hardships need not have existed to the degree to which they did. They could have been ameliorated by an intelligent approach. I submit that the government panicked and created a scarcity in some areas and a surplus in others. It did not take the necessary steps to trade these items in an area of convenience to Canada.

The unfortunate part of it is that shippers from the east coast of Canada who use export markets virtually exclusively for their products have found that their international trading reputation has been damaged, that they have a great deal of difficulty establishing themselves in those markets which they have used traditionally because we are no longer considered a reliable source of supply.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very poor way to approach a subject. It must be taken into consideration that we knew that certain companies in Canada requiring protein had their requirements covered on a long-term basis; that this meal was not going to be an adequate substitute for some feed manufacturers; that export markets were going to be vital and essential to them. As a result of this, processors of fishmeal in the Atlantic area, which have been hard pressed for years to make ends meet, were hurt again and lost an opportunity for profit-making. It also reduced the potential income of those people who were fishing. Taking the whole program all around, it was detrimental to virtually every user of protein in Canada. It was detrimental to every food processor who required vegetable oils. In the long run, it was detrimental to the character and the trading nature of our industry throughout the country.

This was avoidable. There should have been an attempt at negotiation. It should have been announced in this House, and people should have understood where they were going and why it was logical. It was not a matter to be studied; it was a matter where the information should have been at the government's fingertips when the decision was made.

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, Canada has now been given special exemption from normal export controls on United States soybeans and soybean meal. Restrictions on vegetable oils have not to date been lifted by the United States government. The Canadian government has not asked the U.S. for any exemption on vegetable oils as the Canadian users of this product, including sardine canners in the Bay of Fundy, have not voiced any difficulties in obtaining supplies.

Presently, domestically-produced vegetable oil is readily available to the fish processing industry. However, the price of Canadian domestic soybean oil is $34 per hundredweight, as compared with $27 per hundredweight for U.S. soybean oil. As a result of the price differential, the Canadian fish processors, primarily sardine canners, prefer the American product.

The recent move by the United States government to give exemptions to Canada on soybeans and soybean meal is soon likely to be extended to cover soybean oil. Further, before the end of this mounth, the 1973 U.S. soya crop is expected to reach the market. This should ensure the resumption of normal delivery from the U.S. Meanwhile, the Canadian controls on the export of vegetable oil are in place. We do not anticipate any serious problems during the remainder of the year for the Canadian fish processing industry in respect of the supply of vegetable oils.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WHITTAKER—SELLING OF UNITED STATES APPLES IN HOUSE OF COMMONS CAFETERIA

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, of which I sent you notice, in the interests of the apple growers of Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia.

When I went to the cafeteria last evening I picked up the apple I have in my hand which was offered for sale. It has the telltale marks of bitterpit which render it unfit for human consumption. Believing it to come from British Columbia I asked to see the box, because from the code on the box I would be able to ascertain the packer and probably the grower and therefore could caution them about sending such apples to the House of Commons. But to my surprise and horror I found that the box came from Washington state.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Whittaker: This is the height of the season for Canadian apple producers. My question of privilege is that I ask Your Honour to do everything possible to ensure that we have Canadian apples in the cafeterias and restaurant of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has three questions of privilege under advisement at the present time. Two were raised yesterday and a new one has been raised today by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. My understanding of the hon. member's question of privilege is that he has noticed that apples sold in one of our cafeterias or the restaurant came in a box from Washington. Of course, the evidence we have before us is that the box came from Washington, not necessarily the apples.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I have much sympathy with the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary, particularly in view of the fact that the best of Canadian apples, the McIntosh, originated in the historic county of Dundas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that the matter will be looked into.

Two other very important questions of privilege were raised yesterday. One was raised by the hon. member for Halton who complained, I believe, that a stone wall was being built in one of the doorways of his office. We have looked into this matter and some progress has been made: construction has been stopped. I assume the hon. member can still get over the wall into his office. That matter will be looked into. I am sure it will be resolved and that some other way will be found to establish the fire protection required to satisfy the fire marshal.

• (1410)

The third matter was raised by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River and had to do with unwed fathers. I am afraid I can do very little about the problems that beset pregnant fathers.

SUSPENSION OF TRANSAIR SERVICE IN WESTERN MANITOBA AND EASTERN SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing importance arising from the decision of the Air Transport Committee to permit Transair, the regional air carrier for midwestern Canada, to suspend its services into western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan effective January 1, 1974. I ask leave of the House to move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That this House urges the Minister of Transport to delay the implementation of the ATC decision until such time as the regional air policy is thoroughly reviewed and updated to meet the air transportation needs of developing areas in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

GRAIN

RAPESEED PLEBISCITE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent necessity arising from the plebiscite recently announced by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board on how rapeseed should be marketed. In view of the fact this plebiscite is stacked against the proponents of orderly marketing, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave):

That the plebiscite on rapeseed marketing be amended to include the following:

(a) Every Wheat Board permit holder should have the right to vote or failing this any producer who grew rape at least once in the last five years;

(b) That a simple majority will carry rather than the present 60 per cent;

(c) That the ballot will simply carry a "yes" and "no" category and the "undecided" category will be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Meadow Lake?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

INCREASE IN PETROLEUM PRODUCT PRICES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the excessive increase in the price of oil products, mainly gas and heating fuel, and of the fact that Canadian consumers, especially those with a low income, soon will not be able to face this increase, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That the House urge the government to consider within the next 30 days the possibility of granting a discount to consumers through gas and heating fuel retailers.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not and the motion cannot therefore be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT STATEMENT RESPECTING INFLATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43, the reasons for which are quite apparent in the motion that I ask the House to agree to have put. My motion is:

[Mr. Nesdoly.]

This House urges the government to take steps to ensure that the false statement which appears on the literature accompanying the OAS cheques just issued and which states "although inflation is a worldwide problem . . . the government are taking all reasonable steps to keep it under control and to minimize its effect" be corrected by the inclusion at the time the next cheques are issued of the true facts to indicate that the government has failed to take reasonable steps in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The hon. member for Rimouski.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Rimouski, but I think that the hon. member for Peace River is rising on a point of order.

[English]

Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Baldwin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Because the literature in question states that the Canadian parliament and the government are taking all reasonable steps to keep inflation under control, as a member of the Canadian parliament I wish to take this opportunity, as I think I am entitled to do, to disassociate myself from this cruel hoax the government is trying to perpetrate on the old people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, as my name has been associated with this matter. I can give the hon. member the assurance that at the next opportunity I will try and see to it that any such message will exclude him from those who are trying to do everything they can to control inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SUGGESTED RETURN TO DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME TO REDUCE CONSUMPTION OF ELECTRICITY AND OIL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the lack of energy resources and in order to check the present crisis as concerns electricity and fuel resources while fighting against inflation and living in the light of day like during World War II, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the government order a return to Daylight Saving Time and act accordingly.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

REMOVAL OF EXEMPTION OF CONSPIRACIES RELATING TO EXPORTS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-226, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

● (1420)

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, under the Combines Investigation Act it is an illegal practice to conspire to fix prices of commodities, but there is a provision in section 32(4) permitting companies in fact to sit down and conspire legally to fix prices for export purposes. Once having done that, the fixed or agreed upon price becomes the price for domestic purposes as well. In other words, Canadians thereby become the victims of legalized theft. The provisions in section 32(4) and (5) came about in 1960 as the result of an open conspiracy between the Conservatives and Liberals in those days.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member appreciates that the Standing Order allows him to make a very brief explanation of the bill and not to argue the bill as he might on second reading. I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps he is going beyond the very strict limitations imposed by Standing Order 68.

Mr. Howard: Certainly I had no intention of doing that, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, I am surprised that I got as far as I did.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has gone as far as he should. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

[Text]

*AIR CANADA COMPUTER SYSTEMS CENTRE, DORVAL, QUEBEC

Question No. 2,543—Mr. McKenzie:

1. From where will the personnel to staff the new Air Canada Computer Systems Centre at Dorval be recruited?

2. (a) What other Air Canada departments will occupy the building (b) from where will personnel to staff these departments be recruited (c) will any Air Canada employees be moved to Dorval from other cities?

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. The new centre will be staffed by personnel promoted from other computer facilities in Montreal and elsewhere, as well as by personnel recruited from outside the company.

2. (a), (b) and (c) Other departments who occupy the building have not yet been determined, but none will involve staff or recruitment from locations other than Montreal.

Order Paper Questions

GOVERNMENT POLICY RELATING TO BUTTER STORAGE

Question No. 2,648—Mr. Reynolds:

Are 70 million pounds of butter currently in storage in Canada and, if so, what is the government's policy in regard to disposing of same to the Canadian consumer?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No; butter stocks which are required for domestic consumption are at the support price of 71 cents per pound.

STORAGE OF NATIONAL MUSEUM ARTIFACTS

Question No. 2,658—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With respect to answer to Question No. 2,207, which indicates that two of the 17 locations presently used to store historic artifacts will be upgraded this year, what steps will be taken to upgrade the remaining 15 storage facilities to prevent deterioration of artifacts set aside for future generations of Canadians?

2. Does the government consider that such storage and preservation facilities require upgrading to prevent serious losses due to poor or inadequate climatic control facilities in terms of humidity control, heat limitation and other factors essential to preserving articles of historical significance, broadly defined, for future generations of Canadians and, if not, what specific plans does the government have to make such provisions in the immediate future?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. I am informed by the National Museums of Canada that an invitation to tender has been called to upgrade the textile storage area at 1523 Laperriere Avenue, Ottawa. It is planned to expand the humidified storage area of historical artifacts.

2. The other fourteen storage locations are considered adequate for the type of artifacts stored, except as noted hereunder. Ashton Press Bldg., Bells Corners, Ontario: As soon as adequate storage facilities become available, artifacts of the Ethnology and Folklore Divisions will be moved. 7 Murray Street, Ottawa, Ontario: As soon as adequate storage facilities become available, artifacts of the Canadian War Museum will be moved.

OFY FUNDS TO CONSTITUENCIES REPRESENTED BY LIBERAL AND CONSERVATIVE PARTY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Question No. 2,671—Mr. Cossitt:

What was the total amount of OFY funds allocated in 1972-73 to constituencies represented in the House of Commons by (a) Members of the Liberal Party (b) Members of the Progressive Conservative Party?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): It is not possible to answer this question, since the allocation of the funds of the OFY programme is done within a framework of regions and sub-regions and not within the framework of electoral constituencies.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Question No. 2,702—Mr. Lawrence:

1. What is the estimated amount of expenditures to be incurred by, for or on behalf of the Food Prices Review Board during the current fiscal year?

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

2. What amount was estimated for the current fiscal year for consultants, "outside" research and other non-direct expenditures by the Board?

3. What is the estimated cost of salaries and expenses for the Board (a) members (b) employees for the current fiscal year?

4. What is the estimated cost of the research program announced by the Chairman of the Board on Friday, September 7, 1973 relating to the use of eighty (80) university graduate researchers?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. $977,000.

2. $270,000.

3. (a) $67,000; (b) $348,000.

4. $110,000.

ROCHDALE COLLEGE, TORONTO

Question No. 2,776—Mr. Hellyer:

Is Rochdale College, Toronto, a registered charitable organization for purposes of federal income tax and, if so (a) on what date was this designation given (b) what is the registration number?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): In so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned Rochdale College is not a registered Canadian charitable organization as defined in paragraph 110(8)(c) of the Income Tax Act.

APPROVAL OF NEW HORIZONS PROJECTS FOR PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Question No. 1,932—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

How many New Horizons projects were approved for the Province of Quebec and what were the amounts paid in each constituency to April 15, 1973?

Return tabled.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO CANADIAN ARTISTS AND SCHOLARS

Question No. 2,427—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. For the years 1970, 1971 and 1972 inclusive, how many Canadian artists and scholars received (a) fellowships (b) grants to work or study in (i) France (ii) Belgium (iii) Switzerland (iv) Federal Republic of Germany (v) Italy (vi) Netherlands (vii) U.S.S.R. (viii) India (ix) U.S. (x) others?

2. What was the place of birth of each individual who received the fellowships and/or the grants?

3. How many persons are presently on staff at the (a) Maison du Canada in Paris (b) Shasti Institute in New Delhi?

4. For the years 1970, 1971 and 1972 inclusive, what were their (a) salaries (b) annual budgets (c) travelling (d) promotion (e) lodging (f) entertainment expenditures?

5. Does the government intend forming an external cultural policy and (a) if not, for what reasons (b) if so, on what date and which department would be responsible for implementing such a policy?

6. Is consideration being given by the government to increase the number of (a) cultural institutions (b) bilateral cultural agreements in other countries and (i) if not, for what reasons (ii) if so, on what date and which countries will be contacted?

7. For the years 1970, 1971 and 1972 inclusive (a) how many students came to Canada (b) how many Canadian students, by province, went abroad under the International Student Summer Employment Exchange Program?

Return tabled.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, it is not very long ago, on October 15, that I posed a question relating to La Mauricie National Park. There is urgency in obtaining an answer to that question because there is an element in it that touches upon the integrity of the hon. member in whose riding it exists.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 243, 244 and 252.

COPIES OF APPLICATIONS FOR GRANTS BY THE PROVINCIAL CITIZENS' RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS CONFERENCE, ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND

Motion No. 243—Mr. Hellyer:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the applications for grants by the Provincial Citizen's Rights and Freedoms Conference, St. John's, Newfoundland, in respect of its Conference held in January, 1973 and for correspondence from the government related thereto.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, these are confidential papers concerning the internal affairs of the Department. Under the circumstances, the hon. member could perhaps withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion dropped?

Mr. Hellyer: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. I did not realize it was a motion in my name. Consequently, in view of the fact there was no consultation, we will transfer it for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Privilege, Mr. Nielsen

COPIES OF APPLICATIONS OF PACT FOR GRANT

Motion No. 244—Mr. Hellyer:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the applications of PACT (Peoples Acting on Concerns Together), Winnipeg, for a grant from the Secretary of State together with any correspondence to or from the government relating to the applications.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this is the same answer to the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, those are confidential papers which concern the department's internal matters. In such circumstances, the hon. member would perhaps withdraw his motion.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—ALLEGED ALTERATION OF "HANSARD" BY SOLICITOR GENERAL CHANGING MEANING OF CERTAIN REMARKS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order although I think it is more properly a question of privilege. Like the question raised by the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary (Mr. Stewart), it also involves a bad apple but this time it is the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), one of a whole barrel full on the treasury benches. It concerns a deliberate alteration in Hansard, the record of the debates of this House.

I know, Sir, that the practice is for members to make grammatical changes in the blues, but it was never intended that the sense of a statement or a sentence be altered so as to take away from its original meaning. Nor was it ever intended that whole phrases could be absolutely deleted from the written record of the proceedings of the House.

Yesterday in answer to a question of mine, which is recorded in Hansard for October 30 at page 7351, the Solicitor General replied in his first sentence:

I would be interested to know what misinformation the hon. member alleges I am giving to the House.

I will get to that in a moment in connection with the change he has made in Hansard. The last sentence but one reads:

I might say also that the director of the penitentiary will be retiring shortly, a new director will be appointed.

There then appears a full stop after that sentence, and it is followed by this final sentence:

Improvements are being made at the institution.

Every member on this side of the House, and I am sure members of the Press Gallery and yourself, Sir, heard the minister say this:

I might say also that the director of the penitentiary will be retiring shortly, a new director will be appointed, and other improvements are being made at the institution.

The minister, Sir, or his minions have deliberately deleted the words "and other", changing the whole sense of his reply. That, Sir, is dishonest. It is misinformation: it misleads the readers of the official record of our debates.

If the minister is prepared to concede that my recollection of the words he used is accurate, that will be fine. Otherwise, I am prepared to move a motion that Hansard be corrected by replacing the words that now appear with the actual words spoken yesterday in that reply.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply if he wishes, but certainly it would be the responsibility of the Chair to look into the record and the suggestion made by the hon. member that the record has been changed. I am sure the minister will give the same undertaking from his side.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the blues were sent to our office in the usual way and I know changes were made, I thought in the usual way. I cannot remember now the exact changes that were made, but I would be willing to check it with you and, if it was out of order, if something was done that was not supposed to be done, I would be glad to comply with your ruling.

MR. HELLYER—REFUSAL OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE INFORMATION REQUESTED IN CERTAIN MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with respect to the motions for papers that were just called and subsequently transferred for debate. In refusing to table information of this kind the government is establishing a new practice and departing from precedents which are time-honoured in this House, thereby taking away the rights and privileges of all members of the House.

Historically, Mr. Speaker, it has been the practice that public documents would always be tabled in response to an order of this kind. It has been the practice for many, many years that applications from private companies and persons for assistance of this kind under well-recognized government projects should be made public, that these are matters of public record and it is only internal documents between ministers and civil servants acting within the departments that are considered privileged. That has been the rule for decades, Mr. Speaker, but now a new practice is being established whereby applications from persons and organizations outside the government and letters in support of those applications are denied to members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hellyer: This, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion is a terrible breach of the privileges of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity may have a point of debate, but it seems to me that is the very purpose of transferring his motions for debate. I find that when we have these debates on the tabling of documents we debate the substance of the matter referred to rather than the very narrow point whether a particular document ought to be tabled or not. The hon. member may have a very good point. It is certainly not for the Chair to determine whether he has or not, but I suggest that is the very point that would be debated if and when the matter comes before the House. The Chair would be very happy, when these motions come before the House in private members' hours, if we concentrated on this aspect of the matter, whether certain documents ought to be tabled or not. I hope there can be a useful debate on this point in due course. Oral questions.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, it is only because I felt there had been—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Hellyer: —a deviation from the practice that I brought the matter to Your Honour's attention.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley. Order, please. I call for the co-operation of the hon. member for Trinity and other hon. members who are arguing across the floor to allow the House to return to work. The hon. member for Don Valley.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ACTION REQUIRED TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT—GENERAL POLICY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the rather interesting statement he made the other day that the seasonally adjusted increase in unemployment was in large measure caused by the high level of economic activity in the country, which is a very unique interpretation, does this mean the government is taking the position that the economy should be slowed down in order to reduce the rate of unemployment in the nation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillies: Why is the government therefore following a policy, as indicated by the rate of decline in the real domestic product, of slowing down the economy?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I have said in a couple of speeches before the House, during the last quarter of 1972 and the first quarter of 1973 the economy expanded at an unsustainable rate of about 12 per cent. It was expected that the economy would have to moderate its expansion and it is presently on target at about 7 per cent in real growth for 1973.

Mr. Gillies: Is the Department of Finance taking the position that this slowing down in the rate of growth of the economy is essential to moderate the rate of inflation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is not the way I would put it. It is obvious that what we want to do is take whatever heat is in the economy and moderate it in a fashion that we can sustain long-term growth without risk of a recession. This moderation which continues the expansion we have experienced but at a rate the economy can sustain is, I believe, a healthy way to run the economy.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Don Valley for a third supplementary and then the hon. Leader of the Opposition, followed by the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to abuse the privilege but I am very interested in this point. Why is the government taking the position that it is necessary to slow down the rate of growth in the economy if it is so certain that the inflation we have—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question asked in those terms is argumentative. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

CAUSE OF GROWTH IN RATE OF PARTICIPATION IN WORK FORCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance with regard to the growth in the rate of participation in the work force. Is it the view of the minister and his advisers that the increased percentage of participation in the work force as far as the population of the country is concerned is in any way the result of the rapid rate of inflation which is causing other members of families to seek work who would not find it necessary except for the rate of inflation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. It is the view of the government and the Department of Finance that the increase in participation in the labour force is as a result of the expansion of the economy which is providing more jobs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for York South will be patient with the Chair, eventually we will get order and he can ask his question. The hon. member for York South.

ENERGY

COST FACTORS INVOLVED IN ENERGY BOARD DECISION TO PERMIT INCREASE IN PRICE OF NATURAL GAS—EXPORT PRICE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arises out of the approval by the National Energy Board, and I assume by the government, of an increase of 10.7 per cent requested by TransCanada Pipelines in the price of natural gas. Can the minister inform the House what cost factors required the National Energy Board and the government to approve this increase and what other reasons there may or may not have been for the approval?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, under the National Energy Board Act this is one of the areas where the board acts within its own jurisdiction without referring it to the cabinet. However, the cabinet, of course, will accept the judgment. The specific reason cited by the board is the increase in natural gas prices as a result of action by the Alberta government.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether he has been in touch with the board about this proposed increase in the cost of natural gas to consumers, and has he any information whether the increase will apply to domestic use as well as industrial use and, if so, what justification there is for that?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I should explain that parliament, under the act, has put this question of determination of rates exclusively with the board. The board in turn does not make the choice in terms of deliveries between domestic and industrial users. It merely delivers it to the wholesale utilities in the provinces. In the case of Ontario, the Ontario Energy Board would determine how the increase should affect domestic or industrial users.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the minister has not interested himself in that problem. I appreciate that exported gas is based on some 105 per cent formula with competitive fuels, but can the minister assure the House that export contracts will be renegotiated to ensure that any price increases to Canadian consumers will be reflected in a price increase for exported gas?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the government would go further than that. Under the regulations established by the government in 1970 and pursuant to other action we will be taking, we will be seeking to increase the export price of gas not just to the level paid by Canadian consumers but to the appropriate competitive level in the export market in which it is sold.

FINANCE

ACCURACY OF FIGURES PUBLISHED IN QUEBEC ON FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO PROVINCE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Can he confirm or refute, as the case may be, the accuracy of the figures published during the last Quebec election campaign relative to the money collected and spent by the federal government in Quebec, between 1946 and 1971?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will understand that his question is faulty on two points. The first is obvious, for he asks the minister to confirm or refute a statement made outside the House. The second weakness I see is that the question could well be put on the order paper.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to put a direct question to the Minister of Finance.

Have officials of his department received requests from the province of Quebec to clarify the statement of expenses and revenues collected in the province of Quebec, between 1946 and 1971?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT OF INCREASE IN PERSONAL INCOME SPENT ON OIL AND GAS ON SPENDING IN OTHER AREAS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to one asked by the hon. member for Don Valley. With regard to the minister's statement concerning economic expansion, does the minister anticipate that the increased percentage of personal income spent on oil and gas will result in a decline in spending in other areas of the economy, and will this decline in spending reduce the rate of economic expansion and be responsible for greater unemployment?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the conclusion implicit in the hon. gentleman's question follows from his own preamble.

Mr. Alexander: Can the minister inform the House as to what the effect of the price increases for energy products will be on the projected growth of the gross national product? Can the minister answer that question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the House will be in a better decision to assess this for itself after the statement tomorrow by my colleague.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC AND MARITIME PROVINCES ON MEASURES TO OFFSET INCREASES IN PRICE OF VENEZUELAN CRUDE OIL

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister had discussions with the governments of Quebec and of the four Atlantic provinces with a view to taking measures to offset increases in the price of Venezuelan crude coming into Canada, which of course will have the effect of increasing the consumer price of fuel and gasoline products in those provinces?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with some of the governments but not with all. I think I will have to defer further answers on that until tomorrow.

OIL—CONSULTATION WITH QUEBEC GOVERNMENT ON NEED FOR ST. LAWRENCE SUPERPORTS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the present policy of the government to replace foreign oil in eastern Canada with Canadian oil, can the minister advise the House whether there has been consultation between the federal government and the Quebec government to determine whether, in view of the new policy, there is still a need for the proposed oil superports on the St. Lawrence?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that was the nature of my meeting with two Quebec ministers in September.

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF EMBARGO ON IMPORT OF FAT CATTLE FROM UNITED STATES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether, in view of the deep uncertainty among cattle producers, as evidenced by the discussions at the cattlemen's convention now going on in the city of Regina, the government has decided to apply an embargo or very stern restrictive quotas on the importation of U.S. fat cattle into Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. The problem is still under discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it has been under discussion for some time. During the past week more cattle were brought in from the United States than have been brought in for many, many years. I think the number was in excess of 20,000. As 50 per cent of the kill in Canada is of American cattle, when is it expected that a decision will be made? The cattlemen are waiting for action instead of procrastination.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I ought to inform the right hon. member it was only one week ago Monday that the cattlemen decided that the government should take any action. They made requests at that time. We have compiled all the facts and I have submitted a suggestion to my colleagues. I hope a decision will be made soon.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if he has had a request from farm organizations, either the general organizations, the National Farmers Union or from the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, for an embargo on fat cattle coming into Canada or for some type of restriction governing cattle coming into Canada from the United States?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think most farm organizations have made public the demands or suggestions they are making. They predominately favour some type of surcharge being placed for a period of time on cattle entering from the United States. The suggestions of some are different from those of others. We are not getting any unanimous opinion from them. However, most of them are of the opinion that something should be done.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE—DISCUSSION BY PRIME MINISTER WITH QUEBEC PREMIER

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since the Prime Minister said yesterday that he would soon meet with the Quebec premier who stated two weeks ago that after the provincial election he would ask for the resumption of constitutional talks, will he take this opportunity to discuss the possibility of holding a constitutional conference and is he himself in favour of such a conference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. Unfortunately, I cannot add anything new. The position of the government is that the Canadian constitution should be repatriated, that a truly Canadian amendment formula be adopted, that a bill of human rights and linguistic guarantees be incorporated into the constitution. Those were the views that we held at the Victoria Conference which regrettably failed because the province of Quebec did not accept the federal proposals. If the new government of Quebec can present proposals compatible with the federal position and generally acceptable to Canadians, we will be extremely happy to resume constitutional conferences.

FINANCE

CONTINUATION OF FLOATING EXCHANGE RATE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As it is now more than three years since the adoption of the floating exchange rate, does the minister intend to continue this policy, particularly in view of his recent statement calling for stable but adjustable par values and wider margins, with the possibility of floating rates in particular situations under IMF supervision and surveillance?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that report of the deputies of the group of 20, from which the hon. gentleman has quoted, also contemplates in the ensuing sentence that floating will be contemplated under the supervision of the International Monetary Fund.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

RELATIONSHIP OF BANK RATE TO FALL IN REAL DOMESTIC PRODUCT FOR AUGUST

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked previously by the hon. member for Don Valley. As bank rates in London, England, and New York have fallen by a quarter of one per cent and as the bank rate has not fallen in this country, to what extent does the government attribute the fall of 2.2 per cent in the real domestic product for August to an economic policy of so-called expensive money?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this country, as I said to the hon. gentleman and some of his colleagues when interest rates were going up, sets its own monetary policy.

Mr. MacKay: May I ask the Minister of Finance why the bank rate continues to be so high? Is it the policy of the government to have the bank rate in this country so high? If not, is the government going to do anything about it?

• (1450)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Interest rates in this country still tend to be lower than those in the United States and in Europe and consequently there is still a differential which causes a certain pressure on foreign exchange. The other factor is, of course, that interest rates reflect the continuing expansion of the economy as evidenced last week by over $300 million in new chartered bank loans.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

REASON FOR DELAY IN APPROVAL OF TREFANN COURT RENEWAL PROJECT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that on May 28 of this year Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation approved in principle a mortgage application from Trefann Homes Corporation to build 17 houses in the first phase of the Trefann Court urban renewal project, and since it is urgent that an immediate start be made on the project so as to avoid escalation of building costs, may I ask whether CMHC has given final approval to the application and, if not, what is the reason for the long delay?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I take it the question is based on press reports which I also saw this morning. Apparently the difficulty is that only one bid was received for the construction of this project and this has made an evaluation of the costs and the rents which will flow from those costs more difficult. However, I have instructed CMHC to process this application immediately because I share the hon. member's anxiety that this development should go ahead as soon as possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PUBLICATION OF POSITION OF GOVERNMENT AT NEXT LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On September 17, the minister advised the House that he would issue a document stating the government position at the forthcoming UN conference on the Law of the Sea. Can the minister tell us whether consultations with the provinces are completed and whether he soon intends to table his white paper in the House?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question last week. I am now in a position to say that the paper is in the final drafting stages and will be tabled in the next few days.

REPORTED CONFLICT BETWEEN MINISTER AND MINISTER OF FISHERIES RESPECTING CANADA'S POSITION AT NEXT LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last Thursday in Newfoundland the Minister of Fisheries presented for discussion purposes a paper in which he outlined the position Canada would take at the forthcoming Law of the Sea Conference. Following the meeting, press reports indicated there was conflict between the minister and his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and that the latter does not go along with the recommendations of the Minister of Fisheries. Will the minister now assure the House that this is not so and that he accepts the position the Minister of Fisheries is putting forward with respect to the position Canada will take at the conference?

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am completely unaware of such a conflict. The paper I shall be presenting represents the joint work of the two departments and the two ministers.

Mr. Carter: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries. Is the minister now able to tell the House whether Canada's delegation to this conference will take with them a back-up plan for presentation in the event that the recommendations made by this country are not acceptable to the other nations?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): If the hon. member means a back-down plan, the answer is no.

ENERGY

TAR SANDS OIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING TAXATION OF SYNCRUDE AND IMPORTANCE OF PROJECT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. It relates to the answers he gave yesterday concerning the meeting he held with Alberta ministers on the tar sands proposal. Would the minister tell us whether he agrees that the Syncrude project is most important to the nation and must go ahead at all costs? If this is his view, what are his instructions to his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, with regard to the modification of the tax problems which face Syncrude, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources having said they would remain?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): There is no difference between myself and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the approach to these negotiations. We both agree that the Syncrude project is a very important one for the future of Canada. At the moment we are reviewing the arrangements between the companies which make up that consortium and the province of Alberta to see whether they can be fitted in with the announced guidelines related to federal resource taxation policy.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Has the minister said that the project must go ahead at all costs?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I did not add the last three words, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEADER OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TO NEXT LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, it is disappointing that there should be a few gallons of Syncrude thrown among our fisheries questions. We do not often deal with questions about fish, and it certainly spoils the continuity of any attack the opposition can mount upon the government.

May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs who will be leading the delegation Canada is sending to the Law of the Sea Conference? Will it be himself, or officials of his department, or will it be the Minister of the Environment and his officials? Who will be presenting the official Canadian position?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It will be the official Canadian position on this side of the House. I do not know about the other side. We speak with one voice and we will be adequately represented by officials of all the departments concerned. As to which minister will voice the views of a united cabinet, I am not quite certain yet. I am sure the ministers will be able to agree without any difficulty whatever.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In spite of the hon. member's admonition a moment ago suggesting we should continue with the same subject, I think we ought to take other considerations into account. For the moment, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Drummond. I appreciate that the hon. member wishes to ask a supplementary and also the hon. member for Skeena and others.

NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM

DELAY IN APPROVING PROJECTS

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Does he intend to alter the process for the approval of projects submitted under the New Horizons Program in order to enable senior citizens to obtain answers before six months, as it happens from time to time?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, a large number of applications have been submitted for such projects and the consideration of these applications must be very serious and thorough; it requires frequent consultations with the groups which applied. Thus fairly extended delays are unavoidable.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT WHITE PAPER ON CANADIAN POSITION AT NEXT LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE BE REFERRED TO COMMITTEE WHEN TABLED

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): My supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs has to do with the document he proposes to present to the House within a week, I think he said. Would he be prepared, immediately on doing so, to present a motion to refer this document to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry in order that, hopefully, we might have the benefit of the views of all sections of the House with respect to it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): That was the original purpose, as I stated to the House, and that is my intention.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): My question has largely been answered, Mr. Speaker; it had to do with the controversy which seems to rage between the Minister of Fisheries and the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the position to be taken at the Law of the Sea Conference. What we realize is that the Minister of Fisheries is endeavouring to learn the views of the fishermen—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my impression the hon. member said his question had been answered. If he does have a question to ask, I recognize him for that purpose.

Mr. Crouse: My question is this: what opportunity will be presented to the Parliament of Canada and to the Official Opposition to make some input into the proposals which will be advanced by Canada whenever this conference is held?

Mr. Sharp: Let me clarify the position again, as I did during the early part of this session. The government has now completed one round of consultations with the provinces. It now intends to present a paper which will be the subject of discussion in the parliamentary committee before which, of course, people from all parts of the country can appear and make representations. It is our desire not only to represent the views of the cabinet but, I hope, those of all parties in Canada.

AIR CANADA

REQUEST THAT CANADIAN AEROSPACE INDUSTRY BE CONSIDERED IN PURCHASE OF NEW PLANES

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Having regard to Air Canada's announced intention to buy the Lockheed L-1011 in preference to the Douglas DC-10, and the possibility that Air Canada may purchase the Boeing 727 instead of increasing its fleet of Douglas DC-9s by acquiring the new and larger series 50 model, and in view of the harm this could do to the employment situation in the Canadian aerospace industry, will the minister inform the House whether the cabinet has yet given approval to these proposals by Air Canada?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Whatever type of aircraft Air Canada is going to buy we shall see to it there is some economic benefit to Canada.

Mr. Stackhouse: In spite of the minister's assurance, may I ask him to tell the House whether the cabinet is willing to see the aerospace industry in the metropolitan Toronto area deprived of contracts upon which it is dependent?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I do not know who is going to benefit, Toronto or Winnipeg, but I am sure it will be a Canadian city.

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF NEW PRESIDENT—DELAY IN OTTAWA-TORONTO FLIGHT

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very large number of urgent questions facing Air Canada, will the minister nominate a new president very shortly?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I hope very soon, Mr. Speaker. We do not nominate the president, but I hope one will be nominated very soon.

Mr. Nesbitt: In the meanwhile, would the minister look into the reason an Air Canada plane, flight 456, last Monday night, bound for Toronto with a full load of passengers, was kept on the ground for two and a half hours? The reason given was that they could not find a crew to fly it.

POSSIBLE STRIKE BY FLIGHT ATTENDANTS—STATE OF CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Minister of Transport. In light of continued threats of a possible strike by Air Canada flight attendants, can the minister assure the House that a satisfactory contract will be reached in the near future so that thousands of holidaying Canadians will not be forced to cancel their vacation travel plans during the forthcoming winter?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope that a settlement will be reached soon.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EFFECT OF MANAGEMENT POLICIES ON RAILWAY SERVICE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport. On October 18, in response to my question about sending the transport committee to Vancouver to study the myriad problems associated with Canadian National rail service in that area of Canada, the minister replied that he would "call the presidents of CN and CP and ask them what they were doing to correct the situation". Flowing from that, may I ask the minister whether or not he has yet had an opportunity to speak to the presidents of these railroads, and when B.C. can expect improved rail service?

[Mr. Stackhouse.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did meet, not with the chairmen but with the vice-presidents of both railways, and I asked them to do all they could in order to get some cars for British Columbia. I think they are working hard to get lumber cars back from the United States more rapidly than at present. They are supposed to be making a report to me shortly, so I will know if what they are doing is really efficient.

Mr. Rose: I am pleased with the minister's response, but I would remind him that there are more problems in the west than boxcars. In view of the fact that track and section forces in the CN northern region have only 55 men currently employed in maintaining 715 miles of track instead of the normal 150 men employed on this maintenance, does the minister intend to look into the matter to ensure the safety of the public, especially with winter fast approaching?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I will look into that aspect as well, Mr. Speaker.

PROVISION OF BOXCARS AT SHIPPING POINTS IN WESTERN CANADA—ALLOCATION IN ACCORDANCE WITH PRIORITIES ESTABLISHED

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Having regard to the fact that the Minister of Transport indicated in the House last week, after meeting with officials of both railways, that the railways would undertake to provide sufficient boxcars for movement of grain, may I ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board what steps he or his officials are taking to ensure that boxcars will be provided at those points in western Canada which have not yet received a boxcar since the conclusion of the strike?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, various meetings with the railways resulted in the allocation of additional numbers of cars, particularly in the case of the CNR, for movement of grain. Those cars will be placed by the Canadian Wheat Board, operating through the block shipment system, in the most effective way in order to move the grain as required and as quickly as required.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vegreville on a supplementary, then the Leader of the Opposition and then the hon. member for Rimouski.

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the fact that a number of delivery points have not received a single boxcar since the conclusion of the railway strike, has the minister done an analysis of this problem and has he established priorities for the allocation of boxcars to these points?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I did bring to the attention of the Canadian Wheat Board the suggestion I had received from a number of places that there was an imbalance in the way the cars were being spotted. They are giving serious consideration to that matter, but prior consideration has to be given to making the very best use of equipment at this particular point in time, and the equity for all that will come through equal delivery opportunities will be a matter for adjustment later.

PROPOSED SHIPMENT OF ALASKAN OIL THROUGH STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and relates to the shipment of Alaskan oil through the Strait of Juan de Fuca, which some months ago the minister promised us he had only begun to fight. Some of us might feel that we want our money back, since there does not seem to have been any fight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the minister where the matter stands at the moment, and specifically what measures he is now taking to prevent what he undertook to fight against?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, discussions are going on and have, of course, been going on more or less regularly between officials of the two governments and between the various departments concerned. This, as I told an hon. memebr who asked me the question the other day, is one of the first items on my agenda in my talks with Secretary of State Dr. Kissinger when he arrives here. So I can assure the hon. member that we still have a few things in reserve and that he should keep his bets on me.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, before making any decision with regard to bets, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate the respective reaches and weights of himself and the Secretary of State?

PROPOSED RETURN TO DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME TO REDUCE CONSUMPTION OF ENERGY

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Following the motion I moved a few minutes ago under Standing Order 43, when I heard a few shy nays, would the minister inform the House whether he is considering the possibility of reinstating Daylight Saving Time because of the shortage of energy at the present time, in order to save electricity and fuels?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we did consider the possibility of extending Daylight Saving Time as a means of saving energy. It has been confirmed that such a measure may be taken, in particular for heating oil; there is also the possibility of creating a shortage of this product and, for this reason, I did not suggest such a change to my colleagues.

SUGGESTED TURNING OFF OF LIGHTS IN GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister, as head of the government, consider launching a full program of economy of energy products this winter which would bring about energy savings on a voluntary basis without any rationing? If we could get ministers and also civil servants to turn out lights in their departments, we could in various ways in Ottawa save considerable amounts of energy.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the consumer side as well as the production side of the energy problem is being considered by the government very seriously.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER MEET KITSILANO COMMITTEE RESPECTING PROPOSED HIGH-RISE RESIDENCE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation failed to meet with the West Broadway Citizens' committee representing 19 Kitsilano organizations located in the minister's own riding to discuss the adverse effects of a proposed 13-storey high-rise residence to be built in a family oriented neighbourhood, will the minister give serious consideration to meeting with this group and will he examine the possibility of making this project compatible with the neighbourhood?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that is more a representation than a question. The hon. member must assume that his representation has been noted. If there is urgency, it can be considered at the time of adjournment.

COMMITMENT OF AIRCRAFT TO MIDDLE EAST LOGISTICS FORCE—ASSURANCE THAT CANADIAN TRANSPORT AND RESCUE OPERATIONS NOT ADVERSELY AFFECTED

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Last night the minister announced that the Canadian logistics force for the Middle East will be equipped with three Buffalo aircraft and three helicopters. As this exactly represents the equipment entitlement of a transport and rescue squadron, would the minister assure the House and the people on both coasts that the equipment will not be withdrawn from the already meagre resources of the transport and rescue squadrons?

● (1510)

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have already given the assurance in another announcement that the use of equipment for the Middle East will not affect our search and rescue capability.

ENERGY

GREATER CONSUMPTION OF FUEL BY AUTOMOBILES EQUIPPED WITH EMISSION CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON REDUCING STANDARDS IN 1975

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the mounting energy crisis, and the fact that automotive emission standards will result in the use of a great deal more gasoline and oil—the standards are to come into effect in 1975—is the minister considering a reduction in the automotive emission standards to come into force in that year and, if not, why not?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, our Canadian automobile emission standards have been announced for 1975. They are not as stringent as those in the United States. Our information is that Canadian regulations as far as fuel used in automobiles is concerned, are not as demanding as those in the United States and will not require more fuel than in the recent past.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They will still use 20 per cent more.

Mr. Morgan: They will still use more fuel than has been used in the past.

[Later:]

Mr. Morgan: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. When the automotive emission standards come into effect in 1975, what is the increased consumption of alcohol, on a percentage basis, that will result from these standards?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You mean gasoline.

Mr. Morgan: Yes, gasoline; I am sorry.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the technical advice we have had from automobile manufacturers is that the fuel consumption per mile will be roughly the same as in 1973.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON TEMPORARY IMPORT SURCHARGE

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is a very direct one for the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to present beef prices. I should like to ask the minister whether he has recommended a temporary surcharge to his cabinet colleagues.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have made several recommendations to my colleagues.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY WHETHER REPORT ON RIOT WILL BE TABLED IN HOUSE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General, who I believe indicated yesterday in the House he was awaiting a report from personnel on his staff in respect of the B.C. penitentiary. I should like to ask whether this report will be tabled in the House, and when the Solicitor General expects to receive it.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to an inquiry to be made by the correctional investigator, the ombudsman who, by the way, is not on my staff; she holds an independent status under the Inquiries Act. I am awaiting her report. I know that her terms of reference provide for reports to be made from time to time to the House. I will check to see what the nature of this one is before I reply further to the question.

CONSTRUCTION OF INSTITUTION AT MISSION, B.C. TO RELIEVE OVERCROWDING

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, will the Solicitor General advise the House what progress he is making with regard to the Mission site as an answer to the overcrowding that is continuing to exacerbate the situation in the B.C. penitentiary?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we are going to go ahead with construction at Mission, British Columbia. We are setting up temporary working quarters there, and the construction of the penitentiary will be carried on by both professional tradesmen and some inmates.

TRADE

SALE OF SASKATCHEWAN POTASH TO CHINA—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO OBTAIN FURTHER AGREEMENTS

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and relates to the recent announcement of the sale of $8 million worth of Saskatchewan potash. In view of the announcement coming so soon after the Prime Minister's visit to the purchaser, in this instance the People's Republic of China, and in view of the evident good relations between Canada and that country, will the minister indicate what measures are being taken to enlarge present trade in that particular product with China?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I should refer this question to the Prime Minister as he was the man who negotiated with the Chinese.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: The House may recall that the Prime Minister announced that a permanent consultative mechanism would be set up with officials from both sides, Canada and China, to consider long-range supply questions. One of the particular items that Canada put on the agenda was long-term supply arrangements in respect of potash. I welcome, as I know all members of the House must welcome, this first sale which is an indication of this profitable arrangement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SITUATION OF INMATES AFTER QUELLING OF RIOT

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of his statement in the House that he has transferred over 100 inmates from the B.C. penitentiary, can he now tell us whether that prison is back to normal, or are the prisoners still locked up in their cells on a 24-hour basis?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the most recent report I have is that the penitentiary is partly back to normal but not completely. In other words, they are trying to restore the penitentiary to normal operation on a gradual basis.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. The Chair had hoped to recognize the hon. member for Hillsborough and the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway before calling orders of the day. I will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary, then the hon. member for Hillsborough and then the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether the inmates have been given the opportunity to go back on a normal basis, or is the prison supervisory staff deciding which areas should be opened up?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I know that instructions were given from Ottawa to the penitentiary officers in British Columbia to make an effort to return, as soon as possible, to general conditions all those who had nothing to do with the disruption. I know that the first steps were taken in respect of those instructions, and I saw that order which was issued from Ottawa.

MIDDLE EAST—INQUIRY AS TO GENERAL BURNS SERVING ON UN PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in reference to the UN Mideast peacekeeping force. Will he advise whether there has been any request for the services of the highly qualified and uniquely experienced General E.L.M. Burns in an advisory or other capacity, and has he ascertained whether this distinguished public and military servant might be made available to the UN at this crucial time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question, to my knowledge we have not received such a request. This is an interesting suggestion and I will certainly see that it is brought to the attention of the Secretary General who may find it quite useful.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN WORLD POPULATION YEAR

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last May I asked whether he would make a statement on Canada's preparations for World Population Year, 1974, under the United Nations, at which time he said he did not know when he could make a statement but thought it would be closer to 1974. Now that we are a lot closer to 1974, I ask whether the minister can make a statement, perhaps next week or very shortly, on Canada's preparations for World Population Year.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to do that. We are now closer to 1974, and closer to the statement that I hope I will be able to make in the next two or three weeks.

CANADA PENSION PLAN (No. 2)

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ANNUAL INCREASES AND LEVEL OF INCOME ON WHICH CONTRIBUTIONS WILL BE PAID

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-224, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose). May we have order, please. I think it is elementary and hon. members should know they should not hold conferences standing or sitting in the chamber. The hon. member has been recognized and he has the floor. If hon. members want to have talks or discussions, they should have them behind the curtain or in the lobbies. That is what those places are for.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. My words may not be of a great deal of interest to people who have other matters to discuss. However, the minister to whom we address our remarks, through you, Sir, might have more than a passing interest in some of the comments which will be made, not only at the moment but by members who will follow me in the debate on second reading of Bill C-224. At ten o'clock last evening I was approximately two-thirds of the way through the remarks I wished to make on this bill. There were certain suggestions I wanted to make.

I shall quickly summarize my three suggestions and then return to the second one. The first suggestion is that we should broaden the base of the Canada Pension Plan so that larger benefits would accrue to the contributors. I object to the fact that the Canada Pension Plan is considered only as a supplementary pension plan.

The second point is that I think we should be making provision for voluntary earlier retirement. Many individuals in this country would like to retire and perhaps would like to search for a new career. They are precluded from doing so because of the fact that we seem to be locked into the concept that someone must begin work at age 20 and continue with his nose to the grindstone until age 65. I see no reason, in this day and age, why this should be necessary.

We should also consider the fact that there are many people in our society who spend a good deal of their lives unemployed. I think it might be possible to accomplish the two ends, if not simultaneously at least in a reasonable way, through satisfying the need for employment among the young and providing for relief, if you like, for those people who no longer wish to be part of the work force but are prevented from retiring for no reason other than their commitments and responsibilities and the financial slashing one takes when one goes on pension in this country. I think that really applies to the first point. I was referring to those people who might wish to retire at an earlier date.

[Mr. Sharp.]

It has been reported to me, I think fairly reliably, that in West Germany the railway workers have a contributory plan which allows them, after 25 years, regardless of the age at which they started employment, to retire with a 75 per cent pension. In contrast, in this country the United Automobile Workers have a formula that is called "30 and out," which means that after a railway worker has worked on the assembly line, or in some other dehumanizing occupation, for 30 years and has paid into a contributory plan which would have subsequent benefits, he could retire and begin another career or just go fishing. I understand, however, that in order for that plan to be in effect it must be registered in Ottawa.

I am told that under the present regulations—perhaps the minister will correct me if I am wrong—any retirement plan in Canada, in contrast to the United States, which calls for retirement under age 55 is not eligible for registration in Canada. I think that is an archaic type of regulation if it in fact does exist. I am sure the minister knows that, just as regulations can be implemented, they can also be changed. It is the case that workers have contributed their own money to the kind of plan that would allow this kind of relief from the treadmill at age 55, then certainly no impediment should be placed in their way. I suggest that each year we should try to bring down, in respect of the Canada Pension Plan, the retirement age for those who wish to retire earlier. Those who do not wish to do so could continue working.

In North America we have long been caught up in what is called the work ethic for some people, although I do not believe for most Canadians. There may be a number who may not wish to retire. Some people are as young as ever at age 65, in terms of outlook and sometimes in terms of physical capacity. Other people are burnt-out at age 30. I give no specific example and I do not look at anyone, certainly at none of my colleagues. I think those who wish to draw a pension after an early retirement should have that right. If the base were broadened, and if the contributions people make were increased from 1.8 per cent to 2 per cent or 3 per cent, this would allow flexibility in respect of the Canada Pension Plan so that early retirement would be possible for people who wish it.

Some people might like to quit their jobs and work at another occupation. So far as I am concerned, they should be free to do so if they wish. Perhaps they would like to start some kind of business which would provide employment. We have a great habit in this country, through DREE, ARDA, IRDIA and other such programs, to give bountiful gifts to companies so that more people might be employed. The fact is, however, that small business employs far more people than large business and industry. So far as I am concerned, people who wish to retire early in order to start a new business that would employ people should be given the opportunity to do so. In that way some of the largesse we give to IBM, General Motors and DuPont of Canada might be used to provide the capital necessary to start businesses which would provide the employment that is necessary in this country.

I feel there is no real rationale, except tradition, which demands that a young man should start work at 18 or 20 years of age and continue until age 65. I believe everything is reversed. We send our kids off at age 21, through OFY and LIP, and keep the old man working until age 65. We already have a provision for early retirement. We have early retirement for members of parliament after six years. Some of us, of course, do our best to avoid this enforced retirement; nevertheless, it happens to the best of us as well as to the worst of us. Why is it not possible for us to do for others before age 65 what we do for ourselves after six years? Early retirement is a concept that I think will grow in Canada. I believe the demand for it will grow, and I think that in terms of the kind of society toward which we are moving it is most vital and necessary.

My third point has to do with the desirability of treating men and women equally, or treating spouses equally, under the Canada Pension Plan, regardless of their sex. This certainly applies to the survivors. This question was dealt with in fair depth by the muscular hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He suggested that perhaps we could combine the income of both the husband and the wife and, as we do in the case of income tax, have them file a joint return or a separate one. Perhaps I am going beyond what the hon. member suggested, but the point is that we should pay them both the same pension whether or not the wife or the husband happened to be the one who was contributing to CPP.

I think many people would agree that all sexism in the plan's structure should be eliminated. If we look, for example, at the plan we find that presently it provides for disabled widower's pension but there is no provision for a normal widower's pension. Conversely, the plan provides for a normal widow's pension in contrast to the widower's pension, and perhaps that is something that should be improved.

Another aspect of this matter concerns the disability provision. In the provision regarding a person's eligibility for disability pension, if I remember it correctly, the phrase "severe and prolonged illness" is used. From this I understand that for a person to be eligible for disability benefit he would have to demonstrate that he had been disabled for, say, two or more years, or one or two years, and then perhaps he would be able to go back into the labour force; but in practice, when a person applies for this benefit "severe and prolonged illness" means to the Department of National Health and Welfare that the person will never work again.

Someone from behind the curtain suggests—I hope this is not autobiographical—that one would have to be almost dead in order to qualify for the disability benefit. I think that is wrong. There are frequent cases, which I am sure have come to the attention of hon. members, of a man receiving disability benefits under the CPP at the age of 60 and his wife being severely limited in terms of her economic responsibilities. There may also be dependent children. In such a case the wife has no option but to go on welfare because of the parsimonious benefits under CPP.

This is also true of those people who are on old age security and CPP, the spouses of pensioners. The pensioner may be over 65 years of age and the spouse anywhere from 10 to 15 years younger. I do not think we should be so severe in our judgment of what is a disability, nor do I think that the fact a person receives disability benefits because of a severe or prolonged illness should imply that he will be on it for the rest of his life. He might be on it for two or three years and then go back to the labour force, perhaps to perform a less onerous task than before. However, that is not the way it has been in practice. This provision is administered far too severely, it seems to me.

Another point dealing with disability which applies particularly in one province, namely, British Columbia, is with regard to a new social security scheme known as the mincome program. Any person between the ages of 18 and 65 receiving a federal disability pension is entitled to the mincome pension. If he has no other income, the maximum benefit is $209.02 per month. We have been in the position of saying to someone who is disabled and is also severely handicapped economically in addition to physically, "If we can only get you that disability pension, you will qualify for mincome and that will take you up to $209". But because of the difficulty of obtaining a disability pension in the first place, the option of receiving income is open to far fewer people. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) discussed this matter in detail and I will not go into it any further. I will only say that I certainly think it is within the easy competence of the minister to have that sort of provision changed.

I shall conclude by saying that in my view the Canada Pension Plan should no longer be considered just a supplementary plan. I think that is basically wrong. I am also not convinced that anything we do to improve the CPP will have the effect of improving the mixed private and public pension plans in the country and thus benefiting the workers rather than the companies. I say this because if we increase the benefits under CPP, because of the integrated rather than the stacked provisions of most company pension plans operating in Canada, as CPP benefits become that much more, the company's responsibilities become that much less. I think that is a discouraging feature and only points out how deeply we are mired in a multiplicity of competing private and public plans. I do not think they necessarily support one another; in fact I think they compete with one another.

I suggest that the Canada Pension Plan could be used for a tripartite purpose, namely, as a pension plan, a guaranteed annual income and perhaps as an instrument of national economic policy, by using a selective investment policy. It is well known, of course, that the funds which emanate from a particular province can be, under certain conditions, lent back to that province for investment purposes. I will not go into the details of that procedure because it will not add anything to my remarks.

The premise upon which this idea of a tripartite purpose is based is a relatively simple one. I think the orange paper on social security put out by the minister anticipates a consolidation or rationalization of some of these social security provisons. I am referring to the Canada Pension Plan, the old age security plan, the guaranteed income supplement and perhaps even the Canada Assistance Plan. These programs should be rationalized and consolidated into one comprehensive package which you might want to call a social security program or an insurance program. What it is called is not important.

I think another corollary is that with the guaranteed annual income and the comprehensive program which will provide for a disability income as well as survivors' benefits, perhaps there is no longer such a great need, if there ever was, for the private insurance industry. If we could achieve some form of public ownership of the private insurance industry, plus some of its liquid assets, with or without compensation—I think insurance companies have been well compensated for their efforts over the years—we could develop a rather important social and economic instrument in this country which would bring benefits to everybody except, perhaps, private insurance companies.

● (1540)

I would like to close by congratulating the minister on his progress. Some significantly progressive steps have been taken in the legislation he has presented. Naturally, the usual comments by opposition speakers on a government bill that goes part way to meeting their desires can be summed up in the phrases, "What took you so long?" and, "Why didn't you go further?" I congratulate the minister on his courage. He told me that he never really thinks about a pension plan for himself. Maybe he feels he will live forever, or perhaps he has independent means to take care of his own security. But I would like to remind him that, progressive as he is, the people all across Canada are away ahead of him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am informed that there have been consultations between representatives of the parties and that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) might be recognized at this point ahead of the hon. member who might otherwise be recognized by the Chair. On this understanding, the hon. member for Winnipeg North is recognized.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their courtesy, since I have a speaking engagement to fulfil elsewhere. I begin by congratulating the minister on the improvements to the Canada Pension Plan which this bill will permit. We in this party approve of the removal of the maximum annual increase of 2 per cent which was a provision in the Canada Pension Plan Act when it was first adopted. We opposed that provision at the time. We believe that the proposal in this bill, to allow benefits to increase annually by an amount that will take into account the full increase in the cost of living, is a substantial improvement.

We also support the provision which increases the level of income on which pension contributions are calculated and on which basis pensions will be paid. I am happy that those who now receive Canada Pension Plan benefits will have their monthly payments increased by between 8 per cent and 20 per cent. This is long overdue in view of the sharp increases in the cost of living during the past few years.

However, I suggest to the minister that what he has done does not go far enough. This bill proposes that we accept the idea that the present payments made to Canada Pension Plan beneficiaries are fair and are in fact a permanent feature of the plan. If we say that the benefits received by people will increase only by an amount equal to the actual increase in the cost of living, then we tie their benefits to the present scale. I suggest that we ought to increase the benefits annually, not by the increase in the consumer price index but by the increase in the actual growth of the gross national product, adjusted of course to take into account the increase caused by inflation. Today I do not have the time to put the figures on the record, but I suggest that if this were done, over a period of time benefits would be substantially more than is the case simply by providing an increase to meet the rising cost of living.

When we discuss the effects of the Canada Pension Plan we must look not just at the Canada Pension Plan itself but at the total package which is available for people who retire. That includes what they get under the old age pension legislation, from the Canada Pension Plan and also from the private pension plans to which they contributed while they worked. We then realize that when we passed the Canada Pension Benefits Standards Act some years ago, which put certain floors under the provisions of the private pension plans, we did not go far enough.

Let me deal briefly with some of the difficulties which we still have. I am not unhappy that we have federal legislation for people who work in industries which come under the jurisdiction of the federal government and that we have similar legislation in four provinces. I am sorry that the other six provinces, including my own province of Manitoba, have not yet passed similar or better legislation. But there is much lacking in the legislation that we passed. What are the defects in private pension plans which still contribute substantially to the well-being of most Canadian citizens when they retire? First of all, private plans are in the main devoid of portability. We are living in an age in which people experience a great deal of mobility. People change jobs voluntarily, people quit because they are sick, people are laid off because of reductions in the working staff, because of automation, and so on—and when they do, even under the best plans they suffer a great deal.

Until the passage of the Canada Pension Benefits Standards Act, under the CPR pension plan the rule was that if a person had not worked 30 years for the company, was not 55 years of age and had left voluntarily, for instance if he were sick, then all he got from the CPR was the exact amount he had paid into its pension plan. He did not get a penny of the interest which his contributions had earned, and he did not get a cent of the money which the CPR should have been putting into the pension plan on his behalf as its share of the contributions.

That is the kind of thing which is wrong with many pension plans. At age 35, 40 or 45, when a worker gets a lump sum repayment of money which he has contributed to a pension plan, he may find it advisable to use it as a down payment on a house, or to buy a car or something else. But the story is different at age 65 when it is time for a worker to retire. I suggest we must introduce legislation to provide for portability. Some companies have begun to do something about this question. The CNR has made an arrangement with the government so that a railway employee can take his pension credits with him if he leaves the CNR and goes to work for the federal government.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, we have the Pension Benefits Standards Act which has since 1967 required both employer and employee contributions to be invested after ten years of service of an employee provided he is 45 years of age. I suggest that the ten-year period should be eliminated or reduced, say, to two years and the age provision should be completely eliminated.

Another defect of most private pension plans is that they pay an employee a fixed amount upon retirement. In some cases they pay 60 per cent of salary, calculated on the best five years. That may be pretty good for a worker who retires in 1973. But where the cost of living increases by 4 per cent or 5 per cent every year, as it has in recent years, a worker who can manage quite well on his pension this year if he retires at age 65 may find that at age 75 his income has been reduced by between 40 per cent and 50 per cent. I suggest that private pension plans should be changed to have built into them the same principles that are now being built into the Canada Pension Plan, that is, they should be increased by at least the increase in the cost of living.

Another defect in most private pension plans is that, while an employee is required to contribute a certain percentage of his wage or salary, say 5 per cent or 6 per cent, 6½ per cent in the case of railway workers, the same is not required of the company. The amount the company pays varies from year to year and from employee to employee, and simply guarantees that the employee will receive a certain amount. I think employers should be required to match the contribution made by employees. Take the railways as an example. The CNR employees pay 6 per cent of their wages as their contribution, and the CPR employees pay 6½ per cent. But the CNR itself pays only 1.75 per cent, and the CPR pays 2¼ per cent as its contribution. That kind of advantage to the companies should not be condoned or excused.

I suggest that the Canada Pension Plan Act should be amended to require the provinces to enact legislation to incorporate escalator clauses in private pension plans. The federal government should be asked to put such a requirement into the Pension Benefits Standards Act. If that were done, then the package that people retiring would receive in the form of old age pension, benefits from the Canada Pension Plan to which they have contributed, and the pension plan established by their private employer would guarantee that they could live at a decent standard, given all the suggestions I have put forward.

It seems to me rather obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the integration of private pension plans with the Canada Pension Plan which has taken place in many cases has had a perverse effect upon private plans, an effect which nobody could foresee; or if they did, they did not speak about it. The Canada Pension Plan and the kind of improvements we are proposing in this bill are based upon a plan which is not funded. This means that the increased benefits are provided through the transfer of funds from the public sector to those who will benefit. Many groups of people are not covered by this plan; for example, housewives, people on welfare who do not work, and people who are unskilled and earn small wages. The benefits under the provisions of this plan are based upon the contributions made, and people such as those I have mentioned either receive no benefits at all or benefits at the lowest end of the scale. The chief beneficiaries are those in the top earnings bracket who pay the maximum amount allowable and, when they retire, will receive the maximum amount permitted under the Canada Pension Plan Act. That is another illustration of giving to those who already have.

Another matter which I think should be looked at, not necessarily today but in the near future, is the integration of the Canada Pension Plan with private pension plans which has taken place. A very good illustration of that is the pension payable to railway workers. This has resulted in the transfer of a large number of benefits to private companies. When we increase the Canada Pension Plan, in many cases we reduce the liability of the private company.

A very large number of private pension plans are set up in such a way that when the employee retires he receives a total pension package. In other words, to the extent that the Canada Pension Plan benefits are increased, the obligation of the private pension plan toward his pension is reduced. In those circumstances, since the worker's contribution is set as a certain percentage of his wage or salary, and since that is deducted every pay day, when the employee retires and you begin to calculate what the company has to put in in order to meet their obligation to his pension, you find the amount they have to contribute is much less than it was before the Canada Pension Plan came into effect. To that extent there is obviously a transfer of the burden from the private company—the railway is one of the best illustrations—to the public.

It seems to me we should be looking at the legislation we have or which we ought to provide in order to regulate and set higher standards for private pension plans so that the benefits they pay will be commensurate with their obligation. I know this kind of thinking will be anathema to the private insurance companies. I do not say this because I think they are inherently bad. Insurance companies are in business to make profits, as other companies are. They want to sell more retirement pension plans to more and more employers and employees. I suggest that just as we found in the field of hospital and medical insurance that the state can do a better job than the private sector of the economy, so we shall find—as we are indeed finding—that the federal and provincial governments can do a better job in the field of pensions than can the private sector of the economy.

● (1600)

While commending the minister for the changes he has brought before the House, I urge him to give serious consideration, along with his provincial counterparts, to the introduction of other legislation which equally with the Canada Pension Plan is necessary if we are to regulate and control private pension plans which play such an important part in the well-being of millions of retired citizens.

Mr. G. A. Percy Smith (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate and to join other hon. members in expressing support for Bill C-224. I notice that the lead-off speakers for the opposition parties, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), the hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), all expressed their support for Bill C-224.

I follow the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) in speaking on the bill. I regret that I did not hear part of his speech, but near the end of his remarks he appeared to object to the fact that the Canada Pension Plan does not provide an adequate retirement pension for everyone. He mentioned the poor, the working poor, the unemployed, and so on. I suggest that the Canada Pension Plan is not intended at this time to provide an adequate pension for everyone. It is simply a social insurance plan to which people contribute. Its purpose is to provide a measure of retirement security for the working people of this country.

The speaker who preceded the hon. member for Winnipeg North, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), made an informative and interesting speech on this subject. It was as well, a witty speech, as his speeches sometimes are. In his remarks, with which I did not entirely agree, he took exception to the fact that the plan is a supplementary plan and is not in itself enough to provide for the retirement income security that most Canadians require. That may be quite true at present. The whole point of the amendments included in Bill C-224 is that this particular situation is to be remedied. What the bill provides for is this: when the plan reaches its full potential under the original legislation, the benefits paid, plus the increases provided in the present amendments, will be such that by the end of this decade a workman could receive a pension of $250 a month. The approximately $90 provided at present is clearly inadequate.

It is thought that the pension payable by the end of the decade, which is to be added to the ordinary old age security pension, should be a substantial factor in providing retirement income security. In many cases that income will be sufficient. Even if we ignore further escalations, what will be the result? Take, for example, a couple receiving $210 in old age pension, or $105 each. If you add the $250 that will be available, their total income will be $460 a month, or about $5,500 per year. We must agree that this would be a very substantial income. In some cases it would be enough, as at that time of life many of the expenses of the couple would be lower, their children having been educated and their general expenses having decreased as they grew older.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West objected to the word "supplementary" being asked in connection with the Canada Pension Plan. Apparently his objection arises from the fact that this word appears in the first line of the initial legislation; there was reference there to "supplementary income." The act as first passed was to provide an income that would be supplementary to the old age pension. I point out, however, that it does not refer to any supplementary pension.

There is another aspect of the speech of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West with which I do not totally agree. He contends that the kind of plan we are talking about is not clear. If I remember correctly, he said it is unclear whether this is a welfare plan, a social insurance plan or something in between. I say that all this will become extremely clear if one reads the words of the original Canada Pension Plan Act of 1964-65. It is strictly a social insurance plan. It is, and must be, financed totally by contributions and no charge whatever is to be made against the consolidated revenue fund of the country. This includes the administration of the plan, the clerical help and everything else. It is financed, as we know, by contributions from employees which are matched by contributions of employers, as well as by contributions from certain self-employed people.

As well, the funds earn interest; they are invested when not required immediately for the payment of benefits. The provinces profit from the availability of these funds. By law they are lent to the provinces. The proportion which contributions from an included province bear to the total fund determines the size of the loans made from the fund. This was pointed out clearly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who on a point of order raised objections to the legislation. What he meant, of course, was that there are no public funds, or funds out of consolidated revenue used in connection with benefits paid under the plan.

I also notice that there appears to be some confusion about the nature of the plan. Several of the speakers I heard did not clearly distinguish it from some of the other plans in effect in Canada, income-support plans such as family allowances, old age pensioor, supplementary allowances, and so on. In recent weeks and months we have passed legislation to enable the escalation of benefits under such plans. I think it is even more important that we do so now in connection with a social insurance plan such as we are presently considering.

A number of speakers have advocated the lowering of the age at which pensions should be payable. Various increases in the rate of pension have also been proposed. However, we must remember that if we were to carry out these proposals the whole concept of the plan would need to be changed. At least, the amount of the contributions would have to be greatly increased. These questions would then arise: How much should we, as a parliament, order a workman to pay into a savings plan? How much should we be prepared to legislate that employers or self-employed people must pay into such a plan?

The legislation prescribes that under penalty of fine or imprisonment employees must contribute a certain proportion of their salaries. Similarly, we order employers to contribute a like amount. So when we talk about lowering the age at which pensions are payable, we are bound to take these other factors into consideration. The money which some 500,000 people presently receive is derived from funds which were paid in under certain conditions, and those who benefit are entitled to benefit. If the age of eligibility were lowered and a flood of new recipients came in to collect benefits under the plan, there would be no solution except to decrease the amount of benefit payable, that is, if we are to follow faithfully the original legislation which clearly states that benefits must be related to contributions.

The plan holds in trust the money paid by contributors, and we cannot change the rules to the disadvantage of those who have already made contributions on the basis of certain understandings. This is why the original legislation made it quite difficult for changes to be made in the plan. I am not for a moment suggesting that the change contemplated in the bill before us is such a change that the draftsmen had in mind. I raise this point because on the front page of a daily newspaper which I read yesterday was an article suggesting that a serious question existed as to the legality of the bill now before us. The article was supplied by the Financial Times news service. Underlying this concern is a certain section of the legislation which was passed in 1964 or 1965—section 115(2) of the Canada Pension Plan Act. This provides:

> Where any enactment of the Parliament of Canada passed after the coming into force of this act contains any provision which alters, or the effect of which is to alter, either directly or indirectly, and either immediately or in the future, the general level of benefits provided by this act or the rates of contributions provided for by this act, it shall be deemed to be a term of such enactment, whether or not it is expressly stated therein, that such provision shall come into force only on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, which day shall not in any case be earlier than the first day of the third year following the year in which any notice of intention to introduce a measure containing a provision to such effect was laid before parliament.

So the argument is that any change in the original act could not be effective for two years and a day from the date it was introduced in parliament. However, it is a well-established principle that parliament can pass any law it chooses, no matter what an earlier parliament may have said or done. The government must be free to respond to changing situations. After all, the original legislation was passed seven or eight years ago, and at this point I feel there is an urgent need to respond to price increases caused by inflation.

The other subsection of section 115 of the original act requires that two-thirds of the population of the included provinces should consent. This provision has been met or it will shortly be met, as is clear from the communiqué which was issued at the conclusion of the conference of welfare ministers held in October of this year. It is clear from this communiqué, dated October 11, that all the provinces have expressed agreement with this change we are asked to make. Had it been otherwise, I might have agreed there was some question about the legality of the amendment which is presently before us.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I feel sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, with his knowledge of the rules, would have raised this matter on a point of order if there were any grounds for his doing so. I do not claim to be an expert on the construction or interpretation of statutes; however, I do know that in trying to interpret them to find the real meaning of the legislation we must look at the intent of the legislation.

● (1620)

We might ask why the section requiring, in effect, two years, notice of any substantial change in the plan was placed in the original act. I think it was put there to prevent any government from recommending hasty or ill-considered changes. Perhaps on the eve of an election some future government might have attempted to increase benefits without making provision for a corresponding increase in contributions, or something of that kind. However, it is clear to me that the intent of the initial legislation was not that a change such as we are proposing in Bill C-224 would be prohibited.

Clause 8 of the bill now before the House provides as follows:

> Subsection 115(2) of the Canada Pension Plan does not apply in respect of the amendments to that act contained in this act.

In other words, in passing this bill we are saying that subsection 115(2) of the original act does not apply. Hon. members will note there is no provision in the bill that subsection (4) of section 115 does not apply; that is, the provision requiring the agreement of all the provinces.

I feel the minister is to be congratulated for bringing forward this bill and for his success in obtaining the agreement of the provinces. The similarity between the proposals contained in the working paper on social security in regard to the Canada Pension Plan published in April of this year and the communiqué to which I made reference earlier is very striking indeed, and I think is a tribute to the tact, diplomacy and indeed perhaps the persuasiveness of the minister in his dealings with the provinces.

One of the main objectives has been to bring the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan into parallelism with each other in regard to contributions, particularly in regard to the income on which contributions are based; the two figures had diverged somewhat. In obtaining agreement on this matter I believe the minister did a real service so far as mobility of the work force and portability of pensions are concerned, as well as for national unity itself.

I feel sure there is no legal objection to the passing of this legislation and I urge its speedy passage through the House. I should like to make one other point before sitting down. It, too, arises from the communiqué issued by the welfare ministers. Part of the communiqué reads as follows:

> It was also agreed where the Canada Pension Plan operates that, effective in 1974, retirement pensions will become payable at age 65 to any person who has ceased to contribute to the plan, regardless of his or her earnings. Thus the earnings test which has been applied to people between 65 and 69 will be eliminated. The government of Quebec has already liberalized the earnings test under the Quebec Pension Plan.

The minister indicated that he has further amendments in mind. I urge him to include an amendment to incorporate the agreement that I have just read. However, I believe the minister has indicated that further amendments should have a little more time so they are fully discussed both by the public and by this House, and that he is introducing only those that are contained in Bill C-224. Since they are to be effective at the beginning of 1974, they are therefore urgent.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the changes proposed in Bill C-224 are going to cause or have caused any violent arguments on the part of anybody in this chamber. When we are dealing with such a sensitive question as pensions, a subject we are all sensitive to both politically and personally, perhaps we do not always scrutinize or discuss all of the issues. In addition to that, in this particular case we are faced with the fact that the consent of the provinces to these changes has been secured, since this is a measure requiring the consent of the provinces. Even the effort and time involved in getting together with the various provincial governments is something that cannot be taken lightly. I feel it makes discussion of the bill, you might say, somewhat academic.

However, I should like to raise a few points regarding the workings of the Canada Pension Plan. There are those who suggest that the CPP should be used to replace the old age security and guaranteed income supplement plans for the elderly. In my opinion, the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement should be the means by which the state guarantees to its citizens a basic pension when they reach retirement age.

There are those who say that the Canada Pension Plan should override old age security and that eventually old age security ahould be phased out in favour of the CPP. In my estimation it is important that the Canada Pension Plan remain a pension plan for those who, either by working as an employee or by being self-employed, make contributions to the plan and thus qualify for a pension when they retire. For this reason I think amendments to the plan that seek to override the plan have to be seriously considered to ensure they are actuarially sound.

There are those who say that the Canada Pension Plan is not really a pension plan in the accepted sense of a private plan or one's own plan, but merely a transfer of income from those who are working to those who have retired. This is perhaps true of any large scheme whereby massive sums of money are raised by way of levy on employers, employees and people who are self-employed and the money transferred to those who have retired. Others would go farther and suggest that the Canada Pension Plan is largely a tax levied on those who are producing and earning, the revenue from which is given to those who have reached retirement.

I think it is wise in any discussion of the type of Canada Pension Plan we would like as a nation to consider the impact of a compulsory-type saving such as this in relation to the level of voluntary saving, or the general desirability of private plans such as employees' pensions, annuities, and so on. Personal savings are usually directed toward specific goals. In my experience as a physician, some 20 years ago people thought seriously about the problems they would face when they became old, particularly if they were ill. Today people do not worry so much about having enough money to live on. Years ago people wanted to make sure they would be able to pay their hospital, physician and other bills associated with illness when they became incapacitated, in order that they would not be a burden on their children, which very often was the case.

In a relatively few years we have taken care of these expenses in that hospital bills are paid for universally, medicare is universal and in most provinces, at least in my own, the cost of drugs is looked after. There is practically no one past the age of 65 who has any difficulty getting drugs. We also have nursing home care and assistance in respect of a wide range of services, including assistance in providing shelter cost for those in low income groups. In that relatively short time much of the basis for the fear on the part of the pensioner has disappeared.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

With the level of old age security and guaranteed income supplements, it seems that personal savings are no longer as attractive to many people. Many who took out life insurance policies 25 years ago with the idea of saving now realize they might as well have taken a trip with the money at the time, particularly in view of the dollar devaluation as a result of our inflationary trend. This is one area we must consider in respect of the Canada Pension Plan as it relates to voluntary savings.

Very shortly we will be considering the foreign investment bill and the government's screening process for foreign investment. I think we should all realize that, in a practical way, what people in Canada save and invest will ultimately determine how effective will be Canadian control of our own resources. A very rapid inflation rate means, for most people, that personal savings programs drawing conventional rates of interest do not really offset the inflationary effect on such investments. People receiving 8 per cent or 10 per cent on their investments—and this is a high rate of interest for those who are buying homes—will pay 3 per cent or 4 per cent in income tax at the end of the year and will be substantially farther behind in terms of real value.

There is one other aspect of the Canada Pension Plan that should be discussed in terms of savings. This represents a large pool of capital, at the present time in the neighbourhood of $4 billion, earmarked for the provinces. Employees' corporate pension plans, mutual funds and the savings portion of insurance funds have all contributed to the pooling of capital in the hands of a relatively small number of companies under the control of professional managers. One bad feature in this regard has been the withdrawal of capital from rural areas with concentration in a few cities in the country. Most communities in the past had a local money-lender who was perhaps not very popular in the area but who did serve a purpose. Rural areas are now starved of capital. As these small capital pools have been centralized, governments have attempted by various programs such as DREE to provide capital for rural communities, but in my opinion they have not been too successful.

The combined effect of the old age security and Canada Pension Plan being tied to the actual cost of living index will mean the taking over from a large number of Canadians the function of personal saving. In other words, very few private pension plans can be indexed in this way, so the Canada Pension Plan will assume a much more important role. When voluntary personal savings cannot be related to the inflation index it becomes very unattractive to build up personal savings. While it is desirable, and perhaps easy, to provide automatic increases in basic pensions by tying them to the cost of living index, this is a somewhat arbitrary measure.

It is very difficult to measure the actual increase in the cost of living, as various items are included; but the index does not reflect the entire economy. The governor of the Bank of Canada made a statement the other day to the effect that he could not understand our unemployment rate at a time when indices showed such business activity. This probably results from the fact that the conditions which affect the indices are upset by changes in the economy not being registered, or registered in a different way in the indices we are using.

The change from the automatic 2 per cent escalation factor will be significant and I support this move although I have reservations, particularly as this provision relates to the entire business community and our tax structure. In a free economy, various segments are advancing while others are going back, and adjustments must be made to offset this fact. When the cost of production in one segment is higher than the return on the product, the price must go up in order to obtain required production. When indexing is related to the entire economy, perhaps this situation is rectified.

Let me give one example in respect of agriculture. We have seen a rapid increase in food prices, about which there has been a great deal of comment, much more so than there has been about increases in the cost of automobiles, clothing and other manufactured goods. An examination of the cost of agricultural production indicates that unless prices go up, production will go down. In addition, we must remember that the determination by the international market of the price of grain products has contributed to the increase in retail prices ultimately passed on to the consumer and reflected in the cost of living index. What happened was that the industry needed a larger portion of our national income in order to maintain productivity. Without such an increase, production would have fallen off, and I might say that it has to some extent.

When there is an increase in the cost of food prices, there is naturally an increase in the cost of living index. If the remainder of the economy is able to respond to this by an immediate rise in their payments, then the whole economy becomes rigid and there is little point in raising agricultural production. So when we translate automatic rises in the cost of living to pensions, wages, and so on, in my opinion there could be considerable unfavourable reaction. It is true we are not dealing here with the normal sums of money in relation to the total economy, although these sums could become significant. Although they are in retirement, we are dealing with people who, because they have left the work force, perhaps because of age or infirmity, have a reduced ability to earn a living. Nevertheless, if all segments of the economy, or almost all, became indexed there could be a very rigid economy in society. At the present time almost all increases in salary are based on cost of living increases rather than productivity.

I should like to elaborate a little on some of the problems in respect of our economy as a result of the way the funds of the Canada Pension Plan are being spent. The provincial use of Canada Pension Plan contributions has become part of a mechanism that not only affects the pension plan but also affects provincial government spending and the entire investment pattern.

Provincial governments have a pattern of borrowing from the Canada Pension Plan. This tends to encourage increased spending by the same governments because of easy access to the pension fund money. The legislation in respect of the Canada Pension Plan provides for the investment of funds less the estimated amounts needed to pay for benefits and costs. These funds are made available to each province, based on its contribution. In this way the provinces are able to borrow money from these funds subject to the supervision of the Department of Finance.

I think it has been recognized for some time that in the past 20 years the provinces have had much greater demand on their treasuries, relatively, than there has been on the federal treasury. Considerable discussion of this problem was generated during the debate on the white paper in respect of taxation, and subsequent taxation law. I believe the use of Canada Pension Plan funds has tended to mask the importance of this. It has tended to make it easy for the provincial governments to have access to funds, and perhaps contributes to some unwise spending programs. This may also have prevented dialogue in respect of making decisions on actual taxation powers, in terms of the proportion allotted to the federal and provincial governments as well as, perhaps, to municipal governments. In general, this easy access to funds by the provincial governments could lead to unwise spending programs.

This program does not involve the normal contracts that would be involved in borrowing from normal lenders. It is not necessary for a provincial government to become involved in the process of borrowing money on the financial market. I suggest this condition could tempt provinces to adopt an "easy come, easy go" attitude. This huge reservoir of Canada Pension Plan funds provides a cash flow which occurs independently of the normal business cycle. The revenue of the Canada Pension Plan grew from $95 million in 1965 to $1,102 million in 1972-73. Since 1965-66 the excess of revenue has left the plan with an amount of $4,779 million. In 1972-73, contributions to the plan totalled $897 million, with pay-outs of $206 million, so that almost $700 million was available to the provinces for borrowing on a prorated basis.

There are many who criticize the free enterprise system, but the intragovernmental borrowing and short-circuiting of the free market by borrowing from the Canada Pension Plan fund—illustrates what has happened. If a province needs funds, it should borrow directly from the market. In turn, if the division of taxes is such that provinces do not have sufficient access to taxing powers, then that should be negotiated. Borrowing from the Canada Pension Plan fund brings into conflict two different functions, the needs of the provincial treasurers and the rights of the pension fund contributors. If the provincial governments borrow at an advantageous rate, obviously the pension fund is lending at a disadvantageous rate. If the provinces did not borrow these funds there would be an incentive to maximize the yield on the funds and the money would flow to the most productive and rewarding sectors of the economy.

Perhaps the managers of the fund should be urged to invest as effectively as possible. There is a suggestion that the Canada Pension Plan legislation would have to be amended to permit each province to control its own funds. If yields on the pension fund could be improved, the contributions could be decreased or the benefits could be raised. Under the present arrangement the provinces are able to borrow at less than market value and thus the pensioners rights are disregarded and given second place. The present situation allows governments to disregard the best interests of the pension plan contributors. After all, the purpose of the government should be to help citizens, not unnecessarily to harm them.

In the final analysis, I think it is important that the Canada Pension Plan be actuarially designed to provide imcome for those who have contributed. It should remain separate from old age security, and some consideration should be given to the fact that the managers of the plan might be instructed, or be placed in a position to invest the money to yield a good interest so that contributors to the plan will be rewarded as much as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Saint-Henri): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to join the previous speakers who have voiced their approval since the beginning of this debate on Bill C-224. It seems that there is no opposition to the bill from either side of the House. I congratulate each hon. member who, while approving the amendments introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), has suggested improvements which I am sure will not come into effect immediately. But knowing the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I am sure that all those suggestions will not remain unheeded.

I would like to relate the history of this bill and summarize its main features.

Passed on April 3, 1965, the law establishing the Canada Pension Plan came into force the following May 5. The collection of contributions began in January 1966 and the first benefits were paid in January 1967 in the form of retirement pensions.

The first benefits to surviving people were paid in February 1968. This plan is a major landmark of social progress in Canada as it enables millions of citizens to secure a financially safe retirement while simultaneously protecting their dependents or surviving relatives against the loss of income in case of disability or death to the bread winner.

This plan is in force throughout the country except in Quebec which has a similar and closely co-ordinated pension plan; the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan practically operate as one single plan. Together they cover almost all working people in Canada, including the armed forces.

The benefit credits accumulated under both plans are portable everywhere in Canada. The contributor who works for more than one employer or who is self-employed during the whole or a part of his working life accumulates pension credits no matter where he works in Canada. Moreover, the plan benefits are paid to recipients, whether they live in Canada or abroad.

Every contributor to the plan must have a social insurance number so that his gains entitling him to a pension may be registered correctly for benefit purposes.

There are three main kinds of benefits: retirement pensions, benefits to surviving relatives, including pensions to widows and disabled widowers, orphan benefits, the overall death benefit, benefits to the disabled, including the pension to a disabled contributor and benefits to his dependents.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

In another field, the same bill includes provisions to give complete justice to any Canadian citizen who, on account of a decision from the board or from the plan, feels frustrated in his rights.

Any contributor or recipient included in the plan has the right to appeal against decisions he deems unjust. As regards participation and contributions, requests from employees and employers must be sent first to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury). Should the minister's decision be unsatisfactory, the applicant may appeal to the Pension Appeal Board, whose decision is irrevocable.

As to earnings assessment for the purposes of Canada Pension Plan, review applications from self-employed workers are treated in the same way as appeals provided under the Income Tax Act. As regards benefits, there are three appeals: one can refer to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), to the review committee or to the Pension Appeal Board whose decision is final.

Implementation of the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan is already an important step in the area of social security in Canada. Such an initiative from our government shows to what extent the latter was concerned with retired people, disabled persons, surviving spouses as well as orphans who, since the plan was implemented, have been able to live more serenely.

In 1968, this government, aware of the problems resulting from inflation and willing as always to be earnest towards pension beneficiaries, implemented a review of social security. Since then, many Canadians have been able to meet their obligations, despite unavoidable increases in consumer prices, and this was made possible by the government's determination to protect citizens against the rising cost of living. Today, faced with the rapid rate of inflation, the government continues to take the necessary measures. This is why, on September 4, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in a statement made in this House, presented immediate legislation designed to slow down the inflation rate. Among these measures, I would like to mention one that enable retired workers and citizens who belong to the above-mentioned categories to keep pace with the standard of living.

Since 1966, we have witnessed—and this makes me very happy—the government's flexibility in their amendments, that I could qualify as systematic, if I consider the amendments brought forward in 1968 to set up an adjustment mechanism which provided for a maximum annual escalation of 2 per cent for pension benefits. Since these amendments, this government has remained on its toes in the face of the extensive inflation that afflicts not only us but all countries of the western world, and we are quite aware of that. That is why after repeated efforts and lengthy studies it was agreed to set up a mechanism much more flexible than the previous one which provides for the adjustment of pensions on the current cost of living standard and a progressive adjustment from year to year.

For those who contribute to both plans; the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan; maximum pensionable earnings will be increased from $5,600 to $5,900, $6,600 in 1974, and $7,400 in 1975.

I find very practical the suggestion of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to legislate immediately on those two questions that should be implemented before 1974. There is no doubt that everyone knows that those amendments to the legislation will provide relief to over 500,000 Canadians who receive retirement pensions or other pensions provided for in the act.

In the Speech from the Throne at the beginning of this session this government considered the different problems affecting all Canadians and promised a complete revision of all social security measures in Canada. Following that formal undertaking by this government, the Minister for National Health and Welfare released his working paper on social security in Canada on April 18, 1973, which contains several proposals that should completely change the social security plan in Canada. And a little later I would like to come back to some of the projects that I find particularly interesting and cherishable, specially in the area of employment strategy.

I would like first of all to commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the federal-provincial conference of ministers that was held on October 11 and 12 in Ottawa.

● (1700)

We, from Quebec, have heard the leader of the new government of that province talk about profitable federalism during the election campaign.

In my opinion, the results of the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa on October 11 and 12 are tangible evidence of that profitable federalism, where the representatives of two levels of different governments can discuss their problems and ways of solving them and implementing measures while protecting the interests of all, whether under provincial or federal jurisdiction.

That is why, following last spring's publication of the working paper on social security by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, after the provincial ministers of Health and Welfare met in Charlottetown on September 25 and 26 to discuss further and make their positions known before resuming talks with their federal counterpart at the conference held October 11 and 12. During this conference, the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare obtained agreement from all provincial ministers on five points, on a complete revision of the Quebec and Canada plans.

The first point of agreement is the increase in benefits according to the cost of living. In future benefits paid under these two plans will be based entirely on increases in the consumer price index, following the removal of the existing 2 per cent ceiling for everyone, including retired workers.

The second point of agreement is the raising of the ceiling on earnings used to compute benefit and contribution rates. The rates of contributions paid to the Canada and Quebec pension plan accounts will be identical from now on. Both will be established at $6,000 in 1974. For the benefit of those who did not know it, there used to be a difference of $300, I believe, between the ceilings of the Quebec Pension Plan and the Canada Pension Plan.

The third point of this agreement provides that maximum retirement benefits under the Canada Pension Plan, which amount to $1,089 in 1973, should increase to $3,000 by 1980, according to estimates. Old age security benefits are added to these retirement pensions.

The fourth point of this agreement concerns a change of residence by the employees. Employees entering or leaving Quebec will now contribute the same amount before and after moving, and this contribution will be based on the same earning level.

The fifth point pertains to the suppression of the earnings (employment income) control for Canada Pension Plan participants between the ages of 65 and 69. Retirement benefits under the Canada Pension Plan for participants aged from 65 to 69 will ne longer depend on their justifying beforehand their employment income—which used to be determined by the earnings control to which they were submitted—and from now on, they will be automatically granted to all those aged 65 who will have stopped contributing to the Canada Pension Plan.

This understanding, Mr. Speaker, given any disagreement which can exist in any area between provincial and federal jurisdictions, proves that there can be an agreement provided the citizens' rights are protected and safeguarded.

I do not doubt that we all readily accept these two amendments and, as the minister said in his speech at the beginning of this debate, other amendments will soon be added to the act.

Speaking about social measures, I would like to talk a little about the duty of the government towards the citizens and of the concern they feel about them, especially about the citizens who are the victims of inflation and of the increase in the cost of living and who do not have any other income than the old age security pension. We all know that last September the government, for the second time in their parliamentary year, granted an increase in the old age security pensions to mesh them with the cost of living. This is a supplementary measure this year and those who get the guaranteed income supplement will benefit from it.

In the same area, the government, by a temporary measure, gave higher family allowances with the October cheques. This measure is temporary—and I am confident it will be adopted during this session—until the new legislation on family allowances is passed. Everybody knows that this new legislation which is now before the committee provides for a three-fold increase over what is provided in the present act, up to a maximum of $20. To this will be added a special program of the provinces and I shall talk with full knowledge about the province of Quebec which will also offer family allowances amounting in some cases to $45 a month.

All that, Mr. Speaker, to come back to what I said before: when it is possible to adjust the views of both federal and provincial jurisdictions according to the needs of citizens, it is always possible to do better.

I would be remiss for not doing like some of my colleagues who, during their speeches, have brought forward some ideas and some amendments regarding our social legislation; I would like to support the member who yesterday spoke about an adjustment of the eligibility age for the old age security which could be progressively reduced from 65 to 60 years. It is, I think, the member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) who, this afternoon, spoke about that matter. We now have workers aged 60 to 65 who cannot find a job because of their age and who, as they are not eligible for the old age security, must be satisfied with welfare allowances.

If we want people between 60 and 65 to leave the labour force we should see that they get the old age security in the same way as at the time of the last change, that is to say by reducing the eligibility age one year at a time over a five-year period. I would not mention any country, but some have a pension plan in which you take the years of service and the age and if they add up to 80, I think, retirement is compulsory. In several instances, some employees must retire even if they are younger than that.

That is why, in my view, officials of the department ought to consider that matter further in order to be able to set up a general plan aiming at the early reduction of the eligible age for old age security pension.

I would like them to look after another case which perhaps would be acceptable to those who will consider it faster than the proposal I made earlier, namely that of the spouse of a beneficiary of old age security pension who is not actually aged 65. Where one of the spouses is aged from 60 to 65 and the other is eligible for old age security pension, the former should also be entitled to that pension.

If I make these two suggestions, it is because everyday, in the riding that I represent, that request is put to me by citizens who have retired from the labour market and who, by this very fact, see themselves without any immediate income and must apply for welfare. When a Canadian has had to work all his life in order to live, and not always for a very high salary, I find a little degrading that he be forced to go on welfare before being eligible for his old age pension. Studies should be made to find out at what level and how such a project should be implemented. I am personally convinced it is possible to do something, at least to have some studies conducted. After all, I believe I should insist more in order that people between 60 and 65 years of age be entitled to pensions when the spouse is eligible.

In conclusion, I would like to encourage all my hon. colleagues to continue in the right direction as laid out in the budget speech, that is to readily accept the two amendments to the bill now before us, with the hope that very soon the minister will present other amendments, as he as promised, in order to give greater access to the Canada Pensions Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan for the 500,000 Canadians who are totally dependent on them, while, at the same time, making them more interesting for them.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration is characterized by two main features: the first deals with the consumer price index leading to an equivalent increase in benefits payable under the legislation. The second refers to an increase in the year's maximum pensionable earnings. I readily accept both amendments to the Canada Pension Plan but, for a very special reason, I have decided this afternoon to restrict my comments to the first feature, that is the consumer price index.

I am not so much interested in the validity of the argument in support of a rise in the index applicable to benefits. This I openly accept. What does interest me is a group of persons to whom neither indexes are applicable at the moment. This problem is complicated and I fail to understand it. This is why I want to put it clearly in the hope that the minister may be able to give us some explanations regarding a really strange situation.

If the government is so much aware, as the hon. member for Saint-Henri (Mr. Loiselle) just pointed out to us, of the fate of those suffering from the disastrous effects of the rise in the cost of living, I am confident that the minister will do his utmost to solve the problem which I am about to make known to you.

● (1710)

[English]

I am very happy to see in the chamber this afternoon the parliamentary secretary to the minister because I hope he will draw to the attention of the minister the remarks I am planning to make. I rise to speak today for many people who have no voice in this House. They live in Canada. Some are Canadians and can vote, but most of them are not yet Canadians and therefore cannot vote; therefore they have no spokesman. These people came to Canada to be with their families who had immigrated before them; they are the mothers and fathers of emigrants from Britain. They came here with what they could by way of assets from Britain because their families had preceded them and they wanted to spend the rest of their days with them. Why should I feel called upon to speak for them today? It is because of the pensions they draw here and the steps being taken by the minister to rectify the situation.

The background is worth recounting, Mr. Speaker. The British pension is a contributory pension; for the length of one's working life one makes contributions to it. Should a contributor decide to leave Britain for Canada after making contributions, he will receive the pension due when he becomes eligible for it. It will be paid at the rate being paid on the date of departure from Britain. That is, if he decides to come to Canada, for example, to stay within the Commonwealth.

However, if he decides to go to a country with which Britain has a reciprocal agreement on social security, he will receive the pension as adjusted from time to time in Britain in accordance with cost of living increases—adjusted right up to the moment of his entitlement—and he will receive all subsequent adjustments as they are made. That is, if he decides to go to a country where there is a reciprocal agreement on social security. These countries include Austria, the Common Market countries, Cyprus, Malta, Switzerland, Israel, Yugoslavia, Turkey, the United States and Jamaica, not to mention the Isle of Man, Jersey, Guernsey and Bermuda. But not Canada. So emigrants from Britain to Canada, having contributed all their working lives to a pension plan in Britain, find that by coming here, to a country in the Commonwealth, their pension level is frozen just because Canada has no reciprocal agreement with Britain on social security.

Where does the fault lie, Mr. Speaker? Here is the explanation I get from one side. In a letter dated July 3, 1973, which I should like to put on the record in part, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) wrote:

Although it is usual for a country to pay its old age pensions to all eligible persons residing within its territory, the same general practice does not apply to persons living abroad. Some countries do not pay such pensions abroad to anyone excepting under very special conditions. Others pay them abroad only to their own eligible nationals. The United Kingdom and Canada pay their pensions abroad to both nationals and aliens who are eligible, whereas the only eligible aliens to whom the United States pays its pensions abroad are those who are nationals of countries which will pay social security benefits abroad in full to their beneficiaries who are U.S. nationals.

From time to time a country may increase the rates of old age pensions payable. Whenever such adjustments are made to Canadian old age security pensions and to Canada Pension Plan benefits, they are payable unconditionally to all recipients residing anywhere abroad, including the United Kingdom, by virtue of Canadian legislation alone, without the need for reciprocal agreements between Canada and the other countries concerned. On the other hand, it is our understanding that the United Kingdom pays such increases abroad only in those countries with which it has reciprocal agreements or arrangements on social security.

As you have indicated, such an arrangement exists between the United States and the United Kingdom. It will be clear from the above information that by virtue of this arrangement, pensioners of the United States who are not U.S. citizens are able to enjoy their full U.S. pensions in the United Kingdom, though they would not be able to do so if the arrangement in question did not exist. Meanwhile, pensioners of Canada, no matter what their nationality, are able to enjoy full Canadian benefits in the United Kingdom. Similarly, there is no impediment to the British government paying increases to United Kingdom pensioners in Canada by virtue of their legislation alone, should they wish to do so.

I emphasize "should they wish to do so", Mr. Speaker. Here is what I hear from the other side, because in my search for the truth and to find out where the problem lies I have entered into correspondence with a number of members of the British parliament and in particular with the minister directly concerned in the British government. What he tells me is a reiteration of the statement concerning the eligibility of persons drawing pensions in a foreign country at the rate current when they left Britain or when they first became entitled after emigrating. Subsequent increases are payable only in countries which have undertaken, in reciprocal agreements, to pay unconditional pensions.

In my correspondence I suggested that Canada was ready to sign an agreement with the United Kingdom and that the United Kingdom was reluctant. This was on the basis of correspondence I had had with the minister. I quote part of the reply of the British minister as follows:

I should say at once that the opposite is true. Since before 1970 it has been our desire to conclude a comprehensive social security reciprocal agreement with Canada and in the course of the last three years draft proposals have been transmitted to the Canadian government on three occasions, the last in March of this year, to which a reply is awaited.

Mr. Speaker, I find this extremely confusing. You will therefore understand why I am at a loss to explain this anomaly to people who come to me for advice and ask what can be done. It seems to me a matter of concluding an agreement with Britain. Why have we not done so? What is the hold-up? Many of those for whom I speak arrived here at middle-age and when they reach the age of 65 they are not, except in rare cases, eligible for the Canadian old age pension since they are unlikely to have lived in Canada for the required 20 years. For this reason, if for no other, I urge the minister and the government to hasten the conclusion of an agreement with the United Kingdom on social security.

● (1720)

I cannot conclude my remarks without mentioning two other classes of disadvantaged persons. Others have mentioned them and perhaps I may be allowed to do so. Something ought to be done soon to permit housewives to contribute to the pension plan, so that they too may receive the pension in their own right, as they deserve. Something must also be done to ensure equivalent treatment for widows and widowers. If a man loses his wife, as I understand it his pension is not reduced; but if a woman loses her husband, her pension is reduced automatically and drastically. Why should this be? Why should one partner of a marriage be treated as less than an equal in the partnership? This defect must be eliminated from our legislation. The legislation we are presently considering may not be the vehicle for doing that, but we must not lose the opportunity when it arises to correct these inequities.

Having made this triple call for justice for British immigrants, housewives and widows, I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I rise, as have many other members of the House, to express my satisfaction with Bill C-224 and, to be consistent with many other members, to emphasize that this bill through its provisions is simply a vehicle for bringing about a better social security system for Canadians.

I intend to be brief, for which hon. members may be thankful, and discuss only two concepts. They are the social guidelines and the philosophy which produced this bill. I shall make a comment or two about our obligation to extend that philosophy and to see to it that our citizens are increasingly brought into contact with this kind of program and given more information. Secondly I shall comment on what I call the hard dollars involved in this program. I also hope that the bill will be passed as quickly as possible because as members of this House know many Canadian citizens are waiting to benefit from its improvements.

The purpose of any social security system is to assure to all the citizens of Canada a decent, human and humane standard of living. The class of Canadian citizen to which our obligation is perhaps greatest is the one consisting of our senior citizens who have devoted their lives and working years in working for our benefit in order that we may enjoy a better place in which to live. Yet bearing in mind the intention behind our social security programs, we must recognize that, perhaps because of the complexities of interrelated and parallel provincial and federal programs, not all our people are the beneficiaries.

Let me give an example from the riding that I represent. I emphasize that I represent one of the wealthiest regions in Canada. The people are among the most highly educated and the most mobile. It is one of our most highly industrialized regions. Yet I still hear of women who are afraid to leave their homes in daytime because they are inadequately and improperly clothed. I still hear of men who cannot get jobs, despite the university degrees they possess, because they are over 50 years old and corporate pension plans do not permit the hiring of people of that age.

I share the hope expressed by my predecessors in this debate that we shall introduce legislation which will result in private pension plans, to which many of our citizens contribute, being made interchangeable and portable and as flexible as the Canada Pension Plan. Such legislation would guarantee our citizens the chance to contribute to better private pension plans. This bill, in essence, is a reflection of those ideas and goes a long way toward establishing the kind of social security system that was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. It is unnecessary to repeat what the speech said. I simply say that in the near future, and by that I mean a few years as I am not looking much beyond the end of this decade, we must consider the idea of a complete and cohesive guaranteed income program for Canadians. I do not mean a program that will encourage persons to stay at home rather than to work; I mean a program that will guarantee the citizens of this country a basic standard of decency. This bill moves us in that direction.

I shall touch briefly upon my second point. I want to deal with the dollars and cents that are behind this program, compare it with past programs and look to where we shall be in the future. In addition to our medical care program, I think it is fair to say that we shall see introduced in this country what I may call "pharmacare" or pharmaceutical care and dental care programs. Remember that about ten years ago all we had in this country was the old age security pension of $65 a month. Compare that situation with the situation of today in which, under the guaranteed income supplement plan, we guarantee that a single, elderly person shall receive not less than $2,150 a year and a married couple not less than $4,100 a year. The benefits under the plan are available at age 65 instead of age 70, and many members of the House have expressed the desire that the eligible age be lowered to 60. I add my voice to theirs and hope for this to come about.

The 2 per cent escalation provision has been removed and the cost of living adjustments will be made quarterly, not annually, which will mean more dollars in more pockets. The yearly maximum pensionable earnings provision will bring into the plan a considerable number of additional dollars, and on the basis of actuarial data to which I shall refer in a moment the result, obviously, will be a substantially increased pay-out at the age of 65. It is this increase from the current maximum of $5,600, as mentioned by an earlier speaker, under YMPE to $6,600 in 1974 and $7,400 in 1975 which, at the 1.8 per cent level of employee and employer contributions, will increase the maximum individual contribution to $106.20 next year. That will be the employee's contribution and there will be an equal and matching contribution by the employer.

Also, the 12½ per cent per annum increase on the 1974 ceiling of $6,600 will bring a greater number of capturable dollars, if I may use pension terminology, into the plan and there will be, as well, an increase in the amount of money which will be received by beneficiaries. The result is this: Whereas the present maximum is $6,600, that maximum will rise to $13,000—we are speaking in terms of yearly maximum pensionable earnings which will apply by 1980—and present benefit of $1,089 will rise to more than $3,000 over and above the old age security pension.

Finally may I cite some examples which will show how this plan is to work. A married man with four children who let us say retired in 1971 when he was earning $5,000 per annum would have received the following benefits under our system: from the pension plan, $63 per month; from the old age security pension, $160 a month; from the guaranteed income supplement, $64 a month—for a total of $287 a month or $3,444 annually. Those benefits are to change as follows: the man will get, under thhe Canada Pension Plan, $86 a month; under OAS, $210 a month; under GIS, $89 a month—for a total of $385 a month or $4,620 per annum.

According to a very cautious and conservative projection, by 1975 the individual who was making $5,000 a year when he retired in 1971 will be receiving under the Canada Pension Plan $123 per month, under OAS $228 a month, an under GIS $81 per month—for a total of $431 a month or $5,172 annually, which is more than he was making when he retired.

● (1730)

This is an extremely conservative projection of the rates of inflation which reflect the possibility of income improvement. If we look only seven years ahead to 1980, we find that an individual receiving $90 a month presently will be receiving $250. A disabled individual presently receiving $115 will be receiving $225. A widow under the age of 65 receiving $71 will then be receiving $135, and a widow over the age of 65 receiving $69 will be getting $120. These figures represent a doubling of current benefits within seven years.

I share with other members of the House a desire to see the programs for our senior citizens still further improved. But I also think members who sit on all sides of the House should compliment the minister responsible for bringing in this bill, with all the increased advantages it will mean for those who so greatly need them.

Mr. Dan Hollands (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I am sure many people in Canada will be happy to see this amendment to the Canada Pension Plan. Many older people, through no fault of their own, are in financial trouble today. In the past year we have seen a more rapid rise in the cost of living than we have ever seen before. This is the essence of the times in which we are living. It has certainly hit the older person much harder than anyone else.

There are one or two changes still to be made to the Canada Pension Plan. I am concerned about the fact that one must earn at least $6,600 a year before being eligible to contribute to the plan. A large number of people are excluded from benefits in consequence. I suppose the largest group would be that which includes the farmers. Over the last five or six years, through no fault of their own, they have been forced, as a result of depressed markets for their livestock and grain, into an extremely difficult financial situation. Indeed, many of them are only able to live because of the tax provision in respect of depreciation of their assets. Many of them do not earn enough to entitle them to contribute to the plan.

I believe there should be some way of enabling people in such a situation to join the plan and catch up with their payments in more profitable years. Unless this can be arranged, they will have to turn to other types of insurance in an effort to make provision for their old age. It is no fault of theirs that their income has been drastically reduced or cut off altogether.

In many ways, the quota system has been a factor in preventing many farmers qualifying for the benefits of Canada Pension Plan. The amount a farmer can produce and sell is limited. Then, too, there are the effects of adverse weather. Go to northern Alberta today and you will see valuable crops lying on the ground, so bad have been weather conditions for the past two months. Surely we should be able to amend the act so that people who are confronted with misfortunes of this kind can still take part in the plan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hollands: One of the features I have been very concerned about since I have been in Ottawa is the disability section of the act. Last week I received a letter from a farmer in my constituency whose only means of support was his quarter section farm. He had been in hospital, two discs had been removed from his back. He is unable to work, so he wrote and asked whether I could help him to receive benefit under the Canada Pension Plan. It is a tragic thing. I went to see this man at his house. He was barely able to walk. But the answer he received from the officials of the Canada Pension Plan, after the man had undergone a medical examination, was that he was able to do light work.

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

Mr. Hollands: I am sure hon. members of the House who supported the plan when it was brought in, imagined that our citizens in this kind of trouble would be helped.

Mr. Baker: Or given the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Hollands: It seems to be one of the jobs of a member of parliament to try to break through the large volume of red tape and bureaucracy which surrounds so many government programs.

Mr. Paproski: A government which does not care.

Mr. Hollands: Yes, I think you are right.

An hon. Member: Don't get mean, now.

Mr. Hollands: The other question I am concerned about is this. What happens to the money in the Canada Pension Plan? We all know that contributions are deducted from our pay cheques if we are employed, and we all know money is sent out to those who qualify for pensions. But what about the money in the middle? I find that the province of Ontario, for example, has been able to draw $2,560 million out of the plan. Alberta has drawn $428 million. I can find no regulation governing the use of this money by the provinces. It is conceivable, therefore, that a province could build highways with the money, or it might invest the funds in projects which were not revenue-producing. So when the time comes to pay back these funds, the young people, the work force in the provinces will be taxed again so that the funds may be repaid.

It is probably a good thing that there should be a large pool of money available in Canada from which projects can be financed. But a great responsibility attaches to any government charged with handling the funds of the Canada Pension Plan and I believe we should ensure, for the good of the country, that the money is earning the maximum possible interest. For example, if we were to take this fantastic sum of money and invest it in housing, I have no doubt the effect would be to reduce the rate of interest which many of our people are paying today. It could lead to a reduction in interest rates.

Quebec is getting the best deal to the extent that it raises its own money and does not need to borrow. I cannot for the life of me understand why other provinces did not opt out of the plan. I would think that if a similar opportunity arose today, many provinces would opt out of it. I should like to see the monetary aspects of the plan handled in such a way as to benefit not only the people of Canada who collect pensions but also the working people who contribute. After all, it is the young people of today who are keeping the pension plan going.

I hope that before too long the government will bring in further amendments to the Canada Pension Plan Act which will make the plan a little more human and will also take into consideration what our ultimate aim is, in view of the tremendous amount of money which has been built up in the fund since 1965.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be very brief since there are only a few minutes remaining, and perhaps some other member will be able to speak before six o'clock. I want to say that I, like every other hon. member who has spoken in this debate, am in favour of Bill C-224. Ever since the Canada Pension Plan came into being, I have admired it. Quite frankly, it is the way I like to do business. A young person takes money out of his pocket and, in co-operation with his employer, puts money away for when he is older. The fund is self-sustaining, or has been up to the present time.

I am only sorry that the Canada Pension Plan as it is now set up did not start many years ago. If it had, and if it had been modelled on the same lines as the United States social security plan, then in my view we would not be in the welfare tangle and mess that we are in Canada today. Surely it is better for a young man and lady to learn as soon as they start working that there is not a great deal in this life that is free, that they have to save a certain amount of money in order to look after themselves in their old age.

Regretfully, this has not, in my opinion, happened in Canada. I must point out that even though we feel that because of circumstances we must embark upon this course, the old age pension has had two increases during the last few months, costing a fantastic amount of money, increases that were made as a result of inflation and the high cost of living in Canada. Over $6 billion will come from the department of the minister who is sponsoring Bill C-224 in this year and will go toward providing primarily for the old and the disabled.

Many of my hon. friends in this chamber who have socialistic tendencies may think money grows on trees. But the fact is that whether in the year 1973, a time when all of us are becoming more socialistic, or whether in the year 1955, when in my opinion most of us were most sensible, this money is provided by the public, the taxpayers of Canada, people who have worked hard, and provided particularly by people who are going to be saddled with the bill and are younger-generation Canadians.

So while I agree with the bill, particularly since the fund is self-sustaining, or has been up till now, I nevertheless give this word of caution. The word "pension" has been used in this debate by many hon. members and we now come to think that a pension is a matter of right just so long as you can get one. Regretfully, I say we have become a nation of "gimmees". Our attitude is "give me something", whatever it may be, in many instances regardless of the cost.

I repeat that in terms of dollar bills, the cost is substantial. The money must be provided by those taxpayers of Canada who have the desire to work. For this reason I caution the government and all members of the House of Commons that just adding to pensions is not the real solution to our Canadian way of life. We are in an inflationary era, which of course is prevalent around the world, and the only way we will solve the situation is, not by increasing pensions every year or every few months but by tackling the inflation philosophy that all or at least most of us are accepting today as a matter of course. In my opinion, this is not good enough and something will have to be done about it.

Let me just give the House one example of what I mean. The government of today and governments of yesterday have advertised for sale Canada Savings Bonds at roughly 7½ per cent. Anyone who is paying tax has at least to pay a quarter of that interest and many people pay half of the 7½ per cent. Then there is an inflation factor of 8 per cent. There is no possible way for people to save money under such conditions. The government must tackle the root of the problem, and I hope that this one has the common sense to go ahead and do so.

Let us not forget that there are many people in Canada who in years gone by have not used the word "savings" as a bad word. In my opinion, it is still a good word. Our senior citizens today would not be able to collect their old age pensions, and neither would I be able to collect mine very shortly, if it were not for those people who still do something that seems to be rather unpopular in Canada, namely, work hard and try to save money, which is then put into those terrible things described by my socialistic friends and which are known as banks, so people can save, so houses can be built and the country as a whole developed.

I have spoken, Mr. Speaker, long enough. But let us not forget that while a bill such as this is most important and most necessary in this inflationary age, the only way to pay the bill is to get people to work hard and to do a certain amount of saving as did our forefathers.

[Mr. Whicher.]

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief. The hon. member who has just spoken castigated socialism. I simply say to him that it was his party that picked up some of these schemes and prostituted them, and in essence they are no longer true socialism. If they were, then we would not have the problems we have in this country today.

This bill, as I understand it, removes the 2 per cent limit now imposed on annual pension increases, basing increases on the consumer price index. This is something that our party has been fighting for since 1964-65 when the Canada Pension Plan was first conceived. The bill also contains a catch-up clause making cost of living adjustments retroactive to 1967, the year Canadians first started to receive benefits. Similar ideas have been hashed and rehashed in this House over the last few hours and days, but I am going to try to express four points which I think are very significant. These have been mentioned by other speakers. I will rehash one or two and then probably bring in one or two concepts that are brand new.

Something that our party would like to see—and I think we will have to start moving in this direction soon—is retirement at the age of 60, perhaps voluntarily, under the Canada Pension Plan. I think that one class of persons we forget are those who live in the hinterlands of Canada and work in dangerous occupations, those who feed the factories of our huge cities and provide their residents with high standards of living yet never themselves reach the age of 60 because, as I say, they are engaged in hazardous occupations. Look at the fluorspor mines on the Burin peninsula of Newfoundland, where there are about three times as many widows as anywhere else.

It saddens my heart every time I go to Uranium City to find that a number of men of the age of 40, 45, 50 or 55 are dying from silicosis, lung cancer, emphysema or some other disease of that nature. For these people involved in hazardous occupations we should make a first step toward lowering the pensionable age to perhaps 55—and that is not being ridiculous or advocating welfare. I think it would be actuarially sound to have people in hazardous occupations retire at that age. I understand that members of the armed services and the RCMP can retire after 20 years' service, but underground miners keep on breathing filth and dirt for 35 years—if they live that long!

Another significant step that should be taken—others have touched on this but I want to repeat it—is to change the legislation in order that we treat husbands and wives alike. I would rather see my wife at home looking after the children than out working, but because she does not earn an income she is not entitled to benefit from the Canada Pension Plan. I think she should be entitled to some benefit. This is particularly true in the case of farmers' wives. I think we could get around this whole concept by accepting the idea we have been proposing for many years now in relation to a family income tax rather than an individual income tax. In this way the husband and the wife would file returns and both would be entitled to Canada Pension Plan benefits.

The third point I wish to make relates to disability pensions. From my experience in my constituency and in other parts of the country it appears that an individual must be about seven-eighths dead before he can qualify for a disability pension.

An hon. member: No, eight-eighths dead.

Mr. Nesdoly: Someone suggests eight-eighths dead, and that is pretty bad. A disability pension should be exactly what it says. If a person is disabled and cannot carry out his regular job, he should be entitled to a pension. I know of one chap who was awarded a disability pension but some bureaucrat here in Ottawa or somewhere decided to appeal the award because he thought the man did not deserve it. The case was set for hearing on August 19 of this year, but I received a letter from this fellow the other day in which he said there has still been no hearing and he does not know when it will come about. I think this whole mess—perhaps it is administrative—should be straightened out.

The fourth and final suggestion I want to make to the minister is that many private pension plans, including the one for parliamentarians, should be scrapped. We should devise a national pension plan, integrating all these plans under one heading. In this way we could provide for retirement at age 55, 57 or what-have-you.

When I was elected a member of this House I had 20 years' service in the teaching profession in my province. I did not give a hoot about the parliamentary pension, but had I stayed in the teaching profession I could have retired at age 57 with 70 per cent of my pension based on my best six years' earnings. I am now losing the years I am here as a member. Maybe that will be only two or three years.

An hon. Member: It won't be long.

Mr. Nesdoly: An hon. member suggests it will not be long, but I will bet anything I will be here longer than him.

All pension plans should be totally portable. For 15 years I worked on a pension scheme for teachers in the province of Saskatchewan, during which time we had a very difficult time getting pensions made portable among Saskatchewan, Manitoba, British Columbia and Ontario. We were never successful in making them portable east of Ontario. Rather than providing for a parliamentary pension, I should like to see my years of service as a member of parliament added to my 20 years' service as a teacher, in order that I might be able to retire at a decent age, in my case 57.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, in view of the hour perhaps I should not proceed to make a wind-up speech in respect of Bill C-224 but should deal with this matter in committee when the bill has been referred. I would therefore ask you to put the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF MEMBERS OF EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I draw the attention of all hon. members to the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a very special parliamentary delegation. These distinguished legislators are members of the parliaments of Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom; but they are here today in a very special capacity. They are with us, and we welcome them, as members of the European parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The members of the House of Commons of Canada wish to extend a warm welcome to their distinguished colleagues. Meetings during this visit are naturally taking place in a spirit of friendliness and human understanding, and we are all happy about them. What will result from these meetings will certainly prove most welcome and useful.

● (1410)

[English]

Meetings and discussions thus conducted in a spirit of co-operation and friendship are bound to have constructive and beneficial results. On behalf of all hon. members, I welcome to this House the distinguished representatives of the Parliament of Europe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—ALLEGED ALTERATION OF "HANSARD" BY SOLICITOR GENERAL CHANGING MEANING OF CERTAIN REMARKS—RULING MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) rose on a question of privilege to suggest that certain words spoken in the House the previous day by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) were not accurately recorded in Hansard for October 30 at page 7351. The hon. member suggested that the words "and other" had been removed so as to alter the sense of the minister's statement. The minister in reply acknowledged that some changes had been made, and the Chair undertook to look into the matter.

A look at the so-called "blues", which are the transcripts of the reporter's original notes, indicates that the words "and certain other" were actually used by the minister. The rules or regulations governing the correction of the blues are not too clearly set down. The only reference the Chair could find was the report of the committee appointed by the House to supervise the actual report of the debates of the House, which report was presented on May 26, 1948, and concurred in by this House. Paragraph 4 of the recommendations of the committee reads as follows:

> Your Committee recommends: That the pages of the daily edition be kept intact so that, after permissible corrections are made, the pages of the daily edition can be used for the bound edition as originally printed, and that changes suggested by members be confined strictly to correction of errors and essential minor alterations.

I think it has long been accepted practice that the editor of debates should have the responsibility to determine whether changes suggested by members are acceptable or not. In other words, the editor of debates should be allowed to exercise his judgment as to whether changes suggested by members are really corrections of errors or essential minor alterations. I am sure that hon. members will want to encourage the continuance of this practice.

At the same time, changes or alterations of the same nature which have not been suggested by a correction on the "blues" can be proposed to the House on motions. Here again this practice conforms with the provisions of Standing Orders. When changes are made to the record of the House either in accordance with provisions of Standing Order 32 at the request of members on motions, the correction appears in the revised edition of Hansard. In this particular instance I gather it would be the wish of the minister and hon. members who have given some thought to this matter that the revised edition conform with the minister's actual statement.

MR. SHARP—REFERENCE OF POSITION PAPER ON LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE TO COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given you notice. It has been brought to my attention that yesterday, in response to a question from the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), I may have inadvertently misinformed the House regarding the reference of the document on the forthcoming Law of the Sea Conference which I propose to have tabled on the government's behalf tomorrow. It has been the government's intention all along to recommend to the House, through an appropriate resolution, that the paper in question be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and not the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, as suggested to me in the question put by the hon. member for Skeena yesterday. I simply wish to reconfirm the government's intention to seek to have this paper referred to the External Affairs and National Defence Committee.

ENERGY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ARRANGEMENTS FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I seek the consent of the House with respect to an arrangement for a statement to be made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? The proposal is that we might revert to motions at eight o'clock this evening for the statement and comments from opposition spokesmen, and that in order to provide an opportunity for questions to be asked following the statement, that we might agree to have part of the question period now with the remaining 20 minutes after the statement this evening, on the understanding that it would not be the wish of members of the House to ask questions on energy in this part of the question period and that the minister would be available this evening in particular to answer questions on that subject.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, we agree to this suggestion. In fact, we had part of the idea in our minds. The only thing we would request is that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make the statement available to us as soon as possible before eight o'clock. We are expecting quite a lengthy statement and we want to study it very carefully. We have many pertinent questions to ask and an advance copy would be appreciated. The only other comment I have to make at this point is that these last minute changes do not contribute to the orderly conduct of the business of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have been party to these arrangements and we agree to them.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we are also party to this arrangement and we agree. However, we insist that we should receive a copy of the statement before that time.

An hon. Member: In French!

[English]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I just ask a question, supplementary to the comments of my party's House leader? Can we have the assurance that the minister's statement will be available, at least to the party leaders, not later than five o'clock this afternoon.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister could reply to that question.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I will see whether that can be done.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: We went along with this request for the unanimous consent of the House to defer the minister's statement on the basis that there might be something in it which might affect the stock exchanges. The stock exchanges are all closed by five o'clock, our time. The minister either has a statement ready or he does not, and if the statement is ready, it could be made available at five o'clock on the limited basis I have suggested.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite prepared to make the statement available on the understanding that it would be received in confidence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we should try to understand one another. If there is going to be an order of the House, the order should be in clear terms so that we do not get involved in difficulties, either at eight o'clock or between six and eight.

My understanding is that there is agreement in the House that we will revert to motions at eight this evening for the purpose of allowing the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make the statement, which will be followed in the usual way by the statements made by representatives of parties in opposition to the government, followed by the second part of the question period for 20 minutes, which would complete the proceedings relating to the minister's statement.

I believe that there is also a condition attached, a condition to which the Leader of the Opposition has referred, that this proposed statement be made available some time before 8 p.m.—the time was not made clear by the minister responsible for the department—and the minister has indicated he was prepared to do this on the understanding that the statement would be given to the representatives of the parties in opposition in confidence. I hope I have indicated clearly and properly what hon. members have in mind.

● (1420)

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, if your last comment is to be made part of the order, I do not think I would be satisfied with the order to the effect that the statement would be made available to the leaders of other parties some time before eight o'clock.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Five o'clock.

Mr. Lewis: If the minister agrees then you, Sir, can put it to the House that the statements are to be made available to the leaders of the parties at or by five o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat what I said earlier, that is that we agree to this arrangement providing a French version of the statement is given to us at five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that it would have been simpler if these discussions had occurred earlier. I shall once more try to determine whether hon. members wish the order of the House to be subject to the condition that the minister give copies of his statement at five o'clock this afternoon.

[English]

My understanding is that the order to which I have referred will include therein the instruction that the minister will make available, in confidence, to the leaders of other parties a copy of the proposed statement in French and English. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN MIDDLE EAST PEACEKEEPING FORCE—FURTHER DISCUSSIONS WITH SECRETARY GENERAL OF UNITED NATIONS—POSTPONEMENT OF DEBATE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that it is my intention to meet with the Secretary General of the United Nations in New York tomorrow morning to discuss further with him his request to Canada to provide a contribution to the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East.

The Secretary General is encountering difficulties in determining the over-all composition of the force. These difficulties relate both to the scale of Canadian participation and to such matters as whether a Warsaw Pact country ought to be included to balance the inclusion of a NATO country, and whether countries other than Canada are acceptable to all the parties concerned. The Secretary General confirmed in writing on October 28 that Canada is acceptable to the parties concerned. I feel the problems can only be satisfactorily explored by personal contact with the Secretary General.

For the moment, no Canadian personnel will be sent to the area and I do not propose, therefore, to bring forward for debate tomorrow the resolution seeking approval of parliament for Canadian participation in UNEF.

Mr. Claude Wagner (St. Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, we understand the predicament in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) finds himself. On the other hand, I must say that many questions have been raised over the past few days with regard to this subject. We understand that some of our troops are already in the Middle East and that some of them, as is evident from a television program last evening, are engaged as observers and therefore are caught in the line of fire. We would like answers to those questions, and we would like also to know if it is a fact that Russia is objecting to the participation of Canada in this Middle East compromise.

Therefore, I think it is essential that we have this debate tomorrow. It is fairly easy for the minister to be in touch with the United Nations Secretary General this afternoon and report back to the House tomorrow. We on this side insist that this debate take place. We would not like to find ourselves in a situation similar to that in which parliament found itself on the Viet Nam issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we hope that the minister's visit to the United Nations in New York will have positive and fruitful results. We do not think that Canada should seek to take up the burden of participation in the peacekeeping force, but we do think that Canada should accept if sought. In our view any member of the United Nations is qualified, other than the great powers, but we confidently leave it to the Secretary General of the United Nations to arrange a balanced and competent force for these important tasks.

Until these matters are resolved and the minister has gone to the United Nations and returned, we see no point in going on with the debate tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is continually in touch with the Canadian representatives to the United Nations, and he is in a position to know the progress of this organization's activity.

In certain circumstances, of course, the minister has to make important commitments and he has to do so on behalf of the government; if he has to get in touch with opposition or government members, I feel that the opposition should have something to say in the process of decision making, or at least should have the possibility of making its position recognized on the part Canada is going to play in respect of the enforcement of the cease-fire in the Middle East. I feel that the opposition has something important to say in this decision taking, because the opposition also represents our country. I feel it is important that we have a debate on this matter.

ABORTION

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO CRIMINAL CODE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely the over 30,000 murders per year that take place in terms of babies aborted in this country. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Madill):

That this House expresses its concern over the seeming abuse of the right to approve abortions exercised by some therapeutic abortion committees who, in considering the health of the mother are including for consideration social and economic factors and declares that the government should proceed with amendments to the Criminal Code limiting abortions to those cases where actual physical or mental danger to the life of the mother exists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has heard the result for himself.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO OPERATIONS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This matter is the certainty that the Unemployment Insurance Commission, on past and present performance, cannot cope with the seasonal increase of unemployment in the winter months of January and February, 1974. Unless immediate steps are taken immediately to overhaul the commission, thousands of Canadian unemployed and their families will suffer hardship and heartbreak.

With consent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this House urges the Governor in Council to appoint a commission under the Inquiries Act to inquire into, report upon and make recommendations with respect to the administration, operation and practices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Mr. Speaker: This motion also requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF TAKEOVER OF PERKINS PAPERS LTD.—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, with which I think most members of the House will agree, arising from the proposed takeover by the Bowater Corporation of London, England, of Perkins Papers, Ltd., a Canadian firm. In view of the potentially adverse effects of that takeover on the Canadian paper industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney):

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

That this House instruct the government to take immediate action to prohibit the sale of Perkins Papers Ltd. to the Bowater Corporation pending the enactment and proclamation of the Foreign Investment Review Act, Bill C-132.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

INCREASED PRICE OF FUEL OIL—SUGGESTED DEBATE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the constant and accelerated increase in the price of gasoline and heating oil, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House do now adjourn to discuss the possibility of having the federal and provincial Ministers of Finance confer and determine whether direct and indirect taxes on gasoline and fuels should be lowered so that Canadians may not suffer too much from it.

Mr. Speaker: I venture to remind the hon. member for Richmond that such an adjournment motion should be moved pursuant to Standing Order 26 and not Standing Order 43. Therefore, I cannot put his motion to the House.

NEED FOR MEASURES TO DEAL WITH OIL SPILLS ON WEST COAST—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the increased number of oil spills along the west coast of British Columbia, and the apparent lack of adequate contingency plans and equipment to deal with them quickly and effectively, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That this House of Commons instruct the appropriate standing committee to examine this situation and to make recommendations to the government so that immediate and effective measures may be taken by the appropriate agencies to deal with any oil-spill emergency that may arise along the West Coast.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

FOOD PRICES

SUGGESTION MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE SPEND ONLY THREE DOLLARS A WEEK ON FOOD—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the light of a statement reported to have been made yesterday by a member of the cabinet who is in the House, even though he is not in his seat, I would move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight):

That the Minister of Agriculture be asked to feed himself on $3 a week for a period of six months, and that at the end of that period he report to the House on the results thereof, if he is still here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will agree that the question in the motion is clearly too hypothetical to put to the House at this time.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Last night, when I was interviewed by the reporter for the CBC, I said that a person had written to me and told me that he could live on that much money. I clearly stated to the reporter that I did not recommend this to anybody.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I suggest that the hon. member who brought forward this motion possibly looks as if he could live on that much money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my leader says that I am standing proof that the minister is correct. I shall report on this six months from now, and six years from now as well.

SUGGESTED USE OF CANADIAN PACIFIC METHOD IN PAYMENT OF BACK TIME—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. In view of the method used by the Canadian National Railways to compute back time owed to its employees as a result of the recent contract settlement imposed by this House, and in view of the fact that such computations lump the back time and regular pay in one cheque, thus causing an over assessment of income tax, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the Minister of Transport immediately instruct the CNR to follow the method being used by the CPR in paying its employees.

Mr. Speaker: The motion submitted to the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO ADMINISTRATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As the Unemployment Insurance Commission has not stayed within its administration budget since 1969, and as in 1973 the budget will very likely double the original prediction tabled in this House, will the minister undertake a public inquiry into the situation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. The administrative budget of the Unemployment Insurance Commission for 1973 will be met.

Mr. Ellis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the administration budget for the Unemployment Insurance Commission headquarters alone will triple this year, will the minister at least inquire into this aspect and make such inquiry public?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, these aspects of the Unemployment Insurance Commission's operation as, indeed, are all its operations, are fully detailed and fully available to members of the House through the inquiries of standing committees. That procedure will continue in future.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INTENTION TO INTRODUCE LEGISLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. As Bill C-125 is now dead, and as the minister in the statement of January 17 referred to matters which were to be dealt with under the bill to which there was objection such as termination of claims, calculating of benefits and severance and holiday pay, I should like to know whether the minister now intends to bring in legislation which will clear up this matter. What is his intention in this respect?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated the other day, I will be making a comprehensive statement on this matter in the near future.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We have pressed the minister now for about a week on the necessity of making a statement, and for one week he has told us that he will be making a statement in the near future. As this matter is of extreme importance, may I ask the minister what is causing the delay in the making of the statement, and can he give us some definite time within which the statement will be made? Certainly, this is a very important matter. Can the minister give us some assurances in this regard?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the future is nearer now than it was when I made this statement one week ago.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order. I ought at this point to remind hon. members that, according to the order made earlier, it is my understanding that the question period is to be limited to 20 minutes. However, I will recognize the hon. member, as I must, on the point of order, and then the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister a question and we are not very appreciative of his smart-alecky remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: With all due respect, my question was fair. Surely, if the minister is a gentleman he could give me a decent answer instead of trying to be so smart. I will ask my question again. Can he be more definite with respect to the time by which he will give the statement, and can he tell us why it has taken him a couple of weeks to prepare this statement?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I cannot add to what I said the other day. I will make such a statement very soon. It will be comprehensive. The requirement for me to be comprehensive means that I will need to take more time than would be necessary to prepare the kind of simplistic statement for which the hon. member may be looking.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am looking for a statement, not for smart-alecky remarks.

ALLEGED DENIAL TO QUEBEC TEACHERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Can he tell the House whether he intends to have specific discussions with the Quebec government to solve the problem of teachers who, when victimized by unemployment, are not entitled to any benefits and, if so, what specific measures does he intend to take regarding this?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge, I have had no such previous representation. I will be glad to get details from the hon. member or any other source and look into the necessity of such consultation. If it is necessary, I will be happy to do so.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair recognizes the hon. member for York South.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I met with representatives of the nurses of the Canadian Public Services for an hour or so last night. We had an interesting, and I think frank, discussion. I promised them an answer at the beginning of next week.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat to the hon. member that we do anticipate developments in the matter of communications with all provinces and that we shall meet as a federal-provincial conference on November 27 and 28.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Communications.

Could he advise the House whether he has considered the possibility of granting Quebec a sort of special status in this area?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): No, Mr. Speaker. Such a possibility will not be examined during the forthcoming conference. Instead, we shall try to agree on national and provincial objectives in the area of communications and see how these could be conciliated.

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT ON IMPLEMENTATION OF NEW RATES FOR CONTRIBUTIONS—POSSIBLE ADDITIONAL COMPUTER INSTALLATIONS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. When will he be announcing the new rates for employer and employee contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Commission and, if the minister does intend to implement the new rates, will he consider referring them to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration first?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will be making that part of my comprehensive statement to which I referred earlier.

Mr. Jelinek: Obviously, the minister is not prepared to give any answers today. I will ask an easier supplementary question. In view of the high initial cost of UIC computer installations, will the minister confirm whether UIC is planning any additional expenses on these computer installations?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the main investment in computer installation is now complete.We are constantly refining and trying to improve our operations, as I think hon. members wish us to do. As far as any further major investment, I have no information to give to the hon. member at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED WORLD FOOD BANK—CANADIAN POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the latest economic reports to the effect that the rich nations are getting richer and the poor poorer, and that poverty has become a way of life in the past few years to a degree not anticipated, what is the present position of the government of Canada with reference to a world food bank? What contributions, if any, has Canada tentatively agreed to make to such a world organization?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman may have noticed, or perhaps he has not, but when I was speaking to the United Nations General Assembly, I supported the latest initiative of the food and agriculture organization for a study of the idea of having food reserves, a world food bank or something of that nature. I also supported the initiative of Dr. Kissinger, the Secretary of State of the United States, who had proposed a world food conference. Therefore, I think I am on the same side as the right hon. member in believing this will be one of the most important problems facing the world in the future.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister, of course realizes, does he not, that under my administration I brought that subject before the NATO organization in 1957, and before the United Nations in 1960, and at that time the Liberal Party opposed it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether that is a question.

LOCATION OF FOURTH HEAVY WATER PLANT—CONSIDERATION OF QUEBEC SITE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Has the government made a final decision concerning the forthcoming construction of a fourth heavy water plant in Canada and, if so, is the province of Quebec still being considered as the possible site for building this plant?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the decision in this respect is not yet final. We are still considering a number of possible sites in various provinces. I can say, however, that the site proposed in the province of Quebec is also being considered.

[English]

LOCATION OF FOURTH HEAVY WATER PLANT—CONSIDERATION OF SITE IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): May I ask the Prime Minister if western Canada is being considered as a possible site for this heavy water plant?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There are at least two sites in western Canada which are being considered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members we have only 20 minutes today for the question period, and I see at least 40 members standing. Obviously, many will be disappointed.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Can the Prime Minister advise whether it has been made a condition of the announcement with regard to this heavy water plant in Quebec that there will be an announcement of plans for Manitoba and that one of the conditions to be included shall be the resignation of the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. Speaker: A question asked in those terms is obviously not in order.

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED ELIMINATION OF FAST WRITE-OFF PROVISIONS AND REDUCTION IN CORPORATE RATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In view of evidence that corporate profits in 1973 are going up at a faster rate than the cost of living, the consumer price index for food, wages and what have you, is the minister in his next budget planning to eliminate the fast write-off provisions and bring the corporate tax rate back to the level at which it stood a year ago?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that, of course, is a budgetary matter. I ought to indicate to the hon. member that as a result of the corporate tax reductions and the healthy profit picture, the capital intentions for business equipment and plant were raised by 19 per cent this year over last.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NEED FOR ACTION TO PREVENT EXCESSIVE PROFITS

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto Lakeshore): I have a supplementary question arising from the Minister's answer and assurances which the Prime Minister gave to the House on more than one occasion to the effect the government would contemplate whatever steps were required to protect the consumer from being gouged in the market place. In view of that statement and assurance, and in view of the evidence of rising corporate prices, can the minister indicate what concrete steps are being planned to prevent excessive profits being made?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that it is correct that the board has exceeded its budget. It submitted a preliminary budget for the fiscal year. Then, it submitted a further budget and that is under study. With regard to the question of salary, that is a matter for cabinet in the same way other similar points are for cabinet.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the ambassador of the Soviet Union called on me yesterday morning to ask me to postpone for one week my visit to the Soviet Union, and at that time he told me that the Soviet Union had no objection to Canada's participation. NATIONAL DEFENCE

GUELPH ARMOURY—NEED FOR REPAIRS IN LIGHT OF POSSIBLE DEMOLITION

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence and deals with non-productive spending by his department. I ask the minister whether he intends to continue paying taxpayers' dollars for the repair of armouries which are in the process of being negotiated with municipalities. My question arises from the fact that the Guelph armoury is in the process of being bought by the municipality and will likely be demolished, yet contracts for repair work are proceeding.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister might reply briefly, but this does seem to me a question that should be put on the order paper.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to look into the work being done in the specific armoury that has been mentioned.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—POSSIBLE TAKEOVER OF ADMINISTRATION BY OTTAWA—UNDERMINING OF STAFF

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of his statement two days ago that the director of the British Columbia penitentiary was retiring and certain other improvements would take place, and in view of his statement yesterday that directives had gone out from Ottawa to the penitentiary, would the minister advise the House whether his office in Ottawa is taking over the administration of the British Columbia penitentiary?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, we have not, but we are trying to follow up on certain matters at the British Columbia penitentiary, and hope that we can, with the director of the penitentiary and the regional director, return that institution to normalcy as soon as possible.

Mr. Reynolds: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister believe that by making directives in Ottawa he is undermining the staff of the penitentiaries?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is an argument, not a question.

NEW WESTMINSTER AND MATSQUI—ALLEGED HOSTILITY OF STAFF TOWARDS INMATES AND VISITORS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Solicitor General. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he would mind inquiring into the increasing level of hostility exhibited during the last two or three weeks on the part of wardens and staff at both Matsqui penitentiary and the B.C. penitentiary toward both inmates and visitors.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we have certainly had some difficulty at the New Westminster penitentiary, but I had no knowledge of trouble at Matsqui. I will look into it immediately and report to the hon. member.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

ALLEGATION THAT CONSULTANT MEMBER OF CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY OF UNITED STATES—SUGGESTED LIMITATION OF STAFF TO CANADIAN NATIONALS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware that one of the designers of the Economic Council of Canada's Candide computer model, and subsequently a consultant to the council having access to private information made available by several government departments was, for a time at least, a member of the Central Intelligence Agency of the United States? If not, will he make an inquiry?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly want to look into that.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the large quantity of sensitive information from the Bank of Canada and from the Departments of Finance and Industry, Trade and Commerce in particular, and in view of the potential value of this information to foreign governments, does the minister intend to initiate the steps necessary to ensure that membership on the council, its staff and persons undertaking contracts for it be limited to Canadian nationals who have been subjected to security screening?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That question, Mr. Speaker, will become more relevant, of course, after I have made the inquiry into the first question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Hellyer: May I ask a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask a last supplementary. I will then permit two further questions before calling orders of the day.

GRAIN

SUGGESTED PRIORITY FOR MOVEMENT OF TOUGH AND DAMP GRAIN FROM NORTHERN ALBERTA

Mr. Dan Hollands (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the harvest conditions in northern Alberta have been terrible, would the minister instruct the Wheat Board to give top priority for boxcars to move the tough and damp grain out of that area?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to discuss this matter with the Canadian Wheat Board. Ordinarily, they are very much aware of such circumstances and do attempt to move grain that needs special treatment, consistent with their other needs to get grain to market.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE WITH HOURLY RATED EMPLOYEES AT ATOMIC ENERGY PLANTS AT CHALK RIVER AND WHITESHELL—POSSIBLE SETTLEMENT—REPRESENTATIONS AS TO JOB SECURITY

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Would the minister inform the House what progress has been made or is being made by the renewal of discussions by the Allied Council representing 11 unions, and the management of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited with regard to a settlement of the eight week old strike of hourly rated employees of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited at Chalk River, Ontario, and Whiteshell, Manitoba?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The employees are voting on a new company offer this afternoon and we expect to have the result by tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might ask a supplementary question, and I will then recognize the hon. member for Lincoln before calling orders of the day.

An hon. Member: Another planted question?

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, no questions of mine are planted; I am interested in labour conditions in my constituency. In view of the antagonism or personality clash that has been evident in this strike, would the Minister of Labour make appropriate representations that job security after the strike is settled will be one of the conditions of an amicable settlement in order that employees will not be penalized as a result of this strike?

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Higson (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Transport state whether construction of an airport is being considered by his department for the Niagara peninsula, specifically in the township of West Lincoln, as an alternative site to the proposed Pickering airport or to replace the present Mount Hope airport?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the chamber is rather noisy. I should like the hon. member to repeat his question.

Mr. Higson: I shall be happy to repeat my question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might be allowed to ask his question and the minister respond to it, after which I will attempt to call orders of the day.

Mr. Higson: Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Transport state whether construction of an airport is being considered by his department for the Niagara peninsula, specifically in the township of West Lincoln, as an alternative site to the proposed Pickering airport or to replace the present Mount Hope airport outside of Hamilton?

• (1500)

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it can be as a substitute to the Pickering or Mount Hope airport.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the House leader will outline the business for the next few days in the usual Thursday manner?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow I propose to call second reading of the Customs Act followed by the Aircraft Registry Act, the National Parks Act, the Co-operative Credit Associations Act and on Monday, regardless of how many of those items we have cleared up on Friday, we will definitely begin the report stage of the Foreign Investment Review Act.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the House leader when we might debate the resolution in respect of our contingent to the UN peacekeeping force in the mid-east?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, following the visit of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to New York.

Mr. Stanfield: When is that?

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow. We will decide early in the week when to call the resolution, but on Monday we will definitely begin with the Foreign Investment Review Act, and at that time we will discuss when to call the resolution on the Middle East.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As has been done before on allotted days, may I suggest that the first four speeches by one member from each party be limited to 20 minutes and that the remaining speeches be limited to 15 minutes with no extra time. This could perhaps be made an order, as I understand there is some agreement. I would also hope that later this evening we may, in the normal way, reduce the time of speeches in view of the ministerial statement which will interrupt the proceedings.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion made by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell). Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—STATE OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMY UNDER GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot) moved:

That this House deplores the government's inability to give leadership in developing and implementing comprehensive and co-ordinated agricultural policies and programs and regrets that by ill-advised and ad hoc remedies the government has weakened the over-all agricultural economy.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in putting forward this motion I feel that you and the House should be made aware of some of the chaotic conditions that exist in agriculture today. Many people in Canada feel that the agricultural economy has had a good year and is basically very sound. However good a year it has been is in spite of the government's policies, certainly not because of them.

We have had a package of short-term and harsh adjustments to the agricultural economy over the past year. They were short term because the government was running a few scant steps ahead of the demands of the consumer. These harsh actions taken by the government brought about a short-term solution but in the long run will severely hurt the consumer as they will tend to bring about greater scarcity and higher prices in the following year.

What actually have we seen? We have seen established in Canada a host of what might be termed arbitrary prices. Prices have been arrived at in the grain industry in an arbitrary manner as well as prices in the livestock industry. This is certainly true, as has been pointed out quite vividly in an editorial that appeared in the October issue of Country Guide. Let me quote briefly from that magazine:

Governments can impose arbitrary pricing methods but, when mistakes are made by those doing the pricing, the farmer must pay for them. Worse still, arbitrary pricing can keep producers in the dark about market demand and prices, isolate them from the market and leave them with little choice but to devote more of their time to fighting political battles rather than managing their farms.

That certainly has been the case this past year. In any farm publication you pick up, be it the Western Producer, the Winnipeg Free Press or the Manitoba Co-operator, you will find the question asked, what is the price of this commodity and what is the effect of government policy going to be? An editorial in the Manitoba Co-operator of October 25 deals with six possible prices for barley in that province and suggests that the farmer is wondering what price he can expect to receive on the market for his grain.

Agriculture

Recently representatives of world grain growers and consumers of grain met in Winnipeg at the urging of the Canada Grains Council in an attempt, as Mr. Dever suggested, to bring about a greater degree of confidence in the industry on the part of producers. I quote briefly from an article which appeared in the Financial Post of October 20:

> The industry is distrustful, especially producers. We could have used more barley and rapeseed this year . . .
> But growers are reluctant to accept advice. We now have to foster more confidence that the advice is the best available at the time it is given . . .

What has destroyed that confidence is the system of abrupt and arbitrary pricing in the grain and livestock industries, which will eventually bring about higher food prices next year. Certainly we now have high world prices for our grain, with wheat at $5 a bushel. There was an adjustment last fall when a ceiling was put on the price that Canadian millers have to pay, with a resulting subsidy, some suggest about 70 per cent, to the Canadian consumer.

What effect will these subsidies eventually have on the Canadian market? I suggest they will bring about a lowering in the production of grain and livestock. We have seen grain priced on the world market at over $5 a bushel; yet at the same time we have experienced a tremendous shortage in our terminals. The terminals at Vancouver and the Lakehead are nearly empty and the St. Lawrence Seaway is just about to freeze up for the winter. I suggest that we will lose certain sales because of our inability to move grain.

Not long ago during an election campaign the government accepted some advice from members on this side and purchased 2,000 additional boxcars. I suggest the government should buy more boxcars now.

An article that appeared in the Financial Post of October 27 points out quite vividly that right now there is a shortfall of some 2,000 boxcars a week for the movement of grain to either Vancouver or the Lakehead. The article goes on to state:

> A Wheat Board official concedes: "We're going to be squeezed like a banana to fill our exports."

In other words, our sales commitments are there but we are not able to meet them because we have not paid enough attention to the movement of grain. No one wants to store wheat that is worth $5 a bushel. They want to sell and take advantage of the high price on the market while they can. There is no reason to believe that in the years ahead the price will continue as high as it is.

Recently Russia announced a 215 million ton crop, 16 per cent above what they expected and above the crop a year ago. The United States has had a bumper harvest this year in feed grain and other grains. So we must make every effort to meet the market conditions today in respect of the sale of wheat. The government has failed to pay sufficient attention to these facts. Both ministers in charge of agriculture have been too busy prancing about the country trying to claim credit for the high world prices instead of marketing Canadian grain in an efficient manner. We are told that marketing is very complicated in Canada today. The livestock industry for a number of years has been proud to be able to say: let the government leave us alone and our industry will take care of itself. The government has not left it alone this year.

Last March we saw a one-sided reduction of the tariff on cattle moving into Canada from the United States in an attempt to appease consumers on a short-term basis, but that did not seem to increase the popularity of the Liberal Party across the country with the consumers. So the government then announced an embargo on the movement of cattle out of Canada. Canada traditionally has been noted as a large exporter of beef, but our price has always hinged on the availability of beef for export. The government placed an embargo on export, which caused chaos. It caused the shutdown of the marketing system throughout Canada and a drop in prices of approximately ten cents a pound. Perhaps it could be argued that the price would have come down in any event. It might have, but it would have come down gradually and farmers would not have lost huge amounts of money because of the inexperienced minister in charge of the consumers, I suppose. It was the consumer affairs department or the Minister of Trade and Commerce that announced this action.

Some time in September the government became a little concerned about the livestock industry and reimposed the tariff of one and a half per cent to equalize the movement of cattle between Canada and the United States. Today we see huge numbers of cattle coming to Canada from the United States. Thirty per cent of our kill is United States beef. We kill a little over 50,000 head a week and that means that about 17,000 head at least of United States cattle are coming on to our market.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said in the House the other day that he had placed three different proposals before the cabinet but that he has had really little effect on the cabinet. Many good newspaper articles written about the present Minister of Agriculture say that he sounds like a farmer, talks like a farmer and must be a good Minister of Agriculture. One must do more than sound, look and talk like a farmer. One has to be able to get results and be able to sell the farmer's case to his cabinet colleagues.

There was a recent headline in The Grower, an Ontario paper—"Farm Policy a Tragic Farce". It points out that we have had three ministers tinkering with agricultural policy, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), the Minister of Agriculture, and the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang). There is also the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). Four ministers have been tinkering with the agricultural economy. The article in the October issue of The Grower goes on to say:

> In Ontario, Agriculture Minister Stewart and nationally, CDA Minister Whelan, have continually and vociferously put forward strong cases for farmers. Unfortunately, there is scant evidence that even their cabinet colleagues are listening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): We are told about a reduction in freight rates on beef coming from western Canada to Ontario. We anxiously await that and hope it will provide some kind of buoyancy for the cattle market in the west. We hear of the possibility of an embargo being placed on United States cattle. But we do not see action.

A few short months ago many people were asking why meat is so high priced in Canada. We were told it was because the United States economy has really been devaluated something like 30 per cent or 40 per cent in the past year and our economy has been devaluated about the same in relationship to the Japanese yen, the German mark and so on and that now our beef could move into those markets. Why does the government not make an attempt to move some of the surplus beef into those markets? We are told that steak is very expensive in Europe, that it is even higher in Great Britain and that it is higher still in Japan. Why does the government not make an attempt, even if it means the subsidization of shipments? It could even pay the freight and move the beef out so that our markets could be sustained.

Why is this so important to our markets? Today feeder cattle are moving into the United States at an alarming rate. If they move there they are fed United States grain rather than Canadian grain causing less employment in Canada. Apart from that, there are fewer placements of Canadian cattle in cattle feed lots and this will bring about a sharp increase in the price of meat next year if we are not careful. If we do not encourage our feed lots to fill up this fall we are bound to have a high price for beef next year and a scant supply. A one per cent reduction in the supply of beef causes a two per cent rise in the price of beef. This is just about how it has worked in the past year and the way it will work in the future if the government does not immediately take some action to remove the chaotic situation in the grain pricing business and the cattle industry.

There are some definite steps the government could take which would immediately alleviate part of the hardship in the agricultural industry today. The feed grains policy of the minister is increasing the price of grain to western feeders by about nine cents a bushel because he arbitrarily tacks on a Wheat Board marketing cost even though much of the grain does not move through the Canadian Wheat Board. He attempts to subsidize to some extent eastern Canada. Who pays for the subsidy? The western grain producer. That subsidy should be paid out of the treasury. If it is a political decision to bring about a price for barley in eastern Canada which is less than the United States corn price, certainly the treasury should accept the cost of that political decision and not the Canadian grain farmer.

The Canada Grains Council seems to be concerned about the farmer and how he fails to listen to advice from the government and its experts. The farmer is in a strange position. He is the only man producing a commodity who does not know what the price of it is on the world market. The Wheat Board is supposed to be working for the farmer; yet it sells his product and does not tell him what he is getting for it. If the farmer could find out exactly what the world price was he would know what his commodity was worth and how much more or less of it he should grow. The old argument is that the Wheat Board cannot reveal these prices because then our competitors would know. If one has a friend who has a friend he can phone a Japanese importing company and find out what Canadian barley is worth. Is it worth $3.25 today at the Lakehead? I would think it is according to my sources. But as a producer I should be told by my selling agency what my product is worth on the market. A man manufacturing automobiles or anything else knows what his commodity is worth on the world market. The farmer is supposed to remain in the dark and take the advice of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Traditionally he has learned over the years to do the opposite and by doing so he probably comes out better.

Two steps could be taken. The treasury should pay the subsidy rather than the grain farmer and the grain farmer should be told what his grain is worth on the world market. The minister has attempted to do this in his announcement that half of the final payment on barley will amount to 58 cents a bushel, but even that estimate will fluctuate from month to month. It may go down, particularly after the announcement regarding the size of the Russian crop. The minister should buy and build more boxcars and he should appoint a rail co-ordinator who would have the power and authority to direct boxcars for the movement of grain to the markets. It is a colossal shame when we read in the Financial Post that we may not be able to meet our market commitments because grain is not at the ports and we are running short of at least 2,000 boxcars a week. We need boxcars. If another election takes place soon, the minister may want to create good feeling throughout the country. If so, he should be issuing those orders right now, and a railway co-ordinator should be appointed to direct those boxcars for the use of the grain industry.

With regard to the beef industry, most people who are connected with the beef industry just hope that the government will get out and stay out. They know how to cope with the weather and with the markets, but politicians befuddle most of the men in the beef industry and make them wonder.

The government could do a number of things to deal with the chaos that exists in the beef industry. It could bring in an embargo on imports for a limited period of time. Thirty per cent of the kill is a huge kill and depresses the market badly. As I said before, it could make some effort to ship large amounts of beef to Japan or Europe. It could increase the tariff. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) spoke about some kind of freight reduction on western beef moving to central Canada. He has not come out with it yet. We are listening. People in the industry are wondering when it is coming.

There are four steps which could be taken with regard to the livestock industry which could bring back immediately some degree of confidence to the industry and at the same time would enhance the image of the minister. We are getting tired of seeing this lovable farm boy prance about the country.

Mr. Whicher: Farmers are not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Yes, the farmers are tired of it. Farmers are saying: let us have action. They like lovable farm boys but they say: Let us see how well he will sell our case to the cabinet. That is how the last Minister of Agriculture lost his seat. He failed to sell the farmers' case to the cabinet. I would not want this to happen to the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) because he is a likeable lad. This is why I urge him today to make an effort to sell his case to the cabinet. I do not want to continue to read in farm papers that unfortunately there is scant evidence that even the minister's cabinet colleagues are listening. It is very depressing to think that our lovable Minister of Agriculture has no sales ability in the cabinet. He can talk like a farmer to the farmers and they like that. He has the odd story he can tell which goes over well, but the beautiful thing about him is that his speeches are brief. Rarely does he make a long one. It is not because he does not know quite a bit about the industry, but farmers do not like longwinded politicians and they appreciate his short speeches. But he will have to start producing.

An hon. Member: We don't appreciate long speeches either.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): There is no fear of that. I am limited to 20 minutes, whether or not I might need more. The minister will have to start producing. His cabinet colleagues must be told that inflation cannot be fought by hurting the farmer. The farmer is the last person who should be hurt. I should like to read the following statement from an editorial in the Country Guide for October:

> Federal government has been under tremendous pressure to do something to dampen the fires of inflation. In its frantic scramble to respond, it turned its guns on, of all groups, farmers.

This is the last thing the minister should allow his cabinet colleagues to do in the fight against inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, following the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) is not an easy task. He spoke about the beef industry and what we were doing. We will be meeting with the people representing the beef industry tomorrow morning in Ottawa. They have been asked to come here to discuss some suggestions or proposals that we want to discuss with them—

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I hope you will talk to the whole cabinet about it.

Mr. Whelan: —before any action is taken. Let us be fair, however. If you remember, the beef industry people told me and the government to keep hands off. They thought they could cope with the situation on their own.

Some hon. Members: You did not.

Mr. Whelan: This is what they wanted until about a week ago last Monday. We have been following the circumstances and checking with our counterparts in the United States as well as checking with the industry in Canada, the producers of beef, packing firms, etc. to find out what they thought should be done. We are ready to make proposals to the beef industry tomorrow and will do so.

[Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).]

Too many people have been saying that we put an embargo on beef. We did not do that. Normal marketing of beef was allowed to continue, and those who made applications for export of beef from Canada found that hardly a permit or application was refused. They were issued readily even before the United States took off their price freeze. I do not know what those who are advocating a price freeze—the party across the way has advocated quite openly a 90-day freeze—thought would happen if a freeze were imposed, but I hope they forecast something different from what has happened in the United States following the removal of the freeze.

The Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, when a price freeze was discussed, said that anybody who would impose a price freeze on food would be an idiot. Two weeks later the President of the United States put on a price freeze. The Secretary of Agriculture then stated that he and the President had agreed and that when the President made a decision he always agreed with him. However, the price freeze caused utter chaos in the North American beef market. It disrupted the normal patterns of trading.

We took off our tariff on beef in the spring. We discussed this with our U.S. counterparts at that time, and I think they fully intended to remove their tariff. But they did not. This was a disappointment to us because we would have liked to see the free-flowing market continue. It was disrupted by their action much more than by ours. Recently I heard that one U.S. official who spoke in Canada said that when Canadians make a proposal about removing a tariff the Americans will listen. If that is so, they did not hear very well because we did take off the tariff but they did not remove theirs.

Many people are not aware that we have a low tariff or no tariff on many of the commodities that come into Canada while the United States has tariffs on products going into their country. Let us take corn as an example. We have an 8 per cent tariff on corn coming into our country while they have a 25 per cent tariff on corn going into the United States. Soybeans enter Canada free of tariff, while soybeans going into the United States have a 60 cents a bushel tariff. So they are not the freetraders some people think they are.

The fact that some hon. members do not know what the government agricultural policy is does not mean there is no policy. Some hon. members do not understand agriculture and farming well enough to recognize a good policy when they see one. Agriculture is the most important single industry in the entire nation and it is one of the most successful. It became successful as a result of the fact that the policies of the federal government did not stand in the way of development but made it possible for farmers today to reap the largest cash income in our history, to sell to more markets than ever before and to provide this nation with the best quality food in the entire world, and plenty of it.

Those who say there is no national policy in agriculture do not know what they are talking about. There is a national policy, and a very good one. If anyone wants to attempt to put the government's agricultural policy into a few words I would say it is to provide the framework within which Canadian consumers can be assured of a steady supply of wholesome food at reasonable prices, and to provide farmers and the whole agricultural industry with a reasonable income comparable with that of the rest of Canadian society.

Earlier today in the House it was pointed out that I said something about what vegetarians could live on. But let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that at that same meeting a representative of a senior citizens group got up and said something very significant. Of course I was not writing it down, but it is on my tape machine.

Mr. Stanfield: Let's have the tape.

Mr. Whelan: The tape machine was sitting on top of the desk so everyone could see it. I do this so that I know what I said when I go home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Do you have doubts sometimes?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I want to tell you what this representative of a senior citizens group said. She could have said it to you, Mr. Speaker, because I know you also would have listened. She said they had a meeting among their group that day and discussed many things, and they came to the conclusion that for their money food was the best bargain they get today in the city of Toronto. She went on to explain why and she did a very good job of it. I asked if she was a Liberal and people told me they did not know, but I thought that such a well informed person would be welcome in our party. She said that when she and her husband were married in 1920 butter was 86 cents a pound and her husband's wages were less than $2 an hour. Butter today is less than 86 cents a pound and the average wage in Canada is $3.50 an hour.

An hon. Member: And we still have a Liberal government.

Mr. Whelan: Total cash income for farmers is higher today than it has ever been in our entire history. Net farm income is higher today than it has ever been. And both continue to improve. This has been a goal of every government, of every political stripe, since the time of Confederation. But under this government's national policy we are making solid, concrete progress.

I might add that Canada has been doing a better job than any other nation in the world, and doing it without putting farmers on welfare and without turning agriculture into a public utility.

The number of profitable family farms has been increasing, not decreasing as many people think. In 1966 there were about 95,000 family farms in Canada selling more than $10,000 worth of food. By 1971 the number increased to more than 113,000 family farms selling more than $10,000 worth of food. I am positive that the figures for 1972 and 1973, when they are gathered, will show an even sharper increase in the number of profitable family farms. I think it would be safe to guess, in fact it would be a very conservative guess, that the figure would reach 175,000 family farms.

Canada's food production has kept on increasing even though the acreage that farmers work has held about steady, at around 170 million to 174 million acres for more than 30 years. The acreage has changed hardly at all but production has increased steadily.

When this government took over, farm exports were falling and we were losing markets all over the world. The government's national farm policies have turned that situation right around and our farm exports are increasing. Canada's record is one of the best in the world, much better than the United States even with its highly publicized grain sales of last year.

In 1960 Canada's agricultural exports were about $900 million. In 1970 they were up to $1,993 million. In 1972 they kept on going up to over $2 billion, and there is no doubt that they will be higher again in 1973. That is performance under a policy that brings concrete results where it matters, in the farmer's pocketbook and in the active, healthy expansion of the related supply and processing industries.

In 1971 exports alone amounted to $5,443 for every single farm in all of Canada—big farms, small farms, hobby farms, all kinds of farms. If you count only commercial farms the ones with sales of more than $10,000 a year, exports amounted to more than $17,600 per farm.

I picked the figures leading up to 1971 on purpose because they show what was happening before the world got into the present international monetary mess, before the price of food started to increase on world markets, and before there was a worldwide tightening of food supplies. They show that Canada's farmers, under the national policies of the government, were taking every advantage of their position as the world's most efficient, the world's most productive, the world's best farmers. Canada's farmers did not get to be the most efficient, the most productive, and the best in the world simply by chance. They did it with the help of our national farm policies.

The role of the federal government, as this government sees it, is to provide the services and the laws that Canadian agriculture and Canadian farmers need to do their job. The role of the federal government is not to do that which farmers and the agricultural industry can do for themselves and do very well. That should be left, as I have said, to the farmers themselves. The role of the federal government is to do those things that the agricultural industry and farmers cannot do for themselves.

This government has used its role to provide our farmers, and our agricultural industry, with the opportunity to earn a level of income that is at least equal to that of everybody else in our society and our economy. But now that we are making reasonable, decent gains in this direction, there are some hon. members who want to take that away again by unwarranted intervention to force food prices down again, to drive our agricultural industry into poverty and our farmers into the backwash of society once more.

Let me warn this House, Mr. Speaker, that today's farmer-businessman will not stand for it, that he will get out of farming and put his money elsewhere. Only those who cannot afford to move out will be left to carry the burden of food production for the nation. That is no way to guarantee ample supplies of good food to consumers.

Agriculture is the most important industry in all of Canada. It is also one of the most complex. There are many different types of products. There are many different types of markets for the same product. And there are many different regions, each with different production problems. When one considers our climatic conditions from coast to coast it does not take much imagination to understand what I am saying. It is obvious that no one-track policy will do a proper job for our agricultural industry and for our farmers. You cannot do the job with one single stroke of the pen when you have ten provincial departments of agriculture with ten different agricultural policies for farmers.

I am going to spell out our policy as simply as I can so that all hon. members will understand our national policy and see that there is a co-ordinated national farm policy.

First, Mr. Speaker, we have policies and programs to assist in the adjustment and development of effective family farms. The Farm Credit Corporation provides the money so farmers can invest to develop profitable family farms. The Farm Credit Corporation has been so successful that it has become the No. 1 source of long-term credit for farmers in Canada. We have kept the interest rate on Farm Credit Corporation loans at 7 per cent. The Farm Credit Corporation has been so successful that people do not look anywhere else for credit but go to their FCC credit adviser first. Only then, if they cannot get the money there, do they go somewhere else.

The small farm development program was planned by the federal government, and today is operating in every province except Newfoundland. This program has been tailormade to fit the different circumstances in each province, and we have federal-provincial agreements and federal-provincial co-operation. We have had that this year, or since November 27, 1972, when I became minister. I have recognized what I know is real, true co-operation, and so far as I am concerned we have had it from most of the provinces.

The amount of loans made by the Farm Credit Corporation in the last four months—and this is the trend in agriculture and I hope it continues—shows that young people now have more confidence in agriculture than they have had for a long time because 40 per cent of the loans have been made to farmers under 26 years of age. The small farm development program helps family farms to develop to the reasonable profit point and it helps other farmers now trapped on their small farms to retire with dignity or to get a better paying job. Nobody is forced out of business. Only those farmers who want to quit or want to retire get help. That is what the program is for, so that they can retire in dignity or get a change of occupation.

Through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion the government has also provided help through programs such as community pastures, reforestation, and substantial help to set up processing and marketing companies in rural areas. The results are plain to see in areas where this has taken place. Production increases locally to supply the new industries.

[Mr. Whelan.]

The second grouping of policies and programs helps agriculture and farmers to meet unusual market situations and heads off pressures that would disrupt the industry by forcing farmers and entire regions into bankruptcy. The main policies and programs that fall under this heading are those connected with the Agricultural Stabilization Board, the Agricultural Products Board and our national marketing legislation. The Agricultural Stabilization Board offers farmers price stability. The Agricultural Products Board offers market stability by handling temporary surpluses. Furthermore, we have taken the leadership and have invited the provinces to develop jointly even better price and income stabilization programs. We did this in September and it had never been done before. The provincial ministers of agriculture were impressed. The minister from Ontario, who has been longest in office, said that he had never attended a meeting that had given him the impression the federal government was really concerned about doing something about agriculture. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that they all agreed with our philosophy on what should be done to stabilize agriculture in Canada.

Marketing legislation provides help for co-operatives so that they can, for example, pay farmers an initial price. This is the first time in the history of my department that there has been a special group to work with farm co-operatives. Marketing legislation has been provided so farmers can set up national marketing agencies. Crucial market information is provided by the department through regular reports such as the weekly livestock report, the daily potato report, the weekly fruit and vegetable report and so on. This government has provided leadership and money to help agriculture and farmers to find and sell to new and larger markets both inside Canada and abroad by providing a $10 million fund.

The third broad grouping of programs and policies covers our efforts to help agriculture and farmers expand markets and improve marketing. I have already mentioned the national marketing legislation and some of our market development work. But one of the most important things this government does to promote markets is to set up and run some of the world's best grading, inspection, health and sanitary programs and policies. Because of this government's policies and programs and the dedicated work of the staff of the Canada Department of Agriculture, we have the healthiest livestock in the world, we have the highest quality products in the world, and we have access to more markets than any other nation in the world. And we do not stand pat on our record but are continually improving our standards and our performance. This government provides agriculture and farmers with market information on a daily, weekly, monthly and annual basis.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) mentioned the monitoring of feed grain prices and I am sure someone else will refer to it later. I was in western Canada for four days last week and I talked to many farmers there. No matter what the hon. member for Crowfoot or anybody else says, I think it is my duty to talk to farmers and to listen to them. After every meeting I have with them there is a question period and I listen to what they think the Canada Department of Agriculture should do and what they think the government of Canada should do. I just cannot take what members of the opposition tell me, Mr.

Speaker; I want to hear for myself and I will continue to do that. I only accept about one-tenth of the invitations I receive from farm organizations and I attend these meetings on Wednesday or Friday night or the weekend. Rarely do I ever miss a day in the House or in my office. The time is not sacrificed from my job or in the House of Commons; it is sacrificed by my family which is probably not proper. I challenge anyone to put their record in the House or their duty as a member of parliament against mine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I might say, too, that I use the government plane and that every time I do I will take guests with me. I will take other Canadians with me to see what other parts of Canada are like so they can understand the position of agriculture in relation to the whole nation.

Every three months the Canada Department of Agriculture prepares factual information and outlook material and provides this information to the industry and to farmers. It is impossible to provide completely accurate forecasts in agriculture. For instance, no one forecast what was going to happen to agriculture this year. No one, not the greatest adviser in the United States or in Canada, not one of them told us what was going to happen.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I hope something constructive comes out of this discussion today. As Minister of Agriculture I will be the first one to recognize it and put it into force. All I can say is that from past performance in this place and in the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and I will just use the instance of the little crop insurance bill—

An hon. Member: That is the only bill.

Mr. Whelan: That may be the only bill, Mr. Speaker, but any bill that took longer than that would take two years to get through.

An hon. Member: Try it!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just said that no one could have foreseen what was going to happen to agriculture in the last year or in the last six months. What he is actually saying is that in agriculture we are in a similar situation to that in which we find ourselves with regard to energy, that there has not been a long-term program. As is charged in the motion, agriculture has been dealt with only by short-term programs. The farmer, like the government, was caught flat-footed when trying to deal with a situation without real confidence in the future. Mr. Speaker, we need confidence if we are going to discharge our responsibilities to the people of Canada.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) can go about the country saying that we have cheap food if he wishes but he has not convinced the consumer of that. He has not even convinced his own colleagues because the government has set up a Food Prices Review Board to find out what is wrong with the cost of food in this country. The minister says that he is to meet tomorrow with the beef producers. I hope he also meets with other people involved in the industry. I hope he is going to do a thorough job so he can come back to the House with a policy for the red meat industry that will bring some confidence to it. In my province, the provincial government had to pay a price support for hogs to ensure the maintenance of a decent level of hog production. That is a role that the Federal government should be fulfilling. The government ever since the second world war has had the responsibility for an agricultural prices support program.

Let me return to beef. What is the government's record? I say that its record is shabby and unco-ordinated. Unilaterally it took off the tariff on beef coming into Canada. It did not obtain any assurances in exchange for removing the tariff. It just took it off unilaterally. People in the cattle producing business said the government was wrong. We said it was wrong, but that made no difference. Next we witnessed an embargo which the Minister of Agriculture said was not an embargo. Everybody else understood that it was an embargo but he said it was not. If it was not am embargo, why did he impose it? Whom was he kidding? Whom was he fooling? His actions only contributed to the confusion of the industry. Later he reinstated the three cent tariff. Apparently he also got rid of the embargo.

Let me tell the minister that the western producers want to know what the government's real policy is. They have seen beef prices fall from $60 a hundred to $44. That is quite a spread. There is no significant support price. The minister says that he cannot get appropriate legislation through the House. I say that if he were to bring legislation before the House that would provide up to date support prices, it would receive passage. The price support legislation on the statute books is hopelessly out of date. The support price based on 80 per cent of the average price in the previous ten years is useless considering the present rate of inflation of 4 to 5 per cent per year. You do not need to be a mathematician with a slide rule to figure out that a support price based on that kind of theory will not be anywhere near the actual prices in effect. In view of this lack of policy and lack of realistic support prices, agricultural producers are wondering where they are to go from here.

The Minister of Agriculture is also responsible for making sure that Canadian consumers have available adequate supplies of food at reasonable prices which will return to the farmer at least his cost of production. Notwithstanding this responsibility, one year ago we imported 27 million pounds of butter. I wonder how many million pounds we will import this year. I wonder how many pounds of New Zealand lamb we will import, assuming New Zealanders have the lamb and want to send it to this country. I wonder if the government will reinstate a support price for wool that will encourage wool production in Canada, assure a stable market for wool and make sure that we do not pay through the nose for the wool that is necessary for the suits and other clothes we wear every day. When will the government do that?

The minister can stand up and tell us what a wonderful job the government is doing through the Farm Credit Corporation. Any developed country, such as Canada, that does not have a properly working agricultural credit program is hopelessly out of date. That program is not a major achievement; it is a necessity in this day and age. Let the minister deal with the problems facing Canadians. Despite inflation that is admittedly world wide, it is the duty of the government to introduce production policies that will meet properly the needs of Canadians. That is the fact with which the government must contend. It is against this background that we must consider support programs for hogs so that farmers producing hogs will stay in business.

At the same time, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board has been disrupting and tearing apart one of the few stabilizing factors governing prairie agriculture and the western regions. While he has been in the process of tearing this apart he has been saying, "Wait until next year, when we will have a better program." Perhaps the minister should read the publication put out by some outfit in Regina which is entitled "Next Year Country".

While the minister was telling western farmers what a good deal he has in store for them, the Minister of Agriculture on October 17 was in South Mountain telling eastern farmers that they could look forward to cheap western feed grains because of the new policy the minister in charge of the Wheat Board was putting in place. The National Farmers Union Newsletter of October 22, 1973, says in part:

> In the light of that blatant pitch to greed it was refreshing to hear an eastern farmer stand up and say that he wasn't interested in cheap grains at the expense of prairie farmers.

So there are the two sides to the coin. What are the facts? According to the Canadian Wheat Board announcement, as of October 22 the price of No. 3 Canada Western Red Spring Wheat for domestic feeders in Quebec, Eastern Canada and British Columbia was to be $3.41⅝, f.o.b. Thunder Bay. According to the Western Producer of Thursday, October 18, the selling price of No. 3 CWRS, or Red Spring Wheat, as of October 12 by the Canadian Wheat Board, at Thunder Bay, and the IWA price as supplied by Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, Country Elevator Division, was $5.49½.

Mr. Lang: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, when I am through. I have only 20 minutes and I wish to continue my remarks.

Mr. Lang: Does the hon. member have the price for domestic wheat that day?

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I was quoting.

Mr. Lang: The domestic price was lower.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to figures that I assume must be known to the minister's own department. These prices for No. 3 CWRS are quoted in the Star-Phoenix of October 23. I was also quoting figures carried in the Western Producer. Those indicate the prices that are quoted by the Wheat Board when selling No. 3 CWRS wheat out of Thunder Bay.

Mr. Lang: Give us the Wheat Board's domestic price for that day.

[Mr. Gleave.]

Mr. Gleave: The minister can stand up later and say what he wishes. I am not trying to mislead the House, as he is suggesting. I am presenting facts to the House. I am saying that the Canadian Wheat Board, under this new policy, is being required to supply 3 CWRS wheat at the lower price I have quoted at domestic points in Canada. The price available of course, is the price less the cost of moving the wheat to Thunder Bay. If you are in the prairie region the price available must take into account the cost of moving wheat to Thunder Bay. At any rate, the export price quoted is the price which the Canadian Wheat Board will receive for that grade of wheat delivered to our customers who buy it for export at Thunder Bay.

I really do not intend to labour the point, because the over-all approach of the policy is more important than the particular price. In place of a clumsy and unworkable price system which is difficult to administer and under which it has taken many weeks before a final price was arrived at, we need a marketing system that is workable and efficient and a price system under which prices can be quoted from day to day, without any question or doubt. We had such a system before the minister attacked it. The Wheat Board could deliver grain without question to those who needed it. It was in a position to guarantee supplies to those who wanted them. There is a real danger it will not be able to do this in the foreseeable future if substantial supplies are bought by the Agricultural Products Board or other purchasers outside the Wheat Board. If those other purchasers choose to buy substantial quantities, the Wheat Board will run the risk of not having supplies readily available. These possibilities concern me even more than the present inequity of pricing.

● (1600)

I could quote more figures. The minister will undoubtedly quote more. The minister's price systems multiply like rabbits. He has all kinds and all colours. You can take your pick. There used to be only one pricing system but the minister has many.

In answer to a question yesterday about quota system problems, the minister said he knew there were problems but once he got the grain rolling he would straighten them out. Unfortunately the block system which was developed over a period of years and was very efficient is now not working well. The minister said this in his statement yesterday.

On the north side of my constituency, the grain elevators are congested. They have been congested throughout this crop year. One quarter of the crop year is now over, and some farmers have not been able to deliver their grain. This is the kind of grain policy we have with this government.

There is one grain policy for western Canada and one for eastern Canada, the area east of the Ottawa river. No wonder the Minister of Agriculture is happy to talk to the Ontario farmers. They are one of the groups which will get the gravy. The minister says his feed policy will bring equity to all farmers in Canada. However, it will have very little to do with one of the two largest producing areas in this country, namely central, south-western and southern Ontario which produces corn, one of the major feed grains. Nothing is being done to equalize the price of corn. There is still a tariff on corn coming into Canada from the United States. If the Minister of Agriculture wants cheap corn for eastern farmers, as he said on October 17, why does he not remove the tariff? It would be less trouble to remove the tariff than to change the policies of the Canadian Wheat Board. It would be easier and quicker. Also, it would not cost the western farmer nearly as much.

I do not know where the government thinks it is going with policies of this kind. The Minister of Agriculture says that everything is cozy in the dairy industry. However, it was reported in the paper that another cheese factory east of Ottawa is closing. A group of farmers who were delivering to that cheese factory are now going out of production. I am sure the minister reads the papers, but he still says everything is cosy in the dairy industry.

We have imported butter. When the minister was on his feet, he should have told us what single or collective action this government and the Canadian Dairy Commission took in the past 12 months to ensure sufficient production of butterfat and milk proteins to meet the needs of the Canadian people and any demands for export. He did not tell us that because he and his government have not done a thing. They sit there shivering, worrying about the threat of inflation and fearing that if they give some real incentive to the farmer his production will rise again. Therefore they do not do anything in some of these important areas.

I think the five cents a quart subsidy to the consumer is good. Maybe some day the minister will tell us what the new dairy policy is to ensure the supply of sufficient dairy products for the Canadian people. After the minister meets with the beef people, maybe he can meet with the dairy commission and the dairy people with regard to boosting dairy production.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has now expired.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak on the opposition motion moved by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and which reads as follows:

> This House deplores the government's inability to give leadership in developing and implementing comprehensive and coordinated agricultural policies and programs and regrets that by ill-advised and ad hoc remedies the government has weakened the overall agricultural economy.

Since I do not have much time, hardly twenty minutes, I shall merely develop two points I wish to raise in the House. I heard the minister say that the department was trying to be fair to all parts of Canada and was working for the future of agriculture, but I shall give him examples of the type of justice that our legislation often bring about, not because of its provisions but because of the way they are implemented.

I shall first consider our farm improvement loans legislation. The 28th annual report for the year 1972 has just been published. Here is what it says:

> The Farm Improvement Loans Act came into force in March, 1945 for an initial period of three years and was subsequently amended from time to time to provide additional lending periods and widen its scope of operation.
> The purpose of the legislation is to facilitate the availability of intermediate term and short term credit to farmers for the improvement or development of farms and for the improvement of living conditions thereon.

All of this is very nice. The report continues:

> The main purposes for which Farm Improvement Loans could be made during the year under review were:
>
> —purchase of agricultural implements, new and used;
>
> —the construction, repair or alteration of farm buildings;
>
> —the purchase of livestock;
>
> —the purchase of additional farm land;
> —general works for the improvement . . .

When one reads this report, one becomes aware of discrimination against Quebec farmers. Although the government has been fighting for many years to remove regional disparities, I think that, in the area of agriculture, this bill does not sufficiently take regional disparities into account.

Let us consider loans for instance. On page 10, the heading of Table 3 is the following: "Loans Classified by Provinces and Purposes". For the information of hon. members, British Columbia has granted 1,584 loans; Alberta, 16,992; Saskatchewan, 18,340; Manitoba, 6,146; Ontario 8,703 and Quebec 282.

● (1610)

Mr. Corriveau: The figures for the province of Quebec are not right.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says the figures for the province of Quebec are not right. Never mind that.

An hon. Member: This is true.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): We all know the Farm Credit Corporation of Quebec, and I for one know something about it. Then, neither the federal government nor the Quebec government grant loans to farmers—

An hon. Member: Our farmers are too rich.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Are our farmers too rich? Far from it. Let us examine the situation more closely. Saskatchewan was granted 18,340 loans but only 282 were granted to Quebec. Quebec farmers cannot be indefinitely laughed at. We wonder why they are rebelling. The situation has been going on for 10 years—

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): How many applications for loans were made?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): The member for Laval is asking how many applications were made. I will answer him, because I have done much work in that field; applications were filed, but they were never accepted. Applications are not accepted. That is why I say that the law is good, but that its implementation is bad; I do not know whether that depends on the men in power or the present staff but we still cannot . . . I have been trying for two years now to get a loan for a farmer who has 150 slaughter cows, but he cannot get even a small loan. Inquiries after inquiries are made and all kinds of reasons are given; he has been a farmer for 42 years, he has three farm lands but he cannot get $5,000. There should be a limit, Mr. Speaker, to people being laughed at, to Quebec farmers' being the laughing-stock.

Let us look at another table, concerning improvement works. Shed and farm building repairs. In Alberta, 450 loans were granted; in Saskatchewan, 500; in Quebec, 24. As regards repairs and improvement works, it is the same thing, the same ratio: 218 against 19; in works concerning fences and drainage, in Alberta, 149 loans were granted; in Saskatchewan, 78, in Quebec, none. I know they still get small loans in Quebec but I simply want to emphasize the discrimination shown there.

Mr. Roy (Laval): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Laval on a point of order.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have only 20 minutes at my disposal and I intend to use all the time allotted to me. Then if I have some time left, I will reply to the hon. member.

I will permit him to ask me questions.

I have only 20 minutes, and moreover—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. If I do not misunderstand the remarks of the hon. member for Roberval, I do not think he is prepared to accept a question, and this is his right and his privilege. The hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): The minister of course is not aware of that, because if he were he would no longer let such things happen again. He would look more closely at that. I have myself worked with farmers to help them get loans, and I have been staggered. I was wondering why those loans were refused. Some will say: the farmers should borrow from the provincial government. But provincial government loans are not big enough and when farmers want bigger loans, they have to apply to the federal government. All things considered, they do not succeed at all in getting loans. And that is precisely why I wanted to draw the department's attention on this famous Farm Improvement Loans Act. Let no one tell me that fairy tale that we can get loans in Quebec. That does not help our big farmers who want to get organized and make progress, because I no longer believe in Quebec or in those loans.

The people in their—

Mr. Corriveau: Oh, oh! So you no longer believe in Quebec!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): They can say oh, oh! all they want. We must not forget that my region has lost 42 per cent of its farmers in the last ten years and we should now make both governments aware of the fact. In all fairness, something must be done to save the farmer.

Another point I want to raise is that of feed grains. Everyone knows that the East, particularly Quebec, is in absolute need of feed grains to compete with other farming areas and ensure its animal production of beef, hog and poultry. One does not need to have much imagination to see that. Earlier I heard the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) say: If we can get good prices this year, that is all we want, and the hell with the rest! That same hon. member wants to line his pockets during the good years without any consideration for other areas in Canada. Canada is not only the province of Quebec but it is not only the western provinces neither. Canada is all of the provinces. There is no room for that kind of reasoning. It is not reasonable to say: We will line our pockets as much as we can.

Judging from what some people say, the East and the West are two different countries. There is a price war going on between the two. Yet, we know that the central government is supposed to be there to ensure justice and balance. Westerners are taking advantage of the good years to get the highest prices possible at the expense of the East as a whole, including the province of Quebec, but come the bad yars they will be very glad to see the eastern provinces help them out with their taxes.

When they have a surpluses let them think about the eastern provinces which are faithful and regular customers.

I would like to quote from a column published in La Presse following a meeting of the Quebec Agricultural Producers' Union. It says: The West is destroying the competitive position of Quebec farmers in collusion with the federal government, in collusion with federal ministers. For the last 30, 50 years federal ministers have always been Westerners. Let us have from time to time a minister from Quebec, so that he may talk on behalf of the Quebec government. I do not blame the present minister, because I know him very well and he is one of the most honest. But in our province, people ask us: When are you going to appoint a federal minister from Quebec so he may talk on behalf of the eastern provinces? I think time has come to wake up, to think, to bring back equity.

The president of the Farm Producers' Union wrote the following: for the past 30 years, Quebec agriculture has been dependent on the mood of the heads of the Canadian Wheat Board which is in Winnipeg. And I would add that it is more powerful than this government. Quebec has always feared that the monopolistic powers of that board jeopardize the growth of agriculture in la Belle Province. But what happened during the 1969-71 period shows that the concern of Quebec farmers was grounded since production of goods such as eggs, hog, poultry has moved west over that period. In hog production alone during that period, production went up by more than 80 per cent in the west, while it increased by only 10 per cent in Quebec. These figures show that feed grains are an important factor in this area, for they are essential to egg, hog and poultry production.

We want to make two points here: the first, brought forward by the west, is that the increase results from the comparative advantages of the west; the second, made by

Quebec, is that the monopoly given by the Federal Wheat Board distorts healthy interregional competition and destroys the competitive position of the whole Quebec food chain.

The west suggests that it has clear advantages over Quebec as regards soil, space, production techniques and better-adapted structures.

● (1620)

In other words, the comparative advantages are the basis for the specialization of an area or a country in a given type of production. Furthermore, the areas exchange their products and this business is beneficial to all partners. In this context, the province of Quebec could move towards the production of industrial goods and the western provinces, towards agricultural production.

If we are going to quibble and be discriminatory, let us agree once and for all and tell the west: feed Canada and we will direct our efforts toward the industrial area. Basically, the president of the FPU was not wrong.

If we accept this theory as a whole, we neglect all the human and historical aspects and even some economic aspects of a society. Having analysed the arguments of Quebec, we will see why this theory of comparative advantages is unacceptable as far as feed grains are concerned.

Quebec maintains that the increase of 80 per cent recorded over two years in the west is not the result of comparative advantages but rather of the fact that the west has the power, thanks to federal support, and this is important, to move soilless productions westward.

To understand the problem quite well, let us say that the main point in this debate should be the cost of transportation of grains compared with that of meat products. There are two possibilities for Canadian agriculture: either we transport to the east the grain produced in the west and cattle is produced around big consumption centres, or cattle production is done in the west and meat products and eggs are transported to big consumption centres represented by Toronto and Montreal.

The selection of the production site for meat in this case would be based solely on the cost of transportation.

For example, let us take hog production as an illustration. In the east as in the west, the production of a hog requires about 650 pounds of barley or 13.5 bushels. In 1971, the cost of barley to produce a hog was $10.07. To understand how those two regions are more or less acutely competing, one must know how the two products are competing on the Montreal market, while supposing that only the feeding and slaughtering costs are considered. For the product in Montreal, it is supposed that the transportation cost is minimal and we reach a price of $18.22.

In the western provinces at $10.07 a hog, $4.13 transportation expenses should be added for a total of $14.20. Under such circumstances, westerners suggest they enjoy a comparative advantage of $4 per hog. What is actually happening?

What Westerners call "comparative advantage" is only pure and simple exploitation of Quebecers to the benefit of Westerners allowed by the supposedly national government of Ottawa. Here is why.

Let us ask the following question: If Quebec had been fairly treated, who would enjoy comparative advantages? Under perfect competition the products may be moved freely and prices of raw materials are determined only by supply and demand.

We should have been paying barley at the same price as western farmers, namely 75¢ a bushel or $10.07 for the total amount required to feed a hog. To those $10.07 you might add the regular transportation and handling expenses, less the transportation grant, namely 30¢ a bushel or $4.05 per hog, and this means for hog that under perfectly balanced competitive conditions Quebec would enjoy a comparative advantage of 8¢. That is exactly what was stated at the beginning of the article: the comparative advantages can be studied, provided all things remain equal. Therefore, the Canadian Wheat Board is distorting the entire competition system which should exist in Canada.

Since the beginning, we have been referring only to past events, but how was the grain problem in May 1973? The difference was exactly 29 cents a bushel, which means that western provinces will enjoy a comparative advantage of 29 cents for a bushel of barley, in their own language, but in legal terms, Quebecers were swindled. Bank robbers are convicted, but those who rob farmers are encouraged.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are going to call me to order. I would still have a lot to say, but I will come back on the matter later.

[English]

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate on agriculture in general. It was interesting to note when listening to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), and I have said this before in the House, that he makes a reasonably good speech when he addresses farm meetings—I have heard him once or twice—but makes a lousy speech in the House of Commons. He demonstrated that once again today. We have the unfortunate situation of the Minister of Agriculture really speaking as a Liberal politician and not as the Minister of Agriculture for Canada, and I think this takes away a good deal of his credibility.

The minister has also demonstrated the fact that he has no new ideas. Ever since this government came into power we have listened to the same kind of agricultural speeches suggesting how good everything is and how the present government is responsible for the high prices we receive for our products at this time. Of course, that is not true, and with the Minister of Agriculture it is virtually nonsense.

In his speech the minister took credit for existing agricultural conditions but failed to mention the tremendous increase in the demand for agricultural products all over the world. The minister of course, has had nothing whatsoever to do with this. In fact, some of the short-term policies of this government has hampered this situation. The minister also failed to mention the fact that the devaluation of the dollar has spurred to quite an extent the demand for food products not only in Canada but also in the United States.

I believe I have only 15 minutes, Mr. Speaker. If that is the case I should like to touch rather briefly on two points that I feel are important. The Minister of Agriculture alluded to the fact that the Farm Credit Corporation at the present time is going great guns. He mentioned that it was making more loans and satisfying more farmers. He suggested that there really is nothing wrong with it at this time. This kind of statement really places a question mark in most people's minds, because we all know nothing is so good as not to need change. I believe it is a fallacy for someone to suggest that no changes are ever needed. When one does so he is not only deceiving himself but also the people of the country. The Farm Credit Corporation is in need of changes. In certain segments it does not respond at times to the wants and needs of the farmers.

I should like to depart slightly from the speech of the Minister of Agriculture and try to outline briefly some of the things we believe might be helpful in respect of revising and improving the Farm Credit Corporation. We feel that part-time farmers should be allowed to qualify for farm credit and farm improvement loans where it can be demonstrated that the borrower has both the intention and the ability to become a full-time farmer. At the present time this is not the case. We should also like to see the Farm Credit Corporation used, at the discretion of the minister, in cases of partial non-payment of a farm mortgage where disaster strikes a crop in a specific area. We have seen such situations in the past year and a half. There have been specific instances where through no fault of their own agricultural producers have been almost forced off the land. I should also like to see a provision to make deferred interest payments on loans possible during the initial period, especially in respect of young farmers. This is a very important point. I certainly hope the minister will consider that thought, although I realize he has indicated that everything in respect of the Farm Credit Corporation is rosy.

Mr. Whelan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not indicate that. We are drafting new legislation and if the hon. member has anything to contribute I would be glad to hear it.

Mr. Murta: That is not a point of order. This interruption is an indication of another thing we notice about this minister. He is very touchy. The fact is that when anyone tries to criticize the minister—

Mr. Whelan: He responds.

Mr. Murta: —he responds and strikes out. The minister says he is drafting farm credit legislation. We will see, if and when it is drafted, whether or not the Minister of Agriculture has taken any heed of the points put forward by the opposition in the debate today.

We would also like to see a system of open-ended mortgages for farmers to make possible additional borrowing without refinancing and new security. From all our observations and discussions across the country we feel this is another area in which the Farm Credit Corporation could play a far greater role in agriculture.

The second point on which I should like to touch concerns feed grains and the marketing of feed grains. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) touched on it very briefly. At the present time we have a feed grains policy brought in by the government that is almost an impossibility because the majority of the people, except the few the minister responsible for the Wheat Board spoke to at his meeting, do not really understand the policy. It is a system under which at last count there were, I think, four or five barley prices including those of the provincial governments.

The situation is very mixed up and confused so far as feed grain marketing is concerned. I think this brings out the point that any government that tries to tinker with the basic premise of supply and demand will find itself in a very difficult position and one which is hard to explain to the farmers of western Canada. The situation is most confused and the road ahead is less clear than it was before the minister set out in the early part of August to solve, as he said, the feed grains problem. More than anything else, I believe the events so far illustrate that no pricing system can be workable, let alone fair, unless prices are allowed to find their own level in actual commercial transactions. I believe it is impossible for any arbitrary plan or paper formula to anticipate every possible effect and side effect, incidental or deliberate.

The new policy was worked out very laboriously and in some detail. It will succeed or fail because of influences which were not even imagined back in August before the blueprint for this policy was drawn up. I think this should be a lesson to all government planners, certainly those in the minister's department, who fill in the fine detail of any governmental program of this kind. It should be plain to them that any price not arrived at in a completely free market will be an artificial price and that artificial prices will not satisfy all parties to any transaction and certainly will not satisfy provincial politicians. I think it should also be a lesson to the minister, if he thinks he really can have his cake and eat it too by having a semi-regulated system which preserves the Wheat Board role to pacify pro-board forces and seeks to eliminate at the same time the anomalies inevitably associated with Wheat Board control. Finally, I think it should be a lesson to those who will vote in the upcoming rapeseed plebescite because this is a very important topic, certainly in western Canada.

I believe the whole situation in respect of feed grain prices and the mix-up in which the Minister of Agriculture fines himself, resulting in his having to go and try to explain his policy personally to the farmers in western Canada, illustrates that imposing a brand new system designed in some office on an existing market causes far more trouble than it eliminates. Hopefully, we will see a far more realistic result from the vote on the rapeseed plebescite in December.

I see my time is running out, Mr. Speaker, I shall not belabour the point any longer. It certainly has been demonstrated that agriculture has come a long way. It is about time it did. However, this has been because of external forces which have played a great role in respect of the increase in farm incomes. I believe it is dishonest for the Minister of Agriculture to take the credit in this area as he does time and time again in his speeches. I think the rural population of Canada will judge him accordingly when there is another election.

[Translation]

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think it is my duty at this stage to try and explain a few things to the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier). He referred to statistics a moment ago, and I feel that these figures go back to 1914 or that he is absolutely not aware of farm credits of the federal government. I would like to quote figures and I will be pleased to give him afterwards the documents where they come from.

On January 12, 1973, long-term mortgage loans granted by the Farm Credit Corporation were distributed in the following way: British Columbia got 175 loans for an amount of $8,300,000; Alberta received 788 loans for an amount of $27,436,000; Saskatchewan got 1,590 loans for an amount of $51,139,000; Manitoba received 425 loans for an amount of $13,398,000; and Ontario got 1,128 loans for an amount of $41,613,000.

May I draw the hon. member's attention on the fact that the province of Quebec received 666 loans for an amount of $21,232,000, an increase of 44.2 per cent for the first nine months of the year. I would like to quote more recent figures, that is to say those of April 9. I would like to repeat the same things about other provinces, for people will be able to see the difference.

Quebec received 862 loans for $21,968,000, an increase of 48 per cent over last year.

Mr. Speaker, I thought it was my duty to quote these statistics and if the hon. member for Roberval wants to check them I will be pleased to give them to him. These are official statistics.

● (1640)

Mr. Speaker, the federal government has drawn up a number of programs to subsidize agriculture which have greatly contributed to make foodstuffs as cheap as they are today in Canada. I do not intend to name them all but allow me to simply give a few examples.

The government of Canada was the first to set up an agricultural food research institute, a fact that is too often taken for granted in this country. Research enabled our farmers to stay at the top not only in terms of production but also in terms of quality. The research stations represent only part of the overall research effort. The Farm Credit Corporation has become the main long term source of financing for the improvement and development of agriculture. The federal-provincial agreements under ARDA were the most important individual programs designed to update and improve the structure of rural communities and agriculture in many areas.

The federal-provincial crop insurance programs have helped to offset crop risks. The government brought in amendments to this act in order to increase its contribution to the premiums from 25 to 50 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture introduced Bill C-129, an Act to amend the Crop Insurance Act, which received royal assent in September. It provides for a new method of sharing the costs of crop insurance between the federal and provincial governments, so that the farmers of every province will now only pay 50 per cent of the required premiums.

Several reasons prompted the government to introduce that bill. First, it wanted to make premium costs uniform for all Canadian farmers. Now, thanks to our proposal, farmers will all pay the same premiums and the federal government contribution to the program will be more equitable. It wanted also to urge the provinces to increase their efforts to make the program readily available to all farmers. Thanks to our proposal, as the provinces share of crop insurance costs increases, the cost to the federal government will increase faster than that of the provinces.

For its part, the federal government has taken the necessary steps to help the farm industry build itself a better and more secure future.

We have raised taxes on capital gains on the transfer of farms from one generation to the next. This is a great advantage for family farms which are the best type of operations we have in Canada.

We have proposed amendments to the Crop Insurance Act in order to help farmers offset losses of income because of ruined crops.

Through the Small Farm Development Program, we have helped Canadian farmers make their family farm operations more profitable.

We have raised the ceiling of farm loans granted by the Farm Credit Corporation and the Senate has approved the increase of the ceiling on loans granted under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

We have also passed a measure to enable the farmers to set up national marketing boards. A well managed agency will benefit the producers as well as the consumers by ensuring more stability and more efficiency in marketing.

The farmers have set up for themselves one of the most efficient production systems in the world.

The Canadian government has also helped the farmers to establish their own marketing systems.

The farmers own a large part of the wheat handling and storing facilities in western Canada, and they also own one of the most important milk processing plants, the most modern and most efficient in all Canada.

They have set up about 120 provincial marketing agencies and this year, the first national marketing board for eggs, and they are discussing the establishment on a national basis of the marketing of poultry.

Farmers have taken the initiative in Canada and, without any substantial grant or excessive import control, they have set up modern, effective and competitive marketing procedures.

The Department of Agriculture is granting loans to farmers for the improvement and development of their operations.

In the small farms consolidation legislation, we offer special assistance to farmers who decide to leave the farm, either to retire or to take another type of employment. There are also federal-provincial special assistance programs for farmers in certain areas.

Mr. Speaker, the government intends to keep on helping farmers to compete on international markets in an objective and competent way. Farmers are naturally anxious to make as much as possible of the rather privileged situation they are in with regard to several agricultural products.

I add that the Canadian Dairy Commission is always on the lookout for export markets. When the United States asked for 25 million pounds of skim milk powder, the Canadian Dairy Commission was the first one to act and immediately call for tenders. We made every effort to get that market.

Indeed, half of the American demand was met by Canada from the Commission's supplies and those currently available for trade, at an internationally competitive price.

That is the kind of quick action that a national marketing board can take, and it is another good reason for those who are against such board to reflect on their ability to co-ordinate the efforts for increased exports.

We want the Canadian Dairy Commission to be the best of its kind in the world. This is a considerable objective, but we accept the challenge and will do our best to meet it.

The Department of Agriculture of Canada is co-operating with provincial representatives in order to develop a better and more complete facilities inspection program.

The federal government has accomplished a lot of work on the sidelines to develop today's new markets. As regards the livestock industry, we have established a new classification system; we have developed an importation program under which we can use the best producing subjects in the world to improve our stock; we have programs to test qualifications; we have opened new markets for livestock and sperms by means of commercial agreements like the one which was recently signed with Australia.

We also offer cash subsidies to farmers who increase their fodder production. But the federal government has not solved all the problems, and it cannot do so.

We have taken a dynamic position as regards the marketing of grain, including fodder. We have rejuvenated our quota system to improve our marketing. We have introduced new and better plant varieties. We have improved our transportation system to such a point that our exports are at an all-time high.

Those are all worthy achievements that helped to improve the farmers' lot, and it is only a beginning. To rest on our laurels is absolutely out of the question. On the contrary, we are determined to keep on working even harder since we foresee other great possibilities.

But I am convinced that Canadian farmers deserve 100 per cent of our efforts. I know we shall have to be persevering if we want to secure and enlarge our domestic and foreign markets for the benefit of Canadian farmers.

● (1650)

In another field, Mr. Speaker, we established an interdepartmental committee that will study proteins.

I believe we have reached a point where we cannot afford any more to live under a system that frustrates forward-looking individuals and organizations with the drive and the technical knowledge required to develop new products and open new markets for our farm products.

We reduced the income tax rate, and the biggest cuts benefited lower income groups.

We have reduced the customs tariffs on many items bought by farmers, including hardware and draining material.

We have reduced the customs tariffs on several food products, but we also warned farmers that we would be ready to restore them if the production of a particular product were threatened in the future.

We increased the direct subsidy for feed transportation to eastern Canada and British Columbia so as to maintain a healthy livestock industry in those areas.

We also changed the regulations concerning the export of foreign cattle with the establishment of quarantine stations, and that has created new outlets for our cattlemen.

Those are decisions already made and announced. We did even better, on the 1st of August, we introduced a new feed grain policy. The grain sector goes hand in hand with breeding, and those two branches of agriculture have bright prospects for development. The feed grain policy will be essential to the future of agriculture throughout Canada.

We have already provided the provinces with the Small Farm Development Program, which aims at helping directly the small farmers improve their future. Some provinces have already adhered to this formula of federal assistance.

We have not dared intrude in farm product marketing. We have been satisfied with passing an act which permits provinces to co-operate in the marketing process, in order to prevent a state of chaos from developing in the sale of farm products at the national level. During the past two years, the opposition used a smoke screen to prevent the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products. Hon. members of the opposition may find it advantageous to consult and agree on a policy. We, the members of this Liberal government, know what we want and have made it known.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I must regretfully interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:

[English]

The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Veterans Affairs; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)—Immigration; the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—Public Service.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that there have been discussions, and I believe I can say there is agreement to postpone tonight's late show until some other night and use that extra half hour for this debate in order to get in a few more speakers. We may do other things as well, but at least there is agreement not to have the late show tonight.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would like to double-check as I understand that to the moment there is not that agreement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Three out of four parties have agreed.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, it would be our wish that this debate continue until 10.30 and that the late show be cancelled. It would also be our wish that later in the day we reduce the time for speeches to ten minutes because of the number of members who want to take part in the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Chair does not see that there is unanimous consent. While hon. members carry on their discussions, and possibly reach agreement, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Middlesex.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O.58—STATE OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMY UNDER GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise as a member of the House who is very concerned about what this resolution implies, namely, the inability of the government to give consistent leadership in comprehensive and co-ordinated agricultural policies and programs.

Some hon. members, and possibly even some of the public on first thought, will question the practicability of this debate when, on the surface at least, most farmers, as the saying goes, never had it so good. But, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that I said "on the surface". I mean by this that unless the farming community can be assured that they will not once again be used as political footballs, then the profit-laden path so obvious now may once again deteriorate into a quagmire of below cost of production returns. As opposition members we have a responsibility forcibly to make the government more aware of this possibility than apparently it seems to be now.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, for some time now in the House I have pursued a line of questioning expressing concern about what is happening in the beef industry, which could quite easily have long-range effects on the industry and also on the consumers who, of course, are everybody. As one example, just this week I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) why a special cabinet meeting had not been called before last weekend in order to deal with the havoc to which our beef industry is being subjected at the present time. His answer was:

—cabinet meetings are called at my behest. The matter of time is one of internal administration. I call them as often as I find it necessary.

Time alone will tell if there should have been a temporary tariff placed on United States beef, both alive and dressed, entering the Canadian market. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) would also like to know the answer. Then he would not have to be guessing again about which way to move. Personally, I think such a tariff should have been imposed two weeks ago when it was quite obvious what was taking place. However, what the Prime Minister emphatically made clear in his answer to me and, more important, to the Canadian farmer, is that agriculture did not rate as high in his books as another political game that was being played last week, and won by his party, in the adjoining province of Quebec.

We all know that the Minister of Agriculture is continually crisscrossing the country, trying to put the message across that not only does our agricultural industry need to be strong but emphasizing that the government does really care. I have to admit that his so-called "Whelanese" has been well accepted by most of the farming community. It reminds me a bit of the advertisement for dog food which says, "all you need to add is love". I can assure the government that the farmers are expecting a bit more than just love at the present time. However, after the answer the Prime Minister gave me it will be very difficult for the minister to convince the farmers this government sincerely does care about their long-term welfare.

Let me review quickly what has happened leading up to the present state of confusion within the beef industry. First of all, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) lifted the one and a half per cent tariff on United States beef entering Canada. Later the U.S. beef producers restricted their supply to market because there was a temporary freeze at the processor level. This freeze meant the processor had a ceiling on the price at which he could sell the dressed product, which automatically set the price to the producer.

To beat this problem, U.S. beef was finding its way over here to be processed and then returned, which in turn had the effect of making our beef more attractive to the U.S. market and resulted in higher prices. Our government then imposed an embargo on the export of livestock and meat products. This caused considerable concern and a drop in prices to our own producers in Canada. The minister mentioned this afternoon in the House that it was not called an embargo but, whatever it was, the price went down in a hurry.

Next, the U.S. freeze at the processor level was lifted and opened up their home market. This encouraged heavy shipments which in turn depressed the U.S. home market.

Naturally, with our market buoyant we then witnessed, and still are witnessing, literally hundreds of loads of U.S. fat cattle being shipped to Canadian packers, particularly in Ontario. In the last six weeks Ontario packers have been able to buy these American cattle at up to 15 cents a pound cheaper. As an example, an 1,100 pound steer could be bought for $165 less. I am told by responsible buyers for Ontario packers that the United States influx has been so strong that they have had either limited or no orders for Ontario cattle in the last six weeks. I am afraid many of the Ontario beef producers, by virtue of not selling their fat cattle now, will be restricted both by lack of money and accommodation and will not be able to buy their normal requirements of feeder calves from the west, which in turn will reflect in yet further disrupted markets in Ontario next year.

The sad part of this exercise is that it not only puts our producers in a very tenuous position but also our consumers in general are not getting the full benefit of these lower prices. I am given to understand that the Ontario packers are in a position where they can offer beef to the trade at 25 per cent less than they could have six weeks ago. The consumers in many instances are not receiving nearly that much of a price advantage. This is the background that prompted me to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) on October 19 if he had contacted the Food Prices Review Board as to why they have not shown more concern regarding the fact that beef prices have not come down in accordance with live purchase prices. I was utterly amazed when the minister answered by saying, "I think this question relates more to the responsibility of the Minister of Agriculture". With all due respect, I think the general public, and they are all consumers, deserves a more responsible answer to a very serious problem facing all Canadians.

Mrs. Plumptre, under questioning this week by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher), tried to defend her obvious inaction in regard to the situation I have just outlined by saying that the board was looking into the fact that meat prices should be lower on account of lower live beef prices, but it would take a while for the lower prices to be evident since there is a time lag between killing and the retail shelf. What happened to the time lag when meat prices were going up so fast, bacon in particular on which as many as three escalating price stickers were put in one week?

I would like to give just one example of why I know beef prices have not come back down to a reasonable differential with live prices. Choice ground beef for restaurant consumption at the peak price cost $1.29 per pound. It now costs $1.13 and before the drastic escalation cost 93 cents. Beef hip cuts peaked at $2.25 per pound and are still $1.79, but there again they were $1.15 not that long ago. These are London prices, Mr. Speaker. If the Food Prices Review Board is really serious about protecting the public, producers as well as consumers, then it will have to think of something more credible than that as an excuse.

As I have stated before in the House, my riding is in the heartland of Ontario's general agricultural production. Milk, eggs, beef, turkey, pork, corn and beans are produced in great quantities with some taking first place in production in Ontario. I have in past years actively participated manually in the production of many of those products. This gives me a considerable advantage over many of my colleagues, regardless of their party affiliation, in analysing on behalf of both urban and rural dwellers when a particular product is being priced at the retail level out of proportion to the cost of production.

I am reminded of a planted question during the last campaign in one of the urban all-candidates meetings. It was: "What can you do for us here in the city?" My answer was then and still is now: One important contribution will be that because of my agricultural production background I will be able to recognize, and hopefully expose, if consumers are being charged unfairly for food products, or, as our socialist colleagues to the left would describe it, recognize "rip-offs".

One difference between my analysis and theirs is that I would expose unnecessary profits. They wish to eliminate all profits of business. They need to cut a new record, or at least change the needle, because I know the rank and file wage earner working for private enterprise business today recognizes his company has to show a profit or eventually he will not have a job. The members to my left will find this out in the next election.

Many people realize increases in food prices meet with much more resentment and bitterness than price increases in other commodities. The public becomes much more aware of a two cent increase for a dozen eggs than a $250 increase in the price of a popular automobile. Although these reactions may be classified as irrational consumer complaints in regard to spiralling food prices, they are indeed quite legitimate. Price movement in the food sector can be logically approached, analysed and explained but cannot be prevented or eliminated without, in essence, imposing upon our political and economic systems.

If, over the long haul, consumers in general are going to have food product prices kept in line, the federal government has to be able to make decisions intelligently in consultation with its provincial counterparts which will have the long-range effect of maximum production at a profitable level to the producer. They must listen to the farmer for a change. Granted, as in every segment of the society you cannot believe everybody, but there are ways to overcome that problem.

As a good example of not heeding the farmers' advice on beef production, because of the total banning of diethylstilbestrol, better known as DES, the cost of fattening cattle has increased by at least 10 per cent. It is clear to most people who are knowledgeable in the production of beef that the decision to ban DES was based largely on emotion. DES was suspended first in the United States and then in Canada when it was found that heavy feeding of DES to rodents used in research produced lasiums in their liver similar to cancer. DES residues of not more than two parts per billion were found in less than 2 per cent of the beef livers examined, and on the strength of this skimpy evidence food critics were successful in having DES removed from the market on the grounds that it represented a threat to human health.

There are two important measurements I would like to use by way of illustration. Two parts per billion are the equivalent of two inches in 16,000 miles and the average yearly per capita consumption of beef liver in the United States and Canada is one and a half pounds. In the August-September issue of the Farmers' Digest, Dr. T. J. Cunah, head of the animal science department of the University of Florida, provided the following pertinent information:

It is also interesting that the medical profession has been using DES against certain forms of cancer in men and women for many years, yet in spite of this evidence the use of DES in cattle feed was eliminated because half to 2 per cent of the liver showed a slight trace of DES, about two parts per billion. The reason given for it was that DES might cause cancer in humans, yet shortly after DES was disapproved for cattle, the use of DES as a morning-after birth control pill for women was still allowed. The level of DES used in 50 milligrams, is equivalent to a girl consuming 50,000 pounds of liver with two parts per billion of DES or 2½ million pounds of liver in which only 2 per cent of it has DES. A girl would need to live 33,333 years to get that much DES from consuming liver, but she gets that much in a five-day period via the pill.

Was this action against the beef producer common sense, Mr. Speaker, or one more example of emotional reaction or lack of ministerial leadership?

Another area that is equally important—I am afraid time permits me to mention it only briefly—is the need for more co-operation by ministers of departments allied to the agricultural industry. I mean that the agricultural industry, including farm dealers, must have some better means for attracting competent labour. This means that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) must try to co-operate with the Minister of Agriculture rather than play one against the other as it appears they must be doing now. Last summer we had an episode in western Ontario of criticism of farm labour conditions. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration kept saying, "give me definite cases". Mr. Speaker, I think we can give him a definite case that was pretty minor.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) must also try to help instead of hinder, as was indicated earlier this session when the Canadian Consumers Association was granted another $100,000 to investigate marketing boards. Their president emphatically denies this allegation but at the same time publicly talks down the national marketing board concept by saying marketing boards should only be provincial. Whom does she think she is kidding?

Canadian agriculture, as is recognized, has the possibility of finally coming into its own. To emphasize this further let me say that for several years previous to 1970 only 4 per cent of the degree student graduates from the University of Guelph want back to farms. In 1970 the figure rose to 10 per cent and in May, 1973, 18 per cent of such degree graduates went back to some form of active farming. I do not mean they were just allied to farming; they were in fact engaged in active farming.

What I have tried to emphasize is that the government must begin to take a long-term approach to our agricultural problems. The Canadian agricultural community has the expertise and enthusiasm to produce much more than we have already witnessed provided they have the opportunity of managing their own production at a profitable level. If this is accomplished, the Canadian consumer as well as world demand will ultimately be supplied with sufficient quantities of good food at reasonable prices.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, from time to time the opposition finds that it can no longer avoid discussing the subject of agriculture on an opposition day. Today the opposition motion concerns agriculture. Their difficulty, as evidenced by the last several opposition motions, has been finding a topic which makes any kind of sense as they try to criticize the government.

Today's motion asks for long-term programs and policies and criticizes ad hoc measures. At least two or three spokesmen on behalf of the Official Opposition have asked for at least one additional ad hoc measure immediately to solve a particular problem of the moment. I am talking, of course, about the serious situation regarding the production of beef. We must ensure that beef continues to be produced in this country and that more meat continues to be produced, as the Minister of Agriculture has emphasized many times. We must see to it that over any long period of time this country produces more meat rather than less. It is therefore our clear desire to maintain the agricultural industry in a viable state.

The motion before the House suggests that one of the spokesmen of the Official Opposition may have reversed his direction. May I remind Your Honour that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), who also moved the motion concerning agriculture that was debated on the opposition day on June 21, encountered the same difficulty that hon. members participating in the present debate have encountered inasmuch as he, on the one hand, asked for less interference and at the same time asked for more government interference with respect to the Canadian Wheat Board.

It might be worth the while of hon. members to look back at that debate if they think they are capable of predicting and analyzing and saying where they think we should be going. May I suggest such an examination also to those hon. members who believe it is worth while to misstate facts and who go on making political allegations with regard to the marketing of grain. They make predictions that work to the great disadvantage of the producers of this country because they mislead them into thinking that the situation is different from that actually existing.

In the debate previously alluded to the motion moved by the hon. member for Crowfoot criticized the government for allegedly failing to take advantage of what he termed top world prices. The hon. member referred to wheat prices as being a little better than $3 per bushel. Another colleague of his referred to prices in the order of $3.45. The motion suggested that the Wheat Board should be at that moment selling wheat at top world prices, that it should be out there selling to the limit, and what a good thing that would be.

Today the hon. member for Crowfoot noted that the price is over $5. Yet only a few months ago he was referring to a top world price of a little better than $3 per bushel and he criticized us for not selling wheat. What he was suggesting, of course, was an uncalled for interference with the Canadian Wheat Board, which was doing its usual superb job of knowing exactly what should be sold and when it ought to be sold. In doing its job it was making sure of the state of the crop which was coming up before making new commitments to completely new buyers. Throughout that period it was looking after the needs of Canadians and our regular customers, needs with respect to which it has a special obligation.

The hon. member for Crowfoot made one of his wild statements in suggesting that the Wheat Board had refused to sell 70 million bushels of wheat to India. I said that this was not so, but that did not deter him. He built his story on that suggestion. He said that we could have sold those 70 million bushels at the then world price, which was a little better than $3 per bushel. Hon. members who wish to look at what he said may consult Hansard for June 21, page 4981. He made the mistake of trying to look ahead too far, and he looks very foolish now for having done that. That is the kind of attitude that has been displayed by members of the opposition.

May I refer also to the remarks of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, with other hon. members, for about six months insisted on suggesting to farmers that a great deal of grain had been sold forward at very low prices and apparently convinced many farmers for a long time that there might be no final payment this year and that even next year's final payment may be low. Let me refer to the predictions of the Canadian Wheat Board with respect to the current year, which indicate a figure of about $4.50 for wheat. The final payment for the next crop year will, according to current conditions, very likely be over $1 for feed barley. This figure will come on top of the biggest initial prices that have ever been paid in our history for wheat, oats and barley. There will be some extremely high figures relating to final payments.

Nevertheless, hon. members opposite are trying to mislead the farmers of this country because they are seeking narrow political advantage and closing their eyes to the facts, which show that much has been done to make the agricultural industry viable, to make it an industry in which more farmers can survive because income levels are now approaching more closely reasonable figures than at any time in our history. It is the wish of this government to maintain those incomes.

Hon. members opposite, bewildered because so much has been done for the agricultural community, which includes the prairie region, even though the government party does not have a great political presence on the Prairies—

An hon. Member: It will have less in the future.

Mr. Lang: —suggested that somehow the Minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board have not managed to convince their cabinet colleagues of the need for acting in the area of agriculture. The situation is exactly to the contrary. Cabinet colleagues from other parts of the country have listened to my recommendations and those of the Minister of Agriculture when we have put before cabinet proposals for the improvement of the agricultural industry of this country. This is to their great credit, a credit that history will record.

The hon. member for Crowfoot said he was worried about transportation. It is true that we had a rail strike and a consequent delay in the movement of grain. However, I am happy to tell hon. members that stocks at Vancouver and Thunder Bay are moving out notwithstanding the very heavy pressure put upon the railways for boxcars by other industries. This pressure is evidenced by the interest of hon. members from British Columbia with respect to rail cars for moving lumber, potash, fertilizer, and so on. Notwithstanding that pressure, the volumes moved are creeping up.

In his motion the hon. member suggests that we should not do things ad hoc, but then he had the temerity to suggest that there is some problem connected with transportation. He was not enthusiastic when we purchased the 2,000 hopper cars. That purchase was an important move and was a step in the right direction for our transportation system. Now he says, I think, that it was a good move. He ignores the fact that the block system has been developed and that our cars are placed in locations on a co-ordinated basis. The fact that co-ordinators are working at various terminals means that there is now a most co-ordinated movement of grain.

He says that he is against ad hoc measures, yet he ignores the fact that for two years we have developed studies on the whole transportation and handling system which are now available and in the hands of the industry as a whole, including the Canada Grains Council. They are being subjected to further examination with a view to our taking steps to improve the system and make this industry the great industry that it ought to be.

Of course our transportation system has been tested to the limit by our tremendous sales effort. This has resulted from a body of co-ordinated policies respecting market development and credit facilities, the like of which we have never seen nor even imagined before. It was through these credit facilities, through the guaranteed additional and new credit programs available to new and to old customers we had lost, that we got back to the position where for three years in a row we have exported and consumed more wheat than we have produced. Naturally we cut into the reserve that we had on hand before that time.

With over 800 million bushels exported in the past two years we set records that were never even dreamed of a couple of years ago. We tested our handling and transportation system and got it into a position where it could do more than believed previously. However, we will not rest until it has more capacity so that we can go on challenging our producers to produce to the limit of their capacity and not hold back and fail to fertilize as we had to do in years when we were not selling an average crop in an average year. That is what this is all about.

In this year I foresee the real probability that, even though we have produced the second largest number of bushels of grain ever produced in the prairie region, perhaps not quite at the 1,506 million bushel level of a few years ago, we will again export such a quantity of grain that at the end of this year we will have exported and consumed in Canada more than we have produced. We will continue to challenge our producers to use the best possible techniques and thereby bring their farming operations into the most economical possible state.

Members opposite commented on the feed grains policy. We spent a great deal of time studying and developing our feed grains policy. Rather than ad hocking the program, we put the proposal before the farmers for further discussion for a period ending August 1 next year.

I am glad the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) recognized the merit of the long-term proposals we have put forward in letting the market determine the prices. However, I was somewhat amazed that the spokesmen for the Conservative party today were not quite clear about the fact that supply and demand are an important factor in our economy and that controls are dangerous and difficult because they interfere with ordinary production development. Therefore they think we should not interfere with pricing. I wish they would talk to their own economic critics who do not understand that if you put on controls you have trouble with production in one way or another.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) talked about feed grains. He referred to the matter of whether feed grains would be a low price or high price policy. The point that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and I have been making from one end of the country to another is that the purpose is to have a similar base for prices across the country. None of my colleagues from Quebec has ever argued we should pay low prices to grain farmers in the Prairies. They have said that people who produce animals in all parts of this country should have access to that grain on a similar cost plus basis. The fact is we do not have low prices.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar did not refer to the price at which feed wheat was selling before the new policy was announced. I wonder why he did not do that. He quoted the new policy feed wheat price of $3.41 5/8. The price the Wheat Board was charging is at Thunder Bay for domestic purposes before the new policy was in the area of $3.16 3/8, a good deal less than under the new policy.

There is a similarity in the case of barley. It was $2.23 before the price was announced and $2.20½ thereafter. Those prices are on the average, even at the current competitive level. This faces us with a real challenge in this country, one which the Minister of Agriculture will be dealing with in his usual effective fashion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: At the moment, feed grain prices in Canada are very high. With the consumer resistance, which is promoted by most of the spokesmen for the Official Opposition, the man who produces meat is being squeezed between the Tory food critics on the one hand and the price of feed grain on the other.

I do not apologize for the fact that the price of feed grain is high. This at least means that the feed grain producers are making up for the very poor return per hour of work they received under long-term past policies in this country. Step by step this government has been doing something about the income position of our farmers with programs on the selling side, programs on the transportation side and programs of information to help the farmer make the decision that is right for Canada and right for him as well. That is the state of affairs in agriculture in this country.

We will not rest. We have a list of programs, from stabilization in the area of meat to grain marketing insurance in the area of grains to ensure that the farmer's life in this country will continue to improve. It will improve as long as this government can in fact put into place policies which do things and are good for agriculture in this country.

Mr. Mazankowski: I wonder whether I might be permitted to ask the minister a question. He dwelt to some extent on the problem of the final payment for the last crop year and the current crop year. Is the minister in a position at this time to indicate when the final payment will be made and whether the amount the farmers will be receiving has been calculated?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, The Wheat Board has now submitted to us the final figures with regard to the payments on wheat, barley and oats. The order in council to authorize those payments is in the process of being prepared and submitted. I could note that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) predicted three or four months ago they would be between 20 and 25 cents. In the case of wheat, I can tell hon. members it will be approximately double that amount. In the case of wheat it will be well over 40 cents. There will be similar high figures for other grains. Rather than give the precise figures, simply let me state the global figure. The final payments on wheat, oats and barley combined in the prairie provinces will come to a total of $374.6 million. I expect that the cheques will be mailed in early November.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The time allotted to the minister has expired. The answer to the question went a little over the time allotted. I do not think I should permit further questions without agreement by the House.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In answering the question of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the minister suggested I had said the final figure would be in the neighbourhood of 25 to 30 cents. I said the initial payment should be increased by 25 to 30 cents because anyone who delivered wheat in the month of July lost far more than that. Last June I said it should be increased by 25 to 30 cents. The farmers would not have lost as much money. However, the minister has no heart for the poor farmers.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I did refer to the pages in Hansard which contained the hon. member's speech. I hope hon. members will look at it. It seems he did in fact indicate 20 to 25 cents. It is even more important that he is now somehow trying to give the wrong impression, that the initial price is the relevant figure. Clearly, he should know it is the final price that is important. The crucial thing is the initial payment plus the final payment from last year or this year. It is not the exact nature of the initial price.

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, as far as the cost of living is concerned, for the consumer the year 1973 has been a disaster. For the farmer, up to this point, it has been one of the best years on record. For the cattleman, it has gone from the sublime to the ridiculous. If hon. members go back five years or even ten years, the positions that I have just outlined will be found to have been exactly the opposite. It is a case of either the farmer and cattleman having a hard time, or the consumer. I would suggest that with a little help and common sense from the federal government—something that is currently sadly lacking—we could have a situation where the farmer and the consumer are working hand in hand for a better life.

● (1730)

I believe that with sensible and imaginative policies, and with an eye on the long term rather than on the short term, we could have a situation where the farmer and cattleman have a secure market, a secure price for their product, and consumers are not stampeded by scare tactics into paying high prices for what goes on to their supper tables. For example, according to news reports of recent months, Canadians from coast to coast were buying deep freezers costing $200 to $400 and then stocking up the freezers with beef bought when its price was sky-high. These people have been cheated; they have been cheated by the federal Liberal government's misinformation.

There have been news reports about the beef shortage scare and nightmare prices for beef, reports for which in one instance I do not blame the news media. As a result, worried consumers spent hundreds of dollars buying freezers which they really did not need. Panic buying of beef drove up the price unnecessarily. This is why I am sorry for the consumer. But for the Liberal government's pressing the panic button, the consumer would never have stockpiled expensive beef in expensive freezers. However, Ottawa lost its nerve. It did not trust the Canadian producer to do his job and forgot about the basic law of supply and demand. In the result, money that the consumer could have spent on food was spent on buying a freezer and high-cost beef. The money spent on a freezer would have bought a lot of food at a time when panic buying had not inflated the price—but it is too late now.

The Liberal government which we currently have in Ottawa panicked; it reacted to a temporary situation with hit-and-miss tactics. But that is not unusual. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1970 the Minister of Justice in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) promoted LIFT, in the Lower Inventory for Tomorrow program. This was his brainchild. Under this program the federal government actually paid the Canadian wheat farmers not to grow grain. Look at the situation today. Ottawa is begging western Canadian farmers to grow as much grain as possible; in fact, it is even scolding our farmers for growing too little. A strange situation, but one that is easy to understand. In looking at the short term, one forgets that situations can change. The Liberals look at the short term, but the Progressive Conservatives look at the long term. I ask hon. members opposite to keep that in mind.

[Mr. Lang.]

I suggest that it would be sound business to have 500 million bushels of grain in storage at all times, with the farmer being paid his storage charges. We could use an extra 500 million bushels of grain right now for export and for the feeding industry, as the minister himself knows. We do not have those extra bushels, and the Minister of Justice also knows why.

Under the Liberal government we live from day to day, from crisis to crisis, and react to situations rather than prepare for them. No wonder the consumer, the farmer and the cattleman are confused. And, I add, no wonder the minister is the only Liberal member of parliament from Saskatchewan. As my good friend the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), once remarked, the minister won his seat at the expense of every other Liberal candidate in Saskatchewan—hardly a commendable performance. However, it is one that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), with his strange sense of humour, might enjoy. After all, as hon. members may remember, it was the Prime Minister who less than a handful of years ago went to Saskatoon to meet the prairie farmers, and when they asked him for help in selling their wheat at a fair price he replied, "You grew it; you sell it. Why should I sell your wheat?" Perhaps after his disastrous election showing in the west just one year ago, which resulted in the Liberals obtaining seven out of 68 seats, the Prime Minister now feels differently.

However, I suggest that as far as the consumers, grain farmers and cattlemen are concerned, the change of heart, if indeed it has come about, has come too late. As far as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is concerned, I guess he does have some good points. He knows, at least to some extent, what farming is all about. But he seems to have taken the advice of the non-oriented agricultural advisers and self-styled experts who inhabit Parliament Hill and the Department of Agriculture's vast complexes; he talks about controlled production, supply management and marketing boards. He talks of controlled production when half of the world is crying out for more food, when the world's population is growing by leaps and bounds and hungry mouths are increasing by thousands every day. Surely, rather than talking of controlled production and supply management we should be talking about incentives to the farmer and cattleman to produce more food. That seems logical to me. If there is a need, then let us fill that need. At the same time, let the Canadian producers make a decent living.

In recent weeks a stream of news releases from the Canadian International Development Agency have come across my desk. They tell of millions of millions of dollars—Canadian taxpayers' dollars, by the way—being given to country after country. Some of this money is given in outright grants, some in the form of interest-free loans repayable over 30 or 40 years. It is a pity that young Canadians trying to borrow money to buy a house could not get such generous help from their own government. Surely, instead of giving this money away we could, in some cases at least, give food instead. Let us buy the produce of Canadian farmers at a fair price and ship it to these countries in Canadian carriers.

We would achieve a number of objectives in this way. We would feed the hungry of the world. We would encourage our producers to produce as much as possible, giving them a ready market and a fair price. On top of this, Mr. Speaker, we would create employment and creating incentives seem very sensible to me because this would help Canadians to take home good wages, at the same time contributing to the needy of the world. But I suppose hon. members across the way who hold on to power by the tips of their fingers just cannot see it. They never could see this kind of sense. This is why the latest polls show the Conservatives, with their rational and well thought-out policies, especially in the field of agriculture, gaining all the time and the Liberals slipping behind.

I should like to make the following suggestion to the Prime Minister and his colleagues. Instead of the academics and theorists making policies and advising the government, why not let agricultural organizations, which are made up of farmers on the land, do this job? I think it might help. For example, it might help the consumer, the farmer and the cattleman. In fact, I am sure it would, Mr. Speaker. Certainly the government bypasses the advice of hon. members, even their own members.

I suggest that the government well the farm organizations, "Look, agriculture minister Eugene Whelan is 'Whelan' but the consumers and producers are wailin' too. Give us your advice". I suggest that the government ask the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, the Alberta Cattlefeeders Association, and Palliser Wheat Growers Association, the B.C. Cattlemen's Association, the Saskatchewan Stockmen's Association and the Ontario Beef Improvement Association, for advice. I further suggest that they listen to that advice. Let the government admit something is wrong. It must start now to rectify the situation, or face feast and famine, bust and boom, high and low cycles and other erratic situations year after year.

I am sure even the Minister of Agriculture would agree that Canadian farmers have proven their ability to produce at competitive prices. Canadians and indeed world consumers need our produce. Why, then, do we sit around living on a day to day basis and depending on hit-and-miss policies? I do not know why; neither does the consumer, the farmer not the cattleman.

I remember when Canada had a vast sheep farming population. Then the government allowed New Zealand lamb exports to come to this country and undercut Canadian prices. The sheep farmers begged Ottawa for a floor price for lamb and a subsidy for wool, but their pleas were ignored. As a result, the Canadian sheep farmer went under. How different that is from the situation in the United States, Mr. Speaker. When our farmers started to go under their sheepmen came to Canada and bought up our sheep breeding stock. Today wool prices have climbed, as have lamb prices, but the Canadian sheepman is no more. Is the Canadian cattleman destined for the same fate? I hope not.

Mr. Speaker this seems amazing, but look at the evidence. In the first part of this year the federal government could not even make up its mind over a feed additive called DES. It seems as though they will do anything to kill incentive. This is like the time barley was selling for 50 cents a bushel. A trucker in Lethbridge constituency suddenly found he could sell barley in Montana for 78 cents a bushel, considerably higher than the 50-cent price. Using a bit of Alberta initiative, the same type that most farmers have, he transported the barley down to our southern neighbour. This did not last long, because the Canadian Wheat Board found out and stopped him. This is a strange situation. The federal government does not like people to have incentive or initiative, hence the many giveaway programs which it institutes to stop people thinking for themselves.

I suggest this is bureaucracy on top of bureaucracy, figures on top of figures and statistics on top of statistics. It is no wonder the cattleman is worried, and no wonder the grain farmer will say this is a good year but will immediately ask what is in store for the next year. Should we not plan and promote a little more, rather than regulate and restrict? I think we should; and my constituents, both consumers and farmers, think so too. In fact, I think even the Liberals think so but the trouble is they have lost the will, if they ever had it, to do so. I am afraid they are running scared.

That is why the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, when announcing his new feed grains policy, would not come to Lethbridge. There are too many cattlemen there and he knew their reaction in advance. He really did not spend too long in announcing this policy in Brandon or explaining it in Edmonton. He knew beforehand this was a hit-and-miss policy: good today in this area, perhaps, and bad tomorrow in another area. What a way to run the country, what a way to run agriculture, and what a way to treat the consumer! The politics of confrontation come into play. For a government devoid of ideas, the only way out is to create false crises, pitting one segment of Canadians against another and one region of Canada against another. Why can we not work together? Perhaps we will be able to, after the next election.

I have already mentioned the problems facing the cattlemen and I have mentioned the feed additive, DES. Let me now mention the recent rail strike. During that strike I suggested to the federal Department of Transport that emergency measures be adopted in order to truck cattle to eastern markets. What was I told? They suggested that basically we raised the beef, and we should sell it, or we should ask the provincial government to create emergency transportation. It seems that Ottawa did not want to help the Canadian farmer and, what is more, it seems that it still does not want to help.

Let us consider tariffs for a moment. The federal government, with only a handful of members from the western provinces and only a handful from the Maritimes, for almost five months, took off the tariff on beef coming into Canada from the United States. The tariff on beef going to the United States remains. At the same time, the United States was buying up our feeder cattle, which later were imported back into Canada free of tariff. This is short-sighted and ironic: it is a hit-and-miss program. But this is what the Canadian cattleman, the Canadian farmer and the Canadian consumer have come to expect from Ottawa. We have a beef shortage in this country. The consumer wants beef. There is not enough beef because bureaucrats have meddled with the laws of supply and demand. At the same time, cattle feeders in Canada are experiencing heavier losses than they did during the time of foot and mouth disease.

Let us look at the Maritimes. There are lush pasturelands in the Maritimes just waiting for the development of vast herds of cattle. But does Ottawa give Canadian would-be cattlemen any incentive to develop the cattle industry in the Maritimes? I suggest it does not. No wonder the Liberals find it difficult to elect members in the Maritimes. Maritimers like to use their initiative and they like to be given incentives. I am convinced that the Liberals are against free enterprise and against "get up and go" initiative. Our party is in favour of this; and we are all for the farmer, for the cattleman and for the consumer. When it comes to marketing, farmers are willing to take the lows if they also have the advantage of the highs. They want realistic floor prices, not unrealistic ceilings. They want to be given the chance to produce as much good quality produce as possible, and to avoid shortages. They believe the consumer also wants this.

When I look at the frustrations borne by the consumer, the farmer and the cattleman today, I begin to wonder about this government. I have come to many conclusions, but being a man of some forgiveness, a man with some kindness in his heart, may I leave hon. members, as I look across the House at those who have put agriculture and the Canadian consumer in the position they occupy today, with one sobering thought. To the House and to the Canadian public, I say of the Liberal members: Forgive them, for they know not what they do.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there have been further discussions to those which occurred earlier, and I believe there is agreement now that we not have the "late show" this evening but that the debate on this subject matter should continue until 10.30.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to bring my humble contribution to this debate on the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), in the opposition, which reads as follows:

> This House deplores the government's inability to give leadership in developing and implementing comprehensive and coordinated agricultural policies and programs and regrets that by ill-advised and ad hoc remedies the government has weakened the overall agricultural economy.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard the mover and other hon. members in the official opposition put forward their cases. I have really wondered whether we had looked up the same statistics because we know very well, as do indeed hon. members in the opposition, the situation which prevails in the agricultural area.

One only needs to refer to the statistics of 1972 and 1971 to see that there is an increase of 17 per cent, an additional revenue of 17 per cent, Mr. Speaker. But what is even more encouraging is that if we consider the figures published by Statistics Canada, we see that the revenue from farming between January and August 1973 are estimated at $4,020,000,000 as compared with $3,146,000,000 for the corresponding period in 1972. Therefore, I wonder whether opposition members have access to the same statistics or whether they are trying to juggle figures in an another attempt to play politics on the back of farmers. We wonder whether we are still in the same country when we see the official figures that are published and that some people have the guts to introduce such motions when one is aware of the economic situation that prevails in the area of agriculture. In view of this situation, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I could not remain seated in my chair, because I have heard the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) say the same things since 1968. It is always the same record, always the same tape: he is trying to give a gloomy view of the agricultural situation. One could even call the record of the hon. member for Crowfoot as follows: How to discourage Canadian farmers in order to reduce their number to better serve one's own interests. I feel that this is the situation but, happily, farmers do not listen too much to the hon. member for Crowfoot in view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that between 1966 and 1971, the number of farms that have chalked up a profit of $10,000 or more has considerably increased.

Therefore, one can see that the agricultural situation is not quite as outlined by the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Since 1968, Mr. Speaker, I have heard the same criticism. I am led to ask myself questions about the following matters: So far as the hon. member for Crowfoot, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) are concerned, what interests do they want to serve in this House? Are they conscious of their role as legislators at the service of agriculture in Canada or do they want to play the role of a grain or beef producer who wants to sell his own production to the Canadian Wheat Board? I might wonder about the aims of those hon. members when they try to make us believe or suppose that agriculture is still in a discouraging situation. I wonder about the aims of such interventions and the aim the hon. member for Crowfoot pursues in introducing today a motion on the agricultural situation.

I would like it to be possible to further discuss that one day. I remember quite well when I was sitting on the agricultural committee that we passed a legislation dealing with amendments to the standards and classification of grains and there again during a year and a half the hon. member for Crowfoot objected systematically to the improvement of that very agricultural policy. We had another proof of that when we tried to do something being aware of the fact that the producer's income was not proportionate to the cost of production. When national legislation setting up marketing agencies was introduced again we had to listen to the wailing of the hon. member for Crowfoot and the opposition who once again systematically opposed that legislation.

And they say they will be the spokesmen for agriculture.

The mass of legislation passed by this government is so impressive that farmers know exactly who their real protector is. The figures I have quoted at the beginning of my remarks confirm how this situation is true.

In addition to all the acts already mentioned by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture

(Mr. Corriveau), I would like to mention how the government is concerned with farmers. During the Liberal convention 19 resolutions were adopted with a view to further improving farmers' conditions. We keep on encouraging young farmers to produce through training, labour retraining, transportation policy and feed grain marketing policy because situations accepted since 1935 will no longer be tolerated. As mentioned by the minister, we no longer want policies aimed at depriving western producers from whatever they are entitled to have; we will demand a fair policy for western producers and eastern grain consumers. We insist on it and we do not want to deprive western grain producers of anything.

In 1969, I visited the western provinces with the members of the committee on agriculture; I think we met 18,000 grain producers. We sympathized with the grain producers who were selling their grain 50¢ a bushel. We saw it on the spot. We sympathized with them and we all agreed that such a situation should be corrected.

And today, we see those very same people criticizing all we have done in the field of the new feed grain policy. And yet western producers were not deprived of anything. It has been said for instance that the grain producer will get a price consistent with the production cost, a price which is competitive in relation to that obtained by eastern producers.

When some hon. members make a speech, I wonder what type of hat they are wearing. Is it a grain producer's hat, a cattle feeder's hat or a protective hat like those of western grain elevator owners? I would like to know once and for all on whose side they are: on the side of the grain elevator owners, of the grain producers, or of the cattlemen or the feeders?

I believe that when we talk about legislation concerning agriculture, we should aim at developing a national agricultural policy instead of a policy which seems better suited to personal interests.

I have no intention of continuing any longer, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to add a comment about the fodder policy, which is very important for eastern producers. As to the differences in prices between eastern and western Canada, we want equal treatment. That is all we want—

[English]

Mr. Baker: Speak to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board about it—

[Translation]

Mr. Roy (Laval): That is exactly what we are asking for.

Mr. Speaker, if we compare food prices of different countries of the world, Canada appears to be well protected; Canadian consumers can buy higher quality products, healthy and very well classified products at highly competitive prices. Take Japan, for example, where sirloin steak is $12 a pound.

In view of the current price situation, the consumer became somewhat more sensitive to the problem because agriculture has a role to play and the Department of Agriculture therefore needs more funds which it could use not only to help farmers but also to contribute in keeping consumer prices at a reasonable level.

In conclusion, I will deal with the question of the marketing board, by appealing to all provinces. If each of them keeps on implementing a provincial marketing policy, they will find that the province of Quebec can produce twice as many broilers and eggs than it does at the present time.

If the provinces have a national marketing board, they must work together, for producers do not wish to experience another situation like that of 1971, when eggs were selling for 23 cents a dozen, and broilers for 16 and 17 cents a pound. In order to prevent such a disaster, I call upon all provinces, all producers to work in close cooperation with the marketing boards, not only at the provincial level but also at the national level. For, if every province keeps on working in isolation, we might experience once again next year the dark days of the chicken and egg "war".

We have today an excellent tool, the National Marketing Board, and if all producers stay alert, production could be doubled. And who would be the first losers? The producers, and in the long term, they would have to pay prohibitive prices for consumer goods, simply because farmers are not interested to produce, since profitability in the field of agriculture can not be compared with investment yields in other areas.

Mr. Speaker, I have concluded my remarks, for it is six o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think there would be agreement that the hon. member be permitted to finish his speech. He would have another two minutes. If he wishes to use that time now, I believe the House would be agreeable because of the long interval we will have this evening. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, here is my conclusion: I think that it is difficult to compare agriculture with industry because agricultural productivity can in fact be doubled. It is as simple as that. But I think we should adjust agriculture to the consumer market. Consumption does not increase at the same rate as production.

Thus I think we should not minimize the problems of agriculture but consider them objectively, and together we can adjust agriculture both to the domestic consumer market and to exports.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 6 p.m., I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. I would remind the House that at that time we shall take up motions again.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. In accordance with the order made earlier today, the House will now proceed to motions, under routine proceedings.

Oil and Gas

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS—INCREASES IN PRICE AND EXPORT TAX—GENERAL POLICY TO MAINTAIN SUPPLY

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on September 4 the government asked the oil industry to refrain, on a voluntary basis, from further price increases to Canadian consumers before January 30 of next year. This price restraint would apply except where, to the satisfaction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the increase in the cost of imported crude oil warranted a Canadian price increase. The government was concerned then, as now, with the inflationary push and its impact on the Canadian consumer.

During September and October, crude oil import costs have risen substantially. One price rise alone by the Arab producing states, followed by Venezuela, was in the vicinity of a 35 per cent increase. My department and the National Energy Board have been carefully monitoring these changes. We have received requests from major refiners using foreign crude oil in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces to increase product prices. These requests reflect only actual increases in crude costs which have already been borne by importers. Each company has experienced different cost increases depending upon the source of the crude and varying ocean transportation costs.

I am today notifying refiners in eastern Canada that the government will have no objection to any decision on their part to raise product prices to levels consistent with each company's crude cost experience in September and the first half of October. The average increase in gasoline and heating oil prices east of the Ottawa Valley line will be about 2 cents per gallon.

Apart from the product price increases which I have just described and which will become effective immediately, our best indications suggest that the average price of international crude delivered at Montreal, from the eastern and western hemispheres, will rise by upward of $1 per barrel during November. Refiners in eastern Canada supplied by international crude will, at a future time, be permitted to reflect crude cost increases for the second half of October and for November in product prices.

A significant part of the market for home heating oil in the central Ontario area is supplied by imports of home heating oil from overseas. The rapid increase in demand for international supplies of home heating oils, with the consequent price increase, has made it difficult for Ontario suppliers to secure adequate supplies before the close of navigation in December.

In these circumstances, it is the government's intention to entertain requests by marketers for immediate price increases in home heating oils west of the Ottawa Valley line and particularly in Ontario and British Columbia. This action will both assist in the securing of supplies west of the Ottawa Valley line and will offset any tendency for these supplies to move out of those markets. With the exception of this product, it is the government's intention to request continuing voluntary restraint at current price levels west of the Ottawa Valley line on the part of the Canadian oil industry until February 1, 1974.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel.)]

The government is, and intends to continue, watching this situation closely and will relax its restraint program further if, in its view, such action would materially assist in what must be its predominant concern—the provision of adequate supplies for Canadian consumers.

The National Energy Board has advised me that if western crude prices continue at their present restraint levels through December, the just and reasonable price for exports to the United States would, for December, generally be at the level of about $1.90 a barrel higher. I am able to announce, therefore, that I shall be seeking authority from parliament to raise the level of export tax from 40 cents per barrel in November to $1.90 per barrel for December exports.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This tax rate of $1.90 per barrel is a direct measure of the savings to Canadian consumers west of the Ottawa Valley line brought about by the government's policy of continuing restraint.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would like now to say a few words about the Canadian crude oil and products supply situation. The outbreak of hostilities in the Middle East and the moves by Arab countries to embargo oil deliveries to the United States and the Netherlands and to impose cumulative reductions in their production rates have cast significant uncertainty on the crude oil supply situation for eastern Canada. It might be that Canada will be affected by the reduction of oil production in Arab countries. Any significant curtailment in our imported crude oil supply is bound to have an unfavourable impact upon the product supply situation in eastern Canada.

Our ability to deal with shortfalls in crude oil supply to eastern Canada is under extensive study, both within the government and in concert with industry. The government has established a technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand under the chairmanship of the National Energy Board. The committee, which includes representatives of companies importing and refining foreign crude oil, is set up to advise as to the outlook for petroleum products supply and measures to bring supply and demand into better balance.

The exact magnitude of the possible oil import curtailment which we face is uncertain and will remain so for some time. Prior to the Middle East fighting, stock levels for oil products were generally in a fair position. The supply of heating oil in Ontario and eastern Canada for the coming winter appeared to be in delicate balance against demand, assuming normal cold weather. If imports of crude oil cannot be maintained at programmed levels, this balance will obviously be disturbed.

The pre-hostilities situation in regard to motor gasoline supply in eastern Canada was generally satisfactory with a seasonal inventory build-up foreseen. Curtailment of crude oil imports would affect this build-up, with a consequent impact on next season's gasoline, even if it were possible to meet winter requirements in full.

● (2010)

On the Prairies the situation is satisfactory in regard to supply of all product categories. Pre-existing concerns, that is to say, concerns which were prevalent prior to the problems arising from the Arab oil interruption, about the supply of heavy fuel oils in British Columbia have been heightened because this region normally imports significant amounts from the United States which now, of course, faces its own supply difficulties.

In light of this over-all supply situation, it seems prudent to consider carefully appropriate means to reduce energy demand throughout Canada but particularly for those products and regions which I have specifically mentioned. A number of provincial governments have already been contacted, and others will be, to outline the nature of the crude oil and product supply situation as it is emerging and to inform them of the price developments which I have just mentioned.

The government is considering further steps, and has an allocation program for application at the wholesale level which will be introduced if a more serious supply situation becomes apparent. Although it is recognized that security of supply for priority users must be protected, the government is reluctant to interfere at this stage with the normal marketing arrangements of the industry. At this stage I am calling upon Canadian consumers, municipalities, heavy industry and provincial governments to study means of reducing consumption on a voluntary basis. We will be in touch with them to exchange ideas, develop and provide details of our conservation program.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this occasion to express my appreciation to the oil industry, with one notable exception, for the co-operation that has been evident from them in the past two months in keeping Canadian prices down. The notable exception is Gulf Canada. I feel it necessary at this time to call attention to a report which appeared in the Toronto Star on Wednesday, October 31, in which Mr. McAfee, the president of this corporation, said with respect to the fact that Gulf Canada broke the freeze restraint and I quote from the Star report:

> When we hadn't heard from the minister from October 12 to October 29, we figured the increase was okayed or the government was stalling.

I would just like to quote from a telegram sent to the same Mr. McAfee by my deputy minister, in my absence from the country, on October 12, in which was repeated what had been stated to Mr. McAfee earlier, that the government wished the company to continue its price restraint. I am prepared to lay a copy of the telegram on the table if the House wishes. I quote one paragraph as follows:

> As I told you during our telephone conversation today in response to your letter to the minister of October 9, 1973, requests for price increases have been received from a number of companies and the department has the question of all cost increases under active review. The minister will take to cabinet shortly a proposal for price increases due to higher crude oil import costs. We request that you continue to refrain from price increases until the cabinet takes a decision in this area.

Therefore, contrary to what Mr. McAfee has been quoted as saying, he was specifically requested to refrain from further action until cabinet had taken a decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I and other members of parliament have been to symposia and meetings over the years to talk about good corporate citizenship, but this American president of that American corporation has set this House a good example of bad corporate citizenship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I think most Canadians are aware that there has been, and is, a world energy problem. They knew that Canada had sufficient energy reserves for its own needs and probably a little bit to spare. After September 4 they thought they were free, price-wise, of any increases until the end of January, 1974. Now, after tonight, they know that the September 4 statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was merely a pose to let people think members of the government were the friends of the consumers until the government got a vote of confidence from the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Gulf Oil speaks.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain: Tonight's statement by the minister ends the price freeze so far as consumers are concerned. It adds immeasurably to the tensions of this federal nation, and I suggest it means a whopping big increase for all types of consumers after February 1. Under this statement, every consumer east of the Ottawa Valley line will have a price increase, effective tomorrow, of 2 cents a gallon. But the minister's statement indicates that with the price rise during November there will be a further 3 cents at the end of November, and every month more increases. The Ontario consumer, under this statement, if he is the driver of an automobile is safe until the end of January. But the home owner in Ontario, and particularly in eastern Ontario, will carry the full burden of increasing costs during this winter.

Prairie consumers are held safe until the end of January and then they, too, should experience a walloping great increase when pent-up, built-up costs and losses are piled on to them in increased prices.

The next point I want to emphasize—and this is the main point—is that this statement tonight, more than many statements made in this parliament over the last number of years, adds additional tension to confederation. Can't you imagine tomorrow, as the people of the Atlantic provinces, hard hit as they have been since confederation, have to take another wallop? Can't you imagine, in Quebec, how all those people who voted Liberal will wonder? Can't you see, in Ontario, the richest province in Canada, people being proud of the fact that the automobile drivers are being subsidized by the producing provinces, and the home owners get the full treatment?

On the Prairies we are free from any increases until the end of January has passed, but I predict that these pent-up losses, the sense of dissatisfaction and the tension will see an increase of prices that you cannot hold back. This will be much worse than if the government had done it the proper way. I am referring to the $1.90 import tax.

Mr. Douglas: Export tax.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Export tax. Any person who was in the west during the period of the 40-cent export tax announcement and who was a serious lover of his country would have recognized the strain that was put on confederation by that announcement. What will it be tomorrow, as they realize that what they heard in the speculative stories over radio, television and in the press these past two days about the good spirit between Alberta and the federal minister, is now kicked down the drain and for the month of December the export tax is being raised to $1.90?

And what of British Columbia? Look at the short shrift they get there—higher prices on every front, with no effort made to assure them of supplies. So I predict that the fundamental significance of this statement is simply a question of delaying today, and that we are going to have higher prices for tomorrow.

● (2020)

I want, now, to go back to the $1.90 export tax. I could not help noting, as the minister read the statement tonight, the joint applause of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party. I ask everybody in Canada: Where will the $1.90 go? On our part, we have made it clear that every bit of this $1.90 tax, or any type of export tax which is a tax on the resources of a single province like Saskatchewan or Alberta, should be returned to the producing province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): This statement does not make clear who will get it. Will the Maritimes get it? Will Quebec get it? Will British Columbia get it? Many years ago there was an advertising slogan that we heard over the radio—"I wonder where the yellow went?" Now it will be, "I wonder where the $1.90 went?". I want to speak to the minister in a personal way by saying how the situation should have been handled. The first and obvious thing is that the only way our fuel system will work is when the nine provincial provinces, the two territories, and the federal government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: There are ten provinces.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain):—the ten provinces, the two territories and the federal government share responsibility for management of resources. The only way to make it work in our federal system is by consultation beforehand and jointly arrived at plans to meet this problem.

This government does not give us confidence. Just a few weeks ago it announced that it was phasing out the

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

National Council of Resource Ministers. This was a sophisticated technique set up so that the 11 equal governments and the territories could jointly work out problems for the joint management of their resources. René Lévesque, who has been in the news these last two months and who was a Liberal minister of the Crown in Quebec where this council was set up, is on public record as saying, as a sincere man like him would say, that the only way we will make the federal system work is through this form of consultation, with people meeting as equals and acting in the best interests of all the people. If they had used the process of consultation, we could have sat down and made concrete plans with the provinces to lessen the impact of the world energy revolution on the consumers of Canada.

I am going to say what I mean by consultation. To us, consultation means concrete plans with the provinces for the maximum and best use of resources. In the present situation, it means co-ordinating policies with producing provinces of oil and gas to lessen the impact of a world energy revolution on consumers. It means heavy emphasis on positive policies to enlarge our present industries and to add new industries based on the comparative advantage that our oil, gas, uranium, coal and hydro power potential gives us. Provinces with energy potential have waited a long time for this industrialization to come to their areas. This was their great opportunity.

The second thing we would have done would have been to sit down with the provinces and seriously consider all the conservation areas we could have used to save fuel in view of today's wasteful consumption.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I am not just referring to turning out the lights in the Pearson building. We could have sat down and worked out transportation techniques to move fuel from surplus areas to deficit areas. We could have talked over the question of storage. We could have considered the humanitarian concerns of the people so dependent on fuel in the winter time. But, above all, if it is a question of working out with the provinces the quid pro quo, we could have resolved the wants and desires of the producing provinces and their ambitions for the future, with the needs of the consumers to meet this shock in a staged manner so that the impact would be lessened or equalized all over the country.

For instance, one of the things that could have been put before provinces which have potential gas and oil is our insistence that if any gas or oil goes across the border in future, the Americans must take off the petrochemical tariff and give us a chance to build industry in Canada. This is the type of thing on which we would like to place emphasis.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not take any longer than the minister took. I want to say, as I did the other night, that consultation is not a dirty word, nor is it demeaning to sit down with our equals in the research field of the provinces to work out programs on how to get a Montreal pipeline in place quickly, and how to make deals with Venezuela and Nigeria on getting oil. Plans could be worked out so that the people least able to bear the problem will not suffer. All these suggestions have been made to the minister, as we all know, since January of this year, but no positive reaction came until this sudden blasting in all directions on September 4, September 13 and, I suspect, again tonight.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, nothing in this great energy policy statement deals with the fact that no effort whatsoever is being made in Canada to find and to put on the market in the next three or four years alternative forms of energy to oil, gas and coal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): When I see our neighbour country to the south, which is in worse shape than we are, spending $2 billion a year on this type of research—as much as they spent on getting to the moon—and we are spending literally as close as you can get to absolutely nothing, I wonder. The latest report of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources stated flatly that it is the agency of the federal government for non-renewable resources. I suggest to the minister and to the whole country, Mr. Speaker, that it is time his department looked at alternative forms of energy, because in the short run and in the long run they are the only ways we will be able to check prices. There is no point in going along with the government being defender of the consumer when we have arbitrary acts such as we have witnessed in the statement tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the present oil crisis in which Canada finds itself is due to the deplorable lack of planning by the federal government over the past ten years, and particularly over the past five years. It has been glaringly apparent for some time that the United States was becoming increasingly dependent upon imported oil. It was also apparent that the Middle East, which has over 80 per cent of the world's oil reserves, would be using the growing world demand to raise the price of its oil. For years the New Democratic Party has been urging the government that Canada, as a net exporter of oil, should do two things. The first is to assure its consumers security of supply. Second, the government must protect those consumers from being gouged by the oil industry, which is seeking to take full advantage of escalating world oil prices.

● (2030)

To this end we have urged a succession of ministers of energy, mines and resources to extend a reversible oil pipeline to eastern Canada and to reduce proportionately our exports of oil to the United States. This has not been done. We now find ourselves threatened with a shortage of imported oil and a dramatic increase in price of such imported supplies as we are able to procure. The consequences of the government's procrastination are now upon us. The chickens of the indecision are coming home to roost. It is the consumers of eastern Canada who will pay the price for the government's lack of foresight.

An hon. Member: Who is going to believe that?

Mr. Douglas: While facing this situation in which we have witnessed a deplorable lack of planning, we have been waiting for the government's long awaited and much vaunted statement as delivered by the minister. It was so important that it was postponed twice today. I must say that when one reads it one will find, surely, that this is a most inadequate response to a desperate situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: As a matter of fact the leader of my party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), and I were given only one copy of the statement in each language. I read the English version and he read the French version. When we had finished, we were sure some pages were missing. We just could not believe that we had read the minister's statement, in view of all the fuss and furore and the waiting until the stockmarkets had closed.

What are the proposals contained in the minister's statement? First, the minister proposes to retain the price restrictions with respect to western crude oil until the end of January. Of course, we commend him for that. We hope that these will be continued beyond the end of January. Certainly, by imposing these controls the government has saved the consumers of Canada millions of dollars.

Some have cried very loudly—particularly members of the government of Alberta—about the great harm this has done to the oil industry. The fact is that the oil industry in this country in the ten months prior to the government's imposing the freeze had raised the price of crude oil by 37 per cent, or 95 cents per barrel. That increased their annual revenues by $700 million per year. The government, when it imposed the freeze, was too late. Nevertheless, thank heaven somebody put it on. When I listen to the objections of some hon. gentlemen to my right, I wonder how long they want the public to be exploited by the oil industry which wishes to take advantage of the rising and ever higher prices in the United States.

As well, the minister proposes raising the export tax on oil going to the United States from 40 cents per barrel to $1.90 per barrel. This is in keeping with the commitment he made to this House. When the legislation for the export tax is brought down, that tax will represent the differential in price between the Canadian price and the Chicago price, and this will be done in order to insulate Canadian consumers from the rising prices in the United States. There is an oil shortage in that country but there is no need for us to experience an oil shortage. The minister is proposing to raise this tax for December. I assume the legislation will give him authority to raise the tax at any other time when the differential increases and to reduce it when the differential declines.

As I listened to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) complaining about this export tax, I wondered how many people realize that if the export tax had not been levied, the oil companies in this country would have made $185 million a year extra by getting 40 cents a barrel more in Chicago for oil than they were buying it for in Canada, and that the government of Alberta, which has been protesting loudly about the export tax, would not have got a five-cent piece of that $185 million.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is where the hon. member is wrong. The government would have received royalties.

Mr. Douglas: Although the Premier of Alberta says that this has cost Alberta $300 million a year, may I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the government of Alberta is actually losing only $60 million. I support the idea of the federal government's fully reimbursing that province and turning back to the producing provinces the export tax. What the premier does not point out is that $240 million would have gone to the oil companies. If the oil companies had been allowed to raise by 40 cents per barrel the price of domestically consumed oil, Canadian consumers would have paid another $72 million a year.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is crazy. The hon. member is all wrong.

Mr. Douglas: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we support maintaining the export tax in order to protect Canadian consumers from rising prices. The minister also said that the government is prepared to consider applications for increasing the price of heating fuels. This would apply west of the Ottawa Valley. The government would consider that, the minister said, in order to offset the tendency for such supplies to move out of the area. I hope the minister will explain that in the question period.

For instance, I do not know how supplies of heating oil could move out of British Columbia unless the government is going to allow that province to export such fuels to the United States. I do not know how such fuels would move out of the Prairies. There might be some such movement out of Ontario, but I would point out that west of the Ottawa Valley, and certainly in most of Ontario, it is possible to get all the western crude you need, and the people in that region can process all the heating fuel they need. Therefore, I think this permission for oil companies to raise the price of heating oil west of the Ottawa Valley is totally uncalled for.

Let me deal with another matter. The two problems which face eastern Canada have to do with providing some protection against price increases and, secondly, continuity of supply. I point out that the minister has not offered any solution. He merely says that he is prepared to let the oil companies raise the price to the consumer, and that price increase is to be proportionate to the proven increase which the companies must pay for crude oil. Certainly, as Venezuelan oil is going up in price there is no doubt that the consumers of eastern Canada will pay much higher prices for oil this coming winter.

On the matter of continuity of supply the minister had nothing to offer. He merely said that the government will continue to watch the situation carefully. That certainly will inspire confidence in those who are worried about oil shortages this coming winter. He is also going to set up a technical advisory committee which will look at petroleum supply and demand. One of its tasks will be, as the minister says, advising as to the outlook in this field. I submit that the best advice they will be able to give Canadians is: Dig out your red flannel underwear.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Your Stanfields.

● (2040)

Mr. Douglas: Surely we ought to be dealing with the problems of protection of price and continuity of supply on a Canadian basis. We in this party have been pressing the minister for the setting up of a national petroleum corporation, one of whose purposes would be that it would function as the sole purchaser and marketer of oil in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: It would enter into bilateral agreements with oil producing countries. It would also purchase the domestic oil. It would distribute and allocate that oil. Such a corporation would be able to pool the oil resources and standardize prices so that the people of Canada who use oil, no matter whether it came from the Middle East, Venezuela or western Canada, would have not the same price but a standardized basic price plus the cost of transportation. That is the kind of policy we ought to have. It is rather significant that in a brief which the minister took to cabinet around April 10 or 12, the minister's own department suggested setting up such a national petroleum corporation. When the National Energy Board report came out, it was hashed over and watered down. It listed the advantages, and three times as many disadvantages.

I am convinced there are people in the minister's department and in the National Energy Board—and to a large extent the minister himself—who recognize the inevitability of establishing a national petroleum corporation to pool the oil resources that are available to the Canadian people, whether domestic or imported, to provide for some price standardization and guaranteed continuity of supply. I strongly suspect the reason we had to wait all day instead of getting a report at two o'clock or five o'clock this afternoon is that the minister was pushing for such a national petroleum corporation. I have the feeling he was clobbered by the neanderthals in his department.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They are like the great men of Saskatchewan. You lost the oil industry.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Douglas: The oil sheik from Edmonton is talking from his seat. If he wants to make a speech, he will have lots of opportunity to make it. He was for years the apologist in this House for the oil industry. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain accused the New Democratic Party of supporting the government on its oil policy. One of the reasons I did that is that I would have nightmares if I thought the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was in charge of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): People left you in the tens and twenties of thousands.

Mr. Douglas: I shall not keep replying to the hon. member for Edmonton West. A former prime minister made him a cabinet minister. It lasted only two months. That was the wisest decision ever made in history.

I conclude by saying that this matter of a national petroleum corporation is too important to be smothered by a few reactionaries in this House or in the government. It is the people of Canada, particularly those east of the Ottawa Valley, who will be the sufferers unless we set up some type of national marketing mechanism. As far as the New Democratic Party is concerned, we shall continue to push the minister and the government to bring in legislation between now and Christmas for such a national petroleum corporation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, following the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Ressources (Mr. Macdonald) who this time sent us a copy of his statement in advance and in French it gives me great pleasure to join with my colleagues in making comments in this House on the important problem raised by him.

Our shortage of energy and oil in Canada, Mr. Speaker, is due primarily to a lack of energy and foresight of this and previous ministers who failed to take preventive measures when they should have in respect of the energy problem in Canada.

The statement made today called for the acceptance of price increases requested by oil companies in Canada, one of 2 cents a gallon for September and October, and another of $1 a barrel for November.

The minister stated that price increases have to be granted to those companies if Canada is to be assured of an adequate supply of petroleum products. That, Mr. Speaker, is another proof of our economic dependence on petroleum products because price increases must be accepted if we are to heat our homes and run our cars.

There again, Mr. Speaker, is proof that we are colonized when 83 per cent of the oil industry in Canada is under foreign control. We export Canadian gas at ridiculous prices and we import gas at higher prices. We are the eternal milk cows of multinational oil companies. It is proven today, Mr. Speaker, that there is no real oil surplus in Canada and yet we have been exporting our products for years and at ridiculous prices. Even if we had surpluses we should save them to meet the demand in coming years while at the same time ensuring a low domestic price. But no, the opposite was done. We have exported at low prices—

Mr. Roy (Laval): I think that prices—

Mr. Rondeau: Prices change every week; you just have to follow the rates at the Montreal Stock Exchange to know the export prices.

I notice that the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) is not familiar with oil problems and that he will be short of oil. If he has not yet been short of fuel oil, he has been without light for a long time.

We import at higher and higher prices, as the minister has just said, when he announced an increase in prices on imports. The policy of the minister does not make any sense. The Canadian consumer is always footing the bill and multinational oil companies pocket millions of dollars while an embarrassed and powerless minister looks on, a member of a party "liberally" financed by the same multinational companies.

Those companies rule the roost, they determine the prices and the future of Canadian petroleum products at the face of the minister, they use tax exemptions allowed for research to swallow up the profits and in this manner they finance their oil explorations throughout the world instead of promoting the industrialization and the marketing of Canadian products.

This evening, according to the minister's statement, the export tax is increased by $1.90 a barrel for the month of December, and the companies increase their import prices. A tax of $1.90 a barrel is applied on export prices and it is agreed to pay more for our imports. Where is the difference? Here it is: the Canadian consumer will pay more for imports than the additional amount the government will collect in export taxes. Mr. Speaker, it takes economists to do that. Government economists are seeking a solution to the oil problem. They must certainly not find one as they would then lose their job. They are paid to look and they must look without finding anything. They have nevertheless found a solution, but it solves nothing. And the minister tells us that there is an energy problem in Canada. On February 14, 1973, the minister was reported as having said:

● (2050)

[English]

. . . the oil wells of the western provinces are not being over-produced; and that no shortages of crude are on the horizon for Canadian refineries.

These assurances have come from energy minister Macdonald, from members of Alberta's cabinet, and from all oil industry spokesmen, as well as from such U.S. authorities as Senator Henry Jackson and Senator Frank Ross.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, why is it that in February we were told that there was no problem, that the oil production in Canada was adequate, and that today we hear about a shortage of oil products? And the Winnipeg Free Press of July 10, 1973, tells why we are supposed to have a shortage of oil products in Canada. Here is what this newspaper said:

[English]

"Phoney Shortage".

Since the start of the present energy crisis in the United States, which has seen hundreds of service stations close down and hundreds more restrict their hours of service, there have been claims that the crisis is a phoney—a crisis brought on deliberately by the major oil companies.

This view, much as it may have been discounted in the beginning, has now been given overwhelming support by the U.S. Federal Trade Commission in a staff report. According to the report, 18 major oil companies in the U.S. have, for all intents and purposes, worked as a cartel or monopoly with a view to squeezing out their independent competitors and keeping their prices—and profits—high.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the minister would have us believe that he is forced to limit the consumption of oil products in Canada because of a shortage. However, in its issue of July 10, 1973, the Chronicle-Herald said this:

[English]

Possible oil reserves off the Canadian east coast, as estimated . . .

[Translation]

estimated not by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but by the Canadian Petroleum Association.

[English]

. . . is 32 trillion barrels of oil and 110-115 trillion cubic feet of gas.

By comparison, the proven oil reserves in the North Sea are 12 billion barrels and 64 trillion cubic feet of gas, he said.

[Translation]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there is a lot of rot in those comments of the minister who tries to make us believe that there is a shortage of oil products in Canada, that we may perhaps soon have to face it due to his improvidence, his lack of information and drive, because he did not have enough foresight to help the companies to develop the Canadian oil fields and since also the companies are interested in keeping their profits at a high level by inducing a shortage of petroleum products. Moreover, we could read on page 6 of La Presse dated May 31, 1971, that is two years ago: "A sea of oil under the turbulent waters of the Hudson Bay?—

I do not have enough time to give particulars on the result of inquiries carried out in Canada but which are kept secret by multinational companies controlling prices, as established by the conclusions of a senatorial inquiry conducted in the United States. Those companies also control the market as well as our Canadian production. Indeed, there is no doubt that Canada, especially Quebec, have extremely rich oil resources. Here is a good one. An election took place recently in the province of Quebec and the party in power used the following motto: Bourassa builds up. As a matter of fact, they promised to build an oil refinery in eastern Quebec and a deep-waters harbour for supertankers in Gros-Cacouna. But there is certainly a lack of communication between the federal and the provincial government for I cannot believe that they promised to build a harbour for supertankers if there is no more oil. They could just as well have promised to build bridges over nonexistent rivers.

● (2100)

Mr. Speaker, this is just about what happened in the province of Quebec. The solutions that we had to propose were very plain. First, we must take stock of our energy needs for the next 25 years in Canada; second, we must maintain an inventory of oil products to meet the demand for the next 25 years as well; we must also grant a special retail discount on oil products in order to encourage consumers to use Canadian oil products. We must oblige multinational corporations to re-invest their profits at home. We must supervise research expenditures of multinational corporations that are now secured through taxes and are only designed to divert money from tax authorities. We must ensure through research activities that the whole energy potential in Canada is known by the government. We must also provide research grants to private individuals who want to develop new forms of energy which eventually will be beneficial substitutes for the products that we know today.

Mr. Speaker, the minister will have to smarten up, to be a little more energetic and stop sheepishly following a policy prescribed by multinational oil companies.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. While my colleague from Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) was making very pertinent remarks on behalf of my party, he has been harassed—and I am a witness as are some of my colleagues—by the Quebec members of another political party.

Mr. Speaker, we are very far from the Chair. These members' attitude is ill-advised; perhaps they are interested in protecting the power, but since we are the only Quebec members of the opposition both in Ottawa and in Quebec, we have the right to express our views and we are entitled to the respect of this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I would like the House to realize that when the hon. member is saying sensible things, I am all ears.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) has risen on a point of order. I listened with interest. I must admit that perhaps there have been some interruptions while the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) was bringing his most interesting contribution to the debate, but I must suggest that the hon. member was adressing the Chair, and that I have listened to him with attention and interest.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Joliette, because I know that he always listens to the Créditistes, since we always say something sensible.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that we will now return to the question period for 20 minutes.

I think that we now ought to get back to oral questions for a period of approximately 20 minutes, after which we will resume the debate which was interrupted at six p.m.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS—GOVERNMENT MONITORING OF PRICE INCREASES EAST OF OTTAWA VALLEY LINE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who said in the course of his statement that east of the Ottawa Valley line the price of gasoline and home heating oil would immediately be increased by an average of 2 cents a gallon although the price would vary from company to company depending upon cost. I ask how he proposes to have the government involved in monitoring those price increases.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, judging from the experience we have had in the last several months, there will be a very quick reading as to how prices will be involved. There will, of course, be some adjustment in margins at the retail level, but in effect I would anticipate that the price leaders whose prices will be somewhere just under 2 cents will probably, at least for those higher than 2 cents a gallon, dictate the price level. We would expect to have the kind of feedback we had earlier when restraints were put on but which fell off afterwards. Normally we would get an early reading as to particular prices of particular companies.

OIL AND GAS—TIMING OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRICE INCREASES IN QUEBEC AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the minister tell us when he proposes to make a further announcement as to the next round of price increases in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces based upon the anticipated increase in crude prices mentioned by the minister tonight, which might well be higher than the price increase he has just announced? When does the minister propose to let the next shoe drop?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that will depend very much upon the kind of proof the companies can bring forth, if indeed they have had additional costs. In the normal course it will take some time before the price increases of last week find their way through to inventory.

HOME HEATING FUELS—APPLICATIONS FOR PRICE INCREASES WEST OF OTTAWA VALLEY LINE—GOVERNMENT CRITERIA IN CONSIDERATION THEREOF

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary question, and perhaps I might really get an answer to this one. The minister has stated his willingness to accept applications for price increases in respect of home heating fuels west of the Ottawa Valley line but he did not indicate the basis upon which applications for increases would be accepted or rejected. Would the minister now indicate to the House the basis, or the criteria the minister would use in determining whether an increase in the price of home heating fuels west of the Ottawa Valley would be granted by the government?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might read to the hon. gentleman that portion of my statement which related to this. I pointed out as follows:

> A significant part of the market for home heating oil in the central Ontario area is supplied by imports of home heating oil from overseas.

This has been the case for a number of years. To continue:

> The rapid increase in demand for international supplies of home heating oils with the consequent price increase has made it difficult for Ontario suppliers . . .

An hon. Member: Don't read so fast.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I agree that I would have to read it very slowly and with great precision to make an impact on the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Be serious.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): To continue the quotation, Mr. Speaker:

> The rapid increase in demand for international supplies of home heating oils with the consequent price increase has made it difficult for Ontario suppliers to secure adequate supplies before the close of navigation in December.
> In these circumstances it is the government's intention to entertain requests by marketers for immediate price increases in home heating oils west of the Ottawa Valley line and particularly in Ontario and British Columbia.

This is where the same criteria applies. Basically, if there are additional costs indicated by particular importers into Ontario, and we have had some indication from independent importers of this previously, at a price level that makes it difficult for them to import and sell at a cost which would enable them to recover their cost, of course we will entertain an application of that kind. This will depend very much on the situation of individual companies. Obviously, I think it is fair to say that anyone who has a western Canada supply and has not incurred the same cost increase as an independent would not be in the same position to get compensation for increased costs.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary question on this point. I would point out that the minister did not say that in his statement, although he tried to give the impression that I ought to have understood this.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I read the statement.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister did not indicate in his statement the criteria on which an increase would be granted, although he has done so now. I should like to ask whether he is now saying, and intends it to be understood to mean, that an application for an increase would be accepted or granted only where there is indication or proof of increased costs.

An hon. Member: That's what he said.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Exactly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Then why didn't you say it?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is exactly as has happened with regard to the eastern market.

Mr. Stanfield: Why didn't you say it?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, I did say it.

Mr. Stanfield: You did not.

OIL—INCREASE IN EXPORT TAX—GOVERNMENT DISPOSITION OF ADDITIONAL REVENUE—INTRODUCTION OF ENABLING LEGISLATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact it is now some time since he announced an export tax on crude oil, and the government is already collecting that tax, I should like to ask two questions. How soon does the minister intend to introduce legislation to give legislative support to the action he is taking and give the House the particulars on which that action is based? Also, is he prepared tonight to give an indication to the oil producing provinces of his intentions regarding the disposition of the revenue which is to be received from this tax? The increase announced today, of course, means a great deal more money, and it seems to me the provinces are entitled to know the minister's intentions.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on the latter point, the intention is the same as I indicated initially to the province of Alberta on September 13, that we would be prepared to make good to the province the revenue which otherwise would have accrued to it, not by way of an increase in selling price to the United States; from the increase it would have got if the market as a whole had gone up. I have said that before in the House and to provincial representatives and it remains the federal position.

As to the balance of the question, we feel it is in the general interest of Canadians that the financial assets created by this windfall, in large part from action of the federal government, which would have gone entirely into the accounts of non-Canadian owned corporations should go toward the development of additional energy resources in Canada, particularly in those provinces which are now producing this resource.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, would the minister be prepared to pay the provinces an amount related to the royalties they would have obtained had the Chicago rates been obtained at the wellhead? Does this apply equally to the price of domestic oil which, of course, is frozen and which would also have risen to the Chicago price had price ceilings and restraints not been imposed?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Sir. We would put the provinces in the revenue position which they determined to be fair from the standpoint of royalties which would have prevailed had the higher price prevailed throughout, whoever their customers might have been.

● (2110)

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the minister said, and I agree with him, that there is a great deal of merit in seeing that part of this revenue goes into developing oil production in Canada to meet our future needs. Is the government making any proposals to the oil producing provinces indicating its willingness to take the balance of the money over and above what it pays the provinces in return for their royalties for the development of, for instance, the oil sands or the heavy oil in the Lloydminster area?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have talked both at the western conference and since then with the provinces with regard to the very heavy investment job which has to be done, for example, in defining the nature of the resource in the Athabasca oil sands and also in defining or establishing if there are better methods for lifting the heavy oil not only at Cold Lake but in the Lloydminster area, which applies to both Alberta and Saskatchewan. We have also talked with the government of Saskatchewan in this regard which has a very active interest regarding some of the additional levels in some of the fields they have in production now. So we have had discussions in this regard. I think it would be very fruitful, not only from the standpoint of these provinces but from the standpoint of Canadians generally, that these assets be put to work for Canadians generally and for the inhabitants of those provinces.

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN PRICE OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS—INQUIRY AS TO STUDY

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Since he informs us that the refineries of eastern Canada which get their crude oil supplies from international markets will probably be allowed in the near future to hike again their prices according to the oil import costs, has a study been made to determine approximately how important the rise will be in October and November and whether the figure of 6 cents a gallon quoted by newspapermen can be said to be realistic?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in my comments I talked about $1 a barrel, I think, as regards the possible increases for November. Divided by 35, the figure means for that month a possible increment of almost 3 cents a gallon.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about a problem peculiar to the area located east of the Borden line.

The minister has already stated in the House that he had had discussions with the Quebec government and, among others, with the Minister of Natural Resources who was then on vacation. Could the minister tell us—

An hon. Member: Before his victory!

Mr. Fortin: That is true, before his victory, because he was not there.

Would the minister tell us the outcome of his discussions with the Quebec government among others? Moreover, can he tell us which consultations he had before his statement of tonight and ensure the House that he will see to it that the region east of the Borden line gets the necessary supplies for the next season in the light of the announcements made by the Quebec government during the last election campaign? This is no longer a question of election but a question of life.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I am not quite certain I did understand the hon. member's question. In any event, we have discussed with the provincial government the question of the pipeline extension. As you know, a proposal for the building of a supertanker harbour has been drafted.

We know that both projects could be implemented so as to ensure that the Quebec consumer will be supplied through an oil pipeline as well as enjoying the benefits of overseas supplies. I must say that the current priority is to ensure crude oil supplies to the Montreal refineries. For this reason and in the light of the international situation, the issue is supplies and not prices.

DOMESTIC CRUDE OIL—SUGGESTED STAGED PRICE INCREASES—CONSULTATION WITH INDUSTRY

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that of the Leader of the Opposition, the only party leader who has seen fit to be here this evening to listen to this discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: When does the minister intend to implement his promised Montreal-based pricing policy for domestic crude, and is he consulting with industry and the provinces to seek a means of achieving a staged series of domestic crude increases up to the Montreal-based international price starting now, rather than a massive price jump on February 1?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we would expect that this would become active on February 1. Certainly the question of staged increases has been considered. On the whole, the consideration was that the protection of several months would be advantageous from the consumers' standpoint.

Mr. Andre: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In answer to a question by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, the minister indicated the government's position in respect of the disposition of the revenues from this export tax. Is this a firm position and has it been accepted by the producing provinces? Is the minister still in discussion with the producing provinces in respect of this tax, and why is there no revised tax figure for November and for the massive increase in December, which does not appear to make much sense?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, on the latter question, the hon. gentleman will have noted that there has been a dramatic increase in the international cost in just the last 15 days. With regard to the attitude of the provinces, I can say with reference to Alberta that I think its position is that the tax is absolutely immoral but it is very keen to have the proceeds.

OIL AND GAS—INCREASES IN PRICE—EFFECT ON COST OF LIVING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I ask the Minister of Finance what measures he intends to introduce to offset the additional burden this will place on the highly overburdened Canadian consumers, especially in the five eastern provinces where this latest move will contribute substantially to the already high cost of living.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government has already taken measures both at the pension level and the family allowance level—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —to protect the interests of the Canadian consumer. The primary motive behind the statement by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, tonight was not only to protect the price to the consumer but to protect the supply to the Canadian consumer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members that there are exactly three minutes before the end of the question period.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, is the minister prepared to meet with the governments of the provinces to enter into ways and means of offsetting this additional increase in the cost of living?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is an interesting question. I suppose one of the most substantial inputs into the cost of gasoline for consumers in most of the provinces of Canada is the very substantial sales tax taken by the provincial governments.

KEROSENE AND STOVE OIL—GOVERNMENT INTENTION IN RESPECT OF PRICE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, on the same line may I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether the government has any plans for specially reduced rates on sales of kerosene and stove oil products which are extensively used by low-income Canadians?

Agriculture

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I am correct in saying that these are both middle distillates which are covered by the program. But, of course, with regard to this area of middle distillates I think the most important question, as my colleague has said, is to continue to ensure its supply, which is in a pretty tight situation, as opposed to the price question.

● (2120)

OIL—EXPORT BOYCOTT BY ARAB STATES—EFFECT ON CANADIAN SUPPLIES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of reports that the minister has received information about the disruption of supplies from the Middle East, and also the statement by a United Nations Arab diplomat that Canada might be denied future oil from Arab states, can the minister explain to the House what the situation is, and set the country straight as to whether we can expect secure supplies or whether we are, indeed, boycotted by the Arab states?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can say, from the latest information I have from Saudi Arabia, that at least in so far as that state is concerned we are not on their embargo list as, for example, are the United States and The Netherlands. We are regarded by those states as being neutral. Therefore, we will be in the situation of having a potential interruption of supply but not the total interruption which those two countries are suffering. However, one of the most difficult points remains with regard to the port of Portland which in the wintertime is the principal source of oil for Montreal refineries. My understanding at present is that this is regarded as being an American destination, notwithstanding the fact that oil comes in bond through to Montreal. So we can anticipate, subject to further diplomatic action, some interruption the extent of which we cannot foresee at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has to call orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—STATE OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMY UNDER GOVERNMENT POLICIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Horner (Crowfoot):

That this House deplores the government's inability to give leadership in developing and implementing comprehensive and co-ordinated agricultural policies and programs and regrets that by ill-advised and ad hoc remedies the government has weakened the over-all agricultural economy.

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this is not a topic that is as appealing as energy:

nevertheless, it is crucial to Canada, the Canadian farmers and the Canadian consumers. Earlier this evening, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) indicated that the opposition parties were misleading the farmers in their statements out west. All I say to the minister is that the farmers on the Prairies are too smart to be misled by either the opposition or the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

He said also that the government bought some 2,000 hopper cars to facilitate the movement of grain from country elevators on the Prairies. I represent a huge riding in Saskatchewan, and I have not yet seen one of these hopper cars in my area. I believe this whole matter of buying hopper cars was not a deliberate government policy but, rather, a policy conceived in desperation during the election when the minister realized that the Liberal party in the west was in serious difficulty.

The two old-line parties, the Tories and the Liberals, have together undermined the situation of the farmers in the west. I am referring to the Liberals and the Conservatives because I believe they have been in collusion on a number of policies with which western farmers disagree. I should like to refer to two of the policies on which I believe the two parties have been in collusion and on which there have been under-the-door agreements between them. First of all, it should be mentioned that government policies with regard to brucellosis have been negligent, ill-advised and totally inadequate. I am referring to brucellosis or Bangs disease about which hon. members heard earlier this year. For five years brucellosis has been spreading throughout Saskatchewan, but the government did not do too much in this regard. Last spring they suddenly smartened up and I must admit that the compensation rates were increased. This is certainly appreciated by the farmers affected. However, the compensation rates are still far from adequate. There are still a number of improvements that could be made with regard to the administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

First, uniform compensation rates should be allowed for calves. At present there is no consistency in this regard. Some farmers are paid for calves; others are told they will not be paid for them. The farmers who are obstreperous and engage in some negotiations do get paid for them. I think there should be some consistency. Secondly, compensation rates should be higher in the spring than they are in the fall. I say this because in the spring cows are usually very thin and scrawny and do not bring the best market price for slaughter purposes. Therefore, compensation rates should be higher to compensate for the lower slaughter prices at the packing plant at that time of year.

Third, once the farmers' herds have had a positive reaction to a number of tests and it appears that the disease cannot be eradicated by conventional methods, the whole herd should be sold. Fourth, there is another problem with regard to brucellosis, that is, the whole question of timing of compensation payments. The farmers' cattle are shipped out. However, compensation payments are held back for three, four, five or six months. A farmer cannot survive if he does not have the financial means. That is why I feel that when compensation is awarded to a farmer and cattle are taken away from him, he should receive at least part payment for his herd. The remainder could follow after the premises have been cleaned up and inspected.

Fifth, another question plaguing farmers with regard to brucellosis is the whole matter of income tax. The income tax status of a farmer who loses an entire herd because of brucellosis could be based on a five-year average. However, this is not very satisfactory and I believe consideration should be given to farmers whose herds are sold because of a government law or edict.

Now I should like to speak on another topic, namely, the rapeseed vote about which we heard a few days ago. I believe it is a phony vote, a masterpiece of Liberal trickery with which the members of the Tory party agree completely, it seems to me. I say this because the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), who is the Conservative Party's spokesman and replied to the minister's statement last week regarding the rapeseed vote, stated that perhaps the vote should not be taken after all. He seemed to be very pleased that the cards were stacked against the proponents of orderly marketing.

There are three things about the vote that are phony and dishonest, and I certainly cannot see how it can be compatible with the so-called Liberal philosophy, if they have any philosophy. First of all, there is the matter of the 60 per cent majority required. Would it not be something if our whole democratic system were based on a 60 per cent majority and we could not win a seat in the House unless we had 60 per cent of the vote? I feel that these guidelines should be revised and all that should be required in this case would be a simple majority. If slightly over half the farmers say they want rapeseed under the administration and jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, that is the way it should be.

Second, only those rapeseed producers can vote who have produced rapeseed two years out of the last three years. This is ridiculous also, and certainly mitigates against the farmer in the northern prairies. I say this because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), or the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, may not be aware of this but three years ago we had a severe outbreak of the Bertha army worm in the northern prairies, right across the north. Many farmers lost their crops or spent a great deal of money spraying them from aeroplanes. The crops were severely damaged.

Following this experience, and on the advice of many farm experts, farmers were told that it would be to their benefit if they did not grow rapeseed on those fields for several years. Consequently, many rapeseed producers went out of production during the last two years. Therefore, in many cases the traditional rapeseed producer has grown only one crop in the last three years, and now he is not allowed to vote. I think the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board is aware of this and did it deliberately in collusion with his Tory colleagues. I think that all Wheat Board permit holders should have the right to vote, or failing this, anyone who produced at least one crop of rapeseed within the last five years. This would certainly be more just so far as the rapeseed producers of western Canada are concerned.

Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the ballot paper is to have "yes" and "no" categories and also an "undecided" category. This is totally unfair because apparently the undecided category is to count as a "no" vote. This further stacks the cards against the farmers who are interested in an orderly system of marketing in this country. Apparently there are powerful forces at work to destroy the concept of orderly marketing in Canada, into which years of labour and toil have been put by farm organizations, wheat pools and farmers' groups on the prairie provinces, at least ever since the 1920's, the beginning of the progressive movement, the labour movement, the co-ops and what-have-you.

Every farmer who supports the principle of orderly marketing through the Canadian Wheat Board should be extremely uneasy and concerned at the announcement by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board on the new feed grains policy and the apparent support he is getting from the Conservative Party. They are being awfully quiet about that policy. All they talk about is supply and demand, as though supply and demand existed in this country today. The minister has spoken of the "equity" he is trying to create for livestock producers in British Columbia and eastern Canada in order that they need not pay more for feed grains than livestock producers in the prairie region, except for the costs of transportation and handling. Unfortunately the model of equity he intends to use is the notoriously inequitable and unjust open market feed mill and feed lot prices for feed grains paid to farmers for years in the prairie region. In order to extend this kind of equity, at the grain producers' expense, to other parts of Canada the function of the Canadian Wheat Board in setting prices on all domestic sales is done away with.

What has been the Wheat Board's crime? Apparently it had come to the attention of feed grain purchasers in eastern Canada that the Wheat Board was doing a much better job of getting a good return for grain producers on the Prairies than were the prairie feed mills and feed lots. It was doing so much better, in fact, that eastern livestock feeders felt they were at a competitive disadvantage with prairie livestock feeders, in spite of the fact that they get $5 per hundredweight more for their cattle here than they do in the west.

How, then, to create equity? "At the expense of prairie grain producers," says the minister. The Wheat Board will no longer set prices for any feed grains sold in Canada. Feed mills and feed lots, which for years have paid grain producers the lowest possible price, often below production costs, now dictate the price at which feed grains will be sold in the rest of Canada as well. In this way the minister claims he is creating equity. For whom? He is supposed to be responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, an organization which serves the interests of grain producers. But obviously he is catering to agribusiness interests. The policy is designed to put a potential candidate for leadership of the Liberal Party—I am referring to the Minister of Justice—on the right side of the Quebec farmer and of the politicians who speak for the Quebec farmer. The minister attacked my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave). My colleague stated facts and figures, and the minister did not like those facts and figures.

Many of these problems would not have developed in the first place if federal governments over the last 15 years had developed stable floor prices for farm products based on the costs of production. This is something that successive Liberal and Conservative governments have failed to do—and this has been the cry of the west for years. Now Canadian consumers are being pinched and squeezed because of high food prices due to the total failure of previous governments to stabilize the agricultural economy.

In the province of Saskatchewan thousands of farmers have left farms because that supposedly would make the remainder more efficient. Many farmers got by, by the skin of their teeth. Now, when things are looking better, everyone is screaming that the farmer is getting too much—

Mr. Whelan: Not everybody.

Mr. Nesdoly: —when in effect he is getting only what is due to him.

In the province of Saskatchewan, on October 15 a floor price was announced for hogs. This was done to encourage farmers to stay in hog production. Studies indicated that it cost approximately $48 to $50 to produce one hog. Therefore, the government of Saskatchewan said, "All right; we will give you a floor price of $52 a hog plus a $5 incentive to stay in hog production." The result is that the farmers have a floor price of $57 per hundredweight on hogs at the present time. This will exist for a three-month period and then it will be reviewed and probably renewed for two further three-month periods until July 15 next. Hopefully, by that time the federal government will waken up and negotiate some sort of a stable floor price for hogs. This is essential if farmers are to stay in hog production. Certainly the federal government should be moving into this scheme because I do not think the people of Saskatchewan should be subsidizing hog prices for all of Canada. And, Mr. Speaker, we export 80 per cent of our hogs.

The hog population in Saskatchewan has dropped slightly and people are saying it is because of the hog marketing commission that we have in the province. The Tories in Saskatchewan are trying to destroy it. I would like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that for the period ending October 1, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics the number of hogs dropped by 4.4 per cent in Saskatchewan, compared with a drop of more than 10 per cent in Alberta where they do not have the type of marketing board that we have.

Another related matter, so far as the agricultural industry in the west is concerned, is the whole question of administration of agricultural policies. We have a minister for the Canadian Wheat Board, we have a Minister of Agriculture, and in Saskatchewan the federal community pastures come under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. This divergence of the various ministries causes problems so that the right hand does not know what the left hand is doing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much interrupting the hon. member, but the time allotted to him under the agreement made earlier today has expired.

[Mr. Nesdoly.]

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I enter this debate to support the motion on agriculture. I would like to begin by quoting an editorial in The Grower, which is published monthly by the Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers Association. It is headed, "Farm policy a tragic farce," and among other things it says:

> The currently higher farm commodity prices . . . could mask the fact that Canada still does not have cohesive farm policy . . . none of the several departments concerned had studied the implications of sweeping tariff reductions.
> Canadian beef and pork producers have been kept on a yo-yo since last February.

● (2140)

Well did the fruit and vegetable growers of Canada know what this means, because they have been kept on a yo-yo for many years because of lack of a farm policy. The soybean market was wrecked and the report from the Department of Agriculture is that farmers have been discouraged from expanding production. An important fact concerning agricultural policy is the federally-divided responsibility for agriculture: Canada has an emasculated Department of Agriculture.

This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was complaining that some people were worried about the number of speeches that he makes. I am not worried about the number, but I get a profusion of these speeches sent to my office and it is the content that I complain about. I do not even have to read them any more; I can just scan them because they are all the same. After reading these speeches over the last few months, it appears that the minister has traded his pitchfork for a trident and is about to grow a beard so that he can keep permanently in place the halo that he thinks is over his head. In most of his speeches he takes credit for what has happened in agriculture in the past few months, which has come about more by accident than by design; there is very little there about the policies of his government.

Why does he not tell the farmers what he is doing to help them in transportation and marketing? What about feed assistance for the people in southern British Columbia where there was a very severe drought this year? With feed assistance for their cattle they could maintain their basic herds. What about the cold storage subsidy? We have heard little about that. What about the livestock inventory provision of the Income Tax Act? What about the tender fruit industry study? We hear very little about these things, Mr. Speaker. I should like to deal with some of these policy matters, but as my time is short I will not be able to cover them all.

This afternoon the minister was going to tell the House about policy, but he got hung up on farm credit. Marketing is the thing, Mr. Speaker. What is the use of setting up credit for farmers, or even giving them money to get into farming, if they cannot market their produce? Marketing is what they need; they have to earn their living in the marketplace. Why does the minister not tell us what he is doing to give the Canadian producer a market in Canada and to help him market abroad? In a speech in the House earlier this year the minister said that no one would bring products into Canada and upset the market of Canadian producers. Is this what he means? How about what happened in onion marketing in Canada this year? What about fresh peach marketing in Ontario this year? What about the marketing of cherries in Canada this year?

Let us now deal with tomatoes. I have a letter from a constituent telling me what happened when his tomatoes were ready for picking. At the peak he had 500 boxes of tomatoes for sale, so he called his marketing board. They gave him an order for 20 packages of tomatoes, or 800 pounds. I have a copy of his account sales from the marketing board. The tomatoes were sent to Vancouver and he received $50 for them, seven cents a pound. The marketing board told him this was because of the produce coming in from the United States at, they allegedly told him, 3½ cents a pound. He got seven cents a pound shipped to Vancouver. If the wholesale and retail mark-up and transportation had taken an equal amount, that would mean that tomatoes should have been selling for 14 cents a pound in the stores in Vancouver. I wonder how long it has been since we saw tomatoes at 14 cents a pound retail?

When the peach crop in Ontario reached its peak for marketing, what happened? There was an influx of peaches. I do not think the minister did very much about this, although I heard him say in committee he was going to give the growers a cold storage subsidy so they could build CA storages to put their peaches in, and then market them at Christmas after everybody else had had a good run at the market and the fruit had lost peak condition. What a way to market Canadian produce! The producer is denied the marketplace at the peak of production and the government is going to help him spend the taxpayers' money to put the crop into cold storage, and then bring it out after everybody else has had a run at the market. The minister said that his researchers told him this could be done. I have never heard of such research. Peaches are one of the most perishable products. I would like to see the day when you could put them into CA storage until Christmas after they had been picked in August.

Why does the minister not tell the Canadian people that none of the prices for farm products are set in Canada? The beef producers are finding that out today, although we have been telling them for years that it was going to happen. We know from experience what has been going on because of lack of policy. Prices are not set in Canada, but outside. We had a really good price structure this year for apples, one that would probably have brought us in proper remuneration considering the increased cost of inputs such as labour, spray, gasoline and diesel fuel, farm machinery, and so on. What happened? There was a large apple crop in the state of Washington and they started rolling cars in. Immediately the price went down and this was the price we had to compete with. So we are back down to the price we got three years ago, but we are not paying the price for gas that we paid three years ago.

What is the minister doing to help us in the area of transportation? We cannot get cars. In the Okanagan Valley we are short 73 cars for shipping fruit. We have a railroad just south of the border which is willing to haul our fresh fruit at no extra cost to us if we agree to send it through the United States and back into Canada. It is the Burlington Northern and it has the rail cars. Yet what has happened? The Customs people have decided that they cannot go five or ten miles and put their stamps on the cars and seal them. That is too far for them to go, even though the railroad has offered to pay their way down there and back. Therefore we cannot take advantage of this service. What a way to do things! We are told that our cars are in the United States, yet there are empty American cars which are available if we want to ship our produce.

Yesterday I mentioned the apples that are sold in the House of Commons restaurants and cafeterias. We cannot ship our apples to Ontario and Quebec. The Americans are getting their apples here and they fill the vacuum quickly. More than likely, that is why we cannot bring our apples in. American apples certainly come in. Mr. Speaker, what a way to handle the crops of Canadian farmers!

I have in my possession a study on tender fruit. I do not know if it has been released officially but I have a copy of it. It does not contain too much input from the industry. It says, in so many words, that there should not be any canneries in Canada. I point out that this publication was put out by the Department of Agriculture. It says that we should market everything we grow in the fresh state. You must market fresh fruit as well as canned fruit. You cannot market just fresh fruit. Yet the people who put out this publication are saying to the producers of Canada, "Send your produce to Australia, to California, to South Africa or to anywhere else in the world and take jobs away from Canadians." That is what they are saying, instead of, "Look, we want a healthy canning industry in Canada and we will see to it that we have a healthy canning industry."

Last year the people in Quebec sent 250,000 boxes of apples across the line to be processed. They should have been processed in Quebec. There was a shortage of apple juice in Canada and the apples should have been processed in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him under the order made earlier today has expired.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, over the years I have developed a great respect for the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), the mover of the motion we are considering. I have grown to respect him for his deep knowledge of agriculture as well as of other subjects which we discuss in the House. Frankly, however, I submit that in moving the motion standing in his name today he has made a mistake. The last sentence reads in part "—the government has weakened the over-all agricultural economy". If that motion had been presented five years ago or two years ago, or at any time in the 20 years prior to the last two years, very few people would have stood in this House, or in any provincial legislature, and denied the correctness of it, if they spoke with truth and sincerity. Why do I say that?

Since the end of the last war the farmers and others making up the agricultural industry of Canada have not been given a square deal. That they should be given a square deal has been emphasized by politicians at all levels of government and of all parties. Nevertheless, in my view the people of Canada have never appreciated that the people in the agricultural industry are like people in other segments of our economy in that they should have a fair share of the good things of life.

Mr. Speaker, for three or four years I was in western Canada. I think it was in 1969 when the agricultural committee of the House of Commons went to that part of the country. The farmers had on hand approximately one billion bushels of wheat and millions of bushels of other grains. Their complaint was that they did not know what to do with all the grain. If the hon. member for Crowfoot had moved then a motion such as he has moved today, and suggested that the government had failed the agricultural community, many in this chamber would have agreed with him. They would have agreed with him only two years ago when the hog farmers of Canada were starving to death, were being starved out of business—not necessarily, I hasten to add, because of the policies of any one government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whicher: I see an hon. member laughing. I am willing to be fair. Many governments on the North American continent did not do their best for hog producers. I am speaking of producers of the United States as well as those raising hogs in Canada. The point is that hog producers could not make a living.

As well, look at the egg situation. Members representing rural areas of Canada know that not long ago farmers were producing eggs which sold at approximately 20 cents a dozen, or less. We all knew then that it took a selling price of 29 cents per dozen for the farmer to break even. Without meaning to laugh at the farmer's expense, the housewife went to Loblaws, Dominion Stores and Safeways and chuckled to herself as she bought five dozen eggs for a very reasonable price, not realizing that what she was paying for every dozen was hurting the farmer who had to produce those eggs. Mr. Speaker, the farmers of Canada have not been given a fair deal for the past 20 years.

In the last year or so a breath of fresh air has blown over the agricultural industry of Canada. I have often heard people, when talking about the policies of the Liberal Party, the Conservative Party, the NDP or any other party say that the leader of the party represents policy. In the majority of cases such people would have been correct in past years. However, in the last few months a leader has emerged, who is helping the agricultural producers of Canada. I am referring to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). He has brought with him a breath of fresh air in enunciating policies affecting the agricultural industry of Canada.

Mr. Knight: What about the minister in charge of the Wheat Board?

Mr. Whicher: Over the years I have heard various ministers of agriculture, provincial as well as federal, straddle the fence, walk along the rail because they did not want to hurt anybody's feelings. The present Minister of Agriculture, and I say this most sincerely, is all for the farmers of Canada. He is for the people of Canada. My Conservative friends should be mighty glad that we have a minister who goes to western Canada and speaks to farmers in that region. Although people in the past may have disliked the government, they like the policies of the Minister of Agriculture. These policies help hon. members in their capacity as members of parliament, I can assure you.

An hon. Member: You could have done that.

Mr. Whicher: An hon. member across the way says that somebody else could have done that. The fact is, and nobody can deny it, that the Minister of Agriculture has been doing this and in my opinion he deserves all the credit in the world. His policies have been criticized. As I understand it, in plain words he wants us to have good, wholesome food at reasonable prices and he wants a reasonable profit for the farmer. For many years the people of Canada have been getting good and wholesome food. However, "reasonable" does not mean much to some people when it comes to buying food. They do not want reasonable prices; they want food at prices which are cheap, to the detriment of the agricultural industry of Canada. They do not necessarily want the farmer to earn a reasonable profit. They do not give a darn about the farmer's profit so long as they can buy food as cheaply as possible.

• (2200)

This is one of the reasons why the people of Canada have to pay higher prices for their food today. Because so many farmers have been almost starved out of existence in some instances, we are short of food, if not in Canada in the world at large. Farmers, not just in Canada but in the whole world, have to make a reasonable profit figure so they will produce the food that is so necessary to keep this earth of ours going.

This afternoon the hon. member for Crowfoot said the government has weakened the over-all agricultural industry. It is not generally my policy to read anything, but there was an article on the financial page of this morning's Globe and Mail headlined "Very good year is reported for farmers". This is from the latest issue of the Bank of Montreal business review. There is much criticism of banks but generally it is that they do not face facts as far as the business world is concerned. I suggest these figures are true because they are found in agricultural reports across Canada. These facts were reported by the Bank of Montreal only this morning. The article states that farm cash receipts of Canadian farmers improved by 30 per cent in 1972 over 1971. Does that show, as this motion suggests, that the government has weakened the over-all agricultural economy of Canada? The article further states:

A further increase of between 25 and 30 per cent seems in store for this year.

If my Conservative friends—they are my friends, because I sit with them on the agriculture committee and respect every one of them—want to be fair, they may criticize certain areas of agriculture. However, they should admit that the agricultural economy of Canada, for the first time in 25 years, increased by 30 per cent last year and will increase by another 30 per cent this year. Some members who spoke this afternoon have been able to take advantage of that because they are farmers, and good farmers at that. Much criticism can be made. As far as agricultural workers are concerned, this is not heaven. We all know that. It is not perfect. However, many things will have to be perfected in the future.

Within the past couple of years national marketing legislation has been passed by the House of Commons. Our unions, which are so important for the development of Canada, can get people together to work as a team. The United Automobile Workers have been able to get what they regard as reasonable pay for the work they do. The workers at International Nickel have a union. But the farmers have not been united. This is because they have not had legislation that would allow them to unite across Canada. However, the national marketing legislation which was passed last year after much controversy and criticism from people not on the government side of the House will be a good thing for the agricultural future of Canada. I would be the first to admit it has not had a substantial effect up to the moment, but these improvements do not happen in a year or so. As a result of that legislation we have the national egg marketing plan. That was set up as a result of the passage of Bill C-176. It has had a dramatic effect on the returns of egg marketing plan producers. No one can deny that.

With regard to stability, we do not only need stability as far as hogs, tomatoes and vegetables are concerned. We need stability as far as our cattle products are concerned. Incidentally, sales of our beef products produce more revenue than wheat, which might surprise some people. I hope that when the cattlemen come to Ottawa tomorrow to meet government officials, they will be able to sell this government, my government, the idea that for a certain short period of time this particular industry needs help.

The outlook for farmers in Canada, in my opinion, if agriculture is properly handled by national farm marketing agencies and sympathetic government—I include not only the federal government but all provincial governments—is bright. Let us not forget that the agricultural industry of Canada is divided into many different segments. For example, the province of Quebec is responsible for the goods produced and sold in that province and for those which come from the province and are sold in other parts of Canada. The Department of Agriculture looks after foreign sales, and I would say the prospects for foreign sales have never been better.

Much criticism is made by our friends opposite who doubtless are sincere in their criticism. They say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has not done this, or he has done too much of that. But one thing they cannot say is that he is not friendly with many world powers. I think one of the greatest things in years to come will be that our present Prime Minister will go down in history for his friendliness with the great nation of China which has one-quarter of the world's population. Future trading opportunities with this huge nation are absolutely unlimited; and their people have to eat, too. The same can be said about domestic farm development and our trade with our American friends, and so on.

I have one other point. I mention, this, not because the gentleman concerned is a particular friend of mine but because he is a friend of many people in this House. As you know, Mr. Speaker, there has been much criticism of food prices in the last several weeks. A very substantial pamphlet known as the Pringle report, dealing with the dissemination of information regarding complexities relating to cost factors from farm input to the dining table, has been published. I wish that all people in Canada had the opportunity to read this report. It shows that farmers have many things against them, that in order to provide good food to the people of Canada they have to spend a great deal of money.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I suggest there is ample evidence of the government's lack of leadership in agricultural policy matters, both in the short term and in long term planning for the future of Canadian agriculture. For this reason I am very pleased to take part in this debate. I wish to comment quite specifically about a very short term, indeed emergency, situation in our Canadian cattle industry, and if time permits I should like to discuss a most important long term item pertaining to beef production in Canada.

Recently there has been considerable discussion, even disagreement, between beef producers over the amount of protection, if any, which our Canadian beef industry needs from the fluctuations in United States markets that occur from time to time. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is well aware of these points of view. Yesterday I was privileged to attend the mid-term directors' meeting in Regina of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, and this item, specifically as it relates to the currently excessive United States fat cattle imports, was the burning issue. Let us look at the problem. The Canadian beef industry is geared almost entirely to supplying beef for our domestic market. Because of the close economic ties between ourselves and the United States, the historic development of our industries and the very similar economic forces operating in these two industries, it has always been an accepted principle that Canadian and United States beef markets are, and should remain, closely related.

The advantages of this have been threefold, I suggest. First, the American market has in the past been far less volatile than ours and has thus formed a stabilizing factor in our market. Until recently the United States market was the largest deficit market in the world, and it was also the highest priced market in the world. Because of our close price relationship, the Canadian industry has been forced to stay, you might say, on its toes to remain competitive. These three factors have been very real.

However, over the past year there were a number of new factors which have changed things, and new forces have been introduced. These are noteworthy. First, the American market has become extremely unstable because of forces that are not operating in Canada and over which we have no control. The direction of United States industry in the short term is being determined more and more by political rather than by economic forces. The United States market is presently not the force it was in the world pricing system and it is certainly not the high priced market. However, this situation may well change if their dollar and our dollar change in value.

There is considerable evidence that the recent close ties between our pricing system and that of the United States has created an unstable situation that is not conducive to the long-term interests of our Canadian industry. In basic terms, we do not want to confuse the maintenance of a free and competitive market for our product with the idea that we can only do so if we retain a close relationship with the United States.

I suggest that if rigid controls are implemented in the United States, as they were this year, then any idea that our market is operating freely is surely naïve. It cannot be argued that the way to maintain a viable open market system in Canada is to tie ourselves to a pricing system in the United States that is under government control. Our two industries certainly respond to similar economic stimuli and in similar fashion; there is no doubt about that. However, it must be clearly recognized that this is only true where the same rules are applied in both games.

Finally, because of its size the United States industry is capable of draining or swamping our market without any appreciable influence on their price structure. I would suggest that the time has come to reassess our policies with regard to the relationship between the United States and Canadian cattle price levels. If, as cattlemen, we do not do so, there is no doubt that the government will do it for us.

We have three basic alternative directions in which we can move in our industry today. The first is to gradually move our whole industry away from the United States price base. This would not only appear impossible but also undesirable if we accept the fact that the United States is likely to remain the most important producer and consumer of beef over the next decade at least. The second alternative is to press for complete integration of our industry with that of the United States, and I mean the reciprocal removal of all tariffs and quotas on movements of beef, fat and feeder cattle. Because of the factor mentioned, that is, government controls, I would suggest that not only would this be difficult to achieve but may also be foolish as far as Canadian producers are concerned.

The third alternative is to press the government to adopt a policy which will allow us to improve our competitiveness with the United States, which basically means a free market between ourselves and the United States. It also embodies the ability of Canada to protect our industry from market aberrations where those aberrations are due to political rather than economic forces. This may well have to be done by some form of agreement between our two countries.

Let us examine the impact of this United States government involvement in the Canadian cattle industry today. Since the Canadian export controls, or the permit system as the minister referred to it this afternoon, were imposed in mid-summer we have come full circle and are now witnessing the heaviest concentration of fat cattle and beef imports in Canadian history. In September, imports of live fat cattle totalled 40,369 head, compared to 763 head in 1972. For the week ending October 5, imports amounted to 13,378 head. For the week ending October 12, they amounted to 18,385 head. For the week ending October 19, they amounted to 20,401 head. The estimated imports for the week ending October 26 are a further 15,000 head. The estimated figure, up to tonight, for this week is 8,700 coming into Ontario and 2,000 coming into western Canada; and there is still another day to go to round out the week.

[Mr. Hargrave.]

October total imports were 77,864 head. We might compare this figure with the figure of 64,000 head which represents the total for the whole of 1972. Our total imports for the year, to date, are 142,099 head. During September and October we received 120,000 head of this total. This has shown up very vividly on the Toronto market in the last two weeks. The Toronto market yesterday and today dropped in price between $1.50 and $2 on fed steers. Ontario is receiving the major impact of these imports of cattle, all of which are grossly overfat even by United States prime standards. Loads have been imported with animals weighing from 1,600 to 1,800 pounds. These were purchased by our packers in the United States for as low as $28. Today's Toronto price for Canadian-fed steers was around $42.50 to $44.50.

There have been very limited Ontario deliveries, with equally limited buyer activity, to the Toronto fat cattle market these past few days. There are ample reports of extreme difficulty in getting packers to bid on our Canadian finished fat cattle of more desirable grades. All of this is now giving rise to a distinct possibility of a holdback of Ontario fat cattle, which can only lead to further overfat cattle in Canada.

Last October 16 the minister met with a delegation of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. That delegation told the minister that with conditions as they then appeared to be—I emphasize that—cattlemen preferred to ride it out without government controls. However, as I have just outlined, conditions have indeed changed drastically to the serious detriment of the Canadian, and especially the Ontario beef industry. A little over a week ago the Canadian Cattlemen's Association recommended an immediate temporary surcharge of three cents a pound live, and six cents a pound dressed, on United States imports. Yesterday, in Regina, the full directorate of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association from every region of Canada unanimously approved this action of their executive. As I indicated earlier, there were some cattlemen, especially from the west, who had some misgivings about this approach to the serious situation. I have to admit that I was one of them.

Now, however, after weighing all the pertinent facts which I have just outlined to hon. members, I say to the Minister of Agriculture, "You moved very quickly in applying export controls last August. Will you now give serious consideration to the cattlemen you will meet tomorrow and to their request for an immediate import surcharge?" I must remind all members of the House of the very serious, four-pronged dilemma facing Canada's cattle industry today. First, feeder calves are presently selling in western Canada for $65 to as high as $80. Second, domestic feed barley for feeders who will buy those calves or who have already bought them, ranges from $2.10 to $2.25 a bushel in western Canada. Third, the present fat cattle market is at about $45. If you put those three points of dilemma together, there is no way in which you can come out with a profit. The fat cattle price will have to jump by at least $10.

The fourth point is perhaps the most important. It is the uncertainty and unrest in our marketplace due to the U.S. imports which are coming into Canada now. The most serious consequence of this dilemma is the distinct probability of a reduced incentive to remain in the cattle business all over Canada, with the inevitable result of a reduced number of cattle and higher price for beef at the consumer level. There is another specific item that is at present working to the disadvantage of the cattle industry. I refer to the application of beef tariff drawbacks as this device presently operates with respect to different types and grades of beef being exported from and imported into Canada. Producer cattlemen will be asking appropriate government departments to examine the fairness of these tariff drawbacks.

Before I conclude, I would like to refer to one longer term aspect of the agricultural policy that presently concerns cattlemen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him by the order made earlier today has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I note that I have barely five minutes left and I had not foreseen that I would be the one to draw conclusions and/close this debate. However, I could say that we had today the opportunity to talk about agriculture. For several weeks, not to say several months, we had not had the opportunity, in this House, to have a lengthy debate on that industry, which I deem essential to our food security.

One will understand that it is rather difficult to cover in a few minutes a topic as huge and as complex as agriculture; one can certainly not make an analysis of it during such a short time.

I should like at most, Mr. Speaker, to point out to the House, as I have been here for the last eight years, that not a single week not even a single day went by without acrimonious debates on agriculture in this House, either during the oral question period or on the introduction of budgets or government bills.

Mr. Speaker, until a year ago or so, we had debates on agriculture, either on wet grain on account of a bad crop during the fall of a certain year, or on a lack of cars. Prices were too low or we could not export and had to accumulate big stocks. And I could go on indefinitely with the topics and complaints that were raised in this House.

However, today, Mr. Speaker, if one goes back over a year ago one realizes that in that period of one year the subject of agriculture was barely touched on in this House. Why? Because agriculture in Canada in that last year improved notably, as did the plight of farmers. That is why members of the opposition who admit that put an end to the criticism they were directing at the government, often rightly so.

The motion we are discussing today and introduced by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) whom we all know well because of his many interventions in this House, is proof of the fact I just mentioned, namely that agriculture is doing well, not perfectly well—I say so immediately—but much better than it ever did. Indeed, the wording of this motion before us today is the best proof of that. It is so general that one could almost talk about the weather.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) did not find one specific point on which to attack the government with respect to agricultural measures. At best he talked about the new feed grain policy. I would like to touch on that point in a few moments and support the Minister of Justice in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) who said among other things that the aim of that measure was fairness.

We from the east, no more than the farmers of British Columbia, have never asked or expected a lower price for feed grain if it meant losses for the Prairies.

We are responsible as Canadians, especially as farmers. In the east we are fully conscious of the interests of western farmers, because we are all dependent on one another in a single Canadian economy. We wish once again to say in this House that our sole objective is equity, fairness and equal opportunity for all.

On that basis, we are ready to support any valid proposal to establish that equity. I see that the time allotted to me will soon be expired. All is not perfect and I am the first to admit it. Indeed, I am concerned by the lack of supplies which we now face. I am also concerned by increases in the cost of living and in agricultural production costs.

But I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that all these are not the fault of the farmers themselves. It is not their fault if we encounter these difficulties. Farmers have done their share and it is up to us as Canadians and as members to continue our support of agriculture.

I will conclude my remarks by paying a well-deserved tribute to our two excellent ministers responsible for agriculture in Canada. As Canadians, we must continue our support so that they can do more, if possible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 10.30 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to the order made earlier this day, proceedings on the motion have expired. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

At 10.31 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order made this day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF DOCUMENT OUTLINING POSITION TO BE TAKEN BY CANADA AT LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as previously agreed I am pleased to table in English and French a document outlining the government's position for the third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea.

I would also like to have the unanimous consent from the House to have this document, as previously mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Davis, seconded by Mr. MacEachen, moves that the background document on the issues involved in the forthcoming conference on the Law of the Sea be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF IMPOSITION OF TEMPORARY SURTAX ON IMPORTS OF LIVE CATTLE AND DRESSED BEEF

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, members should be aware that the government has today imposed a temporary surtax on imports of live cattle and dressed beef in accordance with section 8 of the Customs Tariff.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The surtax will be levied at a rate of three cents a pound on live cattle and six cents a pound on fresh dressed beef. This measure has been put in place to stabilize the Canadian market for beef and cattle which in recent weeks has been disrupted by an unusually large volume of imports. The government is concerned that without such a measure Canadian beef producers will not have sufficient assurance of market stability to produce the volume of beef required to meet Canadian demand. Adequate levels of Canadian production will minimize the likelihood of significant price increases during the coming year.

[Translation]

Steps have been taken to advise U.S. authorities of this action. They have been told that it is required to offset the disruption of the North American market largely brought on by the effects of measures taken earlier this year by the U.S. to regulate prices of beef and exports of cattle feed.

[English]

The surtax is a temporary measure. We expect that North American trade in beef and cattle will return to traditional levels before long. The decision to impose a surtax will therefore be reviewed in 30 days.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like, first of all, to extend my appreciation to the minister for sending me a copy of the announcement, although I have only just received it.

I assure the minister and the Minister of Agriculture that the announcement was expected. In view of my remarks last night in the special debate on agriculture I must say that the announcement of the surtax will be welcomed by the beef cattle industry in Canada. In addition, I commend the two ministers for having made it on a Friday and not a Monday. I have in mind, of course, that when export controls were announced earlier they were announced at the beginning of the week, and it really did cause havoc. I have to say that the government does learn from experience in this regard.

● (1110)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hargrave: I suggest that this is an instance where the representations of a Canadian industry, the Canadian cattle industry, through their organization, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, have indeed been heard, and I am sure that the cattlemen appreciate this.

I realize that it was a difficult decision not only for the government and its various departments but also for the cattlemen themselves. Until two weeks ago there was a clear division in the cattle industry on this issue. Cattlemen in western Canada felt that we should ride out the situation, that it would correct itself and no action should be taken. But in the two weeks that have elapsed since that time great havoc has occurred in the marketing system in Canada because of, let us say, the errors of another government which has involved itself in a basic agricultural commodity. This resulted in great disruption, and I am sure the action that was taken today was very necessary.

I suggest there was clear and sufficient evidence of the impact of these heavy imports of overfat cattle coming into Canada as long as two weeks ago for action to have been taken then. Indeed, it should have been taken two weeks ago today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hargrave: I point out that the three cents a pound surcharge on live cattle or six cents on dressed meat coming into Canada will not mean an increase to the consumer. It should not be taken for granted that there will be an automatic increase. What we can expect to happen is that the supply of fat cattle in Ontario especially but all across Canada will become more current. There has been a holdback reaching serious proportions. In Ontario especially we were getting an oversupply of fat cattle, and this announcement will at least indicate to the producers and feeders in Canada that some action has been taken to correct the situation. Producers will bring their cattle out of the feed lots to the market in an orderly fashion I hope, and market conditions should level out.

In no way do I see an indication of a price rise at the consumer level. I point out to the House, however, that the substantial price drops to the feeder and producer in Canada have not yet been passed on to the consumer through the retail stores, and this is where further action by the government is surely indicated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hargrave: In summary, may I say that I think the cattle industry appreciates the action taken today even though it is two weeks late, that it will indeed cause the situation to level out, and that in my opinion it will not raise the price of beef at the retail level.

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is rather a pleasure to be able to rise and speak about a slightly different aspect of the cattle industry than Bangs disease with which I have been associated lately, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) tells me. I believe that this action by the Minister of Finance is timely because I have reports from my home province of Saskatchewan that approximately 15,000 to 20,000 head of American cattle have moved into the southern part of my province and something had to be done about this matter.

I believe that the surtax will be important in the long run to the consumers because we must protect the beef producers whose costs of production have been escalating and we must maintain a viable beef industry in order to protect the interests of the consumers. If too many farmers give up beef production, in the long run the cost of beef to consumers will skyrocket out of the reach of most consumers. This step has to be taken to ensure a continuing Canadian source of supply.

I also wish to point out that this action by the government in a sense is a result of or was caused by American price controls imposed several months earlier, as a consequence of which American beef producers held their beef back from market. The U.S. price controls have now been eliminated. United States producers have a surplus of beef and they are trying to flood the Canadian market with it.

The minister says that the surtax is temporary. I hope Washington does not pressure the government to remove it earlier than the 30 days stipulated. I can assure the minister that our party will be watching closely to see if the surtax deserves reviewing and renewal. We will be doing this because we have to protect the interests of both the consumers and the producers.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, our party maintains it is time that we in this country started to stabilize farm products by establishing floor prices which are associated closely with the costs of production. If measures of that kind had been taken a number of years ago, many of the problems now emerging would probably not have developed.

It is time that our agricultural industry got away from its boom and bust cycles. We are at present in a boom cycle, but I just wonder when the bust is going to start appearing. Now is the time to start thinking in terms of passing legislation that will give the farmer an adequate return based on his cost of production so that we can have a steady supply of agricultural products both for our own people and for export purposes.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased with the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). However, I should like to take this opportunity to make a few rectifications.

Mr. Speaker, in a country such as ours where we can produce all we need in this field, it is obviously unthinkable to purchase foreign products. It is as if we did not know where calves come from. If this were the case, we would only have to ask a bull.

I therefore think, Mr. Speaker, that the government has not taken sufficient action and that it should decide not to accept on the Canadian market any product which can easily be made here. This is especially obvious in view of the situation in the province of Quebec, where farms are abandoned, where the number of farmers has been reduced by half during the past few years, and where there are many farms which could be used to produce cattle, and especially beef. It is unthinkable that we should refuse to help Canadian farmers to increase their production if need be. It is therefore stupid to import a commodity which is plentiful in Canada when we could be helping not only the present producers, but also farmers who wish to remain in agriculture, and at the same time reduce unemployment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF REPORT OF UNITED NATIONS SECRETARY GENERAL TO SECURITY COUNCIL ON ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT, AND TWO NOTES

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I would like to table, in both official languages, the report of the United Nations Secretary General to the Security Council, contained in document S 110 52, dated October 26, as well as two notes from the Secretary General of the United Nations.

PROTEST AGAINST FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY BY PROPOSED HIGHER DAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise to propose a motion of pressing and urgent necessity arising from the refusal of the city of Seattle in the state of Washington to cancel the proposed plan to raise the height of the Ross dam on the American Skagit River which will cause the flooding of the upstream Canadian Skagit River valley contrary to the protest against such flooding delivered by the government of Canada to the Seattle city council on March 31, 1972.

Recognizing the contribution of the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) who generously offered to join with others in seconding this motion, with unanimous consent I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose):

That the House of Commons of Canada is unalterably and unanimously opposed to the flooding of the Canadian Skagit River valley which will result from the proposed city of Seattle project to raise the height of the present Ross dam situated in the state of Washington and downstream from the Canada-United States border; and

That this House further resolves that the government of Canada deliver the text of this resolution forthwith to the government of the United States of America, the government of the state of Washington, and the council of the city of Seattle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

STEPS TO PREVENT EXCESSIVE PROFITS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney):

That the Minister of Finance make a statement on motions indicating what steps the government plans to introduce to prevent excessive profits being made.

Mr. Speaker: This motion also requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

ENERGY

OIL EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT IN EASTERN CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I also rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. It has to do with the energy crisis which is particularly acute in its effects on eastern Canada.

In view of the extreme dependence of eastern Canada on foreign suppliers for our oil requirements and the desirability of developing our own offshore production capabilities, and in view of the reported detrimental effects on exploration and development projects by major oil companies caused by the jurisdictional disputes between federal and provincial governments, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources meet immediately with the appropriate provincial ministers to resolve, once and for all, these jurisdictional disputes and procedural impediments which this nation as a whole can no longer afford.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

ENERGY

CONSERVATION PROGRAM WITHIN GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES—DIPLOMATIC EFFORTS TO AVOID POSSIBLE INTERRUPTION OF SUPPLIES FROM MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last evening and the concern he expressed about security of supply and the importance of conservation, and in view of his failure to indicate any measures that the government is taking within its own organization to conserve energy, can the Prime Minister tell the House which minister has been placed in charge of an energy conservation program for federal departments and agencies, what authority has been given to that minister, and what machinery has been set up to carry through this program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in a reply to the House three days ago, I think, this matter is very much before the government's mind. It has been discussed in cabinet. We have apportioned the responsibilities about which the Leader of the Opposition inquires among several ministers. They involve legal aspects which are being worked on, communications aspects which are being worked on and involve, of course, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Stanfield: I gather from the Prime Minister's answer that nothing has been done yet except that the matter is being discussed within the federal government. In view of the concern expressed by the minister last night about the probability of some interruption in supplies of oil from the Middle East, has the Prime Minister set afoot any special diplomatic effort to deal with these threatened interruptions and to attempt to prevent their occurrence? Has the Prime Minister instructed any particular effort to be made or has he personally set afoot any effort on his own behalf?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the assumption that preceded the question, I must inform the Leader of the Opposition that he is quite correct in saying that nothing has been done in the sense that no rationing has yet been imposed. However, when the Leader of the Opposition indicates that discussions are merely taking place I must say, of course, that this work is not just being talked about. I indicated that various ministers are involved in the kind of planning that it would be necessary to implement. The Leader of the Opposition is right; nothing has been announced that he may have missed.

To the second part of the question the answer is yes. Diplomatic initiatives have been taken. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has met with the various Arab ambassadors. He is, indeed, meeting today at the United Nations with certain important delegates from Arab countries, in order to ascertain their position on this and other matters.

Mr. Stanfield: Of course I look forward to the usual full and lucid exposition from the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he returns from the United Nations.

PRICE OF CANADIAN CRUDE OIL DELIVERED TO QUEBEC AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): My further supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with regard to security of supplies in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec. May I ask the minister whether, in terms of the pricing policy of any Canadian crude delivered to the Quebec or Atlantic provinces markets, the minister intends to see to it that the price of that crude shall be the frozen price, the price fixed for Ontario and western Canada, or does he intend that any oil delivered to the Montreal market and the Atlantic provinces from Canadian sources should be at the same price as offshore oil coming into those areas, in order to provide some incentive to Canadian producers to do all they can to move oil into those areas?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

● (1130)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, from contacts with the industry our feeling is that the industry does not require any incentive in this regard. They hope to move up to a level of about 55,000 barrels a day in the month of November and perhaps even to go above that if appropriate tanker arrangements can be made. With regard to the impact of Canadian source oil going into the Montreal market, we expect that to go into the cost base of the Montreal refiners in accordance with the discussions with the refiners on the basis of which we reached a conclusion of what their actual cost increase has been. We would expect this to help to offset any cost increases from abroad. Obviously the lower price will not offset any accrued prices coming from abroad in a substantial way because of the very much greater volume coming from overseas.

GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PETROLEUM CORPORATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact the minister's policy statement last night did not do anything to ensure either continuity of supply or price protection for consumers who live in eastern Canada, does the government have any intention of establishing a national petroleum corporation somewhat along the lines envisaged by the recommendation of his own department to the cabinet last April, or has this concept of a marketing mechanism been completely abandoned by the government?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have to take exception to the hon. member's preamble. I remind him that the price protection consumers have in the eastern market is that the prices have only been increased by the amount of provable cost and that the prices there are still under that freeze, although on a different level from that west of the Ottawa Valley line. With regard to continuity of supply, the sheer fact is that unless there is a possibility of price increases to the refiners east of the Ottawa Valley line, there really will be a cutoff of supplies to the Canadian market. With regard to a national petroleum corporation, that concept is before the government. However, I do not see it as a solution to the interim problem which is a problem arising from the interruption of supply coming from the Arab world and, of course, the fact that there have been dramatic price increases by foreign governments in the very recent past.

Mr. Douglas: Does the minister's statement imply that the government is opposed to the principle of a national marketing mechanism which would purchase oil, both offshore and domestic, enter into a pooling arrangement and standardize prices for all Canadians, the only differential being in the handling and transportation costs?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker. I would not have the hon. member try to read between the lines. The government has not taken a decision on the question of a national petroleum corporation or, indeed, on a marketing mechanism. These are questions that are before the government. I can say to the hon. member there has been no decision taken on this point, either for or against.

REASON FOR INCREASE IN HOME HEATING OIL PRICE WEST OF OTTAWA VALLEY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I agree with the minister the government has not taken any decision. That is what is disturbing me. In view of the minister's statement last night that the price of home heating oil will be allowed to rise west of the Ottawa Valley, what is the rationale for that since, particularly in British Columbia and the Prairies, there is no possibility of these supplies of fuel oil moving into the eastern market?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As I mentioned in my statement last night, a very substantial part of the Ontario supply of home heating oil has been imported from overseas refineries. We have been advised by the industry, particularly some of the independents who do not have refinery connections in Canada, that but for the opportunity to pass on the additional costs it simply would not be possible for them to bring in additional supplies for this winter. Therefore we put it on the basis that with regard to incremental supplies they may wish to bring in from now on, if they can establish to our satisfaction what the necessary cost is to purchase the quantity abroad they should be entitled to pass it on to the consumer. The rationale, of course, is that, as between the question of price and supply, obviously supply is pre-eminent.

POSITION OF PROPOSED NATURAL GAS PIPELINE FROM ARCTIC ISLANDS TO SERVE EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Still on the subject of energy, I ask the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether there will soon be developments regarding the construction of a gas pipeline from Melville and King Christian islands to supply eastern Canada.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, several Canadian companies now have a study group on the feasibility of such a gas pipeline. We should know the results in about a year and I really cannot see how this pipeline could be built soon.

[English]

AUTHORITY OF GOVERNMENT TO ENFORCE PETROLEUM PRICE FREEZE AND PRICE INDEXING

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Are the Prime Minister and the cabinet satisfied the government has the authority, without special empowering legislation, to enforce the petroleum price freeze and the price indexing program, as suggested last night?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is really asking me a question of law. If I understood him correctly, my simple answer is that the members of his own party have been advocating a price freeze across the board, so I cannot see the worry of the hon. member.

Mr. Blenkarn: Last night the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made some nasty comments about Gulf Canada. Under what law is the government going to discipline Gulf Canada and other oil companies that do not comply with the price freeze?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF FEDERAL TAX ON DIESEL FUEL AND GASOLINE TO EASE BURDEN ON CONSUMERS IN EASTERN PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. I hope the minister will be allowed to reply. In view of the fact the federal government collects a 12 per cent tax on diesel fuel and gasoline, will the government consider reducing or abating this tax in order to offset the inflationary aspects of the announcement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and ease the burden on Canadian consumers in the five eastern provinces?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we would, of course, want to review the whole question of the federal sales tax on gasoline, but I would think the preponderant tax on gasoline is a matter about which he ought to talk to his provincial premier.

Mr. McGrath: The minister, next to the Canadian consumer, seems to be the real loser in this whole affair. In view of the fact the five provincial governments, because of difficulties in trying to meet their budgetary requirements, are not able to reduce their tax on gasoline, and in view of the fact the federal government has budgeted for a surplus, may I ask the minister whether the same spirit that permitted him to reduce tariffs on some petroleum products coming into Canada will now permit him to reduce substantially or abate the 12 per cent sales tax on gasoline and diesel fuels?

I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance is responsible for monetary and fiscal policy and supposedly responsible for the government's war against inflation. I think the House and the consumers of eastern Canada are entitled to an answer.

• (1140)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): In analysing the impact of any tax on the consumers I also have to analyse the impact of, say, lowering the sales tax and having to find revenue in some other quarter, which might adversely affect the consumer in another way.

Mr. Baldwin: Coca-Cola rather than gasoline.

OIL EXPORT TAX—CONSULTATION WITH ALBERTA—DISPOSITION OF PROCEEDS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a question with regard to the export tax of $1.90 a barrel on western crude that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has proposed. Has he held consultations with the government of Alberta on this matter, has he received the approval of the government of Alberta and, further, where does he contemplate that the revenue from this tax will go?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I have answered these questions several times. I have discussed the tax on several different occasions with the Alberta ministers.

An hon. Member: What is the answer to this one?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The answer is that the government of Alberta regards the tax as illegal and immoral but wants, above all, to have the money.

Mr. Yewchuk: I ask the minister where he thinks this export tax should go. I already know Alberta's position. What is his position?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have said many times that we are prepared to make up to the province the revenue it would have received had it sold these products at higher prices in Canada. But the balance, we think, should be invested in research and other projects for the purpose of developing energy resources in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF EXCESS PROFITS TAX IN LIGHT OF LEVEL OF CORPORATE PROFITS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to pose a question or two to the Minister of Finance arising out of a report in this morning's press that corporate profits for the third quarter of 1973 have gone up by 57.7 per cent and, for the first nine months, by 46.9 per cent, a very substantial increase taking into account the fact that profits had already increased substantially in 1972. Is the Minister of Finance considering legislation having to do with some form of excess profits tax or some other way of bringing at least part of these profits back to the public treasury for the benefit of the Canadian people?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): When making comparisons the hon. gentleman would, of course, have to take into account that profits this year, while healthy, are recovering from lower levels in 1970, 1971 and 1972.

Mr. Lewis: Not 1972.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would expect a good deal of that profit picture to be reflected, as I believe it is being reflected, in heavy capital investment, fulfilling investment intentions which I described to one of the hon. member's colleagues as showing an increase of 19 per cent over last year.

SUGGESTED ABSORPTION BY REFINERIES OF PART OF INCREASED PRICE OF CRUDE OIL IN LIGHT OF PROFITS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the same area I should like to pose a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has he studied the profit figures of the oil companies? If he has, he will have noticed that the oil refineries of Canada increased their profits by 68.2 per cent in the third quarter of 1973 compared with the same quarter of 1972, and by 37.9 per cent in the first nine months of this year compared with the first nine months of last year, which was a very healthy year despite what the Minister of Finance has just said. In view of these profit figures, ought not the minister and the government to insist that the refineries absorb a portion of the increased price of crude oil, especially since they are part of the same multinational corporations which are charging more in Venezuela and in Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): That is in fact what they have been doing in the last several months. I would agree with the hon. gentleman that the profit picture is such that they can well afford to give the consumer this kind of relief for a period of months.

CORPORATE PROFITS—SUGGESTION THAT FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD BE EMPOWERED TO ROLL BACK PRICES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): In the same area, Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. On a number of occasions the Prime Minister has indicated to the House that if there should be any evidence of gouging of the consumers the government would be prepared to take action. I wonder whether the Prime Minister has studied the profit picture to which I have referred? If so, he will have found that Silverwood Dairies increased its profits by 87 per cent on an increase in sales amounting to only about 10 per cent, and that Maple Leaf Mills increased its profits by 147 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. gentleman should ask his question. It seems to me he is giving rather than seeking information. I am sure the hon. member wishes to co-operate with the Chair by taking this into account.

Mr. Lewis: I do, certainly, but I cannot help but notice how anxious the Conservative Party is that these figures should not be on the record.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You are hogging the floor.

Mr. Lewis: I have indicated sufficient about these two companies to make my point. I would therefore ask the Prime Minister whether this clear evidence of excessive profits by food processing industries, which is a form of gouging of consumers, has convinced him and the government that greater power should be given to the Food Prices Review Board so that it can roll back some prices on the basis of such profits?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the hon. member will refer to my statements of August and September, he will find they were to the effect that the government would indeed be prepared to take action if reports were received from the Prices Review Board that they had looked into such cases, discussed them with management and the entrepreneurs involved, and that these people had refused to take the action that we thought was necessary for the welfare of Canadians. Then we would intervene. I have no knowledge of the particular cases to which the hon. member has referred, but I suggest he place them before the Prices Review Board if he has not already done so.

As to the effectiveness of government action, I refer the hon. member to the previous series of questions and answers. We did ensure that the prices of petroleum products would be frozen. This was indicated in my statement of September 4, and it is as a result of the government's action that the companies did agree to absorb the price increases rather than pass them on.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO PEOPLE ON FIXED INCOMES IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES AND QUEBEC TO OFFSET INCREASED HEATING FUEL COST

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance on behalf of the people of eastern Canada, especially those on fixed incomes amounting to $80 or $100 a week who are trying to raise families and heat their homes. In view of the fact the hon. gentleman has rejected the idea that any special arrangements be made in respect of kerosene and stove oil, the fuels mainly used by people on low incomes, and since he has rejected any move to give back part of the billion dollars he collects from gasoline and fuel taxes, does he intend to offer people on fixed and low incomes in the Atlantic and Quebec areas any help in offsetting the increase in the cost of fuel?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): We have increased the disposable income of all Canadians, including eastern Canadians, by 6 per cent after discounting taxes and the rise in the cost of living. As far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned, the last budget resulted in the transfer of another $200 million to the seven provinces receiving equalization payments, including the four Atlantic provinces, which, if those provinces were so disposed, could be passed back to the local ratepayers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that we have spent the question period up to this point largely on one very important matter. Perhaps we should attempt to move now to another subject.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Speaker: Well, that is a decision for the Chair, of course. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate on his supplementary and then pass to the hon. member for Vaudreuil.

Mr. Lundrigan: Obviously the minister assumes that everyone in those provinces has a low form of intelligence—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Lundrigan: —and cannot understand his answers to question. The question I asked had nothing to do with what the minister talked about last spring, and nothing to do with transfer payments or equalization payments. He knows full well that those things have nothing to do with this immediate problem. I asked him to recognize the plight of the people faced with this immediate problem, which is only a matter of weeks old, and to offer some kind of indication—

● (1150)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member is repeating the question he asked a moment ago, and perhaps at this point is putting it in the form of a representation. Perhaps hon. members might allow the minister to reply briefly so the Chair can recognize the next questioner.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I had not completed my question, but the fact of the matter is that if the minister is not going to answer the questions we pose and is going to bring forward deleterious arguments and information which in no way are related to the question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is of course, an argument the hon. member is putting forth at this time and what I suggested was an argument of representation rather than a question. However, in recognition of the importance of the matter I certainly have no objection to allowing the minister to reply.

Mr. Trudeau: Don't lose your cool, John.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the House is entitled to take note of the fact that there is a family allowance bill before us which will increase family allowances to the amount of $20 a month per child and that we have escalated and raised old age pensions. All these measures are increasing the disposable incomes of Canadians as a relief against the erosion of income.

GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is he firmly resolved to proceed as soon as possible with construction of an oil pipeline to Montreal to enable the east to share in Canada's natural resources?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the reasons which caused the government to take a decision in principle in favour of the Montreal pipeline, as announced by the Prime Minister, have been more than ever confirmed by our experience both with the threatened Arab cutoff of oil and the very substantial price increases. It would be my intention, therefore, to meet with my counterparts in the Quebec government, after their substantial victory, to see if we can complete arrangements for such a pipeline in concert with plans they might have for petroleum development in that province.

An hon. Member: Where are you going to get the oil?

OIL PRICE INCREASES—STUDY OF IMPACT ON CONSUMERS AND INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance related to the question put by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. In light of the significant importance of the cost of living and the effect of the announcement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last evening on particular industries, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he has undertaken any detailed study of the impact of these changes, particularly in view of the indication of what is to come, as they relate to Quebec and the Atlantic provinces? Has such a detailed study of the effects on the consumer and industry been undertaken?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, Sir, it is being undertaken.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS ON ROUTES—REASON FOR DENIAL OF ROUTE TO SASKATCHEWAN—CHARTER ROUTES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and has to do with negotiations that have been going on for some four years between Canada and the United States in connection with air routes. I ask this question as a member from the province of Saskatchewan. Why is it that the province of Saskatchewan has been denied the right to one air route into the United States?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that any route was denied to Saskatchewan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Absolutely.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No airline indicated that it was interested in having a route from Saskatchewan to the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Herbert.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, surely the minister's memory is better than that. Did he not meet recently with the Attorney General of Saskatchewan and representatives of three cities, Prince Albert, Saskatoon and Regina, in connection with this matter? Has he forgotten?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not forgotten that, but I think that the airlines, and perhaps they are wrong—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what I asked you.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Well, you do not know my answer so you do not yet know what I am going to say. The airlines maintain that they cannot operate these routes economically, but the government of Saskatchewan has another point of view and it is working with my department to see whether this is possible or feasible, and whether somebody will show an interest in these routes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it just shows you how forgetful the minister was a moment ago when he decided to delude the House. I should now like to ask him a question in connection with charter routes into Canada. Has he received a resolution for the pilots' association in opposition to the denial of any further charter routes into Canada in connection with the agreement about to be entered into? Has he received that or has he forgotten about that too?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I have received a wire, but not saying what the hon. gentleman suggests.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He got a wire but does not know what it said. Was it in both languages?

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND QUEBEC PREMIER—SUBJECTS FOR DISCUSSION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us if he has himself invited Premier Bourassa to meet him this afternoon, or if this is an initiative taken by the Quebec Premier?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be at complete loss to reply to such a question, but I think that this was agreed upon between ourselves. I phoned the Quebec premier after his extraordinary victory the very night of the elections and he and I have agreed to meet as soon as possible, in fact today.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary to the right hon. Prime Minister. Could he disclose the main issues which will appear on the agenda of his discussions with the Quebec premier or at least could he say whether the constitutional reform or the eventual shortage of oil in Quebec will be discussed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as for the first point, I can assure the hon. member that the federal government is in no hurry to resume the constitutional debates. In my opinion, it is important for me to say so, because of the eventual headlines and the various interpretations given to that meeting. I have always said and I repeat it that if the Quebec government wishes to reopen the constitutional issue, we are ready to do so, but it is not for the purpose of holding fruitless constitutional conferences that I am meeting the premier today.

As for the oil issue, I suppose that it will be discussed, along the lines mentioned by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I do not know anything about it for the moment.

[Later:]

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND QUEBEC PREMIER—INQUIRY AS TO PRESS CONFERENCE OR STATEMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Since several members are most concerned about the discussions he will have this afternoon with the Quebec premier, can the Prime Minister assure the House that he will make a statement after this meeting?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, such is not my intention. The hon. member can refer to previous meetings that I have had regularly with provincial premiers concerning this. It is not usual—and I do not intend to change this practice—to give press conferences, or even to give all details on these discussions.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether he is looking forward to a successful series of constitutional conferences in the future, and will he find some other means of dealing with the provinces on energy problems rather than beating them over the head with the jawbone of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: Is that a biblical reference?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been tuned in on his hearing aid rather than thinking up some wisecrack question he might have understood my answer to the hon. member which was to the effect that I was not looking forward to a series of constitutional conferences.

ENERGY

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO CONTINGENCY PLAN IN EVENT OF CURTAILMENT OF SUPPLIES

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the short term does the minister have any contingency plans if crude oil is cut off or curtailed from foreign sources of the province of Alberta?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is representing the Progressive Conservative viewpoint in this regard, but I hope his party is not advocating that kind of action by the Progressive Conservative government of Alberta.

OIL PRICE INCREASES—STUDY OF IMPACT ON CONSUMERS AND INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary and is directed to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of the answer he gave to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. As he is aware, the rise in the price of fuel will have a tremendous impact on the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada. I should like to know who commissioned the study mentioned by the Minister of Finance. I should also like to know what are the terms of reference of this study, when we in this parliament can expect a report from this study and what action will be taken by the government on the same?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I stated to the hon. gentleman's leader that I had asked for an assessment of the impact across the country of the events announced by my colleague last night. As a matter of fact, those studies are constantly under way. It is not a specific commission or specific inquiry. It is the usual and continual in-depth advice I get from my department.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There were a number of questions raised about the impact of the increase in fuel costs on low income Canadians and Canadians generally. The Leader of the Opposition directed a specific question to the Minister of Finance asking if there had been a study undertaken. When one talks about a study it is presumed that the study has some terms of reference, is a funded study, and that there is some expectation there will be a report received and recommendations made. The minister now, in response to the hon. member for South Shore, backs away from his original position and says it is a continuing monitoring process. He has deliberately made a statement to the House which is not in accordance with the facts and is trying to give the impression he is aware of what is going on. It is obvious that there is no study. There is nothing being done. He is trying to circumvent the major aspect of this issue with deleterious statements of this kind.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe there are further supplementaries on this subject. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

INCREASED PRICES OF COPPER AND ZINC—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CONTROL—POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF EXPORT TAX

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It relates to the sharp increase in the prices of copper and zinc. There has been a 45 per cent increase in the prices of those two commodities over the last 11 months. In view of the serious effect the increase in the prices of these raw materials will have on the manufacturing industry, and since most of these increases are being reflected in the profits of the companies rather than arising from increased costs to them, can the minister say what action he intends to take to control the price of copper and zinc in Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my department has had a number of discussions with leaders of the producing companies in Canada to review the situation and ensure that there will be adequate supplies of copper and zinc for Canadian converters and manufacturers. I believe this to be the case. On the pricing point, I think it is perhaps worth reminding the hon. member that there is a double two-price system. The international markets are governed by the London Metal Exchange price which is significantly ahead of the North American price for copper. Canadian manufacturers are receiving their copper at the lower figure, the figure posted in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Members are seeking further supplementaries. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge on a last supplementary followed by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Then the Chair will see the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In spite of the minister's reassurance that there is a double two-price system in Canada, nevertheless the price has risen by 45 per cent in this country in less than a year. Can the minister say whether he intends to take the same commendable action in respect of copper and zinc as has been taken by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with regard to oil and impose an export tax on copper in order to control the domestic price?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there are no plans to impose a tax on copper exports.

OIL—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF SUPPLIES TO INDEPENDENT DEALERS IN EASTERN CANADA

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the minister take steps to ensure that independent suppliers of home heating fuels in eastern Canada are guaranteed suppliers for delivery to Canadian homes and that this is considered a priority before exports are made from refineries located in eastern Canada?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. lady that exports have been under control since June of last year, and it is precisely for the purpose of assuring these supplies that the measure was taken yesterday to enable price increases in the Ontario market.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Is the minister aware that there are independent operators in eastern Canada with empty storage tanks as a result of having been refused supplies by the majors, and will he undertake to see that this situation is corrected so that there will not be Canadian homes throughout the winter without adequate oil supplies?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. lady wants to mention specific examples I am prepared to follow them up, but I would point out to her again that it is precisely for the purpose of assuring supplies to Ontario that we are enabling increases to take place in Ontario.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—STATUS OF PROJECT TO REPAIR HOUSES OF OFF-RESERVE INDIANS IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the desperate substandard conditions that exist in Indian off-reserve housing in Nova Scotia, and in view of a telegram that has been received from the chiefs of the 11 Indian bands of Nova Scotia in reference to a LIP application for housing repairs, can the minister advise if he is aware of such an application and whether it has been approved by the provincial co-ordinating committee and is now awaiting Ottawa approval? Would he do whatever is possible to have this project approved because it is a rather serious situation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I presume that this is with reference to LIP funds accompanying winter works grants from the Ministry of Urban Affairs. I have had consultations as recently as this morning with representatives of non-status Indians who have the same problem that exists with regard to treaty Indians. We are trying to work out arrangements under the more limited ceilings on LIP grants and the diffusion of those through the constituency advisory groups. I would hope all members would bring whatever influence they can to bear on the constituency advisory groups to remind them of the need for a sympathetic attitude toward those applications which must fit into the total structure.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. It is welcome in view of the fact that this application is from a province and no particular constituency advisory group is handling it. I wonder whether he would take that into consideration.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I was just apprised of that this morning. I believe it was a request in total for something like $60,000 spread through many constituencies. I have got to work out the arrangements for that. I cannot give a final commitment on it except to say that my sympathy is in that direction.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair in the last few seconds will recognize the hon. member for Leeds and the hon. member for Charlevoix before calling orders of the day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REACTION OF CUBA TO MOTION REQUESTING RELEASE OF RONALD PATRICK LIPPERT

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question for the Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises out of the motion unanimously passed by the House last Friday asking the government of Cuba to release Ronald Patrick Lippert on humanitarian grounds and permit him to return to Canada. Can the Prime Minister advise the House whether the government has communicated the contents of the motion to the government of Cuba and, if so, whether the government expects a reply will be forthcoming in the near future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will have to inquire, Mr. Speaker, as to the precise answer to that. I do know that in the past very short while, I think in the past week, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been talking to the Cuban ambassador, but I could not vouch for the contents of that conversation.

INVOLUNTARY STERILIZATION OF MENTAL PATIENTS—POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO LAW REFORM COMMISSION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the hon. Minister of Justice.

In view of certain representations made to him concerning the problem of involuntary sterilization in psychiatric hospitals and centres for mental patients, can the minister say whether the problem has been referred to the Law Reform Commission?

● (1210)

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this specific question has been brought to their attention.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice.

Customs Act

Is he aware of recent representations that children aged 9, 10, and 11 have been so sterilized, and has he the intention of referring this question to the Law Reform Commission?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have not been aware of that before. The Law Reform Commission has, of course, the whole question of Criminal Code changes before it, and it may well be that within the broad scope of that term of reference this matter may be considered as well. I will be glad to look into the matter further with the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe rises on a point of order.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to hold back my temper. I have been here for five and a half years and I have been very reasonable in letting everybody have a chance to ask questions, but I have a district of 84,000 people to represent, many of them poor, and I want to give them good representation. Other than the leaders of the parties, I expect my share to be the same as that of anybody else. I just pass that on.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENT TO MAKE ALL GOODS APPEARING ON SHIPS INWARD REPORT DUTIABLE EVEN IF NOT LANDED

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue) moved that: Bill C-189, an Act to amend the Customs Act, be read for the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Customs Act to permit more effective control over goods landed in Canada by ship, thus protecting the revenue. We need this to plug a leak that could be draining away as much as $1 million a year that rightfully belongs to the Canadian people—duties and taxes on goods smuggled by sea and pilfered on docks.

Section 11 of the Customs Act now requires the master of any vessel entering Canada to go immediately to customs and provide a written report on all particulars of the contents, origin and destination of his ship's cargo.

There is, however, no legislative instrument which permits holding the master of a vessel responsible for the accuracy of his report inwards, or accountable for duty and taxes owing on goods which are reported as having been landed in Canada and are later incapable of being produced for customs clearance, due to pilferage, irregular delivery, or for any other reason. The section at one time provided all that was required for the exercise of essential customs controls against smuggling by sea. Customs physically checked ship cargoes against the master's report inwards.

However, by early 1960, shipping concepts, equipment and techniques had developed to the extent that 12 hour "turnarounds" became quite commonplace. With increasing volume of sea traffic reaching Canadian shores, detailed checks of every ship became hopelessly impractical for customs and economically impossible for shipping companies. So customs discontinued cargo examinations against inward reports about a decade ago and began to accept the master's report inwards and his declaration as a true description of the goods which had been taken on at foreign ports and would be landed in Canada on payment of the duty and taxes applicable.

Since then, an increasing number of discrepancies have come to light between the quantities of goods reported inwards and those later presented for customs entry, the latter almost invariably being fewer than the former. That is, goods appear on the ship's inward report as having been taken on at a foreign port but do not appear on the dock or in the warehouse in Canada. All goods reported inwards are presumed to be imported, and whether so-called "short-landed" items are irregularly delivered to the consignee or others, or they are simply pilfered, they must, by law, be taken into account for revenue purposes.

Mounting evidence reached the department that increasing quantities of goods for which short-landed certificates had been filed by shipping companies were somehow finding their way into local commerce. In the face of this, customs issued instructions that demanded payment of duty and taxes by transportation companies on vessel cargo shortages, citing master's reports inwards of goods landed in Canada as the basis of our claim. Many shipping companies have been repeatedly successful in resisting these demands for payment because, without conducting physical checks of ships' cargoes being unladen; customs is unable to prove the goods recorded in the master's report were actually landed in Canada, and because the master cannot be held legally accountable to customs for the contents of his report.

The position of customs in regard to demands for duty payment on shortages ex-vessel was clarified in June, 1971 in an Exchequer Court of Canada decision by Mr. Justice Dumoulin, that the Customs Act does not make the master of a ship responsible for his declaration of goods entering the country. This decision prompted officials of my department to conduct a coast to coast investigation into all aspects of the matter at major seaports, which revealed that section 11 of the Customs Act is clearly inadequate as a legislative instrument to deal with today's fast paced, high volume shipping transport methods.

The proposed amendment is consistent with well established controls over the inward movement of goods by air, rail and highway, which place full responsibility on the carrier for his shipments until they are delivered to the customs sufference warehouse for later entry by the importer. As is the case with other modes of transport, it is proposed to require shipping companies to post performance bonds, equal to the average amount of duty and taxes paid on their shipments. This measure will not only ensure payment of outstanding duty and taxes on goods reported inwards, but will also enable the seagoing carriers to sail without delay.

[Mr. Stanbury.]

Most international vessel carriers disclaim any involvement with cargoes carried after they have been reported to have landed in Canada, and they do not follow tracing procedures beyond the point of landing. This makes calculating the amount of customs revenue lost through shortages impossible over any given period for several reasons. For example, it quite often happens that parts of a shipment are "overlanded"—that is, not removed from the vessel until it reaches another foreign port, from whence they may well be redirected back into Canada on payment of duty by another mode of transport.

However, our studies did reveal that in one of the six customs regions demands for duty and taxes on goods reported short amounted to nearly $130,000 for the 1971-72 fiscal year, and outstanding claims in another region exceeded $200,000. With the reintroduction of effective customs controls through the proposed amendment, we aim to wipe out or at least dramatically reduce these revenue losses.

All possible alternatives to the proposal before the House today have been exhaustively explored. We have concluded that there are only three other options open to customs. First, customs could simply accept without question the statements of the ships masters or agents. Second, the provisions of section 8 of the Customs Act could be exercised by insisting that vessels remain at anchor until all cargo is duty paid. Third, physical checks of every cargo could be reinstituted, without regard to costs and consequences of the resulting delays. None of these would resolve satisfactorily the situation which I have described.

The amendment of the Customs Act which I am proposing is designed to discourage smuggling and pilferage, and to place the responsibility for the goods reported on the ship's manifest squarely upon the shoulders of the person making the declaration. It will restore to Canada Customs adequate means to carry out its responsibility, and restore to the Canadian people the duly collected revenue on which we depend for the benefit of all. For these reasons, I ask the House to approve this bill.

• (1220)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, as the minister has clearly indicated, this bill is introduced as a housekeeping amendment to the Customs Act. I may say also that it applies to the Excise Tax Act, because there is a very quiet phrase in the bill which provides that any of the goods which may be subject to the responsibility of the ship's master under the Customs Act shall also be deemed to have been imported and shall be subject to the excise sales tax. Let us not just tuck that away without raising some questions.

I do not share the minister's enthusiasm for the necessity of making the master of a ship absolutely responsible. His escape from responsibility is very, very difficult. From an administrative point of view I cannot justify the absolute liability of the master of a ship. The minister's proposal contains the phrase "notwithstanding pilferage on the dock or in the warehouse". It does not specify a bonded warehouse or otherwise, and I point out that if goods are in a bonded warehouse and customs duties have not been paid they will not have entered the stream of commerce of this country. The master of a ship is to be held liable under those circumstances. All I say is that business has to be accomplished by the most effective means.

Why is it felt that the master of a ship unloading goods at some ports in Canada where pilferage has been notorious, due to the failure of people like the National Harbours Board in discharging their responsibility to provide an effective security system, should be held responsible for the customs duties and other dues on goods that are stolen? Is it simply because the Department of National Revenue says, "Oh, we lost maybe $200,000 out of the port of Montreal in one year in claims for refunds because of pilferage?" Making the master responsible for these goods will not eliminate the pilferage.

I ask the minister to get after the minister responsible for the National Harbours Board, and any other authority responsible for the security of harbours, to assume their responsibilities and help protect the right of the Queen, in the name of Canada, with respect to the customs duties. There has to be more to this than the minister's disclosures so far would indicate. He has been a little coy. He has been a little reticent in giving information on what type of loophole and smuggling this move is designed to meet.

If it is felt that there is some smuggling because of pilferage from the docks, how is it thought that the pilferage can be eliminated, or the smuggling eliminated, by making the master of a ship responsible for the customs duties? Are the government and the minister now giving to the master of a ship, who is being held financially responsible, the right to insist on what kind of security will apply in customs bonded warehouses or on the docks which are under the jurisdiction of the National Harbours Board or of any of the other harbour commissioners throughout Canada? Has this been contemplated, or has the Department of National Revenue just said, "This is somebody else's problem. We are going to insist on collecting the duty"? Is this the attempt that is being made to try to stop smuggling? After all, what is smuggling but the introduction of goods into a country without paying the just customs dues and other taxes that might be leviable against them.

Why doesn't the Minister of National Revenue go further back and say the responsibility shall be that of the shipper, the owner of the goods? Is the captain of an aircraft coming from abroad, a freighter aircraft or even a passenger aircraft carrying air express, in the same category as the master of a ship? The captain of an aircraft coming from abroad also has a customs manifest covering the goods that the aircraft is carrying. Is he now to be held responsible in the same way that the master of a ship will be held absolutely responsible to prove that the goods never came aboard his aircraft?

When cargo containers are loaded in Hamburg a document is made out saying that they contain such and such. But how does the master of a ship know? Containers may be landed in Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, or in any other port that handles the containers, for transmittal to a customs bonded warehouse. Can the master of a ship assure the security of the goods within the containers? To secure relief against the customs dues that will now be imposed upon him, he must prove in writing that the goods were never landed. I do not know how the master of a ship is going to ascertain that the goods did come aboard at the port of origin and disappeared between the dock and the customs bonded warehouse. Goods are landed at the warehouse, not at the dock, so who guarantees the security of those goods?

I am going to ask the minister to establish the liability. Is it merely a question of the Department of National Revenue saving that half a million dollars a year? If that is so, will the minister then consider the additional costs that will be imposed upon the importers, such as the additional costs of posting bonds which, incidentally, are all additional costs of shipping and are paid by the Canadian consumer.

Unless there is a better answer, I find it difficult to accept the administrative requirement of this decree of absolute liability on the part of the master of the vessel, be it a seagoing ship or an aircraft. Subject to the minister's explanation that to cover the possible loss of some half a million dollars or more of potential customs revenue, the Canadian consuming public is going to have to accept a much greater increase in the cost of goods imported by sea and possibly by air. What is the justification for that? Why ask the Canadian consuming public to do that? It is a very quiet, unassuming kind of bill.

The minister has stated that, as a result of the federal court decision, there did not seem to be any responsibility on the part of the master for customs duty. I cannot see justification for the amount of overkill that I think exists in this bill. I think there are better, more flexible ways of doing it. However, if the minister can point out the dangers in the existing practices, and that there is an open door to abuse, I might modify my opinion. However, on the basis of what has been given to us in this House, I suggest to the minister that his bill has considerable administrative overkill. If smuggling and pilferage are to be prevented, then let the minister convince his colleagues who are responsible for the security of the ports to take better measures; in other words, get off their duffs and eliminate pilferage particularly.

The situation in Montreal may have been cleaned up, and I hope so, but there was a time not so long ago when international shippers had an intense resistance to that port simply because of the breakdown in security. Pilferage was rampant and the newspapers were full of it. There was not such a loose system going anywhere else, and a good living was being made through pilferage in the ports by many people. I hope this has been cleared up, because I do not think Canadian ports should have the reputation of being dangerous to ship to. If we are going to establish a reputation for good business practices and make people desire to do business with Canada, the security of our ports is part and parcel of that reputation.

Bearing that in mind, I should like to hear much more from the minister in committee of the whole about why this particular step is being taken. I am quite prepared to accommodate the minister to keep this bill in the House and take it all the way through. That is why I make the suggestion that we should not have to send it to a House committee but could save a great deal of time by keeping it in committee of the whole. However, I think the minister should come forward with more information.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I gather that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has made a suggestion by way of a point of order that instead of the bill being referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs it should be dealt with in the committee of the whole House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I had made that suggestion informally, and since there was agreement on it, I assumed that the necessary disposition had been made. However, if it is required that I make a motion to amend for that purpose, I am quite prepared to do so; on the other hand, it could come from the government side. If the minister or someone on his behalf will make that motion, that the bill be read a second time and sent to the committee of the whole and dealt with this day, I will be glad to second it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on the same point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make it clear that at least one of our members would like to speak to the bill while we are still on second reading. At the end of second reading, we will agree that the bill be referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) on the same point of order.

Mr. Stanbury: That would be agreeable to the government, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I gather that it is the wish of the House that the order be amended by unanimous consent. Accordingly, when the motion is put the minister would move that the bill be read a second time and be referred to the committee of the whole. The hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney).

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, after the very able and satisfactory introduction given to the bill by the minister I was tempted to stand up and say very simply "We agree". I say this despite the fact that our group has always hesitated to be caught agreeing with anybody, even with consenting adults. However, the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) perhaps raised more questions than they settled. For example, I am totally confounded, dumbfounded and unfounded—perhaps that is not the right word—by what he meant when he spoke of unnecessary smuggling. I have no idea what unnecessary smuggling is. I know what smuggling is, but under what definition of law there may be unnecessary smuggling I cannot tell. Therefore, I await the committee stage with bated breath.

● (1240)

I was going to quote some lines from Pope, but I think I had better not. Perhaps when we come to clause by clause inspection of the bill I can give verse-by-verse comment.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

We think that this is a very necessary and appropriate amendment to the act. The one question which we wish to raise is simply this: will this measure make the customs service provided with respect to goods transported by sea consistent with the service provided with respect to goods transported by air, rail and truck? If it will, then, according to the minister's remarks, the act will become thoroughly consistent in its application.

Overwhelmed as we are, I will end by saying that although $1 million today is not worth what it was worth a number of years ago when a member on the government front benches said, "What's a million?", it still is a great deal of money. I do not think the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) will deny that. We at this end of the House agree to second reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

The Chairman: The House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-189, to amend the Customs Act. There is only one clause in the bill. Shall clause 1 carry?

On Clause 1—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, having put a number of questions to the minister during the second reading debate and having anticipated that he would provide some answers, we can hardly be expected to agree immediately to clause 1. While the minister's officials are coming into the chamber in order, perhaps, to supply some technical information, perhaps the minister would make some remarks of a general nature about matters which are within his ken. Hopefully, as well, we shall hear from the hon. member for Scarborough West. I wondered when he rose to speak noting that he had not been given sufficient advance warning to know even the number of the bill. I know that handling these customs matters is not his usual task. I was disappointed at the hon. member's not quoting us some lines. He is always delightful when he calls on his vast store of literary knowledge and makes a humourous and interesting speech. We were deprived of his humour in the debate on the preceding stage; perhaps at this stage he will do what he suggested.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do not tempt him.

Mr. Harney: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I really did not intend to quote any verses. However, since I have been invited, I cannot resist. In listening to the hon. member for Edmonton West I was reminded of some lines from Pope which go like this:

> Dullness is ever apt to magnify,
> As things loom large which we through fog descry

The Chairman: I remind hon. members that the discussion is on Clause 1.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the interest shown by the hon. members for Edmonton West and Scarborough West in this important bill. I share the concern of the hon. member for Scarborough West. No matter whether the amount involved is $200,000, $500,000 or $1 million, and it is difficult to tell how much is involved, the sum lost is lost to the Canadian taxpayer. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton West will agree with me that it is important to attempt to recover that money, as it is the Canadian consumer who in the end pays for any loss of duly collectible revenue.

However, I sympathize with the concern of the hon. member for Edmonton West when he suggests that we might be putting an unreasonable burden either on the master of a ship or on a shipping company and, therefore, eventually on the consumer. I am advised, however, that the cost of the bonds is minimal. The cost to the consumer in the end might be less, in fact, as a result of the amendment proposed, because of the ability of consignees to obtain refunds in those cases in which they can establish the facts. Under the present system there is difficulty in establishing the fact.

Canada Customs has the responsibility under existing law for collecting revenue, but does not have in this case the means to collect that revenue. The decision of Mr. Justice Dumoulin removed what was formerly thought to be the responsibility of a master. Presumably, the act intended to impose that duty.

If I may answer the question of the hon. member for Edmonton West regarding the comparison between captains of aircraft, engineers of trains and so on—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It should be captains of aircraft and masters of ships.

Mr. Stanbury: Quite so. The answer, directly, is yes. This measure would impose on the master of a ship the same duty that is imposed under the Customs Act on the captain of an aircraft.

If I may reassure the hon. member for Scarborough West, the proposed procedure with respect to requiring a bond and ensuring that the master of a ship is responsible for statements he is making about the goods he is carrying will be entirely consistent with procedures followed with respect to other modes of transport. It was thought, of course, that existing arrangements were consistent. However, when Mr. Justice Dumoulin said that we could not hold the master of a ship responsible, we felt it was necessary to introduce this amendment, to make sure that that responsibility is made clear so that a similar situation would exist with respect to all modes of transport.

If there are other questions, I will try to answer them, with the help of my adviser.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might say for the information of the hon. member for Edmonton West, in view of the interest shown by the hon. member for Scarborough West in smuggling, necessary or unnecessary, that the hon. member for Scarborough West is not only the owner and manager, but master of a vessel now. If the hon. member for Edmonton West was surprised at the hon. member's newfound interest, that fact may provide a useful bit of background information.

I suggest that anyone who listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West on second reading might gather the impression that this bill imposes new and awesome burdens on the master of a vessel. I am not a master of a vessel, but I live in a part of the world where we see goods moving in by vessel fairly frequently.

My initial reading of the bill was some time ago. I gained the impression that this bill would clarify and define what in my view has always been the well defined responsibility of the master of a vessel for practically everything that happened in connection with that vessel, not only in respect of navigation, but whether it was complying with the shipping regulations or creating pollution by oil. We had a recent example in British Columbia where the master was charged and fined because of actions taken which resulted in pollution by oil.

From a rather casual observation, it seems for a good many years there has been a rather grey area in defining the responsibility of what from time to time are rather mysterious disappearances of portions of cargoes from ships' manifests. Of course, there is the other side of the coin. On occasion there is the problem of goods coming into the country which do not appear on the ships manifests. Perhaps that is the smuggling to which reference has been made.

With regard to the minister's comments about this bill bringing the responsibility in line with the generally accepted concept of responsibility of the captain of an airliner or a person in charge of any other mode of transport, if this bill is reasonably administered and the regulations under it are proper and clear, the bill may help to protect the master. We are all aware that, in connection with any piece of legislation that comes before this House, one has to accept that it will be reasonably administered. If it is not administered well, it is our responsibility, as members of this House, to bring that to the attention of the government.

If this bill receives passage, becomes law and is administered in such a way as to cause undue hardship to masters of vessels carrying goods entering Canada, I will be the first to object. Generally speaking, however, I have not found too much foundation for complaint in substance about the way customs officers in our ports, particularly ports on our seacoasts, carry out their duties. If that same approach is carried forward under the regulations to be enacted under this bill, the fears expressed by the hon. member for Edmonton West that the new responsibilities being placed upon a master are too great are groundless.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the minister with regard to the explanation he gave on the points I raised at the previous stage, there is no doubt in my mind from reading this bill that, if the master can prove the goods were not taken on board, in other words that there was pilferage at the port of origin between the time the manifest was made and the goods were put into containers, the master can escape liability. However, there is no provision whatsoever to protect the master from pilferage on the dock of a Canadian port between the point of the ship being docked and the goods being entered into a customs warehouse.

Perhaps I went a little too far on the previous occasion, but if one looks at the bill, he will see what is to be the new subsection (4) of section 11. It lists the exemptions to the liability. They are very clear. The first is, and I quote:

(a) destroyed or lost at sea due to stress of weather or casualty on board the vessel,

That is something that is readily ascertainable and can be proven by the master. The next is:

(b) not laden on board the vessel at the foreign port of exportation,

In many cases that is impossible to prove.

(c) destroyed after landing but before being formally entered into a customs warehouse or delivered to a bonded carrier,

That is a case of goods destroyed by being dropped into the water, fire or something of that nature. There should be a flexible administration of the Customs Act for goods that are stolen at the dock before going into a customs warehouse or delivered to a bonded carrier where the pilferage is in fact the destruction of the goods.

In the case of wines and spirits, one could readily assume the goods were the equivalent of destroyed because it would not take long for the consumption to take place. I understand that is one of the areas in which there is the greatest degree of concern. I refer to the removal or stealing on the dock of liquor, wines and readily consumable goods of that nature.

The minister spoke about the overlanding and re-export to Canada. I may say that I still think there is some overkill here, but like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I will wait to see what it is like. If there are complaints, only the department can complain. My recommendation to the minister is to get after his colleagues who are responsible for the security of ports and let us get some real action in that regard so the minister will not have that work.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, MEMBERSHIP, INCORPORATION, OBJECTS AND POWERS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-183, to amend the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. On behalf of Mr. Comtois, Mr. Clermont, seconded by Mr. Smith (Saint-Jean), moved:

That Bill C-183, An Act to amend the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, be amended by striking out line 23 of the French version at page 21 and substituting the following:

"représentants de membres constitués en corporation en".—Mr. Comtois.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the unanimous consent of the House should be sought to introduce this amendment of which I should like to take cognizance. I was not provided with a copy of it; this may very well stem from a technical difference between the English and French versions. There may very well be no discussion, but we might be provided with a copy of this bill. In fact, it might be indicated for you to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move the amendment at this time, because it could not be listed on the order paper. If this rule applies to ordinary members of this House, it should apply also to the government under these circumstances.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. If I may, I would like to remind the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that the amendment now before us appears on today's order paper, at page XVI.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Very well, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my words. I had been told that the government had not been able to put its amendment on the order paper in time, but if it has been put before six o'clock last night, I have no more reason to object.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I put the question once more: Mr. Clermont, on behalf of Mr. Comtois, seconded by Mr. Smith (Saint-Jean) moved:

That Bill C-183, An Act to amend the Cooperative Credit Associations Act, be amended by striking out line 23 of the French version at page 21 and substituting the following:

«représentants de membres constitués en corporation en»

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-183, to amend the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now, by leave.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Now by leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would simply state that in the absence of a statement from the minister, we have been able to study the bill in committee. Under such circumstances, when a favourable report has been presented by the committee about a bill and when we have heard outside witnesses, it is necessary in my opinion that the minister or his parliamentary secretary comments on what happened since the second reading of the bill.

We have received representations from officials of co-operative credit companies or associations related to the Canadian Federation of Financial Co-operative Companies; moreover we have heard evidence from Mr. Humphrey, the Superintendent of Insurance, in charge of monitoring co-operative credit societies to the extent that they are involved in federal legislation.

However, I must say that I am more and more convinced that more than ever the Canadian Federation of Financial Co-operative Companies is requesting investment powers of a similar nature as the trust companies, life insurance companies and other Canadian financial institutions which, through their members' activities, are supplying banking services in Canada, and which are currently competing not against the whole of their services but in certain areas of banking services supplied by Canadian chartered banks or major trust companies and which are not under the control of the inspection department of our bank and financial system.

I am not criticizing the monitoring services of the Superintendent of Insurance, on the contrary. He is not responsible for bank services but a different philosophy of the Canadian monetary and bank system should exist.

And I refer to the argument I already put forward when we proceeded to a review of the Bank Act. Here, in Canada, we have drafted a new banking legislation, wider than the previous one, that sets up the powers and provides for a new incorporation charter of our commercial banks. As a matter of fact, we see that the act is outmoded since one of the clauses at the end of the bill specifies that the Canada Bank Act includes an appendix with the charter of every bank.

But I think that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) shares my view that because of his many duties as Minister of Finance, responsible for the control and management of financial institutions of this country, a whole sector is beyond his control. We have trust companies that are incorporated under provincial legislation, and one must admit, therefore, that supervision standards and conditions vary from province to province. Some of these standards, however, cannot be approved. Others lead to abuse and fraud on the public.

I believe that the Minister of Finance will agree with me to say that we should have in Canada a legislation for institutions that provide banking services. The provisions would mostly concern chartered banks, the banking services and trust companies incorporated under a provincial or federal charter. The constitution gives the federal government exclusive authority over currency and bank matters. I would say that at the present time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has no control or influence over 40 or 50 per cent of all banking operations. Considering the assets of the Desjardins Caisses Populaires in Quebec which, if I am not mistaken, amount to nearly $7 billion, we realize that the finance minister has very little control over them. There may be other assets under this law, Mr. Speaker I am willing to get back to my subject. Those could be assets of another billion dollars.

There may be supervision a little remote from the Superintendent of Insurance, but not inspired by the same philosophy that a superintendent of insurance could show for banks. I am also referring here to the lack of control under the Bank Act, for after all we have a bank superintendent, an associate and two secretaries. It could be that the secretaries look after social correspondence, but as for the rest, the bank superintendent has no staff to control and check banking activities.

However, the Superintendent of Insurance has an active staff. Why could control over insurance companies, trusts under federal government responsibility, finance companies and certain co-operative institutions not be exercised in a better way? I am saying that without any ill-feeling toward the bank superintendent or the Superintendent of Insurance. After all, at the beginning of 1975, we will have to consider the government proposals; whether it is a Liberal administration or, as I hope, a Progressive Conservative one, the Bank Act will have to be changed not later than the beginning of 1975; we will have to consider the government's great proposals concerning amendments to the legislation. I remember well that the first act on the renewal of commercial banking charters was to be passed in 1964 but events were such that we had to wait until January 1, 1967 before passing the new legislation. Since then, events happened very quickly. I certainly agree with the finance minister about one thing. Whatever government may be in power, it should get ready to bring forward changes to the Bank Act in early 1975. If we want amendments to the legislation, not only in the government sector but also in the private sector, representations will have to be made and the government will also have to reflect upon it in order to introduce a bill liable to be passed in time and come into force before January 1, 1977.

It could be I missed out by about six months or perhaps more. It would be preferable to consider June 30, 1974. The minister must get moving immediately to come up with guidelines on desirable changes. I urge him to determine what the guidelines on the proposed amendments to the Bank Act will be. But we should also pass legislation to monitor our banking institutions. If no corporation, whether provincial, federal or cooperative, is set up let it come under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. I was forgetting the Superintendant of Insurance—he also monitors the activity of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. And we have here all sorts of cooperative societies, trust companies whether they be provincial or federal, or banks, of course; I am told that there were many service volunteers in the institutions which report on their monitoring activity to the Superintendant of Insurance. What I mean by service volunteers is simply this; the provincial administration says: Listen, you are going to participate, and you are going to submit. Their participation is voluntary. At least, the law says it is, but it is still somewhat compulsory.

In conclusion, I should like to say that Canada should modernize its banking system. We need not only the chartered banks, but also the merchant banking institutions in order to set up a financial market in Canada. The Montreal Stock Exchange is not a financial market, and neither is the Toronto Stock Exchange. I am a strong partisan of nationalism; why should Canadians have to go to the financial markets of New York, London, Paris or Frankfurt? Because they do not have the necessary institutions. There are some under a disguised form, but they suffer from a certain handicap. We cannot... My friend, the President of the Treasury Board is whispering "the Canadian Development Corporation", but this is not a banking institution at all. I could tell him many things about that.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I agree with the bill and I hope that it will be passed quickly after the interventions of my colleagues.

Now, I hope that the Minister of Finance who is listening will take this opportunity to revise the legislation governing our financial institutions and to establish new standards so that the Minister of Finance may be responsible for their direction and inspection.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-183, with which we are presently dealing, is one which my party supports wholeheartedly, and we would like to see it dealt with expeditiously. As a matter of fact, we would have liked to have had it passed months ago. The credit unions, particularly those in my province, would also have liked that.

The bill provides for a number of things that the credit union movement wants. In terms of larger membership it gives greater opportunities to credit unions. It broadens the investment powers available to them. It allows the Co-operative Credit Society, and its provincial credit union members, to have access to a lender of last resort through the Canadian Insurance Deposit Corporation. All of these things will be of great assistance to the credit union movement and the various co-operative credit societies.

Saskatchewan is perhaps the heartland of the co-operative and credit union movement in Canada, which began there in the 1930's during the great depression when many of the chartered banks, because of financial restrictions, had to pull out of the area. The credit union movement went into small towns throughout the province, and today it is an organization that has assets of over $700 million in Saskatchewan alone, which I think is quite significant for an organization that is really a near bank, or near banking institution.

The philosophy behind the movement is one my party supports wholeheartedly. It grew up pretty well simultaneously with the evolution of my party's ideals and principles. The credit unions are controlled by the members they serve. The credit unions are founded on the principle of one member, one vote. It is a democratic type of organization owned by the people and controlled by the people. It merits the consideration and assistance of members of this House.

The credit union serves its own members. Over the years it has done much to assist regions like rural Saskatchewan. It has been a community organization, helping communities in many ways, providing opportunities for different groups to do things financially that otherwise they would not be able to do if they had to rely on private banking institutions, loan companies, insurance and trust companies.

As I say, this is a good bill. It is one that is certainly welcomed by the Saskatchewan co-operative and credit union movement. It is one that should be enacted immediately. I am not going to talk about all the other financial problems that might be related indirectly to this bill. There are many things members of this party could say in reply to the comments of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) with respect to banking and financial institutions and the ways in which they should be controlled to work on behalf of the Canadian people.

I see no reason why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) should not be amending the Bank Act to bring about lower interest rates. I would like him to establish a Crown-owned bank to supplement the chartered banks. Such a bank would provide loans for socially necessary items, for farmers, fishermen and small business, and loans at low interest for house mortgages, housing being one of the basic necessities of life. Through that type of Crown bank, the government could channel all kinds of its revenues, such as its pension funds. The revenues of various provincial and municipal governments could also be channeled through it, thus creating a financial institution that would provide loans for necessary social things at interest rates much lower than the rates charged today. This would be an effective way of controlling the financial and banking system. It would force the financial system to be much more competitive. Indeed, that is what credit unions have done in their own way all across the country for the last 30, 35 or 40 years.

For all these reasons I urge the House to deal expeditiously with this bill, and place it on the statute books to help the credit unions and various co-operatives from coast to coast.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

AIRCRAFT REGISTRY ACT

MEASURE TO ENABLE CANADA TO COMPLY WITH CONVENTION ON THE INTERNATIONAL RECOGNITION OF RIGHTS IN AIRCRAFT

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (for Minister of Transport) moved that Bill S-9, to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

● (1440)

[English]

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that those who were applauding were applauding you and not me. I am sure that is because you are doing a marvellous job on a Friday afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, the Aircraft Registry Act is a simple and practical measure aimed at reducing legal complexities and difficulties for those involved in buying, selling and financing aircraft in Canada. Before reviewing specific provisions of this act, I think I should delve briefly into some of the general background involved so as to place the act in some perspective.

Under the Aeronautics Act we have had a central register of aircraft in Canada for many, many years. However, we have never had a central registry of the various types of financial interest that creditors might have against aircraft. This bill will create such a central registry for Canada and eliminate the current very cumbersome situation where financial interests in an aircraft, in order to be protected, must be registered in all the various districts of all provinces and all countries to which the aircraft may be flown.

This leads me to another dimension of this new act, the international dimension. On June 19, 1948, a convention was signed in Geneva, a convention which Canada, for various reasons, did not sign and has not since adhered to. This was the Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft. The new Aircraft Registry Act will give legislative effect in Canada to the principles of the 1948 international convention, enabling Canada to adhere to the convention, joining 33 other nations which have already either indicated adherence or ratified it.

[Translation]

This legislation will also enable Canadian aircraft manufacturers and those who have financial interests in such aircraft, to submit their claims against aircraft sold abroad or leaving Canada. New provisions prove more and more essential in this area with the advent of larger and more expensive aircraft which travel regularly from one territorial jurisdiction to another. The existing acts proved inadequate and difficult to implement.

This bill covers other aspects and for the purpose of my explanation, I have considered in this bill eight general provisions.

First, Mr. Speaker, the bill provides for a central aircraft registry where notices of interest can be registered. These notices can relate to interest, or lease for at least six months, security for the payment of a debt and security for equipment or services provided to the aircraft. In order to avoid complications, the bill will authorize notices of interest on property for the component parts and avionics of the aircraft other that the spare parts. This first provision of the bill puts an end to the present obligation to have a security or retention right registered on an aircraft in all the counties or districts in each province where the aircraft can be operated, which makes the financing of the aircraft easier for Canadian air carriers and simplifies the difficult problems buyers of aircraft have to face to obtain ownership titles.

A second provision establishes a priority order for claims according to the registration date of the notice of interest in an aircraft. A transitional provision precludes any change, through this provision, to the order of priority of claims registered under an act of parliament or of any province before the implementation of this bill.

Third, this bill provides that a creditor cannot sell an aircraft in which he has an interest without an order from a superior court providing a six-week notice with mention of time and place of the sale and the distribution of the proceeds, a notification being given one month in advance to the persons in whose name a notice of interest is recorded in the registry. In this way we will avoid an embarrassing situation for the owner of an aircraft when one of his creditors suddenly decides to redeem his claim by means of a sale.

Fourth, and this is an important point, this new system remains optional. However any one who does not have a notice of interest in an aircraft duly recorded in his name in the registry can no longer legally enforce his rights to the aircraft. He does not get protection from the law concerning the priority of claim and cannot obtain the seizure of the aircraft from other buyers.

[English]

Fifth, Mr. Speaker, the bill provides for the consent of each person who has registered a notice of interest in an aircraft before the registration can be cancelled for purposes of export. This gives much greater security to the creditor or financier. But a qualifying point which should be understood here is that the central aircraft registry is strictly an information system in so far as it does not legally establish or guarantee clear title to an aircraft.

A sixth provision of the act brings some comfort to air passengers. The act prohibits the seizure of a domestic or international flight of a Canadian scheduled commercial passenger aircraft once that aircraft has embarked on its journey. Thus the aircraft and its fare-paying passengers are assured an uninterrupted preplanned journey without the aircraft Registry Act being invoked in a manner that would ground the aircraft en route. Where someone seeks to seize an aircraft in this category, he must make his application to the federal court of Canada which can fix a time and place for that aircraft to be surrendered, but only after the completion of a particular scheduled flight, wherever the flight may take the aircraft in Canada or elsewhere.

[Translation]

Seven, the law provides that, if there is no cancellation or application to extend, a notice of interest shall be deemed to have ceased five years from the day of recording; the bill provides also for regulations concerning the manner, form and content of notices of interest, as well as the procedure to be followed, the nature of required rights, the provision of copies, etc. It also provides for penalties in the event of false information.

The eighth and last main provision of this bill is that it gives the required legal base for Canadian adherence to the Geneva Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft. To this day, 33 countries have ratified the convention or have made application, particularly the United States, France, West Germany, Italy and the Scandinavian countries. The United Kingdom, one of the ratifying states, has recently adopted measures similar to ours, under its Mortgage of Aircraft Order of 1972.

Finally, the Aeronautics Law Section of the Canadian Bar Association has studied and encouraged for many years the establishment of a central aircraft registry. Representatives from the Canadian Bar Association have reviewed and approved these provisions and a number of their suggestions have been retained. The bill has the support of Canadian aircraft builders, Canadian financial institutions, and the Canadian Air Transport Association.

● (1450)

[English]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, we, on this side of the House, listened with considerable interest to the parliamentary secretary explaining the various provisions of this legislation. It seems to me that this is a bill of considerable merit. The preamble to the bill indicates that Canada can hardly be accused of acting with undue haste in associating itself with the provisions of the convention which was signed at Geneva in 1948. That convention had to do with the international recognition of rights in aircraft. It is only legitimate to ask why such a piece of legislation of such obvious merit has been so long delayed.

This is a constructive piece of legislation and, certainly, we on this side of the House do not wish to impede unduly its passage. We welcome its introduction and, after making some comments on it, will not stand in the way of its orderly process through the House.

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of the other place considered the various ramifications of the legislation and looked at many of the practical considerations which are involved. This bill, as the parliamentary secretary said, is designed to protect, to regulate in an orderly fashion, the registration of aircraft, and to deal with the rights and interests of those who deal in many ways with aircraft. This includes their purchase, sale, maintenance and repair.

It has been suggested that, possibly, one reason for delay in bringing this bill forward has been the lack of pressure exerted by aircraft owners, operators and others in the aircraft industry. I doubt that. Nevertheless, the fact that such a suggestion has been made is an indictment of this government's policies.

An officer of the Department of Transport, testifying before the committee of the other place about the lack of pressure being responsible for the delay in bringing forward this legislation said, as reported at page 2:6 of the proceedings of that committee of June 27, 1973:

I do not think it was a case of mature reflection: I think it was a case of pressure not being exerted by any aircraft operators or financial interests that there was any advantage to implementing the convention. Where Canada is now getting into the manufacture of aircraft itself, and trying to sell these aircraft in other countries, the rights in these aircraft must necessarily be recognized...

That, certainly, is a proposition which makes sense. The witness went on to say:

Then, too, there is the large amount of money involved in purchasing aircraft from other countries—and they are getting more expensive now—and it is difficult to find out what is actually against an aircraft. It is more difficult now than it has been. This legislation has actually been in process for about five years, but this is as far as it has ever got, and we hope that it will continue.

We want to see this legislation implemented. It has considerable potential in its application both domestically and, as the parliamentary secretary said, internationally.

Some provisions of this legislation are of interest to those who are concerned about constitutional problems, as they impinge to some extent on provincial jurisdiction. Perhaps some of my colleagues will say something about that later. I hope that in the establishment of the registry system, as set out in the legislation, there will be a maximum of co-operation by provinces. I believe that this will be the case.

The legislation will have a great deal of practical effect. Of course, its utility will depend on the regulations and the procedures which will be implemented. Uniform procedures must be implemented across the country. The same holds true to some extent with respect to the international ramifications of the bill. Hopefully, the various provinces will co-operate and assist in the public advertising and in the various procedures which will need to be developed.

I hope that someone, on behalf of the minister, will explain the meaning of clause 8, which reads:

A person in whose name a notice of interest in an aircraft registered in Canada is not recorded in the registry (a) has no claim in respect of that interest against any other person who, without actual notice of that interest, subsequently purchases or otherwise acquires an interest in the aircraft; and—

Now comes the part which interests me:

—(b) may not seize or take any action to obtain seizure of the aircraft.

I assume that this provision will apply if the person does not take advantage of the various provisions of the central registry. I further assume that it will not affect the existing rights of any person who does not want to utilize this registry system, provided nobody else is ahead of him in coming under the regulations which will be implicit in the setting up of this system. That seems to be the interpretation put forward before the standing committee of the other place concerning this particular aspect of the legislation.

Answering a question put by a Senator, a legal officer said before the committee of the other place, "Whatever rights they have under existing laws remain." He was referring to the categories of persons to which I referred. I assume that that is correct. It is none too clear. I hope that this matter will be taken into account when the regulations are drafted and when they are being enforced.

The parliamentary secretary, of course, has made it clear that this registry does not in any way guarantee title. He also made it clear that it establishes a strict priority system. The government's policy in protecting the rights of those involved in the air line industry and of owners and pilots of smaller aircraft has not been as constructive as it might have been.

I was happy to note, although this is strictly not germane to this legislation, that there was an overhaul of provisions governing air service fees and increases in landing fees. What was done was good. I think this bill will provide encouragement to those engaged in the aircraft industry at a time when they need some encouragement.

Let me say one more thing. Clause 19 says, "this Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation." I hope the actions of the past will not serve a precedent and I hope that there will not be a delay of 25 years in bringing the provisions of this bill into effect.

● (1500)

I hope the government will not bury the bill but will proceed with it in a simple, effective, expedient manner and enact it into law in the not too distant future. The regulations will be the whole key to how well this legislation works, particularly on the domestic scene. Unless the regulations, the court procedures and the jurisprudence developed as a result of the bill are clear, inexpensive, convenient, well publicized and universally used, this legislation will not be nearly as useful as it might otherwise be.

In conclusion, I welcome this piece of legislation and hope it will be dealt with in an expedient manner. We look forward to considering it at a later stage.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the opening remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Guay) when he said that this bill was aimed at removing legal complexities. After listening to his speech and looking at the bill, I wonder which is more complex, the present situation or the situation as it will be after the bill has been passed. On the other hand, when I learned, both from looking at the bill and listening to the parliamentary secretary, that one of the main purposes of this bill is to replace what we now have, namely a central aircraft register, with what will be known as a central aircraft registry, I realized that this is a very important piece of legislation.

All that aside, I join the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) in making the inescapable comment that this government does not rush into things. After all, this bill arises out of an international convention that was adopted on June 19, 1948. Twenty-five years later, something is being done about that international convention. However, as the hon. member for Central Nova and others know, there are other international conventions, notably some of those passed at the International Labour Organization, which have been around much longer than 25 years and to which Canada has not yet agreed.

In any case, we recognize the need for this kind of legislation so that problems connected with the ownership of aircraft, operating as they do among the various countries of the world, can be settled on a basis that is covered by an international agreement. For that reason we are pleased to see this legislation before us and we see no reason why it should take an undue length of time to deal with it in this House. Since this bill deals only with the narrow subject of the ownership of aircraft we are prohibited from getting into other matters we would like to discuss, such as bilateral agreements between this country and the United States, and so on. I simply make the statement that we cannot do that at this time but must limit ourselves to what is before us.

It was comforting to learn from the parliamentary secretary that the rights of seizure of aircraft which are provided for in this legislation will not apply to an aircraft in flight. I am sure the next time he and I are flying together between here and our favourite province of Manitoba, we will be able to console ourselves with the fact that we passed this bill so no one can seize the aircraft while we are in flight.

This bill is exactly what the parliamentary secretary said, something dealing with legal complexities relating almost exclusively to the ownership of aircraft. Because there is an international convention to which Canada should have adhered long ago, we are glad to give our support to this bill so that Canada can now give its adherence to that convention.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I join the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and the previous speaker in expressing support for this measure which is long overdue. It will give protection to people who have a financial interest or otherwise in aircraft. As the parliamentary secretary said, the legislation is long overdue in light of the growing transportation industry and the building of aircraft in Canada for sale within this country and for export.

As our transportation industry grows and we find a rationalization for a system of either centralization or decentralization, we will not only need this type of legislation but I am sure the parliamentary secretary is aware that we will need legislation in a number of other areas. Canada has the potential of achieving very considerable progress in the area of construction and sale of aircraft in the western world. This will come about when confidence in the industry is demonstrated by measures such as this.

As the hon. member for Central Nova stated, we have little or no quarrel with this bill. However, there are one or two aspects of it about which we might wonder. A distinguished gentleman in the place to which some of us might aspire considered many of the pertinent questions with regard to what we might expect in terms of regulations under this bill. On a number of occasions in this chamber we have voiced concern with regard to legislation and the form regulations might take, their impact and consequences, as opposed to a statement of policy which this bill is in fact.

One area of concern involves framework or authority of the Federal Court. Why are other levels of court authority excluded from hearing applications under the legislation?

Why was it not considered useful to extend to other superior courts the authority to grant applications or certificates upon application, in accordance with certain procedures set out in this bill? The owner of a private aircraft may wish to dispose of the aircraft and continue to register his interest in it in the event of default, an accident or for some other reason. He should not have to go to the trouble of seeking counsel in British Columbia or in his own locale and sending him to Ottawa at his own expense simply to make application in order to exercise his will. The parliamentary secretary might think about that problem as we move through the various stages of this measure.

● (1510)

I suggest that a simple amendment might correct this situation. The point may seem to be unimportant, but there is nevertheless a shortcoming in the bill. Such an amendment would not impair the bill, but it seems to me it would be much more convenient and of no major concern to Air Canada, CP Air and any substantial regional feeder service. However, so far as the owner of a small, light aircraft is concerned, it seems a little inconvenient that he should have to come to Ottawa to make application and receive the authority to protect his own interests, which in fact is what this bill intends to do.

There is one other matter concerning clause 6 which is perhaps minor but which I should like to draw briefly to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. This is the clause which attempts to describe a deemed interest in an aircraft. It provides:

> For greater certainty, a person shall, for the purpose of this act, be deemed to have an interest in an aircraft where he is
> (a) the lessee of the aircraft and the term of the lease is not less than six months—

There are other subclauses, but it seems to me that "interest" is not fully defined. Utilization may be involved, but if there is a wet lease rather than a dry lease based on the number of hours flown, used and certain other things, this would make a difference. There is a restriction in the period prescribed of a certain number of days or weeks which, again, overlooks the fact that aircraft are sometimes leased for short periods with an extensive amount of flying time involved, whereas there may not be any flying time involved in a period of six months. There is an anomaly here and this question might be considered at some stage.

We need measures such as this as Canada moves toward the development of an internationally recognized aircraft industry. I am almost tempted to take advantage of this opportunity to speak about other aspects of the aircraft industry in Canada, wondering out loud, or hoping, if you will, that the government will not take 25 years to move toward a separation from the Ministry of Transport of the responsibility for investigating those accidents over which the department has regulatory control. It is true that these matters are correlated, and if that were not the case I would urge the minister to give serious consideration to such suggested separation.

Only when we take steps of this kind do we obtain the confidence of the national and international air community. We cannot grow in the area of aviation without full international confidence. We are in the process this afternoon of taking a small step. I only wish it had been a bigger step and that this measure could be taken as an indication that the government is prepared to move in other areas to further strengthen the confidence of the national and international community in our aircraft industry.

As the hon. member for Central Nova has indicated, this bill calls for the legislation to come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation. Because I cannot read between the lines, I assume that is to allow an interim period during which liens on chattels can be transferred from existing provincial jurisdictions to the proposed central registry. It would seem to be useful to the industry to indicate the nature of the bill and the consequences of not adhering to it because, while it may not seem to be mandatory on the surface, it would be expensive for anyone who failed to follow it. It would be interesting to us in the chamber to have an indication of the length of the interim period which the industry, those associated with the industry or who have interest in a particular piece of equipment, will have to register an interest in order to obtain the protection this legislation will provide.

This type of housekeeping bill is useful, and I suggest similar legislation would be useful in many other areas. Let us now move on to deal with the conflict of interest and investigate aspects of Canada's air industry.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will forgive me if I exhibit again what seems to be the characteristic of being highly dubious of certain legislation. The bill before us states in the preamble, as indicated by the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), that in certain respects it fulfils an obligation undertaken by Canada regarding an international convention on the registration of aircraft. That is all very good, but I point out to hon. members some very grave doubts I entertain as to the constitutional ground on which part of this proposed act would rely. This measure not only sets out to do that but it refers to every aircraft in Canada. The international convention deals primarily with the regulation and control in Canada of seizures of aircraft of international airlines on scheduled passenger operations.

We all remember what gave rise to the international convention. Let me give an example. An aircraft of country "A" involved in international flights destined to one or more countries abroad was always subject to potential seizure by the owner of an accord obtained on behalf of country "B" where the aircraft had landed. We all know the legal complexities and disorganization which resulted. This bill purports to put into being an international accord which was signed many years ago. I fully agree with that, but I suggest that the bill goes much further. It sets up a central registry for obligations and interests in all aircraft in Canada. On what grounds? The Government of Canada has not one iota of jurisdiction over property and civil rights.

In reading through Bill S-9 I came across some rather interesting provisions about the registration of encumbrances against a particular aircraft, about the rights of the holder of encumbrances to enforce them, the courts they had to proceed under, how execution could be levied against aircraft, and the remedies of any person who might be prejudiced or otherwise. Suddenly it struck me that this is completely contrary to the provisions introduced into legislation, say in the province of Alberta, when I was practising law. In that province there is the Seizures Act which lays down the procedure for the seizure of all personal property if need be.

I have before me the Bills of Sale Act which lays down the procedure for the registration of bills of sale, chattel mortgages and other encumbrances against personal property. If the minister thinks that the Alberta act does not touch aircraft, he might look at the Alberta Bills of Sale Act, subsection 8 of section 2 which provides that itinerant machine means vehicles, aircraft, trailers or drilling equipment. So we have legislation in the province of Alberta, the province of Ontario, no doubt the province of Quebec under its civil law, and any other province which provides how to deal with an aircraft or the encumbrances against it both as to registration and the priority of creditors, acts of registration or non-registration, enforcement or default under the encumbrances and enforcement of any judgment under the encumbrances, seizures or disposition of the aircraft.

Then we have what I consider to be this so-called "little softy" bill which was started in the other place and tells us that notice of interest is to be recorded, that the deemed interest in the aircraft is to be established and then, with the greatest disrespect for property rights, talks about priority of claims against any aircraft. I just simply ask, who in the blazes do they think they are? Where a notice of interest is not recorded, this legislation purports to set up different priorities notwithstanding the compliance within a province with the requisite legislation dealing with aircraft, and the registration of encumbrances against them and how the interest will be set up. This bill, on its own little hook says, that where there is no notice of interest recorded in the central registry of Canada, all the rights of that person are wiped out. On whose authority? Does the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) contend for one moment that a bill of this kind will override the provincial law which has been in existence for years?

Mr. Lang: I contend it is valid.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Does the minister say that the provincial law is a nullity? Did I hear him correctly in that regard?

Mr. Lang: I said that this one is valid.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In other words, the other side of the coin is that the others are invalid.

Mr. Lang: Not necessarily.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Will the minister please tell the House, when in due course he speaks again, the position of an individual with a chattel mortgage on an aircraft or a bill of sale duly recorded under a provincial act? I will tell the minister the title of the act in the province of Alberta; it is the Chattel Security Registration Act. That is the one with which I was familiar. It is the central registry for all chattel encumbrances against all personal property.

Within the province of Alberta, that is the only act other than the Bank Act which sets out the priorities under property and civil rights for the determination of creditors' and owners' rights. I am astounded that now this latter day apostle of new interpretative legislation should come forward and say that this bill is particularly valid. The heading of clause 9 is "Seizure and sale of aircraft". We are told that there shall be proceedings in the superior court of a province. If my memory serves me correctly, in the province of Alberta proceedings under the Procedures Act and the Bills of Sale Act in these particular instances are through the district court. I can foresee the collision that will occur if this bill should ever have the misfortune of being passed with these provisions.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make clear that the intention of the government to put into effect, after I don't know how many years, countless years, the international convention with regard to passenger carrying scheduled aircraft of international ownership—

Mr. Lang: Twenty-five years.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister says it is 25 years. Fine. But when they talk about aircraft in this country I say no, because there is no way the government of Canada can set its authority against that of the provinces which have had undisputed authority for years over all mobile equipment, automobiles, aircraft, and whatever may be determined to be personal property. Yet we are told that this legislation, notwithstanding any other act, shall have priority.

• (1530)

This bill will go to committee and we will certainly hear the reasoning of the government as to why it should take steps to set up these countervailing provisions. I can see citizens of one or more provinces involved in disputing priorities over an encumbrance or the rights of interest in an aircraft. We know that private aircraft can cost now up to $2 million or $3 million. This gives lots of scope for quarrelling.

We have this act, and we have the acts of one or more provinces which have their own priorities, established by registration in their own registries, of encumbrances against aircraft. Where will this lead to? Why does the federal government have to step into this determination with regard to any and all aircraft? It would have been preferable if the government of Canada had said: We are setting up a registry dealing with the aircraft that are referred to in section so-and-so, regularly scheduled passenger carrying aircraft whether of a national or an international nature, and certain steps will have to be taken before the establishment of a claim so as not to detain an aircraft under some sort of pressure as we have seen in the past.

We know about the old business of having to post a bond in a banana republic. But that is not so under this bill. This bill refers to any and all aircraft and sets up provisions counter to the well known jurisdiction of the provinces regarding personal property and mobile equipment. I could go through this bill and I am sure I could find some glaring inconsistencies with the Alberta act which I mentioned, the chattel securities registry act. Why have we got this? This bill can go to committee, and if I am not able to be there all the time I hope my colleagues will become aware of some of the doubts I have regarding the bill. I hope they will examine the bill and question the Minister of Justice and his officials most closely as to just what the government is trying to do in the bill concerning a matter over which they have absolutely no jurisdiction. The government should keep out of an area in which the provinces have been able to administer property and civil rights to the satisfaction of the Canadian public.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, as a member from the riding where Canada's second and third largest domestic and international air carriers are located, I felt I had to say a few words on this bill. CP Air, Canada's second national airline, and Pacific Western Airlines, which is the regional and international carrier of British Columbia and Alberta, both have head offices in my riding. I contacted them when I knew this bill was coming up, to see what their feelings were about it. They seemed to be very similar to those of most hon. members who have spoken today, namely, that it should be passed and that it is needed.

Therefore, I just wanted to rise in the House today to say that I support the bill because of the study I have done, and I appreciate the work of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) in finally getting this bill before the House 25 years after the agreement was made. It surprised me to see that the Senate had to bring it in, but I suppose the hard work of the hon. member finally convinced the government that this bill should be placed before the House. I will resume my seat because I want the bill to be referred to the committee. I just wanted to say that it has my support.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENT DELINEATING GOVERNMENT'S POWER IN DISPOSING OF PUBLIC LANDS

Hon. C. M. Drury (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill S-4, to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will have noted that Bill S-4, before the House for second reading today, does not incorporate any major policy change in the National Parks Act. The chief purpose of this bill is to bring Kejimkujik and Forillon national parks into the schedule of national parks, and to authorize the governor in council to set aside by proclamation as national parks the lands comprising Kluane, Nahanni, Baffin Island, Pacific Rim, Pukaskwa, La Mauricie, Kouchibouguac, and Gros Morne.

The second important purpose of the bill is to allow future additions to existing national parks to be achieved by proclamation, thus avoiding the necessity of having to introduce new legislation for each such change. The other clauses amending the National Parks Act are basically administrative and updating.

The most important aspect of the bill, the provision of appropriate procedures for the establishment of ten new national parks, imparts significant and lasting benefits for all Canadians. But first I would like to bring the other provisions of this bill to Your Honour's attention. Clause 1 is an amendment to the definition of "public lands", necessary because the power of the government of Canada to dispose of lands in some of the national parks is limited by the terms of agreement between the government of Canada and the provinces in which the lands are situated.

The governor in council, by clause 2, is authorized to add to an existing national park, by proclamation, lands owned by Her Majesty in right of Canada with the agreement of the province concerned and, most importantly, provided that public notice has been given in the Canada Gazette at least 90 days before proclamation day. In its broad concept, clause 2 provides a procedural simplification for dealing with park boundary adjustments. Let me assure the House, however, that clause 2 does not authorize any deletions, however small, from parks. I should also like to emphasize that no new park can be established without the approval of parliament.

Clauses 3 and 4 will clarify the authority of the governor in council to make regulations to control traffic on highways in the national parks. They also permit the modernization of traffic control within the parks by providing for the voluntary payment of traffic fines in line with the practice of most provinces. At present a violator, if summoned, must appear before a magistrate. The proposed amendment also removes the present anomaly of a $500 maximum fine for violation of any provision of the act or regulations without regard to the nature of the offence, by authorizing lower maximum fines to be fixed by specific regulations.

● (1540)

Clauses 5 and 7(1) delete from the schedule of the act the descriptions of Fort Beauséjour historic park and Fort Anne historic park so that they will no longer be included among the national parks of Canada and may be set apart by the governor in council as national historic parks.

By clause 6 the name of Prince Edward national park is changed to Prince Edward Island national park, the name in common usage, and 12 acres are added to that park. Clause 8 repeals the description of Terra Nova national park as set out in part IX of the schedule to the act, and substitutes therefor the description confirmed by the Surveyor General of Canada.

To bring the major implications of this bill into proper focus I now turn to its main purpose, the provision of appropriate procedures for the establishment of ten new national parks. I refer hon. members to clauses 7(2), 9, 10 and 11. I want today to pay tribute to those provincial and territorial governments with which the minister has worked toward the establishment of these parks: Newfoundland, for Gros Morne; Nova Scotia, for Kejimkujik; New Brunswick, for Kouchibouguac; Quebec, for Forillon and La Mauricie; Ontario, for Pukaskwa; British Columbia, for Pacific Rim; the Yukon Territory, for Kluane; and the Northwest Territories, for Nahanni and Baffin Island.

For the first time we will have three parks above the sixtieth parallel. To speak of Baffin Island and the Nahanni national parks in the Northwest Territories and Kluane in the Yukon is to speak in superlatives. Baffin Island is characterized as having the largest permanent ice cap in Canada, probably the second largest in the world. The Nahanni is legendary for its hot springs, caves, Virginia Falls, which are twice as high as Niagara, and a river which runs through canyon walls, some topping 4,000 feet. Kluane has the highest mountains in Canada, extensive ice fields and glaciers.

Bill S-4 is a milestone. We will have a national park in every province and in both territories. Bill S-4 really concerns the enrichment of Canadian society and heritage by providing the procedures for bringing the total number of parks to 28. The minister's hope is that this bill will be followed by others so that by the year 2000 we will have 60 national parks. Hon. members have heard the minister state this goal on many occasions.

Canadians are in the enviable position of being able to enlarge and improve upon what already is internationally recognized as a superior national parks system. We have a relatively young culture, yet within it an abundance of ageless natural masterpieces in our national parks, wilderness works of art if you like, worthy of preservation and protection, demanding of care and attention and insistent upon expansion just as long as time remains our ally. The reward now and in perpetuity cannot be measured.

In the past few years there has been an increase in the number of visitors from this continent, from Europe and the Orient. This is evidence enough for me that our northern hemisphere parks also are appreciated as a rare experience by visitors from abroad. Just as many Canadians enjoy visiting the lands of their ancestral origins, so do visitors enjoy a country where natural scenic beauty is protected as a cultural heritage.

Here is an indication of how our national parks have grown in popularity and usage. In 1952 we had some 2½ million visitors, by 1962 this figure had grown to almost 7½ million, and in 1972 we had more than 14 million. If the present trend continues, we can expect the number of visitors from home and abroad to increase, with accompanying economic advantages for our tourist industry. But without an increase in parkland and proper management of such land, we face the disadvantages of over-use of our existing parks.

There is another urgency for meeting the goal of 60 parks by the year 2000. Although Canada has more land committed to national parks than any country in the world, by the year 2000 we will be hard pressed to meet demands for outdoor recreational land. It must be recognized that the availability of open spaces for citizens is not as great as imagined. On a national average, national parks represent only 1.3 per cent of Canada's land mass, 11 per cent is in private ownership, 7 per cent in agricultural development and 35 per cent in forestry and mining to which the public has limited or no access. Open spaces now are more abundant in the territories where sheer distance and higher costs are limiting factors on accessibility.

This brings us to the immediate and future needs of Canadians living in cities and growing urban centres who want and need easy and quick access to recreational land. The byways and special places program announced last October opens a new era of diversified land use for outdoor recreation. To review the situation briefly, in addition to national parks we have added eight historical canals and three new categories: national marine parks, national landmarks and national wild rivers. As well, the program envisages national networks of historic lakes and rivers and land trails for canoeing, hiking, riding or cycling, and low-speed scenic parkways for driving to be developed with the help of citizens, local associations, municipalities and provincial governments. I am confident that the co-operation demonstrated by the provinces in establishing new national parks will be an incentive for both public and private participation in the byways and special places program.

Canadians, and a national parks system which represents their interests, have two mandates where parks are concerned. The first is to preserve the most representative scenery in Canada and the second is to permit wise use by the people who go there. I feel we can pioneer in this area. Generally, the amendments proposed by Bill S-4 to which I referred earlier will help us to preserve what we have and are likely to have. In the past, because of the nature of the parks and lower park attendance, care was custodial. But with an increased public appreciation for these special places, the focus in the past few years has been on scientific management.

The broad approach is one of natural succession, fixed by the constraints of zoned park use. This preservation philosophy is based upon a comprehensive natural resource inventory being made in all our national parks. The inventory is being used to help planners pinpoint which areas in a park need maximum protection and which areas can tolerate different levels of visitors' use. Such is the basis of the parks five-class zoning system. This system ranges from wilderness areas to camp sites, waterways, roadways and high-density areas such as townsites.

A further change in the approach to park management should be noted. At the turn of the century, when the west was opened to settlers, and later during the depression, permanent townsites were developed within a number of our western national parks. In the 1970s, in keeping with a more ecologically sensitive society, the emphasis when developing new parks is to encourage certain tourist and service industries to locate outside the parks.

In the future hon. members can also expect to see further experiments with public transit systems in the national parks. This will allow for more effective channelling of visitors, at the same time limiting the destruction of land for road construction. This already has been done with success at Point Pelee and will be done at Kluane to enable visitors to reach look-out points over the glaciers. Another step toward improved management practices was taken in May of this year. So that regions can be represented more closely by staff in the area, the number of our regional offices was increased from three to five. We now have offices in Calgary, Winnipeg, Cornwall, Quebec City and Halifax.

The philosophy of the National Parks Act is that of conservation and recreation. Conservation takes priority, as it must if Canada is to have special places to recreate. Bill S-4 does not alter this basic concept. I ask hon. members for their unanimous support in approving this bill.

● (1550)

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, members of my party share the view of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Marchand). We would like to get this bill into committee where we could take a fairly detailed look at some of its provisions and also make some proposals to fill the gaps where the provisions are not adequate.

I think we can accept and agree with the statement by the parliamentary secretary that no new policy is incorporated in this proposal. That, indeed, is part of the difficulty with the bill because there is a clear unhappiness in many parts of the country about the present practices, if not the policy, of the parks division of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. We want the chance to recommend in committee some changes that will meet these problems. Because these matters are so widespread and cause such concern across the country, a number of members on this side want to comment on existing parks policy and practice at this time.

First, I wish to pay tribute to and draw the attention of members of this House to the very extensive and useful discussion which occurred in the other place. I think the record of the debates there would be informative to any member of this House and anyone interested in national parks generally. It is important, also, to bear in mind that the discussion in the other place resulted in an amendment which is now incorporated in Bill S-4. It did not go as far as the proponents would have wished. There is, as you know, Mr. Speaker, a different minority-majority situation in the other place, for reasons that do not need to be gone into, and I think the person seeking the amendment wisely settled for as much as the minister would accept.

The amendment in the other place was one to democratize the system of establishing national parks in Canada and the system of adding to or taking from the territory of our national parks. There was a desire expressed, therefore, for public hearings. Because of the attitude of the minister as expressed through the Director of Parks Canada, there was a movement back from the request for public hearings, and a settlement for a requirement in the bill that there be 90 days' advance notice published in the Canada Gazette of any proposed changes in the boundaries of national parks. That is not as strong a dose of democracy as was wanted, nor is it as strong a dose of democracy as will be wanted by members of this House in committee, but it was the most the minister would settle for. Members of the other place, being realists, recognize that the government is not as amenable to changes there as they might be to changes made by a committee of our House.

I think it is important to establish the principle that whenever there are significant changes to national parks in Canada, we must ensure the right of public hearing; there must be an opportunity for everyone to comment, not an opportunity merely for that eccentric minority that whiles away its time reading the Canada Gazette. The government claims that it has a commitment to public hearings concerning national parks, but it is significant, in evaluating that claim, to recognize that a provision for public hearings has been kept out of this bill even though there was an opportunity to adopt an amendment which would achieve that end.

It is significant, also, to recall that the government declined to call public hearings in the community of Jasper, a townsite within a national park, when there was a very serious proposal put forward by the minister relative to the removal of railway facilities which would have affected 1,200 individuals living there. There has been difficulty with public hearings and public participation in the establishment of the Ship Harbour park in Nova Scotia, a park which is not referred to in this legislation because there is still outstanding disagreement about that provision. There has also been reluctance on the part of the government to hold public hearings regarding other aspects of parks policy in the country.

The director of Parks Canada, speaking in the committee of the other place, suggested there was no need for public hearings because there was an opportunity for persons who had points to raise to make them before committees of this House or of the other place. That clearly is an impractical suggestion. Not only are the committees of this House, in particular, and of the other place overburdened with work already, but we operate at too great a distance from the people who have important points to make about the establishment of or the diminution of our national parks. He also suggested that the minister would keep an eye upon the public service in case they proposed something extravagant. I think no one who has had experience with the administration of national parks in the country will accept that the minister can act in the stead of the public when he is dealing with senior public servants, in particular, who have been involved at the centre of that department for far too long.

May I call it four o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motion, and private bills.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PROVISION OF SEVERANCE PAY FOR WORKERS DECLARED REDUNDANT

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved that Bill C-44, to amend the Canada Labour Code (severance pay), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since I first introduced this bill there have been a number of changes which have had an effect on the provision of construction pay to employees under the jurisdiction of the federal government. These changes have not necessarily been in the interests of the federal employees who might be affected or in the interests of providing separation pay for employees who are not eligible through their employment for either superannuation or pension.

Mr. Speaker, this measure mainly affects persons who are temporarily employed, and it affects a large category of people under federal jurisdiction who fall into the classification of prevailing wage employees, who may be employed in a government undertaking in a specific area or where the lifetime of the project may be limited. This often happens with carpenters, construction workers and others who are employed for a short period of time and do not become civil servants or permanent employees of an agency under the control of the federal government, but where the work undertaken is in that jurisdiction. This is the only field in which the Parliament of Canada can make objection, and therefore this proposal is limited to that fairly specialized category.

I indicated that there have been changes since this bill was originally introduced. These have made it necessary for myself and other members of parliament to introduce legislation concerning some of the changes that were made the last time we altered the Unemployment Insurance Act. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that we included in that legislation, as wages, any payments that were made subsequent to a lay-off for the purpose of providing a benefit whether the lay-off took place or not. This involved vacation pay, which in my opinion has not in any way been provided for by the unemployment insurance authorities.

● (1600)

When we made vacation pay available to prevailing wage rate and casual workers in industries coming under provincial and federal jurisdiction, we made it clear that vacation pay was for the specific purpose of enabling a person to take a holiday. We did this in such a way that originally, in the province of Ontario at least, a worker could not take his holidays before July 1, the reason being that the best time to take a holiday in Canada is in the summer.

The Unemployment Insurance Act was amended. It said, in so many words, that vacation pay, if accumulated, was wages and was to be included as wages in the calculation of benefits paid under unemployment insurance legislation. That provision, unfortunately, in many instances totally destroyed the original idea behind vacation pay.

Through including severance pay with vacation pay we have done the same thing.

In cases where union contracts provide for severance pay, employment over any extended length of time will build up a sizeable amount of severance pay for workers. When we introduced provisions regarding severance pay, it seems to me we were saying that if a person worked on a job for a short time he ought to be paid something to tide him over until the next job. Take, for example, the construction worker. Let us assume that he has been working on the same project for 30 months. When he quits, he will be paid 30 months' severance pay. That amount should compensate him during the period he is moving from one job to another.

On the other hand, if the workman has worked on the same job for a period of years, it is obvious that his severance pay will be much greater and could serve a totally different purpose. Such a workman could move from one construction job which had been of long duration, to a second job. The point is that the severance pay will make easier his transfer from one job to another.

Unfortunately, the unemployment insurance authorities include severance pay in income. That means, of course, that if a person works for fairly good wages for any period, short or long—let us say it is ten months or two years—and then quits for whatever reason, his severance pay, paid in a lump sum will become income so far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned. For instance, let us say the severance pay of a man who has been earning $1,000 per month on a construction site amounts to $2,000, which is paid as a lump sum. In the eyes of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, that amount represents two months' earnings on the job; consequently, he would lose two months' unemployment insurance benefits. In any event, the most he can hope to collect by way of unemployment insurance is slightly more than $100 per week. As well, you must make allowance for income tax. His benefits would amount probably to $700 for the two-month period in question, assuming he could collect benefits. As you can see, even when severance pay is considered as wages, such severance pay enables a workman more easily to make the transition from one job to another and to follow his own line of work.

What I have said applies, of course, to people who leave their jobs and people who are fired. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the bill would not apply to permanent employees who work, say, for the federal government and are eligible for superannuation by virtue of their employment. Such employees fit into the category of permanent civil servants or permanent employees and are not affected by this bill.

Many of us who have had experience in the labour field believe that severance pay enables the worker to deal with dislocations that arise periodically when he must move from one job to another. Severance pay, which is paid to many prevailing wage rate workers and to workers drawing isolation pay in various parts of Canada, is a major asset, especially to those who work under the aegis of the federal government or its agencies, in that it allows the labour force to be mobile. We believe that is the purpose of severance pay. It is also true that workers are being penalized. The worker who was paid two months' severance pay in the example I used would be penalized during the two months covered by his severance pay, inasmuch as unemployment insurance benefits would not be paid. In my opinion, such workers should also be entitled to these benefits.

While considering this subject I submit we should look at both vacation pay and severance pay, as both payments are made for a specific purpose. Severance pay and vacation pay are accumulated through contributions normally made by the employer and the employee: they form part of the employee's wage structure. Both payments are made to the employee to enable him to enjoy a better way of life in the occupation he is following. Vacation pay is paid for the specific purpose of allowing the worker to take a holiday with his family in the summer.

The unemployment insurance people do not take this into consideration. They think that vacation pay must be paid when a man leaves his job. Consequently, the position of the Unemployment Insurance Commission is that such payment constitutes income and must be calculated and included as income for the purposes of unemployment insurance. That is wrong. The principle being followed is bad. Several of my colleagues and I have tried to remedy this situation in previous private members' bills. We contend that severance pay and vacation pay should not have anything to do with the Unemployment Insurance Act and should not be included in the calculation of income.

The regulations at present do not work to the advantage of short-term employees working under the jurisdiction of the federal government, or for other people for that matter, as they can calculate the point at which a lump sum payment would work to their detriment. The unemployment insurance payment would be larger than the severance pay if it were calculated over a period of one week.

I believe there is a need for mobility of employment in this country. Severance pay is one way of accomplishing this. There are others. Not only is mobility established by severance pay but it compensates one who loses his employment. It is a provision which enables him to make the transition to a second job.

There are many other forms of protection which could be given to workers in this field. This is essential for government employees and others who come under the Labour Code. Severance pay assists in a small way, but something should be done about the problem of housing which often enters into the picture when changing jobs. This applies also to people who are moved to another city. In my area a radar station is being closed. Civil servants, casual employees and armed forces personnel are being asked to move to another area. They have been assured by the Department of National Defence that their jobs will be protected. In the area in which they now live, they pay rent of approximately $125, or can purchase a house for $7,000 or $8,000. Land costs are negligible. Services are almost totally lacking. Housing is a very reasonable proposition. If they move to another area, equivalent housing will cost three, four or possibly ten times as much: for a person now living in Matheson who moves to Toronto it will mean the difference between $7,000 and $70,000 for equivalent housing. No allowance is made in that kind of transfer, and it is reasonable that we should consider this question.

When the Unemployment Insurance Commission opened a computer centre in Ontario several years ago, employees across Ontario were given the opportunity to move to a new centre in Toronto. There were so few applications to work in the Toronto computer centre that there were not enough employees to operate it. No one was stupid enough to move from a small town in Ontario to the city of Toronto for a job that would possibly pay an additional $1,000 a year. As a result, the computer centre was established in Belleville.

In this technical age there are many other forms of protection that should be given to employees who are transferred. A good example of this is James Bay. During the past several weeks the Quebec news broadcasts and election broadcasts have told the people about the wonderful opportunities in James Bay where 100,000 new jobs will be created. It is true there will be a number of new jobs in that area, but they will not be anywhere near 100,000. I doubt whether there will even be 50,000 new jobs created. However, when that job is complete, because of the high degree of technology we have developed it will not take more than 50 or 60 people to operate the major hydro project there. All the machines in the power plants will be automated; they will be run from a switching plant at Val d'Or, St. Jean or Montreal.

Not long ago a $40 million hydro project was built in my area. Several thousand people worked on that project. It now operates with 15 or 20 employees who come from 20 miles away. A crew goes there once a day, or, once every several days to see that the oiling and other maintenance jobs are being done properly by the machine set up to do that work. If we are to maintain reasonable mobility to move people in the government service and in the construction field under federal jurisdiction, we must provide whatever means are possible to carry out these transfers with ease. Severance pay is not the answer. It does not provide the benefits that must be provided to retain mobility of the labour force.

I suggest that if this bill is passed and severance pay is mandatory in those fields where there is not superannuation or pension—superannuation is paid to employees under our jurisdiction—we will find their opportunity for mobility is increased and dislocation and disruption of their economic pattern of life will be less severe.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased of course to rise on Bill C-44, as I have always been most interested in labour questions.

Before coming to the heart of the matter, I should like to recall briefly certain parts of the bill. First, Bill C-44 is entitled an Act to amend the Canada Labour Code, and then the words "severance pay" in brackets. I think this is clearer, and I have always wondered why in the House of Commons the pieces of legislation had unintelligible titles. I think that as much as possible the titles used should describe the purpose of each bill.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), the sponsor of this bill, proposes that the Canada Labour Code contain much more generous provisions for the employee who is laid off unexpectedly.

He proposes specifically the inclusion of a provision following section 57 of the Canada Labour Code which reads as follows:

An employee who is declared redundant by his employer or who ceases to be employed by him as a result of circumstances beyond the employee's control shall thereupon be paid by his employer a sum, hereinafter called serverance pay, . . .

—which is the title of the bill—

. . . calculated under subsection (3).

And the mover of the bill specifically states, and I quote:

(2) This section does not apply to

(a) an employee who has become entitled to receive a payment or payments under any superannuation or pension plan whether statutory or otherwise;

(b) an employee who dies while employed;

(c) an employee whose period of employment by the employer, and by any person from whom the employer has accepted a transfer of the contract of employment, extends for less than 12 months.

This clause clearly indicates that the hon. member for Timiskaming shows some goodwill; he proves once more that he is a reasonable man when it comes to considering matters as serious as this one.

Mr. Speaker, the calculation of the amount of the compensation proposed in this bill is rather simple, and I think that even an employer with little education could understand it. The hon. member for Timiskaming actually proposes, and I quote:

(3) Severance pay is the higher of the following amounts:

(a) the average weekly earnings of the employee based upon the average of the last five years or lesser period of employment, multiplied by the number of years of his employment, and in addition where any part of such years falls between the employee's forty-fifth and sixtieth year, a further amount equal to such average earnings multiplied by such years of employment as fall between these ages; or

I made a brief calculation on the basis of average weekly wages of $100, multiplied by five years, which gives a total of $500. For example, if the employee concerned was, as proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming, between 45 and 60, one could multiply $500 by five years, which would make $2,500. That is how I understand the arithmetic formula proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

My attention was drawn to subsection 2 of his addition to the Canada Labour Code which reads as follows, and I quote:

"54. Parts I, II, III, IV and IV(A) of this Act shall come into force on the 1st day of July, 1970."

I think this should have been corrected or the present bill should have been updated. But he simply kept the same subsection which was in the bill he had introduced earlier. Therefore, I take it for granted that he would want his bill to come into force on the 1st day of July 1974, and if I am wrong, I stand to be corrected.

Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to do a bit of research before deciding to speak on this bill and I found in an analysis of 1804 collective agreements of recent date that out of 1,735,000 employees in all industrial sectors in Canada, only 43 per cent, and what is even more significant, that only 28.4 per cent of those affected by collective agreements were protected by a provision entitling them to severance pay.

Another analysis of 306 major collective agreements involving 447,700 employees in the manufacturing sector shows that 37.9 per cent of the agreements involving 58.7 per cent of employees, included provisions entitling them to severance pay. A 1967 investigation on labour conditions, the last of a series of investigations whose findings are apparently available has shown that only 17 per cent of employees in all industrial sectors of Canada subjected to a sampling were covered by a provision concerning severance pay compared to 35 per cent of employees covered in industries under federal jurisdiction.

● (1630)

Those statistics speak volumes and strengthen the arguments already put forward by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) for the passage or at least a full study of his bill. It seems to me that while some progress may have been made since the publication of the last surveys available to me—I do not think, and this is my intuition—that conditions have materially improved in Canada.

I also had before me a recommendation of the 1963 International Labour Conference which advocated a form of income security for the dismissed worker, but it was suggested at the same time that it might be done through unemployment benefits plus severance pay.

The hon. member for Timiskaming commented on the protection available under the unemployment insurance scheme in Canada. I will not discuss that, but I think there are gaps that should be filled.

As I already said, this is not, of course, the first attempt on the part of the sponsor of this bill to have his bill passed. I think he introduced it for the first time in 1969, and he indicated a while ago that he had to amend it in recent years so as to take into account certain amendments that we introduced, among other things, with respect to the unemployment insurance scheme.

I wanted to do it at the beginning of my remarks, but I should like at this point to commend the hon. member for his initiative and his well-known perseverance, and I want to assure him that he can count on my support for the detailed study of his bill. It seems to me that we could very well refer that bill to the committee.

The hon. member for Timiskaming, as most other hon. members, is concerned about the plight of the Canadian worker because he probably comes from the working class as most of us do. I am not an expert on the Canada Labour Code and I have no legal training nor any union background and at times those questions seem a bit unfamiliar to me. Still I think it is important for all members to expose the abuses that can happen occasionally and are brought to our attention.

No one ever doubted that the employee often is discriminated against by the employer and this especially in areas where there are no unions or where employers openly work against trade unionism.

Mr. Speaker, I should not like anyone to deduce from this last comment that I am a socialist like the hon.

member of Timiskaming. These are questions of basic importance and a member of parliament, should not be accused of being a socialist or of having socialist tendencies or of being a communist because he believes in elementary social justice.

Mr. Speaker, there are also abuses in some areas of this country where workmen do not know the extent of the protection available to them under the Canada Labour Code and the provincial labour codes in spite of the sometimes praiseworthy efforts of governments, civil servants and unions to inform the Canadian workman of his rights.

It is quite interesting, Mr. Speaker,—and I would like to mention this—that during the 1972 federal election that was held on October 30, I defeated a Progressive Conservative opponent who had a peculiar concept of the right to strike, among other things. His views were strongly rejected, and this is why I am here in the House of Commons today. I do not fool myself, Mr. Speaker, I know I was elected to work in the Canadian worker's best interests, and I publicly undertake, once more, to continue to do so.

The Canada Labour Code under its present form includes a few protective measures for the employee who suddenly finds himself unemployed because his employer has decided that he would be replaced by a machine, for instance. The legislation also bestowed on cabinet the authority to prepare technical regulations and to set up procedures to secure proper enforcement of the legislation. I will not deal with that since it was already referred to in the previous debates, when this bill was considered.

I did admit that I am not an expert in this area, even though I am very much interested in this matter. This is why, Mr. Speaker, I wish we could interview government officials and public servants in committee, for instance, during the Christmas recess, on the way the existing legislation is enforced, in order to later determine the impact of the measure advocated by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

I suggested the lengthy Christmas recess which they seem to consider giving us, because the government often finds excuses for not referring these bills to the committee, such as this one for instance: "We are already overwhelmed with work". Then, Mr. Speaker, I take advantage of this opportunity, today, to suggest that standing committees of the House of Commons be allowed to sit during Christmas, Easter and summer recesses, to consider these bills. However I should like to see the devotion of members sitting on these committees taken into account and that a special allowance be granted to them.

I had before me, a few minutes ago, a notebook that I lent to one of my colleagues who intends to speak of this matter—

An hon. Member: You only have one supporter.

Mr. Corbin: On the contrary, I think that there are a lot more.

As I was saying I had before me, a few moments ago, a note book containing an analysis and various studies on the legislative concept of the severance pay recognized in some countries. I have but little time to consider it in detail but I would like the bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming, to be referred to the committee so that we might spend more time on the various aspects of the matter and consider at the same time what is the practice in other countries.

It is important that we continue our studies on this matter, that the federal and provincial Departments of Labour continue their analysis of the existing practice in the field of severance pay and that they make the findings of these studies and analysis available to members. We must also listen carefully to the views of labour unions.

If some hon. members are seriously in doubt about the usefulness of this bill, although I do not think that such is the case, I suggest that they look around them anyway the next time they visit their respective ridings.

● (1640)

Let them go and meet the employees of the manufacturing industry or those of the pulp and paper industry. Let them put on the shoes of a 55 or 60 year old workman who is being laid off because it has been decided that a machine should replace him. Let them go out and meet a man who has a number of children at home to support, who has mortgage payments to make, who has often bought his car on credit through a finance company and who has all sorts of other family and financial obligations to meet.

How would we react if we were in this individual's circumstances, Mr. Speaker? This man who is working today may receive tomorrow a two-month advance notice that he will be laid off. He has no choice because technological progress rules everything nowadays. When he reaches age 60, this man is no longer accepted or even acceptable.

If he succeeds in finding another job, it is sometimes at a much lower salary. And this is far from being funny. You might say that governments will provide for the worker and that they do so to a large extent in the case of a worker in the type of situation which we are studying today, but nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, it is always a humiliating experience for a man who has worked for a living to depend on welfare or on the generosity of governments for financial help or support.

Of course, the government has acted wisely in bringing about this legislation, but whatever might be said, the work ethic still exists in Canada. There still are people who want to earn the money they receive. I believe that as long as this is the case, we should give them all the support that we can, and enact legislation in order to ensure that they receive the best possible social justice.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to give other members a chance to speak. I wish to repeat what I said earlier in my remarks; the hon. member for Timiskaming has my support and I agree that this excellent bill be referred to the committee for further study.

Mrs. Albanie Morin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, it is with some reserve that I am taking part in this debate today on Bill C-44. I would very much like the hon. member to know that I am neither for nor against this bill, but some of its provisions are not very clear to me and it is on this basis that I would like to speak.

The bill introduced by the hon. member among other things, provides for the following:

An employee who is declared redundant by his employer . . .

There may be so many cases where an employee may be laid off without being redundant. This is not quite clear. And here again it says:

. . . or who ceases to be employed by him as a result of circumstances beyond the employee's control . . .

Here again, many cases may be found where employees are laid off for reasons beyond their will. This is quite ambiguous and before supporting this bill, I would have liked the hon. member to give further particulars.

I would have preferred a further narrowing down of the category of employees to whom he would like this bill to apply; it certainly contains good things but then they should have been explained at greater length.

Clause (2) reads as follows and I quote:

This section does not apply to

(a) an employee who has become entitled to receive a payment or payments under any superannuation or pension plan whether statutory or otherwise;

Then, if I understand properly, this excludes all employees who are eligible to a pension plan of any kind and particularly in this case to the Quebec Pension Plan and also all employees who are eligible for unemployment benefits; other classes of employees are also excluded and this should also have been explained.

Subsection (b) reads as follows, and I quote:

an employee who dies while employed;

I think that this category of employees who die while employed should have been covered by the legislation and here I have in mind the wife of a man who dies while employed by a corporation and suddenly sees herself without any income. She may have several accounts to pay and have no income. If her husband was insured she should receive insurance benefits, I agree, but it takes months and months before insurance companies make that payment.

An hon. Member: Is this not covered by the pension plan?

Mrs. Morin: Yes, these would be excluded. I wonder why the hon. member rejects employees who die. I really think that the spouse had a right to that benefit.

I repeat that I am not opposed to this bill. It has many good things, but there are some vague points that should have been explained further.

Paragraph (c) of the bill reads as follows, and I quote:

(c) an employee whose period of employment by the employer . . . extends for less than 12 months.

Again, a class of people who need help have been excluded. I am referring to seasonal employees, lumberjacks who work in camps for five or six months in winter. Well, they are excluded from any benefits by this bill, yet they are the ones who most need our help.

I still have in mind seasonal workers in tobacco, fruit or vegetable harvesting. If their period of employment extends for less than 12 months, they would also be excluded. I wonder why the hon. member excluded those categories of people.

I repeat that there are good things in the bill, but why was it not better explained?

In addition, I had the honour as councillor of the town of Sillery, to take part in the drafting of several collective agreements and let me say, Mr. Speaker, that collective agreements often clearly stipulate that the employee shall be entitled to severance pay should he leave his job. Many collective agreements so provide. I also have in mind the small businesses having three or four employees.

The bill specifies that severance pay should be of such or such an amount as provided in section 3 and that it should not exceed $1,000. It seems to me that small businesses would have their hands tied. Some employers can pay a small severance pay but if a certain amount is stipulated by law, it seems that this would be a disservice to small companies. I think that this would lead them to bankruptcy. Here again I blame the hon. member for failing to think of the small employers.

For all these reasons, I think that Bill C-44 contains several good things. However, it includes some very unintelligible provisions that will not facilitate the work of certain employers.

Once again I am not against the bill but I would like the hon. member to improve it.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Peters: No, Mr. Speaker. I wish to close the debate.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the bill which we are discussing proposes to provide to employees who lose their employment through redundancy a form of income, or severance pay. In looking at the existing programs of this government in the administration of Canada I think it is quite clear that in many cases this kind of severance pay is not required.

It seems to me that what is required for a worker who loses his job through no fault of his own, where his job is made redundant, is not a sum of money no matter how generous but, rather, retraining in order to acquire skills necessary to obtain a new job among those which are evolving, and also the possibility of finding out where new jobs are which call for the level of skill he now has or might acquire; and, thirdly, some method to get him to the location where the job may be if there is none in his own locality.

Whether or not one receives severance pay from a former job seems to me irrelevant to the point when trying to find a place in the work force for the person who has been hit by redundancy. Therefore, I believe we must look, in discussing this bill, at the adequacy of the measures that have been developed by the Department of Manpower and by the Unemployment Insurance Commission in respect of retraining programs which are in operation today, or possibilities for employment.

The dilemma we face is trying to move people around from one economic area to another, and how best we can do this. Most important of all are the mechanisms by which we must attempt to find a job for the person who has been declared redundant. I think it is safe to say that one of the important issues in the recent rail strike which this House had to in part settle was that of job security for various classes of railway workers.

An understanding of the kind of process that is taking place, particularly in the secondary manufacturing sector, is associated with the concerns the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has put forward. He has one way of looking at the problem and potential solutions, and I have another way of looking at the problem and the potential solutions.

● (1650)

Mr. Speaker, in the rural areas of Canada in particular from which the hon. member for Timiskaming and myself come, one of the things that has been happening has been a tremendous amount of capital investment going into traditionally labour-intensive industries. Mining and forestry, for example, no longer employ the same number of people, yet produce tremendous amounts of material, more than they ever used to. They are becoming capital-intensive industries.

When we have people who are made redundant because of that kind of transformation in our economic system, it seems to me we are looking at the provision of additional jobs in areas where those jobs were eliminated. Our aim is not only to provide unemployed person with the means of moving from one region of Canada to another where there might be jobs, but also of ensuring sufficient growth in those isolated areas in order to provide an expanding number of jobs for both the existing work force and the young people in those communities.

In the Atlantic provinces, I note that some progress is being made. This is evident from the latest statistics which have been published. This is an indication that perhaps after five years the policies followed by DREE are taking hold. So as I see the problem, it involves not just the question of legislating for severance pay through the Canada Labour Code, but it involves paying far more attention to the operation of a department like DREE, trying to find out what the mechanism is to bring some kind of economic growth to such isolated regions, and to re-examine the operations of the Department of Manpower and Immigration which in many cases has brought forward programs with which we are not satisfied. I and, I think, other hon. members feel that that department has not been able to find a way to accomplish the goals that we set for it in the legislation establishing the department.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: The problem is that in many cases, when we have been able to define the goals that we want the departments to follow, we have not been able to find the mechanisms for achieving these goals. The programs of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, for example, taken by themselves, seem to be reasonable and sensible approaches to solving these problems. But in point of fact, in their actual operations and in the way in which the department has been put together, they have not been successful; and certainly they have not been as successful as we all would have wished.

We are now faced with the ridiculous situation such as is indicated by the government's job survey, which indicates that there are a substantial number of jobs that are unfilled. Not only are they unfilled for short periods of time, but they are unfilled for lengthy periods. Manpower has not been able to find out about these jobs, take the lists of the unemployed from the Unemployment Insurance Commission and put the two together. I am not saying that unemployment would disappear if that were done. Obviously, the number of jobs available in any given period is going to decrease and they are not always going to be in the places where the unemployed are. A decrease in jobs is due, to a large extent to changes and to the process of turnover. But the point is that there does not seem to have been a realization on the part of Manpower that this problem exists, and even though there are mechanisms in place they do not seem to have worked out to the satisfaction of either the workers concerned, the department or the minister.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) tells me not to blame public servants. I am not blaming public servants. I am saying that what we have done in the case of the Department of Manpower and Immigration is to develop a mechanism to do certain things. In large part it has not succeeded because we do not understand all we should about the operations of the job market, the economic systems and manpower mobility in terms of workers' preparedness to move from one community to another. We have not been able to cope with what have been called changes in the work ethic. Some jobs which used to be sought after, no longer are and we now have jobs which cannot be filled at any price.

It is not a matter of the public servants or a matter of the government; it is a question of looking at a changing society, trying to find out where that society is moving and attempting to devise policies on the fly that will meet the very real challenges that exist. To say that is not to blame anybody, but to point out that not only does the administration, the cabinet, the government, and the Liberal Party have a responsibility to attempt to make these judgments, but so do my friends opposite.

I realize what a strain it would be for the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton if he and his party had to put forward in the House reasoned, sensible policy proposals to meet these problems. One of the reasons they are sitting on the benches opposite and not over here is that they have no policies to offer on this or any other subject.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, just for the record, may I ask if it is still definite that on Monday we will be dealing with the foreign investment legislation?

Mr. Reid: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. The House will resume at two o'clock Monday afternoon.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

TABLING OF UNITED NATIONS SECURITY COUNCIL AGREEMENT ON IMPLEMENTATION OF SECOND PHASE OF RESOLUTION 340, AND CERTAIN NOTES

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table the texts of the following documents: the United Nations Security Council Agreement of November 2 on the implementation of the second phase of Security Council resolution 340 of October 25, notes dated October 30 and November 4 from the permanent representative of Canada to the Secretary General of the United Nations and, finally, the note of October 30 from the Secretary General to Canada's permanent representative.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Judd Buchanan (London West) moved that the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, presented to the House on October 26, 1973, be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there has been discussion with the various House leaders on this matter and I believe there is agreement that the report be concurred in without debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ROLE OF CANADIAN ELEMENT IN MIDDLE EAST PEACEKEEPING FORCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for unanimous consent of the House to raise a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton):

That this House views with concern the indecorous haste exhibited by the Canadian government in its anxiety to secure consent of objecting nations within the United Nations to having Canadians in the peacekeeping force for service in the Middle East, whereby without regard to the magnificent record of Canadians in two world wars Canada's No. 1 combat alert unit is to be placed in a secondary position in the peacekeeping force being given a responsibility analogous to that of hewers of wood and drawers of water for other nationals in the said force.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he is prepared to make a statement on motions relating to his discussions over the weekend in New York and Washington.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. Hon. members know that we would get into difficulty if on motions hon. members were to ask members of the government whether they propose to make statements. I appreciate the importance of the matter. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply. But I think the hon. member would agree that if the minister rose and made a statement that would answer the question. That is why, normally, this kind of question is not asked on motions.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—LETTING OF CONTRACTS BY HIRE NORTH—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in view of reports of a serious conflict of interest with respect to the letting of contracts in connection with a government project in my constituency of the Northwest Territories, I ask leave, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), to move as follows:

That the letting of contracts by Hire North, a Northwest Territories government project, be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts for the purpose of determining whether tenders were called before such contracts were authorized, and also for the purpose of determining whether the employee appointed to head Hire North has been involved in a conflict of interest.

SCREENING PROCEDURES FOR BLOOD IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, that the import of blood from the United States carries with it toxic hepatitic bacteria that constitute a danger to the technicians who handle it for experimental use. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That an inquiry be launched immediately for the adoption of more satisfactory screening procedures in importing batches of high risk blood specimens.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM FUNDS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in that the allocation of funds under the Local Initiatives Program to regions of highest unemployment does not come close to meeting the objectives of the program and tends to destroy the initiative criteria. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That the government immediately increase the funds under the LIP program to at least that amount allocated last year.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO CHILE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to bring a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to the attention of the House and to seek unanimous consent to move a motion. In view of the fact the Canadian ambassador to Chile, in a dispatch to Ottawa, stated, "Reprisals and searches have created panic atmosphere affecting particularly expatriates including riff-raff of Latin American left to whom Allende gave asylum," thus betraying a bias that makes it impossible for him to carry out stated government policy on political refugees in Chile, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to recall the Canadian ambassador to Chile.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

PENSIONS

TRANSFERABILITY FROM ARMED FORCES AND RCMP PLANS TO AIR CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a question of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact the President of the Treasury Board has consistently refused to recommend that the Canadian Forces and RCMP pension plans be transferable to Air Canada's pension plan, and in view of the basic inequity thus caused, particularly to airline pilots who have served in the Armed Forces or the RCMP and who have taken positions with Air Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House requests the President of the Treasury Board to correct this basic inequity by permitting the transfer of credits under the Armed Forces and RCMP pension plans to the Air Canada pension plan.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

ABORTION

PROPOSED COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the representations made to most members of the House not only in person over the past few days but also by thousands of telegrams and letters, urging the House to examine the abortion laws now freely in existence in this country, and in view of the fact that this is a matter dealing with life itself I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie):

That the government be instructed to form forthwith a committee, comprised of members of this House, to thoroughly investigate this entire area affording such organizations as the Alliance for Life and others, in fact all segments of our society, the opportunity to express their views on a matter involving the very lives of thousands of unborn children.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not. The motion cannot be put.

RELEASE OF RONALD PATRICK LIPPERT BY CUBA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek unanimous consent to move a motion arising from the efforts of all those who assisted in obtaining the release of Ronald Patrick Lippert—the Department of External Affairs, the Canadian Embassy in Havana, private citizens throughout the country, and certain members of the news media. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House expresses its appreciation to all those whose efforts contributed and assisted in obtaining the release of Ronald Patrick Lippert.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

SUBMERSIBLE VESSELS—ESCAPE CAPABILITIES

Question No. 2,325—Mr. Forrestall:

Will the government ensure that all submersible vessels for which it contracts or which it purchases have more than one escape capabilities?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, a multiple escape capability for all submersibles is a clearly recognized objective; however, the achievement of this objective is currently subject to the limitations of technology in this field. In so far as the Ministry of Transport is concerned, the question of escape capability will always be an important point of consideration in the contracting or purchase of submersibles.

SUBMERSIBLE VESSELS—CONTROL OR OPERATIONAL SUPERVISION

Question No. 2,327—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What are the definitions of the jurisdictional purview of the government with respect to the control or operational supervision of submersible vessels?

2. What is the statutory authority for such definition?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Defence and Transport as follows: 1 and 2. The British North America Act, Article 91, Section 10, assigns the federal government jurisdiction over navigation and shipping. This jurisdiction is exercised through the Canada Shipping Act which is administered by the Ministry of Transport. Article 714 of the CSA stipulates that, except where specially provided, the act does not apply to ships belonging to Her Majesty. The government has authority to make regulations regarding the construction and equipment of all ships and for the inspection of non-passenger ships over 15 tons, gross tonnage, passenger ships over five tons, gross tonnage and ships carrying more than 12 passengers not in excess of five tons, gross tonnage. The National Defence Act states at Section 2 that "Her Majesty's Canadian Ship means any vessel of the Canadian Forces commissioned as a vessel of war." Under authority of the National Defence Act (Part 1, Section 18) the Chief of Defence Staff is responsible for "the control and administration of the Canadian Forces . . ." Consequently, the National Defence Act provides the statutory authority to the Chief of Defence Staff to make regulations governing the control and operation of submersible vessels belonging to the Canadian Armed Forces.

AIR CANADA—AVAILABILITY AND CHOICE OF CANADIAN WINES ON CARRIERS

Question No. 2,595—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Are any brands of Canadian champagne available on (a) domestic flights (b) flights to the United States (c) overseas flights of Air Canada and (i) if so, what brands are available (ii) if not, for what reason?

2. What effort has the Department of Transport made to urge Air Canada to make Canadian-produced wines available to the travelling public on its flights?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. A Canadian brand of champagne (Bright's) is available on domestic flights, but stocks are being depleted in light of a court decision in late 1972 forbidding Canadian wine producers from using the term champagne for their domestic sparkling wines.

2. The Ministry of Transport does not advise Air Canada on internal management matters of this nature. However we are informed that Canadian wines are carried on domestic flights. The guiding criterion for all cases is customer's preference, which is determined from time to time through passenger surveys and cabin crew reports.

RELATIONS WITH EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES

Question No. 2,665—Mr. Stevens:

1. Has the government taken any steps to establish some form of regular parliamentary link with the European Parliament and, if so, have they been successful?

2. Has the government pressed the European Community to establish European Community Information Offices in (a) Halifax (b) Ottawa (c) Toronto (d) Montreal (e) Vancouver?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Interparliamentary relations are not within the competence of the government but fall within the scope of the officers of parliament, specifically the Interparliamentary Research Centre. However, the Department of External Affairs assists the Interparliamentary Relations Centre in organizing visits to Canada of foreign parliamentarians (such as the visit to Canada of a group of members of the European Parliament later this month)* as well as visits abroad by Canadian parliamentarians.

2. It would not be appropriate for the Canadian government to solicit the European Economic Community to establish an information office in Canada. The Standing Committee of the Senate on Foreign Affairs and Defence has recommended to the government that the Community open an information office in Canada and the Department of External Affairs has passed this information on to the officers of the European Economic Community.

UTILIZATION OF WINNIPEG INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT ON "POLAR ROUTE" TO EUROPE

Question No. 2,713—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the government entered into negotiations with other nations and their major airlines regarding the utilization of the Winnipeg International Airport as either a stopover point or a major departure centre on the so-called "polar route" to Europe and, if so, where and on what date were such meetings held?

2. Have any agreements been reached regarding the utilization of the Winnipeg Airport on the polar route?
