Cole - Immigration policy

C 61705

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF LIBERAL WOMEN OF CANADA.

The Following is a public Statement issued by the Department of Immigration, January 1st., 1929.

Immigration has occupied an unusually large place in public attention during 1928. An indication of the importance which is attached to this subject was the order of Parliament referring to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization the general subject of Immigration, including the work of the Department of Immigration and Colonization, for consideration and report. The Committee considered the subject in much detail, heard many witnesses, and presented its report to Parliament in due course.

The recommendations contained in the report were mainly along lines of activity already pursued by the Department. They included special passage rates for British farm settlers, continuance of arrangements for the movement of domestics from the United Kingdom to Canada, the extension of the Assisted Passage privileges to families of all immigrants from Great Britain who had established themselves in Canada prior to June 6, 1928; and that steps be taken with the object of obtaining a reduction in the general ocean rate to British immigrants to approximately £10. The Committee also went on record as approving the extension of tri-partite agreements between British, Federal and Provincial Governments for the encouragement of British land settlers.

The report was at the time, and since, widely discussed in the Press, and therefore perhaps need not be quoted in greated detail in the present article. Its effect has undoubtedly been to further stimulate healthy interest in the subject of immigration, and to promote a recognition that this is a subject involved in many complexities, the best solution of which is essential to the growth and prosperity of the Dominion.

The beginning of the year found the Department actively engaged in immigration work through its organization in the British Isles and the United States and from headquarters at Ottawa. The appeal for immigrants was directed to those who take up life on the land, either as farm owners or labourers, and to female houseworkers who would engage in domestic service. To facilitate the movement of such settlers from Great Britain a system of Assisted Passages was in effect under which the British and Canadian Governments and the transportation companies co-operated in establishing the following rates for adult settlers from the British port to points in Canada:-

To Halifax, St.John or Quebec	£2 0.0
" Montreal	3. 0.0
" Toronto	3.10.0
" Winnipeg	4.10.0
" Regina, Moose Jaw or Saskatoon	5. 0.0
" Calgary or Edmonton	5.10.0
" Vancouver	5. 0.0

Children under seventeen belonging to the classes eligible for assistance received free transportation, paid for by the British and Canadian Governments at a reduced rate arranged with the steamship companies. These rates are still in effect.

In connection with these passage schemes there is an arrangement effective throughout Canada by which any British subject in Canada may nominate a British subject in the United Kingdom for passage assistance. If the nominator in Canada is not acquainted with any suitable person on the other side, he may nominate by description.

A system for handling women immigrants from Great Britain of the housoworker class had also been developed to a considerable degree of efficiency. Women officers were attached to the staff in all the principal agencies in the British Isles to interview intending women immigrants in order that they might be given help and advice and correct information regarding conditions in Canada. A number of the principal steamship companies in the Canadian Trans-Atlantic Service had adopted the practice of carrying conductresses as ships' officers. Women officers were placed at the Canadian Atlantic ports to receive and assist women and children, and conductresses were employed on the trains to be responsible for such passangers. Women's hostels in some of the principal Canadian centres provided free accommodation for from twenty-four to forty-eight hours after arrival, paid for by the Department of Immigration to women and girls seeking employment as house workers, and the women and girls were placed in employment either through the Employment Service of Canada or by the Women's Branch of the Immigration Department in co-operation with some of the hostels. These facilities for women immigrants are still being provided.

Another class of immigration to which much attention was given is juveniles. Every boy or girl coming within this classification is subject to medical examination and is carefully inspected by Canadian officials to determine his or her fitness for Canada. Employers in Can ada are selected with a view to giving the child a good home and opportunity to acquire a useful training.

A nation-wide system of advice and after-care for immigrants has also been established. The men engaged in this work are in many cases graduates of agricultural colleges and have also had practical agricultural experiences and are able to give first-hand knowledge to the new settler concerning values and the best method of farm operations. The only country besides the British Isles in which active immigration work is carried on is the United States. from which there is an increasing flow of farm settlers.

Such is, in brief, the background against which the year's immigration activities have been carried on. The viewpoint of the Department of Immigration and Colonization has been that Canadians desire neither a drying-up of the streams of immigration nor a flood that cannot be readily absorbed in the country. The activities of the Department have been designed to avoid both of these extremes and to encourage a steady and solid movement of the types who are needed in the development of this country. The movement shows some increase, although not a conspicuously large one, over that of the preceding year, as is by the table of immigration to Canada for eleven months in 1928 compared with the same period in 1927.

Statement of Immigration to Canada, for the Eleven Months ended November 30, 1927, compared with that of the corresponding Months of 1928.

In addition to carrying on along the well defined lines of immigration activity already indicated, considerable new ground has been broken. During the previous year an agreement was completed between the British Government, the Canadian Government, and the Government of New Brunswick, which provides for the placement of 500 British settlers and their families on improved farms in New Brunswick during the period from Mar. 1, 1928, to Mar.31,1934. Settlement under this plan began in 1928 during which year 100 families were placed on the land. The plan follows the general scheme of the 3,000 British families settlement, which has already met with so much success, except that in this case the Canadian co-operation is given by the Province and the Dominion working together, instead of exclusively by the Dominion Government. The Dominion Government, through its Department of Immigration and Colonization, recruits and selects the settlers in the British Isles and, co-operating with the Government of New Brunswick, locates the settlers in that province and extends settlement service through its Land Settlement Branch. The Government of New Brunswick acquires the necessary farms and sells them to the settler on terms calling for 25 annual payments with interest amortized at the rate of 5 percent per annum. The British Government provides funds for acquiring stock and equipment, and for initial expenses, which sums will be repayable on the same terms as the price of the land. Losses, if any, on account of stock and equipment, will be shared by the British and Canadian Governments. Although as yet this settlement plan has been accepted only by the province of New Brunswick, hopes are entertained that other provinces will decide to co-operate along similar lines.

Extensive negotiations were carried on with the British Government and with other interests concerned with a view to putting into effect the recommendations of the Select Standing Committee already referred to. As a result of these negotiations the Honorable Robert Forke, Minister of Immigration and Colonization, was recently able to announce that the third class passage ocean rate for British migrants coming to Canada has been reduced from £18.15.0 to £10. Any British subject in the United Kingdom who is in the position to pay this rate can come to Canada without any formality other than medical examination before leaving the United Kingdom. Migrants are expected to have sufficient means to provide for themselves until they obtain employment, unless they are coming to friends or relatives who will care for them until they find work. It is believed that this reduced ocean rate will lead to a substantial increase in British immigration coming to Canada without government assistance Arrangements, in which the British Government participates, have been made for the settlement of wives and children of men who were satisfactorily settled in Canada before June 6th last. Such wives and children will receive assisted passages, at the rate of £3.15.0 for adults with free passages for children under seventeen years of age.

Assisted passages at the rates prevailing last year, that is, from £2 to £3 according to destination in Canada, will be available for women household workers and for families proceeding to work on the land, with free passages for all members of such families under 19 years of age. Boys under 19 years of age accepted under any Government scheme for juvenile farm workers or proceeding under the auspices of a recognised voluntary society, and girls up to 17 years of age proceeding to suitable homes under the same arrangements, will receive free transportation.

There will be no assisted passages under the Government scheme for single men next year. In cases where single men are not in a position to provide the whole of the £10.0.0 rate it has been arranged that the British Government may provide loans to approved agricultural workers.

Completion of the settlement of 3,000 Families on the land in Canada has been extended for another year and 350 additional families will be settled under that scheme in 1929.

Agreements have been made between the British and Canadian Governments and the Governments of the provinces of New Brunswick Ontario and Manitoba which provide for establishing provincial reception and distributing farms in those provinces and for the subsequent settlement of British boys. British boys between 14 and 19 years of age, suitable for a future on the land, will be received and distributed from these reception homes to farm homes selected under the supervision of the Provincial Governments. The minimum wages are to be $19 per month with free board, lodging, washing and mending. This is the first step in a plan for establishing British boys as farmers in these provinces. To enable boys to become farm owners in their own right the British and Canadian Governments have agreed to loan up to $2500 to each applicant when he reaches the age of 21 years, provided he has acquired the necessary experience and has saved approximately $500, the capital thus available to be used to establish himself on a farm of his own. Applications for settlement under this scheme are now being received and settlement will commence next year.

The provinces of Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia will also participate in the scheme for bringing British boys to Canada for farm placement under the joint auspices of British, Dominion and Provincial Governments. The present participation of the Saskatchewan Government will provide for the use of the Agricultural College at Saskatoon as a reception home for British boys and the distribution of the boys to suitable farm homes in the province. Nova Scotia has not yet established a distributing centre, but is co-operating by placing a limited number of boys in suitable farm homes and giving supervision, and has also decided to participate in the Boys' Land Settlement Scheme.

Facilities for the free medical examination of all migrant proceeding to Canada have been extended by providing that the migrant may if he so desires be examined free of charge by one of approximately 500 British doctors or by one of the official doctors of the Canadian Government. The Canadian Government is using every possible means to facilitate medical examination in the United Kingdom without inconvenience to the migrant and so as to provide against the possibility of his being turned back for reasons of health upon arrival at the Canadian port.

To meet the need for housing accommodation for families in rural districts in Canada a scheme for the erection of cottages has been discussed with the Provincial Governments. One hundred cottages are to be erected in the province of Ontario for occupation by British families, the cost of erection being shared by the Dominion, Provincial and British Governments. Other Provincial Governments now have the matter under consideration.

Increased facilities for training single men for farm work are being provided in the United Kingdom by the British Government. On account of the comparative scarcity of farm labourers in the United Kingdom these training farms will be used to supply farm labour not only to Canada, but also to the United Kingdom and the other dominions. Additional centres for providing preliminary training in farm work for boys on the lines of the Newcastle Training Hostel have been established at Liverpool and Bristol, and further centres will shortly be opened in South Wales, in Hull and in Glasgow. A number of the Provincial Governments are co-operating with the Dominion and British Governments in establishing centres for training in domestic work for women intending to settle in those provinces.

The Colonization Department of the railway companies, the Land Settlement Branch of the Hudson's Bay Company, and other agencies including voluntary societies, working in close co-operation with the two Governments, will make increased efforts in regard to migration for land settlement or farm labor under their auspices. Discussions are also proceeding with the interested Governments concerning land settlement schemes in accordance with the recommendations made by the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture at the last Session of Parliament.

EMPIRE SETTLEMENT SCHEMES.

DOMINION - PROVINCIAL JUVENILE IMMIGRATION.

Between 1868 and 1928 Juvenile Immigration Societies or other agencies have brought to Canada 87,699 children or an average of about 1461 children annually. Some time ago the Department came to the conclusion that a special effort should be made to encourage the movement of British boys from the homes of industrious families in the Old Land. The Department invited the co-operation of Provincial Governments and as the result of subsequent negotiations, five Provincial reception and distributing centres have been established for British boys.

Reception and Distributing Farms

British 'teen age boys are, therefore, also now being brought forward under Government auspices. These boys are selected by the Oversea Representatives of the Dominion and Provincial Governments and are brought forward to the Provincial reception and distributing centres which are operated under tripartite Agreements, the participating parties being the British, Dominion and whatever Provincial Government desires to co-operate in this work. Under these Agreements, boys are received at Provincial centres and placed in selected farm homes which have been approved by Provincial Governments. The minimum wage is $10 per month plus board and lodging, washing and mending. The farmer undertakes to pay the boy a certain sum each month and to remit the balance to the Provincial Government to be placed to the boy's credit. The Provincial Government selects the home, furnishes aftercare, advice, protection and what supervision is necessary for a boy's welfare for a period of three years after his arrival in Canada.

The British Government and the Dominion Government share equally in the cost of transportation from the port of embarkation in the United Kingdom to the rail destination in Canada.

Operation of Societies

Voluntary societies can co-operate through Provincial Centres by submitting to the Colonization Officials of Provincial Governments the names and addresses of suitable homes and by the Representatives of Voluntary Societies submitting the names and addresses of suitable boys to the Oversea Agents of the Provincial or Dominion Governments. The number of children brought forward under Voluntary Societies appears on page 89 of the Annual Report.

PROVINCIAL RECEPTION AND DISTRIBUTING CENTRES.

Centres have been established at the following points:-

Nova Scotia - The Agricultural College at Truro.

New Brunswick - The Cossar Farm at Lower Gagetown on the St. John River which has been equipped for reception, training and distribution.

Ontario - Vimy Ridge Farm, near Guelph. Last year approximately 400 boys were received and distributed from Vimy Ridge.

Manitoba - The Manitoba Agricultural College. 100 boys arrived and were placed last year through the Manitoba Agricultural College.

Saskatchewan - The Agricultural College at Saskatoon.

Quebec - The British Immigration and Colonization Association have a reception and distributing farm on the Island of Montreal. This Association places boys in Eastern Ontario and in the Eastern Townships.

BOYS LAND SETTLEMENT.

Boys Land Settlement Scheme

The next step in the program is what is known as the "Boys Land Settlement Scheme". This is a further development of the reception and distributing centres for British boys. Under this Scheme, the British and Canadian Governments propose jointly to loan a total sum of

Total Advance for Ten Years

$5,000,000 over a period of 10 years to assist suitable British youths to take up farming in Canada on their own account. A large number of British boys who come to Canada as farm workers subsequently take up farms but so far they have had to rely entirely upon their own efforts for the necessary capital to purchase and equip a farm and this may take a considerable number of years.

Purpose of Scheme

The Boys Land Settlement Scheme aims at curtailing this period of waiting and under it a British youth at the end of a few years spent in gaining the necessary training and experience in Canada and in accumulating some savings will have the opportunity of being placed on a farm of his own under Government supervision.

Boys eligible

This Scheme is applicable to British boys who have come to Canada under the Empire Settlement Act and preference is given to those who have been trained at Provincial Centres. The Scheme is applicable only to those who have not come to Canada with their parents or to join their parents in this country.

Age eligible

Upon attaining the age of 21, these boys will be eligible for assistance up to an amount not exceeding $2500 for the purchase of a farm and for stock and equipment provided that they have acquired the necessary training and experience by working for wages on a farm in Canada and have saved approximately $500.

Provincial Co-operation

The Scheme provides for the co-operation of the Provincial Governments and the extent of settlement in each Province will depend upon the measure of such co-operation. Farms may be acquired by purchase or on lease with option to purchase.

Advance by Province

The original Scheme provided for a loan of $1250 by the British Government; $1000 by the Dominion Government and $250 by a Provincial Government. The Scheme, however, has been modified so that a Provincial Government may have the alternative of assuming settlement and supervisory service in lieu of the advance of $250 which, under such circumstances, would be made by the Dominion Government.

The Provincial Governments who have decided to participate in the Boys Land Settlement Scheme are, -

CANADIAN BOYS.

The Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization also recommended, subject to the completion of satisfactory arrangements with Governments of the Provinces, that assistance equal to that given by the British Government to British emigrant boys be extended by the Government of Canada to the Canadian youth who are trained in agriculture.

The following draft proposals were submitted to Provincial Governments regarding the settlement of Canadian boys,-

1. That (a) the applicant be in possession of ..... $ 500
   (b) the Provincial Government loan a sum not exceeding 1250
   (c) the Dominion Government loan a sum not exceeding 1250
   $3000
   (d) the Provincial Government to provide settlement and supervisory service.

2. It was further suggested that the following general conditions applicable to British boys should also apply to Canadian boys:-

   (a) That the applicant has reached his 21st but not his 25th birthday at the date of application for assistance;

   (b) That he is in possession of savings amounting to approximately $500;

   (c) That he has acquired the necessary experience of farm work in Canada by working as an agricultural labourer for wages or in such other manner as the Department of Immigration and the Province may consider sufficient provided that both the Department and the Province shall be satisfied that the applicant is industrious, economical and capable of managing a farm;

   (d) That the Dominion and Provincial Governments share losses on a fifty-fifty basis;

   (e) That the above Scheme shall be applicable only to a Province the Government of which is participating in the British Boys Land Settlement Scheme.

So far no Provincial Government has agreed to participate in the Canadian Boys Land Settlement Scheme.

GENERAL LAND SETTLEMENT.

3000 Family Scheme.

Extension of 3000 Family Scheme

Up to the 28th February 1929, 3002 families have been settled under the British Family Settlement Scheme. Of this number there have been 543 withdrawals and cancellations. The Agreement has been extended to provide for the settlement of an additional 350 families to complete the Scheme.

The main purpose of the 3000 Family Scheme was to attract British settlers and to demonstrate the success of directional land settlement wherever land could be obtained at a fair market value.

On the 4th August 1927, a tripartite Agreement was made between the British and Dominion Governments and the Provincial Government of New Brunswick for the settlement of 500 families on improved farms in the Province of New Brunswick within a period of six years. Under this Scheme, the Provincial Government provides the farm and the British Government advances $1500 for stock and equipment. Repayment is made on a 25 year amortization basis with interest at 5 per centum per annum. The Dominion Government recruits and selects the families and co-operates with the Provincial Government in making adequate arrangements for reception and settlement. Families under this Scheme also participate in the Assisted Passage Agreement. Any loss of interest on the price of a farm during the first two years from the date of allotment as a result of the failure of a settler is shared as follows:-

Dominion Government	25%
Provincial "	25%
British "	50%

Losses on stock and equipment are shared as follows:-

British Government	50%
Dominion "	50%

Families Settled

Under the above Scheme 100 families were settled on improved farms in New Brunswick during 1928.

Nova Scotia.

On the 5th December 1927 another tripartite Agreement was made for the settlement of 500 families on improved farms in the Province of Nova Scotia within a period of six years. This Scheme is similar to the New Brunswick Land Settlement Scheme but is not yet in operation.

GENERAL LAND SETTLEMENT (Continued)

"1. The Committee having heard the evidence in connection with the experiment of the 5,000 Family Settlement Scheme, now almost completed, recommends that time be given to test this form of land settlement before embarking upon extended schemes of this character.

2. The Committee approves of the extension to other Provinces of the tripartite agreement with the British, Federal and Provincial Governments for the encouragement of Land Settlement by the British immigrant."

In accordance with the above Report, the Department has made no new Agreements.

Other Provincial Governments have been invited to participate in tripartite Agreements.

COTTAGES.

Lord Lovat, Chairman of the Oversea Settlement Committee who visited Canada during the summer of 1928, made proposals to the Department of Immigration, to Provincial Governments and other Organizations, to errect cottages for the use of British migrants while undergoing a course of training preparatory to settlement on farms.

During the month of October 1928 the Minister conferred with the Provincial Governments of the Western Provinces regarding immigration matters and advised them that the Department of Immigration had decided to participate with Provincial Governments in the erection of cottages for the training of British families, the cost of the erection of the cottage to be $1,000 and the cash contributions to be allocated as follows:-

the Provincial Government to administer the Scheme. The Ontario Government came to the conclusion that a suitable cottage could not be erected for $1000 and decided not to proceed with the Scheme this year. The Alberta Government also had the matter under consideration but no action was taken.

HOUSEHOLD WORKER TRAINEES.

Arrangements have also been made with the British Government for the training overseas of household workers for Canada. This arrangement does not mean that the Officials of the Department of Immigration will relax their efforts to obtain experienced household workers, but it means that a more vigorous effort is being made to supply the wide-spread demand in Canada for migrants of this class. Provincial Governments have been invited to participate in this work and the Department of Immigration has already received orders for the following trained houseworkers,-

Ontario	300
Saskatchewan	150
Alberta	200
Manitoba	50

Houseworkers are being trained at the following points:-

London,
Cardiff,
Newcastle,
Glasgow.

These training centres are under the control of what are known as "Migration Committees" composed of the Representatives of the Municipal Authorities, Local Education Committees, heads of local Churches, Farmers' Unions, Juvenile Advisory Committees, Representatives of Local Employers, British Government, Dominion Government, etc. The cost of training is defrayed by the British Government and for each trainee cash contributions are made as follows,-

Dominion Government	$15
Provincial "	$ 5.

THE TRAINEE MOVEMENT.

The term "trainee" is used to describe British single migrants coming to Canada, who before coming have been given some training or testing at training centres in the British Isles. The training scheme has been developed within the past five years and more particularly during the past two years. The principal training centres are at Claydon in Suffolk, Brandon in Norfolk, Chisledon in Wiltshire and Richhill in Northern Ireland. There are a number of smaller centres in Norfolk, Lanark and Glamorgan. There are in addition five centres at which men are given the short course training. Until the past year the men trained were between 19 and 25 years of age. The age in the past year has been extended to 35.

The Dominion Government has supplied an amount of Canadian equipment, including machinery for use at the training centres, this being our only contribution.

Prior to the beginning of this year, trainees were given approximately three months' training. This year a number have been sent to Canada with one month's training; these are called short course trainees.

In 1928 some 1400 trainees came to Canada and were all placed through Departmental machinery. At the beginning of the present calendar year, we agreed to take approximately 6,000 trainees during the 1929 season. Of these 4,600 were to be placed in Western Canada and 1,400 in Ontario. Of those proceeding to Western Canada, 3,000 were to be here by the middle of May and the remainder were to arrive in July. The Ontario movement was to continue each month between March and July. The arrival of trainees up to the end of May is 1,529 for Western Canada and 1,023 for Ontario.

BRITISH IMMIGRATION - ASSISTED PASSAGES AND REGULAR FARE.

Fiscal Year	Assisted Passage	Regular Fare	Total	Harvesters who Returned	Net.
1923-24	3639	69280	72919
1924-25	8558	44620	53178
1925-26	8442	29127	37569
1926-27	20248	30130	50378
1928-29	23575	35305	58880	- 6455	= 52,425.

The increase of approximately 150% of assisted migrants as between 1925-26 and 1926-27 was due to what is known as the £3 Ocean Rate which became effective on the 1st January 1926 and which was subsequently reduced to £2.

The above figures show that during the first three years covered by the Assisted Passage Agreement, the large majority of British migrants paid the regular fare of £18.15.0, and that during 1926-27 when the £3 rate was in effect, there was an increase of approximately 150% of assisted migrants and a corresponding reduction of those who paid the regular fare. During 1927-28 when the £2 rate was in effect, there was a still further increase of those who received the Assisted Passage, and a corresponding decrease of those who paid the regular fare.

N.B.- The total number of harvesters was 8,449. Of this number 6,455 returned. Of those returning 2,107 paid full fare, 1,816 paid part fare and the balance, 2,532, were given return passage at the expense of the British Government who also paid the balance of the fare of those who only paid part.

MEDICAL INSPECTION IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

The following is an extract from the Report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization regarding medical inspection overseas,-

> "The Department of Immigration and the Department of Health should, it is considered, make the most exhaustive efforts to see that the new system is perfected so as to eliminate, as far as possible, inconvenience, delay and expense to the prospective immigrant, and to dispel the idea that there is any intention, on the part of the Canadian Government, to restrict or hinder the coming to Canada of British subjects. For this purpose the committee recommends that the present system would be improved and that it would obviate delay and inconvenience to the prospective emigrant, especially those who reside in the rural districts of the British Isles if the examinations were made by British local doctors paid by, and under the supervision and control of, the Canadian medical authorities, who should be located at convenient centres of population."

After consulting with the Department of Health 464 Roster doctors were appointed especially in the rural districts of the British Isles. The Roster doctor medical fees are being paid jointly by the British and Dominion Governments.

The above arrangement is satisfactory to all the companies and organizations interested.

Medical inspection is made under the supervision and control of Canadian Medical Doctors who are located at convenient centres.

REDUCTION IN OCEAN RATES FOR BRITISH MIGRANTS.

The following is an extract from the Report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization,-

> "That measures be taken at an early date to arrange a conference between the Federal and British Governments and the Atlantic Steamship Companies with the object of obtaining a reduction in ocean rates to British immigrants to approximately £10."

After a series of conferences held in London, the Steamship Companies agreed to a general passage rate of £10 for British immigrants. This rate became effective on the 1st of January 1929. The following figures show the number of British migrants who have arrived during the first three months of 1929 covering the period during which the £10 has been in force, in comparison with the number of migrants who arrived during the same period in 1928,-

	1928.	1929.
January -	771	1,133
February -	1,002	1,691
March -	3,150	5,131

It will be noted that there has been a substantial increase under the £10 rate.

The following classes still receive the reduced ocean rate of £2,-

(1) Members of agricultural families over 19 years.

(2) Houseworkers over 17 years of age.

The following receive free passage grants,-

(1) Members of agricultural families who have not reached their 19th birthday prior to sailing when coming to agricultural work.

(2) Boys who have reached their fourteenth birthday and have not reached their nineteenth birthday prior to sailing when proceeding to Canada under the auspices of the Dominion Government, a Provincial Government or an approved Voluntary Society to earn their livelihood on the land.

(3) Girls who have reached their fourteenth birthday and have not reached their seventeenth birthday prior to sailing, provided they are coming to Canada under the auspices of the Dominion Government or of an approved Voluntary Society for house work.

CONTINENTAL ORGANIZATION.

Immigration Inspectors are located at the following points:-

Antwerp,
Danzig,
Hamburg,
Paris,
Riga,
Rotterdam.

Our Officers at the above ports examine immigrants in accordance with the provisions of the Immigration Act. Inspectors were stationed on the Continent of Europe for the purpose of reducing the number of rejections and deportations at Canadian ports.

Appeals.

Immigrants who are rejected by our Inspectors on the Continent of Europe have the right of appeal as provided by the Immigration Act. In order to expedite decisions Immigration Inspectors at Continental points submit the appeal to the Director of Emigration in London who has been authorized to decide appeals except in cases which require an investigation in Canada.

EUROPE - IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS.

The Regulations governing the entry to Canada of European immigrants may be summarized as follows:-

Northern European Countries:- France, Belgium,
Holland,
Switzerland,
Norway,
Sweden,
Denmark,
Finland,
Germany.

Immigrants from the above countries are eligible for entry to Canada provided that they

(a) Are in possession of valid passports;

(b) Can pass medical inspection; and

(c) Can maintain themselves until employment is secured.

Other European Countries covered by Railways Agreement:-

Austria,
Hungary,
Poland,
Roumania,
Lithuania,
Esthonia,
Latvia,
Bulgaria,
Jugo-Slavia,
Czecho-Slovakia.

The only immigrants who are admitted from the countries covered by the Railways' Agreement are:-

(a) Farmers;

(b) Farm labourers who have a reasonable assurance of employment on the land;

(c) Houseworkers;

(d) The wife or child under 18 years of age of any person legally admitted to and resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for his dependents.

(e) Persons who satisfy the Minister that their labour or service is required in Canada.

RAILWAYS AGREEMENT.

The Railways Agreement was made on the 1st September 1925 and renewed for a period of three years from the 1st October 1927 subject to certain modifications. The purpose of the Railways Agreement was to encourage the movement of agriculturists, agricultural workers and domestic servants from non-preferred countries and to expedite the selection and settlement of immigrants of the classes mentioned.

Our investigation showed that in the operation of the Railways Agreement many thousands of immigrants from countries under the Agreement drifted almost immediately upon arrival into non-agricultural work, including industrial employment, in centres of Eastern Canada, thus contributing to the displacement of Canadians. The Railway Companies admitted that many immigrants from the countries under the Railways Agreement drifted from the farm to other more lucrative occupations.

A survey was made of farm labour conditions in Western Canada. This survey was revised by Governments of the Prairie Provinces. As a result of the survey, the Department has now authorized the Railways to bring from the countries under the Agreement 30% of the so-called farm labourers who were brought forward last year. The "30%" is approximately 11,000. There is no limitation from Railway Agreement countries of the following classes:-

(a) Families coming for land settlement;

(b) Household workers;

(c) Relatives of persons who have been legally admitted under the Railways Agreement or otherwise.

The Railway Companies were also advised to exercise greater care in the selection of the type of immigrant likely to accept and remain at farm work. It was suggested to the Railway Companies that they should make a canvas of their requirements for maintenance and construction work and advise the Department at the earliest possible moment what proportion of this demand would have to be met by the importation of labour. It was also suggested to the Railway Companies that there were many men available in the British Isles accustomed to hard manual labour who might be secured and whose services might be utilized for this work.

The following statement shows the immigration from other countries, i.e., from countries other than the British Isles and the United States, during the past three years,-

UNITED STATES IMMIGRATION.

AGENCIES. The Department of Immigration maintains fifteen Agencies in the United States.

ADVERTISING. Advertisements were inserted in 58 agricultural and national papers, whose aggregate circulation is approximately 12,500,000. Arising mainly from this advertising, 30,084 inquiries were received in 1928-29 as compared with 27,533 during 1927-28, and 18,540 inquiries during 1926-27. At the end of the fiscal year 1928-29 there were 5,912 good prospects outstanding.

PUBLICITY. News and special articles are transmitted direct to agricultural and other United States papers by the Publicity Branch of the Department. The publicity report shows 139,972 lines, the space value of which is $67,819.05, covering a circulation of 106,704,024. Arrangements have been made for translating and distributing Canadian publicity matter in the Norwegian, Swedish and German languages, and a large amount of information dealing particularly with Canadian agricultural development has been published in papers of these languages mainly in the United States.

The following is a statement of Exhibition work in the United States,-

Fiscal Year	Exhibitions	Prospects Established

The aggregate attendance at the 71 Fairs during 1928-29 was approximately 3,100,000 persons.

The first column in the following statement shows the number of immigrants who have come to Canada from the United States, and the second column shows the number of Canadians who have returned from the United States, during the last five years.

30% LIMITATION PLACED ON THE MOVEMENT OF FARM LABOURERS FROM THE RAILWAYS AREA.

The limitation was decided upon after a survey of the probable demand for Continental farm labour in Western Canada during the 1929 season. The matter was discussed fully with representatives of the C.P.R. and C.N.R. at a conference held in Ottawa on the 26th December, 1928, and in a letter dated the 2nd January, 1929, the Railway Companies were instructed that the movement of the farm labour class from the Railways Area must be limited this year to 30% of the total movement of the same class during 1928, and further that the 30% was to be brought before the 31st May, 1929.

On the 9th January a Montreal paper carried a despatch purporting to give an outline of the instructions contained in departmental letter of the 2nd January. The statement issued to the Press on the 11th January was the letter of the 2nd January with an introductory paragraph.

The Department's publication of the letter resulted in the issue of a lengthy statement by the Presidents of the two Railway Companies under date of the 24th January. The Department prepared a reply to this which, however, was not published.

The following memorandum was prepared on the 6th February, 1929, dealing with the limitation:-

"1. What the limitation is.

The Colonization Departments of the C.N.R. and C.P.R. were notified by departmental letter of the 2nd ultimo, to reduce to 30% of last year's total, the movement of farm labourers coming to Canada under the Railways' Agreement from the Railways' area of Europe, and to bring the 30% before the 31st May in order to be in time for Spring placement. The farm labourer movement of 1928 was approximately 36,000 men, hence the number to be brought for Spring placement will be between ten and twelve thousand, practically all destined to the Prairie Provinces.

The Railways' area, otherwise known as non-preferred countries, include Russia, Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Danzig, Poland, Austria, Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia, Jugo-Slavia and Roumania.

2. What the limitation does not mean.

It has no reference to the immigration of any class from the British Isles, the United States, France, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Germany and Scandinavian countries. It does not restrict nor limit in any way the immigration from the Railways' area of,-

(a) Agricultural families coming for land settlement.
(b) Women coming for domestic service.
(c) Wives and families or other relatives admissible under the Immigration regulations.

3. What is the Railways' Agreement.

It is an Agreement entered into between the Department of Immigration and Colonization and the two Railway Companies in September, 1925, under which the Railways were authorized to bring to Canada, agricultural families for land settlement, women for domestic service and labourers for farm work. These classes only were to be moved from the countries named in No. 1 above. The Agreement was renewed in October, 1927 for three years, subject to cancellation by any party on a year's notice and subject also to suspension (temporary or otherwise) by the Minister, if conditions required such action - suspension to be after consultation with the Railways.

4. What conditions lead up to the limitation imposed by the Department?

The action taken by the Department grew out of certain Recommendations of the Parliamentary Committee of last Session, which Recommendations were approved by Parliament. The Committee did not favour the Railways' Agreement and recommended against its renewal in its present form. The Committee stressed Federal-Provincial co-operation. The following paragraphs quoted from the Departmental letter of the 2nd ultimo to the Railways, indicate clearly what lead up to Departmental action:-

"Unquestionably there is a very strong feeling against the unduly large proportion of foreign as compared with British immigrants shown in the Immigration statistics of the past few years. The movement under the Railways' Agreement is very largely responsible for bringing about this condition. The Agreement itself was intended to encourage a movement only of the agricultural class, but after three years' experience it has become evident that out of the total arrivals, probably not more than 30% have made aby real effort to remain on the land. It is unnecessary that I more than mention this in passing as the representatives of both Railways emphasized the drift from the farm to other more lucrative occupations.

"You will recall that one of the Recommendations made by the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization was that there should be closer co-operation between the Federal Government and the Provincial Governments, both in regard to farm placement and land settlement. Having this Recommendation in mind the Provinces were approached some time ago regarding plans to increase British immigration and during the discussions it became evident that several Provinces held the view that it is impossible to deal satisfactorily with British immigration until a complete understanding was reached regarding immigration from Central Europe. After describing conditions arising out of the large Continental movement of the past three years, the Provinces stated emphatically that the Federal Government should immediately undertake a survey of the whole farm labour requirements. The Minister promised that this would be done and that the results would be communicated to the Provincial Governments for the concurrence or

W.L. Mackenzie King Papers
Memoranda & Notes

ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

"revision. So far as Ontario is concerned the Provincial Government undertook to make their own survey.

"We have already discussed with you the results of this survey and the fact that the Province of Alberta has definitely stated that while they are anxious to secure a supply of British farm labour and also a supply from preferred countries, they already have in the Province, all the non-preferred country immigrants they require for farm work this year. In view of this situation we will endeavour to carry out Alberta's wishes and the Province is being so advised. Our investigations show that during the period of the Railways' Agreement, many thousands of non-preferred country immigrants drifted almost immediately upon arrival into non-agricultural work including industrial employment, in centres of Eastern Canada, thus contributing to the displacement of Canadians and otherwise filling positions that might have been filled by immigrants from the Mother Country. The survey shows conclusively that the movement of farm labour required this year from the non-preferred countries, is less than one-third of the total movement of last year.

"In view of the above it has been decided that between now and the 31st May next the movement under the Railways' Agreement shall be reduced to not more than 30% of the farm labourers moved by each Company during last calendar year, and since the farmers of Canada are in no way benefitted by a movement of people under the guise of agriculturists who do not follow that occupation in Canada, it is essential that in this year's immigration from non-preferred countries, the transportation companies shall give much greater care to the selection of the type of immigrant likely to accept and remain at farm work. It is to be understood that the limitation of this paragraph does not apply in any way to domestic servants, agricultural families with capital coming for land settlement or to wives and children joining the head of a family already settled in Canada."

5. Why was publicity given by the Department to the limitation imposed upon the Railways, which publicity has resulted in a statement issued to the Press by the Railway Presidents?

The Department published on the 11th ultimo, the text of its letter of the 2nd ultimo to the Railways in order to counteract a newspaper despatch sent out from Montreal on the 9th ultimo in which the following incorrect and mischievous comment was embodied:-

> "Alberta has informed the Federal Government that it has all the settlers it wants from non-preferred European countries and that it is quite willing to take a considerable number of British farm labourers. It is pointed out that seven or eight constituencies in Alberta have approximately 90% foreign born voters. This policy of the Alberta Government and the Federal Government will come in for criticisms when Parliament meets, it is predicted."

The controversy was, therefore, forced upon the Department. Alberta made no such representations as are stated.

6. Are there representations in the statement issued by the Railway Presidents on the 24th ultimo, requiring correction or criticism?

The following should be corrected:-

(a) The Railways' statement quoted the total movement under the Railways' Agreement for 1926-27-28 as 110,795. The correct number is 123,719.

W.L. Mackenzie King Papers
Memoranda & Notes

PUBLIC ARCHIVES
ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

(b) The Railways' statement represented that while the Department has criticised the Railways for moving many thousands of people as farm labourers who did not remain on the land, the Department during the three year period, admitted from the Railways' area, under special Government Permit, 24,806 non-agricultural immigrants, these being unable to comply with the regulations. This statement is quite erroneous. The bulk of the 24,806 immigrants is made up of wives and children admitted to join husbands and fathers who were brought to Canada in advance of their dependents by the Railway Companies under the Railways' Agreement for farm work, but who on applying for the admission of their dependents were found in industrial and other non-agricultural employment, mainly in Eastern Canada. The Department has admitted several thousand dependents of this sort and in not more than 1% of the cases have the heads of the families, resident in Eastern Canada, been found engaged in agricultural work,,though in almost every case the heads of the families were originally destined to Western Canada to be placed on farms. The Immigration regulations provide for the admission of wives and children and certain other relatives, hence the so-called special Permits were mainly Departmental letters issued to facilitate the movement of wives, children and other relatives admissible under the law.

(c) The Railways' statement says that the experience of the Railway Companies shows conclusively that men brought here for agricultural employment and who have left it to take industrial work, return to settlement on the land when they have acquired sufficient capital. The Department has equal if not better facilities for observing this movement if it exists. The Department's experience is that the movement is almost wholly the other way.

(d) The Railways' statement represents that before the advent of the Railways' Agreement it was difficult to secure a movement of agricultural labourers and agricultural families. Departmental records show that prior to the Railways' Agreement every embarkation port in Europe was swarming with immigrants (largely of the same class as those who have come to Canada under the guise of farm workers and have almost immediately taken non-agricultural employment) seeking entry to Canada for non-agricultural work and that these were moving because of unemployment and other post war conditions in Europe. There has always been a difficulty in securing agricultural families with capital for land settlement. There is not now nor has there been in the past, any limitation of this class.

(e) The Railways' statement suggests that in placing a limitation upon a movement of labour, the Minister has in some way ignored the terms of the Railways' Agreement. When the Agreement was renewed in October, 1927, the first clause of the renewal stipulated that the Minister reserved the absolute right to suspend the Agreement if conditions called for that. The Railway Companies were consulted on the 26th December and the officials present assured the Minister that whatever limitation he decided upon would be loyally carried out by the Companies.

7. Does the limitation still allow for the movement of as large a supply of farm labour from Central Europe as at any time since the war, but prior to the Railways' Agreement? Yes, it provides for

W.L. Mackenzie King Papers
Memoranda & Notes

PUBLIC ARCHIVES
ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

a movement larger than came to Canada prior to the Railways' Agreement and also larger than every estimate of need in Canada - except the estimate of the transportation companies. The majority of those brought in 1926-27-28 did not make any effort to stay on the land and the limitation means that the movement in future will bear a direct relation to the demand in Canada and thus fulfill the original purpose of the Agreement.

8. Will the action taken by the Department in limiting the movement of labour from Central Europe, have any probable effect in increasing immigration from the British Isles and preferred countries?

This is the Department's desire and expectation, especially if the Railway Companies can find employment for workers from the British Isles. The new flat rate of £10. for British migrants is expected to materially assist in an increased movement from that country.

9. Is there reason to believe that slowing down the labour movement from Central Europe, will result in our being unable to get that labour later if wanted?

None whatever. The Department receives frequent appeals to open the door wider so that more may come. The pressure of conditions in Europe coupled with the pull of relatives and friends in Canada, is ample assurance that the labour movement can be increased by the simple expedient of opening the door. The movement of the class now limited was suddenly suspended in May, 1927, but without any harmful effect when the suspension was lifted.

10. What provision has been made for relief if the present restriction does not allow the movement of sufficient general labour to meet the demands in Canada?

The Railways Agreement was never intended to meet the demand in Canada for general labour and it is a misuse of the Agreement to so apply it. The fear expressed by the Railway Companies of a shortage of general labour as a result of the limitation of the movement under the Railways' Agreement, is virtually an admission that the Agreement has been used for or has resulted in a movement of a class of immigration that was never intended when the Agreement was made.

The immigration regulations empower the Minister to admit any labour from any country that may be required in Canada. If as the season advances it is found that any class of labour from Central Europe is required in excess of those coming in, the additional supply can be secured without difficulty."

A very useful review of the movement from Canada to the United States and from the United States to Canada, was prepared some months ago by Mr. H. H. Wrong of the Canadian Legation, Washington, from which the following extracts are quoted:-

> "The United States Immigration Service does not classify immigrants by the countries of their allegiance and it is not therefore possible to arrive at a figure for the emigration of Canadian citizen. It employs three different systems of classification which are valuable in estimating the nature of the movement of population. These are:(1) Classification by country of last permanent residence which is defined as being the country in which the immigrant has lived for one year before moving to the United States; (2) Classification by country of birth which appears to have been recorded only since the passage of the Quota Act of 1924; and (3) Classification of immigration from each country sub-divided according to race or people of origin. In compiling statistics of racial origin, "Canadian" is not considered as a race of people and immigrants from Canada are classified as English, Scottish, French, etc.; it is thus possible to determine fairly accurately the racial composition of emigration from Canada. By employing these classifications one can construct the following tables:

"Table A.

Emigration to the United States from Canada since 1920 of persons who had lived in Canada for at least one year.

The figures from 1920 to 1924 include Newfoundland and those since 1924 relate to Canada alone. The statistics since 1924 are probably more nearly accurate than those for earlier years in view of the increasing care necessitated by the Quota Act. The figure for 1928 includes a large number of persons - from 10% to 20% of the total - who still remain domiciled in Canadian border cities, but have been admitted as immigrants to the United States in accordance with the requirements of General Order Number 86 of the United States Department of Labor. All figures are for the United States fiscal year ending on June 30th of the year named.

Emigration to the United States of native born Canadians since July 1st, 1924.

This Table is specially interesting because of its relation to the operation of the Quota Act, since the movement to the United States of native born Canadians is without numerical limitation, whereas other Canadian residents are subject to the quota restrictions of the country of their birth. The decline in the annual movement since 1924 is therefore specially significant, since it shows that fewer native born Canadians each year are leaving Canada in spite of the drastic limitation of European immigration. In this Table also a considerable proportion of the total for 1928 is due to the special conditions created by General Order No. 86.

"Table C.

Emigration to the United States since 1924 of residents of Canada born abroad.

These figures are the difference between Table A. and Table B. The increase since 1924 is probably due to the fact that many residents in Canada who were born abroad, and who wished to move to the United States soon after the passage of the Quota Act, could not secure quota visas for two or three years because of the heavy demand. Again the total for 1928 is artificially swollen.

Emigration from Canada to the United States since 1921 by racial origin.

This Table divides the figures given in Table A. into the three main classes of British, French and others. Its chief value is to show the amount of French-Canadian emigration from Canada. The Table is a simplification of the United States figures which go into great detail and are sub-divided into forty different racial headings. The heading "British" in this Table includes Irish, as well as English, Scottish and Welsh. The heading "other races" is made up almost entirely of persons of Continental European origin, except for a small number (196 in 1928) of African, Asiatic or Spanish-American descent. The figures before 1925 include Newfoundland.

The balance since 1920 considering figures of immigration and emigration alone.

The most obvious way to strike a balance is to deduct from the figures of emigration to the United States given in Table A. the number of persons who have emigrated from the United States to Canada according to the figures of the Canadian Department of Immigration. The figures are not exactly comparable since the Canadian totals are for the fiscal year ending on March 31st, of the year named and the United States totals go down to June 30th of this year; that is, however, of slight importance. Newfoundland is included in the United States figures before 1925:

Year.	Migrated to United States from Canada.	Migrated from United States to Canada.	Net loss to Canada.
1920	90,025	49,656	40,469

"Table F.

The balance since 1924 taking into account "returning Canadians" as well as immigrants to Canada.

The figures in Table E. afford the only statistical basis of comparison which seems to exist before 1925. A balance which is more favourable to Canada can be struck if we employ additional statistics which are available for 1925 and subsequent years. Since April, 1924 the Canadian Department of Immigration has kept records of the number of "returning Canadians" who had left Canada toreside permanently in the United States, and who later returned to resume their domicile in Canada. This total includes the three classes of native born Canadians, British subjects who had acquired Canadian domicile and naturalized Canadian citizens. The table below uses the same figures employed in Table E. with the addition of this class of migrant. It should be mentioned that no comparable United States figure exists and there is presumably a small movement of United States citizens returning from Canada to the United States; this movement, however, is certainly much smaller than the movement in the other direction:

Year.	Migrated to United States from Canada.	Migrated from United States to Canada.	Returning Canadians.	Net loss to Canada.
1926	91,019	18,778	47,221	26,020
1927	81,506	21,025	56,957	3,524
1928	73,154	25,007	39,887	8,260

"Table G.

The balance since 1924 taking into account only native born Canadians who have emigrated to the United States on one side and immigrants and returning Canadians on the other.

A figure yet more favourable to Canada can be reached by using the figures in Table B of emigration of Canadian born. The result, however, is not nearly so fair an estimate of the movement of population as that which is shown in Table F. It serves only to demonstrate that Canada is now getting back from the United States a greater number of people of all classes than the number of Canadian born who are being lost. This table has a bearing on the proposal to establish a quota against Canada; and the Secretary of State used these figures before the Senate Committee on Immigration on March 5th, 1928 in opposition to a Bill proposing such a quota:

Year.	Canadian born emigrated to United States.	Immigrants from United States.	Returning Canadians.	Loss (-) Gain (plus) to Canada.
1926	82,462	18,778	47,221	- 16,463

"It may be of interest to draw some general conclusions from the figures which have been set forth above.

1. Emigration from Canada to the United States has rapidly declined from the maximum point which was reached in 1924. The figure for 1928 is only 36⅔% of the figure for 1924. The total for 1928 is almost the same as the total for 1913.

2. The emigration of native born Canadians has declined still more rapidly than the general figure. The emigration of Canadian residents who originally came to Canada as immigrants has increased considerably since 1924, probably because of the effect of the Quota Act of 1924 which, for a time after its passage, largely prevented the movement from Canada to the United States of any but native born Canadians.

3. All the United States figures of immigration from Canada for 1928 are swollen by the addition of several thousand persons who, in Canadian eyes, still remain in Canada since they retain their domicile in various Canadian border communities; they are treated however as immigrants to the United States under General Order No. 86 of the Department of Labor.

4. The emigration from Canada of French Canadians has declined since 1924 in about the same proportion as the general decline. During the last four years French-Canadian emigration has been about 20% of the total movement. This shows that the loss of French Canadians to the United States is proportionately less than the loss of all other classes of residents in Canada, since persons of French origin constituted nearly 28% of the population of Canada at the census of 1921.

5. Immigration to Canada from the United States has slowly increased since 1924, but the total for 1928 is still far below that for any of the years from 1902 to 1921. The decline in the balance against Canada since 1924 has been almost entirely caused by the reduction of emigration and not by the increase of immigration.

6. Taking into account the number of Canadians who have permanently returned from the United States during the last two years, loss and gain almost cancel out. The net loss to Canada in 1928 of 8,260 persons can be entirely discounted as having been caused by the provisions of General Order No. 86."

In dealing with the exodus it is well to remember the following:-

(1) That the movement is not new. The Canadian born resident in the United States, in the U.S. Census years indicated, was as follows:-

1870.....493,464
1880.....717,157
1890.....980,938
1900.....1,179,922
1920.....1,124,925

It will be observed that the 1920 figures show an actual decrease of almost 80,000 while all the other Census periods mentioned show an increase. Between 1910 and 1920 the U.S. Immigration returns reported a migration from Canada to the United States of almost three-quarters of a million, not all of which, however, would be Canadian born.

(2) Part of the movement is not permanent. The returning Canadians are an evidence of this, the figures being:-

1927.....56,957
1928.....39,887

(3) The U.S. figures show an important and steady decline in the exodus from Canada. If we keep on making progress at the rate of the past five years, the exodus will soon disappear altogether.

BRITISH HARVESTER MOVEMENT, 1928.

Reported detention of harvesters in Winnipeg.

The idea of a British harvester movement to Canada last season originated in the British Isles. As early as May, 1928 the Hon. Wm. Lunn, M.P. an ex-Chairman of the Oversea Settlement Committee, made a public appeal regarding the unemployed and in this appeal said,-

> "Why not an arrangement between the Dominion and Home Governments and all the parties most likely to help for 10,000 Britishers to be provided with work during the coming harvest in Canada?"

On the 27th June Lord Lovat cabled stating that subject to concurrence of the Department of Immigration, he proposed to get into touch with the Steamship Companies in order to ascertain what special rates they were prepared to offer for a harvester movement this year. Lord Lovat inquired whether any estimate had yet been formed as to the supply of labour that would likely be required.

A reply was sent on the 28th June stating that there was not much prospect that a harvester movement would be needed.

On the 19th July advice was received of the labour estimate for the Western harvest and this showed a probable demand of 44,000 from Eastern Canada and the United States. As this number was considerably larger than the annual movement from Eastern Canada and the United States it was agreed that 10,000 British harvesters could obtain harvest employment and that the movement would be approved provided proper safeguards were adopted in, (a) the selection of the right type; (b) an arrangement for placing them in winter employment; and, (c) a special low rate for those who desired to return.

On the 2nd August the Deputy Minister of Immigration sent the following wire to the Premiers of the Prairie Provinces:-

> "Winnipeg Conference disclosed shortage ten thousand harvesters after estimating all other sources supply. British Government have been in communication with Department to furnish up to ten thousand men. Department replied temporary work available this number men accustomed hard manual labour but to avoid hardship insisted Railway Companies must guarantee winter farm employment and special reduced rate to those desiring return. Railways refused guarantee winter farm employment but offered full co-operation. British Government and Railways have undertaken arrange return of those not placed winter employment. Please wire your opinion regarding movement ten thousand British harvesters stating whether you consider we should still insist on Railways guaranteeing winter farm employment we co-operating or approve movement on guarantee of British Government and Railways to arrange return men who cannot obtain winter farm employment. Urgent."

To the above the following replies were received:-

MANITOBA.

"Wire of second August received will willingly co-operate with other Governments and Railways to find winter farm employment for harvesters but in our opinion there is little chance of ten thousand men being so employed. Former experience in Manitoba and particularly in City of Winnipeg indicates particular need to require British Government and Railways to guarantee not only return of men unable to obtain winter farm employment but also to arrange for their maintenance while awaiting return."

SASKATCHEWAN.

"Your wire second re harvest labour. Our opinion is that ten thousand Britishers capable and willing to do harvesting can be placed in harvest fields. We will co-operate to fullest possible extent in securing winter farm employment but of opinion all such men cannot be so placed therefore believe essential arrangements be made providing for return of all men failing to obtain winter farm employment."

ALBERTA.

"Absence from city delayed replying your wire second. From our experience believe quite impossible Railways or other organizations to guarantee winter employment this Province to any substantial number. We still feel every effort should be made to recruit help from Eastern Canada and United States as stated my previous communication. If arrangements made bring men from England agree that satisfactory guarantee should be obtained to return men and suggest some form registration as aid to checking over possible applications for relief."

On the 3rd August the following cable was sent to Lord Lovat laying down the final conditions under which the harvester movement might take place:-

"Your cable 31st Manitoba and Saskatchewan Governments state ten thousand men can be placed in harvest fields but add there is little chance of finding winter employment for number mentioned. Both Governments emphasize necessity your Government and Railways guarantee not only return men unable obtain such employment but declare provision should be made for maintenance when necessary pending return. Both Governments substantially confirm our original condition of employment guarantee by Railways. If you are unable obtain this guarantee then movement may proceed under following conditions:-

"First, that responsibility for movement must rest entirely on your Government and Railways.

"Second, that responsibility for harvest and winter farm placement must rest with Railways eliminating original absolute guarantee Department and Provincial Governments giving full co-operation winter farm placement.

"Third, that your Government and Railways undertake return all men short of funds who cannot obtain winter farm employment, misfits and those who cannot pay fare but desire return.

"Fourth, only men accustomed hard manual labour be recruited.

"Fifth, that you take every precaution prevent misrepresentation regarding wages and prospects in advertising propaganda.

"If you agree these conditions proceed with movement but no sailings after eighteenth instant. Advise Walker and reply."

On the 7th August the Director of Emigration for Canada in London cabled the following acceptance by the transportation companies of the conditions above set out:-

"Shipping Companies and Railways at conference British Board Trade Saturday decided five points your cable third August acceptable to them. Macnaghten informs me companies have agreed accept full responsibility conditions set out under five points your cable third. Ministry Labour and Railways and Steamship Companies advertising movement by prominent posters. Volume applicants constantly increasing. Quality applicants accepted reported excellent. Misfits, undesirables, those unable obtain winter work, those refusing same, return Overseas expense, with cheap rate for those who work harvest and subsequently desire return."

The movement totalled 8,449; the special rate for return was $30.00 from Winnipeg. The Dominion Government did not contribute in any way to passage assistance either to Canada or from Canada. 6,455 harvesters returned, of these 2,107 paid their own way home and an additional 1,816 paid full fare. The balance 2,532 were returned free under the arrangement between the British Government and the transportation companies.

There has been much discussion in the Press and elsewhere over the supposed detention at Winnipeg of a number of harvesters about to return to their former homes. The following memorandum dated the 13th February, 1929 was supplied to the Minister by the Department:-

"There appears in the Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day, for today, a question by Mr. Woodsworth as follows:-

"By whose authority and under what legislation did the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Winnipeg on September 5, 1928 (a) prevent British harvesters from leaving the waiting room of the Canadian National Railways; (b) seek to prevent a Member of the British House of Commons from entering said waiting room?"

"The State Department has queried the Department of Justice (under whom the Royal Canadian Mounted Police operate) and this Department and the reply will, therefore, have to be tabled by the State Department. As the question is one altogether pertaining to the actions of the Mounted Police, there would appear to be no necessity for this Department making any reply.

"For your information I am giving you below, in brief form, the particulars which we have on file with regard to the question referred to. Division Commissioner Gelley under date of September 14th last reported that on September 4th after the steamship companies and the railways had decided to make arrangements to return the British harvesters then in the City of Winnipeg, each railway made arrangements to have the men report at their respective stations. The Canadian National men were required to report at the second-class waiting room, Canadian National Depot, at four o'clock in the afternoon, where they were registered, signing a statement as to their name, particulars of their arrival, and were further required to show their papers establishing that they were British harvesters. They were given a ticket good from Winnipeg to a port of landing in the British Isles. The men were given food at about six o'clock and provided with hampers for the journey. During the procedure and in view of the number of outside people that were continuously going into the waiting room and some of the harvesters wanting to go out, the railway officials closed the gates and allowed no one either to enter or leave. Shortly before the harvesters' train was due to leave, the British Parliamentary Party, then visiting in Winnipeg, arrived at the station and some of the members proceeding to the second class waiting room to interview the harvesters were at first refused admission, but upon making themselves known they were allowed access to the harvesters with whom they were at liberty to mingle at will.

"At a meeting of the Labour Members of the British Parliamentary Party at the Fort Garry Hotel that evening, complaints were made about the alleged treatment of the harvesters. The Division Commissioner was present on request and went fully into the situation, explaining that the British harvesters were not in any way forced to return to the British Isles but were returning on their own request and further that they had been treated with all courtesy and in the best manner possible. The following day at a luncheon given the Parliamentary Party at the St. Charles Country Club by the Board of Trade, Mr. Thomas Johnson, M.P. for Dundee, in a speech complained of the accommodation in the Immigration Hall and also referred to the men as being kept in a cage, there being an armed soldier and two policemen at the door. The Division Commissioner in his report states that shortly after Mr. Johnson's speech several members of the party on proceeding to the Immigration Hall were shown through it and they expressed great satisfaction at what they saw. Mr. Gelley adds that Mr. Johnson has since denied that he made the statements referred to and is satisfied there is no ground for complaint.

"With regard to the question asked by Mr. Woodsworth, this Department is in no way responsible for the presence of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the Canadian National waiting room at Winnipeg on December 5, 1928. We have information on the Departmental file which shows that the officers were placed there at the request of the Superintendent of Investigation, Canadian National Railways Police.

RECOMMENDATIONS IN THE REPORT OF THE SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION.

The recommendations of the Committee are covered by the general memorandum but for the purpose of convenience the action taken on each recommendation is set out in consecative form in this memorandum.

1."Federal Responsibility.

> In the opinion of the Committee the responsibility and control of the selection of immigrants, no matter by whom recruited must rest solely and exclusively with the Government of Canada."

The Railway Companies and other voluntary organizations have at various times pressed for the right of selection. The above Resolution has, therefore, fortified the Department in former decisions to retain control of the selection of immigrants no matter by whom recruited.

2. "Provincial Co-operation.

> The Committee recommends that special efforts be now made to extend the field of activity of the Provincial Authorities particularly in the matter of placement, settlement and supervision of immigrants, and that, with this in view, the Federal Government consider contributing to defray the cost of Provincial co-operation for that purpose."

During the month of October 1928, the Minister conferred with the Provincial Governments of the Western Provinces regarding immigration matters and invited their participation in the work of British nomination, the reception and distribution of British boys, the Boys Land Settlement Scheme and the settlement of Canadian boys. As a result of the Minister's conference with the Western Provinces, Manitoba agreed to participate in the Boys Land Settlement Scheme. Saskatchewan agreed to participate in the reception and distributing farm and all the Provinces agreed to co-operate as far as possible in placement work. As a matter of fact the Province of Ontario agreed to control placement and the Department is co-operating closely with the Provincial Government.

3. "Medical Examination.

> ..... The Department of Immigration and the Department of Health should, it is considered, make the most exhaustive efforts to see that the new system is perfected so as to eliminate, as far as possible, inconvenience, delay and expense to the prospective immigrant, and to dispel the idea that there is any intention, on the part of the Canadian government, to restrict or hinder the coming to Canada of British subjects. For this purpose the committee recommends that the present system would be improved and that it would obviate delay and inconvenience to the prospective emigrant, especially those who reside in the rural districts of the British Isles if the examnations were made by British local doctors paid by, and under the supervision and control of, the Canadian medical authorities, who should be located at convenient centres of population."

Officials of the Department of Immigration and the Department of Health made a thorough investigation into the system of medical inspection, and, acting on the general instructions of the Committee, 460 roster doctors were appointed especially in the rural districts of the British Isles for the purpose of obviating inconvenience and delay to the prospective immigrants. The roster doctor medical fees are being paid jointly by the British and Dominion Governments. This arrangement is satisfactory to all the companies and organizations interested.

Medical inspection is made under the supervision and control of Canadian medical doctors who are located at convenient centres.

SPECIAL PASSAGE RATES FOR BRITISH SETTLERS.

1. "'Teen Age.

The Committee approves of all previous efforts to promote and encourage 'teen age immigration from Great Britain and recommends that the age limit for boy immigrants be extended to boys 14 to 19 years of age, both inclusive."

The new Assisted Passage Agreement provides that the age limit for boy immigrants be extended to boys 14 to 19 years of age, both inclusive.

2. "Domestics.

That the arrangements now in effect for the movement of domestics from the United Kingdom to Canada be continued."

The new Agreement provides for a continuation of the reduced ocean passage rate of £2 for household workers.

Arrangements have also been made with the British Government for the training overseas of household workers for Canada. This arrangement does not mean that the Officials of the Department of Immigration will relax their efforts to obtain experienced household workers, but it means that a more vigorous effort is being made to supply the wide-spread demand in Canada for migrants of this class. Provincial Governments have been invited to participate in this work and the Department of Immigration has already received orders for the following trained houseworkers,-

Ontario	300
Saskatchewan ...	150
Alberta	200
Manitoba	50

Houseworkers are being trained at the following points,-

London,
Cardiff,
Newcastle,
Glasgow.

These training centres are under the control of what are known as "migration Committees" composed of the Representatives of the Municpal Authorities, Local Education Committees, heads of local Churches, Farmers' Unions, Juvenile Advisory Committees, Representatives of Local Employers, British Government, Dominion Government, etc. The cost of training is defrayed by the British Government and for each trainee cash contributions are made as follows,-

Dominion Government ..... $15.
Provincial " ..... $ 5.

3. "Family Re-union.

That measures be taken to extend the assisted passage privileges to the families of immigrants from Great Britain who are now in Canada and who have so far established themselves as to have a reasonable prospect of being able to support their families in this country."

An Agreement was made in accordance with the Committee's recommendation. The Assisted Passage privileges for the re-union of families has now been embodied in the Assisted Passage Agreement for 1929. The privileges may be summarized as follows,-

Assistance is given towards the cost of transportation of

(a) Wives;

(b) Children who have not reached their seventeenth birthday prior to sailing of settlers from Great Britain or Northern Ireland who arrived in Canada prior to the 6th day of June, 1928, and who in the opinion of the Dominion Government have so far established themselves as to have a reasonable prospect of being able to support their families in Canada.

A wife eligible for assistance under this Scheme receives a £3 ocean rate and children under 17 receive free transportation.

4. "Reduction in Ocean Rates for all British Immigrants.

That measures be taken at an early date to arrange a conference between the Federal and British Governments and the Atlantic Steamship Companies with the object of obtaining a reduction in ocean rates to British immigrants to approximately £10."

After a series of conferences held in London, the Steamship Companies agreed to a general passage rate of £10 for British immigrants. This rate became effective on the 1st of January 1929. The following figures show the number of British migrants who have arrived during the first three months of 1929 covering the period during which the £10 rate has been in force, in comparison with the number of migrants who arrived during the same period in 1928,-

January -	771	1,133
February -	1,002	1,691
March -	3,150	5,131

There has been a substantial increase, it will be noted, under the £10 rate.

The following dasses still receive the reduced ocean rate of £2.,-

(1) Members of agricultural families over 19 years.

(2) Houseworkers over 17 years of age.

The following receive free passage grants,-

(1) Members of agricultural families who have not reached their 19th birthday prior to sailing when coming to agricultural work.

(2) Boys who have reached their fourteenth birthday and have not reached their nineteenth birthday prior to sailing when proceeding to Canada under the auspices of the Dominion Government, a Provincial Government or an approved Voluntary Society to earn their livelihood on the land.

RAILWAY RATES FOR CANADIAN LANDSEEKERS.

" "The Committee also recommends that measures be taken to ascertain whether the railways will restore the Home Seekers rates in effect prior to the war, making such rates effective East bound as well as West bound."

Pursuant to the above recommendation, the Department wrote to the Presidents of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific Railways. The following reply was received,-

HOME SEEKERS EXCURSION FARES FROM EASTERN CANADA TO PRAIRIE PROVINCES AND RETURN.

W. J. Egan, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Immigration and Colonization, Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:-

Referring to your letter of July 7th addressed to the Presidents of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways quoting an extract from report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization advocating the restoration of Home Seekers' rates in effect prior to the war, making such rates effective Eastbound as well as Westbound.

As this is a matter that affects all Canadian Railways to a more or less extent, it has been referred to the Canadian Passenger Association for consideration and reply.

Specially low fares for Home Seekers from Eastern to Western Canada were inaugurated, as you will probably recollect, many years ago when it was difficult to secure settlers for the Prairie Provinces and it was necessary from a national standpoint to encourage the movement in every way possible. At that time there was very little business and commercial travel between the East and West.

As the settlement of the Western Provinces progressed, business and commercial travel gradually developed and the Home Seekers' travel from Eastern Canada steadily decreased. As the legitimate use of the fare gradually diminished, the Railways in order to protect their interests against the advantage being taken of the fare by business and commercial travel gradually raised the charge.

The increase in Home Seekers' fares has not been detrimental insofar as settlement of the West is concerned, inasmuch as the exceptionally low Harvest Help fares authorized each year meet the requirements of the actual land seeker from Eastern Canada far better than the Home Seekers' excursion fares, which is evidenced by the fact that for a number of years the majority of those in Eastern Canada who deisred to settle on the land in the West took advantage of these special Harvest Help fares. This gives them the advantage of working for farmers in the West and earning more than enough to pay their passage fares both ways, and those who decide to settle in the Western Provinces arrange to move their families at the time of the next Harvest excursion, when they have their buildings and home under way and ready to receive them.

Further, we are of the opinion that present conditions in Canada are such as to make it inadvisable to unduly encourage removal of individuals and families from one province to another. All provinces have vacant land and are anxiously endeavouring to not only hold their present population but to secure new settlers. Certain of the provinces have even felt the drain caused by the harvesters excursions and have made protest against the arrangements. Our records indicate that from fifteen to twenty percent of the harvesters who go West each year do not return to the East and that the majority of those who do not return actually settle on the land.

After very careful consideration the Railways are strongly of the opinion that it would not be in the general interest to make any reduction in the present so-called "Homeseekers" Fares".

Yours truly,

(sgd) C.P. RIDDELL

Chairman."

LAND SETTLEMENT.

1. "The committee having heard the evidence in connection with the experiment of the 3,000 Family Settlement Scheme, now almost completed, recommends that time be given to test this form of land settlement before embarking upon extended schemes of this character.

In accordance with the above recommendation, the Department has made no new land settlement agreements.

2. "The Committee approves of the extension to other provinces of the tripartite agreement with the British, Federal and Provincial governments for the encouragement of Land Settlement by the British immigrant."

ProvincialGovernments have been invited to participate in tripartite Agreements for the encouragement of land settlement by the British immigrant but so far Agreements have been signed only by the Provincial Governments of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

3. "The Committee recommends, subject to the completion of satisfactory arrangements with governments of the provinces, that assistance equal to that given by the British government to British emigrant boys be extended by the government of Canada to the Canadian youth who are trained in agriculture."

The following draft proposals were submitted to Provincial Governments regarding the settlement of Canadian boys,-

1. That (a) the applicant be in possession of ..... $ 500
(b) the Provincial Government loan a sum not exceeding 1250
(c) the Dominion Government loan a sum not exceeding 1250
$3000
(d) The Provincial Government to provide settlement and supervisory service.

2. It was further suggested that the following general conditions applicable to British boys should also apply to Canadian boys,-

(a) That the applicant has reached his 21st but not his 25th birthday at the date of application for assistance;

(b) That he is in possession of savings amounting to approximately $500;

(c) That he has acquired the necessary experience of farm work in Canada by working as an agricultural labourer for wages or in such other manner as the Department of Immigration and the Province may consider sufficient provided that both the Department and the Province shall be satisfied that the applicant is industrious, economical and capable of managing a farm;

(d) That the Dominion and Provincial Governments share losses on a fifty-fifty basis;

(e) That the above Scheme shall be applicable only to a Province the Government of which is participating in the British Boys Land Settlement Scheme.

So far no Provincial Government has agreed to participate in the Canadian Boys Land Settlement Scheme.

LETTERS OF ASSURANCE OF EMPLOYMENT (PERMITS"- so called)

"Your Committee recommends that letters of assurance of employment shall state the names, addresses, occupations and nationality of the persons to be admitted and that an annual return be made by the Minister of Immigration to Parliament within thirty days of its meeting, giving particulars of all such letters, showing the names of persons so admitted, their addresses, occupation and nationality, the names and addresses of the persons who made the application for each such admission and of any other person who endorsed or made favourable representations in support of such application."

Letters of assurance of employment are being issued in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee and annual returns are also being made in accordance with the Committee's report.

RAILWAYS CONTINENTAL AGREEMENT.

"There was in the evidence, considerable criticism of certain features of the Railways' Agreement. The Committee has some doubt as to the desirability of giving to the Railways special authority to recruit immigrants, but as certain restrictions were imposed in connection with the renewal of the Agreement in October, 1927, the Committee is of the opinion that, in order to ascertain the results of its operation under the new conditions, the present Agreement mightbe continued according to its terms, but with this exception - that the system of nominations of immigrants from non-preferred countries under the Railways Agreement should be confined forthwith to the following degrees of relationship; father or mother, husband or wife, son or daughter, brother or sister - of any individual who is now engaged in farming in Canada, and further that the existing Railways Agreement should not be renewed in its present form."

Instructions were at once issued in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee and nominations of immigrants from non-preferred countries under the Railways Agreement are now confined to the degrees of relationship stated in the Report.

MEMORANDUM:

This memorandum is a brief statement of the present position of immigration from the following sources:-

(a) British Isles;

(b) United States;

(c) Europe.

BRITISH ISLES.

After the passage of the Empire Settlement Act, 1922, efforts were made to promote British immigration by loans under the various Assisted Passage Agreements. Under these Agreements loans were made in whole or in part to farmers, farm labourers and household workers coming to Canada to earn their livelihood at these occupations.

Under date of the 11th December 1925 an Agreement was made between the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs and the Dominion Government for the transportation, at greatly reduced rates, of families and single men coming to Canada from the United Kingdom to settle on the land, and household workers. With the introduction of the reduced rate, loans were abolished for single farm labourers. The reduced rate of £2, which is still given to bona fide agricultural families and to household workers was established upon an equation by the British Government of the rebate of £4.10.0 by the steamship companies, the cash payment of £3.10.0 by the Department and aftercare service.

A comparison of the figures for the two last fiscal years shows the effect of the reduced rate, viz., there were 8,442 Empire Settlement migrants came to Canada in 1925-26; 20,248 in 1926-27 and 24,889 in 1927-28. The total immigration from the British Isles during the fiscal year which ended on the 31st March 1926 was 37,569. The total for 1926-27 was 50,378 and the total for 1927-28 was 50,872.

The Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization recommended that measures be taken to arrange a conference between the Federal and British Governments and the Atlantic Steamship Companies with the object of obtaining a reduction in ocean rates to British immigrants to approximately £10. A conference was held and a flat ocean rate of £10 was finally established. The reduced rate of £2 is still applicable to bona fide farmers, farm labourers and household workers who may also receive a loan of the reduced rate whenever it is considered advisable. The Committee also approved of all previous efforts which had been made by the Department to promote and encourage 'teen age immigration from Great Britain and recommended that the age limit for boy immigrants be extended to boys from 14 to 19 years of age, both inclusive. The new Assisted Passage Agreement has been made in accordance with this recommendation.

Tripartite British-Dominion-Provincial Agreements have also been amended so that boys of the ages mentioned may now be received, placed and supervised by Provincial Governments accordingly. Under these tripartite Agreements boys are received at Provincial headquarters farms and then placed in selected farm homes. The minimum wage is $10 per month plus board and lodging, washing and mending. The farmer undertakes to pay the boy a certain sum each month and to remit the balance to the Provincial Government to be placed to the boy's credit. The Provincial Government selects the home, furnishes aftercare, advice, protection and what supervision is necessary for a boy's welfare for a period of three years after his arrival in Canada.

Centres by submitting to the Colonization Officials of Provincial Governments the names and addresses of suitable homes and by the Representatives of Voluntary Societies submitting the names and addresses of suitable boys to the Oversea Agents of the Provincial or Dominion Governments.

These reception and distributing farms are provided by the Provincial Government and the following cash contributions are made on account of the operation of the farm:-

Provincial	Government	$10	per boy
Dominion	"	$10	" "
British	"	$20	" "
	TOTAL	$40	" "

The British Government and the Dominion Government share equally in the cost of transportation from the port of embarkation in the United Kingdom to the rail destination in Canada.

The Ontario Government have established a farm at Vimy Ridge, near Guelph, as a reception and distributing centre. Last year approximately 400 boys were received and distributed from Vimy Ridge.

The Provincial Government of Manitoba have designated the Manitoba Agricultural College as a reception and distributing centre. 101 boys arrived and were placed last year through the Manitoba Agricultural College.

In New Brunswick the distributing centre is the Cossar Farm at Lower Gagetown. This farm was operated for a number of years by Dr. Cossar of Glasgow and, subsequently, by the Craigielinn Boys' Farm Association. It is situated on the right bank of the St. John River and centrally located for the distribution of boys.

The Provincial Government of Saskatchewan is also participating in this Scheme and this year boys will be received and distributed from the Agricultural College at Saskatoon.

A similar farm has also been established by the British Immigration and Colonization Association on the Island of Montreal for the reception and distribution of boys in Western Ontario and in the Eastern Townships of Quebec. During the fiscal year which ended on the 31st March 1928, 766 British boys were brought out under the auspices of this Association.

The next step in the program is what is known as the "BOYS LAND SETTLEMENT SCHEME". This is a further development of the reception and distributing centres for British boys. Under this Scheme, the British and Canadian Governments propose jointly to expend a total sum of $5,000,000 over a period of 10 years in the form of recoverable advances to assist suitable British youths to take up farming in Canada on their own account. A large number of British boys who come to Canada as farm workers subsequently take up farms but so far they have had to reply entirely upon their own efforts for the necessary capital to purchase and equip a farm and this may take a considerable number of years. The BOYS LAND SETTLEMENT SCHEME aims at curtailing this period of waiting and under it a British youth at the end of a few years spent in gaining the necessary training and experience in Canada and in accumulating some savings will have the opportunity of being placed on a farm of his own under Government supervision.

This Scheme is applicable to British boys who have received assisted passages, have passed through the Provincial reception and distributing Centres in Canada and who are between 14 and 20 years of age upon arrival in the Dominion.

Upon attaining the age of 21, these boys will be eligible for assistance up to an amount not exceeding $2500 for the purchase of a farm and for stock and equipment provided that they have acquired the necessary training and experience by working for wages on a farm in Canada and have saved approximately $500.

The Scheme provides for the co-operation of the Provincial Governments and the extent of settlement in each Province will depend upon the measure of such co-operation.

The original Scheme provided for a loan of $1250 by the British Government; $1,000 by the Dominion Government and $250 by a Provincial Government. The Scheme, however, has been modified so that a Provincial Government may have the alternative of assuming settlement and supervisory service in lieu of the advance of $250 which, under such circumstances, would be made by the Dominion Government.

The Provincial Governments who have decided to participate in the BOYS LAND SETTLEMENT SCHEME are Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Manitoba.

The Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization also recommended, subject to the completion of satisfactory arrangements with Governments of the Provinces, that assistance equal to that given by the British Government to British emigrant boys be extended by the Government of Canada to the Canadian youth who are trained in agriculture.

The Department of Immigration is now in communication with Provincial Governments on the basis of this recommendation.

LAND SETTLEMENT.

The following is an extract from the Report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization:-

> "1. The committee having heard the evidence in connection with the experiment of the 3,000 Family Settlement Scheme, now almost completed, recommends that time be given to test this form of land settlement before embarking upon extended schemes of this character.
> 2. The committee approves of the extension to other provinces of the tripartite agreement with the British Federal and Provincial governments for the encouragement of Land Settlement by the British immigrant."

Under the original 3,000 Family Settlement Agreement, which was made on the 20th August 1924, 2,669 families, comprising 14,946 persons, were settled on vacant Soldier Settlement farms. Of this number 5,180, including heads of families, were placed in farm and household work. Up to the end of the fiscal year there have been 314 withdrawals and cancellations. The Agreement has been extended to permit of the completion of the Scheme.

The main purpose of the 3,000 Family Scheme was to attract British settlers and to demonstrate the success of land settlement wherever land could be obtained at a fair market value.

On the 4th August 1927 a tripartite Agreement was made between the British and Dominion Governments and the Provincial Government of New Brunswick for the settlement of 500 families on improved farms in the Province of New Brunswick within a period of six years. Under this Scheme, the Provincial Government provides the farm and the British Government advances $1500 for stock and equipment. Repayment is made on a 25 year amortization basis with interest at 5 per centum per annum. The Dominion Government recruits and selects the families and co-operates with the Provincial Government in making adequate arrangements for reception and settlement. Families under this Scheme also participate in the Assisted Passage Agreement. Any loss of interest incurred on the price of a farm during the first two years as a result of the failure of a settler is shared as follows:-

Provincial " 25%
British " 50%

Losses on stock and equipment are shared as follows:-

British Government 50%
Dominion " 50%

Under the above Scheme 100 families were settled on improved farms in New Brunswick during 1928.

On the 5th December 1927 another tripartite Agreement was made for the settlement of 500 families on improved farms in the Province of Nova Scotia within a period of six years. This Scheme is similar to the New Brunswick Land Settlement Scheme but is not yet in operation.

PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATION.

The following is a quotation from the Report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization:-

> "The Committee recommends that special efforts be now made to extend the field of activity of the Provincial Authorities particularly in the matter of placement, settlement and supervision of immigrants, and that, with this in view, the Federal Government consider contributing to defray the cost of Provincial co-operation for that purpose."

During the month of October 1928, the Minister conferred with the Provincial Governments of the Western Provinces regarding immigration matters and invited their participation in the work of British nomination, the reception and distribution of British boys, the Boys Land Settlement Scheme and the settlement of Canadian boys. The representations which were made have been confirmed by letter and negotiations are still proceeding between the Department of Immigration and Provincial Governments.

COTTAGES.

The Department has undertaken to participate with the Provincial Governments in the erection of cottages for the training of British families. These cottages are erected in accordance with the tripartite Agreements between the British, Dominion and Provincial Governments. The cost of the erection of a cottage has been fixed at $1,000 and the cash contributions are allocated as follows:-

British Government		$500
Provincial	"	$250
	TOTAL	$1000

Participation is on the basis that a Provincial Government will administer the Scheme. The Provincial Government of Ontario has undertaken to erect 100 cottages and negotiations are still proceeding with the Provincial Government of Alberta for the erection of a limited number of cottages in that Province. Several of the Provincial Premiers expressed a very strong desire that a survey should be made by the Department of Immigration to determine the farm labour requirements in the Western Provinces. The Minister promised to make this survey and to submit the results to the Provincial Government who have reviewed and, in some cases, revised, the result of the survey. The survey showed a demand for spring placement of approximately 6,000 British farm workers, exclusive of agricultural families, for land settlement. The Department has undertaken to place 3,000 British agricultural trainees during March and April and an additional 1200 up to the 15th of May as well as 1800 during the month of July. It is anticipated that the additional requirements will be met by British migrants who are in a position to pay the £10 rate. The Department of Immigration has undertaken to place these British trainees.

AGRICULTURAL TRAINEES.

Increased facilities have been provided in the United Kingdom by the British Government for the training of single men for farm work. These training centres provide men not only for the Dominions but also for the rural requirements of the United Kingdom. Over 1000 of these trainees were brought to Canada last year. Officials of the Department are keeping in close touch with the situation to determine the value of this overseas agricultural training. Before commencing the course of training applicants are examined by Officials of the Department and passed as suitable prospective farm workers or rejected as the case may be.

HOUSEHOLD WORKER TRAINEES.

Arrangements have also been made with the British Government for the training overseas of household workers for Canada. This arrangement does not mean that the Officials of the Department of Immigration will relax their efforts to obtain experienced household workers but it means that a more vigorous effort is being made to supply the wide-spread demand in Canada for migrants of this class. Provincial Governments have been invited to participate in this work and the Department of Immigration has already received orders for 700 domestics from the various Provincial Governments.

The following statement shows the total emigration from the United Kingdom to British North America, Australia, New Zealand, British South Africa, India and other parts of the Empire, United States and elsewhere, from 1921 to 1927, inclusive:-

UNITED STATES.

Another gratifying feature of the general immigration work is the gradual increase of settlers from the United States. In 1925 the number of U. S. settlers who entered Canada was 15,818. In 1926 this number increased to 18,778. In 1927 there were 21,025 and during the last fiscal year there were 25,007. Of the 21,025 who came to Canada from the United States during the fiscal year 1926-27 over 50% or 11,069 were of English, Irish, Scotch or Welsh racial origin.

In the United States, the Department of Immigration has sixteen Agencies known as "Canadian Information Bureaux" in charge of Agents who have a close and intimate knowledge of agricultural conditions in Canada and who are in a position to give accurate and up-to-date information to residents of the United States who contemplate coming to Canada. The Representatives in charge of these Bureaux report not only an increase in the number of inquiries for land settlement in Canada but they also receive a very large number of inquiries from tourists who contemplate motor trips to Canada.

The following is a report of immigration business in the United States for the fiscal year 1927-28:-

The figures giving the value of carloads and effects are given by the settlers to the Canadian Government Agents in the United States.

The Customs Returns for these figures will, no doubt, show a substantial reduction inasmuch as settlers when making entry will give smaller returns.

Another feature to be considered is the fact that many of these settlers do not see our Agents who have to estimate, in many cases, the value of the effects and capital inasmuch as many of these Certificates are issued by correspondence and the Agent does not have an opportunity of interviewing the settler.

EUROPE

As stated on page 10 of this memorandum, the Minister conferred with the Provincial Governments of the Western Provinces. After describing conditions arising out of the large Continental movement of the past three years, the Premier of Alberta asked that the Department of Immigration immediately undertake a survey of the whole farm labour requirements. The Minister promised that this would be done and that the results would be communicated to the Provincial Governments for their concurrence or revision. So far as Ontario is concerned, the Provincial Government undertook to make their own survey.

The total result of the survey was 12,200 farm labourers. Of this number, the following numbers from Continental Europe were approved by the Provincial Authorities:-

	Ont.	Man.	Sask.	Alta.	B.I.C.A.	Total
Scandinavians	-	200	800	300	-	1,300
Other Pref. Countries	300	150	500	300	-	1,250
Non-Preferred Countries	-	200	2000	-	-	2,200
GRAND TOTAL	300	550	3300	600	-	4,750

Our survey included 2000 from non-preferred countries for Alberta. Mr. Hoadley, however, stated that they did not require any from non-preferred countries and the 2,000 was struck out. The Department requested the Railways to bring forward 30% of the non-preferred farm labourers brought forward last year from non-preferred countries, the 30% being approximately 11,000 or over 400% more than the survey. There is no limitation of families for land settlement or household workers and relatives from the Railways area.

The Province of Alberta stated definitely that they had already in the Province all the non-preferred immigrants they required for farm work this year. Our investigations show that during the period of the Railways' Agreement many thousands of non-preferred country immigrants drifted almost immediately upon arrival into non-agricultural work, including industrial employment in centres of Eastern Canada, thus contributing to the displacement of Canadians. The survey showed that the movement of farm labour required this year from the non-preferred countries is less than one-third of the total movement of last year.

A Conference was held with the Representatives of the Railways who were subsequently advised that, up to the 31st May next, the movement under the Railways' Agreement would be reduced to not more than 30% of the farm labourers moved by each Company during the last calendar year. The Railways were also advised to give much greater care to the selection of the type of migrant likely to accept and remain at farm work inasmuch as it was admitted by the Representatives of both Railways that large numbers of non-preferred immigrants drifted from the farm to other more lucrative occupations.

The Railways were also advised that the limitation of 30% does not apply in any way to domestic servants, agricultural families coming for land settlement or to wives and children joining the head of a family already settled in Canada.

It was also suggested to the Railway Companies that they should make a canvas of their requirements for maintenance and construction work and advise the Department at the earliest possible moment what proportion of this demand would have to be met by the importation of labour. It was also suggested to the Railway Companies that there were many men available in the British Isles accustomed to hard manual labour who might be secured and whose services might be utilized for this work.

MEDICAL INSPECTION.

The following is an extract from the Report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization regarding medical inspection overseas:-

> "The Department of Immigration and the Department of Health should, it is considered, make the most exhaustive efforts to see that the new system is perfected so as to eliminate, as far as possible, inconvenience, delay and expense to the prospective immigrant, and to dispel the idea that there is any intention, on the part of the Canadian Government, to restrict or hinder the coming to Canada of British subjects. For this purpose the committee recommends that the present system would be improved and that it would obviate delay and inconvenience to the prospective emigrant, especially those who reside in the rural districts of the British Isles if the examinations were made by British local doctors paid by, and under the supervision and control of, the Canadian medical authorities, who should be located at convenient centres of population."

After consulting with the Department of Health 464 Roster doctors were appointed especially in the rural districts of the British Isles. The Roster doctor medical fees are being paid jointly by the British and Dominion Governments.

The above arrangement is satisfactory to all the companies and organizations interested.

Medical inspection is made under the supervision and control of Canadian Medical Doctors who are located at convenient centres.

Criticism of overseas emigration work by

1. Honourable R. B. Bennett;

2. Honourable Howard Ferguson.

The following is a press despatch dated January 16th 1929 from London, England:-

British Paper States Bennett Studied Immigration Situation

LONDON, Jan. 16—(B. U. P.)—"Hon. R. B. Bennett has strong opinions on the need for a greater flow of Britons to Canada, and he feels that the Canadian Government has not done everything it might have," says The Manchester Guardian today, adding that the leader of the Conservative Party in Canada had a very practical purpose on his visit to London apart from private business.

The paper says: "He took the opportunity to investigate the migration position in Britain and collected opinions from representative people about the working machinery. He had some confidential reports prepared for his own use, and he returned to Canada well supplied with facts and figures. It is quite possible that on his return he will apply his knowledge in an attempt to stimulate the Canadian Government to greater efforts."

The Manchester Guardian also remarks on Mr. Bennett's hatred of publicity when in England, and points out that it is possible he will become the next Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Bennett has been investigating what he describes as "the working machinery" and has obtained some confidential reports prepared for his own use. It is possible that Mr. Bennett may have obtained his information from Mr. Noxon, who is the Agent-General for Ontario and who evidently contributed similar material to the Honourable Howard Ferguson. It is also very probable that

Mr. Bennett obtained additional information from overseas Representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We do not know what information Mr. Bennett may have but the following are quotations from an article by the Honourable Howard Ferguson which appeared in "MACLEAN'S" Magazine, December 1, 1928. This article was based on a speech made by Mr. Ferguson at the Empire Club, Toronto:-

"The Migration Question

There are plenty of possible migrants in Britain who are anxious and willing to come to a new portion of the Empire. Some of them have cauliflower ears and some of them flat feet - a few here and there. We have fellows of that kind in this country - I see them every day - and they get along splendidly; but unless we take the position that there shall be no more flat feet than what we ourselves produce, of course we are going to discourage migration. Let us be sensible about it. When we brought out those thousands of harvesters and told them; 'You can work at the harvest during the summer, and if you can get a job for the winter, you can stay in Canada,' it was not necessary to ask them to answer more than half a dozen questions which meant, in effect: 'Are you sound in wind and limb, and are you willing to work? If you are, you can go.' Why, then, should we require four or five sheets of family history and technical statistics for the admission of immigrants? This Inquisition has left an unfavorable impression in the Old Country. I do not intend to say it in any partisan way, because I quite believe that when these things are brought home to the Department at Ottawa, as they have been, we are going to have an improvement in the situation. I am interested in my country, and that is why I have ventured to state these things as they are.

Let me tell you one little incident. A chap in a little village had decided to sign up to come with his family to Canada.

W.L. Mackenzie King Papers
Memoranda & Notes

PUBLIC ARCHIVES
ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

> He had to make two or three trips to see the doctor for examination. Finally he did not go. Now, that fellow occupied a rather important position in his own sphere of life, but he became an object of derision. Everybody pointed a finger at him, saying: 'He was going to Canada, but they examined him; what was the matter with him? Why couldn't they take him? There is something wrong somewhere.' That is an indication of the type of things that occur in the small communities there, just as they would happen here. There are a lot of little irritating things that could easily be removed, and I am quite sure that the Government at Ottawa, having had them brought to their notice, will see to it that they are remedied, and we will get our fair share of the magnificent type of young manhood that is waiting an opportunity to come out here and do their part in building up a home for themselves and helping us to develop this country."

It may be quite true that there are people who have flat or deformed feet in this country, but the question arises as to what extent physical defects of this kind may affect settlement, especially of families, in Canada. Three cases of this kind have recently been brought to the attention of the Department of Immigration. They are cases of children of three families who have been settled under the 3,000 Family Scheme. In these three cases there was a deformity which, it now transpires, would require an operation at some time or another. Officials of the Land Settlement Branch have emphasized the fact that operations in these cases will be necessary; that these operations will involve a considerable expenditure and that they will be a great draw-back in the early years of settlement. The fact that children were admitted under these conditions shows conclusively that every reasonable latitude is given to British immigrants who suffer from such physical defects.

As an example of how the law is administered in that regard, it may be of some interest to give a concrete example:-

In the first year of the 3,000 Family Settlement Scheme an application was received from a migrant who was certified for valvular disease of the heart. This man had a wife and three small children. The application was not accepted because the applicant who had been so certified by the Medical Examiner was the sole bread-winner. If, however, instead of small children there had been one or two adult members of the family who could have undertaken the obligation of maintenance and also the monetary obligation involved in taking over a vacant Soldier Settlement farm, then the application would have been accepted.

The law, on the question of a physically defective person, is administered so that public monies may not be expended in bringing to this country migrants who are likely to become a public charge upon some municipality.

Mr. Ferguson pointed out that it was not necessary for the harvesters to answer "more than half a dozen questions" and proceeds:-

> "Why, then, should we require four or five sheets of family history and technical statistics for the admission of immigrants?"

Probably the best reply to this statement is a comparison of the forms used by the Department of Immigration and by the Ontario Government.

2 Encs. Annexed to this report is an Ontario Government Form marked "A" which shows 43 questions. Annexed is also the INFORMATION FORM by the Department of Immigration, marked "B", containing 41 questions.

Official who accompanied Lord Lovat examined and approved this Form, which was also approved by Lord Lovat.

The following is an extract from the Minutes by the Treasury Official regarding this form:-

> "Mr. Plant and I discussed with Mr. Egan and Mr. Little the questions of the INFORMATION FORM of the Department of Immigration and Colonization. We were fully satisfied that every question in the FORM is necessary. Many of them which, at first sight, might appear to be unnecessary are required in the interests of the migrant to enable the Department to place him in suitable work. The only question on which some modification appears to be desirable is No. 21 and it was agreed by Mr. Egan that at the end of this question the following words might be added in order to make it clearer to the applicant that he was not necessarily required to give the name of his present employer as a reference:-
> Insert in brackets:- '(not necessarily your present employer)'."

Another important feature is the fact that while not more than half a dozen questions may have been asked the harvesters yet out of 8,500 who came to Canada, 6,500 have returned.

There may be criticism of the following procedure and replies are, therefore, given:-

1. Last year migrants who received the reduced rate were interviewed by an overseas Emigration Official before sailing. It was decided to have our Officers interview assisted migrants because the Dominion Government was making a cash contribution towards transportation.

2. This year migrants who receive assisted passage will also be interviewed by an Emigration Officer except the following:-

   (a) 100 British families who are coming to be settled on Hudson's Bay land under an Agreement between the British Government and the Hudson's Bay Company.

   (b) 100 British families who are coming to be settled on Canadian Pacific land under an Agreement between the British Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

   (c) Migrants who come to Canada under the auspices of the British Settlement Society of Toronto.

   It was decided to leave the interview of the 200 families to the Representatives of the Hudson's Bay Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company who were advancing $1200 for the erection of buildings on unimproved land. The British Government is contributing $800 for stock and equipment. We are not interviewing migrants selected by the British Settlement Society who have signed an Agreement to undertake aftercare. The Railway Companies and other Organizations signed an Agreement in 1926 but evinced no desire to renew this Agreement in subsequent years.

3. Migrants who now pay the regular ocean fare of £10 are not interviewed by Emigration Officials before sailing.

The Truth Regarding the Menace of Foreign Immigrants.

Are Canadian institution being menaced by foreign immigrants?

Rumours have been circulated that Canada is being flooded with southern Europeans and that British institutions are being menaced with the influx of foreigners. On May 5th, 1928 in Toronto, Hon. R.B. Bennett made the following statement:-

> "We are bringing into this country an ever increasing number of non-British immigrants and yet of people who have left this country the major part are of British stock and English-speaking origin. It means this country is rapidly being settled by non-British stock and while the British stock and to some extent French stock are leaving this country."

The Liberal Party objects to this statement on two grounds:

Firstly - It takes issue with those who suggest that carefully selected foreign immigrants cannot and do not become good Canadian citizens.

Secondly - It denies that foreign immigrants have been allowed to enter Canada in sufficient numbers to threaten the supremacy of our native stock.

What are the Facts?

During the calendar year ending December 31, 1929 immigration was as follows:

British Immigrants	66,801
Northern European Races ..	29,968
From United States	31,852
Other races	36,372

So much for the last calendar year. Now take the totals for the three calendar years 1927, 1928, 1929.

British Immigrants	175,589
Northern European races..	95,805
From United States	85,603
Other races	133,661

When these figures are examined it will be seen that immigrants of the Nordic races, that is, those from the British Isles, from northern Europe and the United States total 356,997.

While southern European immigrants amounted to 133,661.

Let Conservative critics of the Liberal Immigration Policy be answered by one of the outstanding Conservative newspapers of the Dominion. The following extract is from the Ottawa Journal of March 18, 1930, and refers to the latest figure published by the Department of Immigration.

> "Good people worrying over Nordic supremacy because of foreign immigrants should take heart from the latest of Government statistics. They show that during the past eleven months British settlers in Canada exceeded those of the same period last year by 7,534. United States settlers increased by 1,000. Those from north-western Europe (favoured races) by 200, on the other hand immigrants from all other countries largely continental Europe decreased by nearly 12,000.

And observe carefully the next paragraph.

"The truth is of course that talk about the British population of this country being overwhelmed by foreigners is nonsense. There has never been a time in the last fifteen years when there was even the remotest prospect of such a thing happening."

Thus a leading Conservative journal flatly contradicts the reckless statement made by the Leader of the Conservative Party.

"KEEPING THE RUDDER TRUE."

LIBERAL POLICIES AND THE IMMIGRATION PROBLEM.

"Canadians, the future is with you. Do not be in too much of a hurry. Your country is for the virile men; let it be filled with the best. What does one hundred or two hundred years matter before your country is full? Keep the stock you have and the men and women you have and see that your future generations are in no way inferior to them. Time is on your side. Maintain your values and your standards and may your prayer be that of the Greek sailor which has been preserved by Seneca:

> 'Oh God, you may save me if you will, you may sink me if you will, but whatever happens I will always keep my rudder true.'"

"KEEPING THE RUDDER TRUE"

LIBERAL POLICIES AND THE IMMIGRATION PROBLEM.

The Year 1922 A Turning-Point.

The year 1922 was a turning-point in immigration. During the war the movement of population from all countries was suspended to a large extent. As a consequence immigration conditions in Canada suffered from the altered circumstances of other countries. In the United Kingdom higher wages for British agricultural workers and the introduction of the dole discouraged emigration on a large scale. In Central Europe, on the contrary, the war had left a great number of dispossessed peoples eager for migration to the new world. At the same time, the United States reversed its immigration policy and adopted a quota system which largely excluded European immigrants and created an artificial labour vacuum which was drawing large numbers of Canadians into the industrial life of that country.

The Principles of Liberal Immigration Policy.

In the face of the abnormal conditions created by the war, the Liberal Government adopted an immigration policy of cautious discrimination. The policy in a word was this - to secure the largest possible immigration of those classes which could be absorbed and assimilated with profit to the newcomer and without loss to the Dominion.

In the development of this policy in succeeding years, it has been recognized:-

(a) That while Canada requires increased population, quality rather than quantity is of the first importance.

(b) That British must always hold first place in importance and that every legitimate effort must be used to maintain and increase the flow from the Mother Country.

(c) That next after British immigration, encouragement must be given to a movement of settlers from the United States and from North-Western Europe of those healthy, hardy people, desirous of establishing themselves in our basic industries, principally agriculture.

(d) That colonization must go hand in hand with immigration and that newcomers whether seeking farm employment or land settlement, must not be left to shift for themselves as strangers in a strange land.

W.L. Mackenzie King Papers
Memoranda & Notes

PUBLIC ARCHIVES
ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

(e) There ought to be the closest consultation and co-operation between the provincial governments and the federal immigration authorities. As the Prime Minister, himself, expressed it, "Any policy respecting immigration which has no regard for the susceptibilities and needs of the several provinces will never serve to maintain the unity of the Dominion as a whole, and it is, as I wish to repeat, upon the unity of Canada more than upon all else that the basis of our present contentment and future development rests".

Propogandists At Work.

In basing its immigration policy upon the principle of selection, the Government has been exposed to attack from a vigorous propaganda carried on sometimes by the opposition and sometimes by special interest for a wide-open door. General McCrae, Chief Whip of the Tory Party proposed that Canada should spend three hundred million dollars in clearing land and erecting homes in the norther portion of the wester provinces in order to increase the flow of immigration. Dr. Manion, another leader of the Tory opposition, speaking in the session of 1929, said, "Our land, I repeat, should be the mecca for all the desirable people from all the over-crowded portions of the earth." At the same time there were those who contended that the doors should be practically shut and bolted in order to protect Canadian labour. Keeping straight to its furrow, the Government refused to be swung to either extreme. The wisdom of its policy has now been abundantly confirmed.

The Immigration Enquiry of 1928.

The underground opposition of the Government policy of selected immigration came to a head in 1928 when veiled charges of incompetence were levelled against the officials of the Immigration Department, and more serious rumours of corruption were circulated in the public press.

Government Welcomes Enquiry.

The moment these rumours reached the Prime Minister, he announced that no effort would be spared to have them sifted by a thorough investigation. The same assurance was given by Hon. Robert Forke, Minister of Immigration. When Parliament met, the Government referred the entire subject of immigration to the consideration of the Committee of Agriculture and Colonization upon which every party and group in the House was adequately represented. There were no reservations in the terms of reference. The Committee was free to summon witnesses and had full access to the Departmental files. After an ex-

W.L. Mackenzie King Papers
Memoranda & Notes

PUBLIC ARCHIVES
ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

haustive investigation extending over three months, the Committee brought in a report to which all parties had subscribed. The reckless charges of corruption and sinister influences failed to find any substantiation. In broad outline, the report endorsed the main lines of immigration policy which had been followed by the Government. Where new recommendations were made, the Government announced its readiness to adopt them.

British Immigration First.

Among the charges made at the time of the Parliamentary Enquiry was the accusation that the Government was more anxious to encourage Continental immigration from Europe than to secure British settlers. This charge was proved to be absolutely without foundation. It is a matter of record that British immigration is encouraged and assisted beyond anything done in connection with any other class of immigration. This encouragement and assistance is two fold, (1) By Publicity. (2) By Passage Rates.

Publicity.

In the British Isles, Canada maintains ten Emigration Agencies, spends many thousands of dollars annually in advertising, distribution of literature, placing exhibits at agricultural and other Fairs, giving lectures on Canada, and in various other ways brings the opportunites in the Dominion to the attention of the British public. No such propoganda is carried on in Europe. In the figures presented to the Committee of Agriculture the Colonization at the Parliamentary Enquiry in the spring of 1928, it was shown that Canada spent an average of $16.67 per capita on British immigrants and 11 cents per capita on Continental immigrants.

Passage Rates.

There is no scheme of passage assistance for the immigrant from the Continent of Europe regardless of his occupation or the country from which he comes. The cost to a Continental immigrant travelling third class ocean and colonist rail from Antwerp to Winnipeg is $137.50.

Until the beginning of the year 1929, the cost to a Britisher who paid his own way was approximately $112.00 for the same journey from Liverpool to Winnipeg. On the 1st of January, 1929, the ocean rate was reduced for British immigrants paying their own way and coming from Great Britain or Northern Ireland. The present flat ocean rate third class is .10 as compared with the former rate of £18.15. It now costs the Britisher who pays his own way approximately $74.00 to get from Liverpool to Winnipeg as compared with $137.50 for the Continental.

ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES

Other Encouragements to British Immigration.

Assisted Passages.

Canada does not contribute anything towards the establishment of the £10 rate, but does make a contribution towards passage assistance for the following classes:-

1. Agricultural families.
2. Houseworkers.
3. Juvenile immigrants.

The ocean rate payable by the agricultural adult or houseworker is £2 with a reduced inland rate. Thus a farmer may travel from Liverpool to Winnipeg for £4.10. Children under 19, belonging to agricultural families, are given free passage. Juvenile immigrants (girls 14 to 17 - boys 14 to 19) receive free passage. All of these special rates, it will be noticed, are limited to British immigrants.

The Empire Settlement Scheme.

The First Empire Settlement Agreement providing passage assistance to British Immigration was made in April, 1923. Under the terms of this agreement provision is made both for reduced rates of passage and for loans for passage assistance. These reduced rates of transportation for selected British settlers, with free passage for juveniles, have been maintained to this date.

The Three Thousand British Family Settlement Scheme.

This scheme was undertaken in co-operation with the British Government in 1925. The project was to move and place on the land in Canada 3000 British families in three years, and was undertaken largely as a demonstration of what might be accomplished by landholders and others in the way of assisting settlement. The lands were supplied by the Federal Government, being lands acquired for Soldier Settlement and either not used or turned back to the Soldier Settlement Board. Funds for stock and equipment were advanced by the British Government. Responsibility for settlement and after-care was assumed by the Dominion Government.

When Lord Clarendon, then as a representative of the British Government, visited Canada in 1926 to look into this settlement scheme, he expressed the opinion that it was the most successful venture in colonization that had been undertaken by any government in recent years.

Boy Settlement Scheme.

Within the last three years a further effort has been made to secure British settlers through the adoption of a plan for the settlement of British boys in Canada. By co-operation with the Provinces and the British Government boys between the ages of fourteen and nineteen inclusive, who will undertake to engage in farm work for a period of three years, are brought to Canada free of all transportation charges, their fares being paid by the British and Canadian Governments. The boys come in the first place to reception and distributing farms maintained by the Provincial Governments with assistance from the Dominion. From these farms they are distributed by the Provincial authorities to suitable farm homes within the Province where they work for wages while learning to farm. In a number of Provinces, it is also arranged that when the boy has obtained a practical knowledge of farmwork and livestock, has reached the age of twenty-one years, and has saved the sum of $500.00 the three governments concerned, Canadian, British, and Provincial, will grant him a loan of $2500 for the purchase of a farm of his own. Already a substantial movement of British boys has been established under this scheme, which is being developed by the Canadian Government as rapidly as the Provincial Governments see their way to co-operate.

Government Willing to Extend Similar Benefits to Canadian Boys.

In adopting a policy to encourage the settlement of British boys on Canadian farms, the Government has not been unmindful of the desirability of offering the same opportunities to Canadian boys. All the Provinces have been advised that the Government was prepared to make the same cash contribution towards the settlement on the land of the Canadian boy as was made towards the similar settlement of the British boy. This proposal is now being considered by a number of the Provinces.

Another Example of Co-operation With Provinces.

An excellent example of what is being accomplished by co-operation between the Immigration Department, the Provincial Governments and the British Government is the scheme for the settlement of Five Hundred British families in New Brunswick. An agreement was entered into in 1927 under which it was arranged to settle approximately one hundred families a year on semi-improved farms in the Province of New Brunswick in each of five years. Already this scheme is meeting with success.

Success of Government Policies to Attract British Immigrants.

The emphasis of Liberal immigration policy has always been on British settlement. It was a manifest absurdity to suggest that a Liberal Government could be indifferent to British immigration which contained no less than four Ministers who themselves came to Canada as British immigrants - Motherwell, Forke, Dunning, Heenan - and one of these, Mr. Forke, held the portfolio of Immigration. The survey just made of the policies now in force is sufficient to ridicule this baseless accusation.

Canada Secures Majority of British Emigrants.

But the Government is not only attempting to secure a preponderance of British immigrants - it is succeeding in its efforts. The tables furnished by the British Board of Trade dismiss any suggestion that this country is not receiving its share of British migrants.

For the seven years 1922 to 1928 inclusive, the latest complete figures at present available - emigration from Great Britain to British North America amounted to 519,415 During the same period the British emigration to Australia and New Zealand combined was 370,026; to British South Africa 106,910; to India and other parts of the Empire 143,027; to the United States 333,591, and to all other countries 83,619.

These figures show clearly that Canada occupies a preferred position from the standpoint of the British emigrant. The following table expresses the comparison in a still more graphic form. It shows the average destination of every hundred emigrants from the British Isles in 1922 and in 1928.

Or to bring it still closer home, in the nine months, January to September, 1929 (inclusive) 113,962 British migrants left the Mother Country for various parts of the world. Of the total, no less than 59,595 came to British North America. (A few of these to Newfoundland, but the balance to Canada.)

In other words, in the nine months under review, Canada received more British migrants than Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, other parts of the Empire, the United States, and all other countries outside of Europe. There could be no more convincing evidence of the success of Liberal immigration policies in encouraging British immigration to Canada.

European Immigration.

No effort is made by the Government to obtain immigration from continental Europe comparable with that made in Great Britain, and no financial assistance is extended to European immigrants. At the same time Canada extends a welcome to desirable settlers from the continent of Europe provided they comply with Canadian requirements as to health, character and ability to support themselves in Canada. References are sometimes made to this European immigration as though it were an undesirable addition to Canada's population. Last year immigrants arrived from the following countries:-

Belgium	862	Germany	13,473
Denmark	2,852	Norway	2,549
Holland	1,252	Sweden	3,073
Finland	4,614	Switzerland	510
France	775	Iceland	8

Which of these nationalities would anyone bar from Canada as undesirables?

The Railways Agreement and Its Changes.

The Railways Agreement has been the subject of much controversy. This Agreement was made in the autumn of 1925. Under the terms the Railways were to recruit in certain countries of Europe agricultural familes for land settlement, farm laborers and domestics, whom they were to place on the land and in domestic service in Canada. The countries covered by the Railways Agreement are Russia, Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Danzig, Poland, Czechoslvakia, Austria, Hungary, Jugoslvia and Roumania. The result of the Railways Agreement was an immediate and heavy increase in immigration from most of the countries to which the Agreement applies. The movement under the Railways Agreement to date is as follows:-

W.L. Mackenzie King Papers

ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

To December 31st 1926	38,028
To December 31st 1927	38,613
To December 31st 1928	47,078
To December 31st 1929	26,721

At the beginning of January 1929, the Railways were notified by the Government that the movement that year of farm laborers must be reduced to not more than 30% of the 1928 movement of the same classes, and that those brought must be here by the end of May. The 1928 movement of farm laborers totalled 34,242. The 1929 movement totalled 11,385. This reduction was made because numbers of men brought in in 1928 made no effort to engage in farm work.

The Railway Companies have been notified that in 1930 the movement of the farm labor class is to be cut down to a maximum of 8000 or a further reduction of at least 25%. In doing this, however, arrangements have been made so that any European farming in Western Canada who wishes to bring out a relative or friend to help him on the land will be able to do so by nomination.

In accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization in 1928, the Railways Agreement is not to be renewed on its expiration in 1930.

Immigration, The New Policy of Co-operation.

"Any policy respecting immigration which has no regard for the susceptibilities and needs of the several provinces will never serve to maintain the unity of the Dominion as a whole, and it is as I wish to repeat, upon the unity of Canada more than upon all else that the basis of our present contentment and future development rests." (Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King).

The return of their natural resources to the Western Provinces during the past session has made possible an increased degree of co-operation between the Dominion and the Provincial Governments in the field of immigration.

With the area available for further settlement now in the control of the Province, it is evident that the interest of the Provincial Governments in immigration has been correspondingly enlarged. In future the Provinces will state the number of immigrants desired from year to year and it will be the function of the Dominion Government to use the facilities of the Department of Immigration in securing the required number as they are requisitioned.

The new policy in a word is this;- Each provincial Government is to be asked to say how many newcomers can be absorbed in its particular province and where they should be sought. This will make an end of what has been called the "dumping" of immigrants. The provincial Government will be responsible for both the numbers and the classes of immigrants who are brought into any province as the result of recruitment abroad by the Dominion Department of Immigration. This will remove a long-standing source of friction between the Dominion and the Provinces and will prevent any recurrence of the charge that the Dominion Government is adding to the embarrassment of the Provincial Government in dealing with the problem of seasonal unemployment.

No barriers are to be placed in the way of people from Great Britain or northern Europe who have the means to come on their own account and take care of themselves after they get here.

The new immigration policy is yet another illustration of the desire of the Liberal Government to co-operate with the Provinces for the maintenance of that national unity which was the vision of the Fathers of Confederation.

Immigration

On Saturday afternoon, September 7th, nearly three hours was spent in the King George Hotel, Saskatoon, going over the Canadian Immigration question with Sir John Sandeman Allen. He is the President of the British Chamber of Commerce and also the Imperial Institute in South Kensington, and is keenly interested in the emigration of good British settlers from the Old Country to Canada. Of course he could not understand why there should be such great restriction on British emigration when there was so little on Continental emigration, and none at all on the mixed stream coming in from the United States. There was no use trying to explain this. The only possible explanation is the Government at Ottawa and its Roman Catholic domination. Sir John has bought a place for his married son and duaghter in the district of Royal, close to Prince Albert.

Collateral - Immigration policy.

Ottawa, 7th March, 1930.

III. REASONS WHY THE DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION SHOULD NOT BE ABOLISHED.

(1) The present organization of the Department has been built up over a period of thirteen years. It has agents, inspectors and other officers throughout Canada, the British Isles, the United States and on the Continent of Europe. Its functions are widespread and important. It deals with the admission to Canada and with appeals of those who are refused entry. No sufficient reason has yet been advanced to show why we should scrap this machine.

(2) Surely Canada has not come to the end of immigration. Because we have some temporary unemployment is not sufficient reason for becoming panicky. We have had other experiences of the same sort, particularly in 1907-08, 1912-13 and 1922-23. Immigration will undoubtedly continue to be one of the major problems of this country for many years to come.

(3) It was the Union Government which in 1917 saw the need of creating a separate Department to handle the important problems arising out of immigration and colonization. Anyone who has made a study of the work of the Department will realize the need of retaining an organization competent to handle the problems that arise.

(4) What has occurred to necessitate the change suggested. Have we finished with immigration. Is there no longer need of a policy. Will the co-operation of the Provinces not call for further activity on the part of the Federal Government, seeking to meet the wishes of the Provinces. One of the Recommendations of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization in its Report of June, 1928, was that the responsibility and control of the selection of immigrants, no matter by whom recruited, must rest solely and exclusively with the Federal Government.

Memorandum for Mr. A. S. Cudmore:

Mr. King asked for a memorandum on Liberal Policy in Immigration from 1921 to date. He asked that it be a very brief survey.

The attached has come in from Mr. Blair today, and, although it is a little shorter than usual, it seems to me it might be boiled down a little more.

As I have not had a moment in which to touch this myself, I wonder whether you might possibly find time to summarize it for Mr. King, so that it will be in the most useful form for him in case he requires it.

NORTH AMERICA. [November 6.]

CONFIDENTIAL. SECTION 4.

[A 6738/1437/45] No. 1.

Sir A. Geddes to the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston.—(Received November 6.)

(No. 1181.)

My Lord, Washington, October 27, 1922.

WITH reference to my telegram No. 420 of the 23rd October and to subsequent correspondence regarding the recent decision of the United States Government to prohibit the entry into United States ports of all ships carrying supplies of liquor, I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship herewith an extract from the "New York Times" of the 24th instant* reporting the ruling of Judge Learnod Hand in dealing with an action brought by the Cunard and Anchor Lines and ten other companies, including two American, to contest the decision in question.

The counsel officiating on behalf of the steamship companies pleaded that their vessels did not transport liquor within the meaning of the prohibition laws and that the supplies carried came under the heading of ships' stores, and therefore did not fall within the Government regulations.

In considering the first of these two contentions, the judge stated that, even if transportation were defined to involve some delivery, he did not see how that would help the plaintiffs, since there appeared to be no significant distinction in the fact that the place of delivery was the ship itself, and he held that if the title or possession of the liquor had any bearing on the case, such title passed as soon as the liquor came into the hands of the consumer.

In regard to the argument that the prohibition laws did not apply to ships' stores, the court ruled that the statute, inasmuch as it effected a revolutionary reform in the habits of the nation, was to be understood as thoroughgoing in its attempt to accomplish the results desired. It did not specify the extent of its application, but left that to be gathered from the occasion and generality of the words used, and it intended to exercise, once and for all, the complete power of Congress under the amendment. Its very want of particularity seemed a good indication that the amendment was meant to cover a very wide field.

Your Lordship will observe that the court declared itself unable to draw any distinction between the carriage of cocaine or opium and alcohol, and supposing that Chinese vessels were to bring these drugs to American ports for the avowed purpose of serving them to passengers outside the 3-mile limit, denied that it could seriously be argued that a statute designed to prevent citizens from using such drugs did not also cover so evident a means of nullifying the law.

As regards the special stocks carried for the consumption of the crews only, the argument as to the legality of their carriage was much stronger, and, after dealing with the matter at some length, the judge decided to grant an injunction against interference with the maintenance of a supply necessary for the crews' rations during the eastward voyage, but the companies were called upon to give a bond in the sum of 25,000 dollars conditional against the use of such liquor for any other purpose. The remainder of the bills were dismissed, and the question will now go to the Supreme Court in the nature of an appeal.

CONFIDENTIAL. SECTION 5.

[A 6739/55/45] No. 1.

Sir A. Geddes to the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston.—(Received November 6.)

(No. 1182.)

My Lord, Washington, October 27, 1922.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge receipt of your despatch No. 1484 of the 30th ultimo in regard to the conditions prevailing on Ellis Island, with particular reference to the case of Miss Nankivell and her niece.

On perusing the enclosure in your Lordship's despatch, I came to the conclusion that little would be gained by making a fresh formal and written complaint to the Secretary of State in regard to a particular case. Representations of that character in regard to this question appear to have the effect of provoking both the State Department and the Department of Labour to put forward the best possible defence of the action taken by their officials and of the conditions prevailing on the island. I have therefore thought it best to try a somewhat different line with the Secretary of State.

In the course of a conversation with Mr. Hughes this morning, I set the facts fully before him verbally and read to him the enclosures to your despatch. I abstained, however, from leaving any written representation. I told him that I knew that if I did I should inevitably receive a complete denial by the officials at Ellis Island of the facts as asserted in these letters, in the same way as I had done on former occasions, and that naturally, and again inevitably, in the absence of a formal enquiry, he would have to accept that denial. I invited him to look at the matter from a more general point of view. He would, I felt sure, be the first to admit that it subjected to an almost intolerable mental strain persons of refinement and education to accommodate them cheek-by-jowl with the sort of individuals who formed the bulk of the immigrant traffic, to whom the habit of cleanliness is almost unknown. This was particularly the case where women were concerned.

Starting from a recognition of that certain fact, was it not possible to do something which would make necessary detentions on Ellis Island less intolerable to the better class of immigrant? Two suggestions occurred to me. The first was that as the American Immigration Law had divided up immigrants into categories according to their places of birth, would it not be possible to place each nationality in separate quarters? Such an arrangement, if ever questioned, could easily be explained by the necessity of controlling the influx of immigrants according to nationality, as provided under the existing Act. Should such a scheme not be feasible owing to lack of accommodation, I urged the Secretary of State to consider the propriety of providing special quarters for those of the immigrants who were able and willing to pay for the luxury of privacy and cleanliness. Even if a system based on payment were impossible, there remained, it seemed to me, the possibility of instituting some elastic, though informal, system of segregation which could be worked by sympathetic officials.

I further invited the Secretary of State to consider the question from the point of view of America's desire to encourage immigration of better-class people. In this connection I had often heard it stated that the immigrants from Great Britain were, as a rule, the most desirable. The present system, however, acted as a deterrent to immigrants of any culture, who, hearing of disagreeable experiences at Ellis Island, would prefer not to expose themselves to that sort of treatment, with the result that their places would be taken by immigrants whose advent it was the purpose of the authorities to discourage.

Mr. Hughes listened carefully to what I had to say, and observed that he could not believe that Ellis Island was as bad as the steerage accommodation on an emigrant ship, but that he was gratified I had approached the question as I had instead of pressing for a reply in regard to the individual case, the circumstances of which I had read to him. He admitted quite freely that on a basis of accusations of bad conditions existing on specified days, now long past, we should get nowhere. He appeared sympathetic in regard to the difficulties experienced by Miss Nankivell and her niece, and promised to discuss the whole matter again with the Secretary of Labour, who, he

Memoranda & Notes

PUBLIC ARCHIVES
ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES

assured me, was most anxious to do everything in his power to improve the lot of the more respectable class of immigrant.

Before taking my leave of the Secretary I expressed gratification that, following upon his recent intervention, conditions on the island appeared undoubtedly to have improved for a time. There were now indications, however, that things were getting into a bad state again.

I have the honour to add that one of the secretaries of His Majesty's Embassy will take the opportunity of a forthcoming visit to New York to make a further tour of inspection of the island, accompanied by a representative of His Majesty's consulate-general. While it is not anticipated that such tours will throw any further light on the situation, they probably exercise a certain influence on the Ellis Island officials and remind them that we continue to take an active interest in the treatment to which our nationals are subjected.

Sir A. Geddes to Sir Eyre Crowe.—(Received January 2, 1923.)

Sir, Washington, December 19, 1922.

WITH reference to my despatch No. 1265 of the 17th November last, I have the honour to inform you that I have not forgotten the treatment of British subjects on Ellis Island. As occasion has arisen I have, through criticism and comment, kept the subject fresh in the mind of the United States Government. I hope that the result will be as satisfactory as I anticipate.

On Saturday, at the suggestion of the Secretary of State, I called upon the Secretary of Labour. His attitude was most friendly and helpful. He will, within ten days, visit Ellis Island accompanied by the Superintending Architect of the United States Government, with whom he will consult as to the possibility of erecting on the island separate quarters for English-speaking people. If there be no room there, space for the new buildings will be found on Governor's Island.

It is Mr. Davis's belief that Congress will approve the necessary appropriation.

We have now, I venture to think, passed the stage where there can be question of the justifiability of our complaint that proper provision is not made for British subjects detained in New York Harbour, and have entered a new stage, the end of which will be the construction of satisfactory accommodation.

CONFIDENTIAL. SECTION 1.

[A 533/64/45] No. 1.

Sir A. Geddes to the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston.—(Received January 29.)

(No. 54.)

My Lord, Washington, January 18, 1923.

WITH reference to my despatch No. 1407 of the 19th December, 1922, I have the honour to inform you that on the 18th December I received a courteous invitation from Mr. Davis, the Secretary of Labour, to visit Ellis Island. I accepted this invitation, and on the 28th December, 1922, I visited the island and inspected the institutions there.

Ellis Island consists, as you will see in the attached photographs,* of three islands. On No. 1 stand the buildings of the immigration station, on No. 2 the general hospital, on No. 3 the isolation hospital.

I saw the immigration station thoroughly, and enough of the general hospital to arrive at a fair idea of its state of efficiency. I had time merely to glance at the isolation hospital. I propose to give my impression of these establishments in order.

1. The Immigration Station.

(Administrative Officer: Mr. Robert E. Tod, Commissioner of Immigration, Port of New York.)

(a.) Staff.

Mr. Tod is a gentleman of independent means, who, some fourteen months ago, accepted office as Commissioner of Immigration at the Port of New York. He is a sympathetic, kindly, energetic and efficient man, who holds office for patriotic reasons. Any country might be proud to point to him as one of its officials. Mr. Tod has spared neither time, thought nor pocket in his efforts to make Ellis Island humanely efficient.

I met several members of the immigration staff. They seemed to me to be suitable and efficient.

I was not favourably impressed by the plan of the buildings of the immigration station. On this subject, after only one visit, I am little inclined to express a definite opinion. It appeared to me, however, that much space on the ground floor that would be invaluable, if available, was practically useless because of insufficient provision for ventilation. Some of the rooms in use as waiting-rooms for those who had to appear before boards are inconvenient of access. Similarly, some of the sleeping rooms impressed me as unsuitable to house the numbers that in rush times spend the nights in them.

The lavatories, with latrine and urinal accommodation, open directly out of the sleeping and living rooms. This seems to me to be an inevitably unpleasant arrangement, especially in view of the fact that many, perhaps a majority of the immigrants, are unfamiliar with the pattern of conveniences in use in North America. Some of the immigrants are, I was told by the Secretary of Labour, apt to mistake the sanitary hoppers for drinking troughs, and the floor, or some drainage channel in it, for a latrine pit.

The rooms provided for the medical boards are unsuitable and inadequate. No effort has been made to adapt them through structural alteration to their present purpose.

While it is obviously necessary that the drifting crowd of immigrants who have to be handled in the building be prevented from straying and getting lost, I can quite understand that persons of some refinement and intelligence sent to Ellis Island resent the locked doors and wire "cages." These are much in evidence, and inevitably suggest imprisonment. I am satisfied, though, that the work of the immigration station could not be done without them. To unlock the doors and leave them open and to remove the " cages " would produce chaos worse confounded.

Something is now being done to renovate the paint-work and to effect minor repairs. This has been too long delayed, and the buildings have been allowed to fall into a bad state. The roof in parts requires attention. This it is to receive. There can, however, be no doubt that the amount of money expended on upkeep has for years been insufficient, even to maintain the property.

My general criticism of the buildings is that they are too small. Further, the immigration laws have been altered since they were built, and, however suitable they may have been at the time of their erection, they do not quite meet the present requirements. The attempt has been made through makeshift arrangements to adapt them to their modified purpose. I understand that the superintending architect of the United States Government is now considering how they can be better adapted. I have no doubt that further improvement is possible. It is difficult to see, however, how anyone can rearrange the buildings and grounds to make them really suitable. The ideal " Ellis Island " would have, I imagine, ground round it so that those whose sojourn there could not be brief would have space to move about and to get away from what must often be a nauseating contact with their companions in detention.

Cleanliness must in the circumstances be difficult to achieve. Many of the immigrants are innocent of the most rudimentary understanding of the meaning of the word "clean." I feel sure that a great effort is made to overcome the difficulties this produces. Still, I noticed in many corners impacted greasy dirt that it was possible to say with certainty had been there for many days, if not weeks or months. The impression that I received was that the cleaning is done with long-handled brushes and mops with, at times, aid from a cold-water hose. Nothing but hot water, strong soda and soap freely and frequently applied with a scrubbing-brush will serve if real cleanliness is to be obtained. As a result of the presence of chronic dirt, the buildings are pervaded by a flat, stale smell. This is quite distinct from the pungent odour of unwashed humanity. Both are to be met at Ellis Island. Indeed, the compound smell of old dirt and new immigrants is so nearly universal there that I should not be surprised if it were no longer noticed by the members of the staff. After leaving the island, it took me thirty-six hours to get rid of the aroma which flavoured everything I ate or drank.

Sleeping accommodation for immigrants and detained persons is provided chiefly in two-tiered bunks. These, in most of the sleeping rooms, are arranged in wire cages, the alley-ways being roofed over with stout wire net.

I am sure that it is necessary to encage the bunks to prevent thefts and even more unpleasant outrages. Yet I can understand a certain reaction of annoyed surprise on the part of those whose early experiences were of decent surroundings on being told to go to bed in a cage, even though the cage is necessary and provided for their protection.

The actual surface upon which the immigrant reclines is either woven wire or canvas, supported on metal laths. The canvases that I examined had not been long in use, not more than a few months, but Mr Tod said that they were not regularly changed or cleaned.

I cannot help thinking that it must be very unpleasant to sleep in the lower of these two-tiered berths, when ill-luck places a brutalised sort of creature in the berth above. The Secretary of Labour informed me that cases have been known where the different calls made by nature on the upper berth-holder are responded to without his or her rising from the " bed." In any such instance it seems to me the immigrant in the lower berth has grounds for complaint against the officials who put him there. I cannot believe that instances of this hardship are numerous on a percentage basis.

Five blankets are issued to each immigrant every night. Of these, two are intended to be spread on the wire or canvas and three to be used for cover. These blankets are of satisfactory quality and are sterilised as often as possible. Unfortunately the sterilisation plant cannot deal with all the used blankets every day. As a result, some of the blankets may be used by more than one immigrant between sterilisations. It is not difficult to believe that this may at times produce hardship for the later users.

A cake of soap and two paper towels are also issued each evening to each immigrant detained overnight. The washing accommodation is good, though, of course, there is no privacy. I have heard this complained of. Such a complaint is merely factious. Similarly, some people do not like paper towels. Personally, I prefer them to cotton or linen towels in public wash-places.

(e.) Food and Feeding.

The food is of good quality and well cooked. The dining room is the cleanest room in the building, when meals begin. It is impossible, however, for any staff to keep it clean during meals, owing to what may be incorrectly described as the " table manners " of the guests, who incidentally use the floor as a universal slop bowl and refuse can.

The dining tables are covered for each meal with clean paper " cloths." The table ware is white glazed, thick, but not too thick, and strong. It seemed to me admirably suited to its purpose.

There are special arrangements for the feeding of immigrants of the Jewish faith which, so far as I am able to judge, are satisfactory. I have heard of no complaints with regard to them.

Generally, I thought the arrangements for feeding the best that could reasonably be expected to be made for the present sort of immigrant in the existing building. I attach a copy of the bill of fare for the 28th December, 1922. I personally saw the dinner served. It was excellent.

The kitchen seemed to me to be well equipped and efficiently managed.

That is all, I think, that need be said at this time about the staff and the buildings of the immigration station and the arrangements to board and lodge those detained at the station, except this :—

> Ellis Island is a Government institution, and, like all Government institutions in all countries, it is almost aggressively institutional. It is impossible for anyone on the island, whether on the staff, an immigrant, a " deportee," or even a visitor, to escape from the pervasive sense of " institutionalism."

The essential problem of Ellis Island is not, however, its institutionalism, or its arrangements for boarding and lodging immigrants, or its buildings, or even its staff. It is the immigrants and would-be immigrants who create it. If they were all accustomed to the same standards of personal cleanliness and consideration for their fellows, Ellis Island would know few real difficulties, but they are not. Those who pass through the immigration station range from the highly educated and gently nurtured, now fallen into straitened circumstances, to the utterly brutalised victim of poverty and oppression in some scarce civilised land. They speak many tongues and dialects. They all, lady, prostitute, mechanic, rabbi, and what-not, are frightened, nervous, shy and strange to their surroundings. They are quite ignorant, too, of what is expected of them and have no conception of what is going to happen next, or why anything happens. Anxious and worried old men and women, young men, girls and little children drift about rooms into which they have been put, or crowd round doors which they think may open. The units in this heterogeneous mass of humanity obviously dislike some of their contacts with one another and yet like sheep follow where any leads. Like sheep, too, they have to be herded and, by hurdles, kept from straying.

It really is remarkable to see how well the miserable mobs of nervous human beings, with all their worldly goods, are manœuvred through the legally necessary examinations and are despatched to their destinations. The officials certainly deserve credit for what they do achieve. Still, detention on Ellis Island must be a hateful experience for all of any sensibility who pass its portals.

When a barge-load of immigrants arrives at the island wharf, the crowded people pass on shore and are quickly scrutinised for signs of infectious disease. If a child has developed measles, let us say, he is picked out for treatment in the isolation hospital. The mother passes on with the crowd. Her feelings may be imagined.

The crowd files into the waiting rooms. These are caged with heavy wire net. It is necessary that they should be to prevent individuals straying. Still, the mental effect cannot be added happiness. From the waiting room the men and women are called out in batches, male and female, for examination by the medical officers. It is obviously impossible precisely to synchronise the calling out of the males and females of the same party. Not understanding what is happening, strange and nervous, some of the wretched immigrants believe that they are being separated from their friends for ever. The Commissioner of Immigration told me that this calling of a man into one room and his wife into another, even though they are only to be separated for a few minutes, leads in some cases to pathetic scenes.

However, they are at length shepherded to the appropriate room. There an unpleasant experience awaits them. The rooms were not designed to provide facilities for the sort of medical examination now required by law. The arrangements are makeshift. During the years that I was Director of Recruiting and Minister of National Service I saw many medical boards in Great Britain. Until the whole recruiting medical service had been reformed by Sir James Galloway, many of them were very far from perfect. Still, no recruiting medical board that I saw was quite so badly accommodated as the medical inspection board I saw at work at Ellis Island. No separate dressing rooms or cubicles are provided. The men strip to their trousers in a crowd jammed between coat-racks. They have to pile their things on the racks higgledy-piggledy—the clean clothes of the washed on the foul clothes of the unwashed. Personally, I thought it disgusting for the washed.

There were five doctors at work when I saw the board. Their duty is to ascertain whether or no each man is free from certain scheduled diseases and transient infections. If the existence of a scheduled malady is suspected, the individual concerned is sent to hospital for diagnosis. No attempt at final diagnosis is made by the board. This is the deliberate policy, and I am sure it is perfectly sound and fair to the immigrants. The inspections that I saw were, from the professional point of view, considering their purpose, thorough and effective; from the point of view of a sensitive immigrant distinctly unpleasant, I should imagine.

The line of male immigrants approached the first medical officer with their trousers open. The doctor examined their external genitals for signs of venereal infection. Next he examined the inguinal canals for hernia. The doctor wore rubber gloves. I saw him "do" nine or ten men. His gloves were not cleansed between cases. I saw one nice, clean-looking Irish boy examined immediately after a very unpleasant looking individual who, I understood, came from some Eastern European district. I saw the boy shudder. I did not wonder. The doctor's rubber gloves were with hardly a second's interval in contact with his private parts after having been soiled, in the surgical sense at least, by contact with those of the unpleasant looking individual.

The examinations of the heart and lungs, &c., of the male immigrants seemed to be effectively and expertly made.

The examination of the female immigrants is made by women doctors. The arrangements for undressing are similar to those for the men. There is no examination of female genitalia except in cases suspected of venereal disease, when privacy is provided.

I saw no mental tests performed, but I saw the rooms in which these examinations are made. Their equipment seemed to me effective and adequate.

From the medical inspection rooms the immigrants who are not put back for further examination, proceed to a great central hall. Here, if everything has gone well, the family parties are reunited. Most efficiently the people are organised into groups corresponding to the ship's lists, and pass before the inspectors, who test their capacity to read and see that there is no reason to doubt their eligibility to land. Those that are granted entry, the vast majority of all immigrants, are now done with Ellis Island and at once get away to New York, or if they are going west, pass to the railway booking hall, where they exchange their vouchers for rail tickets, are told when they will start and how they will be taken to the railway station. Their baggage is skilfully and expeditiously handled. They can purchase at surprisingly low cost most excellent food for the journey and then they, too, get away, done with Ellis Island for ever. All the arrangements for handling admitted immigrants are efficient and reflect high credit on those concerned. They are, in fact, a very good example of American business administration.

Apart from the admitted immigrants, there are first the temporarily detained, i.e., those who are admitted, but who for some reason cannot leave the island at once. Possibly they are waiting for money from friends to complete their journeys, perhaps to California. Possibly they are waiting for an hour or two till friends arrive to pilot them to their new homes. Possibly all members of a family but one have been readily passed in, and that one may have had to go to the hospital for diagnosis. Pulmonary tuberculosis may be suspected or mental deficiency, or there may be a suspicion of contract labour attaching to one of the party, or illiteracy.

I feel profoundly sorry for some of the temporarily detained—a mother waiting for a delayed child, or a father with his children anxiously watching for his wife to come to him. The very heart of the tragedy of Ellis Island is in the room of the temporarily detained. It is no one's fault and cannot be avoided, unless immigrants to the United States are to be finally approved for admission in their own land before they set out upon their journey.

Large numbers of the immigrants have to go before a board to determine whether or not they may be admitted. I saw five or six of these boards at work. The proceedings were decorous and seemly; the arrangements for witnesses who come to speak for or against the admission of an immigrant are good. Every immigrant rejected by a board is told of his right to appeal to the Secretary of Labour in Washington.

This arrangement, the theory of which is probably right, is in practice nothing short of diabolic. For days some wretched creature is kept in suspense. The appeal board at Washington, which advises the Secretary of Labour, works on paper records, tempered, I have heard it said, by political pressure. The Secretary of Labour may be busy, overwhelmed, perhaps, with work in connection with some labour dispute, or anything. Days slip by, into weeks sometimes, before a decision is reached. When the doubt affects one member of a family, perhaps a child, the mental anguish must be excruciating. The system is to blame. In my judgment there can be no question that power to decide should be delegated by law to someone on the spot with the facts and the people before him. If the United States Government will expedite the decision of appeals so that the results can be announced within twenty-four hours of the completed collection of the facts, the anguish of Ellis Island will be appreciably reduced.

In addition to immigrants, Ellis Island has to receive stowaways and men and women ordered to be deported. The conditions under which these unhappy creatures and those refused admittance for being in excess of quota spend their time on Ellis Island are perhaps as satisfactory as the building will permit. Personally, I should prefer imprisonment in Sing-Sing to incarceration on Ellis Island awaiting deportation. To add to the mental torments of those sentenced to deportation, well-meaning, kindly people, with heads softer even than their hearts, seek to entertain them with what are called "Americanisation" addresses and cinematograph films. The purpose of these is to tell immigrants how great a country America is and to make them good citizens. A "Red" under sentence of deportation has possibly views of his own on the subject of the United States. So, too, possibly have those who are to deported because they are in excess of their national quota.

As a matter of fact, what Ellis Island needs, in my judgment, is to be relieved of the presence of about one-half of the people who are poured into it. If a deportation station were established somewhere else with suitable buildings and reasonably extensive grounds much would be gained, but there certainly ought to be increased accommodation for immigrants. Before seeing Ellis Island I had imagined that segregation by nationalities might be possible. I am now satisfied that it is not. The flow of immigrants from each nation is too irregular to permit of any satisfactory system of national segregation being devised, and yet some division of the immigrant stream seems to me essential if Ellis Island is not to be abandoned and a new and larger station built elsewhere. After considering the matter with some care, I have come to think that it might be feasible to divide the stream into its Jewish and non-Jewish parts. Persons of the Jewish faith require special food and special utensils, and their being mixed with Christians on the island undoubtedly creates considerable administrative difficulty.

Whether the Jews should be sent to Ellis Island or to a new station seems to me to be a matter of no importance. The fact is that Ellis Island is too small to accommodate in comfort the numbers of immigrants that come to the port of New York. It is also a fact that to divide the stream by nationalities would introduce more administrative difficulties and, I believe, more real discomfort than it would cure. To divide the stream on the basis of its food requirements seems to me administratively feasible. In the dining-rooms that division has to be made in any event. I am well aware that all proposals to separate human beings on a basis of religious belief are certain to meet with opposition, and that failures to meet special religious requirements, as in the case of food, are equally certain to meet with opposition.

I believe that the choice of the United States Government is by circumstances limited to three possibilities: (1) To continue Ellis Island as at present, with such minor improvements as are possible; (2) to build a relief station and to supply at it, or at Ellis Island, but not at both, food prepared in accordance with the Jewish ritual and to send all immigrant Jews to that station and all non-Jews to the other; or (3) to abandon Ellis Island and build a completely new station somewhere else in New York Harbour or on its shores.

W.L. Mackenzie King Papers
Memoranda & Notes

Undoubtedly, to improve Ellis Island is for the United States Government to follow the line of least resistance.

I have not so far spoken of the so-called first- and second-class accommodation on the island. Possibly the best comment on this was made by Mr. Tod when he said: "I am trying to get all the fittings replaced and the rooms painted." There can be no doubt that he accurately appreciates what these rooms need if they are to remain in their present sites in the existing buildings. Rooms lighted by skylights and ventilated from a hall are, however, not really pleasant, especially when the hall itself is in need of ventilation.

2. The Hospital.

(Medical Superintendent: Dr. Billings.)

The hospital and medical service are not, I understand, under the Department of Labour, but under the Secretary of the Treasury. This administrative provision seems to create less difficulty than might have been expected. The reason for this lies largely, if not entirely, in the personalities of Mr. Tod and Dr. Billings. The principal medical officer seemed to me to be an admirable official as well as a competent and enthusiastic practitioner of the art of medicine.

His hospital arrangements are good. It is true that the buildings are in need of new paint and minor repairs. Some construction is also needed, and the technical equipment, though not bad, might be improved.

It is difficult to judge in such a matter, but my impression is that the nursing and ward maid (or ward orderly) staff might be strengthened with advantage.

The hospital has to deal with every sort of disorder, ranging from slight injury to obscure tropical diseases. It is at once a maternity home and an asylum for the insane. On the occasion of my visit there was at least one patient there, a young woman, who has spent ten months in the psycho-pathic ward. This real hardship to the patient was caused by her friends maintaining a legal fight to secure her admission. That she was mentally deranged was painfully obvious. Yet there she had remained for ten months in an environment not unsuitable for an insane person detained for a few days, but wholly unsuitable for long-continued residence with a view to cure or recovery.

On the whole, I thought the hospital arrangements good. I inspected the laundry, which I found to be efficient.

3. The Isolation Hospital.

I had time merely to glance at the hospital for persons suffering from infectious diseases.

The general lay-out is good, and the kitchen is excellently arranged and equipped. The quality of the food is good. The wards seemed comfortable and decently kept.

Here, as elsewhere, more money for maintenance to the structure is obviously necessary.

The pathological laboratory for the whole medical service on the island is situated at the end of the isolation hospital. I judge it to be efficient and reasonably adequate. It, like every other department on the island, needs more money to spend on upkeep.

After seeing Ellis Island and studying its problems, I believe that it is true to say that it is impossible to administer any immigration station under existing United States laws without hardship and tragedy. If a system could be devised which would prohibit persons desiring to come to the United States from sailing from Europe or elsewhere without the certainty of admission to the United States, the problem would be almost entirely solved.

At present United States consuls, when granting a visa to passports to the United States, may mark the visa with the number of the regulation which they believe that individuals entering the United States would violate. Not only so, United States consuls abroad send communications through the mails to the Commissioners of Immigration saying that they have issued passports to such-and-such persons who are sailing on a particular boat on a specified day, and that, in the

Memoranda & Notes

ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

C 61812

judgment of the United States consul, they should not be allowed to land. I feel quite sure that this does not unfairly bias the judgment of the immigration authority, but, if an individual is clearly not eligible to enter the United States, it would, in my judgment, be kinder to prevent him sailing from Europe or elsewhere than to let him reach Ellis Island and there turn him back.

It is clearly a difficult problem that presents itself for solution. If I were asked to advise the reponsible authorities, I should recommend twelve things :—

1. Put the existing buildings into a thorough state of repair and alter the latrine arrangements.
2. Arrange for these buildings to be maintained structurally and to be kept thoroughly clean.
3. Arrange through structural alteration for proper medical examination rooms.
4. At least refurnish, but if possible replace, the present first- and second-class rooms by rooms with windows looking to the outside, as the third-class rooms have.
5. If possible, through structural alteration, improve the ventilation of the downstair rooms so that they can be freely used in the work of handling the crowds of immigrants.
6. Do everything to expedite the handling of the immigrants, especially in the matter of appeals.
7. Provide a new station for criminal deportees (prostitutes, "Reds," &c.).
8. Provide a new station for those requiring kosher food (or, alternatively, let Ellis Island be the "kosher" station and provide a new station for the rest).
9. Authorise United States consuls to refuse visas to the passports of those obviously prevented by law from entering the United States.
10. Arrange, if possible, for all immigrants to be finally approved or disapproved in their home lands.
11. Abandon the quaint custom of delivering lectures on Americanisation to criminal and other deportees. Strangely, this well-meant activity seems to be more annoying to its victims than any other single detail in the life of Ellis Island.
12. Brighten up the hospital interiors with fresh paint and keep them even still more scrupulously clean.

In conclusion, I noticed a desire upon the part of officials to say that Ellis Island is as good as any immigration station in any land. It may be. Still, it is quite certain that no other nation's principal immigration station has the same problem to solve, for the reason that the laws of the United States are not the same as those of any other nation.

Ukrainian protests against Polish attacks.

Attached are two sample telegrams out of nearly a score which have been received the last ten days, together with a copy of the reply which I am sending. These concerted protests illustrate one of the circumstances which tend to make a large solid Ukrainian immigration into Western Canada the most dubious part of our immigration policy. One very large section of the Ukrainian population is ultra-nationalist, absorbed in the struggles of their Ukrainian kinsmen against the Polish and Roumanian Governments and eager to use pressure to bring the Canadian Government into the conflict. Another very large section provides probably 75% of the active Communist movement in Canada,which is rapidly growing in rural as well as urban areas in the West.

So far as the present protests are concerned, it is rather fortunate from one aspect that under the treaty between the Allied Powers and Poland, any minority in Poland has the right of appeal to the Council of the League of Nations. Any member of the Council has the right to bring such a protest to the attention of the League,but it would probably be wiser for us to emphasize the alternative procedure,namely letting the minority in Poland itself bring forward its protest.

I have discussed the question with the Polish Consul-General, whose information naturally differed materially.

APPROVED BY THE BOARD OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS FOR CANADA UNDER ORDER 162.
DATED MARCH 30, 1916.

It is agreed between the sender of the message on the face of this form and this Company, that said Company shall not be liable for damages arising from failure to transmit or deliver, or for any error in the transmission or delivery of any unrepeated telegram, whether happening from negligence of its servants or otherwise, or for delays from interruptions in the working of its lines, for errors in cypher or obscure messages, or for errors from illegible writing, beyond the amount received for sending the same.

To guard against errors, the Company will repeat back any telegram for an extra payment of one-half the regular rate, and in that case the Company shall be liable for damages suffered by the sender to an extent not exceeding $200, due to the negligence of the Company in the transmission or delivery of the telegram.

Correctness in the transmission of messages can be insured by contract in writing, stating agreed amount of risk, and payment of premium thereon at the following rates, in addition to the usual charge for repeated messages, viz: one per cent. for any distance not exceeding 1,000 miles, and two per cent. for any greater distance.

This Company shall not be liable for the act or omission of any other Company, but will endeavor to forward the telegram by any other Telegraph Company necessary to reaching its destination, but only as the agent of the sender and without liability therefor. The Company shall not be responsible for messages until the same are presented and accepted at one of its transmitting offices: if a message is sent to such office by one of the Company's messengers he acts for that purpose as the sender's agent; if by telephone the person receiving the message acts therein as agent of the sender, being authorized to assent to these conditions for the sender. This Company shall not be liable in any case for damages, unless the same be claimed, in writing, within sixty days after receipt of the telegram for transmission.

No employee of the Company shall vary the foregoing.

DAY LETTERS.

This Company will receive, DAY LETTERS to be transmitted at rates lower than its standard telegram rates, as follows: one and one-half times the ten-word Day message rate shall be charged for the transmission of fifty (50) words or less, and one-fifth of the initial rate for such fifty words shall be charged for each additional ten (10) words or less.

DAY LETTERS may be forwarded by the Telegraph Company as a deferred service and the transmission and delivery of such DAY LETTERS are, in all respects, subordinate to the priority of transmission and delivery of full-rate messages.

DAY LETTERS shall be written in plain English, or in French. Code language is not permitted.

DAY LETTERS may be delivered by the Telegraph Compnay by telephoning the same to the addresses, and such deliveries shall be a complete discharge of the obligation of the Telegraph Company to deliver.

DAY LETTERS are received subject to the express understanding and agreement that the Company does not undertake that a DAY LETTER shall be delivered on the day of its date absolutely and at all events; but that the Company's obligation in this respect is subject to the condition that there shall remain sufficient time for the transmission and delivery of such DAY LETTER on the day of its date during regular office hours, subject to the priority of the transmission of full-rate messages under the conditions named above.

ODS/ET Ottawa, 26th November, 1928

Dear Sir,

I am instructed by the Prime Minister to acknowledge your telegram of November 16th with regard to the treatment of Ukrainians in Eastern Galicia. Similar representations have been made by other groups in Canada. Reports giving an entirely different account of the origin of the recent troubles in Lemberg have been received from Polish sources.

As you are aware, it is not customary for one country to intervene in the affairs of another when its own citizens have not been directly injured, and particularly so when the facts in the case are in dispute.

The League of Nations, however, affords machinery for dealing in a much more adequate way than any single outside country could do, with any complaints on the part of minorities in the countries of Eastern Europe. The Treaty of June 28, 1919, between the principal Allied and Associated Powers and Poland recognizes certain privileges of the minorities in that country. The Ukrainian minority has the right to draw the attention of the League by petition to any infraction or danger of infraction of the provisions in question. When a petition of this nature is addressed to the League of Nations, the Secretary-General decides if it is receivable as laid down by the Resolution of the Council, September 5th, 1923. If declared receivable it is communicated by the Secretary-General to the members of the Council, and the State against which the complaint is made is given an opportunity of submitting such observations as it may consider desirable. In this way opportunity is given for ascertaining the exact facts in the case and for endeavouring to secure an equitable settlement.

I have brought your telegram to the attention of Senator Dandurand, the Canadian representative on the Council of the League of Nations, so that he will be in possession of your views in case the matter is brought before the League of Nations by the Ukrainian minority in Poland.

Yours sincerely,

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Revised Hansard p. 564. March 4, 1921.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

*Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Has the Government been made aware of the date of the next Imperial Conference in London?
2. Does the Government know what questions will be discussed?
3. Has there been any correspondence between this Government and the British Government on that subject?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to communicate its views to the Canadian Parliament on the different questions which will be taken up at that conference, and to fix a date for the discussion of these questions by the House, so that the delegates who will be sent to London might be acquainted with the opinion of the Canadian people on these questions in order to press their views at said conference.

Rt. Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: No date has yet been fixed for the next Imperial Conference and there is no intention that it shall be held this year. It is anticipated, however, that a meeting of the Prime Ministers of the different parts of the Empire will be held in June next.

2. The agenda for this meeting of Prime Ministers has not yet been settled, but it is expected that among the subjects for discussion will be the question of the renewal of the Treaty of Alliance with Japan of the thirteenth July, 1911, and the question of naval policy based upon the principle of co-operation; while there will doubtless be a review and consultation upon the general course of the foreign policy of the Empire.

3. Correspondence is proceeding upon the subject for discussion at the June meeting of Prime Ministers.

4. Should there be an indication of a general desire on the part of the House of Commons for a discussion, the Government would be prepared to arrange facilities and would welcome expressions of opinion from all quarters; but in view of the fact that the meeting is of the nature of a conference, the Government could not depart from the invariable practice by making commitments in advance of the meeting. Necessarily any proposals resulting from the conference and affecting Canada must be subject to the approval of the Canadian Parliament.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Has the Prime Minister observed a despatch stating that the Prime Minister of Australia intends to acquaint the Australian Parliament with the subjects to be taken up at the approaching conference in London and to give that Parliament an opportunity of discussing them? Is it my right hon. friend's intention to give this Parliament the same statement and a like opportunity?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I had not observed any statement by the Australian Prime Minister to the effect described by the hon. gentleman, but I had myself moved in the matter and a little earlier than he. I have already given this House, in outline, the subjects that will probably be discussed. The exact agenda has not yet reached us, but the three important topics that had been suggested were stated in an answer made about three weeks ago to the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) and the answer to his question went on to state that, should it appear the desire of a substantial number of members that special opportunity be afforded in this House for discussion, it would be provided. Ever since that, at any time on occasions when subjects such as that might be brought up, the subject might have been discussed. Should further information reach us making certain that other important topics would be considered, I will feel it my duty to state those topics or their substance to the House.

Opening Speech by Mr. Lloyd George.

Mr. Lloyd George: Gentlemen, I bid you all a hearty welcome to Great Britain and to Downing Street. It was only with great unwillingness that I asked you to postpone our first meeting until to-day, and I hope it has not caused any serious inconvenience to anyone. I am deeply grateful to you for meeting my own personal difficulty by postponing the Conference for a few days.

Since we last met, there are some notable gaps in the British Empire Delegation. Our last meetings, I think, were held in Paris at the famous Peace Conference. My old friend, Sir Robert Borden, has laid down the cares of office, after long and sterling service throughout the war and throughout the making of peace, both to his own great Dominion and to the Empire. I relied a great deal upon his sane and ripe judgment. I am glad to hear his health is much restored and I am sure we can count on him still for many years of valuable service in any work which he decides to undertake. In his place we welcome his successor, Mr. Meighen, who is no stranger to our counsels, because he was with us at the meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet in the summer of 1918, though this is his first appearance as Prime Minister.

By General Botha's death the whole Empire has sustained a heavy loss. He was a king of men, one of the greatest and most striking figures of our time, and I feel certain that history will endorse our high contemporary esteem of his breadth of vision and nobility of character. South Africa and the Empire are fortunate in that his mantle has fallen on his distinguished colleague, General Smuts, who has already played a great part in Imperial Councils during the war and in the making of the peace.

Mr. Hughes and Mr. Massey are very old friends. I believe that we three enjoy the unenviable distinction of being the only Prime Ministers who took part in the war and who, so far, have survived the troublesome years of peace, and I am rejoiced to see both of them looking as young and fit as ever.

Let me also extend a most cordial greeting to His Highness the Maharao of Cutch and to Mr. Sastri, who have come here as representatives of the Indian Empire. We shall, I know, find them wise and cogent interpreters of the Indian point of view in the great questions which we have to discuss.

May I also express our regret that the Premier of Newfoundland has not found it possible to be present at our deliberations.

General Condition of Unrest throughout the World.

The Conference falls at a time of great stress in this country and of serious trouble in many parts of the world. It was inevitable that the nations which had put forth such colossal efforts and sustained such unparalleled losses of life, limb and treasure during the war, should feel all the consequences of overstrain and exhaustion. The systems which perplex the statesmen of all the belligerent countries at the present time are due to the condition in which the nations of the world have been left by the great war. The nerve exhaustion and heart strain which characterise such cases produce a feverish restlessness and a disinclination to steady labour which aggravate the disease and retard recovery. Never did statesmanship in all lands demand more patience and wisdom. The years that followed the Napoleonic wars produced similar or even worse experiences. In this country the distress amongst the population was very much greater after the Napoleonic wars that it is at the present moment. As a matter of fact, in spite of great unemployment and a good deal of labour unrest, there is no actual privation amongst the population, and I attribute that very largely to the self-sacrifices made by the more well-to-do of all classes in order to share their better luck with their less fortunate fellow-countrymen. But still there is no doubt at all that the war has produced a state of things from which it will take years to recover. There are European countries where the poverty and the actual distress is appalling and we are doing our best out of our spare means to assist. But in spite of a good deal that is discouraging, I am confident the world is slowly working through its troubles; there is an increasing disposition to face and accept the facts industrially and internationally. The natural disinclination of human nature to admit unpleasant facts has, at home, provoked industrial troubles, and abroad, fierce outbursts of protest. But gradually the world is passing through its usual experience of first of all denying the existence of palpable realities and then settling down to act upon them. It is a distinctly encouraging fact in the international situation that there is an increasing impatience with those who, from whatever motive, seek to keep the world in a state of turmoil and tension. There is a widening and deepening conviction that the world must have peace, if it is ever to recover health. Some of the most troublesome and menacing problems of the peace have either been settled or are in a fair way of settlement. You must have watched with close interest the developments of the last couple of years in Europe, the series of conferences and gatherings and assemblies of all kinds where we were trying to carry out the terms of the Peace Treaty, and to settle the various difficulties that arose in consequence. There were two questions that gave us great anxiety. One was the question of the disarmament of Germany and the other was the question of reparation. There were other important questions, but these were the two questions around which most of the controversies centred. The disarmament of Germany, I think, may be stated to be a settled problem. The German fleet has disappeared, and so has the Austrian. The German army has disappeared as a great powerful force. It numbered millions; it now numbers little more than 100,000 men. It had tens of thousands of guns, great and small; it has now got a few hundreds. It had an enormous number of machine-guns and trench mortars; these have gone. Millions of rifles—they surrendered about 30 million rounds of big ammunition—all that has gone. It is true they have still got some rather irregular formations which we have not succeeded in completely getting rid of. It is not so much Prussia that is giving us trouble as Bavaria. That difficulty will, I think, be overcome in a very short time. So that the problem of disarmament, which was a very vital one because so long as Germany had a big army and big armaments there was no guarantee of peace, will disappear.

Opening Speech by Mr. Lloyd George.

German Disarmament.

Reparations.

The other problem is the problem of reparation. No one knows better than Mr. Hughes the practical difficulties surrounding that problem. It is not a question so much of adjudicating claims; it is a question of how you are to transfer payment from one country and make it in another. As Mr. Hughes knows, that problem baffled all our financial experts and the financial experts of all countries in Paris, and it is only after two years that we hit upon an expedient which seems on the whole to have given satisfaction to all moderate and practical men in European countries. So far as we have been able to gather, that is the view of the Dominions. We shall probably hear something about it, because they have a very direct concern in it. Germany has accepted a very practical plan of liquidating her liabilities. France has accepted; Italy has accepted; and the public opinion of this country has also accepted; so that the two most troublesome problems are either settled or in a very fair way of being adjusted.

Other Difficulties.

There are two remaining difficulties, one of which is the fixation of the boundaries of Poland, partly in Lithuania, and now in Silesia. I am not going to anticipate what will be said upon that subject; therefore I am only mentioning it. The second difficulty we have had has been the making of peace with the Turkish Empire. Those are the two great outstanding difficulties, but I am very hopeful in regard to both of them. Once those two are settled, then I think we may say that peace has been made; but until then we cannot say, in spite of the fact that we have signed Treaties of Peace, that peace has been made and established in the world.

Necessary to Stand by Peace Treaties.

The first essential to peace—a stable peace—and reconstruction is that we should stand by our Treaties. There are those who grow weary of these great responsibilities, and who speak as though it were possible to renounce them in this quarter or in that without injustice to other peoples or detriment to ourselves. I venture to say that such arguments are as short-sighted as they are false. The nations and peoples of the world have realised their independence in a measure far greater than ever before the war, and the League of Nations—whatever may be thought of the provisions of the Covenant—stands as witness to their realisation of that truth. No progress can be made towards the rehabilitation of Europe, or the establishment of permanent peace in the world, except upon the basis of acceptance of Treaties and an enforcement of Treaties. There may be relaxations here and there, following the discovery of new conditions, with the consent of all parties. We have had some relaxations of that kind—and I think they are wise modifications of the Treaty—in the matter of allowing more time for payment, and more time for disarmament; and in the prosecution of war criminals we made a concession to German national susceptibilities. There have been questions of that kind where, by the consent of all the Powers, there have been modifications. But the Treaties must stand where such consent is not forthcoming, and no signatory should have the right to override any part of a Treaty to which we are all parties. The British Empire from end to end is bound by honour and by interest alike to the Treaties which it has signed. We have appended our signatures—all of us—and we must honour those signatures. Unless Treaty faith is maintained, an era of disorganisation, increasing misery and smouldering war will continue, and civilisation may very easily be destroyed by a prolongation of that state of things.

I propose to call on Lord Curzon, on his return, to give the Conference a comprehensive survey of foreign affairs, and I will not anticipate his detailed statement

Opening Speech by Mr. Lloyd George.

Empire's Relations with United States and Japan.

now. But I should like to refer very briefly to one of the most urgent and important of foreign questions—the relations of the Empire with the United States and Japan. There is no quarter of the world where we desire more greatly to maintain peace and fair play for all nations and to avoid a competition of armaments than in the Pacific and in the Far East. Our Alliance with Japan has been a valuable factor in that direction in the past. We have found Japan a faithful ally, who rendered us valuable assistance in an hour of serious and very critical need. The British Empire will not easily forget that Japanese men-of-war escorted the transports which brought the Australian and New Zealand forces to Europe at a time when German cruisers were still at large in the Indian and Pacific Oceans. We desire to preserve that well-tried friendship which has stood us both in good stead, and to apply it to the solution of all questions in the Far East, where Japan has special interests, and where we ourselves, like the United States, desire equal opportunities and the open door. Not least amongst these questions is the future of China, which looks to us, as to the United States, for sympathetic treatment and fair play. No greater calamity could overtake the world than any further accentuation of the world's divisions upon the lines of race. The British Empire has done signal service to humanity in bridging those divisions in the past; the loyalty of the King Emperor's Asiatic peoples is the proof. To depart from that policy, to fail in that duty, would not only greatly increase the dangers of international war; it would divide the British Empire against itself. Our foreign policy can never range itself in any sense upon the differences of race and civilisation between East and West. It would be fatal to the Empire.

Need for Friendly Co-operation with United States.

We look confidently to the Government and people of the United States for their sympathy and understanding in this respect. Friendly co-operation with the United States is for us a cardinal principle, dictated by what seems to us the proper nature of things, dictated by instinct quite as much as by reason and common sense. We desire to work with the great Republic in all parts of the world. Like it, we want stability and peace, on the basis of liberty and justice. Like it, we desire to avoid the growth of armaments, whether in the Pacific or elsewhere, and we rejoice that American opinion should be showing so much earnestness in that direction at the present time. We are ready to discuss with American statesmen any proposal for the limitation of armaments which they may wish to set out, and we can undertake that no such overtures will find a lack of willingness on our part to meet them. In the meantime, we cannot forget that the very life of the United Kingdom, as also of Australia and New Zealand, indeed, the whole Empire, has been built upon sea power—and that sea power is necessarily the basis of the whole Empire's existence. We have, therefore, to look to the measures which our security requires; we aim at nothing more; we cannot possibly be content with less.

Constitutional Progress of British Empire.

I do not propose to deal in any detail with the agenda for this Conference to-day. We have no cut-and-dried agenda to present. We will discuss that amongst ourselves. The British Government has been under some suspicion in some quarters of harbouring designs against this gathering as a Conference. We are said to be dissatisfied with the present state of the Empire, and to wish to alter its organisation in some revolutionary way. Gentlemen, we are not at all dissatisfied. The British Empire is progressing very satisfactorily from a constitutional standpoint, as well as in other ways. The direct communication between Prime Ministers, established during the war, has, I think, worked well, and we have endeavoured to keep you thoroughly abreast of all important developments in foreign affairs by special messages sent out weekly, or even more frequently when circumstances required. Indeed, at every important Conference either here or on the Continent, one of the first duties I felt I ought to discharge was to send as full and as complete and as accurate an account as I possibly could, not merely of the decisions taken, but of the atmosphere, which counts for so very much. I have invariably, to the best of my ability, sent accounts, some of them of the most confidential character, which would give to the Dominions even the impressions which we formed, and which gave you information beyond what we could possibly communicate to the press.

Minister of Canadian Government at Washington.

Another change, which has taken place since the war, is the decision of the Canadian Government to have a Minister of its own at Washington—a very important development. We have co-operated willingly with that, and we shall welcome a Canadian colleague at Washington as soon as the appointment is made. We shall be glad to have any suggestions that occur to you as to the methods by which the business of the Dominions in London, so far as it passes through our hands, may be transacted with greater dignity and efficiency, though you will all, I think, agree that the Empire owes much to Lord Milner and Lord Long for their services in the Colonial Office during a period of great difficulty and stress. We shall also welcome any suggestions which you may have to make for associating yourselves more closely with the conduct of foreign relations. Any suggestions which you can make upon that subject we shall be very delighted to hear and discuss. There was a time when Downing Street controlled the Empire; to-day the Empire is in charge of Downing Street.

Opening Speech by Mr. Lloyd George.

Asks for Suggestions for Conduct of Empire's Business.

On all matters of common concern we want to know your standpoint, and we want to tell you ours.

Mutual Relationship within Empire.

I will give you my general conception of the mutual relationship in which we meet. The British Dominions and the Indian Empire, one and all, played a great part in the war for freedom, and probably a greater part than any nation, except the very greatest Powers. When the history of that struggle comes to be written, your exertions side by side with ours will constitute a testimony to British institutions such as no other Empire in history can approach or emulate. In recognition of their services and achievements in the war the British Dominions have now been accepted fully into the comity of nations by the whole world. They are signatories to the Treaty of Versailles and of all the other Treaties of Peace; they are members of the Assembly of the League of Nations, and their representatives have already attended meetings of the League; in other words, they have achieved full national status, and they now stand beside the United Kingdom as equal partners in the dignities and the responsibilities of the British Commonwealth. If there are any means by which that status can be rendered even clearer to their own communities and to the world at large we shall be glad to have them put forward at this Conference.

India's Status.

India's achievements were also very great. Her soldiers lie with ours in all the theatres of war, and no Britisher can ever forget the gallantry and promptitude with which she sprang forward to the King Emperor's service when war was declared. That is no small tribute both to India and to the Empire of which India is a part. The causes of the war were unknown to India; its theatre in Europe was remote. Yet India stood by her allegiance heart and soul, from the first call to arms, and some of her soldiers are still serving far from their homes and families in the common cause. India's loyalty in that great crisis is eloquent to me of the Empire's success in bridging the civilisations of East and West, in reconciling wide differences of history, of tradition and of race, and in bringing the spirit and the genius of a great Asiatic people into willing co-operation with our own. Important changes have been effected in India this year, and India is making rapid strides towards the control of her own affairs. She has also proved her right to a new status in our councils; that status she gained during the war, and she has maintained it during the peace, and I welcome the representatives of India to our great Council of the Empire to-day. We shall, I feel sure, gain much by the fact that her sentiments and her interests will be interpreted to us here by her own representatives.

Result of the Empire's Unity.

I have given you my view of our relationship. May I just remind the Conference of what our unity has meant. The war demonstrated—I might say, revealed—to the world, including ourselves, that the British Empire was not an abstraction but a living force to be reckoned with. Who would have believed before the war that the Empire outside Great Britain would, in an hour of emergency, have raised two millions and more soldiers and sent them to the battlefield to serve the common cause, side by side with the United Kingdom? Even the ardent soul of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, in his most glowing moments, never predicted so impressive a rally to the flag. The opportune revelation of the reality of the British Empire has, in my judgment, altered the history of the world. Those of us who know—and many if not most of us sitting at this table were here during the most critical hours of the war and sat at this same table—those of us who know how narrow the margin was between victory and defeat, can proclaim without hesitation that without these two million men, that came from outside the United Kingdom, Prussianism would probably have triumphed in the West and the East before American troops arrived on the stage, and Lord Curzon, who is at this moment discussing with M. Briand, the Prime Minister of France, the execution of a victorious Treaty, would have been discussing how best to carry out the humiliating conditions dictated by the triumphant war lords of Germany.

The reign of unbridled force would have been supreme, and this generation would have had to spend its days in interpreting and enduring that calamitous fact in all spheres of human activity and influence. The unregulated unity of the British Empire saved France, Britain and civilisation from that catastrophe.

Our present troubles are bad enough. Victory has its cares as well as defeat. But they are ephemeral and will soon be surmounted. Defeat would have reversed the engine of progress, and democracy would have been driven back centuries on its tracks. If I may venture to quote what I said at the Imperial Conference of 1907 when Sir Thomas Smartt and I first met—I think we two and the present Colonial Secretary are the only survivors—I ventured to say, in reference to the Empire:—

> "We agree with our Colonial comrades of the Dominions that all this unity is worth concerted effort, even if that effort at the outset costs us something. The federation of free commonwealths is worth making some sacrifice for. One never knows when its strength will be essential to the great cause of human freedom, and that is priceless."

I venture to say that that prediction has been gloriously proved by great events.

Empire Based on Goodwill.

The British Empire is a saving fact in a very distracted world. It is the most hopeful experiment in human organisation which the world has yet seen. It is not so much that it combines men of many races, tongues, traditions and creeds in one system of government. Other Empires have done that, but the British Empire differs from all in one essential respect. It is based not on force but on goodwill and a common understanding. Liberty is its binding principle. Where that principle has not hitherto been applied it is gradually being introduced into the structure.

Development of the Empire.

It is that willing and free association of many nations and peoples which this Conference represents. Think of what we stand for in this room to-day. First of all the long political development of the British Isles, with all its splendours and its pains, the crucible from which the framework of the whole great structure has emerged. Canada, British and French; South Africa, British and Dutch—both now great Dominions whose unity is due to the free and willing combination of two proud races in a single nationhood. Australia and New Zealand, British civilisations both, but planted and developed with a genius of their own by the sheer enterprise and grit of their peoples in the furthest antipodes. India a mighty civilisation, whose rulers were known and respected throughout the western world before the first English post was planted on Indian soil. Side by side with these the wonderful varied colonies and protectorates in their different stages of development, which the Secretary of State for the Colonies is here to represent. In all the marvellous achievement of our peoples which this gathering reflects I am most deeply impressed by the blending of East and West—India with her far descended culture and her intensely varied types, so different from ours, present in this room to concert a common policy with us in the world's affairs, and to harmonise, as we hope, still more completely her civilisation and ours. It is our duty here to present the ideals of this great association of peoples in willing loyalty to one Sovereign, to take counsel together for the progress and welfare of all, and to keep our strength both moral and material, a united power for justice, liberty and peace.

Mr. Lloyd George: As to whether there should be a general discussion now or an adjournment till this afternoon or to-morrow, I am entirely in the hands of the members of the Conference, but I think there would be an advantage in having some discussion about our programme, and also if members would make any general observations which they may care to do at this stage, with reference to matters which I have referred to.

Question of Publication of Speeches.

Mr. Massey: Do you intend to publish this speech?

Mr. Lloyd George: That is another matter; the question of publication is a very important one. It is very undesirable that everything should be published, because we will have to discuss some things very freely amongst ourselves. For example, it would not be desirable to publish a verbatim report of our discussions on the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, because it is obvious we have to say things here amongst ourselves which might be regarded as provocative if published, and therefore I think this must be done with judgment. We must decide amongst ourselves what we will and what we will not publish.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain: I presume that what we are saying now will not be published, but I think it would be advantageous to publish the statement you have made, with, if the representatives of the Dominions so wish, some observations of their own on similar lines. Then I suggest we can proceed to more confidential discussions, of which a full account will not be given to the papers. As you say, it is obvious that when you come to a detailed discussion of many of the questions before us it would be quite impossible to deal with all the essential facts if we knew that all that was said was going to be published.

Opening Speech by Mr. Meighen.

Mr. Meighen: I think we might utilise a little more time to-day in hearing statements from some of us of a general character and then proceed to lay down the agenda. As far as I am concerned, I do not think that anything I might say in advance of our discussion of concrete subjects would be of sufficient importance to warrant a day or even half-a-day's adjournment for preparation. I have listened to the illuminating introduction of the Prime Minister, and I cannot bring myself to think that such a pregnant and impressive address will not receive full publication.

It is unfortunate that the obligation of speaking first should fall upon me, the least experienced representative of the Dominions, but it is well that the traditional order of precedence be followed.

Present Situation in Canada.

The Prime Minister referred to conditions in the British Isles, which, of course, we all from the various Dominions watch with great interest. The words of encouragement which he gave were very welcome to my ears. In Canada we do not suffer in the same degree from unemployment, but none the less we have much more than the normal. The extent and proportion of our agricultural population is such that we have in our belief less unrest than in most countries, and we feel also that our comprehensive and reasonably generous policy towards returned men, particularly to those entering upon agriculture, has reduced the evil in that respect.

The information that the Prime Minister has given as to the progress of peace negotiations, or rather the re-establishment of actual peace upon the basis of the peace treaties, is indeed encouraging. I feared myself that he would not be able to make quite so gratifying a report.

Canadian Opinion on Japanese Treaty.

As to the observations he made on the principles to be kept in mind in our deliberations on the Japanese Treaty and its renewal, we cannot over-estimate their importance. Possibly in the outlying Dominions we are not disposed to give the same attention to one feature which he draws attention to, the paramount necessity of seeing to it that no step is taken that leaves out of mind the importance of mitigating racial divisions. What I have to say as to this subject will, of course, be more appropriate later. All I can do now is to assure you that I, representing Canada, approach this question with a full sense of responsibility, and in seeking to interpret what I believe is the prevailing opinion of my country on the subject, I do so with a firm resolve to reach, if it can be reached, common ground with all representatives here.

Canada satisfied with Constitutional Progress.

The Prime Minister referred to suspicions that had been generated of designs on the autonomy of the Dominions, conspiracies to bring about revolutionary changes in our Constitutional relations. I may say that I do not think any responsible representative of any Dominion, I am quite certain of Canada, requires to have his mind cleansed of evil thought in that respect.

Acknowledgment of Tribute of Prime Minister to Services Rendered by Dominions.

It is due to the Conference, and particularly the Prime Minister, that I should gratefully acknowledge here his striking and memorable words in referring to the services rendered by the British Dominions and India during the late war. No finer expression of the feelings of the people of the British Isles has been uttered, and I feel that his valued tribute will be long remembered throughout the length and breadth of the Empire.

Value of Imperial Conferences.

There can be no doubt as to the value of Conferences such as this. The whole progress of the world, particularly since the war, has emphasised the value of conferences. Indeed, it is the method that has been incorporated as the very basis of the new order which the world is seeking to establish whether under the name of the League of Nations, or under some other name or under no name at all. For ourselves, of course, for this Britannic Commonwealth of nations, this method or principle has a peculiar significance. We are united by the history of our being, by a mutual trust, and by a fundamental intention to preserve a common allegiance. We therefore confer under conditions particularly favourable to free and open communication one with another, and in an atmosphere of complete mutual confidence.

Value of publishing Proceedings and need for frequent Conferences.

There are two conditions of success that I think of importance, though perhaps they are only partly under our control. If our conclusions are to be sound, and being sound, to be acted upon, they must be accorded not only general support, but intelligent support throughout the countries we represent. It is therefore essential that we fully inform the public of our proceedings. There may, in respect of some questions, be limitations; we shall indeed at times be bound to respect what may be called the right of privacy of Governments and peoples other than our own. The problem is not a simple one, but I venture to suggest that it is better in the long run to err on the side of publicity than on the side of secrecy. The other condition is that such conferences as these should be as frequent and as regular as the growing necessities of inter-Dominion and inter-Empire relations demand. Time, I know, is important. It is difficult for Canadian Ministers to be absent, and that difficulty is accentuated in the case of Ministers of other Dominions. The expeditious despatch of business while here will assist all round.

I shall reserve any further remarks until we reach the discussion of the definite subjects that are to be brought before us.

Question of Publication.

Mr. Hughes: I am not quite clear what you desire to do. I understand that the suggestion originally was that after you had addressed the Conference, we should have an opportunity of considering what you had said

Mr. Lloyd George: That was my idea.

Mr. Hughes: I think it is a good idea because you have covered a good deal of ground which is all very much to the point. There is a number of questions on the agenda paper, and, if we are going to have a general discussion, it is desirable that we should put a limit on the time to be devoted to it. If we are given time to consider what you have said we shall be able to confine our remarks within shorter limits, so I prefer that we should adjourn. For the same reason I do not think we can gain very much by meeting again this afternoon. Moreover, it would be hardly possible for each of the Dominion representatives and of the representatives of India to make their statements during an afternoon sitting. I think, however, it is most desirable that we should begin and complete what may be termed the preliminary discussions in one day, if that be humanly possible, so that I am in favour of adjourning the discussion until to-morrow.

Recommends as much Publicity as Possible.

As to publicity, I see no reason, Mr. Lloyd George, why your speech should not be published in extenso, but there may be passages that perhaps you or some other representative may think undesirable. Personally, I can't think of any, but there may be some. The discussions which will have to be held later fall, however, in a different category; and, further, it may be that the preliminary discussion on the points to which you have referred may have to be treated in the same way; but one can't say definitely beforehand. I take it we are not met here merely to register decisions which may, or may not, be capable of realisation, but to suggest something, and some of the subjects which will have to be considered relate to matters which concern other countries. It is necessary that we should be able to speak quite freely in regard to these subjects, and it is clear that we cannot, therefore, publish full reports. I think therefore that, while the fullest possible publicity should be given, that it should be determined by some machinery set up for the purpose, what is to be and what is not to be given to the press. Perhaps the amount of information made public when we were here during the war left something to be desired, and I think we can give much fuller information now. Personally, I am in favour of the widest publicity which is compatible with our achieving the objects that we have met for. For the moment, I am in favour of adjourning the discussion, of publishing your statement in extenso, subject to any excisions you yourself may make, and then following the lines as to publicity which I have mentioned.

Recommends Publication of Prime Minister's Speech.

General Smuts: I think it is a good suggestion of Mr. Hughes that we should adjourn the discussion until to-morrow. Your speech, Mr. Lloyd George, in any case should I think, be published as a general statement made at the opening of this Conference, and I would suggest that to-morrow the other Prime Ministers might make any general observations which they wish to do on the position as a whole, and these might also be published.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think that is very desirable, and, if I may say so, that it would be advantageous if the Prime Ministers made speeches which can be published, because so much depends on the atmosphere that is created.

General Smuts: To let your statement be published by itself without speeches by some other Prime Ministers might again lead to misunderstanding.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is so.

Question of Publication.

General Smuts: And it might be taken that you had given a lead which the others had not followed and that they had taken a different line from you, so I think it would be a proper course that your statement should be published immediately, and that to-morrow the other Prime Ministers should make general statements of such a character as will be fit for publication. After that we might proceed to details and settle from day to day what we are going to publish of our proceedings and what not. It will depend on the nature of the discussion each day.

Mr. Lloyd George: That rather fits in with what I have just heard about Lord Curzon's return from Paris. He will not be ready until Wednesday, so to-morrow might be very usefully occupied as proposed. I think the publication of the statement would create a very good atmosphere throughout the Empire.

General Smuts: A second point. We ought to be able to discuss our agenda and general procedure. I think that might follow the general discussion.

Agrees with Publication of Prime Minister's Speech.

Mr. Massey: I have nothing to add to what has been said by the previous speakers, and I may say I agree almost entirely with what has been said by Mr. Hughes and General Smuts. I am very strongly of opinion, Mr. Lloyd George, that your speech should be published. I look upon it as the most important speech delivered since the end of the war and a speech which to the Dominions will give great satisfaction, and, I believe, to the United Kingdom itself, and great confidence to a number of people and a very large number of citizens who are very anxious about the present position and who feel a little anxiety with regard to what may happen at this Conference. Your speech will inspire confidence and do a great deal of good. As to going on with the business, I am very glad to agree with the suggestion that we should adjourn until to-morrow, and perhaps for a selfish reason, because, not expecting the Conference to go on to-day, I had made an important appointment, so important to my own country that even if the Conference went on I should have to absent myself, but I think the right thing is being done. As regards publicity, we shall have very seriously to consider this matter. My own opinion is that open diplomacy is impossible. I would give the public as much information as possible, but we should consider very seriously what ought to be made public. That is my opinion. I am quite prepared to give way to the majority of the members. I do not think it is necessary to say anything further, and I shall be glad to fall in with the suggestions already put forward.

Mr. Montagu: We shall be very glad if the discussion could be adjourned, as Mr. Hughes suggested, until to-morrow morning, and, if the Conference would agree, I should like to say that, although during the present proceedings the Secretary of State for India may be normally the head of the Indian deputation, it would be a source of great satisfaction to us if the Conference would allow the Indian delegates themselves to assume a leading part in the discussion.

Mr Lloyd George: I would suggest that one member of the Indian delegation should be deputed to speak to-morrow.

Mr. Montagu: That will be arranged.

General Smuts: We have had no discussion yet on the publication of to-day's proceedings.

Mr Chamberlain: I did not take Mr. Meighen's statement as covering the debate which we propose to have to-morrow, but, if he so wishes, the Prime Minister of Canada could have the shorthand report corrected and then it could be taken as delivered at the opening of the discussion to-morrow for publication with the observations of the other Prime Ministers. Because, if Mr. Meighen does not want to say anything more than what he has said to-day, he won't want to repeat it all over again.

Sir Maurice Hankey: Is Mr. Meighen's statement to be published to-day?

General Smuts: No; his speech will appear to-morrow with those of the other Prime Ministers.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is better from the point of the press that they should not get too much material at once and that my speech should go out to-night and yours to-morrow.

Mr. Massey: Yes.

(At this stage the discussion was adjourned until 11 A.M. on Tuesday, June 21.)

Opening Speech by Mr. Hughes.

Mr. Hughes: I desire to congratulate you on the admirable review of the position that you presented to us yesterday. I am sure it was most valuable as well as most interesting. We were all very glad to learn from you, Sir, that though the adjustment of those matters which arose out of the war is not yet complete, all our obligations, and our ex-enemies' obligations under the Treaty, were in a fair way of being fulfilled. We recognise that there are difficulties, and that it is not easy to satisfy those who preach a counsel of perfection, but I think we ought to congratulate you and the Government on having, during these last two years, weathered a great storm full of menacing possibilities, and though it would savour of too much optimism to say that we had yet reached the haven, still, on the whole, we have much to be thankful for. I very sincerely congratulate you as the head of the Government of the United Kingdom.

You have asked us to consider and review the situation as it presents itself to us, and I think we may do this with advantage before we pass on to the discussion of the various questions, or, indeed, decide the order in which we are to discuss them. The circumstances of this Conference are in themselves sufficiently remarkable. This is the first time we have met since the dark shadow of the great war has been lifted, and we are showing to the world and to the various parts of the Empire that those counsels which we took together during the war were not ephemeral expedients, but that we are resolved to continue along that path in company, being guided by each other's counsel and believing firmly that in co-operation and in unity lies the safety of all, and, in no small degree, the peace and welfare of the world.

Need for a means of concerting the Empire's policy.

Well, Sir, we are here—some of us have come very great distances, and all have come at great personal inconvenience. Some of us, like Mr. Massey and myself, have come 12,000 miles. We have each given our views to our representative Parliaments as to what this Conference intends, or hopes, to do. Much is expected from us, and I do venture earnestly to hope that this Conference will do something which will convince the people that we have found a practical and sure way of bridging that apparently impossible chasm which divides complete autonomy of the several parts of the Empire from united action upon matters affecting us all.

That we must do something is essential if this Conference is not to be a last magnificent flare of a dying illumination. I am sure, Sir, you will realise how difficult it is for us to leave a Parliament for five or six months. I shall not, I hope, be suspected of trespassing upon the sacred domain of domestic politics if I ask you just to conjure up in that vivid Celtic mind of yours—as I do in mine—the possibility of your being away for six months.

Now, amongst the great problems that are to be considered three stand out. You referred to all of them yesterday. They are:—Foreign Policy in general, the Anglo-Japanese Treaty in particular, and Naval Defence. There are other problems, of course, which are intimately associated with these. If we are to give effect to the principle, which I take it has already been accepted, viz., the right of the Dominions to sit at the Council table on a footing of equality, and to discuss with you and the other representatives the question of the Foreign Policy of the Empire—these also must be not only considered, but settled. I do not think I am misinterpreting the opinions of all my friends here when I say that this voice, this share, in the Council of the Empire in regard to foreign policy must be a real one, must be one of substance and not merely a shadow. This involves the creation of some kind of machinery, and here we come to a very difficult position, to which I shall refer very shortly later.

We are now asked to deal with foreign policy, and in order that we may do this, you have said that Lord Curzon would review the present position of foreign affairs. We shall await that statement with great interest. The whole Empire is concerned in foreign policy, though this was for many years regarded as the sole prerogative of Great Britain. Wars are hatched by foreign policy. No one is able to say that any act affecting foreign nations will not, in the fullness of time, lead to war. No one is able to say that the most apparently trivial and innocent action will not involve us in international turmoil, and in the fullness of time bring us to the bloody plains of war. So, when we see on every side the British line—or, if you like, the line of this Commonwealth of British nations—being lengthened and the line of defence necessarily thinned, the points of potential danger multiplied—we are naturally uneasy. We have seen that a cloud no bigger than a man's hand can cover the whole heavens. And so, Sir—I speak only for myself, of course—I am sure you will quite understand our desire to know the reasons for your policy in Mesopotamia, in Palestine, in Russia, in Egypt, and your policy in Greece and Turkey. If I have singled these things out it is not because they cover the whole field of foreign policy, but because these matters are perhaps the most obvious. Opening Speech by Mr. Hughes.

Now, if we are to have an effective voice in the foreign policy of this country, we must first of all know precisely how we stand, and the reasons for the policy adopted and the extent to which we are committed to it. I start with the assumption that our right to decide foreign policy is not denied. Very well, let us consider the thing under two heads—first, in regard to matters of foreign policy as they now present themselves before the British Government, and second in regard to policy in the future. We can express our opinions, and if needs be modify the present foreign policy by a full discussion and expression of opinion. Decisions can be registered and given effect to. But the position in regard to policy in the future is very difficult. Every day a new situation arises or may arise. How is it to be dealt with? We shall be scattered to the four quarters of the earth. How are the Dominions to have an effective voice on foreign policy when, as things stand, they can only be told after things have been done and are not consulted beforehand? That is a question which we shall have to consider. I stated, Sir, at the outset that other matters than those three of which I spoke—Foreign Policy in general, the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, and Naval Defence—will arise intimately related to these, and that we shall have to discuss them.

Difficulty of communication.

I come to one now. You yourself said yesterday, Sir, that direct communication between the Prime Minister of Great Britain and his colleagues overseas had worked well. So it has; that is to say, the principle has worked well; but I think I ought to tell you, Sir, that it is rarely that one does not read in the newspapers, sometimes a day, sometimes more than a day, before receiving your telegrams, a very good imitation of their substance. This arises through the great delay in the transmission of messages.

I am not going into details now—I have set this matter down on the agenda—but I want to say that it is absolutely essential, if we are going to have any effective voice in foreign policy, that we shall be in the closest possible touch with you and with each other, and that we shall know, not when the thing is done, but before the thing is done, what is intended, or what is desired to be done. This is essential because in foreign policy, as, indeed, in many cases in domestic policy, you cannot delay. Action is imperative. A thing that is possible to-day is impossible to-morrow, and action must be taken. So, if we are going to have a real voice in foreign policy, then we must have improved communication—means whereby you will be able to communicate quickly with your colleagues overseas, and they with you and with each other. That is absolutely essential. When we come to that item on the agenda paper, I shall show you, in one or two ways, how some improvement may be made. But I confess that all I can suggest falls very far short of that ideal condition of things which one would desire.

Anglo-Japanese Treaty.

Now I leave foreign policy in general, and come to the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. Here we are dealing with a matter definite and urgent. It is not a thing to be settled in the future, but now. The British Government has only postponed settlement in order that the matter might be dealt with round this table. It is an urgent matter. It must be settled without delay. The attitude of Australia towards it has been quite clearly stated. We have not a clean slate before us. If we had to consider for the first time whether we should have a Treaty with Japan, the position might be very different. We have not. For many years a Treaty has existed between Japan and Britain. Its terms have been modified, but in substance the existing Treaty has been in force for a long time. No doubt it cannot be renewed precisely in its present form. It must conform to the requirements of the League of Nations. But the case for renewal is very strong, if not indeed overwhelming. To Australia, as you will quite understand, this Treaty with Japan has special significance.

In favour of renewal.

Speaking broadly, we are in favour of its renewal. But there are certain difficulties which must be faced. One of these arises out of the attitude of America towards this Treaty. I am sure I state the opinion of Australia when I say the people have a very warm corner in their hearts for America. They see in America to-day what they themselves hope to be in the future. We have a country very similar in extent and resources, and it may be laid down as a sine quâ non that any future Treaty with Japan, to be satisfactory to Australia, must specifically exclude the possibility of a war with the United States of America. It ought to do this specifically, but if not specifically then by implication so clear and unmistakable that he who runs may read. It is perfectly true that the present Treaty does this by implication, but not so plainly as to preclude misinterpretation. In any future Treaty we must guard against even the suspicion of hostility or unfriendliness to the United States. I hope you are not forgetting, Sir, that there are many who seek to misinterpret the intentions of this country, and to confound them we must put in plain words what are our intentions. That being so, and subject to that condition—which is not a new condition at all, because Japan has accepted the position for many years—Australia is very strongly in favour of the renewal of the Treaty. As I have said, the Treaty clearly must conform to the provisions of the League of Nations Covenant, and it must have regard to the circumstances of the world to-day, but I think it ought to be renewed; I am strongly in favour of its being renewed. I think from every point of view that it would be well that the Treaty with Japan should be renewed. Should we not be in a better position to exercise greater influence over the Eastern policy as an Ally of that great Eastern Power, than as her potential enemy? Now, if Japan is excluded from the family of great Western nations—and, mark, to turn our backs on the Treaty is certainly to exclude Japan—she will be isolated, her high national pride wounded in its most tender spot. To renew this Treaty is to impose on her some of those restraints inseparable from Treaties with other civilised nations like ourselves. We will do well for the world's peace—we will do well for China—we will do well for the Commonwealth of British nations to renew this Treaty. We want peace.

CANADA

American Objections.

The world wants peace. Which policy is most likely to promote, to ensure, the world's peace? As I see it, the renewal of the Treaty with the Japanese Empire. Now let us consider America's objections to the renewal of the Treaty. Some of these relate to the emigration of Japanese to America; but the hostility to Japan, more or less marked, that exists in America to-day, cannot be wholly accounted for by this fact. As it is vital in the interest of civilisation that a good understanding should exist between America and ourselves, we should endeavour to do everything in our power to ascertain exactly what it is to which America takes exception in this Treaty. We ought not to give her room for criticism which the world could support. We must make it perfectly clear that the Treaty is not aimed against her, and that it could never be used against her. War with America is unthinkable. As the contingency is quite an impossible one, it need not be seriously considered. Yet it is well that the attitude of Australia should be made quite clear.

Suggests Conference with America and Japan.

Whether it would be wiser to invite a Conference with America and Japan, to ascertain what would be mutually acceptable, is a suggestion which I throw out. If one were quite sure that America desired, or was prepared to accept, what would form a reasonable basis of an Alliance with Japan, then I certainly would strongly press the suggestion. But in any case we ought to try and ascertain precisely what America's views are on this most important matter.

Importance of the question of Disarmament.

Now I turn from the consideration of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, Sir, to a question of supreme importance which you raised yesterday, and it is one which is related both to the Anglo-Japanese Treaty and to Naval Defence—I mean the question of disarmament. You said, Sir, and I am sure the world will be very glad to read those words of yours, that you would welcome any suggestion and discuss with any Power any propositions for disarmament or limitations of armaments. Yours words come most opportunely. I think this is the psychological moment. We ought not to underestimate the value of this Conference—it is no use denying the fact that in America they do distinguish between England and the Dominions in a very marked way—and a suggestion coming from you backed by the Dominion Prime Ministers, might gain a hearing where the voice of England alone failed. After all, the distinction which Americans draw between us is easy to understand. History partly explains it. They see, too, in us replicas of themselves. They see us struggling and fighting towards the goal that they have already attained. And I think they are right in supposing that, subject to that determination which we have to achieve our destiny in company with each other and with Britain, we resemble so many Americas. We are free democracies. We want peace. We at least are free from the suspicion of Imperialistic ambitions. The world, tired of war, is yet neurotic, its nervous system so disturbed by war that while it cries aloud for peace, force is the first thing to which it turns to redress its grievances. You cannot expect, you cannot hope for any more favourable moment that the present. If you fail to secure agreement for the limitation of armaments now, how can you expect to do so in the years to come? The appalling race for naval supremacy has already begun, although the fires of the great war are not yet cold. It creates interests in the various countries where this suicidal race is run. This vicious rivalry grows by what it feeds on. Every year it becomes more difficult to stop. Speak therefore now on behalf of this gathering of Prime Ministers. Let us give the world, weary of war and staggering beneath its crushing burdens, a lead. Invite the United States of America, Japan and France to meet us. We cannot hope that the world will beat its sword into a ploughshare, but at any rate it can stop building more ships. Let us stop naval construction and naval expenditure other than that necessary for the maintenance of existing units without prejudice to what may be agreed upon hereafter. In this matter, the first step is everything. If the world resolves to stop making any further preparations for war, everything is possible; until that step is taken, we are only beating the air.

Opening Speech by Mr. Hughes.

Such an invitation issued with such authority behind it would, I think, find great support in America, and I hope and believe in Japan too. In ten years time, in five years time, the position will be that both these countries will be poorer. They cannot continue such a competition indefinitely. If they persist, we and all the great nations of the world must follow their example. What hope does such a prospect hold out to the war-weary world? To stop naval construction pending a permanent settlement of the basis for naval power will not prejudice their interests. The relative strength of each will not be affected by stopping now. I do most strongly urge you to set an example, speaking as you will be able to do on behalf, not merely of England, but on behalf of all those free nations whose representatives are gathered here. Let us show to the world that these young nations gathered round this table have resolved to make their entrance into world politics by setting an example which the world has long wanted. I am not without hopes that such an invitation on your part, and such an example on ours, would be provocative of great good and prove to be the turning point in the world's history.

Need for adequate Naval Defence.

I come now to the last point with which I intend to deal at length, and that is Naval Defence. Whatever may be agreed upon, one thing is clear, that we must have such naval defence as is adequate for our safety. Naturally the amount of force necessary to ensure our safety in a world which has agreed to suspend naval construction, a world in which the three great Naval Powers have, for example, come to such an understanding as would have the force and effect of an alliance, would be much less than in a world which resounds with the clang of hammer beating into shape bigger and still bigger navies. That applies, too, to the renewal or non-renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, but in any case we must have such naval defence as is necessary for our security. The war and the Panamá Canal has shifted the world's stage from the Mediterranean and the Atlantic to the Pacific. The stage upon which the great world drama is to be played in the future is in the Pacific. The American Navy is now in those waters. Peace in the Pacific means peace for this Empire and for the world.

With an agreement between three Great Naval Powers—or, at worst, between two—then the force necessary to defend this Empire by sea—and that it rests on sea power is certain, and I am never tired of repeating this most significant fact to those who are apt to forget how the British Empire came into being and has been maintained—would be much less. But whatever it is we must have it.

Part of Dominions in Empire Defence.

And now one word about the part of the Dominions in Empire defence. You, Sir, said some time ago that Britain had paid so dearly for victory and was groaning under such a crushing burden of debt that it could no longer alone be responsible for the defence of the Empire by sea as it had heretofore, and that the other parts of the Empire must do their share. To that doctrine I subscribe without reservation. I think it is the corollary of our admission into the councils of the Empire to determine the foreign policy. The foreign policy determined or approved by us at this Conference may lead to war. In any case the foreign policy of a nation must be limited by its power to enforce it, whether that power be wholly resident in itself, or come from an alliance, or from the League of Nations. The ambitions of men and nations are curbed by their material power. In our case, sea power is, and must always be, the determining factor of our foreign policy. Now we cannot fairly ask for the right to decide the foreign policy of the Empire and say that we will have no part whatever in naval defence, we will not pay our share. If you ask me what is our share, I say frankly that I am not prepared at this moment to indicate it. We can do that when we come to deal with the matter in detail, but one principle seems to emerge and it is this. I do not think that our share per capita should be as great as Britain's share per capita, because Britain has Crown Colonies, and dependencies, and India to defend. But whatever is our fair share should be borne upon a per capita basis by all the Dominions. That, I think, is the only fair and proper basis. If the converse be conceded for a moment, and some pay more per capita than others, then I do not understand the basis of union amongst us. Dangers to the Empire or to any part of it are to be met surely by unity of action. That is at once the principle upon which the Empire rests, and upon which its security depends. The Dominions could not exist if it were not for the British Navy. We must not forget this. We are a united Empire or we are nothing. Now who is to say from what quarter dangers will come to any one of us? It comes now from the East and to-morrow from the West. But from whatever quarter it comes we meet it as a united Empire, the whole of our strength is thrown against the danger which threatens us. If some Dominions say " we are not in any danger, you are, you pay; we will not, or cannot, contribute towards naval defence," an impossible position is created. I cannot subscribe to such a doctrine. It is incompatible with the circumstances of our relationship to Britain and to each other, it menaces our safety and our very existence, it is a negation of our unity.

I need hardly say that I do not believe that the Dominion quota for naval defence should be expressed in terms of a money contribution, but in terms of Dominion Navies. This is a point upon which the Admiralty has expressed itself very strongly, and the suggestion of monetary contribution is not to be seriously considered. In any case, we shall be able to discuss the matter when naval defence is being dealt with.

Status of Dominions.

I have nothing further to say on those matters to which you referred yesterday, but reference to one other point may be permitted. It is well that we should know each other's views. We ought not to discuss things in the dark. It has been suggested that a Constitutional Conference should be held next year. It may be that I am very dense, but I am totally at a loss to understand what it is that this Constitutional Conference proposes to do. Is it that the Dominions are seeking new powers, or are desirous of using powers they already have, or is the Conference to draw up a declaration of rights, to set down in black and white the relations between Britain and the Dominions? What is this Conference to do? What is the reason for calling it together? I know, of course, the Resolution of the 1917 Conference. But much water has run under the bridge since then. Surely this Conference is not intended to limit the rights we now have. Yet what new right, what extension of power can it give us? What is there that we cannot do now? What could the Dominions do as independent nations that they cannot do now? What limitation is now imposed upon them? What can they not do, even to encompass their own destruction by sundering the bonds that bind them to the Empire? What yet do they lack? Canada has asserted her right to make treaties. She has made treaties. She is asserting her right to appoint an Ambassador at Washington. Are these the marks of Slave States, or quasi-sovereignty? In what essential thing does any one of the great Self-Governing Dominions differ from independent nations? It is true there is a sentiment, a figment, a few ancient forms: there is what Sir F. Pollock calls the figment of the right of the British Parliament to make laws affecting the Dominions. Supposing the British Parliament should make a law to-morrow which would take from me the very position in which I stand, namely, a representative of a Parliament that exists and was brought into being by a British Statute. I suppose that would apply to you, General Smuts, and to you, Mr. Meighen. They could pass that law, and although we might be here as individuals, so far as legal or constitutional status is concerned we should have ceased to exist. But, as Mr. F. Pollock says, this power of the British Parliament is a figment, a shadow. Either it must limit our rights of self-government, or it must weaken the bonds of Empire, or it must simply content itself with asserting rights and privileges and responsibilities that are ours already and that none question. In effect, we have all the rights of self-government enjoyed by independent nations. That being the position, what is the Constitutional Conference going to do? The proposal to hold a Constitutional Conference is causing considerable anxiety, at any rate in Australia. So far from anticipating that it is to give us greater power, some fear it will take away some of the powers that we have, and my difficulty is, and has been, to try and allay those doubts which are very strongly held. I think everyone of us is confronted with the same position. I think even this Conference is surrounded with clouds of suspicion. Our right to a name is in question. If we call ourselves a Conference it is wrong; if we call ourselves a Cabinet it is wrong—a Council is still worse. I am sure between General Smuts and myself there is, in fact, very little difference, if any. But, nevertheless, I say that we are treading on very dangerous ground, and I say this to him. We have achieved this wonderful progress—and it is wonderful progress along certain lines. Is he not satisfied with the progress we have made? The difference between the status of the Dominions now and twenty-five years ago is very great. We were Colonies, we became Dominions. We have been accorded the status of nations. Our progress in material greatness has kept pace with our constitutional development. Let us leave well alone. That is my advice. We have now on the agenda paper matters which mark a new era in Empire government. We, the representatives of the Dominions, are met together to formulate a foreign policy for the Empire. What greater advance is conceivable? What remains to us? We are like so many Alexanders. What other worlds have we to conquer? I do not speak of Utopias nor of shadows, but of solid earth. I know of no power that the Prime Minister of Britain has, that General Smuts has not. Our presence here round this table, the agenda paper before us, the basis of equality on which we meet, these things speak in trumpet tones that this Conference of free democratic nations is, as Mr. Lloyd George said yesterday, a living force.

Opening Speech by Mr. Hughes.

Opening Speech by General Smuts.

General Smuts: I should like to associate myself with what has been said by the Prime Minister of Australia in regard to the speech which you made yesterday, and, in particular, speaking on behalf of South Africa, I should like to thank you very, very much for the reference you made to General Botha. General Botha was not only a great South African, but a great man, and his name will remain as one of the greatest men in the history of the British Empire, and I think the references made to him yesterday were fully justified. You opened yesterday, Prime Minister, in a speech, if I may say so, of such power and brilliance, that it is very difficult for us, in fact, impossible for me, to follow on, but we agreed yesterday that the Prime Ministers should each make a general preliminary statement, and so I proceed to make a few remarks upon the topics on which we are called upon to deal here.

Need for Peace.

I think a discussion like this may be useful, because it will disclose in a preliminary and general way the attitude taken up by the Dominions on the topics which we have come here to discuss. I shall not attempt to break fresh ground in the few remarks I am going to make. I am going to adhere more or less to the tenor of what I said in the South African Parliament when the subject matters of this Conference were under debate. What I said was generally approved in Parliament and by the public in South Africa, and I shall therefore adhere to what I said there. I said on that occasion that what the world most needs to-day is peace, a return to a peaceful temper and to the resumption of peaceful and normal industry. To my mind that is the test of all true policy to-day. Peace is wanted by the world. Peace is wanted especially by the peoples of the British Empire. We are a peaceful Empire, our very nature is such that peace is necessary for us. We have no military aims to serve, we have no militaristic ideals, and it is only in a peaceful world that our ideals can be realised. It should, therefore, be the main, in fact, the only object of British policy to secure real peace for the Empire and the world generally. Now the Prime Minister stated in his speech what progress has been made towards the attainment of this ideal. He pointed out that some of the matters which gave us the greatest trouble in Paris had been settled. The question of reparations, which was, perhaps, the most difficult and intricate with which we had to deal in Paris, has finally, after some years of debate and trouble, been eliminated, in a settlement which, I ventue to hope, will prove final and workable. That is a very great advance. The other great advance that has been made—and it is an enormous advance—is the final disarmament of Germany. That the greatest military Empire that has ever existed in history should be reduced to a peace establishment of 100,000 men is something which I considered practically impossible. It is a great achievement, so far-reaching, indeed, that it ought to become the basis of a new departure in world policy. We cannot stop with Germany, we cannot stop with the disarmament of Germany. It is impossible for us to continue to envisage the future of the world from the point of view of war. I believe it is impossible for us to contemplate the piling up of armaments in the future of the world and the exhaustion of our very limited remaining resources in order to carry out a policy of that kind.

Such a policy would be criminal, it would be the betrayal of the causes for which we fought during the war, and if we embarked on such a policy it would be our undoing. If we were to go forward into the future staggering under the load of military and naval armaments whilst our competitors in Central Europe were free from the incubus of great armies, we should be severely handicapped, and in the end we should have the fruits of victory lost to us by our post-war policy. Already circumstances are developing on those lines. Already under the operation of inexorable economic factors we find that the position is developing to the advantage of Central Europe. The depreciation of their currencies, the universal depreciation of currencies, and the unsettlement of the exchanges are having the effect of practical repudiation of liabilities on the part of a large part of the Continent. If we add to our financial responsibilities and have, in addition, to pile on the fresh burdens of new armies and navies I am afraid the future for us is very dark indeed, and we shall in the long run lose all we have won on the field of battle.

Empire's policy should be for Reduction of Armaments.

Armaments depend upon policy, and therefore I press very strongly that our policy should be such as to make the race for armaments impossible. That should be the cardinal feature of our foreign policy. We should not go into the future under this awful handicap of having to support great armaments, build new fleets, raise new armies, whilst our economic competitors are free of that liability under the Peace Treaty. The most fatal mistake of all, in my humble opinion, would be a race of armaments against America. America is the nation that is closest to us in all the human ties. The Dominions look upon her as the oldest of them. She is the relation with whom we most closely agree, and with whom we can most cordially work together. She left our circle a long time ago because of a great historic mistake. I am not sure that a wise policy after the great events through which we have recently passed might not repair the effects of that great historic error, and once more bring America on to lines of general co-operation with the British Empire. America, after all, has proved a staunch and tried friend during the war. She came in late because she did not realise what was at stake. In the very darkest hour of the war she came in and ranged herself on our side. That was, I believe, the determining factor in the victory of our great cause.

Need for close understanding with United States.

Since the war we have somewhat drifted apart. I need not go into the story—I do not know the whole story—it is only known to you here. There are matters on which we have not seen eye to eye, to some extent springing from what happened at Paris and also from mistakes made by statesmen. But these mistakes do not affect the fundamental attitude of the two peoples. To my mind it seems clear that the only path of safety for the British Empire is a path on which she can walk together with America. In saying this I do not wish to be understood as advocating an American alliance. Nothing of the kind. I do not advocate an alliance or any exclusive arrangement with America. It would be undesirable, it would be impossible and unnecessary. The British Empire is not in need of exclusive allies. It emerged from the war quite the greatest Power in the world, and it is only unwisdom or unsound policy that could rob her of that great position. She does not want exclusive alliances. What she wants to see established is more universal friendship in the world. The nations of the British Empire wish to make all the nations of the world more friendly to each other. We wish to remove grounds for misunderstandings and causes of friction, and to bring together all the free peoples of the world in a system of friendly conferences and consultations in regard to their difficulties. We wish to see a real Society of Nations, away from the old ideas and practices of national domination or Imperial domination, which were the real root causes of the great war. No, not in alliances, in any exclusive alliances, but in a new spirit of amity and co-operation do we seek the solution of the problems of the future. Although America is not a member of the League of Nations, there is no doubt that co-operation between her and the British Empire would be the easy and natural thing, and there is no doubt it would be the wise thing.

Far East and Pacific the new focus of world's politics.

In shaping our course for the future, we must bear in mind that the whole world position has radically altered as a result of the war. Europe is no longer what she was, and the power and the position which she once occupied in the world has been largely lost. The great Empires have disappeared. Austria will never rise again. Russia and Germany will no doubt revive, but not in this generation nor in the next; and when they do, they may be very different countries in a world which may be a very different world. The position, therefore, has completely altered. The old viewpoint from which we considered Europe has completely altered. She suffers from an exhaustion, which is the most appalling fact of history; and the victorious countries of Europe are not much better off than the vanquished. No, the scene has shifted on the great stage. To my mind that is the most important fact in the world situation to-day, and the fact to which our foreign policy should have special regard. Our temptation is still to look upon the European stage as of the first importance. It is no longer so; and I suggest we should not be too deeply occupied with it. Let us be friendly and helpful all round to the best of our ability, but let us not be too deeply involved in it. The fires are still burning there, the pot is occasionally boiling over, but these are not really first-rate events any more. This state of affairs in Central Europe will probably continue for many years to come, and no act on our part could very largely alter the situation. Therefore, not from feelings of selfishness, but in a spirit of wisdom, one would counsel prudence and reserve in our continental commitments, and that we do not let ourselves in for European entanglements more than is necessary, and that we be impartial, friendly and helpful to all alike, and avoid any partisan attitude in the concerns of the continent of Europe. Undoubtedly the scene has shifted away from Europe to the Far East and to the Pacific. The problems of the Pacific are to my mind the world problems of the next fifty years or more. In these problems we are, as an Empire, very vitally interested. Three of the Dominions border on the Pacific; India is next door; there too, are the United States and Japan. There, also, in China, the fate of the greatest human population on earth will have to be decided. There, Europe, Asia and America are meeting, and there, I believe, the next great chapter in human history will be enacted. I ask myself what will be the character of that history? Will it be along the old lines? Will it be the old spirit of national and Imperial domination which has been the undoing of Europe? Or shall we have learned our lesson? Shall we have purged our souls in the fires through which we have passed? Will it be a future of peaceful co-operation, of friendly co-ordination of all the vast interests at stake?

Opening Speech by General Smuts.

Need of friendly Conferences for the future.

Shall we act in continuous friendly consultation in the true spirit of a Society of Nations, or will there once more be a repetition of rival groups, of exclusive alliances, and finally, of a terrible catastrophe more fatal than the one we have passed through? That, to my mind, is the alternative. That is the parting of the ways at which we have arrived now. That is the great matter, I take it, we are met to consider in this Conference. If we are wisely guided at this juncture, this Conference may well become one of the great landmarks in history. It comes most opportune. The American Senate has already made the first move in a unanimous resolution calling for a Conference of the United States, the British Empire and Japan. Japan has been a consistent supporter of the League of Nations. She is one of the great Powers with a permanent seat on the Council, and she has, so far as I can gather, consistently been a power for good in the Councils of the League of Nations. The British Empire, again, is not only one of the strongest influences behind the League, but she is honestly and sincerely feeling her way to a better ordering of international relations. China is not only a member of the League, but has been elected a member of the Council at the last meeting of the Assembly at Geneva. All the great parties concerned in the Pacific and in Pacific policy are, therefore, pledged to friendly conference and consultation in regard to what is the most important, possibly the most dangerous, next phase of world politics. They are all pledged to the new system of conference and consultation, either by membership of the League and its Council, or, in the case of America, by the resolution which the Senate has just passed. It is now for this Conference of ours to give the lead and guide the Powers concerned into a friendly conference, or system of conferences, in regard to this great issue. This, I submit, is the great opportunity presented to this Conference, and I trust that our deliberations will be exploited to the full for the good and future peace of the world. As you said yesterday, Mr. Prime Minister, the British Empire involves the great question of East and West, the relations of East and West. That great question is now coming to a head. There is no doubt that the British Empire is more vitally interested than any other country in this, for she has her feet planted on all the continents. By her great position she is called upon to act as the peacemaker, the mediator, between East and West, and nowhere else has she such scope, such opportunity, for great world service as just here. Great rival civilisations are meeting and great questions have to be decided for the future. I most heartily applaud what you said yesterday on this point, and I trust that difficulties on this most thorny path will not prove insuperable to us. You spoke yesterday most eloquently on the Peace Treaty, the sacredness of the Peace Treaty, and the obligation to carry out the Peace Treaty. There is one chapter in that Treaty which, to my mind, should be specially sacred to the British Empire. That is the first chapter on the League of Nations. The Covenant may be faulty, it may need amendment in order to make it more workable and more generally acceptable, but let us never forget that the Covenant embodies the most deeply-felt longings of the human race for a better life. There, more than anywhere else, do we find a serious effort made to translate into practical reality the great ideals that actuated us during the war, the ideals for which millions of our best gave their lives. The method of understanding instead of violence, of free co-operation, of consultation and conference in all great difficulties.

which we have found so fruitful in our Empire system, is the method which the League attempts to apply to the affairs of the world. Let us, in the British Empire, back it for all it is worth. It may well prove, for international relations, the way out of the present morass. It may become the foundation of a new international system which will render armaments unnecessary, and give the world at large the blessings which we enjoy in our lesser League of Nations in the Empire.

I have spoken at length already, Prime Minister, and therefore, I do not wish to refer to the other great matter which we are met here to consider, and which Mr. Hughes touched upon, namely, constitutional relations. We shall come to a very full discussion of that subject, and, therefore, I do not wish to say any more at this stage.

Opening Speech by Mr. Massey.

Mr. Massey: In the first place, Prime Minister, I want briefly to take advantage of what you referred to as our "unenviable privilege," speaking for myself, the privilege of having the longest record as Prime Minister of any of those who sit around the Council Board to-day, and on that account I want to add a few words to what you have said with regard to an old friend General Botha. During the very few months that I was acquainted with General Botha I came to regard him as one of the best men I ever met, a great man, undoubtedly, and, in addition, a great British statesman. If he had been with us to-day it goes without saying he would have been invaluable in assisting to solve some of the difficult problems with which we are face to face. I feel confident of this, that it will be a very long time before his services are forgotten, either by South Africa, with which he was more intimately associated, or with the citizens of the British Empire wherever they may happen to be. I want, too, to express my regret that we have not with us on the present occasion men who did great work in days gone by. I refer to Lord Milner, Lord Long, better known to us as the Right Honourable Mr. Walter Long, and Sir Robert Borden. I hope that their retirement from Empire service is only temporary, but, in any case, I trust, and I know it, that when we require their advice and counsel, their services to the Empire will always be willingly and faithfully given.

I think I ought to say a word of welcome to those who are met in this room for the first time, and I feel confident that they will do credit to those behind them who have honoured them with their confidence, and that their coming here will be an acquisition to the Conference which I hope and believe will make for better things so far as the Empire is concerned.

And now, Prime Minister, in addition to what I said yesterday, I want to refer again, briefly, to the very fine speech which we, the members of this organisation, had the opportunity of listening to yesterday.

Status of Dominions.

I want to say that I look upon it as the most important speech delivered since the war, and a speech which, to the British citizens of the Dominions, will give great satisfaction, and not only to them but to the citizens at the heart of the Empire, the United Kingdom itself. It will give confidence to a number of people and a very large number of citizens who are anxious about the present position and feel a certain anxiety with regard to what may happen at this Conference. The speech was candid, outspoken and well expressed, and it gave the impression, which I have not the very slightest doubt it was intended to convey, that the Prime Minister intends to place the whole of his cards upon the table, take us, who are the representatives of the Overseas Dominions, into his complete confidence and ask for our assistance in settling the difficulties which at present appear to confront us. The speech, in my opinion, struck the right note, and it will give, I am quite sure, more confidence to people overseas and to citizens generally than the Prime Minister himself imagines could possibly be the case. Ever since the signatures of the representatives of the Dominions were attached to the Peace Treaty at Versailles on the 28th June, 1919, there has been a feeling on the part of many intelligent men and women that the future of the Empire may possibly have been endangered thereby. What I mean is this, that I have seen it stated repeatedly, as a result of the signing of the Peace Treaty, which, of course, included the Covenant of the League of Nations, the Dominions of the Empire had acquired complete independence, and, in case of the Empire being involved in war—which I say heaven forbid, and I say it with all my heart and soul—any one of the Dominions might refrain from taking part or assisting the Empire in any way. I do not agree with that view, and I go upon the principle that when the King, the Head of the State, declares war the whole of his subjects are at war, and that must be the case if some of the best constitutional authorities are right. That is one of the causes of anxiety at the present time. There is the other as a logical sequence of the first, that any Dominion—I won't say Dependencies, Dependencies are in a different position—but any Dominion may, on account of what has taken place, enter into a treaty with any foreign country irrespective of what the Empire as a whole may do. I am not now referring to a treaty entered into for commercial purposes, that is quite another matter. As I understand the position, any Dominion may make a commercial arrangement with any foreign country, but the treaties of which I am thinking and of which many other people are thinking are treaties involving war or peace or foreign policy as the case may be. These latter are the treaties which, I understand, in existing circumstances, a Dominion has not the right to enter into. I bring this up now; I had thought of waiting for another year, but one never knows what may happen during twelve months. Personally, I doubt if it will be possible to hold the Conference which was intended for next year, for reasons which may not perhaps have occurred to many here present. I think I am right in saying there will be an election in Australia next year. I am not authorised to say this, but I have heard it said that possibly Canada will have an election next year. That I do not know, but I do know this, that New Zealand must face an election next year.

Opening Speech by Mr. Massey.

Mr. Lloyd George: How many years have you?

Mr. Massey: Three years.

Mr. Lloyd George: How many years have you?

Mr. Meighen: Five years.

Mr. Lloyd George: How many years does your Parliament last?

Mr. Hughes: Three years.

Mr. Massey: We are in the same year, so when Australia has an election New Zealand has an election. I am suggesting that we shall probably have a number of elections next year, and therefore it may not be possible to hold an Imperial Conference for any purpose whatever.

Mr. Hughes: I am glad you mentioned that. That is one of the practical difficulties. I think I told you, Sir, it would be impossible for me to come next year.

Status of present Conference.

Mr. Massey: I was referring to constitutional questions which are causing difficulties at present, and I should like to see them cleared up. I think we are in a dangerous position—a position which may bring friction in a year or two's time or in the years to come. I think it should be faced now, and we should arrive at an understanding as to exactly where we are. There is another point. The Imperial War Cabinet has been referred to on a number of occasions to-day and yesterday, and I read with a great deal of interest an article by Lord Milner in one of the papers yesterday morning, I think the "Times." I may say I agree thoroughly with the opinion expressed by Lord Milner in regard to the Imperial War Cabinet. I believe it did magnificent work and I hoped that it would become a permanent institution, modified, of course, as required by a period of peace. The Imperial War Cabinet was suitable for a period of war. I do not mean to say we should go on the same lines. We are here to-day, and I think I am right in saying we do not even know what to call ourselves, and there is a great deal in a name. A Conference means consultation and consultation only, but a Cabinet also carries with it the right to recommend some definite course to the Sovereign. Of course, behind it all there is the responsibility on the part of each representative of the Dominions particularly, or even of the United Kingdom, to the Parliaments behind us; we must take the responsibility of our actions; but I think most of us, all of us, here to-day are experienced politicians, and I am quite sure that we are not likely to go too far. There is another difficulty. The representatives of the Dominions and India meet the representatives of the United Kingdom in conference, but we have no right to join in any recommendation that may be made to the Sovereign in regard to any course which requires his assent and which may be thought desirable. Now, I am not anxious about this. I have absolute confidence in the good sense of British people and British statesmen, but still there is the anomaly. There is something there that wants to be put right. Using a term which is often used, it is not democratic. I do not know whether these matters can be discussed and dealt with during the present Conference, and I am calling it a Conference for want of a better name. What I object to is what the name Conference implies. I do not know whether we are able to deal with it during the term of the present Conference, or whether we are not, but I do think the matter should be settled, and not left over indefinitely. We sometimes talk about what we have gained in recent years, and we have gained a great deal. There is no question about that. We have gained in status and in other ways. We stand in quite a different position from that in which the Dominions and Dependencies of the Empire, including India, stood ten years ago, but we have gone back as compared with what was the case two years ago when the Imperial War Cabinet was in existence.

Mr. Hughes: I do not quite follow where we have gone back.

Value of partnership of Nations.

Mr. Massey: We have lost the right which we had then on war matters, and even other matters, to assist in making a recommendation to the Sovereign, the Head of the State, in regard to any course of action which we thought desirable and which required his assent. I may be wrong in the view I take, but I feel so strongly about it, and I have discussed it with my colleagues in New Zealand—though I have not mentioned it in Parliament except by way of a brief hint. I went no further with my own Parliament, but I would not be justified in allowing this Conference to pass without bringing it up. I may say that I believe thoroughly and strongly in the partnership of nations. It does not matter what you call it—a family of nations, a Commonwealth of Nations, or anything else, so long as the partnership is applied. I believe thoroughly and firmly in that; but even a partnership of nations, any more than a nation, cannot stand still. We must either progress or decay. There is no question about that, and I hope those who are entrusted with the management of the public affairs of the Empire itself, and of the countries of the Empire, will see that no decay takes place. There is one point I must acknowledge in this connection, and it is this. While I have called attention to the anomaly, I admit, and am thoroughly of opinion, that there is a far stronger power in the British Empire to-day than any words that may be placed upon paper, either printed or written —that is, the sentiments of the British people, the patriotic sentiments of the British people. I am not merely speaking of Anglo-Saxons or Europeans, or any one race. I am speaking of the British people right through the Empire, including the native races. You cannot go beyond sentiment. And I am quite sure that as soon as they understand what is taking place or its possibility, if only its possibility, they will see that these matters, which may appear small at the time, are rectified without waiting too long.

The Pacific the future storm centre.

I want to say something about naval defence. It has been referred to by Mr. Hughes, and I may say that there is no difference of opinion between Mr. Hughes and myself in regard to the necessity for naval defence. The storm centre has changed undoubtedly during the last few years, so far as it is possible to judge by appearances, and many of us fear that the next war—and I wish I were optimistic enough to believe we had seen the last of wars, but I am not—we fear that the next naval war will be fought in the Pacific. Human nature has not changed very much in the last 5,000 years, and although we have profited by the lessons of the war, and I would like to think that the lessons of the war would prevent war, that the suffering that the people of Europe endured, the tremendous loss of life, the misery they endured, I would like to think that these, taken together or any one of them, would prevent war in the future. I am not looking forward to war in the immediate future. There are clouds on the horizon it is true, some of them perhaps no bigger than the proverbial man's hand, but they are there, and they may bring war sooner than we expect. The wish, however, is not father to the thought.

Naval defence must protect Empire's Communications.

I hope the indications may come to nothing, and no one will be better pleased than myself if they come to nought, but so far as naval defence is concerned—I am speaking of the Empire now, a chain of countries right round the globe, Dominions, Dependencies, and the Empire within an Empire, India, as well as the United Kingdom—whatever may happen in the future, I do hope that there will be a sufficient naval force kept in order to maintain the connections between the different parts of the Empire, and that was where there was a danger of our losing the last war. In connection with submarine warfare in its worst days, about 1917, before the hydrophone and depth charge had been perfected, when the ships were being sunk faster than we were able to turn them out, there was a danger then of the connections being cut between the different Dominions, and the heart of the Empire particularly, or even between the different countries of the Empire outside the United Kingdom itself, and if the connections had been cut we should certainly have lost the war—nothing could have saved us. Fortunately, things turned out as some of us were optimistic enough to expect, but again we have to think of the future, and we have to remember the lessons of the last war. I know, of course, there are great changes —great improvements, if you can call them improvements—in the instruments of war. Probably different methods, but we can only go as far as our knowledge allows us, and I hope this point will not be lost sight of. If it were possible—for my feeling about war is so strong, and I have no doubt it is shared by everyone present—if it were possible for me by one stroke of the pen to strike out the possibility of war, I would do it without hesitation, but it is not. We know, every one of us, that there are countries in the world to-day, densely-inhabited countries, that are only kept within their own boundaries, and kept from inflicting injustice on their weaker neighbours, by the fact that if they did it would probably bring down on them a stronger Power than themselves.

Opening Speech by Mr. Massey.

New Zealand's share in Naval Defence.

Mr. Hughes referred to the financial side of the question and the upkeep of the British navy of the future. I do not suppose that New Zealand is in any better financial position than any other country. We have not been exactly crippled, but we feel the result of the war expenditure, and we are likely to feel it for some time to come. But for all that—I speak on behalf of New Zealand—I take the responsibility of saying that New Zealand will find its fair share of the money necessary to provide a navy strong enough in comparison with other navies to defend the Pacific in case of attack. I hope it will not be necessary, but it is only right that I should express what I feel, and I feel very strongly after seeing what took place on the last occasion in the Southern Pacific upon the outbreak of war. We have an idea of the possibilities that the future may bring forth, and while I have a great deal of respect for the opinion of General Smuts, I do think it would be unwise to leave the countries of the Empire—which means the Empire itself—absolutely unprotected. So far as America is concerned, I hope that we shall be able to join with America in that friendly co-operation which you, Sir, referred to in your address yesterday. I would go the length of saying that so far as I am concerned, I am prepared to join in any well thought out alliance with America. Personally, I do not think that is possible, but whatever happens I hope the time will come when America and Britain will join together, if for no other purpose and with no other object than that of keeping the peace of the world and preventing war.

Value of Treaties.

General Smuts expressed the opinion that we should do without alliances. I am sorry, but I am not able to join in that opinion. So far as our Treaties are concerned, we must stand by them even if for the time being they do not seem to be to our advantage. With regard to the Treaty which was signed two years ago at Versailles, and which provided that we—I am speaking of the Empire now—should come to the assistance of France in case of necessity—I do not know whether legally that Treaty stands. I doubt it, because America has withdrawn from the position which she then took up. But so far as we are concerned I have no doubt about our moral obligation. Our reputation for fair and honest dealing is one of our best assets and must be maintained at all costs. Then we must ask ourselves this question: We have got through the worst war the world has ever witnessed—I hope the world will never see another like it—but if Britain had been compelled to stand alone in that war, the question that must occur to each and everyone of us would be "Could Britain have been successful?" I doubt it. With all the confidence that I have in the might and power of Britain and the patriotism of her people—and their patriotism was proved by the fact that one million British citizens—the flower of the Empire—gave their lives to save the Empire—I doubt if by ourselves we could have stood up against the Powers of Central Europe and have come out successfully during that war.

Recommends renewal of Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

With regard to the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, this is probably one of the most important things we have to deal with. I declined even to my own Parliament to discuss details of many matters which I felt confident would be brought up before this Conference comes to an end. I took my Parliament into my fullest confidence so far as the proposed Japanese Treaty was concerned, and I told them that in my opinion, with whatever modifications may be necessary, I was quite prepared to support its renewal. It is only right to admit that, in saying that, I am guided to a certain extent by what took place during the war period. There was one period of the war, very soon after the war broke out, when New Zealand had 10,000 men ready to send to the front, and the ships and equipment ready to send them, and information reached us from an official source—that the Pacific was not safe. I had an instinct that it was not safe, but that information decided me, so far as it was possible for a Prime Minister to decide, and I appealed, perhaps in strong terms and by strong methods which I thought justified at the time, to the British Government to send us protection for these 10,000 men before they were sent out into the Pacific, knowing that there was a strong German squadron in those waters. The strength of that squadron was proved by what happened afterwards, when they met two quite good British ships—I will not say battleships or even big battle-cruisers, but they met two strong British warships—and sank them with a loss of 1,600 men. The ships were the "Good Hope" and, I think, the "Monmouth."

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Massey: They were there and it was quite impossible to find out, when our transport was ready to sail, where the German squadron was located. I felt that I could not take the responsibility of sending these men off without protection. However, the British Government—I think Mr. Churchill was the head of the Admiralty at that time—acceded to our request, and arrangements were made with Japan to send out a strong battle-cruiser, not a battleship, with 12-inch guns, and a powerful British cruiser, the name of which I have forgotten but which had been the flagship of the China squadron.

Mr. Churchill: It was the "Minotaur."

Mr. Massey: When those two ships came we were perfectly safe. I think our anxiety was justified by the fact—and there are very few men to-day who will not recollect it—that that was the trip upon which the "Sydney" sank the "Emden." By that time, by the way, the Australian ships had joined ours, and in the Indian Ocean there were about twenty-eight ships or more carrying troops totalling probably 28,000 men. I will say that we were justified in New Zealand in our anxiety for the safety of those men. My support of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty does not in the very slightest affect the fact that in New Zealand we stand by our right to choose our future fellow-citizens, and it is only fair to say that our legislation on the subject has never been found fault with by either the Japanese or any other race. Personally I do not think there will be another war during this generation. It is only right to say so, but wars have come up very unexpectedly and it is not well to leave the necessary preparations until the last moment. I trust that so far as naval defence is concerned, and it is on naval defence that the safety of the Empire of the future rests, we shall not be found unprepared. There is just another point arising out of the proposed renewal of the Japanese Treaty and it is this. Supposing Japan had been on the other side? I do not mean to say that is possible, because there was the Treaty, but the Treaty as it is to-day did not compel Japan to come into the war in the circumstances in connection with which the war was fought. But supposing Japan had been on the enemy side, one result would have been quite certain, that neither Australia nor New Zealand would have been able to send troops to the front, neither could we have sent food or equipment—equipment for the soldiers and sailors or food for the civil population of Britain. It would not have been possible. These things have all to be remembered in connection with the renewal of the Treaty. I am prepared to take the American view into consideration. I do not want to leave any wrong impression on that point. I am quite prepared, as I said, to join with America to prevent war, but I must put the position as it occurs to me and as my experience dictates, and I do not think any apology is necessary for my doing so.

Position if Japan had been an enemy in 1914-18.

There are several points referred to in the address by the Prime Minister which must come up again before the Conference comes to an end, and I was very glad to hear what was said about reparation. Apparently I missed the report of the negotiations: in all probability the negotiations took place between the time I left New Zealand and before I arrived here.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is so, I think.

Mr. Massey: I should be very glad indeed to hear a statement made—not merely on my own account, for I know it will be of interest to everyone present—of what the exact position is so far as reparation is concerned.

Lord Curzon: If we circulate the short statement upon that question it might save trouble.

Mr. Massey: Thank you, that will be good enough for me.

Lord Curzon: I will certainly let you have it.

Future of the League of Nations

Mr. Massey: I want briefly to refer to some matters which I think should be dealt with. The League of Nations has already been referred to. I do not know what the future of the League of Nations is going to be or what effect it will have in preventing war. I should like to think it would do all that it was intended to do by its promoters, but we know, most of us, in past history that attempts to prevent war have failed. The Holy Alliance, arising out of the Congress of Vienna, was just one, and had a similar intention to the League of Nations. I do not want to say the League of Nations is beyond hope, because I know better, but the Holy Alliance did fail. I do not want to find fault with the League of Nations—but until we change human nature I am afraid it will be impossible to prevent war, much as we should like to do it.

Opening Speech by Mr. Massey.

Then there is the Imperial Shipping Committee set up in pursuance of a resolution passed at a previous Imperial Conference. I refer to what is termed the Imperial Shipping Committee, but I understand it is only a temporary arrangement. In the first place, I thought it was to be a permanent organisation, but so far it is only temporary. I do not know when its term of office comes to an end, but I do want to emphasise that the matter of communication between different parts of the Empire is probably one of the most vital things that this Conference could deal with. It is the old story of the highways. If we do not have good highways between different parts of the Empire, then we shall find ourselves in very serious trouble, and there is a very great deal of dissatisfaction at present with the manner in which shipping matters between different countries of the Empire are being dealt with or arranged. I do not want to make difficulties, but I think the position should be faced and some better arrangements made. I want to say a few words about the holding of future Conferences. One of the difficulties is, as Mr. Hughes and myself well know, that it is a long journey from Australia and New Zealand to the heart of the Empire, making it almost impossible to attend these gatherings yearly, and I think these Conferences should be held yearly, but if anything is going to be done in that way, we can look forward to improvements in wireless and improvements in the cable system, yet anything that we do at present must be based upon steamships and railways. Something ought to be done, and while I do not want to commit the country to it, it may resolve itself into a question of subsidies so that we may get our mails carried, and passengers carried, and our products carried from one country to the other at the lowest possible rates consistent with fair profits, and so far as mails and passengers are concerned, in a very much shorter time than it is taking at present.

Imperial Communications.

There is just one word I want to say regarding another subject, and I am only going to refer to it by way of emphasising the necessity of something being done. I mean the difficulty in the New Hebrides, where there is a dual form of Government. I am sure most of the members of the Conference understand the position in the New Hebrides and the conditions under which the people are governed at present. The present system is absolutely unworkable, and getting into a worse condition all the time. I do not know what to suggest—except that it might be possible to arrange an exchange of territory so as to provide one Government for these islands; that ought to be a matter to be put before the French Government. There is no question about the fertility of the islands. There is quite a large area, and a large native population rapidly diminishing in number.

Situation in the New Hebrides.

In conclusion, I would like to say a word on behalf of the Dominions. I have the utmost affection for the heart of the Empire. It is the Mecca of every British citizen; but I do think that, in the interests of both the statesmen of the United Kingdom and the people of the Dominions, that meetings should be held periodically in the overseas countries of the Empire. If my suggestion is given effect to, it would give the Prime Minister and Mr. Churchill—not both perhaps together—an opportunity of visiting the Dominions. You cannot govern the Empire from the windows of Downing Street. I do hope the opportunity will be taken by statesmen at present in the United Kingdom to visit the overseas countries of the Empire, and they will then understand the views of these countries and the aspirations of their peoples. I do not think that there is anything else I want to say at this juncture. I had no idea that I should take up so much time. I should just like to say this. The people in New Zealand never before seemed to appreciate to the same extent the importance of the Imperial Conference until this occasion. They were perhaps never so enthusiastic on any previous occasions. There was practically no opposition to my coming to London, and the one point that was impressed upon me in Parliament and at the public meetings which I attended a few days prior to leaving the Dominion—the one point that was impressed upon me—was to stand for unity of Empire, and if I stood by that they would forgive all my shortcomings in other directions. I have nothing more to say, Prime Minister, and again I thank the members of this Conference for listening to me so attentively as they have done.

Imperial Conferences should not always be held in London.

Opening Speech by Hon. S. Sastri.

Mr. Lloyd George: (to the Hon. Srinivasa Sastri)—Would you begin now, do you think?

The Hon. Srinivasa Sastri: I will take about fifteen to twenty minutes.

Mr. Lloyd George: We have plenty of time then for that.

India's enthusiasm for the Empire.

The Hon. Srinivasa Sastri: In the memorable speech to which we listened yesterday, you made a striking allusion to the generous enthusiasms and noble ideals for humanity which the war has kindled everywhere. India, let me assure you, is actuated by these enthusiasms and ideals in the same measure as other parts of this Empire. That the British Empire is the most fitting exponent of these enthusiasms and ideals we realise, and it is the peculiar good fortune of India to remain within the British Empire and take part in the work that we need ever increasingly for the realisation of these noble aims and purposes.

The Princes for whom my friend, His Highness the Maharao of Cutch, will speak and the peoples of India whom it is my privilege to represent here to-day, send their hearty allegiance to the Central Council of Empire on this occasion. We made our contributions to the conduct of the recent war; we sent you supplies of wheat, making dangerous inroads on the scanty stocks of our own people. We made munitions for the soldiers to use on the field of battle, we made money contributions out of our poverty and we sent you men to the tune of 1,274,000, which comes up to over one-half of the total overseas forces employed in the war.

Difference in status of India's representatives and the Premiers of the Dominions.

Of these contributions, Prime Minister, you made handsome acknowledgment yesterday, and please accept our gratitude for the honourable mention of that fact in your speech. We, His Highness the Maharao of Cutch and I, consider it a privilege to sit at this table where history is made, and if I may strike a somewhat personal note, not being employed in the service of Government, never having taken a share in the administration of public affairs, I consider it my particular good fortune to sit alongside with statesmen who have for generations moulded the destinies and fashioned the fortunes of their kind; but the Maharao of Cutch and I cannot fail to remember that the position we occupy here is not comparable by any means to the position occupied by our colleagues from the Dominions. They are called here by virtue of their being Prime Ministers. We come by nomination from our Government. We realise that that marks a great difference in our status, although not in the privileges to which we have been admitted at these meetings. We hope that next year or the year after, our successors, who will take our places here, will come by a better right. The person who represents in the place of His Highness more than one-third of British territory in India will probably be chosen by the Chamber of Princes by election, and the man who takes my place may likewise be elected by the Central Legislature of the land. We have not yet acquired full Dominion status, but we realise we are planted firmly on the road to the acquisition of that status.

Progress of Indian Constitution.

The Government of India Act of 1919 forms a great landmark in the growth of Indian constitution. There is nothing in our previous history with which it can be compared, either in importance or in magnitude. The Princes' Chamber, which is going to play a great part in the evolution of India, does not form an integral part within the law of our constitution. The constitution proper of British India, inaugurated by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, not long ago, has shown a sense of responsibility and loyalty to the Empire, which, in my judgment, is second to none of the Parliaments within the Empire. The new Councils have worked better than we expected under the wise and sleepless watch of the Secretary of State for India. The reforms of a political character that have just been started in India are doing great work in placing us alongside the other parts of the British Empire. I must say that we have our troubles. Non-co-operation has only to be mentioned to bring to your mind an idea of the perils in which we have to live. I am happy to say that Lord Reading, our new Viceroy, may be trusted fully, as recent experience has proved, to deal with this great danger.

Interest of Indian Moslems in Turkish Empire.

There are many subjects to which the Dominion Prime Ministers have alluded, to which also, perhaps, I may be expected, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, to say a few words, but I will forbear. There are two topics of high domestic importance to which, perhaps, this meeting will permit me to allude, as they will not take up much time. The first question to which I will draw your attention is one in which the deepest feelings of my Mohammedan fellow-countrymen are engaged. I will not say much on that topic, as all the issues are at present in full vividness in your minds. On the Maharao of Cutch and myself, who are Hindoos, there rests a very peculiar duty of voicing the feelings of our Moslem fellow-subjects on this occasion. I will only venture on this remark—that in any arrangements that may be made for the future of the Turkish Empire, statesmen of the United Kingdom will have to remember that they must show as much chivalry and tenderness as may be expected from a mighty victor. I have no manner of doubt in my own mind that you will be actuated by these considerations, which are always present to those who have inherited the great traditions of British prowess and the still greater traditions of British sportsmanship.

Opening Speech by Hon. S. Sastri.

Status of Indians in Dominions.

There is another subject of great importance which I must mention—that is the status enjoyed by Indians in the Dominions of the British Empire. In noble words you described this Empire, Sir, as a Confederation of Races into which willing and free peoples had been admitted—willing and free peoples; consent is incongruous with inequality of races, and freedom, necessarily implies admission of all people to the rights of citizenship without reservation. In impressive and far-seeing words the Prime Minister of South Africa alluded to the establishment of everlasting peace. Peace means a stable and unalterable relationship between communities—based on honourable equality and recognition of equality of status. To embody this ideal, there are deductions from it now in actual practice, we are going to submit, I mean our Indian Delegation, for the consideration of this Cabinet, a resolution, the terms of which I understand have already been communicated to you. This is a resolution that will be regarded in India as the test by which the whole position must be judged. I won't say more than that. It is of supreme importance that that subject should be considered and disposed of satisfactorily at this meeting, and it is of the most urgent and pressing importance that we should be enabled to carry back a message of hope and of good cheer. There is no conviction more strongly in our minds than this, that a full enjoyment of citzenship within the British Empire applies, not only to the United Kingdom, but to every self-governing Dominion within its compass. We have already, Sir, as you are aware, agreed to a subtraction from the integrity of the rights of the compromise of 1918 to which my predecessor, Lord Sinha, was a party, that each Dominion and each self-governing part of the Empire should be free to regulate the composition of its population by suitable immigration laws. On that compromise there is no intention whatever to go back, but we plead on behalf of those who are already fully domiciled in the various self-governing Dominions according to the laws under which those Dominions are governed—to these people there is no reason whatever to deny the full rights of citizenship, it is for them that we plead; where they are lawfully settled, they must be admitted into the general body of citizenship and no deduction must be made from the rights that other British subjects enjoy. It is my unfortunate part to have drawn prominent attention to what we consider a great defect in the present arrangements. It may seem to be of comparatively trifling importance to the other issues we have to consider. I only plead that there should be no occasion for small bickerings, no occasion for mutual recriminations amongst us. We have great tasks. Let little things be got out of the way. I only wish that all our common energies should be bent towards realising more and more within the Empire and extending further and further outside the British Empire, those generous ideals of progress to which, Sir, you gave such inspiring and, if I may say so, such alluring expression yesterday.

Mr. Lloyd George (to Mr. Churchill): You have to speak on behalf of the Colonies and Protectorates—there is no time for it now. Shall we have a meeting this afternoon to conclude this part of the business so that Lord Curzon may begin to-morrow on Foreign Affairs? I suggest that we had better meet at half-past four.

Mr. Churchill (to the Prime Minister): I got a message saying you wanted me to do that on Wednesday, so I have not made any special preparations.

Mr. Lloyd George: I thought you would speak on the problem of the Middle East and supplement Lord Curzon's statement. That is what I thought. I thought you would make a general statement on the Crown Colonies.

Mr. Churchill: On the Crown Colonies, yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: Let us meet at half-past four, and then begin to-morrow on Foreign Policy.

Question of procedure in regard to publication.

Mr. Churchill (to the Prime Minister): The point I wanted to raise was one of procedure. I have been struck very much listening to these very important speeches this morning by the fact that there are a good many passages which I think would not be helpful at the present time if they were published in the press, particularly in regard to the whole question of this Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Lloyd George: That you can discuss at half-past four.

Mr. Churchill: I am quite ready to agree to that.

Mr. Lloyd George: Then I hope we shall have transcript ready.

Mr. Churchill: As our discussion proceeds our opinion may be somewhat modified and I think it is rather a pity that so many of the heads of the most important Governments concerned should, as it were, have their views on this subject discussed in the open before we have had a chance of talking it over amongst ourselves. Also, I think it must be rather embarrassing, in a way, to Japan. It is not a question of a Member of Parliament discussing it in a Chamber—it is the heads of Governments. Therefore, I do earnestly hope that the publication of anything in connection with the Japanese Alliance will, at any rate, be kept until we have had a secret and frank discussion on the matter, and then perhaps some general statement may be made when we know where we are.

Mr. Lloyd George: We will discuss that at half-past four.

Lord Curzon: One word on that point. In the interests of my Department I earnestly hope we shall not publish any of these statements at all. We are conversing here with extreme candour. Mr. Hughes this morning made a speech of enormous value and spoke with extreme candour as a friend to friends, and, although what he says may be necessary, if it were published the task of the Foreign Secretary would be made very difficult and it might excite a good deal of attention which perhaps would not be warranted. For instance, can we contemplate going to war with Japan over China? It is far too difficult. Immediately you put in circulation the word war, or anything about war, it is serious.

Mr. Lloyd George (to Mr. Hughes): You do not propose that that should be published?

Mr. Hughes: No; I have been reading this statement through, and with perhaps a dozen excisions it would be quite harmless. I may tell you if you will allow me to make this suggestion, I will censor the statement and then I will send it to you in order that you may see it. You can strike out whatever you think proper. That will be quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, as the Foreign Secretary points out, it is important.

Mr. Hughes: It is not suggested we should give to the press all we say here. I will censor it first and then send it to the Prime Minister, and, if you go through it, it will be quite satisfactory to me however you alter it.

Mr. Massey: I am prepared to omit every reference to Japan.

Lord Curzon: To-morrow, when I make my statement, I trust there is no idea that it should be published.

Mr. Lloyd George: We agreed yesterday, when you were not here, that the general opening discussion should be published but not the subsequent ones.

Mr. Massey: Naturally you must tell us very confidential things which it would be very unwise to publish.

Mr. Lloyd George: It was rather understood yesterday that we should open up with a general discussion, and that the representative of each Dominion and of India should give a general expression of his views about the questions which I raised. I did put in something about Japan, and I think it is essential that something should be said. What Mr. Meighen said was quite inoffensive in regard to the views which I know he has on the subject, and I cannot conceive it will do any harm if it is published. If Mr. Hughes consents to cut out the passage about China and perhaps one or two phrases it will be helpful to the general discussion.

Lord Curzon: Mr. Hughes spoke with great candour about his ideas concerning the proposed Constitutional Conference next year. He condemned the proposal. It is surely undesirable that this should be published.

Mr. Hughes: Of course, I do not know whether you realise that we live in a place where it is far more dangerous to throw stones than it is here, and you may depend upon it I shall be very careful of what is given to the press.

Mr. Massey: I think we can make up our minds about publication to-morrow. If we allow the press to rush us we shall be in a difficulty. We should make no reference to anything which would cause trouble, and I would suggest to Mr. Hughes that before he corrects his proof or sends it on he should eliminate the reference to China.

Mr. Hughes: Japan, no doubt, as well as America, is expecting us to indicate our attitude in regard to the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. In Canada and the Western States it is a live question, and it is very live with us. We must say something.

Mr. Lloyd George: I really cannot conceive what harm it would do, especially in view of the fact that in your own Parliament you have already expressed freely your views. Nothing that has been said now has not been revealed before.

Mr. Hughes: I shall not say anything more than I have said.

Mr. Lloyd George: Revise your speech and send it to me if you don't mind. We meet at half-past four this afternoon; it need not go to press before 4·30 at any rate.

Mr. Meighen: Speaking on behalf of the Colonies, Mr. Churchill will have a rather narrow field this afternoon.

Mr. Lloyd George: His statement will take some time. We could go on to procedure afterwards. I suggest that we meet to-morrow, but it would be convenient to have Thursday off.

Mr. Hughes: I am available all the time.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should like Thursday to be a free day. Then we will say to-morrow and Friday. We do not as a rule meet on Saturday, but we are quite willing to do so if wished.

Mr. Hughes: It is over-doing it.

Mr. Lloyd George: I quite agree. We over-did our Conferences very much on the Continent until we became perfect wrecks. They always insisted on sitting on Sundays, and you generally met a fresh Minister at each successive appointment. They over-did it and they insisted upon a Sunday meeting. I suggest that Mr. Churchill should make his statement this afternoon and then we can go on discussing procedure.

Mr. Hughes: At what time will the meeting be?

Mr. Lloyd George: This afternoon at half-past four.

(The Conference adjourned for luncheon at 1·45 P.M.)

STENOGRAPHIC NOTES OF A MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED KINGDOM, THE DOMINIONS AND INDIA, HELD AT 10, DOWNING STREET, S.W., ON TUESDAY, JUNE 21, 1921, AT 4·30 P.M.

Present:

The Right Hon. D. LLOYD GEORGE, O.M., M.P., Prime Minister of the United Kingdom (in the Chair).

The Right Hon. A. CHAMBERLAIN, M.P., Lord Privy Seal.

The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, O.M., M.P., Lord President of the Council.

Statement on the Crown Colonies, &c.

Mr. Churchill: The Prime Minister has asked me to give a brief statement to the Conference, or meeting, however we are to define it, about the Crown Colonies and possessions which are administered directly under the Colonial Office, and I need hardly say that if I were to attempt to give you a picture of the condition of these States I should occupy an enormous amount of time, because each one is a story in itself full of interest and full of romance. In every one of these Colonies there are problems similar to those in larger States, though on a smaller scale. In some cases, indeed, they are more complex than those which are found in great States, because in many of them there are great differences of race. Their finances are also complicated. Some are so exiguous that the sale of postage stamps to those who take an interest in philately is an important feature in their revenue. The production of turtles is in one case almost the staple source of export and of revenue. Others are great, wealthy, prosperous Protectorates, exporting forty million or fifty million pounds' worth of goods to this country, and supplying Great Britain, and to a certain extent the Empire, with the raw materials of some of their essential and vital industries. As long as the war lasted, practically all the Colonies and Dependencies were very prosperous, but with the arrival of the happy conditions of peace a wave of depression has fallen upon almost every one of them so far as their trade is concerned. During the war we got our tin from Malaya, plumbago from Ceylon, wolfram from Hong Kong, mahogany for frames of aeroplanes from Honduras, fine cotton for their wings from the West Indian Islands. The sugar-producing Colonies were prosperous beyond their dreams. The oils and fats of West Africa, which used largely to go to Germany, were useful to us, and their loss was crippling to the Germans. The Falkland Islands industry of whaling was stimulated for war purposes, and they benefited thereby. Moreover, during the war, when human passions were at such a volcanic pitch, we were happily spared the cataclysms of nature. The hurricanes, earthquakes, droughts, which from time to time ruin the economic margin on which some of the Colonies exist, were happily absent, and it almost looked as if Nature were holding her hand to leave the field entirely free for the devastating activities of man. But the creeping paralysis of depression has spread to almost all the Colonial industries which flourished during the war. The tin on which Malaya depends so much cannot now obtain a price which covers the cost of production. Nigerian tin is in the same position. The price of rubber does not cover the cost of production. We have been approached with pressure to enforce schemes of a compulsory limitation of output, but we have not felt able to accept such schemes. From almost every one of the Colonies complaints are coming in that its principal products cannot now be sold at a profit. Even the sugar Colonies, principally Jamaica and British Guiana, are in difficulty about the disposal of their crop. The cotton crops of Uganda and Nyasaland have suffered very heavily from the fall in prices and the same would have been true of West Africa but for the broad-minded action of the British Cotton Growing Association, which, rather than discourage the native producer by a sudden overthrow in the price at which he has been led to hope to produce, have been purchasing cotton at a price which involves a loss to that Association of £400,000 or £500,000 in the present year. We are told that this period of depression is only a temporary phase. I do not know how far that is true. The decline in the consuming power of the world, which is making its effect felt on the highly organised industries of Britain and, I have no doubt, of the Dominions, is by repercussion producing a similar result upon the raw materials which are produced by our tropical dependencies, and practically every one of the budgets of these Colonies and Protectorates is going through a period of extreme financial difficulty and even crisis. The violent fluctuations in the value of money and the changes which affect the greatest States, operate with far more direct and unshielded force upon those smaller organisations, and therefore as far as the immediate situation of the present is concerned, we are passing through a stormy period in the economic and commercial life of practically all the Crown Colonies. But if one leaves the immediate difficulties and turns to their great and undoubted wealth and potential capabilities, one cannot help feeling how magnificent is the asset which the British Empire possesses, and of which, pending the development of more responsible and representative forms of government in these Colonies, we in Great Britain and at the Colonial Office are the trustees. My submission to the Conference is that we must not lose heart in any way about these splendid tropical possessions which we have, but endeavour to secure credit and money for them to give them that essential technical apparatus they require to develop their great resources. In them you find every conceivable product that the world knows of, and every contributing factor even to the most highly organised superfine forms of industry. Nothing is lacking, and now that we see the American exchange is largely turned against us, and we have such great payments to make to them, we ought really more and more to turn our attention to trying to develop these wonderful hot-houses, these great tropical gardens and plantations, so as to be able to purchase as far as possible the raw products that we want from them. How can any money invested in these places go out from the Dominions, or from the mother country? It can only go out in the shape of the products of labour. How can it return—in capital or interest or in profit? It can only come back in these raw materials which we especially and particularly need, and which may some day make us independent in the most remarkable way of many foreign lands. I feel that this is a matter which, although it is confined to the Colonial Office and to this country at the present time, should more and more engage the sympathies and interest of the self-governing Dominions. I illustrate this particularly by the West Indies. In the summer of 1920 a trade agreement was made between the Canadian Government and representatives of all the West Indian Colonies. It is not merely a remarkable instance of Imperial preference, but it promotes unity with the Empire through the development of Imperial communications, which the Prime Minister will remember he and I have always considered one of the most promising lines along which we can advance, ever since the Conference which he, Sir Thomas Smartt and I attended in the year 1907. Two lines of steamers, one entirely new, will now connect all the West Indian Colonies with the Dominion of Canada. I hope Mr. Meighen and the Canadian Government will advance with increasing confidence on this path, because it seems to me that for all the greatness of Canada and its tremendous producing potentialities, it is not a complete entity without connection with these semi-tropical islands. Compared to the United States, Canada lies wholly to the north with northern products, whereas the United States can produce all that Canada can produce, or very nearly all, and yet reaches down to Florida and regions which give her a semi-tropical sphere. But if the association between Canada and the West Indian Islands is developed and goes on, Canada becomes equipped with an immense range of products which makes her, from an economic point of view, a far more complete entity, and therefore I look forward to everything which tends to promote a close association between these West Indian Islands and the Dominion. It is not only from the point of view of commerce alone, but they are among the most beautiful islands in the world. They are salubrious and balmy, and it might be they would be a place of agreeable resort at seasons of the year, when the climate of Canada is sometimes rigorous.

Statement on the Crown Colonies, &c.

Importance to Dominions.

Mr. Meighen: Bermuda is the chief one from that point of view, and Bermuda has declined to ratify the reciprocity agreement.

Mr. Churchill: We shall endeavour to use our influence as far as possible to secure the general acceptance of it. So far as the constitutional developments in the Colonies are concerned, progress has been continuous, and latterly, especially since the war, very rapid. We have every form of government, ranging from benevolent autocracies tempered by Downing Street, to two-Chamber systems, resting upon at least one of the Chambers being fully elected. For instance, the island of Bermuda celebrated its tercentenary of representative institutions dating from the day when the first general assembly of the islands was made, and therefore can boast a seniority which no existing State in Europe or America can disdain. In Mauritius there was a movement to promote an agitation for a retrocession of the island to France, but this movement has received a decisive check at the recent elections, in which all the retrocessionist candidates have been signally defeated. There has been a strong movement in Ceylon for a more popular control over the government of the colony, following upon the movement which Mr. Montagu and his predecessors have driven forward, fostered, and nourished in India, and a new constitution has been granted which gives a majority in the Legislature to the unofficial element. In the Kenya colony a new constitution has been granted giving an elective basis for the unofficial members of the Council, instead of the nominated basis which existed hitherto. Uganda has reached such a stage of development that they have legislative Councils with nominated membership. In Malta a novel experiment has been tried by my predecessor, and we hope it will succeed. Everybody knows the argument against giving Malta a Constitution. It was said you might as well give a Constitution to a battleship. We have arrived at a dyarchical system—two Governments in the island, one elective, dealing with Maltese affairs, and the other dealing with purely military and naval interests.

Rhodesia.

General Smuts will no doubt wish to discuss, and Sir Thomas Smartt also, the conditions which prevail in Rhodesia. I hope that a delegation of Rhodesians will arrive in this country before General Smuts has to leave. I have telegraphed about this. Of course, Rhodesia is a young organisation to be trusted with full responsible government. Its population is smaller than Natal, when she obtained responsible government. On the other hand, the settlers are discontented with the present state of affairs. The Chartered Company is passing away, and it therefore has little incentive to spend money on the development of the country. I should like to say, if I may, that the work of this Chartered Company has been a very wonderful work for the British Empire. The shareholders have never received a penny in dividends, and they may never be able to secure more than a portion of their capital. A splendid region has been acquired and developed to a large extent, and it has all been done entirely by the voluntary effort of private capital. I hope, whatever arrangements are made, we shall not be animated by any spirit of prejudice towards this company, who, I think, has rendered enormous service to the British Empire. As an alternative to responsible government, there is the question of the incorporation of Rhodesia in the Union. There can only be one destination for Rhodesia ultimately, and the only question we have to consider—I will not say the only question, but the main question—is, what is the psychological moment. One wants Rhodesia to be at man's estate before she joins the Union, and to join it willingly and as a partner. After all, Rhodesia is an enormous factor in the whole South African situation. We must remember that they are very much inclined to resent anything like an attempt to dispose of their destiny over their heads.

The native question is, of course, a very serious one there, and I think I was quite right to try and get these Rhodesian delegates here at the time when General Smuts and Sir Thomas Smartt are here, in order to discuss the whole position with the Colonial Office. Also, we do not want to have any appearance of dictation. I trust that the conversations we shall have when they are here will result in some arrangement that is satisfactory.

Development of Communications.

We have gone on slowly developing Imperial communications. Of course, we have got very little money. The great expense of Palestine and Mesopotamia has thrown such burdens upon our backs that everything in regard to the Crown Colonies has been very severely pruned. Still, we are developing.

East Africa.

In East Africa, I am hoping at last to make the deep water pier at Kilindini. When I left the Colonial Office in the beginning of 1908, I had already succeeded in getting it settled to make this deep-water pier. It was definitely settled. The Uganda Railway, built at enormous expense by the Imperial Government, stops 40 feet short of deep water. With such a pier you would be able to unload from the ocean steamers on to the railway which runs up hundreds of miles to the great lakes, but these 40 feet intervene, and everything has now to be unloaded from the steamers into lighters and from the lighters on to the railway. All articles are subject to a charge in which local vested interests are deeply concerned. I came back to the Colonial Office after thirteen years' absence, and I found still the same 40 feet intervening. The same lighterage interests are deriving their profits, and the whole of the great transport of the war supplies was handled in this inefficient and wasteful manner. However, we hope now to take that up and give the Uganda Railway what it requires—its deep-water connection. A new line, a feeder line, we hope to develop to the railway from the Uasin Gishu Plateau, which will tap the rich district now being opened up by the soldier settlers, and will form the first link to the Congo Basin. A new line from Chindio to the Zambesi has been constructed. An extension of the existing system to Lake Nyasa is now being considered, and in East Africa generally we are trying not only railways, but all forms of light transport, including road railways. I am not at all sure that the tank has not a part to play in some of these countries. I do not mean the war tank, but a caterpillar vehicle capable of collecting the produce from the scattered estates and bringing it to the railways.

Nigeria.

The Northern Nigerian Railway which we carried through many years ago at the Colonial Office is now a very paying, prosperous proposition, and it is joined up with the Southern Nigerian Railway crossing the Niger by a fine bridge at Jebba. It reaches right up to Kano, with a branch to Bauchi. The bridge across the Benue River will contain a span 800 feet in length and will be the third longest span in the British Empire. The whole of Nigeria is self-supporting. It is moving rapidly ahead. The natives are very prosperous. We have difficulty in getting them to come forward as soldiers, although the force maintained is a very small one, on account of the big wages to be obtained. The cost of export to Lancashire of cotton would be very much less if it were not that the local purchaser was attracted by the idea of being able to wear clothes in increasing abundance. There is no doubt that the two Nigerias will absolutely vindicate the exertions made on their behalf by the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. They constitute one of the most solid and valuable possessions of the British Crown, and will repay handsomely any further support by British credit which they may need. The extension of the Nigerian Eastern Railway, which at present consists of a line of 150 miles, is being taken in hand, and when complete the whole Eastern system will have 600 miles of line and will serve the rich tin mines. There are both coal and tin mines, and these are all capable of being worked, not by shafts but by galleries.

Statement on the Crown Colonies, &c.

Mr. Lloyd George: Is the coal rich?

Mr. Winston Churchill: Not compared to the best fields of England, but quite enough to run the whole of Nigeria.

Mr. Lloyd George: I mean the quality.

Mr. Winston Churchill: The quality is fairly good, quite good enough. At the terminus of the Eastern Railway on the Nigerian coast an important wharfage scheme has been planned. We are spending on it half-a-million, not of our money, Nigerian money. The most important wharfage scheme is at Lagos, where 1¼ millions are being spent on the terminus of the main railway—1,800 feet of wharves built of concrete blocks, and so on. A deep-water harbour is contemplated at Secondee on the Gold Coast. Thus we are steadily developing, in spite of the difficulties of the present time, our great tropical possessions.

Ceylon.

Coming to the other side of the world, a small but necessary extension of the Ceylon Government Railway has been undertaken to open up rice-growing districts and relieve the Colony from her dependence on oversea sources of food supply. Then we come to the Federated Malay States. Their railways were joined up with the Siamese Government Railways on the 1st July, 1918. The Federated Malay States railway system now comprises 950 miles of line, all built out of current revenue, and loans have been made to Siam by the Federated Malay States on easy terms to enable the connection to be made between the two systems—a through train now runs from Singapore to Bangkok, and a further connection is being made along the East Coast. The Federated Malay States form a most important feature in our administration. The Conference will remember the gift of the battleship "Malaya" in the year 1912 just in the nick of time for it to be ready. It was the most powerful battleship then constructed. It was one of the five fast and powerful battleships of the "Queen Elizabeth" type, and cost £3,000,000. Had our dreams of a great sea battle materialised there is no doubt that these ships would have played a very decisive part in turning the head of the enemy's line. In many other ways the Federated Malay States have voluntarily come to our aid. They have given us more assistance than any other part of the Colonial Empire has been able to do. At the present moment they are hard hit on account of the tin and rubber prices prevailing, but I am sure these conditions are temporary. The modern world cannot get on without these commodities. Then I mention the name of the great port of Singapore, that is a matter which the Conference will have brought before them on other days when we discuss Pacific strategy generally, but it will certainly bulk increasingly largely in all our minds as the years go by.

Malay States.

Status of Indian Settlers.

Now, I have only one other topic which I wish to refer to because I do not want to trespass too long on the attention of the Conference. It was raised by Mr. Srinivasa-Sastri this morning, the question of the Indian settlers in some of our Crown Colonies, and no doubt that problem also occurs in South Africa to a certain extent. I think there is only one ideal that the British Empire can set before itself in this regard, and that is that there should be no barrier of race, colour, or creed which should prevent any man by merit from reaching any station if he is fitted for it. At any rate I do not feel able to adopt any lesser statement of principle in regard to the Crown Colonies, but such a principle has to be very carefully and gradually applied because intense local feelings are excited, and there is no doubt that extraordinary social stresses arise when populations are intimately mingled in some of these new countries and brought into severe economic competition. The question reaches its most acute form in Kenya.

These matters are now being discussed and I hope to find a means of overcoming difficulties in the application of the broad principles.

Statement on the Crown Colonies, &c.

Tanganyika Territory.

There is one other point which I should mention, that is the Tanganyika territory which was acquired in the war. It was wrecked in the war; and we had to form an entirely new Administration over the whole place. We have endeavoured to equip it with a Government not inferior to the German Administration which it had replaced, with the result, in the present year, we shall have a considerable deficit on the Colony's administration, and I am very sorry to say that of the 1,500,000*l.* which I asked for, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was unable to afford to give me more than 914,000*l.*, and I am afraid that in a year or two the state of the Tanganyika territory will compare unfavourably with its progress and prosperity when it was in the hands of our late opponents. However, we will do the best we can.

I think, Prime Minister, although that is not by any means all I could say, because, frankly, I could go on all night talking of these places one by one—I think that gives the members of the Conference a view of that other enormous section of the British Empire, which, at any rate, ought to be present in our minds for the completeness of the discussion which is now in progress.

Mr. Lloyd George: Now Mr. Hughes, the first question affects you. We have got to decide whether we are going to send these transcripts to the press. I am strongly in favour of it myself.

Mr. Hughes: What?

Question of Publication.

Mr. Lloyd George: We are going to send a full verbatim report, subject to editing, to the press. They are very anxious to get it; they have made the necessary arrangements and I think it will have a very good effect. They want to know what is going on. They are keenly interested—what applies to this country will apply, no doubt, to the Dominions, to the Continent, and to America—and I think it will have a good educative effect throughout the whole world. We have had a very fine discussion and very, very, vital questions have been touched upon from different points of view, and I should have thought it would have been rather helpful to have had this material published throughout the world. You come here expressing your mind very freely, which is good—all to the good—but they will realise, you see, how we are dealing with the matters, and we have got these different points of view to take into account, and it is right that Japan and America and France should know—and the rest of the world should know—that we have got to take into account not merely the state of opinion here, but the state of opinion throughout the whole of the Empire. I should have thought on the whole that that would make it easier for our Foreign Office in dealing with these great problems, and I am strongly in favour of doing so, unless there is real objection to taking the responsibility of sending these reports to the press. Of course I will give Mr. Hughes an opportunity of going through his statement, or if he would give me authority, to cut out certain passages from his speech, which although quite necessary as a contribution to our discussions here, might be misunderstood, in fact, would be misunderstood outside, and if he does not mind my cutting those passages out in bulk. They are merely parts of his speech though they are sentences which I think might be regarded as not being helpful at the present stage if published outside—quite right to put them here, but if Mr. Hughes does not mind—

Mr. Hughes: No, no.

Mr. Lloyd George: If that is agreed, the press are waiting, and I should like to send off such material as is ready.

Sir Maurice Hankey: Does it matter if they are out of order?

Mr. Lloyd George: How long will it take you Mr. Hughes?

Mr. Hughes: About half an hour.

Mr. Lloyd George: If you do not mind, as we have got to go, I should like to say one word about the agenda which I suggest.

I suggest the Conference should meet in future as follows: This week I have already indicated Wednesday and Friday. 11·30 is suggested. It gives you time to go through the despatches and do the pressing work. Monday afternoon at 4·30. That enables you, if you like, to come up to town. Tuesdays and Wednesdays at 11·30, Thursdays at 4·30, Fridays at 11·30. I also suggest the following programme for the next few days.

Mr. Churchill: When you are meeting at 11·30 you will not meet at 4·30?

Future Agenda.

Mr. Lloyd George: The Conference can decide. I do not contemplate that at present we will, but the Conference can decide that. Then I suggest the following programme: Wednesday and Friday—Lord Curzon's statement on foreign affairs; Mr. Churchill's statement on mandates, with subsequent discussion. I think it will occupy the whole of those two days. Those are very important questions. The question of foreign affairs and the question of Palestine and Mesopotamia. On Monday I should suggest there should be a discussion on the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. After the Japanese Alliance it is suggested to take naval, military and air defence, but I am very anxious to have a discussion on two other questions. One is the League of Nations. I think it ought to be discussed and if Mr. Balfour will kindly open that discussion on the League of Nations—he represents the British Government there—we can consider the day later on.

Now the relations with France. What I mean there is, there was a suggestion that we should give a guarantee to act jointly with the United States of America for the defence of France in the event of there being an aggressive attack. That agreement has fallen to the ground because the United States of America has not endorsed President Wilson's signature. I should like that discussed here, and more especially the moment this Conference is over there will be a meeting of the Supreme Council, and I should like to get the views of the whole Empire upon these and other problems before Lord Curzon and I go there. Those are the topics—there may be others.

There is also a question referred to by the Hon. Srinivasa-Sastri this morning which will have to be discussed. There is the question put to me also in the House of Commons yesterday relating to marriages. I have asked for a memorandum upon it. It is a small matter, but it is one of those which excite a good deal of attention at moments. I do not know what the point is, but I have promised to bring it to the notice of the Imperial Conference—I am not sure what it is.

Mr. Churchill: What about Egypt?

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Hughes has indicated that he will want to raise the question of Egypt before we separate. That is a thing that might very well come up for discussion at the Conference.

Mr. Churchill: It affects the populations of the Dominions.

Mr. Lloyd George: It affects the Empire as a whole, and therefore we have that subject for discussion. The future Government of Egypt should be put down.

General Smuts: What is the most important question, the Japanese Alliance?

Mr. Lloyd George: The Japanese Alliance, of course. We have got to decide what we are going to do about it—that is an important thing. Mr. Massey pointed out here this morning that we are certainly more than a Conference, you see, because action will follow our discussion. Take the other, the relations with France—action will either follow or not follow upon our decision. For instance, it is a question whether we shall go to France and say, "Here, if you show a little more restraint in certain directions we are prepared to do this for you"—that is the point.

I have something to say about the League of Nations too. I am not sure you can continue the League of Nations with America definitely out of it, and as long as the Republican Party is in power, they will not come in.

If you want a League of Nations at all there must be something done.

Well, then comes the very important question which was mentioned this morning and to which I referred yesterday—the question of armaments. Whether we are to take any action about that or to leave the initiative to America—that is another very important point.

General Smuts: Is not that in one group of problems which might be dealt with together with the Japanese Treaty, America, the League of Nations? If we could make a pool of the set of problems you might come to a solution of all of them.

Mr. Lloyd George: You must have definite views upon each separately.

General Smuts: Yes, of course, we will come into the intricacies of those circumstances. But supposing some specific arrangements could be made with America which would deal both with Japan and America in regard to disarmament, and which involved the League of Nations, and that America were to agree to come in, then you would solve the whole set of problems at once. That is why we should have an early discussion on these Japanese, American and Pacific questions. It seems to me the most fruitful thing.

Mr. Lloyd George: We are putting it down for Monday—that is the first question.

General Smuts: If we could come to any measure of success there, it would go far to solving a whole lot of problems.

Mr. Lloyd George: Anybody who has got a suggestion to make can add it to the agenda if the meeting approves of this line.

Mr. Churchill: There are one or two minor topics which might be fitted in Emigration, for instance, is not a minor subject, but one which we need not discuss here.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should like to have a general discussion before you come to detail.

Mr. Churchill: I see.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is going to be a very vital matter. I am not at all sure our population is not something beyond what these islands can bear. The question is whether that population is going to emigrate to countries not under the flag or emigrate to countries under the flag.

The Hon. Srinivasa-Sastri: I would ask for the consideration of our subject as soon as possible. I do not wish it to come first, second or third until the very big problems are got out of the way.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, we will put that down. If you will allow us now, we have got to go to the Cabinet meeting. Oh! I am sorry, but Mr. Meighen wishes to say something.

Canadian Representative at Washington.

Mr. Meighen: Mr. Hughes, in addressing you, made a special reference to the course Canada had taken in providing for, although our intention has not yet been realised, a representative at Washington. Unless his remarks were based upon a misapprehension of Canada's action I am not able to understand them. We have not taken this course merely as an exhibition of our national pride or evidence of a new status, or to add to the gaiety of nations, or for any purpose of that kind, but merely for a very practical end in order to get our business done.

The relations between Canada and the United States of America have no parallel anywhere between any British Dominion and any other country. We have a 3,900-mile border line between us and them. Their trade with Canada is greater than their trade with the whole of South America, Central America and Australasia all put together. Canada is their second best customer in the world and it is not a very risky prophecy to say it will be the best. The consequence of these conditions has been that we have had to conduct negotiations continuously. We have had to do so with the machinery which has been in operation, and we have provided supplementary machinery. Our Ministers or officials have continually required to go down to Washington to conduct operations. We have had special treaties; all, of course, negotiated in the regular way. The business of the British Embassy at Washington before the war was, to the extent of over two-thirds, Canadian business, and now I do not doubt it will be a higher percentage than that and increasingly so as the years go on. Under such conditions it did not seem very revolutionary to suggest that a Canadian should especially represent Canada permanently at the American capital. We had no thought, and we never expressed a desire, that our representative there should represent any other Dominion of the Empire. It is true that in the correspondence that took place between the British Government and the Canadian Government provision was made that in absence on leave or in a hiatus between one Ambassador and another, the Canadian representative should act in lieu of the British Ambassador. That was originally the suggestion of the British Government, and it was quite acceptable to us, but we had and have no desire that it should be an essential factor in the arrangement. If there is any objection or reason why such a representative cannot be fully representative during those temporary periods, we certainly could have no objection to somebody else being appointed for that or for any other purpose. If Australia sees fit to send a representative to Washington, Canada would be the last to take exception, but I think it is only right that Canada's motive and purpose in making provision for a representative there should be fully understood. That is all I have to say now.

Mr. Hughes: If Mr. Meighen wishes me to keep out of the report that part of my speech referring to Canada, I will do so, and then when the time is ripe the matter can come up again, and his statement of the case and mine can go out. That will be the fairest way, because as it is now it will be put in two sections, and it will not be a fair statement of the case for either party. Of course, I know I could not shift him, and I am quite sure he could not shift me, so there the position is. At any rate, we both start level. I should like that to be taken out.

Mr. Lloyd George: Does that meet your view, Mr. Meighen?

Mr. Meighen: Yes.

General Review of Foreign Relations.

Mr. Lloyd George: Lord Curzon will just make his statement.

Lord Curzon: Prime Minister, I think I will ask that publicity shall not be given to my statement in the press. There is much that I wish to say that could perfectly fairly be published. On the other hand, our colleagues from the Dominions have come here with a right to ask, and, as I understand, every intention of asking, that a full statement should be made to them as to the real facts and history of the foreign policy of the Empire since the time we last met at this table. Foreign affairs, although the papers are very active in their display and sometimes in their manufacture of information, are nevertheless rather a shut book to the world at large, and it seems only right that I should, to the best of my ability, open the pages of that book and show you everything, however intimate, that is written on them. Therefore I think it better that I should speak with the utmost confidence and that nothing should be published.

I am appalled at the magnitude of the task laid upon me; for I have, on the one hand, to sum up to you what has passed since the conclusion of the Peace Treaties at Paris and elsewhere during the past two years, and, on the other hand, the necessities of the case compel me to carry my survey almost all over the inhabited globe. At the same time I have, if possible, to observe perspective. The narrative of what has happened in each area, even in the circumference of small States, might easily occupy half an hour, or even an hour, in delivery. You must pardon me, therefore, if my perspective is not always quite right, and if at any point I fail to give you the information you desire, I hope you will not hesitate to ask me afterwards. I said that the survey which I have to make is world-wide in its extent, and anyone who has had acquaintance with foreign affairs will realise that no situation like this has ever arisen in the history of the world before. My own acquaintance with the Foreign Office here dates back to more than thirty years since I was Under-Secretary to Lord Salisbury. At that time peace prevailed over the greater part of the world's surface, and we were almost excited if here and there there was a patch—it might be the Soudan or Armenia or Crete—in which disturbed conditions prevailed. Now the whole world is still, although the war has ceased for two years, in a state of disturbance. As I sit in the Foreign Office and look out on the scene I am reminded of one of those lava-lakes with which some of you are familiar in the islands of the Pacific, where you observe a great liquid expanse—an uneasy movement trembling the surface, a seething and a bubbling going on; from time to time a violent explosion occurs; here the banks slip down into the mud and are engulfed, while there you see new landmarks emerge. That is a picture of what is going on all over the world at the present moment.

Before I pass on to the various areas in which you will be interested, I should like to say a word or two about the general principles that have guided our foreign policy during this time. I say quite frankly that our foreign policy has been marked by great caution and reserve. There has been no element of sensation or adventure about it, and I think if there had been we should rather have added to than diminished the perils with which we are surrounded. I dare say some of you have been reading lately two books which have attracted a great deal of attention in England. One, the concluding volumes of the "Life of Disraeli," by Buckle. The other, the recently published "Life of Queen Victoria," by a very clever writer, Lytton Strachey. In those books is depicted the foreign policy of this country as conducted by Lord Palmerston in the one case, and Lord Beaconsfield in the other.

You will find there a history of dazzling strokes of policy, of baffled rivals, of discomfited opponents; there is a perpetual shouting of challenges and waving of flags. There is no time or scope for this in our foreign policy. We have, as I read the lessons of the times, to keep what we have obtained, sometimes almost against our will, not to seize anything else; to reconcile, not to defy; to pacify, not to conquer.

Principles of British Foreign Policy at present.

What, then, are the general principles on which we are proceeding? I put aside the first as axiomatic, because it is the duty of every Ministry and Government—namely, to maintain British interests, British honour, British territory, British independence. The second principle was emphasised by the Prime Minister in his opening remarks of the day before yesterday—fidelity to treaties, and by treaties I do not mean all our outstanding engagements of remote periods, but more particularly the treaties concluded at the end of the war; that is an obligation of honour as well as expediency. It is quite true, as many of you know who were in Paris, that these treaties represented a compromise between the divergent views of different nationalities and even of individual men. It is quite true that they are marked by many, and perhaps, conspicuous flaws. These are little by little being remedied. Some will drop out as they become obsolete or useless. Others will have to be rectified by arrangements and stipulations. But, broadly speaking, the basis upon which we stand is that, the treaties having been signed and having our names at the bottom of them, we treat them as an organic whole which is the basis of the constructive policy on which we are engaged.

General Review of Foreign Relations.

The second principle upon which we move was laid down in language upon which I cannot improve by General Smuts yesterday, and that is the re-establishment of the peace of the world. It is obvious that Europe has no chance of recovery unless the conditions of war and conflict are succeeded by conditions of peace. It is obvious also from the narrower point of view that British interests will best be secured and maintained by the recovery of peace.

But now I come to my third principle, with which I am afraid General Smuts will be in sharp disagreement. It is this; and I regard it as essential and would ask leave to lay stress on it for a few moments. The third principle is that the peace he desiderates can only in present conditions be secured by continued co-operation between the Great Powers, who won the war, and, who are now trying to gain the peace. You know who the Great Powers are. The combination between us was brought about under the pressure of the common danger of the war, and if that combination were now ruptured there is no small chance that the danger itself might revive. The papers are fond of deriding the meetings of the so-called Supreme Council. The Supreme Council is merely a name given to the Allied Conferences held from time to time of the representatives of the Four Great Powers to whom I referred. Believe me, it is no particular enjoyment to those who take part in these Conferences to have to attend them. They break up one's parliamentary and public life, and duties at home; they take one for indefinite periods to foreign countries; they involve long, complicated and sometimes vexatious discussions, but for the time being they are the only means of maintaining the peace of Europe and recovering the lost equilibrium of the world. And let me mention another consideration. This co-operation is all the more necessary because of the dispersal of armed forces which resulted in the first place from the almost too rapid demobilisation into which every country plunged at the conclusion of hostilities, and, secondly, from the lassitude of spirit which has very naturally prevailed in all the fighting countries since the war, and which has set up a definite reaction to the high tension that previously existed. And, secondly, it has been all the more necessary because of the defection, the temporary defection, of the United States. Of the signs of the return to the arena at no distant date of the United States I shall speak presently. And in this combination of powers, the continuation of which I have urged, we find that the combination is seen to depend, in the last resort, in the main, on the continued partnership of Great Britain and France. General Smuts argued yesterday in favour of a reversion to the policy—if I did not misunderstand him—of splendid isolation. He depicted to us Europe as exhausted by the struggle, as the scene of a number of petty squabbles between uninteresting peoples, as no longer of the first importance. He argued to us that we might let these wolves devour each other in their wild forests, while we ought to set sail for the oceans of the Far East and the Far West and build up something new there under the golden skies with which he is more familiar than we are. That is a picturesque account of what I understood to be his thesis.

He would not say that if he were inside the Foreign Office. He is for peace. But peace at this juncture cannot be secured by pious platitudes. It can only be secured by power and by authority, and the only State in a position to exercise that power and authority with great effect in Europe at this moment is Great Britain. It is impossible, I can assure him, to exaggerate the weight which a Great Power, disinterested as I hope in the main we are, and striving for the common end of peace, is capable of throwing into the balance. The influence of a powerful Empire like Great Britain at this moment is most potent for good or evil in the world, and if so, it ought to be used. To refrain from employing it would be not merely to abdicate our leadership, but to lose the direction of events and the power of restraint which it gives. Let me tell you in a sentence the kind of thing to which I refer. There can be no doubt that while the Anglo-Japanese Alliance has lasted, whether we continue it or not, it has enabled us to exercise a very powerful controlling influence on the sometimes dangerous ambitions of Japan. At the present moment, I hesitate to think, and the Prime Minister will bear me out—what would happen in Europe if we were not here to maintain the control of affairs, to keep a hand upon France. I might say a somewhat similar thing about Italy. And suppose you dissolve the Alliance and we all return to our primitive conditions, our pre-war conditions, believe me, it will not be a case of postponing the recovery of peace, it will be a case of the date of the resumption of war. A policy of splendid isolation is no longer possible, is not possible for a country like Britain, geographically situated as we are. We are a country, by virtue of our insular position in Europe and of our Imperial position abroad, with maritime approaches on every side, that make everyone our neighbour; our frontiers are the frontiers of every State, or almost every State, in the world. If you live in the same street or square with somebody in London, you need know nothing about him, you may pass him in the street without even knowing his name; your life is lived in complete isolation from him, because his abode is shut off from yours; he lives in his castle as you do in yours. But if you are a boy at school, at Eton, and live in the same house with 40 or 50 other boys, you know everything about them every hour of the day; you know their character, their lives, their history and their interests. You cannot separate yourself from them. You are moulded by them, and that is precisely the position in which we stand, as I venture to contend, in Europe and the world. Our position in Europe renders it impossible for us to sever ourselves from European politics. If we did so, whatever happened to others, we should sink in a few years to the insignificance of Spain or the impotence of Portugal.

Obstacles to Peace.

Now, in this effort to secure peace we have been hampered by several very unfortunate events or groups of events. To one of those I have alluded—the defection of America. The second has been the failure to conclude peace with Turkey, a failure for which America herself was largely responsible in the first place, but for which, I think, we must take some share of blame. I will come to that later on. The third obstacle to our progress has been the break up of Russia and the substitution for the old autocratic institutions with which we were familar in our youth and during the greater part of our lives, of a form of government utterly unlike anything seen in the world before, framed and carried out on principles which are a menace to civilisation, successful up to date, for reasons on which I need not enlarge at the present moment, but carrying in it the seeds of dissolution and decay, and leaving behind it a trail of misery rarely witnessed since the world began.

Not until we make up for the hindrances caused by the circumstances to which I have alluded will things settle down. Meanwhile, I shall not trouble you to-day by saying anything, unless you want me to, about those smaller areas in Europe where, in consequence of the conditions set up by the Peace Treaty, the smaller States, Czecho-Slovakia, Jugo-Slavia, Roumania, and so on, are, on the whole, justifying and establishing themselves. There, conditions of peace and stability, in spite of the economic difficulties, difficulties of exchange and others, are being restored, and I will pass for the moment from those relatively brighter skies to a rather more sombre picture.

I will turn in succession to the Great Powers with whom we have necessarily been brought into close relations, and will try, in a few sentences, to depict to you the situation in respect of each as I understand it to be.

Relations with France.

First, France. If my words were going to be published I could hardly speak to you about France as frankly as I wish, and think it right to do. I said just now that I thought the union between France and ourselves was the pivot of Continental peace. The difficulties are very great. There are differences inherent in the history, the mentality, the national character of the two peoples. Nothing will ever absolutely overcome those differences. You must have seen them when you were in Paris. We do our best from time to time, in moments of rapprochement to overlay them with considerations of expediency and the like; but at the bottom there is a certain fundamental difference for which we always have to allow. Another cause of weakness in our relations to France is the constant change of Ministries there. Since the war began the Prime Minister and I have, I should think, seen at least six or seven separate French Presidents du Conseil and Foreign Ministers sitting at this table or the tables at which we have met, and always the situation that arose has been complicated by the precarious parliamentary position of the Minister with whom we are dealing. He says: "You must not press me too strongly about this, my parliamentary position is at stake. I shall be turned out if you drive me too hard," and if the Minister is loyal and doing his best to work with you, you have to defer to those considerations. The third source of difficulty just at the present moment—it will pass away in time—is the composition of the present French Chambre des Députés. That Chamber, elected after the war under peculiar conditions, has returned a body of strongly aggressive chauvinists, who, I believe, are largely out of touch with the sentiments of the country, but make it very difficult for any Minister, and undoubtedly render our task of pacification in Europe, particularly with Germany, exceedingly difficult. The next difficulty that France has to face, and that we have to face also in our relations with France, is her extreme reluctance to impose upon her people taxation anything like that which it is our duty to enforce, and already has been placed on our people. She has had the almost inconceivable strain of war on her soil, almost within sight of her capital. She has had to ease the burden of her people, and her reluctance to tax France, as she ought to do, is really one of the main causes of her difficult and intransigeant attitude in the question of reparations from Germany. Then we must also, in fairness, remember this. The French view of the German problem is essentially different from our own. What is our attitude towards Germany? I take it we all feel much the same. During the war we were the object of her particular dislike. We cordially returned this feeling, and had every reason to do so, because of the abominable treatment we received at her hands. But we are the kind of people who, although fierce in conflict, are not lasting in resentment or bitter in revenge, and, when the war was over, more particularly when our signatures had been placed to the Peace Treaty and we had a German Ambassador back in London, I believe there was not one of us who was not quite content, to the best of his ability, to wipe out the past, to start again on a new basis, and gradually to build up relations which in time may be those of friendship in the future.

It is quite different in France—absolutely different in France. In the first place she suffered more than we did. She lost more men than we did. You, all of you, have been to the devastated areas and have seen the appalling sacrifice of material and prosperity which she had to endure and which is still before the eyes of her people. And lastly, there still remains, unaffected by the Treaty, the French apprehension of an open frontier on the east. Hence it is that France regards every delay in the disarmament of Germany as a deliberate act of bad faith in the first place, and as a prospective danger in the second. Hence it is that she snatches at every opportunity, and literally manufactures opportunities, for the military occupation of German territory across the Rhine, in order to safeguard herself from a renewal of this kind of peril. In the early days of last year, after some Communist disturbances in the region of the Ruhr, France actually, against our advice and only assisted by Belgium, perpetrated an entirely unauthorised occupation of Frankfort and four towns across the Rhine. Then more recently she persuaded us to agree to the occupation of three towns at the entrance of the Ruhr Valley—Düsseldorf, Ruhrort and Duisburg. There has never disappeared from her imagination the lure of the Ruhr Valley, and one of the objects for which we here, and especially the Prime Minister, have successfully struggled, has been to prevent her from carrying out this occupation of German territory which her military advisers have always had in view. The Ministers present will see at once what her object is—with Lorraine, the Saar Valley and the Ruhr in her occupation, she becomes the mistress of Europe in respect of coal, iron and steel, and with those countries under her military command she would also become the military monarch. Those quite frankly are the ambitions lurking, I will not say in the minds of the French Government, but of a large section of French opinion, with which we are confronted. Furthermore, this apprehension on behalf of France has very wide reactions, which extend to areas where you would hardly expect to come in contact with them. That is her real object in drawing up the mandates for Togoland and the Cameroons for the employment of black troops. It is owing to her apprehension of these dangers, that I have spoken of, that she wants to recruit her possibly depleted forces by the black battalions which she brought successfully into the late war. And the second area where you see the reaction of the same question is Silesia. It is a great industrial area, a great coal-producing country, and she is desperately alarmed lest this area, whatever the results of the plebiscite may be, should go to Germany. She wants to keep it for Poland, because in the first place it will be taken away from Germany, and, in the second place, because she regards Poland as a State owing its revival largely to her influence, more or less perpetually under her control, and, indeed, a certain military ally for herself in any future warfare in that part of the world.

Now you see, if my argument is at all a good one, how supremely necessary it is for us to maintain our Alliance with France in order to keep the check—the control—upon her which I have described. We are at the present moment, believe me, the only moderating influence in respect of France. We go about arm in arm with her, but with one of our hands on her collar, and if we relax that control I myself should be very much alarmed at the consequences that would ensue. I believe that if we had not maintained this position during the past two years, often with great difficulty, but assisted by the good temper and good sense of the French Ministers whom we have met, we might have had another war in Europe by now, and if we were now to relax it, I doubt very much whether the peace of Europe would be maintained for another five years.

Relations with Germany.

I next pass to Germany. The Treaty of Versailles was signed in June 1919; it was ratified in January 1920. From that date until the other day, May 1921, when Germany finally yielded to our last joint ultimatum, there intervened a long period of difficulties, of procrastination, and of attempted evasion of the terms of the Treaty. How far that evasion was deliberate, or how far it arose from the circumstances of the case, I need not now pause to discuss. There was possibly something in both explanations. It is only fair to remember that Germany has had her own internal difficulties.

In the first place, there was the Communist upheaval in Bavaria in 1919 which caused the demand to keep those separate forces, the disbandment of which has been one of our main objects. Then there was the sham revolution of the extreme Right Party, commonly known as the Kapp "Putsch," in March 1920. Then there was another movement in the Ruhr Valley, which was held by the French to justify their advance in April 1920. The German Government has enjoyed a very precarious existence; it has thrown up no strong personalities. The men whom we have met at the Conference table, doing their best under difficult circumstances, I think the Prime Minister will agree, were second-rate sort of people, and there has certainly emerged no towering figure capable of drawing Germany out of the slough into which she has been plunged. There has been a good deal of social unrest in the country, but by now it is fair to say that on the whole the danger of revolution from either of the two extremes—either Bolshevik revolution on the one hand or militarist reaction on the other—is very much diminished, if it has not for the time being altogether disappeared.

Meanwhile, the German failure to execute the Treaty over these long months to which I referred has been the cause of constant dispute and of frequent meetings, sometimes between the Allies, and on other occasions between the Allies and the Germans. The questions at issue have been in the main these. The Prime Minister alluded in a sentence or two to two of them on the first day. The first was the punishment of the war criminals. I daresay those of you who were at Paris remember the high expectations that were entertained in that respect; we were going to lay our hands on all these criminals; we were going to haul them to the bar of justice; and we were going to convict them. We were right in principle, but we were foolish in expecting more than we could attain. When the time came to get the Kaiser, as provided for by the Treaty, he had retired to Holland. We had long communications with Holland, but I am disposed now to think that on the whole the Dutch Government rendered us a service by refusing him and keeping him there. He is, I believe, entirely innocuous, and whatever part may be played by a monarchical rising in the future, I doubt if the Kaiser will play a conspicuous part in it. As regards the war criminals, I think again we proceeded on wrong lines. The different Powers were asked to draw up lists of the Germans who were accused of especially revolting outrages against either the law of nations or the ordinary criminal law that prevails in civilised countries. They drew up these lists, which were preposterous in their numbers. Five or six hundred names appeared in them.

Mr. Chamberlain : More, I think.

Mr. Lloyd George : They included Hindenburg and Ludendorff.

Lord Curzon : They did not merely include the men who could be convicted of wicked and outrageous acts, but they put in Field-Marshals and Admirals, and it was absurd to think that these would be tried. We reduced the list to the number of forty or fifty. The preliminary trials of a number of these, for which we were responsible, have taken place at Leipzig during the last few weeks. The guilt of the persons in the majority of the cases was absolutely established. Sentences were pronounced upon them, and I daresay these sentences appear according to our ideas, both of ethics and jurisprudence, to be ridiculously insufficient. But I am told by our Law Officers who were there that, in view of the state of the German law, which is different from our own, and the effect on public opinion, the result is very significant, and we ought by no means to be dissatisfied with what has happened.

The second question with regard to Germany was disarmament. The Prime Minister has already mentioned the considerable results that have been obtained.

But still there remained, until the other day, large irregular forces still existing in parts of Germany—particularly in Bavaria. Several of the fortresses had not been dismantled and big guns were maintained in them. The ultimatum of May has provided for the solution of that difficulty.

General Review of Foreign Relations.

Then there was the question of reparations about which Mr. Massey asked me yesterday and I agreed to circulate a paper. It was a very complicated question because there were three entirely separate issues that had to be resolved. First there was the total liability of Germany; secondly, there was her capacity to pay and the methods of payment; and thirdly, there were the shares in the payment which could fairly be claimed by the Allies.

All these matters have been the subject during the last one and a half years of almost innumerable conferences to which one looks back with a shudder almost of horror. To two of these conferences the Germans have been admitted. The first was at Spa in July 1920, and here the Prime Minister will allow me to say that he deserves exclusive credit for having for the first time pressed for, and secured, the appearance of the Germans at the table. I believe the French would have been ready to go on with the old system of declining to meet them and trying to settle the business by correspondence, which would have taken a decade. The whole situation changed when we got these people at the table before us, and when they saw themselves treated not only as human beings, but as equals. The whole temper changed from that moment. At the Conference at Spa to which I alluded, the Coal Agreement and a Disarmament Agreement were entered into and signed, but the question of reparations was left over until a later date. After a prolonged examination of this question the Germans were again invited to London in January of the present year, 1921. On this occasion, for reasons which none of us have ever been able to explain, the Germans conducted themselves with folly as great as the sound sense and discretion which they displayed at Spa. Accordingly the Conference was broken up, and the subsequent events you know. That Government has disappeared. The ultimatum drawn up in London has been accepted by Germany—in my judgment the greatest triumph of peaceful diplomacy that has occurred since the end of the war—and at the present moment you have in Germany a Government, weak, no doubt—it might fall next week—but at the same time honest, as I judge it, sincere, determined to carry out its obligations, its temper reflected in a report which I saw only yesterday of a speech delivered by the new Chancellor, Herr Wirth, in the Reichstag a day or two ago.

That is the situation as regards Germany, and our policy is frankly the re-establishment of Germany as a stable State in Europe. She is necessary, with her great population, with her natural resources, with her prodigious strength of character, which we realised even when we suffered from it during the war; and any idea of obliterating Germany from the comity of nations or treating her as an outcast is not only ridiculous but is insane. The policy we have set ourselves to has been to give her a chance of economic recovery—not entirely from an unselfish point of view, but because in her recovery is bound up the industrial future of ourselves as well as of other nations. That is, I think, quite candidly the position as regards Germany.

Silesia.

The German position has been affected, just as our relations with France have been affected, by the troublesome question of Silesia of which you have read a good deal during the last few weeks. Under the Treaty, as you will remember, the fate of this disputed territory of Upper Silesia, inhabited for the most part by Germans, but coveted by the Poles, backed up as they have been by the French, was to be decided by a plebiscite. The area was to be evacuated by the German troops who had previously occupied it and an Allied Commission of four officers was set up under the Treaty to administer the area, to conduct the plebiscite, and to determine the frontier at its close. The plebiscite took place in March. It resulted in a majority, greatly to the surprise of the French and the Poles, who expected to win, of over 6 to 4 in favour of Germany. But that did not settle the matter. In the first place there was, and there has been since a dispute as to what the actual terms of the Treaty affecting the plebiscite meant. I need not enter into that. Secondly, the Allied Commission to which I have referred, when drawing up its report about the frontier which it was to recommend to the Allied Powers, failed to come to an agreement and sent in two conflicting reports. Thirdly, early in May, the Polish Commissioner, a man named Korfanty, a very turbulent and dangerous character, organised and led across the Polish frontier into the disputed area an insurrectionary movement, backed by forces of between 60,000 and 100,000 armed men, fed undoubtedly with military supplies by Poland itself, and at every stage sympathised with and tacitly if not openly encouraged by the French; these forces overspread the whole country, ravaged, pillaged, burnt, as they went along, practically put out of commission the authority of the Powers, whose troops were inadequate to the occasion, and were only brought sharply up when they came in contact with the German inhabitants of the western area, who organised themselves for the purposes of self-defence under a German officer named Hoeffer. In this position of affairs, the British Government, who had been compelled, when confronted with serious trouble in Ireland, to withdraw the four battalions we had sent there, resolved to run the risk at home, or at any rate to accept the sacrifice at home, of sending back six battalions. Those forces stabilised the situation. At the present moment we have a very competent Commissioner there, and one of the subjects I went to Paris to discuss was the question of Silesia. The plan is being adopted now of persuading both parties, the insurgents on the one hand and the German forces on the other, to withdraw by progressive stages. We are telegraphing to ask the Commission whether they are likely now to be able to give us an unanimous instead of a divided report, and presently, some time next month, we shall have another meeting of the Supreme Council when the Prime Minister and I will undoubtedly have one of the stiffest problems to solve that has yet occurred. There again, General Smuts, if we had not had our hand on the collar of France in the question of Silesia there would not have been the ghost of a chance of peace in Europe.

General Smuts: But France has had her way, has she not?

Lord Curzon: Far from it. All my narrative has been intended to show that we have succeeded in checking France, and the acceptance by Germany of the ultimatum the other day was a profound disappointment to France and was, I think, the greatest victory for British diplomacy achieved for years. That is the situation in regard to Silesia.

Poland.

You will also expect me to say a word or two about Poland. Poland has been a great puzzle and a great disappointment. When we drew up in this room on one occasion the objects for which we were fighting the war, the reappearance of Poland was one of them upon which we laid great stress. We wanted a new Poland both to repair the gross injuries of the past, to satisfy her historic claims and to build up a barrier on the east of Europe between Germany and revolutionary Russia. Our policy has been consistently devoted to carrying out that undertaking. On the other hand, Poland has made almost every mistake which it was possible for a State, a Government, or a group of politicians to make. Owing to her disintegration, which has lasted for centuries, she had no governing or administrative experience. She had no statesmen either of authority or power, and few of character or intelligence. She took up a most unreasonable attitude towards her neighbours. Instead of building up around her the loyalty and affection of the little States, the Baltic States, by which she is surrounded, she has done her best to estrange and offend them. As regards her boundaries her policy has been marked by a megalomania, which it is impossible too strongly to condemn. Not content with her own ethnographic frontiers, she has insisted at various stages on pushing out on adventurous marches into the east, into Russia. At one period she was over 300 miles beyond her ethnographical frontier, and one of the main difficulties the Prime Minister and I have had on all these occasions has been in curbing the dangerous ambitions of the Polish statesmen in this respect.

In November 1918, when the Germans, who during the war had been in occupation of the country, retired, there occurred a series of movements backwards and forwards between Polish armies and the armies of the Soviet Republic of Russia I need not follow the swaying fortunes of this conflict. Suffice it to say that at one moment the Poles had advanced this immense and as I think, inexcusable distance into the territories of Russia proper; at another moment the Bolsheviks, swinging back again on the tide of victory, found themselves at the gates of Warsaw, and the fate of Poland for the moment trembled in the balance. The Prime Minister will remember the attitude of the Polish Minister who bore the strangely appropriate name of Grabsky, at Spa, an attitude almost of humiliation, in which he threw himself at our feet and implored us to rescue his country from the errors its Government had committed. Peace negotiations went on and were at length completed in March of the present year. By "peace negotiations" I mean between the Soviet Government of Russia and the Poles. That is the present position. Our policy throughout has been to control the military and territorial ambitions of Poland. The French policy, I am sorry to say, has been to encourage them in every respect with a view to setting up a powerful alternative barrier for herself upon the east.

I think the Prime Minister mentioned Lithuania the other day in his speech.

General Review of Foreign Relations.

General Smuts: Yes, he just mentioned it.

Lithuania.

Lord Curzon: I only mention Lithuania in a sentence because it is an illustration of the unwise attitude on the part of Poland to which I have referred. Lithuania, as you know, is one of the small States immediately bordering Poland on the north, included in the group commonly known as the Baltic States. Prolonged disputes have occurred between Poland and Lithuania, Poland always suspecting Lithuania of a tendency to become Bolshevik or German, and therefore becoming a menace to herself, and always wanting to keep hold of Vilna, the natural political capital of Lithuania. Hence there has been a long period of squabble and conflict between the two, accentuated in October of last year by the military occupation of Vilna by the armed forces of the Polish general, Żeligowski, disowned by the Polish Government, but, as we know for a certainty, really sent out by them. The matter was referred to the League of Nations, where Mr. Balfour dealt with it. An attempt was made to hold a plebiscite there, which was not successful. It was then referred to a Conference under the presidency of M. Hymans, the late Prime Minister of Belgium, at Brussels. Whether the dispute will be settled or not it is difficult to say. Our policy as regards Lithuania, as it is towards Latvia and Esthonia, its neighbours, is to do all we can to secure the autonomous existence of these States, which, in my mind, I think is more likely to be secured by a federation between them than by any other means. I do not suppose any of us feel very happy as to the future, or as to what might happen with a resuscitated Russia inspired by militaristic or imperialistic ambitions; but, for the time being, these States, which are not Russian, of course, which have populations and an identity of character of their own, deserve all the encouragement that we and the League of Nations can give them; and that is the policy that we have pursued.

Russia.

Next you will expect me to say something about Russia. I alluded to this a little earlier as, perhaps, the most difficult of the problems with which we have been confronted. How far we have been successful in dealing with it, it is rather hard to say. The Soviet revolution, which brought the Bolshevik party into power, occurred in 1917, and they thereupon concluded the infamous Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, which you will remember. The British Government then drifted into a position which was easily explained by the circumstances of the hour, and was dictated by the obligations of loyalty and even of prudence, but which turned out in the long run to be false. We were afraid that the still undefeated German armies would penetrate into Siberia. We wanted to rescue the stranded Czecho-Slovakian forces to the number of many thousands who were still in Russia. We wanted to prevent the German invasion of Russia from the ports of the north, and we did not like to abandon those sections of the Russian community who had loyally adhered to the old alliance and regarded with abhorrence the revolution of the elements which had seized the government of the country, and who implored us to continue our co-operation and help.

It was in these circumstances that we found ourselves supporting, one after the other, a series of military movements which, whatever their hopes, all ended in failure. The first of those was the movement of Admiral Koltchak in Siberia—in many respects a fine officer, fighting well for a fine cause—but he failed. We never had helped with troops, but had helped in other ways, and we finally withdrew altogether from Siberia and Vladivostok.

Mr. Lloyd George: We had troops in Siberia.

Lord Curzon: I am wrong. We had troops, but ultimately we had to withdraw. Similarly, we withdrew from Murmansk and Archangel in the Arctic Ocean, and our last protégé, in whom my right honourable friend on my left took a special interest, was General Denikin.

Mr. Churchill: I place on record the fact that every commitment had been made before I became responsible. I tried to carry them out or give effect to them.

Lord Curzon: Well, accepting for the moment, for the purpose of argument, that the Cabinet were the guilty parties and Mr. Churchill the innocent man, we eventually had to withdraw our support from General Denikin. We spent a very great deal of money in sustaining his cause, but the fact was that, in practice, these generals, although they were gallant men, did not, as regards the policy they advocated or the administration they set up, differ very much from the Imperialists, who had been turned out by the revolution of the Bolsheviks, or from the Bolsheviks themselves. Anyhow, they never succeeded in carrying the people with them, and even when their armies advanced with a great show of victory they left behind them in the areas over which they marched a population discontented and likely to rise. The whole thing was a failure, and eventually we withdrew. That was between September 1919 and March 1920.

Then came the era in which the question of the Trade Agreement with Russia emerged upon the scene. Its first appearance was in Paris in January 1920, when the Supreme Council held a meeting and decided to open trade with the Co-operative Organisations in Russia for the import into Russia of clothing, medicines, machinery and the like, and the export therefrom to Europe of grain, flax, timber and so on. This was followed by a decision of the Supreme Council at San Remo in April 1920 to negotiate with the Russians to conclude an agreement of this description. M. Krassin, as the representative of the Russians, came to London in May 1920. The discussion with him and his superiors at Moscow lasted for many months, and were from time to time hindered and even interrupted, firstly, by the evidence that reached us from many quarters that the Soviets were conducting a dangerous and hostile propaganda against ourselves, both in this country and outside; secondly, by the difficulty of coming to terms with them about the release of the many British subjects who were kept as prisoners in Russia; and, thirdly, by the question as to the legal title of the Soviets to their trade assets.

The Government here at length laid down conditions under which they would be prepared to enter into a trade agreement. Then ensued the Polish crisis and the advance on Warsaw, which was attended by an act of disloyalty and bad faith on the part of the principal Russian representative, M. Kameneff, who was at the time in London. M. Kameneff was convicted, as the Prime Minister will remember, when he was in this room, although he denied it, not merely of having had various suspicious relations with Communistic parties in London, but of having passed on to them for the purpose of propaganda very large sums of money. I think it took the form of jewels which had been sent to him from Russia for the purpose. M. Kameneff returned to Russia, and was told that it was not desirable that he should reappear in this country, and for the time negotiations hung fire. Later on discussions were resumed, and the principal point of dispute then was the engagement which we demanded from the Russians in return for the trade agreement, that they would desist from hostile acts of propaganda against our interests in all parts of the world, and more especially on the borders of India and Afghanistan. Whether they will carry out that undertaking it is difficult to say. I think it is doubtful if they will, and we are watching closely the progress of their actions in this respect in all parts of the world. If you ask me to tell you what I think that the position of Russia is at the present moment, there is this extraordinary paradox about it. At every stage if you go to the authorities they will say to you: "The Soviet Government is on its last legs, it is on the eve of a complete breakdown." We used to hear that in a military sense. How far it is true it is very difficult to say. The recurrent prophecies of military and political disasters were falsified, because this deplorable Government has remained in power over 3½ years. On the other hand, the evidence tells of an economic exhaustion increasing every day, and I believe no more pitiable spectacle exists in the world than that which prevails in Russia at the moment. People in all parts of the country are starving, the means of transport are hopelessly disorganised and broken down, and anarchy is existing in all parts of that Empire. In the Ukraine at the present moment society is terrorised by undisciplined bandits.

Mr. Hughes: Have you anything to say about the effect upon rural production?

Lord Curzon: I have no figures with me at the moment.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is bad.

Mr. Hughes: Of course it all comes to that—if there is food they can go on.

Lord Curzon: I saw only the other day, Mr. Hughes, from evidence which reached me that there is being imported into Russia at this moment a large amount of food, salt herrings, &c., which are being hastily purchased abroad, and the inference we drew was that these articles of food, which are the natural products of Russia, are being hastily brought into the country because of the complete dislocation of transport, in order to save the workmen and the military powers from starvation, and also from the dangers of revolution.

General Review of Foreign Relations.

Mr. Lloyd George: I would like to say one word in answer to that. What I understood was, the great proprietors do most of the cultivation for export, and practically all the scientific cultivation, while the peasants only scratch up the soil to maintain themselves. Well, you see now the great proprietors have disappeared, and the peasants seized the land and have not cultivated it.

Lord Curzon: That is the reason.

Mr. Lloyd George: Therefore there is no food which is available for export, or for supplying Moscow or Petrograd.

Lord Curzon: The most significant thing that I have seen lately was a message which we happened to secure which came from Litvinoff, who, as you know, is one of their most formidable organisers. This is very confidential. There was talk of an American Senator whose name is France, who apparently has warm sympathies with Russia, and there was talk of Mr. France going to Russia. Special facilities were suggested to the Bolshevik authorities because of the favourable reports which he might be expected to give. But Litvinoff, in the message to which I have referred, refused on these grounds: "We are afraid that acquaintance with our complete collapse and abject poverty will not strengthen his sympathies with Soviet Russia." That was only last week.

As to the future of Russia I will refrain from speculating. I have no right to make a forecast. It is still the great mystery of Europe, the great dark cloud of the world, and what new forces are germinating behind it I do not know.

Mr. Hughes: What trade is actually going on between this country and Russia?

Lord Curzon: From such evidence as I have seen they have been trading a good deal in this country. They have ordered ploughs, locomotives and clothing.

Mr. Lloyd George: Flax is the only thing we are getting from them, chiefly through Esthonia, nothing direct.

Mr. Chamberlain: A little timber is also coming.

Mr. Meighen: Are there any restraints in the shipping of coal or specie of any kind?

Mr. Chamberlain: The arrangement was that they should send a test shipment of gold. That an action should be started here, and if the Courts decided in her favour, then it should go on to America, or they might send it for re-export so long as in this country it was in charge of the Bank of England. It is of no value in this country. It is of no value to us to have bullion unless we can use it to buy things in America. Therefore, for purposes of trade it was necessary to find out whether it was good tender here and also whether it was good tender in America.

Mr. Winston Churchill: The action has now gone to the House of Lords. It has been decided in favour of Russia.

Mr. Chamberlain: The Bank of England does not want to buy it. If it is good tender and it is tendered at the mint price, the Bank of England is obliged to take it, but the Russians do not want to part with it at the sterling legal price, they want the world price, otherwise they want to have it in dollars, unless it is of value in America it is not much good to them.

Greece.

Lord Curzon: There remain two points with which I should deal in a few words. The first is Greece and Turkey, the second is America. I am afraid I am very long, but to cover the whole world in the space of an hour is almost impossible. I will try, however, to cut my remarks as short as possible. This Conference, or Cabinet, or meeting, whichever it be, will want to hear something about the situation, the very troublesome situation, in the East. You will want to hear about the situation, more particularly in relation to Greece and Turkey. At the present moment the fortunes of Greece, both during and since the war, have revolved to a large extent round the remarkable personality of Veniselos. Veniselos, a Cretan by birth, but a man of great power and personality, had fought his way to the front at Athens, where he was Head of the Government, until he quarrelled irretrievably with the King, the King being an ally of Germany, and as hostile to us as he could be during the greater part of the war. Veniselos went off to organise Greek forces at Salonika, and ultimately returned to Athens. The King was forced to leave the country, and Veniselos then assumed power. When the war ended he devoted himself with restless energy and ability to prosecuting the fortunes of his country. He was a man with great convictions as to the future of Greece, a profound and vigorous patriot, and he started going about from capital to capital, and attending Conference after Conference, to push the fortunes of his country. In May 1919, while the Conference was sitting in Paris, when the situation in Asia Minor was very difficult, the Greek forces, which at that time were in a state of great efficiency, were invited by the Supreme Council in Paris to occupy Smyrna. Whether, if that decision had to be taken again now, it would be taken, it is difficult to say. There were great excuses for it at the time, because the Italians, who had occupied the coast of Smyrna, were moving up towards it, and there was every reason on the part of the Supreme Council to believe that the Italians would have gone in. It was in those circumstances that the Greeks were asked to anticipate that action by occupation. That constituted a claim on the consideration of the Powers which has not ceased to exist up to the present moment, but in the consequences the appearance of the Greeks at Smyrna no doubt rendered much more difficult the reconciliation with Turkey and the question of the peace with Turkey ever since. While Veniselos was thus moving about from capital to capital fighting the battles of his country, he did not reck sufficiently as to what was happening at home. He felt bound to maintain throughout this period a strict censorship and martial law in Greece, and he declined to grant an amnesty to his political opponents. The King in exile, a born intriguer, was always in touch with his country. He never lost the influence with his Greek people which he had won in his second and victorious war with Turkey. Regarded as something like a national hero in exile, viewed with great pity and sympathy, he was all the while ceaselessly seeking to recover his ground against the absent Veniselos. Finally, when the elections took place, to the stupefaction of the world or the greater part of the world, Veniselos was hopelessly defeated and the King reappeared upon the scene. The situation was unfortunately complicated by the sudden death, owing to a bite by a monkey, of the King's son. He had been put upon the throne on his father's exile and flight from the country. Had that unfortunate incident not happened, very likely none of these events would have materialised. But King Alexander having died, the results of the election were so favourable to King Constantine that he started to recover his throne. The Powers, regarding him as an enemy prince, as he had been, and viewing his return with profound anxiety and suspicion, warned the Greek Government and the Greek people against this act. It was too late. He came back, and he has been upon the throne ever since. The Powers have had no official relations with him, and the French in particular, owing to the fact that during his reign at Athens during the war there was a conflict in which a number of French sailors were massacred on their way from the Piræus to Athens, they look on him with peculiar distrust and detestation. The fate of Greece then came under consideration in the Treaty of Sèvres, the first draft of which was drawn up here. It then went to San Remo, where it was accepted by the Powers, and was finally signed at Sèvres in the course of last summer—I think it was in August 1920. That was the position in Greece up till recently.

Turkey.

Now I turn to Turkey. I cannot say that I think our treatment of the Turkish question has been a diplomatic success. At the end of the war Turkey was, I believe, the most prostrate and feeble of all our enemies. She had lost, and deservedly lost, all her outlying provinces, Syria, Mesopotamia, Palestine, Arabia, and so on. She knew that she could never recover them. Her military forces were exhausted. Her Government was in a state of panic. The Allies were in a position to occupy the capital. If, when the statesmen of the world went to Paris in January 1919, it had been possible for them to grapple at once with the Eastern problem, I believe they could have solved it without difficulty. It was not possible for them to do so. General Smuts will remember the long discussions raised by a project for which he was partly responsible—the League of Nations. That occupied a long time. Then the peace of Europe had to be re-established, and for one reason and another the East, which nobody seemed to care much about——

Mr. Lloyd George: And Wilson asked us not to.

Lord Curzon: Yes, there was the action of President Wilson, who led his colleagues to believe that America might take some action, might even possibly take a Mandate; and for all these reasons Turkey and the East were forgotten. Meanwhile the situation tended to get worse. What is it at the present moment? At Constantinople you have the Government of the Sultan and the Grand Vizier, a Government anxious to make terms with us, willing to conclude—it of course signed the Treaty of Sèvres though as yet it has not ratified it—willing to conclude an arrangement if come to, but hopelessly weak, exercising authority over very little beyond the confines of the city itself, utterly destitute of resources. Meanwhile, in Angora in Asia Minor you have the rival Government, as it claims to be, of Mustapha Kemal. Mustapha Kemal was an officer originally sent out there by the Sultan himself in a position of importance in Asia Minor, a young man of between 30 and 40. He is an unscrupulous, powerful, intriguing sort of man of very bad personal character, but no doubt a formidable person when appealing to the national sentiments of his country, and of course that is the basis upon which the Angora movement has sprung into being. Angora represents the Sultan as being a helpless puppet in the hands of the Powers, and declares that theirs is the true fount of Turkish nationality. At one time the movement takes the form of pan-Islamism and an appeal to the religious sentiments of the Turks, at another time of pan-Turanianism and an appeal to ethnic unity. Anyhow, by one appeal or the other, Mustapha Kemal succeeded in building up a Government there. A national assembly was founded, Government institutions were started and that Government has persisted ever since in regarding itself as the real Government of the Turkish Empire. They have always appealed as the main source of their national unity to the duty of evicting the Greeks from Smyrna, and their position was greatly strengthened, in the first place by the retirement of the British force from the Caucasus, a subject into which I have no time to enter now, and secondly by the defeat of the French forces down in the south in Cilicia. By these means a body of national sentiment and a body of military strength were created by Mustapha Kemal, and this Government thought itself strong enough to refuse absolutely to accept the Treaty of Sèvres which had been signed by the Government at Constantinople. Since then an uneasy struggle, the actual details of which I will not go into, has proceeded between these two authorities, and at last in January of the present year we endeavoured to face the difficulties by inviting them both to London. A Conference ensued here in which these two authorities sitting side by side at the same table and observing an ostensible amity, nevertheless proved conclusively to us that the real force lay at Angora and not at Constantinople. We proposed various terms, the first of which, intended to bring about a peace between the Greeks and the Turks, was unsuccessful because it was refused by the Greeks. This was a proposal for an Allied Commission to go to Smyrna and another to Thrace in order to report to the Powers regarding the population of these areas. We then made another proposal offering to the Turks many substantial modifications in the Treaty of Sèvres in their interests, with a view to terminating this long dispute.

I ought to have said, but I had forgotten, that at any earlier date, before the Treaty of Sèvres was concluded, the vexed question was discussed here, and after much dispute was decided, as to the retention of the Turks in Constantinople itself. There was a strong party in the Government, of whom I was one, who thought that this question could only be solved by turning the Turks out of Europe—the difficulty, however, would have been to find some one to take their place—and build up a strong Turkish Government in the highlands of Anatolia. There was another party, affected by Indian sentiment—the views of India were expressed by Mr. Montagu with great force on the occasion—who were in favour of retaining the Turks in Constantinople. That party prevailed, and it was decided to leave the Turks in possession.

To refer again to the meetings here, the Turks went back with the revised terms which we had offered them from London, and since then their tone and temper have been worse, they have quarrelled with the French, quarrelled with the Italians, quarrelled with ourselves. Meanwhile, the Greeks resumed—I think somewhat unwisely—at any rate, without sufficient preparation, the offensive in Asia Minor and sustained an initial defeat. They are now, it is said, about to renew the conflict, the King is at Smyrna and is said to be confident of success. I went to Paris the other day with the instructions from this Government to see whether even at the last moment we could not reconcile these two parties and bring about a peace. I have not time to go to-day into the negotiations which I conducted with the French Government. They have so far taken this form, that an appeal has been addressed to the Greek Government to put themselves in the hands of the Allies, and should the Greeks listen to that appeal—which I hope they may, though I am not confident—we have clearly in our minds the terms which we would then propose, both to the Greeks and to the Turks, with a view to terminating the conflict. I doubt really whether it is to the interest of either party to continue it. If Greece were victorious now, I do not think she has the population, the strength, or the resources to maintain permanently an advanced position in Asia Minor. Neither is it really to the interest of the Turks, to quarrel with the Allies, and, more particularly, with Great Britain. Deep seated in the Turkish mind is a sort of hereditary instinct that we have been their friends in the past, and that we are likely to be their most stable friends in the future, and perhaps at this moment the omens are more favourable than they have been at any time before for a composition. We have had, only in the last twenty-four hours, an indication that the Angora people are not unwilling to discuss matters with us, and therefore I hope that a little light may fall upon this dark and tragic scene, and that before many more months have passed we may emerge from this gloomy pass in which we have been struggling for so long, and may obtain an issue that is honourable to Greece on the one hand, and will relieve the outraged sentiment of our Moslem friends in India and throughout the East upon the other. I could give more details if required, but that is——

Mr. Lloyd George: You are going on to America now?

Lord Curzon: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: I have had a note from Mr. Meighen that he has to leave for luncheon with the Duke of Connaught. He is especially interested in that, and I am afraid we could not proceed in his absence, and therefore I suggest that we adjourn now. But this is the anniversary of the King's Accession, and those guns we heard being fired will have reminded us of that fact, and I think it would be rather a pleasant thing to send greetings on the Anniversary, greetings to the King and Queen. I suggest:—

> "The Prime Ministers of the Empire and the representatives of India, assembled in conference, send loyal and dutiful greetings to your Majesty and the Queen on the Anniversary of your Accession, and desire to express the earnest hope that your Majesties may long be spared to unite your peoples in a common bond of loyalty and devotion."

If I might send something of that sort in the name of this Conference, it would be rather a pleasant thing to do.

Mr. Massey: Quite right. There is another thing which has occurred to me, since you mention it. It is this, whether we should not take notice of the opening of the Ulster Parliament to-day.

Mr. Churchill: I would wait to see if you get through.

Mr. Massey: I do not think we have done the right thing in connection with the opening of the Ulster Parliament. I think some notice should already have been taken, and the question occurs to me whether it is not too late. It won't do to give the cold shoulder to a very large number of people who have stood loyally by the British Government in a time of difficulty, and who are likely to be a power in the future, so far as it is possible for us to judge.

Mr. Balfour: Do you think they will regard it as giving them the cold shoulder? I quite agree we must not, but will they interpret silence . . . .?

Mr. Massey: I am afraid so, personally.

(The Conference adjourned until 4·30 P.M.)

General Review of Foreign Policy.

Lord Curzon: This morning I brought my survey to the conclusion of what I had to say about Turkey and Greece. I ought to have stated then, and I do now, that I purposely omitted to say anything about Egypt, the League of Nations, or the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. For this reason, as I understand we are to have a discussion on each of these subjects on separate occasions, and therefore I did not want to add to the length of my own remarks or to anticipate what may have to be said then by even alluding to them to-day, I added this morning that there remained to be dealt with the subject of America, but when I got back I found that I had said nothing, and I think it would be improper if I did not have a few words to say about Italy and Austro-Hungary. These words shall be very short, but they are required to complete the gaps that I have left in my analysis this morning.

Italy.

In the case of Italy I will speak with precisely the same frankness as I did about Germany and France. We have found Italy to be a difficult and unstable Ally. She came reluctantly into the war; she made a very stiff bargain before she entered. At one stage she was on the brink of a great disaster which might have brought her and the Allies to the ground; she was mainly restored by the endeavours of the foreign forces of Britain and France. When the victory was won, although she has attained spoils incomparably greater than any one thought likely, or than even her own ambitions had covered at the beginning of the war, she has nevertheless persisted at every stage in regarding herself as ill-used and in complaining more particularly of ourselves for her bad fortune in not having done better in the war. The main trouble with Italy has arisen from the terms of the Treaty of London, which was concluded here in London in April 1915, and signed by Great Britain, France and Russia, with a view to bringing Italy into the war. We paid, in my judgment, too high a price. We offered Italy in that Treaty great advantages in Istria and Dalmatia, and we offered her, in a vague phrase which has been the source of much trouble. in the event of our beating Turkey, compensations in the East.

The settlement of Europe at the close of the war was held up, as you will remember, by the despicable incident of Fiume, that port which, after the Armistice, was occupied by Italian troops, having been seized and held for a period of something like sixteen months by the poetical swashbuckler d'Annunzio.

The serious thing was not the rodomontade or braggadocio of d'Annunzio himself, but the effect that this exercised firstly upon the morale of the Italian forces, both the army and still more the navy, and secondly the effect it had in retarding the conclusion of peace. I cannot say how many times during those sixteen months the Allied Conference met to discuss the question of Fiume, and how many hours of valuable time the Prime Minister, for instance, devoted to the object of finding a solution for that very difficult problem. Meanwhile, in Italy itself the internal conditions were difficult. There was an adverse exchange. Great Britain was unable to give financial assistance to Italy in her distress. We were bound to refuse to sell her coal and raw material below their world-market prices. All this added to our individual unpopularity, and we constantly heard that Italy itself was in the throes of revolution. I am bound to say, from my own experience at the Foreign Office—I give this as a tip to my colleagues here—that there are two countries in Europe which are always said to be on the brink of revolution, but where my experience leads me to the conviction that it will never come off. One is Italy and the other is Spain; and I have come to the conclusion that it is in the old stolid, steady countries where such things are not suspected, that you are often nearer to the edge of revolution than you are in these Latin communities, where the institutions themselves have survived many revolutions and are really very stable. However, this is an obiter dictum which I give you for what it is worth.

The Adriatic question was ultimately settled by the Treaty of Rapallo, which was concluded by the present Foreign Minister of Italy with the State of Jugo-Slavia in November 1920. Fiume was constituted an independent State. Italy surrendered her ambitions as regards Dalmatia, and she retained in Istria and elsewhere a very ample reward for her own sacrifices and exertions. Therefore there is for the moment peace in that part of the world. Our relations with Italy have been rendered anxious at times, firstly, by her great capacity for intrigue, particularly in the East, and by her ambitions to obtain in Asia Minor and elsewhere an economic outlet which she requires to make up for the depletion of her own internal resources. Coal, oil and other products of Asia Minor are what she wants. There would be no particular harm in this policy were it not that Italy mediates behind our backs and concludes secret agreements, against which we afterwards have to protest, and which leave a rather disagreeable impression on our minds.

General Review of Foreign Policy.

Further, Italy is strongly anti-Veniselist, because her position in the Mediterranean renders her incurably suspicious of dreams of a greater Greece. On the other hand, while I say what I have said in a disparaging sense, it is only fair to remark that, at the Conferences in which we have taken part, the policy of Italy in respect of Germany and the pacification of Europe has been much closer to our own than it has been to that of France. On many occasions she has given us useful assistance, but it is an assistance upon which we can never very definitely rely, partly owing to the character of her people and partly to the apparent inability of her present Foreign Minister to take a strong line.

Austro-Hungary.

Now a word about Austro-Hungary before I pass on to America. Peace with Austria was embodied in the Treaty of Saint-Germain, which was signed in September 1919 and was finally ratified by the Powers in July 1920. The fate of Austria as she was left by the war and by these Treaties is unquestionably pathetic. Here you had a great, although a very heterogeneous Empire, thinly held together by a sort of historic tradition and by the personality of the late Emperor—who died, as you remember, in the early days of the war—irretrievably shattered by the consequences of the war, by its own follies and by the fissiparous tendencies inherent in the structure of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. You are faced at the end of the war with this position. You have a reduced territory, scarcely the size of a Kingdom, surrounded by jealous, suspicious and hostile States, each of whom has now gained or recovered its freedom and is by no means anxious to do anything handsome by Austria; and then in the centre of this diminished area you have a vast capital, Vienna, with 2 millions of people, created and organised to be the centre of an immense and flourishing Empire, lying there helpless and hopeless, destitute, impoverished, a pitiable spectacle of despair. These are the circumstances in which Austria has almost continuously been hammering at the doors of Europe ever since for relief in her distress. She suffered from a painful lack of food and fuel, financial chaos has reigned supreme, and there has been complete economic disorder in every branch of public life. Mr. Chamberlain reminds me, and, indeed, I was just going to say it, that we have shown a much greater readiness to help Austria in her troubles than any of our Allies, and up to the end of 1920 we had contributed no less than 10 millions—he said 12 millions, but I think it is 10 millions—towards her relief. Meanwhile, the Vienna section of the Reparation Commission—I may say in passing that there is not the slightest chance of getting any reparations from Austria; any prospect of that we have had to wipe off the slate—submitted a scheme to the Allied Powers which practically meant the Powers taking over the financial reconstitution and management of Austria. There was to be a great credit of hundreds of millions and plans on a very large and ambitious scale, which, when they were submitted to the Conference at Paris, attracted very little general support. In substitution for them, a scheme was prepared under the auspices of the League of Nations, called the Termeulen Scheme, from the name of its author, which was a scheme for giving credits to Austria against the gold value of the Austrian assets. We and our Allies have abandoned for a period our liens on these State assets of Austria, and in this scheme lingers some hope of giving help to Austria, although not, I fear, very great, because our assent, which has been willingly given, has not been followed by a similar eagerness on the part of some of the other Powers concerned.

In these circumstances it is not very surprising that a movement should have grown up, and indeed is proceeding rather rapidly at this moment, for union with Germany. This was foreshadowed at the time of the Peace Treaties, and conditions were put into the Treaties, as you will remember, absolutely prohibiting such a junction, which would be a revival of the menace to Europe, to bring which to an end the war was fought. This movement in Austria is known as the Anschluss. It is proceeding in this way. Parts of the still surviving Austrian Empire are holding plebiscites on their own account in order to indicate what are their own wishes as to their future. Two such plebiscites have been held, one in Salzburg and one in the Tyrol, each resulting in an overwhelming majority for union with Germany. Next month, in July, there is to be an all-round plebiscite of the Austrian populations on the same subject, and I must tell you that supposing the result to be, as it will very likely be, a pronouncement by a very large majority in favour of union with Germany, a very serious situation will arise. It will be serious for more reasons than one. I have indicated the main reason why the Allied Powers in general could not accept it, but there is another reason, and that is, the moment this union with Germany is proclaimed, and still more if an attempt is made to act upon it, you may be quite certain that all the States round Austria, of which I have spoken and who are now gaining in stature and strength, instead of accepting any such situation, will sweep across the borders and snatch still further spoils, and it is by no means unlikely that in such a situation you may have that part of Europe at war again, and the very conditions which we spent such enormous sums of money and such untold treasure of lives to escape from may be reproduced. Therefore, the situation of Austria is one of undoubted anxiety. A new Government of Austria has been formed, yesterday or to-day, headed by a man of probity who means to do his best. I think the Powers must continue to give Austria sympathetic assistance, but for the rest I do not know that we can exercise any particular influence ourselves.

Mr. Hughes: What is the attitude of France, or what would you imagine her attitude to be on this?

Lord Curzon: France is intensely hostile to the idea of any union of Austria and Germany, so much so that in her anxiety to escape any financial responsibility, at the first breath of a plebiscite she came to me and said: "I want you to join with me in refusing financial credits until this peril is overpast." The Austrian Government was doing its best at the time to stop this movement and I thought it cruel and unjust to join with France, but at any rate that mere act is a sufficient answer to you, Mr. Hughes, as to her attitude about it.

Hungary.

Now a word about Hungary. Hungary had declared her independence before the war came to an end in October 1918. She passed, as many of those States did, through a very turbulent and troubled time immediately after the cessation of the war. The situation was complicated by the appearance on the scene of a Transylvanian Jew named Bela Kun, who was let loose from Russia, descended upon Budapest, succeeded in organising there a species of Soviet Government, and in a very short time reduced the country to absolute disorder. The Roumanians, in pursuit of their Transylvanian ambitions, advanced into the country, Bela Kun disappeared, the Roumanians occupied Budapest, and it was with very great difficulty, and by the exercise of no small pressure, that the Allied Powers succeeded in getting Roumania to withdraw. Since that date a succession of Governments has been seen in Hungary, of which the latest is perhaps the most respectable, and is presided over by a sailor, Admiral Horthy, at Budapest, who has been in power now since March, 1920. He seems to be holding his own and to be anxious to do his best, but I will not conceal from you that in Hungary there are old aristocratic traditions, with which you are familiar, and a strong sentiment in favour of monarchy. I do not doubt myself that in two or three years time there may be a monarchy again in Hungary and possibly a return of the old dynasty. It is in the latter respect that the danger lies. Not only are the Great Allied Powers resolved firmly not to allow any member of that disastrous and fatal dynasty again to exercise a real influence in Central and Southern Europe, but none of the surrounding States will tolerate the idea for a moment. You may have read in the newspapers a little while ago of the attempt of the ex-Emperor Karl, living in retirement in Switzerland, to make a dash for the Hungarian throne; it was a ludicrous and stupid performance, indicating the calibre of the man who made it. It resulted in ignominious failure on his part; the Hungarian Government under Admiral Horthy played their part well and Karl was bustled out of the country almost as quickly as he came. But he is still residing in Switzerland and is capable at any time of repeating the attempt, so that his presence is a source of anxiety. At the present time I am engaged in trying to persuade every country in Europe to take him in. I have unhesitatingly declined him in this country to which he is anxious to come. At present I am trying to persuade the King of Spain to accept him; if any Dominion representative here has an unoccupied castle in which he would like to keep an ex-Emperor—most of all perhaps in the sunny islands of the Pacific about which I spoke this morning—I am sure we should be glad to hand him over.

Mr. Massey: We do not want him.

United States.

Lord Curzon: Now I come to my concluding paragraph, about the United States of America. My colleagues know very well, and therefore I need not repeat, the very tragic history of President Wilson at Paris, an explanation of a great deal that has since happened and of the long delays in settlement which have occurred. When President Wilson went back from Paris he found at once an estranged and hostile Senate who looked with great repugnance upon the Treaty to which he invited their assent. He entered, as you will recollect, upon a vigorous personal campaign in defence of the Treaty which he had done so much to shape, and presently he broke down irretrievably in health and practically disappeared into private life. The Senate declined to ratify the Treaty of Versailles. A complete breach occurred between the American Senate and the Washington Administration. The President was an invalid in his sick chamber, incapable of transacting business, unseen by anybody, but from time to time exercising a sudden and usually ill-judged interference in public affairs.

General Review of Foreign Policy.

Official relations with the American Government almost ceased to exist, and for ten months we practically did no business with America at all. There was this advantage that we avoided all disputes with her, but undoubtedly it was a source of procrastination in Europe that this great country, which had shared in our sacrifices and helped to win our victory, became, by the foolish policy of her own President, nervous, useless and impotent at the critical period after the war was stopped. Little by little America in these conditions withdrew from the various Councils all representatives, and before President Wilson went out of office, not one of them was left. Meanwhile, the only activity in respect of European affairs which the American Government showed from time to time, by despatch or otherwise, was an interest in the settlement of certain questions in which she was very strongly concerned. The oil of Mesopotamia, the allocation of the submarine cables seized by the Allied Powers, and the island of Yap. At length in March 1921, President Harding came into office, and here it is quite clear to me from information that we possess, as well as from his representative, that America is now entering upon a new and definite course of policy towards European affairs, and towards this country in particular. The new Government has stated in language that cannot be mistaken—it was indeed emphasised in his opening address by the new American Ambassador here—that she will take no part in the League of Nations, no part of any kind at all, although she hopes for an International Association intended to promote peace. What she has in view has not yet been explained, but antagonism to the League of Nations in its present form is undoubted and has to be reckoned with. Secondly, she now proposes to make peace herself with Germany by a Declaration of Congress, and what we shall probably find before long is this: that she will ratify the Versailles Treaty with many reservations in her own interest. President Harding has further stated that while he does not wish to be entangled in the affairs of Europe, yet he is willing to join all nations for the purpose of conference and counsel.

Acting upon these hints, at a recent meeting of the Supreme Council we extended an invitation to the new President to rejoin the bodies to which I referred. This was accepted, and henceforth we shall find again an American at the table of the Supreme Council, of the Reparation Commission, and of the Ambassadors' Conference in Paris. What degree of authority the American representative will be allowed to exercise I cannot at present say. I think the Dominions will agree with me in thinking it a right policy to encourage this participation in every possible way. America is coming back voluntarily. Let us meet her with open arms; her participation will not only be valuable, it will also be a help in the reconstruction of the world, and nothing will be wanting on the part of the Foreign Office to promote and encourage it in every way.

A word or two has been said about—but I am not going to touch upon—naval armaments. America is proceeding upon the execution of a great naval programme, designed in 1916, and intended to provide her, when it was carried out, with the most powerful fleet that the world has known. The Senate has adopted an amendment authorising the President to take up the question of disarmament with Great Britain and Japan. No proposals have yet been received by us in that connection. The American Ambassador has not even mentioned the matter to me, but there seems good reason to believe that before taking official action the American Government desires to have a private conversation with the principal Allied Powers. I think it was Mr. Hughes, or some other speaker yesterday, who suggested that this Conference might perhaps take the initiative itself. Well, that is a suggestion worthy of consideration, but, on the other hand, if we find it a better method of procedure, instead of extending a formal invitation ourselves to America, to enter upon this private and confidential discussion which President Harding, I believe, is willing to undertake, that may be the best way of commencing negotiations.

Mr. Hughes: It ought to precede anything.

Lord Curzon: Yes. There remain one or two other questions in which America is chiefly concerned and which we shall presently be discussing with her. The Anglo-

Japanese Alliance, which we shall take here another day, and the question of the Allied debts to America, about which she has taken a very stiff, and I cannot help saying, a rather ungenerous line in her claims, and, in the background—the eternal Irish question.

The general situation, therefore, as regards America is this. President Harding is, I believe, bent upon rebuilding the close friendship and co-operation between his country and ourselves. He holds, and I respectfully share his belief, that these two countries acting loyally together, have the power to bring order again into a stricken world; and both our national interests and our sense of moral responsibility point in the direction of extending the most friendly welcome to his advances when they are made.

My own belief is that in the troubles and turmoils of the east, if we can look to the west and re-establish excellent relations with America, we shall see a dawning of light in the sky which is so overcast in almost every other quarter of the globe.

Mr. Lloyd George: We will hear Mr. Churchill now.

Palestine and Mesopotamia.

Mr. Churchill: Prime Minister, the field to which you have asked me to direct the attention of the Conference is very small compared to the almost world-wide sphere with which the Foreign Secretary has dealt, but the sombre panorama which he has painted finds its counterpart on a small scale in the Middle East. The members of the Conference who were concerned in the waging of the war will not need to be reminded of how it is we are in possession of Palestine and Mesopotamia and what our relations with the Arab races have been, but I must take as my starting point the fact that we availed ourselves in the crisis of the war of the age-long antagonism which existed between the Arab and the Turk, and the Turk having taken the side of Germany, we did our utmost to rouse the Arabs to assert themselves and claim their rights. In this we were successful and the King of the Hedjaz, King Hussein, erected the Arab Standard in 1916, summoned the Arab chiefs around him, and drew the sword against the Turk. A very brilliant young Englishman, Colonel Lawrence, played a vital part as an intermediary in all these critical negotiations. Thenceforward, as we gradually repulsed the Turkish advance upon the canal and drove them into the Southern portion of Palestine, the Arab army, advancing from Mecca and into the desert far to the eastward of the Hedjaz railway, became an important element upon our flank and assisted Allenby's advance throughout 1917 and 1918. The Arab army, with its cavalry and camelry, riding far and fast into the desert, tearing up the railway line behind the Turks and affecting their communications, played what is undoubtedly an important part—I will not say a decisive part—but an important part in all the brilliant series of operations which hurled the Turk from the Holy Land. The French had a small force with us, and it would have been a larger one no doubt but for the fact that they were concentrating on facing the main shock of the enemy's attack in Europe; but in the main it was a British-Indian-Arab army that conquered Palestine and Syria and liberated them from the Turk. At the same time, our armies—the British and Indian armies—with good and evil fortune alternating, but with perseverence, irresistibly drove their way forward in Mesopotamia, up the Tigris and eventually, at the same time that the Turkish army in Palestine was annihilated, that in Mesopotamia was dispersed, and so we got practically complete possession of both these ancient lands.

Arab assistance during the War.

Then came the period of the peace. While fighting was going on, we had made various pledges to the chief races into whose territories we came, and when we advanced into Arab and Turkish territory, we promised the populations that we would not allow them to be put back again under the yoke of the Turk.

In addition we held out to the Arabs high hopes of the reconstruction of the Arab race with a chance to revive again the old Arab culture and national spirit. We also promised the Zionist Jews that they should have a national home in Palestine, and, of course, we have always subscribed to the doctrine that we extend representative institutions to the countries of which we become possessed, and endeavour to guide them rather than to govern them by arbitrary or military force. Such are the circumstances which led us to the acquisition of mandates for Palestine and Mesopotamia at the Peace. But since then things have gone ill, very ill indeed, and I could not be sure that I should be right if I predicted with any confidence a happy outcome. I am not without hopes, but I do not feel that a happy outcome can in any way be guaranteed. The first thing that went wrong was the quarrel between the French and the Arabs. In any agreements between the French Government and the British Government, in the negotiations conducted by Mr. Lloyd George and M. Clemenceau, particular stress was always laid, I think I am right in saying, by the Prime Minister on the retention by the Arabs of Damascus, Aleppo, Homs and Hama, those eastern cities of Syria. Emir Feisal, at the head of the Arab armies, having entered into Damascus and set up a Government, behaving with a certain amount of unwisdom, and pushed on by extremely extravagant Arab Nationalist aspirations, evidently contemplated the erection of a complete Arab State under the protection of Britain over the whole of Syria, and of a similar State in Mesopotamia. A disagreement broke out between Emir Feisal and the French, with many fierce protests and complaints urged by the French against him, accordingly at a certain stage, the French being involved in Cilicia and in fighting with the Turks, General Gouraud marched an army against Damascus, routed the Arabs, seized the city, and is now in occupation of the four towns I have mentioned as well as the whole of Syria. The operations had been conducted very largely by black African troops, and it was extremely painful to British opinion, and to British officers particularly who had served with the Arabs, to see those who had been our comrades such a little time before and our Allies, and who looked to us for protection and to see their wrongs righted, to look on while they were thrashed and trampled down and their cities taken against the spirit of the treaties, if not against the letter, by the French; and that has been a deep source of pain to politicians and to the military men who have been concerned. However, we have these strong ties with the French and they have to prevail, and we were not able to do anything to help the Arabs in the matter, but it has unsettled the whole of the Arab world, and for a time they mingled us in their resentment with the French. At the same time the Turkish situation degenerated. Turkey was at our mercy when the Armistice was signed, but owing to the delay imposed by the vacillations of President Wilson and the absolute hiatus in American Government which ensued, shattering all the hopes we had that they would intervene and take some of the burden of reconstructing the Middle East, the Turks had developed again their strength, a feeble strength it is true, but a remote strength, an un-get-at-able strength, and one which makes its manifestations felt in the Mahommedan world, which carries its repercussions as far as Afghanistan, Persia and India, as the Secretary of State for India and the representatives of India will have an opportunity of testifying at a later stage. So it happened that we became the nation most embroiled with the Turks, at the same time that the French became the nation most embroiled with the Arabs. No one has found it possible to make any satisfactory arrangements with the Bolsheviks, and owing to the fall of M. Veniselos, the Greeks have adopted the pro-German Constantine as their King. Thus the Allies for one cause and another found themselves at enmity or at any rate not in friendship with the Four Powers who exert influence in the Middle East. At the same time our military forces have had to be gradually demobilised and the expense of every kind of service has been rising steadily, particularly, as you may imagine, service in these extremely hot and distant countries. The expense of the occupation of Palestine and Mesopotamia began to be enormous, and although we have been continuously reducing our troops there and consequently reducing the expense from year to year since the fighting stopped, it certainly cost us nearly £40,000,000 last year to maintain our garrisons in Palestine and Mesopotamia, and it is costing us £34,000,000, reduced by recent changes to £27,500,000, to maintain ourselves there this year. You may have noticed since your arrival in this country that there is a certain amount of criticism about the expenditure of money, and that people are evincing more and more a reluctance to continue to be taxed at the present rate. A great deal of the unpopularity due to high taxation and to the idea that the Government is unduly profuse is concentrated upon our position in Palestine and Mesopotamia, and not altogether without reason; and from the tenor of my remarks yesterday in speaking of the Crown Colonies, you will perhaps see that I am one of those who share the great regret that this enormous expenditure has been wrung from us in regard to Palestine and Mesopotamia, when the money would produce such enormously better results if it, or even a portion of it, could be applied to the development of our tropical colonies. Palestine and Mesopotamia are arid countries, where with great difficulties in irrigation you will get a crop, whereas in Africa we have dripping countries, bursting with exuberant vegetation, where your struggle is to keep the jungle from devouring you with its enormous energy of reproduction. In the Middle East the population is of a most difficult and intractable kind; proud, impecunious chiefs, peppery politicians, bitter, hot-headed theologians, who are a large proportion of the ordinary members of the population, in fact, almost constitute the entire population, and all, unhappily, extremely well armed. In the circumstances it is not surprising that we had last year a serious rebellion in Mesopotamia. The whole of the Euphrates rose, and other parts of the country. We had to bring back two divisions from India which had already left and were in process of demobilisation, and to concentrate considerable air forces there. However, after a great deal of marching and fighting, which cost us perhaps twelve hundred to fourteen hundred casualties and wrought very great havoc upon the tribes with whom we were in contact, the rebellion was quelled. At the same time the Government revised their view as to the kind of administration which should be set up in Mesopotamia. At the outset the idea had been to give a good efficient administration of the kind which you see in the settled districts, the highest class districts of India, and a very able man, Sir A. T. Wilson, was in charge of the country; but we found this was too expensive, and also there is no doubt that these turbulent people are apt to get extremely bored if they are subjected to a higher form of justice and more efficient administration than those to which they have for centuries been accustomed. At any rate, we have reverted perforce and by the teaching of experience to more primitive methods.

Present Administration in Mesopotamia.

Mr. Chamberlain: It was our earlier idea.

Mr. Churchill: It was a desire for efficiency. We reverted to our earlier idea, and proclaimed last June our intention to set up an Arab Government with an Arab ruler and an elective assembly and an Arab army. The next question was, who should be the ruler? We had a good deal of trouble about that because of the French, the quarrel which the French had had with Emir Feisal which I have just described at Damascus, and there is also a great division of policy between the French and the British. The French idea is that Arab independence is pernicious and is bound to work detrimentally to Europeans of all kinds wherever it manifests itself. They say it easily turns itself into mere xenophobia; that though they are friendly to the English so long as the English are favouring the national spirit, as soon as they have got powerful they will turn against us as they have against the French, and that we are only raising up a Frankenstein's menace in this Arab Independence which we will live bitterly to repent some day, and they say the more sensible policy and one which derives its origin from classical times is divide et impera, to split them up into small parties and do nothing to foster the national idea. They say that such a policy will be attended with greater success. It is what they have done themselves. They have put up a little Government at Damascus, another at Aleppo, another at Beyrout, and two others in the hills of Syria, all small Administrations manned by the local people under direction of French officers, and they avoid anything which can be said to lead to any recognition of the general principle of the Arabs as a race. We do not take that view. We decided definitely that there is no reason why the Arabs should not have a chance. Whether they will succeed in fulfilling all the hopes that are based upon their character cannot be said, but we feel it inherent in our position that they should have a fair chance of showing whether they are capable of carrying on extensive national States and of reviving their own glories and culture, and if that is to happen there is only one structure in the Arab nation according to the advice I have received—I do not pretend to be an expert, but we have good experts at our disposal—there is only one structure I am advised which has within itself the capacity of acting as a basis for such reconstruction.

Mr. Montagu: Is Colonel Lawrence working with you.

Mr. Churchill: He is. I am very glad to have been able to get him to submit to the bridle of official duties which he has always been reluctant to do. This structure is the Shereefian family. The King of the Hedjaz, has four able sons of whom the best known are Feisal and Abdulla. The Shereefs have a remarkable history in that they are neither obnoxious to the Shias nor to the Sunnis, they claim to spring from Islam before the lamentable split between the Shias and the Sunnis and the murder of Hussein, and they have family and traditional connections on both sides. In addition to that they are a cultured, polished class of people, a civilised people, a very able, intelligent, agreeable people. They have fought with us in the war, they are very strongly impressed with the idea that England is their friend and the friend of the Arab race. At any rate we decided we would build upon that and try to erect at the earliest possible moment an Arab Government in Mesopotamia, and leave them with their Arab army, with a certain amount of support and assistance from us, to bear the brunt of the defence of Mesopotamia both from Bolshevik and Turkish intrigue, and the maintenance of internal order. Having that in our minds we decided to set up this Government at the earliest stage. I am greatly indebted to the Foreign Secretary for the clearness and combative energy with which he dealt with the French on the subject of Emir Feisal, and the arguments which he used left the Ambassador silent in the end, and I am glad to say that that silence has not been broken, I understand, in the visit which Lord Curzon has recently paid to Paris. Although I have now announced practically that we are backing the Emir Feisal in his candidature for the throne of Mesopotamia, the French did not raise it in any controversial manner. That I think is very satisfactory, though of course they do not like it. I may say that I have been at pains to assure the French, so far as I have come in contact with them, that we have no intention of using the Arabs as a means of prejudicing their interests, and I have told the Arab leaders that they must clearly understand that if we had to choose between them and the French, sorry as we should be to do it, we should be with the French against them, and I hope that a loyal spirit on our part will continue to mitigate the dislike which the French have for this Arab policy. We must have some friends, we cannot possibly carry on in these countries with a dwindling military force at an enormous expense, and no friends of any sort or kind. You must pick some out of the scrimmage and have them on your side.

Palestine and Mesopotamia.

Mr. Hughes: Are they people who turn on their friends?

Mr. Churchill: Well, they turn on their enemies, too. But I do not know that we should apprehend that, because our intention is to study their interests, and I think they have quite enough intelligence to realise what their true interests are. The Emir Feisal has now started from Mecca to Mesopotamia and he should arrive almost immediately. We have not felt, of course, justified in forcing him upon the people, but we have hopes of his success when he arrives. He undoubtedly now has the cachet, or the coupon, which attaches to a Government candidate, and other candidates have withdrawn. One misconducted himself—the Home Secretary—and had to be sent into exile. The Naqib of Baghdad, who was also a candidate, has now decided to welcome the Emir Feisal, and has become the head of the Committee of National Welcome, so that we hope that the Emir will be acclaimed, and that the Assembly, which will be chosen shortly under the impress—this is not for publication—under the impress of his arrival, and the popular rejoicings which will be going on—which we hope will be going on—will be an Assembly which will acclaim the Emir as the ruler, and the good people I have there—Sir Percy Cox, the chief of them, is a brilliant man—are strongly of opinion that this is the course events will take. Still, I can give no guarantee. If it is so, we should have, at the end of this year, an Arab ruler with an Assembly and Council of notables, and an Arab army. In addition to that, there will be native levies, Kurdish and Arab levies, officered by British officers, from which the Arabs will gradually merge into the Arab army at a later stage, and the Kurds will more or less take the position of a frontier force, in Kurdistan, because you do not want Arabs in the Kurdish district. We shall have, behind that, twelve battalions and some artillery and cavalry, and no less than eight squadrons of the air force which we hope to rely upon to give moral support to the Emir Feisal in the early, and necessarily precarious, days of his reign. But the result of this, if it is successful, is that the expense on Mesopotamia will be reduced from approximately 25 millions in the present year to something like 7 next year, and 7 is of course, with the decreased purchasing power of money, only the equivalent of 3 or 4 before the war. If that were so, and we could do that, and no further trouble arose, if there was no further rebellion needing a great reinforcement, and matters settled down on that basis, the expense would not be unmanageable; we could afford to carry on until the new Government takes root, gradually withdrawing our troops more and more, and getting out behind an Arab State which would become more and more a going concern. If that were so, we should have succeeded in having kept our pledges and done the right thing by the country, without either destroying our finances by undue expense or injuring the political situation of the Government by expenditure which is so extremely unpopular while it is maintained at the present height. That is what we are hoping to do. As I say, I can give no guarantee, but people who know best are hopeful, and although we live on a volcano, we live on so many volcanoes that one more or less does not seem to me to make a very great difference; we are used to them. So much for Mesopotamia. I think there is no doubt that it should be clearly understood that it is the duty and desire to carry out our pledges, rather than hopes of immediate profit, which justify our remaining there. It would be a shameful thing for us to do if, having in the war come into these countries and broken up the forms of government that prevailed there, and having made all sorts of promises, and driven out the Turks who were the only form of Government, we suddenly scuttled for the coast, throwing away the Mandate which we had recently received and taken before the whole world, making ourselves a by-word and a mockery in view of our declarations of giving a good Government and good institutions to these people, leaving the great city of Baghdad and other ancient cities to be pillaged by the wild Arab, the Bedouin of the desert, and leaving our name accursed in the whole of this region. It is a duty that we are discharging, and, if it does not cost too much money, we may with patience and perseverance be able to get through it without further serious loss.

Mr. Meighen: But for the responsibilities under the Mandate, would you have been entirely free from obligations?

British Obligations.

Mr. Churchill: If we had never accepted the Mandate for Mesopotamia, we nevertheless should have had, de facto, obligations of a very serious kind which would have necessitated our leaving the country in some state of order before we evacuated it, and a very large portion of the expense was quite unavoidable, but, of course, once we accepted the Mandate, we, as it were, re-affirmed all those obligations and undertook to put the job through, and I do not despair that we shall do it.

Mr. Hughes: These obligations were incurred during the war, and it was necessary to incur them, you say?

Mr. Churchill: Certainly, it was unavoidable. At the same time I have always felt that if the expense got too great, or the people continually rebelled, we should, on giving reasonable notice and doing the best we could, be entitled to wind up our responsibilities, but we hope to avoid what would be a very humiliating and painful confession of failure.

Palestine.

Now I come to Palestine. Palestine is complicated by the pledge which was given by the late Foreign Secretary, Mr. Balfour, in the name of the Government, in a most critical period of the war, that a Jewish National Home would be favoured by Great Britain in Palestine. There are 550,000 Arabs, 60,000 Jews and 60,000 Christians in Palestine. The Zionist ideal is a very great ideal, and I confess, for myself, it is one that claims my keen personal sympathy, but quite apart from whatever you may feel for the idea, there is no doubt that during the war we hoped to gain influence and support, among other things, for our cause, and to enlist the aid of Jews all over the world, and that we got, in consequence, support, and we have to be very careful and punctilious to discharge our obligations, if we honestly and legitimately can, without sacrificing other considerations. And therefore, I am in a very difficult position there, because it is not that the Jews in Palestine were unpopular—they were not; it is not that the numbers that are now coming in—7,000 or 8,000 a year—are really introducing a serious or imminent change in the character of the country—they do not; but the Zionists, in order to work up enthusiasm for their cause, have to go all over the world preaching the return of hundreds of thousands of oppressed peoples from the persecuted countries of Europe, Russia, the Ukraine, Poland and so forth, to the Promised Land. This terrifies the Arabs who, although they would not be in the least alarmed if it were a moderate immigration of carefully selected colonists of the kind that have already established themselves there, and done such wonderful work under the care and munificence of, for instance, the Rothschild family during the last twenty or thirty years. They would not mind that at all, but the idea they have in their minds is that they are going to be swamped and overwhelmed by hundreds of thousands of Bolsheviks from Central Europe. That is what they believe and it has raised a most dangerous state of excitement from one end of the country to another. We had a very nasty outbreak at Jaffa the other day at which forty of fifty Jews were murdered, and it was not suppressed until a large number of casualties of one kind or another had been inflicted. Our force in Palestine has been greatly reduced, and I have read a despatch to-day saying it is not large enough having regard to the policy we are pledged to carry out. We have 5,000 fighting men with a ration-strength of 7,000 or 8,000. There would be no difficulty, of course, in governing the country with a much smaller force but for our pledges, but I am of opinion that we are bound to make an earnest effort to give honourable effect to them, and, as I was saying in the House of Commons, we must persuade one side to concede and the other to forbear. We must insist on the door to immigration being kept open, insist that immigrants are not brought in beyond the numbers which the new wealth of the country, which was created by public works and better agriculture, can sustain.

Palestine and Mesopotamia.

Mr. Massey: The character of the immigrants?

Mr. Churchill: Above all, as Mr. Massey so justly interjects, by looking strictly to the character of the immigrants, both at the port from which they start for the Holy Land and when they arrive in the country. The stories of Bolshevism have been much exaggerated among them, the numbers of those who are infected with this horrible form of mental and moral disease are not at all great, but I have given to Sir Herbert Samuel, himself a keen Zionist and a Jew, directions which he is carrying out with vigour, to search the camps for men of Bolshevik tendencies and to send them out of the country with the least possible delay, and this is being done. It is not a question of making war upon opinion, but of not allowing a great experiment, which deserves a fair chance, to be prejudiced by persons who are guilty of a breach of hospitality.

Mr. Meighen: How do you define our responsibilities in relation to Palestine under Mr. Balfour's pledge?

Mr. Churchill: To do our best to make an honest effort to give the Jews a chance to make a national home there for themselves.

Mr. Meighen: And to give them control of the Government?

Mr. Churchill: If, in the course of many years, they become a majority in the country, they naturally would take it over.

Mr. Meighen: Pro rata with the Arab?

Mr. Churchill: Pro rata with the Arab. We made an equal pledge that we would not turn the Arab off his land or invade his political and social rights.

Mr. Montagu: Mr. Balfour's speech guaranteed the rights of both.

Mr. Churchill: I am already in a difficulty because we are giving Mesopotamia an Elective Institution. We have not yet been able to set up an Elective Institution in Palestine for the obvious reason that the first act of the Assembly would be to veto all Jewish immigration. I think we shall find a way, and I hope in the near future to establish an elective body in Palestine, but on the basis that certain things will be ultra vires, for instance, interference with immigration so long . . . .

Mr. Lloyd George: I think there is very good ground for distinguishing between them. It is a great international ground.

Mr. Churhcill: It is the home of three great religions.

Mr. Hughes: You must remember that it is a home from which they have been away for quite a long time. Its application to things nearer here is not so very remote.

Mr. Churchill: What do you mean, Mr. Hughes?

Mr. Hughes: What you say in effect is, you are going to send to this home 2, 5 or 10 million Jews. I don't know the number, but I think there are 15 million Jews in the world. Of course, you are going to regulate the flow, but in process of time they will come back.

Mr. Churchill: I doubt whether very much more than 10,000 a year will go in our lifetime, and it should be remembered that wherever they have been they have not only created wealth for themselves but for the Arabs around them. Wherever the footprints of the Jew in Palestine are found you have prosperity, progress and scientific methods of cultivation, and where there was a wilderness you now find vineyards. They are very good, energetic agriculturists, and there is also this one concluding point which I wish to mention. If we succeed in these two difficult tasks in Palestine and Mesopotamia, which I hope we may with patience and a certain amount of force in reserve, if we do succeed in this, at a moderate expense, then we shall have met all our promises. If, on the other hand, things go wrong, I think we ought to have the liberty to resign our mandates.

Mr. Massey: You are speaking of Mesopotamia now?

Palestine and Mesopotamia.

Mr. Churchill: I am speaking of both, and the United States has lately been coming forward from its long sleep and demanding that none of the mandates shall be ratified by the League of Nations until they have been fully consulted, but if they are under the delusion that we are making a great profit out of these, we might invite them to share our burden with us or relieve us of them altogether. Anyway, I think we ought to have from the Imperial Conference, who represent States, many of which sent troops to take part in this cause, the necessary liberty to make an offer if, and when the time arrives; but I object very much to the accusation that we have got off with a very valuable booty, when, as a matter of fact, we are discharging with great pain and labour a thankless obligation.

Mr. Hughes: Are we to hear anything on Egypt to-day?

Mr. Lloyd George: It is reserved for a separate discussion. I think we had better adjourn now, because we have another Cabinet, until Friday at 11·30, and you will be prepared to lead off the discussion on Friday. We propose to continue the discussion of the general foreign policy of the Empire on Friday, and you will all be ready to take part in the discussion.

Mr. Hughes: I suppose we shall be able to get Lord Curzon's speech?

Lord Curzon: I have just been correcting it, and it will come round to-morrow, or the greater part of it.

General Statements on Foreign Policy.

Lord Curzon: I gave orders for the Foreign Office telegrams to be circulated to the members of the Conference from to-day. I was a little uncertain even as to whether we were a Cabinet, a Conference, a Council or a Meeting.

General Smuts: I hope the telegrams will be confined to those which affect the questions we are discussing, otherwise we should have such piles of them thrown at us.

Mr. Lloyd George: Telegrams from Upper Silesia and such matters.

Lord Curzon: We send you the blue printed document every day. Of course, there are masses of telegrams, 500 or 600 a day. We do not give you those, but there is a printed selection of 30 or 40.

Mr. Lloyd George: The selected important telegrams which are circulated amongst the members of the British Cabinet will be sent to you and they will contain all the important material. They are the telegrams printed by the Foreign Office printers.

Lord Curzon: There are three or four sheets and you will get that document every day.

Mr. Massey: Of course, we have been getting important despatches for some days.

Lord Curzon: That is right, of course.

Mr. Meighen: It is due to the Foreign Secretary first of all that I should say we are very much in his debt for his lucid and impressive review of the conduct of foreign affairs during the last 2½ years. There could be, to my mind, no doubt at any stage as to the meaning he intended to convey, nor as to the frankness and sincerity with which he made his presentation. Similar words apply to that phase of the same subject covered by the address of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. I do not purpose this morning to venture upon any line of criticism of the specific moves on this chessboard in these months. I should require to satisfy my own mind by a longer and closer familiarity with the situation here before doing so. There are others from the Dominions, doubtless, who have enjoyed that familiarity and who will take advantage of the opportunity.

Some words are expected at this stage from the Dominion Representatives expressive of their views as to the general trend of policy in foreign affairs as disclosed by the Foreign Secretary, as well as that pursued with respect to obligations under Mandates, and under mid-war commitments as reviewed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. What remarks I have to make will be general in character and applicable to the entire field.

Status of Dominions in the Empire's Foreign Policy.

It first becomes necessary to set forth upon what principles and subject to what limitations, if any, the comment or advice of the Dominion Ministers may be rightly made or given upon such questions at this Conference.

The Dominions, while enjoying full control of their own affairs, inclusive, in many essential phases of their affairs with other countries, are nevertheless nations within the British Empire. While it is quite true that should Great Britain become embroiled in war every considerable country in the world would be affected, the British Dominions would obviously be affected more immediately and vitally than would countries without the Empire. Whatever course any Dominion might decide to take, its liability to attack would be unquestioned, and its whole existence might become at once in jeopardy. The degree of this special peril might vary with the character or location of Britain's enemy, but that it would always exist is beyond argument. Upon the soundness, therefore, of British Foreign Policy, upon the wisdom of the broad principles governing that policy, very important consequences, as respects the Dominions, depend.

Associated with the above consideration is the further fact that there exists no council or body responsible to the Dominions, or to any Dominion, which can advise our common Sovereign in relation to foreign affairs.

One other truth of paramount importance to Canada is that, incident to our very position on the map of the world, our distinctively Canadian relations with the United States, as respects all phases of mutual concern, are in their very nature so vast and so vital to us that the control of those relations has become and must remain a matter incident to our autonomy. The conduct of affairs as between the entire Empire and that Republic is also of far-reaching concern to Canada. We are interested to a degree very marked indeed in the character and cordiality of the friendship between these two great countries. General Statements on Foreign Policy.

Out of these postulates it would seem the following might be concluded:—

1. There should be regular, and so far as possible, continuous conferences between the responsible representatives of Britain and the self-governing Dominions and India with a view, among other things, of determining and clarifying the governing principles of our relations with foreign countries, and of seeking common counsel and advancing common interests thereupon.
2. That while in general final responsibility rests with the Ministry advising the King, such Ministry should, in formulating the principles upon which such advice is founded and in the application of those principles, have regard to the views of His Majesty's Privy Council in other Dominions and of the Representatives of India.
3. That as respects the determination of the Empire's foreign policy in spheres in which any Dominion is peculiarly concerned the view of that Dominion must be given a weight commensurate with the importance of the decision to that Dominion. Speaking for Canada, I make this observation with particular reference to our relations with the United States.

I may be permitted to say that, added to the above specific conclusions, there is another that it seems to me must be constantly brought forward. The British Empire is now, as it has been for centuries, a union of people under varying forms of connection, spread throughout the world. It has become, of more recent times, a Commonwealth of free nations living under widely diverse conditions. Clearly, any principles underlying the conduct of external relations of such a Commonwealth of Nations must be, more and more, of such simple and understandable character that they will be generally acceptable to the various and widely scattered peoples that comprise the Empire.

League of Nations.

With particular reference to this last, and what I might describe as an overriding conclusion, a few further remarks may be ventured. The erection of a League of Nations was, in some degree, the outcome of a longing among the world's democracies for the bringing about of such diplomatic relations among the nations as would remove the complexities and perplexities of the system of balancing friendships and animosities which had prevailed. In so describing diplomatic proceedings it is needless to add that I do not do so by way of attributing special blame, or any blame, to Great Britain. A nation must define its course in the world as it is. But we have a League of Nations now. What effective part it is to play in the new order, or in bringing improvement to the past order, no one can foretell, and well-informed opinion is naturally divided. But, speaking my own mind and speaking for Canada, the overwhelming determination is that every energy should be devoted, and every caution and restraint exercised, to make possible the success of the League, to help and advance its cause. It seems to me logically to follow that we should now seek to avoid inviting the return of any conditions that would be regarded as anomalous to, or out of harmony with, the general scheme and purpose of the League of Nations, or that could fairly be considered as evidencing distrust in the effectiveness of its organisation. I do not carry the argument further at the present time, but only say that, to my mind, sub-alliances or groupings of Powers, under whatever name, are not easily reconcilable with confidence in, or even fidelity to, the fundamental purposes of the League.

I need not comment at all at present on Conclusion 1, referred to above, as to the necessity of regular continuous Conferences, nor as to the provision of organisation to effect that end. This, I presume, will be debated later.

Present Situation as regards advising His Majesty on Foreign Affairs.

Coming to Conclusion 2, it will be noted that the statement of our present position, as regards the determination of such matters of foreign policy as affect the entire Empire, has reference to conditions as they actually exist. There can be no question but that legally the only body which has up to now advised His Majesty as to the conduct of this Empire's foreign affairs, with responsibility to a Parliament and people, has been, and is to-day, His Majesty's Government of the United Kingdom. Methods have been adopted by which such advice can be given best after consultation with responsible representatives of the Dominions, and indeed, in cases where any Dominion has been solely, or almost solely affected, in accordance with the direct recommendation of such Dominion. Nor is it overstating the present position to say that the right of a Dominion in respect of important engagements to have its consent obtained before being bound, and in cases where the interest of a Dominion is paramount to have its voice accepted, has grown into an indefeasible constitutional recognition. Time and good sense and mutual trust will doubtless clarify the difficulties of the position and establish an effective working practice. But there has been and is no body authorised as such to advise His Majesty in relation to foreign affairs except the United Kingdom Government. I make no conjecture as to the durability of the conditions I have described; I merely say they do exist. While they exist, the importance of His Majesty's Government taking into account, and at times indeed depending upon, the special interest of the Dominion concerned, giving effect to the views of such Dominion, can scarcely be overstated. On the care and fidelity with which the views of the Dominions are regarded depend, it seems to me, in large degree not only the continuance of the relations I have described, but the success with which we discharge our mission as a Commonwealth of Nations. I add, and add with emphasis, my conviction that, whatever evolution of these relations time and circumstances may bring about, the unity of our peoples will remain undisturbed.

Relations between Canada and the United States.

In commenting upon Conclusion 3, which calls attention to the paramount interest which in given cases a Dominion, or Dominions, may have in the cause of the Empire's Foreign Policy, and to the imperative necessity of giving heed to such paramount interest in any decision arrived at, I desire to refer, by way of illustration, to the position of Canada as respects the United States. In this connection I was more than pleased with the words that fell at the close of his speech from the lips of the Foreign Secretary. Canada is a neighbour of the United States across a boundary of nearly 4,000 miles. We share with them a great portion of the American continent. Their trade with us is second in magnitude in the comparison of their trade with the countries of the world, and may easily become the first. We have almost every form of international negotiation with them. The course of the United States' policy in every field affects Canada. Their numbers are many times the numbers of the Dominion in population; their decisions, their lines of policy, consequently affect us in profound degree. We live in constant and vital touch with this problem from day to day. The maintenance, and if it is by any means possible, the betterment, of relations between the British Empire and the United States of America should be, as the Foreign Secretary has well said "the pivot of Britain's world policy." To no country does this truth appeal with such tremendous force as it does to Canada.

The heart of the Dominion beats true to-day, as it has always done, to British institutions and to British connection. We believe that there is one thing of first importance to Britain and the other Dominions, and of not only first but vital importance to Canada, and therefore having wrapt within it, in a peculiar way, our future, and that is the continuance and improvement of our relations with the American people. It has developed through the years, not as a matter of sudden departure or acquisition, but as a matter of growth out of the very necessities of the case, that in the determination of questions affecting, not the Empire as such and the United States, but affecting Canada and the United States, the Dominion should have full and final authority. It is well that this development has taken place, and I submit confidently that in similar conditions in other fields of our foreign relations a like development would be desirable for the common advantage.

I am not in these remarks making reference to any specific article of foreign policy—such, for example, as the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. The time for that discussion will come in due course.

I have endeavoured to unfold our position in a broad and understandable way. I hope my doing so will help in our discussions, subject by subject, later.

Mr. Hughes: Prime Minister, I quite agree with Mr. Meighen's comment upon the review of Foreign Policy presented to us by Lord Curzon. From whatever point of view it be regarded, it was admirable. It left a profound impression in our minds, both of the vastness and splendour of the pageantry of Empire that it unfolded and the competence of those who have charge of the Foreign Affairs of this country. I agree also with Mr. Meighen that that part of Foreign Affairs dealt with by Mr. Winston Churchill left nothing to be desired, either in the completeness of its treatment or the vividness of its presentation.

Situation since the Armistice.

We find ourselves in a difficult position. We are asked to express an opinion on the Foreign Policy of Britain and the Empire during these past two and a half years. But we are confronted with things either already done, or still in the doing, but so far matured that in most cases, no matter what might have been said with advantage when the moment was opportune, there now remains nothing at all to do but to go on. I am not suggesting by these remarks that anything that has been done might have been done in a different way, because I think we all realise that to a large extent circumstance compelled us to shape our policy in a certain way. We were never quite free to shape our own course over a great part of that spacious arena covered by the Foreign Secretary yesterday. The circumstances of the war and our obligations arising out of it made freedom of action impossible. We may regret that we incurred some of these obligations, but at the time that we did so we thought any sacrifice and any price justified, if it contributed to the safety of our country. To-day we sit round this table in perfect peace and security: we may speak of the Treaty of London as did Lord Curzon. No doubt, if we had to do it all over again, we might act differently. Yet if no other inducement would have persuaded Italy to range herself alongside the Allies, it was right that we should have made the Treaty. I do not think myself competent in any case to criticise the Foreign Policy of the last two and a half years. It is impossible for any of us who are unfamiliar with the details and far removed from that environment in which the Foreign Policy of Europe is moulded to do so. Nor do I suggest for a moment that affairs could with advantage have taken any other course. I think Lord Curzon, whether deliberately or not, conveyed the impression that we were in our present position not entirely of our own free will. The alternative, he told us, was a policy, not of splendid but of dangerous isolation—isolation full of menace not only to ourselves, but also to the world.

General Statements on Foreign Policy.

Need for Empire to share in European Politics.

General Smuts was perhaps responsible for Lord Curzon's references to this matter. It had been suggested that we should stand aloof from European policy and follow the example of America. I do not agree with that view. I think Lord Curzon was absolutely right. What would have happened to the world if we had stood aloof? Would it have been well for the world? Sometimes I fancy we do not realise, as Lord Curzon pointed out, the tremendous potency of this Empire for good or evil. Weighing all things fairly, I venture to say that the British Empire has been, and is, on the whole, the most potent influence for good that the world knows or has ever known. No doubt there are spots on the sun; we have sometimes fallen short of a counsel of perfection. But if our courage fail, our hand becomes palsied and we no longer hold the sceptre, who is to do so? I know what General Smuts has in mind. But I do not think, taking a fair view of the position during the last two years or so, we should have been justified in standing aloof and calling upon the League of Nations—which, as yet in its infancy and promising great things to the world, is not yet in a position to fulfil those promises—to take our place.

Value of the Empire to the World during last Two Years.

Now, there are only one or two things I desire to touch upon. It is impossible to grasp or even dwell upon the mere outline of the vast picture presented to us yesterday. We who come here with our minds filled with other matters vital to our countries, need time to consider carefully what we have heard. I shall, therefore, confine myself to one or two observations. I think no useful purpose would be served by any attempts to criticise the Foreign Policy of the past two and a half years, even if I were so inclined and thought that criticism necessary and proper. No doubt, looking back on all that has been done, we can see many things that might with advantage have been done differently. But that applies to most, if not all, things that men do, viewed in retrospect. The Treaty of Versailles imposed upon us certain responsibilities. We should have proved ourselves weaklings had we failed to shoulder them. I agree with Lord Curzon absolutely that the world, distracted and demoralised by war and its aftermath, wants a rock upon which it can stand. The world is in a state of chaos. This Empire alone stands firm. Much has been said, and rightly said, about peace. But we must face the facts, for the peace of the world is not to be secured by mere words. It is proper after this great war to speak in condemnatory terms of force. But we must not forget that the world owes much these last two and a half years to the power of this Empire. It has acted as the world's policeman. And it has, on the whole, performed its duties efficiently and to the lasting benefit of mankind. Its failure to carry out what we conceive to be its clear duty would have produced most lamentable effects upon the whole world. For what to-day is the alternative to this Empire, its alliance with France and the principles for which it stands? The alternative is Bolshevism, the very negation not only of democarcy, but of all law, international and municipal. Though the things that are done are not without flaw, no good can come of criticism. To a large extent we are as much responsible—every one of us who represent the Dominions—for the greater part of the Foreign Policy during the last two and a half years as Great Britain herself, for it has been fashioned to deal with conditions for which the Peace Conference and the Peace Treaty were, if not directly, indirectly responsible. And at that Conference our voices were heard and to that Treaty our names are attached. I desire, however, to say a word or two upon a matter arising indirectly out of the Treaty of Versailles. I refer to the state of affairs between Greece and Turkey and our attitude towards the belligerents. The general feeling of the people of Australia, at any rate, and, I think, of the people of this country too, is that we ought not to be involved in this trouble. We ought not to spend one shilling or to risk one life to further the ambitious projects of King Constantine. Lord Curzon has explained how the position arose. I could not help thinking, while he was speaking, how mysteriously the finger of Providence moves. A monkey, we are told, has done this thing. He bit Alexander so sorely that he sickened and died! But why did he stop there? Why did he only bite King Alexander?

General Statements on Foreign Policy.

I do most strongly urge that as our interests certainly lie in conciliating the Moslem world, we ought not to support the ambitious designs of King Constantine. I do not know that the views of the Australian soldier in regard to this matter are very important, but he emerged from the war with a supreme contempt for the Greek, who was supposed to be his ally, and with a hearty admiration for the Turk, against whom he fought. I must say I share that view entirely, and I would not spend one shilling or move one man on behalf of Greece.

Russia.

Now, I say nothing at all about Russia, because I think those who have said most about Russia have learnt as time goes on that they have had, for the most part, to retract all they said and that silence would have been their most useful mode of expression. We are told by Lord Curzon that the Soviet Government of Russia is almost on its last legs and that it is now buying herrings to feed the people. But, still, there it is. We are told that the commune is honeycombed with internecine strife. Well, internecine strife is not peculiar to Russia. These things go on everywhere. We are told that there is a quarrel between Lenin and Trotsky. Well, what of that? Are we to postulate from that that the end of all things is arriving? Are there not quarrels amongst other leaders, political intrigues and internecine strife in other countries—here and in other parts of the Empire, for example? I do not know how it is with Mr. Meighen and Mr. Massey—General Smuts is in a happy position just now—but I am bound to say that I am so familiar with that sort of thing in Australia that it does not affect me at all. I live in an atmosphere of internecine strife. If there is nothing else to support the theory that the Soviet Government is on its last legs than statements of this kind, the outlook is not very promising for those who do not believe in Bolshevism.

If there is anything further, I hope, Sir, we shall be told what it is. And it is very important that we shall be told precisely what is the policy of Britain in regard to trade with Russia. It is most embarrassing to be asked questions in the House of Representatives in Australia about the trade agreement with Russia, and to say that I have no information whatever about it. I am not suggesting that anything definite has been done about a trade agreement. All I say is, if anything has been done or is to be done, we ought to be told of it.

Palestine and Mesopotamia.

I will turn to just one other matter arising out of the statement of Mr. Churchill. I think we are all very much interested in the picture he drew of Mesopotamia and of Palestine. Mr. Churchill says, and I think he is quite right in saying, that we made certain promises during the war, and we are called upon to fulfil our obligations honourably. But when I heard the Colonial Secretary's speech, the prospects of his policy in Mesopotamia proving successful seemed to justify the expenditure and effort. But when I came to read his speech, I was struck by the manner in which he guarded himself from the charge which might be made hereafter, that he was ready to guarantee that this Arab Kingdom would fulfil the hopes that some enthusiasts held in regard to it. Personally, I do not know how far our promises take us. But I do not think we ought to go one-thousandth part of an inch beyond the letter of the law. Of course, the Colonial Secretary is probably of a more optimistic temperament than I am, at any rate this morning, and he sees a new Arabia. Now, here again my view is jaundiced and overcast by the views of the Australian soldier who fought in this war alongside of our allies, the Arabs. From experience the Australian soldier learned much. In action it was his custom to keep both eyes on our Arab allies, because there was far more danger from them than from the Turks.

There was, however, a silver lining to this dark cloud hovering over the Australian soldier. The Arabs rarely fought in earnest for more than ten minutes, and then unless victory appeared certain melted away. I hope we shall not endeavour to achieve the impossible in Mesopotamia. Promises must be kept, and I would, if I were a member of the House of Commons, support Mr. Churchill in honourably keeping them, asking him, however, not to interpret them too liberally. No doubt our policy in Mesopotamia has an influence in the Moslem world, and for that reason, if for no other, it deserves support. But when we turn to Palestine and see what is being done there, I am bound to say that I do not understand how to reconcile our present policy there with that pursued in Mesopotamia. Certainly what is being done in Palestine will not tend to help us with the Moslem world. But Mr. Churchill's explanation is that we have made promises, and, of course, must stand by them. But I do hope that both in this and in other matters you will remember that this Empire of ours—particularly in this country—has many enemies. Its every act evokes hostile criticism and is made the subject of gross misinterpretation. There is a widespread suspicion in the minds of very many people, even in the country which I have the honour to represent, that Britain's foreign policy is Imperialistic and directed towards aggrandisement and widening its sphere of influence. I think this ever-lengthening list of foreign entanglements seems to give some colour to this charge. It certainly serves to feed anti-British propaganda. I hope, therefore, we shall, as far as possible, mould our foreign policy on lines compatible with those ideals of liberty, democracy, right, and the peace and welfare of mankind for which we fought in the great war. So far as the Dominions are concerned, we certainly do not desire world Empire. Our ideals do not rest upon a foundation of force or warlike preparation, but upon peace and all that makes for peace.

General Statements on Foreign Policy.

Status of Dominions in the Empire's Foreign Policy.

I come now to quite a different question. Mr. Meighen this morning gave a new turn to this debate, for which I at any rate was not prepared. He has said some things which I should like to consider very carefully before I speak on them. I had not anticipated that at this session we should do anything more than deal with what the Foreign Secretary and Secretary of State for the Colonies had said, deferring our discussion upon the basic principles that are to govern future foreign policy for another day. However, I can quite see that under the heading set out in the notice paper it was quite competent for Mr. Meighen to introduce these questions. But I want to have an opportunity of considering very carefully the terms of his memorandum and where his proposals, if adopted, would lead us to. I shall not now say anything by way of comment, let alone criticism, of his suggestions, save to make it clear that it must not be understood that by my silence I support his views. On the other hand, there may be very little difference between any of us, and the difference, if any, may be in the statement of the case rather than in substance; but I want to be very careful that we should know exactly what Mr. Meighen has said and what his proposals involve, and I shall leave, Sir, anything I have to say on the Representative of Canada's views upon the principles which should govern the Empire in relation to its foreign policy, until I have had an opportunity of carefully considering his statement, Dangers of Bolshevik Propaganda.

I come now to a point of the utmost importance. I said earlier in my speech that in a shifting world this Empire of ours was the one thing that stood firm, and I entirely agreed with Earl Curzon that Bolshevism was the very negation of all the British Empire stands for. Thus Bolshevism recognises that it is against this Empire that the forces of anarchy and destruction must fiercely rage. It is no use shutting our eyes to the fact that against the British Empire there is a world-wide conspiracy. A virulent campaign of insidious propaganda against us and all we stand for is being carried on in almost every country of the world. We cannot, we dare not, ignore its sinister purpose, its menacing effects. I was very much surprised, therefore, to see a report of a speech delivered, I think, by Sir Robert Horne, in which he said it was no part of the Government's duty to counteract Bolshevik propaganda. Whose duty then is it?

Mr. Lloyd George: I do not think he said that.

Mr. Hughes: It may be that I am mistaken. I do not know. In any case, the fact remains that it is vital that the world should not be left to the mercy of an insidious propaganda which worms its way through the tiniest crevice in the armour of men's minds, appealing to their ignorance, their emotions, interests, superstitions, and religion. Everywhere Bolshevik propaganda wraps itself about a gospel of hatred of Britain and all her works. In our Dominions, in India, in America, all over the world men's minds are being saturated by this poison. So far as the Western world is concerned, the British Empire is the great obstacle in the paths of Bolshevism. I think it is time that some deliberate and systematised effort was made to counteract this propaganda, and to tell the world the things for which Britain and the Empire stand. Let the people of the world have at least the opportunity of hearing both sides. Here I will leave the matter for the present.

We are very anxious to know what it is proposed to do with regard to trade with Russia. What you propose to do in regard to any recognition of Soviet Russia. I hope you will tell us in plenty of time what you propose to do before you do it.

General Smuts: I was very much struck not only by the ability of the statement of the Foreign Secretary, but especially by its extreme candour, and I think we are all very indebted in this Conference to Lord Curzon for the frankness and candour in which he has spoken. He has not put any case before us; he has not defended the foreign policy of the British Government, but, in a spirit of great frankness, has put all the principles that have guided us in the immediate past. Now, I should be very sorry if anything I said last time, or that I am going to say to-day, should be taken as coming from a critic.

Different points of view of the various parts of the Empire.

I speak in no critical sense at all, but I think it is very necessary that we should all discuss the fundamentals of our foreign policy from the different points of view that present themselves in the different parts of the Empire. The Empire after all is a very big concern, and every subject of international concern is viewed as it were from different angles by our different peoples, and it is the very object of a meeting such as ours here to focus all these different points of view in order that our policy may have a bearing with regard to all of them. I have always looked upon it as a great advantage that those with whom we are dealing in European diplomacy should understand that this is the position of the British Empire. If foreign Ministers in Europe think they are simply dealing with the British Government they might expect too much. They would not expect then to carry this sympathetic and easy-going British Government with them, but they ought to understand that it is a very difficult show and a complex show with which they are dealing, that the British Foreign Secretary and the Colonial Secretary represent a very complex Empire spread over all the world, and matters have to co-ordinated before any concession is made; I think that it would be very helpful to our Foreign Office, and the British Government generally, to make the foreign Governments understand that you represent not only the United Kingdom, not only the British Government but the British Empire as a whole which has to view things from all these different angles.

Indeed, there is no doubt that in the British Empire as a whole the affairs of Central Europe are viewed with a great deal of indifference. I am speaking merely from the point of view of South Africa, but I suppose the point of view of the other Dominions is very much the same. The affairs of Central Europe, such as they have been developing in the last two years since peace, do not affect our people very much. They leave us cold and indifferent, and although we have been very deeply into all these matters and the British Government has taken the greatest amount of trouble—the Foreign Secretary has spoken of all the time that has been spent in conferences to find solutions which these impasses in the relations have necessitated—these no doubt leave us cold and indifferent in the Dominions. This is a far away world. We occupy a position of isolation to some extent which does not make us sympathise very much with these concerns in Europe, and what I have been afraid of is this—watching things as they have been developing the last two years and reading telegrams from the Prime Minister and the papers as to what is happening, and seeing how often we are on the point of a great crisis—what I fear is this, that we might at any time find ourselves very deeply involved, this Government might find itself very deeply involved in a European crisis to which the Dominions are utterly indifferent, and in which they will say, "We will have no concern in these things," and that would lead to a very serious consideration.

Mr. Lloyd George: Would you mind developing that, General Smuts? You do not mind my interrupting because you put that point in your first statement. Just tell me the sort of thing you have in your mind. Give me an illustration.

General Smuts: I will give as an illustration the advance which took place at Ruhrort, Düsseldorf and Duisburg. It was something quite apart from the Peace Treaty, so far as I take it. It was a further occupation of German territory. Of course, luckily for us, nothing happened, but supposing a new crisis had developed over that, what would have been the attitude of the various peoples of the Empire?

General Statements on Foreign Policy.

Mr. Lloyd George: This is really rather important, and that is why I am pressing you. That advance took place to enforce more particularly two conditions of the Peace Treaty. One was that in relation to reparation, because the Germans were refusing to put forward any practical proposals for that purpose, and the second was because they refused to disarm in accordance with the conditions of the treaty. Supposing they had definitely declined to carry out these conditions. The Dominions are directly interested in reparation, directly financially interested. Would the Dominions have preferred that we should have taken no steps to enforce these conditions?

General Smuts: It is difficult to see what attitude the Dominions would have taken in any particular case. Take the position that was taken at one stage of the Reparation question. The position of the 50 per cent. export duty. I do not know what attitude was taken up by the other Dominions, but when my Government came to consider the question from the South African point of view, and in reviewing what our trade relations had been with Germany in the past, and what we hope our trade relations may be with her in the future, we found it impossible to agree to this policy; and that is the sort of thing we have to guard against. The British Empire regard it from different points of view, and unless we can follow a Foreign Policy in Europe which bears all these things in mind, we may come to a crisis which carries our different countries into difficulties, which would be a very serious thing. The peoples who have been started on their legs at the expense of the lives of our young men and great expenditure—we find these peoples callous and irresponsible in the matters they pursue. It is rather from that point of view—the impression that these things are making on our peoples—that I am afraid of Central Europe, and I think we are being too deeply occupied in the affairs of Central Europe. Do not think I am for a moment in favour of splendid isolation. That does not express my attitude. I do not think America is taking the right attitude in these matters. America, after coming into the war, has backed out of everything. I agree with what has fallen from Mr. Hughes. It is not possible for us to do so unless we want to be selfish and not play our part properly. We must continue to bear our share, but there, too, I have this feeling that I have expressed, that we ought to be very careful as to the attitude of the Empire as a whole in all these matters—careful how far we go, and I am in favour of an attitude of greater independence than we have hitherto assumed, if I may say so. You described the policy, our Continental policy, as that of a sort of Alliance with France, and you said that was the pivot of Continental peace. I am very doubtful about that whole policy. There is no doubt, as you described to us, Lord Curzon, France pursues a different policy from us. France has different aims. Our policy is that of a loyal ally who saw the war through by the side of France, who wants to discharge her obligations to France and to the rest of Europe, but we are working with an Ally who has a policy of her own to pursue. If France succeeds in her policy she will produce a weak Germany and a set of weak States under her tutelage. She has Belgium held in some treaty relation the details of which I do not know; she seems to be working up Poland into a similar State, and we shall have a Continent under the leadership of France, which would be a very dangerous thing for this country. I therefore doubt very much whether it is a wise policy for us to be associated with France along the lines they are pursuing. We have found it difficult to work with her under war conditions; we find it more difficult to work with her under peace conditions. We know her policy is entirely different from ours, and unless we assume the position of semi-independence, unless we assert ourselves and act in a manner that is worthy of the greatness of this Empire, then we are placed in a false position—in a false position in this way because, whilst nominally acting with France, we are almost fighting her. This policy, which Lord Curzon has described to us of keeping a hand on France in order to control her, keeping in with France in order to keep her in check, is a difficult policy. You are always liable to be misunderstood. You are liable to be accused of disloyalty. You put yourself forward as helping her, and you are keeping a check on her all the time; this may lead to continual charges of bad faith and disloyalty.

Recommends policy of Greater Independence in European Affairs.

No, I would submit that we should rather take up a position of independence, and when we are fighting in our own interests, and in the interests of Europe as a whole, say to her "No." Do not try to be an ally and be dragged about by her and have to fight her all the time. It seems to be a policy of independence which is desirable, and that would be a much easier policy for us to pursue and which in the end is going to be much more effective with France too. If you do actually stand up to her then, of course, she will be much more cautious. The immediate past has shown that. I would, instead of being an ally of France, or working with her as ally, and almost disloyal to her in that sense—I would rather assume a position of independence, putting the British Empire entirely aside from all of them, and taking a line of our own, and a strong line if necessary. That would make our position intelligible to the whole world; our position will be intelligible to France. She will know how she stands, and it will make the whole position of the world easier. I do not know whether I make myself understood . . . .

Mr. Lloyd George : It is a very practical problem which we have to consider. I am very glad that you have led off with it, because I think we should consider it, not only as a part of our foreign policy, but consider it separately. That is one line. There is another which is suggested, as you know. Therefore, I am glad to hear the case in full.

Mr. Churchill : I did not understand what General Smuts meant when he said "Let France know where we are with her." That covers so much. Will he make it a little clearer?

General Smuts : So long as we are an ally of France she looks to us for support. I do not want her to look upon us in that light at all. She should know that she is dealing with an independent Britain, who is going to judge impartially of the whole position. The British Empire is going to be guided by her own interests and general world interests, and no longer guided by war interests.

Mr. Chamberlain : Have you considered what would have been the actual results in Europe to-day if we had adopted that policy twelve months ago? I am talking now of since the peace and considering troubles which have arisen out of the war. Having seen the troubles at the meetings of the different European Governments and ourselves, it seems to me impossible to overrate the valuable influence which the British Delegation—and particularly the Prime Minister, greater than any other man, I think—had on those gatherings. If we had made this declaration to France twelve months ago, you would have seen France in occupation of the Ruhr Valley, either alone or with contingents just sufficient to give colour to her operations, and you would have seen France passing over the whole of Silesia through Poland, in spite of the plebiscite which was the direct result of the British Peace Delegation, in which the representatives of all the Dominions took counsel with the Prime Minister in France.

Mr. Lloyd George: Do you mind dealing with that, General Smuts?

General Smuts: I look upon the thing rather differently. France is really in a weak position. Her ambitions are very great, and very dangerous to the world. Really she is a weak country, and unless she knew that she was backed up by the British Empire, I doubt whether she would go into Silesia. Take the occupation of Frankfort. That is necessary to your statement. Here was a case in which France gave way at the moment to her ambitions and occupied Frankfort. You made the position of the British Empire clear at once, so that, I think, is rather an indication that it would be better if we were to assume a strong position—I say it with modesty, and do not think one ought to speak immodestly, but at all events clearly, but we should speak from the position that we do occupy in the world, and we should recognise that we exercise more influence with France and we should not allow her to count so far on us as to pull 10 per cent. to-day, 15 per cent. to-morrow and 20 per cent. afterwards, in connection with her policy. If that is done the rest of the world will look much more to us; the rest of Europe will be guided by us as really the determining factor in European policy.

Lord Curzon: What you are really advocating is that we are to revert to the kind of policy which we pursued before the war. It was the war that brought us into close alliance with France. During the whole of my public life I have been a good deal occupied with foreign affairs under the old régime. What was the old régime when we were independent of relations with France? Did it bring us peace and happiness? No, it was a condition of conflict with her in every part of the world—nothing but pin pricks. We were brought to the verge of war with France on three occasions—over Nigeria, over Fashoda and over Siam; and it seems to me after the experience of the past thirty years that a policy of independence on our part was only attended with grave danger. I might multiply these instances, but so serious did the case become from time to time that every five or ten years there had to be a sort of sweeping up with France in order to put things on a better basis. When those arrangements came about we gave away much more than we got, and certainly I must emphasise the fact that, although General Smuts represents the present situation as one in which France is pulling us along sometimes 10 per cent., sometimes 15 per cent., and sometimes 20 per cent., in my judgment the proportions are very much the other way about.

General Statements on Foreign Policy.

General Smuts: You are very much in the same position now as the one you described as having existed years ago. We are kept in continual turmoil and difficulty by France even to-day; it is an endless thing, and I have the feeling that, whatever we are going to do, Europe is moving to another crisis. It seems to me this pot is boiling and kept boiling partially by French ambitions, to some extent by general conditions, but the position in Europe is such, financially and economically, that I do not see how we are going to escape some great crisis in the future. All these countries are overburdened with debts; they cannot really get along. France is looking to German indemnities for relief. She will find no substantial relief in that direction. I am very much afraid that in a certain number of years we shall be in a great crisis in Europe, and all the time not in a position of independence, able to assert ourselves and bear our full weight, but involved with France and all the odium which her policy may bring upon us, and not really strong and independent to act according to our interests. That is why I am looking more and more in the other direction, and that is, to America. America, of course, has behaved very badly over this whole business. She came late into the war, she has left us at a very critical stage, and she has simply disinterested herself in the whole business and has withdrawn out of it. But there are many indications that America is profoundly unhappy—very many indications of it. There are many people profoundly unhappy; and while her own present Government will not join the League of Nations—they fought a campaign over that and won their victory over setting it aside—America is groping about trying to find some way by which she may once more do her duty. That presents a very great opening for us to try and get our world relations upon a better footing. If we could get America once more to work with us, even if she were not in the League of Nations, it might alter the whole situation.

Advantages of better Relations with America.

Mr. Lloyd George: You must get her into some sort of Association. You cannot have a League of Nations without America; it would not be of the least use.

General Smuts: I would not go that length. The League of Nations is more an effort, an experiment, a groping as it were of the peoples towards a new organisation and a new international life. It is not in a form that I look upon as final; it may be the whole thing may have to be reshaped.

Mr. Lloyd George: Look at that map, and see what is outside the League; half the world is outside.

Mr. Massey: But look what is inside the League of Nations. There is a weaker tail in the League of Nations than in the British cricket team.

General Smuts: I am strongly for union with America and for coming to some general settlement with America as the basis of our foreign policy.

Mr. Hughes: Would not that involve us in such a policy as America might dictate?

General Smuts: No.

Mr. Hughes: Or, at any rate, as America might suggest or favour. You say we must not go with France, but stand alone, but that with America it would be all right. I see objections to both.

General Smuts: The great difference is this, that America has very much the same position in world affairs that we have. Our Dominions, too, are in very much the some position. Our association with France entails our continual preoccupation with the internal affairs of Europe, whereas America is in a different position. Your country and my country and New Zealand are all developing . . . .

Mr. Hughes: I think, and have always said, that an understanding with America is essential to the peace of the world. Still, I think it is fatal to your argument as you put it forward about France and England. I am quite sure of that, but at the same time we cannot have that understanding with America unless we are prepared to give up the course we intended to take, and do what they suggest.

General Smuts: I do not think that we should make any surrender at all. We are exposing a number of surfaces of friction with America quite uselessly. We have had a fight over oil in Mesopotamia. We have heard the story of Mesopotamia. The Colonial Secretary seems to be most doubtful about the whole Mesopotamian business, and told us half a dozen times that there is no guarantee of a future there.

Mr. Massey: The Standard Oil Company think there is oil in Mesopotamia.

General Smuts: Then we have the question of cables and Yap. We have a number of other questions that are surfaces of friction which are developing with America. I am for getting rid of all of them. We have at the back of them all the most serious question of the American loans. America has lent us a lot of money, which I consider part of the war, and the final solution must solve that question too. We have lent to France a lot of money. How we are ever to have peaceful relations with France if we continue in years to come to insist upon payment of that debt I do not know, and I would make every effort to get the people in a better temper, to bring them into a state of mind when we can deal with all these questions. I would not keep talking to America over these questions, because they are not in the proper temper and there is no atmosphere for a fruitful discussion. If we are to come to some general settlement with her and work with her on the lines of a general understanding, the temper would be produced in which we might relieve this country of what is probably the most intolerable incubus resting upon it—the American debt. It is not impossible to deal with the question in that way. America would not look at it now, but if we developed our foreign policy upon the proper lines, if we have this orientation in our foreign affairs, it is very likely that America might fall into line ultimately with us and we might come to a clean settlement of all this big business. Those are the few suggestions I wanted to make. There are many points which arise from Lord Curzon's statement which I will not go into because it seems to me the big thing is the direction of our policy, the direction in which we are going to move in the future in the difficult times we are going to have, which will be as difficult as any that have ever been. The world is bankrupt and half mad, and it must come to a crisis again. There will be a repudiation all over Europe, and the question will be: "How is it going to affect us here?" To some crisis we are certainly moving, and I would therefore, with a view to all these difficulties, dangers and perils that threaten our path, advocate, without asserting it openly, working towards a position of greater independence in Europe and towards a position of greater co-operation and better understanding with America, as the key-note and the fundamental principle of our future policy.

Need for the Empire to associate in European Politics.

Mr. Massey: Mr. Prime Minister, I join the speakers who have preceded me in expressing our gratitude to Lord Curzon and Mr. Churchill for the very lucid and important statements that we have had from them with regard to foreign affairs. I would just like to say that, so far as Lord Curzon's statement is concerned, while he dealt with many important matters, I think the most important point he made was—and I admit there must be different points of view and different opinions favoured by the gentlemen met round this table—when he made it abundantly clear that it is impossible for us to dissociate ourselves from the politics of Europe. We simply cannot do it at present. The politics of Europe are at present chaotic, simply in such a state of chaos that no one can clearly understand them, but I believe that the chaos would be a hundred times intensified if Britain attempted to withdraw. General Smuts expressed the opinion that the affairs of Central Europe were regarded with indifference by the peoples of the Dominions. That, I am bound to say, is not my experience. I can find a dozen men, citizens of New Zealand, here to-day in London who know probably as much, and have studied European politics as closely, as almost any dozen men who are in public life at present, or who represent the different countries, or who are even Ministers of the different countries. So far as my own country is concerned, they have proved their interest over and over again in European politics, and generally the state of affairs in Europe, by sending quite substantial contributions from their own limited exchequer for the purpose of relieving the distress and starvation even of enemy countries, even those which are regarded to-day as enemy countries. That is my experience. As to withdrawal, I do not know whether General Smuts made this point perfectly clear, whether he suggested that we should withdraw from our alliance with France, because morally it is an alliance. Personally, again I say, I do not think it is possible, and if you look at it from only one point of view, and that may be an exceedingly selfish point of view, how are we going to enforce the conditions of the Peace Treaty if we withdraw from our alliance with France? If France by herself attempted to enforce the conditions of the Peace Treaty we should have war right away, a war which would set the whole of Europe in a blaze. I doubt if we could enforce the conditions by ourselves. If I asked the people of the Dominions to send troops to Central Europe—to Germany—for the purpose of enforcing the conditions, while they would be quite ready to come forward in support of Britain, or probably France, I doubt if I could get sufficient forces to be of any value for the other purpose. I think the only chance of enforcing the Treaty is to keep our alliance with France in existence.

There is another point of view. Some day or other there may be another European war. I believe there will be, though the wish is not father to the thought. I believe it will be so, though probably not in our time. There is the possibility of French territory passing into the hands of an enemy of Britain, territory within gun-shot of the shores of the heart of the Empire. That has to be thought of. At all events, I think the risk is far too great. However, that is my individual opinion, and it has got to stand at that so far as I am concerned.

There are two other points in which I am interested and on which I should like to say something. I suppose it is intended later to discuss naval defence?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes

Mr. Massey: I do not think we can avoid it. I think we ought to have an opportunity to express our opinions upon the naval defence of the Empire, particularly because from our point of view the danger centre, as I understand it, has shifted. It is no longer in Europe—I am speaking from the point of view of naval defence only—but in the Pacific.

How do we know what developments are likely to take place in the Pacific during the next few years? I will not follow that, because we have the assurance that an opportunity will be given, but I believe that we are on the eve of great changes in Europe.

Russia and Germany in the Future.

I am not thinking of the possibility of war in the near future; I would like to think all war is ended, but take Russia, for instance. The cablegrams that we have got from Russia and the statements that have appeared in newspapers from time to time, whether they are reliable or whether they are not, I cannot tell, but they seem to indicate that Bolshevism in Russia is tottering to its fall. If so, what is taking its place? I hope it will be something better. I am not going to suggest whether it is going to be an Empire, a Monarchy, a Republic or what it is going to be, and let me say I think that Republics are just about as dangerous as Monarchies. If you look back upon the history of the world, you find that Republics have been at war just as often in proportion to their opportunities as those countries that called themselves Empires or Monarchies. Then take America—even America has been at war many times. As a Republic, it went to war with itself on a very serious occasion in the 'sixties, and American blood was poured out like water. However, I was referring to what might possibly come along in Russia in the course of a few years—the present state of events cannot continue, and I believe that Russia will have a stable Government again. It may be as has happened in France, that a strong man, such as Napoleon was, will come along and reorganise Russia. It is in their interests and in the interests of the world that something better should be done than is happening in Russia at the present time. How that would affect us it is impossible to say, but you have got to think of Germany and Poland alongside Russia. Germany is getting back to peace conditions, and, as far as it is possible for us to judge, very rapidly. Manufactured goods to-day can be produced in Germany and sold to other countries at a very much lower price that they can be produced in England, America or anywhere else. I believe in five years you will have Germany in a strong industrial position—I do not suggest military or naval position—but in as strong an industrial position as she was prior to the war. How that will affect Europe it is impossible to say. I trust that Germany will not attempt to get back to the military position she occupied prior to 1914, but she may, and it will be a long time before Britain is forgiven for the position she took up in the war by the German people. I am satisfied of that.

General Statements on Foreign Policy.

There is a difficulty in regard to Poland. The idea of most of us, when the new arrangement was made, was that the new Poland would be a sort of buffer State between Germany and Russia. I have come to the belief that anything of the sort is impossible. Napoleon tried 100 years ago, so did the Congress of Vienna. They attempted to make Poland a buffer State and failed. The plain truth is—and I am sorry to admit it—we cannot rely upon the Polish people. If they do not find trouble outside, they will find it inside, and fight among themselves, and it is my opinion that the future danger of the world is coming from a combination between Russia and Germany, and, if that can be avoided, it will be a very good thing to do.

Insufficiency of the present League of Nations.

But you will want something stronger and far more influential than the League of Nations to prevent danger of that sort, and that is why I think the whole Covenant of the League of Nations should be reconsidered by people competent to do it. I am not reflecting on the present Council of the League of Nations—not in the very least—but I should like to see something much more comprehensive and much more representative done in connection with the League of Nations. If not, it had better go out and let us rely upon a British League of Nations, in which, I believe, everyone of us would have far more confidence than the present League of Nations. I am disappointed, as, at the time, I thought we should have something more substantial before now, although there is time yet, and there is no reason why there should not be more time given. What I am afraid of is that it is leading to a false sense of security. People may rely upon the League of Nations to prevent war, and some day or other we shall find an enemy at the gates. I say "we," but I do not expect it to happen during the present generation.

I should like to endorse what has been said by General Smuts on the point that the re-establishment of Germany is necessary to our peace and prosperity. I quite believe that, and I think we ought to assist in that direction in every way we possibly can. There is just one point that I want to refer to while I am dealing with German matters, and that is the punishment of war criminals. Now, I do not think I am a vindictive man—my friends say I am not—but we were all present at the Peace Conference and we all took part in the proceedings of the British Delegation. I think what has occurred in connection with the treatment of war criminals—or what has been allowed to occur—has been a bit ridiculous. I am speaking of the number of the criminals whose names were placed on record. I think it was absolutely ludicrous to think that we should shoot German criminals by thousands—that was out of the question—it was quite impossible. I am interested in this, because, as the Prime Minister knows, I happened to be on the Atrocities Commission and attended every meeting of the Commission. The majority of the Commission, I may say, were not unreasonable men—very far from it—and they thought the atrocities should not be allowed to go unpunished. They were murders in the worst sense of the term, and murder accompanied in many cases by the most horrible details. We thought we should have had an International Tribunal of unbiassed men, and limited the number of the worst cases which should have been placed on trial. It did not matter how many—whether forty, fifty, a dozen or twenty, yet they should have been tried and punished in accordance with the magnitude of their crimes. I am afraid by what we have done we have established a bad precedent. We talk about preventing war in the future. If you are going to prevent war you must do something by way of a deterrent. Now the criminals have been allowed to escape and I think it is too late to do anything. We cannot go back upon it. We have a precedent that I can think of in the civil war in the United States of America. Those criminals guilty of atrocities were placed upon trial, and I have read that one man, a German, as it happened, was guilty of cruelty to prisoners under his control—the war prisoners—and he was placed upon his trial at the end of the war and shot, as I have no doubt he deserved. As I say, we have allowed these people to get off too easily. I am not going to bring this matter up again, and I am not going to refer to it publicly or privately again, though I think it my duty to express my opinion now.

Punishment of War Criminals.

Relations with Turkey.

Then there is Turkey. Turkey is one of the most difficult questions the Allies—and especially Britain—have to settle. I cannot forget that we are the greatest Mohammedan Power in the world, and I think we should be taking a serious risk if we bundled the Sultan and those connected with him out of Constantinople. I think the right thing has been done as far as that goes. We had these many millions of Mohammedans loyal to us during the war, most of them are British subjects, and we have to think of them as fellow citizens. I believe the Sultan should be left in Constantinople, though I certainly would not allow him to regain the power which he possessed prior to the war, and if that is done, it is going to prevent him regaining the territory which he held prior to the war, and that is where I think Mesopotamia and Palestine come in.

General Statements on Foreign Policy.

Palestine and Mesopotamia.

I am very strongly of opinion that, whatever happens, Palestine and Mesopotamia must not go back to Turkey. Then, what are we going to do with those countries? We have put our hands to the plough, so to speak, whether right or wrong, but, as we have put our hands to the plough, we cannot now draw back. If we draw back from Palestine and Mesopotamia now it would leave a very bad impression on the Mohammedans there, and the Asiatic people generally, and perhaps certain European people as well. It would be a serious blow to British prestige, and I think we have to go on. I think those two countries have to be held. I know some of the difficulties, and I know there are more difficulties than I can think of, so far as the information supplied to us allows us to do so, and so far as the newspaper reports give the information. But take Palestine. It has been already pointed out that the Arabs were our Allies during the war. We know their peculiarities. Mr. Hughes referred to them, but they are a people of the British Empire to-day; I believe they have a great future and are a great race. It has been said if they were successful in their fights, each one collared his share of booty and went to his home, and was not seen again until it was disposed of. I believe it is possible to improve the Arabs. I had quite a number of conversations with Colonel Lawrence when we were in Paris together, and Colonel Lawrence has more influence with them than any other living man to-day. He had great hopes of the Arabs, and I believe it was by his influence that they were brought into the war.

However, the Arabs are in possession of a good deal of Palestine, and it won't do to remove them forcibly. There is no doubt in my mind about that. We must stand by the usual constitutional principle, that no British citizen may be dispossessed of his freehold unless required for the purpose of the State, and I think we shall have to be careful how we handle these people. They are a dangerous people undoubtedly, and if suffering from a sense of injustice there is no knowing what they may do. At the same time the pledge given by Mr. Balfour must be given effect to on behalf of the British Empire, and I, for one, would not go back upon it in the slightest degree, but there are ways of keeping these pledges.

Mesopotamia.—A very large number of Australian and New Zealand soldiers were engaged in the campaign both in Mesopotamia and Palestine, in both places. They were both engaged in the campaign against the Turks on the Gallipoli Peninsula. Those campaigns, Gallipoli and Mesopotamia, will not be forgotten. I do not propose to compare them, because in importance they are not comparable. That is not the point at all, but I should be very sorry if I had to tell the New Zealand soldiers, who took part in the Gallipoli campaign and the Mesopotamian campaign and in Palestine—because they are associated in their minds—I should be sorry to have to tell them that the British Government had decided to withdraw from those countries. There may be circumstances which will make it necessary for us to withdraw, but I think the country should be held on to in the meantime. I know nothing about the oil question except what I have read.

Mr. Hughes: We ought to know something about oil.

Mr. Massey: Perhaps we shall, but I know that oil interests outside the British Empire are very anxious about oil being discovered in Mesopotamia.

Mr. Lloyd George: We might get Sir John Cadman here to give us information on the subject.

Mr. Massey: Speaking for myself, I should be very glad. We are depending more and more on oil, and here in the heart of the Empire we are dependent very largely on oil, much more so than in the past, and if there are oil deposits in any country over which we have authority or in any part of the British Empire, I think they should be made available. It is a big subject, and one which we could discuss for hours, but I do not know that we should get any further forward. I want to refer briefly to a point made by Mr. Meighen. Mr. Meighen looks at matters from the Canadian point of view, which is quite right. We have all our rights in this respect, and he must think of the United States. I do not object to that. I think of the United States, too. I think it is exceedingly important that the two English-speaking nations should be able to work together in the future, and if they are able to work together I think it will be well for the history of the world. But the other point I wish to refer to is the point made by Mr. Meighen that at present the Dominions have no say in any representations which may be made, or it might be desirable to make, to the Head of the State, to the Sovereign. I think it is the weakest point in the present arrangements. Many people seem to imagine that the Empire consists only of the United Kingdom and of the four great Dominions and India. That is not the case at all. I think Mr. Churchill mentioned this, but at all events I got the information somewhere, I think correctly. There are over forty of these smaller Governments, Crown Colonies, and Protectorates—there are over forty of them within the British Empire to-day. Now, in this respect they are in a better position than we are. I do not envy them, not a bit, but they are in a better position in this way because, so far as making representations to the Sovereign are concerned, Mr. Churchill speaks for them, and he speaks with authority, but when we go away from here, and I have no fault to find with the attitude of the members of the Government of the United Kingdom, I say during the time I have been coming here they have treated us in a way it is impossible to find fault with, we could not have had better treatment, but still there is the weak point and I think a way out should be found. I know the difficulty. Mr. Hughes and I have a long way to come. Some of the other Prime Ministers have not so far to come as we have, but the fact that we have a long way to come makes it impossible that we should be in consultation with British Ministers the whole of the time unless by cable. Very well, you can do a lot by cable, but in the event of a serious crisis coming along, and one never knows, those who are responsible for the government of the Empire must come face to face. In connection with the declaration of the great European war, it had to be done by cable. There was no other course, and the arrangements worked all right, but there are other possibilities, and this difficulty should be got over somehow or another. If these Conferences—I would like to call them Cabinets—if these Conferences are to be of any value they must be held regularly and the business must be continuous. There must be no gaps such as we have had since we left Paris nearly two years ago. How that is to be avoided I am not able to say. I do not like to suggest a resident Minister because there are difficulties that way. The Minister would only represent the Government so long as it was in office, and when the Government went out of office the chain would be broken, but the intelligence of the men sitting round this table at the present gathering or at some future gathering will be able to get over the difficulty, and if we can get over this difficulty you will strengthen the Empire to a very great extent. I have been attacked in New Zealand about this difficulty. I sat still and said nothing, but I have to admit when I go back that the weakness exists. I do not know how it is to be met, but I must express my opinions there as I have to the members of the Conference and leave it at that, but I do not see any chance of Mr. Hughes or myself coming back next year, and when an election occurs one never knows what may happen, but whether we come back or not it does not matter as far as our interests in the British Empire are concerned. Both of us wish that the connection may be made as strong as it can be made. There is plenty of improvement as far as that is concerned. I will not ask the Conference to listen any longer, but I took the opportunity of expressing an opinion on these points I have mentioned, and I hope in future Conferences some weight will be given to what I have said as coming from New Zealand.

Difficulty of representing Views of Dominions on Foreign Policy.

Mr. Montagu: I wish to say a few words on subjects of special interest to India. Mr. Hughes has spoken to so large an extent, as though he was a representative of India as well as of Australia, that I have not much to say. The two subjects which most closely concern the Government of India to-day are our relations with Turkey and Russia. Our interest in Turkey is based partly on the fact that Indian soldiers are still in occupation of part of the old Turkish Empire, and are very anxious to get home. Secondly, on the fact that, so far as numbers are concerned, Indian soldiers played the leading part in laying Turkey at the feet of the Allies. Thirdly, because about 70 millions of the population of India are Mohammedan in religion, and Turkey has the respect of all sects, and is the leader of one sect of the Mohammedan religion, and the whole of the peace of Asia right from Constantinople to China is affected by the conditions now existing in Turkey. I think the view of India as a whole on the subject will be that after we have insisted upon the payment by Turkey of the just penalty for her share in the war, and I mean by that after the loss by her of the non-Turkish countries, Palestine and Mesopotamia, we hope that real peace will be achieved with Turkey. That Turkish Turkey will be able to live a free and independent existence, and that friendship between Turkey and the British Empire will be restored, and when that happens that fact will have its repercussion right through Asia and one of the greatest anxieties of India will be removed, and what Lord Curzon has told us of what has happened recently between himself and the French leads us to hope very highly that these things will come about. Really, the condition of affairs in regard to Turkey leads me directly to the other problem that is worrying India, i.e., Russia. It may be from different motives or it may be from the same motive disguised, but it looks as if the anxieties which Bolshevik Russia presents are becoming almost identical with those which Czarist Russia presented. That seems to me to be at the bottom of the activities of men like General Brussiloff on behalf of the Bolshevik Government. They are taking an interest in Persia, in Afghanistan, in Turkey, and indirectly in India, just as though they were still possessed of the imperialistic designs of the old Russian Government. There is no doubt of the fact. I think that authorised or unauthorised evidence is accumulating that the Bolshevik Government is pursuing by propaganda, and even, indeed, by preparation for warlike operations, determined action against British interests in the East, and I quite agree with Mr. Hughes when he says that our relations with Russia ought to be discussed and action formulated with a view to dealing with what I think is the accumulating evidence of this sinister purpose on the part of the Bolshevik Government. I have only one other thing, and that is on behalf of India I endorse what Mr. Hughes has said in regard to the Mesopotamian mandate, in regard to the Palestine mandate and in regard to the Greeks. There is no doubt whatever that the Greeks, possibly because of their triumph, are at the present moment showing the fiercest animosity towards any Moslems who happen to be within their reach, and massacres and outrages have been going on recently. As regards Mesopotamia, the view of the Indian Moslem about that is this. That they welcome the determined efforts to form an Arab Government, but they are anxious to avoid seeing a great Moslem country under the domination of a non-Moslem Power, even if that non-Moslem Power be Britain, and therefore the success of Mr. Churchill's efforts to set up an Arab Government is very much welcomed in India.

Russia.

Greece.

Mr. Lloyd George: On the Greek outrages, I think it is fair to say we have a telegram from Constantinople from our representative, that they investigated the Greek and the Moslem outrages and there was no question that the Moslem outrages were worse.

Mr. Montagu: I have seen telegrams from Smyrna, also from our representatives among others, which give terrible accounts of what the Greeks have been doing.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, I know; but this came within the last few days reporting the result of the investigations. I think it is fair that the case should be put for both sides. It is not fair to the Greeks to assume that the outrages were all on one side.

Mr. Montagu: I want to lay stress on the Greek atrocities, because when we talk of Turks in this country we talk of the Armenian massacres and other massacres as if the Turks were the only people who massacred.

Mr. Lloyd George: But it does not put matters right to talk of the Greeks as if they were the only people who massacred.

Mr. Montagu: I certainly did not mean to convey that impression.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think it fair to the Conference that that statement should be made. I am referring to the statement sent within the last few days.

Mr. Montagu: The only other word is in regard to Palestine. The Indian is apprehensive about Zionism, and it affects the susceptibilities of Moslems, but I think they will be reassured by the repeated statements that the rights of the non-Zionist population of Palestine will, of course, be respected as declared in the original announcement made by Mr. Balfour, and my final word is on the subject last raised by Mr. Massey. Under the present Constitution of India the headship of the Government of India, the controlling authority of the Government of India, is still in this country, in the person of the Secretary of State for India in Council, and this is especially true of foreign affairs, but with regard to them I think it only right to say that under the new Constitution the Viceroy and his Government is confronted by an elected Legislature, and it will be essential more and more to take stock of the Government of India and its advisers directly when we are discussing foreign affairs in which India is interested.

Mr. Hughes: What is it proposed to do this afternoon?

Mr. Churchill: I should like to say that I was relying on the fact that nothing was set down this afternoon, and I have arranged conferences between Ministers of Canada and the President of the Board of Trade in regard to the very serious question connected with bacon, and later on with General Smuts and Sir Thomas Smartt and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in connection with South African wool, and we thought we should have this afternoon clear to work out these quite important matters.

Mr. Hughes: I did not quite catch all those points.

Mr. Churchill: There is the Canadian question open with the Board of Trade and the Ministry of Food which will certainly take one and a half hours.

Mr. Hughes: I quite see your point, but Mr. Meighan has, in that memorandum of his which he read out, raised points of fundamental importance, which I refrained from saying one word about, but I want to point this out to you, that if they go out . . . .

Mr. Lloyd George: They must not go out. I was going to make a suggestion. I quite agree that this afternoon we cannot continue with our conferences for the reasons indicated by Mr. Churchill, and other business which affects the British Government, and we have more very important conferences this afternoon, which, I am sorry to say, cannot be put off. Questions of the most momentous importance have been raised in the speech of Mr. Meighen, and also by General Smuts, who raises very important points. I think this discussion must continue, as it affects the whole policy of the British Empire, and it would be much easier for us to give the kind of considered opinion we each of us want to give on each of these matters after we have time to reflect upon the statements that have been made.

Mr. Hughes: And I hope also that afterwards you will have a discussion without prejudice; I mean you cannot say what you think of Canada's opinion until you have heard what General Smuts and Mr. Massey and myself have had to say.

Mr. Lloyd George: And that is why I think we should adjourn the discussion of this until Monday afternoon. The propositions laid down by Mr. Meighen go to the very root of the matter; to the very root of the whole question; the relations of the Dominions to the United Kingdom in reference to the control of foreign policy. He has made very practical suggestions, and I think they ought to be considered immediately. I mean by immediately at the very first moment we meet, and there is also the very important issue raised by General Smuts in reference to our general attitude towards the Continent, whether we should continue the old policy as one of more or less isolation, or whether we should seek something in the nature, not exactly of alliances, but what has been known as Ententes, more or less co-operation with a particular group. Those are two very important questions, and therefore I suggest that we adjourn until Monday afternoon at 4·30 P.M.

Mr. Hughes: In the meantime, what about publication?

Mr. Lloyd George: I think we had better not publish anything. I think it is very important that we should not publish inconclusive matters.

Mr. Hughes: If that is not done, I shall have to press for an afternoon sitting after an interval has elapsed to enable us to consider this so that a complete report may go out.

Mr. Lloyd George: We are not going to publish it.

Mr. Hughes: That was in case you were.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think they are important enough to take the week-end for consideration. We shall then have certain things raised . . . .

Mr. Churchill: You have said that there are two questions: the constitutional question and the European question. One is the composition and construction of the British Empire, and the other is what ought to be done in relation to what is going on in Europe at the present time. They are very separate, and I think we should not gain a bit if we had them mixed up in the discussion.

Future Agenda.

It would be far better to deal with the constitutional questions at a sitting devoted entirely to them. There are these very broad propositions that Mr. Meighen has put forward, and General Smuts has touched upon, with regard to the Dominions' relation to foreign policy, and there are other constitutional aspects which, I believe, it is desired to touch. That all makes one block of subjects by itself. Quite apart from that is this question of the European situation, which I certainly hope we shall have further discussions upon. I was hoping that they would be kept separate.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think there is a good deal to be said from that point of view, and therefore thought it would be better to bring the general debate to a conclusion before we proceed with the very categorical propositions laid down by Mr. Meighen—to proceed with the general discussion on Monday, because apart altogether from the questions raised by General Smuts, there are one or two important issues raised by Mr. Hughes about Palestine and Mesopotamia, and about Russia. The same thing applies to what Mr. Massey has said, and to Mr. Montagu's statement as to Asia Minor.

Mr. Hughes: On the discussion of Mr. Meighen's points, as Mr. Churchill points out, rests the question of constitutional relations. Now we are dealing with certain matters—defined, concrete, they do not necessarily imply any alteration in the present relations existing between the various parts of the Empire. There is the question of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, the question of Naval Defence, what we are to do in relation to it, and other matters. We ought to dispose of these, or at any rate make an attempt to do so before we come to these other things which we certainly cannot now settle around this table. We may come to some sort of an agreement for a future Conference, but we cannot settle the Constitutional question at this Conference. The Angló-Japanese Treaty and Naval Defence are matters which we can settle.

Mr. Chamberlain: That is what the Prime Minister had proposed, and it was accepted by Mr. Meighen and General Smuts, that we should deal with these general questions first and then take up later, when we had had time to consider them, the points put by Mr. Meighen as to our constitutional relations.

Mr. Hughes: I have no objection.

Mr. Meighen: Then on Monday we go on with a further discussion of Lord Curzon's statement.

Mr. Lloyd George: And the issues raised by the Dominion Prime Ministers, and, on behalf of India the specific issues apart from the constitutional proposals put forward by you.

Mr. Meighen: I did not believe that I had been the father of any constitutional proposals. I thought I had merely stated what I believed to be the present position. I may be wrong in my statement of it, but, while made with care, it was not made with the thought that it was going to be attacked. However, we may discuss on Monday what has taken place in the last two and a half years, and suggestions of the nature of those made by General Smuts. I may have something to say or I may not, but I think we should get away from general discussions and on to concrete discussions, particularly upon the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. Let us get to them as soon as we can because I do not think we will get very far unless definite subjects are before us. When we have these, all those other things will come on, and if we can regard ourselves now as merely defining the lines upon which the Dominions are prepared that the Government should proceed in the determination of foreign questions, that might be stated as the subject of the present discussion, and let us go through them as soon as we can and get to the concrete, the Anglo-Japanese Treaty, and from that we can discuss arrangements for carrying on communications between us on this very topic until we meet again.

Mr. Lloyd George: May I say this word—these are very concrete things for us which you have raised to-day. We have got to come to decisions from day to day, and Lord Curzon has actually to send despatches and proposals to foreign Governments based upon the general policy of the British Empire. Therefore, you have raised three or four questions which are of practical importance to us, and it is very important for us to know what the general views of the Empire are, as Lord Curzon's despatches will be fashioned according to what the general policy of the Empire is, and therefore it is not merely an abstract discussion, it is a very concrete matter so far as we are concerned, and a very immediate one in reference to some matters—the Greek question and the Russian question, and the question raised by General Smuts on our attitude in Europe. They are day-to-day questions with us.

Mr. Massey: And we should arrive at an understanding as soon as possible.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Meighen said "the concrete questions." Does he include the question he brought up this morning? Is that a concrete question?

Mr. Meighen: I do not know that that is a concrete question.

Mr. Hughes: I want to know.

Mr. Meighen: If we are to discuss one of the subjects mentioned by the Prime Minister in his first invitation to this Conference, what I have said has to do with that, and in that respect would be a concrete question—that is a discussion on the mechanism of a continuous conference between now and the constitutional conference.

It is concrete in that respect. I do not know what raised it, but it has to do with that.

Mr. Hughes: Do you mean, Mr. Prime Minister, by concrete questions, questions such as what do we think about your policy in Russia and that sort of thing, or policy in Greece?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, I regard those as concrete questions, as affecting day by day the decisions which we have to come to, and on which Lord Curzon is sent to France and every part of the world.

Mr. Hughes: And on which you wish us to express our opinion on your conduct of the business?

Mr. Lloyd George: No, not our conduct in the past, but what lines we are to take in future. Two or three questions have been partly raised by you and partly by General Smuts, Mr. Massey and Mr. Montagu. Those are very practical questions.

General Smuts: All questions of foreign policy, I take it?

Mr. Lloyd George: It is very important we should carry the Empire along with us on the lines we take.

Will 4·30 suit you on Monday? Perhaps we had better meet on Monday at 3·30. There is nothing further this afternoon here. There are conferences at the Colonial Office, but we will meet here again at 3·30 on Monday. The Anglo-Japanese matter will come up on Tuesday.

(The meeting then adjourned.)

Foreign Policy. Discussion on

Mr. Montagu: I should like, if I may, to make a statement about one of my observations on Foreign Policy last Friday. I drew the attention of the Conference to the atrocities committed by the Greeks in Turkey. You pointed out to the Conference at the time that I had given a one-sided impression because of a telegram which you had received which contained this sentence: "Many atrocities by both Greeks and Turks were discovered by the Commission under Franks and Farmar; latter, i.e., the atrocities committed by the Turks—predominated." I was basing myself upon a previous report of the Commission presided over by Colonel Farmar which had been circulated to the Foreign Office, and I had not seen that telegram. I thought it fair to state the evidence showed that atrocities had been committed by both sides.

Mr. Lloyd George: And that, according to our Commissioners, the latter predominated.

Mr. Montagu: According to that telegram from our Commissioners.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, that shall be put right. I think it was arranged at our last meeting that the three postulates laid down by Mr. Meighen with regard to the discussion on foreign politics, or rather the keeping in touch between the United Kingdom and the Dominions and India on questions of foreign policy, should be discussed separately, and that we should first of all dispose of the discussion on the general principles of our foreign policy before we came either to the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, or to the three principles laid down by Mr. Meighen. I think that was generally agreed. Therefore, the discussion is now open on the questions raised by General Smuts, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Massey and Mr. Montagu. Do you want to say anything, Mr. Meighen, on General Smuts' propositions about the principles that ought to dominate our conduct of foreign policy in Europe?

Mr. Meighen: General Smuts followed me on that matter.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Hughes, do you wish to say anything about what fell from . . . .

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Meighen?

Mr. Lloyd George: No, we shall have to discuss that separately. Do you wish to say anything on the questions raised by General Smuts about our policy in Europe?

Mr. Hughes: I am afraid I have misunderstood. I have been considering what Mr. Meighen said, supposing you intended to deal with that. I omitted to speak on it at the time, being under the impression that it would be discussed later.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, that is to be taken on a later date.

Mr. Hughes: Unfortunately I have not given that close attention to the report of General Smuts' statement to be able to offer a useful contribution to the discussion.

Mr. Lloyd George: Do you wish to say anything about it, Mr. Massey?

Future of the Dardanelles.

Mr. Massey: Not exactly on what General Smuts said. As a matter of fact I forgot it was coming on this afternoon. There is one point I might have referred to in dealing with the statement by Lord Curzon; that is to say, the position of the Dardanelles. I do not think the Dardanelles were mentioned by Lord Curzon so far as I can recollect; if so, I did not notice it. I do not quite know what the position is to-day myself, but I should like to express the hope, now that the opportunity offers, that the Dardanelles will not be allowed to go back to the Turks, but will be kept open for the commerce of the world. I suppose the Dardanelles will in future be under an international control, but no definite arrangement appears to have been made up to the present.

Lord Curzon: That is not quite the case. Your proposal is axiomatic, and the war would have been fought in vain if it were not to result in an arrangement which would render impossible the shutting of the Dardanelles by Turkey at any time in the future. What happened was this—in the first version of the Treaty of Sèvres which was drawn up, the safety of the Straits in the future was provided for in this way. Forces representing the Allies were to hold both shores of the Dardanelles, Gallipoli on the north, and Chanak on the south, and there was to be a demilitarised zone several miles in width, running along both the northern shores of the Marmora and the southern shores of the Marmora, within which area the existing forts should be destroyed, no new forts erected, and no new forces maintained. The Allied Powers, with such forces as they chose to keep at Constantinople, would be at liberty at any time to go into this area to see that the conditions of the Treaty were being observed, the whole object of the arrangement being that not only the Straits themselves, but the whole of the adjacent area, as far as Constantinople, should at no time be used for military or hostile purposes by the Turks. Simultaneously, by the Treaty of Sèvres there was set up a Straits Commission on which were represented the Great Powers who fought and won the war, which was to regulate the navigation of the Straits in the future, the levying of dues, and so on. The only change that has been made in the position is this—that when the Turks and Greeks came to London in the month of March, in our anxiety to come to terms with them and to make things a little easier for the Turk, we modified the original provisions of the Draft Treaty to this extent, that we held as an essential the maintenance of the position at the mouth of the Straits, whether it were held by military force or by naval force, but we reduced the demilitarised zone which was to be occupied by international troops on either shore of the Marmora. That is the position as it stands now, and whatever terms are come to with the Turks in the future, I think the Dominions will agree with me that it is axiomatic that the position at the mouth of the Straits should be maintained, and that the awful sacrifices we made in the war should not have been made in vain.

Discussion on Foreign Policy.

Mr. Massey: The forts have not been destroyed yet?

Lord Curzon: No, but they can be destroyed at any moment. We have not liked to do it because it was a rather aggressive act while the peace negotiations were going on.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think I should like to say something myself on the very important points which have been raised in the course of a very remarkable, and very enlightening, discussion on foreign policy. For the moment I set on one side Mr. Meighen's propositions; we must have a separate discussion on those, because they involve the whole of our arrangements for the future. I thought those propositions were very fairly and concisely expressed, and in so far as the main propositions are concerned I think they are very sound. There is one general principle which he laid down upon which I shall have something to say later on, that does not concern so much the arrangements between us as the weight which is to be attached to the opinion of any particular part of the Empire upon a question of foreign policy which more particularly concerns it. That is a doctrine which may be a very dangerous one if it is literally interpreted. It is perfectly true that when you come to questions which, say, affect Canada more than they affect the other parts of the Empire, we must attach greater weight to the opinion of Canada. I can well understand that Canada will take that view with regard to the United States of America, although it is just as vital to us to be on friendly terms with the United States of Amreica as it is for Canada. It is quite axiomatic here, not merely with Governments but with the people, that we must never quarrel with the United States. It is one of those things which are regarded as quite inconceivable. Nobody ever discusses it, and if anybody is indiscreet enough to do so, there is a general feeling throughout the whole of the assembly that that man has committed an indiscretion of first-class magnitude. But when you come to Canada, I think you can well understand their feeling that their position is a very different one from that of either the other Dominions or Great Britain. There they are. They have a frontier of thousands of miles coterminous with the United States of America; they have very special relations in reference to that frontier, in reference to their trade, and also in reference to those great waters that divide the frontiers. The arrangements in respect of these things have been left entirely to Canada; we have never dreamt of interfering, and the arrangements have always been made direct, and I can well understand Canada feeling that there are special reasons why she should be represented at Washington by a Minister, seeing that all the business has been transacted directly up to the present between the two countries. But when you come to the question of one Dominion or of one country, whether the United Kingdom or the Dominions, or India, because there are special interests in regard to a question, having a decisive voice in determining it, that is a very dangerous doctrine, because we are all involved once anything happens. The case of the United States with Canada is only one case. The other case is of India in reference to the Turkish Empire. India has a very special point of view. India has got 80,000,000 Mohammedans. They are very specially concerned because of their religious sympathies with the Turk. That is their point of view. It is a very special point of view, and, as everybody who has heard discussions in this Cabinet knows, it has been taken into consideration in fashioning our policy. Take the question of Constantinople. We have had a very serious discussion at this table as to whether the Turks should be excluded from Constantinople or not. Some of the most influential members of our Government were in favour of the Turk going out of Europe altogether, but I think it would be conceded that the determining factor in favour of retaining him was the Indian point of view.

Discussion on Foreign Policy.

If we had not got the Indian point of view, we should certainly have turned the Turk out of Constantinople. It was the one argument which, I think, turned us, and Mr. Montagu will recognise that. The same thing applies to other questions in connection with the Turkish Empire, because the Turk was guilty of an act of very deliberate treachery to an old friend, who pulled him out of many difficulties in the Crimea war and in 1878. He has been supplied not merely with money, but by troops repeatedly, by Great Britain, by France and by Italy. The three gave their direct assistance to him at the most critical years in his history, and here, when we were fighting for our lives, the three of us, when it was very doubtful whether we could win, when we had very great anxiety up to the last moment, the Turk slams the doors of the Dardanelles in our faces and by that means undoubtedly prolonged the war by two years. The trouble in Russia is directly attributable to the Turk. We could not get at Russia to help her. If the Turk had been true to us we could have got to Russia in 1915, when we knew she was short of shells and of rifles. But we could not get there. We could not get Roumania to our side because Roumania was afraid, and we could not give her the necessary start, and when Roumania collapsed, we could not get near her, because the doors of the Dardanelles were closed.

Russia would not have collapsed if Turkey had come in, and if Russia had not collapsed the war would have come to an end probably in 1916—certainly in 1917—so that the destruction of the last two years, which has made such a difference in the reconstruction of the world, which added millions to the casualties and which is more directly responsible for the shattering of Europe than anything else—that is directly attributable to the Turk. Well, in dealing with the Turk, we were entitled to deal with him very sternly and severely, and the one thing that has restrained us has been the opinion of our Mohammedan fellow-subjects in India and the consideration we had for them, and the appeals that came from them. I agree with Mr. Meighen. We were bound to take into account their opinion, exactly as we are bound to take the opinion of Canada into account when we come to settle questions with America, but when the Mohammedans of India say, "You must take our opinion altogether on the subject," there I feel we must challenge that. We say you are not entitled to that, but you are entitled to say, "We made a great contribution." You are entitled to say that this especially affects us, but you are not entitled to say because "we have given special contribution, you must defer entirely to it," and, although we may attach special importance to the view which has been taken by one particular Dominion or by India on a particular subject, the Empire, as a whole, has the right to decide the policy, giving due weight to the special considerations that affect one part of it.

Mr. Meighen: I think you have rather overstated my position. I do not think you will find in my remarks anything in regard to the exclusion of the others.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is all right. I only wanted to safeguard that position as a general proposition—that is all. Well, now I come to General Smuts's review of the state of Europe and his statement of what he conceived to be the sound policy for the Empire to adopt. Although he disclaimed anything in the nature of a policy of isolation, I do not quite see where he would establish a dividing line between a policy of isolation and the policy which we have pursued. We have signed a Treaty. Well, we could say," "We have signed that Treaty and we have no further interest in it. Now, then, Poland could break it, the Czecho-Slovakians could break it, France could break it, and Germany could break it, but we are done with it the moment the ink is dry and we have no further interest." I do not think General Smuts went as far as that, although I do not quite follow him in his policy. I do not quite comprehend the extent to which he would go. General Smuts said that we were in danger of being dragged at the heels of France. Well, that is true, and the impression left on his mind was that we were being dragged into Conference after Conference. One Conference, 10 per cent., as he has put it, and the next Empire's Policy in Europe.

Conference 15 per cent., but percentage by percentage somehow or other being dragged down to the position which France had adopted. I had just that preceding day had a very interesting conversation with the most distinguished of all French statesmen, M. Clemenceau, and he used exactly the same words as General Smuts, but in the reverse sense. He said, "I will tell you why France is so suspicious." "We are talking," he said, "as old friends."

Discussion on Foreign Policy.

Mr. Hughes: M. Clemenceau?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes. He was with me one hour and a quarter, and he said, "I have no official position and I do not want to interfere, but, as old friends, let me tell you the impression in France. Somehow or other, you are pulling down the French, Conference after Conference, by some 10 per cent."—he always used to say it was 10 per cent.—"until we left them with nothing."

Lord Curzon: Now they have been postponing the next meeting of the Supreme Council for the last two months, in order not to be pulled down again—that is what I was told in Paris.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is more like what has happened. If you look at the position taken up by the French, and if you follow the whole of the Conferences step by step, you will find they are gradually being brought down to what I conceive to be a more reasonable frame of mind. Each successive Conference, whether you take Reparations, whether you take the Ruhr Valley, or coal, or disarmament, they have gradually proceeded Conference by Conference to postponement, to modifications, and to alterations. That is the charge brought against French statesmen, that, when they go into Conference with England, they allow themselves to be persuaded out of the position which they have taken up. Take the last Conference of all on Reparations. It is alleged by M. Briand's critics that he gave a definite undertaking that he would occupy the Ruhr Valley on the 1st May whatever happened. He came here having given that pledge, and there was a prolonged discussion. He did not occupy the Ruhr Valley, neither on the 1st May nor since. He reduced his claims very considerably, and we had an agreement which was so satisfactory that even the Germans themselves felt that, as a whole, it was the most reasonable proposition which had been put before them. But you take the bulk of the French ex-Ministers, like M. Poincaré. Their view is that M. Briand has given it completely away, and it was a fact that he had already signed a document, and that they had to decide between quarrelling with the Allies and pressing their own policy. That is the fact that induced them finally to accept Briand's agreement. Therefore, so far from being dragged further and further behind France, we had undoubtedly exercised a very restraining influence upon her. There is a strong feeling in France in favour of occupying the Ruhr. Their policy is to destroy Germany and occupy the Ruhr themselves, and hand over the Silesian coalfields to Poland. When that is done you have practically taken the lungs of Germany away—her right and left lung—and it is a poor anæmic thing left, and only kept alive with such oxygen as it gets from outside.

Well, that is the French conception of the Germany of the future—I don't mean of men like Clemenceau or Briand, but there is a very powerful party in France which would like to reduce Germany to that condition. Well, now supposing we disinterested ourselves in Europe, attended no more Conferences; the French have always now got the answer that Britain and Italy are taking a strong line, and they must carry their Allies along. Well, are we to say to France, "We are not going to take any further interest in the matter?" The French Ministers are face to face with a rather Chauvinistic Chamber led by men like M. Poincaré, who, not having done very well in the war, want to show how courageous they are in peace, and they are constantly prodding French opinion to very extreme and to very violent action. I should, therefore, have thought it was very unwise from the point of view of the peace of Europe that we should withdraw from these Conferences and take away our restraining hand, as it were, from France. Italy would have no influence—none. The French, no doubt, would treat her with great contempt in all these Conferences, and if Italy were to attend these Conferences, the French would barely pay the civility of consulting her, and would just take their own action. Well, that would be a very fatal thing for Europe. Germany cannot strike now, but she will be able to do so later on, and it would be a very fatal step if we simply accumulate causes of future war in the system of Europe. It would be compressing all these wrongs, until one day there would be an explosion and we should be inevitably affected by Effect of disassociating the Empire from France.

Discussion on Foreign Policy.

what happened. I am not going to predict in the least what may happen in Europe, but Mr. Massey said a very shrewd thing when he called attention to the possibilities of a rapprochement between Russia and Germany. After all, when France was beaten in 1871, she looked out for powerful Allies. Up to that moment, she was entirely at the mercy of Germany. Germany was constantly bullying her, even to the extent of dismissing her Ministers—I remember one of their Foreign Ministers being practically dismissed by an edict from Berlin.

Lord Curzon: Because he agreed with us.

Mr. Lloyd George: Just a word from Berlin, and he had to go. So that France was humiliated almost beyond endurance. She was entirely at the mercy of Germany. We could not protect her alone, and then came the Russian Alliance. From that moment, the whole position altered. There were, of course, military advisers of Germany who thought Germany was strong enough to fight both, but still, there was an element of doubt, and Germany showed considerably more restraint and respect in her treatment of France after that Alliance than before. Well, Germany will probably, German statesmen will probably, attempt, will at any rate seek, the same combination, and probably succeed in establishing the same combination. There is one common ground of hatred between the Russians and the Germans, and that is the Poles. They both loathe the Poles, both have a great contempt for the Poles, and the Poles are doing their very best to stimulate both of them to a common hatred, and it is by no means impossible that Germany and Russia—I do not mean the present Russia, but some sort of regenerated Russia, whether it is imperial or monarchical or republican, I do not know, but the present system cannot possibly go on—will seek friendship and co-operation with Germany, and Germany is the only country that can regenerate Russia economically. She is the only country that has the resources, the contiguity, the opportunity for doing it. I do not know of any other country that can do it, and therefore Russia and Germany are bound to each other to seek some sort of partnership, beginning perhaps with an economic partnership, ending with a diplomatic one, and it is not impossible that they may develop into a military rapprochement. That is the story of these friendships. The old causes of quarrel have vanished. They have no coterminous frontiers to begin with. The old trouble between the Austrians and the Slavs, which was constantly provoking hostile diplomatic action in Berlin against Moscow, that is completely gone, and they have no further causes of quarrel; in fact, the Slav, who before divided them, will now unite them, and for that reason the development of Europe may be on the lines of two very formidable groups facing each other, or, if France persists in her folly, France may find herself alone against the most formidable military combination that the world has ever seen. What France does not reckon upon is this. She sees Germany is now disarmed, and as long as she is disarmed she can never strike. The moment she enters into a great alliance with a powerful military empire, that source of weakness completely vanishes because there is no treaty which can prevent Russia from arming. She can raise armies, she can equip armies, and there is only one thing which can prevent her raising armies and equipping them, and that is an unwise economic system that impoverishes the country. The moment that disappears—Russia is a country of infinite natural resources; there is no country in Europe that is comparable to Russia in its natural resources—once you had an energetic race like the Germans applying their mastery to conquering those hidden riches, and if they also apply their brains to organising and equipping armies the mere fact that Germany had got a helpless population would make no difference at all, because there you have a virile race. For at any rate twenty or thirty years there will be millions of men in Germany who would know the use of arms and who are trained. There will be the material. We know perfectly well how armies can be raised here. We had the means that enabled us to raise and train armies—the old non-commissioned and commissioned officers, multitudes of them, who had left the army ten, twenty, thirty years ago, all came back, and all having their old skill and fitted to train perfectly raw material, but good material. You will find the same thing in Germany, and therefore France, in pursuing this policy of driving the Germans into fierce but suppressed hatred, is guilty, I think, of the greatest act of folly which any race has ever perpetrated. It has produced the destruction of Germany, and unless France pursues a much wiser cause in future, it may very well end in a more complete destruction of France than anything that has ever been inflicted upon her.

Probable future course of events in Russia and Germany.

But to keep out of it, not to try and restrain France, is no kindness to France, no kindness to Germany, no kindness to Europe, and no kindness to the world, because, once war begins, the last war shows you cannot guarantee its frontiers. It was like a prairie fire, and you would find the whole world would be drawn into it, and next time it would be a war of a kind that might very well overthrow civilisation, because they were just beginning, in the last year or two, to get on to devices of such a destructive character that if the war had gone on another year or two you would have had great cities laid in ruins. The Germans were preparing infinitely greater machines to destroy London, and if we had gone on for another three weeks our machines would have been bombing Berlin, because they were quite ready and we were only waiting for the weather. By the next war, all these things will have been perfected. When you get on to the question whether there is any advantage to be gained by giving to France the guarantee we were prepared to give her jointly with the United States of America, that is a question I do not want to express an opinion on at the present moment, because I think we must discuss it separately, but it has been represented to me from very many quarters that from even the French point of view it is not desirable to press it upon them just yet, even if we came to the conclusion that it was desirable at any time. For the moment, however, I will not say anything about that.

Discussion on Foreign Policy.

There was a question put about Russian trade.

General Smuts: May I just say this? I do not want to prolong the debate. Your answer to me is the very thing that makes me afraid. It is the sort of consideration that is running through my mind, that France is building up a system, almost by conscious effort she is building up a system in Europe which has even the danger you fear. By her policy of fostering suppressed hatred with the Germans, keeping Germany weak, keeping Germany in a perpetual unrest and weakness, she is consolidating this great central eastern block that we fear is a nightmare for years. After the war is over her policy is stimulating this to life. What is going to be our position if we attach ourselves too closely to France in this policy of hers? All you see I am pleading for is not isolation, but greater independence, but I am very much afraid if we ally ourselves closely to France while she is pursuing these ends in European politics, we are going to jeopardise the British Empire very seriously in time to come. I know how difficult it is to keep out of a conflagration that may break out, but I would not like to see the British Empire taking wrong sides from the very start, but to see her independent and claim her independence, and speak her independence, let everyone know of her independence; let Russia know it, let Germany know it, that we are not tied to this policy by way of an alliance or Entente or any practical co-operation. That is really all I am at. I feel that a new alignment is already taking place in the politics of Europe. There is a development which is going to produce far-reaching results in twenty or thirty years. I see the beginning of the parting of the ways, and it is because of that I am raising this note of warning. I do not criticise the policy of the Government. When I speak of 10 per cent., do not take it as criticism, but it is so important for us to be very wide awake at this stage, and not, out of pity for France, or out of the idea of keeping a controlling hand on her, implicate ourselves too deeply in her policy, and in the end get thrown into what may be the sort of thing you are describing.

Disadvantages of Alliance with France.

Mr. Lloyd George: I do not think there is any essential difference between us on that, but you see, so far from our being drawn into it, the French view is that we are using our position of friendship rather to restrain her and prevent her doing what she wants. I will give you a test. Suppose you said to Germany now, to some German statesman: "Would you like Great Britain to come out altogether?"

General Smuts: I do not think they would.

Mr. Lloyd George: They regard our presence at the Council of the Allies as a guarantee of fair treatment in so far as we can possibly influence the judgment of that body. So it is. Silesia is a case in point.

General Smuts: Undoubtedly.

Mr. Lloyd George: If it had not been for our intervention there the whole of that country would have been taken by the Poles.

General Smuts: But for our intervention Silesia would have gone to Poland two years ago.

Mr. Lloyd George: That was due to the action of the British Empire. We considered the case very fairly. Everybody, you will remember, expressed his opinion individually, and we came unanimously to the conclusion that a case had been made there for a reconsideration of the decision of the Commissioners—the negotiators—in respect of that part of the German Empire.

Mr. Meighen: What advantage is it in this very work walking hand in hand with France and having that comradeship in European policies? What advantage is that over the position you would be in if you stood as you were before there was such a compact? Your strength would be just the same.

Advantages of Association with France.

Mr. Lloyd George: I will tell you the advantage I think it is. I think we have greater influence with the French opinion such as it is. It gets very excited and very abusive, but in the end Briand gets up, as he did in the Chamber, and he says: "If you want to quarrel with Great Britain—he did not mean a war—you had better find somebody else." He instantly converted a hostile majority into a friendly majority for a peaceful settlement. You see as long as we maintain some sort of friendship we do exercise a very considerable influence, I think, upon French opinion. That, I think, is the only reason, whereas if we stood apart—M. Clemenceau was putting this to me on Thursday, "You are making a very great mistake thinking we are a greedy people. No doubt there is a very powerful section of the French opinion which takes that view, but the bulk of the French people are sick and tired of war. They have suffered very severe losses, and they do not want any more fighting, and it is with great difficulty that they can find young men to go to their training institutions for officers. They cannot get the officers. That is even the class who are supposed to be militarists, who have had enough of militarism for some time to come." But when you come to Paris, the journals are so militaristic and there is a very powerful class there which has a considerable influence upon the Government, and I think that is the only answer I can give to that.

Lord Curzon: I will make that even stronger. Being at the Foreign Office I am in daily contact with the thing, and I say our influence is considerable. It is the dominating factor in Europe at this moment. I do not say this at least in the sense of private conquest, but I am impressed at every Conference we go to by the fact that in the last resort the voice of England remains, and I think General Smuts was complaining we did not adopt a policy of sufficient independence. That, I think, is the word he used. There are at the present moment six cases which I have to deal with in which our policy is almost one of complete independence. Now the question of Silesia is one, and I shudder to think if we took away our hand from the helm what would happen in Silesia. The question of the Ruhr is another. We have so far succeeded in keeping France out of the Ruhr. In the Middle East there is another, and if our solution turns out successful, in so far as it is based on the European policy which is profoundly distasteful to France, in that respect we are working on lines independent of her. In regard to the economic rehabilitation of Germany, there on the subject of reparations we have pursued an independent line. The same thing in regard to Russia, and I think our foreign policy constitutes General Smuts' desiderata, that it is coupled with a large measure of independence, and at the same time it is successful. I will add one other consideration which is often forgotten. This is our obligation. We went to Paris and we signed these Peace Treaties. We are the greatest living guarantee for a successful execution of these Peace Treaties, and it is inconceivable from the point of view of ethics of honour, that we should take our hand from the plough now and let the thing go back into chaos, as it would. I think the view of national honour alone compels us to go on.

Mr. Meighen: There is no difference there as I understand it. We cannot take our hand from the plough at all. By having it understood that we are marching closer to France than we are to other countries we are putting ourselves in this position. France expects more of us. If we do not follow France, in France the resentment is all the greater because they feel they have the right to call upon us. We have the same problem in our country in a much minor degree, but that is exactly what I would expect.

Mr. Lloyd George: We can discuss that when we come to the specific question of whether we shall sign that document. There is no doubt at all that the French are acting in such a way as to make it very difficult for Germany not to contemplate vengeance.

Yesterday I heard of a case in Germany where a French officer was passing a German house and heard the music of the "Wacht am Rhein" being sung. There was a wedding ceremony, and festive words were being sung to the tune. He went in there—prosecuted these people for singing that, and fined them 25,000 fr. for singing the music of the "Wacht am Rhein" even inside Germany with words which were applicable to a wedding ceremony. Of course this has gone right through Germany, and there are a good many incidents of this kind. There is the question of the black troops and other questions which have led to this thing.

Mr. Massey: The black troops have been withdrawn.

Mr. Lloyd George: They were withdrawn from Frankfort.

General Smuts: That is one of the worst features in their policy.

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Chamberlain: If we were to withdraw or assert our independence in the point of disassociating from France, France would really stand master of Europe, and Italy or Belgium would never offer remonstrances to France.

Mr. Lloyd George: Everybody who has attended the Supreme Council is aware of that. There is a sentiment on both sides.

There is not nearly the same sentiment as there was a year ago. The thing that started it was the occupation of Frankfort in spite of the British protest. That gave a sharp shock to English opinion and I noticed it again over Poland.

General Smuts: This Korfanty business must have had some influence.

Mr. Lloyd George: The British opinion there was quite unanimous.

Mr. Chamberlain: In a debate in the House of Commons the other day, which was very thinly attended, but all were thinking men, friendship with France was put on the same level for Europe, as friendship with America for the rest of the world, as an essential basis in our foreign policy.

Mr. Churchill: A sudden, violent, brutal casting away of France, leaving her to fend for herself, would, I am sure, produce a revulsion of feeling in this country of a formidable character. There are thousands of graves in France, and the people of this country cannot put their hearts on a cause like this and spin round quickly. They would be quite upset if there was a violent casting off of France.

Reparations.

Chairman: On reparations, I do not know whether Mr. Hughes wants to speak

Mr. Hughes: I asked you to tell us something about what you intended to do with regard to reparations and Russia.

Mr. Lloyd George: I have a note about that. On reparation we can have either a statement made here at this table showing exactly what has happened, or we can have a paper circulated.

Lord Curzon: It is being prepared.

Mr. Hughes: A printed paper, and we can discuss it afterwards.

Mr. Lloyd George: In regard to this, I think it has been a very satisfactory chapter on the whole. It has been a pretty long story—there are a good many chapters in it—but from chapter to chapter we have got to a satisfactory conclusion, and a conclusion which, on the whole, has satisfied financially opinion in all these countries, and I think it is a very good basis upon which to operate.

Mr. Hughes: When is the first payment to be made?

Mr. Chamberlain: The first payment has already been made.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, £50,000,000 has already been paid. That is a very remarkable thing. They are making no fuss about it. £50,000,000 in gold.

Mr. Massey: Mostly to France and Belgium.

Mr. Lloyd George: Do not commit yourself to that altogether. At any rate it has been paid.

Mr. Hughes: How much are you going to pay? After all, we are concerned in this.

Discussion on Foreign Policy.

Mr. Lloyd George: You are going to have a paper explaining the whole thing and you had better raise the question afterwards.

Mr. Hughes: Quite right.

Groupings of Nations.

Mr. Lloyd George: I do not want to go into that now, there is another matter going on which might be a very important one, and that is the organisation of the nations in South-Eastern Europe—Roumania, Serbia, Czecho-Slovakia and Poland. Poland will be troublesome whichever way matters go. That is another very formidable group, and I never thought the League of Nations would put an end to this. You might just as well expect a Parliament to bring the party system to an end as to expect the League of Nations to put an end to grouping.

Mr. Balfour: It goes further than that. We are contemplating an amendment in the League of Nations in which groupings are encouraged.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is stronger still. In every assembly you are bound to have grouping.

General Smuts: It seems to me that fifty or one hundred countries in a League of Nations is too unwieldy. They must be grouped.

Mr. Lloyd George: They will be grouped. In every assembly you are bound to have groups formed; this is the criticism that you generally have, that any sort of understanding with France is incompatible with the real faith of the League of Nations. I have heard Lord Robert Cecil say that many times. You have this understanding inside the League just as you had it before the League was established. Somebody will get up and propose something, and you feel they will support you. We always felt that Japan was backing us, but you never know where she is. That is what will happen, you will not get rid of this grouping by any League you establish.

Trading with Russia.

Now I come to Russian trading. With regard to Russian trading, up to the present the amount of trade with us is three and a half millions of orders of various kinds. I sent to the Board of Trade for information on this point and this is what I got. The agreement, which dates from the 16th March, has produced three and a half millions. That is not so bad. It is very much better than I anticipated. One of the supreme reasons which dictated that action on our part was that we knew there was considerable unemployment coming, and on every platform you had labour leaders saying that this was due to the fact that we were refusing to take orders from Russia. They said, "Here is Russia with no end of gold and wanting all kinds of goods, and if you would open the door to trading with Russia, you would get orders which would keep you fully employed." I told them at the time they must not expect anything of the kind, but it was of importance to get the agreement signed in order to put an end to that delusion. All the same it has produced more orders than I ever anticipated. It has produced three and a half millions at a time when it is almost impossible to get orders from any part of the world. Orders have fallen off from old customers, and here comes Russia with these orders, and with a guarantee, evidently satisfactory to the firms who have accepted the orders, that payment will be made.

Mr. Hughes: What are the conditions that govern relations between Great Britain and Russia, are there any?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, considerable conditions. As a matter of fact we did send them along immediately, but if Mr. Hughes would like it, we can circulate a copy of the conditions.

Mr. Hughes: When were these drawn up and agreed to?

Mr. Lloyd George: On the 16th March.

Mr. Hughes: When were they sent out? I referred to these in my speech.

Mr. Lloyd George: I am certain we sent out the actual conditions.

M. Hughes: If you did send them, and they arrived while I was there, the thing escaped my memory.

General Smuts: Not only was the agreement sent us, but the British Government also asked us whether we would adhere to it, and I looked through the agreement, and most of the conditions seemed to me to be rather peculiar. We can trade with Russia at any time and adhere to the agreement or not.

Discussion on Foreign Policy.

Mr. Lloyd George: We will certainly circulate that document. Whoever has got the charge of it shall circulate it. It took a month to go out, and it may not have arrived before you left. It was only on the 16th March that it was signed. I only want to say one or two words about Anatolia. This is going to be one of our most difficult problems; but I should like to recall to those who were present at the Peace Conference in Paris what actually happened. We had a Commission set up—an Inter-Allied Commission—to settle the question of the boundaries. We were represented on that Commission by Sir Robert Borden during the Conference. We have acted in every respect upon his recommendations.

Anatolia.

General Smuts: Did they make a report?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes they did, and I have consulted it since. Sir Robert Borden made recommendations to which France, ourselves and the United States of America agreed. With regard to Anatolia, France and ourselves agreed. Italy refused to come in or even to express an opinion. She said she would express no opinion as to how the future of Anatolia was going to be regulated. We knew what that meant. Italy wanted Smyrna, and therefore would not agree, and then President Wilson afterwards agreed with France and with ourselves about Smyrna; and, as Lord Curzon reminded the Conference, Sonnino then started to occupy one port after another. We took no action. Then he came to Mersina. That was very much nearer.

Lord Curzon: Mersina is right round the corner.

Mr. Lloyd George: No, I do not think it is Mersina; it is Marmarice. That was his next step, they occupied that port. We took no action then.

Then one morning we discovered he had occupied Scala Nova, and there was no point in that, unless he meant to go to Smyrna. He was getting very near. He never consulted his colleagues; he did it without intimating us of it.

Mr. Hughes: How long ago was that?

Mr. Lloyd George: While we were actually sitting. Then the Supreme Council had a talk, and we came to the conclusion that he really meant to occupy Smyrna, and that his troops had been landed there with a view to occupying the whole of that vilayet. It was decided that Veniselos should be asked to occupy Smyrna, seeing that the Commissioners of the Powers, all except Italy, had reported in favour of Smyrna going to the Greeks. Sir Robert Borden was very strongly in favour of it. We consulted him at that time because he was the one who took a special interest in the matter and examined it on our behalf. That is the story. Well, the Greeks now say: "Yes, you used us," and they say it in a document which came to-day, "you had no troops of your own, neither you nor France, the only troops available were Italian troops, and you knew that they would occupy it for themselves. So you used our army, ours being the only army available. You kept us there for two or three years, you reported in our favour, you actually framed a Treaty with Turkey based upon the recommendation of your Commissioners, and now, two or three years after, because it does not suit you, because you are in trouble in Palestine and Mesopotamia, you say: 'Thank you very much, would you mind clearing out.' You do not even say: 'Well, we will pay you for having done our work.' We are a poor people, you have actually stopped our issuing necessary credits even in our own country, and you will not do what is always done in every war, what the Americans did with you when they were neutrals, you will not even allow us to buy material in your country for which we are prepared to pay; you do not give us the benefit which neutrals usually give to a country."

Mr. Balfour: I cannot see why we did that.

Mr. Lloyd George: Neither can I. At any rate, that is the position, which they challenge. Then there is another thing which I think the Conference must know. Our military advisers have taken a very low estimate of the Greek forces, and whenever we have had a report from them coming from Constantinople, the Greek forces have been put at their very lowest in moral, numbers, valour, leadership, and in everything else, and this was the position a year ago which we announced to M. Veniselos. On the other hand, Mustapha Kemal, the Anatolian man, had been represented as a man of towering pre-eminence, of an irresistible prowess, and with a tremendous army. Those were the reports we used to get from the East. I then sent for M. Veniselos, and said: "Are you not in a very perilous position? Your armies are there, and Mustapha Kemal is a tremendous fellow, and he has got Turks." M. Veniselos said: "What would you like me to do; if you would like me to clear Mustapha Kemal out of the way, I will undertake to do it in a month." Then we said: "Can you get right through to the Dardanelles?" "Yes," he said, "give me so many days, and I will get through." We said: "This is a military proposition, and we cannot express an opinion about it"; but Marshal Foch happened to be coming over to this country, so we thought the best plan was to get M. Veniselos to meet Marshal Foch and Sir Henry Wilson. I think Lord Curzon and I were there, also M. Millerand, but we cleared out and left him with the soldiers. We said: "This is a military proposition." They came out, having agreed to M. Veniselos's proposition. Veniselos did it in less time than he had undertaken; he scattered Mustapha Kemal, who was supposed to be an irresistible soldier. It is perfectly true, we discover now that he had not very great forces, but we were told then that he had. That is the point. Now, the same thing has happened again. We were told a very short time ago that the Greek army was an army of 47,000, completely demoralised, which was not nearly as good an army as it was a year ago, and that it was very badly led. It is perfectly true they made one attack which was badly led, but I could point to a good many attacks on our part which were not complete successes. That is bound to happen in the history of any army. With the French army the same thing applied. Unfortunately, the German army was the best army at that time, but they also made mistakes. These things happen with much better equipped armies and armies of greater experience. We were told there were only 47,000. We met and decided that perhaps before we took this estimate we had better send somebody over to find out. We left it to the Chief of the Staff, who is certainly not pro-Greek; in fact, I think he would not challenge the statement if I said he were rather Turcophile. At any rate, he is a soldier, and we said: "Choose your soldier," and he said, "I will send Colonel Nairn, who is there on the spot; it would take too long to send a man from this country." I said: "Is he a good soldier?" He said: "Yes, he is a first class soldier, and a very intelligent soldier." He has sent this report, and I think you ought to see it; it contains two pages, and therefore I can only barely summarise it. It turns out that there are 200,000 Greeks. That means that they have got now 100,000 efficients at the least; that, so far from the last mobilisation having been a failure, it has been a great success; that, so far from the moral of the Greek troops being low, it was never better, and his report is that they are better than they were last year. There are one or two weak leaders there, but so there are in every army. But his report on the leadership is that it is first rate. That is the position.

Greek Army at the present time.

We have been trying to meet it, and we have asked the Greeks if they would place themselves in our hands. I think if it were purely us they would do so, because I think on the whole they know that we would be fair, but they know that putting themselves in the hands of the Allies means putting themselves in the hands of France and Italy. Italy does not care about the Mussulmans; that is not what she is after, but she hates Greece. As the Foreign Secretary pointed out, there is rivalry between them. She does not like this new Power arising in the Mediterranean, and there is a sense of rivalry. France has got her own interests to serve. We need not dwell upon those interests, but a good many of them are financial. She has a greater financial interest in Turkey than anybody else, and she has got a group of financiers who are very interested in Turkey and who, to a very large extent, dominate the Quai d'Orsay. Although Greece, I think, would trust us, she would not put herself in the hands of a Council two out of three of whose members are hostile. That is my interpretation of it. She is fairly confident that she is going to win, but the man who predicts what is going to happen in a battle knows very little about battles, and we have been too long associated with the direction of war here to predict what is going to happen in any fight. I am not going to say what is going to happen, for I do not know. All I know is that King Constantine—who is a loathsome creature from our point of view, but we have nothing to do with that, he is the choice of Greece and we are dealing not with him, but with the people, the race, the nation—has come to the same conclusion as our Colonel, that is, his army is a better army than Mustapha Kemal's, but I do not know. At the present moment the Greeks say they are not prepared to put themselves in our hands. That puts us in a very difficult position, because if they do not do so there are only two courses; one is that we should compel them to accept our terms, which means blockading the Piræus and threatening to bombard Athens.

Mr. Churchill: No; we need only intercept their communications with Smyrna.

Mr. Lloyd George: One course is to make ourselves disagreeable and use the might of these three great and powerful nations to compel them. The other course is to let these two countries fight it out. Well, there are obvious disadvantages in both. The disadvantages of allowing them to go on is that the Greeks might overthrow the Turks, but that might not be the end of it, and the Turk would be very disgruntled, quarrelsome, sulky and making himself a nuisance to everybody all round, including ourselves. I have always thought that the trouble we had in Mesopotamia was far more due to the fact that the French had broken faith most discreditably with the Arabs, having first of all undertaken to give Homs, Aleppo and Damascus to an independent Arab Kingdom. They have occupied the three and the Foreign Secretary has pointed out in his statement that that was undoubtedly the reason why the Arabs are disgruntled. The Turks helped to stir it up, no doubt, but if you make terms with the Turks you will still have that real Arab grievance which will create trouble. That is one point of view. On the other hand, if you take action to compel the Greeks to abandon what they have conquered by their own right hand, and what men like Sir Robert Borden (who is pre-eminently a fair-minded man, who went most carefully into the whole of the facts) have reported was Greek by every principle that we have adopted in similar cases, then we should be in the position of having antagonised a very powerful little race, a race which is a very vital one to us, being on our most vital communications on the road to India, a race which has the command of what are probably going to be the most important strategic positions in the Mediterranean, should there be any war in the future, because they have got these little islands scattered all over the place, which might be a sheltering ground for every submarine and torpedo-boat destroyer. We should have antagonised that race. Those are the considerations upon which we have got to make up our mind one way or the other. There is a third consideration; that if the Greek finds that he is beaten by Mustapha Kemal, then Mustapha Kemal will be a more formidable person than ever and will be more difficult to treat with. That is for consideration. At any rate, if Mustapha Kemal is beaten by the Greeks he will be more easy to deal with, but the Greeks would be less easy to deal with. All those considerations will have to be taken into account. It is a very difficult problem, but it is a mistake to assume that there is nothing to be said on the other side. From our point of view there is, of course, the consideration that the whole of the Mohammedan race in India would like to see the Greek driven out of Smyrna. There is nothing to demonstrate that the Turk would accept that. He says he will want Thrace as well, and he will certainly want more independence in Anatolia. Personally, I would give him more independence in Anatolia. I think it would be a very great mistake, once you have left Anatolia to him, not to leave it to him to do what he pleases inside his own country. He is now purely the vassal, not of France, but the vassal of French financiers.

Present Situation between Greeks and Turks.

In the interest of French financiers, to whom, more than others, the Turk is kept in a condition of bondage in order to pay the percentages to these gentlemen—well, that is a humiliation which I can understand any self-respecting race protesting against, and I heard a very able deputation from the Mohammedans of India, headed by one of the ablest advocates to whom I have ever had the privilege of listening. He devoted most of his speech to that side of the problem. He dwelt upon the humiliation of the Kaliph, the spiritual head of the whole of these Mohammedans, who are kept in this condition of bondage to these financiers. Well, those are the questions which we shall have to consider, I am afraid, within the next few days, because, as you will observe, the document has come from the East.

Mr. Hughes: You have not told us the views of the British Government.

Mr. Lloyd George: We have only received it this morning. We have not even met to consider it. There are arguments on both sides and it has to be considered. Whatever action is taken, it must be an action which is scrupulously fair between both parties. If the Greek is not to be intimidated and if he is not to be blockaded and his communications intercepted, some pressure must be applied to the Turk if he continues to be recalcitrant. I am anticipating. All this must be discussed later on. I am very sorry for having detained the Conference all this time, but these are the two or three questions which I thought I would impress upon you for the consideration of the Conference. Now, that is all I have to say, I think. Now, I don't know whether Mr. Balfour has anything to say.

Mr. Balfour: No, Prime Minister. You know quite well ever since the Conference in Paris I have been what I suppose has been called pro-Greek. I remember writing a memorandum, as far as I remember it rather imperfectly now, for the Conference. It was on those lines. I entirely agree with you that the Turk ought to be master in Turkey. By Turkey, I mean Anatolia, which is inhabited by Turks. I want the Turk where he should manage his own people, and I would not allow him, if I could help it, to manage any other race. He has never done it well and never done it even tolerably well, and, therefore, I still think, if it can be done, Smyrna should be Greek. It is Greek by history; it is Greek by its inhabitants, and I am convinced, if you make it Greek again by sovereignty, you will find when that happens there—it has happened everywhere where the Turk has been expelled from any part of Europe inhabited by Christian people—you find an enormous increase in civilisation and in the prosperity of the district.

Discussion on Foreign Policy.

Turkish Situation.

You may think the Serbians, Bulgarians, Greeks and the Roumanians are not the highest specimens of the Aryan race—I don't argue that, but they are people who will improve their own country as soon as you relieve them of Turkish domination. Therefore, I still regret that it has been found necessary to withdraw from a policy to which we have more or less set our hands. I have not altered that view, and that the Mohammedans of India, when they come to understand the situation, and when you make it clear to them that you want the Turk to be supreme in his own country, and you do not want him to be put under the thumb of the French or other financiers, and you do want him to bear his part in the international work of the world, I don't believe that, when that view has sunk in, it would have the effect our Indian friends think. However, I may be wrong, but whether I am wrong or right this is the important consideration. Looking at the problem of Europe and the near East, and apart from the Mohammedan opinion in India, I should like to see the plan originally sketched out carried into due effect.

Mr. Montagu: Did you not put forward a suggestion of a plebiscite to solve this at the London Conference, a Commission of Enquiry?

Mr. Lloyd George: No, no, we did not. We are opposed to that. I will tell you why. You see the Greek population have been driven out, and a good many of them have been exterminated, and a plebiscite under the present conditions would not be right.

Mr. Montagu: I think of the Greeks and Turks.

Mr. Lloyd George: No, that is not a London proposal.

Lord Curzon: There was to be a Commission as you justly say to advise the Conference before they came to a final decision, taking into account all the various considerations, political, economical, geographical and the rest, but there was to be no plebiscite. We have had enough of plebiscites, have we not?

Mr. Montagu: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: This will be reserved for discussion later on. We have to take action upon that in the course of the next few days. I don't suggest we should take any decision upon it because I don't suppose the members of the Conference have seen it, have they? You ought to see the telegrams on the subject in order to form a judgment upon it.

Mr. Hughes: To what are you now alluding?

Mr. Lloyd George: The Greek question—the Anatolian question. We have to decide what action we are going to take.

General Smuts: I thought Lord Curzon really decided on the policy to apply if the Greeks and Turks submitted to our jurisdiction.

Lord Curzon: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: You see they have refused, and now comes the question what are we to do, and that is why we shall have to come to some decision.

Mr. Chamberlain: I gave them warning in the House of Commons that if they did not accept the good offices of the Allies, they would take the decision at their own risk.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, at their own risk.

Mr. Churchill: As you have asked Mr. Balfour to express an individual opinion on the subject, I hope you will allow me to record in one single sentence the fact that I don't look at it from the same point of view that he does, and if it were fitting or suitable, I should be quite prepared to deploy a considerable argument on the other side. I only say that by the way. I don't wish it to be thought I am in complete agreement.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think we shall have to discuss this as the Dominions are in it very directly, because it was a Dominion representative who investigated the matter on my behalf, and I accepted fully his judgment and endorsed it. As the Dominions, as well as India, actually contributed troops to the overthrow of Turkey, they have a very special interest in the matter, but I think they had better get the papers first of all, otherwise they won't be in a position to express an opinion.

Mr. Hughes: I ask now what is the position in regard to the Agenda and the disposal of the various matters that have been set out upon it? Future Agenda.

Mr. Lloyd George: I suggest to-morrow we should take the Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Hughes: The Anglo-Japanese Alliance?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, if that meets your views, Mr. Massey?

Mr. Massey: We need something in the way of a paper to know when it is coming before us.

Sir Maurice Hankey: I sent out one after the discussion the other day.

Mr. Lloyd George: It was a sort of sketch Agenda. Sir Maurice Hankey has sent round a kind of sketch of the business and the order of the business.

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Mr. Massey: I will see presently, but, in addition to everything coming from what we may call the Government Benches, I presume private members will have an opportunity of bringing forward matters.

Mr. Lloyd George: Oh, yes, indeed—that is why it is sent round. If there are any other suggestions, perhaps you will communicate them, either to the Secretary or put them across the table.

Mr. Hughes: I approve that sketch. I do not think it can be improved upon, but I do not know whether you have added to it, Sir Maurice? Whether you have included in it migration?

Sir Maurice Hankey: I will send a new one. I have got that down, and I will send a new one round up-to-date.

Mr. Hughes: All right.

Sir Maurice Hankey: And Reparations.

Mr. Hughes: I only wanted to say that there are two or three questions that concern Mr. Massey—at any rate, they concern me as representing Australia. The most vital one of these is the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, then the question of naval defence, and the other one is the question of migration.

Mr. Churchill: Migration?

Mr. Hughes: That is what has brought me here, and from what one can see there is very little time to spare, because you cannot dispose of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance round this table. You can decide upon some policy, but it may be you will want time to consult the other party, because it is clear you must hear what they have to say. You cannot tell them what we have to say until, of course, we have some settled policy. That ought to be gone on with at once. Anyhow, the question of naval defence to us is vital. It might not be so vital if the Anglo-Japanese Alliance is satisfactorily renewed. But, still, it is a very vital thing. Those questions have to be settled, and there is this other matter we must discuss now, after Mr. Meighen's speech the other day—those modifications or alteration in our Constitution which are involved, or may be involved, in what we are doing, or hope to do, in regard to foreign policy. Mr. Meighen has set out his views in regard to that—they carry us a very long way, but before we can discuss the question there is, or ought to be, a Constitutional Conference next year, as we must decide this question. Mr. Meighen has raised a point which appears to me to be of fundamental importance, and we must express an opinion upon it as a whole. We must know where we are.

Future Agenda.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Hughes, you raised the question of migration.

Mr. Hughes: No, No! Mr. Meighen was speaking of what principles he conceived to be desirable upon which it would be necessary and proper to determine the foreign policy of the Empire.

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Hughes: It is a very important subject.

Mr. Chamberlain: Mr. Churchill was referring to what you said.

Mr. Hughes: Oh! I beg pardon. What I do suggest, Mr. Churchill, concerns you directly in your official capacity as Secretary of State for the Colonies. You remember a conference was held earlier in the year—early in the year, I think, or last year rather, and since nothing that has to be done necessarily involves detailed considerations, I would suggest that the matter might be brought up, and perhaps referred to a small Committee, and that they may later on make a concrete recommendation to this Conference, which, in turn, could discuss it.

Mr. Churchill: The Cabinet have considered the question of migration, and I am equipped with proper authority to discuss it from our point of view, and as you know, Colonel Amery, the late Under-Secretary for the Colonies, gave profound study and attention to the matter, and what I would suggest is, we should have a committee set up which could meet within a few days in which in the first instance, if the Prime Ministers would meet me and afterwards delegate further details to other colleagues they have with them, I do not think it would mean making any further inroads on their time. At the same time, the matter would be getting on, and we should get to a solution in time to have conclusions formed by the general Conference. Prime Minister, if you would approve of that we might settle it now.

Mr. Lloyd George: There is no reason why you should not set up that committee now immediately.

Mr. Hughes: If I may, I will second that.

Mr. Chamberlain: What I really understand this deals with is the question of assisted migration from the United Kingdom to other parts of the Empire suitable to white men. It is not a general movement of population within the Empire, or anything of that kind, but assisted migration of men and women from this country to other parts of the Empire.

Mr. Massey: I would support the suggestion, but Mr. Churchill should make a statement first, and then we shall know exactly where we are.

Mr. Churchill: Of course, I am quite ready, Mr. Massey, to do that, although not this afternoon. I really think on the whole it would be easier if we had a talk round the committee first, and then probably could present concrete questions to the Conference.

Mr. Massey: Perhaps Colonel Amery would make a statement as well.

Mr. Churchill: I propose that he should be on the committee, because I do not want to take up too much of your time sitting on matters of detail.

Mr. Hughes: Each of the Prime Ministers should attend this meeting, and should have the right of appointing some person.

Mr. Churchill: I think their deputies, and then Colonel Amery could thrash it out.

Mr. Lloyd George: If you would give the names of those who would represent your various Dominions

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Churchill will arrange?

Mr. Lloyd George: If you will arrange it with Mr. Churchill, we will leave it to the Colonial Office.

To-morrow, I suggest at 11·30, we should take the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. Lord Curzon will open, and then the whole question can be thrashed out. The next question I have got down for consideration is Naval, Military and Air Defence.

Mr. Chamberlain: They interlock.

Mr. Lloyd George: And disarmament. It is a group of topics. I have got four days down for those great topics. Lord Curzon, to-morrow afternoon, is seeing the American Ambassador, who has some important communication to make. I have no doubt it bears on this. Therefore I suggest we should have our first meeting at 11·30 and the meeting in the afternoon at 4·30, so as to give Lord Curzon and the Ambassador an hour and a half, if necessary, to discuss the question.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Chamberlain: The Prime Minister has asked me to express his great regret to the Conference that he is unavoidably prevented from being present this morning. You are all aware that we are in the throes of a coal crisis again, and it has become absolutely necessary for him to attend a meeting of the miners and mine-owners this morning to see if a settlement can be arranged. He has asked me, therefore, to make his apologies and to invite the Conference to proceed with the discussion, which I think Lord Curzon is to open, on the Anglo-Japanese Treaty position.*

Lord Curzon: The question of the renewal, or the reverse, and, if we renew it, in what shape we renew it, of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance is perhaps the most important, and certainly one of the most perplexing that will come before this meeting, for upon the solution of this question will depend the evolution of our own policy and, to a large extent, the peace of the world during the years that are to come. I have circulated, at different stages, to the members of this Conference, all the pertinent papers on the subject. There were a number of papers that were issued, I think, before you left your own countries to come to England, containing the views of the Imperial Defence Committee, of the Foreign Office, and of various other authorities, upon the question. Since you came here I have circulated to you another set of papers, containing the despatches and telegrams that have passed on the subject in the main with our representatives in the United States and in Japan; and lastly, during the last day or two, there have, I believe, been circulated to you one or two supplementary telegrams on the subject. Thus, I think, you are fully seized of all the available information at our disposal.

Situation since 1911.

Now the position is this. The agreement, in the form which it now bears, was concluded in July 1911 by Sir Edward Grey, who was then our Foreign Minister. This agreement succeeded and superseded two previous agreements which had been negotiated by his predecessor. The object of Lord Grey in concluding it was, broadly speaking, the same as the object which had animated Lord Lansdowne and the Government before, namely, the maintenance of peace in the eastern parts of Asia, and the preservation of the independence and integrity of China, with equal opportunities for the commerce of all nations in China. But events have altered a good deal during the interval since the agreement was first drawn up. The Treaty of 1911 omitted several points that had appeared in its predecessors and included others, notably the well-known Article 4, which was inserted in order to exclude the possibility of war at any time between Great Britain and the United States of America. Article 4 is as follows:—

> "Should either High Contracting Party conclude a Treaty of general Arbitration with a third Power, it is agreed that nothing in this agreement shall entail upon such contracting party an obligation to go to war with the Power with whom such Treaty of Arbitration is in force."

Mr. Hughes: That was new, of course.

Lord Curzon: Yes, it was put in then for the first time. It was put in deliberately, because at that time Lord Grey was endeavouring to negotiate, and almost succeeded in negotiating, a Treaty of Arbitration with America, but as you will recollect, that Treaty was thrown out by the Senate in America, and therefore fell to the ground. On the other hand, a little while afterwards, namely, in September 1914, he did succeed in concluding, not a general Arbitration Treaty with America, but a Treaty which is entitled "With regard to the establishment of a Peace Commission." Under the terms of this Treaty, all disputes between the contracting parties, that is, Great Britain and the United States of America, were to be referred to a special Investigation Commission. Although this is not a general Arbitration Treaty, you will realise that it is in practice equivalent to it, and accordingly, this Treaty having been concluded, the then Government took the very wise and proper step of telling the Japanese Government that the Peace Commission Treaty was regarded by them as equivalent to an Arbitration Treaty, and therefore, that the conditions prescribed by Article 4 of the Treaty of 1911, which I read just now, applied.

The Japanese Government recognised the position and deferred to our views, and this is so well known that I am perfectly astonished at the misapprehension that prevails upon the point. During the last few months I have constantly seen statements made, very likely tendenciously, in the Press, notably in America, that the Anglo-Japanese Treaty still contains the seeds of possible conflict between this country and America. Quite apart from our general view of the question, that is wholly out of the bounds of possibility under the text even of the agreements which have been concluded. That, then, was the position up till last year. I should have said, if I have not done so, that the Treaty of 1911 was concluded for a term of ten years; in other words it will expire on the 13th July, 1921, a fortnight from now. When the Covenant of the League of Nations was passed, it was clear to us that if the Treaty were renewed in its present form it would be incompatible in many respects with the provisions laid down in the Covenant, and accordingly in July last year Japan and ourselves made an intimation to the League of Nations that in the event of renewal after July of this year it would have to be done—and we should be glad to do it—in a form compatible with the conditions laid down in the Covenant of the League. I have now come up to the present date. For a long time it has been admitted, and indeed openly stated, that the question of this agreement would be one of the main subjects that we would consider here, and as this meeting was not to take place until the present month of June, and it was clear that we should be running rather near to the date of expiration in July, it was obviously necessary to make some provision for the temporary prolongation of the Treaty. The term of a year was originally proposed, but inasmuch as that might have given the impression that we were needlessly prolonging the matter, and perhaps prejudging the decision of this meeting, it was eventually decided to suggest a prolongation of three months. That was agreed to, I think, by all the Dominions, but as a matter of fact, Japan has not agreed to it at this moment, and as things stand, within a fortnight from now that Treaty wholly disappears. You must not infer from that that they have any objection to prolongation, quite the reverse. There has been a certain difficulty, in view of the communication to the League of Nations to which I have referred, in determining the conditions under which it will be prolonged. That is in course of being overcome, and I think in the next day or two the extension of the Treaty for three months, that is to say until October 13th of the present year, will be agreed to, a communication being addressed to the Council of the League of Nations to the effect that if anything occurs during those three months that may call for action under the terms of the Treaty, action that may be inconsistent with the Covenant, the procedure of the Covenant should prevail over the terms of the original agreement. That is the formal and technical position as regards the agreement at this moment.

* The Prime Minister subsequently joined the Meeting. During his absence Mr. Chamberlain acted as Chairman.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Present Situation.

Mr. Meighen: Perhaps it would be convenient to read the clause providing for termination and partial extension. I was under the impression, from that clause, that if nothing was done then the Treaty automatically was extended for a year and could be terminated only on a year's notice. Perhaps such year's notice must terminate with a 13th day of July.

Lord Curzon: It does. The view of our lawyers is that, unless steps are taken to annul it in the course of a few days, the agreement automatically expires on the 13th July, 1921. That is, I believe, recognised by both parties, and no difficulty will arise, I think, for the reasons I have named.

View that Treaty expires on the 13th July, 1921.

I said, at the beginning, that there is a great deal to be said on both sides of this question, and perhaps the Conference will allow me to state the arguments with as much fairness as I can, pro and con.

I will first state the arguments that are used with considerable force against renewal. It can be pointed out with truth that the main object for which the agreement was originally concluded has, at any rate, in the form in which it was then presented, ceased to exist. The agreement was drawn up in order to meet the menace of Russian ambitions in Northern and North-Eastern Asia. That was a menace which had affected not only our own Dominions in India, but the peace of the Eastern World for many years. It was supplemented by the growing power and ambitions of Germany. Both these dangers may be said to have vanished—at any rate, temporarily vanished. The Russian Empire, in its old form, has ceased to exist, and the whole of Northern Asia, formerly the centre of a powerful military autocracy, is now in a state of relative chaos. Germany, for the time being, has disappeared as a formidable rival in the Far East, and therefore there is force in the argument that the conditions which called the agreement into being no longer prevail. On the other hand, it will be my duty to point out presently that it is not inconceivable that these conditions may revive at no distant date, and perhaps be of a more formidable type.

Arguments against Renewal.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

The second and main objection, which has figured in many quarters, arises from the feelings that are entertained with regard to this matter in the United States of America. There is no doubt that in many quarters the existence of the Treaty is looked upon as a source of irritation, and, as I said just now, I am rather surprised myself that the existence of Article 4, and the conclusion of the Treaty to which I referred, have not been more successful in removing the misunderstanding in America than they have. The misunderstanding does not exist in the State Department, but it exists in public opinion, and it is fomented by the Press. In the printed papers which have been circulated to you, Sir Auckland Geddes, our Ambassador in Washington, represented in the latter part of last year that these criticisms, although serious, were not vital, and he recommended the continuance of the Treaty for reasons which you will there read. The Minister has now sent us a series of telegrams which you must have seen, and which throw a somewhat different light upon the matter.

Feeling in America.

Mr. Hughes : The last few weeks?

Lord Curzon : Yes. There are three telegrams, dated respectively the 6th June and two telegrams of the 24th June, in response to an enquiry from me as to whether the situation had changed at all in America. I will just touch upon these telegrams in passing. In the first of them, No. 388, dated the 6th June, he quotes the opinion of the Secretary of State in Washington, not, indeed, given to him but alleged to have been communicated to somebody else, that the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance would be disastrous. The two telegrams of the 24th June are to this effect :—He says, in the first of them, no doubt American opinion regards even the thought of the renewal of the Treaty as evidence that British protestations of a friendly feeling towards the United States of America are insincere. In the second telegram he writes, after a conversation, although one of an informal character, with the Secretary of State, that he had told him that he viewed the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance in any form with disquietude, because of the effect such renewal would inevitably have upon American opinion, and he added that even if we specifically excluded the United States from any operation that the Treaty might have, the result would be little less than unfortunate. There was then mentioned in the telegram a discussion with the Secretary of State about a suggestion that in lieu of the Treaty there might be substituted a declaration of policy, embodied in identic notes to be exchanged by the American, British and Japanese Governments. The Secretary of State said that he would consider this suggestion, but we have not at the present stage heard more about it. I quote these passages because I think it is only right that so serious an expression of opinion should be mentioned. It only came into the country three days ago. The 25th was Saturday, was it not?

Sir Maurice Hankey : I did not get them until last night. I sent them out last night.

Lord Curzon : Now you have them.

General Smuts: I will just ask this question. This Peace Commission Treaty with America—was that ratified by the Senate?

Lord Curzon : Yes. Here it is. It was signed at Washington on the 25th September, 1914, and ratifications were exchanged on the 10th November, 1914. So much, for the moment, about the possible or probable state of feeling in America.

View of China.

Another source of possible objection is the point of view of China. There can be no doubt, I think, that the existence of the Anglo-Japanese Agreement has had a somewhat disturbing effect upon our relations with China. China, for reasons which I shall presently name, has some grounds for regarding the ambitions of Japan with suspicion, as long as the agreement exists. China, or, at any rate, some elements in China, undoubtedly hold that great prestige is given to Japan by our backing, and the pressure from which she suffers is sensibly aggravated. You can barely open a newspaper in England at the present moment without seeing a series of articles with the name of Mr. Simpson underneath, and they represent, in tones almost of passion, the alleged state of feeling in China about this matter, and their objections to the renewal of the Treaty. I think I must give you a warning about this. Mr. Simpson is the gentleman who, some years ago, wrote a series of clever and unscrupulous books under the name of Putnam Weale. He is a man—I am speaking confidentially in this room—of doubtful character and antecedents. He is on a sort of roving commission with a very handsome salary paid by the Chinese Government, and is now, through the columns of the Press, justifying his pay by writing a series of denunciatory articles couched in language of extreme abuse. You must, to a certain extent, discount what you read about it.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Chamberlain: He has been inspiring questions in the House.

Lord Curzon : Yes.

General Smuts : His name is Simpson?

Lord Curzon : Yes. Some of the books he has written under the name of Putnam Weale were about the " Boxer Rising " and the " Dark Skinned Races in the Far East." Now, let us for a moment look at what is at the bottom of the feeling in China, and how far on the broadest grounds it is justified. Let us try to transfer ourselves to the Far East and envisage the rival ambitions and actions of these two Powers. There you have on the one hand Japan, a people possessing great and intellectual gifts, a people orderly and disciplined in temperament, with a fierce patriotism, resolute in determination, but rather unscrupulous in the means they employ. These people inhabit a group of small islands, where they have only a limited area to sustain a population already too large for it—islands which are poor in resources, and which barely support the 50 or 60 millions who live upon them. They are a people who must expand. They have done so, in so far as this was open to them, during the last twenty years, and they have done it, if not with an excess of scruple, with fairly successful consequences. They have annexed Korea, they have possessed themselves of Formosa, and they have acquired the Pescadores. They have, since the war with China, practically made themselves the possessors of Southern Manchuria, where they pursue a definite policy of the " closed door," of exclusive railway construction and mining rights. They have acquired a very powerful control over Shantung, which they have promised to relax, but, at present, have not gone far in doing so. In 1915, as you will recall, they addressed the famous Twenty-One Demands to China, which I need not further particularise than by saying that they were intended to make, and would have made, China a vassal State. Meanwhile, Japan is prevented from expanding in the direction of the Pacific by the fact that most of the island groups there are already in the occupation of Great Powers. The Philippines in particular, on which her eye was fixed, passed into the possession of America, who cannot be expected to show the slightest sign of willingness to surrender. Thus you have this restless and aggressive Power, full of energy, somewhat like the Germans in mentality, seeking in every direction to push out and find an outlet for their perfectly legitimate ambitions. Within sight of their shores you have the great helpless, hopeless, and inert mass of China, one of the most densely populated countries in the world, utterly deficient in cohesion or strength, engaged in perpetual conflict between the North and the South, destitute of military capacity or ardour, an easy prey to a nation of the character that I have described.

That is the phenomenon looked at from the spectacular point of view, and you can easily see how the erosion is constantly going on, and the kind of suspicions that arise. As regards China, I can say this, as I have said to the Chinese Minister when he has been to see me. I think it is out of the question, if we renew this agreement, that we should not take into consideration the views of China. China is a great mart for all our goods, it is a country in which it is very desirable that we should work hand in hand with America; it is a country which, even with the inevitable expansion of Japan, we do not want to see swallowed up, and it is a country which after all was in its origin made and developed, in the main, by British money and British commerce, and in which our influence is still very great. Therefore, if it comes to a question of renewal, I state boldly that I would not propose to renew without taking into very close consideration the fears and desires of China, or without discussing with China, if renewal be decided upon, what precise form renewal should take.

Arguments in favour of Renewal.

Those, I think, are the main arguments which are freely used against the renewal of the agreement. Let me attempt to state the case on the other side, and it is a very strong case. If you look back upon the period since the first form of this agreement was concluded by Lord Lansdowne, as far back as 1902, and if you look more particularly at the last ten years in which Lord Grey's agreement has been in existence, I do not think it can be denied that the agreement has had, on the whole, a steadying and stabilising influence on the political conditions of the Far East. It has certainly been very useful to both parties. It helped Japan most materially in her historic war with Russia. It helped us most materially in the recent war with Germany. Papers have been circulated indicating the point of view of the Admiralty about the value of the assistance given by Japan to us in the war. Japan is the kind of party that in giving, and giving generously, never forgets its own interest. I do not think Japan is at all an altruistic power—perhaps there are not many of them knocking about in the world just now; she is, as I read her, scrupulous and honourable in the discharge of her obligations, but at the same time she always directs a very close eye to her own interests and her own future. But, nevertheless, our naval authorities will tell you that in the seas of the Far East, in the China Seas on the one hand and in the Mediterranean on the other, in different ways and to different degrees, Japan was a valuable Ally and assistant in the war, and if you regard what she did from the negative as well as from the positive side, I suppose it is not to be denied that our alliance with her, and the assistance of her naval forces, assured the complete safety of our possessions in the Pacific. The representatives of the Dominions who are here will be in a position to speak, and I think some of them—especially Mr. Hughes and Mr. Massey—have already in public speeches given expression to their views on that point.

I may sum up this part of my case by saying that I do not think anybody would dispute that the Alliance was most valuable to us during the war, and has, during the years in which it has existed, had a steadying effect on the politics of the Far East as a whole.

Danger of a probable revival of a Russo-German Combination.

Next I take a point which I touched upon just now. I frankly said that the circumstances which originally called the agreement into being had vanished, but those of you who recall the discussions we have had on foreign affairs generally during the last few days, and the speech more particularly of the Prime Minister yesterday, will, I think, realise that if that danger has temporarily disappeared it is more than likely to reappear in a different and perhaps more sinister form. The Prime Minister spoke yesterday about the possibility of close co-operation between Germany and Russia in the future, and he explained how an impetus might be given to that tendency by the unfortunate policy being pursued by France with regard to Poland. Now let us assume a resuscitated Russia spreading herself over the vast expanse of Northern Siberia. There are already one or two Soviet Governments there. Let us assume that she resumes not only her old strength but her old ambitions; let us assume that she is backed at the European end of the chain by the forces of Germany. You can well conceive what a temptation it might be to Japan, in these circumstances, if we had severed our link of connection with her, to respond to the invitations, the temptations, that would be addressed to her by that party, and I can well conceive—this is no idle dream—if we dropped the agreement altogether, and if Japan were offended and estranged by our action, as she might well be, that she might seek future friends in another quarter, and this in another ten or twenty years' time might alter the whole face of the eastern world and constitute a danger to our position greater than any from which we have hitherto suffered.

What I am saying is, I admit, speculative, but I think it is a speculation based upon probability, based upon serious probability. I should like, while on that point, to read a few words from a letter which I received only a few days ago from the British Ambassador, Sir Charles Eliot, at Tokyo, which throws some light on the possibility of this combination in the future, and the steps Germany is already taking to start it:—

> "If the present alliance is replaced by an Anglo-American understanding, at the expense of Japan, the Japanese will no doubt cast about for new allies, and will for some time find it hard to get any. Neither Bolshevik Russia nor Republican and defeated Germany offer much attraction at present, but Germany may turn into something very different in the future, and Solf, the present Ambassador here—you will recall him as the German Colonial Secretary during the war—spares no pains to ingratiate himself with the Japanese. He is quiet, though very friendly, in Tokyo; he pays frequent visits to other large towns, such as Kyoto, Kobe and Osaka, delivers addresses, and spreads the idea that Japan and Germany were never active enemies, and that, at the present juncture, they have many interests in common."

Therefore, Germany, with her usual subtlety and determination, is apparently already beginning to work.

(At this moment Mr. Lloyd George joined the Conference.)

Lord Curzon: I was giving the arguments for and against the renewal of the agreement, and I called the attention of the Conference to a rather formidable series of telegrams that came during the last few days from Sir A. Geddes at Washington, reporting an attitude of increasing suspicion and alarm at the possibilities of our action there. I was just at that moment quoting you yesterday as having called our attention to the seriousness of a probable revival of a Russo-German combination in the future to which Japan might easily fall a victim, and I was reading a passage from a letter I have just received from our Ambassador at Tokyo, Sir Charles Eliot, pointing out that the German Ambassador there is already at work trying to lay the foundations of a German-Japanese combination in the future.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Lloyd George: I have not seen that.

Lord Curzon: It only came to me a few days ago. It is a private letter, but I will give it you afterwards.

Mr. Massey: We knew this man very well in Brazil. He was the German Governor at Samoa for some years.

Mr. Balfour: He is now German Ambassador at Tokyo.

Steadying influence of Alliance on Japan.

Lord Curzon: I said just now that the Anglo-Japanese Agreement had been, I thought, successful in its general effect upon the Asiatic position in recent years, and I think it has been successful in another way. I admitted, quite frankly, a little earlier, the character of the Japanese Imperialism, and yet I am pretty sure, in my own mind, that formidable as it has been, it would have been much more serious had this Agreement not subsisted. I can name quite a number of cases in which a check—a very effective check—has been placed on Japanese ambitions by the fact that she knew we would not accept, or submit to, or tolerate, this or that proceeding on her part. I should say that we had in many respects clipped her wings very effectually, and I will take a striking illustration which has occurred only during the past few months and with which you are familiar. Japan was pursuing a policy of somewhat daring railway ambition in the north-eastern parts of China, notably in Manchuria. The other Powers, France, Great Britain and America, have always held strongly the views which I fought hard for in the Foreign Office, that there ought to be a combination of Powers for the commercial development of China, instead of this absurd and insensate competition between them. I may say, in passing, that the old days, 20 or 30 years old, in which the tendencies of the Powers of the world were, so to speak, to map out different areas in China as their spheres of influence, the British in the Yangtse, and other Powers elsewhere, have disappeared, but nevertheless the era of friendly co-operation had not begun. Last year, however, we succeeded in carrying a measure that is called the Consortium and that was an agreement between the Governments of France, America, and our own—Belgium is to come in—for a common policy of railway, commercial and industrial development in China. When we were negotiating this, Japan, standing out for her own individual and rival ambitions, had to decide whether to stay out of it and be fought by us, or come in, and I think it was largely the pressure that we were able to exercise in England, by virtue of our Agreement with Japan, that brought her in. She is now in the Consortium as one of a group instead of an independent and rather formidable competitor on her own account. That I will give you as one illustration of the way in which we have been able to exercise pressure on Japan.

Mr. Meighen: What is the attitude of China towards that Consortium?

Lord Curzon: China was only too pleased, I think, that there should be a combination of Powers rather than that she should be exposed to the somewhat dangerous embraces of Japan. She would sooner have her State developed by a number of friendly Powers acting all together than she would have a policy of snatch and grab pursued by one against the other.

General Smuts: What is the position in China?

Lord Curzon: The governing position?

General Smuts: Yes.

Situation in China.

Lord Curzon: The governing position is this. The old historic fight between North and South is going on. It is unresolved. In the North you have a Republican Government at Peking. You will remember the Monarchy ceased to exist, the Empire ceased to exist, and the Emperor is in retirement, a small boy with an English tutor.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

A very strong and powerful man, Yuan Shih Kai, became the Head of the Republic. I knew him well and he was a serious and responsible statesman. Whether he acted wisely or not in allowing it to be thought, after the fashion of Cæsar, that he would accept the Crown I do not know. He died shortly after and immediately the country fell back into the old state. From that time the military bands have ravaged the country. Military governors rule the areas around their cities under the nominal system of a Republic, but really a provincial autonomy exists. In the South at Kanton one or two Republican Governments have started. Our old friend Dr. Sun Yat Sen has been elected the President of a Southern Republic. Therefore, at the present moment there is—I will not say chaos—since in the ordinary course China is so orderly a country; there is never chaos. Things go on in their own way, whether there is a Central Government or whether there is not a Central Government. The local Governors collect the revenues and have a good time, and the Chinese go on making their money and so on, but the very conditions to which I have referred render China a very easy prey.

General Smuts: Are there two Governments?

Lord Curzon: There are two Governments. The Government of Dr. Sun Yat Sen does not recognise the authority of the North, and really the provincial Governments are a law unto themselves.

Mr. Balfour: They are actually fighting?

Lord Curzon: There is sporadic fighting.

General Smuts: What part is Japan playing in this North and South business?

Relations between Japan and China.

Lord Curzon: Japan had up to quite recently a very strong influence over the Peking Government, because by her tactics and by the wonderful powers of infiltration which she possesses she came into touch with the military groups in China, and the military groups were pro-Japanese. All that was shattered by the policy at Paris, and the policy of the Twenty-One points which I have mentioned. The Japanese conduct in Shantung produced a feeling in China almost of indescribable, although not unnatural resentment, and since the Paris meetings Japan is conscious of the insecurity of her position, and has been trying to come to terms with China about Shantung. China, however, wrapping herself up in her amour-propre, declines to move in the matter, so at the moment the position of Japan is more insecure, or, let us say, less powerful, in Northern China than it used to be.

Views of France and Holland on Renewal of the Treaty.

I might mention in passing a point which produced some effect upon our Cabinet, but which I can dismiss here in a sentence, namely, that I think that the continuance of our agreement would be more than welcome to the other European Powers who have estates in that part of the world, notably France and Holland. The Possessions of both are signally defenceless, and France would, I think, be seriously alarmed at any policy which might let loose an estranged and aggressive Japan in the Far East. The islands that belong to Holland and which are by no means badly governed, are in a similarly defenceless position, and Japan, excluded from the Philippines and with no particular place to turn to, might fall upon them some day in the future with disastrous consequences. I think, therefore, that both of those Powers would strongly favour a continuance of some agreement between Japan and ourselves.

Views of Japan.

Then you have to consider after all the views of Japan herself. You have read in these papers the telegrams and despatches that have come at different times from Sir Charles Eliot, culminating in a telegram which was circulated a little while ago as one of these particular White Papers. There is no doubt whatever that Japan warmly hopes that the agreement will be renewed in some form or other. I must say that her whole attitude about the matter—I am speaking about the Ambassadors and others with whom I have had conversations—has been reasonable. They at once accepted the position that any renewal must be compatible with the terms of the Covenant. They are quite ready to accept the position that the views and position of China must also be taken into account, and also through the mouth of their Foreign Minister, Viscount Uchida, that we cannot possibly renew the agreement except after consultation with America. On the other hand, supposing we were to drop them altogether and to tell them that the situation has changed, that we are much obliged to them for their services, but that the whole position in the Pacific has rendered it impossible for us to continue this agreement with them, I think they would not only be humiliated, and mortified beyond expression, but that that mortification would presently turn into anger and might not inconceivably be followed by an attitude of resentment and a policy of revenge. That is not my view, but that is the view which is consistently pressed upon me by our Ambassador at Tokyo. Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Churchill: When you say it is not yours . . . .

Lord Curzon: I share it, but for the moment I am resting myself upon the authority of our Ambassador. From the wider point of view I must confess myself that I should feel some anxiety at the position in which you had an Ally for something like twenty years, against whom you have to bring so little in the way of charge, as in the case of Japan, who on the whole has done you so well, who has been faithful to the Alliance, and is anxious that it should be renewed, and for the renewal of which such a good case can be made out, but where I had to be the minister who wiped it off the slate and said: "No, America is so important to us that we really cannot have anything more to do with you at all." I do not think that would be a very strong or a very defensible position to take up.

There was another point which affected us when we were considering the matter here and which the Representatives of the Dominions will be in a position to appreciate. It is this. Supposing you cut off your Agreement with Japan now, you again revive the old position in the Far East—the white men against the dark men or the yellow men. Now our policy during the last twenty years has been to try to remove and obliterate these colour prejudices, and undoubtedly our agreement with Japan has led to an increase in the prestige of the dark races as against the view that Europeans will not have anything to do with the dark races and look upon them from a point of superiority and despise them. When we took Japan on the footing of equality of races we immeasurably increased the sense of self-respect entertained by those races. Mr. Montagu will tell you what a great effect this has had in the countries for which he is responsible, the idea that we are treating them as equals; and if we were to throw away this Alliance I really think you would be throwing away an asset of very considerable value on an international scale and from the widest point of view. I do not want to enlarge upon this because if Mr. Montagu has to speak he will lay stress upon it himself.

Views of the Admiralty and War Office.

There is not very much more for me to say. The Papers you have had circulated to you will have shown you that the Admiralty here are in favour of the renewal of the Agreement with Japan, not necessarily in the same form as now, but in a manner that will safeguard the suspicions of America. I am speaking of the Paper dated the 12th February, 1920.

Mr. Churchill: Looking at it from a purely strategic point of view.

Lord Curzon: I am taking the conclusions at which they have arrived. I am referring to the Paper dated the 12th February. The War Office, in a Paper circulated on the 14th February, 1920, pointed out that the military position in the Far East would be very embarrassing if hostilities occurred with Japan. They attached much weight to the danger of a Japan-Russia combination and much more to a Japan-Russia-Germany combination in the future—and thought that we must not antagonise the United States of America and if a new agreement were concluded it must be made in harmony with the latter. We shall hear the views of the Representatives of the Dominions here.

Views of Dominions.

Mr. Hughes has already told us that broadly speaking he is in favour of a renewal.

Mr. Massey has said the same.

The attitude of Canada is different, and is different for reasons which have not only been explained, but which Mr. Meighen will no doubt lay before us with great fullness. Canada looks at the matter from the angle of the American Continent. It is vital that her relations with America should be as close as possible. She cannot contemplate with equanimity anything that would disturb those relations. She has her own Japanese problem on the Western Coast, although the renewal of the agreement has nothing to do with the immigration question, which must be treated separately. Further, in the course of communications we had with the Canadian Government this year, Mr. Meighen submitted a proposal which, so far from being unacceptable, gained the warmest sympathy from many in this room, and that was for a solution of the Pacific problem by means of a Conference of the Powers concerned. It might be well now, or at some not distant date, to have a Conference such as suggested by the Canadian Government with the American Government and the Japanese Government and the Dominion Governments, and any other Powers who might be interested in the settlement of the position. This is a policy which is very well worth considering and which might perfectly well be consistent with a renewal of the agreement in some form should it be considered desirable.

Summary of alternative courses of action.

In conclusion, the Conference may ask me what are the alternatives before us. I think I can summarise them in a few sentences. Of course, we can cancel the Agreement altogether, although I have said that from some point of view there are formidable objections to this, and the Conference will have realised that it is not the course I would, personally, recommend.

Secondly, we can continue it: we might renew it in its present form, but with the modifications required to bring it into harmony with the Covenant of the League, with the omission of any reference to India, and with clauses that made it clear that in no conceivable circumstances would we go to war with the United States. That I do not recommend, because the situation has been very much changed since it was drawn up. The Treaty in its present form is not desirable. The military clauses would excite very great suspicion and alarm in America, and we have gone beyond the stage at which renewal either in its present form or something like it is practicable.

The third alternative is one which was proposed in one of Sir Auckland Geddes's telegrams, namely, to expand the present agreement into a tripartite agreement. In theory this has many attractions, but it seems to be doubtful whether the Senate would pass it, or if American public opinion is prepared for it, while there is always the fear in America, where Administrations succeed each other with violent oscillations, that an agreement adopted by one party might be repudiated by the next, whereas we desire to have continuity in policy in the years which lie before us. Still, the idea of a tripartite agreement is one worthy of consideration.

The fourth alternative is one which, I think, on the whole, the Foreign Office is rather disposed to recommend, always subject to what may be said here, namely, that the Agreement, if renewed, should be renewed in a different form, and after consultation with the United States on the one hand and with China on the other, and with the League of Nations; its renewal being accompanied by an expression of willingness on our part to join the United States Government in an examination by Conference between interested parties of the Pacific problem suggested by Mr. Meighen. It has occurred to me that a slight variation of that situation is also worthy of consideration. A good deal turns upon the order in which you proceed. The kind of Conference Mr. Meighen has in view is a matter that would take a good deal of time, would involve many considerations, and would be, of course, very far-reaching in its consequences. It would be a Conference conceivably held on the other side of the Ocean, in which all the Pacific Powers would be involved. There would be the Dominions and Great Britain, there would be Japan and China, and there would also be the other Great Powers which have possessions in that part of the world.

Mr. Massey: The South American States?

Lord Curzon: Perhaps; and you will therefore see that if we enter upon that sphere we are embarking upon a very big field, and opening out negotiations which could not conceivably come to any issue except in a considerable space of time; and therefore it might be thought desirable, by common consent, to renew the agreement, not in its present form, but in a form brought into harmony with the Covenant of the League on the one hand, and with what we may call the suspicious clauses removed from it on the other, for a time, say for a year, pending the decisions of the other Conference to which I have referred. That is a possible solution, and I think the practical choice lies between the two—between a temporary renewal with a view to a larger discussion and a more complete solution, or the renewal in a different form for a term of years, let us say four, capable of being either extended or dissolved at the end of that time, after consultation with the other Great Powers, principally America, China and the Dominions.

Those are the possible solutions, unless some other solution may be suggested in the course of this discussion. I thank the Conference for having listened to me in making what I conceive to be a fair statement of the position and the consequences involved.

Mr. Hughes: Which alternative does the British Government prefer?

Lord Curzon: When we considered it here, the Cabinet was inclined to favour renewal for a term of years.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Churchill: The situation has been altered by the telegrams from the United States, which were not before us when we considered this. They have since arrived from Sir Auckland Geddes, who reported originally that it would do no harm in America if the renewal took place.

Mr. Lloyd George: Would you like to put any questions to Lord Curzon first, because before you make your statement Mr. Balfour would like to say a word on behalf of the League of Nations and the Committee of Imperial Defence.

Date of Expiry of Existing Treaty.

Mr. Meighen: The Foreign Secretary has stated that the Treaty expires on the 13th of next month, if no step is taken in the meantime for its renewal. Article VI provides for the running on of the Alliance unless the contracting parties should have notified twelve months before the expiration of the ten years an intention to terminate that Treaty. I am not able to understand how it can be read to bring about absolute termination next month.

Lord Curzon: It arose in this way. The letter, which was written by both parties in combination to the League of Nations in July of last year, is regarded by the competent lawyers as equivalent to an announcement of denunciation.

I could read you our statement to the Japanese Government about our proposal to extend the Agreement for three months. The matter has been studied by our legal authorities, who have definitely advised that the letter of last year does constitute a notification by both parties of an intention to terminate the Agreement on the 13th July, 1921, unless in the meantime a new agreement shall be entered into. It thus follows, in the view of His Majesty's Government, that the Agreement will expire on the last-mentioned date unless it is renewed in the interval.

Mr. Meighen: That means then that the intention to terminate has in effect been given.

Views of the Committee of Imperial Defence.

Mr. Balfour: I have to speak in a double capacity, for, while there is present here the Secretary of State for War, the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, it so happens that I am the Chairman of the Sub-Committee or the Standing Committee, I think it is called, of the Committee of Imperial Defence, which has been entrusted with the work of considering this very important problem. We were clear that, from a strategic point of view, there could be no doubt whatever that it is to the advantage of this country to renew the Alliance. Before the Great War, the Committee of Imperial Defence—of which I was not then an active member, I was in Opposition, and though I took part in certain discussions I was not a constant attendant—but I understand that the fact of the Japanese Alliance was held to relieve the Admiralty of the day of any serious responsibility with regard to the Pacific, that is to say, it was not proposed that we should have to keep a very large fleet there, or take a large fleet there, as long as Japan was our Ally. Then came the Great War. That is over, and we have to consider the strategic position, with Germany and Russia for the moment left out, but undoubtedly with a great, and, I believe, an almost friendly, Navy, but still a Navy that is not our own in the Pacific, as well as the Japanese. America is steadily putting ships in the Pacific, I understand, and although I am not in the least way conceiving a war with America as a possibility, yet if you look at the thing from a purely strategic point of view, and omit politics and sentiment and look at it with an open mind, undoubtedly it is a fact that if we had not Japan on our side we should be second or third Power in the Pacific after a considerable number of years. I hope the last contingency will not occur, but we cannot deny that at the moment we are in a relatively unprepared condition in that part of the world, that is, we have not had time or money to adjust all our defences to meet the situation which the Great War has rendered possible. I do not say the Great War has created this position, but it has rendered it possible. Therefore, in our view, so long as our relatively unprepared condition lasts, it is, from a strategic point of view, of very great importance that the Japanese Alliance should be maintained. Nobody suggests that an alliance is a permanent safeguard, or is an adequate substitute for material force. Alliances may come to an end, quarrels may arise, new situations may dissolve them, and it is necessary to face the possibility that they will not last for the full length of time that was anticipated. Nevertheless, experience has shown, and I think that the speech of the Foreign Secretary which we have listened to this morning has clearly proved, that our alliance with Japan in the past has been of great strength to us in those waters, has been a great protection to British interests, has been a very controlling factor on the policy of

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Japan; and as that has been the case in the past, I see no reason whatever to doubt, myself, that it will be the case in the future. Therefore, from a strategic point of view it is the opinion of the Committee of Imperial Defence that a renewal of the Treaty with Japan is a most desirable object. I referred just now to our relatively unprepared condition. What is that due to? It is due, of course, to the actual building of some Powers, and the prospective building of other Powers, but it is also due to another cause to which the Committee of Imperial Defence has devoted a great deal of attention, and in regard to which it has, I think, circulated a statement which is now in the possession of all the Prime Ministers.

The new difficulty, the new situation, arises from this. A modern battle fleet is worked and will more and more be worked by oil and not by coal. It is impossible for a great many reasons, financial and other, to keep the great bulk of the British Fleet in the Pacific. To keep the bulk of the Fleet in the Pacific so far from its base involves a prodigious cost and extraordinary administrative difficulties, and I think that we must assume that in the main it will be in Western waters and in Northern waters that the British Fleet, the main bulk of the British Fleet, will be concentrated in peace time. What is required there is to make arrangements by which the British Fleet can be transferred effectively and rapidly so as to operate in the Pacific. It cannot possibly operate in the Pacific unless it has a place in the Pacific where it can concentrate and where it can refuel. If you send out a fleet from the Atlantic or the Mediterranean, the great bulk of such a fleet, if you send it out to the Far East, could get to Singapore, which is the gate of the Pacific, but when it got to Singapore, unless it brought with it an immense number of oilers which are not yet in existence, it would find itself without the power of refuelling. It would be immobile, and if immobile it would be useless, relatively useless. In these circumstances, we have come to the conclusion that one of the most pressing needs for Imperial defence is that Singapore should be made into a place where the British Fleet can concentrate for the defence of the Empire, of our interests in the East, our interests in India, our interests in Australia, our interests in New Zealand, our interests in the smaller Possessions there, and that for that purpose it is absolutely necessary to undertake works at Singapore. Those works cannot be finished in a day. They cannot be finished in a year. They must take some time to complete.

Mr. Massey: They are going on.

Mr. Balfour: Not yet. This question has only been taken in hand quite recently. Therefore, until Singapore is rendered the place which we think it ought to be made, a place of concentration, a place of refitting and refuelling, until this is done, we are at a relative disadvantage undoubtedly in the Pacific, and that is a very strong strategical reason, putting all wider considerations apart, why we should remain on the most friendly terms with Japan and why we should continue a policy we have hitherto pursued with such success, which is that of joint action with Japan in the Far East. I imagine we shall have to discuss this question of Singapore more in detail when we come to deal with the naval problem, but it is impossible to give the Committee of Imperial Defence's view upon this question of the Japanese Alliance without referring to it, and without discussing in its main outlines the immense importance which our Naval and Military Authorities attach to the policy I have suggested. Now I think nobody could have listened to Lord Curzon and not have come to this conclusion, that two evil consequences at least will follow from bringing the Japanese Alliance to an end. The first is, that we can no longer count on any assistance from Japan. We can no longer pretend to control her actions or modify her policy in the Far East, but worse than that, we may turn a faithful friend into a very formidable enemy, and to turn a faithful friend into a formidable enemy at a moment when you find yourselves relatively unprepared to meet any attack from the former friend and the present enemy is the very worst policy you could possibly pursue from a strictly military point of view. The First Lord of the Admiralty is there; I do not know that there is any broad consideration in that connection which he thinks I have omitted. I think I have sketched it adequately for this stage of the discussion.

Consideration of the question from point of view of League of Nations.

I therefore come to the second part of my observations, which I shall make very short, in which I speak, not as the Chairman of the Standing Committee of Imperial Defence, but as the British Representative of the League of Nations. I ought to say that the idea, for what it is worth, which I am going to throw out now, I have not had time to discuss, either with the Prime Minister or the Foreign Secretary, because it only occurred to me yesterday when I was meditating upon the discussion which was probably going to take place to-day. In order to make the idea clear, perhaps my colleagues will allow me to remind them of what happened at Geneva at the last assembly of the League of Nations and since. A good many suggestions for amendments to the Covenant were made at the Assembly. The Assembly remitted them all for consideration and report to the Council of the League of Nations, and the Council of the League of Nations in its turn appointed a Committee to consider them seriatim, to offer an opinion upon them and to make any further suggestions which it thought proper. Of that Committee it made me the Chairman, and the Committee met in London. I was not able to go to Geneva owing to public work here. I think it was three weeks ago. It was very representative. I was the only Britisher upon it, but France, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Spain, Japan, South America, Czecho-Slovakia, and other countries were all represented upon it, and we were unanimous. One of the amendments considered was the Czecho-Slovakian amendment, and the man who I believe devised it, and who, being on our Committee, certainly recommended it, was the ablest statesman which Central Europe in this turmoil has yet been able to produce. It was the Foreign Minister of Czecho-Slovakia, M. Benes, well known, I think, to everybody here, and everybody, I think, will agree he is a man of great capacity. M. Benes, as I think it was pointed out by the Foreign Secretary, no, by the Prime Minister, is deeply concerned in this new combination of Central European States which is in process. I do not know whether it is to be formed or not, but it is under discussion, a combination of Czecho-Slovakia, Roumania, and so on. His idea was that such combinations of States, or two or more States, if it was genuinely done for defensive purposes and in the interests of the peace, was not only an object to which the League could take no objection, but it was an object which the League ought to encourage, and that such combinations could be done and should be done with the approval, under the protection as it were, and with the complete knowledge of the League of Nations. He embodied that in a proposed amendment to the Pact. I am sorry I have not the document here. I did not know the discussion was going to take this form to-day, or I would have brought the document with me. I have it at home.

Mr. Massey: Can we have the document circulated?

Mr. Balfour: Certainly; I think it would be proper.

Mr. Massey: I was simply referring to the resolution.

Mr. Balfour: Of course, it should be circulated. I was wondering whether I would circulate it separately or trouble our colleagues with the whole report of the Committee. I think they would like to see the whole report of the Committee which deals with all the amendments.

General Smuts: I think it would be convenient at some stage of the Conference that we should discuss these amendments.

Mr. Balfour: Quite. It turns on Article 21, and Article 21 reads as follows:—

> "Nothing in this Covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements such as Treaties of Arbitration or Regional Understandings like the Monroe Doctrine for securing the maintenance of peace."

Now we propose on M. Benes's initiative to make the following addition to it:—

> "Agreements between members of the League tending to define or complete the engagements contained in the Covenant for the maintenance of peace or the protection of international co-operation may not only be approved by the League but also promoted and negotiated under its auspices, provided these agreements are not inconsistent with the terms of the Covenant. Special conferences of the members of the League concerned may be summoned for this purpose by the Council or by the Assembly of the League."

The whole argument is contained in this report, but that suggested amendment is the outcome of the discussion. I will circulate the whole of it.

Mr. Hughes: Can we have a typed copy of the amendment after lunch?

Mr. Balfour: Yes, certainly. As you will see, it is an amendment to Article 21.

Mr. Hughes: It has a direct bearing on the Anglo-Japanese Treaty.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Balfour: That is why it has been brought to this meeting. It occurred to me last night if we said to the Japanese: "The old Treaty is over, we think that it should in spirit be renewed, and we think it comes under the terms of this Article 21," (which unfortunately has not yet been accepted, but only recommended), I really do not see how anybody could object. Of course, America is not for the League. America is rather against the League, but you will observe this Article brings in the Monroe Doctrine rather by the shoulders. The Anglo-Japanese Alliance, especially if America would join, would be the Monroe Doctrine applied to the Pacific, and whether you look at it from that point of view or not, it is quite clear that the pacific character, the defensive character, of the whole transaction would be patent to the eyes of the world if it were done under the auspices and with the complete knowledge and approval of the League of Nations. It would then be framed with its defensive and unaggressive character patent in every line, with the League of Nations as its godfather, and it would be a very embittered controversialist who could find in such a transaction a menace or threat, or anything else, to any third Power, or indeed anything otherwise than as a controlling influence over any imperialistic tendencies which the Japanese Government or any Party in the Japanese State might be supposed to entertain. That suggestion I simply throw out at the moment as a personal suggestion because it has not only never been discussed by the Cabinet, but I have never had the opportunity of mentioning it either to the Prime Minister or the Foreign Secretary, who are the people whose opinion will most direct the Government of this country.

Mr. Hughes: Supposing your suggestion was adopted by this Conference, would you now take the steps that have to be taken before any Treaty or arrangement made between ourselves and Japan can adapt itself to, or be in harmony with, the Covenant as amended?

Mr. Balfour: I should think so, because our Treaty with Japan is intended to be a pacific and defensive Treaty, and if a Treaty is really in essence pacific and defensive it ought not to require much ingenuity or much skill in drafting to make it congruous and harmonious to the fullest extent in both the spirit and the letter.

Mr. Hughes: But the amendment has not been accepted yet, has it?

Mr. Balfour: No.

Mr. Hughes: That was what I wanted to know.

Mr. Balfour: But I think it would be accepted. It is proposed by Central Europe. The Chinese did not very much like it at the Conference, but all the other Powers did, and they were very representative people. Switzerland was represented, Holland was represented, in addition to the three Great Powers, and the South American States, so that I should have a good hope that it would be accepted. Nor do I quite see why anybody should object to it. I think I have made it clear, have I not?

The Prime Minister: I think so, very clear. I would suggest that at this stage, if it is convenient to the Conference, the debate should be adjourned, as I should very much like to be present when the Dominion Premiers and Representatives of India state their views upon this subject. I am afraid I must go back to the Coal Conference; I have been sent for, and I am afraid I cannot remain here any longer. Would it be convenient if this Debate were taken to-morrow?

Mr. Balfour: Do we not meet at half-past four to-day?

Mr. Lloyd George: It depends entirely upon this. I am very sorry, but there is great trouble with the miners, although I am hoping we may be able to get through it to-day. Supposing I am able to arrive at an agreement with them, the House of Commons may want to discuss it. In that case I certainly should not be here. But supposing the House of Commons do not, I could be here at 4·30, and so could Mr. Chamberlain.

Mr. Churchill: We have arranged a Committee Meeting at 3·30 on the subject of Emigration. That would be over at 4·30 of course.

Lord Curzon: I have to see the American Ambassador at 3 o'clock and I can report at 4·30 what he has said.

Mr. Lloyd George: We shall know at 4 o'clock if the discussion takes place, and subject to that we could meet at 4·30.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Prime Minister, I should like to say this. It is no use our discussing this matter when you are not here.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should like very much to be here, and therefore, if you put it in that way, if there is no Debate in the House of Commons on the subject of coal, I will be here at 4·30.

Mr. Hughes: There is one thing I want to ask the Foreign Secretary through you. Will he have those two alternatives typed for me?

Lord Curzon: Yes, that is what I suggested.

(The Meeting then adjourned.)

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Lloyd George: I am sorry to say that I have received a letter from the Colonial Secretary intimating that his mother died very suddenly this morning, and that he would be unable in the circumstances to be present. He wishes me to apologise to the Conference on his behalf. I am sure you will allow me to communicate to him, on behalf of us all, an expression of deepest sympathy, for he was very fond of his mother.

I regret that I could not be here yesterday afternoon, as it took longer to pull the coal business through than we expected. As a matter of fact, we were not able to settle it all up until nearly half-past six. I am very much obliged to you for putting off the Conference until this morning.

Mr. Meighen: Prime Minister, we have now come to what is undoubtedly the most important subject of discussion at this Conference. I can only say as to the introduction by the Foreign Secretary that it was what all of us knew it would be, ample in argument and admirable in presentation. It is with some deference that one who is far from being as experienced as he with such subjects ventures to follow—particularly when he feels it his duty to turn the argument toward a different conclusion.

Discussion in Canadian Parliament.

You remarked, Prime Minister, some days ago, that there had been free communication in the Parliament of Canada of Canada's position on this question. That is not wholly correct. There was free discussion in the House, requested by members on both sides, but the discussion ended without any commitment whatever from myself or from any member of the Government as to the course we should pursue here. Nor have I made any such commitment, nor has any Government member, publicly or in any way since.

Opposes renewal.

Perhaps it will contribute to rapidity if I say at the outset that I feel compelled to oppose the renewal of the Alliance. I would regret to see the Treaty continued in any form at all.

Lord Curzon's remarks will enable me to present my case more briefly than would otherwise have been possible. He has with fairness presented arguments against the renewal of the Treaty, as well as summed up at the close what he felt were the preponderating arguments in favour of renewal. Referring to the latter, if I caught the full effect, they might be described in these words:—"First, that the Treaty has served its purpose, or, in other words, has been a success, in that it has held the situation in the Far East; in a word, has met the purpose for which the Treaty was originally framed, and the somewhat different purpose for which it was renewed in 1911. My answer is: if the purpose was to preserve peace in the Pacific, possibly in the main, it has. But, at any rate, it did not preserve peace during the period of the Russo-Japanese war. I have no further remarks to make on that phase.

Mr. Chamberlain: It was signed in the middle of that war.

Situation changed since 1902.

Mr. Meighen: It was concluded in 1902. The Treaty, however, had certain ends to serve from our point of view. It was framed admittedly to meet first of all a Russian menace, and secondly, on its renewal in 1911, a German menace. These were the concrete objects that Great Britain had in mind in making the Treaty, and we are told it served those purposes. As we find ourselves now, both those menaces are removed, and consequently, if my mind reasons correctly, there can be no argument for renewal of the Treaty drawn from conditions no longer present. There may be reasons why it should be renewed to meet another situation. I will come to that later. But there is really no correspondence between the speculative possibility of a rehabilitated Russia and the actual Russian menace of 1902; no correspondence between the still more speculative possibility of a Russo-Germanic Alliance and the actual German menace of 1911. In a word, a Treaty framed to meet future contingencies of that character is wholly different from a Treaty framed to meet an admitted state of facts, which state of facts constituted a manifest menace that all the world could see. I do not relish being in the position of saying to the people of our country, nor of answering any criticism from the country to the south of it, that this Treaty is for the purpose of enabling us to meet a possible menace arising from a combination of two potential, or should I say impotential foes, one of whom now is self-smitten and the other of whom is defeated and more or less prostrated—and all this in the presence of the new conditions of world affairs that we are trying to bring about. In fact, to put such a case would be to invite criticism, if not worse.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

The second reason is this—that Japan has proved a trusted and a loyal ally, has lived up to her obligations under the Treaty, and that that fact should be taken into account in determining whether or not we should renew the Alliance. Well, I am not intimating even an opinion—Lord Curzon's opinion in this respect is conclusive so far as I am concerned—that in relation to the late war Japan fulfilled her obligations, and that possibly the Treaty enabled Japan to succeed with Russia, which may have been an advantage to us.

Extent to which Japan has observed Treaty.

But it is going very far to say that Japan has proved true to the Treaty. Again the Foreign Secretary's words are conclusive with me. The Treaty was framed—if its language meant what it said—to bring about "The consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of Eastern Asia and of India," and "The preservation of the common interests of all powers in China by ensuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire, and the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations in China," and "The maintenance of the territorial rights of the High Contracting Parties in the regions of Eastern Asia and of India and the defence of their special interests in the said regions." In other words, the independence and integrity of China and the "Open Door."

I read the following from the Foreign Secretary's address of yesterday, referring to Japan:—

> "They are people who must expand. They have done so in so far as this was open to them during the last twenty years, and they have done it, if not with an excess of scruple, at any rate, with fairly successful consequences. They have annexed Korea; they have possessed themselves of Formosa, and they have acquired the Pescadores. They have, since the war with China, practically made themselves possessors of Southern Manchuria, where they pursue a defined policy of the "Closed Door" of exclusive railway construction and mining rights. They have acquired control over Shantung, which they have promised to relax, but at present have not gone far in doing so. In 1915, as you will recall, they addressed the famous Twenty-One Demands to China, which I need not further particularise than by saying they were intended to, and would have made China a vassal State."

Against a nation that had covenanted with us to preserve the independence and integrity of China and the "Open Door," that reads to me like a very formidable indictment.

Lord Curzon: It is only fair, Mr. Meighen, that you should remember what I said yesterday. In the agreement concluded between the United States of America, represented by Mr. Lansing, and the Japanese Government, represented by Viscount Ishii, in November 1917, the American Government themselves recognised that Japan had special interests in China, particularly in that part where their possessions are contiguous. That was a recognition of a certain right on the part of Japan and justified, to some extent, the proceedings to which you are now objecting.

Mr. Meighen: What you say might put it out of the power of the United States of America to criticise Japan, but it does not affect the argument that, having made the Treaty for definite objects, Japan has far exceeded her rights, and progressively violated her covenant. It cannot well be imagined how in the short space of less than twenty years she could expect under any conditions to achieve more in the way of aggrandisement, and it is only reasonable to say that if we do enter into another Treaty, we have every ground to expect them, hold the check rein as we will, to succeed in duplicating the performance of the last twenty years in the further invasion of this very independence and integrity of China. In so far as she does that with us walking by her side, it makes us particeps criminis and thus affects our standing with all other nations.

China's objection to the Treaty.

I have also difficulty in understanding this: if a real object of the Treaty is the preservation of China's integrity, how does it come that the Government which is the most violently opposed to its renewal is the Government of China itself. There can be no question as to their position. I do not mean, by these words, to dispute the estimate the Foreign Secretary places upon Mr. Simpson. I saw him only once. I do not dispute the Foreign Secretary's judgment at all. But it is not a question of the standing of Mr. Simpson or the character of Mr. Simpson. It is a question of where the Chinese Government is, and no one that I have heard disputes that the Chinese Government is very strong in its objection to the renewal of this Treaty. If they actually looked to it for protection it is inconceivable that they would be opposed to its renewal, and it seems to me what we should take into account, as regards China, is the opinion of the Chinese Government and the Chinese people.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Lord Curzon: It is only fajr indeed to say that the protest of the Chinese Government has been directed against the renewal of the Treaty in its present form. I am not aware that they have said anything contrary to the renewal under the sort of conditions that I described yesterday.

Mr. Meighen: Well, their position is revealed in the despatch from our Ambassador there, to the effect that the Treaty must not contain a reference to the preservation of Chinese integrity and independence without, first of all, their being consenting parties. Leave that reference out and tell me on what ground you expect under the Treaty to curb the rapacity of Japan in China. Leave out other things, such as have been suggested, and I really do not see what is left of the Treaty, except window dressing, for all its substantial purposes are one by one relegated to oblivion.

Now, I stated that the avowed object of the first Alliance was to provide against the Russian menace—the danger in that regard has gone; the avowed object of the last renewal to provide against the German menace—that danger has also gone. But we are told we are preparing now against the still greater peril of the two together. If we do so by an Alliance with Japan, is that not going to invite, or at least to hasten, the very Alliance we fear between Russia and Germany? It would seem to me that we are thereby taking the very step that is likely to bring such a menace into being.

Germany's relationship with Japan.

As respects the cultivation of friendship between Japan and Germany, as revealed in the account of Dr. Solf's activities in Japan, I do not see anything objectionable; I do not doubt for a moment that Germany will seek to make friends with Japan. I should think that task was part of the duty of Dr. Solf, acting as he does for his country, and I do not think there can be any objection. We should do the same. We should do towards Japan as Germany, through Dr. Solf, is doing. We should also have such a representative there—I do not say we have not—if we have not, we should have a man of his capacity and skill.

Suggested British Policy towards China.

This further thought I venture. It would seem to me that the proper policy toward China would be, not so much the formation of groups to protect her———.

Mr. Lloyd George: Not so much what?

Mr. Meighen: Not so much groups to protect her, as a policy of encouraging her self-reliance by putting her on her own unhampered resources as to taxation and finance and in a position of responsibility.

Canada averse to Alliances.

Speaking generally as to Alliances, I am quite sure I am speaking the opinion of the Dominion of Canada when I say it naturally is averse to any Alliances at the present time. We do regard the formation of groups and Alliances, even though they are not counter to the Covenant of the League of Nations, as likely to subvert its purpose. The Prime Minister said the other day that it would be impossible to expect that groups should not arise within the League itself; that, forty or fifty nations being represented there, the same thing would occur as happens in a Parliament—certain groups would get together for certain things. That may be, but that is very different from permanent Alliances: I mean ten, fifteen, or twenty-year Alliances. I would be sorry indeed to see all these various nations taking sides as is done in a Parliament, one seeking to prevail over the other and each straining for authority and power. If that course is to be pursued, why, it seems to me there is nothing but despair ahead of us. It is quite natural that, for definite purposes there would be certain of them—I mean all chiefly interested in the purpose—who would group together. That I would conceive to be possible; but if, for example, Japan and Great Britain are, under the shadow of the League, to form an Alliance for the purpose of preventing possible designs of Russia and Germany in the Far East, then, other Alliances would be formed for counter purposes. Alliances will grow, and there becomes really no difference between the situation that results and that from which we have escaped. They are precisely the same. Consequently, we would like, if possible, to start without entanglements of this kind, and we feel that it is safe to do so now. If we come later on to the pass of a combination against us then we will cross that bridge, we will have something then to point to as the reason for what we are doing, but until we come to it we have not any sufficient reason.

Mr. Chamberlain: May I ask one question? Does not that presuppose that if we make any arrangement with Japan now she will still be ready to come in if danger arises owing to a German and Russian combination? Is not it quite likely that when that time comes she will not be on our side, but will be in the German-Russian combination? Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Meighen: If we start now to guard against this contingency, on the hypothesis that Japan will not then be a friend, what combination could you not justify? You could justify any. Where do you put those who are without the combination? Do you not compel them to make themselves active along certain lines, and in this regard particularly the United States?

Effect in China.

Again, it does look to me as if the friendship of China—and it is worth something—is almost certain to be lost by the course we are contemplating. We are almost certain to lose that friendship, and it is going to bring China and the United States a lot closer together. I think they have the advantage over us even now. I do not pretend to speak with authority on this special point, but such is the impression reading has given me, and reason does prevail upon me to say that, by taking this course, we are going to give the United States a decided advantage in her influence in China. We should not do so. Our interests there are equal to those of the United States; the importance of the Chinese trade and the goodwill of China are very great.

Canada's special interest in British-American relations.

I come now to the subject of British-American relations. Canada does not claim that in the general question of the renewal or the non-renewal of this Treaty her voice must be specially heard. Not at all. The Empire is concerned as an Empire, and so is every part. But as regards this aspect, its effect on British-American relations, we do feel that we have a special right to be heard. We say that because we know, or ought to know, the United States best, and because in the continuance and improvement of our relationship with them we have a vital concern. If from any cause, or from the initiation of any disastrous policy, we should become involved in worse relationships than we are now, Canada will suffer most of all. And if, in the last awful event—God forbid it should ever come!—we reach the penalty of war, Canada will be the Belgium. Consequently, in the preservation and improvement of that relationship we are eagerly, critically concerned. But we view this question not from the standpoint of the United States, we view it from this standpoint, that if, as I believe, the Foreign Secretary is sincere when he says that British-American friendship is the pivot of our world policy, it follows that in determining the wisdom from our own point of view of any engagement a major consideration must be its probable effect on that friendship.

Renewal unsatisfactory to United States.

From the beginning of the discussion I know that the Foreign Secretary has stated that any renewal should be in a form satisfactory to the United States, and that we must carry that country with us in any course that we take. Well, I am going to say this. I do not believe that it is possible to have an agreement in any form at all, however negative, that will be really satisfactory to the United States. I do not say that it will be impossible to have an agreement to which the United States Government would be compelled to admit that it could take no exception, and would say nothing—would stand by. That might be possible, I should think, but that does not mean that the agreement itself is not going to be harmful to our American relations—that it is going to be satisfactory to the American people. I am not intimating for a moment that the United States Government will not speak for the American people. It will speak just as fully as any Government can speak for any people. It will see a certain agreement; it will see that no interest of the United States is affected by the precise terms of the agreement; and it may possibly say: "We cannot take specific exception"; but that any agreement for an exclusive confidential relationship that this country enters into with Japan will not injure our relations with the United States is to my mind impossible, no matter what are its terms. It will be used by every fomentor of strife against Great Britain. The existing engagement has been so used all these years. It had a definite clause in 1911 that it should not involve us in war with the United States, but the very existence of that Treaty has undoubtedly injured British-American relations. Its continuance will do so even more, and for this reason, that the just objects, which were patent to American statesmen before, are not patent to American statesmen now. They may see objects still, and they may say they are good objects—I doubt if they will say they are sufficient—but they are not of the character, the imminence and the strength of those that animated us before. If we now in this new state of affairs renew a confidential and exclusive relationship with Japan it is wholly impossible to argue convincingly, to my mind, that it is not going to affect detrimentally our relations with the United States, no matter how steadfastly the British Government sets its face to keep those relations good.

The American Government as much as, or more than, any Government in the world is affected by popular opinion, by the necessity of carrying their people with them, and American opinion is bound to be affected by the renewal of these relations with Japan no matter what form that renewal takes, and no matter how earnestly we seek to bring that Republic to our point of view.

Lord Lee: You mean an exclusive relationship?

Mr. Meighen: I mean an exclusive relationship with Japan. There is another reason. When the old Treaties were made there were five, perhaps six, Great Powers—you might say more; now there are three Great Powers, powers of the first order and strength, and those are Japan, Great Britain and the United States. Does it stand to reason that two of these can group themselves together in a special relationship in a sphere in which all three have great interests and the third be unaffected, the third look with favour upon it? It does not appeal to my reason, I do not think it is possible. They have interests equal to ours in the Far East, in the Pacific. Why then, for the purpose of protecting common interests, for the purpose of holding in good form the situation in the Far East, why should they be left out of any relationship. I cannot see it. I do not doubt for a moment the sincerity, or even the determination, of the Foreign Secretary, that we shall do nothing to antagonise them. I do not doubt that at all, but I think the reincarnation of this agreement is the first step in a journey that may bring us to that result. Suppose we insert a clause that nothing in the Treaty shall lead us into conflict with the United States. In the first place we have that in the present compact, but the report of the discussions in the Japanese Diet indicated that Japanese Statesmen were very careful not to give the effect to the clause that we intended. They did not give full effect to it. But the fact is it was there. There was a clause that guarded us against that awful fate. They know there is again to be such a clause and yet they want the Treaty. Why? I think their objects are clear. They believe that, in the event of a conflict with the United States, they will have us benevolently by their side. Then it is, from their point of view, a contemplatable contest; otherwise it is not. They look undoubtedly for this country to assume a position of benevolent neutrality, if not better. And the whole course of the Alliance will on their part be so conducted as to bring us insensibly into opposition with America. We may not strike the blow, but we may be brought into a position of opposition to American interests. For example, suppose they pursue the course they have pursued; suppose they do no more than they have done all through these twenty years. Does anyone say that will not bring us into conflict with American interests? Undoubtedly it will. We may restrain, we may do all we can. We say now that we have done so to the best of our ability, but there is Korea, there is Formosa, there is Manchuria, there is Shantung. There are the twenty-one demands. They have done all these things during the twenty years, and strive as we will to have the United States people believe that this is all perpetrated with our hand on their collar, we cannot get them so to believe. They will believe it has been done with the connivance of Great Britain, in order to subvert the purposes of the United States, and to give us a greater hold on and enhancement of our eastern interests. Japan expects benevolent neutrality or better if war should come. Besides she will expect our assistance also at the Peace Table, and that is a vital thing as we all know. These advantages are what she is looking for. The American public understand these things, and undoubtedly industrious efforts will be made by the whole army of Junkers or semi-Junkers in powerful positions to influence opinion, to see that the American people understand them, and they are just waiting to start.

Resolution in American Senate for Conference on Reduction of Armaments.

That country has behaved with scrupulous correctness, at least its Government has, up to now. I think the best people are looking to this Conference to take up a position that will enable them to bring about a better state of affairs. The passing of a recent resolution by the American Senate so indicates. The statements that have gone out to the press from Washington confirm this belief. The Government has said nothing, but I feel satisfied that much that has gone out has been inspired, and that convinces me that they would very much like to see a step taken at this Conference of the whole Empire that will open the way to a better friendship. I do not think they want any better as respects European relationships with Great Britain than that accorded to any other country. But I do think we cannot ignore the passing of that remarkable resolution by their Senate on the very eve of this Conference. It is the resolution asking for a Conference with Japan and Great Britain looking to a reduction of armaments.

Mr. Massey: That has not been turned down.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Meighen: I am saying that the time chosen for the passing of that resolution indicates that they are watching the course of this Conference very carefully.

Now, it is said that we should know first of all before we go into Conference as to the Far East and before we lose the concrete source of strength that we are said to have in this Alliance, what is going to be done about armaments and navies. And, as Mr. Massey says, we have not turned down their proposal. I make the statement that when you enter again into this Alliance you may in effect turn it down. There may be no use talking to the American Government about reducing armaments after you have entered into a special exclusive relationship with their greatest competitor. What position are we in to go to them to discuss reducing armaments? We are in a good position if we do not re-ally ourselves with Japan alone, but if we do, then the race has started. The burden that will as a consequence be on us to secure our possessions in the East will in my judgment be an increasingly heavy burden, and I do not know whether we shall be long able to sustain the competition. They have their programme, and the only opportunity that we shall be likely to have to work in concert with them for a relaxing of this armament burden is the opportunity that presents itself now. What is there to be lost by letting this treaty matter stand until a Conference as suggested is held, or until some sort of arrangement can be made resulting in an understanding? What is to be lost by such a procedure?

No need for Japan to be estranged if Treaty not renewed.

It cannot be argued that unless we renew a faithful and loyal Ally is to be estranged. If so I can only look upon the present state of affairs with despair. If such reasoning is correct, then this engagement is eternal unless terminated by violence or bad faith. We admit that on both sides the objects that we sought are attained. We are on friendly terms. But forsooth under these conditions to suggest non-renewal is to offend Japan and to make a stranger of her and turn her into the ranks of our foes. There is no ground at all for estrangement. It seems to me that there is some reason for America's objection to any exclusive relationship, but there can surely be no valid objection from Japan to a relationship with them but inclusive as well of the United States.

Lord Curzon: I quoted the opinion of our Ambassador. I had to condense my remarks on this point yesterday, but Japan would feel it bitterly and would take real offence in view of what our Ambassador said.

Mr. Meighen: I do not know, and therefore I am not contesting that statement, but any reasons behind such a feeling on her part are not apparent to me at all. I say this, that her position would be unreasonable against a proposal that she and the United States should sit down with us together, so that to whatever is done by one, the other will be a party. That course does not cast out Japan at all. It widens the region of her recognition among the Great Powers. But if she, without the shadow of reason, takes offence, what is to be expected of the United States who are asked to stand out altogether while we renew a special exclusive relationship with Japan? There would be some show of reason behind a sense of estrangement on the part of that country, even though the possibility of antagonism with them is provided against in the arrangement; they are nevertheless out, and they are the same blood as ourselves. I think we should treat Japan just the same as the United States, but no better.

If this renewal is intended to create a combination against an American menace which is to succeed the German menace, which in turn succeeded the Russian menace of 1902, then there can be no hope of ever carrying Canada into the plan.

The claim is sometimes made, sometimes left to be implied, that this Alliance with Japan is to be the pivot of a new world alignment. That only needs to be stated to excite despair in the minds of the people of our country. The future is dark if we have to start now on that path. I can only add that there is no possibility of convincing Canada or making any appeal at all to her with those words in our mouth—none at all. I am not saying that other reasons for renewal may not be adduced, but this implication of providing against a possible menace in America cannot carry conviction. We ourselves have got along with the United States for 100 years, and have overcome many difficulties, and we meet there a spirit which convinces us that we can still get along.

Canadian position.

I addressed a cablegram to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in February last, outlining the position that we felt then this matter was in and the course it should take. I stated that the success of the Alliance, so far as China was concerned, had not been impressive, that the objects for which it was created and continued no longer existed, and that, on the other hand, the objections that had some force at the time of the conclusion of the three Treaties, had now far greater force. I took the stand that it would be wise to seek some other expedient rather than the renewing of the Alliance. I suggested at that time that it would be useful for us in Canada, in a purely informal way, to ascertain whether or not the United States would sit down with the British Empire and with the other Powers having special interests in the Pacific and Far East and seek to come to some understanding as to the preservation of those interests, and as to the principles which should actuate the policy of all. The four Powers mentioned were Japan, the United States, the British Empire and China.

As to the composition of the Conference we should of course be quite ready to hear discussion and suggestions as to who should be there, but those were the four proposed. My suggestion was not acceded to. What we felt and said was this, that if we came to this Conference as we come now, not knowing whether the alternative of such a Conference, looking to a tripartite arrangement (or perhaps even wider), was possible or not, we should find ourselves in the position of having no alternative save to renew or terminate. That pass is just where we seem to be. We have not much time. I did not know before that steps had been taken by way of communication to the League of Nations, or rather by way of communication with Japan and disclosure to the League of Nations, that amount really to a denunciation of the Treaty unless it is by concrete act renewed.

Mr. Balfour: I am not sure that I understand that allusion.

Mr. Meighen: I understand from the Foreign Secretary that Japan and Great Britain have agreed and have informed the League of Nations that any renewal must be in terms that will comply wholly with the Covenant of the League of Nations, and that Counsel for the Foreign Office has given the opinion that such arrangement between Japan and Great Britain submitted to the League amounts to a denunciation of the Treaty unless active steps are taken to renew it in some form or other. Therefore the clause that provided that if nothing were done before the 13th July it should extend for another year and be terminable only with a year's notice, does not apply. Unless we act now, so we are told, the agreement falls; thus we are confronted with the difficulty foreshadowed in my cablegram. We have really no time.

Lord Curzon: You have until the 13th October.

Mr. Meighen: I may say in that regard we knew nothing of that extension in Canada.

Question of three months' extension.

Lord Curzon: The arrangements have been going on here and have not been finally concluded, but, as a matter of fact, it is certain that the prolongation of the agreement for three months beyond the 13th July, 1921, will be operative and therefore we have from now until that date within which to decide.

Mr. Meighen: That of course is a prolongation of the Treaty. I have consulted an officer of our External Affairs Department, who states that information that the Treaty had been extended did not reach Canada. Certainly, Canada did not assent to any renewal for three months. He has never seen nor have I seen any notice that such has taken place.

Lord Curzon: The Colonial Secretary is, of course, responsible for communication with you.

Mr. Meighen: Our officer has no recollection of having seen it, nor have I, and I fear the Government of Canada did not receive it. I understood yesterday that Japan has not agreed herself to the renewal for three months, it appears now that that assent will be given. For myself, I would rather see no renewal for three months. In fact, I fear that a renewal will be injurious, injurious to the success of the Conference. I think we should have been in the best position of all, if we had felt out the possibilities and been enabled to hold our Conference prior to the expiry on the 13th July, having made first appropriate communication to all the Dominions and obtained their approval. We should be in much the best position if that had been done. Now I submit it would be better to pursue conversations with the United States at once and with any other nation which the Foreign Secretary thinks should come in, and see if we cannot secure an understanding, or an exchange of notes before the 13th July, or at least before any great time elapses, and before any conceivable harm can result from the expiry of the Treaty. I should think that would be the wisest course we could take now. It seems to me that it is scarcely approaching the matter in the right way to renew the Treaty for a short time and to say to the United States, we are going right on unless you act. Such a method may end all right, but I think it has not such good prospect of success as if we recognise frankly that a new state of affairs exists, that there are not now the same conditions as existed in 1911, that other circumstances calling for some action may be present, but that the old ones have passed away—it would be taking a more propitious course, I say, if we now recognise these truths and declare to the United States that in the presence of this new situation we clearly recognise their equal interest in the Pacific with us, and we ask them to sit down with us and with Japan and come to an understanding. Let us not say to them first that unless they do, we purpose renewing this engagement to which they are not parties at all. I submit to the Conference that what I have outlined is the right course to pursue and I think if any words are necessary to emphasise its rightness they are the words contained in the last message of our own Ambassador at Washington. It is very significant that the previous messages from Sir Auckland Geddes were to the effect that a renewal of a modified agreement would not be badly received by the United States. Now he has changed and I think he is right, undoubtedly right, in his estimate of American opinion and in his recommendation. It will be noted that he communicates to his Government the words of the Secretary of State of the United States. Can we go beyond the Secretary of State on such a question? There can be no doubt that his opinion is that any agreement with Japan will be prejudicial unless the United States join in. His opinion would be best obtained in an informal conversation. There is no doubt that such is his opinion. Surely the Secretary of State is the proper man to express an opinion and the man whose opinion should be accepted by us on such a point. He says, let me repeat, that any exclusive agreement will injuriously affect relations with the United States. I note in the memorandum submitted this morning by the Foreign Secretary outlining his conversation with Mr. Harvey that Mr. Harvey expresses the opinion that there might be an agreement that would be acceptable to the American Government.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Sir A. Geddes' Opinion.

Foreign Secretary's interview with Mr. Harvey.

The memorandum reads: " . . . . If the Conference now sitting in London decided that it was desirable to renew the agreement in some form or another, and we came to the American Government with such an announcement, would the mere fact of renewal, apart from the form in which it took place, be likely to meet with a necessarily unfavourable reception at the hands of the American Government? My position would certainly be complicated if I were to advance upon a field, my mere entrance into which might be the source of misunderstanding and offence.

" Mr. Harvey hastened to assure me that I need entertain no such fears. In America, as in some other countries, there was a great gap between press clamour and the views of the Government. Whatever the decision at which we might arrive in this country, it would be respectfully treated and examined by his Government.

" Further, I put the question—arising out of the suggestion made by President Harding's Administration that it might be desirable to have a discussion with Japan and ourselves as to naval strength in the Pacific—whether the Ambassador thought this covered the whole of the ground suitable for an enquiry, or whether it might not be possible to contemplate an investigation in which the whole future fortunes of the Pacific, political and economic, as well as military and naval, might be passed under review by the various nations concerned, with a view to arriving at some constructive policy for the future. I understood that America was withdrawing her fleet from the Atlantic, convinced that no danger could arise from British rivalry on this side, and that her naval forces were to be concentrated in the future in the Pacific. This meant that the Pacific would speedily become the centre and pivot of world politics, and that it would play an enormous part in the determination of the destinies of the future. In these circumstances it appeared to me that the Powers would do well to consider how they were to conciliate their several interests, apart from those of defence, in that vast area, and how they were to provide for the development without friction or warfare of the immense resources which it possessed. The problem of China alone demanded an exhaustive investigation. Was it not conceivable that some uniformity of policy might be attained, and that the Pacific might be assured of a future that would justify its name?

" The Ambassador replied without any hesitation that he could not imagine anything better than that discussions initiated between the interested Powers should range over this extended area, and he felt confident that no objections would be raised by his Government should such a proposal be made.

"Altogether, his conversation, although it was necessarily neither detailed nor specific, left me with a favourable impression as to the probable attitude of the American Government, and convinced me that absolute candour between us and them will be the wisest policy to pursue."

Relations with America will suffer from renewal of Treaty.

My comment on that extract is this. If it means anything as reflecting the real opinion of the American Government and people it is opposed to the judgment of their Secretary of State, definitely opposed. There is no reconciling them at all. If it only means that it would be hopeless to ask the assent of the United States officially to it, then the Ambassador may be quite correct, and certainly I am bound to respect his view. But that is very different from saying it would not injuriously affect relations with the United States. He does not go that far. Nor, if he had ventured to, can the Ambassador be heard to say that renewal would be, in fact, an agreeable thing to the American Government, because the opinion of the Secretary of State of the United States is a higher one than his in that regard. Consequently out of both communications it must appear that we have everything to lose, as far as American relations are concerned, by renewing the Treaty in any form.

Impression that American Ambassador considered renewal probable.

Lord Curzon: It is very difficult to condense into a few sentences the impression left by a conversation, but I ought to say that the impression left upon me by the American Ambassador yesterday afternoon was not at all in consonance with the view contained in the telegrams from the United States. If Mr. Harvey had desired to represent to me that the state of feeling there was so strong that the renewal of the Treaty would not be tolerated, he had abundant opportunity for doing so. He did not take it. On the contrary, he seemed to think it the most natural thing in the world. We should have friendly discussions in that case. He has come here charged with the policy of closer friendship between his country and ourselves, and had he felt that here in the gateway stood an obstacle, stood an angel with the "sword of flame," he surely would have told me so. He did not say so. He said, "Any time you wish to discuss with me any question, I shall be delighted to do so." I did not push it further than that. But certainly the whole tone of the man, and the character of what he said was far more friendly than anything I had been led to expect, or than Sir Auckland Geddes' telegrams would have caused me to anticipate.

Need for Tripartite Arrangement.

Mr. Meighen: Is that not what I am urging? Their attitude is friendly. They desire to be more so; and this message is most certainly clear that there should be a tripartite arrangement, or perhaps something wider, but something in which the United States is a party. Therefore, pursue that course. But if not, and there is another agreement between us to which they are not a party, it will be unfavourably regarded by the United States. If the Ambassador had intimated otherwise would he not be in direct conflict with the expression of opinion by Mr. Hughes? And in that event are we not bound to take Mr. Hughes's opinion?

Lord Curzon: He did not go so far as that.

Communications regarding three months' extension of Treaty.

Mr. Lloyd George: I do not wish to interrupt you, but I was very disquieted by your statement that we had not informed you of our intention to propose to ask the Japanese Government to prolong the agreement for three months. I felt that it was my fault if that was the case, because the previous communication had come from me, and I felt that I ought to have informed you. I was under the impression that I had, and if I had not I certainly owed you in Canada an apology. But I find on the 26th April I sent you a message, in which I said: "Your Government may rest assured that until the June Meeting of the Imperial Cabinet, the question of renewal in any form of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance will be left entirely open. As an act of courtesy to the Japanese Government, and in deference to your apprehensions, the former has been informed that until the future policy of the Empire has been decided upon by the Imperial Cabinet, no decision can be reached; and in our judgment neither promptitude of decision nor freedom of action will in any way be compromised by awaiting this discussion. In the meantime, we propose to ask the Japanese Government, since it would be impossible to communicate the decision before the date of the expiry of the present Treaty in July, to agree to prolong for another three months the present agreement."

Mr. Meighen: I now recall that, and I am sure that we received it. I overstated the matter if I said that we had no communication of the intention.

Mr. Lloyd George: That was in April. I felt that I ought to have informed you, and I was under the impression that I had. Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Meighen: We did not communicate agreeing to a renewal in any form, whether for three months or any time. Neither did that message amount to a submission to us of the question. I remember that was at the end of your reply to my second cablegram.

Mr. Hughes: It was understood that we should come here to deal with it. What is the good of dealing with a thing that has ceased to exist? The question was the renewal.

Mr. Lloyd George: This is what I said: "In the meantime, we propose to ask the Japanese Government, since it would be impossible to communicate the decision before the date of the expiry of the present Treaty in July, to agree to prolong for another three months the present agreement."

Mr. Hughes: That is an extension without prejudice

Mr. Meighen: A statement of intention.

Mr. Lloyd George: It was done in order to give us a free hand here, with a view not to prejudice the decision of the Imperial Conference, so as to give us plenty of time to consider it carefully.

Mr. Hughes: If that had not been done, what would be the position to-day?

Mr. Lloyd George: I think we made it clear. I do not think that there was any objection or protest received from any of the Dominions to the proposed extension for three months.

Mr. Meighen: I want to say a few words in reply. If a proposal had been submitted for our approval, probably we would have objected. Perhaps, as it was, we should have replied and objected, but we did not carry our communications any farther as a matter of fact.

America should have been consulted before three months' renewal.

It would have been much better in my judgment to have ascertained in good time the United States attitude towards a Conference. Where are we now? We have an agreement, say, for three months more. In the meantime, the old Treaty stands and we are in communication, say, with America, in regard to a Conference. What is to happen finally to the agreement if the Conference results in one thing, if it results in another thing? We cannot be in Conference with you to consider what should be done. We may be at the Conference with America; I do not know, of course, whether it will take the form of a Conference at which men will sit round a table, or whether an attempt will be made through Ambassadors to reach identic notes, or what may take place. But there are a dozen different results that may come. Now then, suppose we are in the presence of one of those results, and the question comes, what shall be done? We cannot meet in conference here again to decide it. So it seems to me that the maintenance of the Treaty pending a Conference may mean virtually eliminating the voice of the Dominions from the question, that is to say, in so far as that voice may, as at a Conference, be adequately expressed.

Mr. Balfour: There is one question I should like to ask Mr. Meighen. In one of the most important passages of your speech you have said this: "How can America, which is one of the three Great Naval Powers in the Pacific, Japan and ourselves being the other two, look with favour on a confidential and exclusive relationship—some phrase of that sort—between those two Powers, from which she herself was excluded?" Have you any ground for thinking that America would like to be a third party to an agreement?

Probability of America favouring the Tripartite Agreement.

Mr. Meighen: I hoped to have that ground. That was the object of the communication I made to the Prime Minister, but in deference to his desire nothing whatever was done towards ascertaining the attitude of the United States.

Mr. Balfour: I am thinking of public opinion in America, which is what you especially appealed to.

Mr. Meighen: I have no doubt at all that that is correct and I am confirmed in such opinion by the Secretary of State of the United States. I wish for no better confirmation.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Balfour: They would not contemplate a tripartite arrangement?

Mr. Meighen: What I meant to say was that they would not look with favour upon a bipartite arrangement.

Mr. Balfour: Yes; but have you any ground for thinking they would agree to the alternative course of a Tripartite Agreement?

Mr. Meighen: I cannot bring any argument to bear upon that.

Mr. Balfour: But what is your view?

Mr. Meighen: My view is that they would.

Mr. Massey: That they would favour a Tripartite Agreement?

Mr. Meighen: I think the prospect would be quite hopeful for some kind of participation on their part in a broad, inclusive arrangement that need not take the shape of a formal or rigid Treaty; but I cannot say definitely.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Prime Minister. I think we are all indebted to the Foreign Secretary for the very complete review of the position in which we stand in regard to Japan and to a renewal of the Alliance. He has presented with admirable impartiality the position from both points of view and I thought his presentations had exhausted the possibilities of the position so far as his presentation was concerned. But Mr. Meighen has shown that this is not so. Mr. Balfour has explained how the renewal of the Treaty will be affected by the League of Nations Covenant. This morning we have received a copy of a draft telegram from Lord Curzon to Sir Auckland Geddes in which the Foreign Secretary repeated the substance of a conversation which he had had with the Ambassador of the United States on this matter. We have all the facts before us, and understand the position thoroughly. At least, that is what I should have said yesterday. But Mr. Meighen has shown us that there is another side, which he has presented with considerable force, and that side seems, if we are to accept Mr. Meighen's point of view, to exclude even consideration of any other. What, in fact, Mr. Meighen has said is this. He says we ought not to renew this Alliance—I leave his subsidiary arguments on one side for the moment—because America does not desire us so to do. Here, before we consider whether this is a sufficient reason for non-renewal, we naturally ask ourselves how does Mr. Meighen know that this is so? The official information that we have had from the Foreign Secretary does not at all support that view. Mr. Meighen's reply to this is direct and to the point. He says that the voice of the Ambassador, or even of the Government of Washington, is not the voice of America. Naturally we are very anxious to hear the voice of America. But when there are many voices, to which shall we pay heed? Last night, so we are informed in the press this morning, the representative of the State of Virginia, speaking at a function at which Mr. Churchill was present, assured us that the utterances which Mr. Meighen regards as the voice of America should be wholly disregarded.

Difficulty of knowing American opinion.

Mr. Meighen: You have mistaken what I said. I did not say the opinion of the Ambassador was to be disregarded. I said the opinion of the Secretary of State was the highest opinion on that subject I could wish for.

Mr. Hughes: If I misquote you the blame is not wholly mine; but we will leave that. What I intended to say is this, that we are asked by Mr. Meighen to disregard the views expressed by the American Ambassador on a matter on which he is surely entitled to be heard, and to listen to what Mr. Meighen calls the "Voice of America." We are told that if we do renew this Treaty we shall certainly prevent those friendly relations which now exist with America becoming still more friendly, or even turn her from a friend into an enemy, and in short, we shall do a thing which no citizen of any part of this Empire desires to do. If that be the natural and inevitable effect of a renewal of the Treaty, clearly we ought to hesitate and weigh well the position before we act. But is the position as Mr. Meighen put it? I do not think it is. I listened, as well as I was able, to Mr. Meighen's argument. It is quite obvious that his views, as the views of all men, are coloured, like the dyer's hands, by what they work in. We all naturally reflect our environment. Mr. Meighen's most certainly reflect his. The policy he thinks right is one which the "Voice of America" would acclaim. But what we have to ask ourselves is this: Is this Empire of ours to have a policy of its own, dictated by due regard to its own interests, compatible with its declared ideals, of which it has no reason to be ashamed, and from which it has deviated as little as any nation, or is it to have a policy dictated by some other Power? That is what we must decide. Now let me ask Mr. Meighen this very simple question.

Need for Empire policy.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Let us assume that the course that he would have us follow is urged upon the United States of America; that they should mould their policy as the voice of Britain demands; that they should so order their conduct, and have regard to our lightest word, lest anything should offend our delicate susceptibilities, that, in short, they should refrain from saying and doing those things which, although very advantageous to themselves, might possibly offend us. I want to ask Mr. Meighen whether he thinks such a course would find general acceptance in America, whether it would be even accepted by those who he says are not the rulers or spokesmen of America—I mean the Government. I do not think it would. Why, then, should we do so? I want Mr. Meighen to try and put himself in the place of the Representatives of the other parts of this Empire and to remember that we are here trying to evolve a policy for the Empire as a whole. Mr. Meighen said—and I am sure we were very glad to hear him say so—that he did not ask that Canada's voice should be heard to the exclusion of others or above others. We admit willingly and freely that Canada's interest in this question is great, but certainly it is not greater, than Australia's; in fact, I think it would be very easy to show Mr. Meighen that, while with him, the question is: How shall this question be resolved so as not to excite criticism in the United States of America and so affect public opinion in Canada; with us the position is different. It takes on another and more menacing aspect. Mr. Meighen has not suggested for a moment—not directly, at any rate—that one of the consequences to Canada of refusing to renew the Treaty might be to endanger its national safety. He does not suggest that, for a moment, for its borders march for nearly 4,000 miles with those of a nation of 110,000,000 of people. He did not say so, but it is a fact, and one of the most striking proofs of the inconsistencies of mankind, that the nation primarily responsible for that League of Nations which was to banish war for ever, is now committed to the most ambitious naval programme the world has yet seen. By its actions it is clear that it fears attack, and is so doing all that is humanly possible to protect itself against any aggression, from any quarter, but in particular from Japan. It is most important to note this. Mr. Meighen says we should not renew this Treaty with one of the other two Great Naval Powers, and then seek a Conference on the question of disarmaments. We should not go into Court with clean hands. By renewing our Alliance with the most formidable Naval Power except America immediately before we go into Conference, the object of which was the peace of the world, through disarmament or the limitation of armaments, we should prejudice the chances of agreement and be open to the charge of inconsistency. In substance, that is what he says.

Well, what will happen if we do not make this Alliance with Japan? Does Mr. Meighen suggest for one moment that America will be more ready to discuss disarmanent with us? Does he suggest that she will abandon that naval programme of hers? Does he suggest that our refusal to renew the Treaty that has existed now for nearly twenty years, that has never been responsible for a breach of the world's peace during the whole of that period, which, indeed, has done something to preserve it, and which excited little or no attention and no objection in America until the moment when she resolved to be a Great Naval Power, will ensure the cordial co-operation of America in a policy of disarmament? I do not believe so for one moment. Now, I want to put this to you. I speak now, perhaps, for others round this table besides myself—but they can exclude themselves if they so desire. We are ready to talk disarmament with America any day—to-morrow, without reservation or qualification of any sort or kind. She has been invited to discussion with us. The Prime Minister said some time ago that Britain was ready to discuss the matter with America at any time. He repeated that yesterday. And that is the policy, not only of Britain, but of the Empire. I have no doubt that he would repeat it to-day if he thought that such a repetition was called for.

Doubtful whether refusal to renew would help Disarmament.

Now, what has been the response of America to this invitation? No doubt President Harding has said something, but it can hardly be said to have exhausted the possibilities of the situation, and certainly it did not amount to an acceptance of the invitation. On the other hand, the naval programme has gone on. The Senate has approved of the greater part of the necessary expenditure. This, then, is the position which confronts us, and if we are asked, what now stands between us and that positive assurance of the peace of the world for which the world is so anxiously waiting, what must the answer be? It is that America shall accept our invitation and agree with us upon a basis for the limitation of armaments. If America and Britain were in agreement on a practical means which would ensure this, I would not waste the thousandth part of a minute over the question of the

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance. Would I prefer the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty to an arrangement, which would put an end to the suicidal policy of competing armaments? I say No! a thousand times No! But no such choice is given us. And so we must perforce face the position as it is. Yet Mr. Meighen has tried to create an impression in the minds of the Conference that the renewal of this Alliance was an obstacle to disarmament, and that our renewal would be quite incompatible with our expressed desire for a Conference with America for that purpose. For this reason Mr. Meighen says we ought not to renew it. But even supposing that the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty is incompatible with our invitation to America to discuss disarmament, and I do not admit it—it is certainly not more so than is America's own attitude in regard to this question. Here is a nation responsible—more than any other nation—for the Covenant, that imposing and sacrosanct instrument, which was to ensure the peace of the world and banish war for ever from the earth; yet from which, amongst all the civilised nations, excepting only Bolshevik Russia, she alone has remained aloof, and which she has now condemned with bell, book and candle, thus crowning her contemptuous rejection of the only existing means of preserving the world's peace.

Yet Mr. Meighen not only condones but extols America, and condemns Britain. If the League of Nations which was created at her instance to ensure the world's peace fails, at whose door is the failure to be laid? Not at ours for we are within its fold, but surely at America's for she has rejected it. And as I have said, she says to the nations of the earth who looked to her to lead them into the paradise of everlasting peace, that she proposes to have the largest navy in the world. Contrast then her acts with her words and her policy with that of the Empire. We shall surely not suffer by comparison. Say, if you like, "We desire peace but we are going to have an Alliance with Japan." But do not forget that we invited America to discuss disarmament, to ally herself with us: but in response to these invitations so far she has done nothing. Mr. Meighen says that the renewal of the Treaty will prejudice us when we come to a Conference with America. I do not think so. We should find that the Treaty with Japan would be automatically denounced if the world agreed upon disarmament, or if such an arrangement with America is arrived at as would enable us to take definite steps for the limitation of armaments. But these things are as yet far off: they are dim shadows. It is in such a world that Mr. Meighen has been moving this morning. What does he offer us? Something we can grasp? What is the substantial alternative to the renewal of the Treaty? The answer is, that there is none. If Australia was asked whether she would prefer America or Japan as an Ally, her choice would be America. But that choice is not offered her. As against the substance she is offered the shadow. She calls to America saying "Here are we with a coast-line of 13,000 miles, with a great continent to defend, within three weeks of a thousand millions of Asiatics; will you come to us if we call?" But to the call of our young democracy in its remote isolation, there is no answer. Now then let me speak plainly to Mr. Meighen on behalf of Australia. I, for one, will vote against any renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance upon one condition and one only, and that is that America gives us that assurance of safety which our circumstances absolutely demand. Mr. Meighen has that assurance—his geographical and political circumstances are such that he has at his very door a powerful neighbour which for its own sake, if not for his, will defend him. America herself is invulnerable: her coast-line might be attacked, but her hinterland can never be occupied. And it may be said that in this war between Japan and America—this war which some believe must come—neither Power can destroy the other. The geographical position and general circumstances of each are such as to preclude this. Mr. Meighen has not touched upon two facts which stand out; one, that America's real objection to this Treaty in any form is the fear of Japan; and the other, the hatred of Britain by certain sections in America.

Australia's position.

Mr. Meighen: Who are the Asiatics to whom you refer?

Mr. Hughes: Look at the map.

Mr. Meighen: A map is a map. Is it China?

Mr. Hughes: There is China, there is Japan. If you will look at the map you will understand something of the circumstances of Australia.

Mr. Meighen has suggested we ought to postpone the renewal, but we have already done so. There was a postponement originally of a year. Was it not so, Lord Curzon?

Lord Curzon: That was originally suggested—a year was originally suggested, and then we fell back out of deference to this Conference to a suggestion of three months.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Hughes: Very well. Ample notice has been given to the whole world of our intention to consider this question at this Conference; ample opportunity has been given to America and to every other nation to express their opinions with regard to it. Lord Curzon has given us the substance of his conversation with the American Ambassador, and has told us that, if we decide to renew the Treaty in any form, that he will commence official conversations with the Ambassador to ascertain what form America desires it should take, or if she can bring herself to approve of it in any form. This brings us to a point upon which Mr. Meighen was very emphatic. He said, if I understood him aright, that there is no form in which it would be acceptable to America. Mr. Meighen may be quite right—his knowledge of that country is incomparably superior to mine, I do not pretend to interpret the opinion of America—but I do pretend to understand something about the opinions of my own country. These are very clear and definite, but no clearer or definite than those of any other part of the Empire placed in similar circumstances. And the policy approved by this Conference, must be one which is best for the British Empire as a whole. Now, first and foremost we have to consider what is necessary for the security of the Empire. It is therefore impossible to decide this question without considering its relation to naval defence. Now let me repeat once more that I desire, above all things, disarmament or some arrangement for the limitation of armaments. But if that be impossible, if having done everything that men can do to achieve this, by a general invitation to the world and a direct invitation to America, to discuss and decide this question, and having failed, what are we to do? If America will neither discuss it, or, discussing it, cannot agree either upon disarmament or some basis for the limitation of disarmament, then we have to face the facts as they now are. And what are they? This Empire rests on sea power, and while sea power exists as the most potent factor in determining the destiny of mankind, we must see to it that the navy is adequate to our circumstances. That, shortly, is the position. I want the Conference to consider it in its application to Australia. If we do not renew this Treaty with Japan, where will Australia stand? If you will look, Sir, at the map you will see the position that Australia occupies. It is a great Continent. We know that the dominant and eternal factor in determining the destinies of mankind is not the ambition of kings or these minor causes to which war has been attributed, but to economic circumstances. Now these circumstances are operating in Japan to-day. She has a rapidly increasing population crowded together in a scattered group of small islands. She must burst the bonds that cramp her natural growth. This is the explanation of her great army and of the ever-increasing strength of her navy. This is the reason she is spending more than half her income on naval and military armaments. But she cannot continue indefinitely, nor for any length of time, this tremendous drain upon her resources. Her ambitious projects must be realised in the near future or the hour in which realisation is possible will pass. What, then, is likely to happen? Will anybody who looks at that map say that, living as we do, remote from Europe, from the Western World, occupying a rich and almost empty Continent, dependent absolutely on sea power, not only for our prosperity, which comes from the sale of goods in overseas markets, but dependent for our very existence on sea power, say that it would be wise for us to alienate by a rude and abrupt refusal to renew this Treaty, our nearest neighbour, a great and powerful nation, whose circumstances compel her to seek new territory for her overcrowded population, and who has behind her effective means of making us feel the full force of her resentment.

Empire Naval Defence and renewal of Treaty interdependent.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Hughes, I think it is very important that Mr. Meighen should hear this, and he has gone off to luncheon with the Prince of Wales, but I think it is very important that he should hear it. I think we had better adjourn here and this last argument I hope you will repeat later. I am sure Mr. Meighen would like to hear it.

Mr. Hughes: I would like to repeat it.

Mr. Lloyd George: So I suggest that we adjourn until—what time would suit?

Mr. Massey: Any time will suit me.

Mr. Lloyd George: If we meet here at 4 o'clock we should have two hours. You will resume then?

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Prime Minister, when we adjourned I was dealing with that part of Mr. Meighen's argument which particularly referred to the interpretation of the opinion of America, and that led me to consider in greater detail than I had previously done, the effect upon Australia, as part of the Empire, of a refusal to renew the Treaty. Mr. Meighen being called away, you asked me to repeat what I said during his absence. I have not been able to look over the whole of the shorthand report of what I said.

Mr. Lloyd George: That argument you developed being about what would have happened during the war.

Australia's position if Treaty is not renewed.

Mr. Hughes: Yes. I think I can just read a few short extracts from the transcript of the shorthand notes of what I said, and then develop it further. Mr. Meighen said that there was no form in which the Treaty would be acceptable to America. Perhaps Mr. Meighen is quite right. I do not pretend to interpret the opinion of America, but I do understand something about the opinions of my own country, which are clear and definite. They were formed by the circumstances in which Australia found herself, and were, as I think, the best policy for the Empire as a whole. It is important to remember that this question cannot be considered apart from its relation to the naval defence of the Empire. Let me repeat once more that I desire above all things disarmament, or some arrangement for limitation of armaments. But supposing that we had done everything possible by approaching America, by giving her an open and direct invitation to discuss how this could be achieved, and that she would not confer, or after discussion would or could not agree to some basis for the limitation of armaments, then, in what position should we find ourselves if we had refused to renew the Treaty with Japan, if we had alienated her support, if we had turned a friend into an enemy? Should we have to wait in dangerous isolation, groaning under the burden of ever increasing armaments until the world agreed to a binding agreement of disarmament operating simultaneously on all the great naval Powers, including the United States of America, Japan and ourselves?

We have to face the facts as they are. If we do not renew this Treaty with Japan, what will the position be? Look at the map, and note the geographical position of Australia. A great continent with 5½ millions of population, and Japan a small group of islands, densely populated and occupying a dominating strategic position, as its nearest neighbour. The population of Japan is increasing with great rapidity; the economic pressure upon the means of subsistence is daily becoming more intense. The position is unstable, it cannot continue for any length of time. Japan cannot continue to spend half her total revenue on military and naval armaments. She must expand. She is the strongest naval Power in the Pacific. In the face of these facts is it to be wondered at, that Australia views with apprehension the possibility of the Japanese Treaty being denounced? Australia depends for her prosperity upon the sale of her products overseas. Sea power is the foundation of our existence. What should we gain by this abrupt and rude refusal to renew the Alliance with our present Ally? No hint of any intention not to renew it has been given. It has been suggested, not officially of course, that we propose to renew. Definite opinions in favour of a renewal have been publically made by the representatives of Australia and New Zealand. Yet now it is proposed that we should throw over an Ally of many years standing, who, during the war, played a useful part. It is not so much what she did, but what she could have done if she had, instead of marching side by side with Australia and New Zealand, taken her stand by the side of Germany.

Look at the map and ask yourselves what would have happened to that great splash of red right down from India through Australia down to New Zealand, but for the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. How much of these great rich territories and portions of our Empire would have escaped had Japan been neutral? How much if she had been our enemy? It is certain the naval power of the Empire could not have saved India and Australia and still been strong enough to hold Germany bottled up in the narrow seas.

That, Mr. Prime Minister, is the position with which I was dealing when we adjourned and which you asked me to repeat for Mr. Meighen's benefit.

Position of Australia similar to greater portion of Empire.

I do not know that I can put the position of Australia towards this Treaty, which is one very similar to that of the other Dominions, except perhaps that of Canada, without some reference to the effects of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance upon the war. Nothing is more certain than that victory was due in no small measure to the substantial help that the Dominions and India were able to give Britain. So much is generally admitted. But not one soldier could have been brought across the seas but for the service rendered by Japan who interpreted her obligations under the Treaty, on the whole, liberally enough. Without her help it is most improbable that the Allies would have triumphed over the Central Powers. Had she elected to fight on the side of Germany, we should most certainly have been defeated. So if to-day we are here discussing the question of the renewal of the Treaty, we, as victors in a life and death struggle, must not forget that we owe victory to the fact that Japan was our Ally. Now this fact applies to the Empire as a whole, but it applies with greater force to Australia and New Zealand. It is very obvious what defeat would have meant to us, and so it is not to be wondered at that we are a little perturbed at the presentation of the case for non-renewal by Mr. Meighen. Let me repeat once more that which I said in the Parliament of the Commonwealth before leaving for England, that Australia would do nothing which would range her as an enemy of the United States. We desire to be—we are resolved to be—friends with America. That is a clear and definite statement, without any reservations, of the attitude of Australia towards the United States.

We find ourselves, therefore, in a most embarrassing position, charged as we are with the solemn duty of endeavouring to do our best for the Empire, and we must not fall short of doing that which is necessary, even in the most trying circumstances. It is most embarrassing that we have to examine the position from other points of view than those with which Mr. Meighen favoured us, but there is no alternative, it must be done. Mr. Meighen has presented the case from the standpoint of Canada, which as I have said, reflects the opinion, or what Mr. Meighen believes to be the opinion, of America. The circumstances of Australia are very different from those of Canada, and I feel it necessary to set forth our position quite clearly. I hope Mr. Meighen will not think that I pretend to have escaped the effects of my environment any more than he has done. I hope, however, that I shall not lay myself open to a charge of a narrow or biassed view. For I venture to say that the circumstances of Australia, particularly its complete dependence on sea-power, are common to the greater part of the Empire, and that, therefore, the consequences of non-renewal of the Treaty upon Australia would be felt by the Empire as a whole, Canada perhaps excepted.

Renewal not incompatible with League of Nations.

Now Mr. Meighen's argument, which was presented as I have said with great force and ability, turned wholly upon the effect of the renewal of this Treaty upon the United States. But the onus is on those who wish to disturb a state of things which has existed for nearly twenty years, to show why we should change. I submit with all respect to Mr. Meighen that he has not made out his case. Let us consider his argument. Mr. Meighen has not suggested that the renewal of the Treaty in some form is incompatible with the League of Nations. Mr. Balfour has shown us that it need not be incompatible with the Covenant either in its present form, or in the amended form as outlined by him yesterday. I am quite willing that the Treaty should comply with either the Covenant as it is, or as amended, but not that it should depend upon either alternative in particular. That is to say if by any chance the amendment should not be approved by the League then the Treaty should adapt itself to comply with the requirements of the Covenant as it stands. If the amendment is approved then it should comply with the Covenant as amended. That being so, let us see what this involves. The League of Nations stands, if anything does, for all those principles upon which Mr. Meighen has been so insistent this morning. The peace of the world, disarmament, and end of the suicidal struggle for naval supremacy which preceded the great war and which is now being renewed—a policy which has reduced the world to a state of chaos and which, if persisted in, will destroy civilisation—for all these things the League of Nations stands. We are members of the League. The United States is not. The declared policy of the United States is to build the biggest navy in the world. Surely then we are not to be charged, we who are members of this League, we who propose a Treaty which is compatible with the Covenant and of which the League will approve; we, who urge a limitation of armaments, are not, because we seek to renew a Treaty which has been in existence for twenty years, to be charged with something that will disturb the peace of the world or will delay for one day the happy consummation that the whole world desires! If such a charge is to be against anyone, it certainly will not lie against us. The renewal of the Treaty in the form we desire is not inconsistent with the Covenant of the League of Nations, with the maintenance of the world's peace, with still closer friendship with the United States of America, with disarmament, or the limitation of armaments. What reason then is there that can be urged against its renewal? Mr. Meighen would have us believe, that in some way or other, renewal would be a menace to the world's peace. But what are the facts?: for it is no use beating the air. The maintenance of the world's peace is above all things that which we earnestly desire, but how is it to be maintained? There is a general consensus of opinion amongst civilised peoples, that in some way or other the Great Powers should show that they have learned something from the Great War and are worthy of the awful price paid for victory, by coming to some arrangement that will preserve the world's peace. Well we have joined the League of Nations. We are willing to discuss disarmament with the United States of America. We have said to America, "We will discuss with you the question of disarmament, and we will do so quite independent of the League of Nations, or whether any nations join with us, and you, or not." What can we do more than we have done. Mr. Meighen tells us that the renewal of the Treaty will be objectionable to America. I should like to hear from Mr. Meighen, the facts being as I have stated, why this should be so. He says it does not matter in what form we renew it, it will still be objectionable. He does not deny that the Treaty may be so formed that the Government of America may say "There is nothing inimical to our interests in the Treaty." But even so, he says that this nebulous, intangible thing which he calls "the voice of the people of America" will regard it as a hostile act, and evidence of an outward and visible sign of our intention to do something which will militate against America's interests. It is very difficult to deal with such an argument, because in the very nature of things who is able to say what is the voice of the people of America? It is said that the voice of the people is the voice of God.

Difficulty of knowing real American opinion.

Mr. Massey: Not always.

Mr. Hughes: Precisely, you cannot tell whether the God speaks or merely rumbles in uneasy slumbers, or peradventure, speaks with a forked tongue saying many and quite inconsistent things. But against Mr. Meighen's hypothetical voice of America, we have this definite and clear statement by the American Ambassador, who is if anyone is, the voice of America, the authoritative voice of the people, and the Ambassador says that he is willing to discuss the question of renewal with the Foreign Secretary. I submit that his voice is the only one we ought to heed. In any case why should the renewal of the Treaty be regarded by America as an unfriendly act? It has existed twenty years. The Foreign Secretary reminded us yesterday that America has never regarded it as an Alliance hostile to her interests until quite recently. I cannot place my finger just now on the precise terms of Lord Curzon's reference.

Lord Curzon: It was the reference to Sir Auckland Geddes' communication to us in November 1920.

Mr. Hughes: Thank you. There has been as everybody knows an election in America quite recently which resulted in the most overwhelming victory for the Party whose spokesman the American Ambassador is. Yet Mr. Meighen contends that he is not charged with authority to speak on behalf of the people. Of course, it is impossible to have relations or to come to any understanding with regard to disarmament or anything else with a country whose foreign policy is built upon the shifting quicksands of faction or public opinion, resting upon or controlled by faction. I am very much afraid that what Mr. Meighen would have us believe as the voice of America is something very different. We have seen only the other day the clearest possible proof of the fact that America speaks with two voices. One voice assures us—and I reminded Mr. Meighen of this before the adjournment—that the great heart of America beats in sympathy with us; the other voice denounces us and all our works. Mr. Meighen would have us believe that if we will but do this thing, if we repulse and brush aside contemptuously an Ally of twenty years standing who is at this moment the second naval power in the world—I speak, of course, of a fleet in being—if we brush aside this Ally whose stronghold occupies strategic positions as regards our Empire, which we cannot and dare not ignore, we shall turn the hymn of hate which this other voice now chants into loud shouts of eternal friendship. I venture to ask Mr. Meighen what substantial thing can we hope for? Mr. Meighen says "You will get the friendship of the great American people." Frankly I do not believe it. Now, Sir, I venture to say that if we do this thing, if we repulse an Ally who stood by us during the critical days of the war, if we bow the knee to faction, if we attempt to interpret the raucous voice of the faction as the voice of the great American people, we shall not only fail to win their friendship, but shall most assuredly bring ourselves into contempt amongst them. How does a strong nation act? It does that which it thinks to be right. It examines all the circumstances and considers the feelings and sentiments, the ambitions, the desires, and the necessities of all mankind. But it acts. It does not go about begging leave to do this and that and postponing day after day and year after year that which, not being done, will involve its own destruction. That is not the way to gain the respect and the alliance of America. Those who are weak have no Allies. And if they are weak through their own vacillation, they deserve none. They will certainly get no Allies whose support can be compared for one moment with that strength inherent in a Power that, having faith in itself and the justness of its motives, takes its own course, guided only by a due regard for its own security and of those basic principles upon which civilisation rests, and in the very vanguard of which the British Empire marches.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

I say, unhesitatingly, that so far from gaining the friendship of that anti-British faction by refusing to renew this Treaty, America will despise us if we do reject this Treaty. When we have done what Mr. Meighen will have us do, he believes we shall have swept away all those clouds of enmity and distrust that warp the judgments of America in regard to ourselves and every act we do. If I thought that by any act of ours we should make America our firm friend and Ally the position would be very different. But I do not believe this will do what we so earnestly desire. For when we have swept this away there remains another which goes infinitely deeper than any objections a certain section of the American people can have to a renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. Does Mr. Meighen say for one moment that the Irish section, and the hostilities of that section and all those sections that group themselves with it, will be materially modified by anything we can do in regard to this Treaty? Does he say that the venomous hatred against Britain that now inspires it will be lessened by a thousandth part by this latest evidence of our having failed to act in a manner compatible with our position and our interests? They will interpret our act as another evidence of our weakness. They will say, "You have done this thing and now this other remains," and so it will go on. These men can never be brought to be friendly with Britain and it is as well that we should recognise this fact at once. There are in America to-day those who are friendly to Britain, those who are bitterly and irreconcilably opposed to her, and a section which stands midway between, apathetic and indifferent, who may be brought to support us or to favour an alliance or an understanding if we but act justly and firmly. I emphasise this last.

We must not only act justly but it is necessary to act as becomes a great Power. Mr. Meighen tells us plainly that we cannot renew this Treaty in any form that will be agreeable to the American people. My answer to Mr. Meighen is that he cannot be in a position to know. With all respect to Mr. Meighen, he is not in a position to know. No man can know. But I say that in twelve months' time, if we renew this Treaty, the position will not have been altered for the worse so far as our relations with America are concerned. For what course do we propose to follow? We propose to consult America, invite her to express her opinion, to be, if she will, a party to it. And this brings me to the point Mr. Meighen made. He said: "You propose to renew a Treaty when the need for it has disappeared; it arose out of the condition of affairs when there were six great Powers, when the condition of Russia and the growing power of Germany made it necessary for us to conserve our interests in the Far East. But now there are only three great naval Powers, and America would regard the grouping of two of them as an evidence of unmistakable hostility to her." Mr. Meighen says this in the face of our declared purpose of expressing in definite terms that this Treaty is not, and must not, be construed in a way unfriendly or hostile to America. As to his other contention it must be said that if the circumstances have changed, the need for this Treaty has not passed away. Mr. Meighen is wrong if he supposes that the only reason why Britain made this Treaty with Japan was because Russia was then a great Power, and as she is so no longer, the need for the Treaty has passed. The Treaty was made to protect the interests of Britain. Now, although the circumstances have changed, the need for protecting British interests remains. Mr. Meighen pushed his argument further, so far indeed that he brought before us a possibility that I had not contemplated. He said: "If you do this thing you must not omit from your calculations the possibility of America ranging herself with Germany and Russia against you." We are asked to abandon an ally who has stood by us, in order that we may please the anti-British faction or at most serve the interests of a Power which we are now told will, if we do not agree to abandon our Ally, do that very thing which Mr. Meighen condemns, namely, form an alliance, but in this case wholly incompatible with the League of Nations, and the maintenance of the world's peace. But why did not

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Meighen push his argument a little further? He told us what the possibilities were if America ranged herself with Russia and Germany, but why did he stop there? Suppose we do spurn Japan, may not America, which as Mr. Meighen says may make alliance with Bolshevik Russia and Germany, ally herself with Japan? We are asked to pursue a policy of dangerous isolation at a moment when we are perfectly incapable of maintaining our interests by such a policy. Turn your friend and ally into an enemy, as you will by a refusal to renew, and where do you stand? What have you done lately? Sir, it is to the eternal credit of Britain that she has taken the lead and set an example to the world in disarmament, while the rest of the world, the other two great naval Powers, were engaging in building greater and greater navies. She has reduced her navy very much below the strength at which it stood at the close of the great war. And even as it stands now, it is too great a burden for Britain to bear.

And yet it is proposed that we should deliberately invite a conflict with another great naval Power on a stage so remote, and at an hour when we are utterly unprepared, when we could not, if we wished, marshal our whole resources—when we could with difficulty hope only just to maintain our own. Does Mr. Meighen deny that this is a possibility which we must face? He tells us that if we renew the Treaty we may have to face an alliance of Germany, Russia and America. Well, if we do not renew does he deny that we may have to fear that Japan either alone or in alliance with other Powers may attack us? I cannot for the life of me understand that those reasons, which Mr. Meighen put forward, are sufficient to compel us or induce us to pursue a policy so fraught with menace to this Empire. When we come to discuss naval policy, we shall see where we are. Look at Hong Kong, Singapore and the East as a whole—look at Australia and New Zealand. We shall have placed before us facts in relation to the naval position to-day: ships, docks, bases, oil and fuel supplies throughout this Empire, and I venture to say that, if nothing else would convince Mr. Meighen, that ought to. We are not to-day in a position to challenge or invite a conflict with a great Power.

Difficult for Japan to continue present Expenditure on Armaments.

Let me emphasise this point; it is impossible that Japan can continue to maintain her present armaments for an indefinite period or, indeed, for any lengthy period. The economic pressure upon her resources grows, and is growing so rapidly that she has everything to gain and nothing to lose, if the blow is ever to be struck, by striking soon. Is it suggested for one moment that the statesmen of Japan would stand idle and wait, while America prepares her great fleet, while she marshals such an overwhelming naval supremacy as would make a conflict impossible, while she builds docks, while she accumulates and stores oil and fuel and prepares for the day? This will take time but in such a race Japan knows very well that eventually she must take second place, she cannot keep pace with America. In the end, she must be overwhelmed by sheer force of numbers and financial resources. Will she then wait or strike sooner and possibly in some other quarter? Japanese statesmen can hardly hesitate between such alternatives. The Japanese people are bearing crushing burdens and it is impossible that these can be increased or be long borne. Now, Mr. Meighen will have us insult, or to put it more mildly, offer a rude rebuff to this proud and powerful nation. He would cast away this substance for the shadow of a better American feeling towards us. It is not suggested for one moment that America will ally herself with us. She will not come into the League; she will not disarm. Now, France and Holland, we have been told by Lord Curzon, regard the renewal of this Treaty in some form with favour. They would regard their position and their interests as being safe under these circumstances.

Opinion of France and Holland.

Lord Curzon: I have had no communication with them, but I believe that to be the case.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, quite so. Very well. Supposing you did not renew it, what is the position of Holland? What is the position of France? Is the world's peace likely to be promoted best by the renewal of this Treaty or its rejection—that is the question.

Japan's ideals not compatible with World Peace.

I have referred to Mr. Meighen's argument that America might conceivably be found ranged against us. I cannot believe that this is possible, but, at any rate, by common consent Mr. Meighen and I are agreed that Japan is a Power whose ideals or ambitions are, or may conceivably be in certain circumstances, incompatible with the preservation of the world's peace. And her circumstances and her power are such that, if a deadly insult like this be offered her, and she finds herself isolated, what is she to do?

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Sir, I certainly think that we shall be building an edifice for the maintenance of the world's peace upon surer foundations if we continue these relations which exist between Japan and ourselves for yet a little while. It may be that, either through the League of Nations, or some arrangement between the Great Powers, the United States, Japan and ourselves may find a simple solution, a basis upon which the world can work for the restoration of normal conditions. At present there is none. I do not hesitate to say that we should be doing an ill turn to Japan if we thus isolated her. How can we best control Japan? The world still shows unmistakable signs of readiness to appeal to force rather than to reason, in spite of the deadly lesson that has been driven home by war and its terrible consequences. We ought either to control Japan as an Ally and friend or as a potential enemy and actual rival. Our interest lies in the preservation of peace. Our circumstances in the Pacific are such that any other suggestion is unthinkable. What are we to do? We are not able to police the Pacific ourselves. Who can and will do so? Who will defend Australia? How is its safety to be assured? Mr. Meighen, perhaps, does not quite appreciate just how Australia stands in this respect, but when I tell him that we devoted to naval and military purposes, including our obligations arising out of the war 70 millions sterling, he will perhaps understand we cannot shoulder any greater burden. If he will look at his own budget and ours he will see what it means to have a great nation like America as his neighbour, under whose wing the Dominion of Canada can nestle in safety.

Continuation of Alliance in some form better guarantee of World Peace.

Australia's current Expenditure on Defence.

Mr. Meighen has spoken about China, and he appeals to us in a way to which we are naturally susceptible. We want to protect the interests of China. It is right that we should respect her integrity and prevent her from exploitation. But how is this to be done? Mr. Meighen spoke as though it was sufficient to wipe away this Treaty, and those interests would be amply safeguarded. But he does not tell us who is going to protect them. Is America going to do it? If so, how? Is she going to do it by appeal to force or to reason? Is she going to have an understanding with Japan? She has recognised that Japan has special interests in China.

Interests of China.

She will not, she cannot, deny that this is so. Well, how is America going to ensure that China's integrity and interests shall be respected? Is she going to enlist us on her side? Is she going to rely on us to coerce Japan if other means fail; to make us, in fact, her Ally for this purpose, or ask us to shoulder the whole burden? There are only two ways by which we or America can exercise some control over Japan; one is through this Treaty. The other alternative is, of course, war. America is not ready for war. We certainly are not. Now, Mr. Meighen ought to have told us how China's interests were going to be advanced by a refusal to renew this Treaty, but he did not do so. No doubt he told us about the rapacity of Japan; about her insatiable ambition. How are these to be checked—by words? Is the "voice of America" going to stand against the Japanese fleets and the Japanese army? Is it going to prevail against the machinations and intrigues of Japan in China, or does he suggest that we should organise in China an army capable of defending China? These things are in the clouds; there is nothing of substance in them. Mr. Meighen has suggested that there should be a Conference of Pacific Powers—he mentioned China, Japan, America and Britain—to solve the problem which he says is insoluble here. But how could a better thing come out of that Conference than out of this? Would America's objection to any arrangement that this Pacific Conference could make be any less than to the renewal of the Treaty? I cannot see it. What is this Pacific Conference to do that this Imperial Conference cannot do? We set out with the express declaration that we will protect China, that we will not only have due regard to the interests of America, but we are prepared to exclude her from it and to protect her interests. I would never agree to a Treaty that did not make it clear that it would never involve us in an unfriendly attitude towards America. As to her trading rights and interests in the Far East, how is the renewal of the Treaty to affect those?

What advantage in Conference of Pacific Powers over Imperial Conference?

Is it suggested that if we do not renew this Treaty, that the policy of Japan in regard to the "Open Door" will be modified? Who is to compel Japan to modify it if she refuses voluntarily to do so? I venture to say that we have been walking this morning—I will repeat what I have said—in a land of shadows. There is no definite tangible thing which we can hold. What is the alternative to the renewal of the Treaty? If I were asked to choose between America and Japan as an Ally I would choose America. But when I am told in the clearest possible way that America will not be an Ally, that she will have nothing to do with European Alliances, or come into the League of Nations, that she will not disarm, that she persists, despite the declaration of ex-President Wilson, in her intention to have the most powerful navy on earth, what are we to do but to continue that Alliance which has been in existence for twenty years and without which we should never have achieved victory?

Recommends immediate renewal of Treaty.

I do not wish to prolong the debate. I must regard Mr. Meighen's presentation of the case as not the case for the Empire, but as the case for the United States of America. I am as warm a friend and as resolute a champion of the Union of English-speaking people as any man. I will yield to none—not even to Mr. Meighen—in my desire to bring this about. But I do not mistake the voice of a noisy anti-British faction in America for the sentiment of that great Republic, and I will not believe that we shall advance the cause of the peace of the world, and promote more friendly relations with the United States of America, by a weakly vacillating policy which seeks always the approval of this faction before we dare pursue a policy founded on justice, compatible alike with the welfare of mankind and the greatness of this Empire. We have been summoned here to formulate a foreign policy which will protect the interests of every part of the British Empire. This we must endeavour to do. I am for the renewal of this Treaty, and I am against delay.

I am for an immediate declaration of our intentions to renew upon terms that will be at once compatible with the League of Nations Covenant, which will give America ample opportunity to be officially consulted and which will exclude specifically and in set terms, the possibilities of our being ranged in hostile array against America in the terms of that Treaty. That is my position, and I venture to say that a further postponement will and can place us in no better position than we are to-day. We have to face the facts as they are. We have to choose between the Ally with whom we have been in close terms for twenty years, who served us well during the war, without whose aid we could not have obtained victory, together with the maintenance of the status quo modified to meet the requirements and the proper representations of the Covenant, as against regard for American interests.

As to the course which Mr. Meighen suggests, I for one, see nothing to be gained by delay and since we have come here to do this thing, I want to say on behalf of Australia that I cannot but venture to hope that this Conference will decide to do something quite definite and that without delay.

South Africa not so closely concerned.

General Smuts: Prime Minister, this discussion has become somewhat controversial, but as one understands how deeply these Dominions who have spoken to-day are concerned in this important question, one can quite understand the sort of language which has been used here. My country is almost entirely outside of the area of this great controversy that has been raised, and, therefore, we can look upon this question from the point of view of greater detachment. The subject is one of the greatest importance, and, listening to the language which has been used here to-day by two of the Dominions, language of the most menacing character, one can understand how far reaching the effects of this whole question must be for the future of the Empire. The language used by these two Prime Ministers is such as to frighten a man who stands outside of this great issue; but looking at the question as a whole, I do not remember in the twelve years that I have taken part in these Empire debates a greater or more difficult, or far-reaching issue being raised for the Empire as a whole than this one. It is not a question merely of the continuance of the Japanese Alliance. The question is much bigger, it raises in a very fundamental form many of the great issues on which the future peace of the world depends, many of which are fundamental questions of our future foreign relations; and in dealing with this question which affects the Empire, we should deal with it with all proper proportion and not hurry to a decision. I am not going to discuss all the details of this subject which has been very amply and fully discussed. The discussion raised by the Foreign Secretary and Mr. Balfour has raised a very important aspect of this question, and though they go into a great deal of detail which I shall not touch upon, I want to point only to two great considerations which it seems to me we have to keep before us in dealing with this question. The first is this; I put it first not in the order of importance, but I deal with it first because it is the most convenient—that we must do nothing that appears like an affront to Japan. The question which is raised here is one of such a character, affecting the future peace of the world, that I would go very far to avoid even the appearance of throwing Japan over or putting an affront on Japan. The question of East and West, no doubt, is a great question which lies before this Empire in the future. As I said before our feet are planted both in the East and the West. The British Empire consists of both continents, and it is, therefore, to our interest to keep the two together, as the Prime Minister said, by bridging the divisions between Japan must not be affronted.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Europe and Asia. And you will not do that if any policy is adopted to-day which seems to throw Japan over and alienates her. We have to look facts in the face. Even Mr. Hughes in his elaborate and able argument which he put before us to-day went on the assumption not that Japan is the real danger and America the friend, and a certain friend, but that Japan is the potential danger, and, therefore, we should control her by keeping up the Alliance.

Mr. Chamberlain: Would it not be true to put it that America was a certain neutral and Japan was a possible enemy?

General Smuts: Yes. If we look to world peace, we must do nothing to alienate Japan or make her think that her time is in the past, that we have had the convenience of her friendship for twenty years, but that circumstances have changed in the world, and we have now finished with her; that we are off with the old love and on with the new. I am anxious that we should avoid that, because Japan is the danger of the future; there is no doubt about that. We will not be solving the cause of world peace by shoving her off, so to speak. At the same time I am equally anxious that we should have the right alignment in our foreign policy in the future, and I agree with Mr. Meighen in what he said this morning, that another generation will see others occupying the position of importance which this Empire occupies to-day. It is quite true to say that America has a vast influence upon the British Empire, and if we want to continue in the future and remain a compact group of States, we have to bear that in mind. We must, in the second place, therefore, avoid any policy which might produce a cleavage between ourselves and the United States. We will break up the Empire if we do adopt any such policy. I am quite sure of that, and we must avoid that by all means. One bright spot in this dark situation in which we find ourselves to-day seems to be this, that a Government has come into power in America which wants to work with us. So far as we can see from public declarations, the President of America has declared against the League of Nations. He will have nothing to do with that, and he would not join the League of Nations, but there are many indications in the documents and in what one sees in the press, that it is really the honest intention of America to work with us, and that America is groping her way towards a closer co-operation with us. Now it is not only this Japanese question that we have to deal with, but with a group of foreign questions. We have some questions with America ourselves, such as Mesopotamia, the question of cables, and so on. Besides that, in the background, there remains the debt which we owe to America, which to my mind it is absolutely necessary to wipe out before we can have good relations established again. There is going to be a revolt if we continue to build up armaments in this race that is taking place between America and Japan just now. Mr. Hughes has just explained to us what they are doing in Australia, and I can see in the economic struggle which is ahead of us in the future that this country is going to be handicapped largely and fatally by the taxation which is necessary for such armaments. Therefore, we have not only the Japanese Alliance, but we have a whole group of first class questions which have to be solved, in the settlement of which America is vitally concerned; and fortunately we have at this juncture an American Administration which appears to want to work with us; and, therefore, I am for dealing with this question as a whole and trying to find a solution, not piecemeal, but of the whole group, if possible. It is quite possible that by a piecemeal solution, by first dealing with the Japanese Alliance and then armaments and other questions, we will get no solution, but with the atmosphere as it is to-day, there ought to be an opportunity and possibility for a solution of the whole group of questions; and I think that we should make use of this opportunity.

Influence of America on British Empire.

Other questions with America which require settlement.

I do not want to go into the details of this matter, I simply want to state my view upon it, and the conclusion I have come to is this, that we should adopt neither of the alternatives "A" or "B" of the Foreign Secretary. (See Appendix.) The first alternative "A" proposed that we should renew the agreement for four or five years after consultation with the United States and China and the League of Nations, so as to bring it into conformity with the views of these parties, and after renewing the Treaty in this form we should proceed to negotiate over the armament and other questions. The second alternative "B" is that we should renew it for a short period—say a year—and in that interval of a year hold these Pacific Conferences, at which these various questions can be dealt with. I do not like either of these solutions.

Disapproves solutions suggested by Foreign Secretary.

I am not sure that you are going to satisfy Japan by these solutions, though, of course, I don't know, but my feeling is that when we go to Japan and tell her that we want to renew this Treaty, but that it will be a Treaty that will specifically exclude America, as Mr. Hughes requires—it will be a Treaty that will exclude all reference to military co-operation as the League of Nations require—it will be a Treaty of so vapoury and watery a character that there is no substance whatever left in it. I am not sure that when you come to Japan and propose that, it would conciliate them; and a renewal of this Treaty in the form which is proposed seems to me neither calculated nor likely to please Japan, and if possible, I would rather avoid the whole of that aspect of the question.

The telegram from our Ambassador at Washington raises an alternative solution which to my mind is feasible and ought to be explored.

American views on renewal.

The Ambassador wired the Secretary of State to the effect that the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty in any form would lead to disquiet because of its effect on American opinion. He says that "if the United States were specifically excluded from any operation that Treaty might have, the result would be little less than unfortunate." It was pointed out that the Imperial Conference might decide that it was unable to cast forth Japan as if she was unclean, and the Ambassador indicated that he did not know whether the United States had considered a similar agreement with Japan.

Finally, the suggestion arose that instead of a Treaty, a Declaration of Policy, embodied in identic notes, might be exchanged by the American, British and Japanese Governments, subject to agreement on the essential character of the declaration and the practical application of the principles involved. He said he personally would be in favour of such a line of policy, that is, a tripartite Conference to be held between the three Governments. He said he would be in favour of that, and later on he says that, more than that, this conversation might be communicated to the British Government. I, therefore, take the meaning of this to be that the American Government is prepared, not to enter into a formal Alliance with us in a tripartite Treaty which would include herself, Japan and ourselves, but they are prepared to negotiate with us, and that an exchange of notes between the three should make this clear. In the discussion which Lord Curzon had with the American Ambassador here, it is clear that the American Government is prepared that this should go beyond the question of disarmament—that your exchange of notes and views and Declarations of Policy of the three countries should go beyond disarmament and cover other points at issue.

Mr. Balfour: Are you sure it is intended to include disarmament?

General Smuts: Yes, that was the question put by Lord Curzon to Colonel Harvey, whether it should go beyond disarmament. He said: "Yes, it would cover the whole field." America was waiting for us to take the first move. America did not think she should make the first move, and it seems to me that these two conversations at Washington and in London indicate the lines of the true solution, that we should not go like a bull at a gate and try to renew the Treaty in a form that will please Japan, in a form that will affect American public opinion in a way we should not like, but we should get the three countries together, talk things over and exchange notes, a procedure which would not constitute a formal Treaty or Alliance, but an Entente, and later proceed to discuss specific questions as they arise.

Recommends Conferences for dealing with Pacific in future.

I feel convinced that the way of dealing with the Pacific in future is by a system of Conferences, the system which was adumbrated as subsidiary to grouping under the League of Nations. A system like that of Conferences between the Pacific Powers seems to be the only way of getting agreement in future.

The idea of the grouping of nations in a smaller league is one I have always thought consistent with the bigger League of Nations, and as I explained in my pamphlet on the League of Nations, the League would only be workable by such a system of Conferences amongst the nations of the smaller League.

Here is a case in the Pacific where greater and smaller Powers are concerned, and very vital economic, political and strategic questions arise from time to time, and the only solution is that they should be brought before Conferences from time to time, and not dealt with by any Alliance. We have two important conversations, one in Washington and one in London, pointing to the same result as the best solution of this matter—the coming together of these three Powers. America is waiting for us to take the lead, and a discussion of this and other questions and an exchange of notes might well become the best of the whole new system.

Mr. Lloyd George: Do you mind my putting this question? I would rather like to elucidate this point. Is that proposal which you mention consistent with Lord Curzon's second alternative of a renewal for a year pending these conversations? The conversations will take some time, and meanwhile it is possible that Japan will say that she has been dropped. Why should America object to a renewal for a year pending conversations? Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

General Smuts: If it is clearly a necessity, of course, I do not object to the three months' extension. I think we do want time to discuss one of the most important problems in the future politics of the world.

Mr. Lloyd George: The three months is to enable us to discuss it. What objection could there be to an extension for a year in order to enable us to discuss it with America?

Agrees to renewal for a year for discussion of general question.

General Smuts: I feel no objection to that provided it is made plain to both parties, both to Japan and America, what the position is, that we are trying to find a solution of the great question. We have been Allies with Japan, and this is no case of being off with the old love and on with the new, but there is no doubt it must be made plain to Japan that America is as vitally interested in this question as Japan and ourselves, and that it is much better, even from the Japanese point of view and the world point of view generally, that we three should come together; I think Japan might understand that. Whether she understands it or not, however, that seems to me to be the wise course to take in the interests of this Empire. If we do not do that, if we do not come to a solution which includes Japan with America, if we do not do that, then we are up against a terrible problem. This discussion which has taken place to-day warns me as to the future. We are at the parting of the ways, and I think we can avoid it by an arrangement which need not be a renewal of the Treaty in some form or another. The situation has become transformed. It is no longer an Alliance, but the situation has become transformed, so let us devise an instrument which will be adequate to this transformation, to the change which has come about.

Mr. Balfour: You would not include China? I agree to that.

Conferences with all interested Powers.

General Smuts: When we come to Conferences, then I would call in all the others. I would call in France, China, Holland, and all the Powers that are interested. But this great step which has to be taken, the initial step, should be confined to the three Powers. America herself is indicating that line. If we can get Japan to adopt that course we can make an arrangement which would safeguard the British Empire, and which would safeguard the very great interests which Mr. Hughes has at heart. I can understand that his position and the position of Australia is a terrible one. I can understand the serious language he uses about this, but our problem is a bigger one than that, and if we can find a solution which solves the bigger problem I think we should adopt it.

American Ambassador has not put forward American views officially.

Lord Curzon: I should like to make an observation arising out of what you said and arising out of what previous speakers have said. I think we should be careful not to read too much into what the Ambassador said to me yesterday. Remember, the Ambassador did not come to talk to me about this question. I thought he had, but when he came into the room he put forward certain propositions to me about an entirely different matter, to which I need not refer now. Taking advantage of his presence there I then opened a conversation about this. I said: "We are talking about this matter over the way, and you know we are desirous of doing nothing which will possibly offend or estrange you, and I wonder at what stage we can best enter into conversation with you. I should like to know your views about the matter"; and then he gave the reply, which was the inevitable reply: "We cannot take the initiative; we want to hear what you have to say." Then I said: "Don't you think it would be an excellent thing to have a Conference on this," and he said "yes," of course he did; he could not say "no." You must not take that to mean——

General Smuts: It is a good opening.

Lord Curzon: It is a good opening, but speakers have been inclined to take him as the official voice speaking for the American Government, which, of course, he was not.

Lord Lee: Did not the Secretary of State take the same lines?

Mr. Chamberlain: Mr. Hughes was drawing inferences from the Ambassador which were contrary to what was said. I thought the Ambassador's reply appeared to be more favourable to the renewal of the Treaty than Mr. Hughes did.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Massey: I will start by following the good example of the previous speakers and complimenting Lord Curzon and Mr. Balfour on the fine statements they have made leading up to the important matter under discussion to-day; important not only to us particularly in the South Pacific, but to every part of the Empire and to the Empire as a whole. Mr. Hughes has put the point of view of Australia, and put it forcibly and well, and everything he has said applies to the other British countries south of the line just as much as to Australia itself. I do not intend to discuss only the point of view of New Zealand, because, I will just say this, that if it were possible for the point of view of New Zealand and the point of view of the Empire as a whole to come into conflict, I would go for the Empire at once, and I am quite sure that in doing so, my course of action would satisfy the people whom I represent and who sent me here. Just one point has been mentioned within the last few minutes with which I can hardly agree; that is, that the Treaty should be renewed for, say, twelve months and then discussed again, or in the meantime, during the twelve months, Conferences and discussions might take place and we might possibly arrive at an understanding. I cannot help thinking that delay, so far as this matter is concerned, is dangerous; that we shall probably—I am speaking of the world as a whole—we shall probably, certainly possibly, be in a more dangerous position in twelve months than we are at present. I think Japan ought to be informed without the slightest delay whether we propose to renew this Treaty or not; though I want to qualify that by saying that I agree thoroughly with the suggestion that has been made that a Conference should be arranged in which America should take part and present her own views. I am afraid that in this connection I am inclined to take a somewhat pessimistic view of the possibilities, but I have watched Japan and I have watched America for some years past, and I believe there is very serious possibility of trouble as between those two countries. I have watched the propaganda which has been circulated and I heard the reference made by Lord Curzon to it yesterday. I have watched the propaganda which has been going on in newspapers and magazines and on the platform very often. Just before leaving home I read a book, the title of which I cannot recollect; one of the most dangerous books I have ever read, written by an American; I cannot recollect his name, but written forcibly and well. He brushed on one side the negroes and said they were not worthy of consideration. Good fighting men under good leaders possibly, but no faculty of organisation so far as they were concerned. He said that some day there would be a war between the brown man and the white man and that the white man should be prepared for it, and the sooner he was prepared the better. That is exactly where our Empire comes in. We have both white men and brown men in the Empire. We have more brown men than white men for that matter, and we cannot complain of the attitude of the brown men during the war. We should have had much more serious difficulty in winning the war had they not been thoroughly loyal to us, and I think that deserves to be remembered when we are discussing such a matter as this. As for America's future, I consider that the future of America itself is the biggest problem of the world to-day. No one can look at all those mixed races in the United States; 13 million negroes and millions of people from Southern Europe, Northern Europe, all sorts and conditions of men and women, without wondering what the population will be like in another forty or fifty years from now or even a much shorter period, and I say it is quite impossible for anybody to predict the result. I have talked with most intelligent men, Americans who were most enthusiastic supporters of the present Government, President Harding and those connected with him, and they have expressed the opinion to me more than once that sooner or later there must be trouble in America. There is, undoubtedly, the beginning of trouble. A very few weeks ago I was in one of the outposts of the United States, I was there for one day; the steamer on which I happened to be travelling stopped there. I went ashore, as all the passengers did. I met a number of people whom I had met on previous trips and there is not the very slightest doubt there was war in the atmosphere, if I can express it in that way. I did not meet a single individual with whom I was acquainted who did not leave the impression that they looked on war as a certainty.

New Zealand would waive her particular wishes to meet general Empire policy.

Recommends immediate action with regard to Treaty.

Possibility of trouble between Japan and America.

Future of America.

I hope it is only a possibility, but it all pointed to war. That was only at an outpost, a very small part of the United States, but the feeling was there, and when people get that idea into their heads the very fact of their thinking about war is likely to bring war. Something comes along and there is a flare-up, and before the world realises what is happening they are at each other's throats. I cannot help thinking that the crisis will not pass without trouble. There has been a paper read or forwarded to us during the last day or two, supposed to be from an unimpeachable and authoritative source—I do not know the source and I do not want to know it; perhaps it is as well that we do not know. But, referring to the new policy of America, it says this: "On the other hand, the new policy means that Great Britain must acknowledge, in its turn, the naval superiority of the United States in the Pacific. Australia, New Zealand and Canada must recognise the ground of common interest with the United States and look to this country,"—that is to say, America—"for protection rather than to Great Britain." The sting is in the tail of the sentence, that we must in future look to America. You, Mr. Hughes, and I must look to America in the future rather than to Great Britain for protection.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Hughes: I have not been looking.

Mr. Massey: And I have not been looking, but I want to say this, and I say it with all sincerity, that my country will not look to any other country than Britain for protection so long as the British Empire exists. We are part of the British Empire and we look to the British Empire to protect us. We are not going to look to any other country, and we are not going to accept protection from any other country except the Government of the British Empire itself. If another country is allied with the British Empire and it becomes necessary for us to ask for protection, then there is nothing wrong in Britain's Ally coming to protect us, but not a country which is not allied with Britain. As I think I have said, there has been a lot of propaganda about this thing, and instead of making things better, this propaganda is making things worse. I have had letters from no end of people of whom I have never heard, giving me advice about what I ought to do in connection with the proposed renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. I do not want advice from anybody on a matter like this. A man came to me the other day, apparently a very decent fellow. He said he had come to talk with me about the proposed renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. He said he had been in the East himself. Then he proceeded to tell me about the position he thought I ought to take up. Well, I told him I had not come to England or to London to ask advice from anyone; my mind was made up, in the interests of the people whom I represented, before I left New Zealand. I reminded him that I was very busy and said good-bye. But that sort of thing shows that wires are being pulled, very unfairly and very improperly, as I think. However, most of what I have said is only by the way. So far as the renewal of the Treaty is concerned, Mr. Hughes has mentioned several times that the Treaty has been in existence for twenty years. I am bound to agree with the opinion expressed by Mr. Hughes on this, that if during that time a great deal of good has not been done, a very great deal of evil has been prevented, which is the next best thing. I hold no brief for Japan, but I cannot get away from the fact that they have been loyal to us during the whole of those twenty years and they gave good service during the war period. There is no question about that. If Japan had not been our Ally, but had been Germany's Ally, I do not think we should have won the war. That was one of the factors and a very important factor, that helped us to win. We lost no end of ships by submarines and now and again by a German raider, but if the big fleet of Japan had been against us and at liberty, we could not have maintained our communications for a month and we should soon have had to ask for terms. The Japanese served us well for twenty years. They have been our loyal Ally. We have got through the worst war of history. The Allies, of whom Britain was one and Japan another, have been victorious. Now that we have got through the war and some of our former enemies no longer exist, that is to say, they have been so weakened and crippled that as military nations or naval nations they are negligible, is it the right thing to suggest that we should say to Japan, "We do not need your assistance any longer, we can do without you, and we do not propose to renew the Treaty?" I am not going to use strong language, but I do think this; I hope it will not be considered strong language, but I do think that if we took up that attitude with regard to Japan or any other nation that served us in the same way we should be guilty of the basest ingratitude. It would not be playing the game and we should lose the respect of the other nations of the world. And let me say this, that once Britain loses the respect of the other nations of the world the British Empire is done. We should see to it that we do what is right in connection with Japan as well as in connection with any other nation with whom we are in alliance. I can remember the whole of the details—although I am not going to inflict them upon the Conference—when the Japanese

British Empire must protect Dominions.

Japan loyal to Treaty for twenty years.

Refusal to renew now would show lack of gratitude.

cruiser "Ibuku" was helping to escort Australian and New Zealand troops to the different threatres of war. There were 30,000 men there and I have been in conversation with a number of them, because there were 10,000 New Zealanders besides the ships' crews, and they have given me the most dramatic descriptions of the actions of the people on board, the officers and men, of the Japanese ship when a wireless message came to hand which indicated that there was an enemy warship within striking distance. They described to me how, after the news had been picked up by the Japanese cruiser, they ran up the great Battle Flag of Japan, the cruiser steamed round right in front of the ships that were being escorted, interviewed, by wireless or otherwise, the British officer-in-command, and insisted that the Japanese ship should have the order to go out and sink the enemy ship of the presence of which they had been told. However, the admiral in charge of the "Minotaur" directed that the Japanese ship should go back to its place. She obeyed, and the "Sydney" was sent to do the work which she did so well. I know that the Japanese are people who make hard bargains and get all they can. But against that there is the fact that they gave us great service, which should count at a time like this. Supposing we said to Japan, "We have done with you, we are not going to renew the Treaty," there is the possibility which has been mentioned and emphasised, and which I want to emphasise. Japan is a proud nation, a very sensitive nation, and a very suspicious nation. We all know it and we may, if we are not careful, turn a nation with a temperament like that from a loyal friend into a very dangerous antagonist.

Danger of Japan forming other Alliances.

Do not let us imagine for a moment that Japan is going to be without an Ally. There is not a nation in the world to-day that would refuse an alliance with Japan if Japan offered it, for the very simple reason that Japan is one of the three Great Powers of the world. I do not know whether she will not be the most powerful of the three in two or three years' time; but it is certainly one of the most powerful of the three Great Nations to-day, and there is not a nation that I can think of that would turn down Japan as an Ally. You can think, of course, of our old enemy Germany, and of Russia.

Mr. Hughes: In eight years Japan must be supreme in those things.

German ambitions.

Mr. Massey: Dr. Solf was mentioned the other day. He was Governor of German Samoa and he used to come down once a year to Auckland. He was very friendly with the people there, they put him up at the Clubs, and made much of him. He was extremely popular and extremely plausible. Even to-day some of them cannot imagine that he would ever turn round upon us. But it has been done. However, he showed his true colours on one occasion when mention was made of what New Zealand and Australia were doing in connection with the war, when he said: "They will have reason to regret their actions when this war comes to an end and we take possession of New Zealand; we want it badly, we are going to have it and make use of its citizens for other purposes than they have been used for up to the present." That was Dr. Solf, but he was not then a guest of the Auckland people. I can imagine how he is working, even with the Japanese, who are pretty shrewd and can reckon up that sort of thing as well as most people. I can imagine his having an influence on them and preparing the way for possibilities in the future.

Supports Conference of Empire, America and Japan.

I think I mentioned that so far as the proposed Conference is concerned, I am quite willing to support it. I think it would be a good thing to get, at all events, the representatives of the three Great Nations together to discuss the position, not only with regard to the renewal of the Treaty, but other matters connected with the possibilities of the future. I believe that self-preservation is the first law of Nature, and our business at present and our duty, as men very near the top of the tree so far as the public affairs of the Empire are concerned, is to do everything that we possibly can to strengthen and to preserve the Empire in a time of serious difficulty. There is no doubt, and we cannot shut our eyes to it, that we are passing through a particularly dangerous time, and there is no man on earth to-day who can tell us what the position will be in two or three years from the present.

So far as America is concerned, I frankly admire the genuine American citizens. I am not speaking of pro-Germans or Bolsheviks, the pro-Sinn Feiners or the Sinn Feiners themselves. I am not speaking of them. There is a big proportion of the population who are against Britain and everything British and will always be against us. We cannot shut our eyes to it. But the great bulk of the right-thinking and intelligent people of America, the old stock, are quite friendly towards Britain to-day, and if it rested wholly with them there would not be the slightest difficulty in arriving at a friendly and amicable arrangement that would probably stand for a great many years to come. I should like to see that attempted even if we were not successful in connection with it. I am glad the point has been made that the Treaty, even as it stands to-day, is not unfriendly to America—very far from it. Lord Curzon referred to something the other day which was a proof that so far as the British Government is concerned they had not the slightest thought of any antagonism or any unfriendly act.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Japanese and American racial feeling in South Pacific.

But there is this point, and here, again, I must speak from the point of view of the South Pacific and Japan, as I know them. I have been on Japanese ships over and over again at our ports. They are proud and suspicious people, and if these American ships come down to the South Pacific and make their headquarters there, it will be looked upon almost as a challenge to Japan. I have not had an opportunity of expressing my opinion to American citizens or the American Government, but, if they want to avoid war, they should avoid making their headquarters on the South Pacific—I do not mean the Philippines, as it is their business. If they think that is right, it is for them to do so. I know exactly what would happen the first time a Japanese ship and an American ship got into one of the harbours on the South Pacific. There would be a riot between the two crews and things would be done which would, in all probability, provoke immediate war, or be looked upon as portending war.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Massey, I am sorry, but we have a Cabinet, and have to be in the House of Commons at 6 o'clock. To-morrow morning, I am sorry to say, I have also got a series of Conferences. Will a quarter past four to-morrow afternoon suit you, Mr. Meighen?

Mr. Meighen: Yes. I think I should say that I expect I shall have to leave for Canada not later than the 21st July.

Mr. Hughes: I will come, though you have told us Thursday was to be free. I had made other arrangements, but I can put them off.

Mr. Lloyd George: I was thinking of Mr. Meighen's convenience. He has got to be back at that early date and we have a good deal to get through. I suggest to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. Massey: I think we have stuck to our business very closely and if we could avoid the social engagements, very well. Although we appreciate very much the hospitality of the British people, yet it all means time.

Mr. Lloyd George: This is an important decision that we have got to take. I think we ought to go on discussing it at any rate. Mr. Hughes, can you be here at half past four to-morrow?

Mr. Hughes: The whole day?

Mr. Lloyd George: No, Thursday afternoon at 4·30 P.M.

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

APPENDIX.

Anglo-Japanese Agreement.

The two alternative plans suggested by me this morning were these:—

(A.) Renewal of the Agreement with Japan for a term of four or five years, after consultation with the United States, China, and the League of Nations, so as to make the new Agreement conform to their general views and to remove the doubtful or suspected features from it.

The renewal might even be in such a form that the American Government might at a later date, if it chose, come in.

This renewal to be independent of an International Conference on the Pacific question, though not, of course, inconsistent with it.

(B.) Temporary renewal of the existing Agreement (brought into harmony with the Covenant of the League of Nations, and with mention of India possibly omitted) for a space of, say, one year from October 1921, so as to provide for the holding of an International Pacific Conference in the interval.

Such a Conference would consist of the Governments of Great Britain, America, Japan, the Dominions (Canada, Australia and New Zealand), China, France and Holland. The inclusion of the Pacific States of Central and Southern America may be a subject for discussion, but would probably be found an encumbrance.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Massey: I had almost concluded my observations when we adjourned last night. To the best of my recollection when we adjourned last night I was about to call attention to the fact that as long as the Treaty with Japan existed we were able to control that restless nation to a certain extent. I recollect that a day or two ago Lord Curzon, referring to another nation whose name it is not necessary to mention and with whom we have mostly friendly relations, suggested that while the present arrangement existed we were able, so to speak, to keep a hand on her collar. I think the same remark applies to Japan. If Japan has one fault more than another I think it is that of a desire for the acquisition of territory. But so long as Japan is connected with Britain I think Japan's inclinations in that direction will be kept under control, to a certain extent at all events.

Position of China, especially Shantung.

With regard to China, I have a very great deal of sympathy with China and the position in which she is placed to-day and especially with regard to Shantung. I am not one of those people who think that in a few years time China will develop into a great and powerful nation. She certainly will not so long as she is left to herself; but with Japan as organiser there is no knowing what might happen. I came across a representative of China not long ago, and because I did not happen to take his point of view exactly he reminded me that in the years to come China will be one of the great nations of the world, and that it was well that smaller nations should cultivate very friendly relations. However, I am not afraid of that, but I do think that where an injustice is being done to China we should endeavour to remedy it as far as we can. I think that British influence should be brought to bear to compel Japan to keep her promises so far as the Shantung Peninsula is concerned, or perhaps in any other direction where promises up to the present have been made, but have not been kept.

Immigration Act of New Zealand.

With regard to the Japanese Treaty there is a point on which Mr. Hughes has interested himself very frequently, not so much perhaps during the present Conference as on previous occasions. That is the danger of migration to the British countries in the Pacific. Personally, I do not feel anxious in the very slightest. We are not in the habit of calling attention to it, but it is as well that the Conference should know that in New Zealand we have perhaps the strictest immigration law in the world which has worked smoothly and without friction. I am not going to quote the Act, but the main provision of the Statute is simply that no foreigner can come into New Zealand without the consent of the New Zealand Government. I expected friction when Parliament agreed to that law and also when it received what we speak of in New Zealand as the Royal Assent, that is to say, when the Governor General expressed himself as willing to sign it and did sign it, but so far there has been no trouble. It works in this way, that no foreigner can come into New Zealand without the consent of the Government, the consent of the Government being obtained through the Minister for Customs. But any foreigner may come in for six months for business, for pleasure, or for health, and if he desires to stay longer than six months and indicates that he would like to become a permanent resident, then if he has conducted himself properly and decently during the six months during which he has been a resident, the Minister for Customs may allow him to remain, and he becomes a permanent citizen if he feels so inclined. That law applies to all foreigners, but we have not applied it to all nations, although it is there and can be applied at any time. Probably after a few more years experience there will be a schedule drafted to the Act specifying the nations which may come in and which may not. But that is the law. I saw an article in the "Times" yesterday contributed by an eminent authority, in which he expressed the opinion that every nation had the right to choose its own citizens. We are simply asserting that right, and as I say it works well, and, so far, without any friction whatever.

Value of Admiralty opinion.

With regard to the Treaty, I am not quite sure whether Mr. Balfour did not call attention to this point. In any event it will not do any harm if I read the paragraphs to which I will refer briefly. I hold in my hand the Admiralty opinion with reference to the proposed renewal of the Treaty, and I may say that I have a great respect for any opinion expressed by the Admiralty. I have always found them reliable. British sailors, any way, go about the world with their eyes open and take notice of what is going on, and their opinions are very often of immense service to the citizens of this Empire.

Referring to the proposed Japanese Treaty—I am not going into the other opinions expressed, because we shall have an opportunity of dealing with them later when we come to naval defence—I will read paragraph 12.

Lord Lee: May I ask to what document you are referring?

Mr. Massey: It is a memorandum by the Committee of Imperial Defence.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Sir Maurice Hankey: It is a memorandum numbered E.-15.

Views of Committee of Imperial Defence.

Mr. Massey: "The Committee are advised that one result of the determination of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance at the present time would probably be that a spirit of resentment towards the British Empire would replace in Japan the feeling of friendship now existing there, and in such an eventuality the whole strategic situation in the Far East would have to be reviewed by His Majesty's Government in concert with the Governments of the Dominions and India." Then the document goes on, but I am passing over several paragraphs and coming to another one under the heading of "Conclusions."

> "(b.) That, unless it is thought that some satisfactory understanding with the United States and Japan regarding a common policy in the Pacific is within the range of practical politics, thus making war a very improbable contingency, Great Britain has, from a purely strategic point of view, much to gain by the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. Nothing, however, in this paragraph should be taken to prejudge the political and international complications due to naval rivalries and racial antagonism.
> "(c.) That, whether the Anglo-Japanese Alliance is renewed or not, the existing situation, under which it is impracticable for the British fleet to operate in the Pacific within any reasonable time after the outbreak of war, should not be allowed to continue, and that, in accordance with a conclusion reached by the Standing Defence Sub-Committee at a previous meeting and approved by the Cabinet, a development of the naval bases in the Far East is an essential part of British naval policy.
> "(d.) That, in the event of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance being determined without some such understanding as is referred to in paragraph (b) above the whole strategic situation in the Far East will require to be reviewed by His Majesty's Government in concert with the Government of the Dominions and India, and that the provision for the development of the essential naval bases in the Far East will have to be taken in hand not gradually, as might otherwise be the case, but as a matter of urgency,"—— that is to say, if this Treaty is determined—I am using the words of the paragraph—and is not renewed, the whole situation in the Far East will have to be taken in hand at once, as the paragraph says, as a matter of urgency.

Question as to whether a portion of British Fleet could be stationed in the Pacific.

That is a very strong expression of opinion and if I had not been able to make up my mind for other reasons I think the reasons I have mentioned would have guided me. I have almost finished, but before doing so there is just one point arising out of this. We have heard repeatedly during the course of this discussion that there is practically no possibility of war for, I hope, quite a long time to come, so far as European waters are concerned. There is no possibility of any trouble in the Atlantic so far as we can see. Personally, with my limited knowledge perhaps, I am not able to see why some of the great warships that are at present idle in British waters might not be transferred to the Pacific. It is quite evident—I have read this paper right through, and not only the clauses I have quoted—that the Pacific will have to be taken in hand before long, and personally I do not see much difference in the cost of maintenance of warships as between the Pacific and the Atlantic. Oil—yes, oil has to be provided undoubtedly, but you do not get oil in the British islands. I do not suppose you can get it any nearer than Mexico, and so far as Mexico is concerned it could be obtained readily enough for the purposes of the Pacific. There is coal in any quantity. We actually send coal from New Zealand to Singapore. We do it now, and when our troubles come to an end, and I think they are nearly at an end so far as the supply of coal is concerned, the Admiralty, for coal-burning ships, can obtain a much larger supply at the port of Westport than it has been getting for years past. It is a small point, but with the object of enabling the supply of good coal to be increased, not only for our own purposes—I am speaking of local purposes—but also for the purposes of the Admiralty, we have taken over the port of Westport and made it an international port; we are going to increase the facilities there and we are going to spend a considerable sum of money in the near future. That port will have to be fortified, but that is another matter altogether. I am not going any further except to say this. I hope I have made my position clear. It is simply this. I think the Treaty should be renewed, but at the same time I think we should do everything we possibly can to promote a friendly understanding with the Government and people of the United States.

Recommends renewal of Alliance and, if possible, a Tripartite Arrangement.

The Maharao of Cutch: The view I have to put forward before this meeting, as one of the representatives of India, is very much in accord with what I understand to be the general view of the Government here and of those of Australia and of New Zealand. It seems to me it would be very damaging to the prestige of our Empire if we were to refuse to continue to be the Allies of Japan after the loyal co-operation which she has afforded to us throughout the war.

We made the Alliance originally, and on other occasions we renewed it and continued it before the war, because we thought it was necessary for our own ends. We have profited by that friendship of Japan, and I think it would be most ungrateful on our part to show now a change of front.

India is vitally interested in the safeguarding of the Pacific, and we are quite of the view that this should be done by a mutual understanding between the British Empire, the United States and Japan, which would be of enormous importance in the interests not only of the Empire, but of the whole world. Therefore, India would welcome conversations to this end, provided it is not done at the risk of throwing over Japan or of our appearing to hesitate about the value of our friendship with Japan.

I would urge that surely an Alliance is not something which we can thrust aside when there is no immediate need to call for active assistance, and which can be reassumed in dangerous moments. An Alliance to be of any value ought to be treasured, I think, in times of sunshine so that it may be available in times of storm. No doubt the best thing perhaps would be what has been suggested—an understanding between the United States, the British Empire, and Japan; but I would ask, if we are unable to acquire the friendship of a new friend, as we very much want to do, should we discard an old friend, a friend who has been faithful to us? I humbly submit that we should not do that.

Deprecates reference to India in Preamble.

So far I have spoken on the general question of the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty; now I would beg to add a few remarks with reference to the effect upon India of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. There is one point in the preamble of the Japanese Treaty which is not altogether viewed with favour in India, and, I understand, is not very popular also in Japan. I mean the reference in the preamble to the assistance of Japan for the defence of India. I would ask, on behalf of India, as one of her representatives, that this reference in the preamble may be omitted. It is damaging to the prestige of the British Empire that we should bind ourselves to seek the assistance of an Ally for the defence of our territory. It is not only damaging in that way to the prestige of the Empire, but its moral effect on India is undesirable. It gives India the impression that the British Empire, assisted by India, does not feel that she could hold her own. She has successfully protected her frontiers from the invaders for many years, and I do not think it is desirable to create the impression in India that we find it absolutely necessary to have a Treaty with Japan whereby we should necessarily want her assistance for the defence of India.

Moreover those who are disposed to make mischief—and there are mischief-makers all over the world—construe the reference in the Treaty of the British Empire with Japan to mean that Great Britain and the Government of India may not be able, without the assistance of Japanese bayonets, to maintain the internal peace of India. Obviously this is a very grotesque assertion, but I think the loose wording of the preamble of the Treaty does not exclude the possibility of that interpretation being placed upon it.

The last thing I would refer to is that some sections of the Japanese population in India take a great interest—which we view as an undesirable interest—in the internal affairs of India. They do this on the ground that Japan may be involved in the affairs of India, and it gives them an excuse for acts of espionage. For all these reasons, although India is in favour of the renewal of the Japanese Alliance, we think that the mention of India in the preamble should be omitted.

Japanese interest in China and Tibet.

Now there are one or two more points to which I would invite the attention of this meeting. It is quite apparent that Japan takes a great interest in the affairs of Tibet and in the affairs of China. I would suggest that, if a Treaty is negotiated with Japan, it would be desirable that the Foreign Office, when they come to negotiate the Treaty, may bear this point in mind. In support of what I have said with regard to the omission of any mention of India in the Treaty, I would urge one more point.

Status of India.

India is now becoming a self-governing Dominion. Therefore if India were to be a party to the Treaty, I presume it would be necessary that a representative or representatives of India or the Government of India should be signatories to that Treaty. Therefore it seems to me that there is no point in the mention of India occurring in a Treaty to which India is not a direct party.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

These are the remarks which I had to submit with special reference to India on the general question of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Views of Representatives of Dominions.

Mr. Lloyd George: We have had a very remarkable discussion upon one of the most momentous questions that could be submitted to the decision of any Conference. In many ways, it is a decision which is more likely to affect the future course of affairs than almost any other that could be submitted to this, or any other, Conference at the present moment. Mr. Meighen, in the very powerful statement which he made against the renewal of the Treaty, dwelt upon the importance of friendship with the United States of America and argued that a renewal of this Treaty would, at least, imperil very seriously the prospects of that friendship.

Mr. Hughes, Mr. Massey, and the Maharao of Cutch have urged very strongly the importance of not offending the powerful Empire of Japan, which has been a faithful Ally to us in trouble. General Smuts dwelt upon both those points, and I agree with him that they are not irreconcilable. I think it would be even a more serious decision than that with which we are confronted, if we had to decide between an Alliance with Japan and friendship with America. I do not think that is necessary, and I will give my reasons later on, or rather emphasise certain suggestions which have been put forward. Friendship with America is fundamental.

Friendship with America fundamental.

It is a dominant principle in all British policy, and it is inconceivable that we should embark upon any policy that would involve a breach with the United States of America. That, I think, is accepted as an axiom by all those who sit around this table. Let me put the effect of a non-renewal of this Treaty upon our relations with Japan. I do not accept the statement that a renewal would involve a quarrel with America, but I have absolutely no doubt that the refusal to renew would involve a breach with Japan.

Sir E. Grey's statement at 1911 Conference.

I do not think Mr. Meighen was at the Conference in 1911; were you, Mr. Meighen? Sir Edward Grey made a very important statement on foreign policy to the Imperial Conference. Coming to the question of a Japanese Alliance, he used these words:—

> "The present Alliance must last until 1915. It will only come to an end then if it is denounced, or if notice is given either by ourselves or by Japan a year before 1915. It does not expire unless notice is given by one Power or the other that the Alliance is to be terminated."

Now these are the words I call attention to:—

> "Now, you cannot give notice of the termination of an Alliance of that kind and bring the Alliance to an end and then find yourself in just the same position as if the Alliance had never existed. If we, in 1914, were to give notice to Japan that we did not wish to continue the Alliance, the Alliance having worked so well as it has, and having been no trouble to us, she certainly would infer that that meant some reversal of our policy, and she at once would look, and be bound to look, at whatever arrangement she could make with other Powers to secure her position, feeling that she would be no longer in our confidence and thinking we must have some motive in determining the Alliance with her. In the same way, if she wished to denounce the Alliance with us, in 1914, we should at once be disquieted, because we should feel she was going to make some other arrangement to which we should not be a party, and it might be an arrangement which would be unpleasant to us later on."

Those are very weighty words, and everything that has happened since has given point to them. If we were here now discussing for the first time the question of whether we should enter into an Alliance with Japan, the very cogent arguments of Mr. Meighen would have still greater force, and I think irresistible force; deliberately to conclude an Alliance with Japan, when relations between her and America were not friendly would not perhaps be regarded as an unfriendly act in the diplomatic sense, but it would certainly be regarded in the general sense as rather unfriendly. The suggestion now is, having long enjoyed that Alliance, you will now, because there is a little unfriendliness between Japan and America, refuse to renew it. See what has happened since 1911. Up to 1911, when Sir Edward Grey made that statement, Japan had rendered us no particular service. On the whole, I think the advantage had been on the side of

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Japan, undoubtedly very considerably so on the side of Japan. She was actually at war with Russia, and it gave her a sort of moral support which made a considerable difference to what was really a new country in its present form. But since then, what has happened? We have been at war. We have been in a war which was really a war of existence, and if we had been defeated the consequences are something which are inconceivable. As Mr. Hughes pointed out, and Mr. Massey afterwards, if Japan had not been our Ally we could not have guaranteed that that very fine army which came to our aid from Australia and New Zealand would have reached the West. Neither could we have guaranteed that the great army which came from India would have crossed the Indian Ocean. At any rate, it would have been a strain on our naval resources. It would have involved tremendous losses in the West if we had had to detach cruisers and torpedo boats to protect ships in the Indian Ocean and the Pacific Ocean instead of concentrating upon European waters. Here is a service which was vital to us.

Mr. Hughes: Our soldiers would not have come because they would have been wanted to defend their own countries.

Mr. Lloyd George: We should have been deprived of something like 2,000,000 first-class fighting men in our war if we had not had that Alliance with Japan. Why did Japan come in? She had no quarrel with Germany. She had no particular interest in coming into the war. She was not concerned in Belgium. She had no interest at all in France; as a matter of fact, she was much more interested in Germany. German officers had been training her army, and on the whole she was fairly friendly with Germany. She came in purely and simply because she was an Ally of ours. She had no other reason for coming in. It is perfectly true that after coming in she has made the most of it. So have we. Having won the war, she has got some islands in the Pacific. That is equally true of France. That is equally true of us and of Belgium. She came in purely and simply because she was an Ally. What is it suggested we should say to her—"Yes we have been your Ally and bosom friend and you have been very useful to us, in fact, your services were perfectly essential to us only two years ago, but there is a very powerful friend of ours here who will be offended if we continue our Alliance with you, and therefore we mean to drop you." Now I put this—translate that into ordinary social or business relations. What description would anyone give to that? How could you describe it? Somebody comes and helps you in your business relations when in a very tight corner, when you could not have done without him, and then somebody else comes along who has quarrelled with somebody else, who is a still more powerful person, and you say: "Well, I am very sorry I have to cut you in future, because otherwise this very powerful gentleman will not take any notice of me and might scowl." I venture to say that there is not one of us sitting at this table who would behave like that. Why should we like the British Empire to do something that we should not dream of doing in our own personal relations with each other?

Comparison of Diplomatic Relations and Ordinary Relations.

Japan has honoured her Compact.

Now that is my view. We must not insult Japan. She stood by her compact to the very last letter. She has never been at a Peace Conference where she has not stood by us right through and through. In the war she stood by us and she stood by us in peace, and now to drop her is something, I think, which, so far from winning the friendship of America, would win the contempt of America.

Mr. Hughes: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is my view. The American is not that type of man. If we were beginning from the start, I do not know what we should do, but two years after the war, when this gallant little people in the East backed us through thick and thin, now to drop them—we cannot do it. I think the British Empire must behave like a gentleman. That is one plea I put in for the renewal of the Treaty with Japan.

Need for knowing real American opinion.

I do not think it will lead to a quarrel with America. Let us find out what America is thinking and get behind that. There is a good deal of talk of war between Japan and America, and it is said to look inevitable. We must get out of this doctrine. I remember in my short parliamentary career two inevitable wars. One was between Russia and ourselves. It was regarded as absolutely inevitable. There was Russia, the great iceberg rolling towards all the places we wanted to keep, and we said this means war. It passed away and it is much more remote than it appeared twenty or thirty years ago. I remember a time when a war with France was inevitable.

Mr. Massey: Not so very long ago.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Lloyd George: Lord Curzon referred to it in his statement. On three separate occasions it looked as if we were on the point of war with France. I heard Sir Edward Grey in the House of Commons say that if France did such and such a thing, it would be regarded as an unfriendly act. That in diplomacy means, if you do it, it means war.

Mr. Chamberlain: She did it at Fashoda.

Mr. Lloyd George: I am not talking of Fashoda. There were three times when we had not merely an inevitable war, but we came right up to the brink. Yet there was no war. Let us remember that now. Is there no common sense left and cannot we render some service by stopping it? We certainly ought to do so. We ought not to allow it to go on. Once a thing like that begins—the late war shows that—no one can guarantee where it will end, and it must be stopped and it can be stopped, and that is why I think something ought to be done. There is another interest which was referred to by Mr. Massey, and I think also by Mr. Meighen, which we ought not to neglect, and that is the interest of China. I am entirely with Mr. Massey in the observations which he made a short time ago, that we ought to see that China is fairly treated, even in the interest of fair play. They are a great docile, kindly people on the whole, and it is monstrous that they should be ill-treated by these great military Powers, whether they are Japanese or any other Powers, and we ought to see they are fairly treated, and I think the fact of our being allied to Japan would enable us to talk as a friend to Japan. When the United States of America begins to talk to Japan about China, Japan says, "Oh, yes, you want to get there yourselves, you want to keep us out." That is the attitude. I saw President Wilson lecturing those two inscrutable envoys of Japan by the hour in Paris. I just listened to him, but I knew perfectly well what was passing behind those very immovable faces—"you want to clear us out and want to get there yourselves." They did not believe he was doing it in the interest of fair play to China. They thought he was doing it in the interests of exclusive control by America of that immense population. We, on the other hand, —Mr. Balfour—talked to them a good deal and they listened to us; two or three times Mr. Balfour talked to them and they were most amenable. They knew perfectly well that he was talking to them as a friend. The same thing applies to Yap. If we say, "We are not going to shake hands with you because the Yankee offers his hand to us, we cannot do it as he will not like it," then in future anything we say will not have the slightest effect on Japan. On the contrary, they will say, "You left me after I had done you a service." We can influence Japan. I am certain in China there is a great people who, I believe, are on the eve of very great things. Somebody gave me a paper the other day showing how they were rebuilding their cities, modernising them, and how they were developing everything. They have, I believe, about 2,000 newspapers, 800 daily papers—of course, I do not know how true this is. This is China. They have great Student Unions of about 700,000 people; and their trade is beginning to develop. He points out that now the trade of China is only one pound sterling per head of the population, whereas the trade of Japan is ten pounds sterling per head. If you had the same thing in China, you would have a trade of about 4,000 millions; and they are under the impression that the Japanese are keeping them down. Their idea is that the Japanese Alliance is designed to keep them down; they do not like it. All that can be cleared up, and I trust that in any conversations you may have China will be brought in. We should not allow China to be left entirely in charge of the United States of America. Let us not allow the United States of America to create the impression in China that she is China's only friend.

China should be fairly treated.

Development of China.

China should join in Conference.

Mr. Hughes: How do the Chinese reconcile President Wilson's attitude towards them in Shantung?

Mr. Lloyd George: He put up the best fight he could for them, but I think we are more likely to put that straight by being friendly with Japan than by breaking with her. Well, here I agree with General Smuts, that these positions are not irreconcilable positions. As everybody knows, you always begin with irreconcilable positions, and the work of a Conference is to reconcile the irreconcilable, and I think the same thing would happen if we had a Conference between the United States of America, Japan and ourselves. It has been suggested that we should renew the alliance for a year, in order to give time for that Conference. I do not believe that is necessary. Mr. Meighen called attention to the terms of the alliance.

Value of Conferences.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

It is dated the 13th July, 1911, and article 6 of the Treaty reads as follows:—

"The present agreement shall come into effect immediately after the date of its signature, and remain in force for ten years from that date.

"In case neither of the High Contracting Parties should have notified twelve months before the expiration of the said ten years the intention of terminating it, it shall remain binding until the expiration of one year from the day on which either of the High Contracting Parties shall have denounced it. But if, when the date fixed for its expiration arrives, either ally is actually engaged in war, the Alliance shall, ipso facto, continue until peace is concluded."

But something was done last year which was tantamount to a denunciation. That has not been the Foreign Secretary's view, and it is not the view of Japan. This morning we decided to submit the question to the Lord Chancellor, who would confer with the Solicitor-General. It had never been submitted to the Law Officers before.

The Lord Chancellor: Yes, the case had been before them.

Considers Treaty does not expire July 1921, but would like Lord Chancellor's opinion.

Mr. Lloyd George: I have not had an opportunity of seeing the Lord Chancellor since, and I would like to ask him to express his view on that subject; but at the present moment you have this position: There has been no formal denunciation of the Treaty; it is purely inferential. Japan does not take the view that there has been a denunciation. In that case, until twelve months' notice is given this thing lasts for twelve months from the date when you gave the notice. There would then be no question of renewal; it would purely be a question of whether we should decide to denounce the Treaty. That would give time for the Conference which Mr. Meighen and all are very anxious to secure, a Conference between all the Powers engaged in the Pacific to clear up the whole situation, and above all to get rid of the inevitable war. You would discuss the question of armaments and all the other various questions. We should have a state of things where we could carry the United States of America with us without insulting a very brave and loyal ally. Whoever may have reason to complain about the conduct of Japan, we have not, and I trust it will be possible to reconcile the whole of these positions, and not only that, but to disperse what is a very menacing cloud in the Pacific.

Mr. Hughes: Allow me to ask you one question before the Lord Chancellor begins. You say that the present position in the opinion of Japan is that there has been no denunciation of the Treaty; that the position therefore is that it will continue in any case for twelve months. Is that so?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes.

Mr. Hughes: What is best then that should be done now; are we to leave Japan in ignorance of what our intention is?

Mr. Lloyd George: We had better get the legal opinion first of all, and then discuss that afterwards. That will take some time to discuss.

Opinion as to duration of Treaty.

The Lord Chancellor: The Cabinet asked me this morning to give my attention to this matter. The technical side was new to me at the moment, and since then the Foreign Office have placed at my disposal the necessary papers. I have had very little time to put the conclusion which I have reached into suitable language, but I will briefly state what that conclusion is. It is not primarily or exclusively a question of law with which we are concerned; it is a question of the appropriate means to construe diplomatic documents in a matter which is not capable of decision by the Courts, and cannot be pronounced upon by a Judge. It is a matter upon which any representative of any Dominion here or any layman coming from the Home Country is as competent to form an opinion as a lawyer. I will briefly state the facts. We are concerned to construe article 6 of the Agreement. It is as follows:—

"The present agreement shall come into effect immediately after the date of its signature, and remain in force for ten years from that date.

"In case neither of the High Contracting Parties should have notified twelve months before the expiration of the said ten years the intention of terminating it, it shall remain binding until the expiration of one year from the day on which either of the High Contracting Parties shall have denounced it. But if, when the date fixed for its expiration arrives, either ally is actually engaged in war, the Alliance shall, ipso facto, continue until peace is concluded."

It is necessary therefore to decide what kind of act was contemplated by those who drafted article 6 for the purpose of bringing the Agreement to an end. It is that one of the contracting parties shall notify the intention of terminating it, and the notice that was to be given was a notice that might be properly described as denunciation.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Following that a notification was addressed to the League of Nations on the 8th July, 1920, by the Governments of Great Britain and Japan, and the language of that must be read. The document is not long:—

Notification to League of Nations in 1920.

"The Governments of Great Britain and Japan have come to the conclusion that the Anglo-Japanese Agreement of the 13th July, 1911, now existing between the two countries, though in harmony with the spirit of the Covenant of the League of Nations, is not entirely consistent with the letter of that Covenant which both Governments earnestly desire to respect. They have the honour therefore to notify to the League that if this Agreement is to continue after July 1921 it must be in a form which is not inconsistent with that Covenant."

The Governments of the two Empires in other words notify the League of Nations that, in their opinion, the Agreement existing between them is consistent with the spirit of the Covenant of the League of Nations, but requires verbal alterations, and they inform the League that they recognise the principle that if the Agreement is to be continued it must be in a form not inconsistent verbally with the Covenant, and the suggestion is made and was accepted for some time by persons consulted, that the document which I have just read can be construed as being a notification under the terms of article 6 that there is an intention to terminate it or to denounce it, to adopt the other expression contained in that article.

The first observation I have to make as one whose duty it is to construe legal documents is that I should have so read article 6 as to infer from it that the notification contemplated by its terms was a communication addressed by one of the contracting parties to the other contracting party, and while it is not inconceivable that the two contracting parties might adopt what they consider a convenient course of embodying such notification in a communication addressed to a third party, one would require or expect that the circumstances should be very unusual or explicit in character. I detect no explicitness in the document and that document is expressed in quite a different way. There are certain ways in which this instrument could be brought into line with the Covenant of the League of Nations, and it was discovered, not that the spirit of this Agreement was in any way inconsistent with the Covenant, but some verbal alterations might be required in its character, and therefore it was intimated by the two Governments that it was proposed to make these verbal alterations. It seems a remarkable construction to say that the communication made by the two parties, for a reason which is most clear and intelligible, to the League of Nations is to be construed as the denunciation which article 6 requires. If it had ended there, I should have hesitated before I assented to the view that the effect of what was communicated to the League of Nations was a denunciation of the Treaty.

I ought to point out that the matter was presented, in my view, without most of the material facts to the Law Officers. It was presented in a shape which merely raises the issue as one of construction without informing them of those facts which ought materially to be known by them. I should entertain great doubt merely on the point of construction as to the view which they formed, but the other circumstances to which I have called attention now have convinced me that their view could not be supported, and led me to conjecture that, had they had these facts before them, their view would have been different, and the Solicitor-General does not dissent from the view I have mentioned. The facts I have in mind are these: One of the contracting parties, the Japanese Government, has taken the view that that which was done did not mean a denunciation, and was not intended to be a denunciation.

Lord Curzon's opinion.

Lord Curzon, who has had a very great experience in construing these diplomatic documents, though he does not pretend to be a lawyer, was also of the same opinion, and when he was advised by his technical advisers at the Foreign Office that they inclined to the other construction, I understand that his judgment dissented, and he has never taken the view that this was intended to be the effect, or was the effect.

Opinion that no denunciation of the Treaty has taken place.

It is quite obvious when construing a diplomatic document it is important you should know what is the view that is taken on a communication upon which so much is admitted to be founded as the communication to the League of Nations. The Law Officers were not informed either of the view held by the Japanese Government or of the view held by the Foreign Secretary. In construing a document and the records, everyone here who has had experience of law knows, of course, that it is convenient in the main to collect the wishes and intentions of the parties from that

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

It is dated the 13th July, 1911, and article 6 of the Treaty reads as follows:—

"The present agreement shall come into effect immediately after the date of its signature, and remain in force for ten years from that date.

"In case neither of the High Contracting Parties should have notified twelve months before the expiration of the said ten years the intention of terminating it, it shall remain binding until the expiration of one year from the day on which either of the High Contracting Parties shall have denounced it. But if, when the date fixed for its expiration arrives, either ally is actually engaged in war, the Alliance shall, ipso facto, continue until peace is concluded."

But something was done last year which was tantamount to a denunciation. That has not been the Foreign Secretary's view, and it is not the view of Japan. This morning we decided to submit the question to the Lord Chancellor, who would confer with the Solicitor-General. It had never been submitted to the Law Officers before.

The Lord Chancellor: Yes, the case had been before them.

Considers Treaty does not expire July 1921, but would like Lord Chancellor's opinion.

Mr. Lloyd George: I have not had an opportunity of seeing the Lord Chancellor since, and I would like to ask him to express his view on that subject; but at the present moment you have this position: There has been no formal denunciation of the Treaty; it is purely inferential. Japan does not take the view that there has been a denunciation. In that case, until twelve months' notice is given this thing lasts for twelve months from the date when you gave the notice. There would then be no question of renewal; it would purely be a question of whether we should decide to denounce the Treaty. That would give time for the Conference which Mr. Meighen and all are very anxious to secure, a Conference between all the Powers engaged in the Pacific to clear up the whole situation, and above all to get rid of the inevitable war. You would discuss the question of armaments and all the other various questions. We should have a state of things where we could carry the United States of America with us without insulting a very brave and loyal ally. Whoever may have reason to complain about the conduct of Japan, we have not, and I trust it will be possible to reconcile the whole of these positions, and not only that, but to disperse what is a very menacing cloud in the Pacific.

Mr. Hughes: Allow me to ask you one question before the Lord Chancellor begins. You say that the present position in the opinion of Japan is that there has been no denunciation of the Treaty; that the position therefore is that it will continue in any case for twelve months. Is that so?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes.

Mr. Hughes: What is best then that should be done now; are we to leave Japan in ignorance of what our intention is?

Mr. Lloyd George: We had better get the legal opinion first of all, and then discuss that afterwards. That will take some time to discuss.

Opinion as to duration of Treaty.

The Lord Chancellor: The Cabinet asked me this morning to give my attention to this matter. The technical side was new to me at the moment, and since then the Foreign Office have placed at my disposal the necessary papers. I have had very little time to put the conclusion which I have reached into suitable language, but I will briefly state what that conclusion is. It is not primarily or exclusively a question of law with which we are concerned; it is a question of the appropriate means to construe diplomatic documents in a matter which is not capable of decision by the Courts, and cannot be pronounced upon by a Judge. It is a matter upon which any representative of any Dominion here or any layman coming from the Home Country is as competent to form an opinion as a lawyer. I will briefly state the facts. We are concerned to construe article 6 of the Agreement. It is as follows:—

"The present agreement shall come into effect immediately after the date of its signature, and remain in force for ten years from that date.

"In case neither of the High Contracting Parties should have notified twelve months before the expiration of the said ten years the intention of terminating it, it shall remain binding until the expiration of one year from the day on which either of the High Contracting Parties shall have denounced it. But if, when the date fixed for its expiration arrives, either ally is actually engaged in war, the Alliance shall, ipso facto, continue until peace is concluded."

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

It is necessary therefore to decide what kind of act was contemplated by those who drafted article 6 for the purpose of bringing the Agreement to an end. It is that one of the contracting parties shall notify the intention of terminating it, and the notice that was to be given was a notice that might be properly described as denunciation.

Notification to League of Nations in 1920.

Following that a notification was addressed to the League of Nations on the 8th July, 1920, by the Governments of Great Britain and Japan, and the language of that must be read. The document is not long:—

"The Governments of Great Britain and Japan have come to the conclusion that the Anglo-Japanese Agreement of the 13th July, 1911, now existing between the two countries, though in harmony with the spirit of the Covenant of the League of Nations, is not entirely consistent with the letter of that Covenant which both Governments earnestly desire to respect. They have the honour therefore to notify to the League that if this Agreement is to continue after July 1921 it must be in a form which is not inconsistent with that Covenant."

The Governments of the two Empires in other words notify the League of Nations that, in their opinion, the Agreement existing between them is consistent with the spirit of the Covenant of the League of Nations, but requires verbal alterations, and they inform the League that they recognise the principle that if the Agreement is to be continued it must be in a form not inconsistent verbally with the Covenant, and the suggestion is made and was accepted for some time by persons consulted, that the document which I have just read can be construed as being a notification under the terms of article 6 that there is an intention to terminate it or to denounce it, to adopt the other expression contained in that article.

The first observation I have to make as one whose duty it is to construe legal documents is that I should have so read article 6 as to infer from it that the notification contemplated by its terms was a communication addressed by one of the contracting parties to the other contracting party, and while it is not inconceivable that the two contracting parties might adopt what they consider a convenient course of embodying such notification in a communication addressed to a third party, one would require or expect that the circumstances should be very unusual or explicit in character. I detect no explicitness in the document and that document is expressed in quite a different way. There are certain ways in which this instrument could be brought into line with the Covenant of the League of Nations, and it was discovered, not that the spirit of this Agreement was in any way inconsistent with the Covenant, but some verbal alterations might be required in its character, and therefore it was intimated by the two Governments that it was proposed to make these verbal alterations. It seems a remarkable construction to say that the communication made by the two parties, for a reason which is most clear and intelligible, to the League of Nations is to be construed as the denunciation which article 6 requires. If it had ended there, I should have hesitated before I assented to the view that the effect of what was communicated to the League of Nations was a denunciation of the Treaty.

I ought to point out that the matter was presented, in my view, without most of the material facts to the Law Officers. It was presented in a shape which merely raises the issue as one of construction without informing them of those facts which ought materially to be known by them. I should entertain great doubt merely on the point of construction as to the view which they formed, but the other circumstances to which I have called attention now have convinced me that their view could not be supported, and led me to conjecture that, had they had these facts before them, their view would have been different, and the Solicitor-General does not dissent from the view I have mentioned. The facts I have in mind are these: One of the contracting parties, the Japanese Government, has taken the view that that which was done did not mean a denunciation, and was not intended to be a denunciation.

Lord Curzon's opinion.

Lord Curzon, who has had a very great experience in construing these diplomatic documents, though he does not pretend to be a lawyer, was also of the same opinion, and when he was advised by his technical advisers at the Foreign Office that they inclined to the other construction, I understand that his judgment dissented, and he has never taken the view that this was intended to be the effect, or was the effect.

Opinion that no denunciation of the Treaty has taken place.

It is quite obvious when construing a diplomatic document it is important you should know what is the view that is taken on a communication upon which so much is admitted to be founded as the communication to the League of Nations. The Law Officers were not informed either of the view held by the Japanese Government or of the view held by the Foreign Secretary. In construing a document and the records, everyone here who has had experience of law knows, of course, that it is convenient in the main to collect the wishes and intentions of the parties from that which they have placed on record in the instruments, but that is a rule which is adopted for general convenience and is recognised to be a rational one because it is found in the ordinary litigations by ordinary individuals that it is a fair guide as to what the intentions of the parties were. But where you have in the construction of a high diplomatic instrument a concurrence of opinion between the representatives of the High Contracting Parties as to that which they intended by a communication to a third party, it is absolutely impossible, in my judgment, even if the matter were abundantly clear, that you are to go by the terms of a communication which we know from the evidence of both parties was not intended to support that construction. I should find great difficulty even if one or both of the parties said it was their intention to have founded a denunciation upon this communication to accept that view, but when I am asked to see in a document of this kind such a denunciation and at the same time am assured by each of the parties to that denunciation that they never intended to make it, I for one have not a vestige of doubt upon these facts. Prime Minister, I make no observations on the policy in the matter, but upon the technical matter on which you have asked my opinion for the purpose of this Conference I have no hesitation whatever in saying that we should adhere to the view that no denunciation has taken place. There is no technical reason whatever why we should not adopt that course, and indeed, it is one I should feel no difficulty in supporting and in vindicating in any legal company. One sentence I should have added. It might be urged that the conduct of the parties had been inconsistent with the view I have just advocated in this respect, that a three months' renewal has been arranged between them during the period of discussion. I should explain the adoption of that course by supposing that inasmuch as the question had been raised, it was raised by ourselves as to whether or not that which had been done amounted to a denunciation, it was necessary while the matter was being discussed and while a decision upon this matter was pending that there should be a period of time which should render these discussions possible and I assume that to be the explanation.

Mr. Lloyd George: That seems to me completely to change the whole situation. You see it is a different proposition now.

Mr. Meighen: The situation is this, as I understand it, between Japan and ourselves things are not exactly in the same position in regard to the Treaty as if no communication had been made to the League of Nations. That is to say, it does not expire on the 13th or until a year's notice of denunciation has been given, but as between Japan and Great Britain on the one side, and the League on the other, Japan and Great Britain are under an obligation to remodel the words of the agreement. Lord Chancellor, is it your opinion that it should end on the 13th July?

Lord Chancellor: No.

Mr. Meighen: I agree.

Lord Chancellor: I am very glad to have your agreement.

Mr. Meighen: Then we are in this position that we are discussing something quite different.

General Smuts: The policy still remains.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, the policy still remains. The Conference certainly is of value.

Mr. Meighen: I should certainly have reconsidered my remarks had I known it. I took pains to find out what the situation was.

Mr. Lloyd George: When I applied my mind to the document, I do not pretend to know much about law, though I have had some legal training, I was surprised at the opinion that has been given and I ventured to invite another opinion, the highest legal opinion in this country, and the Lord Chancellor was good enough, at the request of the Cabinet, to go into the matter very carefully and I understand that Lord Curzon always took that view though he thought the lawyers knew better; therefore, he accepted their advice.

Lord Chancellor: In justice to the Law Officers, it should be said that when they gave their opinion they were not told that Japan and Lord Curzon held that view and I think it should have been done.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Lord Curzon: What it means in practice is this, that the year's extension that I suggested we certainly get anyhow under the terms of the existing document.

General Smuts: It runs on to the 13th July, 1922.

Mr. Lloyd George: It runs until you give twelve months' notice.

General Smuts: Is it going to run on for ever or for the twelve months?

Mr. Lloyd George: That is the issue now.

General Smuts: The only point now is this, Mr. Massey. It is clear if this opinion is correct that this Treaty will run on automatically until the 13th July, 1922, and it will continue to run on further unless it is terminated by a denunciation.

Mr. Massey: It runs on indefinitely as I understand it until denounced by one of the High Contracting Parties and for twelve months afterwards. We are in a greatly improved position from what we were in when the discussion commenced. I think the discussion has done much good and has cleared the atmosphere, and from that point of view we are much better off than we were.

Proposes postponement, to enable Mr. Meighen to reconsider the new situation.

Mr. Lloyd George: You have still the important question of what you are going to do to clear up the situation in the Pacific, and if you intend to alter your Treaty, in what sense? I suggest, and it is only fair to Mr. Meighen to give him time to consider how this affects his attitude and position in the whole matter, I suggest we should take our discussion early next week. A further discussion whether you are going to denounce or whether you are going to invite the parties to come to a Conference without denunciation, and if so, what line you are going to take there.

Need to communicate with Japan.

Mr. Massey: In the meantime, do you propose to communicate with Japan giving them any idea of what is taking place?

Mr. Lloyd George: I think that is essential.

Lord Curzon: We must do it at once. We must put the thing right within twenty-four hours from now.

Mr. Hughes: Prime Minister, I quite agree that the position is altered, and we should postpone the discussion to give Mr. Meighen time for consideration. But I want to know what is in your mind—the mind of the British Government—in regard to the policy of renewal which is not affected by this? Is it suggested, for example, that we should declare our intention to Japan, I mean, publicly?

Mr. Lloyd George: Is that not the point which will be discussed at the adjourned Conference? That is the point, but I thought it would be fair after this tremendous change in the position to give Mr. Meighen especially an opportunity, because that is the question that must be discussed among ourselves.

Question as to whether Japan wishes a Tripartite understanding.

Mr. Meighen: Has any attempt been made to ascertain whether Japan is willing to come to a joint understanding, a tripartite understanding, between herself, America and ourselves?

Lord Curzon: No. I have been waiting. The matter has from time to time been alluded to in conversations between the Japanese Ambassador and myself, but I have always taken the line of saying I can make no proposals to him on behalf of the Government until this Conference met and gave its opinion together. I can at any time renew conversations with the Japanese Ambassador, but I shall not do it until I have received instructions from you that the moment has arrived, and when we have the renewed discussions which the Prime Minister has invited, you will no doubt say to me, go to the American Ambassador on the one hand, and the Japanese Ambassador on the other, and see how the land lies, but in the meantime I am all in favour of the discussion which the Prime Minister has suggested. Mr. Meighen may in the new position be able to give advice which may help me a great deal in approaching one party or the other.

Mr. Lloyd George: Lord Curzon cannot discuss the matter with the American or Japanese Ambassador until he knows the point of view of this Conference, and therefore it is desirable that the conversations should be postponed until after our discussion, so that he can go there fully enlightened as to the views of the whole Empire.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Lord Curzon: I hope our discussion will not be too long postponed. Mr. Meighen says he will only be in this country another three weeks. The same applies to General Smuts.

Mr. Lloyd George: Let us have it to-morrow. It is very important what should and what should not appear in the papers. Any premature publication in the papers of the discussions is very injurious. I think there should be an official statement.

Mr. Hughes: Does that mean that after the 21st Canada will not be represented here at all?

Mr. Meighen: We may be through by the 21st. It will depend on what remains by the 21st. I think we should be able to get through by that time.

Mr. Hughes: I think we should, too, if we go on in the way we have been going on.

Mr. Lloyd George: If we push along we shall be able to get most of our work done.

Mr. Hughes: I agree with Lord Curzon, it should be settled, and with all respect, Sir, I suggest we return to it on Monday.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Meighen is willing to go on to-morrow, and it affects him more than anybody else, this change of opinion.

Undesirability of publication until definite decision reached.

If I may revert to the other matter, I trust that there will be no report given to any of the newspapers of what has happened here until we come to some definite decision, because there are matters which affect so many countries. America is watching everything that is happening, also Japan and China, apart from the Dominions, and France, and the other countries. It is important, therefore, that there should be no partial revelation of what transpires. There was a rather full account in the "Times" to-day, given evidently by somebody who had heard the discussion, though it was not quite a full account.

Mr. Meighen: I am sure that nobody who heard the discussion here could have given the account I read in the "Morning Post."

Mr. Lloyd George: There are inaccurate accounts, of course, but the account in the "Times" is rather too accurate for anyone to infer that it had not been given by somebody who was present.

Mr. Massey: I know what happens in my country. A smart reporter goes round to everybody concerned, and gets a little from each, and is able to put together a fairly accurate report of what has taken place. I have known it happen scores of times.

Mr. Chamberlain: Nobody ought to be able to get anything from anybody. That is the only way.

Mr. Lloyd George: Until we come to a decision, and then we will decide to what extent we will publish. There may or may not be harm in publishing it, but that is a matter which we can consider.

We will adjourn now, and if we get through the Japanese question to-morrow morning we will take Naval Defence in the afternoon.

Leakage of information to the "Times."

Mr. Lloyd George: I am afraid I must again call attention to the unauthorised publication of a very partial and one-sided report in to-day's "Times" of our proceedings yesterday. It is accurate enough to make it quite clear that it must have been given by someone who was present in the room. On the other hand, it is very incomplete, and that is one of the evils of these breaches of confidence and obligations of honour. I am sorry I have to put it as high as that. It is an obligation of honour upon all of us here not to communicate any information outside except such as is agreed upon. It is an indiscretion which affects our business here, because until we come to a definite agreement I can well understand partial communications being thoroughly mischievous. In to-day's "Times" the opinion of the Lord Chancellor is given, and the facts of who spoke.

Mr. Hughes: They put in a good report yesterday, and I cannot understand how they got it.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is undoubtedly communicated by someone inside this room at the present moment, and I think it is very serious if we cannot trust each other not to reveal things we have agreed not to reveal.

General Smuts: It is a terrible thing.

Mr. Lloyd George: Such a leakage makes it very difficult for us.

Sir Thomas Smartt: To-day's report is much fuller than yesterday's even.

Mr. Meighen: I did not see the account in the "Times" yesterday, but the account in the "Morning Post" was wrong. Apparently warnings are no good. I suggest that you adopt some means to ascertain the source of the information, and, after ascertaining the source, that you make known here before all of us what the result of your enquiry is.

Lord Curzon: The worst of it is that the papers will not tell you the source of their information.

Mr. Meighen: We have had the same difficulty in Canada, and we usually get out of it.

Mr. Balfour: Does the report in to-day's "Times" show bias?

Mr. Lloyd George: It is incomplete, and therefore that means it is biassed. It does not put the whole thing. We might come to a conclusion in the end after a good deal of discussion which would make us feel that we did not want to report what happened before we came to that conclusion. You want to keep your hands free right up to the end to come to a conclusion, but you cannot do that if you are committed at every stage by partial reports. It makes a Conference of this kind impossible, for it is a Cabinet after all.

Mr. Massey: I certainly think it ought to be cleared up.

Mr. Lloyd George: This Conference meets under the same conditions as a Cabinet.

Mr. Massey: It is unpleasant, because suspicion attaches to every one of us.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is what I mean. It makes it difficult for all of us.

Mr. Massey: I happen to know that one of the "Times" men had it last night.

Mr. Hughes: Looking at the report fairly, I do not think it is to be explained by any deliberate leakage here. Do you think so?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, I do. It has happened two days in succession. Take the Lord Chancellor's opinion; that is a thing that nobody knew anything about. I did not know the Lord Chancellor's opinion until about 5 o'clock. I think Lord Curzon told me a little time before he spoke what the Lord Chancellor's opinion was, and that was the first I heard of it.

Mr. Hughes: The report gives the Lord Chancellor's opinion as well as the fact that he was here.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes; it really gives an account of what happened and says that the Lord Chancellor's opinion altered the whole position. That is a very unfortunate thing, and I do appeal to whoever has been giving the information . . . .

Mr. Hughes: I believe these things come out at dinners.

Mr. Lloyd George: There is no question of a dinner here. If it had come out at dinner you must remember that the other papers would have had it as well. This must have been given to a "Times" correspondent and to no one else. If it had been simply gossiped about at dinner the other papers would have had it; but no other paper has it.

Mr. Meighen: Mr. Massey could give you the "Times" man who had the information last night.

Mr. Hughes: It has not done much harm yet, but it may do so. We never know where we are.

Mr. Lloyd George: It makes it difficult for all of us.

General Smuts: You do not know what you can say here. That is the danger, because possibly I say things here which, if they were reported, I would not say.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is the point. You always do that when you meet under Cabinet conditions. You would express your views in a totally different way or keep them to yourself if you thought they would be published in the papers. It is quite clear from the leading article that whoever talked to the "Times" man said that there was a desire that there should be no publication. He has even gone to the extent of communicating that fact.

Mr. Balfour: I am rather surprised that a paper like the "Times" should put it in.

Mr. Lloyd George: But that is what they do. In the old days the "Times" would not have done it, but that is another story.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Meighen: The discussion so far has proceeded on the assumption that, if no steps were taken between now and the 13th July, the Treaty would fall on that date. That turns out to be incorrect. We are now in this position, if no steps are taken, that the Treaty proceeds indefinitely, subject only to the power of either country to denounce it at one year's notice. The other fact that is now understood fully is that both countries are under obligations to the League of Nations to remodel the wording, and if I express my own opinion such remodelling should take effect from the 13th day of July. I observe in Lord Curzon's remarks the suggestion, based upon the assumption that the three months' extension would be agreed to, that instead of changing the terms of the agreement the same terms may be used, and the Council of the League of Nations should be given to understand by a joint note that, should any dispute arise affecting the two Powers, the provisions of the agreement would be subordinate to the Covenant. That, I suppose, is another alternative. Anyway, we find ourselves confronted with a new and material circumstance. I am not criticising Lord Curzon at all—I am sure he gave us what he was informed was the real position according to international law. However, the discussion that has taken place has had this value—it has served to make known generally the opinions of the various Dominions and of the British Government on the broad question of the renewal or the non-renewal of the Treaty. I think I should say a few words on that question and then I will come—and come very quickly—to a discussion of what, in the new state of facts, would be the best practical course to take. The position that Canada took was fairly completely disclosed in the correspondence of last February between myself and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. It was fully understood, I can well see, by the Foreign Secretary, and it was very fairly stated by him in his address before this Conference. I did, however, listen to a rather forceful attack, not on the position that Canada really took, but on a caricature of that position stated by the Prime Minister of Australia, and, I am afraid I must say, apparently acquiesced in by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Judging from their speeches I am afraid I failed in the address I made here to improve upon the communications of February. I must indeed have destroyed the entire effect of those communications in my remarks. It has been assumed that we are called upon here to discuss an alternative which involved the waiving aside of Japan, the cutting of that nation, the refusal even to speak to her, and the giving of the hand of fellowship instead to the United States of America. I do not want to overstate, in any degree, the effect of words used round this table. I am prepared to quote at any moment in support of my remarks. Indeed, it was assumed that we had urged upon the Conference a policy which would mean the taking of a course in international affairs, which, if the parallel were taken in private affairs, would be ungentlemanly.

Leakage of information to the "Times."

Mr. Lloyd George: I am afraid I must again call attention to the unauthorised publication of a very partial and one-sided report in to-day's "Times" of our proceedings yesterday. It is accurate enough to make it quite clear that it must have been given by someone who was present in the room. On the other hand, it is very incomplete, and that is one of the evils of these breaches of confidence and obligations of honour. I am sorry I have to put it as high as that. It is an obligation of honour upon all of us here not to communicate any information outside except such as is agreed upon. It is an indiscretion which affects our business here, because until we come to a definite agreement I can well understand partial communications being thoroughly mischievous. In to-day's "Times" the opinion of the Lord Chancellor is given, and the facts of who spoke.

Mr. Hughes: They put in a good report yesterday, and I cannot understand how they got it.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is undoubtedly communicated by someone inside this room at the present moment, and I think it is very serious if we cannot trust each other not to reveal things we have agreed not to reveal.

General Smuts: It is a terrible thing.

Mr. Lloyd George: Such a leakage makes it very difficult for us.

Sir Thomas Smartt: To-day's report is much fuller than yesterday's even.

Mr. Meighen: I did not see the account in the "Times" yesterday, but the account in the "Morning Post" was wrong. Apparently warnings are no good. I suggest that you adopt some means to ascertain the source of the information, and, after ascertaining the source, that you make known here before all of us what the result of your enquiry is.

Lord Curzon: The worst of it is that the papers will not tell you the source of their information.

Mr. Meighen: We have had the same difficulty in Canada, and we usually get out of it.

Mr. Balfour: Does the report in to-day's "Times" show bias?

Mr. Lloyd George: It is incomplete, and therefore that means it is biassed. It does not put the whole thing. We might come to a conclusion in the end after a good deal of discussion which would make us feel that we did not want to report what happened before we came to that conclusion. You want to keep your hands free right up to the end to come to a conclusion, but you cannot do that if you are committed at every stage by partial reports. It makes a Conference of this kind impossible, for it is a Cabinet after all.

Mr. Massey: I certainly think it ought to be cleared up.

Mr. Lloyd George: This Conference meets under the same conditions as a Cabinet.

Mr. Massey: It is unpleasant, because suspicion attaches to every one of us.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is what I mean. It makes it difficult for all of us.

Mr. Massey: I happen to know that one of the "Times" men had it last night.

Mr. Hughes: Looking at the report fairly, I do not think it is to be explained by any deliberate leakage here. Do you think so?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, I do. It has happened two days in succession. Take the Lord Chancellor's opinion; that is a thing that nobody knew anything about. I did not know the Lord Chancellor's opinion until about 5 o'clock. I think Lord Curzon told me a little time before he spoke what the Lord Chancellor's opinion was, and that was the first I heard of it.

Mr. Hughes: The report gives the Lord Chancellor's opinion as well as the fact that he was here.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes; it really gives an account of what happened and says that the Lord Chancellor's opinion altered the whole position. That is a very unfortunate thing, and I do appeal to whoever has been giving the information . . . .

Mr. Hughes: I believe these things come out at dinners.

Mr. Lloyd George: There is no question of a dinner here. If it had come out at dinner you must remember that the other papers would have had it as well. This must have been given to a "Times" correspondent and to no one else. If it had been simply gossiped about at dinner the other papers would have had it; but no other paper has it.

Mr. Meighen: Mr. Massey could give you the "Times" man who had the information last night.

Mr. Hughes: It has not done much harm yet, but it may do so. We never know where we are.

Mr. Lloyd George: It makes it difficult for all of us.

General Smuts: You do not know what you can say here. That is the danger, because possibly I say things here which, if they were reported, I would not say.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is the point. You always do that when you meet under Cabinet conditions. You would express your views in a totally different way or keep them to yourself if you thought they would be published in the papers. It is quite clear from the leading article that whoever talked to the "Times" man said that there was a desire that there should be no publication. He has even gone to the extent of communicating that fact.

Mr. Balfour: I am rather surprised that a paper like the "Times" should put it in.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Lloyd George: No, I did not say that. What I said was, a refusal to renew the Treaty with Japan would be contrary to that line.

Mr. Meighen: If I did not in my remarks give cause for the assumption, nobody did, so that the hypothesis was an impossible one. I took the pains to say that I accepted in full the assurance of the Foreign Secretary that Japan had fulfilled her every obligation and behaved as a true and loyal Ally through the war, and I stated that, under those circumstances, you could not cast her aside. Nor did General Smuts say anything that constituted a difference between his position and mine at all. I want to be distinctly understood as assuming that there is no criticism coming from us as regards war support, and I assumed that throughout the whole of my address. What I argued was this. That there is some criticism, and just criticism, due to Japan, not in so far as her support of us during the war was concerned, but in relation to that part of the Treaty which bound her to respect the integrity of China and the "Open Door." I argued that. That, I thought, should be taken into account in determining whether or not very special consideration should be given to Japan now. Such special consideration has been asked by those who support the renewal of the Treaty, whether or no. I expressed apprehension that the next few years would disclose a continuation of that aggrandisement with the inevitable consequence of impairing our good relations with other countries, who look with anything but favour upon the continuation of that policy by Japan. And I urged most strongly this, that the purpose of the original Treaty and of the renewal, having been fully met and having served to the advantage of both Powers, a new world situation now arises, three Great Powers emerge, all three having an almost equal interest in the Far East. It was not wisdom, I submitted, to cast an Ally contemptuously aside, but it was the part of wisdom to request that Ally and the other Powers concerned to meet us, and confer, and come to an understanding as to what should be done in that territory and what principles should govern these three Powers in determining the best course there. I suggested that it would be better—bearing in mind, of course, the assurance given that the Treaty would expire on the 13th July, if nothing were done—it would be better to do nothing in the meantime, except seek to come to this understanding with Japan to meet the United States in Conference rather than renew the Treaty, and in that position go to the United States of America. I felt that if we deliberately renewed the Treaty with Japan, and if we then asked the United States of America to come to the table with us, they might very naturally say: "This Conference is loaded against us. You would be coming to us in a much better position if you came the way we are coming—tied nowhere, anxious only to meet on an equality, and to seek to come to common ground." That is the position I took. I did not even suggest that if, having made that offer under the best of conditions, we should fail through the unreasonableness of the United States of America to reach results, I would not consider coming to an agreement with Japan alone. However, what I want to raise objection to chiefly is this—the misstatement of the course of policy which I have sought carefully to urge upon the Conference. The description given of my argument was wrong in another respect. I was even charged with espousing the cause of the United States of America, and with having argued the whole matter from their standpoint, instead of from the standpoint of the British Empire. That charge has at least the element of novelty as applied to me. I took pains to try to put what was in my mind in this respect in two or three sentences. I assumed that the necessity of friendship with America was, in fact, part of our world policy. It was so stated by the Foreign Secretary. I took his words to mean what they said. That being so, I sought to argue, and, to reinforce my argument, pointed out two things: first, the propinquity of Canada to the United States of America, and secondly, the resulting effect that Canada is able to understand their attitude. I gave my opinion that a renewal in any form under the conditions that presented themselves there would be unfavourable to those relations. I did not say that there would be a breach or a quarrel—not at all. I did not even intimate that. I meant just what I said, that it would prejudice our relations, that it would not conduce to improvement.

China.

British Empire, Japan and United States all largely interested in Far East.

Advisable to have Triple Conference before deciding to renew.

Considers that the policy advocated has been misunderstood.

I referred to the further fact that my opinion was confirmed in practically identical words in the last despatch of Sir Auckland Geddes, quoting the words of the Secretary of State of the United States himself. I venture to state that we should take the word of the Secretary of State of the United States in that regard. It would need overwhelming evidence to warrant us in going behind it. Therefore I assumed that a case had been made to show that to renew the Treaty in any form would tend to lead otherwise than to good relations with the United States. I emphasise the last cablegram of Sir Auckland Geddes the more because it followed a series of others, from the whole course of which it appeared that he himself was reluctant to come to the recommendation which he last expressed. Now then, believing on those two grounds that such would be the result of the renewal, and believing as I did as well that the major factor—I will not say the pivot—although I believe that was the word used by the Foreign Secretary—the major element of our policy is friendship with the American Republic, believing that those words really expressed the policy of Great Britain and were not mere words alone, I assumed that the effect of any steps which we should take upon our relations with that country was something that we had to take into account from our own standpoint, not from theirs. That conclusion surely was inevitable. If American and British concert and concord and friendship is a loadstar at all of foreign policy, then in deciding our course, selfishly from our own standpoint alone, we must give foremost consideration to the effect of that step upon American relations.

Now I will not go into anything further that has been said nor deal longer with the general broad position.

We are now at this point. The agreement, as just revealed, goes on, if nothing is done, indefinitely, subject to the right of either side to denounce on a year's notice. That is the position. Further, as between the two high contracting parties on the one side, and the League on the other, they are under obligations to subject the Treaty to the Covenant of the League of Nations. I am going to assume that that will be done. I do not know whether it is to be accomplished in the one way or the other, whether by a remodelling of the Treaty or merely by continuing the same Treaty and notifying the League that in application its covenants will prevail over the covenants of the Treaty. In my opinion it would be better to remodel and expressly to make the terms such that no exception could be taken from the standpoint of the League or from any other standpoint, such, for example, as was expressed at this table by the representatives of India or as expressed by the Foreign Secretary himself. The whole position is this—the agreement does run on for at least a year. For how long should it proceed? I think we should agree that it should proceed for a year, and in that respect I would give my concurrence to the suggestion of the Foreign Secretary, which appears as "B" (see appendix to E/10th meeting) on the special memorandum which he circulated on the 28th June. Perhaps I should read the whole of "B" before making any comment:—

Necessary to submit Treaty to the League of Nations.

Recommends revised Treaty should continue for one year.

> "B." "Temporary renewal of the existing agreement (brought into harmony with the Covenant of the League of Nations, and with mention of India possibly omitted) for a space of, say, one year from October 1921, so as to provide for the holding of an International Pacific Conference in the interval."

Let me read in connection with that some words of the Foreign Secretary that I think might also be brought to bear and their effect embodied in any renewal. I refer to, first, these words:—*

> "They are quite ready to accept the position that the views and position of China (by 'they' he means Japan) must also be taken into account, and also through the mouth of their Foreign Minister, Viscount Chinda, that we cannot possibly renew the agreement except after consultation with America."

Lord Curzon: That is a misprint. It is Uchida who is the Foreign Minister.

Mr. Meighen: I commend those words.† Then this:—

> "The Treaty in its present form is not desirable. The military clauses would excite very great suspicion and alarm in America, and we have gone beyond the stage either at which renewal in its present form, or something like it, is practicable."

The following as well:—†

> "The fourth alternative is one which, I think, on the whole, the Foreign Office is rather disposed to recommend, always subject to what may be said here, namely, that the agreement, if renewed, should be renewed in a different form, and after consultation with the United States on the one hand and with China on the other, and with the League of Nations . . .

Mr. Hughes: Which fourth alternative is that?

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Meighen: I think it is the same as "B"—

"should be renewed in a different form, and after consultation with the United States on the one hand and with China on the other, and with the League of Nations, its renewal being accompanied by an expression of willingness on our part"—and this I consider important—"to join the United States Government in an examination by Conference between interested parties of the Pacific problem." (See E/8th meeting, page 10.)

On the same page, the Foreign Secretary says these words,* it is not necessary for me to read the context, but he says, "with what we may call the suspicious clause removed from it on the other, for a time, say for a year, pending the decisions of the other Conference to which I have referred." I know what this involves, but I think it cannot be avoided, it involves going into the Conference as an ally of Japan, but it involves that result under conditions that are wholly different from what would have been the conditions if, facing the fact that the agreement was to end, we took the positive step of renewal. We do not now face that fact. We face the fact that the agreement stands and that, without doing something (which we cannot be called upon to do), we must come to the Conference as an ally to Japan. I therefore would urge this, that the Foreign Secretary does, what I feel sure he is disposed to do, meet the representatives of Japan, China and of the United States, and being frank with them ask them to be just as frank with him. He should seek to find out precisely what each of them wants, what each of them expects. He should make known the position of this country, its friendship for Japan, its friendship for America, its friendship for China, and he should endeavour to get the assent of them all to what he described as the Pacific Conference. He should endeavour to secure concurrence that such Conference be held at the earliest possible date, and that nothing be done in the meantime that will prejudice its success—for I can easily see how many things could be done—but that everything be done to seek to ensure its success so that before this year expires, and as early as all the parties can agree, an understanding among these four Powers arrived at through a Pacific Conference shall be substituted for an exclusive confidential relationship with Japan.

Recommends discussion with Japan, China and United States.

Mr. Lloyd George: Although I am not in agreement with Mr. Meighen's preliminary criticism—I think he has taken a rather too exaggerated view of Mr. Hughes's reply—I have been refreshing my memory by looking up the notes of what I said. I was simply dealing with two alternatives and started by saying they were quite reconcilable. If we were to decide as between the renewal of the Treaty with Japan and friendship with America, that would be very serious, and I pointed out how serious it would be if we had to refuse friendship with Japan. To refuse renewal with Japan, in my opinion, that would be conduct that would not become the dignity of the Empire. On the other hand, I pointed out how very serious it would be if we had a quarrel with America. I think that is very much on the lines on which General Smuts spoke before. I said that how can we reconcile the two positions and the conclusion, and what Mr. Meighen has said before, confirmed by what he has said now, shows that he is of the same mind. It also justifies another observation I made, that in a Conference, although the views may be very conflicting and antagonistic and apparently irreconcilable, in the end with goodwill you generally find an agreement, and I feel sure the Conference will agree with the conclusion of Mr. Meighen that the Foreign Secretary should explore the grounds and by communicating with the representatives of America, Japan and China, find out exactly what the position is. There is only one part of Mr. Meighen's proposals which I think it would be difficult or impossible for us in that form to comply with. When the Foreign Secretary proposed originally that the agreement should be renewed for a year, he was under the impression that the agreement had come to an end, or would come to an end, at the end of three months from July. Now we are in a different position. The agreement only comes to an end after we have denounced it, and twelve months after the denouncement, and in order to carry out the Foreign Secretary's proposals now on the present basis we should give notice to Japan that twelve months hence the agreement would come to an end. That would be very undesirable before we enter into a Conference. There is no reason for delay in summoning this Conference. I am sure America will be delighted to respond to an invitation, and the same applies to China and Japan, and to this country. Therefore, it is much better to leave the thing where it is, subject to such modifications as those indicated by Mr. Meighen, which would adapt the agreement to the League of Nations. That is another matter, but we should not give notice to Japan terminating the agreement.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Hughes: What would follow from that?

Mr. Lloyd George: What would follow would be this, that things would remain where they are, but we would go into Conference.

Mr. Hughes: Where are they now; what will happen in twelve months from whatever date you take?

Mr. Lloyd George: Nothing happens until you give twelve months' notice.

Mr. Meighen: You must, it seems to me, enter into a new agreement. There must be a new document if we are going to comply with our promise to the League of Nations. Consequently, on the 13th July a new agreement must be made, and everything depends upon what is embodied in such agreement. The terms of the old one will not apply.

New agreement necessary to meet League of Nations.

Mr. Lloyd George: You are not going to alter the whole agreement; you are only going to alter it in two particulars at the outside.

Mr. Meighen: That is what we are discussing. We enter into an agreement for a year because we could not ask for any shorter time, but we comply fully with suggestion "B" of the Foreign Secretary.

Lord Curzon: I think I can clear the ground as regards the first point. You have been discussing what is or ought to be the consequence of the communication we have made to the League of Nations, which cannot be wiped off the slate altogether. There are two ways of doing the thing. Assuming, as we must, that the original Agreement itself remains in existence for a year, as we take the intention to be, how are we in the interval to bring it into harmony with the provisions of the Covenant of the League? There are two ways, I think, of doing it. One would be by consulting the League as to such remodelling of those parts of the original agreement as may be inconsistent with the conditions of the Covenant. That is, drawing up a new document. The other would be to lay down that in any respect in which the procedure of the agreement is discovered in practice to be inconsistent with the procedure laid down by the Covenant of the League, the latter is to prevail. We can deal with the matter in either of these ways, and probably we should consult the Council of the League as to the method of procedure which they would recommend. Am I clear on that?

Manner of remodelling Treaty to meet League of Nations.

Mr. Meighen: Yes. I am aware that if you conform to the conditions of the League you cannot, except by mutual agreement, do more. I think a year is plenty of time, and we can decide by then; but may I ask whether, in making the Treaty conform merely to the League of Nations' requirements, does that involve the elimination of the clause as to going to war? I gather that to be the intention from your remarks to the Conference.

Lord Curzon: That involves correspondence with the Council of the League. We have said to them that we understand that in certain particulars we agree that the original agreement is not applicable. We are willing to modify it after consultation with them. Mr. Balfour could explain the probable attitude of the League, but in order to escape a perhaps difficult discussion on that point, I make the other suggestion that, without remodelling the original Agreement, in the interval before us, we should agree with the League that if any case should arise in which the procedure laid down in the Agreement is inconsistent with the procedure laid down by the Covenant, the latter should be in operative force.

Recommends that during interim Covenant of League should be operative.

What Mr. Meighen asks will be for the Council to decide. Surely the position is clear. If your advice is taken, as I apprehend it will be, it is my duty to get into immediate communication with the Japanese Ambassador first, the American Ambassador second, and the Chinese Minister third, with a view to suggesting a Conference on these matters between the three Powers, or if possible the four. In the interval the Agreement stands. Notification to denounce could only be given by agreement between Japan and ourselves. It would be an arbitrary act if we were now to commence these operations by notifying our intention to denounce, but later on when the Conference has met and is proceeding to arrive at a solution—as I hope it may, an adjustment of the Agreement can be considered to see if it can be succeeded by something better. That is the course of procedure that will have to be followed.

No denunciation necessary.

Mr. Meighen: I do not think that any denunciation is necessary.

Lord Curzon: That is what I was arguing.

Mr. Meighen: I do not think it is necessary, because you will have to sign a new document and everything depends on what you put in that document. You do not require, do you, to put in Clause 6?

Lord Curzon: That is a matter of legal interpretation.

Mr. Lloyd George: Would it not be advisable to have these conversations before we finally determine this last point? Then Lord Curzon will report to the Conference later on what is the result.

Necessity for clear announcement of British and Canadian views.

Mr. Hughes: Before the matter is argued other views might be heard, because I must confess I should like to understand precisely what Mr. Meighen's proposal is. Very much depends upon that; and I should like to know what the views of the British Government are, and with what qualifications or limitations, if any, it is proposed to follow the course suggested by the Foreign Secretary, and now approved by Mr. Meighen, subject possibly to some reservations which he has outlined.

Let me say a word or two on Mr. Meighen's remarks this morning. He has complained of what I said, and of what the Prime Minister has said, as being caricatures of his attitude. I need hardly say, speaking for myself, that they were not intended to be such, and I am sorry that they should be so regarded; but I would ask Mr. Meighen to read his speech of this morning and compare it with the speech he delivered the other day, and see what a vast difference there is. He will find on comparing his two speeches that they differ on the point of the true attitude of Canada. As he has put the matter forward this morning I could take no exception to it, because he now says we ought to consider America, and America's views as they affect us. Of course we should. In that, I am entirely with him, but, with regard to the world's position and the effect of a non-renewal of this Treaty upon that position, I see no reason whatever to say anything to qualify what I said before.

Japan must be treated as a friend.

One thing is obvious—we must deal with the world problems either by force or by arrangement. We must treat Japan as a friend, and induce her to go that way which we think right and proper in the world's interests, or fall back on force. And where is that force? The answer is that it does not exist, or if it does exist, it can only be marshalled with such consequences to Britain and the Empire as to be absolutely ruinous. That is a fact we cannot ignore, and I asked Mr. Meighen, as I ask him now, to look at the position that Japan occupies in the Pacific, and to remember that Australia is a Pacific Power, and its destiny lies in the Pacific; and at the present we can lean on nothing but the China squadron and our own. When we come to discuss the question of naval defence we shall see what these amount to. It is sufficient to say now that they do not even give us a sporting chance to defend, and adequately protect, the whole of our recent possessions.

Although Mr. Meighen spoke about the League of Nations and the necessity for conforming to the requirements of the Covenant, he did not mention that America had announced her intention of having the greatest navy in the world. He does not suggest that she should conform to the League of Nations from which she steadfastly holds aloof. But we must do so.

Consequences of refusal to renew Treaty.

I am not going to press the matter any further than to repeat once more that Mr. Meighen has not attempted to deal with the consequences that must inevitably arise from our refusal to renew this Treaty. Those consequences are obvious, and they are inevitable. Those consequences, it is true, will not fall upon Canada directly, but she will assuredly suffer if the effects are felt by any portion of the Empire. Naturally, a Power like Japan, if she decides to strike, will select the most vulnerable spot. I explained why, in my opinion, Canada would not suffer. Japan and America both occupy impregnable positions; though they might do infinite harm neither can destroy the other. We may lay that down as an axiom but they can do infinite harm to us and to the world. What you said, Sir, seems to me unassailable. If we alter the status quo, we say to an Ally of twenty years standing, "We want you no more," and this at a moment when we have not the means to meet that old friend's just resentment at our cavalier and disdainful treatment. We have not got the force, and we cannot look anywhere in this world for an Ally. I mean an Ally that will, if need be, support us with the sword. Where are we going to look for one? If there is a peaceful solution possible, well, you, Sir, have taken the first step along that road. You say, "Come, let us reason together; we are members of the League of Nations."

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Lloyd George: You cannot say that to America.

Mr. Hughes: No; I am speaking for the Empire, we are members of the League of Nations. That is the first point. Then you have said to a nation that obstinately remains outside the League, "Come, let us have an understanding." Both these invitations appeal to deaf ears. America will not come in, and she will not agree to a limitation of armaments.

Lord Lee: Does Mr. Hughes say that an answer has been received from America declining to take part in a discussion on armaments? On the contrary, I think she passed a resolution to the contrary yesterday.

Mr. Lloyd George: Lord Lee's point is that America is prepared to discuss a reduction of armaments.

Mr. Hughes: Yes—of course the whole world is, but I ask Lord Lee, when is this discussion going to begin? Meantime we have a positive—resolute determination on the part of America to have the biggest navy in the world. On the other hand, in Britain, I suppose, two-thirds of the great battle fleet of the Navy is out of commission. This proposal does not seem to me to settle the point I yesterday ventured to put before the Prime Minister. It was this. What is the policy of this Conference in regard to a renewal? Who is to decide it? If we cannot decide it amongst ourselves, are we going to seek counsel elsewhere? And is our decision to be determined—I mean the question of renewal, never mind in what form or what conditions we are tempted to seek—the question is, is it going to be renewed?

This Conference competent to decide the question of renewal.

In any case policy for Empire should be renewal.

Let me ask Mr. Meighen this. He speaks of inviting America to sit down and discuss the question. If an opportunity were given to me to sit down with representatives of America and discuss this great question, no one would accept that invitation more eagerly than I, but I should enter that Conference with my views perfectly clear on the one main point, and that is, my intention to renew that Treaty. As to the form, I should enter that discussion with an open mind. I ask, therefore, what is it you want us to do? We intend to renew. But Mr. Meighen will have us begin again. It is a tabula rasa that he proposes to offer to this Pacific Conference. They may write on this slate whatever they please. I do not know whom he has in his mind, but what I want to say is this. We have come—Mr. Massey and I—12,000 miles to settle this question. It is now proposed we should go back and that there should be a Pacific Conference, that the question of whether there shall be a renewal or not, which we came to decide, is not to be settled now. If you say, "We will renew it, but the form will be a matter for discussion at this proposed Conference," then you have an entirely new situation, one to which I take no exception, but about which I should like to say one or two words. But if you mean, "Go back to your country now; we will have another Conference to which we shall invite somebody else," then you will go to a Conference in which we will be in a minority. China, Japan, America, and Britain are to be invited. Apparently the Dominions are not to be represented. In any event, the Empire will not be represented, because under the hypothesis you won't have a policy. You will go there with your policy nebulous. You do not propose to say definitely we are going to renew—that is the policy of the Empire. Until you have decided that, nothing can be done. If what Mr. Meighen really has in his mind is that we should be represented, it means that this Imperial Conference will change its venue, that it shall reassemble, and that it shall ask America, China, and Japan to confer with it a year hence or earlier. The objection which I put forward is in part removed; but only in part, because if we were not invited here to settle this question, what were we invited here to do. If you had intended to postpone a settlement, you could have done it by cable. Mr. Meighen lives a week distant from here. Whenever the Pacific Conference is held, he can attend it. In any case, the views he has put forward could as well be put forward by the United States of America, and there is no need for him to attend, but the views that Mr. Massey and I hold could not be put forward by anybody else than ourselves, nor can they be put forward by us because we cannot attend. If the Conference is to be held somewhere in the Pacific, that might solve the question for us, but not for you. So I hope, Sir, you will not forget that if you decide to postpone the Conference you merely put off the evil for another day, involving nothing to yourselves, but a great deal to us; you shut us out altogether, and if for no other reason, you ought not to do it. There is no part of the Empire with so direct and so vital an interest in this Treaty as Australasia. India has spoken, and has expressed the same views as ourselves. We are Pacific Powers; our destiny is there, and we simply cannot afford to offend a powerful neighbour. We could not afford to do it even if we so desired, and we have no desire whatever. We are scrupulously careful in our every word to avoid giving offence; we want to live in perfect amity. While we hope that America will walk in terms of warm friendship with the Empire, and while that is an ideal towards which we continuously strive, I think she is more likely to do so if we pursue a policy compatible with the interests of a great nation and a great Empire. What will America think of us if we walk haltingly; if we say to her, "We summoned the representatives of this Empire to discuss this question, but you took exception to it; and so we have postponed it. We are not asking the Empire to settle it any longer; we want you and China to sit round the table." If we do that we shall invite and deserve her utmost contempt.

I cannot agree to postponing the settlement of the terms upon which the Treaty is to be renewed. If it is decided as a definite unalterable policy to renew it, then we know where we are, and what is more, the United States will know where it is. They can have a voice in settling the form it shall take; we shall not be unwilling to listen to anything they have to say, but as to the actual policy of renewal, well, our interests are so wrapped up in the Pacific with Japan that we cannot break with her. We have no desire to break with her. We should not have won the war had she not been our Ally. Not an American soldier would ever have been on European soil; that much is absolutely certain, because the war would have been over long before the Americans arrived. And so in the interests of world peace we ought not to affront this Ally; we ought not to do this incredibly mean and inexcusable thing. I am in favour of a plain, straightforward declaration of our intention to renew. That being the policy, I leave the rest. I am perfectly willing there should be a Pacific Conference, if you like to call it a Pacific Conference. A Conference on which China can be represented. I want her views to be heard; I want the views of America to be heard. There is something else we are asked to settle this afternoon and to-morrow, the question of the naval defence of the Empire. How can we settle that if this dominant factor is still undetermined? Our naval policy in the Pacific is surely governed to some extent by the existence of the Treaty. What is Japan to think, when you tell her that this matter is not yet settled? You cannot tell what you are going to do; all you can say is, "We are going to refer it to a Conference." That will not be satisfactory to her. I shall say no more, but urge that this Conference shall declare unambiguously, in quite definite terms, that it is in favour of renewal; that that is its policy. As for the rest, so far from taking exception to America being called into consultation, I urge it. Far from taking exception to a Pacific Conference, I urge it. Let us tell America what she wants to know; let us tell her where we stand; then she will know she is dealing with a Power which knows what it wants, and she may then be willing to discuss how this can be secured without injury to herself.

Empire's policy in favour of renewal should be announced, and then Conference called to determine form of renewal.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think it is possible to have something to reconcile the views which have been expressed. I think Lord Curzon has some proposals.

Suggested procedure.

Lord Curzon: I have been trying to draw up in a tentative way the course of procedure which I understand the Conference on the whole to recommend. I will just read it. I daresay the language is not perfect. It has been drawn up in a hurry, but it is an attempt to arrive at a solution, and, of course, the object of the Government here is to find a bridge between the views of Mr. Meighen and Mr. Hughes and Mr. Massey, which I do not think, on the point of tactics and procedure, are at all irreconcilable. At any rate, I will read my attempt. The procedure which I understand we favour is as follows:—

1. I should inform the Japanese Government that the position is changed by the view that was expressed by the Lord Chancellor and the decision which was arrived at yesterday in consequence, and that no notification to denounce the Treaty has been given; therefore the agreement goes on.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

2. Tell the League, in pursuance of the communications we have already had with them, that we propose to deal with the whole Eastern and Pacific question in a larger spirit; that any new arrangement will be in harmony with the Covenant, and that in the meanwhile we are prepared to state that wherever the Covenant is found to be in conflict with the Treaty the Covenant is to prevail.
3. I am, here in London, to approach the Japanese and American Ambassadors and the Chinese Minister with a view to finding out whether the agreement as affected by what I have said concerning the Covenant of the League still remaining in existence, they will enter into a Conference upon the Pacific question in its largest aspect.
4. After my conversations with them, which could take place in the course of the next few days, I come back here and report to the Conference what is the result of these discussions.

Mr. Hughes: With the American Ambassador?

Lord Curzon: The Japanese and American Ambassadors and the Chinese Minister. That I then come back here during the course of the next fortnight and report to you what is the result of my conversations so that the matter will still be in your hands before we settle it.

5. That we do not notify our intention to denounce until a settlement has been arrived at by the new suggested Conference, or until a new Treaty has been drawn up by common agreement to replace the existing one. Should the Conference fail to arrive at any new agreement, the existing agreement as adapted to meet the requirements of the Covenant of the League goes on.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, all right.

Mr. Meighen: I am not in accord with all of that, but I will not say anything for a time.

Interests of New Zealand and Australia identical.

Mr. Massey: I think that what Lord Curzon has suggested will probably end in an agreement being arrived at which will get us out of the very serious difficulty with which we are face to face so far as Australia and New Zealand are concerned. There is no question that our interests in this respect, and I agree with every word that Mr. Hughes has said, are identical. In the event of war, and Heaven forbid that anything of the sort should come along, we stand or fall together. There is no question about that, and if we are not very careful I am afraid there will be all sorts of complications which may seriously affect the Pacific. Mr. Hughes has indicated that in his opinion we have been weakened by the war which has taken place and I think that must be admitted. We are weakened financially and weakened in man power. Perhaps so far as sea power is concerned our position is better than many people imagine, and I would like to think so. Personally, I think it is better than is generally supposed, but all the same in two or three years at the furthest, if Japan and America go on building as they propose to build, or as they are building, we shall undoubtedly be the third Power in the world instead of the first.

Mr. Lloyd George: Unless we build also.

Need for ally in the Pacific.

Mr. Massey: Unless we build, and I can only say that if these two Powers go on building our duty is perfectly clear. I would not hesitate a minute, but we have not come to that. We have come to a stage when it is necessary to have a powerful ally. Where can we look for a powerful ally but in Japan, and we have Japan for an ally now. Why on earth should we attempt to get rid of Japan, put her on one side, and, so to speak, go upon our own? To me it would be an act of supreme folly to do anything of the sort. So far as the proposed Conference is concerned, let us have a Conference by all means. I am not at all certain that America, though we know that America indulges in a good deal of bluff when diplomacy is concerned, would consider this an unfriendly act; and, by the way, I am not using the term "unfriendly act" in the way in which it is sometimes understood in matters of diplomacy. Perhaps it is too strong a term to use. But I am not at all certain that America would raise any serious objection. Why should she object? Personally, I am not able to see it. I know, of course, that there is a good deal of jealousy between America and Japan at present and that there has been for a long time past. Probably that jealousy may continue. Possibly, but I hope not, it may culminate in war. If we can do anything to avoid that, and prevent war coming as between those two great nations, I think we should do it. That is why I think we have to be particularly careful. I may add—and this is all I am going to say, because I do not think it is any use going over ground that has been gone over again and again during the last two or three days—that I read with a great deal of interest the despatch dated yesterday from Lord Curzon to the British Ambassador at Washington. It seems to me to be on exactly the lines that are required. Lord Curzon says there, plainly and explicitly, if words mean anything—and I know he means every word he has given expression to—that he proposes to place our cards—that is to say, the cards of the British Government—on the table and be perfectly candid. I think that is the right line to take. The very last paragraph seems to me to afford a very great deal of hope that we shall get out of this difficulty without any serious trouble. I agree with that paragraph. I have never yet been able to see why America should make trouble over our renewal of the alliance. It is not forming a new alliance, but is a renewal of an existing alliance. The paragraph is this: "Altogether, his conversation,"—that is to say, the conversation of the American Ambassador, and there is no one so well able to speak for the American nation as the gentleman they have appointed to represent them in London—"although it was necessarily neither detailed nor specific, it left me with a favourable impression as to the probable attitude of the American Government, and convinced me that absolute candour between us and them will be the wisest policy to pursue." I do hope that the American people, if they come to the Conference, and I trust they will, will be as candid as Lord Curzon intends that the British Government should be. That is the right policy to pursue. Like Mr. Hughes, I believe in the Conference. Let us have it by all means. But do not let us run any risk of this Treaty being dropped. I do not think it would be of the slightest use to postpone its consideration for a year or anything of that sort. It is in existence now and it should go on until one or other of the high contracting parties sees fit to denounce it, which I hope will not be for a long time to come, for I am convinced that the peace of the world is much more likely to be preserved with the existence of the Treaty, than if all the three Great Powers go upon their own without being allied to one or the other.

Recommends continuation of Treaty and Conference of Pacific Powers.

India should be represented at Pacific Conference.

Mr. Srinavasa-Sastri: Mr. Prime Minister, I have one word to say. I do not wish to divert the attention of the Conference for a moment from the central theme of the discussion. India would be very pleased, as the Maharao has made clear, if this Treaty were renewed, but if the whole matter be deferred until after the Pacific Conference that has been suggested has sat and considered the matter, I think this is a suitable opportunity for my saying that India is also vitally interested in this matter and would like to be represented at the Conference. It has been assumed in this discussion that probably India is outside the range of interest. I think the Government of India would take a different view and would like to be represented at the proposed Conference. I should like India to be considered as one of the Powers deeply interested in the whole question of the Pacific.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Hughes has had to leave us now, and I believe there are others who have engagements. Would you like to say anything now, General Smuts?

Considers that policy of continuation of Treaty should not be announced till after Conference.

General Smuts: I want to say this, Mr. Prime Minister. I agree generally to the course sketched by Lord Curzon in his statement, but as to the last point I doubt whether we have yet reached the stage when we should say that if everything fails we are going to adhere to the Japanese Treaty. It seems to be that it would be dangerous to say that at this stage. I think you should leave that point open for consideration until you have discussed the matter with the other countries. You see that if it comes out that that is the policy we have decided upon, we are entirely in the hands of Japan. Japan may very well say, "I am on velvet; if this negotiation with America fails, my Treaty continues, and I am going to do my best to upset this negotiation with America." Do you not think that that last point should be left open?

Mr. Lloyd George: That is a question upon which Mr. Hughes seems to feel so strongly that I think we must adjourn now and ask you to raise that point after luncheon.

Mr. Balfour: If you said "renew in some shape," would not that satisfy both parties? Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

General Smuts: No. First we make the point that the Treaty stands and is not denounced, and in the last paragraph we declare it to be the future policy . . . .

Lord Curzon: In the event of the failure of the Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think we should not discuss that now, since Mr. Hughes feels so strongly upon it. You are raising an objection to it, and I think Mr. Hughes had better hear it.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Lloyd George: Let me see, I think General Smuts wishes to speak.

General Smuts: I was speaking before the adjournment, Mr. Hughes, but owing to your absence the Prime Minister asked me to wait until you were back, as you were so deeply concerned in all these discussions. Now, the view I take of the matter is this; we need not discuss the merits any more to-day; we have discussed the merits of this question fully and I think we are practically agreed as to its merits. Now, the question comes of how we are going to carry out the ideas on which we originally agreed. Lord Curzon has drafted a series of propositions (see Appendix (A)) to carry out the sort of discussion which has taken place here, and when you had left, Mr. Hughes, I was saying to the Conference that I agree with all these propositions with the exception of the last. The fifth point of Lord Curzon's memorandum stated that, after we had tried everything, after we had given our notice to Japan, given our notice to the League of Nations, and we had had our discussions with the Americans, the Japanese and the Chinese, if we did not come to an agreement, then the Anglo-Japanese Alliance would stand as our policy for the future. That is how I took it.

Mr. Hughes: Stand as modified by the League of Nations?

General Smuts: The alliance in its modified form.

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Inadvisable to announce policy of continuation of Alliance before holding Conference.

General Smuts: Modified in accordance with the requirements of the League, which stands as our policy for the future. What I want to repeat now is this: I agree to the rest of those propositions,* but I do not agree to the last, which, I think is a very dangerous thing to be said at this stage. I am most anxious—as I am sure we are all most anxious—to carry America with us. I take it, after the discussion that we have had on this subject, that no question of greater difficulty or of greater danger could turn out for the British Empire than this matter which we are discussing, and if we could rope America into our policy—if we could keep Japan our friend and bring America within the circle of that friendship—I think that the future of this Empire and of the world is clear, and we must use every effort to do it. Now, it seems to me if, in advance, even before we have spoken to America, even before we have had discussions with her, we affirm the Anglo-Japanese Alliance as our future policy, we would make a great mistake, we would be making a declaration of policy with which I for one would not agree. I do not think Japan would like the inclusion of America if it could be avoided. The position of Japan in the East is such that she would like an exclusive alliance with us, and I think she would prefer that to drawing America within the circle. But that is not our point of view—it is not the point of view of Mr. Hughes. Mr. Hughes has expressed himself in this Conference more strongly than I have done. He has said, if we have to choose between Japan and America, he would take America.

Mr. Hughes: As an alliance.

General Smuts: Yes, if there is a chance. If we are confronted with that dreadful alternative, he would rather have America.

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

General Smuts: If that is the spirit in which we have to approach this question, then I think we must make every effort to get America in. We must make every effort not to load the dice in favour of Japan, and, it seems to me, if, in advance, we are going to declare that the Japanese Alliance, failing everything else, is to be our policy, I am afraid Japan is going to make use of that position: she is then going to force the pace and she will try to prevent an agreement with America being reached, and I think that it is of vital interest, while conserving our friendship with Japan, also to get America into that circle of friendship. Therefore, I am in favour of dropping that last paragraph.

Mr. Lloyd George: You do not object to the others?

General Smuts: The others I agree to at this stage.

Mr. Lloyd George: You do not insist upon our denouncing the alliance as essential?

* Appendix (A).

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

General Smuts: I think at present it would unnecessarily alarm and ruffle Japan, and I think at this stage we must avoid any denunciation. We must give the negotiations which are coming every chance, and we can do so by dropping this point 5.

China.

There is one other point that troubles me, and that is China. Here, again, I come to the Japanese point of view. If we, at this preliminary stage, are going to draw China into the negotiations, will not Japan look upon the position as if we are trying to back the Conference, so to say, by a preliminary discussion with her opponents, because there is no doubt China is the bitter opponent from the Japanese point of view, even more so than the United States of America. I should like to let China know we are her friends, and we are doing our best for her. But, now, looking at it for the moment from the Japanese point of view, we are asking Japan to have a discussion, not only with us, but also with America and China.

Mr. Lloyd George: With Japan?

General Smuts: We are asking Japan to come to a Conference with us which will include two of her opponents, the more bitter of the two being China, and it is just a question with me if we want this thing to succeed—as we are very anxious that it should succeed—whether we should not confine it to the three only. Lord Curzon, I am simply raising the point—I am not in any way dogmatic upon this.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think America would insist. We must not quarrel with China, otherwise we should be in a bad position in reference to China.

General Smuts: Japan is very nervous . . . .

Lord Curzon: I think your alarm is really unnecessary.

Mr. Massey: Read the last paragraph.

Sir Maurice Hankey: The only thing I have done is to convert it into the third person.*

General Smuts: I should not like this document circulated. The less this document gets about the better.

Mr. Lloyd George: We must have lots of documents before we come to the final one, and if we got a provisional document published, it would be fatal to agreement.

General Smuts: This is the most ticklish business possible with which we are dealing now.

Lord Curzon: General Smuts, may I say in reply to your point, I do not think there will be the difficulty which you anticipate about bringing in China. I am under the impression that, when speaking to the Japanese Ambassador, I said some little time ago, "Of course, you will understand quite clearly before we come to close quarters in regard to the renewal of the agreement, we have to consult America and China." Therefore, I prepared the ground and the main reason for bringing China in at this stage is to be found in the preamble of the agreement itself.

General Smuts: Yes.

Lord Curzon: You will see that the agreement as originally concluded was for the express purpose of ensuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire, and, therefore, if there is any question either of continuing or refusing the Treaty in any way, China cannot be left out, because she is in the forefront. The words are . . . .

Mr. Hughes: What are you reading from?

Lord Curzon: I am reading from the agreement itself:—

"The Government of Great Britain and the Government of Japan, having in view the important changes which have taken place in the situation since the conclusion of the Anglo-Japanese Agreement of the 12th August, 1905, and believing that a revision of that agreement responding to such changes would contribute to general stability and repose, have agreed upon the following stipulations to replace the agreement above-mentioned, such stipulations having the same object as the said agreement, namely:—

"(a.) The consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of Eastern Asia and of India;

"(b.) The preservation of the common interests of all Powers in China by ensuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire and the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations in China."

How can you consider the renewal, modification or revision of this Treaty without giving China an opportunity of being heard?

You see China has asked to be heard, and I have told her she will be heard.

Mr. Lloyd George: There was no Conference in the ordinary sense in 1911.

Mr. Balfour: No.

General Smuts: You don't think the Japanese will deeply resent China being called to such a Conference? Of course, you know what happened, Prime Minister, in Paris between China and Japan.

Mr. Lloyd George: They were seen separately.

Lord Curzon: I will speak to the Japanese Ambassador first upon these lines, and indicate to him our desire to consider the point of view of China in the matter, and that it is the wish of the Conference to consult China. If the Japanese raise serious objection, I can come here and discuss it with you. I think that step ought to be taken at the initial stage.

General Smuts: I won't pursue that.

Lord Curzon: What do you think of that, Mr. Balfour?

Mr. Balfour: That would be all right.

General Smuts: If you proceed on those lines it would be all right.

Mr. Massey: What about the continuation of the Treaty?

Mr. Hughes: Where have we got to now?

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Massey asked about the continuation of this Treaty. Well, that is now left an open question. The Treaty undoubtedly will last for twelve months, at least, and we can leave open for later discussion what the attitude is going to be for the future after that. You understand, Mr. Hughes?

General Smuts: After twelve months. We do not settle that question now.

Mr. Hughes: Unless Mr. Massey wishes to speak, I wish to say a word upon what General Smuts has said because that creates another situation which has to be discussed.

General Smuts: I have finished.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is Mr. Meighen's turn.

Future action proposed. Appendices A and B.

Mr. Hughes: We are narrowing this matter down now. We have come to the last paragraph of the last Clause.* It is to the last paragraph, not to the whole Clause, that General Smuts objects. What General Smuts says is this. He recognises that my desire for the inclusion of America, my desire to see America and the Empire marching hand in hand, is as great as his own. And I lay that down as a principle to be applied not only to the Pacific question, but to all world politics in which America and ourselves are concerned. But he takes exception to this last paragraph, because, in his opinion, America would feel that we did not enter the Conference free to reject this Treaty. That is in effect what he says.

General Smuts: No, I do not say that. I do not think you understand me. What I say is this. If we declare in advance that our policy is the continuation of this Treaty—more or less, the acceptance of Lord Curzon's alternative (A)†—that is the indefinite continuance of this Treaty—we would give Japan a great advantage in the negotiations and Japan would know that that is our policy for the future, and she conceivably would do her best to keep America out of it. That I want to avoid. Our interest is to get America in. Japan's interest is to keep America out, and I do not want to give Japan that excuse or reason for keeping America out.

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Hughes: General Smuts has made the position quite clear, and I understand it perfectly. I ask him however to look at another side of the question. If we follow the course he suggests, will it not give America a very great advantage? Will it not give to those forces which are marshalled against England and which conspire against the interests of the British Empire—won't it give them the opportunity to use every effort to frustrate our purpose, to misrepresent our intentions, and to make it impossible that we can arrive at any agreement at the Conference? General Smuts has not ventured to express the belief that we shall arrive at a conclusion. If you look at all the circumstances you will see how improbable it is that an arrangement can be made satisfactory to Japan, to America, to China and ourselves. But if you say that a satisfactory arrangement can be made, what is there to prevent an agreement being arrived at under Lord Curzon's proposal? You have to look at the whole of the proposals. You must not take this last paragraph as it stands independently of its context. The conditions precedent to the operation of this last paragraph are set out very clearly, and are most important. They are our plain declaration that we are dealing with the whole Eastern and Pacific question with a just spirit, it is to be in harmony with the Covenant, that where the Covenant is in conflict with the Treaty the Covenant is to prevail . . . .

General Smuts: It is only the last sentence in 5* that I object to. Should the Conference fail, the existing agreement as adapted to meet the requirements of the Covenant of the League goes on. It is only that sentence, you understand, that I am against. I am not against the whole of 5.

Mr. Hughes: As I say it is the last paragraph—I distinguish that. Looking at it now from the point of view of America and the possible effect of our including the last paragraph of Clause 5, what is to be done? The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will approach the Ambassadors in London—the Ambassadors of the United States of America, of China, of Japan—to find out whether the Anglo-Japanese Alliance as modified by paragraph 2* being still in existence, they will enter into a Conference on the matter, and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will report to this meeting later on. No doubt Lord Curzon, under paragraph 3,* will ascertain by conversations what would be acceptable to the United States of America; if there is any modification of this Treaty to which we could agree, to which Japan would or could agree, and which at the same time would be satisfactory to America, and report here to us.

But I ask General Smuts to consider what prospects there are of an agreement at this Conference in which America and China, Japan and ourselves would be represented, if it be, as Mr. Meighen says, that he cannot conceive of any circumstance—I cannot quote Mr. Meighen's actual words—or any modification, either of verbiage or substance, that would be acceptable to America. He can conceive of circumstances that would be acceptable to America, but not to Japan, that is to say, you can modify it so that it would be merely a husk and so make it acceptable to America, but Japan would say "I will not have it," but he cannot conceive of any modification acceptable to Japan and America, and I am sure General Smuts will admit that it is no use considering a modification of the Treaty which would not be acceptable to Japan as well as to America. Very well, what do we gain by reference to this Conference of a Treaty which would not in any circumstances be acceptable to America and Japan? What we lose by leaving in suspense the vital question of what our relations to Japan will be, is so obvious as to be overwhelming. General Smuts has said, and I thank him for it, that he realises that his position and ours differ materially. It is a more vital question to us than it is to South Africa. Let me assure him and Mr. Meighen that I believe that when I plead for some consideration for our young Commonwealth, surrounded as it is by a sea of difficulties, menaced from this very quarter, I shall not do so in vain, and I ask that we shall not be left in suspense for a period which may be indefinite, but that we shall know at once where we stand. Nor can I conceive for a moment that the Japanese Ambassador will be satisfied. We know how shrewd the Japanese are and how far-seeing. We know that they have pursued for many years an undeviating course—they are a people who know what they want, and a nation which will be compelled to do something, for it cannot support an increasing population if bottled. It must have an outlet. I cannot conceive Japan will be content to allow the question of renewal of the Treaty to remain in suspense. If we say: "We are not going to renew this Treaty" or "We are going to refer the matter to your rival, to your enemy," does this not look as though we were not satisfied with them? And, in such a case, what will Japan do? And what is our position?

Mr. Lloyd George: May I interrupt? I do not think, if I may say so, you are quite doing justice to General Smuts's proposition.

Mr. Hughes: Why?

Mr. Lloyd George: I will tell you why I say so. It is a different proposition. He says, "I am not asking you to denounce the Treaty before the Conference. If you denounce the Treaty, then, at once, that is a notification to Japan which she will regard as an affront, and it will look as if you are seeking other alliances and you give her full notice." His proposal is that you should not denounce the Treaty before the Conference. You go to the Conference with the Treaty undenounced and you do not denounce it unless there is some better arrangement made between Japan, the United States of America, China and ourselves. It is quite obvious that if there is an arrangement achieved there that will secure peace between Japan, America, and China, as well as ourselves, it is better than a mere agreement between Japan and ourselves, if it is possible. If it is not, until the Treaty is denounced, the Treaty goes on and you cannot bring it to an end unless we meet afterwards and agree to give notice of denunciation. I cannot understand quite why you object to General Smuts's proposition, because, as you know, I am in general agreement with your view about Japan and I should have thought that was right. May I just say another thing about it? I do not quite take the same desperate view as you, Mr. Meighen—I think I am afraid of quoting Mr. Meighen after his statement this morning—about the possibility of effecting an arrangement to draw America and China in. I am not at all sure if you accomplished an arrangement of that kind that you would not satisfy all the parties, and here I do not quite agree with General Smuts. I do not think Japan would prefer an arrangement with us rather than with us and America. I cannot conceive an intelligent people like the Japanese wanting to quarrel with America if they could get rid of the causes of quarrel. They are not fools, and they know that in the long run America would beat them. There might be a preliminary advantage with Japan, but in the end America would beat them, because her resources are infinite. She is a country that can afford to wait. For a year or so she might allow Japan to have a preliminary advantage, but in the end the resources of America would overwhelm her, and I am sure the Japanese realise that, and they would prefer an understanding with America, provided their own interests are safeguarded. I think this Conference would end in a great international arrangement that would secure the peace of the Pacific for generations.

Mr. Hughes: You may be right, but there is an interval.

Mr. Lloyd George: But in the interval you do not denounce the Treaty.

Mr. Hughes: That is the point. You say that we do not denounce the Treaty, but the time must come when you ask: "Do you intend to renew it?" otherwise the thing drags on, and both parties prepare for the alternative, one for renewal, and the other for denunciation. Do you think that Japan is going to risk falling between two stools?

Mr. Lloyd George: Had we not better find out whether Japan would regard that in the light in which you are regarding it? If they say that that arrangement satisfies them, they will be willing to come in. Then we can go on to discuss afterwards, having ascertained what Japan thinks.

Mr. Hughes: Let the Foreign Secretary ascertain by enquiry where we stand in regard to this matter, and, if possible, others, and then resume the discussion; but I am not prepared to agree to the excision of that paragraph. I consider it vital to the whole question. We cannot have Japan regarding anything we do as an unfriendly act.

Mr. Lloyd George: Supposing we agree upon that and adjourn the discussion until after we hear what Lord Curzon has to say to us?

Mr. Hughes: I am willing to leave these five clauses* alone . . . .

Mr. Lloyd George: No, we cannot do that.

Mr. Hughes: Surely Lord Curzon can be left to find out the position by enquiry.

* Appendices (A) and (B).

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Lloyd George: But he would want to know what we want. Up to that point we can agree, and then Lord Curzon has something to go to the Japanese Ambassador upon and ask what he thinks of that. You must give him some directions.

Mr. Hughes: That is very different, because then a new situation will arise, the nature of which we cannot foresee. We do not know what Japan will say, and we shall be faced with these five propositions with the last paragraph excised.

General Smuts: There is something to be said for Mr. Hughes' point of view. After all the disclosures that have been made in the press, I do not like these written instructions, so to speak. The Foreign Secretary has heard our discussion and he knows what the discussion has resulted in, and he can surely act in the spirit of the discussion without a written statement of policy, and we should avoid adhering to a written document, which is dangerous. I am only trying to help Mr. Hughes over his difficulty.

Lord Curzon: I do not think it is really a matter of difficulty. I have stated that I did not think I was authorised to proceed until I had instructions from this Conference. I had this morning to attempt to draw up your instructions* to me; to which do you object? No. 1: I am to inform the Japanese Government that the situation has changed, and therefore the agreement goes on. I have to say that to them; therefore, I take it, we are all agreed on No. 1. No. 2: To tell the League that we are dealing with the whole Eastern and Pacific situation in a larger spirit, and that in the meantime we are prepared to state that where the Covenant is inconsistent with the Treaty, the Covenant prevails. I am bound to say that. No. 3: I am to approach the Japanese Ambassador and find out whether the agreement as modified by paragraph 2 being still in existence, they will enter into a Conference on the matter. That is agreed; and No. 4: Report to this meeting later on. You do not withdraw that, do you? No. 5: We do not notify our intention to denounce until a settlement has been arrived at by the Conference or a common agreement has been drawn up to replace the present one. Why not pass the instructions up to that point, and leave the last sentence over until I have reported.

Mr. Massey: I do not agree. The last paragraph should be left in. If you strike that out you are simply saying to Japan, "If you don't agree with America and China when they come along, you may be deserted at the last moment." That is the view I take, but with that left in we are saying to America and China, "We want you to state your grievances and give us an idea of the possibilities that may arise from the operation of the Treaty, and if we can put matters right for you, we are going to do it." But by the other way you are giving a tremendous advantage to America over Japan. I do not think it is fair. I think a friendly arrangement can be made without much difficulty. Difficulties may arise which we do not see now, but I think it would be better if that last sentence were left in as a sort of guarantee to Japan that nothing unfair can possibly happen.

Mr. Balfour: Is not the plan we have considered to leave the document as it stands, it being understood that no binding agreement is come to by this Conference until Lord Curzon is heard?

Mr. Hughes: I am perfectly prepared to leave the matter to a Conference, even if we are not present, but in which the Empire is to have a policy, provided that the failure to agree means ipso facto that we fall back on the Treaty, but I am not prepared to remit the matter to a Conference where we have no policy. The two things are fundamentally different. You say, "Are you prepared to be represented at such a Conference?" I say, "Yes," because if the Conference does not come to an agreement we fall back on the Treaty.

Mr. Lloyd George: But, Mr. Hughes, speaking as a friend of the Japanese Treaty your attitude is absolutely incompatible. If this stands without the last paragraph, it means that you can only bring that Treaty to an end by another Imperial Conference which will decide to give notice.

Mr. Hughes: That is to say we are to put off from to-day to some other date a Conference at which it is a physical impossibility for Mr. Massey and myself to be present.

Mr. Massey: I believe the Prime Minister is acting in perfectly good faith, but Mr. Hughes, General Smuts, Mr. Meighen and myself not being here would make no difference with regard to the Treaty. I know you are doing your best in consulting with us, but we have no power to act with you, and that is one of the things I want to see remedied.

Mr. Lloyd George: I have assumed, of course, that you would be at the Conference. It depends where it is. I assumed that you would be represented there, and then we could decide what to do.

General Smuts: That is all I want, that in the event of failure the Empire should have an opportunity to consider the whole position from that point of view, and we should not prejudice it in advance by saying that in case of failure we go on as before.

Lord Curzon: The last sentence is a truism, because until notice has been given and denunciation takes place the agreement stands. I, therefore, quite agree with the Prime Minister.

General Smuts: It is not really a truism, Lord Curzon; the last sentence means this, in case of the failure of these negotiations the Japanese Treaty is our policy, and we go on with it. If the last sentence is left out, it means this, that the road is open for us to reassemble, discuss the matter again and see whether we are to give notice or not. The last sentence prevents our giving notice, and that I think would be going too far. This is the whole point in issue between the two of us here.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think it ought to be our policy if this Conference fails.

General Smuts: We should leave the decision of that open at this stage. I think the least we can do is to accept your amendment and postpone the consideration of this matter until we know where we stand. That is quite clear, Mr. Hughes. You must meet the other point of view half way. We meet you more than half way, and you ought to meet us also a little distance. All we ask is that this last sentence, whether the Japanese Alliance will be the declared future policy of the Empire, should remain open for discussion after Lord Curzon has seen them.

Mr. Hughes: I have no objection to that, and I do not mind your striking that paragraph out, though I thought that this thing had been put before us in the light that it would be put down in black and white and in view of what has gone before, it would be said that we agreed to the excision of this.

Mr. Lloyd George: I am not opposed to the excision. I proposed that the discussion on these three lines should be adjourned until after Lord Curzon's interview with the Japanese Ambassador, and until he reports to us. I am not opposed to excision, I merely proposed adjournment.

Mr. Hughes: I move an amendment that the whole thing be adjourned.

Lord Curzon: I am ready to go, but you must not shoot me off without instructions.

Mr. Massey: Do you say that the last sentence should be submitted to the Japanese Ambassador?

Mr. Hughes: If you said to the Japanese Ambassador "What would be your view of our not now declaring our intention in regard to the matter" what would be your view?

Mr. Lloyd George: Surely that would be put as a question to him in order to ascertain his view.

General Smuts: Understand what the question of Mr. Hughes is. He suggests that Lord Curzon should say to the Japanese Ambassador: "Of course, if this association with America fails, we go on with you. That is our policy." That would be most unfair. I do not think that is business.

Mr. Hughes: The converse would be equally unfair.

Mr. Lloyd George: I agree, at this stage it would, and therefore I do not see why you should, but I do not see why you should not find out . . . .

Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Hughes: Find out what you like in the way you suggest. I leave it entirely to Lord Curzon. He knows what we want. Look at paragraph 3*:—

> "3. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will approach the representatives in London of the United States of America, China and Japan in order to find out whether, the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, as modified by paragraph (2), being still in existence, they will enter into a Conference on the matter."

Well, I do not want to know that, unless I know what the policy of this Government or this Empire is, in regard to the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. To go to the Conference without a policy is to invite most serious trouble. I say to Lord Curzon: "Ascertain what are the views of Japan in regard to this matter"

Mr. Lloyd George: Certainly.

Lord Curzon: That is all right.

Mr. Meighen: I want to say a word or two so that my position be not misconstrued. I am very sorry the discussion proceeded at all past the first statement of the Foreign Secretary. Had it ended there, there is no doubt it would have been better than where we are now, it would at least have been nearer my view. I do not want, by inference or specific statement, anything to go to Japan which intimates that this Treaty in its present form, or even after making it subordinate to the Covenant of the League of Nations, is the policy of this Empire. I do not know, I am sure, why we have abandoned the conditions stipulated in the first statement of the Foreign Secretary. We have not abandoned the intention of modifying in one regard, that is to make it conform, the working out of it conform, to the League Covenant. But apparently the Treaty is going to stand as it is, there is going to be no new Treaty at all, only the making its administration conform to the Constitution of the League of Nations. But there are other respects as well which the Foreign Secretary laid down as vital to comply with which the Treaty was to be remodelled. I do not know why those vital modifications are now cast aside. I would like an attempt made to secure them. I would like to secure, even for the one year (during which the Treaty must subsist), the modifications which the Foreign Secretary called our attention to, and one of which, indeed, the Representative of India emphasised as essential.

There is a clause in this Treaty which says that Japan has special interests in the Far East, also that we have special interests, territorial rights and so forth. Now, I think Japan is in a position to say: "Our position in Southern Manchuria is to-day a special interest, we are there by your compliance, we are there with your recognition, and if China disputes our place you are under obligation to march by our side in war." I do not think that obligation should continue, certainly not indefinitely. I do not want to accept that result on behalf of Canada. I would like to see every effort made to modify the Treaty even for this coming year. I do not believe there is any necessity at all of saying what should be our policy after. Our policy must be governed by what we learn at and our experience derived from the Pacific Conference. It must be so governed. I know the Foreign Secretary will have no difficulty in discussing this matter in the light of these remarks with the Ambassadors. As for Mr. Hughes and myself, we are worlds apart, and I cannot conceive how the Foreign Secretary can possibly reflect both of our views in any statement to the Representatives of those other Governments. All I desire is this. I desire that the Treaty be remodelled, that an attempt be made to get Japan to remodel it and to have it last only for a year. If the latter purpose fails I do not see how the former can fail. I think it was in the mind of the Foreign Secretary, when he just spoke, that it would not fail, that is, an attempt to have its objectionable features removed from the Treaty.

To suggest that we should first say to Japan, "If the Conference fails, this Treaty is satisfactory to us and this Treaty is our policy," and, having said that to Japan, that we should then approach the United States and say: "Come with us"—the thing is madness in my mind. Japan would have the key to the situation, they would be the arbiters of the whole Conference. The Prime Minister says it would be better for Japan to have America tied in. Well, I do not pretend to be a judge of that, but I rather doubt it.

Mr. Lloyd George: You do not think Japan wants an understanding with America?

Mr. Meighen: I would not say that, but I think Japan would prefer to go on the way it is. I do not put my opinion, I certainly would not put my opinion against your considered opinion.

Mr. Lloyd George: I would not myself put . . . .

Mr. Meighen: But I think Japan has got on very well.

Mr. Lloyd George: That seems to be such a blunder in Japanese statesmanship that I cannot conceive them making it.

Mr. Meighen: They have succeeded very well as it is. I do not believe they would feel so confident of succeeding in the same respect in the next twenty years if the United States were tied into the arrangement. They could not possibly expect to succeed any better. Anyway, such an antecedent final commitment would make Japan arbiter of the situation. In a word, I urge that we look and work for real success at the Conference—we are bound now, unfortunately as I think, to regard the Treaty as lasting for a year, perhaps for longer—I would like to see an attempt made to have an arrangement that it continue for a year only. Then we will be free to consider our position.

We are bound to have it subsisting at least while we are at the Conference. Do not let us tie ourselves any further. Let us go to the Conference with our hands as free as under the circumstances we can make them, just as we ask the United States to go. Then we have a right to ask them to do likewise, but otherwise, if we tie ourselves more than is absolutely essential, we are not, in my judgment, so ordering our task as to promote success.

Mr. Hughes: May I ask you this, what those words mean in your opinion: " The British Government (Clause 5*) will not notify its intention to denounce until a settlement has been arrived at by the new Conference and a new Treaty has been drawn up "? Does that mean the same as if the Clause read as follows: " The British Government will not denounce the Treaty until a settlement has been arrived at by the new Conference "?

Lord Curzon: Yes, it does, because denunciation can only take place by giving a year's notice. That is the form denunciation takes. If you read the Treaty itself you will see that the process of denunciation involves a notification a year before. I am merely stating there what is the process demanded by the terms of the agreement.

Mr. Hughes: It is not a notification of policy, it is an act of denunciation?

Lord Curzon: It is an act provided for by Article 6 of the Treaty. That is all.

Mr. Hughes: Will you answer me this question? What would be the effect of a failure to agree at this Conference, if you struck out the paragraph against which General Smuts has spoken?

Lord Curzon: The Prime Minister and I both argued that the existing agreement stands until it is denounced and then replaced by something else. That is, I understand, the position we have both taken up, and that is why we think the last sentence superfluous, but I understood the Prime Minister to say he was quite willing, leaving the last sentence out, to agree that when we reach the stage provided for in the first four paragraphs, no final decision should be arrived at before another Conference took place.

Mr. Lloyd George: Report what the result of your . . . .

Mr. Hughes: Do you agree with that view?

Mr. Lloyd George: I thought there was great advantage in adjourning for consideration of that, and Mr. Meighen could put his definite views forward and you could put yours, after we had had a report from Lord Curzon. I do not see why we should not take it, for instance, next week. Lord Curzon will see all these Ambassadors in the course of the next three or four days.

Lord Curzon: The Jap would have to refer to his Government. I do not suppose that we should get a reply under ten days or a fortnight.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Meighen is not going back until the 21st, and that gives him time to consider. Meanwhile, the Ambassadors will probably need to refer to their Governments. You will have the replies of all those three Governments, and we shall have the facts before us, and that is the vital issue involved in the last paragraph, because that raises Mr. Meighen's question as well as yours. Anglo-Japanese Alliance.

Mr. Hughes: If that is the view expressed by Lord Curzon, and endorsed by yourself, it is the interpretation which can and must be placed upon Clause 5, after the last paragraph has been deleted. Then this position is created, that if the Conference fail to agree, if the Conference suggested in Clause 3 fails to agree, then there is no denunciation of the existing Treaty.

Lord Curzon: Not unless the Government decides.

General Smuts: Not ipso facto. There is no ipso facto denunciation. It is a question for us to decide later at another Conference.

Lord Curzon: That is so.

General Smuts: That is where the position is left at.

Mr. Hughes: That raises the whole question. If Lord Curzon is right, then those words are superfluous, and if they are superfluous, whether they are in or out does not matter; and therefore what the first part of that Clause means is, if we do not agree, the Treaty goes on and that is our policy—that is to say, we approve of the Treaty; but if you say they are not superfluous, that the words are an extension and are not merely superfluous or words of limitation—it is quite a different matter.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Meighen can raise all these questions after the report of Lord Curzon. It does not preclude him from raising them. Are you satisfied with that?

Mr. Meighen: I am quite satisfied.

Mr. Lloyd George: I have sent for the naval authorities to come and put the case before us, and they will be here in a few minutes. We might consider our programme for next week until they come.

General Smuts: The defence question and the question of disarmament come together and should be discussed together.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should think so. Will you take the League of Nations before Anglo-French relations?

Mr. Balfour: I think there is some advantage in putting the League of Nations a little late because I shall be glad to have Mr. Fisher's help.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should think we would take the Anglo-French relations after the naval, military and air questions.

Mr. Srinivasa-Sastri: Would it be possible to take No. 8 on Tuesday?

Mr. Lloyd George: That is what is being suggested now. We must try and get reparations. The Foreign Secretary and Mr. Balfour will be absent on Tuesday, and I want to put some question down on Tuesday where they are not so concerned. He is concerned in all these questions, but it is more for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Sir Laming Worthington Evans. We might take reparations on Tuesday if we can get it ready.

(The Conference adjourned until 3·30 on Monday, the 4th July, 1921.)

Mr. Lloyd George: I should think so. Will you take the League of Nations before Anglo-French relations?

Mr. Balfour: I think there is some advantage in putting the League of Nations a little late because I shall be glad to have Mr. Fisher's help.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should think we would take the Anglo-French relations after the naval, military and air questions.

Mr. Srinivasa-Sastri: Would it be possible to take No. 8 on Tuesday?

Mr. Lloyd George: That is what is being suggested now. We must try and get reparations. The Foreign Secretary and Mr. Balfour will be absent on Tuesday, and I want to put some question down on Tuesday where they are not so concerned. He is concerned in all these questions, but it is more for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Sir Laming Worthington Evans. We might take reparations on Tuesday if we can get it ready.

(The Conference adjourned until 3·30 on Monday, the 4th July, 1921.)

APPENDIX (A).

Draft prepared by Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The procedure is:—

1. Inform Japanese Government that the position is changed, and that no notification to denounce has been given. Therefore the agreement goes on.
2. Tell the League that we are dealing with the whole Eastern and Pacific question in a larger spirit; that any new arrangement will be in harmony with the Covenant, and in the meantime we are prepared to state that wherever the Covenant is in conflict with the Treaty the Covenant prevails.
3. I am to approach Japanese, American and Chinese, and find out whether (the agreement as modified in paragraph (2) being still in existence) they will enter into a Conference on the matter.
4. I report at this meeting later on.
5. Do not notify intention to denounce until a settlement has been arrived at by the new Conference, or a new Treaty has been drawn up by common agreement to replace the present one. (Should the Conference fail, the existing agreement as adapted to meet the requirements of the Covenant of the League goes on.)

APPENDIX (B).

Draft prepared by the Secretary.

1. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will notify the Japanese Government that the position is changed and that the British Government are advised that no notification to denounce the Treaty has been given. Consequently, the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of the 13th July, 1911, remains in operation.
2. The British Government will inform the League of Nations that we are dealing with the whole Eastern and Pacific question in a larger spirit; that any new arrangement will be in harmony with the Covenant; and that in the meanwhile we are prepared to state that wherever the Covenant is in conflict with the Treaty the Covenant prevails.
3. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will approach the representatives in London of the United States of America, China and Japan in order to find out whether, the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, as modified by paragraph (2), being still in existence, they will enter into a Conference on the matter.
4. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will report to the present meeting later on.
5. The British Government will not notify its intention to denounce until a settlement has been arrived at by the new Conference or a new Treaty has been drawn up by common agreement to replace the present one. (Should the Conference fail, the existing agreement as adapted to meet the requirements of the Covenant of the League goes on.)

Mr. Sastri : Before the discussion is resumed I wish to draw your attention to a matter included in the discussion when I was unavoidably absent this morning. I hear that there was some talk of the business for the next few days. May I suggest that it is of great importance that the subject of the business of India should be taken on Friday?

Mr. Lloyd George : We did not fix Friday; we only got up to Thursday.

Mr. Sastri : There is one reason why I specially urge that after this discussion is done we may have a discussion on the position of each particular Dominion. That may take some time, and as some of our colleagues are expressing the desire to get home quickly, it is better that we should take this matter as soon as possible.

Mr. Lloyd George : It is essential that General Smuts should be here, as it affects him directly. I suppose he will be here by Friday?

Sir Maurice Hankey : He told me he expected to be back for Friday.

Mr. Lloyd George : It can be put down tentatively for Friday, but we can only do it tentatively as General Smuts must be here to discuss that matter. We will stick to that as a tentative arrangement.

Mr. Hughes: Shall we say 4·30 on Thursday if he is back, or, if not, Friday morning?

Mr. Lloyd George : Yes. This subject which Mr. Sastri wants to raise is the status of India in the Dominions.

Mr. Hughes : Yes, quite so.

Imperial Communications.

Mr. Lloyd George : Now, Mr. Hughes, will you open the question of Imperial Communications?

Mr. Hughes : The matter with which I shall deal as shortly as possible is one of the greatest importance to the Empire, and its ramifications are very wide. First of all, I lay it down that the vital need of the Empire to-day is close communication between each Dominion and Britain, and among the Dominions themselves. This is necessary for political, strategical and commercial reasons. A short statement of the position in which we find ourselves to-day may be permitted. The British Empire is made up of a group of nations distributed widely over the face of the earth, and just at the time when the people of these nations find themselves in need of closer association, when indeed rapid and efficient means of communications are essential to their very existence as an Empire, applied science and technical knowledge have placed within their grasp means by which they can communicate with each other not only with greater ease, but at far less expense than hitherto was possible.

The question of communications is not limited to any one avenue. We have to consider communication by sea, by the air, by land where this is necessary for inter-Empire purposes, and by cable and by wireless telegraphy and telephony. I propose, therefore, to consider the question briefly in all its aspects. First, perhaps, it would be well that I should emphasise its importance, particularly in its direct application to the purposes which have brought us together at this Conference. We are to discuss the principles upon which the foreign policy of the Empire is to be governed and to devise means that will give an opportunity for the Dominions overseas to apply those principles to definite questions as they arise which were formerly decided by Great Britain alone. As things stand now, the share of the Dominions in determining foreign policy cannot be a substantial one. Yet their status under the League of Nations and their liability to be involved in war arising out of foreign policy makes it imperative that their voice should be heard. Conferences between the Prime Ministers of Great Britain and the various Dominions ought to be regular and frequent, but this is not now possible. Australia and New Zealand cannot send their Prime Ministers to Britain for six months every year, and no less time will suffice for a visit. Many suggestions have been put forward, but the Imperial Conference or Cabinet is the only practical machinery at present existing. It can hardly be said to be sufficient, if effective participation by the Dominions is to be assured. It has been suggested that an Imperial Cabinet or Council should be constituted, consisting of a Minister of each of the Dominions residing in England, armed with authority to speak for his country, but, apart from general objections, such a Minister could not speak with authority on matters concerning his country.

That could not be done by the Prime Minister of each of the Dominions, much less by any other Minister. I speak for myself and say that I am not in a position, except perhaps on one matter, to do other than assent to or dissent from any decision that may be arrived at here and submit the same to the Australian Parliament for ratification or rejection, as the case may be. Certainly no Minister, other than the Prime Minister, could come armed with the necessary authority, and that seems to me to dispose of this suggestion as a practical solution of the difficulty with which we are confronted. The Dominion Parliaments will not agree to surrender their rights of self-government; binding decisions can therefore only be made by the Cabinets, and in most cases by the Parliaments of the various parts of the Empire, and on definite questions of foreign or Imperial policy no such decision is possible unless the questions to be considered can be presented to the Dominions immediately they arise. Imperial Communications.

Clearly, then, it is essential, if our voice in the counsels of the Empire is to be a real one, and not a shadow, that the various parts of the Empire should have constant and speedy communication with each other. This is a compassable, as well as a necessary, ambition, and I venture to predict that the day is not far distant when the Prime Ministers of the various Dominions will be in wireless telephonic communication with each other, and I say that I know of none, nor can I conceive of any other means, by which the participation, a real participation by the Dominions, in Empire affairs, other than by those means, is possible. I do not suggest for a moment that this would do away with the necessity for personal consultation. But it would enable the principles agreed to on foreign policy or Imperial matters to be applied by the whole Empire and not merely by Britain, as at present. An up-to-date wireless installation which would enable the Prime Minister of Britain and the Prime Ministers of other portions of the Empire to be in consultation on every important Imperial question, would not impair those self-governing rights upon which the Dominions are so jealously insistent, and, at the same time, would enable the voice of the Empire, as distinguished from that of Britain, to be heard. The present position may be shortly stated—cases, I do not deny, may be cited to the contrary—but for all practical purposes the Dominions are told of things when they are done and when nothing remains for them but to accept. This is in most cases inevitable, because questions of foreign policy must be decided without delay. Yet it is unsatisfactory. I do not suggest for one moment that by any means at our disposal, it would be possible to have that close consultation between the representatives of the various parts of this Empire as exists between members of a Cabinet composed of members of the same Parliament in the same country, but I do say that it would be an immense stride forward if the present cable system, which is very far from adequate, were thus improved. The Imperial Conference can only formulate a general policy. Too frequently it does not even do that, and such a scheme as I have in my mind would enable the various parts of the Empire to be brought into such close, intimate and daily touch with each other as to enable them, by the common possession of facts upon which an opinion is to be formed, to exercise a real voice in determining the destiny of this Empire. I am sure that the Prime Minister and the Ministers representing His Majesty's Government of the United Kingdom are not blind to the danger that exists under the present state of affairs. The problem of government of the Empire is a most difficult one. You have a number of independent or quasi-independent nations, who have been told—and who believe—that they have a right to make laws for the people themselves and who do make these laws. But foreign policy may affect the policy of every one of the Dominions and, of course, it may involve all in war. As things now stand Britain may involve us in war, and the Dominions feel that foreign policy, which has been so far made by Britain, ought not to be decided by Britain alone. The people of the Dominions ask themselves this question more and more insistently as time goes on, and will do so. How is this compatible with our rights of self-government? Where is this Imperial Government of which some speak? There is none. People speak of the Imperial Parliament, but it does not exist; and the Imperial Cabinet. Where is it? There is the British Parliament, a Canadian Parliament, the Australian Parliament and the Cabinets of these nations. We are not an Imperial Cabinet. We are not even allowed here to speak of ourselves as an Imperial Cabinet or Conference. We can call ourselves Imperial, but the moment we attempt to fix a substantive, there is trouble. Somebody says, it is not a Conference, it is not a Cabinet. Empire's need of good Communications.

Mr. Massey: It is our own fault.

Mr. Hughes: Probably it is, but I do not think that that helps us very much. Now, I want to emphasise, first of all, that if this Empire is to work together, if it is to develop its great resources, if it is to take advantage of the tremendous possibilities of trade and of the profit that can come out of close co-operation between the various parts, if it is to be assured of that complete security which the strength of this Empire, rightly directed, can assure, if a citizen of the most remote part is to feel he has an equal voice in the government of this Empire with those at its heart, then we must have some means other than we have now of enabling the voice of the Dominions to be heard. I venture to say that one of the best assurances we can have, something that will help us very materially, anyhow, in this matter, is improved communications.

Special need of good Communications with Australia and New Zealand.

Now, consider the position from the point of view of those remoter Dominions which Mr. Massey and myself represent. I have said that these Imperial Conferences are the only machinery at present in existence for Empire Government, and for dealing with Empire affairs. If they are to be of any use they must be held frequently. Neither in those things that have been done, nor those things that are to be done, can Dominion Ministers have any real controlling influence, unless they meet very frequently and at least yearly. Mr. Massey can speak for himself, but it is certain that the representative of Australia cannot attend here yearly unless some means are found by which we can lessen the distance by shortening the time that attendance here now involves. At present it means six months. Clearly we cannot spend six months out of every year away from our own countries. The alternative, you may say, is to send another Minister—a Minister other than the Prime Minister. But what would he do? What could he do? He would be an onlooker. He would be, of course, invaluable in telling us what was being done, but he could not have any real voice in the Government of Empire. I do not know if you gentlemen quite realise that suspicion follows us like a cloud directly we leave our country. No sooner are we here than critics in our own country suggest that we propose to do some incredible and monstrous thing, that we propose to undermine the foundations of those free institutions which are our glory and our pride. I have never attended Conferences here but that it was suggested that I was in favour of an Imperial Parliament, and my denial of this, vehement, continued and regular, does not suffice to allay the fear that something will be done to impair our right of self-government. Mr. Meighen can speak for himself, but I should be surprised if my experience and his were not very much alike. Directly a man comes here it is said that he gets out of touch with "the opinion of the people." He cannot hear their voice. He does not know what the people want. It is suggested that he cannot interpret their wishes. To do so a Minister would have to return to his country very frequently. That alone would render him almost useless here. The High Commissioner, when he has been over here some time, is said to get out of touch with his country. I speak, of course, of the remote Dominions, for Canada enjoys a very great advantage over us. We are faced with this position, that while we cannot come here regularly, we must have a voice in the management of the affairs of the Empire. How are we going to get it? I ask you to consider this as a great Imperial question. It affects the very existence of the Empire; it concerns the business management—the government—of the Empire. Even our constitutional relations are—or will be—moulded by our decisions. And where do we stand to-day? What are we doing to bring the widely-scattered parts of this Empire closer together? The steamship service between Australia and England is slower to-day than it was twenty-five years ago.

We were told during the war and afterwards by postprandial orators that the war had changed everything. It may be said that if it has, it has changed the steamship services for the worse and not for the better.

Mr. Lloyd George: The expense is so much greater now.

Need for improved Steamship Services.

Mr. Hughes: No doubt, twenty-five years ago, Sir, if you and I had been asked "Is it possible to rush through the air at 150 miles an hour," we should have smiled. But it is not impossible. The expense is great—but expense does not govern progress. If you try all things by the test of expense, it must apply to the security of this Empire. Defence costs more now than it did twenty-five years ago, yet I think you will say that we must have security nevertheless. I say most emphatically that 12½ to 14 knots an hour for Inter-Imperial steamship communication will not do. It is a standing reflection upon our Imperial common sense. It is a menace to our Imperial interests. Of course I do not know whether it will pay the companies to increase their speed; but I am certain that it will not pay the Empire to be satisfied with the service as it stands. What do you know of Australia? What does the average Englishman know of Australia? He knows very much less of it than he does of Canada, and he does so largely because of its distance. When people select a field for migration or emigration, why do so many go to the United States? Because it is near at hand. Our voice in the counsels of the Empire, our influence, the development of our mighty heritage, all are influenced by this fact, that we are remote from the centre of the Empire, and unnecessarily remote. There is no reason at all other than dividends; I admit that that is a reason and a substantial one. But there is no reason why Mr. Massey and I should not get home in four weeks by steamship. As things are we cannot get home under six weeks. I therefore propose to ask the Conference to consider the question of an improved steamship service. It is a matter which vitally affects all the countries which we represent. I recognise all the difficulties; we know them quite as well as, say, Lord Inchcape. But we are here as guardians and trustees of the Empire, and we have to ask ourselves not whether it is profitable for the great steamship companies to improve their services, but whether it is safe and profitable for the Empire to leave them where they are. This wide flung Empire—a world within a world—depends for its very existence on the unity of the whole. Not one part—not even this part called Britain, could stand alone now, whatever might have been true before the war. We depend upon each other. Does not common prudence as well as wisdom dictate the policy that we should endeavour to get as close to one another as is humanly possible?

Imperial Communications.

Air Communication.

Now turn from the sea to the air. Here is the last element which man has conquered. That which was before a mere dream or a plaything has become now a great factor in human progress and in moulding the affairs of nations, both in peace and in war. I do not propose in this general review, such as I am now making, to attempt to deal in detail with any one of these phases of wireless communication, of steamship communication, or air communication, but I do say that the Conference ought to consider the general question of communications in relation to the political, the commercial, and the national affairs of the Empire as a whole. It is said that airships are now capable, subject to adequate provision of mooring masts on suitable sites, of making the journey between here and Australia. It is a practical proposition. You know, Sir, that two of our citizens, Sir Ross Smith and Sir Keith Smith, flew in one machine from England to Australia. What might we not do with relays? I do not say it would be a commercial proposition at first, but the fact remains it is quite possible to arrange for an aeroplane service between here and Australia. It is not for me to speak on this matter when expert opinion is available, but I think I am safe in saying that airships can reduce the journey to something like ten days. Am I right?

Sir Frederick Sykes: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Hughes: I hope, Sir, you will not think that I am contending that an airship service is a complete and efficient substitute for a faster steamship service. It is not. We are confronted with a many-sided problem. All those things which I have mentioned—wireless communication, faster steamship communication, airships—all those things have relation to the same problem; they tend to bind the different parts of the Empire closer together. They make it a more profitable thing for every citizen in every part of the Empire to be a citizen of this Empire. We should not forget or cease to advocate that it is not only a very glorious thing to be a citizen of this Empire, but it is a very profitable thing as it is now, and it can be made still more profitable.

The demand by Public Opinion for good Communications.

I now come to another phase of the matter. I have not attempted to deal with the financial side of this question, although I am prepared to do so when the proper time comes for considering details. I come to another phase—the necessity for better means of communication in relation to what may be termed, for want of a better phrase, Imperial public opinion. The most potent factor in the world to-day is public opinion. The voice of the people cannot be ignored, and the opinion of the people upon any question is largely dependent upon the facts placed before them in the press and in other ways. I want to emphasise again that if that be true of the world at large, it is still more true of this lesser world, but still this great world in which we live, the British Empire. And if public opinion is a potent factor now, as time goes on it will become the dominant factor. Nothing strikes the visitor from the Dominions upon any of his visits to England more than the meagre information about his own country appearing in the columns of the British press. And the converse is not less true. If you look at the columns of the British press and endeavour from them to get some idea of what New Zealand is, what India is, what South Africa is, or even Canada—though to a lesser extent—or what Australia is, what a pitiable travesty of the truth do you get! Look at the press here and note the very restricted space that is available for such trivial affairs as Imperial matters or politics, and the pressure of space for sport and divorce and things of that sort. What do you see about Australia or India? It is the same throughout the Empire. If I had never been to England and if I were in Australia seeking from the press to know what England was, well, Sir, I should have a very poor opinion of England in the scheme of things. I should know nothing whatever of the real life of Britain, what it was thinking of, what were the great currents of British public life manifesting themselves in the economic, social and political spheres. I could know nothing at all about them. Before we left Australia, we got something about the coal strike, but very little. When I came here I found the people obsessed of this very thing. When I got to Suez and Toulon, I heard nothing whatever. We spent pounds trying to find out what was happening in England. Nobody told us. We heard of course that Carpentier was training for his fight with Dempsey and that Armstrong was doing very well. I have put the lighter side of it, but it is perhaps the most serious thing that we have to consider, because public opinion in the Dominions is the great factor that will determine the future of this Empire. We have got to foster an Empire spirit. But when you get before an Australian audience and ask it to have a concept of Empire and what Empire means, it is naturally thrown back on what it knows of Britain and the Empire, and so it is thrown back upon the press. How can you appeal to such an audience, informed in such a way, so that you can really make them understand in true perspective what New Zealand, Australia or the Empire is? You cannot do it. Every day that the case for Britain and for the Empire is put in this pitiable way, America is at work, doing that for which in her case there is far less need. Do you know, Sir, that every day there goes out from America to the East, radiating in every direction, American news, and not only American news, but American concepts of world news?

Sir, you know that the mind of the Chinese nation now is malleable. It seizes all the facts which it can and it forms its opinion of this Empire on the facts supplied. America has no interests in China greater than ours. Yet America does this and we do nothing. Here you have an Empire—widely scattered—that depends upon the unity of its parts, and yet those parts whose very existence depends upon united action are so ill-informed of what the other part is thinking and doing. They cannot form an independent opinion and the tendency must be to drift away. We do nothing; and the cause of this is very largely due to the high cable rates and our apathy towards wireless telegraphy. In Australia we ask the press, "Why don't you send us more news as to what you do in Britain?" They reply, "Every word costs from 7½*d.* to 9*s.*" I do not know what would be the average, but somewhere between those two figures. The press services that are concerned in supplying Australia with news spend tens of thousands of pounds in order to supply us with that meagre stream from which we slake our thirst. The British papers, on the other hand, get information from Australia about wild dogs and strikes, as if strikes did not occur elsewhere. I am sure English statesmen could correct that.

High cost of Press Cables.

Mr. Lloyd George: We have had one or two coal strikes.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, of course, but the answer to all this is that they cannot afford to do more than they are doing. I heard the other day that a column of news is sent from America to a Canadian paper at, I think, 19 or 20 dollars. They pour out the news, not at 7½*d.* or 9*s.* per word, but probably at one-twentieth of the price which is charged for every line or word that is sent from here to Australia.

Progress by other Nations in Wireless.

Now let me state shortly what other countries are doing in wireless; it is only necessary to retail them in order to see how backward we are. The mere recounting is a reflection upon us. Other countries are very active while we do nothing, or very little. Before the war Germany had completed chains of stations throughout Germany, in Africa, the Far East and the Pacific Ocean—practically surrounded the whole world with a chain of powerful wireless stations. These were destroyed, or captured, mostly by Dominion forces in Africa, Australia and elsewhere, but they had distributed the news about the war and they saved at least 8 million pounds' worth of German mercantile shipping. Germany would during the war have been isolated from the world but for her wireless stations. We could pick up in Australia, and we did pick up, wireless messages from Germany almost every day. To-day, Germany has two direct wireless services with the United States of America and a third is now being arranged. France has two great stations capable of communicating with all parts of the world. I myself have heard Lyons at Pennant Hills, Australia, and the message was so loud that it could be carried along 500 miles of telephone wire and still be heard. America is so satisfied with this French service that she uses Bordeaux as the distributing centre for practically all her European news. The United States of America has long-distance internal wireless stations, and is at present conducting a wireless service in the United Kingdom, France, Norway, Japan and Germany, and arrangements are being made for duplicating the other existing services by a huge wireless station communicating simultaneously with five different countries. Italy has made considerable advances in this direction; Switzerland, too; and even Russia, according to statements which have been published in the press, is building the most powerful wireless station in the world. Now, the United Kingdom has two long wireless stations, one conducting commercial services with the United States of America and the other with Canada. It was from Carnarvon that a message was sent by my late colleague, Mr. Joseph Cook, and myself to Australia direct.

Imperial Communications.

The United States has two or three commercial services with European countries, including one Trans-Atlantic service, and she has a considerable number of short-range stations for communicating with American ships and other purposes. South Africa has only two stations of small range. Australia has a number of low-power stations capable of communicating with commercial ships a few hundred miles distant. New Zealand is no better off than Australia. Australia and New Zealand had a station erected some years ago and intended for inter-communication, but to-day it is almost obsolete. The range is supposed to be twelve hundred miles or more, and under certain circumstances we exceed that. India has a few internal coastal stations, but nothing modern. The Crown Colonies have very little, and Canada is the only Dominion having wireless communication with the United Kingdom. There is no system of direct wireless communication with the Dominions overseas. Now, it is obvious from this, if we do not give them the fullest encouragement in wireless telegraphy and wireless telephony in the immediate future, we shall be left far behind other countries. I understand also that other countries are gradually registering for their own use and so monopolising the best wave lengths necessary for economic communication. Wireless communication has been considered at several Conferences, I believe, and it was referred to or came before what is known as the Norman Committee.

Wireless situation in Empire.

I am not going to deal now with the recommendations of that Committee. I say, however, this, that nothing has followed upon either the decision of any of the Conferences or the recommendations of the Norman Committee. We still do nothing. Now, if I am asked what scheme I prefer, I say I prefer any scheme which will get itself done. When you refer these matters to the Post Office, your Post Office or our Post Office, we always get the same answer. It may be taken as symptomatic of Post Offices, but it is well known that they are obsessed with the idea that they, and they alone, are to be entrusted with the latest achievements of science. No doubt the Admiralty quite properly have to consider the effect of all this when at war, and they must take control when war breaks out. That goes without saying. I have had very spirited Conferences with my Postmaster-General, and with my officials, and I am bound to say they have not been altogether satisfactory. I come very reluctantly to the conclusion that our only hope for doing this thing is to get it done by somebody other than the Post Office, otherwise it will never be done at all.

I hope that nothing I have said will be taken as a reflection on the Post Office. I do not consider the Post Office is any worse than any other Government Department.

Mr. Lloyd George: All equally bad?

Mr. Hughes: I content myself with the way I have put it, but I say this, Mr. Prime Minister, that we ought not to be content to leave this thing where it is. If you say "that the Government will do this," then I say, "I shall be content that no one else than the Government shall do it." If you say, "We will get it done whether in this or that way," I am satisfied. All I ask is that it should be done. We cannot go on now as we are, imperilling our Imperial connections, imposing an intolerable handicap on commerce, and leaving our citizens in the various parts of the Empire generally uninformed of what the other parts are doing—left helplessly and hopelessly in the race for supremacy in a scheme of communication of which we were eleven years ago the originators. And so I say I am not going to pin myself down to any scheme so long as something is done.

Need for Wireless Progress in Empire.

I desire above all things that the thing shall be done, and I feel certain it will never be done unless we say it is to be done by the agency which will do it soonest and give us the best service. We have been assured that efficient service can be provided which will give us messages at half cable rates, whatever they are. If you bring in wireless as a competitor the cable will drop its rates. That, too, will help materially. The press of this country and of Australia, if one is to find their opinion in their press associations, are strongly in favour of the wireless system. The Norman Committee suggested we should have it in relays of 2,000 miles each—a complicated scheme in which nothing can be done unless everybody is agreed. You, Sir, who have had much experience with conferences, know that if nothing is to be done unless everybody is of one opinion then nothing can be done at all, and if all are to wait until the most dilatory is ready then we shall still be found waiting in ten years' time. What I propose is very simple, and it has the merit of simplicity. It is this, that this conference shall approve of a scheme, that Great Britain shall say: "We will put up our plant, you put up your plant." In this event we will put up a plant in Australia which will communicate direct with you, and every other Dominion can do the same. Then every Dominion is in this position, it need not wait on any other, either to begin construction or to reap the advantages. It is true it will be cut off from the other Dominions, but it will have direct communication with the heart of the Empire, and you with that Dominion. That is what I propose, and there is no reason to suppose that it will involve a commercial loss. We are assured it will not involve a commercial loss. No doubt we will meet with opposition. The cable companies will oppose it. Perhaps that is the best argument that can be adduced why we should press on with it. However, I shall endeavour to deal with these matters when they come up for discussion in detail. I have endeavoured to set them out, more or less in broad outline, but I do strongly urge that from every point of view, from the point of view of what may be termed Government of Empire, in order to ensure that the Dominions' share in formulating foreign policy shall be real, in order that the defence of Empire shall be effective, in order that trade and commerce may be benefited, and in order that public opinion throughout the Empire may be well informed and that Empire and British propaganda throughout the world may be in a position at least to hold its own with anti-British propaganda, that this should be done. For all these reasons I urge very strongly that a wireless scheme should be adopted. For the rest, I have given reasons why we should have an Air Service and an improved Passenger Service. I will conclude by suggesting that a small Conference Committee might be asked to consider such of these points as you think fit and bring up recommendations of a definite character which we can then discuss. I shall not do more than make that suggestion, and I leave it to you, Sir, in your wisdom, to determine what is to be done.

Conference to consider Communications.

Canada's position as regards Communications.

Mr. Meighen: There is not very much that I wish to say. Our position is not so accentuated in this difficulty as that of Australia and New Zealand. We are much closer and our development in wireless telegraphy in connection with England is further advanced. We have had a contract for ten years running with the Marconi Company, the terms of which we had to remodel not very long ago. But we have a wireless service, and we do not find any very general complaint on that score. In the matter of a new service, I do not know that I can address any criticism to any Government.

We are interested with the Motherland in the exchange of news, and we know the present position is not satisfactory. We know that the news that comes to Canada filters through New York; indeed, it is censored by the American authorities. I do not mean the Government authorities, but from the American standpoint. It reaches us in that condition. And it has, as a result, an undesirable influence, and a very serious influence it is.

Little, if any, Canadian news reaches England. I have been struck as never before by the paucity of news that gets into the press here. But the difficulty is this. I have made enquiries. It is not that there are no facilities for getting news here. It is not that it does not come. It is because it is not printed when it does come. Your newspapers are simply selling goods, and they find our news does not sell. I do not know how to get over that. Perhaps someone has a solution. Anyway, I made enquiries at Reuter's, and that is the information they gave me. We have had proposals for a purely Reuter service here. I think it involved some contribution from the British Government as well as from ourselves. We did not go into it. We have not established it. It is under consideration still. But so far we have had to decline on account of the very great cost.

Consequently, the cure lies at our own door, as far as I understand the question, in regard to news of Britain reaching Canada in its real and true form.

Imperial Communications.

As regards the reverse picture, we cannot help it. I do not know anything that we can do in Canada to get Canadian news into the British press. It does not get in, and it is the choice of the press in Britain that it does not.

Nor do we suffer, as regards transportation by steamship, as do the farther parts of the Empire. We are seven days, in the worst period of the year, between Liverpool and Quebec, and we can do better in the later periods of the year when the danger from ice is past.

I cannot speak technically on what we are doing as regards the wireless service. Mr. Guthrie can perhaps say something which would be of interest, though. Airship Services will possibly have to start with Government subventions, but in the years to come they should be a commercial proposition, and I do not think it will take very long. Now, the important thing is this, and it is the first point that Mr. Hughes made, that we should concentrate our efforts on getting the closest means of communication between the Government of Britain and the Governments of the Dominions. If we are as near as he thinks we may be to telephonic communication then that is the best; that is the goal. If we were there, then there would be a lot of constitutional clouds removed in my mind at once. I do not know how far we are. It seems to me that the work of this conference might well be directed towards discovering what can be done to facilitate despatch between our countries, which will never be satisfactory even if it takes the form of wireless, but which, when it does reach the stage of telephonic communication, will solve many of our difficulties. Such communication as can be had by the written word is very different in kind, and different in value, from what can be had by the human voice to and fro, and I hope, with Mr. Hughes, that we shall see the result in our time.

Need for Progress in Communications.

Sir Thomas Smartt: I have not yet had much time to give consideration to this matter, nor to go into the papers since you stated the subject should come up this afternoon. I have for a long time taken an interest in the matter of Communications, and remember that in 1907 at the Imperial Conference, you were perhaps the most sympathetic United Kingdom Minister then present who realised the vital necessity of some arrangements being entered into between the Governments of Great Britain and the Dominions, with a view to perfecting and quickening the means of communication. I was interested in what Mr. Hughes and Mr. Meighen said with regard to the possibilities of telephonic communications. When we were coming over the other day, General Smuts and I were much struck with the clearness with which we got wireless telephonic messages 210 miles from the coast. They were absolutely as clear as you can hear people talking here, and one came to the conclusion that by scientific investigation improvements might result whereby you, sitting in London, could enter into telephonic communication with us sitting in Capetown, with Mr. Hughes and Mr. Massey sitting in Australia and New Zealand. That seems possible, and if it is possible, it will solve one of the greatest difficulties in connection with our scattered Empire. As Mr. Meighen has said, no written communication can at all convey what the human voice conveys in any discussion of any sort whatsoever, but I do not think anything can be done by an ordinary discussion round this table in attempting to solve a question of that sort. I am in favour of a Committee being appointed, consisting of experts, to consider the matter and lay some conclusion before the Conference, but this, like all other matters, is one of expense, which is a serious matter under present conditions. When Mr. Hughes said that the war was hoped to change everything, he did not mention the one thing which the war has not changed, and that is the cost—except for the worse. When we discussed in 1907 the quickening of ocean communications, the price of coal was entirely different from what it is now, and I was surprised when we came over on the new Union Castle steamer, and she shortened her voyage to Southampton by one day, to find that to do this we burned 52 more tons of coal each day, which shows what an extremely costly problem the question of quickening our communications is. You remember, Mr. Prime Minister, that in 1907 the whole question of the advisability of quickening mail communications and passenger communications was very fully discussed, and it was then realised—and I think the same proposition faces us now—that it could only be done by common contribution on the part of the Mother country and the outlying Dominions. You spoke then of the desirability of a policy whereby each would bear a fair share of the cost. With regard to what Mr. Hughes says, I can go further back as far as South Africa is concerned. I can remember in 1890 and 1891 the "Scot" and the "Dunvelor Castle" made the voyage quicker than our commercial communication is carried out to-day. That is a very serious state of affairs when you realise the enormous developments that have taken place, in turbine engines and all sorts of improvements of that kind. We are largely in the hands of shipping companies and shipping combines, and in many cases they are sufficiently strong to dictate to the Governments of the various countries. That is our difficulty, and the question of cost in respect of diminishing the period of the voyage.

Mr. Meighen: We have Government steamers.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Yes, but whether the profits of that Government service are the same to-day as they were two or three years ago I should not like to say.

Mr. Hughes: Ask Lord Inchcape if his are. I am perfectly sure that where he could go we could follow.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Governments taking up commercial enterprises find that they are very expensive; that is our experience. What struck me to-day, when the Secretary of State for Air and the Air-Marshal were referring to the development of aerial transport, was whether it would be worth our while considering aerial communications from a business point of view; whether, before the Dominions entered into mail contracts extending over a period of years, we should not see whether there is any possibility within our means of developing the aerial service to carry our mails, even if it did not carry our passengers. It is a matter well worthy of our fullest discussion.

It is not alone that you want quickening of communication of thought, to which Mr. Hughes has referred with regard to wireless, whether it be wireless telegraphy or telephony, but you want a quickening of communication between individuals. If you cannot encourage the people of the Mother country to visit the Dominions, and the people of the Dominions to visit the Mother country, you cannot have that harmonious co-operation which we all desire. Mr. Hughes has referred to the Press. Well, Mr. Prime Minister, I must say that ever since I have been here I have viewed with the greatest concern the condition of the press of this country. It is not alone papers that you would expect to be catering for news of a sensational character, but leading dailies have during the last two or three weeks had their front columns filled with reports of prize fights, or divorce cases of nauseating character. That is all very detrimental. We are much better served in South Africa—though not well served—with events that are taking place here, than London is served with events that are taking place in the Dominions, and that is, to my mind, an extremely serious thing, because if you do not keep the people here—at the heart of the Empire—acquainted with what is taking place in the outlying portions of the Empire, they begin to lose interest, and I was wondering whether there would be any possibility of finding means whereby the newspapers could be got to adopt a policy of an educational character, or even only one newspaper, because there are sufficient among the reading public of this country to support it to a large extent, and give it a large circulation. Since we have been over here I have looked at the papers, and so far as the Union of South Africa is concerned I think I have hardly seen one single reference to what is taking place in that country. If somebody had run away with another man's wife—and he was a wealthy man—no doubt it would have been flashed over the wires, but so far as any news of real practical value is concerned, of information even with regard to our trade and our commerce, you hardly see anything whatsoever. The solution of all these problems is extremely important, but it is very difficult to suggest a remedy, and perhaps the best course would be, as already suggested, to refer the matter to a committee with expert advisers.

Unsatisfactory condition of Press.

Committee to consider Communications.

Lack of result from previous Committee on Communications.

Mr. Massey: There are one or two opinions which have been expressed by Mr. Hughes with which I do not agree, but I will come to them in a minute. Just with regard to this suggestion that a Committee should be set up to consider the whole question of Empire shipping. I happened to be here three years ago, and a Committee was set up then, and it went into the whole question exhaustively and submitted a resolution which still stands in the Public Records of this country. It was a good resolution, but I am very sorry to say that very little has been done to give effect to it. Then there is the question of time. I do not know how much longer this Conference is to continue sitting. Personally, I am not in a hurry to get away just yet. I want to get back to New Zealand by the 1st October, but that is a comparatively long way off. I hear of other members going fairly early, and it appears to me worth considering whether we ought not to sit in the evenings if it is possible to do so. I do not want to go back to the country from which I came and have to tell them we have done practically nothing. I want to be able to tell them, and to show them, that we have done something that will be of benefit to the whole of the Empire.

Imperial Communications.

So far as the press news is concerned, I endorse what has been said. The same thing that has been described happened with regard to every one of our Dominions. I saw the other day a telegram stating that an earthquake shock had taken place in New Zealand and somebody's clock had stopped. Only that and nothing more. On another occasion, there was a telegram from New Zealand stating that a variety of native parrot that we have over there had attacked sheep. I am simply giving these as instances of the paucity and bad selection of news that comes to England.

Unsatisfactory condition of British Press.

I do not know whether anything can be done to rectify that, and I do not know whether it is any part of our business. We can only regret it. The fact remains.

Now, Mr. Prime Minister, I heard Mr. Hughes complain that we, of the Overseas Dominions, have not a share in the foreign policy of the Empire, and I think I interjected something at the time that it was our own fault. As to any interference with the autonomy of any one of the Dominions, I have never heard of it from any British Minister, I have never heard any suggestion that would in the slightest degree interfere with the right of self-government so far as the Overseas Dominions are concerned.

Lack of good Communications prevents Dominions having voice in Empire's Foreign Policy.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Surely, that is an entirely different subject to be discussed outside the Inter-Empire discussion.

Mr. Massey: The matter has already been introduced. However, about foreign policy, if we were a Cabinet, we could not only discuss foreign policy but we could take part in the foreign policy of the Empire. Being a Conference simply, all that we can do is to express an opinion and leave our opinions to be dealt with as they think proper by the Ministers of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hughes: I do not accept that position.

Mr. Massey: That is the position.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, it is.

Mr. Massey: I would like to have it referred to some official constitutional authority and have it decided once for all, but that is the actual position. I know the difficulty, of course, and it is the distance which some of us have to travel in order to get here. That is the principal difficulty. There ought to be continuity and regularity so far as it is possible to attain it, but under existing circumstances neither continuity nor regularity is possible. That must be admitted. As time goes on, and distances become shorter—I mean, of course, as improvements are made in steam communications, rail communications, or whatever it may be—that difficulty will be got over to a certain extent; but I see no possibility of overcoming it by wireless, as suggested.

We have already had some experience of the business that was dealt with in this room finding its way into the newspapers. Why, when we send communications from one to another, or from the Prime Ministers overseas to the Imperial Prime Minister, as we call him, and I am glad to use that term . . . .

Mr. Churchill: You mean by wireless telephone?

Objections to Wireless Telephony.

Mr. Massey: By wireless telephone it would be simply publishing it to the world at large.

Mr. Hughes: Not necessarily.

Mr. Massey: There is no way out. I cannot see any other way at present. You could have an improved cable communication.

Mr. Churchill: Or wireless communication.

Mr. Massey: You could put it into code.

Mr. Churchill: But you cannot talk in code. You can have improved cables or improved wireless, but the wireless telephone would be open to the public.

Mr. Hughes: Why is it open?

Mr. Churchill: You can never tell who is listening to what you are saying.

Imperial Communications.

Mr. Hughes: Supposing you telephone it in code. There is nothing to prevent you.

Mr. Churchill: Then you cannot converse; you simply read out streams of figures.

Mr. Massey: You can always find a key to a code. There are many difficulties, but the difficulties can be made less. I quite agree with that.

Mr. Hughes: Might not they be able to get over that?

Mr. Massey: They have not done it yet. My point is that any improvements we may make for a considerable time to come, so far as it is possible for me to judge, must be made upon the basis of steamships and railway trains and cable communications. I hope there will be important improvements, and I have no doubt there will be in connection with wireless. I want to see them as well as other people, but they are not here yet.

Mr. Hughes: Wireless telegraphy is all right.

Climatic difficulties with regard to Aerial Communications.

Mr. Massey: So far as airships are concerned, I was listening to a particular friend of mine making a speech the other evening, and he detailed his experiences in an attempted flight from Paris to London. He told us that he had come down five times, and the fifth time he was only fifteen miles from where he started. Do you know him, Mr. Hughes?

Mr. Hughes: I know him, but that was one of the bad days.

Mr. Massey: I do not want to discourage anything in the way of improvement. So far as I am personally concerned, I should like to see improvements made, but do not forget this that we can do a lot with such experience as we have had here. We can do a very great deal, I believe, but when you talk about passing from this side of the world to the antipodes, do not forget that you cannot miss a winter both on this side of the world and on the other. If you start here in the summer you will get over there in the winter, and vice versâ. I know a little about mechanics, and that sort of thing, and I can imagine the effect of wind pressure on some of the big airships we see over London on a fine day. That may be got over but I do not see the possibility at present, and when you talk about travelling from here to Australia and New Zealand in ten days I want some of these gentlemen, who are so optimistic with regard to air services, just to attempt it and let me see if it can be done. If it can be done none will be better pleased than we who reside in the antipodes.

Sir Frederick Sykes: The Germans went to East Africa and back.

Steamship Communications.

Mr. Massey: Yes, and we can do anything that the Germans did. But on the journey from here to East Africa and back they did not go through a winter. The greater the distance of course the greater the disability. Mr. Hughes put his finger on a weak point when he made the statement that the steamships of to-day were no better than the steamships of 20 years ago so far as speed was concerned. I am afraid that is absolutely correct. I do not think we are as well off as we were. We in New Zealand are better off in one way—and everyone looks at his own country first—we are better off in one way because in getting to this country prior to four or five years ago the usual route—in fact, there was hardly any other route possible—was round Cape Horn, and ships were built for the Cape Horn trip. They were mostly slow vessels, cargo ships with a certain amount of passenger accommodation. We now go through the Panama Canal, and I hope the Americans will allow us to continue to go through it. We pass through the Panama Canal at present, although the distance is not a great deal shorter, nothing like one would imagine. Still, the weather encountered is better, and we are able to make trips with much more comfort for the passengers. I came over here once in a ship that averaged only 9½ knots, and we came across the North Atlantic with 175 passengers and not the slightest protection. If a submarine had come along it would have been the softest thing in the world for the submarine. A submarine did not come and we got here, but a submarine sunk the ship on her next trip. Those things are past, but instead of 10- or 12-knot ships—and we still have them—we ought to have vessels carrying mails and passengers and steaming not less than an average of 16 knots. That is not very much, and it can be done quite easily. But it means money. A 16-knot ship would take passengers from New Zealand to this country or vice versâ in a little less than thirty days, and thirty days would be a tremendous improvement upon what we have got now. It is too slow . . . .

Mr. Hughes: That is the least, really.

Imperial Communications.

Mr. Massey: I should like to say a higher figure, but that is quite feasible, and even if it required a subsidy I think it ought to be done. The mail services were very bad during the war, and they have not recovered yet. We never know when the mail will come, and when it does come we find it has taken between 38 and 42 days. That is the usual thing, and it is far too long. When this Committee was set up, which has been referred to, I expected big things from it. I thought we were going to do something definite and something for the benefit of every country in the Empire—because it is not limited to any country. I have read this document, and I have no doubt that other members have read it, and I think it is the most colourless document I have ever seen in all my life. If they had tried to avoid doing or saying anything important, or expressing an opinion upon any important point, they could not have done it better than they have done it here. It is no use, and if the next Board or Committee—this is only an interim Board which has reported recently—does not do better than this, it is not worth while going on. It needs to be taken in hand, and energetically. I believe that the Government which we are in the habit of speaking of as the "Imperial Government" should take the matter in hand, We can do a little for ourselves, and if it ever becomes a question of subsidy I have no doubt we shall do our share.

Contributions to Imperial Government for Communications.

I do not want to say much about the financial aspect, but I am looking forward to every country in the Empire, not being compelled, but volunteering to contribute more to the support of the Imperial Government than it has done up to the present, though I think we have done as much as we can do just now. So far as I am concerned, I do not want to make any rash promises with regard to this, but these things have to be paid for. There is no question about that. Shipowners are not philanthropists by a very long way, as most of us have experienced both as regards passenger fares and in freight rates. Speaking about freights, that is another of the difficulties the overseas people have at present. We got fairly good prices during the war period, New Zealand particularly perhaps, and I know that Australia joined in this. We had a contract with the Imperial Government by which the Imperial Government took over most of our products for the purpose of the soldiers, or for the navy, or for the civilians of this country. The Imperial Government took them over in our country, that is to say, f.o.b. They paid the freight and we did not feel it. But things have changed, prices have dropped, and we are now on our own, and are experiencing the very greatest difficulty in having anything left for the producers in the countries to which we belong after the expenses are paid. The least profitable of the products which we sent to this country, and of which we sent a very great deal, certainly during the war, was beef. I happen to know of this instance, because it came from the district which I represent. A pretty big shipment of beef of good quality came to Smithfield within the last few weeks from New Zealand. It was sold for 3½*d.* per lb., and it cost 4*d.* per lb. from the time the animals walked into the abattoirs in New Zealand until the meat was landed in London the other day. The unfortunate owner will have an additional payment of ½d. per lb. to make on account of the freight on the whole of the beef.

Freights to New Zealand.

Mr. Meighen: He will have to send more beef to pay the difference!

Mr. Massey: That is what the typical Irishman would be supposed to do. What is the difficulty? It is no use talking about keeping up the trade. We cannot do it unless freights are reduced. It is not so bad in the case of lamb. Lamb is selling at a fair price, but beef is very bad indeed, and second-class mutton is almost as bad as beef. Under these circumstances the trade must fall off, and there will be presently very little for the ships to carry. Altogether, the outlook is very far from good. We can produce any quantity, and there is no difficulty there. We can produce the goods that are required, but if we cannot get the price for them when landed here, owing to excessive charges in the way of freights and other expenses, and there is nothing left for the producer, then the country is going to suffer; and not only the people of my country, but the people of this country will suffer in proportion.

Cost of Oil Fuel.

There was a point mentioned about oil being cheaper than coal. I do not pretend to know a great deal about it except this, that just about the time the war came to an end several of the shipping companies trading to my part of the world changed their vessels from coal to oil. Some of them have now changed back; they say that the oil costs more than the coal, and I am afraid that there will be less oil in the future instead of more. One never knows. I only hope it will not be the case, but I am not at all certain that oil is going to be much cheaper than coal.

There is one point I wish to emphasise, and it is this. I have already expressed the hope that something will be done so far as this matter is concerned, because it is of extreme importance to the Overseas Dominions. There is this point which we must look at from an Empire point of view, viz., that anything in the way of improved communications, whether by post, by wireless, by cable, or by steamer, helps to strengthen the bonds of Empire and to bring us closer together than we are now, and on that account I think it is worthy of every possible encouragement. If the Committee is set up as suggested, I personally should raise no objection to it, but unless something more is going to be done than has been attempted up to the present, then I say it is not worth doing.

Exhaustion from the War.

Mr. Churchill: Prime Minister, I think everyone is agreed as to the objects which we have in view, and there cannot be any difference of opinion. Every one of these topics mentioned has shown us the need which we have got to meet, and the only question is how to meet that need and when it can be met; whether it is a cheaper news service or quicker correspondence in official matters, or faster steamships, or better aerial communication, or an Imperial wireless chain; every one of these things is not only desirable but an Imperial necessity. The question is, how can you get them and when can you get them? We must bear in mind that, at the present time, a great wave of exhaustion has passed over the world that has been fighting. The idea that we should have better methods of communication at our disposal for civilian purposes after five years of slaughter and destruction is not well founded. Obviously, all our civilian plant has been greatly impaired, worn out, deteriorating, and has only been imperfectly replenished, and there is a complete absence of new development which ought to have been planned two or three years ago, but which could not be planned because all our resources were engaged in the war. That is equally true whether you look at the comfort or speed of your steamships, or whether you look at the amount of money available, or whether you look at the amount of public interest in external affairs, the mind and resources of the nation are exhausted at the present time. There is a period of repose to gather the strength, which cannot be a long one—it may be only a few years. I agree it is deplorable at the present time to see the newspapers reporting the most trivial matters, yet, nevertheless, that is partly a sign of a temporary period of public fatigue, which will pass. While we see exactly what we want to do, it would be a mistake for us to propose very large or drastic action involving immense schemes and a huge expenditure of public money. We will do the best we can. We will drive ahead as far as we can. We will get plans made out on good lines, and we will get agreement between the different parties. Then, as our strength revives and recovers, we shall carry them into actual effect.

State of British Press.

Well, the first subject is the circulation of news within the British Empire. I lately received a deputation of all the press of this country, a most representative and powerful deputation, and they made a tremendous case exactly on the lines which Mr. Hughes has followed with so much emphasis to-day. They said the high rates of the cable service, the long delays in getting wireless communications into existence, hampered the whole transmission of news from the Mother Country to the Dominions and from the Dominions back here, and not alone does it hamper them, but it places us at an enormous disadvantage with regard to the news which is purveyed by the other great branch of the English-speaking world, which comes from America, under conditions at present far more favourable. There is no doubt that the American press, with their 100 million readers, is able to collect its news on a vast scale and, having paid for the collection by its internal circulation, it can afford to throw down the news—dump the news as it were—in other English-speaking countries.

Mr. Massey: And advertise itself.

Mr. Churchill: It is not merely a question of the news and of the demand for the news, but of the atmosphere created, and it is really a vital thing that the British Empire should develop a strong British Empire atmosphere, that we should know in each part of the Empire what the other parts are thinking. There should be a sympathetic understanding of each other's difficulties. It will come when we are telling our story to each other rather than having it told for us by other men.

Well, in this, as in other questions, you come up immediately against finance. Mr. Massey said he was looking forward to a greater effort being made to keep the British Navy upon a broad Imperial basis. I may say that stands absolutely first and we must be very careful, however other things may press and be desirable, that we do not get in the way of that vital necessity. I promised the newspaper authorities that I would myself lay this matter before the Conference, and now it is clear that all the Dominion representatives hold the same view on the subject. I think that at the Committee, which I understand the Prime Minister proposes to set up, I might possibly arrange for a short Conference between the Dominion Prime Ministers and the representatives of the newspapers in this country, with a view of seeing what practical proposals can be made. There is one practical proposal which we hope already to do with the aid of the Postmaster-General—that is to allow the deferred rate in regard to press communications at the cheaper rate which was discontinued during the war. So far as the wireless chain is concerned, of course, it has been delayed by the war and there has been a hiatus in actual construction during which time the matter has been at a standstill. Imperial Communications.

Mr. Hughes: France has been in the war, too, but she has the largest high-power station in the world.

Importance of Egypt in Communications.

Mr. Churchill: We have now completed the Oxford Station. I think it is already able to talk. The next link in that chain is, of course, Cairo. It only shows you how vitally important from every point of view Egypt is; whether you look at aviation or naval movements, or the military position of our Empire, or at this wireless communication, Egypt plays her part as one of the most important countries in the world.

Mr. Massey: It is the heart of the Empire.

Mr. Churchill: Well, the Oxford–Cairo Station will be talking in November.

Mr. Hughes: What is the range of the Cairo Station?

Wireless Chain.

Mr. Churchill: It talks to India and talks to this country, and we can talk direct from this country to India for military purposes, but India cannot talk back. There is no doubt whatever that these wireless chains, when they get into operation, will afford a very great addition to the facilities of interchange of communication. They will not, in my opinion, displace the cables, but they will develop an additional class of traffic of very great importance.

If the Committee is set up, I understand that the Prime Minister proposes that the Postmaster-General should be a member, and I will take steps to bring Sir Henry Norman and other members into touch with the members of the Committee in order that you may hear shortly and briefly from them exactly what has been done, and will be done in the next six or eight months, in regard to the Imperial wireless chain.

Mr. Hughes: Is your policy definitely settled or do you mean what has been done? Are you fixed in your opinion?

Cost of present-day Steamship Services.

Mr. Churchill: Certainly. The construction is proceeding with these stations and with the two new ones Oxford and Cairo. It is finished in the one case and will shortly be finished in the other. So far as steamships are concerned, there I think you will find that at the present time financial difficulties will be very great indeed because the cost of everything is enormous, and to accelerate the South African and New Zealand services over these great distances of water will be a very costly matter; but, as Sir Thomas Smartt has reminded us, this is an old love of the Prime Minister's. He and I at the Conference of 1907, when I was Under-Secretary for the Colonies and he was President of the Board of Trade, always pressed this method of developing the unity of the British Empire, and it is one of the first objects to which we should devote our money and energies once the vital questions connected with the safety of the country and the naval power of the country have been provided for. There is no surer way, whether you take conveyance of freight, or conveyance of passengers, the cheaper freights and faster passenger services are the most vital need after security has been provided. With every knot an hour which is added to the steamships connecting the British Empire, that Empire gets smaller and less unwieldy, while retaining its old strength and richness and gaining in efficiency. It compresses the whole structure of the Empire.

Mr. Lloyd George: It gets both smaller and bigger.

Sub-Committee to consider improved Steamship Services.

Mr. Churchill: It gets smaller and bigger at the same moment. I think that a sub-committee of this Committee might be set up, of which the President of the Board of Trade and Sir Joseph Maclay would be members who could select one or two practical schemes and put them forward for consideration. But I would say this. While looking at the general direction in which we wish to go in the next five or ten years, let us find some practical things which we can start now having regard to our limited resources, at the present time.

Development of Egypt-India Air Route.

So far as the air is concerned, I would like to say a word about that from the point of view with which I am specially concerned. Until a few months ago I was Secretary of State for Air, and, in the Middle East, I am concerned with what is a very large portion of the Royal Air Force. Perhaps you have had a look at this map, and the Prime Ministers will recollect what I said when I spoke to them about Palestine and Mesopotamia, as to our methods of aerial control in these wild countries. We have now in Mesopotamia seven air squadrons and there will shortly be eight. We have one here and five in Egypt. That is a very powerful force. We have to have the aerodromes and the pilots and the sheds and the planes and the mechanics and so on, at Baghdad, in Cairo and Ludd; having got them there for the purpose of maintaining order and maintaining order more cheaply, there is the possibility of utilising this plant, when conditions are peaceful, for purposes of accelerating communications. The expense in regard to carrying mails or passengers by aeroplane, or by airship if you like, is very considerable and if you charge the passenger with the whole cost of maintaining the pilot permanently, the training schools which create him, the aerodromes, the mechanics, the whole apparatus, you are putting a burden upon that means of communication which will make it uneconomical at the present time in many cases. But here, where you have already all the plant on the ground, it would not be necessary to charge a higher rate for the aeroplanes which would be passing to and fro with mails or passengers than would actually pay the cost of the trip of the aeroplane and the remuneration of the pilot. Therefore I believe it would be possible for this particular section, Karachi–Baghdad–Cairo, in the very near future, as a practical matter, without any large additional expenditure, to establish an economic and paying service for mails and for a limited number of passengers. Already we have got a line through the desert which the aeroplanes can fly over without the danger of coming down and being lost. The whole line has now been surveyed. We have made friends with the Arabs at the different places where you might want to come down. Little deposits of petrol have been entrusted to the Arabs. In fact yesterday this naked empty desert was crossed in eleven hours.

Captain Guest: They were into Cairo in eleven hours.

Mr. Churchill: The surface of the desert is white and you plough a line which shows black under the surface of the soil and therefore the aeroplane has no difficulty in following it, and yesterday a machine came through from Baghdad to Cairo in eleven hours, accomplishing a journey which would otherwise have taken 4½ to 5 weeks. That shows what the air can do for the British Empire.

In addition to that we have the great military advantage of being able to move all our aeroplanes from here into Egypt to reinforce her if trouble occurred, instead of having to take them to pieces and put them on board ship and then fit them up again. That is a very important aspect—this air route across the desert—and it would be well if we could apply this to the shortening up of the British Empire as a whole, especially to those parts in which Mr. Hughes and Mr. Massey, and the representatives of India, are interested. It is almost a direct straight line, "as the crow flies" literally, and we must begin in a moderate way running these passenger aeroplanes. I took the responsibility of ordering these to be made, and they are being made, aeroplanes of a civilian character, which can be flown by a pilot when we are not doing military work.

Mr. Lloyd George: What tonnage can they carry?

Captain Guest: Eight people—1,600 lb.

Mr. Lloyd George: And anything in addition?

Captain Guest: I would not like to answer that off hand.

Sir Frederick Sykes: It is not an economic proposition yet, but it can become so, if the route is laid, and it is being laid down. I think it will be some time before it can be called an economic proposition, because of overhead charges.

Mr. Churchill: Exactly. That is perfectly true. But if we have to have 5, 6 or 7 of these squadrons lying there keeping order in the country, and the country was quite quiet in the interval, that is not a cost with which the ordinary mail should be saddled. This plan would knock ten or twelve days or even more off the journey from New Zealand and Australia home to England, because you could get in the train at Colombo—or wherever you get on the mainland—and run up by train to Karachi and fly across to Cairo and take another ship—four days home. Imperial Communications.

It could very quickly be made to carry a large proportion of the mails, and I have no doubt that the mails could be lessened to a small weight. I am afraid I have trespassed upon ground which the Air Minister ought to have dealt with, but I thought we could go more at leisure into that if we have this Committee. The Prime Minister has fallen in with the suggestion of Mr. Hughes about a Committee, and I do not think we need have many meetings with the Prime Minister. If we have one or two meetings on the right lines, we could have some Sub-Committees to bring forward definite matters to come up before the Conference, and if it is agreeable I am quite ready to undertake the charge of that group of Committees and Sub-Committees. Committee to consider Communications.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Are any of the Departments carrying out any investigations with regard to development in wireless telephony?

Mr. Churchill: You will hear all about that.

Sir Thomas Smartt: If you can speak from one end of the Dominion to the other, it is going to have an enormous effect.

Mr. Churchill: The Postmaster-General is an expert on that.

Mr. Kellaway: The Committee already set up does not deal with that.

Mr. Churchill: The proposal is—

"A Committee composed as follows:—

"Mr. Churchill (in the Chair),
"A representative of Canada,
"A representative of Australia,
"A representative of New Zealand,
"A representative of South Africa,
"A representative of India,

"in consultation as required with the Ministers at the head of the Board of Trade, Air Ministry, and Post Office, and their officials, is appointed to consider the question of the practical means available at the present time for the development of Imperial communications by land, sea, air, cable, radio-telegraphy and telephony. The Committee should report as soon as possible."

Mr. Hughes: You say "practical means available at the present time." That is rather cryptic.

Mr. Churchill: I attach great importance to that. I think we might spend enormous time in considering what will be possible ten or fifteen years hence, and nothing would be done, but there may be practicable steps which we could take now.

Mr. Hughes: I see what you mean. Anything we can do now we might consider.

Mr. Lloyd George: Our programme is very much upset by the absence of General Smuts. I have been going through all these things on the agenda. It is very difficult to consider them in his absence. For instance, Constitutional Questions—you cannot discuss those in the absence of General Smuts. Then there is the League of Nations, Disarmament and Anglo-French Relations. Future work of Conference.

Mr. Meighen: I think we could discuss the latter.

Sir Maurice Hankey: General Smuts's last words to me were that we should not discuss Anglo-French Relations without his presence.

Mr. Lloyd George: He takes a very definite view on that matter. For to-morrow I think we could take Egypt. I do not know if General Smuts has any special opinion about that. It is very vital to the Empire. But I suggest that we take Egypt to-morrow afternoon. That is a very important question. We have been hanging it up until we could get the views of the Dominion Premiers and India. In the morning we go to the Treasury about Reparations, but in the afternoon we could take Egypt. Lord Curzon has seen the various Ambassadors, and proposes to give an account of his conversations with them to-morrow. He does not want further discussion until he gets their replies.

Imperial Communications.

Mr. Massey: I think that is very satisfactory.

Mr. Lloyd George: We had better sit at 11 to-morrow morning. I suggest that the Foreign Marriage Question should be referred to the Colonial Office Conference, that is about people of various nationalities born abroad; that is something to do with the Marriage Laws. The next question is the present control of the New Hebrides. The third is the Empire Patents. If those three questions could be referred to the Colonial Office Conference, it would relieve the pressure upon this Conference very considerably.

Mr. Hughes: I have no one to attend to these things for me. I cannot be in two places at the same time. If you are going to fix the Colonial Office Conference when we are not sitting anywhere else I can go to it.

Mr. Churchill: So far as the New Hebrides is concerned, it is only a matter between Australia and New Zealand. I could take that up.

Mr. Hughes: That will suit quite well.

Mr. Massey: It will also suit me.

Mr. Lloyd George: On the question of publicity for to-day, I do not think it matters what you publish for to-day, and I suggest that it be left very much as before.

Mr. Hughes: As far as Australia is concerned, I see no reason why I should not give the Australian press the substance of what I said about communications.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is a very vital matter to Australia, much more than it is to Canada.

Mr. Hughes: I did not raise any point that would hurt the feelings of any other country.

Mr. Lloyd George: Do not put in the attack on the Post Office.

Mr. Hughes: If you like, nothing shall be said about anybody.

Mr. Churchill: I was going to suggest that the Secretariat should work up a thoroughly good account, beginning with Mr. Hughes's speech and such parts of other people's statements as are suitable, and that they should let them out, not for to-morrow but for the day after.

Mr. Hughes: I do not mind that at all. What objection have you to my giving to the Australian press what I said?

Mr. Lloyd George: I should not think that there was any objection to that so long as it was agreed. These things are of special interest, and there is nothing controversial about them at all.

(The Conference then adjourned.)

Egypt.

Lord Curzon: It was only yesterday afternoon that I was asked to be ready to take up the question of Egypt to-day, and, very busily occupied as I have been all yesterday afternoon and all this morning, I must be pardoned if I have not had the time to put the narrative and the exposition in as complete a form as I should otherwise have liked.

Difficulty of Egyptian Problem.

I think you will find, when I have stated the case, that the Egyptian tangle is about the worst of all those we have had before us, and I am doubtful if anything I may say will lead you to think that a practical solution is in sight. In order to understand the present position I must say a word or two, although my retrospect will be as brief as possible, about the circumstances which have led up to it.

Arabi Rebellion.

It is now over forty years ago since we went into Egypt to suppress the Arabi rebellion and found ourselves insensibly committed to something like an occupation of the country. In the years following the Arabi rebellion it was the deliberate and avowed policy of our Government to evacuate Egypt as soon as we could. That policy was frequently expressed by Lord Salisbury. It took the form of a Convention which Sir Henry Drummond Wolff went out to Egypt to negotiate, and it was only owing to the influence of France, most unwisely exercised in her own interests, that the Sultan of Turkey was induced to refuse his signature to that agreement. Had he given it at that time we should have been out of Egypt long before now. Whether we should have had to go back again is, of course, another question.

1888—1914.

Then ensued a period of a quarter of a century, from 1888 to 1914, the outbreak of the war, in which Egypt was a more or less autonomous nation existing under the suzerainty of Turkey, ruled by a Khedive and a Council of Ministers and with an Egyptian Legislative Assembly in the background. The British Government for that quarter of a century was represented by an official who had no higher rank than that of Agent and Consul-General. Indeed, his diplomatic status was not higher than that of the representatives of the other European Powers who were at Cairo. But little by little a gradual change in the situation took place, due to many causes. Firstly, to the presence of our army of occupation necessary for the preservation of order and the security of the country; secondly, the obligation that fell upon us to recover the Soudan; thirdly, the existence of very wide-spread and powerful British interests in the country; and, lastly, the personality of Lord Cromer himself—a man who with that remarkable administrative gift, with that genius for ruling an Oriental country, could not fail, apart from all the other conditions I have named, insensibly to draw all the strings into his own hands. Thus at the end of this period, or at any rate up to the time of Lord Cromer's death, Egypt came to be regarded almost as a British possession. Certainly it was a country in which the British point of view and British interest were very much in the ascendant. Meanwhile, and particularly after Lord Cromer had gone (because after his disappearance from the scene a number of other men unfit to wield the bow of Ulysses succeeded him), a number of influences began to be felt which were secretly eating away at the heart of our position. For instance, we began, hardly noticed at the time, to increase the figures, which afterwards became excessive, and in my opinion dangerous, of British officials in the country, and there can be no doubt about it that the immense and exaggerated number of these officials, the quality of whom appears to have deteriorated as time went on, was largely responsible for the rising that afterwards took place. Another tendency manifested itself, and that was, as you increase the numbers of your British-official population in an Asiatic country they tend not to draw closer to the people but to draw away from them. They become a colony by themselves, living apart, with their own sports, their own interests, their own life, and as we have seen in some parts of India (but less there than in Egypt, because they are more scattered), so did the British colony in Egypt tend to pursue a life of its own, divorced from Egyptian sentiment and habits. We had another failure in Egypt which is a little difficult to analyse but which I think is undoubted, and that was in our educational policy. It had in some respects the same sort of result as our education had in India; that is to say, taking a number of sharp, clever young men, all aspiring to fill Government posts which were not there to be filled, and, in so far as they failed in their aspirations, drifting into a backwater of sullen discontent. All these causes were at work, and meanwhile, the restraining hand of Lord Cromer having been removed, the then Khedive Abbas Hilmi, who at no time was a satisfactory or loyal person, was persistently intriguing against us.

Failure of Educational Policy.

Situation on Outbreak of War, 1914.

I now come to the conditions at the outbreak of war. When in the autumn of 1914 we found ourselves at war with Turkey, it became necessary, owing to the fact that Egypt was nominally subject to the Sultan, to regularise the position there.

Egypt.

Mr. Asquith's Government was then in power; the present Prime Minister was a Member of his Government, and he will recollect that the question was debated by that Government as to whether the better policy would be to annex Egypt straight away or to declare a British Protectorate. For reasons into which I need not enter, but with which I am entirely in accord, it was decided to take the latter of these courses and to declare a Protectorate. Thus in September 1914, the Khedive Abbas Hilmi, who had openly associated himself with our enemies, was deposed, and one of his uncles, Prince Hussein Kamal, a gentleman of character and integrity and very loyal to us, was put upon the throne with the title of Sultan, and in the proclamation which was issued declaring the change of status, we laid down that Egypt was placed under the protection of His Majesty and would thenceforth constitute a British Protectorate.

Egypt as a British Protectorate.

We did that in perfect good faith, but with, I think, exaggerated innocence. For instance, we did not take the trouble to explain to the Egyptians exactly what a Protectorate meant. We are so used to Protectorates in a hundred different forms in different parts of the world that we did not bother to explain what was the kind of Protectorate we were setting up in Egypt. On the other hand, the word itself, as you well know, can have an invidious connotation. In one extreme it may mean a gentle and necessary supervision of the external and internal policy of a country. At the other extreme it may mean that under the guise of a Protectorate it is really ruled by British hands and controlled by British guns. We did not explain to the Egyptians exactly what we meant, and undoubtedly there existed in many of their minds the impression, not altogether unreasonable, that this Protectorate had been declared for the purposes of the war only, and that when the war was over we should revert to our older position, that we should remember our old promises as to evacuation, and that some change in the position in Egypt, favourable to the aspirations of the natives, might be expected to ensue. That was the position, I think, at the outbreak of the war. When it began, we said, quite rightly, that we did not expect Egypt to take her part on the fighting front, and that we would make ourselves responsible, as we did, for the defence and protection of her frontiers; but, although we did not ask her to contribute soldiers, we did ask her, and with very profitable results, to make an indirect contribution to the war. This was at once a source of strength to us, and of discord among the people. I need not enter into the actual position that Egypt occupied in the war.

The Dominion Ministers here will recall very well that it became a kind of Clapham Junction through which their soldiers passed to and fro, and where they spent many months. The Ministers will recall, too, our successful attempts to throw back a Turkish invasion of Egypt on the Suez Canal.

Egyptian Internal situation during the War.

I pass away from that to the internal symptoms that were largely responsible for what followed. Mr. Balfour rightly reminds me that it was a labour question. We recruited in Egypt what was called the Egyptian Labour Camel Transport Corps. These men were well paid, and, if the scheme had remained as originally conceived and carried out, it would have been all right, but the levying of this Corps fell into the hands of the local Egyptian officials, the village officials known as "Omdehs," and these men, freed from the control of their British superiors, who had all been drafted away to the war in one capacity or another, pursued methods of corruption, of oppression, even of cruelty, recalling the old days of the Press Gang in this country. At the same time, another source of trouble was the requisition of cereals and animals and the collection for the Red Cross Fund—all of them innocent themselves and right and proper in their inception, but gradually drifting in the hands of the native agents into engines of oppression upon the people. Simultaneously, Egypt found herself confronted, as almost all the other countries involved in the war, in a great rise in prices, which weighed heavily upon the population. Thus, all the while, almost unknown to us here and really either unobserved or insufficiently observed by our people who were working in the country, a state of affairs was growing up that presaged trouble. In 1917 the Sultan Hussein, of whom I have spoken, unfortunately died, and we then had to put up in his place the only available candidate, his brother, the present Sultan, whose name is Fuad, who had been educated abroad, was not in very close touch with Egyptian sentiment, and neither in character nor ability could be compared with his brother.

Situation at time of Armistice.

In 1918 the war came to an end. With the termination of the war a new cause of political discontent emerged. President Wilson's Fourteen Points and the ideals for which he fought at Paris had a wide repercussion in all Oriental countries, and not least, I think, and perhaps, in view of the history I have put before you, most of all in Egypt itself. In November 1918, just at the time of the armistice, a declaration, for which Lord Robert Cecil was responsible, was drawn up and issued by the British and French Governments, mainly with reference to Syria and Mesopotamia, but laying down in language of great clearness that our policy was the enfranchisement of the various people who had been liberated by our arms from the yoke of the Turks and the institution in those areas of forms of National Government.

Well, when the Egyptians, who look upon themselves as in the very front files of civilisation and who trace their history back to thousands of years, found that the Arabs and other people who had been involved in the war were proposing to get some form of self-government of their own, they began to think very poorly of the situation in which they still found themselves under the Protectorate, and were to be denied conditions which were to be given to their much more backward brothers. This was the position at the end of 1918; then a man named Zaghloul Pasha, who had himself been Minister of one or other of the Egyptian Ministries—a somewhat discontented man and up to that time a man of no great political position or reputation—began to organise the Nationalist Party. He called upon our then High Commissioner, Sir Reginald Wingate, and presented to him claims that involved complete autonomy for Egypt, and he expressed his desire to come to London to put forward this programme before the British Government. Simultaneously, the then Prime Minister of Egypt, Rushdi Pasha, and one of his colleagues, Adli Pasha, of whom I will say more in a moment, expressed a desire also to come to London. Their suggestion reached London just before Mr. Balfour, who was then Foreign Minister, was going to Paris for the Conference, and, not unnaturally, he represented that the moment was an unfavourable one to receive them, but that he hoped to receive them a little later on. The Egyptian Party—the Nationalist Party—have always represented that as a great error of judgment on our part. It is easy, in the light of subsequent events, to indicate that a different answer might have been returned, but, in the circumstances, it was very difficult to give them another answer, and a little later, when the suggestion that they should be asked to come to England was renewed, Rushdi and Adli, having by this time got more into the hands of the extremists than before, laid down as a condition of their invitation that the other people—Zaghloul Pasha and his friends—should come with them and be received too. This invitation again, rightly or wrongly, we declined. We said we should be very glad to see the Ministers at any time, but we could not, in view of our position, contemplate receiving a man whose views were so utterly inconsistent with the whole principles of our position in Egypt. Thereupon, Zaghloul Pasha and his men raised the flag of revolt. They went with a delegation to the Sultan, Sultan Fuad, and used most menacing language to him, and our then representative in Egypt, Sir Reginald Wingate, being in England, Sir Milne Cheetham recommended, in the interests of order, that these men should be ordered to leave the country. His advice was accepted by us here—I was then acting at the Foreign Office—and they were removed to Malta. This was the final spark that kindled the flame.

Zaghloul Pasha.

Mr. Hughes : When was that?

Revolt in Spring of 1919.

Lord Curzon : In March 1919. Then ensued the rising in Egypt, of which you have all read, taking our people there and here almost entirely by surprise, on a scale almost unparalleled in ferocity and accompanied by looting, pillage, and the murder of British soldiers; in fact, an open revolt, and the serious part of it was not merely the incidents by which it was accompanied, but the fact that it permeated all classes, and that, for the first time in that quarter of a century of our connection with Egypt, which I just now referred to, the Fellahin for whom we had done so much to raise, whom Lord Cromer had by his successful policy brought into a condition of what we thought was permanent friendship with ourselves, were involved. It was not only a question of Moslem against Christian, but all classes of people, including for the first time, at any rate, in recent history, the Coptic community. Just at that time, Sir Reginald Wingate being in England, Lord Allenby, fresh from his triumphs in the East and at that time Commander-in-chief of the British Forces in Egypt and Palestine, went to Paris where the Conference was sitting. By common consent of all of us, it was thought desirable to invite him to return to Egypt as High Commissioner with full powers, military and civil, to deal with this perilous situation in the manner that he thought best. He arrived at Cairo in the concluding days of March 1919. His first step was to reverse the policy that had been pursued and to bring back Zaghloul Pasha and his friends from Malta. Whether that decision was right or wrong, I have often puzzled myself to think. On the one hand, it was a generous concession, and it might have been held at that moment to be the sign of a desire to calm the spirits agitated by this terrible rising. On the other hand, it could be argued that this was a sign of weakness on our part, of which the Nationalist Party was certain to take advantage. However that may be, they certainly did take advantage of it—they certainly did. Zaghloul Pasha and his three friends, released from Malta, at once transferred themselves to Paris, where they had large funds at their disposal, and entertaining on a considerable scale, they tried unavailingly to get the sympathy of the Conference then sitting in Paris.

Egypt.

It was clearly necessary for us, and such was the advice of Lord Allenby, to take some special step, both to enquire into the cause of the outbreak and to place things for the future on a better footing. The man of all others marked out by his experience and reputation for dealing with difficulties, was one of our own colleagues—I mean Lord Milner. He, at that time, was Secretary of State for the Colonies, and his early fame had been made in Egypt more than a quarter of a century before. His book on Egypt is still a classical work on the administration of that country. Accordingly, we decided to send out a special Mission to Egypt under Lord Milner for the purpose that I have described. Various conditions, into which I need not enter, rendered it difficult to send out the Mission in the summer of 1919, and it was not until the winter—in the latter part of the winter—that he and his colleagues (whom we selected as the men best suited), most of them of Egyptian experience, and all representing the liberal point of view, started from this country. It was not until December that they went out. When they arrived in Cairo they met with organised antagonism from Zaghloul and his friends, carried out with all their resources of boycotting, picketing and the like, by the Nationalist Party. Lord Milner and his colleagues conducted themselves with admirable composure. Although none of the prominent Egyptians were allowed officially to see them; although when any of them went about in the country to make enquiries, they were dogged and followed from place to place, and every effort was made to keep people away from them; nevertheless, in private conversations in private places with leading men, they collected an immense amount of valuable information, and arrived at a general précis. This they embodied in a kind of preliminary report which they sent home to us, but all the while they did not come into contact with Zaghloul himself, who remained in Paris. Accordingly, when Lord Milner came back to this country, and in his anxiety, before he framed his final Report, to get some idea of what the extremists desired, he invited Zaghloul and his friends—not in an official, but in a private capacity as representing an important section of Egyptian opinion—to come over and see him in London. Conversations took place between Lord Milner's Mission and these gentlemen in London in the summer of 1919, and by the month of August certain tentative conclusions had been arrived at between them.

Lord Milner's Mission.

Mr. Hughes : Before Lord Milner went out?

Lord Curzon : No, this was after Lord Milner came back in March—these gentlemen came here in June.

Mr. Hughes : You said 1919.

Lord Curzon : I beg pardon, 1920. I made a mistake, they came here in 1920. The conversations lasted until August 1920, and then this tentative agreement was arrived at. I ought to say in fairness to the Cabinet, that they knew nothing of what was going on. Lord Milner had undertaken these conversations on his own responsibility in private, and I, myself, as Foreign Secretary, had only the dimmest idea of what was going on, and I was a good deal surprised when I saw the conclusions in the form they ultimately assumed. However, in the month of August this tentative agreement having been arrived at, Zaghloul undertook to send back some of his friends to Cairo in order to receive a favourable reception. I need hardly say that they took advantage of the occasion to publish it in the papers without authority, and from that moment, the matter having been made public, we ourselves had to take cognisance of it, and I am bound to say that it began to be regarded, not as the pronouncement of Lord Milner and colleagues only, but that of His Majesty's Government. Probably you have had the Report.

Mr. Hughes : Did Zaghloul's arrival in Cairo precede the Report of Lord Milner to the British Government.

Lord Curzon : Zaghloul himself did not go back to Cairo, he remained in Paris. He sent back his principal friends to Cairo in order to secure—as they did secure—a favourable report for the tentative conclusions. Broadly speaking, what Lord Milner proposed in this arrangement was that, for the relationship of a Protectorate for Egypt, there should be substituted a Constitution, by means of a Treaty between Egypt and Great Britain, under which Britain would recognise the independence of Egypt as a constitutional monarchy with representative institutions; and Egypt would confer upon Great Britain such rights as are necessary to safeguard her special interests, and to enable her to furnish the guarantees which must be given to foreign Powers to secure the relinquishment of their capitulatory rights. In the course of the same draft agreement, Lord Milner, advancing somewhat from the position he had taken while in Egypt, agreed, in order to meet the demands of Zaghloul Pasha and his friends, to hand over to Egypt the control of their foreign affairs, and the right of representation in foreign countries.

He also agreed, while providing for the maintenance of a British force in Egypt, that it should not be located in any of the capital cities where its presence was alleged to be a cause of offence, but that being kept there because of the central Imperial position of Egypt which necessitates the safeguarding of the Canal, the British forces should be maintained somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Canal itself. He further proposed that our British control of the administration should only survive in the form of the appointment of a number of rather shadowy officials whose relations with the native Government were left somewhat obscure, and he trusted to British interests being maintained in Egypt in the future by the paramount position of the High Commissioner who would continue to represent this country there, but who would apparently have to rely on the prestige of his personality and his position for the influence that he might exercise rather than, as hitherto, upon any definite show of force. That is a very brief and necessarily condensed and perhaps not altogether complete summary of the proposals made by Lord Milner. It was at this stage that the matter came before the Cabinet here, and papers were written upon the matter by myself and some of my colleagues in which we pointed out what we thought in some respects the weakness or the drawbacks of the position. I remember more particularly laying stress—and here I think I had the support of almost all if not all of my colleagues—upon the very doubtful provision about British troops, the proposal to concentrate them in some area removed from the great cities, and I remember pointing out that such a position seemed to me to be a source of great weakness and danger in the future. Also I was not quite reassured about the proposals on foreign affairs or the position of the judicial and financial advisers, who were to remain Europeans under the new régime, and I argued that it was necessary to lay down, if anything like this scheme was adopted, that no foreigner should be admitted into the military or civil service of the Egyptian Government except with our consent, in other words, that in the interests both of the very large staff of Englishmen serving there now, and in the interests of the future management of affairs, if we were to maintain any influence at all, we should not allow an opening for Frenchmen and Italians, and people of that sort, to overrun the Administration. Lord Allenby, who was over in England at the time, took substantially the same view as I did, but he held very strongly to the position, Lord Milner having reported, his report having been made public, the Egyptian people finding it impossible to believe that anything that came under Lord Milner's name could not be the view of the British Government, that it was impossible to go back from the broad principles of the policy recommended by Lord Milner, although he thought in those points I have mentioned, and some others, that we should be at liberty and we ought to insist upon conditions that guaranteed our position and rights in Egypt more effectively than some of Lord Milner's proposals had done. He then went back to Egypt, and at his instance, with a view to starting matters on the next stage, the Cabinet on the 22nd February sent a telegram to Lord Allenby for publication in Egypt. It was also published here. It communicated the broad lines on which we were prepared to proceed. I will read this declaration if I may: "His Majesty's Government, after a study of the proposals made by Lord Milner, have arrived at the conclusion that the status of protectorate is not a satisfactory relation in which Egypt should continue to stand to Great Britain. While they have not reached final decisions with regard to Lord Milner's recommendations, they desire to confer regarding them with a delegation, nominated by the Sultan, with a view, if possible, to substitute for the protectorate a relationship which would, while securing the special interests of Great Britain and enabling her to offer adequate guarantees to foreign Powers, meet the legitimate aspirations of Egypt and the Egyptian people."

The meeting will see that that was a tremendous concession to Egyptian sentiment because it did promise that for the conditions of the Protectorate existing since 1914 there should be substituted Treaty relations, creating some form of independence for the Egyptian people. On the other hand, in all other respects, we retained—and this was publicly stated—entire liberty when the delegation came over here to lay down and even to insist upon such conditions as we might think necessary, the Egyptian Delegation, of course, retaining equal liberty when it came over here to make any other proposals outside the strict lines of the report which it might find desirable to put forward. In other words, within the confines of the broad principles I have enunciated, both parties retained their liberty for the impending discussion. These communications having been made to the Egyptian Government and having been received with great gratitude and enthusiasm in Egypt, it then became necessary to take steps for the constitution of the official Egyptian delegation that had to come over here and conclude the new Treaty with us. The Sultan had always been promised that such a delegation should come. We exercised no sort of pressure in its constitution. We asked the Egyptian Government to send whom they pleased. The existing Ministry, which had been a mere stop-gap Ministry in Egypt, disappeared from the scene and was replaced by Adli Pasha, one of the gentlemen who had been engaged over here in the negotiations with Lord Milner. He is the present Prime Minister and he at once took steps to constitute the Delegation, to nominate its members and to give indications as to the programme. At this moment Zaghloul, the evil spirit in the whole discussion, returned to Egypt. He met with a great reception from the people; he was greeted with an ovation like that of some great military conqueror, and in the early stages after his return, he addressed himself, apparently, to an attempt at friendly co-ordination with Adli's Ministry. There was every hope for a week or two that the two would combine and that the Delegation would represent all parties. However, whether it was inspired by vanity, as is alleged by his critics, by a kind of megalomania from which it is well known that he suffers, or from jealously of Adli Pasha, whom he cordially dislikes, or from a feeling that by standing out altogether he could get the best terms and become the first ruler, he broke with the Prime Minister and started a campaign of his own. He went about the country making a series of speeches which would even excite the admiration of a Sinn Feiner, and finally owing to his harangues, a state of affairs was produced which culminated in serious disorders in Cairo and riots of the most terrible description in Alexandria, commencing with a squabble between Moslems and Greeks, which ended in an anti-European outburst in which many lives—forty I think—were lost and I think some hundreds were wounded.

Egypt.

Constitution of Egyptian Delegation to discuss situation.

Riots—May, 1921.

Mr. Hughes: When was this?

Lord Curzon: That was in May 1921, and the situation was only re-established by the appearance of British troops upon the scene. The native police and the Egyptian army who were first called upon, were quite inadequate to deal with the situation, and it was only restored by British troops. That is the position up till the last few weeks. Adli Pasha with his mission is now on the seas. They will be here at the end of this week. Zaghloul and his friends are carrying on this dangerous and, bitter campaign in Egypt, and I think there can be little doubt, from all we hear from them, that Zaghloul is out to destroy Adli, to defeat any arrangements that might be concluded between Adli and us here, and very likely in the long run to unseat the present Sultan of his position on the throne. Now we have arrived at this point that we have to consider what we are to do. Can we secure an agreement here, and if we do secure an agreement here, will it be accepted in Egypt, and by acceptance in Egypt, I mean acceptance by a legislative assembly or a national assembly convened for the purpose of discussing and ratifying the arrangement, because that is one of the promises that have been made. Can we hope to do that? It is difficult to answer these questions with any confidence. I am not confident that we can conclude an agreement, that is to say, I have no doubt that we can draw up an agreement which will broadly conform with Lord Milner's principles, and will safeguard all the points in which our interests are concerned and the interests of other parties. I can give you a draft of such an agreement. I do not know whether Adli Pasha would accept it. I am afraid that, however reasonable it might be, he is so terribly afraid—he is rather a timid man—of Zaghloul and the reception he would meet with on his return, that he would find it difficult to accept a peace. If he did accept, and I believe my colleagues agree, I am very doubtful of the reception it would meet with on his return. Now you may say to me, "If that is the position, whether you conclude your Treaty or not, supposing it ultimately to break down, what is the alternative?" There are some who would say: "We have done our best, we have been generous, we have abolished the Protectorate, we have declared our willingness to set up reasonable guarantees, and they will not have it. Upon their heads be it. We must revert to the status quo ante. Why should we not go back to the temporary Government and good administration and the many benefits of the Cromer régime?" I must tell you quite frankly that I believe that to be wholly impossible.

General Smuts: That is to abolish the Protectorate and go back to the status quo ante?

View of Lord Allenby.

Lord Curzon: Yes, to go back to the status quo ante. I believe that to be quite impossible and that is the view taken by Lord Allenby himself. I will just read a few lines from a despatch that came from him quite a short time ago. He said—

> "Western ideas of autonomy and self-government, not to speak of independence, to which the great war gave so considerable an impetus, have gained too strong a hold on all sections of the community in Egypt for it to be possible for us to return to old-time methods, or to look to the administrative devices created by Lord Cromer for precedence to guide us in our future action. The opinion of such leaders as Zaghloul has entered too deeply into the imagination of the people of Egypt to render any such solution of the problem possible."
> I have on many occasions emphasised to your Lordship that the memorandum published in Egypt in August last has come to be regarded, whatever the real intentions of His Majesty's Government, as a substantive offer; and that any wide departure from the main principles of the settlement which that memoranda advocates would be regarded as a breach of faith, not only in Egypt itself, but by world opinion at large."

Sir W. Hayter's suggestion.

I could elaborate it if required, but I think I have said sufficient to give you an idea of the position. During the last day or two, however, there has come to me a paper which I would like to circulate to the Conference. It was only seen by myself a day or two ago. It emanates from Sir William Hayter, who is the legal adviser in one of the Egyptian Administrations. It is a very able and prudent paper. It takes the line of accepting the principles of the Milner Report, while holding that many of the suggestions of Lord Milner are inapplicable or out of date; and it concludes with the suggestion, for which there is a good deal to be said, which is favoured by Lord Allenby in his covering despatch, and which we in the Foreign Office are rather favourably inclined towards, namely, that viewing the apparent impossibility of concluding a permanent definite agreement now which would be accepted by both parties, what we should do is to conclude a temporary modus vivendi to last for a period of ten years, and to be replaced, as I hope under happier conditions, at the end of that time by some more permanent arrangement. You must remember that although I talked about Egypt as being in the hands of the Zaghloul group, as it apparently is, although if you count heads, there are 90 per cent. of the population that would follow him into any polling booth which he asked them to enter, yet in the background there are many sensible men who are afraid of our going out altogether, and leaving them to the tender mercies of the Extreme Nationalist Party; and the views of these people have been greatly affected by what happened in Alexandria, just as foreign Powers have been. We have been talking about abolishing the Capitulations and setting up new Courts in their place, but you can understand that when the Greek, Frenchman and Italian is subject to being shot down in the streets of Alexandria without provocation, he will require better protection, and if a garrison is not there to protect him, he will put in his garrison himself. All these questions are having great weight upon the Egyptian opinion, and I only mention this because I think myself that, while adhering to the policy with regard to the Protectorate from which we cannot depart, and while considering the idea of constructing a Treaty with the Egyptian people and giving them independence, we should like an interval to elapse during which we had some provisional modus vivendi to tide us over to a better time. I should better be able to explain this if I could circulate these papers, and if the Prime Minister agrees, I should do that, and should include one or two despatches from Lord Allenby on the subject. The whole matter is very complicated, but I have tried in an unpretentious way to give an account of the situation.

Moderate Egyptian opinion.

The Prime Minister: Now for discussion. Are you ready to start? Egypt.

Mr. Meighen: No.

The Prime Minister: Mr. Hughes, are you prepared to go on?

Voice of Dominions in Empire's Foreign Policy.

Mr. Hughes: I feel myself ill-equipped to offer any useful contribution to the discussion. The subject is so complex. I come to it wholly unprepared either by previous study or knowledge of the facts that have led to what is a most extraordinary and lamentable position, but since you invite us to offer our opinions, there are just one or two observations I would like to make. First, let me say a word or two on a point that crops up continually here, and which we hope yet to decide. I refer to the adoption of a principle and the establishment of some machinery by which the foreign policy of the Empire might be guided by the representatives of Great Britain, the self-governing Dominions, and India. This case has demonstrated in convincing fashion the urgent need for action in this direction. For not only were we not informed beforehand, but we were not even informed after it had happened. The position, as revealed by Lord Curzon to-day, comes to me with something of a shock. I have had no communication from the Colonial Office or direct from you, Sir, with reference to the actual position in Egypt. I saw in a newspaper some time ago a statement to the effect that it was proposed to adopt Lord Milner's report. That is the first hint I had of anything being contemplated. I presume that the world at large learned of it at the same time.

Mr. Lloyd George: We have not decided yet.

Mr. Hughes: No, that is quite right, but I did not even know what the recommendation of the Milner Commission was. Shortly after the appearance of the paragraph to which I have referred a question was asked in the House of Lords. Lord Curzon, in reply, said that the report had been received, but it had not been considered by the Government.

Importance of Egypt with regard to the Empire.

A short statement appeared under this news item intimating that the report involved complete autonomy for Egypt. I at once sent you, Sir, a telegram saying that I was much concerned about the report; that I should be glad to be informed of the position; that I regarded the Egyptian question as one of such vital importance, not only to Britain, but to the whole of the Empire, and that, as Egypt was the gateway to the East, and so to Australia, that nothing should be done without full consultation with the Dominions. I may perhaps be accused of taking a narrow and biassed view, but it appeared to me that this question affected the national safety of Australia, and for that and other reasons I was frankly alarmed at the position set out in the brief press summary, and altogether opposed to the adoption of the Milner report.

We have now heard the matter sufficiently amplified by Lord Curzon. We know where we are. Lord Curzon has shown us clearly how the present position arose. I confess that it disturbs me greatly. It would be well if we could see our way to get out by the way we went in. But on the face of it this does not seem possible. The original cause of all this undoubtedly lies in President Wilson's Fourteen Points; that glittering phrase "self-determination" which he originated is responsible for this and much more. Reference has been made to the discussion which took place with the Egyptian delegates in 1918. General Smuts was here at the time, and he will correct me if I am wrong, but I have no recollection of this question being discussed or even mentioned at any meeting of the Imperial Cabinet. General Smuts might be considered at that time a member of the British Government, and so information denied to us might be accessible to him, but, so far as the Imperial Cabinet is concerned, I do not remember the matter being mentioned. Similarly in Paris there was nothing made known to us except the fact that the Egyptian delegates were in Paris while we were there. I know nothing of Lord Cecil's note to Lord Allenby, which, as it were, closed the door to any attempt to get out by the same way as we went in.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think it right to say about that that it was done without my knowledge. Mr. Balfour was then the Foreign Secretary. He and I were in Paris, and we knew nothing at all about it, and the French Foreign Office did exactly the same thing, and M. Clemenceau knew nothing about it until we came to a talk regarding it, and he said he was certain that nothing of the kind had been done; but it was done, and that is why Lord Robert Cecil said what he did without consulting anybody.

Egypt.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, that is so, but it is clear that a serious position has been created which affects us all. Anything that menaces the canal and British prestige in Egypt—or in any of those territories which are, as it were, the hinterland of the canal—affects the whole of the Empire vitally. Now we are asked to say what we are going to do. First, I want to say how much I regret that what has been done has been done, and to express the hope that we shall learn wisdom from what has happened, and devise means to prevent the recurrence of proceedings of this character, which might lead to equally or still more disastrous results. It has been stated in definite terms by Lord Curzon that, even if we granted all that Lord Milner recommended, it would still leave us in opposition to Zaghloul, and we should have opposed to us all those varied elements that make up, we are told, 90 per cent. of the population.

So, then, here is a remedy which, while disastrous to us, is going to be unacceptable to the greater bulk of the Egyptian people. Having made a concession which is the utmost that we can make, which we ought never to have dreamed of making, which, if made, will imperil Australia and the whole Empire; which, if we make, we make with the full knowledge, or at least with every prospect, of its being unacceptable to the great bulk of the people. Having made it, we can never recede from it; we shall always have to give a little more and a little more, in order that we may placate the implacable. How can we safeguard our interests? What guarantee is it proposed to exact in regard to our interests in Egypt that can be satisfactory? Speaking as a civilian, I think it impossible to hold the canal with troops confined solely to the canal zone with the hinterland peopled by a population bitterly hostile.

Lord Curzon: I think Mr. Hughes is pushing it rather too far when he says that the population are bitterly hostile. The population of the country are united in their demands for political independence, but they have no idea what it means.

Method of protecting Empire's interests.

Mr. Hughes: I do not say they have, but there is no smoke without fire. You have said that nothing we can do will placate Zaghloul. Is he, then, merely animated by this desire for political independence? May it not be that he has some other design, that perhaps behind him are some other influences? In any case, no one will contend for a moment that we shall be, if we concede what is demanded or even what the Milner report seconds, in as good a position to hold that canal, which must be held at all hazards, as at present. You say they propose to give us guarantees that our interests will be safeguarded, or that we will be permitted to safeguard them. First, they cannot give a guarantee that we dare accept. Secondly, supposing you do accept; suppose you give the Egyptians all they ask for, you give them autonomy. The matter does not end there. What you have done for Egypt you must do everywhere. I do not say you should not grant to all what you grant to the Egyptians; only it is well to realise what this means. Do not forget that, as the demand by the Egyptians was founded on President Wilson's Fourteen Points, any concession in this will be followed by demands from other quarters. We must consider, before we concede autonomy, if Egypt can stand alone? Do you believe for a moment that she can do this? But unless we are ready to believe that the world will turn from appeal to force to appeal to reason, we cannot entertain such an idea for a moment. What, then, will happen if we relinquish our position at this gateway to our estate? Will that be the end, or will not other nations seek to supplant us? We from the Dominions are asked to give advice in a case where the time is long past where advice could be usefully tendered. We are brought to a case in articulo mortis, and asked to perform a miracle. We can do nothing. Lord Curzon has taken what I may venture to say is a very optimistic view. He speaks of the 10 per cent. of the respectable interests upon which he builds such high hopes, but the bourgeoisie never were able to stand against revolutions, and never will be. We propose to withdraw the only force that can protect them.

Egypt unable to stand alone.

Need for a British Force.

Lord Curzon: No, we propose to keep it. Nobody has proposed for a moment to withdraw the force. My criticisms on Lord Milner's proposal were of precisely the opposite character, namely, that whereas Lord Milner proposed to confine the British force in the neighbourhood of the canal, treating it as an Imperial force, I argued, on the other hand, that the British force is required there for the maintenance of order, and for the protection of the country from enemies, and that it must, therefore, be maintained in the country.

Mr. Hughes: I am very pleased to hear you say that, but if you are going to grant them autonomy, if you are going to give them all they want, and at the same time attempt to maintain our interests by armed forces, I have nothing further to say. If that is the kind of autonomous Government you propose to give them, you may look to me for support, but anything short of that I oppose. We have to consider the vital interests of this Empire, and this, in my opinion, is a matter of life and death. Egypt.

Mr. Lloyd George: You are assuming that we are committed to some of the things. We are not. We are here to discuss them, and before we commit ourselves we are going to confer with the Dominion Premiers and the Representatives of India, and that is what we are here for. We are committed only in so far as this declaration is concerned. Within those limits you can discuss anything, so therefore there is nothing like articulo mortis.

Mr. Churchill: We are committed to abolishing the Protectorate, but as to what we are to put in its place we are not committed.

Extent of present commitment.

Mr. Lloyd George: We say the Protectorate is not a satisfactory method. That is all we are committed to. We are therefore free. These gentlemen will be here in about a week and Lord Curzon will meet them, governed and instructed by the opinion which is formed here as a result of our discussions. So we are absolutely free, either to reject, or to accept, or modify. We have not committed you in the least beyond that declaration.

Mr. Hughes: I was certainly under the impression that Lord Curzon, on the whole, would have us understand something quite different. He said that when the Milner Report was made public all Egypt was overjoyed.

Mr. Lloyd George: They do not like the word "Protectorate," of course.

Mr. Churchill: They thought they were going to get a good deal more than we ever meant.

Mr. Hughes: That is sufficiently ambiguous of course to serve for an official pronouncement, but was it for that reason, I ask, that joy suffused the heart of the Egyptian? I do not think so.

Mr. Lloyd George: I remember Lord Milner telling us—I forget what the name was—he gave the Egyptian name for "Protectorate," which represented everything that was evil. They hated the word. We said we were not going for that word.

Mr. Hughes: I am sure your view is the same as mine on this matter. If we are only talking of words, any word will suit me so long as we get the thing we want.

Mr. Lloyd George: You are absolutely free to make any proposal with regard to the thing itself which is consistent with your not having something which called a "Protectorate"—absolutely free.

May I also point out we sent that very document to you on the 2nd March, so there is nothing that we have really kept away from the Dominions. We have sent you Lord Milner's Report—these are new—you would not have had them. On the 2nd March we sent you that identical document. That is all we have got.

Mr. Hughes: It is only fair to say you sent it to me after I had left.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is the difficulty which illustrated your speech yesterday—the difficulty of communications.

Mr. Hughes: I said nothing by way of criticism, let alone of censure, but I think I am entitled to point that out. I have only to add that I think we should be in a better position if Lord Curzon were to see the Egyptian Delegates and report to us what transpires. Let us have a concrete proposal, and then we shall have something to deal with. If you cannot satisfy them, of course you cannot satisfy the Extremists. If you have something tangible, put it before us. At present, we have nothing.

Suggests views of Egyptian Delegation be first Obtained.

Mr. Balfour: It is worth mentioning, isn't it, that if it came as a matter of surprise to Mr. Hughes, it came as a matter of surprise to the Cabinet. I shall never forget my feeling when in August last year, for the first time, I got an inkling of what was going on, and when Mr. Hughes says, with very great justice, that he is called upon to deal with the situation after it is too late to deal with it thoroughly and satisfactorily, that is the case with the whole Cabinet.

Egypt.

Mr. Hughes: Although, of course, I knew nothing of what Mr. Balfour says, I gathered from the reply Lord Curzon made in the House of Lords, that neither the Prime Minister, nor any other members of the Cabinet, including Mr. Churchill, had ever heard of it, or heard of it in time to do anything.

Mr. Balfour: That is true.

Mr. Churchill: I wrote my protest within five hours of reading it in the newspapers last autumn.

Mr. Hughes: We are all in the same boat.

Mr. Meighen: You are referring to the announcement of Lord Milner's? You are not referring to Lord Robert Cecil's?

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is the reference to the Arabs; it had no reference.

Mr. Balfour: He was not thinking of Egypt.

General Smuts: Lord Robert Cecil's declaration had reference to the Sykes–Picot Agreement. That Agreement was a secret between us and the French, and at that stage it came to the notice of the Arabs to whom we had made quite different promises, and some statement had to be framed between the British and the French Governments which would conciliate Arab opinion, and so a new formula was devised. As I remember, that was the genesis of that Declaration.

Mr. Hughes: Look at this, that other paragraph which qualifies a little . . . .

General Smuts: I would only say I do not think that we are in a position usefully to discuss this subject now. The British Government is only bound by a general Declaration, and that we accept. The Egyptians have accepted that too, I understand; that is a general formula—this formula, that the Protectorate should go and that the special interests of Great Britain should be protected by a Treaty, and that, for the rest, Egyptian aspirations shall be satisfied. That general Declaration is the only document that binds us, and that we all agree to, and as far as the British Government knows, that satisfies Egyptian opinion. So that is all that we can found on.

Necessity only for protection of Empire's interests.

In regard to particulars, it is a matter for discussion between you and the deputation when it arrives. I would only say this, that I feel very strongly that we should not attempt to do more than protect Imperial interests; the attempt, I think, to govern these Oriental communities on our lines and by our methods is bound to fail. It will involve us in all sorts of entanglements. The whole political atmosphere of the world has changed. We do not want to govern Egypt, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. Massey: What about India?

General Smuts: Don't let us discuss India now. She is on a road which will take her far. We are discussing Egypt, and we have similar problems in Mesopotamia and elsewhere. I only think that as a principle we should simply conserve our Imperial interests and let these people govern themselves and find out how it can best be done. We do not want to be for ever entangled in Egypt, and send armies there to keep the Administration going. You only want to conserve Imperial interests, and we only want to do the same, and I think in that spirit we should work on this formula.

Mr. Hughes: May I say this to you. Look at that Canal and see how much it means to us and how little by comparison to you.

General Smuts: In Egypt you have two problems, the problem of internal government and the problem of autonomy; the problem of running an Administration, which I think is an Egyptian problem, and we should leave it to them.

Mr. Winston Churchill: Altogether, would you leave it.

General Smuts: As far as possible. There is an indefinable neutral ground, so to speak, between the two.

Lord Curzon: The element of all the foreign populations and the rights of foreign Governments place great responsibility on us.

Mr. Balfour: There is no country so international as Egypt at this moment. You have enormous foreign interests in proportion to the size of the country and the population.

Egypt.

General Smuts: Once we go further than protecting Imperial interests, with the new atmosphere growing up in these countries we are going to let ourselves into no end of entanglements, and the Empire cannot stand the burden.

Mr. Balfour: I not only see your point, but I have great sympathy with it, but do not let us conceive Egypt with a native population which happens to border on the Canal, and which can be left alone to carry out native ends with native methods. Unfortunately, Egypt is not; Egypt is quite different; Egypt is abnormal and like nothing else under heaven, and it is very difficult to deal with her on your plan. I quite understand you.

General Smuts: I know that the Dominions will do very little to help the Mother country in this matter; she will have to bear the burden. We talk of Imperial communication which we are going to protect, but it will in the end be the British navy and the British army that will go to Egypt, and the people of this country will refuse to carry this intolerable burden of keeping an army in Egypt; so long as we protect our interests there and see that things do not become hopeless from our Imperial point of view, that should suffice.

Mr. Hughes: Will you look at it in another way? You talk of the rights of the Egyptian people; is it not notorious that they are a corrupt people; that, in fact, it is not too much to say, their official hierarchy is hopelessly corrupt. Did not Lord Curzon point out that one of the causes of all this trouble has arisen from that very thing. Our armies were in Egypt for a long while during the war; they had an opportunity of seeing the Egyptian. I cannot speak from experience, and no one is here who has had any practical experience of Egypt, but I would like to say this, that I feel confident if you gave them everything they wanted they would still be unable to govern themselves. They are a corrupt people; there is an ignorant proletariat, there is a corrupt bureaucracy, there is a megalomaniac leading them. I say again most certainly, Egypt as a self-governing country in the sense we mean it, in the sense you mean it, General, is impossible.

General Smuts: You have the opinion of Lord Allenby. Lord Allenby says that a return to the old pre-war condition where the British Government, in a mild way and by subterfuges, so to say, ran the Government with Lord Cromer, has become an impossible situation. If that is so, what can you do? You don't want to annex the country; you don't want to run it directly. Where are you going to draw the line, except at this point, our Imperial interests as distinct from local Egyptian interests?

Unique position of Egypt.

Prime Minister: That is really the point. I think everyone would accept that formula, but you have to reduce that formula to practice. Your difficulties come in the practical application of that formula. For instance, I will give you two or three illustrations. Egypt is not a country merely; it is a high road. It puts it, as Mr. Balfour points out, in a different category from any other country. It is a high road between East and West. The first thing you come up against: Is Egypt to get foreign relations? That is the first point. Is Egypt to be represented separately in the Courts of France, here and elsewhere? That is the first question. Is that consistent with our Imperial interests? The second point is this: Is it consistent?—they really mean to run their show there without having outside advice, they are not sufficiently advanced for it. I quite agree with Lord Curzon they were overrun with minor officials and things which could be done very much better by Egyptians than by inferior Europeans, but there are certain things they cannot do, engineering for example, and finance. They want advice from outside. Well, now, are they to be at liberty to choose their advisers. Just see what that means. On the face of it, it looks as if they ought to have the right to have whom they like and pick the best man, but that is not the way to work. French interests will press them to take a French adviser; Italian interests and German interests, and other interests, perhaps American interests, will all be pressing to get their own particular man there. The moment you put the foreign outside advisers there our control over that country goes, and you get a hostile organisation which will make the difference between an Egypt working with you and an Egypt working in the interests of some other Power. Now, those are two vital considerations. You may say, if you don't allow them, you don't give them internal liberty; on the other hand, if you do, it will be fatal to Imperial interests; it might not be fatal in five, ten or twenty years, but ultimately it will be absolutely fatal. Then comes the third question. I am only giving these as three illustrations of the practical difficulties with which you are confronted. Take the question of a garrison; you have to protect your highway. It is a highway to Australia; it is a highway to the East. It is no use talking of Singapore if you cannot get to Singapore. You must get there, and it is no use having great fleets there if somebody here can do what the Turks did with the Dardanelles. It is really our trouble with the Dardanelles, but it is much more vital to us. The Dardanelles only locked the door to Russia and Roumania; that was very nearly fatal to us, but these are Dardanelles which lead to the whole of the East, and you were reckoning here the other day how long it would take the British fleet to get there, and the question of two or three weeks makes the whole difference to you. But if you have a Power here which might become hostile at any moment, which might be bought as the Turks were bought—they were bought with cash; the Turkish people did not want to quarrel with us. The Turks have said to me that they were amazed they were at war with us. Why did it happen? There were two or three leading Turks bought by Berlin with cash and promises of all sorts of positions. The same might happen here. You may have Egyptian Ministers bought, and the door is locked, and while we are arguing you are done in, and our interests in that part of the world are completely smashed, and you must begin again. Therefore comes the question, what about your garrison? This report says you may put it on the sands of the desert, on the brink of the Suez Canal. That is no use to you. Why should you plant your troops in a position of that impossible kind? Aden is bad enough, and it does not give you the necessary control. Those are three; there are others which will occur to other members of the Conference, but those are three very practical questions which go to the very root of the whole business, and upon those three things I do not think we should give way. That is my individual opinion. We are discussing this here; we are not putting the views of the British Cabinet, but we are each discussing our own individual view with a view to arriving at a Cabinet decision exactly as we did in the war. Some of us have advanced views, and some of us have not such advanced views.

Mr. Massey: I should like to say, Sir, that I agree thoroughly with the views you have put forward. New Zealand is not so much interested as Australia and India, but we are here not to look at the views of any particular part of the Empire, but to look at the positions of the Empire as a whole and to consider its interests. I am very glad that General Smuts and I are personal friends, for I am sorry to notice that we nearly always find ourselves of opposite opinions. I cannot help that. There must be a difference of opinion even in a comparatively small gathering like this. But in considering what has taken place I do not want to criticise adversely anything with which Lord Milner was connected, because I have a tremendously high opinion of Lord Milner. In listening to this discussion and reading the papers that have been supplied to us, I have been very forcibly reminded of a saying of a German writer in the early days of the war—I think it was Nietsche, but I am not positive, for one cannot remember these things or who is responsible for them, but whoever it was it attracted a good deal of attention. He said something like this, speaking from the German point of view, "To stab the British Empire to the heart we must get possession of Egypt and the Canal." That was as nearly as possible what was said, and a communication was sent to me a day or two ago in which there is another quotation from a German document to the effect that the Germans intended to establish themselves on both banks of the Suez Canal and so to cut the main artery through which circulates the life blood of the world, and particularly the British Empire. There is the whole position in a nutshell from an enemy point of view. It is the highway, the British, the Imperial, or, if you like to put it, the British Empire highway. It is the British Empire highway from the very heart of the Empire itself, where we are to-day, to India, to Australasia, to the whole of the Far East, and it is the way through which the ships of war would have to pass in the event of trouble in that part of the world, such as that we were considering a few days ago. To my mind it is exceedingly important. Whatever happens, there is no question about it that British interests must be protected with a people such as the people of Egypt. We cannot help remembering that under British control Egypt has made greater advancement and progress than it has done since the time of the Israelites. There is no question of that. I for one looked forward to a time when Egypt will be even far more prosperous than it is at the present moment. General Smuts says that we cannot pretend to govern these Eastern people and that we should not attempt it. That means that we have got to abandon the whole of them. If we abandon them what is going to happen? The British Empire is at an end. That may not matter very much from certain points of view, but it would mean a great deal for the world if the British Empire came to an end. If we followed the doctrine expressed by General Smuts we should have chaos. It would put the clock of civilisation—I do not think there is any exaggeration about it—back for a thousand years. I hope it will never happen. I do not see the way out, but I do put it that in the interests of Britain and in the interests of humanity—I will put the interests of humanity first—that recommendation should not be given effect to in its entirety. To my mind it would be simply national and Imperial suicide, and so far as I am concerned—we are speaking confidentially now—I certainly will not be a party to it. We ought to be able to say, in the interests of the Empire, that we did what was right in connection with Egypt, and even more so, because I do not know of any country so important to the Empire as Egypt, with the exception of Britain itself. Even Australia and New Zealand might be parted with and the Empire would go on, but I do not think you could run the Empire without keeping control of the main artery, as stated by the German writer I have quoted. It is another of the legacies left to us by the Fourteen Points of President Wilson. I distrusted them at the time; my instincts were against them; I thought they would involve us in trouble and I was not disappointed. I am afraid we have not seen the last of them by a very long way. However, there may be a way out of it. Egypt.

Mr. Meighen: They know more than the Fourteen Points.

Mr. Massey: I believe they were the origin of a great deal of the trouble that has come to the British Empire and to the world since the signing of the Peace Treaty, and I do hope that some satisfactory way will be found out of what is taking place. I understand that Lord Curzon cannot make any recommendation until he meets those Egyptian representatives who are coming, or who are perhaps on their way now.

Lord Curzon: When you say I cannot make up my mind, I have a very clear idea of what I shall propose. I could circulate a draft to you conceding the main principle as we have already conceded it, but safeguarding all the points to which we attach importance. I have drawn it up and I have got it, but whether it will be accepted is a different thing.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think the Conference ought to see these proposals for discussion. I think it is really very important that when Lord Curzon meets these delegates he should go there armed with the general conclusions of the Empire upon that subject. I think it would be very desirable that Lord Curzon should circulate his proposals.

Lord Curzon: Would you like me to circulate them? That was my idea, and then I will put forward at the end the idea, suggested by Hayter, of a ten years' agreement on the assumption that we cannot get them to agree to anything on a permanent basis. I will circulate the two.

Mr. Massey: I did not mean that Lord Curzon could not make up his mind, because he is one of the men who can make up his mind. I am glad to be able to acknowledge it, but I think it is only right that before he says anything definite—confidential communication is a different thing—he must meet the men who are coming from Egypt.

Mr. Churchill: I really am responsible for the places next door to Egypt, namely, Palestine and Mesopotamia, and so my affairs are very much concerned with what goes on in Egypt. I was very shocked when I read about this in the papers last August, and the Prime Minister knows that I immediately sent off my protest and circulated it to my colleagues. At the same time I have always recognised that it was a fact that something had been done and that things could not be absolutely the same again after that publication had been made. Therefore I agreed to the Cabinet decision, and quite willingly, to tell the Egyptians that something would be substituted for the word "Protectorate," which was what they particularly disliked. Therefore I feel that the only thing that really lies before us now is the reserves which we must insist upon, and the Prime Minister stated with very great force several of those reserves. First of all, it would take more troops to protect the Canal if they were quartered along the Canal than it would take to keep order over the whole of Egypt and protect the Canal as well.

Egypt.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: And much more expense.

Location of Troops.

Mr. Churchill: If we put our troops in the desert along the Canal, leaving the country to stew in its own juice and to become a hotbed of internal and external intrigue, you would have to have other large forces, and you would be committed to heavy expenditure. Therefore the garrison we keep there, apart from the international aspect which Mr. Balfour dwelt upon, bearing in mind our responsibilities of protecting foreigners, will have to be kept in the great cities in Cairo, Alexandria and elsewhere. And the Egyptians ought to be told plainly that that is what we are going to do. Those garrisons are there not only for the purpose of protecting the Canal. If they were not there every other Power which has capitulation rights and felt its subjects were likely to be injured, would put their troops there. The withdrawal of British troops from the great cities in Egypt would not mean the withdrawal of foreign troops from Egyptian soil; it would only mean that more foreign troops of various Powers would be put there in their place. We should probably be the only Power of importance that had not got a body of troops in Cairo for the purpose of protection. Therefore we must have our troops there.

Mr. Lloyd George: Lord Curzon has to leave us now and the agenda concerns him. It is suggested that to-morrow morning at 11·30 we take the question of Anglo-French relations. That is a decision we shall have to take.

Advisers to Egyptian Government.

Mr. Churchill: The Prime Minister spoke of a second point which I think you will see arises out of the prime military necessity and political necessity of keeping garrisons in Cairo and Alexandria. He spoke of the importance of not allowing the European advisers of the Egyptian Government to be picked freely by them from any nation they liked in the world, so that we might have hostile, intriguing people there who would be really working the machine against us. That is true from the point of view of their hostility, but also from the point of view of the efficiency of the Administration. I quite agree that the quality of the British administrative assistance given to Egypt has deteriorated in late years, and I think it is a subject which requires very careful investigation, why and how it can be improved, though it is absolutely certain that, unless you have a proportion—not such a large proportion as now—but a considerable proportion of authoritative advisers in the Egyptian Department of State under Egyptian Ministers (but still advisers whose advice is taken), unless you have a proportion of those, the country will relax and fall back from the point to which it has been raised—I do not say to the chaos and squalor of the days of Israel—but the cities will deteriorate, order will not be maintained and there will be discontent amongst the people, abuse and corruption will creep in on a large scale and then we will have real discontent amongst the people with violence, and troops will have to be brought in. You will have to keep your garrisons there until, at any rate, something like decent; orderly quasi-European administration has been set up. It would be a great mistake and a great danger; you would have all the responsibility for the country because you have to keep troops there. Otherwise, we shall see everything going to rack and ruin. It does seem to me wise to keep an element in the administration of advisers who will advise in the same way as they did in the days of Lord Cromer. Well, if you take these two very important points, you will see that we shall have to go rather on the lines we went on before the war, with such modifications as are possible in the growing advance of ideas. I do not say that we cannot do a great deal to meet Egyptian sentiment. I have been out there recently myself and I have thought a good deal about this, and certainly would not be afraid of reforms. It has only been a Protectorate and has always been a foreign country, and I do not myself see why we should not arrange our control of Egypt in the form which is most agreeable to them.

Mr. Meighen: What about representation in other capitals?

Representation in Foreign Capitals impossible.

Mr. Churchill: That we could not give. I am quite clear we could not give that. It would mean a centre of intrigue set up in every foreign capital. We could not possibly give that.

Mr. Massey: Has anything been done about the renewal of the lease of the Canal?

Mr. Churchill: It has only just been mooted in the most tentative way, but I have always considered myself that it is much better that the Canal should be more or less vested ultimately in Egypt, than that Egypt should remain under British control. I always hope that that will be the ultimate thing. Egypt.

Mr. Massey: It would be a serious matter if the lease of the Canal came to an end and the British lost control.

Zaghloul's demand for evacuation of Soudan.

Mr. Churchill: It would be most fatal. Then another point that Zaghloul Pasha is insisting upon is that we should not only leave Egypt, holding on perhaps to the Canal, but that we should also give up the Sudan—that is the latest of his demands.

Mr. Balfour: That is sheer ignorance.

Mr. Churchill: Those tremendous regions which have been developed out of barbarism by British labour and money—that is another thing we have to make perfectly clear that we cannot put up with. Of course, I regret very much indeed that the handling of this matter at the outset was such as to set up a wrong ideal before the people of Egypt. The great ideal we wish to set up for the British Empire is the family of self-governing Dominions, all perfectly autonomous in everything that concerns themselves, but co-operating freely within the circle of the British Empire. That is the great conception, that is the conception which has animated Mr. Montagu and the British statesmen who have been concerned with the reforms in India—the idea of great self-governing Dominions.

Mr. Massey: A family of nations.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, and here in regard to Egypt we have diverged. We have put up a different kind of ideal altogether—that I regret most profoundly. Still, having gone so far on that road, I think we can now only really insist upon these vital securities, namely, garrisons, the foreign policy and such reasonable share in the administration as will secure efficiency and which will so far be a safeguard against inefficiency and the maintenance of the Sudan under British authority. This seems to me the very, very least that we can stand upon. I am pretty sure that Aldi Pasha and his Delegation will not be able to agree to this. If they did agree, I am perfectly certain that they would be repudiated violently by Zaghloul, who is certain to strike them down when they get back. I do beg and pray before this most important discussion begins, in which the Foreign Secretary will be concerned, that we should have a perfectly definite view of what are the vital points; it is not a matter of mere convenience or profits, it is a matter of the actual vital existence of the structure of the British Empire. It is only through this Canal that the British fleet can reach the stations where it can protect or come to the aid of Australia and New Zealand in the Pacific in their hour of peril, and it is in Egypt naturally where there would be garrisons of British troops needed to reinforce any part of the Middle East. It is in Egypt that you naturally put your wireless station and aviation. It is the Clapham Junction—it has been described as the strategic Clapham Junction of the British Empire, and we really cannot afford at the end of a war, where we have struck down the most powerful Empire in the world, the Germans, the Austrians and the Turks, we really cannot afford to let ourselves be pushed out of our position in Egypt by the continuance of local agitations. With every desire to meet the wishes of the Egyptians, I do hope the Conference will stand very, very firmly on these essential points.

Egypt essential to Empire.

Mr. Meighen: I do not understand one statement you made, Mr. Churchill. You say it has been the development of self-governing nations and that you regret we diverged from that path in the case of Egypt. Your argument is one with which I fully agree; your regret is that we are unable to proceed in Egypt on that path at all.

Mr. Churchill: Now, I quite agree.

Mr. Meighen: We never should have undertaken to do so.

Mr. Churchill: I do not make myself clear. Of course, one had the idea that Egypt would be included in the British Empire, and, so included in the British Empire, would gradually attain the full Dominion status, but instead of that she has diverged on to a path which is inconsistent with her being in the British Empire, and they are being taught there that nothing matters as long as you can say: "We are outside the British Empire." That I very much regret, and I very much regret the report which was published should have, as it were, indicated that we should agree and approve of that, because after all, we had to declare a Protectorate. We had been round the Powers of Europe and received assent from all our Allies, from

Egypt.

France, the United States of America and from Belgium, we had received their agreement to the effect that it was incorporated in the British Empire; that is what I mean by getting on the wrong line, but I do not think you can avoid taking to some extent the position that it is an independent country, though we hope to bring it back in the course of time within the orbit.

Mr. Meighen: Your opinion in a word is that it is to our vital interest as an Empire that we do have a Protectorate there, but that we call it something else.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, exactly. That is much better put.

Lord Milner's opinion.

Mr. Balfour: I am afraid I ought to add, for what it is worth, Lord Milner's strong opinion—you see we have discussed this with him, and he knows quite well what dismay and anxiety his ex-colleagues have seen in his report, but he has maintained quite steadily both in the Cabinet and to me, and no doubt to everybody else in private conversations, that he does not believe that the Egyptians want to sever their relations with the British Empire, that they are all too perfectly conscious that they cannot stand alone, that they all are quite aware that they must have advisers, without which we think they cannot possibly get on, and that those advisers must be British advisers. Of course, if Lord Milner is right, the task we have with the deputation ought to be less serious than the tenor of the conversations to-day across this table would lead one to fear. I am afraid that I have always thought Lord Milner sanguine on the point. He knows a great deal about it, and he holds the opinion with very, very great vehemence, and that fact ought to be known to my colleagues.

Mr. Massey: He had that in his mind when he wrote the report.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: The moment they are permitted to take up advisers outside the British Empire they would get into the hands of those advisers, and their intentions would evaporate. Lord Curzon has promised to submit definite proposals to the Conference.

Mr. Hughes: Before he sees them?

Mr. Lloyd George: Before he sees them. I do not think it would do for him to go there without a clear idea of what his objective is, and when these are circulated we can fix the discussion upon that, and see whether we agree upon those lines. To-morrow we will take the Anglo-French relations at 11·30.

Mr. Massey: No report of this will go out.

Mr. Lloyd George: This is the report:—

"Lord Curzon in an introductory statement briefly reviewed the history of British relations with Egypt, dwelling upon the importance of Egypt in the war, and concluding with the circumstances attending the despatch of the Milner Mission to Egypt and the publication of the Milner Report. The discussion was then opened by Mr. Hughes, and continued by Mr. Meighen, General Smuts, Mr. Massey, Mr. Churchill, Mr. Balfour and the Prime Minister. It was decided that the proposals for meeting Egyptian national aspirations and safeguarding Imperial interests now under consideration by the British Government should be discussed in detail at a later date by the Dominion Ministers and Representatives of India with a view to the arrival of the Egyptian Delegation now on its way to England."

Mr. Hughes: I think that is sufficiently ambiguous.

(The Proceedings then terminated.)

Egypt.

Lord Curzon: It was only yesterday afternoon that I was asked to be ready to take up the question of Egypt to-day, and, very busily occupied as I have been all yesterday afternoon and all this morning, I must be pardoned if I have not had the time to put the narrative and the exposition in as complete a form as I should otherwise have liked.

Difficulty of Egyptian Problem.

I think you will find, when I have stated the case, that the Egyptian tangle is about the worst of all those we have had before us, and I am doubtful if anything I may say will lead you to think that a practical solution is in sight. In order to understand the present position I must say a word or two, although my retrospect will be as brief as possible, about the circumstances which have led up to it.

Arabi Rebellion.

It is now over forty years ago since we went into Egypt to suppress the Arabi rebellion and found ourselves insensibly committed to something like an occupation of the country. In the years following the Arabi rebellion it was the deliberate and avowed policy of our Government to evacuate Egypt as soon as we could. That policy was frequently expressed by Lord Salisbury. It took the form of a Convention which Sir Henry Drummond Wolff went out to Egypt to negotiate, and it was only owing to the innuence of France, most unwisely exercised in her own interests, that the Sultan of Turkey was induced to refuse his signature to that agreement. Had he given it at that time we should have been out of Egypt long before now. Whether we should have had to go back again is, of course, another question.

1888—1914.

Then ensued a period of a quarter of a century, from 1888 to 1914, the outbreak of the war, in which Egypt was a more or less autonomous nation existing under the suzerainty of Turkey, ruled by a Khedive and a Council of Ministers and with an Egyptian Legislative Assembly in the background. The British Government for that quarter of a century was represented by an official who had no higher rank than that of Agent and Consul-General. Indeed, his diplomatic status was not higher than that of the representatives of the other European Powers who were at Cairo. But little by little a gradual change in the situation took place, due to many causes. Firstly, to the presence of our army of occupation necessary for the preservation of order and the security of the country; secondly, the obligation that fell upon us to recover the Soudan; thirdly, the existence of very wide-spread and powerful British interests in the country; and, lastly, the personality of Lord Cromer himself—a man who with that remarkable administrative gift, with that genius for ruling an Oriental country, could not fail, apart from all the other conditions I have named, insensibly to draw all the strings into his own hands. Thus at the end of this period, or at any rate up to the time of Lord Cromer's death, Egypt came to be regarded almost as a British possession. Certainly it was a country in which the British point of view and British interest were very much in the ascendant. Meanwhile, and particularly after Lord Cromer had gone (because after his disappearance from the scene a number of other men unfit to wield the bow of Ulysses succeeded him), a number of influences began to be felt which were secretly eating away at the heart of our position. For instance, we began, hardly noticed at the time, to increase the figures, which afterwards became excessive, and in my opinion dangerous, of British officials in the country, and there can be no doubt about it that the immense and exaggerated number of these officials, the quality of whom appears to have deteriorated as time went on, was largely responsible for the rising that afterwards took place. Another tendency manifested itself, and that was, as you increase the numbers of your British-official population in an Asiatic country they tend not to draw closer to the people but to draw away from them. They become a colony by themselves, living apart, with their own sports, their own interests, their own life, and as we have seen in some parts of India (but less there than in Egypt, because they are more scattered), so did the British colony in Egypt tend to pursue a life of its own, divorced from Egyptian sentiment and habits. We had another failure in Egypt which is a little difficult to analyse but which I think is undoubted, and that was in our educational policy. It had in some respects the same sort of result as our education had in India; that is to say, taking a number of sharp, clever young men, all aspiring to fill Government posts which were not there to be filled, and, in so far as they failed in their aspirations, drifting into a backwater of sullen discontent. All these causes were at work, and meanwhile, the restraining hand of Lord Cromer having been removed, the then Khedive Abbas Hilmi, who at no time was a satisfactory or loyal person, was persistently intriguing against us.

Failure of Educational Policy.

Situation on Outbreak of War, 1914.

I now come to the conditions at the outbreak of war. When in the autumn of 1914 we found ourselves at war with Turkey, it became necessary, owing to the fact that Egypt was nominally subject to the Sultan, to regularise the position there.

Egypt.

Mr. Asquith's Government was then in power; the present Prime Minister was a Member of his Government, and he will recollect that the question was debated by that Government as to whether the better policy would be to annex Egypt straight away or to declare a British Protectorate. For reasons into which I need not enter, but with which I am entirely in accord, it was decided to take the latter of these courses and to declare a Protectorate. Thus in September 1914, the Khedive Abbas Hilmi, who had openly associated himself with our enemies, was deposed, and one of his uncles, Prince Hussein Kamal, a gentleman of character and integrity and very loyal to us, was put upon the throne with the title of Sultan, and in the proclamation which was issued declaring the change of status, we laid down that Egypt was placed under the protection of His Majesty and would thenceforth constitute a British Protectorate.

Egypt as a British Protectorate.

We did that in perfect good faith, but with, I think, exaggerated innocence. For instance, we did not take the trouble to explain to the Egyptians exactly what a Protectorate meant. We are so used to Protectorates in a hundred different forms in different parts of the world that we did not bother to explain what was the kind of Protectorate we were setting up in Egypt. On the other hand, the word itself, as you well know, can have an invidious connotation. In one extreme it may mean a gentle and necessary supervision of the external and internal policy of a country. At the other extreme it may mean that under the guise of a Protectorate it is really ruled by British hands and controlled by British guns. We did not explain to the Egyptians exactly what we meant, and undoubtedly there existed in many of their minds the impression, not altogether unreasonable, that this Protectorate had been declared for the purposes of the war only, and that when the war was over we should revert to our older position, that we should remember our old promises as to evacuation, and that some change in the position in Egypt, favourable to the aspirations of the natives, might be expected to ensue. That was the position, I think, at the outbreak of the war. When it began, we said, quite rightly, that we did not expect Egypt to take her part on the fighting front, and that we would make ourselves responsible, as we did, for the defence and protection of her frontiers; but, although we did not ask her to contribute soldiers, we did ask her, and with very profitable results, to make an indirect contribution to the war. This was at once a source of strength to us, and of discord among the people. I need not enter into the actual position that Egypt occupied in the war.

The Dominion Ministers here will recall very well that it became a kind of Clapham Junction through which their soldiers passed to and fro, and where they spent many months. The Ministers will recall, too, our successful attempts to throw back a Turkish invasion of Egypt on the Suez Canal.

Egyptian Internal situation during the War.

I pass away from that to the internal symptoms that were largely responsible for what followed. Mr. Balfour rightly reminds me that it was a labour question. We recruited in Egypt what was called the Egyptian Labour Camel Transport Corps. These men were well paid, and, if the scheme had remained as originally conceived and carried out, it would have been all right, but the levying of this Corps fell into the hands of the local Egyptian officials, the village officials known as "Omdehs," and these men, freed from the control of their British superiors, who had all been drafted away to the war in one capacity or another, pursued methods of corruption, of oppression, even of cruelty, recalling the old days of the Press Gang in this country. At the same time, another source of trouble was the requisition of cereals and animals and the collection for the Red Cross Fund—all of them innocent themselves and right and proper in their inception, but gradually drifting in the hands of the native agents into engines of oppression upon the people. Simultaneously, Egypt found herself confronted, as almost all the other countries involved in the war, in a great rise in prices, which weighed heavily upon the population. Thus, all the while, almost unknown to us here and really either unobserved or insufficiently observed by our people who were working in the country, a state of affairs was growing up that presaged trouble. In 1917 the Sultan Hussein, of whom I have spoken, unfortunately died, and we then had to put up in his place the only available candidate, his brother, the present Sultan, whose name is Fuad, who had been educated abroad, was not in very close touch with Egyptian sentiment, and neither in character nor ability could be compared with his brother.

Situation at time of Armistice.

In 1918 the war came to an end. With the termination of the war a new cause of political discontent emerged. President Wilson's Fourteen Points and the ideals for which he fought at Paris had a wide repercussion in all Oriental countries, and not least, I think, and perhaps, in view of the history I have put before you, most of all in Egypt itself. In November 1918, just at the time of the armistice, a declaration, for which Lord Robert Cecil was responsible, was drawn up and issued by the British and French Governments, mainly with reference to Syria and Mesopotamia, but laying down in language of great clearness that our policy was the enfranchisement of the various people who had been liberated by our arms from the yoke of the Turks and the institution in those areas of forms of National Government.

Well, when the Egyptians, who look upon themselves as in the very front files of civilisation and who trace their history back to thousands of years, found that the Arabs and other people who had been involved in the war were proposing to get some form of self-government of their own, they began to think very poorly of the situation in which they still found themselves under the Protectorate, and were to be denied conditions which were to be given to their much more backward brothers. This was the position at the end of 1918; then a man named Zaghloul Pasha, who had himself been Minister of one or other of the Egyptian Ministries—a somewhat discontented man and up to that time a man of no great political position or reputation—began to organise the Nationalist Party. He called upon our then High Commissioner, Sir Reginald Wingate, and presented to him claims that involved complete autonomy for Egypt, and he expressed his desire to come to London to put forward this programme before the British Government. Simultaneously, the then Prime Minister of Egypt, Rushdi Pasha, and one of his colleagues, Adli Pasha, of whom I will say more in a moment, expressed a desire also to come to London. Their suggestion reached London just before Mr. Balfour, who was then Foreign Minister, was going to Paris for the Conference, and, not unnaturally, he represented that the moment was an unfavourable one to receive them, but that he hoped to receive them a little later on. The Egyptian Party—the Nationalist Party—have always represented that as a great error of judgment on our part. It is easy, in the light of subsequent events, to indicate that a different answer might have been returned, but, in the circumstances, it was very difficult to give them another answer, and a little later, when the suggestion that they should be asked to come to England was renewed, Rushdi and Adli, having by this time got more into the hands of the extremists than before, laid down as a condition of their invitation that the other people—Zaghloul Pasha and his friends—should come with them and be received too. This invitation again, rightly or wrongly, we declined. We said we should be very glad to see the Ministers at any time, but we could not, in view of our position, contemplate receiving a man whose views were so utterly inconsistent with the whole principles of our position in Egypt. Thereupon, Zaghloul Pasha and his men raised the flag of revolt. They went with a delegation to the Sultan, Sultan Fuad, and used most menacing language to him, and our then representative in Egypt, Sir Reginald Wingate, being in England, Sir Milne Cheetham recommended, in the interests of order, that these men should be ordered to leave the country. His advice was accepted by us here—I was then acting at the Foreign Office—and they were removed to Malta. This was the final spark that kindled the flame.

Zaghloul Pasha.

Mr. Hughes : When was that?

Revolt in Spring of 1919.

Lord Curzon : In March 1919. Then ensued the rising in Egypt, of which you have all read, taking our people there and here almost entirely by surprise, on a scale almost unparalleled in ferocity and accompanied by looting, pillage, and the murder of British soldiers; in fact, an open revolt, and the serious part of it was not merely the incidents by which it was accompanied, but the fact that it permeated all classes, and that, for the first time in that quarter of a century of our connection with Egypt, which I just now referred to, the Fellahin for whom we had done so much to raise, whom Lord Cromer had by his successful policy brought into a condition of what we thought was permanent friendship with ourselves, were involved. It was not only a question of Moslem against Christian, but all classes of people, including for the first time, at any rate, in recent history, the Coptic community. Just at that time, Sir Reginald Wingate being in England, Lord Allenby, fresh from his triumphs in the East and at that time Commander-in-chief of the British Forces in Egypt and Palestine, went to Paris where the Conference was sitting. By common consent of all of us, it was thought desirable to invite him to return to Egypt as High Commissioner with full powers, military and civil, to deal with this perilous situation in the manner that he thought best. He arrived at Cairo in the concluding days of March 1919. His first step was to reverse the policy that had been pursued and to bring back Zaghloul Pasha and his friends from Malta. Whether that decision was right or wrong, I have often puzzled myself to think. On the one hand, it was a generous concession, and it might have been held at that moment to be the sign of a desire to calm the spirits agitated by this terrible rising. On the other hand, it could be argued that this was a sign of weakness on our part, of which the Nationalist Party was certain to take advantage. However that may be, they certainly did take advantage of it—they certainly did. Zaghloul Pasha and his three friends, released from Malta, at once transferred themselves to Paris, where they had large funds at their disposal, and entertaining on a considerable scale, they tried unavailingly to get the sympathy of the Conference then sitting in Paris.

Lord Allenby appointed High Commissioner.

Egypt.

It was clearly necessary for us, and such was the advice of Lord Allenby, to take some special step, both to enquire into the cause of the outbreak and to place things for the future on a better footing. The man of all others marked out by his experience and reputation for dealing with difficulties, was one of our own colleagues—I mean Lord Milner. He, at that time, was Secretary of State for the Colonies, and his early fame had been made in Egypt more than a quarter of a century before. His book on Egypt is still a classical work on the administration of that country. Accordingly, we decided to send out a special Mission to Egypt under Lord Milner for the purpose that I have described. Various conditions, into which I need not enter, rendered it difficult to send out the Mission in the summer of 1919, and it was not until the winter—in the latter part of the winter—that he and his colleagues (whom we selected as the men best suited), most of them of Egyptian experience, and all representing the liberal point of view, started from this country. It was not until December that they went out. When they arrived in Cairo they met with organised antagonism from Zaghloul and his friends, carried out with all their resources of boycotting, picketing and the like, by the Nationalist Party. Lord Milner and his colleagues conducted themselves with admirable composure. Although none of the prominent Egyptians were allowed officially to see them; although when any of them went about in the country to make enquiries, they were dogged and followed from place to place, and every effort was made to keep people away from them; nevertheless, in private conversations in private places with leading men, they collected an immense amount of valuable information, and arrived at a general précis. This they embodied in a kind of preliminary report which they sent home to us, but all the while they did not come into contact with Zaghloul himself, who remained in Paris. Accordingly, when Lord Milner came back to this country, and in his anxiety, before he framed his final Report, to get some idea of what the extremists desired, he invited Zaghloul and his friends—not in an official, but in a private capacity as representing an important section of Egyptian opinion—to come over and see him in London. Conversations took place between Lord Milner's Mission and these gentlemen in London in the summer of 1919, and by the month of August certain tentative conclusions had been arrived at between them.

Lord Milner's Mission.

Mr. Hughes : Before Lord Milner went out?

Lord Curzon : No, this was after Lord Milner came back in March—these gentlemen came here in June.

Mr. Hughes : You said 1919.

Lord Curzon : I beg pardon, 1920. I made a mistake, they came here in 1920. The conversations lasted until August 1920, and then this tentative agreement was arrived at. I ought to say in fairness to the Cabinet, that they knew nothing of what was going on. Lord Milner had undertaken these conversations on his own responsibility in private, and I, myself, as Foreign Secretary, had only the dimmest idea of what was going on, and I was a good deal surprised when I saw the conclusions in the form they ultimately assumed. However, in the month of August this tentative agreement having been arrived at, Zaghloul undertook to send back some of his friends to Cairo in order to receive a favourable reception. I need hardly say that they took advantage of the occasion to publish it in the papers without authority, and from that moment, the matter having been made public, we ourselves had to take cognisance of it, and I am bound to say that it began to be regarded, not as the pronouncement of Lord Milner and colleagues only, but that of His Majesty's Government. Probably you have had the Report.

Mr. Hughes : Did Zaghloul's arrival in Cairo precede the Report of Lord Milner to the British Government.

Lord Curzon : Zaghloul himself did not go back to Cairo, he remained in Paris. He sent back his principal friends to Cairo in order to secure—as they did secure—a favourable report for the tentative conclusions. Broadly speaking, what Lord Milner proposed in this arrangement was that, for the relationship of a Protectorate for Egypt, there should be substituted a Constitution, by means of a Treaty between Egypt and Great Britain, under which Britain would recognise the independence of Egypt as a constitutional monarchy with representative institutions; and Egypt would confer upon Great Britain such rights as were necessary to safeguard her special interests, and to enable her to furnish the guarantees which must be given to foreign Powers to secure the relinquishment of their capitulatory rights. In the course of the same draft agreement, Lord Milner, advancing somewhat from the position he had taken while in Egypt, agreed, in order to meet the demands of Zaghloul Pasha and his friends, to hand over to Egypt the control of their foreign affairs, and the right of representation in foreign countries.

He also agreed, while providing for the maintenance of a British force in Egypt, that it should not be located in any of the capital cities where its presence was alleged to be a cause of offence, but that being kept there because of the central Imperial position of Egypt which necessitates the safeguarding of the Canal, the British forces should be maintained somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Canal itself. He further proposed that our British control of the administration should only survive in the form of the appointment of a number of rather shadowy officials whose relations with the native Government were left somewhat obscure, and he trusted to British interests being maintained in Egypt in the future by the paramount position of the High Commissioner who would continue to represent this country there, but who would apparently have to rely on the prestige of his personality and his position for the influence that he might exercise rather than, as hitherto, upon any definite show of force. That is a very brief and necessarily condensed and perhaps not altogether complete summary of the proposals made by Lord Milner. It was at this stage that the matter came before the Cabinet here, and papers were written upon the matter by myself and some of my colleagues in which we pointed out what we thought in some respects the weakness or the drawbacks of the position. I remember more particularly laying stress—and here I think I had the support of almost all if not all of my colleagues—upon the very doubtful provision about British troops, the proposal to concentrate them in some area removed from the great cities, and I remember pointing out that such a position seemed to me to be a source of great weakness and danger in the future. Also I was not quite reassured about the proposals on foreign affairs or the position of the judicial and financial advisers, who were to remain Europeans under the new régime, and I argued that it was necessary to lay down, if anything like this scheme was adopted, that no foreigner should be admitted into the military or civil service of the Egyptian Government except with our consent, in other words, that in the interests both of the very large staff of Englishmen serving there now, and in the interests of the future management of affairs, if we were to maintain any influence at all, we should not allow an opening for Frenchmen and Italians, and people of that sort, to overrun the Administration. Lord Allenby, who was over in England at the time, took substantially the same view as I did, but he held very strongly to the position, Lord Milner having reported, his report having been made public, and the Egyptian people finding it impossible to believe that anything that came under Lord Milner's name could not be the view of the British Government, that it was impossible to go back from the broad principles of the policy recommended by Lord Milner, although he thought in those points I have mentioned, and some others, that we should be at liberty and we ought to insist upon conditions that guaranteed our position and rights in Egypt more effectively than some of Lord Milner's proposals had done. He then went back to Egypt, and at his instance, with a view to starting matters on the next stage, the Cabinet on the 22nd February sent a telegram to Lord Allenby for publication in Egypt. It was also published here. It communicated the broad lines on which we were prepared to proceed. I will read this declaration if I may: "His Majesty's Government, after a study of the proposals made by Lord Milner, have arrived at the conclusion that the status of protectorate is not a satisfactory relation in which Egypt should continue to stand to Great Britain. While they have not reached final decisions with regard to Lord Milner's recommendations, they desire to confer regarding them with a delegation, nominated by the Sultan, with a view, if possible, to substitute for the protectorate a relationship which would, while securing the special interests of Great Britain and enabling her to offer adequate guarantees to foreign Powers, meet the legitimate aspirations of Egypt and the Egyptian people."

View of the Government on Lord Milner's Proposals.

Lord Allenby's views.

Government's Declaration.

The meeting will see that that was a tremendous concession to Egyptian sentiment because it did promise that for the conditions of the Protectorate existing since 1914 there should be substituted Treaty relations, creating some form of independence for the Egyptian people. On the other hand, in all other respects, we retained—and this was publicly stated—entire liberty when the delegation came over here to lay down and even to insist upon such conditions as we might think necessary, the Egyptian Delegation, of course, retaining equal liberty when it came over here to make any other proposals outside the strict lines of the report which it might find desirable to put forward. In other words, within the confines of the broad principles I have enunciated, both parties retained their liberty for the impending discussion. These communications having been made to the Egyptian Government and having been received with great gratitude and enthusiasm in Egypt, it then became necessary to take steps for the constitution of the official Egyptian delegation that had to come over here and conclude the new Treaty with us. The Sultan had always been promised that such a delegation should come. We exercised no sort of pressure in its constitution. We asked the Egyptian Government to send whom they pleased. The existing Ministry, which had been a mere stop-gap Ministry in Egypt, disappeared from the scene and was replaced by Adli Pasha, one of the gentlemen who had been engaged over here in the negotiations with Lord Milner. He is the present Prime Minister and he at once took steps to constitute the Delegation, to nominate its members and to give indications as to the programme. At this moment Zaghloul, the evil spirit in the whole discussion, returned to Egypt. He met with a great reception from the people; he was greeted with an ovation like that of some great military conqueror, and in the early stages after his return, he addressed himself, apparently, to an attempt at friendly co-ordination with Adli's Ministry. There was every hope for a week or two that the two would combine and that the Delegation would represent all parties. However, whether it was inspired by vanity, as is alleged by his critics, by a kind of megalomania from which it is well known that he suffers, or from jealously of Adli Pasha, whom he cordially dislikes, or from a feeling that by standing out altogether he could get the best terms and become the first ruler, he broke with the Prime Minister and started a campaign of his own. He went about the country making a series of speeches which would even excite the admiration of a Sinn Feiner, and finally owing to his harangues, a state of affairs was produced which culminated in serious disorders in Cairo and riots of the most terrible description in Alexandria, commencing with a squabble between Moslems and Greeks, which ended in an anti-European outburst in which many lives—forty I think—were lost and I think some hundreds were wounded.

Constitution of Egyptian Delegation to discuss situation.

Riots—May, 1921.

Mr. Hughes: When was this?

Lord Curzon: That was in May 1921, and the situation was only re-established by the appearance of British troops upon the scene. The native police and the Egyptian army who were first called upon, were quite inadequate to deal with the situation, and it was only restored by British troops. That is the position up till the last few weeks. Adli Pasha with his mission is now on the seas. They will be here at the end of this week. Zaghloul and his friends are carrying on this dangerous and bitter campaign in Egypt, and I think there can be little doubt, from all we hear from them, that Zaghloul is out to destroy Adli, to defeat any arrangements that might be concluded between Adli and us here, and very likely in the long run to unseat the present Sultan from his position on the throne. Now we have arrived at this point that we have to consider what we are to do. Can we secure an agreement here, and if we do secure an agreement here, will it be accepted in Egypt, and by acceptance in Egypt, I mean acceptance by a legislative assembly or a national assembly convened for the purpose of discussing and ratifying the arrangement, because that is one of the promises that have been made. Can we hope to do that? It is difficult to answer these questions with any confidence. I am not confident that we can conclude an agreement, that is to say, I have no doubt that we can draw up an agreement which will broadly conform with Lord Milner's principles, and will safeguard all the points in which our interests are concerned and the interests of other parties. I can give you a draft of such an agreement. I do not know whether Adli Pasha would accept it. I am afraid that, however reasonable it might be, he is so terribly afraid—he is rather a timid man—of Zaghloul and the reception he would meet with on his return, that he would find it difficult to accept an agreement. If he did accept, and I believe my colleagues agree, I am very doubtful of the reception it would meet with on his return. Now you may say to me, "If that is the position, whether you conclude your Treaty or not, supposing it ultimately to break down, what is the alternative?" There are some who would say: "We have done our best, we have been generous, we have abolished the Protectorate, we have declared our willingness to set up reasonable guarantees, and they will not have it. Upon their heads be it. We must revert to the status quo ante. Why should we not go back to the temporary Government and good administration and the many benefits of the Cromer régime?" I must tell you quite frankly that I believe that to be wholly impossible.

General Smuts: That is to abolish the Protectorate and go back to the status quo ante?

View of Lord Allenby.

Lord Curzon: Yes, to go back to the status quo ante. I believe that to be quite impossible and that is the view taken by Lord Allenby himself. I will just read a few lines from a despatch that came from him quite a short time ago. He said—

> "Western ideas of autonomy and self-government, not to speak of independence, to which the great war gave so considerable an impetus, have gained too strong a hold on all sections of the community in Egypt for it to be possible for us to return to old-time methods, or to look to the administrative devices created by Lord Cromer for precedence to guide us in our future action. The opinion of such leaders as Zaghloul has entered too deeply into the imagination of the people of Egypt to render any such solution of the problem possible."
> I have on many occasions emphasised to your Lordship that the memorandum published in Egypt in August last has come to be regarded, whatever the real intentions of His Majesty's Government, as a substantive offer; and that any wide departure from the main principles of the settlement which that memoranda advocates would be regarded as a breach of faith, not only in Egypt itself, but by world opinion at large."

I could elaborate it if required, but I think I have said sufficient to give you an idea of the position. During the last day or two, however, there has come to me a paper which I would like to circulate to the Conference. It was only seen by myself a day or two ago. It emanates from Sir William Hayter, who is the legal adviser in one of the Egyptian Administrations. It is a very able and prudent paper. It takes the line of accepting the principles of the Milner Report, while holding that many of the suggestions of Lord Milner are inapplicable or out of date; and it concludes with the suggestion, for which there is a good deal to be said, which is favoured by Lord Allenby in his covering despatch, and which we in the Foreign Office are rather favourably inclined towards, namely, that viewing the apparent impossibility of concluding a permanent definite agreement now which would be accepted by both parties, what we should do is to conclude a temporary modus vivendi to last for a period of ten years, and to be replaced, as I hope under happier conditions, at the end of that time by some more permanent arrangement. You must remember that although I talked about Egypt as being in the hands of the Zaghloul group, as it apparently is, although if you count heads, there are 90 per cent. of the population that would follow him into any polling booth which he asked them to enter, yet in the background there are many sensible men who are afraid of our going out altogether, and leaving them to the tender mercies of the Extreme Nationalist Party; and the views of these people have been greatly affected by what happened in Alexandria, just as foreign Powers have been. We have been talking about abolishing the Capitulations and setting up new Courts in their place, but you can understand that when the Greek, Frenchman and Italian is subject to being shot down in the streets of Alexandria without provocation, he will require better protection, and if a garrison is not there to protect him, he will put in his garrison himself. All these questions are having great weight upon Egyptian opinion, and I only mention this because I think myself that, while adhering to the policy with regard to the Protectorate from which we cannot depart, and while considering the idea of constructing a Treaty with the Egyptian people and giving them independence, we should like an interval to elapse during which we had some provisional modus vivendi to tide us over to a better time. I should better be able to explain this if I could circulate these papers, and if the Prime Minister agrees, I would do that, and would include one or two despatches from Lord Allenby on the subject. The whole matter is very complicated, but I have tried in an unpretentious way to give an account of the situation.

Sir W. Hayter's suggestion.

Moderate Egyptian opinion.

Egypt.

Mr. Lloyd George: Now for discussion. Are you ready to start?

Mr. Meighen: No.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Hughes, are you prepared to go on?

Voice of Dominions in Empire's Foreign Policy.

Mr. Hughes: I feel myself ill-equipped to offer any useful contribution to the discussion. The subject is so complex. I come to it wholly unprepared either by previous study or knowledge of the facts that have led to what is a most extraordinary and lamentable position, but since you invite us to offer our opinions, there are just one or two observations I would like to make. First, let me say a word or two on a point that crops up continually here, and which we hope yet to decide. I refer to the adoption of a principle and the establishment of some machinery by which the foreign policy of the Empire might be guided by the representatives of Great Britain, the self-governing Dominions, and India. This case has demonstrated in convincing fashion the urgent need for action in this direction. For not only were we not informed beforehand, but we were not even informed after it had happened. The position, as revealed by Lord Curzon to-day, comes to me with something of a shock. I have had no communication from the Colonial Office or direct from you, Sir, with reference to the actual position in Egypt. I saw in a newspaper some time ago a statement to the effect that it was proposed to adopt Lord Milner's report. That is the first hint I had of anything being contemplated. I presume that the world at large learned of it at the same time.

Mr. Lloyd George: We have not decided yet.

Mr. Hughes: No, that is quite right, but I did not even know what the recommendation of the Milner Commission was. Shortly after the appearance of the paragraph to which I have referred a question was asked in the House of Lords. Lord Curzon, in reply, said that the report had been received, but it had not been considered by the Government.

Importance of Egypt with regard to the Empire.

A short statement appeared under this news item intimating that the report involved complete autonomy for Egypt. I at once sent you, Sir, a telegram saying that I was much concerned about the report; that I should be glad to be informed of the position; that I regarded the Egyptian question as one of vital importance, not only to Britain, but to the whole of the Empire, and that, as Egypt was the gateway to the East, and so to Australia, that nothing should be done without full consultation with the Dominions. I may perhaps be accused of taking a narrow and biassed view, but it appeared to me that this question affected the national safety of Australia, and for that and other reasons I was frankly alarmed at the position set out in the brief press summary, and altogether opposed to the adoption of the Milner report.

We have now heard the matter sufficiently amplified by Lord Curzon. We know where we are. Lord Curzon has shown us clearly how the present position arose. I confess that it disturbs me greatly. It would be well if we could see our way to get out by the way we went in. But on the face of it this does not seem possible. The original cause of all this undoubtedly lies in President Wilson's Fourteen Points; that glittering phrase "self-determination," which he originated, is responsible for this and much more. Reference has been made to the discussion which took place with the Egyptian delegates in 1918. General Smuts was here at the time, and he will correct me if I am wrong, but I have no recollection of this question being discussed or even mentioned at any meeting of the Imperial Cabinet. General Smuts might be considered at that time a member of the British Government, and so information denied to us might be accessible to him, but, so far as the Imperial Cabinet is concerned, I do not remember the matter being mentioned. Similarly in Paris there was nothing made known to us except the fact that the Egyptian delegates were in Paris while we were there. I know nothing of Lord Cecil's note to Lord Allenby, which, as it were, closed the door to any attempt to get out by the same way as we went in.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think it right to say about that that it was done without my knowledge. Mr. Balfour was then the Foreign Secretary. He and I were in Paris, and we knew nothing at all about it, and the French Foreign Office did exactly the same thing, and M. Clemenceau knew nothing about it until we came to a talk regarding it, and he said he was certain that nothing of the kind had been done; but it was done, and that is why Lord Robert Cecil said what he did without consulting anybody.

Egypt.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, that is so, but it is clear that a serious position has been created which affects us all. Anything that menaces the canal and British prestige in Egypt—or in any of those territories which are, as it were, the hinterland of the canal—affects the whole of the Empire vitally. Now we are asked to say what we are going to do. First, I want to say how much I regret that what has been done has been done, and to express the hope that we shall learn wisdom from what has happened, and devise means to prevent the recurrence of proceedings of this character, which might lead to equally or still more disastrous results. It has been stated in definite terms by Lord Curzon that, even if we granted all that Lord Milner recommended, it would still leave us in opposition to Zaghloul, and we should have opposed to us all those varied elements that make up, we are told, 90 per cent. of the population.

So, then, here is a remedy which, while disastrous to us, is going to be unacceptable to the greater bulk of the Egyptian people. Having made a concession which is the utmost that we can make, which we ought never to have dreamed of making which, if made, will imperil Australia and the whole Empire; which, if we make, we make with the full knowledge, or at least with every prospect, of its being unacceptable to the great bulk of the people. Having made it, we can never recede from it; we shall always have to give a little more and a little more, in order that we may placate the implacable. How can we safeguard our interests? What guarantee is it proposed to exact in regard to our interests in Egypt that can be satisfactory? Speaking as a civilian, I think it impossible to hold the canal with troops confined solely to the canal zone, with the hinterland popled by a population bitterly hostile.

Lord Curzon: I think Mr. Hughes is pushing it rather too far when he says that the population are bitterly hostile. The population of the country are united in their demands for political independence, but they have no idea what it means.

Method of protecting Empire's interests.

Mr. Hughes: I do not say they have, but there is no smoke without fire. You have said that nothing we can do will placate Zaghloul. Is he, then, merely animated by this desire for political independence? May it not be that he has some other design, that perhaps behind him are some other influences? In any case, no one will contend for a moment that we shall be, if we concede what is demanded or even what the Milner report proposes, in as good a position to hold that canal, which must be held at all hazards, as at present. You say they propose to give us guarantees that our interests will be safeguarded, or that we will be permitted to safeguard them. First, they cannot give a guarantee that we dare accept. Secondly, supposing you do accept; suppose you give the Egyptians all they ask for, you give them autonomy. The matter does not end there. What you have done for Egypt you must do everywhere. I do not say you should not grant to all what you grant to the Egyptians; only it is well to realise what this means. Do not forget that, as the demand by the Egyptians was founded on President Wilson's Fourteen Points, any concession in this will be followed by demands from other quarters. We must consider, before we concede autonomy, if Egypt can stand alone? Do you believe for a moment that she can do this? But unless we are ready to believe that the world will turn from appeal to force to appeal to reason, we cannot entertain such an idea for a moment. What, then, will happen if we relinquish our position at this gateway to our estate? Will that be the end, or will not other nations seek to supplant us? We from the Dominions are asked to give advice in a case where the time is long past where advice could be usefully tendered. We are brought to a case in articulo mortis, and asked to perform a miracle. We can do nothing. Lord Curzon has taken what I may venture to say is a very optimistic view. He speaks of the 10 per cent. of the respectable interests upon which he builds such high hopes, but the bourgeoisie never were able to stand against revolutions, and never will be. We propose to withdraw the only force that can protect them.

Egypt unable to stand alone.

Need for a British Force.

Lord Curzon: No, we propose to keep it. Nobody has proposed for a moment to withdraw the force. My criticisms on Lord Milner's proposal were of precisely the opposite character, namely, that whereas Lord Milner proposed to confine the British force in the neighbourhood of the canal, treating it as an Imperial force, I argued, on the other hand, that the British force is required there for the maintenance of order, and for the protection of the country from enemies, and that it must, therefore, be maintained in the country.

Mr. Hughes: I am very pleased to hear you say that, but if you are going to grant them autonomy, if you are going to give them all they want, and at the same time attempt to maintain our interests by armed forces, I have nothing further to say. If that is the kind of autonomous Government you propose to give them, you may look to me for support, but anything short of that I oppose. We have to consider the vital interests of this Empire, and this, in my opinion, is a matter of life and death.

Egypt.

Mr. Lloyd George: You are assuming that we are committed to some of the things. We are not. We are here to discuss them, and before we commit ourselves we are going to confer with the Dominion Premiers and the Representatives of India, and that is what we are here for. We are committed only in so far as this declaration is concerned. Within those limits you can discuss anything, so therefore there is nothing like articulo mortis.

Mr. Churchill: We are committed to abolishing the Protectorate, but as to what we are to put in its place we are not committed.

Extent of present commitment.

Mr. Lloyd George: We say the Protectorate is not a satisfactory method. That is all we are committed to. We are therefore free. These gentlemen will be here in about a week and Lord Curzon will meet them, governed and instructed by the opinion which is formed here as a result of our discussions. So we are absolutely free, either to reject, or to accept, or modify. We have not committed you in the least beyond that declaration.

Mr. Hughes: I was certainly under the impression that Lord Curzon, on the whole, would have us understand something quite different. He said that when the Milner Report was made public all Egypt was overjoyed.

Mr. Lloyd George: They do not like the word "Protectorate," of course.

Mr. Churchill: They thought they were going to get a good deal more than we ever meant.

Mr. Hughes: That is sufficiently ambiguous of course to serve for an official pronouncement, but was it for that reason, I ask, that joy suffused the heart of the Egyptian? I do not think so.

Mr. Lloyd George: I remember Lord Milner telling us—I forget what the name was—he gave the Egyptian name for "Protectorate," which represented everything that was evil. They hated the word. We said we were not going for that word.

Mr. Hughes: I am sure your view is the same as mine on this matter. If we are only talking of words, any word will suit me so long as we get the thing we want.

Mr. Lloyd George: You are absolutely free to make any proposal with regard to the thing itself which is consistent with your not having something called a "Protectorate"—absolutely free.

May I also point out we sent that very document to you on the 2nd March, so there is nothing that we have really kept away from the Dominions. We have sent you Lord Milner's Report. On the 2nd March we sent you that identical document. That is all we have got.

Mr. Hughes: It is only fair to say you sent it to me after I had left.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is the difficulty which illustrated your speech yesterday —the difficulty of communications.

Mr. Hughes: I said nothing by way of criticism, let alone of censure, but I think I am entitled to point that out. I have only to add that I think we should be in a better position if Lord Curzon were to see the Egyptian Delegates and report to us what transpires. Let us have a concrete proposal, and then we shall have something to deal with. If you cannot satisfy them, of course you cannot satisfy the Extremists. If you have something tangible, put it before us. At present, we have nothing.

Suggests views of Egyptian Delegation be first Obtained.

Mr. Balfour: It is worth mentioning, isn't it, that if it came as a matter of surprise to Mr. Hughes, it came as a matter of surprise to the Cabinet. I shall never forget my feeling when in August last year, for the first time, I got an inkling of what was going on, and when Mr. Hughes says, with very great justice, that he is called upon to deal with the situation after it is too late to deal with it thoroughly and satisfactorily, that is the case with the whole Cabinet.

Egypt.

Mr. Hughes: Although, of course, I knew nothing of what Mr. Balfour says, I gathered from the reply Lord Curzon made in the House of Lords, that neither the Prime Minister, nor any other members of the Cabinet, including Mr. Churchill, had ever heard of it, or heard of it in time to do anything.

Mr. Balfour: That is true.

Mr. Churchill: I wrote my protest within five hours of reading it in the newspapers last autumn.

Mr. Hughes: We are all in the same boat.

Mr. Meighen: You are referring to the announcement of Lord Milner's? You are not referring to Lord Robert Cecil's?

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is the reference to the Arabs; it had no reference.

Mr. Balfour: He was not thinking of Egypt.

General Smuts: Lord Robert Cecil's declaration had reference to the Sykes–Picot Agreement. That Agreement was a secret between us and the French, and at that stage it came to the notice of the Arabs to whom we had made quite different promises, and some statement had to be framed between the British and the French Governments which would conciliate Arab opinion, and so a new formula was devised. As I remember, that was the genesis of that Declaration.

Mr. Hughes: Look at this, that other paragraph which qualifies a little . . . .

General Smuts: I would only say I do not think that we are in a position usefully to discuss this subject now. The British Government is only bound by a general Declaration, and that we accept. The Egyptians have accepted that too, I understand; that is a general formula—this formula, that the Protectorate should go and that the special interests of Great Britain should be protected by a Treaty, and that, for the rest, Egyptian aspirations shall be satisfied. That general Declaration is the only document that binds us, and that we all agree to, and as far as the British Government knows, that satisfies Egyptian opinion. So that is all that we can build on.

Necessity only for protection of Empire's interests.

In regard to particulars, it is a matter for discussion between you and the deputation when it arrives. I would only say this, that I feel very strongly that we should not attempt to do more than protect Imperial interests; the attempt, I think, to govern these Oriental communities on our lines and by our methods is bound to fail. It will involve us in all sorts of entanglements. The whole political atmosphere of the world has changed. We do not want to govern Egypt, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. Massey: What about India?

General Smuts: Don't let us discuss India now. She is on a road which will take her far. We are discussing Egypt, and we have similar problems in Mesopotamia and elsewhere. I only think that as a principle we should simply conserve our Imperial interests and let these people govern themselves and find out how it can best be done. We do not want to be for ever entangled in Egypt, and send armies there to keep the Administration going. You only want to conserve Imperial interests, and we only want to do the same, and I think in that spirit we should work on this formula.

Mr. Hughes: May I say this to you. Look at that Canal and see how much it means to us and how little by comparison to you.

General Smuts: In Egypt you have two problems, the problem of internal government and the problem of autonomy; the problem of running an Administration, which I think is an Egyptian problem, and we should leave it to them.

Mr. Churchill: Altogether, would you leave it?

General Smuts: As far as possible. There is an indefinable neutral ground, so to speak, between the two.

Lord Curzon: The element of all the foreign populations and the rights of foreign Governments place great responsibility on us.

Mr. Balfour: There is no country so international as Egypt at this moment. You have enormous foreign interests in proportion to the size of the country and the population.

General Smuts: Once we go further than protecting Imperial interests, with the new atmosphere growing up in these countries, we are going to let ourselves into no end of entanglements, and the Empire cannot stand the burden. Egypt.

Mr. Balfour: I not only see your point, but I have great sympathy with it, but do not let us conceive Egypt with a native population which happens to border on the Canal, and which can be left alone to carry out native ends with native methods. Unfortunately, Egypt is not; Egypt is quite different; Egypt is abnormal and like nothing else under heaven, and it is very difficult to deal with her on your plan. I quite understand you.

General Smuts: I know that the Dominions will do very little to help the Mother country in this matter; she will have to bear the burden. We talk of Imperial communications which we are going to protect, but it will in the end be the British navy and the British army that will go to Egypt, and the people of this country will refuse to carry this intolerable burden of keeping an army in Egypt; so long as we protect our interests there and see that things do not become hopeless from our Imperial point of view, that should suffice.

Mr. Hughes: Will you look at it in another way? You talk of the rights of the Egyptian people; is it not notorious that they are a corrupt people; that, in fact, it is not too much to say, their official hierarchy is hopelessly corrupt. Did not Lord Curzon point out that one of the causes of all this trouble has arisen from that very thing. Our armies were in Egypt for a long while during the war; they had an opportunity of seeing the Egyptian. I cannot speak from experience, and no one is here who has had any practical experience of Egypt, but I would like to say this, that I feel confident if you gave them everything they wanted they would still be unable to govern themselves. They are a corrupt people; there is an ignorant proletariat, there is a corrupt bureaucracy, there is a megalomaniac leading them. I say again most certainly, Egypt as a self-governing country in the sense we mean it, in the sense you mean it, General, is impossible.

General Smuts; You have the opinion of Lord Allenby. Lord Allenby says that a return to the old pre-war condition where the British Government, in a mild way and by subterfuges, so to say, ran the Government with Lord Cromer, has become an impossible situation. If that is so, what can you do? You don't want to annex the country; you don't want to run it directly. Where are you going to draw the line, except at this point, our Imperial interests as distinct from local Egyptian interests?

Unique position of Egypt.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is really the point. I think everyone would accept that formula, but you have to reduce that formula to practice. Your difficulties come in the practical application of that formula. For instance, I will give you two or three illustrations. Egypt is not a country merely; it is a high road. That puts it, as Mr. Balfour points out, in a different category from any other country. It is a high road between East and West. The first thing you come up against: Is Egypt to get foreign relations? That is the first point. Is Egypt to be represented separately in the Courts of France, here and elsewhere? That is the first question. Is that consistent with our Imperial interests? The second point is: Foreign advisers—they cannot really run their show there without having outside advice; they are not sufficiently advanced for it. I quite agree with Lord Curzon they were overrun with minor officials and things which could be done very much better by Egyptians than by inferior Europeans, but there are certain things they cannot do, engineering for example, and finance. They want advice from outside. Well, now, are they to be at liberty to choose their advisers? Just see what that means. On the face of it, it looks as if they ought to have the right to have whom they like and pick the best man, but that is not the way it would work. French interests will press them to take a French adviser; Italian interests and German interests, and other interests, perhaps American interests, will all be pressing to get their own particular man there. The moment you put the foreign outside advisers there our control over that country goes, and you get a hostile organisation which will make the difference between an Egypt working with you and an Egypt working in the interests of some other Power. Now, those are two vital considerations. You may say, if you don't allow them, you don't give them internal liberty; on the other hand, if you do, it will be fatal to Imperial interests; it might not be fatal in five, ten or twenty years, but ultimately it will be absolutely fatal. Then comes the third question. I am only giving these as three illustrations of the practical difficulties with which you are confronted. Take the question of a garrison. You have to protect your highway. It is a highway to Australia; it is a highway to the East. It is no use talking of Singapore if you cannot get to Singapore. You must get there, and it is no use having great fleets there if somebody here can do what the Turks did with the Dardanelles. It is really our trouble with the Dardanelles, but it is much more vital to us. The Dardanelles only locked the door to Russia and Roumania; that was very nearly fatal to us, but these are Dardanelles which lead to the whole of the East, and you were reckoning here the other day how long it would take the British fleet to get there, and the question of two or three weeks makes the whole difference to you. But if you have a Power here which might become hostile at any moment, which might be bought as the Turks were bought—they were bought with cash; the Turkish people did not want to quarrel with us. The Turks have said to me that they were amazed they were at war with us. Why did it happen? There were two or three leading Turks bought by Berlin with cash and promises of all sorts of positions. The same might happen here. You may have Egyptian Ministers bought, and the door is locked, and while we are arguing you are done in, and our interests in that part of the world are completely smashed, and you must begin again. Therefore comes the question, what about your garrison? This report says you may put it on the sands of the desert, on the brink of the Suez Canal. That is no use to you. Why should you plant your troops in a position of that impossible kind? Aden is bad enough, and it does not give you the necessary control. Those are three; there are others which will occur to other members of the Conference, but those are three very practical questions which go to the very root of the whole business, and upon those three things I do not think we should give way. That is my individual opinion. We are discussing this here; we are not putting the views of the British Cabinet, but we are each discussing our own individual view with a view to arriving at a Cabinet decision exactly as we did in the war. Some of us have advanced views, and some of us have not such advanced views.

Three essential considerations in the question.

Egypt.

Mr. Massey: I should like to say, Sir, that I agree thoroughly with the views you have put forward. New Zealand is not so much interested as Australia and India, but we are here not to look at the views of any particular part of the Empire, but to look at the positions of the Empire as a whole and to consider its interests. I am very glad that General Smuts and I are personal friends, for I am sorry to notice that we nearly always find ourselves of opposite opinions. I cannot help that. There must be a difference of opinion even in a comparatively small gathering like this. But in considering what has taken place I do not want to criticise adversely anything with which Lord Milner was connected, because I have a tremendously high opinion of Lord Milner. In listening to this discussion and reading the papers that have been supplied to us, I have been very forcibly reminded of a saying of a German writer in the early days of the war—I think it was Nietsche, but I am not positive, for one cannot remember these things or who is responsible for them, but whoever it was it attracted a good deal of attention. He said something like this, speaking from the German point of view, "To stab the British Empire to the heart we must get possession of Egypt and the Canal." That was as nearly as possible what was said, and a communication was sent to me a day or two ago in which there is another quotation from a German document to the effect that the Germans intended to establish themselves on both banks of the Suez Canal and so to cut the main artery through which circulates the life blood of the world, and particularly the British Empire. There is the whole position in a nutshell from an enemy point of view. It is the highway, the British, the Imperial, or, if you like to put it, the British Empire highway. It is the British Empire highway from the very heart of the Empire itself, where we are to-day, to India, to Australasia, to the whole of the Far East, and it is the way through which the ships of war would have to pass in the event of trouble in that part of the world, such as that we were considering a few days ago. To my mind it is exceedingly important. Whatever happens, there is no question about it that British interests must be protected with a people such as the people of Egypt. We cannot help remembering that under British control Egypt has made greater advancement and progress than it has done since the time of the Israelites. There is no question of that. I for one looked forward to a time when Egypt will be even far more prosperous than it is at the present moment. General Smuts says that we cannot pretend to govern these Eastern people and that we should not attempt it. That means that we have got to abandon the whole of them. If we abandon them what is going to happen? The British Empire is at an end. That may not matter very much from certain points of view, but it would mean a great deal for the world if the British Empire came to an end. If we followed the doctrine expressed by General Smuts we should have chaos. It would put the clock of civilisation—I do not think there is any exaggeration about it—back for a thousand years. I hope it will never happen. I do not see the way out, but I do put it that in the interests of Britain and in the interests of humanity—I will put the interests of humanity first—that recommendation should not be given effect to in its entirety. To my mind it would be simply national and Imperial suicide, and so far as I am concerned—we are speaking confidentially now—I certainly will not be a party to it. We ought to be able to say, in the interests of the Empire, that we did what was right in connection with Egypt, and even more so, because I do not know of any country so important to the Empire as Egypt, with the exception of Britain itself. Even Australia and New Zealand might be parted with and the Empire would go on, but I do not think you could run the Empire without keeping control of the main artery, as stated by the German writer I have quoted. It is another of the legacies left to us by the Fourteen Points of President Wilson. I distrusted them at the time; my instincts were against them; I thought they would involve us in trouble and I was not disappointed. I am afraid we have not seen the last of them by a very long way. However, there may be a way out of it.

Egypt.

Mr. Meighen: They know more than the Fourteen Points.

Mr. Massey: I believe they were the origin of a great deal of the trouble that has come to the British Empire and to the world since the signing of the Peace Treaty, and I do hope that some satisfactory way will be found out of what is taking place. I understand that Lord Curzon cannot make any recommendation until he meets those Egyptian representatives who are coming, or who are perhaps on their way now.

Lord Curzon: When you say I cannot make up my mind, I have a very clear idea of what I shall propose. I could circulate a draft to you conceding the main principle as we have already conceded it, but safeguarding all the points to which we attach importance. I have drawn it up and I have got it, but whether it will be accepted is a different thing.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think the Conference ought to see these proposals for discussion. I think it is really very important that when Lord Curzon meets these delegates he should go there armed with the general conclusions of the Empire upon that subject. I think it would be very desirable that Lord Curzon should circulate his proposals.

Lord Curzon: Would you like me to circulate them? That was my idea, and then I will put forward at the end the idea, suggested by Hayter, of a ten years' agreement on the assumption that we cannot get them to agree to anything on a permanent basis. I will circulate the two.

Mr. Massey: I did not mean that Lord Curzon could not make up his mind, because he is one of the men who can make up his mind. I am glad to be able to acknowledge it, but I think it is only right that before he says anything definite—confidential communication is a different thing—he must meet the men who are coming from Egypt.

Mr. Churchill: I really am responsible for the places next door to Egypt, namely, Palestine and Mesopotamia, and so my affairs are very much concerned with what goes on in Egypt. I was very shocked when I read about this in the papers last August, and the Prime Minister knows that I immediately sent off my protest and circulated it to my colleagues. At the same time I have always recognised that it was a fact that something had been done and that things could not be absolutely the same again after that publication had been made. Therefore I agreed to the Cabinet decision, and quite willingly, to tell the Egyptians that something would be substituted for the word "Protectorate," which was what they particularly disliked. Therefore I feel that the only thing that really lies before us now is the reserves which we must insist upon, and the Prime Minister stated with very great force several of those reserves. First of all, it would take more troops to protect the Canal if they were quartered along the Canal than it would take to keep order over the whole of Egypt and protect the Canal as well.

Egypt.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: And much more expense.

Location of Troops.

Mr. Churchill: If we put our troops in the desert along the Canal, leaving the country to stew in its own juice and to become a hotbed of internal and external intrigue, you would have to have other large forces, and you would be committed to heavy expenditure. Therefore the garrison we keep there, apart from the international aspect which Mr. Balfour dwelt upon, bearing in mind our responsibilities of protecting foreigners, will have to be kept in the great cities in Cairo, Alexandria and elsewhere. And the Egyptians ought to be told plainly that that is what we are going to do. Those garrisons are there not only for the purpose of protecting the Canal. If they were not there every other Power which has capitulation rights and felt its subjects were likely to be injured, would put their troops there. The withdrawal of British troops from the great cities in Egypt would not mean the withdrawal of foreign troops from Egyptian soil; it would only mean that more foreign troops of various Powers would be put there in their place. We should probably be the only Power of importance that had not got a body of troops in Cairo for the purpose of protection. Therefore we must have our troops there.

Mr. Lloyd George: Lord Curzon has to leave us now and the agenda concerns him. It is suggested that to-morrow morning at 11·30 we take the question of Anglo-French relations. That is a decision we shall have to take.

Advisers to Egyptian Government.

Mr. Churchill: The Prime Minister spoke of a second point which I think you will see arises out of the prime military necessity and political necessity of keeping garrisons in Cairo and Alexandria. He spoke of the importance of not allowing the European advisers of the Egyptian Government to be picked freely by them from any nation they liked in the world, so that we might have hostile, intriguing people there who would be really working the machine against us. That is true from the point of view of their hostility, but also from the point of view of the efficiency of the Administration. I quite agree that the quality of the British administrative assistance given to Egypt has deteriorated in late years, and I think it is a subject which requires very careful investigation, why and how it can be improved, though it is absolutely certain that, unless you have a proportion—not such a large proportion as now—but a considerable proportion of authoritative advisers in the Egyptian Department of State under Egyptian Ministers (but still advisers whose advice is taken), unless you have a proportion of those, the country will relax and fall back from the point to which it has been raised—I do not say to the chaos and squalor of the days of Israel—but the cities will deteriorate, order will not be maintained and there will be discontent amongst the people, abuse and corruption will creep in on a large scale and then we will have real discontent amongst the people with violence, and troops will have to be brought in. You will have to keep your garrisons there until, at any rate, something like decent, orderly quasi-European administration has been set up. It would be a great mistake and a great danger; you would have all the responsibility for the country because you have to keep troops there. Otherwise, we shall see everything going to rack and ruin. It does seem to me wise to keep an element in the administration of advisers who will advise in the same way as they did in the days of Lord Cromer. Well, if you take these two very important points, you will see that we shall have to go rather on the lines we went on before the war, with such modifications as are possible in the growing advance of ideas. I do not say that we cannot do a great deal to meet Egyptian sentiment. I have been out there recently myself and I have thought a good deal about this, and certainly would not be afraid of reforms. It has only been a Protectorate and has always been a foreign country, and I do not myself see why we should not arrange our control of Egypt in the form which is most agreeable to them.

Mr. Meighen: What about representation in other capitals?

Representation in Foreign Capitals impossible.

Mr. Churchill: That we could not give. I am quite clear we could not give that. It would mean a centre of intrigue set up in every foreign capital. We could not possibly give that.

Mr. Massey: Has anything been done about the renewal of the lease of the Canal?

Mr. Churchill: It has only just been mooted in the most tentative way, but I have always considered myself that it is much better that the Canal should be more or less vested ultimately in Egypt, than that Egypt should remain under British control. I always hope that that will be the ultimate thing. Egypt.

Mr. Massey: It would be a serious matter if the lease of the Canal came to an end and the British lost control.

Zaghloul's demand for evacuation of Soudan.

Mr. Churchill: It would be most fatal. Then another point that Zaghloul Pasha is insisting upon is that we should not only leave Egypt, holding on perhaps to the Canal, but that we should also give up the Sudan—that is the latest of his demands.

Mr. Balfour: That is sheer ignorance.

Mr. Churchill: Those tremendous regions which have been developed out of barbarism by British labour and money—that is another thing we have to make perfectly clear that we cannot put up with. Of course, I regret very much indeed that the handling of this matter at the outset was such as to set up a wrong ideal before the people of Egypt. The great ideal we wish to set up for the British Empire is the family of self-governing Dominions, all perfectly autonomous in everything that concerns themselves, but co-operating freely within the circle of the British Empire. That is the great conception, that is the conception which has animated Mr. Montagu and the British statesmen who have been concerned with the reforms in India—the idea of great self-governing Dominions.

Mr. Massey: A family of nations.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, and here in regard to Egypt we have diverged. We have put up a different kind of ideal altogether—that I regret most profoundly. Still, having gone so far on that road, I think we can now only really insist upon these vital securities, namely, garrisons, the foreign policy and such reasonable share in the administration as will secure efficiency and which will so far be a safeguard against inefficiency and the maintenance of the Sudan under British authority. This seems to me the very, very least that we can stand upon. I am pretty sure that Aldi Pasha and his Delegation will not be able to agree to this. If they did agree, I am perfectly certain that they would be repudiated violently by Zaghloul, who is certain to strike them down when they get back. I do beg and pray before this most important discussion begins, in which the Foreign Secretary will be concerned, that we should have a perfectly definite view of what are the vital points; it is not a matter of mere convenience or profits, it is a matter of the actual vital existence of the structure of the British Empire. It is only through this Canal that the British fleet can reach the stations where it can protect or come to the aid of Australia and New Zealand in the Pacific in their hour of peril, and it is in Egypt naturally where there would be garrisons of British troops needed to reinforce any part of the Middle East. It is in Egypt that you naturally put your wireless station and aviation. It is the Clapham Junction—it has been described as the strategic Clapham Junction of the British Empire, and we really cannot afford at the end of a war, where we have struck down the most powerful Empire in the world, the Germans, the Austrians and the Turks, we really cannot afford to let ourselves be pushed out of our position in Egypt by the continuance of local agitations. With every desire to meet the wishes of the Egyptians, I do hope the Conference will stand very, very firmly on these essential points.

Egypt essential to Empire.

Mr. Meighen: I do not understand one statement you made, Mr. Churchill. You say the history of the Empire has been the development of self-governing nations and that you regret we diverged from that path in the case of Egypt. Your argument is one with which I fully agree. You say that we cannot proceed along the line of self-government now in the case of Egypt, but you say your regret is that we were unable to proceed in Egypt on that path.

Mr. Churchill: Now, I quite agree.

Mr. Meighen: We never should have undertaken to do so.

Mr. Churchill: I do not make myself clear. Of course, one had the idea that Egypt would be included in the British Empire, and, so included in the British Empire, would gradually attain the full Dominion status, but instead of that she has diverged on to a path which is inconsistent with her being in the British Empire, and they are being taught there that nothing matters as long as you can say: "We are outside the British Empire." That I very much regret, and I very much regret the report which was published should have, as it were, indicated that we should agree and approve of that, because after all, we had to declare a Protectorate. We had been round the Powers of Europe and received assent from all our Allies, from France, the United States of America and from Belgium, we had received their agreement to the effect that it should be incorporated in the British Empire; that is what I mean by getting on the wrong line, but I do not think you can avoid taking to some extent the position that it is an independent country, though we hope to bring it back in the course of time within the orbit.

Mr. Meighen: Your opinion in a word is that it is to our vital interest as an Empire that we do have a Protectorate there, even if it must be called something else.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, exactly. That is much better put.

Lord Milner's Opinion.

Mr. Balfour: I am afraid I ought to add, for what it is worth, Lord Milner's strong opinion—you see we have discussed this with him, and he knows quite well what dismay and anxiety his ex-colleagues have seen in his report, but he has maintained quite steadily both in the Cabinet and to me, and no doubt to everybody else in private conversations, that he does not believe that the Egyptians want to sever their relations with the British Empire, that they are all too perfectly conscious that they cannot stand alone, that they all are quite aware that they must have advisers, without which we think they cannot possibly get on, and that those advisers must be British advisers. Of course, if Lord Milner is right, the task we have with the deputation ought to be less serious than the tenor of the conversations to-day across this table would lead one to fear. I am afraid that I have always thought Lord Milner sanguine on the point. He knows a great deal about it, and he holds the opinion with very, very great vehemence, and that fact ought to be known to my colleagues.

Mr. Massey: He had that in his mind when he wrote the report.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: The moment they are permitted to take up advisers outside the British Empire they would get into the hands of those advisers, and their intentions would evaporate. Lord Curzon has promised to submit definite proposals to the Conference.

Mr. Hughes: Before he sees them?

Mr. Lloyd George: Before he sees them. I do not think it would do for him to go there without a clear idea of what his objective is, and when these are circulated we can fix the discussion upon that, and see whether we agree upon those lines. To-morrow we will take the Anglo-French relations at 11·30.

Mr. Massey: No report of this will go out.

Mr. Lloyd George: This is the report:—

"Lord Curzon in an introductory statement briefly reviewed the history of British relations with Egypt, dwelling upon the importance of Egypt in the war, and concluding with the circumstances attending the despatch of the Milner Mission to Egypt and the publication of the Milner Report. The discussion was then opened by Mr. Hughes, and continued by Mr. Meighen, General Smuts, Mr. Massey, Mr. Churchill, Mr. Balfour and the Prime Minister. It was decided that the proposals for meeting Egyptian national aspirations and safeguarding Imperial interests now under consideration by the British Government should be discussed in detail at a later date by the Dominion Ministers and Representatives of India with a view to the arrival of the Egyptian Delegation now on its way to England."

Mr. Hughes: I think that is sufficiently ambiguous.

Status of Indians in the Empire.

Mr. Lloyd George : I am going to suggest to Mr. Sastri, General Smuts and the Colonial Secretary, who are more directly concerned in the Indian question, that after Mr. Sastri has made a statement to the Conference, the questions he raises should be referred to their Committee.

General Smuts : Mr. Sastri wishes to make a statement to the Conference?

Mr. Lloyd George : Yes.

General Smuts : I have no objection whatever.

Mr. Lloyd George : If that is agreed to I will call upon Mr. Sastri to make his statement.

Mr. Sastri : Prime Minister, I am very grateful indeed for the opportunity that has been afforded to me on behalf of India to make a statement of great importance to her. That statement relates to the position of Indians in other parts of the Empire to which she happily belongs. Let me begin my statement by clearing the ground of one or two misconceptions which have arisen in regard to it. In the first place, I will say at once that in India, among the intelligent population, the meaning of "Empire" is fully understood, the great advantage and honour of belonging to this Empire are appreciated to the full, and I may even go further and claim that the significance of "Empire" is perhaps more fully understood and interpreted in a more exalted sense in certain sections of India than I have been able to find in some quarters even in the United Kingdom, where one would expect a full understanding of the question. There is such a thing as citizenship of the British Empire, which has found, I must say, an abiding residence in the Indian minds, but which, strange to say, I have found lamentably lacking in the minds of certain people here.

To us the Empire stands for equality, for absolute justice. It may be that this is not a legal or a juridical concept. I have no right, not being a lawyer, to lay down anything on that subject, but in the popular conception in India there is this element, that we conceive that when this Empire reaches to the fullest height of her moral greatness, it will be open to every subject to seek the fullest self-expression of which he is capable in any part of the Empire, unhampered and unhindered, that he will, to put it more particularly, be entitled to move about freely in any part of the Empire, to take up his residence in any part of the Empire and, provided only he conforms to all local laws, avail himself of all the facilities afforded, where he settles, for developing his faculties to the utmost. That is our conception. I find it very often stated, however, that this is not yet a fact and may never be a fact, and it is no use raising people's expectations on the footing that it is at the present moment an established fact. Now we know only too well that at present it is not an established fact, but we all look forward to the time when this full right of British citizenship will be a fact acknowledged and everywhere worked up to. That is why, Sir, in my opening speech, immediately after your pronouncement, I ventured to state the proposition that the compromise of 1918, which on behalf of India Lord Sinha accepted, was a deduction from the citizenship of the Empire. I ventured to say that there were two principles that came into conflict on that occasion; first, this principle of free and open citizenship which I have enunciated, and secondly, the other principle that every part of the British Empire, every self-governing Dominion, had the right to determine the composition of its population by suitable and appropriate immigration laws. When these two principles came into conflict the authorities of the Empire for the time were in favour of the latter principle, which I venture to think is the lower or inferior principle. Now there is no disposition, on the part of the class of people for whom I am entitled to speak, to go back on this understanding. We are quite prepared to abide by this compromise which we arrived at on that occasion. I venture, however, to draw your attention to the circumstance that it is regarded almost universally in India as a compromise entered into with our sister Dominions in order to meet their wishes fully, so that all ground of misunderstanding and mutual recrimination may be removed.

Reason why India has not passed Immigration Laws.

Now, there are some people who are naturally asking what has India gained by this compromise? When other Dominions have passed Immigration Laws in consequence of it, or in conformity with it, India has forborne to do so. If India has forborne to do so it is certainly with a particular object, and I am bound frankly to tell you that she has forborne to avail herself of this compromise, and has not passed any Immigration Laws, merely because she is not confronted with that danger with which the Dominions are confronted. They have to safeguard their civilisation from the unlimited influx of Asiatics, and for that purpose have passed these Immigration Laws. India stands in no such danger. Her population is much too large to fear any risk of being swamped, and that is why she has hitherto not availed herself of this principle of reciprocity. If ever she should do so, it would not be in self-defence. It would be, rather, retaliatory in its effect. It would be that she wanted, after all hope had been abandoned of obtaining justice at the hands of the Dominions, to hit back. That being the significance of our action, I am bound to state at once that there are a great many people in India at the present moment inclined to think that if, after the compromise of 1918, we do not obtain fair treatment wherever we are lawfully settled in the Dominions, it would be time, when we had exhausted all means of conciliation, when we had exhausted all expostulation on the question, all mediation and arbitration, to think of this last act of retaliation.

Status of Indians in the Empire.

India's relationship with Dominions.

I think that I may now go to the next branch of the subject which is a consideration in some detail of our exact position in the Dominions. I am happy to dismiss at once Newfoundland and New Zealand as Dominions in which there is no Indian problem at all. New Zealand, of course, has Immigration Laws by which she excludes Indians, but they are framed in scrupulous conformity with the compromise of 1918, and the few Indians that happen to be there are likely to get the full franchise of citizenship of New Zealand. I will at once leave New Zealand with an expression of our gratitude that there is no trouble there by which we are confronted India's position with regard to Australia and Canada.

Then to come to Australia and Canada, the position there is almost the same. In Australia and Canada I think the only thing that remains to be done is to confer the franchise on resident Indians, provided they are able to satisfy the authorities that they are lawfully resident in those places. That is the thing yet remaining, and I am full of hope that when we make suitable representations to those Dominions they will see the wisdom and the justice, having been reassured on this question of being swamped, of granting to such Indians as are settled the full rights of citizenship enjoyed by their own subjects.

South Africa.

There remains the question of South Africa. The Union of South Africa consists of four different provinces, but there is one province which may rank honourably with New Zealand and Newfoundland, that is the Province of the Cape, where there is no disability at all on an Indian, because he is an Indian. He enjoys the Municipal and the Parliamentary franchise as well, and there are no disabilities of any kind which he may not, in the ordinary exercise of his franchise, get rid of by his own efforts. The Cape Province is out of the range of my remarks, but elsewhere in the Union of South Africa there are serious disabilities to which Indians are subject to-day because they are Indians, and for no other reason. There are disabilities with regard to their residence; they are ordered to live in certain places marked out for them; that is what is called segregation. Then there are limitations to their right to acquire and own property. There are also limitations on their freedom of trade, they having to take out licences which are subject to renewal, with the risk on each occasion of renewal of not meeting with favourable treatment. There are other grievances which are detailed in our memorandum of 1918, to which, however, I will not refer lest I should load my subject to-day with too much subordinate matter. In these parts of South Africa, unfortunately, there is a feeling amongst the European population that the Indian, even though settled there for many years, is an alien, that he must be got rid of, and that the pressure of administration, if exerted with sufficient rigour, will bring about the desired result. There is a League of South Africans in the place, the members of which are actuated by the strongly expressed desire to get rid of the Indian element, for they cannot shake off the fear that if the Indian is allowed to live amongst them he may in the course of time prove a source of danger to their commonwealth. I believe that those fears are ungrounded, that the feeling of antipathy which these leaguers entertain towards the Indian are largely without justification, but we have got to recognise that there is that feeling for the moment, very strong, very powerful, and, in some seasons, absolutely irresistible.

Mr. Hughes: Do these disabilities to which you refer fall upon Indians born in South Africa?

Mr. Sastri: Also on them, unfortunately. There are many of these Indians—I am very thankful to Mr. Hughes for reminding me of it—who are true South

Status of Indians in the Empire.

Africans, who were born there and do not know any of the languages of India, and some of whom, perhaps, have never seen India at all. They are, in every sense of the word, South Africans. Nevertheless, they are treated exactly on the same footing as though they went there yesterday against the wish of the local people.

Indentured Labour in Natal.

In point of fact, the Indian element in South Africa was introduced there at the request of the colonists of Natal, who sought cheap Indian labour, and, by a system of what is known as "indenture," introduced a number of our coolies into the Transvaal. It is to be remembered, on behalf of these coolies, that they have contributed to the present prosperity of Natal. Nevertheless, they are now regarded as undesirables, and the only thing is to attempt to remove them from the soil which they have enriched by their labour. From time to time when this anti-Indian feeling erupts, as it were, demands are made on the Government—I think, on the whole, an unwilling Government—that they should redouble the rigour of administration and aggravate the pressure on the Indians so that, in course of time, they may leave the colony out of disgust. The Indians, however, have not done so; they have resolved to live on the soil to the prosperity of which they have made some contribution, to which they were invited on a system of indenture, and on which they still hope, notwithstanding all discouragement, to be able to make good their position through the good offices of other parts of the Empire. Now, quite recently, a Commission was appointed by the South African Government for the purpose of examining one or two questions connected with these disabilities. They have recorded one finding, which is of first-class consequence to this discussion. That finding is, that there is no ground whatever for the fear entertained in many parts of South Africa that there is a continual influx of Indians, and that that influx is at such an alarming rate as to necessitate drastic steps. That fear has been proved abundantly to be absolutely without justification. Now I remember in 1917 during the discussions at one of the Conferences, of which we are the successors, General Smuts making the statement that, when once this fear of being swamped is remedied by suitable immigration laws, all other questions of administrative disabilities and hardships could be solved freely and perfectly. Now, some time has elapsed since then, and all that we are able to say is, that instead of these hardships being lessened they have been in one or two respects greatly aggravated.

South African Commission on the Indian Question.

South African anti-Indian Legislation.

In the year 1919 a law was passed which removed one of the means by which Indian residents in the Transvaal were able to acquire and hold property. The law of 1919 made it impossible for them to do so and banned the only means which, up to that time, had been offered to them. This Commission to which I have just now referred made a recommendation that that law and the Gold Law of 1885—against which the Indian community have always persistently protested—should not be touched at all, and, further, they have recommended that a new disability be added to this long catalogue of Indian disabilities, to the effect that they should be prevented by law from holding property in the uplands of Natal. Against this particular recommendation one member of the Commission, I must acknowledge, protested. He has written a dissentient note. At the request of the Government of India, the Government of the Union of South Africa have hitherto delayed taking any action on the recommendations of this Commission, but there is pressure on them. The people of South Africa would insist on steps being taken to carry out these recommendations, and we are under a fear that perhaps early action may be taken, the effect of which will be to tighten the bonds under which Indians have lived in the three provinces in the Union of South Africa.

Now I have in my hands here two or three telegrams that I have received from Pietermaritzburg, from Durban and from other places in Natal, complaining against the laws already in force and against other laws which are contemplated, according to their information. I will not weary the Conference by reading them. Some of their grievances date back to the time of President Kruger, but it will only weary the Conference to hear all that sorry detail. Quite recently, in a debate in the Parliament of South Africa, several statements were made by members which have attracted the notice of newspapers in India. There is a certain class of newspapers in India, as elsewhere, which is on the watch for such sensational news, and these have worked them up into leading articles and all sorts of special contributions, the effect of which has been to make India believe that we are on the eve of a time when the fetters of Indian residents in that Dominion will be inevitably tightened.

Recommends conferment of full Franchise.

Now I wish to suggest to this Conference, what must be superfluous to those who have lived for centuries under representative institutions, that the only final and satisfactory way of solving all these problems is to confer the full franchise of the locality on such people as are qualified to receive the franchise by education, by property and by qualifications appertaining to general citizenship. The franchise has, I think, been discovered by humanity to be the only means by which people can, by their own efforts, remedy their grievances. Any other remedies that we may devise will only be remedies applied by others, and no such remedies have been found in the long run to be so efficacious as those which the franchise confers on those who receive it. If we made the franchise general and uniform as you have it in England for election to Parliament, the candidates would have to seek the suffrage of Indian voters, and, when that position is reached, when members of Parliament in the Union have to seek the suffrage of their Indian co-citizens, we can well see that we shall have arrived at a position when we may dismiss all concern for the welfare of that class of people. The solution will then be in their hands, and any further grievances which they may suffer from will be largely of their own creation or acquiescence. In the most interesting statement to which we listened yesterday on Egypt, a statement which, for my part, I heard with the most intense interest and admiration, Lord Curzon suggested more than once that the Egyptian situation was developing at a rapid rate, but that the authorities here in England did not know how fast it was developing. If, as the circumstances developed, they had been conveyed then and there to the authorities here, suitable remedies, it was implied, would have been applied at the right time.

Activity of Separatists.

Now we cannot say that, in this present case, at all events, timely information is not supplied to the authorities here. Both the people of India, and the Government of India, have very frequently addressed the authorities here and kept them fully informed of the situation as it develops from day to day. In the communication which has been circulated to the Conference by the Government of India, they have made it perfectly clear that, amongst the malcontents in that country at the present moment a movement of separation has begun to show itself—that people are asking this, whether it is to their lasting interest to remain in this Empire. This unfortunate feeling, newly emerged, is being stimulated by a set of people, amongst whom I will take the liberty of mentioning the name of Mr. Andrews. Mr. Andrews is a well known missionary. He has got the peculiar gift, I must say, of entering into the skins of other people. He understands Indians, their inmost feelings, their instinctive wishes; he has travelled into every part of this Empire where Indians are resident; he has counselled them, he has encouraged them, he has befriended them. Quite recently, probably under the influence of Mr. Gandhi, he has come to the conclusion that it is the belief in the topmost circles of statesmen and politicians throughout this Empire, with the real wish and desire, however it may be camouflaged, that it is desired to keep this Empire purely for the white man, that they will not find room in it for the coloured races of the world, except on a footing of complete political and economic subordination, that they have not yet assimilated the notions of equality, of brotherhood, and of humanity, and that there is no place, therefore, which India can honourably fill within the Empire, and that their utmost and immediate efforts should be directed to effect a separation from this Empire. I am somewhat concerned to think that this movement is gaining ground. I do not say that the situation is past hope, or past remedy, and I am making this clear and frank statement to you, supported by the Government of India in that Memorandum, of which copies have been circulated to you. I am making this frank statement in order that you may place in the hands of the friends of the Empire in India the means of countering this dangerous and disruptive movement. That is my mission. I have imposed upon myself as may have been seen, a vow of silence in other matters until this question, so vital to India, is disposed of satisfactorily. I would beg of you to give me leave to read what Lord Reading has stated quite recently. He has not stated it in this connection, but almost within a few days of his arrival in India; this state of feeling has been borne in upon him, and in one of his early utterances he has considered it necessary to state openly, and without reservation, this doctrine of the perfect equality of the Indian and the European. He was, however, of opinion—he assured Indians—that the British people did not indulge in any notions of racial superiority or predominance. He was, however, striving to put this principle of equality upon a firm basis, and in this connection he declared: "There could not and must never be humiliation under British rule of any Indian, because he was an Indian. The British people, both in India and in Great Britain, must realise that there was much suspicion and misunderstanding to banish, and must convince Indians by their own actions that they really meant what they said regarding India." Now, Lord Reading has found it absolutely necessary to assuage the feelings of considerable sections of Indians by making an unequivocal declaration of that character. If we are to avoid, betimes, the growth of this anti-Empire feeling in India, I would ask this Conference most earnestly to take into consideration the proposal which the Government of India in making through us. I have not the right—not possessing the necessary experience or the personal weight—I have not got the right to advise this Conference from a superior platform, but as a student and as a citizen, and as one admitted to a seat at this table, let me point out the great danger of allowing a situation of great risk to develop under our own eyes.

Example of Ireland.

You have Ireland, you have Egypt to warn you. Very many people, both in England and in India, believe that a big Ireland must be made and created in that vast continent, and at a great distance from the seat of Empire. These mischief-makers must be thwarted and foiled, and that can only be done by taking steps betimes to remove these grievances which they are able by their skill to manipulate for their own sinister purposes. And because I am convinced that this is a real genuine grievance felt not only by these mischief-makers, but by all true well-wishers of India, I urge the consideration of the resolution that I have got here. But I am not without realising the enormous difficulties by which this question is beset. I may say this at once, that I realise the difficulties of South African statesmen. They have got to deal with a population largely as dogged in the assertion of what they believe to be their rights, as the kind of people of whom I have been speaking with some warmth and disapprobation. Their electors do not understand still the full meaning of Empire. Empire to them is the right to live as they please and not to let others live as they please. They have not risen above this crude conception of British citizenship. That must be recognised. Time, therefore, must be allowed for the education of these electors, and we are quite willing to allow that necessary time. Our resolution, however, asks for the assertion and the acceptance by this Conference of a vital principle. It is surrounded by difficulties, but if there are difficulties, difficulties exist to be met and overcome, not to be run away from, not to be dreaded. I was present quite recently at a debate in the House when the question of Ministers without Portfolio was discussed. I heard one sentence from the Prime Minister's lips which I well recall—"This House whatever the risks must do right." If it is true of the House of Commons it is much more true of this Tribunal of the Empire, which exists to make difficulties less, not greater, which exists to remove grievances before they become incurable sores, which exists to improve matters everywhere, even to those communities whom fortune has not hitherto favoured. Do we ask for the impossible? I am convinced that the resolution which we are putting forward to-day, with the concurrence of the Government of India, is reasonable, is moderate, and allows full scope for the necessary delay and process of development. Let me read this resolution at once:—

Present feeling in South Africa.

Recommends Resolution establishing position of domiciled Indians.

> "This Conference, while reaffirming the Resolution of the Conference of 1918 that each community of the British Commonwealth should enjoy complete control of the composition of its own population by means of restriction of immigration from any of the other communities, recognises that there is an incongruity between the position of India as an equal member of the British Empire and the existence of disabilities upon British Indians lawfully domiciled in some parts of the Empire. This Conference accordingly recommends, as a matter of the most urgent importance, in the interests of the solidarity of the British Commonwealth, the adoption of a policy of removing any disabilities under which such Indians are placed, and making them good citizens of their country of domicile by merging them in the general body of citizens in whatever part of the Empire they may be lawfully domiciled."

This Conference is asked merely to recommend the adoption of a policy. We cannot legislate. We can recommend to the Dominions the adoption of a policy. But it may be asked—"What is the use of this recommendation? Does not every Dominion, do not the Statesmen in every Dominion, already know this elementary and basic fact of the moral basis of Empire? Need we make a solemn recommendation on this subject?" I wish it were superfluous. It seems to me that in such complicated affairs it is often necessary to proclaim an ideal. A great writer on your constitution has said that the only value he could find of a declaration of rights is the moral stimulus it offers to the subjects, to the Government. Subjects are told what they may claim and legislators are admonished of their limitations. If we accept this principle and lay it down, although it may be a very elementary principle, we tell the Dominions which violate it to-day that they are in error, that they must set their house in order, that they must, at the earliest opportunity, begin the process of conforming to this principle. That is the value that India attaches to this declaration. We have been often told in the course of these discussions that India must exercise a little patience. I must say frankly, Prime Minister, and I say this from the bottom of my heart, that it does not lie in the mouth of any portion of this British Empire to say to India that she must exercise patience.

Status of Indians in the Empire.

Patience has been her strong unmistakable characteristic from the beginning. She has borne, she has suffered, she has bled, but she has always only pleaded for justice, for redress. To-day when I came here, my rôle is not that of an impatient critic of the Administration, my rôle is still that of the patient man, who says, "I have borne so long, let me know that you are thinking of the remedy, that you are not making the situation worse for me, but that you have resolutely made up your minds that these grievances shall be no more. Establish your bona fides." I am sorry to say that even that elementary, that first fact in the situation, the bona fides of one Dominion, have still to be established. Face forward, that is all that I ask. Begin the process. It is late; I fear, it is very late; but I hope it is not too late.

Now, if the resolution that we propose has the good fortune to meet with your acceptance, we know that that is not the end of the matter. We realise fully that before that resolution can at all be carried out in South Africa, a good deal of popular education will have to be undertaken. India, for her part, will also do what she can to help this process of popular education. She realises, having night and day to dwell with this sore problem, she realises that it can only be done in course of time. She realises that the misunderstanding proceeds largely from mutual ignorance, that if more enlightened South Africans and more enlightened Indians could come together and understand one another, a great part of this rooted distrust would quickly disappear, and, in order to bring about that state of mutual knowledge, we are quite willing on our part—in fact, we have a proposal on foot on that behalf—to visit these Dominions in turn, three or four amongst us, and help Ministers who have undertaken this solemn duty of educating their electors. We will go, and provided they give us reasonable facilities, we will talk to the leading statesmen and politicians. We will talk, if it so pleases them, to public meetings and to the citizens at large. Similarly, I have authority from the Government of India and from the Secretary of State to convey to the Dominion statesmen an invitation that they should, in their turn, visit our large towns, and in as strong a force as they please, go and see how we live and what sort of people we are, how we have now come into the temple of representative institutions with a sure and steadfast footing. Let them see us, and we shall see them, and in that way we establish the beginning of an understanding which is sure to lead to sympathetic and honourable treatment of all these questions which, at present, lead to mutual recrimination.

Recommends Interchange of Visits between leading men of Dominions and India.

Only one word before I close. The existence of a subject of this nature, but so vital to the future of India, and, if I may venture to add, so vital to the Empire also, the existence on our programme of a subject of this kind is known to India. They watch my movements in that country with the most intense solicitude. What happens to this resolution, therefore, is a matter of profound consequence to our best interests. Let me be enabled, therefore, by your good offices, to go and tell my countrymen that there are still hopes for us within this British Empire, in this Empire where we wish to live in confraternity with other peoples, that there is room and honourable room for us. The mischievous propaganda of the Separatists must be conquered, and if this Conference breaks up without giving me that encouragement, without offering me something solid and substantial which I can hold out to the people as a message of hope from this Conference, then, to use a common phrase, the game is nearly up. We can do nothing thereafter. This is the critical time. Do not let, if I may venture to say it again, do not let the situation develop into sinister proportions before your very eyes. Be strong to do justice, do not let your strength be employed in the preservation of inequalities and injustices undermining the Empire. I put this resolution formally before the Conference.

The necessity of giving some definite pronouncement to India on Status of Indians as result of Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: Well, Mr. Sastri has put before us a very powerful and very eloquent speech in support of his resolution and he certainly has made a strong case for consideration. As he will recognise, this is a matter the Dominions must decide for themselves. We have no right of interference, we have no right of recommendation, we have only the right of communication in this matter. It is a question entirely for their decision. There is one self-governing Dominion which Mr. Sastri does not refer to where there are no disqualifications, and that is the United Kingdom. Here we have not disqualification of any sort or kind. Each country and each Dominion has its own problem; but I think it will be felt that this is a case which deserves consideration, affecting as it does India, representing so many millions of very loyal subjects of the Throne, who have given such guarantees of their loyalty in the greatest trial the Empire has been put to. I will therefore at this stage simply suggest, unless somebody wants to make a statement, that if we begin discussion now, I think we should have to continue it; therefore, there is only one alternative, either to delegate it at this stage to a Committee to consider, or proceed with the discussion. I have suggested the former course, that Mr. Sastri and the Indian Delegation should meet the representatives of the Dominions concerned, and Mr. Churchill would be there to represent the Crown Colonies, which are also concerned in this matter.

Recommends question be delegated to a Committee.

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is one course; the other is that we should discuss it here.

Mr. Hughes: What has this Committee to do, Sir?

Mr. Lloyd George: To consider the resolution put by Mr. Sastri, and discuss it with him, and report to the Conference.

Mr. Hughes: Has not Mr. Sastri laid down a broad general principle that has to be accepted or rejected, subject possibly to modifications after due consideration of all those difficulties which Mr. Sastri himself has admitted exist? But I can hardly think, Sir, that a Committee could help us. I understand, of course, that there are practical difficulties, and these must be dealt with by each Dominion, as Mr. Sastri has said, if this principle is accepted.

Mr. Lloyd George: I am just trying to save the time of the Conference. If we had unlimited time, it would be very useful to continue the discussion here, but we are working against time as it is.

General Smuts: Under those circumstances, I would suggest, Mr. Prime Minister, that your idea be followed, and that we do not take up the time of the Conference, which is occupied with much other work, but that we pass this matter on for discussion at a Committee such as is proposed by you.

Mr. Sastri: Which would report to the Conference?

Mr. Lloyd George: Very well. Then they had better meet under the chairmanship of Mr. Churchill at the Colonial Office.

Mr. Hughes: Will discussion come on afterwards?

Mr. Churchill: That may be so.

Supports Mr. Sastri.

The Maharao of Cutch: This is a question on which I feel quite as strongly as my friend Mr. Sastri. I should have liked to have made a statement on my own behalf as representing the interests of Indian States in support of Mr. Sastri's statement, but I think that as a Committee is to be appointed, and probably the question is to come up again before this Conference, with your permission I should like to reserve my statement for a future occasion. I may add that this is the one question in which—of all the questions before the Conference, momentous as they are—India is, I feel, most closely concerned. I feel that I should be wanting in my duty if I were not to place my views before the Conference, but it is better that I should not detain the Conference by another long statement; yet at the same time I should like to reserve my right to make a statement later on.

Mr. Lloyd George: Very well. The Colonial Secretary will convene a Conference on the subject, and the Indian Delegation will either in whole or in part be present, and such Dominions as are directly concerned in the matter.

Mr. Churchill: I think it is only General Smuts . . . .

Mr. Hughes: It is quite understood that we shall have an opportunity later of discussing it.

Mr. Lloyd George: That depends on the Committee.

Mr. Hughes: With all submission, I do not quite follow that. I cannot see how it depends on the Committee. We understand the position quite well.

Mr. Lloyd George: I am assuming that you will be there, Mr. Hughes. I think, Mr. Sastri, you wanted the Australian and New Zealand Premiers to be present?

The Maharao of Cutch: It is a question that affects them all.

Mr. Lloyd George: It affects Canada as well.

Mr. Churchill: If that is really going to happen, it means that the morning or afternoon that that takes place we should not have a meeting of this Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: I do not see how you could. General Smuts would be absent in any case.

Mr. Montagu: I am only anxious to get forward with the Conference in the best way.

League of Nations.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think we can now go on with the League of Nations, if Mr. Balfour will make his statement.

Always supported a League of Nations.

Mr. Balfour: I have always been a League of Nations man, long before the League of Nations came into existence, and an experience now extending over one or two years has strengthened my conviction that the League of Nations is necessary, and it has also, I am sorry to say, strengthened my fears that it is an institution in many respects difficult to work. Perhaps I might begin by explaining where I think the special difficulties lie, before I explain where I think experience has shown that the need for it exists, is increasing, and is not likely to diminish.

Difficulties in way of League of Nations.

It is true that some of the difficulties are only temporary difficulties. The statesmen who at Paris framed the League of Nations had in their view undoubtedly that the Treaty of Versailles, and the subordinate Treaties that came into existence after the Armistice in consequence of the victory of the Allied Associated Powers, would rapidly and effectually settle the boundaries of the nations, redistribute territories in accordance with suggestions and in accordance with the various populations, and all that remained to the League of Nations, therefore, would be to see that rights clearly established were carried out, that war between those reconstituted areas should never be allowed to take place without, at all events, serious efforts being made to prevent it, that the catastrophe of 1914 should never be repeated in anything like the same form, and that in addition to that, there should be a machinery for protecting minorities in certain cases and for carrying out certain international arrangements of benefit to all the nations concerned.

Everybody knows that these hopes have not been indeed completely disappointed, but are in part not fulfilled. Even now the Treaty of Versailles is not an accomplished Treaty. Even that Treaty has not been carried out, and one of the most important points of that Treaty was settling the boundaries of Poland. The boundaries of Poland remain unsettled, and Poland is one of our great standing difficulties. Another of the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles dealt with the question of Silesia, and everything that leaves the centre of Europe in a perturbed and unsettled condition really leaves the League of Nations with a problem before it which was not contemplated by those who framed the Covenant under which the League of Nations works. I hope, however, that that can be settled and got over. Another thing that was perhaps not fully contemplated by the framers of the Covenant was the state of disturbance which does not really so much depend upon the way frontiers are drawn as upon the populations in the areas. For instance, at the last Assembly one of the problems brought before the League was the problem of Armenia, a problem which is very near the heart of the statesmen who met in Paris in 1918—a question in which America has always professed to be deeply interested. It is a question in regard to which it is practically impossible for the League of Nations to do anything effectual except to ask the Great Powers, if they have it within their competence, to do what they can to bring it to a proper conclusion. Then there remains, as we all know, the tremendous lapse in the ideas of the Covenant, that three of the greatest nations of the world are still outside it, and of these three two are not, so far as we can see at the moment, very likely to come inside it in the near future. America unfortunately allowed the whole question to be caught up in the wheels and cogs of party conflict, and all common sense appears to be torn to pieces in the process. So much so, that America does not only not belong to the League, but they think it so accursed a thing that they will not answer the League's letters, which is carrying opposition to rather an extreme excess.

America.

Russia and Germany.

Then there is Russia. I assume that Germany will with no very great delay become one of us, unless she thinks it worth while to remain out because America is out, but Germany, if left to herself, will come in, I feel sure. But Russia will only come in if her present position is ameliorated. She wants to come in, but she is a helpless, dangerous derelict mass on the eastern flank of the whole series of small States, the politics of every one of which stand disturbed by the proximity of this great unregulated Empire—every one of which feels that when Russia is restored, the result may be that their own future is compromised; a most disturbing state of things, one which we never anticipated at the time when the Pact was framed, and one the full consequences of which are still upon us, and to which, so far as I am aware, no solution is yet attained, or is in the way of being attained.

We must wait. I suppose, until the present régime of Russia comes to a natural and inglorious end, and then see whether some permanent and satisfactory system can arise by which the fragments of the late Russian Empire, which are in no sense Russia, which in no sense desire to be Russia, whose population belongs to a different race, who profess a different religion and speak a different language, but yet lie on the fringe of Russia and separate her, geographically seem to separate her, from the ocean, until their fate and their relations with the new Empire, with the new and restored Empire, can be satisfactorily arranged. That is a tremendous problem, and I do not see how the League of Nations can settle it alone, though perhaps they may do something to assist the Powers in carrying out the duty. Those are great difficulties, but there are some technical difficulties which I might perhaps mention, smaller difficulties which I might mention, and which I think should be present to those who want to see the kind of difficulty with which the League has got to contend.

Difficult for Responsible Ministers to attend League.

The first of these is distance, and the effect which distance has, great geographical spaces have, upon properly manning the Council of the Assembly. And it is not merely distances, it is the work which falls upon statesmen in these days, even if distance does not interfere. If you had an ideal League of Nations, the people who ought to attend it and carry on the business of it are the Prime Ministers and the Foreign Secretaries, but it is quite impossible that they should do it. It would be quite impossible for the far distant communities, such as Australia or Japan, to do it, from sheer distance. But it is quite impossible for Great Britain to do it. The Prime Minister, I hope, will be able, at some date, perhaps, to take part in the Assembly, but that he and the Foreign Secretary should do the work of the League is really, I believe—having watched the thing rather carefully—impossible. The French have found it impossible. One or two of the Central States sent an important Minister, the Central European States, but their work is less, and I doubt whether even they would be able to do it as a regular practice.

Mr. Massey: The Balkan States?

Mr. Balfour: Let me think—which of the Balkan States. No; they have not sent the Prime Minister or the Foreign Secretary. Venizelos came once, and Benes, who is Foreign Minister of Czechoslovakia, and is a very valuable and important member of the League. That is a very great difficulty, because the thing can only be run by tact, by avoiding too clear distinctions. After all, the people who take a leading part in the League are the Representatives of France and the Representatives of Britain. It is so, has been so, and, I hope, it will long continue to be so. Whom do they send? Mr. Fisher and myself have hitherto been the Representatives of Great Britain in the main—I think Lord Curzon did it once when it was in London—but in the main the work has been done by Mr. Fisher and myself. We are members of the Cabinet. Being members of the Cabinet we know the general trend of opinion in our colleagues' minds on these questions, and while, of course, we should never think of taking a resolution or committing our country in any way upon a great new issue, we do allow ourselves, have to allow ourselves, a certain amount of initiative. If you want to deal effectively with the work of the Council, it must be done. You cannot always be referring by telegram, and people at home are hardly in a position to know exactly how the discussion around the table is going on, how harmony is to be arrived at, how the work is to be done. It has been done, so far, very successfully. We have always been unanimous—I think we may, broadly say that Great Britain has usually got her way—at all events we have had our full weight in the Assembly. But observe what a difficult system that is to work. The other members of the Council, other than France and Spain, usually depend upon an Ambassador. The Spaniard there has been the Spanish Ambassador in Paris, the Japanese has been the Japanese Ambassador in Paris, the Italian has varied, but has usually, I think, been a member of the Italian Government, but they have not made any such great and important decisions as have fallen to France and Great Britain. That is the difficulty, and it cannot completely be got over.

Financial Difficulties.

Another difficulty which I see is the money. We made an attempt—a heroic attempt—to get money voluntarily subscribed to relieve what was almost an international danger, the spread of typhus from the great Russian centre of infection over Poland, over the other nations coterminous with Russia, into the more western parts of Europe. We made it more than once. We failed We got a certain amount of money; Canada was most generous in her subscription, Great Britain did her duty, France more or less, but on the whole, the League did not produce any large amount of money, and all those who watched the response made to our appeals have, I think, come to the conclusion that that is a form of League activity which, in existing circumstances and in the existing temper of the world, perhaps in the existing financial condition of the world, it is quite useless to repeat, and I should never be responsible again for making any appeal of that kind.

League of Nations.

Another difficulty is that directly an effort is required of the League you inevitably make every Representative of the League, say: "Well, what will my Parliament say to the share of effort which it is called upon to make?" Then they go on to say: "Will my Parliament think it has a direct advantage in the effort which it is called upon to make?" And we all know Parliamentary duty well enough to be aware that even if the sum of money is not great, and even if the object is clearly beneficial, any Member of the Opposition may get up and say: "This is a worthy object; we have nothing to say against it, but it is wholly alien to the interests of this country, my constituents care nothing for it, they will in no sense benefit by it, and I do not think the effort should be made."

Of course, if that kind of argument is carried to excess, the League of Nations fails. Some effort—it need not be a very important one—some effort is required if common action is to be taken on any occasion which involves some slight sacrifice of the immediate interests of the communities making it. That is a danger. We cannot deny it. No danger, of course, arises from such incidents as the action of Argentina. As far as my information goes—I do not know whether the Foreign Office have had information—but the sort of information I collected when I was at Geneva with regard to the defection of Argentina, was that it was a purely internal affair, that for some reason the President of the Republic had views about the League of Nations and he thought it would help him or his party if he took the action which he did take. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. Massey: Has Argentina formally withdrawn?

Mr. Balfour: It has not formally withdraw, and that, I think, really puts an emphasis on the particular kind of danger to which I refer. Unless the action of America produces a catastrophe I do not believe the League will perish from this or that Nation getting up and formally saying: "I do not approve of the League's proceedings. My Government wash their hands of it. We now hereby formally give the two years' notice required for leaving it." That is not what will happen. What will happen is that some representative of the League will get up and say: "This is very futile and my Government has told me I need not stay any longer or take any further part in it." He will then withdraw from the Assembly, the country will cease to pay its subscriptions and a sort of rot will set in. Without any formal declaration of abstention from the League, members of the League will practically cease to be members of it; it will fall into desuetude; they will take no part in the deliberations of the League and will not subscribe to its efforts. The full difficulties will only occur if the occasion should arise, for example, when some serious effort had to be made to stop a war, some effort, for example, involving blockade. I do not myself see how a blockade is to be carried out until we make an arrangement with America. A blockade in which America did not take a part, and to which America would probably say: "We do not recognise it"—it is clear that if the League of Nations is breaking off all commercial and financial communication with the criminal party, it is clear that even that will lose much of its efficacy if a country like America remains out. The American lender will gain instead of other lenders; the American exporter will gain instead of other exporters, and the Nations of the League undoubtedly are imperilled, and greatly imperilled, by the absence of America from our Councils. Russia does not matter to anything like the same extent—perhaps not at all from this point of view; America is particularly important.

Danger of League falling into desuetude.

Well, that is a very gloomy picture I have drawn. I have shown you there are great difficulties. I do not at all despair of getting over them, but I think it would be folly, as we are talking among ourselves, it would be folly to minimise the magnitude of the problems which lie before us. Then you will perhaps say, if the thing is so difficult, why not abandon the attempt. It was a well-meant attempt. It does credit to all who were involved in it, but unfortunately the world is not ripe for this great work. I should regard that as one of the most calamitous disasters which has ever happened to the world. We had a chance after this war, and we still have a chance of establishing this arrangement, this international arrangement which will and ought to perform incalculable services to mankind which cannot be adequately performed merely by the old diplomatic methods. I know there has been a great deal of nonsensical attack made upon that method. The world, or some uninstructed fraction of the world, says diplomacy has made for war. I do not think at any time in its history has it made for war. It has been very ineffective in keeping the peace, but it is the nations that make for war. It is the diplomatic representatives of the nations who have done anything that has been done in the way of preserving peace. It is quite inadequate for many of the purposes for which the League exists, and I should regard really with horror the termination of our labours, and those labours, believe me, have not been unfruitful. I am really provoked when people say, well, what has the League done, and I am provoked for this reason, that the League has only been in existence since the 10th January, 1920. Since the 10th January, 1920, it has had to organise itself, to create its machinery, to carry out an infinite number of difficult tasks of internal policy, and it has had to work, as I have already explained to my colleagues, it has had to work in a world in no sense prepared for it, and in no sense corresponding to the ideal which existed in the minds of those who brought the League into existence. In spite of that, in spite of the disadvantages which might really have condemned the efforts of the Council of the League to barrenness, I think a careful observation of what it has done shows it has done a great deal already and is capable of doing a great deal more. Consider what it has done, for example, in the matter of quarrels between nations. Take a small case first, one that came under my own personal observation and which it so happened I had to deal with individually. It was a quarrel between the poor remains of the Austrian Empire, between Vienna and Austria on the one side and with Poland on the other, over a rather difficult question connected with the great immigration of Jews into Vienna during the war and their expulsion from Vienna after the peace. What happened was this. There were great areas of the Austrian Empire, of the then Austrian Empire, from which the Jews fled when those areas were over-run by the Russians or Germans in the course of the war. They went to Vienna for safety; they crowded in. They left the outlying parts of Austria and went to the centre. The outlying parts of Austria ceased to be Austrian after the peace and the Viennese began to say, well, these Jews must go back. They must go back to their old homes and areas. As long as they were Austrian subjects they had a certain right in the Austrian capital, but they have no right now, seeing that these outlying districts are no longer under Austria. There was a difficulty and a row. The Poles and the Austrians came before the Council. The matter was dealt with by the Council. It was dealt with in a friendly spirit, and I believe that no diplomatist could have done what the Council did, because the vanity of the two, the pride of the two, was not at all touched by the advice given by the representatives of the whole League of Nations, whereas dictation from England or France or dictation from anybody else would certainly have been resented. That, perhaps you will say, is a small point, but a much bigger point, unfortunately not yet settled, is the question of Poland and Lithuania. That is an immense problem on which I need not trouble my colleagues at the present moment at all beyond making these observations. We have prevented what otherwise would have occurred except for us, we have so far prevented recourse to arms between the two populations. We stopped a war that actually was going on, and we have prevented its renewal, and at this moment both parties have consented to meet under the presidency of M. Hymans to discuss a scheme of arrangement between the two which, if adopted, might be expected to produce harmony, where at present hopeless disorder appears to prevail. I ought to say that such has been the behaviour of the Poles and such is the temper of the Lithuanians, that it is impossible for anybody to be sanguine of the results of the negotiations now going on, but the fact that they are going on, and the fact that they are going on under the League of Nations, is, I think, evidence that we have already shown ourselves of value in stopping international conflicts, in diminishing international misunderstandings, and it may be in promoting permanent international arrangements. Another case, known to all of you by name, has without doubt prevented a war and, I think, without doubt has made a permanent settlement possible, and that is the Aaland Islands. That was taken in hand by the League; they sent up a Commission.

Progress of League.

Austria and Poland.

Lithuania and Poland.

Aaland Islands.

The Commission elaborately examined all the facts on the spot; they made an elaborate report to the Council. The result was the Council have come to a decision; that decision, though very unpalatable to one of the parties, has really been accepted by both; and, what I think is more important, the Council of the League have been able to give advice to the successful litigant, which was Finland, advising them to modify their laws in regard to the Swedish population which remains with them under the decision, the Swedish population of the Aland islands, which will greatly mitigate the objection which the Aland islands felt at still being kept within the limit of the Finnish territory; and we have it on clear evidence that it was really the persuasion of the League, because it was the League of Nations, and not one of the Great Powers, that induced the Finns to do what they would otherwise have refused to do, which is to modify their own internal laws at the suggestion of an external authority. Had that external authority been one of the Great Powers, had it been anything other than, in fact, the League of Nations, we have every reason to believe that the Finns would have said, this is our territory, we are really governing it well, mind your own business. I think that is a success in which we have justified ourselves, and which could not have been obtained by any other machinery, the machinery which is now in existence. Then there are all sorts of international questions, which I do not believe could properly have been dealt with conveniently except by the League of Nations. Whether the system of mandates is good or not, the system of mandates depends upon the League of Nations. If you abolish the League of Nations, I think you will have to abolish mandates. Some people think that an advantage. Perhaps from some points of view it might be an advantage, but given that mandates are part of the system that the world desires to see applied in regard to German conquered territory, there can be no doubt that the League of Nations or something like it is absolutely necessary. It is only they who can wisely appoint a Committee to watch how mandates are carried out; it is only they who, on the report of that Committee, can pronounce as to whether they have been carried out. You could not entrust that power to a Committee of Great Nations. The jealousy would be intolerable; the friction would be beyond the power of man to deal with. Therefore, for good or for evil, I consider that mandates are bound up inextricably with the fate of the League of Nations. I do not want to bore my colleagues by going into details, but I would like to add this. We had a great Conference at Barcelona on waterways. Canada was not able to send a representative there; Canadian interests were not touched. Broadly speaking, all Europe was represented, and, I think, South America, and I believe that all-important international question of waterways and transit, much more important, of course, in Europe, which is broken up into small States separated by ancient quarrels—it is more important there than in the new world, still it does perhaps touch the new world—has been considered as it could not have been in any other way.

Mandates.

Conference on Waterways.

Take finance. The League of Nations appointed a Financial Committee at Brussels. The Financial Committee at Brussels made recommendations to the League of Nations which were pursued by the League and which are now being put into operation. They touch the very vital centre of our present discontents. Maybe it is slow in operation; I daresay it is not very effectual, but it is far more effectual than anything anybody could have contrived without the League of Nations, and the efforts now being made to put Austria upon her legs, to start the revival of credit in Central Europe, will, if they succeed, as I think they will to some extent be almost sure to succeed, be a contribution to the rehabilitation of the economic condition of Europe which really cannot be exaggerated; and I do not doubt that there will be other matters of general economic interest with which the League will be able to deal.

Financial Committee at Brussels.

Then with regard to the International Court of Justice, I do not know what my colleagues of the Conference think of the advantage of an International Court. I think it invaluable; but whether it is invaluable or whether it is not, it is the creation of the League and could never have come into existence without the League. Europe has tried over and over again to do it, and has always failed. We have now succeeded, and the International Court is in a fair way of being constituted and turned into a working machine.

International Court of Justice.

Now let me say one word upon a thing which everybody will admit can only be done by a League of Nations, so far as I can see, namely, the government of certain territories which it is contrary to the public interest should be confided to the undivided authority of any Great Power. I will mention two in particular. One is Danzig, the other is the Saar Valley. In the case of Danzig, I think the League has done absolutely invaluable work. Its business was to see that the Constitution framed by Danzig could be maintained. We came to the conclusion that we could not be asked to guarantee a Constitution which, in our opinion, had elements in it which rendered it hopelessly unjust and unworkable. The Danzigers sent us a Constitution in which practically the whole authority of the town was vested in a narrow oligarchy elected for eleven years, and from which all popular democratic authority was excluded. We told them that they really must reconsider that. They have reconsidered it, the whole matter is in process of reform, and I believe we shall get a Constitution in that city which will work, which we shall be able to guarantee, and which will preserve Danzig, which is ambiguously placed between Poland on the one side and Germany on the other, which economically depends upon Poland, upon which Poland economically depends, which is Polish from every point of view except population, but which in population is German. It was a most embarrassing problem which had to be dealt with, as the Prime Minister remembers. It was a problem which embarrassed us tremendously in 1919, which was solved by handing over Danzig to the League of Nations, and I think the League of Nations is showing that it is capable of carrying out the trust with which it has been invested. And who else could you find to carry it out if the League of Nations ceased to exist? I do not believe there is any possibility of finding an alternative. What I say of Danzig I could say, mutatis mutandis, with regard to the Saar Valley. The Saar Valley also presented a most difficult and ambiguous problem. It was found necessary, rightly or wrongly, in the course of the negotiations which we carried on, and which we carried on with our Allies the French, to satisfy them with regard to the Saar Valley. I do not say we have satisfied them. They would have liked to have taken the Saar Valley, which in point of population is purely German, and to have annexed it to France, with all its mineral resources. That seemed to the rest of the Conference in Paris to be a very high-handed proceeding, much too like Alsace and Lorraine to be justified, and the actual compromise ultimately adopted was to put the Saar Valley for fifteen years under the League of Nations, thereafter allowing it to determine its own fate by a plebiscite—evidently a compromise very difficult to carry out and involving the possibility of much unfairness, much hardship, much favouritism, and many of the evils inseparable from a form of government so anonymous. I believe, on the whole, that that is working well. It is largely working well, may I say, because Canada was good enough to send us a most admirable man to help us upon the Commission. I only know Mr. Waugh very little indeed; he was good enough to come and talk to me about the Saar Valley, but there can be no doubt whatever that he and the Frenchman, who also did very good work, are really working the Saar Valley as well as we could hope it should work. The French are going to withdraw all black troops, I believe: there are still some there, but they will be greatly diminished, I hope. If they carry out the advice of their own man they will diminish greatly their own garrison. There will be no labour troubles, the whole machinery of government seems to be working smoothly, and, on the whole, as far as I am able to judge from the reports, the government of the Saar Valley is really a triumph for the system which has been adopted, a system the success of which I think any prophet, looking at the matter in a strictly impartial spirit, would have greatly doubted. That the French have never done anything which the Germans have a right to complain of is perhaps saying too much, but, on the whole, that part of the country is orderly, is contented, is industrious, and has none of the troubles one might have expected to have arisen. On the whole, that is due to the labours of the Commission, and the two men on the Commission who have done it are the Frenchman and the Canadian, and indirectly, I suppose, the League of Nations, which is the ultimate responsible authority, may take some credit for the result.

Saar Valley.

Empire's interest in the League.

I have very little more to say. I think this Empire has a very special interest in retaining the League, and the reason I say so is this. I want to point out that the League is really a most important instrument of diplomacy from the British point of view. What is the British point of view with regard to Continental politics? The Empire, far removed as much of it is from Europe, is deeply interested in Continental affairs. It cannot help being interested. We, of course, are still more interested. The British policy on the Continent has for centuries been instinctively of one type; so far as the Continent is concerned, it is to keep the peace and to see that no nation gets a dominating influence within the European area. No doubt our many wars have had great results outside Europe in the way of acquisition of territory and all the things that we know about; but, so far as Europe is concerned, what we have always wanted is peace and what used to be called the "balance of power," but what, perhaps, we had better call the absence of any super-State, of any dominating Power. That is the policy of the League of Nations, and while the League of Nations is not strong enough by itself to carry it out, I hope it will be strong enough to carry it out without exciting the jealousies which any British action necessarily involves. Take the case of Poland. Now there have been troubles in Poland on the north and on the south. There are troubles in Poland in connection with the Lithuanian question, to which I have already adverted. There have been troubles in Poland in connection with the Silesian question. In connection with Silesia, it is inevitable that there should be a collision, as there has been a collision, between French diplomacy and British diplomacy. That is the great trouble which the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have to deal with. When they go to these Conferences, England is up against France, France is up against England, with infinite evils to both communities. Those jealousies will be largely avoided if the matter is conducted through the machinery of the League of Nations. Then it is not England and France which are involved, not the British Empire, not the British Empire on the one hand and France on the other; it is the forty-eight States belonging to the League of Nations in the background and the eight States which are represented on the Council in the first line, and the result is, as you know, you get a harmony which it is almost impossible to get by the ordinary diplomatic machinery. Mr. Fisher will tell you—he was the President—Mr. Fisher actually got the French to admit that the Poles are hopelessly unreasonable in their whole treatment of this Lithuanian subject.

Mr. Fisher: I got the French to join me.

Mr. Balfour: Yes, he got the French actually to join in that declaration.

Mr. Lloyd George: This time?

Mr. Balfour: It is, indeed, one of the triumphs that he got. It is very difficult to do that when it is a Prime Minister versus a Prime Minister as between England and France. It has been a criticism against the League of Nations that it is not a measure of justice as it is working; the French, for example, could stop every beneficent action or every action that we wanted to carry out—what I call the British view of Continental policy. Well, they could; one Power could stop it, but observe at what cost they would stop it. They would have all the other members of the League against them; all the other members of the Council against them, and if it became knowledge to the world there would be a public debate. The French would give their case—I mention the French, because whatever Power it is they would give their case in public, and the other seven members of the Council, or a fraction of then, would give their case in public, and the whole world would judge between the two. Again, it would not be a sharp collision between nations; it would be a collision between policies considered from an international point of view and debated in public. I admit you very often camouflage it. I do not mean that this method is one that is going to deal with every situation, but they could not stand the public criticism to which a formal debate before the whole world would subject them and their Government. That really is all I have got to say. I am perfectly certain that the League will do what no other machinery can do. I am not certain that the difficulties with which the League are surrounded may not prove to be overwhelming, but I am confident if they do prove overwhelming and if the experiment fails, it will be one of the greatest disasters which can happen to civilisation. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Lloyd George: It has been a most interesting and illuminating statement. I think we had better discuss it this afternoon, and I should very much like to invite an expression of opinion from the representatives of the Dominions as to whether any practical steps could be taken to get the United States of America to associate itself, not with the League in its present form, but with an Association of Nations. At the present moment it is a sort of three-legged chair; you cannot sit on it with comfort or certainly with confidence, as you never know when it will drop you. You have, I think, to get America into it. I should like to consider whether anything could be done with a view to bringing America in. There is a great sentiment there, I am told, in favour of such an Association, and even Mr. Harding, who is a great opponent of the League, admitted there was a sentiment and that he thought America would come in under certain conditions, but not to this Covenant. I should like to invite an expression of opinion upon this subject. Will 3·30 P.M. suit everybody?

Mr. Balfour: I am sorry, but I have to speak at a meeting at 3 o'clock. I dare say I could get here a little after 4, if you do not mind.

Mr. Lloyd George: Very well, 4 o'clock here this afternoon this debate will take place.

(The Conference then adjourned until 4 P.M.)

Note.—A revised copy of Mr. Balfour's statement, as issued to the press, is attached (see Appendix).

2. Whitehall Gardens, July 8, 1921.

APPENDIX.

Revised Copy of Mr. Balfour's Statement on the League of Nations as issued to the Press.

Mr. Balfour: I have always been a League of Nations man, long before the League of Nations came into existence, and an experience now extending over one or two years has not only strengthened my conviction that the League of Nations is necessary, but also, I am sorry to say, my fears that it is an institution in many respects difficult to work.

Perhaps I might begin by explaining where I think the special difficulties lie, before I go on to show how much the League has already done, and how hard it would be to create any other authority to take its place. It is true that some of our difficulties are only temporary. The statesmen who at Paris framed the Covenant of the League undoubtedly assumed that the Treaty of Versailles would rapidly and effectually settle the new frontiers, redistribute territories in accordance with the wishes of the populations concerned, leaving to the League of Nations the relatively simple duty of maintaining rights clearly established, and prevent national differences developing into national wars.

Everybody knows that these hopes have not, as yet, been completely fulfilled. The Treaty of Sèvres is still in dispute, and even the Treaty of Versailles has not been fully carried out. One of the most important objects, for example, of the latter was the determination of the boundaries of Poland. But the boundaries of Poland remain still unsettled. Another problem was the status of Galicia. But the status of Galicia is still unsettled. Now everything that leaves Middle Europe in a perturbed condition really requires the League of Nations to deal with a situation never contemplated by those who framed the Covenant under which the League has to do its work.

Another thing that was perhaps not fully considered by the framers of the Covenant was the difficulty of dealing with semi-civilised populations in territories not under mandate. For instance, at the last Assembly one of the problems that excited most interest was the problem of Armenia. The Assembly was deeply moved but quite helpless. Nothing effectual was done, nothing effectual could be done. The League could only make appeals in favour of a population which it was quite powerless to protect.

Perhaps, however, the most serious difference between the League as it was planned and the League as it exists arises out of the absence from its ranks of three of the greatest nations of the world, two of which are not, so far as we can see at the moment, very likely to join it in the near future—I mean America and Russia.

I hope that Germany will at no very distant date become a member. But Russia will only come in when she had ceased to be what for the moment she is. And whether the Soviet Government endures or perishes, she is likely for some time to come to be a disturbing influence in the east of Europe, which it will be difficult for the League of Nations to guide and control.

Appendix.

These embarrassments are in their nature temporary; but there are others—due to the constitution of the League itself. There is the difficulty, for example, of manning the Council and the Assembly. This is partly the effect of the immense distances which separate many members of the League from our meeting place in Geneva, but partly also it is due to the fact that the statesmen best qualified by their position to deal with League problems, namely, the Prime Ministers and the Foreign Secretaries of the various nations, cannot possibly make a regular practice of attending its meetings. In the case of Great Britain, the work of the Council, and in part the work of the Assembly, has been hitherto done by Mr. Fisher and myself, although Lord Curzon was able to take the chair at one Council which happened to meet in London. We are Cabinet Ministers, and are acquainted with the general views of our colleagues: we can therefore, without inconvenience, exercise a certain measure of independent discretion without in every case referring to our Governments for instructions. This renders discussion more fruitful, and business more rapid than otherwise would be possible; but it is not every member of the League who is in a position to send Cabinet Ministers to Geneva as a matter of course.

Another difficulty which presents itself in our attempts to use the full machinery of the League is due to money. We made an attempt in 1920 to obtain funds by voluntary subscription from members of the League, in order to deal with typhus in Poland and the east of Europe. Typhus was at that time, and I fear still is, not merely a great misfortune to the countries bordering upon Russia, the great centre of the infection, but a menace also to nations lying further to the west. Poland was, according to our information, making every effort to deal with this danger; the Council came to the conclusion that she should be supported, and we therefore issued an appeal for funds to the members of the League. The appeal was on the whole a failure, a failure partly due no doubt to the financial difficulties which beset the whole world, partly to the fact that most members of the League were remote from the peril with which we were endeavouring to deal. In some cases very liberal subscriptions were offered, but on the whole it was clear that at least in existing circumstances such appeals were not likely to succeed.

It is indeed evident that under the Parliamentary system the expenditure of the League will always present an easy object of attack. The gain to the world of international co-operation is immense, but it cannot be allocated with any definiteness between the co-operating nations. It is always, therefore, easy for a Parliamentary critic to ask what advantage his particular nation derives from the expenditure which it is called upon to make, and in these days of universal poverty such questions fall upon sympathetic ears.

If this very natural frame of mind is permitted to dominate policy, manifestly, the League will perish. Some common sacrifice, however slight, is required if any common effort is to be successful. I believe this danger is not negligible, though I am sanguine enough to think that it will be successfully surmounted.

So far I have dwelt upon the obstacles which thwart and may even imperil the success of this great experiment. Let me now say a few words upon some of the reasons which require all men of goodwill to do their best to make it a success; and here I can appeal not merely to speculative theory, but to actual experience. The League has been in existence since the 10th January, 1920, say about a year and a half. In that time it has had to create its machinery, to organise its methods, and to devise means for pursuing what is without doubt a new adventure in the history of mankind. One would have thought that these facts alone would modify the sternest critic, and that no one would be so unreasonable as to expect in the first eighteen months, during which this infant institution has been in existence, the full authority and efficiency which only time can bring. But even these eighteen months are sufficient, in my opinion, to show to any impartial observer how valuable the League of Nations can be, and how impotent any other organisation would be to fill its place.

I am the last person to deride what is commonly called "The Old Diplomacy." The Old Diplomacy has for many generations done much in the cause of peace, and those who see in it merely a costly method of embittering international relations and snatching national advantages, completely misread the lessons of history. But there are assuredly many things which the League of Nations has even now shown that it can do, which diplomacy could scarcely attempt, and which it certainly could not attempt with success.

Let us consider them under three heads. The first of these is common international effort for objects which all admit to be good, but which are the special business of no nation in particular. For example, there are abuses which have to be stopped, the traffic in opium, the illegitimate traffic in arms, the traffic in women and children. With all these objects there has been attempts to deal before the League came into existence. They have not always been satisfactory, sometimes they have been wholly ineffectual. I cannot doubt that a far greater measure of success will attend the organised effort of the nations of the world, acting through the League organism, than by any machinery which diplomacy could possibly set up. If again we turn from abuses, which have to be stopped, to objects which it is desirable to promote, we learn the same lesson. Consider, for example, the International Court of Justice. The establishment of such a Court has long been the desire of statesmen; many efforts have been made to create it; but these efforts have invariably failed, and we may surely congratulate ourselves on the fact that the International Court is now in process of creation through the efforts of the League.

Again, the great Conference which met at Barcelona, under the auspices of the League, to consider the question of international transit by railways, rivers and other waterways, obviously dealt with an international problem of the first magnitude. It was the creation of the League, and without the League could hardly have come into being.

But consider another and yet more pressing subject—the economic condition of Europe and of the world. We have obtained peace, but we have not yet obtained the fruits of peace. The decay of credit, and the paralysis of production, imperil the whole industrial system of the civilised world. I do not suggest that for so great an evil the League of Nations could provide any sufficient remedy; but some contribution it has been able to make to the solution of these difficulties, a contribution which, however modest, could, so far as I can see, have been made by no other method. A Financial Conference was summoned by the League at Brussels in the course of last year. The Conference made some suggestions of great value. These we are endeavouring to apply, particularly in the case of Austria: and any measure of success which we can obtain will have beneficial effects, not only in Austria itself, but throughout the whole industrial world. Every part of that world is more or less organically connected with every other part; and what is required now is that this economic organism, paralysed and wellnigh destroyed by war, should resume once more its vigorous activities.

But there is another and wholly different set of functions thrown upon the League by the Treaty of Versailles, functions which cannot be carried out at all by any single Power, nor carried out effectually so far as I can see except by the League itself. I refer to the government of certain exceptional areas which are not the less important, from an international point of view, because they happen to be small. I refer to the town of Danzig and the Valley of the Saar.

The town of Danzig is economically inseparable from Poland, but in population is predominantly German. The war divided it politically from Germany, while the Treaty of Peace recognised its intimate relations with Poland. At the same time its independent existence as a separate and autonomous community under the protection of the League was fully secured. The League is responsible for maintaining its Constitution, though not for framing it. But the Council felt that it could not undertake to maintain it without satisfying itself that it was just and workable. In its view the Constitution, as originally designed, was neither just nor workable. But through the efforts of the Council fundamental changes are in process of accomplishment, which will, I trust, secure the good government of the city, and promote the most amicable relations with the Polish hinterland.

The other area in connection with which the League is specially responsible is the Saar Valley. The Saar Valley is an industrial area, mostly German in population, lying on the French frontier, and intimately connected with adjacent French territories. By the Treaty of Peace it is, for fifteen years, to be governed by a Council appointed by the League and reporting to it, after which, by means of a plebiscite, it is to determine its own destiny. As far as I am able to judge, the very difficult problem which such an area presents is being dealt with in a fashion at least as satisfactory as we have any right to expect. On the whole, the valley is orderly, industrious and contented. Much of this success is due, no doubt, to the self-devoted work of the Commission, of which Mr. Waugh, a Canadian Scot, is not the least distinguished member, but the Commission is responsible to the League, and without the League I fail to see how the system could be worked. Other duties touching questions of administration are thrown upon the League in connection with mandates. I will not argue whether the system of mandates is a good one or a bad one. On this point opinions differ, but the system is there. It is prescribed by the Treaty of Versailles, and it represents the deliberate policy of the Allied and Associated Powers in dealing with what were once German territories outside Europe. An essential part of that system is that the procedure of the Mandatory Powers in connection with mandated territories should be subject to some kind of international survey. This work has been entrusted to the League of Nations, and I believe that only the League of Nations can perform it. But at present no forecast can be made as to the way in which this system will work. Appendix.

The last heading under which I will consider our activities is perhaps the most important of all. It deals more immediately than any of the others with those international differences which it is the main business of the League to heal. We are sometimes asked what the League has done to promote goodwill among the nations. I am anxious not to overstate the case, but it seems to me that during the eighteen months of its existence our record is far from being barren. I begin with a case which, if the League of Nations had not been in existence, could hardly have ended satisfactorily, though it involved no questions of territory. It seems that during the war large numbers of Jews from the northern portions of what was then the Empire of Austria took refuge in Vienna. After the peace the Austrian Government desired to compel their return to their original homes, now no longer in Austrian territory. The Poles objected. A bitter controversy ensued, and the subject came before the Council of the League of Nations. After a good deal of discussion an arrangement was come to acceptable to both parties, and not unfavourable to the Jewish population concerned.

There is a much larger question which the Council of the League are endeavouring to settle, and unfortunately final success has not yet crowned their efforts. I refer to the group of problems arising out of the relations between Poland and Lithuania. The subject is far too complicated to be dealt with here, but it may be proper to say that, in consequence of an appeal to the League, hostilities between these two countries were stopped, and a scheme determining their future relations is now being discussed in Brussels by the parties principally concerned under the able guidance of M. Hymans, the Belgian representative on the Council, who is acting on behalf of the League. Whether these efforts will end in an arrangement both amicable and permanent it would be premature to say, but I am confident that even the modest measure of success already attained would have been beyond the powers of any body possessing less authority than the League of Nations.

About the dispute between Sweden on the one side and Finland on the other concerning the Aaland Islands, I can speak with more confidence, and in this case a controversy involving the most complicated questions of international law and ethics has been finally settled. The Aaland Islands are Swedish by population; historically and juridically they form part of Finland. The whole subject was investigated on the spot by an International Commission appointed by the League, which, like some other of its Commissions, enjoyed the advantage of having on it an American representative. Their elaborate report was unanimous. They decided that the Aaland Islands belonged to Finland, but they used their good offices to secure the largest possible measure of autonomy for the Swedish population affected by their decision. We have evidence that this concession, voluntarily granted by the Government of Finland, would never have been obtained at the instance of any external Power other than a League of which Finland, in common with most civilised Powers, was itself a member. It would be difficult to find a clearer instance of the manner in which, under favourable circumstances, the League may contribute to the cause of International Peace.

Two further observations I will permit myself before concluding: the first is that, if the League were to dissolve, a new Peace Treaty would have to be framed, and new machinery would have to be devised for carrying out the duties with which the League has been entrusted.

The second observation is especially addressed to the British critics of the League. They must be well aware that for many generations the main anxiety of British statesmen in their Continental policy has been to preserve the peace, and to prevent the domination of any particular Power over its weaker neighbours. Those two aims have not always been compatible, and the first has had more than once to be abandoned in order to obtain the second. They were not compatible, for example, in 1914, but if the League of Nations reaches its full strength and stature, if it be supported by the great moral forces of the world, peace and national independence will be secured without resort to arms. If in the future there should again arise a Power greedy of domination, it will find itself confronted, not merely by defensive alliances between a few interested States, but by the organised forces of the civilised world. If that hope is to be accomplished, it can be only by a League of Nations; and when I consider the services already rendered, or in course of being rendered, to the cause of international co-operation by the League, mutilated though it be by the absence from its membership of some who might have been among its most powerful supporters, I cannot doubt that few calamities would be greater than the abandonment of the great experiment to which we have set our hand. Should that calamity occur, it is not in the lifetime of this generation that a serious effort will again be made to substitute the rule of justice in international affairs for that of force; and the horrors of five years of war will have been endured in vain.

Suggested Pacific Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: Well, Mr. Meighen.

Mr. Hughes: Before you begin to-day's discussion there is a matter I wish to bring under notice. This morning, Mr. Prime Minister, I received a Foreign Office despatch containing a report of the interviews and conversations held between Lord Curzon and the Japanese Ambassador, the Chinese Minister, and a copy of a cable from Earl Curzon to Sir Auckland Geddes. I only want to draw your attention, and the attention of the Conference, to some extracts which I think should be considered. On page 2 the paragraph begins:—

Interviews between Lord Curzon and Japanese and Chinese Ambassadors and Cable to Sir A. Geddes.

"In these circumstances, the plan had commended itself to the Imperial Conference now sitting in Downing Street that advantage should be taken of the interval which was now secured to us to hold a Conference on the Pacific question between all the Powers principally concerned with a view to arriving at an agreed solution. Our idea was to propose to the American Government the summoning at an early date of an International Conference, to be held possibly on American soil or somewhere in the neighbourhood, at which should be represented the Governments of America, Japan, Great Britain, China and the British Dominions who were directly concerned."

There are two other references I propose to attract your attention to, one of them being on page 7 of the second part of the cable from Lord Curzon to Sir Auckland Geddes; it is the first complete paragraph on the page, beginning:—

"Accordingly, with this hopeful information at my disposal, I made to the Ambassador the formal suggestion that his Government should invite the Conference to meet in the forthcoming autumn or winter, and I promised him our assistance in endeavouring to make it a success. Mr. Harvey, in reply, at once began to discuss the question of those who should be invited. He was reluctant to extend the number of these, and he hoped that it might not be necessary to include the South American States. He also raised a question as to the necessity of inviting France or Holland,"

Then the fourth paragraph, page 7:—

"As regards the place and time of meeting, the Ambassador, who throughout treated the assent of his Government as assured, recommended as the most suitable meeting-point the island of Cuba. There, at Havana, there were ample hotels, and the climate in October and the latter part of the year was delightful. The site was very central between the old and the new worlds, and the negotiations could take place in a favourable atmosphere."

Now, I want to protest against the manner in which these conversations have been carried out. Lord Curzon says, in the first paragraph of page 2:—

"In these circumstances, the plan had commended itself to the Imperial Conference now sitting in Downing Street that advantage should be taken of the interval which was now secured to us to hold a Conference on the Pacific question . . . ."

Mr. Massey: Who says that?

Mr. Hughes: Lord Curzon. In my opinion, that, as set out, is entirely inaccurate and not in accordance with facts. Lord Curzon was, without prejudice, to obtain the opinion of the Japanese Ambassador, the American Ambassador and the Chinese Minister in regard to the question, and to ascertain on what terms, if any, their Governments would favour the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. But Lord Curzon has stated in this Report that the very thing we were discussing—the point on which there was such a conflict of opinion—has been already decided and had commended itself to the Imperial Conference. I object to that. It makes it impossible for us to continue a discussion on this very point.

Mr. Lloyd George: Opposed to a Conference in the Pacific?

Mr. Hughes: I say, unless we have a policy in the event of the Conference failing to come to an agreement.

Mr. Lloyd George: I never heard you. It never occurred to me. I am amazed at my own lack of comprehension. I was certainly under the impression that we were all agreed that it was desirable to utilise this interval to effect some arrangement with Japan, the United States, China and ourselves, so that there could be complete views on the Pacific.

Suggested Pacific Conference.

Mr. Massey: That is all right.

(Lord Curzon joined the meeting at this stage.)

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Hughes takes exception to something you have said; he says he never agreed . . . .

Mr. Hughes: What I said was that I did not take exception at all to the Conference provided one point was settled—that in the event of failure to reach agreement it was our intention to renew the Treaty.

Mr. Massey: I agree with that point myself.

Mr. Hughes: The whole point . . . .

Mr. Lloyd George: Here you are. This is the decision:—

Decision of previous Meeting on Consultation with other Governments.

1. "The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will notify the Japanese Government that the position is changed and that the British Government are advised that no notification to denounce the Treaty has been given."

That has been done; consequently the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of the 13th July, 1911, remains in operation.

2. "The British Government will inform the League of Nations that we are dealing with the whole Eastern and Pacific question in a larger spirit; that any new arrangement will be in harmony with the Covenant (that is being done); and that in the meanwhile we are prepared to state that wherever the Covenant is in conflict with the Treaty the Covenant prevails."

That is about to be done.

Lord Curzon: It is being done.

Mr. Lloyd George:

3. "The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will approach the representatives in London of the United States of America, China and Japan in order to find out whether the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, as modified by paragraph 2, being still in existence, they will enter into a Conference on the matter.

4. "The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will report to the present meeting later on.

5. "The British Government will not notify its intention to denounce until a settlement has been arrived at by the new Conference or a new Treaty has been drawn up by common agreement to replace the present one."

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs seems to have carried out in the letter and in the spirit the instructions unanimously agreed to by the Conference. He has approached the Ambassadors of the United States, China and Japan in order to find out, the Treaty being still in existence, whether we will enter into a Conference on the whole question.

Mr. Hughes: I have no objection to the Conference so long as it is agreed to renew the Alliance.

Mr. Massey: There is just one point, however—the reference to the Conference being held on American soil. I do not remember anything about that.

Lord Curzon: That was the suggestion of Mr. Harvey. I said if the Conference is summoned by America, what are your ideas about it? And he said he thought that Havana would be a very good place. I expressed no preference for any locality.

Time and place of suggested Conference.

Mr. Hughes: I did not say you did. I thought Mr. Massey made it clear, and I certainly did, that we could not attend any Conference in the fall—which we call our summer—we could not possibly attend another Conference here this year. We could not go to Cuba or even to San Francisco. If the Conference were held in the Pacific, we might get over the difficulty by meeting next year.

Suggested Pacific Conference.

Lord Curzon: No definite suggestion has been made to that effect. I have reported, as I believe, with absolute fidelity, what the Ambassador said. There was nothing to prevent the Ambassador, when discussing the idea of a Conference, saying: "Well, I suppose we shall have to discuss where it shall meet, and Cuba would be a good place."

Mr. Hughes: In October this year, you said.

Lord Curzon: Pardon me, I did not say in October this year; that is what Mr. Harvey said to me.

Mr. Hughes: I am quoting from your words: "Accordingly, with this helpful information at my disposal, I made to the Ambassador the formal suggestion that his Government should invite the Conference to meet in the forthcoming autumn or winter."

Lord Curzon: Precisely, and the forthcoming autumn begins in the month of October, and the forthcoming winter ends in March, and that is what I had in view. The forthcoming winter ends in March; according to our computation it does.

Mr. Hughes: Not in Cuba, surely not?

Mr. Lloyd George: I do not think Lord Curzon has departed from the instructions that have been given by this Conference. I think he has most faithfully carried them out.

Mr. Hughes: I will not press the matter any more now, but I will look at what was said and if it was as you say, then there was no difference of opinion between any of us.

Mr. Lloyd George: There was no difference of opinion about the Conference, none, as to the holding of the Conference.

Mr. Hughes: Unless and until . . . .

Mr. Massey: We are agreed on that. Mr. Hughes is right, neither he nor I can attend this year, that is quite certain.

Mr. Lloyd George: When are you leaving?

Mr. Massey: Not before the middle of next month. That is, leaving here.

Mr. Lloyd George: It might be held in the Pacific. Of course, we will discuss later on as to the time and place. We must try to secure a place that is convenient to everybody. Now, Mr. Meighen.

Mr. Meighen: I think what has been done most faithfully carries out the instructions of the Conference. At the time, I protested and said I wanted somewhat different circumstances. I wanted a new and modified Treaty for a year and that was not accepted, the majority prevailed, and its instructions have been carried out faithfully.

Mr. Massey: That is to say that the Treaty stands?

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, and on that basis Lord Curzon was to negotiate a Conference in the Pacific.

League of Nations.

Mr. Meighen: I refer now to Mr. Balfour's statement of this morning on the subject of the League of Nations. My first suggestion is this, that this most useful and, I think, very timely and necessary statement of the work of the League, as well as its difficulties and disappointments, should be made public to the fullest possible extent. There will have to be one or two excisions, but with these excisions it would be useful now to have the utmost publicity given to this statement. There is a disposition to criticise not only the work, but the prospects now of the League of Nations. It is an all too prevalent practice, and the review which we have listened to this morning from Mr. Balfour, if widely understood, will have a wholesome effect. Our concrete purpose, I think, is to see if some suggestion can be made and agreed upon, that will bring about a remedying of the one major handicap under which the League labours to-day. It labours under more than one, it is true, but by far the greatest is the withdrawal, or rather the refusal to enter, by the United States of America. I am not hopeful that I can make any practical suggestion looking to definite action in this regard. I think Mr. Balfour appreciates as much as I do what forces have operated to keep out the United States. It is true, as he says, that the whole subject became involved in the turmoil of a political contest in that country. With that turmoil still proceeding, there is no hope of successful action for a while. But there are other considerations to keep in mind. Firstly this, the United States—there was this important body of sentiment there—were earnestly and conscientiously actuated to move only where they could usefully do so, that is with good results to themselves or to the world, and not to interfere in the settlement of European disputes. I think many of the best people of that country shared a doubt as to the usefulness of their taking part in European politics, and because they shared it, they did not throw themselves unanimously against the interposition of party politics into the question. If they had, they might possibly have resisted the course pursued by a large section of their press. They felt they were not in a position to render useful service in the settlement of these matters. They realised that it had been traditionally difficult for Great Britain and European countries generally to understand the New World, and they feared that they suffered under similar disabilities in trying to deal with the problems of the Old. There was what we all appreciate, the century-long reluctance on the part of the United States of America to leave the Western hemisphere, and that feeling proved to be just about as strong in the year 1920 as in the year 1800. It took hold of the popular mind, and the old instinct reasserted itself. They shrank from going away from the American Continent and meddling with affairs outside. It will take some time to alter those elements of policy. It is not going to be done as soon as perhaps many here expect. The President of the United States, in order to engage the goodwill of many who have firm belief in the ultimate usefulness of some League of Nations, but who object to the present League on one ground or another, has announced that he would like to see some association formed without the disabilities that they see in the present League of Nations, the principal disability in their minds being connected with article 10. In the Presidential contest that was a great bone of contention. It was preached on every platform, as leading them into vague and unlimited responsibilities, and those who took the adverse side against article 10 had much the better success in the contest. Their President has affirmed that he and his Government would like to associate themselves, at some unspecified time, with an Association of Nations which would have the same object, as far as I know, as the present League, but which would be constituted with a better Charter. If I were the head of this Government here, I think I would be disposed to wait until he came forward with a suggestion as to what he really meant.

League of Nations.

America's Refusal to enter League.

Preference of President for some other form of Association of Nations.

Mr. Lloyd George: Do you think he is likely to do that, Mr. Meighen? That is the point.

Mr. Meighen: I do not think he is for some little time. I think we shall have to wait for that. I feel sure that in any event another President will, but that is four years from now. It cannot be in less than that time, except in the event of the President's death. Those people of the United States upon whose influence in the Republic depend good relations between Great Britain and that country are very largely the people who are in favour of the League. That is, I venture to think, more true, perhaps, than the people of these islands realise. They are very stoutly in favour of the League of Nations, and their hearts are bent on securing the objects outlined by Mr. Balfour this morning. What I say applies to the ranks that support the President of to-day. They are the larger fraction of the class of people I have described. Of that there is no doubt. There is no room for argument on that score, and the sympathy of that section of American public opinion President Harding must have, or he cannot survive. He must have it. I do not say he cannot retain it, and do very little in the way of practical action towards going into the League of Nations. I do not pretend to give any opinion on that point. I think the progress of time will compel him to hold behind him just this body of American sentiment. In my opinion the more this country does further to solidify the confidence in the fair intentions of Great Britain that now exists among these people, the more helpful it will be; the more we do that the more we hasten the day that they will put themselves as a nation within the League.

League of Nations.

Mr. Lloyd George: Do you mind developing what you mean by that?

Mr. Meighen: I mean, for example, the step foreshadowed in the conversations the Foreign Secretary has had with the American Ambassador. If in the progress of these negotiations and the proceedings of the proposed Conference they are compelled to have the fullest confidence in the fair intentions of Great Britain, and the desire of Great Britain to keep them on an equality in connection with this Eastern question, that will add to the numbers of those who will press their Administration into the League or into some similar association. An opportunity may occur later when an advance may be made on the part of the British Government, but for the British Government to step out itself and walk towards the President now would probably have the result of his retiring, and the territory between would be just as great as before. I think it would be better to wait until an opportunity presents itself. That may occur, or it may not, but if it does not, then simply by so treating in other matters with the United States as to put it out of their power to criticise justly—by that course of conduct, in my judgment, the hands of the Administration will be forced. I believe that the patience under which this country has stood the utterly incomprehensible—to me certainly indefensible—attitude of the Hearst and kindred press in that country has had the effect of producing a reaction against those influences, and the coldness of America is not as marked now as it was six months ago.

Canadian position.

Now, before I cease I will say a word as to the position in Canada. I have no manner of doubt whatever that it would be with nothing less than a shock to the Dominion that news would be received of any disposition on the part of this Empire to abandon its part in the League of Nations. The Dominion of Canada still looks for the exhaustion of every resource to procure by concert with the United States the purposes of the League, the predominant one of which I take to be the minimising of the danger of war, and the reduction of armaments. The Dominion will scrutinise very carefully the bona fides of this and every country in the efforts it puts forth to reach that goal. If it feels that there has been any failure at all to make advances looking to a reduction of armaments all round, looking to the reducing to the minimum of the peril of war, then it will be impossible to bring a Canadian Parliament to the point of sharing in an adequate naval defence or general defence programme of the Empire. The people of Canada want to be thoroughly convinced—the conviction must sink into the people—that there has been nothing left undone in the way of establishing firmly and working efficiently the League of Nations. They must feel that everything has been done in that way, and in every other way, to bring about reduction of armaments. Until they are so convinced, then he has a difficult task indeed who seeks to gain the co-operation of Canada in any programme. That is an essential condition, whoever the Prime Minister or the Government may be, if there is to be a chance of succeeding. The people must be convinced that these efforts have been made. Consequently, there is no disposition there yet to feel that the League should be abandoned, and I speak within the bounds of correctness when I say that on our part we do not intend that the Dominion will be charged with leaving the League.

Mr. Hughes: I have nothing to say at this stage.

Public criticism of League due to ignorance.

General Smuts: I wish to join with Mr. Meighen in expressing my appreciation of the statement which was made by Mr. Balfour this morning. It certainly was most encouraging and heartening. I think there is a feeling of public disappointment with the League; the public generally feel that the League has not responded to the high anticipation of its performance, the high hopes that were entertained of its work, and there is no doubt that that disappointment is profound and widespread. But it is largely due to ignorance; it is not known what work in detail the League has done, that is, the Council and the Assembly, especially the Council, and I think it is one of the legitimate grounds of criticism against the Council that it has not seen sufficiently to the publicity side of its work. All this valuable work, for instance, that Mr. Balfour described this morning, as done in connection with the Saar Basin—I knew nothing about it; I always looked upon the arrangements about the Saar Basin as one of the most risky parts of the Peace Treaty, and I was much encouraged to hear this morning that under the auspices of the League and this Commission which is controlling the Saar Basin, the government of that territory is proceeding along these normal and favourable lines. And so in many other particulars, I am sure it is a genuine criticism against the League, and especially against the Council, that there is not sufficient publicity.

League of Nations.

A great deal of publicity has been given to the meetings of the Assembly; that is all to the good, but I do not think sufficient has been done in respect of the Council meetings. I also wish to say this, Prime Minister, that I appreciate very much the good work that Mr. Balfour has done as a representative of the Empire on the Council. There is no doubt that he has acted as a representative, not only of Great Britain, but of the Empire as a whole on the Council, in a way which I feel reflects honour and credit upon all of us. Now, I have this feeling about the League in regard to the larger question that has been raised. I have this feeling that the British Empire is pledged in honour to stand by the League. The League is our work, there is no doubt about it; the League was hammered out by British representatives in conjunction with America. If ever there is anything in the Peace Treaty which is a product of what I may call Anglo-Saxon ideas, it is the League of Nations, and I think we are pledged in honour to defend it, to defend our own work, and to give it every chance possible. It has fallen on evil days, it is a child which has been born in an evil time; the world is not fit for democracy nor is the world fit for the League, but it is only part of the great disillusion and disappointment that has come over the world. That is no reason why we should become disheartened. We should be all the stronger, all the more determined to pull whatever may be pulled out of the wreck and try to make a success of the League. It has not done so much; it is very young; the atmosphere is very unfavourable, but it is quite possible that the volume of public opinion may keep growing behind it in the years to come, and in the end it may acquire a very great moral authority in civilisation; I think it is the real hope of the world, that the League may acquire such moral authority, may have such a backing of public opinion behind it, that the Governments of the whole of the world, great and small, will listen to the judgment of its Council and its Assembly. I think it is our work very largely; we must back it up. America has fallen out temporarily, but there I am also encouraged by what Mr. Meighen says. It has unfortunately become a party question in America. Wilson mismanaged this question grievously, with the result that it became a party question where it never should have been a party question. The League of Nations idea was really the idea of the Republican Party; the associations that started the thing in America were largely composed of Republicans, but through the political mismanagement of this question it so happened that it was the Republican Party that kept the League out of America. But that may only be temporary, and I think that we should continue to give it all our support, all our strength, and help it on as much as possible.

Empire pledged to defend League.

Suggestion to help League.

The Prime Minister asks what we could do, what steps we could take, what active steps we could take to help the League. I would make these suggestions. In the first place, I think the time has come when we should make a real effort to get Germany in. I know the difficulty has been very largely French opinion, but I am very much afraid that if Germany stays out very much longer she may not desire to come in at all, that new channels may be worn for her ideas, and that she may not desire to join at all. Germany is going to be a great factor, a mighty factor, again in the future of Europe, and the sooner we can get her into the League I think the better.

Germany to join League.

A great change has now come through the settlement of the Reparation question, and I think that the time should be ripe, I hope that the time is ripe, and I hope that the British Empire will be able to use all its influence to get Germany in as soon as possible, because it may otherwise be too late. I know it will be difficult on all points to co-operate with Germany, but, of course, we have these difficulties all round. It is more the risks and dangers of the future that I am looking to, and from that point of view I would have Germany taken into the League as soon as possible. With regard to America, it is possible that we may have to take a different line. The League is not merely an organisation, it is also a great idea, a great system of ideas, on which we are working, and I think if we succeed in getting America into something like a Pacific Conference such as is contemplated, that we shall have gone a long distance in getting America into line with the ideas which underlie the League.

America.

Mr. Meighen: Hear, hear!

General Smuts: I would not bother so much about the formal aspect of the matter, but try and pull America into the League itself. If she says for the present she will not come in, let that rest; for the present she will not come in, but America is willing to join what she vaguely terms an Association of the Nations. She is not opposed to the conception itself; she is only opposed to what has been done in Paris, and under those circumstances, I think we should make further efforts to get America into other similar things which are of the character of the League and are intended to fulfil the functions of the League. To my mind there cannot be anything more important that the establishment of some Pacific concert, a system of conferences, to deal with the Pacific question in future, in which America takes her part. If she does that, she will be practically doing the work of the League on a smaller scale in a smaller circle, but doing it in a very essential sphere, and I think in that way we shall be preparing the way for her entry into the greater circle later on.

League of Nations.

This is the second suggestion I would make, that we should not try to force America into the League, but should try to get her into other Associations of a similar character, and the Pacific Conference idea seems to me the most fruitful line that we could develop at present.

More Support by Governments of British Empire.

My third suggestion is this. I do not want to utter a word of criticism—I have no reason to do it—but I do feel that we, as Governments, should back the League more strongly. I am not sure that we are not also helping to leave the League, as it were, derelict as an organisation, which is left to go its haphazard way. If our Governments, and especially the British Government, were to back the League more actively, I think that would do a great deal.

Mr. Lloyd George : How?

General Smuts: It is difficult, Prime Minister. I do not want to criticise . . . .

Mr. Lloyd George : If you give suggestions . . . .

General Smuts : I am not sure that some of the questions which we take to the Supreme Council could not be left to the Council of the League.

Mr. Lloyd George: You are getting to the very heart of the thing. This is a real question. Would you mind giving us the sort of question to be settled by the League of Nations which is now disposed of by the Supreme Council? That is a practical question.

Merging of Supreme Council in League of Nations.

General Smuts: My original idea of the League at Paris was this: that insensibly the Supreme Council would go over into the Council of the League, that a time would come, not when you would have two parallel institutions working side by side—a sort of holy alliance on the one side and the League on the other—but insensibly, as we got away from Paris, the one Council would more and more merge into the other, and that the presence of the great leaders, Prime Minister and Foreign Ministers, which was essential in the one Council, would be felt in the other Council too. Unfortunately, there is very little of that so far. So far, the two institutions are continuing on absolutely parallel lines, the Supreme Council doing one set of work, trying to wind up the Peace Treaty, trying to settle all the various questions in the Peace Treaty, and next door you have the Council of the League dealing with another set of problems. It is a question well worthy of consideration, whether we are not approaching the time when these two bodies might not usefully be merged and the Council of the League therefore become a more important body, and acquire greater authority and influence than it has at present. It is a general criticism that I am making. I am not going into detail, because there may be practical difficulties in detail. I agree with what Mr. Balfour has said, that the League is in line with the fundamental ideas of the British Empire, and the methods of the League will also largely foster and further the things which the Empire is carrying out and has at heart. I feel profoundly, that the mission for which the Empire stands in the world is a mission which can be furthered on a larger scale by the League itself, and that from that ideal point of view, too, the League is an institution which is well worthy of our support.

The alternative system of ideas on which we have been working in the past has proved impossible and the Empire system, which is largely also the League system, is the only basis upon which we can continue into the future. I agree with Mr. Meighen, that our peoples want to be given a chance. If they are asked to vote money for armaments; if they are asked to vote money for fleets and armies, they will ask us, in the first instance, have you exhausted every means in your power to make use of the League? They will force that question on us; they will want an assurance, and they will want to be absolutely certain on this point, that every effort has been made to make use of the machinery of the League before they vote money for armaments on a large scale. From all points of view, I think, even if the League were only an experiment—and I think it is much more than an experiment—but even if it were only an experiment—we are pledged to it in honour and we should support and assist it in every way we can. League of Nations.

Mr. Massey: To commence with I may say that I was exceedingly pleased with the address we had from Mr. Balfour, though I was not surprised to learn that difficulties were being experienced in the operations of the League. The difficulties are not greater than I, for one, expected, because I realised it would be some time, many years, perhaps, before the League of Nations would be able to influence the nations of the earth in the way its promoters and friends expected. I must say that to a certain extent I have been disappointed with the League; I say so candidly; I have been very disappointed with the League and very disappointed with the sayings and doings of its supporters. The one thing that prejudiced me against the League and one that will take some time to get over, was the attempt that was being made to show that the League of Nations had to a certain extent taken the place of the Empire Government; that the Dominions had become, by their representatives signing the Covenant of the League, independent, free to do exactly as they liked, either in peace or in war. That if the Empire got into difficulties, each one would choose for itself whether it was to join and assist the Empire or whether it should make an arrangement for itself with some other country. These ideas were scattered broadcast in every English-speaking country, and I expect everybody here at this Conference knows it as well as I do, and I said at the time and say it now, that if that sort of thing was to go on, I would recommend New Zealand to withdraw. If I had to choose between the League of Nations and the British Commonwealth of Nations, I would stick to the British Commonwealth of Nations every time. I started out a good friend of the League and I want to remain one, but I am bound to say my friendship has been chilled to a great degree by what has taken place. Now there was one point mentioned I think by all those who have spoken, that is that every possible attempt should be made to keep the League of Nations from being a party question. It became a party question in America, and it is killed as far as America is concerned. There is no possibility of the American people taking it up at present, although what the next Administration will do nobody can predict, but in the meantime it is dead in the United States of America, and if my information is correct, it has to a certain extent been used as a party question in the House of Commons. If the League of Nations is going to do any good, it must be kept above party in every country which is a member of the League, in Britain, in America, though it is almost useless to speak of America at present. The chief argument in America against the League was in regard to the Monroe doctrine. I am not at all certain that there was not a provision in the League which was intended specially to prevent it in any way interfering with the Monroe doctrine, and I think it would have that effect.

Effect of League on Status of Dominions.

League should not enter into Party Politics.

Mr. Balfour: There is that agreement and it is proposed to extend it by new amendments.

Mr. Massey: If I were an American I would be an ardent supporter of the Monroe doctrine. I am not at all certain that America is as well off to-day as it would have been if it had stuck more closely to the Monroe doctrine. If it had stuck to the Monroe doctrine it would not have annexed the Philippines and there would not have been this trouble with Japan. However, it is done, and although it may affect us seriously in the years to come, we cannot interfere at present. Then another weak point has been touched on to-day and that is the great cost of the League. I do not really know what it is costing us. It would be quite impossible to tell at the moment what it is costing my country, but I know it is costing a large sum and the representative of New Zealand at the last meeting of the League of Nations adversely criticised the enormous cost, and I think it is costing a great deal more than the nation should be called upon to pay at present. I know these things cannot be run without money, and a lot of money at that; but there is always a tendency to extravagance where men are allowed to fix their own salaries and their own travelling expenses and that sort of thing, and I do think something should be done to keep the expenditure within reasonable limits, at all events during this time of financial stringency through which we are passing. None of us care to ask Parliament to vote large sums of money unless we can really point to the fact that the country is getting some return for it, and I would be better able to submit a proposal for the money required for the League of Nations after having heard the speech of Mr. Balfour to-day. I am bound to say that, and on that account I am glad to have the information he conveyed. There is one point and a very good point which must be admitted in connection with the League of Nations: that is the setting up of an International Court. I think something of the sort was urgently required. Personally I feel we ought to acknowledge that good work has been done in years past by The Hague Conference. I think it did perfectly good work, and if the League could take up the same work and improve on it, it will be worth its place in the world. Do not let us forget that the Empire to which we belong is to-day the strongest factor for peace in the world. I do not think there is any doubt about it, that the Empire will never go to war again for the purpose of increasing its territory or for aggrandisement or looking for indemnities and reparation, though indemnities and reparation are two different things. One would never go to war for those; but this is one of the dangers, and I am afraid of it, that we, the British people, sick and tired as we are of the very name of war after the awful experience we have had during the last six or seven years, may go to the other extreme and may rely on the League of Nations to prevent war when the League of Nations is not able to do it. It will become very useful, I go to the length of admitting it has been useful already, but I do not believe for one moment it will ever prevent war between certain of the Great Powers who are not members of the League of Nations to-day; they may be members, but I do not think the League will be able to prevent war in the case of trouble between any of these Great Powers. If the League of Nations is going to enforce the principles it lays down, it must have force, it must have armaments behind it. I do not suggest for a moment that it should be in a position to provide armies and navies. I know that is impossible, each country must do that for itself, but in case of trouble there must be sufficient force behind the League of Nations to take up a strong position, and I do not see any prospect of that for a very long time to come. We shall come back later on to consider what shall be done to defend the Pacific in the future, and I cannot forget that the very nations who are supposed to be exceedingly anxious for peace, are the nations who are forcing the pace in the way of building ships, and providing munitions of war. I am not going into that at present, but intelligent and sensible men must see what is going on and they must draw their own conclusions. I have said over and over again and I say it now, I am prepared to support at any time a combination between America and Britain with a view to dictating peace along with another powerful nation—France for instance, France is the one that occurs to me—to join in a combination which will make for the peace of the world, and I believe if we had had that at first instead of inviting all these small nations to come in, I believe the League of Nations would have been in a stronger position to-day. Imagine any of these nations being of serious use in the trouble we have just experienced, Bolivia, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Hedjaz, Honduras.

League of Nations.

International Court of Justice.

Functions of the League.

Mr. Balfour: Hedjaz has not ratified yet.

Mr. Winston Churchill: Hedjaz is Mecca.

Mr. Massey: Neither Hedjaz nor Mecca is a nation yet. It is quite likely that Hedjaz will be. Liberia—the very idea of Liberia being of any use in connection with the League of Nations is, I will not say ludicrous, but it is something very near it—Nicaragua, Panamá, a little strip over the Canal, Peru, Uruguay, which is the place where nearly all the males were killed in a civil war not so very long ago.

Mr. Lloyd George: That was Paraguay, next door.

Mr. Balfour: Paraguay is a member, too.

Mr. Massey: That is where they attempted to establish the new Australia, the socialistic republic which was to lead the world in socialistic matters. Chile, which is not so bad. Chile occupies nearly the whole of the western coast-line of South America, and may be in years to come a powerful nation. I have no doubt the League of Nations will have an opportunity of making peace between them before long. Salvador, and so on. I do not know what you are going to get out of them in the way of contributions, but from any other point of view, I cannot help thinking the League of Nations would be better without them.

Mr. Balfour: Luxemburg is a member also; I do not know her population, but it is very small.

Mr. Massey: But to go back to the point, if we could get a combination, such as has been suggested, of the more powerful nations who would make it their business to police the other nations of the world and keep them within their boundaries and keep peace, not suggest it, but keep the peace. Say to them, you must keep it, or if you do not, we will see that you do. I think we should be in a much better and stronger position than we are in now.

League of Nations.

As to reduction of armaments, I am not at all certain that other nations have much to say regarding that question, but there are two of them, certainly, that are going on increasing all the time—America and Japan. There is nothing seriously wrong with that for the time being, but you cannot tell with this sort of thing what may happen. I have a very friendly feeling towards America, a number of my relatives are American citizens. I cannot forget that this is the sort of thing that is said. A personal friend of mine—and a good personal friend, an American citizen—speaking to me within the last month, said: "You British people are done; your time is past; you will never recover from the war, and you can make up your minds that we are going to be top dog." Coming from a friend of mine, I did not take any serious notice of it, but that is the sort of thing that has sunk into the minds of many American people, and it does not do any good. I have repeatedly heard something similar to that in the steamers going up and down the Pacific. Somebody sent me the other day a copy of a speech delivered at Toronto recently by an American citizen—I cannot put my hand on the speech for the moment—a journalist from New York. He was dealing with the international question, and his whole theme was this: "An American fleet for the Pacific; we are going to have our fleet there, and no other country's fleet is wanted." To me it was a revelation. Of course, he was received courteously. But I do not believe many Canadians agree with that view. That sort of thing does harm, and ought to be discouraged. In Toronto and in Vancouver they are extremely loyal. I do not say that there are many disloyal citizens in Canada. Those two places are enthusiastically loyal, if I am able to judge. All I have to say is this, Prime Minister, I believe some organisation is wanted. I am not enthusiastic about the League of Nations, but something of the sort is urgently required in the interests of peace and in the interests of the world, and if we can do anything to further that object, then, so far as I am concerned and the country I represent, we shall be very glad to assist.

American Expansion in Armaments.

Something in nature of League required.

Mr. Montagu: I do not want to say very much on this subject. I feel particularly grateful to Mr. Balfour for that very valuable collection of instances of what the League has done, and it will be very useful to all of us. I ought to have known them before, but it seems to me the most valuable information to put before the public when one is discussing the merits of the League.

From the point of view of India, there is one body subsidiary to the League which I should like to mention, and that is the Labour Conference, which is more valuable to a country of backward economic development like India than it would be to a European country. It has succeeded in bringing employees and employers and Government representatives together in the face of the world. Seeing the trend of development in the way of getting good factory legislation passed in India, a shortening of hours, a raising of the age of child labour, has brought Japan on in the same direction, which I think will be most valuable to the development of the country we represent here. I should like to ask Mr. Balfour about the expenditure of the League. As I understood it, there was rather a row about that at the last Assembly meeting at Geneva, and a Committee appointed which has resulted in making recommendations which will lead to economies in the future. It is a Budget Committee that has reported, is it not?

Labour Conference.

Mr. Fisher: There is to be stricter financial control and a proposed new allocation of expenses between the members.

Mr. Montagu: The last observation I shall make is this: You asked General Smuts a question which I thought of enormous importance, namely, what General Smuts had in mind when referring to the labours of the Supreme Council as connected with the labours of the League of Nations. You asked him if he could particularise on any special thing which was now being done by the Supreme Council that he would advocate ought to be done by the League of Nations. Did I understand him correctly when I say that he has no specific suggestion to make? As I understand it, the Supreme Council is mainly concerned with wiping up these horrible peace questions, like Greece, Turkey and Poland.

League of Nations.

Mr. Lloyd George : And Reparations.

Mr. Montagu : Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George : You could not turn the League of Nations on to adjust a bill of costs between Germany and sombody else.

Mr. Balfour : The League of Nations would never touch anything connected with the war.

Mr. Montagu : Then if that is so, is it not a fact that the Supreme Council really only exists to wind up the war?

Mr. Lloyd George : Yes.

Mr. Montagu: And, therefore, if the League of Nations will never touch anything arising out of the war, there is no overlap between the functions of the two bodies?

Mr. Balfour : There are certain things.

Mr. Montagu : I did not understand the proposition of General Smuts.

General Smuts : What I said was not in a spirit of criticism at all. I was rather influenced by the public effect to-day of the Supreme Council, by its activities, as it were, dwarfing and putting completely into the shade the Council of the League of Nations. The Council in that respect suffers in public estimation.

Mr. Fisher: May I add a few words as a short footnote to Mr. Balfour's speech, with which I was in fullest agreement?

Value of League although America does not join.

You invited us, Mr. Prime Minister, to consider what steps we might take with a view to inducing America to join the League. The point I wish to make is, that valuable as the adhesion of America would be, the League has a most important function to perform apart from America. Its value seems to me to be largely independent of the question as to whether America does or does not enter the League. After all, Europe is the cockpit of war in the world. It is in Europe that you get the great historical antagonisms and the sharp racial tensions between Slav and Teuton, between Teuton and Celt, between Albanian and Serb, Greek and Bulgar, Pole and neighbours of the Pole. The question of the regulation of naval armaments, which I agree can only be effected by negotiation between the great naval Powers, England, Japan and the United States of America, is entirely separate from the question of land armies on the Continent of Europe. It appears to me, for instance, that there is a very great value in getting all the Balkan States, as we now have them, into the League. I speak under correction, but I think we should certainly have had fighting in Albania but for the fact that Albania is now a member of the League. I entirely agree with Mr. Meighen in holding the view that it would be a mistake now to attempt to modify the constitution of the League in the expectation of meeting American opinion. I think that our best course would be to go on with the League quietly and persistently and to let American opinion form itself. In my view, by far the most important question for the members of the League to consider now is the question raised by General Smuts, namely, the admission of Germany to the League—what steps, if any, should the British delegates or the British Government take with a view to securing the admission of Germany at the next Assembly. There is no doubt that there is a very considerable body of opinion among the States of the League that Germany ought to be admitted, and that if you allow much more water to flow under the bridges before the admission of Germany to the League, you have the risk of a combination between Germany and Russia which will be extremely dangerous. I understand that there is already a considerable change of feeling in France upon that point, and I myself should be very much averse from putting any very strong pressure upon France this year. France is still in a highly nervous condition, which may be realised when I inform the Conference that when a proposal was made to appoint a German as a member of the Opium Commission at the last meeting of the Council, the French did not see their way to accept it, and the proposal was, therefore, postponed. If that is now the feeling of France, it would, I think, be sanguine to expect that by next September France will be willing to assent to the admission of Germany. I am informed, however, on very good authority that there is a very considerable change of opinion in France, and that after a year from September one might reasonably expect to find France actually consenting to the admission of Germany to the League. Although I am quite cognisant of the fact that many Americans take great objection to Article 10, and to some other provisions of the Covenant of the League, I should be disposed to think that it would be a mistake for us now to attempt to meet American opinion by altering the constitution of a body which is working tolerably well and to the satisfaction of many of its members.

Admission of Germany.

League of Nations.

America.

I should like, in conclusion, to emphasise one point which Mr. Balfour made, and that is that the League, by virtue of its constitution, can perform services which the ordinary diplomatic agency is unable to perform or is less well able to perform. I think there was a very remarkable instance of that in the case of the recent dispute between Finland and Sweden. Finland made concessions in regard to the Aaland Islands at the request of the Council of the League, which the Finnish delegate told me they would never have consented to if they had been dealing with Sweden alone. Those concessions were undoubtedly made to Sweden as a result of services performed by the Council of the League of Nations.

Aaland Islands.

Relationship between Foreign Office and British Branch of League.

Lord Curzon: I would ask leave to say one or two words about the attitude of the Foreign Office towards the League of Nations and its work. The English branch of the League of Nations has nothing to do with the Foreign Office, that is to say, its Secretariat is not inside the Foreign Office, it is independent, and our connection with the work of the League only arises in two ways: Firstly, in the opportunities that occur of referring matters to the Council of the League, and, secondly, in the conversations that take place between the Foreign Office and Mr. Balfour or Mr. Fisher, whichever of the two is our representative at the meetings of the Council of the League. It is quite natural that before they go there they should wish to know what are the views of the Government (of which they are members) in relation to foreign affairs, and on no occasion do they go out without a preliminary conversation with the Foreign Office.

Value of League in Foreign Affairs.

As regards the other category, namely, the opportunities that occur to us of referring matters to the Council of the League, Mr. Balfour has given us a summary this morning of some of its activities, but he might have extended his list, and I can say emphatically, in reply to the question put by General Smuts, that we in the Foreign Office regard the League and the Council of the League as an invaluable instrument for discharging certain duties and solving certain problems with which our machinery is not adequate to deal. I hold that view most strongly, and I will give these illustrations. At one of the meetings of the Supreme Council here we all agreed to make the suggestion to the Council of the League that they should send a Commission of Investigation to Russia, holding that the League, by its wide representative character and by its prestige and impartiality, would carry an authority that no Foreign Office could. That failed, not from any action of ours, but simply because of the hostility of the Soviet Government. Take, again, the question of Armenia, one of the most troublesome we had to deal with. In the early days, when America had retired from the stage, we were looking anxiously in every direction for some nation who would assume the mandate for Armenia, or, if not, that would interest herself in the fate of Armenia. But we did not attempt to do that ourselves; we turned to the Council of the League, and we made representations to the Council of the League. I happen to remember them because I wrote them all myself. Take, again, the question which has been more than once mentioned to-day, and in which the League has really had a very notable success. I am speaking of the Aaland Islands, those islands in the Scandinavian waters which were a bone of conflict between Sweden and Finland. How did that come about? Sitting in the Foreign Office, I used to receive visits almost weekly from the representatives of these two parties; I was tired of the quarrel between them. I felt confident that no advice I gave would have the smallest effect with either party and that the Powers were incapable of solving it by themselves. I looked to the Covenant of the League, and I found there a clause which empowered any outside and detached representative of a country, in a case where the continuance of a disagreement was likely to disturb peace, on his own responsibility to write a letter to the Council of the League asking them to take it up. I did it on my own authority, without consulting anybody, and then I said to the Swedish representative and the Finnish representative, "This is what I have done in the exercise of my responsibility." The thing was done, and they at once deferred to it. In a little time they came to express their gratitude for it, and now they have accepted the result. I only mention that as an illustration of the kind of help that we can give in the Foreign Office.

League of Nations.

I could give you, but I do not want to trouble you with it, a list of other cases in which the Foreign Office here have gladly had reference to the Council of the League, and, in respect of one of them, the institution of the International Court, I have been taking very active steps, those steps being directed mainly to securing a ratification by the Dominions through the persons of their representatives who are now here and who have it in their power, if they can give their ratifications, to bring the International Court into existence at the time the Assembly meets in August or September next.

Relationship of Supreme Council to League.

General Smuts raised the point, which has been dealt with by the Prime Minister, as to how far the Supreme Council can be, or ought to be, replaced as time goes on by the Council of the League. I only mention one consideration which has not been alluded to so far. Look at the Powers who are on the Council of the League now. In addition to the four Great Powers, there are Brazil, Spain, China and Belgium. Well, is it really to be contemplated that, what Mr. Montagu described as a sweeping up of the débris of the war, can possibly be undertaken by any body in which an equal voice is possessed by the representatives of those Powers? Strictly, questions of the late war can only be solved by the Great Powers who fought and won the war. It must not be imagined that the Prime Minister and I derive the smallest pleasure from visiting such detestable places as San Remo and Spa, or that we would not gladly hand over our responsibility to others if we could. But for the present that is impossible. If, however, I am asked what is the attitude of the Foreign Office towards the League, it is this. I would say it is doing work on a necessarily modest scale in the early stages which is very valuable—I think I may say invaluable work. My inclination would be to give it all the chance that we can and to strengthen it for the particular work that it has undertaken. I would not myself be at all disposed to substitute for it at the present stage something else. I would rather keep it on the present basis with such amplifications as we can make.

America.

As regards America, I really think the line to pursue has been indicated by more than one speaker to-day. I would not scrap the League in order to replace it by some new American Association, but I would, by our attitude towards America in all these questions such as the Anglo-Japanese Agreement, accustom them to the idea to association with others, and particularly an association with ourselves growing gradually in a form that we cannot at the present moment determine, but which means that we endeavour to co-operate with the American Government, whether it brings them into the League or not. After all, in four years' time, the present Government will have gone out in America; there may be a change, and whether it ever induces them to come in and give their acquiescence to the present League or not, such a policy as I have described will, at any rate, bring them into co-operation with ourselves and with the other members. I have made these observations mainly in reply to something said by General Smuts, and because I was anxious to remove from his mind what struck me as a false impression as to the attitude of the Foreign Office.

General Smuts: I was glad to hear it.

Previous Doubts of League.

Mr. Hughes: May I say one word. You know very well what my views were of the League of Nations originally and what they are to-day. I can see no reason to change them, but I recognise how greatly the world is distracted and how much it needs peace, and although I am to be numbered amongst those who do not believe in the efficacy of the League to bring about all that its adherents claim, as I have no efficient substitute which I can put forward for acceptance, I am content that we shall remain a member of the League and do whatever we can to make it a success. We who are gathered round this table are members of the same Empire, the majority of us are of the same race; we all speak the same language. But even here it would be idle to deny that on great questions there is frequently a wide divergence of opinion. Any one who remembers the Peace Conference, and can visualise that gathering of all the nations of the earth, must surely realise that human nature being what it is, that it is utterly impossible for such a body to govern the world and determine its destiny. I have refrained from saying anything publicly to belittle the League, nor have I failed to do what I could to afford it opportunities to benefit mankind. But I confess that from its very inception I despaired of its being of use—indeed, that, in some circumstances, it might be a menace—to our Empire, but I had never been able to see that other side of the question presented by Lord Curzon this afternoon. Now I see the League in quite a different light. Lord Curzon has shown, that the Assembly—and to a lesser extent the Council of the League too—is a sort of appanage of the Foreign Office, enabling us to do things for the glory of the Empire which would not be done so well, if at all, in any other way, and, as Lord Curzon has shown us, the League is to be brushed aside whenever it is necessary for the benefit of the Empire that we should act directly through the Foreign Office. I must confess that, as a zealous supporter of the Empire, such an interpretation appeals to me, but I am bound to say I do not think it would appeal to General Smuts. It is the most complete scathing exposure of the League's futility in deciding the destinies of the world that I have heard. League of Nations.

Lord Curzon: Let me say I do not for a moment recognise your description of my last remark. As it seems, however, to have given satisfaction to you and to General Smuts, I will not pursue the matter.

Mr. Hughes: I am sorry. It will be some consolation to you to know that what you have said gave me, for the first time, the hope that the League of Nations would be useful to the British Empire. I did hope it would serve the purpose of mankind as distinct from the Empire. However, my view, shortly, is this: I think it would be a great mistake for us to withdraw from the League. I think we must give it an opportunity whenever we can do so to be of use to us and to the world. As I have said, experience will prove it utterly incapable of preserving the peace of the world and banishing war from this earth. As for America, I think there is a great deal of truth in what Lord Curzon and Mr. Meighen say—that we should continue our relationship. If America will not come in—we cannot help it. I think it would be a very great mistake for the British Empire to pursue any other policy than it has done since its representatives consented to the Treaty and to the Covenant.

Mr. Lloyd George: I am not going to make any observations. Mr. Balfour, Mr. Fisher and Lord Curzon have represented the views of the British Cabinet on the subject, and the only point that I meant to deal with was the question of the Supreme Council, and that has already been disposed of by Lord Curzon much more effectively than I could, but I think we ought to arrive at some sort of conclusion to this discussion which we can register. The actual form we can discuss later on when we frame one, but I should like something of this sort recorded:—

> "(i.) That, even though the League has not fulfilled all the hopes of its originators, and cannot be expected to do so while some of the greatest nations in the world are outside the Covenant, nevertheless, it has already accomplished an invaluable work which would not have been effected by any international machinery previously existing."

Now, that is the first point. The next point is, I think, that you are generally agreed that Germany should be admitted as a member of the League.

Mr. Massey: Let us keep our hands upon her collar.

Mr. Lloyd George: Now about Germany.

> "(ii.) That Germany should be admitted to the League." Germany.

Mr. Balfour: Supposing I am at the next Council, am I to take it as instructions to ask France?

Mr. Lloyd George: No; that is a matter of discretion for you, and it is the view of the British that we ought to press. You can say you press the French privately. You must have some discretion.

Mr. Hughes: Is this for publication?

Mr. Lloyd George: No, this, for instance, you cannot.

Lord Curzon: Publish about Germany?

Mr. Lloyd George: No, I propose it should not be published. (Reading from paper)—"Although the League cannot hope to achieve its full purpose as long as the United States of America is not a member, it is not desirable to take any steps at this moment to approach the United States of America with an invitation to join the League." America.

Mr. Meighen: I would not put that in. Let us be silent upon it.

Mr. Churchill: There is not much advantage in putting it in.

Mr. Hughes: I think a "Bowdlerized" version of the first would be better. It would mean just the same.

League of Nations.

Constitution of League.

Mr. Lloyd George: I wanted to come to the second point. I say at once, I am not satisfied with the constitution of the League. I did not think it would work. I agree absolutely with Lord Curzon. The idea of having China, Brazil, Spain and Belgium with equal authority with the Great Powers who have had the whole burden of carrying out the League, I think it is a perfectly impossible position but when the United States of America, Russia and Germany come in, well, then, you must find some means of getting the little nations represented in proportion to their weight. That is all.

Mr. Hughes: This is not a good time for us to withdraw from the League.

Mr. Lloyd George: No, I am not suggesting that. What I want to say is this, that I do not think it would be desirable to discuss all that until the United States of America comes in, but if the United States of America comes in, I think it is a suitable time to discuss the constitution questions. There are questions like the Xth Clause of the Covenant, those are questions to be discussed. I believe the Covenant to be much too rigid, to be much too binding in its verbal obligations. The Supreme Council is a much more effective body, because it has no clauses. We all go there without any binding Covenant to say that whatever is done there shall bind all, that we have to guarantee the particular frontiers which we lay down or enforce any particular decisions that we take, but all the same we do it. I do not think we can put it in the form of a Covenant, and if we do I think we would smash it.

Mr. Meighen: Why not in the recital also affirm that the Conference does not feel that the constitution of the League is beyond improvement?

Mr. Lloyd George: I should be very sorry to see, if there were any conclusions here, a conclusion which indicated that we were quite satisfied with the constitution of the League, and that we were bound in future. I think on the whole I can say it requires a little more consideration. These have now been roughly drafted, and I think you had better allow us to frame something to submit to you later on. I think we ought to have some conclusions not for publication, but to be recorded in the procès-verbal.

Question of Publication.

Mr. Hughes: Are you going to publish anything? I thought one was for our record and another of a different kind. I do not see what you gain by giving publicity to it.

Mr. Lloyd George: You must publish the fact that we have discussed it.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Is not Mr. Balfour's statement, with some editing, an extremely suitable thing for the public? It would be very useful to the public.

Mr. Balfour: What is that?

Sir Thomas Smartt: I think your statement with a little editing—there are one or two things you would not like to publish—would be a very extremely educative thing to publish.

Mr. Lloyd George: If I might suggest to Mr. Balfour that he should do it and let the press get it early to-morrow, very early, for the Sunday papers.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Yes.

Mr. Massey: You mean the "Observer" and the "Sunday Times"?

Mr. Lloyd George: The Sunday papers; they have twice, if not two and a half times, the circulation of the daily papers.

Mr. Meighen: I would not mention America, but I would associate the idea of the possible imperfections of the constitution with the fact that the other nations are not in it.

Mr. Lloyd George: There must be a paragraph about the functions of the Supreme Council in clearing up the débris of war. What have we got on Monday?

Panama Canal Tolls.

Lord Curzon: When are you going to take the question of the Panamá Canal tolls?

Mr. Lloyd George: Let us have it.

Panama Canal Tolls.

Lord Curzon: The question was raised in this way; the other day the American Ambassador came to see me and told me that the present administration in America, having put into their platform at the Convention a statement about their resolve to revoke the policy of their predecessors and to open the canal free from tolls to the coastwise traffic in America, had introduced a Bill into Congress with that object. The Bill has passed the House of Representatives, and is now before the Senate, and President Harding, having pledged himself in his electioneering campaign to support this policy, will have to put his signature to the bottom of the Bill. The Ministers will remember that when a Bill of this sort was passed at an earlier stage some years ago, in direct violation of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty as interpreted by us, and, I believe, by the great majority of people, that Bill was, as soon as President Wilson came into office, revoked by him. The new proposal involves a complete reversal of policy on the part of the United States, and challenges the position which we have always hitherto assumed. The Ambassador came to me with the proposal to buy our consent to this change of attitude by a concession which his Government are prepared to make to Canadian coastwise traffic, that is to say, they are prepared to give the same immunity from dues and tolls to the Canadian coastwise traffic as they are proposing to give by this legislation to themselves. I pointed out that this raised a great issue of Imperial policy, and that I could not pledge the Government without consulting the Cabinet and Mr. Meighen, which I would have to do before giving an answer to him. The view taken by the Foreign Office, the Board of Trade and all the Departments concerned is that it would be highly undesirable to make this surrender. We then referred it to Mr. Meighen, and I believe Mr. Meighen holds the same view; and if we are unable to make what I think would be a really unholy bargain, the only course open to us is to protest to the American Government fiercely against the line of action which they are pursuing, which I think is in the highest degree immoral, and if we are unable to agree on the matter, to insist upon arbitration. I have, more than once, mentioned here Lord Grey's Treaty setting up a Commission for the investigation of any case in which the American Government and ourselves are disagreed, and I think we must insist upon referring this case to this Tribunal. For the moment, our decision is only on the point whether I am to return—which I hope you will authorise me to do—a formal negative rejoinder to the American Ambassador.

American Ambassador's Proposal.

Recommends rejection.

Mr. Meighen: I have not the least hesitation in dealing with the Foreign Secretary's statement. It is some years now since I have had an opportunity of reviewing the Treaty and the history of the discussions that led to it. I think it was in February 1914, when President Wilson vetoed legislation, that had passed both Houses—legislation that had the effect of giving preferential rates. I came immovably to the conclusion that any such legislation was a breach of the Treaty of the plainest kind; that for the United States to carry out such legislation would be simply taking a great world franchise, to the securing of which the concurrence of other Powers had been obtained on certain conditions, and, having done so, simply scrapping the conditions and seizing the franchise to itself. That is what this contemplated action means. Our Canadian traffic is affected seriously; I mean to say our coastwise traffic. More than that, we have the Dominion Government operating now a mercantile marine, and we are interested in that as a Government as well as a people—in the preservation of this coastwise traffic. That part of the traffic will increase very probably most rapidly of all. To let the Bill pass on condition that we secure this concession from them would, as far as the advantage to Canada is concerned, be very great. There is no doubt about that. But I for one will never be a party to the purchase of an unfair and unjust—should I say dishonourable—advantage. I do not think we have any right to it. Nor can I conceive the British Government acquiescing in the disturbance of the whole basis of a solemn Treaty, merely at the price of an advantage to Canada. These opinions of mine are firm. I think they are based on a careful study of the Treaty and its effect. I would say by all means protest in the most vigorous terms against the action, carry the protest to the utmost publicity at the present time. All I fear is whether it would be wise for us to suggest arbitration on a point clearly decided already. I think it would be better to wait for them to do so. The Treaty itself is the conclusion of an arbitration, and it looks like asking for re-trial of a case that is not now decided in our favour. However, as to that, I do not pretend to speak with authority, or to adduce further argument. I would say, at least, carry your protest to some considerable length before suggesting arbitration.

Panama Canal Tolls.

Lord Curzon: The American Government is unhappily committed, and the Ambassador told me that the President's signature would be placed to the Bill, and we might protest to the uttermost, but nothing will happen. It is before the Senate, and it has been held up by this unholy offer made to us. The Bill will go through the Senate, and will be signed by the President, and we can protest, but nothing will happen. The American coastwise traffic will be exempted. In these circumstances, what is the good of having an Arbitration Treaty with America unless you use it? It was passed really to deal with cases of this sort, and our case is so strong that we should go into arbitration with every confidence. If Mr. Meighen could suggest any other alternative, I should be glad to consider it; but, to my mind, the only other alternative is inaction.

Question of Arbitration.

Mr. Meighen: I do not know of any other alternative, but it will be very valuable to let the world understand the strength of the protest. If you could get the suggestion for arbitration to come from them it would be so much the better.

Mr. Massey: I am glad to hear the opinions expressed by Mr. Meighen, and I congratulate him upon them. I am not surprised at this, though I had not heard of it before, but I have thought for some time that something of the sort would be attempted. I do not know whether the members of the Conference know that America has just raised its customs dues against the Dominions. We are to some extent affected. The customs dues have gone up; they were supposed to be on trial for six months, but I have not the slightest hope that they are going to be reduced. This is giving ships of the United States a tremendous advantage over the ships of other countries going through the Panamá Canal. If they are going to do this, there is no reason why they should not increase the canal dues. The canal dues might be increased so as to make it prohibitive for ships to pass through, except American ships. This may be a serious thing for New Zealand. Formerly, our shipping invariably went round Cape Horn, but nineteen out of every twenty ships now go through the canal, paying its dues. It pays them to do so, but I can just imagine the consternation in the country I represent when this gets out, and I hope that Lord Curzon will do what has been suggested—make the strongest protest possible. It is a most serious breach of faith. That was the one thing that led me to hope that America would not attempt to interfere after what took place some years ago, when President Wilson came into power. I do hope that they will reconsider the thing, and think better of what has been proposed. If not, the Pacific will be an American lake. That is what it amounts to.

Customs Dues Raised against Dominions.

Mr. Hughes: I can only support what has been said. You can see what it means to us. Panama is the most direct route to the East Coast of America, and at least as near as any other route to Europe; and we should have to regard any attempt by America in the direction suggested as a most unfriendly act, and not to be tolerated. It does not reveal that spirit of friendship which is so desirable in all branches of the English-speaking race. I have no doubt that Lord Curzon, when he has an opportunity to put the matter before the Ambassador, will be able to make him see in what light we view it, and he will then have an opportunity of hearing what the Ambassador's views are.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should like to express a word of gratification at the very notable declaration made by the Prime Minister of Canada, and to thank him on behalf of the United Kingdom, and, I think, on behalf of the Empire, for the very loyal and courageous stand which he has made. I think his stand will have a very far-reaching effect throughout the world.

Mr. Massey: It is a splendid thing to do.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is a very fine thing to do.

Future business.

Sir Maurice Hankey: As regards future business, is it impossible to have the Indian Conference to-morrow?

Mr. Lloyd George: The difficulty to-morrow is that we cannot get General Smuts, and he is very much concerned in the statement made by Mr. Sastri. What about Naval Defence on Monday? The suggestion is that the question of the Constitutional Conference should be discussed on Monday afternoon, and Imperial Policy in Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Hughes: That would work in, I should say.

Mr. Lloyd George: Let us have that on Monday afternoon if it suits everybody.

Mr. Hughes: What about this morning's publication for the press?

Mr. Lloyd George: We suggest that we have simply discussed the question of the League of Nations, but I think there would be a great . . . .

Mr. Hughes: I mean this morning's particularly.

Sir Maurice Hankey: We sent out a short notice, but Mr. Sastri did not want to publish.

Mr. Sastri: I think that in South Africa and in India there will be all sorts of comments made and it will create an unfavourable atmosphere.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is a very wise position. On Monday, I am not sure we had not better put the difficulties from this end, the difficulties we experience, and then invite the views and suggestions of the Dominions upon questions of foreign policy.

Mr. Massey: Is it possible to get the opinion of some constitutional authorities before then on some of the points that have been raised? I do not know who you have here in the way of constitutional authority unless it is the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, he would be available. It is rather a question of practical difficulty than otherwise, how we are practically to elicit your views upon questions which arise from day to day. That is the question, whether you are going to leave someone here with whom we can confer and whom we can send for, and who knows fairly well the views of his Government.

Mr. Hughes: We have to consider, of course—you will remember Mr. Meighen's memorandum, that goes to the very root. Clearly, that is linked up with the constitutional question.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is it.

Mr. Meighen: I do not know of any other alternative, but it will be very valuable to let the world understand the strength of the protest. If you could get the suggestion for arbitration to come from them it would be so much the better.

Mr. Massey: I am glad to hear the opinions expressed by Mr. Meighen, and I congratulate him upon them. I am not surprised at this, though I had not heard of it before, but I have thought for some time that something of the sort would be attempted. I do not know whether the members of the Conference know that America has just raised its customs dues against the Dominions. We are to some extent affected. The customs dues have gone up; they were supposed to be on trial for six months, but I have not the slightest hope that they are going to be reduced. This is giving ships of the United States a tremendous advantage over the ships of other countries going through the Panamá Canal. If they are going to do this, there is no reason why they should not increase the canal dues. The canal dues might be increased so as to make it prohibitive for ships to pass through, except American ships. This may be a serious thing for New Zealand. Formerly, our shipping invariably went round Cape Horn, but nineteen out of every twenty ships now go through the canal, paying its dues. It pays them to do so, but I can just imagine the consternation in the country I represent when this gets out, and I hope that Lord Curzon will do what has been suggested—make the strongest protest possible. It is a most serious breach of faith. That was the one thing that led me to hope that America would not attempt to interfere after what took place some years ago, when President Wilson came into power. I do hope that they will reconsider the thing, and think better of what has been proposed. If not, the Pacific will be an American lake. That is what it amounts to.

Customs Dues Raised against Dominions.

Mr. Hughes: I can only support what has been said. You can see what it means to us. Panama is the most direct route to the East Coast of America, and at least as near as any other route to Europe; and we should have to regard any attempt by America in the direction suggested as a most unfriendly act, and not to be tolerated. It does not reveal that spirit of friendship which is so desirable in all branches of the English-speaking race. I have no doubt that Lord Curzon, when he has an opportunity to put the matter before the Ambassador, will be able to make him see in what light we view it, and he will then have an opportunity of hearing what the Ambassador's views are.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should like to express a word of gratification at the very notable declaration made by the Prime Minister of Canada, and to thank him on behalf of the United Kingdom, and, I think, on behalf of the Empire, for the very loyal and courageous stand which he has made. I think his stand will have a very far-reaching effect throughout the world.

Mr. Massey: It is a splendid thing to do.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is a very fine thing to do.

Future business.

Sir Maurice Hankey: As regards future business, is it impossible to have the Indian Conference to-morrow?

Mr. Lloyd George: The difficulty to-morrow is that we cannot get General Smuts, and he is very much concerned in the statement made by Mr. Sastri. What about Naval Defence on Monday? The suggestion is that the question of the Constitutional Conference should be discussed on Monday afternoon, and Imperial Policy in Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Hughes: That would work in, I should say.

Mr. Lloyd George: Let us have that on Monday afternoon if it suits everybody.

Mr. Hughes: What about this morning's publication for the press?

Mr. Lloyd George: We suggest that we have simply discussed the question of the League of Nations, but I think there would be a great . . . .

Mr. Hughes: I mean this morning's particularly.

Sir Maurice Hankey: We sent out a short notice, but Mr. Sastri did not want to publish.

Mr. Sastri: I think that in South Africa and in India there will be all sorts of comments made and it will create an unfavourable atmosphere.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is a very wise position. On Monday, I am not sure we had not better put the difficulties from this end, the difficulties we experience, and then invite the views and suggestions of the Dominions upon questions of foreign policy.

Mr. Massey: Is it possible to get the opinion of some constitutional authorities before then on some of the points that have been raised? I do not know who you have here in the way of constitutional authority unless it is the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, he would be available. It is rather a question of practical difficulty than otherwise, how we are practically to elicit your views upon questions which arise from day to day. That is the question, whether you are going to leave someone here with whom we can confer and whom we can send for, and who knows fairly well the views of his Government.

Mr. Hughes: We have to consider, of course—you will remember Mr. Meighen's memorandum, that goes to the very root. Clearly, that is linked up with the constitutional question.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is it.

(The Conference adjourned until 4·30 P.M. Monday, the 11th July, 1921.)

Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

American invitation to Conference on Disarmament preceded by a Pacific Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: I have to give an answer in the House of Commons on the Anglo-Japanese position. There has been a very dramatic change in the whole situation, and although it has been nominally brought about by the President's invitation, it is really the result of our action here. You will recollect that it was decided here to approach the American, the Japanese and the Chinese Ambassadors with a view to suggesting a Conference on the Pacific question. That has produced one of the most remarkable documents of modern times in the form of a direct invitation from the President of the United States of America to a Conference on the question of disarmament, to be preceded by a Conference on the question of the Pacific.

Mr. Meighen: Is "preceded" the right word to use?

Mr. Lloyd George: Lord Curzon will tell you about that. As you know, I saw Mr. Harvey, and I can only take his interpretation of it. I understand the Foreign Secretary has also seen him, and he has given him exactly the same interpretation. His interpretation is this, that a Conference should be held at Washington on disarmament, that those who are invited to take part should be the Allied and Associated Powers, to use the old phrase; that the Conference should be preceded—this is Mr. Harvey's interpretation of those words—by a Conference amongst those whom it concerns—that also has to be interpreted, but his views are more or less identical with ours on that subject—China, Japan, United States of America and the British Empire: that the two Conferences should be held at different times and at different places, but that the Pacific Conference should come first. That is obviously sensible, for you cannot settle disarmament until the various Powers know where they are in reference to this great Pacific issue. The immediate question is the answer I am to give in the House of Commons to-day. It is not quite ready, it is being drafted, but Lord Curzon will have it in about five minutes.

Lord Curzon: It will take a quarter of an hour to go through it and get it right.

Time and place of Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: Then comes the other question of time and place. As far as the Pacific Conference is concerned, there would be an obvious advantage to us, and certainly to those who have come here from a great distance, to have a Conference before we dispersed. London would also be the most convenient place. President Harding has invited us to Washington for the Disarmament Conference. Well, if we go to Washington for disarmament, then I think we are entitled to ask their representatives to come here for the preliminary Conference.

Mr. Massey: Yes, and soon.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, before this Conference disperses. Mr. Harvey, as you know, was very favourably impressed with that idea. He was very much impressed with the appeal which you both made to him as to the impossibility of your attending a Conference later on in the year after you had returned to your respective countries. He thinks that that will carry very great weight with the United States of America, who are anxious to meet our convenience in that respect. How Japan would view that I do not know. It is not that they would object to London; the only point that would weigh with them is whether they have anyone here who carries sufficient weight to represent them on a question of such moment to themselves. Ishii, of course, is a first-class man. Hayashi is obviously inadequate. If Chinda had been here I have no doubt at all they would agree, but it would take six weeks to come here from Japan by the quickest route, would it not?

Japanese Representative.

Lord Curzon: It takes three weeks from Japan to America and then a week across, that is four weeks, and then a week over here will make five, throw in a few days, and then you have the best part of six weeks.

Mr. Hughes: Where is Chinda?

Mr. Lloyd George: I think he has just returned to Japan.

Lord Curzon: Ishii was the man who was in America and signed the American Agreement with Lansing. He has been in Paris. Did you not meet him in Paris, Mr. Balfour?

Mr. Balfour: I do not know whether Ishii was the man in Paris.

Lord Curzon: I believe he was a delegate to Geneva.

Mr. Balfour: Yes, that is right. I know him quite well.

Mr. Lloyd George: I know him, too. He is a very interesting man, but whether he carries sufficient weight or whether the Japanese would feel that they were well and sufficiently represented at two Conferences that are very important to them, I do not know. They could not send anyone else in the time. Six weeks is almost prohibitive. Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

Mr. Balfour: The United States of America could hardly have contemplated a Conference at Washington at this time. The heat there is worse than it is here.

Mr. Lloyd George: No, they do not intend that. The Pacific Conference should come first, and Mr. Harvey thinks they would not mind meeting here.

Lord Curzon: I might say that the American Ambassador particularly asked me to take care that no mention of the first Conference being held here should be made at this date. You know how very susceptible they are, and as the Conference is being convened by the American President, he would not like the suggestion made from this end that we thought it should take place here. If the suggestion is made to him the Ambassador thinks he would readily conform to it, but he would not like us to publish it.

Mr. Massey: That is the Pacific Conference?

Lord Curzon: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: Could he not make the proposal?

Lord Curzon: I have no doubt that he would be prepared to do so. I told him I would see him after this Conference had taken place and communicate with him about the matter.

Mr. Hughes: I do not think the Americans could possibly take exception if you said, "We accept your invitation to go to Washington to discuss disarmament," and then adding, "We ask you to come here for the other Conference." I see your point with regard to the Japanese. They might say, "We are very much interested in this, and we must have our best men present, and they cannot get here under six weeks."

Lord Curzon: Ishii is in Europe. Was he at Geneva the other day, do you know?

Mr. Lloyd George: He came here to the Supreme Council, if you remember.

Lord Curzon: Was he at Geneva last week? We could easily find out.

Sir Maurice Hankey: I will find out.

Lord Curzon: If Viscount Chinda is still with the Japanese Crown Prince he will be in Europe. He left Paris only yesterday.

Mr. Lloyd George: Chinda is the man I think they would trust.

Mr. Hughes: Who is the present Ambassador?

Mr. Lloyd George: Baron Hayashi, but I do not think that he would do.

Lord Curzon: Hayashi knows the question almost better than the others, because he was their representative in China for many years. I think he knows the Far Eastern question as well as they do, but he has not got either the ability or the personality of the other man.

Mr. Hughes: What is the alternative? The matter will have to be decided, and decided quickly, if you are to have it here. It must be decided quickly in any case, for Mr. Massey's sake and my own. We must know where we are. What is the alternative if they will not agree? Cuba is out of the question. There is only one place other than London we can go to. I have discussed the matter with Mr. Massey, and Honolulu is the only place that we can go to, in the second week in January. Date and site of Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: The two Conferences ought to be disposed of in the course of this year.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, I see that.

Mr. Lloyd George: You have here a very favourable atmosphere, and I think it is obviously in the interests of the whole problem that we should approach it immediately.

Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

Lord Curzon: What is the latest date by which you and Mr. Massey must leave England?

Mr. Massey: The middle of next month.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Massey and I discussed this yesterday, and we must both be back in our own countries at the same time. I have made an arrangement with my Parliament, and I must be there in the first week in October. Of course, if you say to me: "There is a Conference to be held here, stay another week," and the Conference is of such vital importance as a condition precedent to the Conference on Disarmament, that will be my answer to my Parliament, and I am prepared to give it. But you see, Sir, there is a limit. I must be back some time.

Mr. Massey: I am in exactly the same position. I promised my Parliament that I would be back in October, and Parliament will be convened for the middle of September. They are looking forward to my being there because we propose to undertake a revision of the Customs tariff, which have not been touched for a dozen years and need revising very badly. The understanding was, when I left, that we should take that matter up and be ready to go on with it by the time I got back. As Mr. Hughes has pointed out, if it was only a matter of postponing my departure for a week, I could tell Parliament my reason for waiting, and I do not think there would be the slightest objection on their part. The only difficulty then would be that the ships might not fit in so well.

Mr. Lloyd George: If there is a preliminary Conference and then you go on to Washington, Honolulu or Victoria—which is another suggestion—might do for the preliminary Conference.

Mr. Massey: Victoria or Vancouver would be the place in Canada where it could be held.

Mr. Lloyd George: Then comes Washington.

Mr. Meighen: That is 3,000 miles away.

Mr. Hughes: We cannot have two Conferences on the American Continent. That would not do. We have certain interests here, and we must preserve them, and regard must be given to the "atmosphere," and our favourable atmosphere is here.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think we ought to press for the Conference here. I understand from the Foreign Secretary that Viscount Chinda has left Paris.

Lord Curzon: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should have thought it would be better to have Chinda, Ishii and Hayashi together.

Lord Curzon: The difficulty is about their getting their instructions without consultation with their Government.

Mr. Lloyd George: But they know the problem very well.

Mr. Churchill: If they would come here, all the better. Is there not rather a danger that the Americans may feel—after all, it is a great Pacific question and a vital one for the Powers bordering on the Pacific—reluctant to come after what happened at Paris, when President Wilson got into such trouble with his own people? If they would come, nothing could be better. America and Canada would be a half-way house for everybody. If they would not come here, the next best thing would be Canada.

Mr. Lloyd George: But how can you suggest Canada on the Washington invitation? Why should we want a Conference in Canada and another in Washington? I could understand Canada being taken as a compromise for both Conferences. To have one Conference in Canada and one in Washington is a thing which they would not comprehend. They would say: "Obviously, you have an objection to Washington, not because of the distance, but purely because it is Washington."

Mr. Balfour: Also because it is August. There are people here who know more about it than I do, but I remember talking to some Washington people, and they told me that Washington was an impossible place to do business in in the height of summer.

Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

Mr. Meighen: It is never hotter there than it is here now. I do not know the difference between the atmosphere of Victoria and Vancouver Island and the atmosphere of London.

Mr. Hughes: This means a great deal more to us than to you. You have 100,000,000 people right alongside of you. We cannot go to our Dominions and return. We cannot get back here; you can go to Canada and return here for the Conference; we can get, as I have told you, to Honolulu in the second week in January. That is the best we can do. I think here is the place.

Mr. Meighen: The suggestion was to hold the Conference there on your way home. You would save two weeks by having it in Victoria.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, but it seems rather absurd to have a Conference in Victoria and then to say: "We have settled that now, let us go on to Washington and settle the other." We could not do it. If we did not do it right away, we should all have to come back here and go to Washington then.

London best site for Pacific Conference.

Mr. Massey: London is the place for the first Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think we ought to make a real effort to get it here.

Lord Curzon: I do not think there will be any difficulty. When I saw the Ambassador just now and discussed with him the proposition which you have laid down, that the two Conferences must be at different places and at different times, and that the Pacific Conference here should precede the other, he accepted both. Then I went on to discuss the place, and he himself made the suggestion to me that it should be London. He said: "I think if we have the big Conference on disarmament at Washington it will be only reasonable that our Government should conform to your wishes." He particularly mentioned the convenience to Mr. Hughes and Mr. Massey of having the Conference here. He said: "I do not want you to say anything about that at the present stage. Could you come with proposals to me and talk them over with me, and I will make proposals to my Government?" I do not think from his point of view, or from the point of view of his Government, that any difficulties will arise. Therefore, I think this part of the discussion is really superfluous.

Mr. Massey: So far as the South Pacific is concerned the interests of Britain are very much greater than the interests of the United States of America. There is no question about it. They have not much concern there; they have few interests in the South Pacific. I am not speaking of the northern hemisphere, that is a different thing, the Canal itself gives an enormous interest to the Pacific.

Mr. Meighen: We are quite satisfied if we can be here.

Mr. Massey: Would you wait another week?

Mr. Meighen: I think I shall go home and, if essential, come back.

Mr. Massey: I would have to get a steamer at Vancouver—that seems to be my easiest way home. I have to leave here by about the 18th of next month.

Mr. Churchill: Would China come here?

Lord Curzon: China, of course, is delighted with the invitation.

Mr. Hughes: My arrangements at present are I am to leave by a boat—I think it sails from here on the 20th August.

Mr. Massey: The same time as myself.

Mr. Churchill: For a matter of such importance, Mr. Massey, would not your Opposition or your Parliament be content to have you spend a little more time?

Mr. Massey: I think Parliament will do what I request them to do.

Mr. Churchill: I think our position here would not be very good if the Prime Ministers were absent.

Mr. Massey: No doubt Parliament will do what I ask them to do. I have to show that I have done my best to keep my promise if there is not any other business of very urgent importance.

Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

Mr. Churchill: I think this is the biggest thing we have had to do for a long time, and one cannot spoil the negotiations for a day or two.

Duration of Conference.

Mr. Hughes: Look here, Mr. Churchill, the point is this: when would this Conference start? We have a Constitutional Convention coming on. The matter does not interest you, but it is of great importance to Australia. We must pass the necessary legislation before the end of the year. The whole thing is highly controversial, and it has to be done as provided for by our Constitution. Any time later than, say, the middle of October will make it impossible for me to carry out the policy of the Government and the deliberate solemn pledges that we have made to Parliament, but if you say a fortnight, I may be able to manage it.

Mr. Churchill: This Pacific Conference is going to be a long business. It is not a thing that can be settled at a few meetings. The whole future of China and Japan, and the inter-play of Japan on Russia, all that will come in on the question of the United States of America, Japan and this country. I think there are formidable groups of problems and it might take two or three months before we arrive at any conclusion. Do not you think it will take a long time, Prime Minister?

Mr. Lloyd George: I do not say that it will take very long—not more than a fortnight.

Mr. Churchill: Nor more than a fortnight?

Mr. Massey: This is not open to the press?

Mr. Lloyd George: No.

Mr. Hughes: There is the possibility of a hitch in reference to the respective Governments, and so on; you must not overlook that fact.

Mr. Meighen: I think I would probably go home and come back, if it was essential.

Mr. Hughes: Would you?

Mr. Meighen: Yes, I think so.

Suggestion for Pacific Conference in Washington and Disarmament in Europe.

Mr. Balfour: Do you think the Americans would be content to keep to the order of the Conferences? They must take them in the order that I think you have suggested, but alter the places. Have the Conference about the Pacific in Washington and the Conference between the Allied and Associated Powers about disarmament in Europe. For the latter the presence of the Dominions is clearly not so necessary as for the former. It is the former which most emphatically requires the presence of the Dominions. Very well, they meet in Washington first, in spite of the hot weather, and then ask the Americans if they will not come to Europe for what is, after all, a European concern.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, except that you see their invitation is for the Disarmament Conference. It is their invitation.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: They simply suggested a conversation for the other. They clearly attach very great importance to the other because that is going to be a great international thing for Italy, France and all the Allied and Eastern Powers.

Mr. Hughes: If you are going to have disarmament first, you are suggesting that as an alternative, are you?

Mr. Balfour: No; I am suggesting leaving the Conferences in the order which, I understand, is the American order, and certainly the logical order—Pacific first and disarmament second. What I suggested was, you should invert the order of places of meeting and have the first meeting in Washington about the Pacific.

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: That would suit the Dominions evidently much better than the other, because you go there on the way.

Mr. Lloyd George: At the second Conference on disarmament, you simply get the great Powers of the world—the Allied and Associated Powers.

Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

Mr. Hughes: I think the solution you put forward is the best one, that is to say, press for the Conference here, but I do certainly think that Mr. Balfour's is the best alternative that has been put forward.

Mr. Balfour: The best second string.

Mr. Hughes: Yes—that would be quite feasible for all, but it is not the best. I think the Prime Minister's is the best.

Mr. Lloyd George: I am a little afraid about approaching them on that—you sort of muddle the thing. It is now quite a clear invitation. They have invited us to Washington to discuss disarmament. Well, then, you see, the Japanese business does not concern America. I was talking to Murray Butler about it. The East does not care very much—does not care at all about it—the Japanese business—not so much, he says. He took rather a different view to the one Mr. Hughes takes.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Harvey?

Mr. Lloyd George: No, Murray Butler. He says the West is anti-Japanese, and take a very keen interest in it, but the East does not. Disarmament is a thing which concerns the East even more than the West, and that is where you get the wealthy people who are taxed very heavily. That is a question which concerns the whole country, and they would probably think we were trying to filch the more important Conference.

Mr. Balfour: What do you say to this procedure, Prime Minister? Accept, without suggesting any alternative, and say you desire for the convenience of the Dominions that it must be soon. If that comes off, that is the best plan of all. Supposing it does not come off, we say to the Americans, "We accept this, and we would have been delighted with your plan, but the Japanese cannot do it or the Dominions," and then perhaps the second consideration might be come to without being offensive. If we accept, as far as we are concerned, in the order exactly what they propose, they cannot be offended if that breaks down on some really obvious legitimate ground.

Mr. Churchill: After all, this Pacific question is a vital one to them. The position is most important, and I am afraid that they might sheer off. I would be delighted to be convinced the other way, but they work up their national pride. There is no difficulty in what we want. I would like to see them here. I am only saying that I should be surprised . . . .

Mr. Chamberlain: Is it worth while to jump this fence before we come to it?

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Chamberlain: Lord Curzon at his conversation with the American Ambassador thinks that there will be no trouble.

Mr. Lloyd George: As a matter of fact, Mr. Balfour and myself met the American Ambassador last Friday night dining here, and he suggested London. That is my recollection.

Mr. Balfour: I think he did.

Mr. Hughes: I think you would be in a strong position with Japan if you said America is willing to discuss the matter here in London on the Pacific question. I do not see how she can very well refuse. She can ask for delay, possibly, in which case you will be driven back to consider what you have to do, but I do not think she would refuse, Sir.

Mr. Lloyd George: She would meet anywhere in Europe, or, say, as far as Egypt. We can be back here in nine to ten days.

Mr. Chamberlain: He (Viscount Chinda) is probably in Switzerland at this moment, and, according to Lord Curzon, left Paris yesterday.

Mr. Massey: He would not travel by aeroplane to Japan?

Mr. Balfour: No. The thing to say to the United States of America, without consulting anybody, is, "We are in favour of your plan." Then, if that plan breaks down, find another.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is a very remarkable rapprochement.

Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

Mr. Churchill: Very. We have made history sitting round this table—there is no doubt about it.

Sir Maurice Hankey: They did state definitely the first invitation is Washington, and the second does not suggest any place.

Mr. Churchill: At all events, I shall be very relieved to know they will come here.

Mr. Lloyd George: I hope they will for more reasons than one, as I do not want to go over there.

Mr. Churchill: No.

The Prime Minister's Statement to House of Commons, July 11, 1921.

Mr. Lloyd George: On the point of amour-propre they might say, "We will come over to you if you will come over to us." Now, this is the suggested statement which I am to make in the House of Commons:—

"When I told the House last Thursday that I hoped to be in a position to make a statement on Pacific and Far Eastern questions to-day, I was awaiting, as I explained at the time, replies to conversation which had taken place between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the representatives of the Governments of the United States, Japan and China, as the result of our discussions in the Imperial Cabinet. I am very glad to be able to inform the House to-day that the views of the Government of the United States reached me last night and are extremely satisfactory. The Chinese Government is also favourable. We have not yet had a formal reply from the Government of Japan, but we have good reason to hope that it will be in the same sense. Now that these views have been received, I am glad to be at liberty to inform the House of Commons fully regarding the course which our discussions in the Imperial Cabinet took. I do this with particular satisfaction, because it will show how very valuable a step forward we have been able to take by common consent in the sphere of foreign affairs.

"The broad lines of Imperial policy in the Pacific and the Far East were the very first subject to which we addressed ourselves at the meetings of the Imperial Cabinet, having a special regard to the Anglo-Japanese Agreement, the future of China and the bearing of both those questions on the relations of the British Empire with the United States. We were guided in our deliberations by three main considerations. In Japan we have an old and proved ally; the agreement of twenty years' standing between us has been of very great benefit, not only to ourselves and her, but to the peace of the Far East. In China there is a very numerous people with great potentialities who esteem our friendship highly, and whose interests we, on our side, desire to assist and advance. In the United States we see to-day, as we have always seen, the people closest to our own aims and ideals with whom it is for us not merely a desire and an interest, but a deeply-rooted instinct to consult and co-operate. Those were the main considerations in our meetings, and upon them we were unanimous. The object of our discussions was to find a method combining all these three factors in a policy which would remove the danger of heavy naval expenditure in the Pacific with all the evils which such an expenditure entails and to ensure the development of all legitimate national interests in the Far East.

"We had in the first place to ascertain our exact position with regard to the Anglo-Japanese Agreement. There has been much doubt as to whether the notification to the League of Nations made last July constituted a denunciation of the agreement in the sense of clause 6. If it did it would have been necessary to decide upon some interim measure regarding the agreement pending fuller discussions with the other Pacific Powers, and negotiations with this object in view were in point of fact already in progress. If, on the other hand, it did not, the agreement would remain in force until denounced either by Japan or ourselves and would not be actually determined until twelve months from the date when notice of denunciation was given. The Japanese Government took the view that no notice of denunciation had yet been given. This view was shared by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but as considerable doubt existed, we decided, after a preliminary discussion in the Imperial Cabinet, to refer the question to the Lord Chancellor, who considered it with the Law Officers of the Crown, and held that no notice of denunciation had yet been given.

Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

"It follows that the Anglo-Japanese Agreement remains in force unless it is denounced, and will lapse only at the expiration of twelve months from the time when notice of denunciation is given. It is, however, the desire of both the British Empire and Japan that the Agreement should be brought into complete harmony with the Covenant of the League of Nations, and that wherever the Covenant and the Agreement are inconsistent, the terms of the Covenant shall prevail. Notice to this effect has now been given to the League.

"The broader discussion of Far Eastern and Pacific policy to which we then turned showed general agreement on the main lines of the course which the Imperial Cabinet desired to pursue. I have already explained that the first principle of our policy was friendly co-operation with the United States. We are all convinced that upon this more than upon any other single factor depend the peace and well-being of the world. We also desire, as I have stated, to maintain our close friendship and co-operation with Japan. The greatest merit of that valuable friendship is that it harmonises the influence and activities of the two greatest Asiatic Powers, and this constitutes an essential safeguard to the well-being of the British Empire and the peace of the East. We also aim at preserving the open door in China and at giving the Chinese people every opportunity of peaceful progress and development. In addition to these considerations we desire to safeguard our own vital interests in the Pacific and to preclude any competition in naval armaments between the Pacific Powers. All the representatives of the Empire agreed that our standpoint on these questions should be communicated with complete frankness to the United States, Japan and China with the object of securing an exchange of views which might lead to more formal discussion and conference. Lord Curzon accordingly held conversations last week with the American Ambassador and Japanese Ambassador and the Chinese Minister, at which he communicated to them the views of the Imperial Cabinet, and asked in turn for the views of their respective Governments. He expressed at these conversations a very strong hope that this exchange of views might, if their Governments shared our desire in that respect, pave the way for a Conference on the problems of the Pacific and the Far East. The reply of the President of the United States was made public by the American Government this morning. It is known to the House. Mr. Harding has taken the momentous step of inviting the Powers to a Conference on the limitation of armaments to be held in Washington in the near future, and he also suggests a preliminary meeting on Pacific and Far Eastern questions between the Powers most directly interested in the peace and welfare of that great region, which is assuming the first importance in international affairs. I need not say that we welcome with the utmost pleasure President Harding's wise and courteous initiative. In saying this, I know that I speak for the Empire as a whole. The world has been looking to the United States for such a lead. I am confident that the House will esteem it as an act of far-seeing statesmanship, and will whole-heartedly wish it success. I need hardly say that no effort will be lacking to make it so on the part of the British Empire, which shares to the full the liberal and progressive spirit inspiring it.

"Let me add only one word as to the part played in these events by the gathering of the Imperial Cabinet in Downing Street. I venture to say that the action we have taken could not have been taken in so prompt, effective and unanimous a fashion, but for the intimate personal consultation between the Prime Ministers of the Empire and the representatives of India, which this gathering has enabled us to enjoy. We have taken counsel together without reserve. With this result before us, I need not elaborate the inestimable value of that close consultation and co-operation in the conduct of the Empire's affairs."

Mr. Hughes: There is one phrase, I think towards the beginning, I want you to look at; you say something about not having heard from Japan.

Lord Curzon: It is in the first paragraph.

Mr. Hughes: I want you to consider this. You make this announcement and you say we have not heard from Japan—Japan knows nothing of this. We know nothing of her news. Do not you think we could put something in which would be a little smoother for her?

Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

Lord Curzon: I saw the Japanese Ambassador this morning, and the Japanese Government is always a little punctilious about these things. I asked him what reply he had, and he said he had a reply on Saturday expressing no disapproval of the suggestion of a Conference, but asking him what were the exact suggestions which were going to be put before the Conference. I replied that that was a matter for subsequent discussion, and what we wanted was their assent to the Conference.

Views of Japanese.

I had a talk with him about the American Ambassador's proposal on the question, the idea of having two Conferences, the Pacific Conference before the other. With that idea he was warmly in agreement, and I asked if he thought there would be any objection on the part of his Government to it. He said he did not think he could conceive it would be possible there could be, and I sent him out of the room urging him to get his Government to wire at once consenting to both Conferences. I think we could put it in a more complimentary form if you like.

Mr. Hughes: If I had been a Japanese, I would say: "We were very much concerned in this. We are one of the two principal parties in this. China, who is our rival and one who is complaining and criticising, has said "Yes, but we have said nothing." I think you could get some other words which would just set that out in a little less troublesome manner. They are a very sensitive people.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes.

Lord Curzon: I think the phrase in that draft is: "I have no reason to doubt"; we could turn it round a little bit and say: "We have good reason to hope."

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes. We have good reason to hope; I think that is all right.

Mr. Hughes: I think if you were to say: "I have no reason to doubt" and so on . . . .

Mr. Lloyd George: It is rather taking it for granted.

Mr. Hughes: Japan has been very ready to appreciate our friendship and to renew this Alliance and so on, and if you follow that up it is all right, but the taste is there in their mouth.

Mr. Lloyd George: Take the general draft of the statement. Is it the line that the Conference would like taken?

Mr. Massey: Yes.

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Mr. Meighen: Yes. It is very good.

Mr. Balfour: I think it is very good, I do not say that you could not alter a word in it, but what document could you not alter a word in?

Mr. Lloyd George: Lord Chancellor, your part of it is fairly stated and is without offence to the law officers?

Lord Birkenhead: Yes. I should think so, I think they would be quite pleased with that statement.

Mr. Lloyd George: Viscount Chinda has left Toulon for Naples, but can be reached by wireless through the Admiralty. I should have thought that with Viscount Chinda in Europe they would have been quite satisfied.

Lord Curzon: That is for them to say. I could see the Ambassador this morning, but I cannot say anything involving his supersession.

Mr. Hughes: Viscount Chinda cannot get beyond Egypt without our getting a reply.

Lord Curzon: I think it is quite open to ask the Ambassador as to the kind of plenipotentiary his Government is likely to appoint; they might send two.

Mr. Lloyd George: You could suggest that the meeting might take place here as it is very important that the Dominion Premiers should be here.

Lord Curzon: I could do so this morning. The Japanese want it to take place here. They think they would have a rather better chance here.

Mr. Hughes: Has Viscount Chinda a reputation for supporting us or not? You do not propose to suggest that we hint at what Viscount Chinda will do?

Pacific and Disarmament Conference.

Lord Curzon: I could say to the Ambassador that it was necessary for the convenience of the Dominion Premiers that it should take place, probably at the end of August or the beginning of September, and if it is not possible to send anyone over, they might use one of their famous men who are here in Europe.

Mr. Massey: Have you suggested that date?

Lord Curzon: I have suggested no date to anybody.

Mr. Massey: The end of August or the beginning of September is too late.

Dates suitable to Dominion Premiers.

Mr. Hughes: You were out when the Prime Minister put that question to us. Mr. Massey and I said we must get back home, and now the arrangement is that we get there the first week in October. That would mean we would have to have this not later than the last week in August.

Lord Curzon: Very well. You see the Conference would take the best part of a week or ten days undoubtedly, because there are a great many issues to discuss.

Mr. Hughes: When the principles are settled, when there seems to be an understanding, that would be quite satisfactory, we would not necessarily have to stay.

Lord Curzon: The form it will take will be the enunciation of a number of principles which will be subscribed to by all the parties. I do not think it will take the form of a Treaty. It will be a Conference which will have agreed principles to which we can all put our names.

Mr. Hughes: That is all we want, and I hope Lord Curzon will note that it must not be later than the last week in August.

Mr. Massey: It ought to be before then.

Lord Curzon: Could you give me approximately the date on which you must go?

Mr. Massey: My date is approximately fixed for the 18th.

Lord Curzon: Allowing for the week or ten days . . . .

Mr. Massey: Then it will depend upon a ship being available. Parliament will not mind a week or ten days, but I might not get a suitable ship if I miss the ship at Vancouver, which is a fast one. I should have to fall back on a ship going through the Panamá, which will be a slow one.

Lord Curzon: When does the ship that you contemplate catching leave?

Mr. Massey: Just at the moment I am not able to say. My calculation was to leave on the 18th to get the ship at Vancouver.

Mr. Hughes: My date is approximately the 20th.

Mr. Lloyd George: Is there anything further to say about this?

Mr. Hughes: You will, of course, Lord Curzon, try to get it as early as possible?

Lord Curzon: Obviously, in the interests of everybody, ourselves included.

Mr. Lloyd George: We certainly do not want to keep the thing open. I think that will do and we will have that sent to the House. That is all we decided to do this morning. I thought it was of sufficient importance. We had summoned the British Cabinet for this morning and we put it off, but I thought it was of sufficient importance to summon the Imperial Conference so as to get an agreement. You see it is an acceptance.

Mr. Meighen: It is, of the Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: We will go on this afternoon.

Sir Maurice Hankey: I was wondering whether we ought not to speed up a little during the next few days. It is Foreign Policy this afternoon.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, at 4·30 P.M.

Sir Maurice Hankey: I understand you will be busy at the end of this week, and was wondering whether we should not take the Naval Question, so as to be sure of that getting through by next Thursday.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, I shall be very tied up after Wednesday. My statement this afternoon will take about half-an-hour, but I shall be back here by 4·30.

Future Agenda.

Lord Curzon: I have circulated to Members of the Conference certain papers, which they will get in the next half-hour, containing the principal clauses of the draft Agreement as to Egypt. We had a discussion about it last week, and I have circulated a draft for a permanent Agreement, and, if that is found impossible, a Provisional Agreement. There will have to be a discussion with the Delegation immediately, and I am quite willing to have discussion here, if thought desirable.

Mr. Hughes: You say you have circulated the papers?

Lord Curzon: Yes, I have my own copy and you will get yours when you get back to your offices. I do not think we should put the draft of what we want on the table. It will be better to let them blow off steam; Orientals like that sort of thing; and I will then indicate to them the points on which we are going to stand.

Mr. Hughes: You are suggesting that we should discuss that this afternoon.

Mr. Lloyd George: You had better read the papers before coming this afternoon, and if you find anything in them you would like to discuss, you had better let us know this afternoon.

Mr. Chamberlain: It is important to get on this afternoon with Constitutional questions, because, although Mr. Meighen does not want to add anything, there will be observations, no doubt, which some of the members will like to make.

Mr. Massey: Yes, it is one of the biggest questions we have to deal with. There are other points of view, and I really think there is nothing of more importance coming before this Conference, not only of importance to Mr. Hughes, but to everybody in the Empire. I know it is of the greatest importance to us.

Lord Curzon: I should like to go into the discussion with the knowledge that I have you behind me. At this moment, of course, I do not know whether you approve of the draft I have circulated. You had better look at it and see.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Hughes is anxious to know whether they can have the copies here. Is that possible?

Lord Curzon: They are already delivered at their offices, and they will find them all there.

Egypt.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Hughes has taken a very special interest in the Egyptian question. Have you read the Paper (E.31) that has been prepared, Mr. Hughes?

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: Have you anything you wish to say about it?

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: As Lord Curzon has to see the Egyptian delegates to-morrow I think he ought to know what are the views of the Conference.

Lord Curzon: I should like to have some indication of the lines I should go on. (Copies of E.31 were handed round.)

Suggested Clauses of Agreement.

I drew up yesterday a few clauses. Of course, an agreement, if an agreement is secured, will have to contain a good deal more, but what I thought you wanted me to do was to draw up in general phraseology, though I hope sufficiently precise, what I call the governing clauses of an agreement with Egypt. They proceed upon the hypothesis that the agreement we make, or try to make with them, is within the lines of the Cabinet decision which was read out here, and which was transmitted to Egypt in February of the present year. That decision, as you will remember, postulated the withdrawal of the protectorate as established in 1914, the substitution for it of Treaty arrangements with Egypt which would allow her to be constituted an independent State under a constitutional monarchy. Within those limits we are at liberty to lay down what lines I should insist upon, and the provisions we please. I must own again, as I stated the other day, that I think there will be a great difficulty in concluding any agreement with this deputation at all. My own impression is that they are in such deadly terror of Zaghlul and his extremists at the other end that they will decline anything; and it may be, therefore, that in the last resort we may have to contemplate a provisional rather than a permanent agreement.

British Forces in Egypt.

The points upon which I understood this meeting to lay great stress were these. Firstly, garrisons. The view was held here, which I certainly share most strongly, that no limitation ought to be placed, at any rate at the present stage, upon the continued presence of British troops in Egypt for the various purposes for which they are required: on the one hand, for the maintenance of Imperial communications; on the other hand, for the defence of Egypt against external aggression (an obligation which we assume); and in the third place, for the maintenance in the last resort, as occurred the other day at Alexandria, of internal order. I therefore propose to make no condition whatever either as to the number of troops that ought to be kept, or as to the places in which they should be kept, but to retain the right to keep a British force in the country. I should certainly not use the word "garrison," which is very invidious—but to keep a British force in the country at such places and for such time as may be considered desirable after discussion between the parties. Similarly, I put in a provision giving to the British Government the right to the use of the various harbours, aerodromes, barracks and so on, as may be required.

Foreign Relations.

The second point is that of foreign relations. In the old Cromer days the Egyptian Government did have, and has always had, a Foreign Office of its own under a Foreign Minister. That, of course, it would be unwise and, indeed, impossible to withdraw. The question you have to consider is what measure of control should be exercised over their administration of foreign affairs in the capital, Cairo, and what measure of similar control in foreign capitals. As regards the former, I do not think that you can do more than prescribe in general language that their foreign policy in Cairo should be conducted in close consultation with the British High Commissioner, Lord Allenby, for the moment. As regards representation of the Egyptian Foreign Office abroad, that is a point which Lord Milner conceded to Zaghlul Pasha after the meetings in London. Very grave doubt was expressed here as to whether we ought to concede that point. It was felt that Egyptian representatives in Paris and Rome might become the focus of a good deal of intrigue with foreign Powers, and therefore in these preliminary articles I have provided that while they should be allowed to have consuls in foreign towns or ports, for business purposes, the representation of Egypt in foreign capitals should be undertaken, at the request of the Egyptian Government, by the British representatives there. I tell you that I think there will be a very grave fight upon that, and that I very likely shall have to bring the matter again to the Conference at a later stage.

Status of Britain in the Administration.

Thirdly, I have put in a condition which did not appear in the Milner proposals, but which Lord Milner thought himself the Egyptian Government would accept, and that is, that in view of the special position that Great Britain will occupy, and of the very large number of British officers and officials who are in her service, the Egyptian Government must enter into an engagement that they do not employ foreign officers or officials in any branch of their service without the consent of the High Commissioner. The position of the High Commissioner himself can only be determined in general language and will depend, as all these things do in the last resort, more upon the personality and prestige of the individual than they can do upon any formulas you lay down in advance. However, we do propose to indicate here that the British High Commissioner shall be in a position of commanding authority and influence, and in the last resort he will be not merely a symbol, but the pivot of British supervision over that country.

Egypt.

Financial Control.

There remain the two questions of financial control and judicial control. Here it is proposed in these draft formulas to give to the Financial Commissioner a rather less shadowy position than that which was contemplated by Lord Milner. I have defined with some precision the functions which he will have to discharge when the present Commission of the Debt ceases to exist and its duties devolve upon him, what I may describe, indeed, as the functions that he must discharge for the due protection of foreign interests in Egypt when those foreign interests arising out of the abolition of the Capitulations are taken over by us. I further provide, or attempt to provide, for a general supervision over the financial side of the Administration, which is really vital in order to prevent a complete collapse, by giving him the right of access to the Egyptian Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance. Of course, what I mean by that in practice is this: I want him to know what is going on; I do not want him to be interfering at every stage in Egyptian Administration. We must let them walk in their own track now. They will no doubt make many grave mistakes. I have no doubt the Administration will deteriorate, but I want him to know what is going on, and then, in the last resort, he can do what all the British finance Ministers in Egypt have always done; they have gone and told the High Commissioner, so that if some great scandal is impending there is a chance of intervening and stopping it.

Judicial Control.

In the same way as regards the Judicial Commissioner, I have provided that he should be charged, as he must be, with the administration of the law in all matters affecting foreigners, assuming, as I have done, that those interests are to be handed over to us. I have given him similar powers of access to the Egyptian Ministers of Justice and of the Interior in order that he may have every opportunity of knowing what is going on.

Suez Canal.

I have added a paragraph at the end on another matter, which is really of almost greater importance than anything. Under the existing circumstances, the Suez Canal falls back into the hands of the Egyptian Government within a few years from now; I forget the exact number.

Mr. Churchill: Forty years.

Lord Curzon: It is something like that. It is very desirable indeed to contemplate at an early stage, and certainly at this stage when we are re-arranging the whole affairs, an arrangement by which the existing system, which places us in a position of practical control, should be continued for a long period of years. This, therefore, is the moment, I think, to endeavour to secure that the existing arrangement shall be prolonged for another period of 100 years.

Mr. Massey: By way of renewing the lease.

Lord Curzon: Yes; those I think are the main provisions, and I have put them down here really with a view, if you accept them, of giving me a sort of basis upon which I can stand in my conversations with these gentlemen, which are to begin to-morrow. I have always taken the view that at any stage when I come up to a bad fence which I cannot get over, and where I am liable to be unseated, I must come here in order to know whether you wish me to get up in the saddle again. I think such stages will occur very early in the day, but at any rate, these are the lines upon which I am prepared to act, if they are in general consonance with your views.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Prime Minister, I have had very little time to look at this paper, but I quite appreciate Lord Curzon's position, and if we are going to give him advice, now is the time to do it. Delay cannot improve and may still further prejudice our interests in this unfortunate matter. Looking hurriedly over a copy of the telegrams and despatches that Lord Curzon has sent, I feel that all I said the other day, and the anxiety I expressed in my original telegram to you, at what I felt to be the very serious position that had been created, was more than justified. Let me quote a few sentences from these telegrams to show exactly where we are. Page 6 of this paper (E.31), which commences with General Allenby's despatch to Lord Curzon dated the 16th April, 1921, and Mr. Patterson's memorandum on the matter, contains the following: "The Milner proposals staggered the country as being far beyond anything they had ever dreamed of, and in the case of many, as I have already said, they were horrified at having been taken so literally. As a member of the Legislative Assembly said to me, with tears in his eyes, 'I could never have believed it of Lord Milner.'"

It is unfortunate, Sir, we have not the Milner report before us. I have not seen it, and so have not been able to familiarise myself with it in detail, but I want to direct the attention of the Conference to one or two matters which seem vital. On page 1 of Lord Allenby's despatch, at the bottom of the page, there are these words, which, I venture to say, are pregnant both with meaning and with menace for us:—

> "The conclusion to be drawn from the memoranda submitted by Mr. Amos and Mr. Patterson is that we stand committed to the general principles of the policy initiated by Lord Milner, and that His Majesty's Government must bring that policy to its logical conclusion. I am broadly in agreement with the views set forth in their memoranda. I have on many occasions emphasised to your Lordship that the memorandum published in Egypt in August last has come to be regarded, whatever the real intentions of His Majesty's Government, as a substantive offer; and that any wide departure from the main principles of the settlement which that memorandum advocated would be regarded as a breach of faith, not only in Egypt itself, but by world opinion at large."

One fact stands out—that we have not before us a clean slate. A position has been created by the Milner report, and its premature publication, which amply bears out all that I said the other day. So when we are asked whether we agree to the very vital modifications suggested by Lord Curzon, to which I have no objection whatever, we have to remember Lord Allenby's words, "A substantive offer has already been made." And we are told that, "We must have regard for the opinion of Egypt and the world at large." Sir William Hayter has contributed a very valuable paper on this question. He has set out clearly—and it has to be accepted as a fact—that independence is what the Egyptian people seek, and independence is what Lord Milner promised them. Probably when they asked for this they did not expect to get it, but the point is, that Lord Milner definitely promised independence on behalf of the British Government, and, Lord Allenby says, this "is a substantive offer and is so regarded by the world at large." But it is perfectly clear to me, and I think to every member here, that we cannot go any further than is compatible with our vital interests. Lord Curzon has set out the views of all of us on the matter. You must have an army there; and it must be a real army, with power to act as our interests demand. Not as Lord Milner would have us accept as a substitute, for as Sir William Hayter says, "Lord Milner's conception of an army, subject to such limitation of its scope of action, is radically unsound." There is to be a British force, to be used only for the defence of Egypt against external foes, and the protection of our Imperial lines of communication. However many foreigners are murdered by the Egyptians, the British army is to do nothing, to stand aside. And this army of Lord Milner's is to be confined within a narrow zone. Sir William Hayter further declares that Lord Milner's idea of the functions of the Financial Adviser and judicial officer "appear to be altogether misconceived," while his recommendations "for the plan of judicial re-organisation, generally known as the Hurst Scheme, has had the unhappy fate of meeting with universal opposition." It is clear, then, that we cannot accept Lord Milner's scheme, although, as Lord Allenby says, "Egypt regards it as a substantive offer." On the other hand, then, we are told that we cannot go back to the status quo ante bellum. Lord Allenby is very emphatic about that. He says we cannot go back, we made an offer. Egypt could hardly believe its eyes when it read it, but it is now accepted by Egypt and the world—it is "a substantive offer." Well, if we cannot go back, and we dare not accept Lord Milner's scheme, what are we to do? If we offer the Egyptians the shell but not the kernel of Lord Milner's recommendations, will the world consider that we are keeping our word? I am rather afraid that it will not, but I am bound to repeat once more that I think it is deplorable that the creation of such a position was permitted. I could never have believed that Lord Milner could have done this thing—never. I thought a man with his temperament, outlook and conception of the Imperial position, was incapable of such a thing, but he has done it, and we are now asked to deal with the position which he, himself, has created, and which all these advisers of ours tell us—Lord Allenby, Mr. Amos, Mr. Patterson and Sir William Hayter—tell us we must accept, in appearance, if not in reality. But will appearance suffice? Lord Allenby says it must be regarded as "a substantive offer." I want to direct your attention, Mr. Prime Minister, and this is the last word I shall have to say on the matter, to the hope expressed by Mr. Patterson, in that: "If the Assembly refuse to ratify the agreement, His Majesty's Government can once more start again with a clean slate. Should, however, the agreement be ratified, we must see it through. It would be the most fatal error to go back on what is virtually an offer of the Government's to Egypt. Details may be modified and safeguards added, but in its general line the scheme should not be broken in Downing Street. If an agreement is come to it will still have to be ratified by an Egyptian Assembly, and I feel that there is a most excellent chance that it would never be ratified." Here, then, is the solid truth, as Mr. Patterson sees it. We are to offer something which must not be a mere shell of what Lord Milner offered them. It may be modified in detail but not in substance. And then we must hope that the Egyptian Assembly will fail to ratify this counsel of despair. I feel, in these circumstances, that nothing that I could say would help this Conference, but am more than ever convinced that I ought not to have omitted what I said the other day and have in part repeated to-day. That we should be confronted with such a situation created in such a way is deplorable. And although I find myself in excellent company, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Foreign Secretary at that time, and, of course, the present Foreign Secretary and Mr. Churchill—and I assume the whole of the Cabinet—it is deplorable that we in the outer Dominions should have been kept in ignorance of what had been done.

Egypt.

Mr. Lloyd George: We were just as staggered as Mr. Patterson.

Mr. Hughes: Lord Curzon, if you really ask my humble opinion as to the proposals set out by you, I say, stand fast by them—I am perfectly satisfied. But I say now emphatically that you ought not to go any further, that it is the last we can do in all the circumstances. We have to choose between these proposals and taking another and fatal step along a road on which we ought never to have set our feet for a moment unless we intend to destroy this Empire. Is it suggested for a moment that we should confine our troops to the Canal Zone? I pointed out to you in that cable of mine how this appeared to me the way to destruction. For that and other reasons I strongly urge that Lord Curzon's recommendations be strictly adhered to with only such minor modifications as will maintain in their integrity our vital interests. We must have control of foreign affairs, we must have an army of occupation, our High Commissioner must take precedence of others, our financial adviser must be the authority to whom they look for counsel, and where advised they must follow, for the rest of it is a modus vivendi for a period, and, as Sir William Hayter says in the postscript to his recommendations, at the expiry of this period of ten years Egypt's claim for complete independence will have to be very seriously considered. It must be clearly understood that we accept this position without prejudice to our own interests and are not committed to anything definite.

Supports Lord Curzon's proposals.

I have only to add this, Sir, if we fix this period ten years, if we say, "We will do this for ten years, without prejudice to your claim for independence," the position should be clearly understood. The Egyptians should be made to understand that while we do it without prejudice to their right to reserve their claim for independence, we at the end of ten years, on our part, will consider without prejudice the position on its merits as the facts then are. We cannot go further along this road and commit ourselves to another definite policy. Ten years in the life of a nation or of an Empire like this is nothing. In ten years the world, as Sir William Hayter says, may be a much safer place for defenceless nations. But to-day our circumstances are such that we must control the Canal; it is one of the vital communications of our Empire. We cannot control the Canal unless we have control of the country.

Reconsideration suggested after ten years.

Mr. Lloyd George: Does anybody else wish to say anything about this?

Mr. Montagu: I would ask Lord Curzon about this. There is a new provision in this that I do not quite understand. I understand how important it is if we are going to recede from Lord Milner's position with a desire to maintain British interests, but once again, there appears here what amounts really to the complete control of Egypt in finance. The Finance Commissioner is to be consulted on all matters of finance. What I have in my mind is merely this, that owing to the fact that Lord Milner was not repudiated when he came home, and has never been repudiated, I feel so anxious if I can to avoid a terrible letting-down of Adly Pasha. He has fought, as far as I understand, the battle; he has quarrelled with all his old friends, and has been trying his best to improve the present situation in Egypt. He has got to be presented with variations of the Milner proposal designed, as Mr. Hughes and the Prime Minister have said, to preserve the vital interests of the British Empire. Are the financial provisions essential to the position of the British Empire? Is it necessary to impose so stringent a control on the future of Egypt in its finances? This sort of provision appears so often in this kind of document. I never could understand how great Imperial purposes are served by it, and it is certainly a tremendous lowering of the independent Government of Egypt and its people which I thought was only to be done in the interests of the British Empire.

Lord Curzon: In answer to Mr. Montagu, I think I can reply easily on the various points he has made. If you will look at my article No. 5 you will find that powers are provided for this Finance Commissioner in three respects. The first are those functions which will devolve upon him in connection with the protection of the financial interests of foreign Powers. There is no dispute about that whatever. In any agreement that is concluded that must play a part.

The second category of powers are those provided for in No. 13, and here Mr. Montagu speaks of my having provided for the stringent control of every aspect of Egyptian finance by this officer. Surely that is not the case. What is it proposed that he shall do:—

> "For the proper discharge of his duties the Financial Commissioner shall be kept fully informed of all matters within the purview of the Ministry of Finance, and shall at all times enjoy the right of access to the President of the Council of Ministers and to the Minister of Finance."

For my own part this seems to be very shadowy. What I have provided for is not interference, but knowledge of what is going on, and I do not think I have provided for more. As regards the third provision, No. 13, with regard to no external loan being raised for the revenue of any public service being assigned by the Egyptian Government without the concurrence of the Financial Commissioner, that is a proposal of Lord Allenby himself, and has been transferred by me bodily from one of his papers. That is how I wish to reply to Mr. Montagu. With regard to what Mr. Hughes has said, I would make one observation. While it is quite true that Lord Allenby has more than once drawn attention to the difficulty of getting away from the main lines of Lord Milner's proposal, every single proposal I have made here has the personal concurrence of Lord Allenby himself, and he thinks we can make a good stand and get them. Whether the situation has changed on the part of Zaghlul—that may be the case—or not, I am proposing nothing here that will not have the backing of the British High Commissioner.

Proposals approved by Lord Allenby.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think we might pass on now to the other question. We will pass on to the other subject. It is important that Lord Curzon should secure the views of the Conference before he meets the delegation.

Mr. Hughes: How was the reply to President Harding received in the House?

Mr. Lloyd George: Very well. They were very pleased.

Mr. Balfour: It was received very well.

Mr. Lloyd George: They were very pleased. Somebody told me who was sitting next to the American Ambassador that he looked pleased.

Mr. Meighen: I think he should be.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes. Now let us go on to the other problem. Mr. Meighen, did I understand that you left it where you put it before?

Mr. Meighen: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: For the moment. In that case I will pass on to Mr. Hughes.

Mr. Meighen: If what I say is attacked it may be necessary to reply to it.

General Smuts: What is the subject that we are discussing?

Mr. Lloyd George: The constitutional question—foreign policy.

The Constitutional Question.

Mr. Hughes: It is really the case that Mr. Meighen presented.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Meighen has made suggestions.

Mr. Hughes: I think I will direct my remarks to what Mr. Meighen said, for his speech really opens up the whole question.

I will devote myself to an examination of the position as set out by Mr. Meighen, because his view raised issues of such importance that they must be decided somehow or other, in order that we may know where we are. First of all, I desire to say that with much that Mr. Meighen has said I find myself entirely in accord. Many of the principles he lays down are not new. The basic principles upon which the Commonwealth of British nations rests are two: complete autonomy of the various parts, and unity of the whole. If I find myself unable to agree entirely with Mr. Meighen, it is not because he puts forward new principles, but because he seeks to extend existing principles much farther than has hitherto been done. It is not possible now to review the constitutional relations between Britain and the Dominions at length, and I do not propose to do so. I do not deny for a moment that the claim for wider application of existing powers which Mr. Meighen lays down as essential to Canada's welfare and progress is unassailable, if we consider Canada only as a self-governing Dominion, to whom by separate representation at the Peace Conference and as a signatory of the Versailles Treaty was accorded the status of a nation.

Mr. Meighen's suggestions.

But as Mr. Meighen has himself pointed out, although Canada is a nation, she is also a member of the Empire, that is to say, a nation within a federation of nations, and so, in a very different position to a nation like America, which not only does not seek alliances, but expressly declines them.

The point we have to consider is whether the application of the principles in the manner suggested by Mr. Meighen is compatible with our obligations to, or our membership of, the Empire. As I see it they are not. Let me show as shortly as possible why this is so. It is obvious that these two basic principles, upon which the Empire rests, autonomy and unity, are inconsistent, and that the relations actually existing between Britain and the Dominions would be impossible, but for the spirit in which the rights enjoyed by all are exercised. The explanation of how communities, enjoying the most complete autonomy and jealously insisting upon their right to exercise it as they deem fit, yet proudly declare themselves partners of a united Empire is to be found in their history, in the circumsances of their origin and development, and in the sea power of Britain. This last has been a dominating factor in Empire development and of itself sufficiently explains why the great self-governing Dominions, while being clothed with ever-widening powers of self-government, have never found any difficulty in reconciling their rights of autonomy with partnership of a united Empire. Quite apart from those other things which bind us together; race, language, ideals, free institution of government and trade, the sea power of Britain—the Motherland of the Dominions—is a sufficient reason why the Dominions, although in name and fact, nations, should exercise their rights of self-government in a way which makes the British Empire, what you said the other day, "a living force." Every Dominion owes all that it has of greatness and of liberty to one great fact. For over a hundred years the British navy has been the greatest sea power in the world. The territories of the Dominions are scattered all over the world; great stretches of ocean divide them from each other and from Britain. They have been able for over a hundred years to develop their great heritages without fear of foreign aggression. Or to put it in other words, but for the British navy, they would not now be self-governing Dominions—nor in all human probability be in existence as British or even free communities at all.

Dominions dependent on British Sea-power.

It will be convenient here to state Mr. Meighen's postulates and consider the effect of their application upon the various Dominions and upon the Empire as a whole. With Mr. Meighen's plea for "regular and if possible continuous Conferences, among other things for determining and clarifying the governing principles of our relations with foreign countries, and of seeking common counsel, and advancing contentment thereupon," we are, I feel sure, all heartily in accord. I am not quite sure what Mr. Meighen means by his reference to "Conferences determining and clarifying the governing principles with foreign countries." I should have thought the difficulty lay, not in "determining or clarifying principles," but rather in applying these principles to concrete cases. Personally, I see no reason why we cannot lay down the principles which ought to govern our relations with foreign countries at this Conference. But I do see very great difficulties in applying these principles to the very many questions of foreign policy that may arise, say, within the next two years. The need for regular Conferences, however, is obvious. The practical difficulties not less so. I have already said something on this head and further opportunity will be afforded before the Conference adjourns.

Voice of Dominions in Foreign Policy.

I come now to postulate Nos. 2 and 3, to which I will refer: "That while in general, final responsibility rests with the Ministry advising the King, such Ministry should, in formulating the principles upon which such advice is founded and the application of these principles, have regard to the views of His Majesty's Privy Council in other Dominions and of the representatives of India.

"3. That as respects the determination of the Empire's foreign policy in spheres in which any Dominion is peculiarly concerned, the view of that Dominion must be given weight commensurate with the importance of the decision to that Dominion. Speaking for Canada, I make this observation with particular reference to our relations with the United States."

Now, here Mr. Meighen maintains in effect and indeed in so many words, that while final responsibility for advising the King upon matters relating to foreign policy rests with the British Ministry, the views of Ministers in other Dominions should be had regard to. With that view interpreted as I understand it, I entirely agree.

Effect of individual Dominions having special Rights in certain phases of Foreign Policy.

But postulate 3 lays down "that where any Dominion is peculiarly concerned in the Empire's foreign policy, the view of that Dominion should be given weight commensurate with the importance of the decision to that Dominion." And Mr. Meighen adds that he makes this observation in regard to Canada's relation to America. Now, if this postulate of Mr. Meighen's be applied to all questions and to every Dominion, as he states quite definitely it is intended, where is it going to lead us? With all respect to Mr. Meighen, I cannot see how we can continue as a united Empire if each one of the partners insists—as they logically may—on exercising their autonomous rights to the extent here implied. The effect will not be immediate, but as I see it, it is inevitable that we shall drift apart. We are like men parting at an old rendezvous, wandering along inviting but unfamiliar paths; for a little while we shall hear each other's voices regarding our relationship and our common interests unaffected, returning at irregular intervals for a few years to the old rendezvous, but each year will see us farther estranged.

Mr. Meighen's postulate is, in my opinion incompatible with a united Empire—with an Empire that will endure.

Canadian Relations with United States.

Mr. Meighen tells us that the relations between Canada and the United States on all matters of mutual concern are so vast and so vital to Canada, that the control of those relations has become and must remain a matter incident to Canada's autonomy.

Now these words, read along with Mr. Meighen's postulates and general argument and his firm intention to appoint an Ambassador at Washington, clearly indicate that in determining the foreign policy between Britain or the Empire and United States, Canada's advice is to be followed. Or to put it in other words, Canada is to determine the foreign policy of the Empire with the United States. I do not think this would be good for the world. I am quite certain it would not be good for the Empire. Let us look at the relative position of Canada and the United States. Canada has 9 millions, United States over 100 millions. We know very well to what extent American trade and financial interests must necessarily affect Canada. We all admire the United States. We want to be friends with her, to have such an understanding with her that would ensure the world's peace. But it can hardly be said that her response to our advances has been enthusiastic. She refuses to come into the League of Nations, although it was established for no other reason than our belief that she wanted it. She refuses to accept many of the responsibilities under the Treaty of Versailles. She is apparently hostile to the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, and this in the face of the fact that she has been told in most definite terms that we would most certainly not sign any Treaty that involved in the most general way the possibility of war between the Empire and the United States. And as we all know, the anti-British forces in the United States are—and are likely to remain—strong enough to prevent rapproachment between the two English-speaking peoples that we desire.

Undesirability of Empire Relations with United States being Governed by Canada.

Now what must necessarily be the result of applying Mr. Meighen's postulates to the determination of the foreign policy of the Empire towards the United States. That policy will be as we have been plainly told, moulded on the advice given by Canada. It is hardly possible that such advice will not tend towards a foreign policy suited to the circumstances and interests of the United States rather than to Britain. If we admit that the trade and national interests of the United States and Britain may at times clash, then is it not clear that since Canada's relations with the United States are so vast and vital, and her trade with the Republic so great and daily becoming greater, that Canada's advice can hardly be such as would prejudice her great neighbour? Canada's geographical position, as well as the overwhelming superiority of the population and of the naval and military strength of the United States, is such that any other attitude would be difficult, if not impossible. On the other hand, the idea that the Foreign Policy of the United States would be moulded by considerations of Canada's interests can hardly be entertained. So then it comes to this. What we are asked to agree to is that the Foreign Policy of the Empire is to be determined by the United States of America! If Canada were not a partner in the British Empire this would be none of our business: but she is, and as Mr. Meighen has told us, she is resolved to remain so. That being so, how can we agree that the Foreign Policy of the Empire, upon which the security and the very existence of the other great Dominions depend, should be determined by postulates, the application of which must subordinate the interests of the Empire—and any part of it, except perhaps those of Canada—to those of any other Power? The argument could be elaborated at much greater length, but it will suffice for the present to touch upon one other point. Mr. Meighen has insisted that his postulates are to be applied generally, and that goes without saying. What is conceded to Canada must be conceded to all the Dominions, and ultimately at all events to India.

C 62128

The Constitutional Question.

Australian Position and Interests in the East.

Now the circumstances of Australia are entirely different from those of Canada. We are a continent remote from the Western World. The oceans are our boundaries. Our development has proceeded along different lines from Canada. The bulk of our trade is with Britain. She buys the greater part of our produce. We are one of the best of her customers. Our trade with America is relatively small compared to that with the United Kingdom. That is one point. I have said we are remote from the Western World, but we are very near to the great population of the East. We are nearer to China and Japan than any other country. Eastern questions and development deeply concern us. We depend for our safety as a free community upon sea power. If any Power other than Britain controlled the sea, our position would be untenable. This being so, let us apply Mr. Meighen's postulate to the circumstances of Australia. Since we are vitally concerned in China and Japan—very much more so than Canada, or South Africa—then our advice must be taken on matters of Foreign Policy affecting the East, particularly those questions relating to China and Japan. Then again, since we depend absolutely on sea power for our existence, our advice must be followed—or as Mr. Meighen puts it—must be given weight commensurate with its importance to us in any discussion on Naval Power. Our interest in regard to the settlement of the Pacific problem is vital, and is immeasurably greater than that of some of the Dominions, if not all, except New Zealand. Is our voice only to be heard in the settlement of the Pacific policy? All these things are as much incident to our autonomy as are the relations with the United States incident to that of Canada. But our policy and our circumstances demand among other things, the maintenance of a navy greater than Britain herself can support, and so imposes on all the other Dominions the duty of adequately supplementing British naval expenditure by contributions in money or kind upon a uniform basis. Mr. Meighen has invited us to express our opinion on the postulates which he has put before us, which should determine Foreign Policy. I have endeavoured to show some of the reasons why I believe they cannot and ought not to be accepted, at all events without important reservations.

Unity of Empire compromised if Foreign Policy moulded on wishes of individual Dominions.

I do not wish to push this line of argument further. I can quite understand Mr. Meighen's position. It is quite distinct from that of our own, but if one Dominion is going to claim the right of insisting upon the Foreign Policies of the Empire being moulded upon her advice when her interests are peculiarly involved, conditions are created which are incompatible with the unity of the Empire. It is quite another thing that Mr. Meighen should come here and present his case, argue it, and convince us. I am trying to develop the point that Mr. Meighen in effect wishes to reduce to writing, a governing principle which in the future will determine the Foreign Policy of this Empire. I wish him to contrast that which he wishes us to do with that which is and has been the practice from the very first time that Conferences have been called together in this place, and particularly since the Imperial Cabinet was first assembled. We are gathered round this table to decide without prejudice upon the merits of every case that arises, and if Mr. Meighen would leave it at that, all would be well. No plea will be made on behalf of the whole of this Empire, or of any part of it, to which the majority of the members of this Council would turn a deaf ear. Mr. Meighen has put the case with considerable force. But we know that when he seeks to reduce that to writing, he seeks to substitute a cast-iron principle governing our future action for those well-tried and salutary methods upon which we have relied. He does not seek the opportunity to convince us, but to lay down a principle that will take away from us the right to determine each case upon its merits. We cannot agree to that. I am sure that would involve Mr. Meighen in as many difficulties as ourselves.

The Constitutional Question.

Mr. Lloyd George: You mean you can use it as an argument, but it must not be a sort of action.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, you may use Mr. Meighen's postulate as an argument, but not apply it as a principle. Mr. Meighen asks you to consider his circumstances. We are very ready to consider them. He wants us to see what it means to him and give him a verdict which is compatible with justice to the whole Empire, and to the interests of Canada in particular. Where can he find men more ready to consider the difficulties which confront him and to aid him to overcome them than are seated round this table? But he wants something more. And to this I do not see that it is possible we can agree. I urge most strongly that we shall not lay down principles which must in effect cramp that perfect freedom which marks this Empire out from all other Empires, ancient or modern. Every man sitting round this table is a man sitting in authority amongst his own people. He is now able to say to his fellow citizens: " You have in future the right to mould not only your own destiny, but that of the Empire also. There are no limitations to your power; there is nothing you cannot do; providing only your cause be just, right and reason shall prevail. And this is the principle underlying all our free institutions, from the Parish Council in Australia, Canada or New Zealand, right up to this Grand Council of Empire. Just as there are no limitations to the power of the elector of Britain, so there is nothing we cannot do except that which is repugnant to our sense of justice, which we know is not right, which impairs our liberties, menaces our security, and strikes a blow at the unity of the Empire. I do ask Mr. Meighen not to insist upon doing that which will make it impossible for us to continue those relations under which we are able, as it were, to reconcile the irreconcilable autonomy of the parts and unity of the whole. The world has never before seen a Constitution such as ours; I ask him to remember when he takes this step that we cannot stop there; we must go on.

Advantages of Conferences over Written Constitution.

I do not ask him to refrain from appointing an Ambassador. We can argue that round this table. If Mr. Meighen insists upon it, he has a perfect right to do so, but he will not deny us a like right to speak freely as we think. There I leave it. I do hope we shall attempt to do nothing that will fetter our right to discuss things on their merits; nor to reduce to writing that which will only have the effect in the end of making relations that exist between the different parts of the Empire impossible. It is only by wise restraint, by refraining from exercising our undoubted rights as self-governing communities that an Empire such as ours which rests upon two conflicting principles of autonomy of the parts and unity of the whole can endure. If I were to say here and now on behalf of Australia, " there are things that we have the right to do," and then Britain should set down the things that she could do, and assume that both Australia and Britain proposed to exercise to the full these undoubted rights, then and there would be the end. It is because we have been cast in the same mould and bred in the same constitutional environment that we have exercised all our privileges with that restraint without which this Empire cannot continue to exist. I hope that we shall not hear so much about the rights of any particular part of the Empire, especially if these are to be urged to a point where it means the destruction of the Empire itself, or to the prejudice of any particular part of the Empire.

The other day we listened to an admirable statement of the case for India. I ask Mr. Meighen, " Is the voice of India to prevail, and if not, why not? ": and if it is to prevail, what has General Smuts got to say? Who is to decide between them? If any authority can, then it is this Council. But we cannot decide save by their consent. There is no written Constitution, no binding laws or code which limits their rights. The Empire is united only because every member of it is absolutely free. If we once lay down this or any principle in writing, it must prevail. But General Smuts and Mr. Sastri know perfectly well what this would mean. General Smuts knows that the authority of this Council, if it has any, can now only be applied if the parties agree. But if we lay down principles, the position will be fundamentally changed. How can each part have complete autonomy when some authority superior to themselves can impose its will upon them? Here I leave the question. I hope that we shall be able to come to a realisation of the fact that we can only be free nations by exercising our freedom with due regard to the freedom of every other part of the Empire.

The Constitutional Question.

General Smuts: We are really discussing two different subjects, which, though related, are really different. One is the subject of the Dominions' share in foreign policy, which has been raised by Mr. Meighen, and that is really subsidiary to the other and larger question, the Constitutional Conference.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, I think so.

The Question of a Constitutional Conference.

General Smuts: That is the matter for which we were called together. The subjects as announced to us for discussion included the settling of the agenda of the Constitutional Conference for next year or some future date. That is the really important matter, and it arises out of a resolution which was passed in 1917 at the Imperial War Conference, which was to the following effect:—

> " The Imperial War Cabinet are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special Imperial Conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities."

This subject of constitutional relations was raised at the Conference of 1917, and after a good deal of discussion, and after private Conferences among the Dominion representatives themselves, we framed this resolution, that the subject was far too important and difficult to deal with during the war period, and that it should stand over and be dealt with at some future Conference. The resolution then went on to lay down certain guiding principles. It laid down that the autonomy of the Dominions should be recognised in full, and that their existing rights should not be infringed upon or abrogated in any respect. It also laid down that they should have a share and an adequate voice in foreign policy and foreign relations, and that some machinery for more frequent and continuous consultation should be devised: but that the Conference itself which was to determine these things should be held at some future date. We have been called together in this present Imperial Cabinet to consider as one of our subjects the agenda of that future Conference which is to be held, and I take it that that is really the major subject which we are now discussing. The Dominions' share in Imperial policy is only an aspect of this larger question. I think we were very wise in not dealing finally with this subject in 1917, because in 1917 nobody could have foreseen what the course of events would be during the war and at the end of the war, and if we had had to lay down in 1917 the constitutional relations in the Empire, we might have been entirely out in our reading of the trend of things. These relations developed much after 1917, and the whole matter came to a head finally at Paris, at the Peace Conference, where the question of the constitutional relations of the Dominions was raised in a very decisive and conclusive form at the various meetings of the British Empire Delegation. The question was raised as to what share we should take in the Peace Conference. That is how it was first raised, and you know, Prime Minister, that in the Imperial War Cabinet the subject was given a great deal of consideration even before we went to Paris—what form of representation should be given to the Dominions at the Peace Conference. Owing to the insistence of the Dominions themselves, and to the very firm support they received from the British Government all through, it was finally decided that they should have the same representation as the minor Powers. We went to the Peace Conference on that basis, and on that basis alone, that we should have the same right of speaking and voting, that we should take part in the whole Conference exactly on the same basis as the minor Powers. When the form of the Peace Treaty came to be settled there were many meetings of the British Empire Delegation. We wanted the Peace Treaty to be moulded in a form which would recognise the new position of the Dominions. The earlier draft did not do so. Neither the Covenant of the League of Nations nor the Peace Treaty as a whole, in their original form, gave expression to this new status of the Dominions. But here again the point was raised. It was fought out, and again the Dominions were firmly supported by the

The Constitutional Question.

British Government, with the result that in the final form of the Peace Treaty, the Dominions signed as parties. The British Empire was constituted as a group, and in that group the Dominion Ministers signed on behalf of their own countries and their own Governments. They were specially authorised by the King and by formal resolutions of their respective Governments to act as plenipotentiaries. What emerged therefore from these very important events was that the Dominions, instead of being under the tutelage, so to say, of the British Government, as they had been in all their foreign relations in earlier times, emerged as States with an international status; they took part in this International Conference, they signed that great international document on behalf of themselves, no longer with a British Government signing for them, but signing for themselves.

Mr. Massey: For the King, on behalf of their own countries.

General Smuts: Yes; they signed as plenipotentiaries authorised by the King, the King having been moved thereto by the resolutions of the various Dominion executives. The position, therefore, in the middle of 1919 was entirely different and had altered completely from what it had been in the middle of 1917, when this resolution which I have read was passed. I say that we were wise in not pressing matters to a conclusion in 1917, but in awaiting the results of the war and holding our Conference thereafter. It is certain that when this Conference comes to be held next year or the year after, or on any future date, we shall have an entirely new situation in the British Empire to consider, a situation entirely different from that which existed in 1917.

The position as it has now emerged has been repeatedly declared as one of equality in status between the United Kingdom and the Dominions. Ministers of the Crown in a most formal way have declared that it is the general result emerging from what has happened at Paris. But although that is stated to be the general principle and the general result, there is no doubt that the position remains to a large extent obscure. I was involved in a great conflict over this question immediately after the Peace Conference. When I went back to South Africa in July 1919, after the Peace Conference, I found that a Republican movement had sprung up there, and that a very strong party had been formed whose main, in fact only, plank was the secession of South Africa as an independent Republic from the British Empire. I countered the movement by putting the other picture, by explaining to the people of South Africa what had really happened in regard to the status of the Dominions. I explained to them that they were no longer in a position as a subordinate British Colony as they had been before; that their position in the British Empire had changed fundamentally and that although there was a great deal of obscurity still, although all sorts of constitutional conundrums could still be proposed as to details, yet in principle, the new position had been laid down by the precedents established in Paris, and that we in South Africa and all the Dominions had acquired an international status, had been recognised by our signature of the Peace Treaty as having that international status, and that we were no longer in a position of subordination. On that general line I fought the General Election in 1920. I had to fight another on practically the same issue in the beginning of this year. The constitutional position in the Empire is therefore not a mere academic question, it is one of vital importance, and I think the time is coming, and has come, when we should do whatever we can to remove the obscurities which still cling to the situation. If we can do so by any constitutional declarations which could be made now or could be made hereafter at a Constitutional Conference, I think we should very materially assist the position in the Empire as a whole. As I say, in South Africa this separation movement has actually arisen; it has been beaten down at the recent elections, but it is by no means dead; we shall have to bear that in mind. It is also in agreement with the general trend of opinion all over the world. This movement in favour of greater national liberty and freedom is a world movement, and the British Empire will feel it too; and the more we can make it clear to the component parts of the Empire and to the world that ours is not a system of subordination, that this is not a system of one dominant Power or Government which keeps the others in a subordinate position, but that it is a system of equal States working together on principles of equality and freedom, the more we will, to my mind, stabilise the position in the British Empire and the greater power for good we shall be.

Situation of South Africa after the War.

Need for Declaration on the Constitution of the Empire.

The whole matter has been left by the Resolution of 1917 to the Constitutional Conference which is still to be held. The position, as I say, has already been considerably developed by what happened at Paris; but what happened at Paris is, after all, only a precedent, and the constitutional position has to be clarified in the Empire. I am very much opposed to a written Constitution for the Empire. We have seen during the war how a written Constitution, like that of the United States of America, hampered its Government at every turn and made the prosecution of the war a matter of the utmost difficulty. We have seen also how a rigid Constitution like that worked at the making of peace when it really became impossible for the American Government to make peace; peace was made only long afterwards, only the other day, in fact, in a way which is still unintelligible to me. A resolution has been passed, but the effect of that resolution and what is to happen thereunder is still not clear to me. These anomalous results arise under written Constitutions. We have a different type of Constitution. It is not written; it is moulded by precedent, moulded by the internal development of the situation from time to time; and therefore the Constitution is like a garment that fits the body and the spirit of the whole group of nations as they develop in their national and their group relations. I am for maintaining that essential unwritten character of the Constitution, and I am against written formulas. But whilst that is so, I also think that it ought to be possible to clarify a number of points which to-day are obscure. They are obscure, even to constitutional lawyers; they are obscure to the Empire and they are obscure to the world outside.

The Constitutional Question.

Objections to a Written Constitution.

Take the case now of what happened in the United States when the ratification of the Peace Treaty came forward, and objection was taken to the voting power of the Dominions in the Assembly of the League of Nations. It is quite clear that the constitutional position in the Empire was entirely misunderstood in the United States. They still looked upon the four British Dominions as British Colonies, as constituents whose votes were commanded by the mother country. They did not understand what the new position in the British Empire was and that the votes were not commanded by the British Government at all, and that the Dominions were on a footing of equality in their new international status, and represented directly by their own spokesmen at the League of Nations. It is quite clear, from the debates that took place in the Senate, so far as I have been able to follow them, that the position was not understood. No difficulty was felt in the Senate against Cuba having a seat in the League of Nations, but difficulty was raised in the case of a British Dominion, which has a position of far greater real independence than Cuba. Not only from the point of view of internal public opinion in the Empire, but from the point of view of outside world opinion, I think we should clear up the situation. We can do so, I think, if half a dozen principles or declarations could be framed.

Status of Dominions not understood in United States.

Mr. Massey: Then you get the written Constitution.

General Smuts: I would not make it a written Constitution at all. I would certainly not favour very much the form of declaration which Mr. Meighen has submitted, because the subject is difficult and more complicated than he imagines.

Mr. Massey: I agree with you upon that point.

General Smuts: I know we agree, except in opinions; we are fundamentally in agreement. No; I think it would be unwise for us to lay down large vague general principles, the application of which in detail it would be difficult to foresee; I am therefore not in favour of the form of principles laid down in Mr. Meighen's memorandum. To 90 per cent. I think I could in practice agree, I think they are sound working principles, and in practice we shall act according to the spirit of them. A Dominion which has a special interest in the settlement of any question would no doubt carry special weight in the settlement of that question, and you could assume that as a fundamental axiom; but to lay it down as a fixed written principle might warrant further conclusions to which I would not agree, and which might be very dangerous. But there are other declarations clarifying our status of equality in the British Empire and the relations of the component parts, which could very well be formulated and be laid down, and which could receive some constitutional sanction and in that way clear up the position which is now to some extent obscure. I do not know in what way to proceed about this matter. We are asked to lay down an Agenda for this Constitutional Conference. Now there are two ways of settling an Agenda. One way is to tabulate a list of subjects that are going to be discussed. To my mind, if we were to do that we would not help this matter forward at all, and I doubt

The Constitutional Question.

Suggested publication of certain Propositions for consideration by Constitutional Conference.

whether there is any utility in simply stating a list of subjects which the Constitutional Conference of next year or the year after is going to discuss. I see no use in that. That Conference will itself determine the list of subjects that it will discuss, but I have been wondering whether we could not usefully go a step further and do something which would be of real utility, and that is, formulate a list of propositions about the constitution of the Empire, entirely of a provisional character, and for the consideration and settlement of that Conference work out a list of such propositions and publish them for the notice of the Empire and of the whole world. Then if half a dozen propositions like that could be formulated now, clearing up the real relations that exist in the Empire, they could be debated in the Empire, they would help to guide and form public opinion, and when the Conference of next year, or the following year does meet, it will have some concrete material to work on, and it can either accept or reject those propositions. But it would have provisional and tentative propositions before it which would have been discussed in the various parts of the Empire in the meantime. To-day, there is nothing to discuss. I do not know whether the subject of constitutional relations is discussed at all except in a country like South Africa where they arise in a very acute form, but if we could frame a series of propositions, and, without passing them finally, publish them as provisional propositions to be the material on which the Conference of the following year would work, then I think we would be giving a good lead to public opinion now, and we would settle the material for discussion, in the meantime, of those important subjects. I do not know what more one can say in a general statement. To my mind, this is a matter rather to be thrashed out in a sub-committee.

Practical machinery for obtaining opinion of Dominions in Foreign Policy.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should have liked to have heard a little more, both from Mr. Hughes and yourself, on the very practical question of how, apart altogether from these general principles, you are to conduct the day-to-day work of the foreign relations of the Empire, and to gather the opinion of the Dominions upon the great questions.

Mr. Hughes: I did not attempt to do that.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is a very practical issue for us and for you.

General Smuts: That is so, Prime Minister. I am not prepared now to go into that question. It is a most difficult question, and the answer to it involves new machinery which does not exist to-day. To-day, the only form of consultation that there is is a weekly telegram from you to us on foreign affairs, notifying us of what is going on. Generally, those telegrams arrive after the events.

Mr. Lloyd George: I know; that is what I want to have from you. What do you suggest we should do in order to gather your opinions? We are inviting them.

Mr. Hughes: I think you should ask us to make some concrete suggestion, but I think it is only fair to say, at any rate as regards myself, that I understood you to refer to the general principle.

General Smuts: I am speaking generally now. So far, I have been speaking quite generally. I have not come to anything concrete.

Mr. Hughes: I should be ready, as I am sure General Smuts will be, to do what we can.

General Smuts: The answer to the Prime Minister's question involves new machinery in the Empire which will require very careful consideration, and which we could proceed to discuss to-morrow.

Mr. Massey: I am not raising any objection. If you desire to go on to-morrow I am quite willing.

Mr. Lloyd George: One of the resolutions adopted by the Imperial Cabinet was the right to nominate a Dominion Minister, a resident Minister here, to take part in our discussions. Well, I am not sure that any Dominion has acted upon . . . .

Sir Maurice Hankey: There have been some . . . .

General Smuts: That suggestion has never been practically carried out.

Mr. Massey: Because the Cabinet was dropped. I am speaking of the War Cabinet.

General Smuts: You understand that I have not discussed at all the very important question that you have raised. There are other similar important questions.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is our practical difficulty.

The Constitutional Question.

Mr. Massey: Prime Minister, I have referred to this question on other occasions, even during the present Conference, and I do not know that it is necessary that I should go over the same ground. Still, I want to discuss one or two of the points referred to this afternoon. Mention is continually being made of our autonomy. I have said before that so far as I can see there was not the slightest intention on the part of the British Government, or the Imperial Cabinet—just as you choose to express it—to interfere with our autonomy. We have the right of governing ourselves in our own way, and making our own laws, but, as I understand it, we have none of us the right to interfere with the welfare of any other Dominion, or any other part of the Empire, or the Empire itself.

Autonomy of Dominions refers to Dominions individually.

Those are the lines I am going on, and I believe them correct. A written Constitution has been suggested, or, at all events, reference has been made to the Constitution of the Empire which is not written. I am not asking for a written Constitution and have never asked for it. I do not know if it would be any improvement, but I do agree with General Smuts when he says there are certain points which require to be made very much clearer so that we may know exactly our relations to each other and to the Empire. We do not know them to-day. So far as the Constitution is concerned, it is not written, but I think it must be acknowledged that it is based on Statute Law, some of which goes back to the days of the Saxons; however, commencing with Magna Charta, then coming down the centuries to the Bill of Rights in 1688, then the Habeas Corpus Act, the Reform Act and the Act of two years ago which extended the franchise to the people of the United Kingdom. That has become part of the Constitution, but I do again say that something more is wanted. I mentioned one point. By the way, it is quite true that our status has been increased. We are a partnership of nations—a family of nations I would prefer to call it—but a partnership has its duties and responsibilities as well as its rights and privileges, and I think we ought not to forget that. I think we ought not to forget that we have a duty first to the Empire. I say my duty is first to the Empire and second to New Zealand, and I am quite prepared to stand by that anywhere. The greater includes the less, and certainly the greater is, to my mind, more important than the less. Take the point I raised the other day about the Cabinet and the Conference. It has never been settled yet. I have seen, with a certain amount of interest, that, in the draft which was submitted to us, this meeting was sometimes referred to as a Cabinet and sometimes as a Conference. I am not quite sure which stood. I do not think it matters much because we have not settled the point, and until we do, we do not know where we are.

Need for defining certain Relations between component parts of the Empire.

We have had a great deal to say, during the last few days, with regard to foreign affairs. They have been discussed at great length and very rightly and properly so, but I would ask anyone who understands the position to-day, in what position do the representatives of the Dominions stand with regard to the foreign affairs of the Empire, with regard to matters affecting the making of war or the making of peace? Where do we stand? Have we any say in connection with any one of them? I say we have not. The Crown Colonies have a say undoubtedly.

Voice of Dominions compared to Crown Colonies and India in regard to Foreign Policy.

Mr. Hughes: You do not say we ought not to have?

Mr. Massey: That is another matter. I say we ought. In matters connected with foreign affairs which come up at the Cabinet, Mr. Churchill represents them, and does it well, I do not doubt for one moment. His own opinion will coincide with the opinions of those he represents. Take India. India may have a grievance, and I do not say India has not a grievance, but India is in a better position so far as a voice in foreign affairs is concerned than the great Overseas Dominions. I do not envy India, I am only stating the position. I say it cannot be challenged and it should not be allowed to continue, so far as the Dominions are concerned. I express my own opinion, of course, but it has been my business occasionally to read up constitutional law and constitutional history, and I have come to that conclusion and I believe it to be right. That is one of the reasons why I think this matter should be submitted to constitutional authorities so that we may get to know exactly where we are, if we possibly can. So far as the remedy is concerned, it is quite easy according to my way of treating it. Let us get back to the position we occupied when the War Cabinet was sitting, when we joined with the Ministers of the United Kingdom in any representations which might be made to the head of the State. Surely that is a fair position to take up.

The Constitutional Question.

Empire not so United as during the War.

I come back for a moment to the League of Nations. Most of us have been thinking of the League of Nations a good deal lately.

I heard Mr. Hughes say that, if Mr. Meighen's suggestion were given effect to, the countries of the Empire would drift apart. I do not know whether I am unduly pessimistic in regard to this—I am not of a pessimistic disposition as, I think, most members of the Conference know—but I am becoming pessimistic about the future of the Empire. It is not a question of drifting apart; the drift has commenced. We are not in the same position that we occupied two years ago. We are not united as we were then, and there are forces at work to-day that were not at work during the war, and members can see it in all directions. I see no other way of meeting the drift, which, I believe, has already commenced, except by arriving at an understanding as to where we are and making whatever provision may be possible, though I know the difficulties as well as any member of the Conference. We ought to make whatever provision is possible for the proper representation of the Overseas Dominions in what should be the Cabinet of the Empire. The distance is the difficulty that we are right up against. I know, of course, the principle of Cabinet representation. I am not quite sure about this point, but I think I am right in saying that every member of the British Cabinet must be a member of the Privy Council. I think that is so. Then, I think, that a member of the Cabinet must be invited to meet in Cabinet by the Prime Minister—that goes without saying. Well, that constitutes the membership of the Cabinet and on that I think there should be an understanding. I know perfectly well this is another of the difficulties, that even a member of the Cabinet other than the Prime Minister of a Dominion cannot represent his Dominion properly. Nobody but the Prime Minister can speak for the Parliament of which he is a member. The whole responsibility rests on this one man. He is supposed to know the mind of the Parliament and the mind of the Government, and, if he does not know the mind of the Parliament and goes wrong, well, he must take the consequences when he goes back. When questions are submitted to a body such as this, the Prime Minister who is not quite sure of his proper position could say: "Well, I shall be very glad to submit this to my Parliament when I get back," or, if his Parliament happens to be sitting, he could communicate with it; that is the way out. We need to be brought closer together and with the present means of communication it is very difficult to do it. A suggestion was made to me yesterday. In all probability, we are not likely to build many warships for many years to come, though, at the same time, I am one of those who stand for the proper defence of the Empire; yet I am anxious that something may come out of the understanding which has begun to be arrived at as between the Allied and Associated Powers. These are the people to take this thing up, and if they take it up, as I hope they will, and come to a proper understanding, a new organisation will take the place of the League of Nations, and I for one will not be sorry. That is the position I take up in regard to that. I believe what is proposed is worthy of all possible encouragement. As far as I am concerned, I do not intend to be half-hearted about it; if an arrangement can be arrived at, I shall receive it with a great deal of pleasure and I shall feel that we have done the right thing, and that we have done a very great work. At the same time, please understand, I want to see the Empire upheld. I do not want to see it humiliated in any way, and while Mr. Balfour was speaking across the table, I was interested in the interjection that the British Empire had no pride. We were not too proud to fight. It is one of the things we should bear in mind in our relationship with other nations, that we want to be perfectly courteous and perfectly respectful to them and do everything that is possible to meet their wishes, yet at the same time, we need to consider British rights, British interests and British pride—if you like to put it that way.

Difficulty of representing Dominions in the Cabinet.

Suggested special fast boats at disposal of Dominion Premiers.

By the way, speaking about the suggestion made to me, so as to get over the difficulty of distance. It is just possible we are not likely to build warships for many years, and I believe the world generally is sick of war and the world will be glad to see an easing up. Just as it happened after the Napoleonic wars there was a lull, and, for quite a number of years, there was no serious war, none of the Great Powers were at war. We cannot expect small nations like the Balkan States or the States of South America to refrain from war, but so long as the Great Powers are not at war the world will not be seriously affected. Now the suggestion was made that we should have what is called a yacht—I think that is the term. I am certainly not going to interfere with the privileges of the Royal Family, but I think a fast warship or a fast yacht would be a good thing for the use of Ministers with an economic speed—I think that is the term—of not less than 25 knots. I know these vessels were scarce during war time and I know we had to get one in New Zealand for the Imperial Government; she was a vessel of some 25 knots and was called a despatch boat. She was returned to us in as good a condition as she was sent. That is the type of ship we want when an emergency arises, and at a time when it may become necessary to call together the Imperial Cabinet hurriedly. This ship should be placed at the disposal of Ministers for that purpose.

The Constitutional Question.

You could collect us at Vancouver, Victoria, Sydney, Melbourne, Auckland, Wellington, or the Cape when necessary. This wants thinking out; it rather appealed to me and I think there is something to be said for it. I do not say it will do all we need, but I believe if we do something of that sort, it will help us to solve the difficulty which we are up against at present.

Mr. Churchill: I hope you will collect a vessel of considerable burthen before I attempt to cross that ocean. A small yacht I am rather alarmed about.

Mr. Massey: The yachts at present cannot go beyond the Mediterranean. I do not suggest that such a ship as the "Renown" is necessary; I don't suggest that for a moment, but we saw what the "Renown" could do. It could go round the world at an average speed of over 20 knots—perhaps 25 to 30 knots if required; that means coal or oil as the case may be. The "Renown" has proved what can be done, and it would enable the British United Kingdom Ministers to see the country overseas and meet the people overseas in a way that they have never been able to do before.

Mr. Churchill: You want a few very fast liners.

Mr. Massey: Apparently we have not got them. We have not been able to build many ships during the war. There are few fast passenger ships as far as I know. I am speaking of the ordinary sea-going ships. I think we ought to see if something more can be done. At all events, there are many points where improvement is possible, and this is one of them.

Empire Unity and Sea Power.

One of the points to which we are looking forward continually is unity of Empire: only I put the word "Imperial" though I think "Empire" is better. I say I want to emphasise this point and repeat that I am certain we are not so well off as regards Empire unity as we were two or three years ago, in spite of the fact that nearly a million men from the whole of the Empire lost their lives to save the Empire from Prussian despotism. Then, there is sea-power which was referred to by Mr. Hughes; we have not yet finished the discussion on sea power. As a matter of fact I understand we are to have an opportunity of being given a separate day for it. I thoroughly agree with the arrangement that is in prospect; well and good, if a satisfactory arrangement can be made, but if not, then we must do what is right as far as sea power is concerned.

New Zealand's Loyalty to the Empire.

One point I might mention which is of interest to me, and it shows the mind of the people whom I represent—the people of New Zealand. Our soldiers when they returned had to their credit a sum of about 80,000*l.* profit from the canteens. The returned soldiers meet together twice a year in one of the centres in New Zealand; they meet generally in Wellington, and at the last meeting by a resolution of thirty-six to one they carried a motion to the effect that the interest on this 80,000*l.*, which belonged to them and no one else, from the canteen profits should be used for the purpose of maintaining the Imperial navy. I think it is a splendid thing to do. It may be a very small thing, but it shows the feeling there is of loyalty to the Empire and the feeling in overseas countries like Australia and New Zealand. The feeling has grown, and is growing, that proper protection is necessary and we have not got it now.

It is hardly worth while following this point up, except this, that I was reminded of something which happened during the war. After the battle of Jutland, when several first-class battle-cruisers were sunk (I cannot remember the names, I think they were the "Queen Mary" and one or two other smaller ships), what happened was this. When the news came to New Zealand, the Cabinet decided unanimously that if the Imperial Cabinet would accept a battle-cruiser they would purchase one as nearly as possible of the same power and armament as the ships that had been lost, from the Japanese, or from some one of the South American States which had good ships, and hand it over to the Imperial Government, free of cost. The Imperial Cabinet replied that under the circumstances it was not necessary, as they felt they had enough ships and of sufficient calibre to finish the war. I mention this point just to show the feeling in the country to which I belong as far as the Imperial navy is concerned, and that we have now a Governor-General, one of the best sailors of the Empire, who at every opportunity calls the attention of the citizens of New Zealand to this great fact. Then there is a point raised especially by Mr. Meighen, and that is that any country of the Empire need not enter into a war in which the Empire is concerned. This is not a new point by any means, it has come up over and over again. I have turned up a report of the 1911 Conference* when Sir Wilfred Laurier raised the same point.

Question as to whether, when the Empire was at War, any portion of it could remain outside the War.

Mr. Meighen: Where is it in my statement.

Mr. Massey: It is more implied than stated definitely. I think you will find it there.

Mr. Meighen: I do not think you will find it.

Mr. Massey: Sir Wilfred Laurier brought it up at the 112th Meeting of the Committee of Imperial Defence held on the 29th May, 1911, and there is a whole page with regard to it, and I am glad to say that, as far as it is possible to judge from the report, nobody agreed to it. Mr. McKenna, who was at that time in office, was particularly pronounced, and even the representatives of New Zealand. To my mind it would be an exceptionally anomalous thing that in the case of the Empire being involved in a war, one British nation, one British Dominion, should stand out and allow the others to bear the brunt of the war, and that at the same time that State should be getting the protection of the Empire.

Mr. Ballantyne: I think it is only fair to Sir Wilfred Laurier to say that I have heard him make the statement many times, in and out of the House, that when Great Britain was at war Canada was at war.

Mr. Massey: Let me quote :—

"Dr. Findlay: Do you mind saying what you mean by being at peace in these circumstances.

"Sir Wilfred Laurier: I say, not being engaged in war.

"Dr. Findlay: That is ~~their~~ from being left alone.

"Sir Wilfred Laurier: Being left alone.

"Dr. Findlay: And not being attacked.

"Sir Wilfred Laurier: Not being attacked and taking no part in the war.

"Mr. McKenna: Can you imagine the case of a Canadian grain ship coming across the Atlantic at a time when we are at war with Germany, and a German cruiser meeting that grain ship, is that grain ship a neutral, or may she become a prize?

"Sir Wilfred Laurier: No; it is a British ship.

"Mr. McKenna: I am ~~to~~ assuming that it is a Canadian ship?

"Sir Wilfred Laurier: It is a British ship.

"Mr. McKenna: Then she can become a prize?

"Sir Wilfred Laurier: Certainly.

"Mr. McKenna: The German cruiser can take her?

"Sir Wilfred Laurier: Certainly.

"Mr. McKenna: Then how can you be in a state of peace?

"Sir Wilfred Laurier: As I said a moment ago, there may be occasions when we may be in a state of peace and at others when we may not. It all depends on circumstances. But to say that when Great Britain is at war Canada must be at war seems to me a fallacy in view of the historical experience I have given."

Mr. Meighen: I think I can agree with both you and Mr. Ballantyne.

Mr. Ballantyne: Sir Wilfred Laurier was also on the eve of a general election at that time.

Mr. Massey: There is a great deal to be said for a Prime Minister, or the leader of a party, on the eve of a general election.

* Minutes of the 112th Meeting of the Committee of Imperial Defence.

The Constitutional Question.

Mr. Hughes: I think it only fair to say that if you take the whole of Sir Wilfred Laurier's attitude and position towards the Empire, you must remember where he stood. He was a French-Canadian, and on the whole he was all right.

Mr. Massey: I simply say that the point was raised and the Conference at that time did not agree with it. That is my point. I am not reflecting upon Sir Wilfred Laurier—far be it from me to do anything of the sort. Then take the other side of the question, that a Dominion may make a treaty with a foreign nation. I do not know that this expresses it. I do not think anything of the sort is possible. It all goes back to the point, that when the King is at war, his subjects are at war.

Question whether a Dominion can make an Independent Treaty.

Mr. Hughes: I think the position there is this. That it can do so. If I am asked, I say we have the right to do so. If we exercise this right, and I am asked if we can remain in this Empire, I say, "No." I say that is the position. I do not say that ipso facto we are out, but it is the end of the Empire.

Mr. Massey: Undoubtedly. I agree with Mr. Hughes in the opinion he has expressed. If that sort of thing is started, the Empire is gone. We might just as well face the position. I am very strongly of the opinion that we should do everything we can to strengthen the Empire, and if we do that, I believe posterity will bless us for doing it. If we allow the foundations to be taken away and allow the Empire to fall, I believe posterity will curse us and blame us for it. I would like to have these matters thrashed out and get a definite opinion from your constitutional authorities. I have neither spoken to the Solicitor-General nor the Attorney-General on the subject. I would be perfectly satisfied to have the opinion of these two gentlemen or any other qualified men, and have the thing, as General Smuts has suggested, clarified and cleared up once and for all.

Mr. Lloyd George: Do you want to say anything?

Position of India.

Mr. Sastri: I want to say a word if I may. I was much interested in an observation made by the Right Honourable Mr. Massey, that none but a Prime Minister is entitled to speak with any authority on behalf of a Dominion. I wonder where I come in?

Mr. Massey: You are not quite a Dominion.

Mr. Sastri: But I dare say that I will be.

Mr. Massey: Then you will be of the same opinion as myself.

Mr. Sastri: It was borne in upon me how approximate the position of General Smuts seems to have been quite recently to that we now hold in India. He described how we had to meet a Separatist faction in his Government, amongst his people. I wish I had it in my power to smite my opponents in India with the same weapon that he employed. I could then be sure I could disperse them. I only wish that this Cabinet would place such a weapon in my power, but General Smuts must agree that if I went back to India and told them that while I was debating their case in this very Cabinet, the people who had been enjoying this franchise were deprived of it quite recently, instead of having a weapon to smite my opponents with, my opponents would have a terrible weapon to smite me with. I am, therefore, much concerned with the proposition that General Smuts laid down, that we should put down a few general statements to be considered next year. That would not include the particular resolution that I have brought forward. It is most urgent, General Smuts must recognise, that our common enemies, your enemies and mine, must be accounted for immediately. The resolution that I have put forward, therefore, is not one which could come in the category referred to by General Smuts, as though it should be laid down provisionally or tentatively for consideration as a future Cabinet. In Turkey the position is getting worse. This particular matter is bad news, Prime Minister, and I am glad to have the opportunity of bringing it forward.

Mr. Lloyd George: Well, I do not know whether we will adjourn at this stage. Lord Curzon has gone down to meet the American Ambassador. We have had a pretty good discussion upon it.

Mr. Meighen: I have something to say.

Mr. Lloyd George: I also have something to say and thought I would say it to-morrow.

Mr. Meighen: I would rather get it off my mind, if we are not in too great a hurry.

The Constitutional Question.

Mr. Hughes: You said when General Smuts had finished speaking that you wished some concrete suggestions to be made. I think you might allow us to put before you what we think might be done, and the constitutional position as we see it, and what we think should be done in regard to it.

Mr. Lloyd George: Right.

Mr. Hughes: That is, after Mr. Meighen has spoken.

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Meighen will make his statement now.

Mr. Meighen: I will not attempt to refer to some of the subjects which have been touched upon in the course of the Conference addresses to-day. I will make a short statement first as regards some observations on this constitutional deliverance of mine, or whatever you choose to call it.

Mr. Massey: A memorandum.

View as to the Voice of Dominions in Foreign Policy.

Mr. Meighen: And secondly, as to the proposed Constitutional Conference, and thirdly, as to how we should go about making progress on the question of the proper conduct of our mutual relations as regards Foreign Policy in the future.

Well, first, the circumstances in which this statement of mine was made should be kept in mind. The Foreign Secretary had reviewed the entire conduct of foreign affairs for, say, two or three years, since, at least, our last meeting. I thought it would not be out of place to put on record my general view as to the right of a Dominion to a voice in the determination of Foreign Policy, to consider the extent and the limitation of that right under the present recognised constitutional mechanism. I do not intend what I said to be in the nature of a resolution to which all must accede and to which a minority must submit; nor did I intend what I put forward to be regarded as of the rank of a Magna Charta or even of the Fourteen Points. I did not think there was a Minister of the British Government now who would deny to any Dominion anything affirmed on that Dominion's behalf in this statement. In answer to arguments put forward by Mr. Hughes, I only wish to call attention to two things. One is the word "distinctively" in the fifth line on the last page, and the second, the word "commensurate" in the second page. I have nothing else to say.

Constitutional Conferences.

Now as to the Constitutional Conference. We are confronted with several circumstances, but the main one I may be able to confine myself to. The fact is that in 1917 a resolution was passed calling for a special Constitutional Conference after the war. No doubt at the time the anomalies of our present position were getting home to the members of the Conference of 1917 with an accentuated force, due to the need of very direct co-operation during the war, and it was very generally felt that something had to be done to remove those anomalies. Consequently, this resolution was passed. I am not sure that if everything had been known that we know now the resolution would have been unanimous. I do not like the idea of advertising ahead that we contemplate constitutional changes. It has an unsettling effect in Canada, and it may also have in other countries. I must here refer to General Smuts's suggestion that there should be certain tentative resolutions now proposed, in order that we may revolve them in our minds between this time and when a Constitutional Conference is held. You put certain things in writing, and let your country know that two years or even a year hence you are going to discuss this or that. That would give rise to apprehensions. The thing that we have to decide is what we are going to do. We are called here, and one of the initial reasons for calling us here was to decide the items of the agenda. We have the alternative of preparing no specific agenda. My suggestion is this: We have to meet again. I do not see any reason for meeting arising from any necessity for constitutional changes at all. Such reasons alone are not sufficient. But I think for other reasons it will be necessary to meet again in a couple of years.

Mr. Massey: Less than that.

Mr. Meighen: Yes, perhaps less. Let us if we can, determine on the name, time and place of our next meeting. I suggest that "Imperial Conference" be continued as the name. Let us decide then from a review of all the circumstances whether a change of constitutional relationships is necessitated by the experiences we shall have had. Do not let us lay anything down as agenda. I do not see how we can; but if we could and did, it would have anything but good effects. I do not say that everything is right in our constitutional arrangements, and I do not say that we cannot do at least something very soon; I am inclined to think we can, but the present is not the time to do it, and whether it be in two years or less, there should be a lapse of a reasonable time after the war conditions. It would never have done to have met immediately after the war, with the experience of the war in our minds, and then to have made adjustments to apply for a long period of peace. I consider that in another two years it will be time enough, and even then I do not think there will be any radical changes necessary; but we could review the conditions at that time, and we might then achieve something worth while.

The Constitutional Question.

Method of Co-ordinating Dominion's Opinions as regards Foreign Policy.

That is my suggestion on Topic No. 2. As to the third, what should be done in the meantime in order that we may be better advised, and better able to exercise the rights hitherto exercised and now sought to be expressed in this paper of mine. How we may the better do that is a question which is practical and immediate, and we ought to seek to make good progress upon it at once. My suggestion is this, that we should have a Committee at work for the next two or three days, which would report to this meeting on that matter and we should appoint the Committee to-day. We should see if we can do something in order to make the determination of questions common to us all a real determination of us all instead of one—in order that the Government of Great Britain could the more quickly, easily, more fully and effectually get in touch with and act in co-operation with the Dominions in the meantime. For that reason I suggest this Committee. That is how I express its work. It is the only suggestion I have to make now on that subject.

Mr. Lloyd George: I do not think we can decide that at this stage. The other members of the Conference have not expressed their views on the practical point, and therefore they would probably like to do so to-morrow. I suggest that we should adjourn at this stage, and that can be discussed to-morrow. That is the practical issue, I think, for us to consider.

Mr. Churchill: You will leave to-morrow afternoon blank, I suppose?

Sir Maurice Hankey: We had so arranged, but a change came over the scene, seeing that the Prime Minister would not be available this week.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should be very glad if you could take questions which it is very important I should be present at. De Valera is coming over.

Mr. Churchill: You will want a Cabinet Meeting one day this week.

Mr. Lloyd George: If we could take question of defence to-morrow I should be glad.

Mr. Churchill: All my notifications that I have been sending out are to the effect that we are going to meet on communications and migration, and one or two other things. I am quite agreeable if you would start and go through the whole afternoon, and come on here at 4·30.

Mr. Hughes: This question of the Constitutional Conferences which was raised really by Mr. Meighen is one which, if we attempted to deal with it other than after full consideration, will lead us into no end of difficulty, and I would suggest that we must have sufficient time, at whatever cost to any other subject, to go into it thoroughly as it is one of those things that agitates the minds of people in the Dominions.

General Smuts: I quite agree with Mr. Hughes, it is a very important subject.

Mr. Chamberlain: We could resume this to-morrow morning, and Mr. Churchill will then have his meeting in the afternoon.

Mr. Churchill: I am quite agreeable to that arrangement, but if you begin sitting at 3 and go on till 7 o'clock, you will find it rather exhausting.

Mr. Lloyd George: What you might do is to go on from 3 to 4·30, and then if you could go over, for even 10 minutes to the House of Commons, both the Speaker and the House of Commons would appreciate it; and we could then meet here at 5 o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: If we want more time on the Wednesday, in the event of our not finishing to-morrow, you will give us that.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, that is so.

(Adjourned until 11·30 to-morrow morning.)

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Mr. Lloyd George: I am not sure that it would not be very useful if we continued the discussion on the lines initiated by Mr. Massey, and now go from general principles to ways and means. Mr. Hughes said that he had something to say upon that subject.

Position of United Kingdom in League of Nations.

Mr. Massey: Will you allow me to add something to what I said yesterday, although I do not attach much importance to it. It is an anomaly in connection with the League of Nations. I do not know whether it has been noticed by anyone but myself that the United Kingdom is the only part of the Empire that is not specially represented on the Assembly of the League of Nations.

Mr. Lloyd George: Is that so?

Mr. Massey: Of course Ministers represent the British Empire, which includes the United Kingdom, but that leaves an overlapping between the Overseas Dominions and the other parts of the Empire. I do not say there is much in it.

Mr. Balfour: I am afraid there is a good deal in that point. I do not know that it concerns us here very much, but it is an anomalous position that is going to be very awkward. I do not think that we can avoid it. Do you want me to say anything about the League of Nations now?

Mr. Lloyd George: I think that could be taken afterwards.

Mr. Meighen's Propositions.

The only contribution at this stage which I should like to make on the question of general principles is to lay down one or two axioms which I think are accepted by everybody, and to lead up to a discussion on the best method of carrying out the principles which are accepted by all. Personally I do not take exception to the propositions laid down by Mr. Meighen in the sense in which he interpreted them. I take note of the fact that he emphasises those two words "distinctively Canadian" and the word "commensurate." Those words make a very considerable difference. I assume that those are questions which almost exclusively concern the relations of Canada with the United States of America; but there must be a good many questions. The Anglo-Japanese Alliance is not a question which is distinctively Canadian. It is a question which affects other parts of the Empire. There must be a good many other questions of the same kind, but undoubtedly there are a good many questions (and necessarily there must be) which concern Canada primarily and almost exclusively. I take it that Mr. Meighen had in his mind questions of that kind. Therefore, there is nothing which is irreconcilable in the position taken by Mr. Meighen and the position taken by Mr. Hughes in his statement yesterday.

Mr. Hughes: Perhaps, if we knew exactly what Mr. Meighen has in his mind, we could say.

Mr. Massey: But he told us last night. I thought Mr. Meighen's explanation was satisfactory.

Necessity for maintaining Unity of Empire in Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Lloyd George: After the explanation Mr. Meighen gave us last night and the way in which he called attention to those words, I think he safeguarded the position of the Empire, and therefore, on that interpretation—speaking on behalf of my colleagues sitting on this side of the table—I certainly would not challenge Mr. Meighen's propositions.

I think it is of paramount importance that in foreign affairs we should maintain the unity of the Empire. I think it is of paramount importance not merely to the Empire as a whole or to its individual parts; but it is of paramount importance from the point of view of humanity as a whole. The late war demonstrated that. There is no doubt at all that the Empire saved humanity and civilisation from a very great catastrophe. I doubt whether any single part of the Empire could have done it if the Empire had not come in with the whole of its strength. It is very difficult for us to conjecture what would have happened, but it was so near a thing on one or two occasions that I think anyone who said that if the Empire as a whole had not come in, the issue would have been a different one, could make a very good case if not an irresistible one. So that the fact that the Empire spoke with one voice has really altered the history of the world and the direction in which civilisation has developed. Therefore, it is of paramount importance that the Empire should have one voice and that we should speak as a whole. The world has realised its power—I will not say for the first time—but it has realised the full extent of its power for the first time. The British Empire put very nearly ten million men into action on land and sea. I think we are rather too apt to dwell upon the service the Empire achieved on land, forgetting the equally important and equally vital and essential part it played at sea. Whatever men we put on land would have been of no account if we had not had command of the sea. That is going to have a bearing upon our next discussion. It is that which decided the war. Anyone has only to make a picture in his mind of what would have happened if the positions had been reversed and Germany had had the command of the sea. The Empire would have been of no account, France would have been cut off from the world, America could not have come to her aid in time, and France would have been destroyed. Russia was destroyed as a matter of fact. It is not sufficiently realised that Germany succeeded in destroying her enemies on the east, and she only just escaped destroying her enemies on the west by the intervention of the British Empire.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

That was a contribution which the Empire made on land and sea. So that undoubtedly it is the fact that the Empire spoke as a whole with its united strength, with its concentrated strength, with a united purpose—that is what has made history as it is going to be for centuries to come. Therefore I think we ought to start there, that the first thing we ought to seek is some means by which the Empire can speak with one voice.

Great Power of the Empire when speaking as a Whole.

Now, I should like to take another phase. There is no part of the Empire that would be as potent speaking separately as it is now when speaking as part of the British Empire. I do not mean to say that the United Kingdom would not be powerful even if the whole Empire were not behind it. That is not what I mean. But the influence which it exerted, the share of the influence which it exerted, would not be as great, nor would that of Canada, Australia, New Zealand nor India. I will illustrate what I mean. The United Kingdom is very powerful. It has a population which exceeds that of France by about 7,000,000, and it would undoubtedly be a very potent influence in any war. But it goes without saying that its influence would not be as determining an influence as the one which it exercises when it has the whole Empire acting with it. Take any of the Dominions. The Dominion of Canada has the population of Roumania, Jugoslavia or Greece. It would always be a very powerful voice if it stood alone; but the influence which it would have actually exerted by itself in fashioning the world would not be comparable to that which it did actually exert as part of the British Empire Delegation. There the Dominions took part in determining the policy of the Empire, which very largely determined the peace. We consulted Roumania occasionally on Roumanian questions. We consulted Jugoslavia on Jugoslavian questions, and Greece on questions which affected Greece, but we never brought them into our Councils to determine what the world was going to be like for the next thousand years perhaps. But the British Empire Delegation—South Africa, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India—they were there in our Councils. We took no line of action with regard to world policy without having constant consultations with them, and I shall never forget the great meeting when the German reply arrived, when we sat for two days to consider what answer the British Empire was going to give. It was the answer of the British Empire that prevailed; it prevailed against America; President Wilson was not in favour of some of the things which we did in the way of concession over Poland, more particularly over reparation and one or two other things. But standing alone the Dominions would not have been in that particular part of the picture; they would not have been in the very centre of things. Therefore each Dominion exercised an influence which was infinitely greater as being part of the British Empire than it would have exerted if it had stood absolutely alone. What applies to the Dominions applies equally to India and the United Kingdom. Therefore, standing together, we are each of us more powerful, and each has a greater say in the world's affairs than if each of us stood alone and pursued a policy of isolation. Therefore, I would lay down a principle, which I am sure would be accepted, that it is vital, if we are going to influence the world, that we should speak with one voice. That does not mean the voice of the United Kingdom. I am coming to that. It does not mean the voice of Canada or of India, or of South Africa, Australia or New Zealand—it means the voice of the whole. That is what I am coming to, and it is a very vital consideration. If we speak with different voices, the influence of the parts would not equal that of the whole, and I consider that to be one of the greatest disasters that could befall humanity, for never in the history of the world have you had a combination of men of such different races, different ideals, different traditions, different histories, different outlook upon life, coming together and each contributing his own point of view, and the point of view of his nation, of his people, of his race, of the thousands of years which each has lived in his own way, and bringing the whole of that together

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Empire's Voice must be the co-ordinated Voice of all parts, not of one only.

into a common stock, to enrich the world and to add to its security and to its freedom.

Very well, I come now to my second proposition. It is essential we should speak with one voice, but that voice must not be the voice of Britain alone. If it is, it is not merely unfair to the rest of the Empire that we should determine policy, that we should write the cheque and expect the rest of the Empire to honour it with the blood of their sons. It is not only unfair, it is unreasonable. It is not liberty. It is not our conception of Empire, and, apart from that, it is a futile policy. Self-respecting people will not continue to operate upon that principle, and, if they did, they would not have half the value they have. It is because the Dominions are strong, vigorous, independent races that they are so formidable when they come into action, as the Germans well know, and, therefore, we must have some means of connecting and co-ordinating the voices of Empire, so that, having gathered these opinions, we can consolidate them, we can concentrate them, so that the voice as far as the outside world is concerned is one voice, but it is a voice made up of many chords, and what you want is to concentrate these, and how are you going to do it? Now, that is the problem to my mind, if you accept these principles which I have laid down, and I think it is the opinion of all those around this table. I have listened to all the discussions and I have never heard anything that indicated that it was not. The question is, "How is it to be done?" Mr. Massey made a contribution. It was a very bold one, and I hope it will be considered. It may not be the only means, but it may be a method of gathering the voices of Empire at crucial moments. Sometimes, it will be impossible, because situations arise so suddenly, so unexpectedly, that you have no time to summon a central conference at any point, not with the fastest cruisers you can invent. Therefore, there must be other means as well. We have tried it and we have had two or three methods by which we have attempted to improve upon the old position by which Great Britain practically spoke on behalf of the Empire without much consultation. Now, that is a past which we certainly have no desire to go back to. We have tried one or two, perhaps, crude methods. We have sent over to the Dominions all the essential and relevant material, which has given them the necessary information as to the trend of foreign affairs, the questions which were agitating this end of the world and which were affecting the affairs of Empire in every corner of the world, and yet we have sought not to overburden you with material which is of no importance. Every morning, as you can see, you have sheaves of all kinds of papers, coming from all parts of the world. They have no real bearing upon your judgment in foreign affairs, and most Cabinet Ministers who sit around this table confine their reading to the most vital papers that come along. Those papers are sent to the Dominions. When there is urgency, we send special cables informing the Dominions of the position of affairs. There was another suggestion which was made, I think it was at the 1917 Conference, that there should be a resident Minister who could be summoned in cases of emergency or who could be kept informed as to what was going on here. I know the difficulty of appointing a Minister of that kind. If he is a man of great influence in Dominion affairs, he probably prefers staying there to exert that influence at home, and when he goes from home that influence gradually weakens almost to vanishing point, because he is not keeping in touch with the public opinion of his own country. Then, there is the other difficulty. He does not quite know what is going on in his own Dominion. His mind, therefore, is not fresh upon the opinion which may fluctuate a good deal in your country as it fluctuates in ours. There may be not merely new issues, but new aspects, and it is very difficult for him to speak with the same certainty as to the opinion of his country as if he were there on the spot. Still, he does know his country and he knows the fundamental opinions of his country. He understands his people, and you would be in a position to communicate with him not merely officially, but more or less privately, as we do with Ambassadors in various parts of the world, and it has its value. We have had two or three very important meetings to which your agents and Commissioners here have been summoned. We had one before the great gathering of the League of Nations. We had another when we discussed the question of reparations before we went to Spa. That was one of the most important Conferences. It was the first occasion that we met the Germans face to face. We had a representative from Canada.

Methods of co-ordinating Empire's Opinions.

Question of Resident Ministers.

Sir Maurice Hankey: We had Sir George Perley, Sir James Allen and someone from Australia.

Mr. Lloyd George: And that distinguished Australian Senator Millen. Well, these gatherings were very useful, and I hope it will be possible not merely to continue them but that it will be possible to summon them more frequently. But that is a question for you to decide. It is only you that can tell us whether you feel that meetings of that character are helpful from the point of view of the Dominions. They are certainly helpful from our point of view. What we want is to gather the voice of the Dominions and India upon all these questions, and that is one way of dealing with the situation. We have, first of all, communications by cable, not altogether satisfactory, because you cannot have an interchange of argument. You take what has happened here. We came here with apparently different views upon two or three different questions. We have thrashed them out among ourselves and have arrived at an agreement. You cannot do that by cable. All we do by cable is to express our views to you and you express yours to us, but you cannot argue about them. You do not come into contact and thrash out these questions. Therefore, there must be some other way, some other means by which we can interchange views and thrash out questions which affect the Empire as a whole, and I should very much like to have a discussion this morning upon the practical ways of arriving at conclusions on questions of Foreign Policy which will carry the whole Empire along with us in any decisions that we come to. The voice of the Empire must, of course, be communicated to the world through the British Foreign Office. I do not see any other way of doing it without breaking up the Empire, no other way of doing it, and I think it would be accepted. If we each of us indicate our separate views, the Empire as a whole will not carry the same weight. As a matter of fact, there will simply be a series of intrigues with foreign Powers. They naturally will not attach the same importance to the unity of the British Empire as we do.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Practical means of co-ordinating the opinions of Empire's component parts.

I am certain in their own interests they wish that the British Empire should be kept together rather than that it should fall to pieces, and I think the ablest and greatest statesmen among them realise it. If you talk to men like M. Clemenceau and M. Briand, they realise in their hearts that although we may not agree with them altogether upon many questions it is better in the real interests of France that the British Empire should be there. They are able to plead it against their own people. You can see M. Clemenceau constantly doing it and you can see M. Briand doing it. He likes to be able to say, "I should like to do that too, but you will not carry the British Empire with you if you do it." In his heart he is rather glad of it. If you look at his speeches when he fought the Senate and Chamber of Deputies on Reparation—they wanted something sterner. They really wanted to break up Germany. They wanted to occupy the Ruhr valley, and they would have put forward demands which would have been quite impossible; and if you had said to them, "That will destroy Germany," in their hearts they would have said that is what we want. There are a considerable number of Chauvinists in Paris with an influence which is far beyond their numbers, but the responsible statesmen of France, men of the Briand and Clemenceau type, do not want it, and they like to be able to say, "Well, you know if you do it the British Empire breaks with us—you will not get its support when you are in trouble," and they like the British Empire to be a fact. I believe it would fill the world with despair if it dissolved and broke up—with despair and rightly so. I cannot see anything between the world and a real catastrophe except this Empire, that has no purpose beyond what is the purpose of humanity to preserve the peace of the world, to develop along the lines of liberty and justice, and therefore I sincerely hope before we part this Conference will be able to devise some means by which the opinions of Empire can be gathered and concentrated, and be able to speak with that one voice which, spoken in 1914 without any discord, without any doubt, without any hesitation, rang through the world and saved it. I invite a discussion upon ways and means.

Mr. Meighen: I referred to the subject yesterday afternoon. As regards this, I suggested a committee. I had something in my mind at the time. I do not know whether I can do any good by advancing what I had in my mind now or not. My idea was that an Imperial Conference be held two years from now, that we do not denominate it specifically a "Constitutional Conference," that we inaugurate a series of annual Conferences, or semi-annual as we may agree, at least two years from now—I do not see how you could commence earlier at the present time—that we give them all the same name, and that at the first one to be held two years from now, we give special consideration to any necessary Constitutional readjustments. In a word, that we thus execute the charge imposed upon us by the Resolution of 1917.

Suggested series of Constitutional Conferences.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Resident Ministers.

Now, as to the improvement of our communications, that is to say, our communications regarding foreign affairs, as to meeting the desire of the Prime Minister to enable the Empire to speak, as it must meanwhile speak, through His Majesty's Privy Council here with one voice, I was only going to say this. The right of each Dominion to have a resident representative to sit with the British Government while it is engaged in the consideration of matters that are of vital concern, was affirmed by resolution and accepted in 1918, but only for the period and for the purpose of the war. It was exercised, but not very fully or generally. I think it would be well to have that right reaffirmed, even though it may be exercised no more fully and no more generally than before, until we meet again, say, in two years' time. It may be, or it may not be, that the exercise of such a right would have a good effect, but its existence, I believe, has had a good effect, and it might possibly be that it would be availed of more frequently than it has been. These things can be examined in detail in a committee better than here. I think that we are all anxious that some means should be found, with the least possible change and readjustment, that will enable all portions of the Empire to feel that grave steps taken and grave lines of policy followed have been taken and followed after the due deliberation and concurrence of all. Unless that is done, there is danger of the disintegration which the Prime Minister is so anxious to avoid. I do not think the danger is quite as great, for example, as Mr. Massey describes it to be; I do not think it is. The fact is that the British Empire is fundamentally a good thing; its people, on the whole, are of a more than ordinary measure of intelligence; they rise above the average of human intelligence. Those being the two great basic conditions, first that the institution is good, and second that its people have high intelligence and know it to be good, these show, to my mind, that it is pretty secure. The only thing I have said that is of any practical urgency is that the right to have resident representation here be reasserted and agreed to. Perhaps more could be accomplished through the instrumentality of a committee. I have no reason to complain myself of the fairness and care with which we have been kept informed; perhaps we get our cables more promptly than they get them in Australia or New Zealand. I would hope that something could be done to meet the objections that have been very strenuously urged by Mr. Hughes, on behalf of Australia, to the effect that the information reaches him when it is too late to act. That is all.

Mr. Lloyd George: Now, Mr. Hughes.

Interpretation of Mr. Meighen's Proposals.

Mr. Hughes: Sir, you have put before us this morning the position in which we stand. You have said that the unity of the Empire must be preserved in the interests of humanity. You have said that the Empire must speak with a united voice. I agree with all that you have said in this connection in the way in which you have put it. May I say, however, that I cannot quite accept your views with regard to Mr. Meighen's postulates, although put as you interpret them, I see no objection to them. As I said yesterday, it is not the principle to which I take exception, but to its application.

You will quite see, Sir, that if it were laid down as a fixed principle, that the voice of a Dominion in any matter of foreign policy must be commensurate with its interests, the question is, "Who is to decide the point?" If you are to accept the principle and apply it to all circumstances, subject only to that reservation that the Dominion voice must be commensurate with its interest, then we shall come here with our hands tied. We can discuss no question which particularly concerns any one Dominion with freedom. I do hope that you will see that the acceptance of Mr. Meighen's postulate leads us far beyond where we are now, and I am not going into that uncharted sea without uttering the most emphatic and earnest protest against a departure which may lead, we know not where. I am quite prepared to discuss every question on its merits, and to admit, nay, to insist, that in considering any question we must have regard to the peculiar interests of any Dominion on that question. But this is very different to the acceptance of the postulate. When Mr. Meighen referred me to those qualifying words in his postulate, I referred him to my own words, viz., that I took no objection to the principle, but only to the application of it, in the way and to the extent he urged. I go now still further and say that if you are able by way of illustration to cite a case in which the interest of any Dominion is so clearly vital to its welfare that its voice must have corresponding weight in deciding the policy; if you can show, for example, that Canada's vital interest in any question is not only so clear, but so overwhelming, as to make any decision that would prejudice her interests unjust, then apply your principle, but do not lay it down as if it were one of the corner stones of a written constitution binding upon the Empire. The other day I stated that the proposal to hold a Constitutional Conference to amend the Constitution had caused alarm in Australia. Curiously enough, this has been displayed in two sections holding quite conflicting doctrines. One section regards any interference with the Constitution or any hint of such interference as an attempt to impair our sovereign or quasi-sovereign rights and powers; the other regards it as an attempt to weaken the bonds of Empire. Now, although appearing very illogical, it is nevertheless true that you can satisfy both those opposing sections by leaving things alone; and that is the only way you can satisfy them. This brings me to the proposal to hold a Constitutional Conference. I understand Mr. Meighen to say that we should hold a Constitutional Conference in two years.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Mr. Lloyd George: He challenges the date.

Deprecates a Constitutional Conference.

Mr. Hughes: I am coming to that. We are to hold it in two years, but we are to call it by another name. Well, Sir, if I believe in the necessity for a Constitutional Conference, I must favour Mr. Meighen's suggestion, but I intend to show there is no need for one, that there is, indeed, very great danger in a Constitutional Conference. And I do not believe for one moment that, having decided to hold a Constitutional Conference, you can by changing the name hide the truth under a bushel for two years, so that no one can discover it. I do not believe it. Do you mean to say that throughout the whole of this Empire it is possible that the truth, known as it must be to so many of, for we must necessarily inform, our colleagues—that the facts will not leak out, that we shall be suspected of an attempt to hold a secret Conference? It would be said: "Why are you doing this; what monstrous things do you intend to perpetrate?" Those who are fearful of an attack upon their rights of autonomy will be up in arms. On the other hand, those in the opposite camp will believe that this is an attempt to weaken the ties of Empire, and they will not be behindhand in saying so. I propose, therefore, to examine this question very closely. I am most strongly against a Constitutional Conference. There is no need for one. On the other hand, there is great danger. I do not think that a Conference to consider the Constitution should be held at all, but, if one is to be held, then I want the whole world to know what it is intended to do. I cannot agree to anything different. I said the other day that it was impossible for me to attend a Constitutional Conference next year. It is now suggested that it should be held the year after. I do not say that it is impossible for me to attend the year after. Mr. Massey, of course, will speak for himself. But, apart from the date of such a Conference, the more you examine this thing, the more hopelessly undesirable the suggestion appears. In theory I have nothing to say against the suggestion of Mr. Meighen that the Conference should be called by another name, or by no name at all, but in practice it would not work. In any case, there is no need for a Constitutional Conference. General Smuts, speaking yesterday, said that circumstances had altered since the 1917 resolution had been passed—the Treaty of Versailles had been signed, we had received the status of nations, we had been recognised as such, and given a seat in this League of Nations, our position had been defined, and that therefore, in his opinion, the same necessity for the Conference did not exist. I say that no necessity exists for the Conference to consider the Constitution, and I hope the matter will be dropped. Let me ask those who favour such a Conference to tell us why they demand it. Let me set out the constitutional position very shortly, and in order to do so I have reduced the position to a series of questions which deal directly with the matters which must be considered at any Constitutional Conference. Have the Dominions power to make treaties with foreign countries relating to (1) commercial matters, post office and telegraphs, and the like; (2) matters out of which wars arise, or treaties for submission of such disputes to arbitration? As to the first, there is no doubt whatever that we have the right to make commercial treaties with foreign countries; this right is incidental to autonomy under which we make tariffs, and so the right to make commercial treaties providing for reciprocal duties, &c., and of course we have a power to make treaties relating to post and telegraphs, and so on. As to (2), in my opinion, we have no right to make treaties with foreign countries in relation to matters which usually fall within the sphere of foreign policy. I must qualify this by explaining exactly what I mean. If I am asked, Is there anything in our constitutional relations with Britain which would preclude us from concluding a treaty, my answer is: "Yes, I think there is," but, quite apart from this, and even if this limitation did not exist, I say that, unless we accept as a basic principle that the Dominions cannot of their own initiative make such treaties, unity is impossible. In my opinion, it must be accepted as a fundamental principle that the Dominions have no right to make treaties on those matters which fall within the sphere of foreign affairs. Now for another point. Is it possible for one part of the Empire to be at war and another at peace? I say, No, it is not; but, if I am asked: "Is each part of the Empire ipso facto involved in war by declaration of war by Britain?" I should not like to go so far as that. Probably it might be contended by Dominion Ministers that technically a Dominion is not necessarily involved by a declaration of war by Britain; but, viewed as a practical question, there is no doubt that a declaration of war by Britain must involve the whole Empire in war. I will show why I consider this is so later on. Sir Wilfred Laurier seems to have recognised this in answer to a question. Mr. McKenna asked him what would happen to a Canadian ship if it were overtaken by a German warship when war was raging between Great Britain and Germany; would it be regarded as a prize? Clearly it would, and I think any Prize Court would say so. But whether it would or not, there is no doubt as a practical question it would be decided against Canada or Australia or any other Dominion owning the ship. It may then be laid down that, whatever the theory may be, the fact is that when Britain is at war the whole Empire is at war. This brings me to the next question: "What would be the position if the King were advised by one set of Ministers to make war and by another set to make peace, what would he do?" Can His Majesty's Dominion Ministers advise him directly? The channels of communication at present do not permit of this being done, and it is difficult to see how the Prime Minister of any Dominion could tender advice directly to the King. No doubt the fact that his Ministers in any Dominion were desirous of tendering him advice would be known to the King, but that is all. But it may be asked, What would the King do if a Dominion Minister wanted to advise him, would he accept or reject such advice on his own responsibility? He would not. In this, as in all other things, the King acts on the advice of his responsible Ministers, and would therefore submit the matters for the consideration of his Ministers in London. "But why should the King take the advice of his Ministers in one part of the Empire without reference to any other authority and not take it from Ministers in another part?" The answer is that, while in theory and within certain limitations in practice, the same relations exist between the King and his responsible advisers throughout the Empire, there are certain most important practical differences between those existing between the King and his responsible advisers in the United Kingdom and those in other parts of the Empire. For example, it is from the British Parliament that the Crown draws its supplies. The support of the Monarchy rests wholly upon the shoulders of the people of the United Kingdom. The Dominions enjoy all the advantages of the Monarchical system, but contribute nothing towards its support. The King can only consider the advice of Ministers who are supported by a majority in the British Parliament. If the King acted upon the advice of any Oversea Dominion without consulting his Ministers in the United Kingdom and being advised by them to accept the advice of the Oversea Dominion, his Ministers in London would resign. It is not necessary to pursue this further, but it is obvious that an impasse has been reached. But there is another reason why the King could not act on the advice of the Oversea Ministers except with advice so to do by his advisers in the United Kingdom. To do so would destroy the principle of responsible Government and make the King in regard to matters within an indefinable, but a very considerable, sphere independent of his advisers, or some of them.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Possibility of Dominion Ministers advising the Crown.

The Empire's Constitutional Relations should be decided by the Imperial Conference, not by Legal Opinion.

Mr. Massey said yesterday he desired the opinion of the Solicitor-General and Attorney-General as to our constitutional position. But these authorities cannot advise us. This matter is not one in which they can do so. Are the relations between the Dominions and Britain then not to be determined by legal opinion? The answer is certainly not. If we ask, where are we to look for guidance as to our constitutional position, the answer is around this table. There is no other authority. What we around this table decide to do, that can be done, what we decide shall be the constitutional practice in future, that shall be the constitutional practice, provided only that our various Parliaments support our views. So that we are not to go to the Law Officers to know what is our constitutional position; we are not to turn to constitutional history or practice, because, as is very well known, these so-called constitutional authorities simply report what has been done, and do not and cannot tell us what will or can be done. The writers upon the Constitution look to precedents, but we establish the precedents to which they look, and are ourselves independent of those precedents. As you know, what has been done during the last five or six years is without precedent. For example, when we were here in 1918 it was decided that the appointment of the King's representative, which had hitherto been a matter entirely in the hands of the Government of the United Kingdom, should be resolved by discussion, if necessary, between the parties, and the Dominions should have as much right as His Majesty's Ministers in the United Kingdom in submitting names for nomination. For myself, I can say that that practice has been followed.

Mr. Massey: That is to say we have been consulted.

Mr. Hughes: I want to make it perfectly clear what is the position. It is this, and it is recorded in the documents, that we were invited to nominate some gentleman for consideration for the appointment. As a matter of fact, we made no nominations, but the principle is not affected by that. We asked in turn that His Majesty's advisers here should submit some names to us, this was done, we made our selection and in due course the appointment was made. I only mention this as one of the things worthy of reference, but many things have been done since 1914 that have changed constitutional relations very materially. Examined closely, it would be idle to deny that these have effected a real change in these constitutional arrangements that existed, say, ten years ago. Let me cite another instance. I presented for consideration by His Majesty's Ministers a suggestion that the channel of communication should be changed in such a way as to ensure direct communication between Prime Ministers, that is, between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the various Prime Ministers of the Dominions. That was agreed to. It did not supersede entirely the ordinary practice, but the principle was established, and it was understood that, at the option of each Prime Minister, communications should go direct to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. I shall have a word to say as to how this has worked out in practice, but the principle has been established. That is a distinct advance. When the Government of the United Kingdom or of the Empire—if you like to call it so—is communicating to a foreign Government, it does it through the Foreign Minister to the Foreign Minister or the Ambassador of the other country. Our status as a nation is thus as clearly recognised surely as that of foreign countries. We have a right to communicate direct with the Head of the State, and I think that is substantially a real recognition of our national status, as real as that established by our presence here to-day.

No need to extend the Constitutional Authority of the Dominions.

I come now to another question: "Is it necessary, for any reason, to extend the Constitutional authority of the Dominions?" Can any alteration in our relations with Great Britain and each other give us greater power than we have now? If, of course, the object of the Constitutional Conference is to take away something that we now have, these questions do not arise. But in that case, then, while we are allaying the fears of one set of critics we inflame the fury of the other. I assume that the idea in the mind of General Smuts when he, and other representatives of the Dominions, voted for this resolution in 1917 was to give us something we had not got. General Smuts says that is right. Very well. Let us then ask ourselves, what can any Conference give us that we have not got? I do not speak of the theory, but of the practice; and here let me show you how utterly illogical and inconsistent the theory and the practice are. In theory the power of the British Parliament to make laws is unlimited. You may, if you like, point to British statutes which limit its power. I do not deny that, but you must not forget that it has the power to amend or repeal such statutes. Well then, what is in theory our practice? We are here now, each one of us representing great self-governing Dominions, accredited, as we are proud of remembering, with the status of nationhood at the Paris Conference. We have affixed our signatures to the Versailles Treaty. But, if we look for the legal foundations of our power and our authority, where do we find them? In a British statute! And you, Sir, know very well that if you and the Parliament of the United Kingdom were so minded, and if you were so ill-advised, as to act as Pitt, and His Majesty's Ministers and Parliament did when there was trouble with the American Colonies, you could, by the exercise of legislative power, leave us without any legal foundation upon which to stand. I do not speak of the practical effects of your action, but of its legal effects. We should still insist upon rights of autonomy, but what would our legal and constitutional position be? You say that Britain will never exercise her undoubted legal rights, and, of course, that is true. But what does this mean—that it is not so much what we can constitutionally do, but what we ought to do in order to reconcile our autonomy with Imperial unity. Practically, no doubt, we should stand where we do now. You have great Dominions enjoying full rights of self-Government. I invite General Smuts to tell me what it is we cannot do. I have said we cannot make Treaties with foreign countries, so that if he wants to make a Treaty with a foreign country—I am sure he does not, and am only taking that as an illustration—I say that he cannot do it as a nation within this Empire, because if he advises His Majesty to assent to a Treaty, His Majesty cannot act on that advice except it is first approved and then tendered by the Prime Minister of Britain. That is the constitutional position, but, apart from that, where are the limitations upon our authority? What is it we cannot do? When I am told that we want more power and there is something we have not got, I naturally say: "Tell us of something substantial that we have not got; or, if we lack nothing substantial, tell us, if you like, of some bauble with which we may deck out our quasi-sovereignty." I know of nothing that we have not got, but if there is anything that General Smut desires, let us see what it is, so that we may examine it, and, if necessary, grant it. I have mentioned two things, both substantial—not in the nature of gauds—with which we have really and substantially increased our status as nations. I could cite many more. I have a right to nominate or submit names for nomination of His Majesty's representatives. That is a real thing. We have a right to communicate direct with the Prime Minister, that is a very real and direct recognition of our autonomy. And there are other things. We are gathered around this table to consider this question, and I ask General Smuts what is there that the British Authorities have ever withheld from us? From what Councils have we been excluded? We have been asked to consider questions where the interests of Britain were so overwhelming that if interests were the determining factor in deciding policy they ought never to have been brought before us at all, for they were domestic questions. What more do we need in the way of power or recognition that a Constitutional Conference can give us? We ought not to agree to a Constitutional Conference unless it be shown that it will give us some advantage we do not enjoy, some real thing which we do not possess, which could be given to us by a Constitutional Conference, and which cannot be given here and now. I do not believe that there is any such thing, I cannot think of any.

When I stand up in the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia, even though my feet rest upon a British statute as a legal foothold, I cannot see how I could be clothed with greater amplitude of authority if we were independent nations. I agree entirely with what you say, Sir—what should we be outside this Empire? Our voice would be lost across the waste of waters, the voice of a community of five and a half millions of people. But when we speak as part of the Empire, on behalf of the Empire, the voice of Australia is heard. But apart from that, what is it I lack, what do you lack, General Smuts, that you would have if your country was a Republic, or an indepedent nation like Belgium or Holland, or any of the nations of the world? I confess I do not know, I cannot believe that there is any man more jealous of, and more insistent upon, the rights of Australia, as a Dominion, to govern herself in her own way, than I. I have perhaps obtruded my opinions too much upon the British Government in this way, but, nevertheless, I see clearly that there are places where my feet must not tread, merely as an Australian, but when I come into these Councils, when I put on the toga of Empire citizenship, then my voice is and must be heard, and have equal weight with those of others. Here is the position. There is no constitutional nexus between the Dominions and the United Kingdom except the Crown. There is no way in which the Crown can be advised except it be advised by one set of responsible Ministers. It cannot be advised by half-a-dozen. There must be recognised channels through which advice tendered to His Majesty must go, and the King is the nexus that binds us together. Now, in regard to domestic matters, it is not suggested that we should all be of one accord, and I cannot recall any cases where our advice to His Majesty, tendered through his representative, in regard to domestic matters has not been taken. I know, of course, that under our Constitution certain matters, navigation for example, may be reserved for the assent of the Crown, but this, after consideration, has been given. If it be such things as these that you wish to push aside, let us discuss them, but, I do not believe that there is anything real and substantial that can be given to us by any Constitutional Conference. Now you, Sir, have laid down a great basic principle, you have said that the Empire must speak with one voice. Then you ask us how it is going to do it? If we cannot do it now, or by some means we can now devise, we certainly will not be in any better position to do so as a result of a Constitutional Conference. A Constitutional Conference could not help us in any of those difficulties that now stand in the road. They are embedded in our circumstances and have nothing whatever to do with our constitutional relations. The reason why General Smuts's voice does not have the same weight when he is in Africa as when he is here, is, because he is in Africa. That will remain. We are not gods. Mr. Churchill the other morning said, "You make the Empire smaller," and the Prime Minister added, "And larger at the same time." No doubt that is so, but still there is Africa, there is Australia, there is Canada, New Zealand, and there is a waste of waters between us. How are our opinions to be gathered in such a form, and impressed upon the British Government in such a way, as will enable us to tell our people that our voice is heard in the Councils of the Empire, that in moulding foreign policy we have an equal right to share, or at any rate a share commensurate with our importance and our trade? That is the great question. How is that to be done? One thing is certain, a Constitutional Conference will not, cannot help us.

Let me state the position. At present we have no effective voice in foreign policy, except when we come here. That is certain, and in the very nature of things it seems that it must be so. This brings me to the point that I stressed the other day. The key to the whole position is communications. There is no other. That does not mean that I sweep aside the suggestion of having a Cabinet Minister here, for I can conceive that he would play a very useful part. But he would not be a substitute, complete and satisfactory in itself, for these Councils. General Smuts knows very well the difficulty and Mr. Massey emphasised it, yet Mr. Massey spoke as one who rather favoured the idea. He said: "Whom could we send that would have authority both here and in our own country?" We know very well that everything we do here we do subject to the reservation that our Parliament and our Government—our Government first and then our Parliament, must approve it. Upon our return they will ask, "What have you done?" and unless Parliament approves our actions we stand in a very parlous place. Our voice is in such a case the voice of a man and not the voice of a nation. But if Prime Ministers cannot speak with authority, how much less can other Ministers do so? One of the difficulties arises out of distance, though this does not apply to the whole Empire; Mr. Meighen, for instance, can go back to Canada and return here in time for the Pacific Conference. But what is possible to Mr. Meighen is not possible even to General Smuts; and is quite impossible for Mr. Massey and myself. It is impossible, I believe, for the representatives of India also. Yet it is clear that in the Councils of the Empire not the voice of one Dominion only, but the voice of all, must be heard, because it will be no satisfaction to Australia or New Zealand that Canada, or even Africa, is represented here, if we are not. We say that plainly. If we are to have Ministers here representing our Dominions, that would not be a solution sufficient in itself. I do not deny, however, that they might help very considerably; they could keep us informed, perhaps. I suggested the other day that we might have access to the Foreign Office, so that we might know things quickly, or quicker than we are told them now. This brings me to the point you wanted me to reach.

Certain advantages from Resident Ministers.

Mr. Lloyd George: Yes, this is what I have been waiting for.

Mr. Hughes: I suppose I am on optimist, though chastened by long sojourning in the wilderness, but when you agreed, Sir, that we might communicate direct with you, I thought that we had made some substantial advance. The idea of direct channels of communication was not dissatisfaction with the Colonial Office, but first, that we had a right to communicate with you as Head of the Government, and secondly, that by so doing we might save time. Now, what is the actual position? I will set it out before you. The Foreign Office, as is natural and proper, gets the first intimation of matters which are likely to be of interest and are of importance. The Foreign Office naturally says nothing to us, because it has yet to bring the matter before the Prime Minister and the Ministers of the Cabinet, and generally the matter is in a state of suspended animation for some little time. You said just now, however, that Ministers were in the habit of reading only a few of this most formidable pile of papers that comes every day. Do you read them all, Mr. Churchill?

Foreign Policy Questions should be dealt with by Prime Ministers direct, not through Colonial Office.

Mr. Churchill: I read the whole of the telegrams, and I have done so for the last fifteen years.

Mr. Lloyd George: You mean those that are circulated.

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Lloyd George: But that is not the whole of the telegrams that come.

Mr. Churchill: Oh no!

Mr. Lloyd George: We all read the telegrams that are circulated.

Mr. Hughes: Then I admire your assiduity, Mr. Churchill. Anyhow, Mr. Chamberlain seems to give assent that he does not read them all.

Mr. Chamberlain: I should think it a great waste of time if I read all the telegrams that are circulated. I look them through and pick them out.

Mr. Hughes: What I am coming to is this. Matters are brought up to the Cabinet by the Foreign Secretary or by the Prime Minister, a decision is given perhaps, or the matter is in suspense. The Prime Minister thinks it desirable that a communication should be made to the Prime Ministers of the Dominions. A reply is drafted. It comes to the Colonial Office. The Colonial Office sends it. I want to say this, that one of the reasons that we had in our mind when we altered the channels of communications was that we should have direct communication with the Prime Minister; another reason was that we should save time, because in this question time is the essence of the contract, and the real difficulty that we have, apart from that which must always exist, the lack of personal consultation round this table, is time. The Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister have to decide what is to be done. Something comes up to-day which must be decided in, say, forty-eight hours. What are they to do? If we do not get a message until it has run through all these tortuous channels we are not heard. So there is one thing you can do—very simple and not going very far, I admit—that is to send all important papers relating to Foreign Policy. Copies can be sent to the Colonial Office, but they must come direct to us. I think that is only fair.

Summary of Proposals for co-ordinating practically the Opinions of the Empire

The practical suggestions I make are these: that there should be, if you like, a Minister in London representing each of the Dominions. I do not attach anything like so much weight to that as some of you. No sooner does a Minister leave his country than he is accused of getting out of touch with the people. In any case, he could decide nothing; he could not speak as I can speak as the head of a Government; as Mr. Meighen can speak as head of the Canadian Government; as General Smuts or Mr. Massey can speak as heads of their Governments. He could speak only as a member of a Cabinet afar off, whose circumstances he does not know, and with whose ideas he is losing touch every day. Still, I am not against it. Regular Conferences are, of course, the one real solution, but regular and frequent Conferences are practically impossible, and so because time is the essence of the contract, we must improve our means of communications so that at least we are informed of what is intended to be done before you do it. I do not deny at all that there is no substitute for gathering round this Council table, but the remedy for that and the way to make these Conferences more frequent is to improve communications between the outlying parts of the Empire. Providing you can reduce, as you could by airship, the time occupied by the journey from Australia to England to, say, ten or twelve days for the single journey, the time occupied by us in coming and going, and in attending the Conferences, could be reduced to six weeks. The more frequent the Conferences, the less would be the accumulation of matters to be decided. There is nothing impracticable about such a scheme. I do not profess to speak as an expert, but we are told that it is possible, and I say that I hope that due regard will be had to possibilities in that direction.

With regard to the other side of communications, if we are to be in close and intimate touch with one another, which is essential, that is only possible if ampler and better means are provided for telegraphic and later telephonic communication. I dealt at length with this phase of the question the other day, and I hope that my arguments will not be entirely overlooked by you. If we have better means of communications, we shall be able to satisfy our Parliaments that we are in possession of information and that we know what is going on. I have stood in the Commonwealth Parliament many and many a time and have been asked questions relating to great international crises that I was assured were shaking the world to its foundations. Those who questioned me possessed, from some esoteric source no doubt, information which was entirely kept from me. I have been asked: "Did I know this" or "Did I know that," and my almost uniform reply has been I did not. My Cabinet is amazed when it is told that we have no information upon this or that important matter. Such disabilities can be removed in part, if not entirely. But there is no substitute for ascertaining the voice of the Empire except by

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Conferences round this table. More frequent Conferences round this table could be held if we improved the means of communication. But in the intervals, if you are going to satisfy the people of the Empire that they really have a voice in Foreign Policy and are not to be dragged into war and told when the tocsin rings that war was inevitable, you must improve the means of communication so that we are told daily of what transpires. I have suggested the means by which this can be done in whole or in part. I will only add this, that the principle for which I plead is that we shall exercise our great powers as autonomous States in such a way as will enable the unity of the Empire to be maintained. That can only be done if we are prepared not to push our powers beyond safe limits. That is the beginning and the end of the gospel of Empire. If Canada or Australia insists upon doing things which, being done, would make the Empire speak with two voices and make autonomy incompatible with unity, then that is the beginning of the end. So that, whatever we do, if we go away from here without doing anything else, we must resolve that, no matter whether we are informed or whether we are not informed, we must maintain a united front. But if we are to do that with due regard to the interests of our own States we ought to put things in very much better shape than they now are. We ought to create machinery by which every day there would come in complete information of where we are. There ought to be more frequent Conferences, and, if you like, Ministers in London, whose business it would be to supply direct the news to the Dominions, and who could tell us what was being done by you. As there is no need for a Constitutional Conference to enable us to do this, or to give us any right or power we do not now possess, I am opposed to any such Conference being held.

Better Progress probable from Informal Conversations.

General Smuts: May I make this suggestion, Prime Minister. I do not want to make a speech or go into the whole matter. I think that we are drifting into making speeches over this difficult subject and making no progress at all. We have been for the last two days making speeches to each other on a subject which is highly contentious and very difficult, on the subject of devising ways and means of arriving at a common policy in the affairs of the Empire. May I make this suggestion? It is very difficult to discuss this matter in a formal Conference like this, where we really tend to make speeches and state our position very formally, and where minutes are taken and shorthand notes are kept. Can we not adopt the procedure which we adopted on former occasions? That is, for the Prime Ministers to come together in quite informal conversation and go into the matter. There are things that can be said, points of view that can be raised, and suggestions that can be made which it is difficult to make in a formal Conference of this kind, so I would suggest, as we did on former occasions, that the Prime Ministers should talk quite informally and try and thresh out this matter and see if it is not possible to come to some decision. On special points, we simply held Prime Ministers' conversations. We went into it quite informally and without any record. This formal debate leads nowhere.

Mr. Lloyd George: I think there is an advantage in having preliminary discussions on broad lines like this. They are very useful for reference in future, and they are making the Constitution of the Empire in exactly the way the Empire has grown.

Mr. Massey: And we are much nearer agreement than we were a fortnight ago.

Mr. Lloyd George: I agree with General Smuts, that, each of us having laid down the broad principles, there is a great deal to be said for an informal talk, but the informal talk would not have had the same value if we had not had a preliminary discussion. We have had each Dominion laying down particular principles, and the United Kingdom doing the same thing. I think there should be an informal talk among the Prime Ministers. That occurred repeatedly before.

General Smuts: It proved to be a way out of several difficulties and we came to agreement on different points.

Mr. Massey: What time do you propose to adjourn?

Mr. Lloyd George: Could you stay for five or ten minutes, because Lord Curzon cannot be here at 5 this afternoon? He has a practical suggestion to put before the meeting, which, I think, is of importance. Do you mind putting it now, Lord Curzon?

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Suggestions advanced by Dominion Premiers.

Lord Curzon: We have been considering this morning the various means by which the Dominion Premiers might have a closer hold upon the management of foreign affairs, and the suggestions have taken various forms. One, an extension of the system of Conferences that we now hold; two, the presence of a Cabinet Minister in London representing the Dominions; three, improvements in communications by telegraph, wireless, and telephone; and, four, the suggestion made by Mr. Hughes just now about telegrams being sent from home to keep the Dominion Premiers in touch with what happens. I think you will see there are certain difficulties about the latter. In all cases where a crisis is brewing, where things are drawing up to a situation which might involve the Empire in war or where treaties of first-class importance are likely to be concluded, the Dominion Premiers are, it seems to me, entitled to such information, and I am sure there will be no objection to sending it. Mr. Hughes will realise that, in the day-to-day conduct of the Foreign Office and of foreign affairs, it is impossible. Take, for instance, the Upper Silesian question, which is now before us. It is a very critical matter. It varies from day to day, and a telegram sent out to you from Upper Silesia would be out of date when it reached you. Nor would your views be of use to us in the matter. You would not understand it. And suppose we came to business, and instead of four battalions, we had to move eight battalions, the other four would not be Australian or New Zealand battalions, they would be British battalions. What you want is greater knowledge and greater influence in matters which concern you as parts of the Empire, and in which you yourselves, your Parliaments, your troops, may be involved. Now, how can we bring that about? The suggestion I made to the Prime Minister was this: You want, before you are involved in action, to know what has happened, to know what is happening from day to day. I think, as far as I can ascertain, your present knowledge is inadequate. What do you get now? Once a week, I believe, there is sent out to you from the secretariat a paper called "The British Empire Report," and another called "The Foreign Countries Report," which contains a condensed summary of the information, telegraphic and otherwise, of the preceding week.

Now look at the contrast between that and what happens when you come here. As long as you are in London you get the telegrams from day to day, you get a selection of despatches and papers sent to you by me on important matters, and you get, as, for instance, in the recent negotiations for the coming Conference on the Pacific, you get the papers recording the interviews of the Foreign Minister with various Ambassadors and Ministers, and the papers he supplies to the Cabinet. Cannot we bring your position when you are away from here into closer conformity with that which exists when you are here? That is the problem we want to solve. Let me describe the situation as it exists with the Cabinet here from day to day. There are circulated to the Cabinet in the first place the telegrams which you get now. I do not think there is any particular object in sending those out by post, because by the time they reach you they would be utterly out of date. The Cabinet also get now the Foreign Office papers, which contain all the principal despatches issued from the Foreign Office here or received by the Foreign Office here, and, what from one point of view is more important still, the accounts recorded from day to day by the Foreign Minister of his interviews with Ambassadors and Ministers. For instance, you have those papers that I circulated to you; my talks with the Americans, Japanese, and Chinamen a day or two ago, and anybody who wants to know the history of how we have arrived at the Conference now decided on will find it in those papers. The suggestion I made to the Prime Minister was this: That we might send out to you, to the Prime Ministers of the Dominions, once a month, or, if necessary, once a week, a selection of these extremely confidential Foreign Office papers which are now seen only by the Cabinet and circulated to our representatives in our Embassies and Legations abroad. What I would propose amounts to this: to put you on the same footing as our Embassies abroad. I said to the Prime Minister just now that in making this suggestion, which I do at my own responsibility, and of which Mr. Balfour, to whom I communicated it, approves, I shall be shocking the traditions of the Foreign Office, who naturally cling to the idea that their papers belong to themselves, and they cannot be safely communicated to anybody else, but to which I make the rejoinder that I cannot see why a Prime Minister at Pretoria, or at Sydney, should not be just as capable of keeping his papers confidentially concealed as a British Minister at Bucharest or Prague.

Suggests regular despatch of Foreign Office Papers to Dominion Prime Ministers.

Mr. Hughes: Or the same man from Pretoria when living in London.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Lord Curzon: Precisely. If you favour the idea you would get the real history of all the events as they are being evolved, as they germinate in the first place and gradually evolve into a policy. You would know in a few weeks' time, according to your distance from London, exactly what was going on.

Mr. Hughes: You are speaking of sending it by post.

Lord Curzon: Yes; and a great crisis leading up to war does not develop in a week or two. A war or any great affair in which you are concerned is the result of a process that has been going on for several weeks or months. I would add that, if you favour the idea, firstly, I think it would be desirable that such papers should not be circulated in your Departments or in your Ministry. I think they should go to the Prime Minister and be in the hands of his private secretary, or be used by him, of course, in confidential communications with his Ministers, but not circulated in the Departments. Further, I would make the suggestion that when you leave office you should either destroy them or send them back. I make that suggestion for this reason: it would be a very unfortunate thing if these records, existing, we will say, in your Department at Pretoria, were afterwards got hold of by some historian—amateur or professional—who might in a corner of the Empire construct a partial history of the Empire for the period during which he had access to the documents. I think it would be desirable to accept an obligation either to destroy them or return them here.

Mr. Massey: To send them back.

Lord Curzon: Subject to this, I think the suggestion I have made is really the most practical one that has been submitted to keep you in touch with what is going on in the most secret and confidential aspects of foreign affairs from month to month, and year to year. I am presupposing that the Foreign Office keeps these records of what has been said as faithfully as it does now. It has always been the practice at the Foreign Office, and I never have an interview with an Ambassador without putting down as soon as he has left what I said to him and what he has said to me.

Future Business.

Mr. Lloyd George: Well, at 5 o'clock we meet.

Sir Maurice Hankey: We will go on with this?

Mr. Lloyd George: Mr. Massey might speak, and then we will take up Naval Defence.

Mr. Hughes: I hope you will not do that, because the naval business concerns us very much, and I try and prepare everything, but I have not prepared for that. I am seeing Lord Lee this afternoon.

Mr. Lloyd George: If you are not ready, it would be a waste of time to do so. What else can we take?

Mr. Churchill: To-morrow we are fixed for the Treasury and the Colonial Office.

Mr. Lloyd George: What can we take this afternoon so as to get on? The Anglo-Japanese thing is in course of liquidation.

Sir Maurice Hankey: Can you take Military and Air Defence? Certain proposals for Military and Air Defence were put forward for your consideration, and I have recirculated them this morning.

Mr. Meighen: For this afternoon?

Mr. Lloyd George: Well, I am just wondering. I think it would be an advantage to take Reparations when I was present.

Sir Maurice Hankey: I do not think you would get Sir Robert Horne.

Mr. Hughes: We have not got any statement about that, have we?

Sir Thomas Smartt: We might just as well have it here.

Mr. Lloyd George: Could not we take that?

Mr. Meighen: Well, it is altogether a question of principle, as to how the division is to be made. There seems a rather sharp difference of opinion.

Mr. Lloyd George: It has got to be settled.

Mr. Meighen: The difficulty I am in is this: there has been some error, or rather there has been some variation, in the principle of calculations. That is one thing. I am ready to state my position in the matter at any time. I do not know what progress I can make. I cannot say anything more than I said the other day at the Committee meeting.

Mr. Massey: I understand three Dominions are agreed. There is this difficulty that Mr. Meighen referred to. I think there is an error in it; I cannot account for it in any other way. As far as the principle is concerned, it was a question of payment to the different Dominions in proportion to the liability.

Sir Thomas Smartt: We have a double event. In that discussion we had with the Treasury, we had the difficulty of deciding whether we should take the capitalised value of the pensions, or whether we should take the casualties, or whether you could add the two together and take the mean of both.

Mr. Hughes: We cannot go on with Reparations this afternoon.

General Smuts: We can go on with the discussion this afternoon and see how far we get.

Mr. Hughes: What are we going on with?

Mr. Lloyd George: We could then have our informal talk.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Mr. Massey: I agree with the suggestion put forward by General Smuts that now that the general discussion is coming to an end we could probably arrive at a conclusion more quickly and more readily if the matter we have been discussing is referred either to a Committee consisting of the Prime Ministers or to a Special Committee appointed for the purpose. I am inclined to think that in either way we should come to some conclusion which would be satisfactory to each and every one of us. I want to express my appreciation of the speech delivered by the Prime Minister this forenoon. To my way of thinking, this speech displayed throughout a sincere love of Empire, and I hope it will not be lost. I am speaking now of the speech itself. I do not know whether it is possible to publish it. I cannot think of anything that would be objectionable to any other country or to any section of the community, but at all events I am quite clear about the main point—that it is a speech that will live. It ought to be preserved so that the people who come after us will get some idea of what has taken place in these eventful and strenuous times.

Circulation of Foreign Office Papers.

With regard to the suggestion by Lord Curzon that certain confidential documents should be forwarded to the Prime Ministers in the countries to which they belong, that is a concession which I have not the slightest doubt will be appreciated. I want to refer again to what I suggested by way of an interjection, that extreme care must be taken to see that these documents do not get into the hands of people who might make a very improper use of them. I had a personal experience upon one occasion of a thing like that, and it has made me very careful ever since. I hope that members, like myself, will be impressed with the importance of keeping these documents not only from the public, but from the hands of people who might take advantage of the information which has come to them.

We have had many problems to solve, but I think the problem before us now is probably one of the most important. I am inclined to think that it is as important as any of the others with which we have had to deal during the present Conference—that is the problem which will enable us, the representatives of the people of the Dominions, to speak with one voice and as a united Empire. That is the problem. It is a question of the unity of the Empire; but to get it we must have continuity and we must have regularity in connection with these gatherings. Whatever we may choose to call them, there must be continuity and there must be regularity, and it is difficult to arrange for either of them at the present time in existing circumstances. Several very useful suggestions have been made in connection with the present discussion, and reference was made to a suggestion put forward three years ago, before we separated and went to our homes, after we had had some experience of the working of the War Cabinet. That was with reference to a resident Minister. I agree with it as far as it goes. A resident Minister would maintain the connection, but it is not everything that we want, and I cannot think of anything which will quite fill the bill, at present at all events. I should like to see the experiment of a resident Minister tried. I should be very glad indeed to see the larger of the Dominions, Canada and Australia, select a resident Minister to live in London, and to represent them when foreign affairs were being dealt with by the Cabinet here. I think it would be a very good idea if he could be in practically the same position as an Ambassador is to-day, but it would be only until further development allowed a better arrangement to be made. Then there was another proposal which was referred to yesterday, briefly and incidentally, but which I had made on a previous occasion, I think at the commencement of the Conference, when I suggested that periodically, or at all events occasionally, these gatherings of representative men, Prime Ministers mostly, should take place overseas. I should like to impress the Prime Minister with the importance of something of the sort. I believe if it could be done it would be another of the bonds, and a very useful one, which would help to unite the Empire. Speaking for my colleagues, as well as for myself, coming here to these gatherings has been an education to us. There is no question about that. We understand the Empire problems very much better than we did some years ago. I can say that for myself unreservedly. But education is required in the other direction, and I am not casting any reflection when I say this, for nothing is further from my thoughts, that it would be an education to the Ministers of the United Kingdom to come to the overseas countries, and to see the development that is taking place, to see the possibilities of the different countries, and ascertain the sentiments and ideas of the prominent people connected with the overseas Dominions, especially their public men. I feel certain that if that was done once it would be an experiment which would be repeated, because it would be well worth doing.

Resident Ministers.

Imperial Conferences should meet in different parts of the Empire.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Nomination of His Majesty's Representatives in the Dominions.

I want to say a word with regard to some of the things expressed by my colleague, Mr. Hughes. I do not think that Mr. Hughes was quite correct in saying that we of the overseas Dominions have the right to nominate the representative of the King. That, as I understand it, is not the position. It is a right which should be reserved by the King himself in the last resort, on the recommendation of his Ministers, to say who shall represent him in the overseas Dominions.

Mr. Hughes: That is the position.

Mr. Massey: I am glad that Mr. Hughes agrees with me. That leads me up to the other part of the argument. I thoroughly agree with what Mr. Hughes mentioned, that a list of the gentlemen available, in case of a vacancy in the Governorship of any of the Dominions, shall be supplied to the Prime Minister of that Dominion, and that his opinion should be asked. I think that is only right and proper.

Mr. Hughes: What was agreed upon was this: That both parties, that is to say, the Ministers of the United Kingdom and of the Dominion affected, should have the right to submit names. We have as much right as they, but in the last resort, of course, the opinion of His Majesty's Ministers here should prevail.

Mr. Massey: Yes.

Mr. Hughes: I do not think in practice there would be any difficulty.

Mr. Massey: I do not think anything in the way of friction would be possible, because I cannot imagine any objectionable man being appointed or recommended.

Mr. Lloyd George: It is essential to the Empire that whoever is appointed should be acceptable to the Dominion.

Mr. Massey: I am bound to say that I am very proud of what took place on the last occasion when a vacancy occurred in New Zealand. It is no breach of confidence if I tell the Dominions what occurred. The last Governor had been there for quite a long time, and he was naturally anxious to get back to England to look after his property and business here. The "powers that be" consulted me, as Prime Minister, and gave me a list, as a matter of fact, of suitable men who might probably accept the position if it were offered. I do not say that everyone on the list was anxious for it, because I do not know. I had the opportunity of selecting the present Governor in that way, recommending and expressing the opinion that Lord Jellicoe was a particularly suitable man for the position in New Zealand. There is no question about it; without reflecting on any of the good men who have gone before, and we have had a long list of splendid men as Governors, we have not had an objectionable man that I can think of.

Mr. Hughes: There is only one thing I should like to add. If we liked we could present a list for consideration by His Majesty's Ministers here and they could proceed upon that. They have asked me if I had any names to submit, and I had not.

Mr. Churchill: It is a matter for friendly informal arrangement. The ground is thoroughly explored by that means in quite an unofficial way, and then a formal recommendation is made when something has been agreed upon.

Mr. Massey: There is no question about the experiment being successful in New Zealand. Lord Jellicoe is the most popular man we have had. The people in New Zealand think all the world of him, and I hope he will stay with us for a very long time. Mr. Hughes has expressed another opinion. He says that all we need now is in our possession. I go very nearly the whole way with Mr. Hughes. There is nothing in the way of self-government that we have not got. There is nothing in the way of autonomy—which is the technical expression—that we have not got. There was one point to which I referred a day or two ago, which was referred to this morning by the Prime Minister, and which has been incidentally mentioned on several occasions, that if it is at all possible to do it—and if it is not possible to do it in its entirety, we should get as near to it as we can—we of the Overseas Dominions should have a share in making any recommendation that becomes necessary to the Head of the State, His Majesty. That is where we fail at present. I have dealt with that before, and I am not going back to it now, but I hope something more will be done in that direction before we go away.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Mr. Hughes: Do you mean direct to the King?

Mr. Massey: In conjunction with the United Kingdom Ministers we form a Cabinet which should be thoroughly representative of the whole of the Empire, that is to say, of the United Kingdom and of the Overseas Dominions. At present we have no say except in the way of expressing our opinions to the Ministers on the other side of this table. I do not say that our opinions are not considered—I know that they are, and that they are given effect to on every possible occasion. But that is not the point. Then, as to communicating direct with the Prime Minister, I agree with Mr. Hughes that that was a point gained. I seldom take advantage of it, because I know very well that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, or the Imperial Prime Minister, as you may chose to express it, is so overburdened with work that it is almost cruel to ask him to attend to anything that can be kept from his shoulders.

With regard to treaties, we have not the power, and we have not the right as Dominions, to make treaties with any other country. We can make a commercial arrangement, we can make a reciprocal trade arrangement, but that is as far as we can go, because we cannot ask His Majesty to sign a treaty. If we did, I am sure he would not do it; he would refer it to his Ministers, as Mr. Hughes himself suggested. There is no difference of opinion between us there.

No necessity for Constitutional Conference.

Mr. Hughes expressed an opinion with which I agree. He referred to the resolution which we dealt with in 1917 with regard to a Constitutional Conference. I think that at the time it was only dealt with tentatively, as it might not be proceeded with. I agree with Mr. Hughes in thinking that it was a mistake at the time and that we had better drop it. I do not think a Constitutional Conference is necessary. I am not afraid of it in the very slightest, but I do not think it is at all necessary. There is no question that it stirs up a lot of discussion which certainly does not do any good.

I have met in New Zealand gentlemen who considered they were authorities on constitutional matters, and who pointed out all the mistakes we have made. Probably having been over here and having discussed the question with other Prime Ministers and other Ministers, I knew as much as the critics themselves did, probably a little more. I am not afraid of criticism, not a bit, but there are times when criticism does a lot of harm, and I am bound to say that the discussions that took place on that subject caused a great deal of uneasiness to many loyal citizens in the Empire, so that my own opinion is that the proposed Constitutional Conference should be dropped, and that we should do a little each time we come back, and do what is necessary. The British Empire has grown, it has developed, and I think no doubt that changes and amendments will be necessary for centuries to come if the Empire lasts as long as I hope and believe it will. That reminds me of another possibility in connection with the League of Nations. Of course, that is really a part of the constitutional question. Each Dominion has the right to representation on the Assembly of the League of Nations. Now, this might possibly happen. I shall be very sorry to see it happen, but there are four or five Dominions, and it is just possible in time to come we might find the representatives of the Dominions on that Assembly—they do not get the length of the Council—we might get the representatives of the Dominions voting on opposite sides, expressing different opinions. That would be an unfortunate thing for the Empire, and I would sooner not see the Dominions represented at all on the Assembly of the League of Nations if they are going there divided and to express different opinions, and perhaps vote in different directions; the voting requiring unanimity in any proposal, that is to say, in any proposal of importance, would not matter so much. If anything is going to be done in the way of revising the Covenant of the League, that should not be forgotten. It seems to me to be an unfortunate position.

Dominion Representation on League of Nations.

Mr. Balfour: May I say something about that?

Mr. Hughes: That raises another point which is full of danger. America says, now, what we told you is right, Britain has six votes and we have only one.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is not so, they have many. They have Panamá, Cuba and a whole lot.

Mr. Hughes: Then, if we have only one vote, where are we, that is what Mr. Massey says?

Mr. Massey: I say it is better to have one vote than a divided vote—that is my point.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Mr. Hughes: I do not admit that.

Mr. Massey: That is only a side issue at present. I should like to say that, as far as it is possible to judge, and I think it is the opinion of thinking men all over the world, the British Empire so far as it has gone has been a tremendous success. Nobody looking back for forty or fifty years would have thought the Empire could have developed in the way that it has developed. Here we are all round the world, all races, all creeds, all colours and all united under one King, practically one Constitution, all working in the same direction as far as public affairs are concerned, and endeavouring to do our best for our fellow-citizens and for humanity. I am strongly of opinion that nothing we can do to keep the Empire together and keep our countries united should be left undone, and I hope at this Conference we shall be able to point back and say we appreciate the position taken up. Nothing has pleased me more than the attitude taken up by the representatives of India; they have shown themselves in their expressions of opinion, in the ideas they have put forward, they have shown themselves to be thinking men, able men, so far as that is concerned, and there are no more loyal and enthusiastic citizens in the United Kingdom itself or the Overseas Dominions than those who represent India here to-day. I notice a little trouble in the papers to-day in regard to India. Those things will happen and go on happening, but they hardly affect the question. It does not affect the loyalty of our friends in the slightest. At the last Conference, when we discussed constitutional matters, there was a suggestion put forward, and I thought it an important one at the time, in the case of a Constitutional Conference being held the leader of the Opposition should be invited along with the Prime Minister of the country concerned to attend the Conference and express the opinion of the people behind him. Since then, there have been developments. In my own country it would be almost impossible to say who was the leader of the Opposition at present. In the United Kingdom to-day, the Opposition is divided into a number of groups, as it is in my own country. In New Zealand there is one member who calls himself the leader of the Opposition, and, when the question was raised in the House, I must acknowledge that gentleman had the largest number of supporters behind him. He was able to show a dozen or thereabouts behind him as against five or six in the case of others, and, in consequence, he sits in the seat of the leader of the Opposition, but the Labour people say they are the legitimate Opposition, and, though they have not as many supporters as the other Opposition, they say their man should be referred to as the leader of the Opposition. That sort of thing is no use. The leader of the Opposition in a case like that would be of little value, and, in consequence, I do not think it is worth following up. There are cases where there are only two parties in the country and those cases could be considered, and, if the Prime Minister of that country is of opinion it would be of benefit to the Conference to have with him the leader of the Opposition, then I do not think any objection will be raised. A suggestion has been made by Mr. Meighen, who is not present, by the way, that constitutional matters should be postponed for a couple of years. I do not agree with it. These delays are dangerous. There have been many changes in the past two years and we do not know what changes we shall see in the next two years. I hope the British Empire will be in a strong position and will have got back to normal long before two years. However, for certain reasons, I do not think delay is advisable. There is nothing to be gained by delay and a great deal may be lost. I should like to see some real progress made in this connection.

Success of the Empire.

Suggestion regarding Constitutional matters at 1917 Conference.

I have often admired the ancient Romans whose favourite boast was to be able to say, "I am a citizen of Rome." I would like to see a very much larger number of the citizens of the Empire glad to acknowledge and proud of the fact that they happen to be citizens of the Empire to which they belong, and able to boast that they were citizens of the British Empire. Then, in considering the Constitutional Conference and what may possibly happen, we have always to remember that the Overseas Dominions are filling up. There is a good deal of immigration going on now and as far as I am able to judge very suitable people are going from this country to Overseas Dominions We are getting our share. Only the other day I saw a trainload going out and they seemed to me to be people who will make good citizens on the other side of the world. There is certain to be during the coming quarter of the century a considerable increase in the population of the Dominions. Waste places will gradually be filled

As Dominions progress some changes will be necessary.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

up and we have to face changed conditions and changing conditions—conditions which will render changes necessary not in the Constitution to which reference was made this morning, but in the arrangements under which we are working. I cannot suggest any changes at the present moment necessary in this respect, but I know they will be necessary as time goes on and as the population in the Dominions increases, and I hope and believe that the Overseas Dominions, and the other young Dominions that are coming on, the Crown Colonies, many of whom will claim the dignity of Dominions, I hope they will all be imbued with the same spirit of Empire and anxious to remain within its boundaries rather than to go out and carry on on their own. They have nothing to gain by such a course. Personally I am quite certain of this. If a poll were taken, if a vote were taken of the people of my own country or Australia or Canada (I cannot speak for South Africa as I have never been there), a large majority would decide to remain in the British Empire, and they would be right in doing so. I hope the day will come when there will be a large majority in South Africa, and I think that will be the case. If they come out, what do they gain? Absolutely nothing, and they lose the protection that is afforded to them by the fact of being within the Empire. They lose the dignity of being citizens of the Empire, and if any Dominion were foolish enough to go out on its own I do not think we should keep it within the Empire. It is not now as it was with Abraham Lincoln, when the best blood of the States was poured out to keep the States one nation. We have not come to that, nor are we likely to, but I hope the sentiments of unity which have been so well expressed by the Prime Minister will continue, and we shall hear less in the future of individuals—there is always a dissatisfied section who say it will be better to come out of the Empire. They will be sorry for themselves if they come out. I have no other opinions to express except just these, and these are only suggestions. I think we should encourage the resident Minister idea. I do not think it likely that New Zealand would send a resident Minister for a long time to come. We have other things to think of, and many things to do which require to be done first, but the larger Dominions might at any time each of them send a Minister. I do think that this should be taken in hand by the Ministers of the United Kingdom. I do not know whether the other Prime Ministers of the Dominions will agree with me in this. I think there should be an understanding that any time a Prime Minister comes to England, and at that time there is any business of importance connected with foreign affairs, Peace Treaties, or any other Treaty for that matter, that he should be invited to take a seat along with the other Ministers, that is to say that he should really for the time being be a Cabinet Minister. It is only a beginning.

Mr. Hughes: A Cabinet Minister of the British Cabinet—surely not?

Mr. Massey: Of the Imperial Cabinet. I do not make the mistake of saying that you and I should interfere with the local affairs of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hughes: I certainly understood that was settled.

Mr. Lloyd George: That is the rule. If there were any great question of Imperial policy we should certainly call him into our counsels.

Mr. Massey: I should like to see it done officially, with a record of it, so that we can point to this when we talk about being partners of the Ministers of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hughes: I was under the impression that although we had only established it during the war, we were still entitled to call ourselves colleagues of Mr. Lloyd George.

Mr. Massey: That is exactly what I want.

Mr. Hughes: If we are here, ipso facto we, being colleagues, are entitled to be summoned.

Mr. Lloyd George: I have sent for the Minutes, and you will find the point recorded there.

Mr. Massey: I think this ought to be made clear, and I am glad Mr. Hughes agrees with me.

Mr. Hughes: The Australian climate always bring people to one opinion.

The Constitutional Question and Foreign Policy.

Mr. Massey: I am glad to hear that, and also to hear that Mr. Hughes is of the same opinion as New Zealand. I want to emphasise the suggestion made that we should do everything we can to shorten distances, and I should be very glad if an opportunity were taken to discuss the question I have put forward with the Admiralty. It might be a fast ship—not a warship, but one which would be useful for Imperial purposes, for carrying Ministers from one country to the other whenever required. I think it would work, but I should like to hear what the experts have to say before any decision is arrived at. That is practically all I have to say, Prime Minister, and I would strongly urge that we should go forward, but not too rapidly. It will not do to make false steps, and a false step might put us back for many years; but development should take place now, and let development go on as the British Constitution has grown up. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. Lloyd George: The Conference is now over, and we will now have that informal talk.

Sir Robert Horne: We will now begin and see what we can do until Mr. Hughes comes.

Empire Total Claims.

I will just explain that we claimed on behalf of the Empire something like 1,600,000,000*l.* In point of fact what has been awarded to us, if I may so put it, comes out at something like 1,400,000,000*l.* That is the figure in this document at any rate. Our claim was made up of a variety of items; pensions, separation allowances, shipping losses and non-maritime losses. Over and above those there is a matter which we shall have to deal with to-day, and that is the amount which is to be credited to us for the upkeep of the army of occupation, which raises a difficult question in connection with Australia, perhaps not a difficult question, but one which we shall have to settle.

(At this point Mr. Hughes entered.)

Claims in Respect of Pensions.

I propose that we should deal first of all with the question of the proportion in respect of pensions, afterwards we will take separation allowances, then shipping losses, and then the only remaining question will be that concerned with the amount to be credited respectively for the maintenance of the armies of occupation.

Mr. Massey: I think you had better tell us the total amount first.

Sir Robert Horne: The total amount of pensions which we asked for was something like 900,000,000*l.*

Sir Thomas Smartt: In order to be clear, I presume that all comes out of the 6,300,000,000*l.* which I believe was the amount agreed to at the last meeting in connection with reparations; that is the total indemnity that the Allies were to get?

Sir Robert Horne: 6,300,000,000*l.* is the total amount for the Allies. For the British Empire it works out roughly to about 1,452,000,000*l.*, which is 22 per cent. of the total. Our claims were made up upon a computation of what each part of the Empire would be entitled to in respect of these various items, pensions, separation allowances, and so on. I will come to that later and just say now that it does not very much matter, or may not very much matter, what was the basis of our computation in putting forward the original claim. What really matters now is how we should divide what is assumed to be about to be paid in the process of time.

Sir Thomas Smartt: That is the 22 per cent.?

Sir Robert Horne: Yes; that we should divide that amount according to the proportions which we agree upon. What was discovered was this. Let me take the case of pensions first. I think we can deal with that separately and then go to the others. At the time we put forward the claim it was practically known what was the British liability in respect of pensions. There was no actual account available of the amount of the liability of each of the other parts of the Empire.

Mr. Hughes: When was this?

Sir Robert Horne: February of this year. But there was put in as near an estimate as could be made, and as it turned out the total was very nearly right—I think it probably is right. When the final figures were got it was plain that certain adjustments had to be made. I will take an illustration. Canada's liability turned out upon her own figures to be less that that at which it had been originally assessed in arriving at the total. On the other hand, I think Australia's liability turned out to be slightly more than had been estimated at the time when the original computation was made.

Mr. Meighen: Is that in respect of pensions?

Methods of apportioning Pensions Claim in the Empire.

Sir Robert Horne: Yes. I am dealing now only with pensions, as it forms a good illustration of some of the other things, and I thought we could deal with it by itself to start off with. You can do one of two things, as I think: you can either correct the original computation by the facts that have since been discovered and bring the original figures into consistency with the accounts, as they have now been seen; or you may proceed in another way and take the actual capitalised liability of the various portions of the whole and divide up the amount of the reparation money which is paid to us in accordance with the proportion of the actual liability of each portion of the Empire.

Mr. Meighen: Do you mean the actual pensions liability?

Sir Robert Horne: Yes, the actual pensions liability capitalised. I will show you in figures in a moment what the difference is. Roughly, these are the two things in principle. On the first basis what was done was this. Under the Treaty we were entitled to be paid not upon the scale of pensions which any of us might happen to have arranged, but upon a scale which France had. That really was the basis. In point of fact none of us are paying actually upon the French scale. We are all paying more than the French scale, with the exception of India. The theory of the original computation was, taking the French scale and applying it to each part of the Empire separately. If you take that you accordingly reduce the amount which each person is to get to a common denominator; you assume they are all paying upon the French scale, although we shall have to make an adjustment in regard to India.

Sir Thomas Smartt: The Indian pensions are less, I understand?

Sir Robert Horne: I think so.

Mr. Massey: They are the pensions that are proposed to be paid to the soldiers, are they not?

Sir Thomas Smartt: No, I do not think so.

Mr. Massey: I think they ought to be.

Sir Robert Horne: I have no doubt the French scale did make a differentiation between different grades of soldiers, but we are not in that intricacy at the moment at all. We are taking the thing on a wide view, that you took the French scale as a whole, looked at the number of your armies, and assessed the amount which on the French scale you would probably be liable to pay. That is how the original computation was arrived at. You could proceed upon that basis if you liked and then correct the amounts that were put in for the separate parts of the Empire by the figures as now ascertained, making a further correction for India in the respect that she is not even paying up to that scale, and, therefore, that she should not take out more than she has actually paid. That is one way of doing it, and that is following the basis of the Treaty. On the other hand, it really does not matter amongst ourselves whether we follow the Treaty or not. The Treaty gives us a lump sum, and instead of dividing it upon that basis, we can if we choose apportion it amongst the various parts of the Empire on the footing of saying, "Well, now we have ascertained, each of us, our capital liability in respect of pensions, and we shall apportion it upon the basis of the ratio that the various liabilities have to each other." Those are the two main features. I can now show you from the tables how these two theories would work out.

Definition of Pensions.

Mr. Hughes: May I ask, first of all, if there is any definition of this category "Pensions"? Is a pension that which is ordinarily so-called, or does it include allowances and those other payments, which, I believe, are being made by all the Dominions and, I think, by Britain? For example, for Australia's 10*l.* paid in pensions last year she paid 20*l.* by way of allowances and under other heads.

Sir Robert Horne: You mean for land settlement and that sort of thing?

Mr. Hughes: For soldiers, yes.

Sir Robert Horne: I do not think it includes any of those things. I do not think any claim was made in respect of these adventitious aids, so to speak. It was purely upon a pension basis.

Mr. Hughes: I was a member of the Reparation Committee. Assuming that the Treaty did not adopt the whole of the recommendation of the Committee. When the Committee considered what might be paid under the category of "pensions," it was regarded as a generic term, under which might be grouped all the sub-headings to which I have referred. To the soldier or to his dependents it makes no difference whether the money received is called a pension or allowance or anything else. It is paid to him to enable him to rehabilitate or to maintain himself. I am bound to say that, although I did not agree with my colleagues entirely (Lord Sumner and Lord Cunliffe) as to the exclusion of certain categories, that I was always under this impression. And in making up our estimates, while we did not include land settlements because we could not then foresee what has since been done in this direction, we did contemplate those charges for which we have now undertaken responsibility and have statutory warrant for, such as allowances and other things.

French Scale the Basis of Calculation.

Sir Robert Horne: I will tell you why I think that is ruled out of this discussion. The ultimate arrangement made under the Treaty was the French scale. That is the only basis we have, and the amount of our reparation is computed upon the basis of the French scale. We divide it amongst ourselves when we get it. Accordingly, nothing is in the computation as to what we are entitled to get except upon the basis of what the French were paying out or making themselves liable to pay out in respect of the remedies they were offering to their soldiers. That means, as I understand, practically pensions and pensions alone in the strict sense.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Otherwise you would get into a most serious complication, because some Dominions—we, for instance—are paying a high pension scale and some are not paying as much. If you divide on the basis of what each individual Dominion is paying you would hardly ever get a common denominator.

Sir Robert Horne: If you will look at the table* on the first page . . . .

Sir Thomas Smartt: Before you go to that, may I ask you whether you are now dealing with 22 per cent. of the computed amount of 6,300,000,000*l.* Besides that amount of 6,300,000,000*l.*, there is a further payment to be made over forty-two years on the basis of German trade estimated at 26 per cent.

Sir Robert Horne: The 6,300,000,000*l.* covers all the liabilities.

Sir Thomas Smartt: It covers the whole thing.

Sir Robert Horne: The upkeep of the armies of occupation are outside, but otherwise it covers everything.

Sir Thomas Smartt: So that really the annual payments, plus the alternative payments, are all included in the 6,300,000,000*l.*

Sir Robert Horne: Yes.

Mr. Massey: Everything except the cost of the armies of occupation.

Method of computation of Empire's total Claim.

Sir Robert Horne: If you look at the table* on the first page you will see what we applied for. That was the computation of our claim, 32,694 millions of marks, which works out at something over 1,600,000,000*l.* You see what the various items are: pensions, separation allowances, damage to property, non-maritime shipping losses, and damage to civil persons. We are not really concerned here at this moment with the proportion these things bear to each other. Again, if you look at what is described as Table 1, on page 4 of my copy . . . .

Mr. Montagu: Are you confining your attention this morning only to pensions?

Sir Robert Horne: No, I hope to do everything else afterwards, but I should like to take pensions first and get a principle upon that before we go on to separation allowances. If you look at Table 1 you will find, dealing with pensions alone, as this table does, that in column "A" you get the proportion that each part of the Empire bears to the other in respect of its claim on pensions. It is made up by the actuary upon the basis of what we computed at the time to be the liability on pensions of each of the various parts of the Empire.

Mr. Hughes: How do each of the columns differ from each other?

Sir Robert Horne: I will tell you what I think column "B" means now. Column "B" means column "A" corrected by the actual figures that we received from various parts of the Empire as the liability they were undertaking. Column "A," as you see, proceeds upon the French scale, which was the basis of the Treaty. Column "B," still operating upon the French scale, corrects the actual proportions as ascertained by the figures provided by each part of the Empire.

Sir Thomas Smartt: By the various pension Acts.

Basis suggested for computation of the share of portion of the Empire in Pension Claim.

Sir Robert Horne: So that you see on that basis while the United Kingdom's share remains the same, Canada, for example, is 6·22 instead of 3·13 and Australia comes out at 6·30 instead of . . . .

Mr. Meighen: I do not understand that at all.

* Paper No. E 26. Appendix.

Sir Robert Horne: We computed as best we could at the moment, as we could not get the actual figures from you at all.

Mr. Meighen: How do you figure Australia twice more than Canada?

Sir Robert Horne: Quite frankly, your Canadian Pensions Office has not been able to provide really accurate figures.

Mr. Meighen: It is not a matter of accuracy at all—it is a matter of profound error.

Sir Robert Horne: If you will let me explain the question. I am leaving column "A," because column "A" has turned out inaccurate in its proportions. I think I can show Mr. Meighen how the thing arises. I think I can make a complete explanation. Well now, I have told you what column "B" is. Now, column "C" corrects the position through an adjustment in respect of India. The 3·91 and 3·93 that you got in Columns "A" and "B" in regard to India turned out to be quite inaccurate, because India, in point of fact, as I have said, is not even paying on the French scale, and, therefore, we have reduced India to ·54, that being the exact proportion which she is paying according to her pensions scheme, and that has the effect of altering the figures in regard to all the others. For example, Canada goes up slightly to 3·24. We distribute the surplus that we get by putting India in its accurate position, and Australia gets a little more, and New Zealand slightly more, too. That is proceeding on the basis, as you see, of the French scale, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty and correcting the figures originally put in, which actually shows in what proportions they are made up according to the pensions schemes of the various countries.

Mr. Meighen: It does not. There is no chance in the world of it being within 100 per cent. of being right.

Sir Robert Horne: I will show you how the thing works out. If you take Table 2, which is two pages further on, you will find the figures based upon a different principle. Instead of proceeding upon the French scale—what we paid on the basis of the French scale—it proceeds to a distribution of the amount to be received upon a different footing. It shows what is the capitalised liability of each of the various parts of the Empire as now discovered by actuarial estimate upon the pensions' schemes. That is what it does. It may possibly be the fairest way out—I do not know that we shall discuss that. I am only now explaining where we are. Now you see the figures change a little upon that basis. The United Kingdom percentage remains practically the same, 84·95 instead of 84·56; the minor Colonies remains the same. Canada goes up from 3·24 to 5·10. Look at Table 2. Australia goes down from 7·84 to 5·95; New Zealand remains about the same, 2·47 as against 2·78.

Mr. Massey: On the face of it, that column looks very much better in proportion to the number of soldiers from each country.

Sir Robert Horne: This is really a thoroughly scientific actuarial calculation upon the basis of the liability of each portion of the Empire under the pensions scheme operating—that is what it really is.

Mr. Hughes: I do not know where you get these figures, but you must have a record. I do not admit for one moment that you have the right to take what you call pensions in this country, but which we call in Australia pensions, and group them under, say, three headings. What have you done? You have taken one of ours and said, "That is all we are paying," but it is not. Might I ask this, the pensions scheme in Australia, for example, the rights of pensions alone—the term is ordinarily applied. I should like to ask your officials whether they had regard to that—what schedule they have taken apart from anything else?

Sir Robert Horne: I am told that they put in every kind of allowance on the same basis as here.

Mr. Hughes: What schedule did they take—the old schedule or the new one?

Sir Robert Horne: When was there a new one, Mr. Hughes?

Mr. Hughes: I should say the best part of a year ago—I do not know how long.

Sir Robert Horne : I am told it was about six months ago. The Australian one was obtained from Australia House, and it was on the basis of that one that these computations were made.

Mr. Hughes: I should say that it was not accurate.

Sir Robert Horne : Well, we will ascertain that.

Mr. Hughes: We paid 66,000,000*l.* to soldiers last year. On the face of it, therefore, that is . . . . (shaking his head in dissent).

Sir Robert Horne : You are probably including many other things which we have not included, like land settlement.

Mr. Hughes: Even when you have made every allowance for that it does not seem to be approximately correct.

Sir Robert Horne : Have you anybody, Mr. Hughes, that can tell us about this matter?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, I first want to know all you can tell us, because I do not know what figures you are working on. Perhaps your officials might be given an opportunity to consult with mine in order that we may see where we are and what we are doing. We must work on the same figures, otherwise we cannot arrive at any settlement.

Sir Robert Horne : They have been working together for the last six months. I cannot say that Australia House has left them in ignorance of any particular claim you are making.

Mr. Montagu : There is a strong question of principle raised by Mr. Hughes. Our figure is wrong. Have you included land settlement?

Sir Robert Horne : No land settlement is included in this.

Mr. Montagu : That is what Mr. Hughes was raising just now.

Case for inclusion of Land Settlement in Pensions' Claim.

Sir Thomas Smartt : You do not raise the question that, included in the apportionment of your pensions, should be the amount of money that you have spent upon land settlement. I understand from the Chancellor that these computations, no matter what the basis may be, had been estimated on the actual basis of the capitalised amounts of your pensions.

Sir Robert Horne : Pensions were including, of course, ordinary allowances for convalescent treatment and training—it includes all these, but does not include the kind of thing, for example, as able-bodied men that we send to Australia under the scheme of land settlement. We did not include any of that, although it is very costly to us.

Mr. Massey : If you are going to include an item like that, I should have to increase ours by 25 millions.

Sir Robert Horne : Obviously, it seems to be outside the purview of what we regard as the foundation of proper claims.

Mr. Meighen : They are loans.

Mr. Hughes: I am not talking about money, either out of revenue or of loans.

Mr. Meighen : I know. They are advances to soldiers by way of a loan.

Mr. Hughes: I am not talking about advances to soldiers, but what we have paid and are paying to them. We say to the soldier, "Very well, if you go on the land we will help you." If he says, "I prefer not to go on the land," we have got to support him until he is re-established. Whether the money is paid to the soldier to settle him on the land, or as payment by way of sustenance, it amounts to the same thing so far as our Treasury is concerned. Clearly, you cannot exclude the one in calculating the other.

Sir Robert Horne : With all submission, Mr. Hughes, I think it stands upon a different footing because, obviously, they are not in the ordinary way reparations in respect of war damage, because they are mixed up with a great many other considerations.

Mr. Hughes : No, they are not.

Sir Robert Horne : With us they are.

Sir Thomas Smartt : We believe, Mr. Chancellor, very large sums of money have been spent on land settlement and returned soldiers, but they are not returned in these claims.

Sir Robert Horne: No, they are not put in as part of your computation in connection with the Treaty.

Mr. Hughes: I hope you will hear this case argued. This is the first time we have had a chance to know upon what basis the Government of the United Kingdom proposes to dsitribute any monies received by way of reparation, and we ought to be allowed to hear all the facts before we are asked to come to any decision.

Sir Robert Horne : No. Well, Mr. Hughes, I think you are slightly in error about this, because the representatives of Australia, Canada, South Africa, and of the United Kingdom have been working hard on this thing for six months.

Mr. Hughes: While that may be very true, I, as head of the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia, have been kept wholly in the dark about it. I hear all this for the first time.

Sir Robert Horne : I am sorry for that. Your representatives have certainly been very busy.

Mr. Hughes : Probably they were under some obligation not to say anything.

Sir Robert Horne : The schedule upon which they proceeded came from Australia, and therefore I am sorry you did not know about it. It is not surprising with all the many duties you have to perform that you have not heard about it, but, believe me, the officials of Australia were very well apprised of the whole of the questions that are here under discussion.

Mr. Hughes : I know nothing whatever of it. I know of the 22 per cent. to the British Empire. Mr. Lloyd George reported that to us, but beyond that it has not gone.

Sir Robert Horne : There is this to be kept in mind. I do not say it is foreclosing things. What the Treaty provides in respect of reparation in connection with the liability for pensions is payment of pensions on the French scale, and that is in the Treaty. I am afraid you signed the Treaty.

Mr. Hughes: I did sign it, but I will ask any man who was there if he ever read it—all of it.

Sir Robert Horne : That is the basis upon which we are to be paid.

Mr. Hughes: I do not admit that, because the matter has been the subject of negotiation ever since.

Sir Robert Horne : But not getting away from the bases.

Mr. Hughes : I do not know.

Sir Robert Horne : What the clause says is—

> "(5.) As damage caused to the peoples of the Allied and Associated Powers, all pensions and compensation in the nature of pensions to naval and military victims of war (including members of the Air Force), whether mutilated, wounded, sick or invalided, and to the dependents of such victims, the amount due to the Allied and Associated Governments being calculated for each of them as being the capitalised cost of such pensions and compensation at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, on the basis of the scales in force in France at such date." (Treaty of Versailles, Part VIII, Section I, Annex I, Clause 5).

That is the basis upon which reparation is to be paid, and that limits, as it would seem to me—but I say it with great deference to any view you may have—it seems to me to limit the scope of the matter we are considering. I think it really prevents us getting on to the big question as to what each country may have chosen to do as a part of general policy of that country in the way of providing for land settlement.

Mr. Hughes : I will leave land settlement out for the moment, but I understood you to say that quite apart from the basis upon which the monies received under the Reparation clause were to be divided between the different Allies, there was the question of the division inter se, which was not necessarily governed by the same principle. I think you said that.

Sir Robert Horne: What I said was, we could, amongst ourselves, if we chose, agree to a proportion in the way of distribution which would not necessarily be governed by the French scale, but what I have exhibited this other table for, upon capitalised value, is to show how the proportions would work out if you took such a basis as this.

Mr. Montagu: What you have done with regard to India is, you have claimed from Germany on the French scale, and then you have said to India you do not pay on the French scale. Therefore, it is a little nest egg for us. It is too high for you and we will distribute it to the other persons.

Sir Robert Horne: I could quite understand that objection if we were getting what we claimed, that really is the point.

Mr. Montagu: I am not questioning the propriety of some adjustment, but I am saying this adjustment requires a little consideration from that point of view and Australia's.

Mr. Meighen: That is the thing which has been in my mind.

Mr. Hughes: I do not see how you can ignore the circumstances of the Dominions.

Mr. Massey: You cannot receive more than you pay away.

Mr. Meighen: I do not know. You can increase the payments.

Sir Robert Horne: If the full amount of the claim was granted we could not deny India all that has been claimed on her behalf, but, when much less than the claim has been granted, if one takes more than she actually pays and the others less, because of the error in the original computation———

Sir Thomas Smartt: Seeing that other parts of the Empire have had to pay out on the basis of the higher scale of living.

Mr. Meighen: That is the point.

Sir Robert Horne: Having said so much and before we get on the discussion upon the principle which Mr. Hughes has raised, if it is to be raised, may I direct your attention to Table 3, which will show you the proportions? These are really illustrations which would be arrived at if you took the basis of casualties alone without regard to the scale on which pensions are paid in respect of those casualties. Table 3 shows that the casualties of the United Kingdom come out at 82·2 instead of 84. Canada comes out to 7·1, Australia to 7·2, New Zealand comes down to 1·9 and India remains at ·54.

Mr. Montagu: You do not make the calculations up for some reason or other.

Sir Robert Horne: It is kept at the same figure because that is the actual expenditure. The explanation of these figures is this. If you take casualties by themselves, they give some kind of indication of what your liability will be, but not a full and complete explanation, for this reason. If you take the case of the United Kingdom, we had, I think, almost twice as many married men in our army as any of the Dominions, as you would expect, and the result, of course, is that there is far more to be paid out in the way of pensions; there are far more widows and dependents to provide for, and, therefore, casualties by themselves do not give anything like the measure of the liability of the various countries, but I have put forward that table just to show you how it works out on casualties alone. Now, Mr. Meighen, I would like you to look at the table* which shows the general casualties and so on, and you will see in these figures an explanation as to why I think there is some error in the records of the Canada Pensions Office.

Sir Thomas Smartt: What page is that?

Sir Robert Horne: If you take the fourth column, first you see the total of the casualties of each of the various parts of the Empire. The United Kingdom is over 2,000,000, Australia 211,000, Canada 206,000, India 117,000, New Zealand 56,000 and South Africa 21,000. Look at the next column, representing the disabled men.

Mr. Meighen: Just a moment before you go on. Where do you reach the figure of 206,000 for Canada?

Sir Robert Horne: That was supplied to us, as I understand, by the War Office.

* Paper No. E 26, Appendix.

Mr. Meighen: Up to the 15th January, 1919, 218,433, according to our official figures here.

Sir Robert Horne: I do not know whether you can say whether these figures . . . . there is still the difficulty, whatever the correct figure is, Mr. Meighen, if you will kindly look at this table for a moment, because it is an important point—look at the next column on disabled men. We had one in three of our casualties disabled. No, it is one in two, because the disabled men are included in the casualties; that is, more than 20 per cent. disabled. If you take Australia, there are 95,000 disabled out of 211,000 casualties. It is just about the same proportion as ours.

Mr. Massey: It is more.

Sir Robert Horne: No, it is slightly less. Look at the Canadian figures: 52,000 disabled out of 206,000. That, as you see, is very much less than the proportion of either the United Kingdom or Australia, and, if you look at the New Zealand figures, 34,000 out of 56,000, that is a bigger proportion than either the United Kingdom or Australia, and South Africa, 15,000 out of 21,000, is a bigger proportion, but the Canadian figures look to me to bear some error on the face of them.

Mr. Meighen: It means it is likely that the different Departments have given a different meaning to the word "disabled."

Sir Robert Horne: I suppose it is upon disablement that you pay pensions.

Mr. Meighen: It may be. It may mean one thing in one country and not quite the same thing in another.

Sir Robert Horne: You may administer on a much higher basis.

Sir Thomas Smartt: That is the whole thing. If the Canadian Medical Boards are much more rigorous, they would have put their percentage of disabled on a much lower scale.

Mr. Meighen: That is so, but that would not make any difference in the distribution.

Sir Robert Horne: That explains why on your figures of your pensions scheme, when they are actually applied to the original computation, your figure comes down, because your figure of disablement, and therefore the figure of your pension liability, comes so much lower actually than is the average in other countries.

Mr. Meighen: In a word, care or whatever you may describe it as, in one country may result in a very considerable contraction of the number of any class, but that should not have any effect at all in the question of the distribution of Reparations.

Sir Robert Horne: That depends. You see, it depends on the point of view—I am not saying this is a conclusive answer—but it depends upon the basis you take to divide Reparations; whether on the basis of what you really incurred . . . .

Mr. Meighen: You would not argue that?

Sir Robert Horne: I do not know. It is for consideration.

Mr. Meighen: It is absurd.

Sir Robert Horne: Or whether it is on some basis higher than that.

Mr. Meighen: It is on the basis of the suffering of the country. The country suffers just the same whether the State pays a certain amount to the individual or whether the individual suffers it himself. There is not a bit of difference in that. One country by a very reckless policy might absorb the whole thing if it were reckless enough. All I want to draw attention to is this. We only want a reasonably broad basis of distribution, and it would be a shameful thing if we cannot agree on it. I do not think that this should be taken into account, not that I want any computation made of it of any kind, but in determining what the broad basis should be this should be taken into account, that Canada alone obtained no territorial acquisitions. They ought not to be wholly ignored in determining the basis of distribution.

That, as you see, is very much less than the proportion of either the United Kingdom or Australia, and, if you look at the New Zealand figures, 34,000 out of 56,000, that is a bigger proportion than either the United Kingdom or Australia, and South Africa, 15,000 out of 21,000, is a bigger proportion, but the Canadian figures look to me to bear some error on the face of them.

Mr. Meighen: It means it is likely that the different Departments have given a different meaning to the word "disabled."

Sir Robert Horne: I suppose it is upon disablement that you pay pensions.

Mr. Meighen: It may be. It may mean one thing in one country and not quite the same thing in another.

Sir Robert Horne: You may administer on a much higher basis.

Sir Thomas Smartt: That is the whole thing. If the Canadian Medical Boards are much more rigorous, they would have put their percentage of disabled on a much lower scale.

Mr. Meighen: That is so, but that would not make any difference in the distribution.

Sir Robert Horne: That explains why on your figures of your pensions scheme, when they are actually applied to the original computation, your figure comes down, because your figure of disablement, and therefore the figure of your pension liability, comes so much lower actually than is the average in other countries.

Mr. Meighen: In a word, care or whatever you may describe it as, in one country may result in a very considerable contraction of the number of any class, but that should not have any effect at all in the question of the distribution of Reparations.

Sir Robert Horne: That depends. You see, it depends on the point of view—I am not saying this is a conclusive answer—but it depends upon the basis you take to divide Reparations; whether on the basis of what you really incurred . . . .

Mr. Meighen: You would not argue that?

Sir Robert Horne: I do not know. It is for consideration.

Mr. Meighen: It is absurd.

Sir Robert Horne: Or whether it is on some basis higher than that.

Mr. Meighen: It is on the basis of the suffering of the country. The country suffers just the same whether the State pays a certain amount to the individual or whether the individual suffers it himself. There is not a bit of difference in that. One country by a very reckless policy might absorb the whole thing if it were reckless enough. All I want to draw attention to is this. We only want a reasonably broad basis of distribution, and it would be a shameful thing if we cannot agree on it. I do not think that this should be taken into account, not that I want any computation made of it of any kind, but in determining what the broad basis should be this should be taken into account, that Canada alone obtained no territorial acquisitions. They ought not to be wholly ignored in determining the basis of distribution.

Sir Robert Horne: I am afraid you would not like to take over Mesopotamia, Mr. Meighen.

Mr. Massey: That is my experience.

Mr. Meighen: As regards mandates, that may be true, but I should not like to hear that as regards territorial acquisitions after the trouble taken to get them.

Mr. Massey: What territorial acquisitions are you referring to, for instance?

Mr. Meighen: You have Samoa.

Mr. Massey: That is a mandate country, and it carried a good deal of responsibility. I know we are not going to get anything out of it, but it was taken to prevent any other country coming in.

Mr. Meighen: Australia wanted Nauru, and you also wanted something.

Mr. Massey: Only to keep other people out.

Mr. Hughes: What has that got to do with this question?

Mr. Meighen: Canada alone received none, and Canada alone from that standpoint is interested. We should be in a minority if interest alone was to dictate, but I suggest that it should not be left out of account in determining the principle that is to govern the distribution, not that any computation could be made, but if there was one principle defensible, that appeals to us as right and fair. If such a principle as that were defined, and if it gave a little advantage in that respect to the country that got no territorial acquisition, it might be adopted.

Mr. Massey: I see no financial advantage in it.

Mr. Meighen: Financial advantages are not everything.

Sir Robert Horne: I understood you to put forward a suggestion, Mr. Meighen, that we ought to try to find some way which does not rigidly follow the actual liability incurred, because you say there is something outside of that. That is your point.

Mr. Meighen: That is so. We would never get anywhere if we did not go on that basis

Sir Robert Horne: Something that does not rigidly follow the actual amount which the State happens to pay in the way of pensions.

Mr. Massey: You get into indemnity in that way. Once you depart from the principle of reparation, you get into trouble.

Mr. Meighen: I do not want to depart from it at all.

Mr. Hughes: What principle then are you going to adhere to? Liability should be the only principle. The question is to establish what is the liability, and we require some kind of principle to guide us, what we are to exclude, and what to include.

Mr. Meighen: Liability as between the State and the State's citizens is one thing, but the loss which the country itself suffered is another thing. You might, for example, have adopted a certain policy as to who is disabled or who is not, and whether a man is disabled 20 per cent. or 80 per cent.; we may have followed another course. You may have been reckless and we penurious, or vice versâ, but that should not determine the principle of reparation. We should seek the principle that has a bearing on the actual suffering of the country's people, and adhere to that. We would say, go on a casualty basis if we can. I realise Sir Robert Horne's point that the country which has exhausted its manhood the more, whose casualties are really greater casualties, man for man, than other countries is entitled to be considered as having incurred a greater liability. Perhaps some allowance could be made for that here.

Mr. Massey: That would suit me.

Mr. Hughes: I think there is a good deal in what Mr. Meighen says, and if we are to take into consideration all those things that he has touched upon, and consider all the circumstances of each Dominion during the war, we should have to include the effect of the war upon the trade of each country, and to examine whether one Dominion suffered more than another as a result of the war, and if we found as a fact that the trade of any Dominion had not suffered but increased or decreased by such an amount as to be negligible, we should have to take this fact into account.

And we should also have to consider the remoteness of any part of the Empire from its markets, the dangers to which its trade was exposed on that account, the price obtainable for its goods—all these and many other things would have to be taken into consideration. As I see it, you are launching into an uncharted sea. Once you fix the liability, you can express that liability in terms of money. We are invited to take pensions, as payable by each Dominion, as the bases, or as an alternative base the quotas upon the casualties suffered. I think that you have a much better basis for fixing the quota of reparation by taking the actual amount of its liability to its soldiers. This seems a more reliable and equitable basis than its casualties and disablements; but if you take this latter as a basis, namely, the amount that we are paying in compensation to our soldiers, then Mr. Meighen says it is inequitable, because he says some Dominions may have been reckless and others penurious. He says that, if you have the quota upon the actual casualties, you eliminate that.

Mr. Massey: The term "casualty" differs in the different countries. A casualty in New Zealand is not the same as in the other Dominions. A casualty in New Zealand was not counted unless a man was off duty for a certain number of weeks. We may differ in that respect.

Mr. Meighen: That is the same with us.

Mr. Massey: I do not think we would be wise in getting away from calculating in the actual liability the sum which each country has paid by way of pensions and compensations, without including land settlements.

Mr. Meighen: We are spending thirty-three millions in loans for the purpose of taking hold of the disabled fellows. That is not pensions you see.

Mr. Massey: Something might be done in that way, but I am very doubtful about it.

Mr. Meighen: You could not take pensions alone, at least I do not think you could. We have been spending more until just this year in other forms of assessments than in pensions.

Sir L. Worthington Evans: But those additions for civilian reinstatement do not alter the ratio.

Mr. Meighen: They would undoubtedly affect the ratio.

Sir Thomas Smartt: It would depend on what you can do. I understand Mr. Hughes is not only making provision for land settlement, but that he is setting the men up in business, giving them 500*l.* or 1,000*l.* to set them up in a shop.

Mr. Hughes: I hear you say that.

Sir Thomas Smartt: I am only asking if that is the case.

Mr. Hughes: As a matter of fact it is not.

Mr. Massey: We are doing it in New Zealand, and have spent a very large sum of money in that way. We have trained every man who was willing to be trained, paid him his pension during that training, and also paid him the minimum wage as provided in the Arbitration Act while he was learning his business.

Sir Thomas Smartt: If you go into all those questions you will never arrive at a good basis.

Mr. Massey: I quite agree.

Sir L. Worthington Evans: I very much doubt whether you would appreciably alter the ratio.

Mr. Massey: No, not much.

Sir Robert Horne: It is difficult to follow that in all its ramifications.

Mr. Meighen: It is difficult from the point of re-establishment of a disabled man.

Mr. Massey: We are only doing it in the case of a disabled man.

Mr. Meighen: We take another way of doing it. It is a loan that you make.

Mr. Massey: No, in the case of training a disabled man we pay him everything.

Mr. Meighen: If you paid him 1,000*l.*, that is a loan.

Mr. Massey: That is so.

Sir Thomas Smartt: I understood that New Zealand and Australia gave the men loans to set them up in business. Mr. Hughes does not do so, but you do it in New Zealand.

Mr. Hughes: For practical purposes these payments are negligible. We have confined our action to settlement on the land. If we were to be told now what payment Germany has made and is to make in the near future we should be better able to grip this as a practical proposition.

Sir Robert Horne: It is difficult to do that at this moment.

Mr. Hughes: If we are to divide nothing, it does not matter upon what principle we decide to divide it.

Sir Robert Horne: We must hope for something to divide.

Mr. Hughes: The Chancellor of the Exchequer does not entirely live on hope.

Sir Robert Horne: We shall have Bonds to deal with.

Sir L. Worthington Evans: Interest-bearing Bonds upon which interest will be paid.

Sir Robert Horne: Let us try to gather information upon this matter. Does the casualty basis recommend itself to Mr. Hughes, does it recommend itself to you, Mr. Massey?

Mr. Massey: No, I think it is too complicated. I suggested liability.

Offer to adopt Casualty Basis if Dominions prefer it.

Sir Robert Horne: I see Australia comes out all right on the casualty basis. It does better on that basis than on the liability basis. Great Britain suffers on that basis because it has so many more dependents to provide for, but if the representatives of the Dominions agree that the casualty basis would suffice, I will, so far as the United Kingdom is concerned, undertake to suffer the loss that there is in it. There is an obvious loss in it.

Mr. Meighen: There is now. There is, however, this to be said, that as time goes on you are likely to get back to a lower cost of living than the Dominions. You were before the war substantially lower, though you are not now. I have seen no evidence of it since I came over, but when normal times return you very probably will. That would assist Great Britain.

Sir Robert Horne: I am not making any point about that now. I say that if the casualty basis is satisfactory to the representatives of the Dominions, I am perfectly willing to forego for the United Kingdom the proportion which obviously we give up. You will find it in Table 3, Mr. Hughes.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, I see.

Mr. Massey: Before we do anything in the way of casualties, or accept casualties, we need a common interpretation for "casualty."

Mr. Montagu: If you depart from liabilities and go to casualties you would have a higher liability for certain Dominions.

Sir Robert Horne: I put it to you that if the United Kingdom is taking the proportion it would be entitled to take, looking to its liability, India could scarcely complain if it gets the full amount that it pays out, gets it in that proportion. All the rest are getting less.

Mr. Montagu: If you are basing yourself on liabilities, I quite agree with your proposition, but if you depart from liabilities and go to casualties, which has no relation to liability at all, but is a measure of the suffering of humanity, then I say we are entitled to take that claim on casualties as well as any other part of the Empire.

Mr. Meighen: I think so too, except for this consideration that Sir Thomas Smartt advances, that casualties, as we adopt it, is merely a means of getting at the monetary suffering of the nation, and not of the Treasury. What he said, which rather altered my view, was this, that on account of the cost of living in India you do not suffer per man as we do. If a man is injured 20 per cent. in each country, you do not suffer as much as Canada or Australia. If he is totally disabled you do not. I thought that argument was very strong.

Sir Robert Horne: I appreciate Mr. Montagu's point of view about this, but I am afraid that if India asks to be assessed on the basis of casualties, then the whole of this table will be put out.

Mr. Meighen: Casualties is only a means of getting at the suffering of each country reduced to pounds and shillings. That is all, and we think that is the fairest way of getting at it.

Sir Robert Horne: We are a little bit confused about this, because it is not really pounds and shillings, but the proportion in which you are going to claim pounds and shillings.

Mr. Meighen: I know that—the relative suffering reduced to the denomination of money. It is a means of getting at that, but as regards India a difference arises on account of the very great difference in the scale of the cost of living, and consequently an exception must be made there, because in the case of a man in India who is half disabled, the loss to that man in money is much less than if the same man was in Australia. Consequently, if you got the loss in money that seemed to me to be fair.

Sir Thomas Smartt: The only difficulty about casualties, as Mr. Massey suggested, is, what do you define as casualty? Get a common denominator. A man may get a scratch on his finger, he is off for the day, it is a casualty, but it does not interfere with his economic condition in his country when he goes back.

Mr. Massey: Really I do not think it is worth while. It all comes back to what incapacity means at the end of the war. If you are going to try to get the relative suffering of each country, the better way is to take the proportion of people, men and women, who went to the war, in proportion to the rest of the population. I do not suggest that, but it seems to me that is the better way of getting at the relative suffering. I do not think you will do better than stick to liability.

Sir Robert Horne: May I suggest we are really not endeavouring to find out the amount of suffering of one country as compared with another? What we are trying to discover is some rough measure in which we can estimate the proportion to each other in which we are going to take any money that becomes available. That is all. It is not going to compensate for suffering. That is not the object of this. This is an attempt to arrive at a proportion sum and nothing more. When you are looking at the question of pensions, the number of people who have been injured does give you a rough measure. I think that undoubtedly may be said, and you may say: "Well, upon what basis have you compared these things in the various countries?" As far as we are concerned, all the figures we have are War Office figures, the casualties suffered by the various armies I venture to think that is not a bad measure if we are looking at the means of making this proportion sum. For example, if you take the case of New Zealand, out of 56,000 casualties, 34,000 were disabled. I imagine that the proportion of casualties in the various armies came out not very differently.

Mr. Massey: It is not casualties. If you are going to do that, you have got to drop casualties and go for incapacity at the end of the war or at the time the soldier reached his country.

Mr. Meighen: What about the man who was treated for four years during the war? You cannot leave that out.

Mr. Massey: That would come under what I have said, the time he arrives in his own country.

Mr. Meighen: He might not arrive there at all.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: You might have the amount of casualties and capital liabilities and pensions. You will then get the actual casualties of the day during the actual service, and you will get another factor which represents the permanent loss.

Mr. Hughes: Look at New Zealand's total: 56,000, of which 16,000 were killed.

Mr. Massey: 17,000

Mr. Hughes: Whereas you take Canada : 206,000, of whom 56,000 were killed. The proportion is different, and whatever you may estimate of the measure of a man's disablement, when he is dead there is an end of it.

Sir Robert Horne: There is his widow. If he is dead, there is still the question of the widow and family.

Mr. Hughes: You cannot say he is not disabled.

Sir Robert Horne: And they are part of the pensionable liability.

Mr. Meighen: We include deaths as disabled. A death is a disability.

Mr. Massey: The number of dependents has to be taken into account.

Mr. Hughes: Of course.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Does disease come under casualties, too?

Sir Robert Horne: Disease arising from war service is, I think, counted as a casualty with us.

Sir Thomas Smartt: I wonder if that is so?

Mr. Meighen: That is so with us; but it is claimed in this Memorandum, whether rightly or wrongly—I can hardly believe it myself—that we, in deciding whether a disease does arise out of the war, are more exact, they would get the advantage on that.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Take the troops in German East Africa. The worst cases of these troops were not the wounded, but the men who will carry to their dying day malarial fever, from which most of them will never be the same again. I do not know that they are treated as casualties.

Mr. Meighen: Surely.

Mr. Hughes: We had a larger force in Palestine, and may crack up now, over two years after the war.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Are they included as casualties?

Mr. Hughes: Many of them are not.

Mr. Massey: They are not officially included as casualties?

Mr. Hughes: No.

Sir Thomas Smartt: That makes a serious difference in our pensions.

Mr. Meighen: Those who, while in military service, took malarial fever are casualties. I think so.

Mr. Hughes: Wait a moment. I do not think so. Let me put this to you. There are plenty of people cracking up now in Australia who came out of the war apparently unaffected.

Mr. Meighen: So have we.

Mr. Hughes: They appear all right, then they go down, they crack up.

Mr. Meighen: Our Medical Boards decide that if break-up is traceable to the war he is a casualty; if not, he is not.

Mr. Hughes: These trickle through bit by bit. You are not able to measure yet.

Mr. Meighen: Neither are you.

Mr Hughes: No.

Mr. Meighen: So we are alike. It will even up. The question is whether or not, in determining whether his trouble is traceable to the war, each country has adopted equally rigorous standards. This paper says we have adopted more rigorous standards than you. If we have, you get the advantage in the distribution. Personally, I do not think we have. I am ready to take the chance.

Sir Robert Horne: The casualties that we have estimated are the War Office casualties. It has got nothing to do with the views we may take in the various countries as to the number of people with fever, or a diphtheria that he may get, or a pneumonia, nothing to do with any question of that kind. These casualties are casualties in the field at the end of the war.

Mr. Meighen: Are you sure of that?

Sir Robert Horne: These casualties are War Office casualties. It is true they do not cover what we each suffer in our different countries with regard to subsidiary diseases arising out of the war, but what one puts forward the figures for is that they afford a rough measure of what each country has suffered in respect of war injuries, and really, that is all you can hope to get. You cannot get perfection, otherwise you would have to get down to every single item of administration in respect of our various pension schemes. That is hopeless and impossible, and therefore I do not think we need require to argue the question whether we have different administrative methods with regard to pensions or not. We take the War Office casualties as affording a rough measure of what each has suffered.

Sir Thomas Smartt: If the War Office would only tell us what are included in the term "casualties."

Sir Robert Horne: It will be on the same basis for all.

Sir Thomas Smartt: The troops that served in East Africa and countries of that sort had casualties far more serious than many of the wounded people, because in the East African campaign, which I followed, a huge percentage of the troops that went down, went down owing to the malarial conditions of the country—they were not wounded. If they are not considered as casualties, the pension scheme on that basis is far higher than the scheme on casualties.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: It would not really be a fair measure of the amount of disablement. They would be reported as a casualty. That is really a life disablement.

Sir Thomas Smartt: These men are all under our pension scheme. They are really the worst cases.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: The worst cases we have here are the malarial cases that keep on recurring.

Mr. Massey: There are lots of casualties whose dependents themselves never claim or receive pensions.

Mr. Hughes: I think the principle fairest to all is one which rests upon what is the actual liability, the liability recognised by each State, in regard to the war, expressed in terms of money. That is set down really in Table 1.

Sir Robert Horne: Table 2, I think.

Mr. Hughes: I do not admit, however, that the percentages, as set down there, rest upon the monies actually paid in Australia. But that is a matter which can be determined by examination of the figures. It has been suggested that we should weight casualties with the figures of Table 2. Then you get this :—

Great Britain	83·6
Canada	6·1
Australia	6·6
New Zealand	2·21
South Africa	·77

and you get that as against under Table 1:—

United Kingdom	84·5
Canada	3·2
Australia	7·8
New Zealand	2·7
South Africa	·9

and under casualties the average disability, if it were wholly determined by that, would, according to the Appendix to E 26, be :—

United Kingdom	50
Australia	67

Now, I am afraid if we argue for a very long time we shall hardly ever be able to arrive at something which is entirely satisfactory, but if we can get some workable scheme which would be acceptable to us, that would be the best, if it could be hoped for, and I am willing to take either the casualties or Table 1, but not Table 2 as it is now or these.

Sir Robert Horne: I would venture to support you in the view that we should take the casualties' table taken along with the table of actual liability, bringing out the figures you spoke of on this sheet, in which Canada gets 6·1 per cent., Australia 6·6 per cent., New Zealand 2·2 per cent., South Africa ·77 per cent., Great Britain 83·6 per cent. This is all, of course, on the assumption that India is taking ·54 per cent. in the total as showing her actual liability.

Mr. Montagu: How do you mean the actual liability? I do not quite follow. It is a percentage.

Sir Alfred Watson: It is India's liability reduced to the proportion of 25/44ths of India's actual capital liability.

Mr. Montagu: On the scale suggested, if India gets 25/44ths of her capital expenditure, what will South Africa get?

Sir Robert Horne: Sir Alfred Watson was talking of the conversion of the franc into rupees, from which we are all suffering. He is trying to explain to you the result of the exchange, because the matter was originally computed in francs, but in saying you are to take ·54 per cent. you will be getting on that proportion the whole of your expenditure.

Mr. Montagu: Assuming Germany pays the whole debt.

Mr. Hughes: Is this on a franc basis?

Sir Alfred Watson: Table 1 is on the franc basis. Table 2 is on the pound basis and Table 3 is on the pound basis.

Mr. Massey: What are we discussing, because it seems to me we are not getting anywhere?

Sir Robert Horne: It does not matter whether you are talking of francs or pound sterling if you are only talking of a proportion, but I do not understand what Sir Alfred is trying to tell Mr. Montagu.

Mr. Montagu: Neither do I. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told me earlier that I ought to be content with ·54 per cent., because that would give me the total liability. Now you tell me you give me 25/44ths. If that be so, if I get that, what are South Africa, Australia and Canada getting? You want to compute my claim differently from them.

Sir Alfred Watson: In Table 2 you all get 25/44ths of your actual liability.

Mr. Montagu: Under Sir Robert Horne's alternative proposal he is keeping me to Table 2, but he is making a suggestion for combining Table 2 and Table 3 in regard to the Dominions. What proportion of their actual liabilities are they going to get?

Sir Alfred Watson: In total they will get the same as you. There will be a slight alteration as among themselves. Great Britain will suffer a loss of 3 per cent. and the other Dominions will get that 3 per cent. divided among them; India remaining the same.

Mr. Massey: What is the basis laid down in the Treaty? We seem to be talking all round the subject and are not getting any more forward.

Sir Robert Horne: The basis laid down in the Treaty is that the claim should be put forward on the basis of the French scale of pensions. That is to say, even although we are paying more, we cannot get more. That is on the French computation; that is what it provides. You get that lump sum. Some of us are paying, as you see, more than the French scale, India is paying less, the rest of us are paying more. The suggestion has been made that we should arrive at a division as amongst ourselves, not merely upon what each of us happens to be paying out, because, as Mr. Meighen says, those who are more strictly administering their scheme are the losers.

Mr. Hughes: I do not admit that for one moment. If you are arguing on the merits of the case I withdraw my assent to the compromise.

Sir Robert Horne: I am not doing that. On the other hand, to measure on the casualty basis would be obviously wrong, as, for example, in the British case it very much exceeds Britain's liability in respect of pensions. Now, it is suggested that you should put these two things together and, by weighting them together, you should get at something which will approximate to the justice of the position.

Mr. Massey: I do not agree with it. Once you get away from the liability, you are going to get into trouble, and very serious trouble. I believe you should have a workable basis set down here in Table 1, column "C."

Sir Thomas Smartt: There is a manifest injustice to Canada there.

Mr. Massey: I believe there is an injustice to Canada there, but do not imagine I want to do any injustice to Canada.

Mr. Meighen: That is reflected again in the next table.

Mr. Massey: I think that ought to be altered.

Mr. Meighen: This feature comes in also, Sir Robert. As you know, the Royal Air Force was supplied in very exceptional degree from Canada, and that does not appear at all in our casualties; that appears in yours.

Sir Robert Horne: We are dealing with very big figures. I do not think it could touch that.

Mr. Meighen: I think it must be the difference between the 218,000 and the other. We had a great many men in that force, and also men who came from Canada who came over here and joined your forces, and who have now gone back to Canada.

Sir Robert Horne: Anybody who was in our force gets the pension from us.

Mr. Meighen: We suffered in those two respects. The Air Force enlistments and the enlistments in your army of men who were really Canadians. We suffer in both those respects; nevertheless, I would agree to the casualty basis, but I would not agree to its being weighted down by any other system of calculation as to pensions. There are those two respects in which it will be unfair. I do not like to agree for another reason. It has a certain complication about it which will make it a subject of perpetual controversy and will not be easily understood by the general public. It is not complicated to me; I understand it, but will it be generally understood? I do not think so. If we say it is divided on the basis of casualties, I think it will be accepted at that.

Mr. Massey: Irrespective of the pensions paid?

Mr. Meighen: Yes. When you took it to the peace table you took it on casualties, not on pensions.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: On the French pensions.

Mr. Hughes: Irrespective of the amount paid, then you cannot weight the pledge with anything, you must pay on the casualty basis.

Mr. Meighen: That is what I say.

Mr. Massey: The French system is not on the casualty basis, it is according to the amount paid. Supposing Canada paid twice as much in pensions as New Zealand does, do you think it would be fair for us to claim as much as you do?

Mr. Meighen: Certainly.

Mr. Massey: I don't.

Mr. Hughes: I see Mr. Massey's and Mr. Meighen's point, and I see they are both equally fatal to this compromise here.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: You keep talking of casualties as though they were synonomous with pensioners; they are not.

Sir Robert Horne: It does not matter whether you are talking of francs or pound sterling if you are only talking of a proportion, but I do not understand what Sir Alfred is trying to tell Mr. Montagu.

Mr. Montagu: Neither do I. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told me earlier that I ought to be content with ·54 per cent., because that would give me the total liability. Now you tell me you give me 25/44ths. If that be so, if I get that, what are South Africa, Australia and Canada getting? You want to compute my claim differently from them.

Sir Alfred Watson: In Table 2 you all get 25/44ths of your actual liability.

Mr. Montagu: Under Sir Robert Horne's alternative proposal he is keeping me to Table 2, but he is making a suggestion for combining Table 2 and Table 3 in regard to the Dominions. What proportion of their actual liabilities are they going to get?

Sir Alfred Watson: In total they will get the same as you. There will be a slight alteration as among themselves. Great Britain will suffer a loss of 3 per cent. and the other Dominions will get that 3 per cent. divided among them; India remaining the same.

Mr. Massey: What is the basis laid down in the Treaty? We seem to be talking all round the subject and are not getting any more forward.

Sir Robert Horne: The basis laid down in the Treaty is that the claim should be put forward on the basis of the French scale of pensions. That is to say, even although we are paying more, we cannot get more. That is on the French computation; that is what it provides. You get that lump sum. Some of us are paying, as you see, more than the French scale, India is paying less, the rest of us are paying more. The suggestion has been made that we should arrive at a division as amongst ourselves, not merely upon what each of us happens to be paying out, because, as Mr. Meighen says, those who are more strictly administering their scheme are the losers.

Mr. Hughes: I do not admit that for one moment. If you are arguing on the merits of the case I withdraw my assent to the compromise.

Sir Robert Horne: I am not doing that. On the other hand, to measure on the casualty basis would be obviously wrong, as, for example, in the British case it very much exceeds Britain's liability in respect of pensions. Now, it is suggested that you should put these two things together and, by weighting them together, you should get at something which will approximate to the justice of the position.

Mr. Massey: I do not agree with it. Once you get away from the liability, you are going to get into trouble, and very serious trouble. I believe you should have a workable basis set down here in Table 1, column "C."

Sir Thomas Smartt: There is a manifest injustice to Canada there.

Mr. Massey: I believe there is an injustice to Canada there, but do not imagine I want to do any injustice to Canada.

Mr. Meighen: That is reflected again in the next table.

Mr. Massey: I think that ought to be altered.

Mr. Meighen: This feature comes in also, Sir Robert. As you know, the Royal Air Force was supplied in very exceptional degree from Canada, and that does not appear at all in our casualties; that appears in yours.

Sir Robert Horne: We are dealing with very big figures. I do not think it could touch that.

Mr. Meighen: I think it must be the difference between the 218,000 and the other. We had a great many men in that force, and also men who came from Canada who came over here and joined your forces, and who have now gone back to Canada.

Sir Robert Horne: Anybody who was in our force gets the pension from us.

Mr. Meighen: We suffered in those two respects. The Air Force enlistments and the enlistments in your army of men who were really Canadians. We suffer in both those respects; nevertheless, I would agree to the casualty basis, but I would not agree to its being weighted down by any other system of calculation as to pensions. There are those two respects in which it will be unfair. I do not like to agree for another reason. It has a certain complication about it which will make it a subject of perpetual controversy and will not be easily understood by the general public. It is not complicated to me; I understand it, but will it be generally understood? I do not think so. If we say it is divided on the basis of casualties, I think it will be accepted at that.

Mr. Massey: Irrespective of the pensions paid?

Mr. Meighen: Yes. When you took it to the peace table you took it on casualties, not on pensions.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: On the French pensions.

Mr. Hughes: Irrespective of the amount paid, then you cannot weight the pledge with anything, you must pay on the casualty basis.

Mr. Meighen: That is what I say.

Mr. Massey: The French system is not on the casualty basis, it is according to the amount paid. Supposing Canada paid twice as much in pensions as New Zealand does, do you think it would be fair for us to claim as much as you do?

Mr. Meighen: Certainly.

Mr. Massey: I don't.

Mr. Hughes: I see Mr. Massey's and Mr. Meighen's point, and I see they are both equally fatal to this compromise here.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: You keep talking of casualties as though they were synonomous with pensioners; they are not.

Mr. Montagu: There is a further political consideration I would raise from the point of view of people who are always trying to make trouble for us in India, namely, in Russia. If we proceed on our actual liability then we can face the world, but if we allow our enemies to say that we rate an Indian casualty lower than another casualty, we shall get into political difficulties which can be avoided on the liability system.

Indian Situation.

Mr. Hughes: I want to say this. I quite see the force of what has been urged in regard to India by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I am not in favour myself —although I can see very plainly it may not be to the interests of the Dominions—I am not in favour of the amount allocated to India being on any different basis. I quite see, if it be a basis of amount paid, India may not do as well as if on the basis of casualty, I quite see that, and it might be, therefore, that we should be driven to fix upon a principle of actual amount of liability. That is a principle which, if applied to all, the Indian delegates can defend; it is the same for us as for all the others, but this compromise appears to me to disregard the effect of this upon Indian feeling. I am not in favour of having India singled out for worse treatment than any other part of the Empire. I do not come here as the champion of India, but she has signed the Treaty, she has parliamentary institutions, she has the same right to be treated on a footing of equality around this table as any other, and the same principle must apply without any exception to all of us. Although I did not see it at first, I see this compromise is open to very severe criticism by the outside world, will give ground to those people in India who are disaffected and who are all the time saying we differentiate between India and the others, it does give occasion for that censure and criticism, and I do not think it is fair, so while I prefer naturally and I think it is equitable that we should be paid according to what we actually paid, if we cannot have that we must have it on the basis of casualties. As we shall all be treated the same in either case, the same principle will apply to us, and that no doubt in Table 1 will have the effect of bringing us all down a little.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: Table 2 you are arguing for. Table 2 is casualties.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Table 2 would be fair.

Sir L. Worthington Evans: Take Table 2.

Sir Robert Horne: Table 2 is based upon the actual capital liability that each country is incurring. That is Mr. Montagu's suggestion.

Mr. Meighen: Mr. Hughes says "casualties, and put India the same as the rest." That is Table 3, with the ·54 altered, and the table altered accordingly.

Sir Robert Horne: Mr. Massey wants Table 2, as I understand.

Mr. Massey: I am prepared to accept Table 2.

Sir Thomas Smartt: I will take Table 2 also. If you take the Indian casualties now, it will alter the figure very considerably, far more than people imagine.

Sir Robert Horne: I think you had far better stick to Table 2.

Mr. Meighen: I do not like to have to defend, and I do not think I can till I go into it further.

Sir Robert Horne: Table 2 is based upon the actual figures of what the pensioners are receiving, which have been forwarded to us by the Canadian officers.

Mr. Meighen: I do not think they are calculated the same. If it is revised, I think our scale is the highest, but there has been a different method adopted with regard to the capitalised liability.

Sir Robert Horne: We will decide upon the principle, and if there is a difference in the figures to be presented, that will have to be gone into.

Mr. Meighen: I will try to meet you, and I am anxious to do so, but I do not think that Table 2 is within a long way of being fair, and before I agree, even to the principle of Table 2, I should have to think it over. I am prepared to agree to Table 3, and to give India her casualties.

Sir Robert Horne: I think you had better see how the figures work out before you say that.

C 62188

Mr. Meighen: It is not a matter of figures so much as a matter of principle. I can defend figures, but I cannot defend a wrong principle.

Sir Robert Horne: I really do come back to this. After all, what we are trying to arrive at is a proportion. You are not now deciding something which you have got to go on the platform to defend as the amount you are going to hand out to your pensioners. It has got nothing to do with that. We are only trying to arrive at a rough and ready method of distributing what we assume, or hope, may come to us.

Mr. Hughes: Which do you prefer, Sir?

Division by Capital Liability incurred by each Country.

Sir Robert Horne: I must say it seems to me, so far as pure equity is concerned, the best way to do it would be by Table 2, by the capital liability which each country has incurred. I think that fits the situation myself.

Mr. Massey: I quite agree with the principle.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: It is the only one that fits in.

Sir Thomas Smartt: For everything they are paying out in pensions, they are receiving a proportionate share on the basis of the capitalisation.

Mr. Massey: I agree so far as the principle is concerned. I am losing a little by it, but I do not mind.

Mr. Meighen: I will not agree to that now.

Mr. Hughes: That is the same principle applied to us all, India, and everybody else?

Sir Robert Horne: Yes.

Mr. Hughes: All I have to say is this. I want to get a decision of some sort. It is understood, I assume, that in regard to the percentages set out in the third column, and the figures of capital value, &c., set out in the second column, we shall have an opportunity of going into those?

Sir Robert Horne: Certainly.

Mr. Hughes: In order to ascertain what in fact is the amount paid or claimed by each Dominion under each category, and correcting it if necessary.

Sir Robert Horne: Yes.

Mr. Hughes: I do not pretend that this is satisfactory to us, but I am prepared to accept anything that rests on a foundation of equity, and that has some relation to facts—actual expenditure. We can defend such a basis of agreement. The world can cast no stones at you if you do that. The Empire as a whole will be in an unassailable position. If the different parts of the Empire say: "We pay this out on the basis of what we have expended for this particular purpose, and on the understanding that India is to be treated as every other part of the Empire, and that we have a right to review these figures," I will agree.

Mr. Massey: I think we all agree. May I say that we have never been supplied with details, at least I have not. I mentioned the reason at the Conference the other day, that I was on board ship, and probably Mr. Hughes was on board ship, when these matters were arranged. I do not know now what the terms of payment were so far as Germany is concerned, that is to say, how many years it is spread over, or the shape the payment will take, whether bonds or gold.

Sir Thomas Smartt: You can get all that out of the papers you have received, the details of the 6,300,000,000*l.*, and the forty-two yearly payments.

Mr. Massey: That has not come to me.

Sir Robert Horne: I should be delighted, Mr. Massey, if you have not got such a document, to have it sent to you.

Mr. Massey: I think it probably went to New Zealand.

Mr. Hughes: I asked Mr. Lloyd George the other day, and he said there was a paper coming, but I have not seen it.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: It is a Foreign Office paper, and it has been circulated.

Mr. Massey: I think Mr. Hughes's copy went to Australia, and mine to New Zealand.

Mr. Hughes: I think this is a fair question, and surely it is capable of being answered—What are we going to get this year and next year?

Sir Thomas Smartt: Germany had paid 50,000,000*l* in gold already, or the equivalent.

Mr. Hughes: How much are we going to get out of that?

Sir Robert Horne: Of course it has not been paid in cash. A considerable amount has been paid in Bills, which will only mature on the 1st September. 12,000,000*l*. have been paid actually in gold.

Sir Thomas Smartt: The total is 50,000,000*l*.

Actual present payment by Germany.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: And that constitutes the first year's interest payment on the bonds. You do not touch it as cash except as dividends upon bonds.

Sir Robert Horne: There is a considerable number of priorities upon that. In the first place, the armies of occupation have to be paid for. That is one of the things we have to deal with.

Mr. Massey: And what "occupation" means.

Sir Robert Horne: That is a question we are going to discuss here. The Belgians have priority for certain claims of theirs. As you know, they were put before all the others, so that altogether I do not think there is going to be very much to divide this year, but we shall see.

Mr. Hughes: Then it is an academic question.

Mr. Meighen: We shall have to meet again upon this matter.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: Could we not take the question of the army of occupation now?

Mr. Montagu: What is the decision? Is it that the principle of Table 2 is accepted subject to an examination of figures?

Mr. Meighen: I have never said that I accept it, and I certainly will not. I look at Table 3 and even with those figures, which are not the same as ours, but assuming they are right, if I say to my Parliament: "Yes, our casualties are almost four times those of New Zealand, but they get practically twice the reparation." I cannot defend that. Furthermore, I cannot defend the principle that a country should have the right itself to decide what proportion of reparation it gets. The matter of calculation comes in. The methods of calculating these capitalised liabilities come in. The policy of the country comes in, and, as between ourselves, the individual policy of a country should have no weight whatever, not the least. I am ready to take casualties and have any correction made so that they will be, as nearly as we can get at it, calculated the same, but I will not agree to anything else at the present time.

Sir Thomas Smartt: The War Office will tell you that to compute casualties on the basis of men who went under with malarial disease, which is worse than some wounds, is impossible at the present moment without a total readjustment.

Sir L. Worthington-Evans: Casualties do not represent any fixed financial liability.

Mr. Hughes: Shall we have to meet again on this matter?

Sir Robert Horne: It is perfectly obvious that we must. If one member of the Conference says he cannot agree, then we must have another meeting.

Mr. Massey: I think there must be some inaccuracy so far as Canada is concerned, and that it ought to be adjusted and put right. What Mr. Meighen has said makes it perfectly impossible for me to agree to casualties. That is absolutely certain. I must stick to liabilities.

Sir Robert Horne: Let me say again, Mr. Meighen, that I do not think the point is quite appreciated. What we are doing here is not to say to any one of us or to the nation we belong to: "Now you have been looked at from this point of view with regard to the sufferings of your men." That is not the kind of point we are trying to defend on platforms. There is a certain amount—let us assume it is 1,400,000,000*l*.—to be divided in reparations, not merely in respect of pensions, but in respect of other claims—separation allowances, shipping losses, armies of occupation. In the end, while we are trying at this moment to arrive at a proportion for pensions, the ultimate proportion will be made on separation allowances, shipping losses and all the other things, so that when you say to your people: "We are going to get a certain proportion out of the 22 per cent. that is awarded to the whole Empire," that is for all our losses. It is not only for pensions, because we have at the moment to discuss each of them separately in order to arrive at the final percentage. But we are not going out into the world saying: "We have got so much for pensions, so much for separation allowances, so much for shipping losses" and all the rest. It is not so. In the end we are getting a certain proportion for all the obligations with which we are concerned.

Mr. Hughes: That rests on the actual losses under the various categories.

Sir Robert Horne: Yes, quite.

Mr. Hughes: As established by the facts.

Sir Robert Horne: Yes, quite. You have got to make it up from these various things. I do not anticipate, as far as I am concerned, I shall be taking anything more. In the whole of these reparations we allocate our amounts so much to Canada, Australia, and so much to the United States of America, and they each get such proportion, but that is for everything.

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Sir Robert Horne: That is how it will come out.

Mr. Hughes: May I ask you this? Are we going to have another meeting?

Sir Robert Horne: Yes, we must have another meeting, and I will have to arrange that with the Secretary.

Sir Thomas Smartt: We have other meetings, and to-day we have a meeting on communications.

Mr. Hughes: I cannot go back to Australia unless I know something quite definite. We have to know that.

Sir Robert Horne: I shall have to see Sir Maurice Hankey before arranging the next meeting, but we will take it on Friday.

(The meeting then adjourned.)

SECRET.

E. 26.

Report by the Government Actuary on the apportionment amongst the Component Parts of the Empire of the Receipts from Germany under the Reparation Clauses of the Treaty of Versailles in respect of Pensions and Separation Allowances.

Preliminary Considerations.

The total claim of the British Empire for Reparation under the Treaty of Versailles, comprising: (1) Pensions; (2) Separation Allowances; (3) Damage to Property (non-maritime); (4) Shipping Losses; (5) Damage to Civil Persons; was presented under these five categories for the Empire as a unit. The several amounts were given in the British Delegate's Report of the 18th May, 1921, as:—

—	Gold Marks (Millions).	Percentage of Total Claim.
Pensions	19,007	58·14
Separation allowances	3,930	12·02
Damage to property (non-maritime)	445	1·36
Shipping losses	8,985	27·48
Damage to civil persons	327	1·00
Total	32,694	100·00

The proportions in which these five items enter into the claims of the several component parts of the Empire vary considerably It is accordingly recommended that the British Empire's share of the reparation receipts (22 per cent. under the Spa Agreement) should be divided in the above proportions into the sums due under each category before proceeding to sub-divide the payments separately amongst the United Kingdom, the Dominions, minor Colonies and India. The present report deals with this sub-division in respect of the items, Pensions and Separation Allowances.

I.—Pensions.

1. The claim submitted to the Reparation Commission in respect of military pensions totalled 42,670,000,000 fr. for the British Empire; and the sum included for this item in the total Allied claim as communicated to Germany was 19,007,000,000 gold marks.

2. This sum was arrived at by estimating the claim, in francs, on the French scale of pensions for the United Kingdom and for each other part of the British Empire, and the claim as presented represents the addition of the sums found by these separate estimates. If, therefore, the estimates were all based on data of the same kind and all were vested with the same authority it would be sufficient to propose that the sums recovered from Germany and allocated to pensions should be divided among the several parts of the Empire in the proportions in which their estimated claims enter respectively into the total of 19,007,000,000 gold marks. This, however, is not the position. While fairly full data were available in respect of the United Kingdom at the time when it was necessary to make the calculations in order to be ready with the claim on the final date (the 12th February, 1921) less complete information was to hand in respect of several of the Dominions and in the case of Canada the full particulars required were not received until the end of April. In these circumstances it was necessary to have resort to approximate methods of calculation in respect of the Dominions using such general materials as was available for the purpose. As the full data from the Dominions have come to hand a complete valuation has been made in each case based as far as possible upon the experience of the Dominion concerned. The result of this full valuation is to show that in total the estimates submitted to the Reparation Commission were very closely approximate to the true position. When, however, the total is separated into its component parts rather considerable differences reveal themselves, the claim for

Canada being materially reduced, while those for Australia, New Zealand and South Africa are correspondingly increased. The reason for this seems to lie in the differences between the respective methods of pension administration. Although Canada has experienced as heavy losses as Australia by deaths and in the numbers of wounded, as shown in the official casualty returns, the number of pensions awarded in Canada is much smaller than in Australia; and, furthermore, in the case of disabled men, the average rating of the degree of disability in Canada is approximately only one-half that obtaining in Australia. (See Annex.)

3. This consideration suggests that the details of the original estimates would not supply a satisfactory basis for the apportionment of the sums to be recovered.

4. In the case of India, the figures need adjustment for another reason. As against Germany, the claim for the Indian native troops was rightly based on the French (European) scales, as was also the claim of France in respect of the strictly corresponding class. The provision actually made by the Indian Government for its native troops is, however, very small in comparison with the French (European) scales, and to use the proportion in which India was represented in the claim as the basis of apportionment to India as against the other parts of the Empire would have the effect of allocating to India not merely a wholly disproportionate share of the sum recovered, but, on the basis of the obligations now accepted by Germany, an amount considerably exceeding the total liability incurred by India in respect of pensions and corresponding allowances. It is submitted, therefore, that whatever general basis of apportionment be adopted the case of India must be specially dealt with, having regard to the great difference between her monetary obligations in respect of pensions, &c., and those of the other parts of the British Empire.

5. As a matter of information, though for the reasons given above this basis is not recommended for adoption, Column A of the following table is given as showing the proportionate extent to which the claim in respect of each part of the Empire entered into the total as presented to Germany. Column B shows the apportionment as it would have stood if the full facts now at hand had been available when the claim was prepared. As indicated in paragraph 2 above, the total amount of the claims is unaffected by the substitution of Column B for Column A; the question at issue is simply one of apportionment. Column C gives the same apportionment as Column B, save that the proportion allotted to India is reduced to the figure appropriate to the actual conditions of the Indian pension scales as lately revised, the rupee being taken at 1*s.* 4*d.* Subject to this adjustment, the allocation in Column C is strictly in accordance with the basis of the claim laid down by the Treaty.

—	Column A.	Column B.	Column C.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.

Newfoundland	·09	·11	·11
India	3·91	3·93	·54
Total	100·00	100·00	100·00

6. It may perhaps be considered that the Treaty basis of the aggregate claim of the British Empire does not supply a suitable basis for the apportionment of the amounts recovered, since it fails to give effect to the differences between the scales of pensions, &c., in force in the various parts of the Empire and allows nothing for differences of exchange. It has appeared desirable, therefore, to make a further investigation, bringing these factors into account, and the apportionment resulting from this calculation is shown in Table 2.

7. It should be mentioned that the adjustment for exchange is only important in the case of Canada, Newfoundland and India. In the case of Canada and Newfoundland the present rate of exchange is used as the conversion factor, and in the case of India the rupee is again taken at 1*s.* 4*d.* The whole question of exchange is one of great difficulty in view of the fact that the liabilities under consideration as well as the amounts to be recovered represent payments extending over a long future period.

8. The apportionment shown in Table 2 is based upon the capitalised liability for pensions, &c., of each part of the British Empire as governed by its own scales and administrative methods. This liability has been actuarially ascertained for the present purpose and with the nearest possible approach to exactitude; it is adjusted where necessary to bring all the items on to the common basis of the British pound at the current rate of exchange, but otherwise exhibits directly the liability undertaken. It is thought that the actual figures brought out by the valuation will be of interest to the several Governments concerned, and these are accordingly included in the table.

Total	1,614,163,000	100·00

* These amounts do not include certain minor items, not appreciably affecting the totals, the values of which it was found impracticable to assess.

9. If it be determined that the apportionment should be governed by the relative money burden of pensions, &c., in the several communities concerned, the basis of apportionment provided by Table 2 is, it is believed, the most precise that is attainable, regard being had to the many and, to some extent, uncertain factors involved. Arguments in support of the adjusted Treaty basis (Table 1, Column C) as against this alternative basis may acquire strength from the fact that the assessed liability of each part of the Empire on which Table 2 is based is the result of the independent action of the Government responsible, exercised with reference solely to the circumstances of its own people and its own economic conditions. In view of the criticisms to which any strictly financial basis appears to be open it may be useful if a basis of a different kind be submitted. Such a basis might be found, it is suggested, in the relative military efforts of the several communities as expressed, for example, by their casualties (deaths and wounded). Such a basis as this would be wholly free of complication, and while ignoring such considerations as the higher rates of pensions and allowances in certain of the Dominions as compared with the United Kingdom would disregard such a considerable factor operating in the contrary direction as the difference between the proportions of widows to death in the several parts of the Empire. An apportionment by the numbers of casualties (as supplied by the War Office), modified, however, to secure to India and the minor colonies the capital amounts indicated by the previous apportionments, results as follows:—

II.—Separation Allowances.

10. The sum included for the British Empire in respect of this item in the Allied claim, as submitted to Germany, was 3,930 millions of gold marks.

11. It is understood from the War Office that this sum was arrived at by applying the average daily French rate of allowances per man to the actual average number of troops (effective strength of the United Kingdom in each year, together with the estimated average number of Dominion effectives). Owing to the absence of Dominion statistics at the date when the claim was prepared the estimate of the number of Dominion troops was necessarily only approximate. Further, the claim made no allowance for the variations in the family condition of the troops of the several parts of the Empire, the proportion of married men amongst the United Kingdom forces being approximately twice as great as that obtaining for certain of the Dominions. As regards India, a claim was admitted based on the daily rate allowed to those French troops corresponding to Indian native troops, the fact that native troops do not receive separation allowances does not, of course, affect the claim under the Treaty. Although the sum of 128,997,023 francs was claimed on behalf of India in respect of separation allowances, the only sum charged to India revenues during the war on this account was £33,800, which was the sum disbursed up to the 10th January, 1920. As shown in paragraph 4, in discussing the apportionment of the pensions receipts, to use the proportion in which India is represented in the separation allowance claim as the basis of apportionment, would allocate to India a wholly disproportionate amount, and one far exceeding the liability incurred by India.

12. Although not recommending for adoption as a basis of apportionment, the following table shows the proportionate share of each part of the Empire in the total Empire claim for separation allowances as actually presented. No sum was actually included in the claim in respect of the minor Colonies, and the proportion allocated to the United Kingdom has been reduced to provide the share of the minor Colonies:—

Canada	6·64
Australia	4·72
New Zealand	1·19
South Africa	·27

	100·00

13. The proportions appearing in Table 4 would have a stronger claim to consideration as a suitable basis if the disproportionate sum adopted for India were adjusted to bring it into relation with the facts above indicated. Accordingly, Table 5 has been prepared showing the share of each part of the Empire on this basis.

in different parts of the Empire, nor for the differences of exchange which exist: and, as has been already indicated, they fail to give effect to the very significant differences in the proportion of married men in the forces of the several parts of the Empire. Table 6 has accordingly been prepared on the basis of the actual disbursements in separation allowances of the several parts of the Empire as supplied by the Governments concerned. In the case of Canada and Newfoundland, the actual disbursements have been converted into British pounds at current rates of exchange: as regards the other Dominions, this adjustment is regarded as unnecessary, as their currency stands practically at par with British currency.

Table 6 therefore indicates as nearly as may be the comparative weight of the separation allowance liabilities met by each part of the Empire, in its independent estimate of its own economic condition throughout the period of the war.

Reparations.

Sir Robert Horne: I think I might possibly make a suggestion which we could discuss, and then we might see what Mr. Meighen thinks about it when he arrives.

It is impossible to get at any scientific valuation of the proper method of distribution of reparations. I am perfectly certain of that. One has only to remember what it is we are attempting to divide. We are proposing to distribute the 22 per cent. of German indemnities that comes to Britain—when I say Britain I mean the British Empire, of course. That 22 per cent. is the roughest possible figure. It was not arrived at upon any really scientific basis or any meticulous calculations.

Mr. Massey: It is not supposed to be quite accurate.

Sir Robert Horne: It cannot be accurate; it is impossible that it should be. The division is, France gets 52 per cent. as against Britain's 22 per cent., and nobody suggests seriously that that is an accurate estimate of the extent to which each of the two countries should be indemnified. Accordingly I do not think that we ought to attempt here to arrive at anything which is accurate. All we can do is to take a rough axe and divide as nearly as we can, looking at the thing from a general point of view.

Suggested method of distribution of the Empire's Reparation Receipts.

I do not know whether this suggestion will meet with your acceptance, that, instead of going into each of these items separately, we should attempt to arrive at something that on the whole would give a more or less convenient distribution of the 22 per cent. of reparations which comes to the British Empire.

(At this point a document headed "Distribution of British Empire Reparation Receipts," was handed round. Appendix.)

I do not know whether you have also before you the larger table which shows the amount for each of these items taken separately, which is headed "Reparation Receipts under the Treaty of Versailles."* If you look at the larger document you will see that under each item there is a certain percentage given to each of the portions of the British Empire, and in the final column there is a table which gives the following totals: United Kingdom 88·16 per cent., the minor Colonies ·77 per cent., Canada 3·88 per cent., Australia 4·04 per cent., New Zealand 1·57 per cent., South Africa ·55 per cent., Newfoundland ·10 per cent. and India ·93 per cent. making in all 100.

The smaller document which I have now circulated makes a readjustment of that not upon any basis at all, but making a readjustment of the figures so as perhaps to make the distribution more plausible and to arrive at some kind of rough method of treating the matter. By this method the percentage of the United Kingdom is slightly reduced, with the effect of bringing up Canada and the minor Colonies, and New Zealand and South Africa, Australia losing a very small percentage. You can see that the result is to bring Canada and Australia to the same share of the reparation money, New Zealand getting rather less than half of either of them, and South Africa between one-sixth and one-seventh. What I venture to suggest is, that we might look on this matter in the rough and might discuss whether, on the whole, we cannot say, taking it in the rough, that Canada and Australia should get about the same share, and New Zealand a little less than half of either of them. If we can agree upon that in a general way, it seems to me that we should be getting much nearer to an end of this discussion. If we discuss the matter as we did the last time we were here, we shall be sitting here for ever, and never get through it. I do not know first of all whether this method of dealing with the matter will commend itself to this Committee or not; and in the second place, whether the figures more or less will be accepted. What do you think of this plan of dealing with it, Mr. Hughes?

View of Australia.

Mr. Hughes: The more I go into the matter, the more am I bewildered by the manner in which the totals have been arrived at. I am referring now not to the rough estimates which you spoke of as having been arrived at by considering what would be, on the face of it, a plausible division—to use your own phrase. I am speaking of these other schedules which are set out under the various tables.

Sir Robert Horne: You mean the tables we dealt with on the last day?

Mr. Hughes: Yes. There are five of them, I think. I stated, when we were discussing this matter last, that I should like to have an opportunity to look into the figures upon which these calculations were based. I am bound to say that I have not been able to get everything that I could desire, but I have received some information both in respect of pensions, separation allowances and casualties, which were the two bases upon which we were to settle the matter, or which were presented for consideration. In both of those I see that inaccuracies have crept in, so that any calculation based upon the figures supplied will afford us no opportunity for comparing the proper and just claims of each Dominion. I do not propose now to address myself to any one of these suggested bases of settlement—pensions and separation allowances on the one hand and casualties on the other. I merely wish to say that the figures that I have received show that the calculations if dependent upon those figures would not give the percentages set out opposite Canada, New Zealand and Australia. Therefore I have to consider what has to be done. You will readily understand, Sir, as the function of your office is concerned with money, that notwithstanding what may be said about the importance of other things, that it is upon the wings of finance that nations move, and if they are to avoid the bumps and the débris of this solid earth they must have money to rise into the upper air. We cannot agree to any division that does not take into proper and strict account the circumstances of the various Dominions, and of Australia in particular, of course.

Reparations.

Difficulty of obtaining accurate basis of calculation.

Referring to Table 1, and to the three lines in the memorandum which immediately precede it, I desire to call your attention to the fact that we are told in this official memorandum (E 26), presented to us for consideration, that, subject to this adjustment—meaning thereby the adjustment of the rupee to the rate of exchange—the allocation in Column C on Table 1 is strictly in accordance with the basis of the claim laid down by the Treaty. Under that Australia is allotted 7·84 per cent., Canada 3·24 per cent., New Zealand 2·78 per cent. and India ·54 per cent. In Column B, Australia is offered 7·57 per cent., Canada 3·13 per cent. and India 3·93 per cent. Strictly speaking, and if we are to stand by the letter of the bond, we are told that it is Column C of Table 1 to which we must have regard. I express my willingness, and indeed my desire, to see India treated on the same basis as other parts of the Empire, and, although I say this without prejudice, I am prepared to accept Column B, but I am not prepared to do so without a further examination of the figures, which I believe will show that Australia is entitled to a still higher percentage than that. Certainly, if we look at the casualties it is obvious that no fair basis of calculation is offered because Canada has included in her calculations of casualties those involving under a disability of 20 per cent. 72 per cent. of her total casualties are under 22 per cent., while only 1·66 per cent. of Australian casualties are under 20 per cent. It is obvious that with such a wide disparity it is impossible to have any basis upon which you can make a comparison.

Divergence in method of calculating Casualties.

Sir Robert Horne: That is obviously because the Canadian Medical Boards and the Australian Medical Boards must have operated upon entirely different estimates of disability.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, but if you are going to take casualties you must have a uniform method, and I submit the method should be disability resting upon a common basis. If you are going to say that Canada's disability includes 46 per cent. who are under 10 per cent. of disability, and a further 26 per cent. under 20 per cent., then 70 per cent. of casualties included by Canada are excluded from the Australian figures. Very well, if you do include these, and we have as much right to do so as any other part of the Empire, if you are to base it upon justice and estimate the loss to a country like Australia upon the disability of its fighting men, we must include those, and there must be added to Australia's casualties an additional 70 per cent. to adjust our figures to the Canadian denomination.

It is an impossible thing to suppose there can be this difference, unless one Dominion's battle casualties were received at a safe distance in the rear, while the other did the fighting at the front. This could not have happened, and the whole thing, as you say, arises from the different methods adopted by the Pensions Boards. I submit that ours is the more equitable; when a man is not injured beyond 20 per cent. regard must not be had to it. And in the circumstances therefore I stand on column "C," or at any rate on column "B" of Table 1. I shall be prepared to go into figures as far as I have them, but I might point out that the money Canada spent on pensions, &c., last year was £13,000,000, while we spent £22,000,000. The separation allowances and pensions for the year amount to £8,299,000 for Australia and £1,113,000 for New Zealand, but looking into the percentage for the two Dominions we see that these give Australia as 7 per cent. to 2 per cent. for New Zealand, but the actual figures show at least 5 to 1 is as 6 is to 1. I have no option but to stand by column "B." I want to do justice to India with a right to examine the figures and to adjust them in such a way as to enable the actuaries to arrive at a basis calculated on the monies actually paid. In addition to the figures I have quoted, we paid nearly £7,000,000 for repatriation, monies which are not recoverable. But I have left this large item out entirely. I do not press them.

View of New Zealand.

Mr. Massey: I am afraid, Sir Robert Horne, that we are not getting much closer to an understanding or settlement of the difficulty that appears to have arisen. So far as I am concerned I am pressing no claim on behalf of New Zealand for land settlement, for homes for soldiers or anything else except the actual payments by way of pensions and separation allowances. I do not know that I have had sufficient time to go into all the figures submitted to us, but the other day, when we met, the column that appealed to me was the column mentioned just now by Mr. Hughes—column "C" on Table 1. If we are not agreed upon the basis upon which the calculation ought to be made I do not think we shall be very far out because then it would be a matter for the actuaries. It appears to me that there are three methods of calculation (1) on the Treaty basis. I am prepared to stand upon that; I am prepared to accept that and leave it to the actuaries to say what will be the amount coming to New Zealand. If there is any objection to that I fall back on the liability. Personally, I do not know of any fairer; I believe the Treaty basis will give New Zealand a little more than we should receive if paid on the actual liability, and I cannot think of any fairer way. The other suggestion that has been put forward is that the payment shall be made in proportion to the casualties. I think that would be absolutely unfair. I think it would probably work out very unfairly, and consequently would not give satisfaction in our country or in Australia, whatever the case may be for Canada, and of that I cannot speak. I come back to where I started, and I do not think I shall be able to get away from this; I prefer payment on the Treaty basis, the basis laid down in the Peace Treaty and which was intended should be a guide to us in arriving at the amount which should be forthcoming, and the proper allocation of it.

The Treaty Basis preferred.

View of South Africa.

Sir Thomas Smartt: We discussed that the other day, and I think we arrived at one main conclusion, that whatever the distribution of amount might be no State should certainly get more than the absolute amount they paid. In that case, column "B" of Mr. Hughes would come out entirely wrong because I understand, no matter what column you take, on the basis of the Indian pensions, and realising the difference in the value of money to the recipients of those pensions, India would work out on either of those calculations at about ·54. As far as we in South Africa are concerned I do not wish to press the point; I think we should have had a statement from the War Office as to what is included in casualties. I think perhaps malarial fever is perhaps one of the heaviest causes of casualty within the Union, and this is not included in casualties. A large number of our men were for a long time in the East African campaign, and we are paying the largest amount of pensions to these men, a larger amount than is being paid to those who fought in France with the Brigade. I think there was a suggestion the other day that we might have taken the capitalised value of the pensions and the casualties adding them together and dividing them. Why that appealed to me was, without knowing the circumstances of the manner in which these figures were arrived at, it seemed manifestly unfair to Canada in that first Table that she should get such a small amount when she put such a large number of men into the field, and had such a large capitalised pension account and a large casualty account. There must be something wrong in Table 1. If you look at columns A, B and C you will see that Canada has 3·13 and 3·24, Australia 7·57 and 7·34, and New Zealand 2·58 and 2·78, and South Africa ·90. Whether it is worth while raising the question of how a casualty is arrived at now I do not know. I think we should certainly arrive at a common agreement; we shall be working on this for ages and never reach a conclusion. I am willing to do any adjustment which is fair.

Sir Robert Horne: Mr. Massey, would you be willing to accept what Sir Thomas Smartt suggests—capitalised pensions?

Mr. Massey: No, I will not accept that. I will accept the Treaty basis or the Liability basis; either would suit me.

Reparations.

Sir Robert Horne: Mr. Hughes, would you be content to accept the capitalised liability basis in each country?

Mr. Hughes: Capitalised value of the pension?

Sir Thomas Smartt: I take it that we are dealing with pension alone in this table.

Sir Robert Horne: At this moment we are.

Mr. Hughes: I do not know that I can say what that means.

Sir Robert Horne: It means this, accumulating the whole of your liability for pensions; it would be capitalised at £96,000,000.

Mr. Hughes: But why on our old scale of pensions?

Sir Robert Horne: It is on the latest scale that the Australian Commonwealth furnished to the Government.

Mr. Hughes: I happen to know it was based on the old scale.

Sir Robert Horne: Supposing we adopted the principle suggested, subject to correction of the figures.

Mr. Hughes: I shall be willing to consider that, but I must have a little time to consider the matter. I do not know where it leads me; if I were only speaking for myself it would not matter, but I am speaking for a country.

View of Canada.

Mr. Meighen: I have thought it out. I do not see how you can, for this reason. I explained the difficult case that Canada is in if they give their pension scheme and that is capitalised out, but the fact is we are paying practically double that scale, but we do not say we are going to do it permanently; we have allowed one bonus on the pension, then another, then another; in fact, we have three of them. The gross pension is practically double what our scale is. We had a Committee this session, a joint Committee from all sides of the House, to see if we should take off one of these bonuses this year. We decided not to; next year we may take it off, or the year after, or we may take none of them off. How can you capitalise pensions? If we have a system of commutation, one country will have one system of commutation and another country another system. We give a man the option of taking so much money if he is within a certain percentage of casualty, which saves the country a great deal and the man gets the benefit.

Mr. Massey: It is the capitalised value of the pension?

Mr. Meighen: No, it is less, and it would depend on how the money had been applied as to how it would total up in the capitalisation. Then, coming to the sphere of re-establishment. I do not think you can capitalise this in Canada. Although I gave two reasons which seemed to be conclusive, but getting on to re-establishment we have all manner of systems there. We have a system of bonuses while they are at work.

Mr. Massey: I am making no claim as to re-establishment.

Sir Robert Horne: Nobody is including these things.

Mr. Meighen: I know that, but you cannot help it if you are going to try and compare these things, because it depends on what you do in this respect how your liability totals up.

Sir Robert Horne: I would like to say this again: we are not trying to get scientific division, and this is only one item in a series of items involving a percentage at the end as to how we should divide out over the different parts of the Empire.

Mr. Meighen: We shall be a 100 per cent. out in pensions. Yes, because our capitalised value will be just 100 per cent. of what we may claim. I do not see anything to do except that it may be this. You can take the casualties. That is satisfactory. I know there is an objection, but you could never be 100 per cent. out; you might be up to 15 per cent. out, because of the fact that the casualties in a certain class of one country might be greater in a like class with another country, and that class might be the heaviest in point of liability.

Mr. Massey: Taking casualties, a country might receive a great deal more than it pays.

Mr. Meighen: You might have to make a correction on that. Anyway, you could cut it out; or you could get Australia and Canada alike, and if the other people agree it would be satisfactory. That would appeal to our country as right, or you might take casualties, and you might take a certain scale of pensions and apply that same scale to the casualties in each class of all countries.

Sir Robert Horne: Well, I suggested before you came in, Mr. Meighen, that we might start upon a general principle, that practically Canada and Australia should be put on the same footing, that is to say, 4 per cent. each, and that New Zealand should take rather less than half.

Mr. Massey: To put Australia and Canada on the same footing and give New Zealand a half, but that is a rough and ready way.

A rough and ready method of division more easy to defend.

Mr. Montagu: May I say this conversation carries me back to the spring of 1919 in Paris, where we had exactly the same problem and exactly the same conversations, that is to say, to try and divide the German indemnity between the Allies. I was in this, and I had meeting after meeting with the French and the Americans for months when we were trying to arrive at a scientific basis just as we have been trying round this table; we failed, and eventually we had to get in a rough and ready method, such as Sir Robert has suggested this afternoon, as the best that we could do. Each country knew the sort of thing that its constituents would expect to get, and they gave and took, to get some colourable, but wholly rough and quite unscientific basis, and that was the origin of the final 22 per cent. I do submit, with that experience in my mind, that the suggestion of the Chancellor is worthy of a little more consideration, and I think so particularly because of the difficulty which I wholly admit on account of the country which I represent. I do not want to ask for a sum which is largely in excess of the money which we have actually spent, although, let me say in passing, that I regard our scale of pensions as shockingly low—it is so low because we could not afford more—and if we get any money in this scheme I shall do my best to see that it is used not in relief of the taxpayer, but to increase the scale of pensions, so that it comes more nearly to the Dominions scale. Therefore, we are going to be penalised for our poverty under the system of pensions. I could consent quite easily to a lump sum which I could justify as being the best that I could do in the circumstances, to come into a common scheme, but if I have got to agree to a calculation on a scientific basis then it is my duty to those whom I represent to go into all sorts of details. For instance, I understand these figures are calculated on the basis of a 1*s.* 4*d.* rupee exchange; I think that if we are not entitled to a 2*s.* rupee gold exchange, at any rate we are entitled to a 2*s.* rupee sterling exchange, which would alter the figures to our advantage. Secondly, as I suggested at the last meeting, I cannot take—if it is a scientific calculation it is so difficult for me to take a different basis calculation to the Dominions, even though it gives me more money than I am entitled to, but if it is a lump sum I can take into account those things. Your suggestion, to my mind, seems to be simpler from the point of view of India and it seems to me to give, in the light of the experience we had with the Allies, a greater chance of coming to a decision soon.

Sir Robert Horne: How does that commend itself? That we should really try to arrive at a single percentage over the whole region of pensions, separation allowances, damage to property, shipping claims, partly as to hulls and partly as to cargoes. Then outside of these things, there is another element, which is the amount to be paid for the armies of occupation.

Cost of Armies of Occupation.

Mr. Meighen: That is outside the 6,600 millions.

Sir Robert Horne: That is so. It is an extra item.

Mr. Hughes: They have to pay it?

Sir Robert Horne: They have to pay it, but it is not included in the 6,600 millions.

Mr. Hughes: That money the Belgians had, was that in addition to reparations?

Sir Robert Horne: Yes. It is part of the 6,600 millions, but it is a prior claim.

Sir Basil Blackett: The repayment of the Belgian debt, incurred during the war, is separate.

Mr. Massey: Does not that raise the question as to the armies of occupation being separate?

Reparations.

Mr. Hughes: You have raised another claim now, Sir Robert. This army of occupation calculation here gives £624,000 to New Zealand and £1,388,000 to Canada—and a thousand to us.*

Mr. Meighen: A thousand pounds?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, a thousand pounds. Of course, we are a very poor and humble people, and I a very impoverished individual, but I think I could manage that myself. It is an impossible amount. Our men, like yours, were soldiers; they obeyed orders; they went where they were sent, by the mere accident of circumstances ours were retained in France, and yours were sent to Germany. However, there it is. A soldier must go where he is told, and we had to maintain them. While you are to be recouped.

Mr. Meighen: Why were they maintained in France if they were not needed for the army of occupation?

Mr. Hughes: It was based on the number in Germany.

Mr. Meighen: Why were they not taken home?

Mr. Hughes: You cannot send 400,000 men home in a few weeks. We sent them home as quickly as possible, but of course we had to maintain them until they could be sent home. Ours were in Europe as long as yours—in fact, longer, probably—because we had to send them further. That is a charge upon us which you will escape, because you happen to be a few miles near than us, and they were sent there.

Mr. Meighen: Your suggestion is that it would apply to Britain, too?

Mr. Hughes: If it were based on the number of troops in Europe—Germany, France and Belgium—Britain would get, about I suppose, 1½ to 2 per cent. less than she gets now. That is all. You would lose, and New Zealand would lose.

Mr. Massey: I cannot afford to lose. I believe New Zealand has spent more money on returned soldiers than any other country in the Empire, not excepting the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hughes: It may be so, we have spent very much more per head than the United Kingdom. I do not admit that you spent more than Australia, but I will not enter into an argument on the matter. I say your soldiers, like ours, were under the orders of their commanders; they were sent because they were told, and it appears that the maintenance of yours is to be borne by Germany, and the maintenance of ours by Australia.

Mr. Meighen: This was communicated to the Canadian Government many months ago, i.e., the position Australia takes, and a reply was sent, and from recollection, I rather think, we acceded.

Sir Robert Horne: Well, I think, if I may express a primâ facie view, that it does seem to me rather inequitable that the troops which were compelled to be kept on the continent, but simply did not happen to be used for the armies of occupation, that that circumstance should rob the country that sent them of using part of the reparations for the up-keep of the occupation troops. It looks to me so.

Mr. Hughes: It is not suggested for the moment that the troops in Germany were occupying a dangerous position, and I, myself, told Sir Henry Wilson that our troops were available. I told him so in a letter to which I had an answer.

Mr. Montagu: Does this include the army of occupation in Turkey?

Sir Robert Horne: No, it is only what Germany has to pay. (Passing a paper to Mr. Massey.) That is how the figures were arrived at. I do not know whether you have seen this or not.

Mr. Massey: This is the army of occupation only. I think if we could clear this question up, we could get on further.

Mr. Hughes: I think I ought to say, Sir Robert, that I am given to understand—I do not know myself—that the British Authorities are quite willing that we should be paid on this second basis, the number of troops quartered in France, Germany and Belgium.

Mr. Meighen: Because it does not affect them much.

Sir Robert Horne: It affects us only to the extent of £300,000.

Reparations.

Mr. Hughes: Oh, yes, it affects them a good deal. They lose £319,000.

Sir Robert Horne: Yes. It is rather a matter for you others; we are perfectly favourable to it.

Proposal to settle on a Capitalised Basis.

Sir Thomas Smartt: As you do not seem to have any real basis upon which everybody agrees, if you were to settle the pensions first on the basis of the capitalised amounts of each State, which really you have in column 2—it is true there is a note to say there must be some little differences—I take it that is roughly the amount of the capitalised value of the pensions of the various States?

Sir Robert Horne: Mr. Meighen says it is not.

Mr. Meighen: You would be 100 per cent. out.

Sir Thomas Smartt: I see with regard to Canada that the capital value of pensions is £12,300,000.

Mr. Meighen: That is fixed pensions. We pay double that in the form of bonuses.

Sir Thomas Smartt: I think all the other States do. We pay a lot of money for other things, but they are not capitalised. We capitalise the actual pensions paid under the Pensions Act, as the United Kingdom has done.

Mr. Meighen: Supposing your bonus turns out to be permanent?

Sir Thomas Smartt: If you like to do extra liberal things, each State should bear it. To most of the men who have been at the front we give two years' agricultural training, and give them 3*s.* a day during training. All soldiers have been placed on the same basis.

Mr. Meighen: But if you take pensions alone you will be 100 per cent. out. What is the use of taking the pension of one country which includes all pays, and another that only includes half that it pays.

Mr. Massey: Just look at this: here is this latest proposal by which New Zealand loses £460,000, and Mr. Hughes gains £499,000. I congratulate Mr. Hughes, but I am sorry for my country.

Mr. Hughes: You can please yourself what you do, Mr. Massey, but it is not fair to Australia that we should have £1,000 against £400,000 for New Zealand.

Cost of Armies of Occupation: Suggested Arbitration.

Mr. Massey: No, I do not think it is. I am prepared to let it go to arbitration, if we can agree upon arbitrators. We shall never settle it here. It is the most undignified squabble anyhow. I do not think the Prime Ministers should be expected to do a thing like this.

Sir Thomas Smartt: I agree that arbitration will be the best solution.

Sir Robert Horne: I tell you what I am willing to do, Mr. Massey, in order to get a settlement of this. If we can get a settlement of the army of occupation question, we can settle other matters more readily. The Imperial Government loses £318,000, which is a small proportion of the total, the total being £14,684,000. I am willing to take half of your loss, Mr. Massey.

Mr. Massey: Let us see how that will work out. It means our losing £230,000.

Sir Robert Horne: It means that you lose £230,000, yes.

Mr. Massey: I cannot justify it; that is the trouble. If it was only myself, there would not be so much difficulty, but I have to justify this to the public.

Mr. Meighen: You mean you could not justify the United Kingdom taking half your loss?

Mr. Massey: If they will take three-quarters of the loss, I will say yes.

Mr. Hughes: Your suggestion was made on the basis that Canada and Australia got the same.

Sir Robert Horne: I was coming to that afterwards. I thought we had better get this out of the way about half the cost of the army of occupation. Shall we take the army of occupation first, and then get on to that?

Reparations.

Mr. Hughes: What are we to fall back on? We must know where we are. I think we should consider the whole position. I say I am willing to consider the proposal. Mr. Meighen says he will take the basis of casualties; Mr. Massey says he will not do that. Sir Robert Horne puts forward a proposal on a different basis which gives you (Canada) 4 per cent., and I think Australia 4 per cent. What I want to ask Sir Robert now is, if we can come to an understanding amongst ourselves in regard to the Army of Occupation, where do we fall back on to casualties or Sir Robert's proposal?

Sir Robert Horne: I understand Mr. Meighen would be willing to accept an arrangement by which Canada and Australia got the same, whatever that might be.

Mr. Hughes: I will agree to that if we can get an understanding on the Army of Occupation.

Sir Robert Horne: The Army of Occupation was composed partly of British troops from the United Kingdom, partly of Australians, partly of New Zealanders, and partly of Canadians.

Mr. Massey: This is the point I want to get at; do you include troops that could not get back because of the want of shipping, and things of that sort?

Sir Robert Horne: They are not included in the armies of occupation in the strict sense, but then, on the other hand, here is Australia with a considerable body of troops in France and Belgium, and it is only a matter of accident that they do not form part of the Army of Occupation.

Mr. Massey: That is not answering my question. Were these troops left there because there was no shipping to take them away? Our men wanted to get home, but could not do so.

Mr. Hughes: If they had not stopped you would not have got this.

Sir Thomas Smartt: There were other troops as well as these that could not get back. The South African troops were delayed a considerable time. Those who had interests in shipping got their men back quickest.

Sir Robert Horne: The table I have shown you is worked on the basis of taking each portion of the Empire which had troops actually in the Army of Occupation, and taking this, they included the Imperial Government, Canada, New Zealand and Australia. South Africa had no such troops.

Sir Thomas Smartt: Our troops were in France waiting to return, but they could get no shipping.

Mr. Meighen: Then they come under the second head.

Sir Robert Horne: There are no South African troops here.

Sir P. B. Blackett: I imagine they took just those parts of the Empire which had claims on the Army of Occupation, but instead of basing their claims on the troops, they based them on their troops in Belgium, France and the Army of Occupation; and no claim was sent in from South Africa.

Mr. Massey: It is a very great pity that Ministers from overseas should be expected to do this sort of thing. It is humiliating.

Sir Robert Horne: Well, Mr. Massey, I will take three-quarters of your loss.

Mr. Massey: All right, I accept.

Mr. Hughes: I do not want to be hanging about over this; if you take three-quarters we will take one-quarter.

Sir Robert Horne: Mr. Massey is content to take the one-quarter himself. We will fix up that upon that basis.

Mr. Hughes: That is £953,000, minus one-quarter of Mr. Massey's loss—that is £115,000.

Sir Robert Horne: Are you taking this quarter from me, Mr. Hughes, or from Mr. Massey?

Reparations.

Mr. Hughes: No; I am assuming that, readjustment having been made, you are willing to take this sum. I do not know where Canada is now.

Sir Robert Horne: Canada comes down naturally to £1,212,000.

Mr. Meighen: I do not like it. I thought the Government had agreed to that. I do not like the responsibility of taking this figure.

Sir P. B. Blackett: I understood that the Canadians were willing to agree to what is done round this table.

Sir Robert Horne: Let New Zealand bear her quarter, I will take the other three-quarters, and you the Canadian.

Mr. Meighen: No, that would not do. If you took half the Canadian, I do not know whether I should ask for that. If it is right, it is right; but I would not like to say take one-half. If, however, it is right, let it be so.

Mr. Massey: I think it would be a fair suggestion.

Mr. Meighen: Was there any extra hardship entailed in the march into Germany? Of course there might have been ructions too.

Mr. Massey: They took the risk, certainly.

Mr. Meighen: I will make it one-half; I think that will do.

Sir Robert Horne: Then take half Canada, and the United Kingdom takes three-quarters of New Zealand.

Mr. Massey: That seems fair.

Sir Robert Horne: This lets you off cheaper. You were taking £115,000. If you are taking one-half of the Canadian, you are only taking £85,000.

Mr. Hughes: That suggestion was not made to me, I did not hear that.

Mr. Meighen: I have some hesitation in accepting it. You can put it the other way; the United Kingdom give us one-half, and you take one-quarter. I shall have a little difficulty in explaining to the Canadian Parliament why New Zealand is compensated for three-quarters and Canada for none. What is the ground for the compensation? There must be some ground, or it would not have been done. I suppose there was more hardship entailed for the troops; they were on duty instead of on leave. I suppose there is some ground in that, but if there is, it applies to the others. I do not feel too secure in my ground one way or the other. I do not know whether there should be something allowed because they were on duty, or were not. That is the way it was put to us in Canada.

Mr. Hughes: Now, do you mind figuring it out at what that actually leaves us?

Sir Robert Horne: You get £950,000, less £85,000, which gives you £865,000. Perhaps it is better that the United Kingdom should take half of Canada's loss. I think it would be better that it should be done like that, than that Australia and Canada should get mixed up.

Mr. Meighen: I prefer that.

Sir Robert Horne: Half of Canada and half of New Zealand. Take half of Canada and half of New Zealand, and Australia a quarter of New Zealand.
