House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, July 3, 1947

The house met at two o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

Second and final report of special committee on Dominion Elections Act.—Mr. Cote (Verdun).

STANDING COMMITTEES

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the name of Mr. Winters be substituted for that of Mr. Baker on the select standing committee on industrial relations.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN SEVENTH REPORT

Mr. E. O. BERTRAND (Prescott) moved:

That the seventh report of the standing committee on standing orders presented on Tuesday, July 1, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MOTOR VEHICLES—EXPORT PRICES

Mr. CAOUETTE:

What are the export prices to persons who sell motor cars manufactured by (a) the Chrysler Corporation; (b) General Motors Corporation (c) the Ford Motor Company?

Mr. MAYHEW: No information.

*POSTAL SERVICE—MAIL DELIVERY, ROUYN AND NORANDA

Mr. CAOUETTE:

What steps have been taken to establish a letter carrier delivery in the twin cities of Rouyn and Noranda?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I should like to give a verbal answer to this question. The twin cities of Rouyn and Noranda, if treated as one postal area, or in other words served by one post office, would have a sufficient number of calls to warrant a letter carrier delivery service, and in the event of that service being established the patrons would enjoy a drop letter rate of postage throughout the whole community served by the one office. Neither the Rouyn public building nor the building housing the Noranda post office is large enough to accommodate the necessary letter carrier staff. The question of providing a new building to take care of the needs of the combined area is under consideration, but progress is difficult due to the uncertainty as to whether the suggested arrangement would be acceptable to both communities. In the meantime we can do nothing further.

POSTMASTERS—SUPERANNUATION

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many postmasters as of this date are making monthly payments or contributions to the superannuation plan?
2. Are deductions made from their salaries to provide superannuation?
3. If so, what is the toal amount deducted each month?
4. Has any action been taken to make the scheme applicable to all postmasters?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. 2,252.
2. Yes.
3. $10,051.49.
4. The matter is under consideration.

These answers cover only postmasters of revenue offices who do not come under the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

IMMIGRATION—DISPLACED PERSONS—DOCTORS

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Has the province of Saskatchewan or any other province made any application to bring doctors to Canada from D.P. camps?
2. If so, what decision was made by the department?

GUYSBOROUGH COUNTY, N.S., MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. LOW:

1. Were any mail contracts let in Guysborough county, Nova Scotia, recently?

83166—320

REVISED EDITION

VICTORIA

2. If so, on what routes?
3. Were tenders called?
4. If so, what were the names and addresses of all who tendered, and the amount of their respective tenders?
5. Who was the successful applicant or tenderer?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED SATURDAY SITTINGS—MORNING SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe I should make some report to the house with regard to the meeting I had last night in my office with the leaders of the different parties, and the whips. The meeting was called to consider the plan of work for the remainder of the session, and to see if we could come to some agreement as to procedure which would enable parliament to prorogue at the end of next week at the latest.

Hon. members will recall we had hoped it might be possible, following the procedure adopted a couple of weeks ago, to prorogue at the end of the present week. However that has not been possible, although I must say that the work accomplished since that time under the arrangement then made has been exceptionally good. If hon. members will continue to cooperate as they have during the last few weeks, I believe that with some slight precautionary measures we ought to be reasonably sure of proroguing before the end of next week—although of course the time at which we prorogue rests with the house itself, more particularly with the opposition.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not entirely; if the right hon. gentleman had been here last night—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have sat both in opposition and on the government side. I know that if it wishes so to do, the opposition can hold up measures for a long time. However, what I wish to inform the house is that a suggestion was made by the government that this week we should sit on Saturday, beginning at eleven o'clock in the morning and continue to six o'clock with an adjournment from one to two o'clock, and that if this were agreed to the government would not suggest further sittings in the morning until possibly Wednesday of next week, if we felt such sittings were necessary in order to conclude the business before the end of the week.

As the house realizes, the government does not wish to bring pressure upon any section of the house. On the other hand we have a responsibility in respect of the business of the house as a whole, and up to a certain point must act upon that responsibility. I understand hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party, the Social Credit group and all hon. members on this side are prepared to sit on Saturday of this week at eleven o'clock in the morning, and to continue the sitting until six o'clock in the evening. Some members of the C.C.F. group take exception to sitting on Saturday. I am not making a motion today because I do not wish to make this question of procedure the subject of a vote in the house if this can possibly be avoided. What I would ask is whether members of the C.C.F. group, knowing that all the rest of the members of the house are favourable to sitting on Saturday from eleven o'clock in the morning until six o'clock in the evening, would not reconsider between now and tomorrow the position they now take. I believe if a favourable agreement can be reached as to this, so far as next week is concerned it will not be necessary to consider morning sittings until on toward the middle of the week. If that is not possible, and if we find we are not going to make the progress we hope to make, the government will have to consider whether we should not begin morning sittings earlier next week.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this group has considered carefully the request made. We are of the opinion that we already have morning sittings or their equivalent; that is, we are already sitting the extra two hours which on other years we put in from eleven to one. We do not believe we should put our own convenience before the proper conduct of the business of the house. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) mentioned a minute ago that the Progressive Conservative opposition and members on the government side of the house were agreeable to sitting on Saturday. I would add that they were not agreeable last night either to facilitating or expediting the business of the house. My observation was that it was government members who held up the house for four hours, without accomplishing anything.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. member would cut that time in half, perhaps he would be correct.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am stating the same time as stated by the minister himself last night.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The reference to four hours which I made was the time taken up by members on all sides of the house, and the hon. member certainly knows that.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is what I am saying, too; it was four hours wasted, and the major portion of it was wasted by members on the government side of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: My understanding is that there is considerable difference of opinion at least among members on this side of the house—

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: —as to whether or not they would like to sit Saturday morning.

Mr. FLEMING: Speak for yourself.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, one member on this side says "hear, hear" and another says "speak for yourself", which goes to prove that there is a difference of opinion. There is very little difference of opinion in this group, but I understand the same difference of opinion holds with the Social Credit group.

That is our position. We are quite willing to facilitate and expedite the business of the house when we see that there is an attempt on all sides to do so.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POSITION WITH RESPECT TO UNITED STATES FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the importance of the question may I ask the Minister of Finance if he will consider, before prorogation, making a statement to the house and country about the situation in connection with American exchange?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I will give consideration to the question, but I doubt if I can add anything to what I said a short time ago.

HIGH WATER AND FLOODS

REPORT AS TO DAMAGE TO TORONTO ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works when the report of the government's engineer on the Toronto island floods will be tabled.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): My information is that we will have it in two or three days.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN RECONSTRUCTION OF DAMAGED AREAS IN MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. In view of the very serious damage to crops, live stock and bridges caused by recent floods in the area around Dauphin, as well as other parts of Manitoba, will the minister state what steps the government is prepared to take, in cooperation with the government of Manitoba, to assist in the work of reconstruction in these flooded areas?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that any representations from the government of Manitoba have been made to the federal government. If they are, careful consideration will be given to the relative responsibilities.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Will the minister undertake in every way to assist in obtaining priorities on timber and steel for the repair work? A serious situation has developed in that area, and only today I have received requests for help in obtaining priorities.

Mr. HOWE: In respect of disaster in any part of Canada it has been the practice of the department to give the highest priority on requirements for rebuilding. I can assure the hon. member that requests for priorities will receive consideration.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

REQUEST FOR FURTHER STATEMENT ON FLAG TO BE USED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the other evening the Minister of Public Works stated, when the subject of flags for public buildings was under discussion, that both the Canadian ensign and the union jack were distributed and the caretaker could choose either. On Dominion day no union jack appeared on this building. Will the minister make a further statement?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): The other night I read to the committee the policy of the government which was laid down in an order in council passed in September 1945. I stated at that time that the public buildings were flying the Canadian ensign.

Mr. CHURCH: The Prime Minister said that parliament would decide.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEETING IN CAMERA OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask either the Minister of External Affairs or the hon. member for Cochrane whether invitations will be extended to all members of the Senate and the House of Commons or just to the members of both committees on external affairs to attend the meeting of that committee to be held on Tuesday morning next?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Although the hon. member had no opportunity to give me advance notice of his question I am glad to be able to say something here about this sitting of the external affairs committee which is to be held in camera, and to which much more importance has been given in the reports published in the press than is warranted.

My understanding was that a feeling was expressed by members of the committee that they would like to have an opportunity of getting frank expressions of opinion from the officials of the Department of External Affairs which they would not feel free to state for publication. It was suggested that that might be done in one of the ordinary meetings of the committee which would be held in camera, as committees of this house frequently have met in camera for the purpose of thinking out loud and without having reports of their proceedings published. When that became known it was suggested that the members of the committee of the other place would also like to have that kind of meeting, and because of the large volume of work to be attended to between now and prorogation it was suggested that the two bodies might meet together.

The question was subsequently put whether other members of either house could attend. There certainly can be no objection to that. As to whether there should be any invitation to other members who might wish to attend, I do not think that is necessary. It has become known that there is to be this meeting in camera where opinions can be expressed without committing anyone to them, where there can be frank discussions of what would appear to be desirable with respect, for instance, to the timing of the deposit of letters of ratification of peace treaties and such matters. I do not think that there should be any invitation to members of the houses of parliament who are not members of the committees, but I am sure that as far as the officers of the Department of External Affairs are concerned they will not have the slightest objection to any member of this house who is interested being present.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not suggesting that invitations should be given out, but I have seen conflicting reports in the press with respect to the meeting that was to be called and who were to be there, and I thought we should have some clarification.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think some of the gentlemen of the press have really attached more importance to this than is warranted. They seemed to feel that there was an implied connection between a session of the committee in camera and the negotiations which have been going on in Paris in connection with the so-called Marshall plan. As far as I know there is no connection whatsoever between them. Had there not been a word said outside of Canada about international affairs for the last month, this meeting in camera would no doubt none the less have been suggested as a convenient way of discussing a little more frankly than one does in a public forum the timing of Canadian actions and the reason for that timing.

Mr. CHURCH: Is there to be any public discussion of external affairs in this house this session? This is the 104th day of the session, and there has been none so far. At these secret meetings they just talk about nothing and do nothing.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The estimates of the Department of External Affairs will be before the house very soon, and it will depend upon my hon. friend and other members of the house whether there is any discussion.

Mr. CHURCH: Hon. members will not attend a secret meeting; I will not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Following the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as a member of the committee on external affairs I want to make it clear that it was not the committee that suggested a secret session. The mystery, if any, resulted from the government's action.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): It was not through government instigation that this happened. As chairman of the committee, perhaps I could state what happened so that parliament may be seized of the exact situation. It was suggested by Mr. Pearson that a special meeting should be held in camera by the external affairs committee at which time information could be given to the members of that committee which would be most informative and instructive. There was never any lead given by the government in that connection.

Mr. CHURCH: The committee should be abolished. It has done nothing all session.

SOIL PIPE

SHORTAGE IN TORONTO AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Yesterday the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Timmins) asked a question with regard to the production of soil pipe. His question was as follows:

Having regard for the shortage of soil pipe in the city of Toronto, has the government taken any action to increase production?

Major action has been taken to stimulate increased production of cast iron soil pipe and fittings during the latter part of 1946 and the first six months of 1947 as follows.

Arrangements are in operation to channel sufficient pig iron to enable the producers to operate at plant capacity. Arrangements have further been completed for a continuing flow of pig iron to meet increased production facilities during 1947. Price increases have been granted to the industry to compensate for increased costs of production.

Assistance has been given to individual producers in obtaining necessary equipment from War Assets Corporation which could not be obtained elsewhere or in time to facilitate early increased production. A submission by a major producer to expand production facilities at their plants for the production specifically of cast iron soil pipe and fittings was approved and a programme has been in operation since the first of January which provides an incentive bonus on increased production over and above the base rate established as normal production capacity at the end of 1946.

Results of these actions, by way of increased production throughout the industry, showed up early in the year. The total production of cast iron soil pipe and fittings in 1946 was approximately 2,100 tons per month, or slightly over 25,000 tons. The production during the first five months of 1947 averaged approximately 2,800 tons per month, or at the rate of 33,600 tons per year. With further expansion of facilities, it is estimated that approximately 35,000 tons will be produced in Canada during 1947, or a 40 per cent increase over 1946.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 269, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND

ESTABLISHMENT FROM ARMY CANTEEN AND OTHER SERVICE FUNDS—PROVISION FOR BOARD OF ADMINISTRATION

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 410, to establish a benevolent fund from army canteen and other service funds.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. CLAXTON: Mr. Chairman, before this clause carries I think a short statement should be made. On February 26 of this year I moved for the appointment of a special committee to look into the question of the disposition of canteen funds. Those funds originated through profits made in the sale of various supplies through canteens and through other similar sources entirely related to the Canadian Army. The committee was set up and I think hon. members will have observed with satisfaction the composition of the committee in that nine of its members had served in the second world war, twelve in the first world war, and three in both wars. This was not the first committee set up to deal with canteen funds. A committee had been set up on August 30, 1941, under the chairmanship of Mr. J. M. Macdonnell, then in private life but now the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. A parliamentary committee was created by resolution of this house on March 24, 1942, and it had a great number of meetings under the genial and efficient chairmanship of the Deputy Speaker who is now presiding over this committee of the whole, the hon. member for Brantford City. That committee made its report on July 22, 1942. Generally speaking, army canteen funds have since been administered by the regimental funds board in accordance with the reports of these committees.

The funds with which we are now concerned originated, as I have said, entirely from profits made through the sale of supplies through army canteens. As members know, members of the armed services in most places and in practically all units had opportunities to purchase at low cost additional comforts, and sales, small overhead and low costs led to the accumulation of very considerable profits. Some of these were expended by the units during the war. There is now left in the possession of the government the sum of $8,134,934. It is expected that that will be further increased by an amount of approximately one million dollars, so that the canteen funds with which we are concerned in the present bill total something of the magnitude of $9,000,000, a very considerable sum.

The committee held thirteen meetings. It made a unanimous report on June 12, 1947. It is not unusual, Mr. Chairman, for committees to make unanimous reports, but I think it is rather unusual that a committee should have held all its meetings, as I believe this one did, without any divisions and without any votes. That reflects great credit on the non-partisan spirit of full cooperation with which members from all parts of the house took part in the work of this committee. I think I speak for members of the committee and for members of the house when I say that it was in no small measure due to the tact and skill of the chairman that this very happy result followed.

The report of the committee proposed the adoption of a bill which had been drafted under direction of the committee and which was annexed to the committee's report. That bill is virtually word for word the bill which is now before the house. The government has accepted the report of the committee and puts forward this bill not only as the bill of the government but it hopes with the full support of the committee and of members in all parts of the house.

The bill itself provides for the establishment of the fund and describes the origin of the various sums which go to make up the fund.

By section 4 the bill would establish a board consisting of five members appointed by the governor in council, of whom one is to be nominated by the Canadian Legion and another by the National Council of Veterans Association in Canada, and it contains this very interesting provision:

> No member of the board shall hold or occupy a position in the public service of Canada.

It obviously was the intention of the committee that the board should be operated in as independent a fashion as possible, and with a view exclusively to the best interests of the veterans.

The bill goes on to create a committee for each province and sub-committees where they are needed. It provides for no remuneration for members of the board or committees but provides for a per diem allowance, and travelling expenses where that is agreed to by the board. Provision is made for the appointment of a secretary whose salary is as set out in the bill.

The important provision, Mr. Chairman, is that made in section 9 of the bill, which reads:

> There shall be paid out of the fund to or for the benefit of veterans or their dependents or the widows or children of deceased veterans such amounts as the board may from time to time determine.

The purpose of the benevolent fund which is to be established by this bill is that it be administered and paid out for the benefit of veterans and their dependents. Subsection 2 of section 9 lays down certain principles which the board is to follow. These have been prepared by the committee in general terms so that the board will not be hamstrung, but will be guided in the application of the funds.

The remaining sections of the bill deal with matters of procedure. One important provision of the bill is that the board is to report to the minister who is defined as the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Consequently with the adoption of this measure and its enactment, this will cease to be a matter of direct concern to the Department of National Defence with which I am concerned, but will be the responsibility of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. This is in accordance with the policy put forward by the government and approved by parliament, that as far as possible all matters having to do with veterans should be the responsibility of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

As I have said, the report mainly provides for the enactment of a bill, but there is one additional proposal recommending that the government put forward legislation to coordinate the work of the Canadian naval service benevolent trust fund, the army benevolent fund board and the Royal Canadian Air Force benevolent board and establish a committee which would insure as far as possible that the funds were administered on a uniform basis.

As hon. members are aware, the corresponding fund which came into being in connection with the profits earned from expenditures of members of the Royal Canadian Navy is dealt with by the Royal Canadian naval benevolent board which was created by P.C. 42/10672 on November 23, 1942. The naval benevolent fund was incorporated by dominion charter in July, 1945. The Royal Canadian Air Force benevolent fund is of an earlier origin, in that it was founded in 1934 and incorporated by dominion charter in July, 1944. These two funds have separate boards. It is the recommendation of the committee that as far as possible all these should be administered so as to secure uniform results. I am not speaking for the government on this, but I can assure the committee that that recommendation will have their most serious consideration, and as far as the Department of National Defence is concerned we shall use our good offices to see that as far as we possibly can there is close cooperation among the three funds.

The report itself refers to one thing to which I think I should make reference. It says:

> In this connection the committee is gratified to be able to report that, probably for the first time since the termination of world war I, all veteran organizations of national scope in Canada have collaborated in the preparation of a joint brief and have been unanimous in their recommendations.

This result is warmly appreciated. It is also fair to say that the recommendations of the committee are in substantial accord with all the submissions put before the committee, whether by organizations or individuals. Accordingly it is the view of the government that the bill, having received sound consideration and widespread support, should receive the favourable consideration of the house. Its object is to provide machinery for the careful expenditures of money created by the expenditures of the men and women of the army. It is designed to do that in a way which they themselves would like to see it done; that is, for the benefit of those of their number and their dependents who are in necessitous circumstances. It represents a true spirit of comradeship and an attitude of unqualified cooperation.

Mr. MUTCH: If I have learned one thing as chairman of the committee whose report is being discussed at the moment it is that if you have something to say you should make it direct and brief. But no matter how important the considerations before us or how great the urge to get through, there is always time to take a moment or two to be courteous and to give expression to that courtesy. If the remarks of the minister as applied to the committee of the whole were justified, and I think they were, then I as chairman of the committee should like at this moment to express publicly to the committee my appreciation of the fine spirit of industry and of cooperation manifested by the members of the committee on canteen funds. If the remarks of the minister directed toward me were in any way justified, I should like to say publicly that much of the efficiency, expedition and thoroughness of the work of that committee was due to one who is not a member of the committee, the capable secretary who was supplied to the committee, whose interest and knowledge of veterans affairs is the equal of that of any hon. member of the committee, and exceeds that of most of us. It is a bit unusual, but on behalf of the committee I should like to pay a word of tribute to Mr. Burgess, who was an able assistant to that committee.

Since the bill which the committee reported has come before the house intact I do not want to be in the position of placing any logs or stones in the path of its progress. Therefore, again expressing my appreciation of the work of the committee and expressing to the minister the appreciation of the committee for his kind words, I shall allow the committee to discuss the bill.

Mr. BROOKS: There is not very much that needs to be said regarding the bill. I simply wish to confirm what has already been said by the minister and by the hon. member for Winnipeg South. The committee was unanimous in the report. The work of the committee was congenial. Perhaps that was due to the chairman. I am not going to take away from him any credit which has been given to him, except to say we all felt that our duty was to do our best for the returned men. I also think that we have learned a lot from the experience of handling the canteen funds of the first great war. We had the experience of having before us as witnesses men who had worked on these canteen funds since the first great war, and they helped us materially.

As the minister said, we also had representatives from the different returned men's organizations. Taking it all in all, there was no reason in the world why we should not bring in a unanimous report. The only matter on which perhaps there was any difference of opinion was regarding the air force and navy benevolent funds. They did not come within the terms of our reference; but as the minister has pointed out, we made a recommendation in that connection. I feel it was the general opinion of the committee that at some future date the matter should receive careful consideration by the government, possibly with the idea in view of placing these funds in the same position as the army benevolent fund, or the bill which is now before the house. Further than that I have nothing to say except that we were unanimous. We feel that the recommendations in this bill are good, that they will redound to the benefit of the returned men, and personally I see no reason why they should not receive the unanimous support of the house as they did in the committee.

Mr. PROBE: I wish briefly to support the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South and the hon. member for Royal. A good deal of the credit for the work of the committee and the unanimity of the report is due to the fact that the submissions of the Legion and the other service men's organizations were concise and to the point, and based on actual experience of the work of the canteen fund committee following the first great war. There was of course a limitation in the terms of reference to the committee which prevented us from going into the matter of some uniformity of policy with respect to the disposal of canteen funds of the other two service organizations, the air force and the navy. I was glad that the minister referred to the fact that the committee has made a reference to the need for such legislation, and I trust it will not be forgotten, because the service men of all these organizations have an equal right to be considered twenty, thirty, forty or fifty years from now, or until that time when all canteen funds are exhausted.

There is a special feature of this bill which I think should be called to the attention of this committee. There is written into the bill itself a limited guarantee for some educational benefits to the children of needy veterans. These educational benefits are not placed on a competitive or scholarship basis, from the standpoint of academic standing, but rather on the basis of need, and therefore it will make it possible for needy children, especially of the deceased veterans, to receive an education which they might not otherwise be in a position to acquire. If there is one criticism of the veterans' charter it is the fact that while the returned man himself is looked after, and to a limited extent the widows of men killed in action, we have not held the federal government responsible for the passing on to the child of such education as would likely have been its right had the father lived to provide it.

I am glad it is specifically emphasized in section 9 of this bill that the educational rights of the children of needy or deceased veterans will be looked after. There is another thing that deserves commendation. There was some discussion as to whether or not we should have permanent force personnel on the continuing boards to administer this fund. We have here a regulation which prevents employees of the federal government from taking an active part in the work of administering the fund, and I believe that provision will get the support of the public generally. The citizens of the country other than members of the civil service will be in a position to administer it.

There is one minor point which escaped me at the time it went through the committee, and the minister might consider it at another time. I refer to the interest rate of two and one-half per cent which is mentioned in subsection 3 of section 3. There may have been an explanation for it in the committee at the time, but if so I have forgotten it. The fund, I submit, should earn the same rate of interest that the government generally pays for its money.

Beyond that, the members of our group are in hearty agreement with the general scope and provisions of the bill. It looks to me as though we shall be able to administer the $9 million odd left from the canteen fund operations to the benefit of the veterans and their families as a whole.

Mr. CHURCH: I am glad that the soldiers of all parties who sat on the committee have presented us with such a commendable bill. I happened to be on a similar committee that was set up after the last war and I moved a resolution at that time that the fund should be administered according to soldier population, so far as the soldiers were concerned, in the various provinces equitably. Looking back, I am sorry that the act that was then passed did not afford the public protection that is written into this bill, namely, public control over the whole fund. I think there was some criticism of the manner in which the fund was provincially administered, particularly in one or two areas in Saskatchewan. I am pleased to note that the auditor general has control of the fund by audit, but I should like to see one of the clauses, that relating to education of veterans' children, made a little less stringent, because many of these veterans' children work very hard in the summer to earn their fees. In the last few days we have seen in the newspapers pictures of some of them engaged in different forms of rather hard work.

On the whole, I wish to congratulate the committee and the house on the good work that has been done in connection with this bill. I think we ought to extend the principle and have similar cooperation in other directions. It would enhance the reputation of parliament before the people of the country as far as the conduct of the country's business is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I gather from what has been said that hon. members are agreeable to all the clauses?

Mr. TUCKER: With the exception of section 9. It is desired to ensure that the dependents of deceased veterans shall have the same rights as if the veterans were alive. It is therefore intended that a motion be made that subsection 1 of section 9 be amended by inserting the words "or former dependents" after the word "children' in line 21 on page 5 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall sections 1 to 8 carry?

Mr HARKNESS: There is one question I wish to ask with reference to section 3. Does this list of amounts credited to the fund include all the amounts which the committee considered should be included? I ask that because, going over it, I could not remember whether all the various funds which we thought should be credited to the account had been included in this list. As far as subsection 3 of section 3 is concerned, the amount for kitchen by-products is only for kitchen by-products which were secured overseas, and the amount for kitchen by-products in this country apparently is not there. I may be incorrect in that regard, but that is according to my recollection. Could the minister say whether everything we thought should be included has been included in the list?

Mr. MUTCH: Perhaps I might be allowed to say a word. In the final report of the committee there was not included a recommendation with respect to kitchen by-products in Canada. After a discussion we had with the associate deputy minister, and the explanation that was made, the matter was not pressed. We did press for the inclusion of the whole of the sum overseas which had been designated with the regimental names, and for which claims had been entered at the time payment was made. I can say to the hon. member that the bill introduced today, with the exception of the amendment that was made a few moments ago, is in point of fact exactly the same bill that the committee finally recommended. The by-products from the camps in Canada are not included in the bill, for reasons given in the committee.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I think the committee which dealt with this question has done an excellent job. I have read the minutes and followed the proceedings of the committee, and I think they approached the question in a very fair and practical manner. I support the commendatory remarks made by hon. members who have spoken previously. Two features of the bill appeal to me particularly. One is the provision for a decentralized administration; the provincial committees and subcommittees will be close to the problem, and needs. I think that will make for successful administration of this act and of the fund. I am pleased also to see some provision for the education of veterans' children. In British Columbia for a good many years we have had an act which provides grants for the assistance of veterans' children, and it has done a great deal of good in these cases. I am particularly delighted with the provision of the bill.

Sections 1 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Section 9 as amended agreed to.

Sections 10 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PENSION OR SUPERANNUATION BENEFITS TO SENIOR APPOINTEES SERVING OUTSIDE CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide pensions or other superannuation benefits for senior appointees of the Department of External Affairs serving outside Canada and the wives, widows and dependents thereof.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs mind giving us some explanation as to the purposes and objects of the proposed measure?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not like to precipitate a debate at this stage, I think it would be more practical to have the debate upon the bill, when hon. members will have it in their possession and can see just what we propose to do. The purpose of the legislation is to deal with the position of a small number of persons who have been brought in from outside the public service to head missions abroad. Our public service has developed so rapidly that it has not been possible to provide as heads of missions everywhere persons who were in the service and who were entitled to the benefits of the Superannuation Act. A few such persons have been appointed under conditions similar to those which prevail in the selection and appointment of judges, and the purpose of this bill is to provide pensions which in a general way would be somewhat similar to those provided under the Judges Act but which would be contributory whilst the pensions under the Judges Act are non-contributory.

There are two or three other provisions in the bill to take care of the continuation of the pension rights of those from other branches of the civil service who are made heads of missions in foreign countries. The bill will deal with a small number of cases, of which I can give the details when we deal with the bill, to show how each section will apply to them. If it suited the convenience of hon. members to allow the resolution to pass, the bill could be distributed at once and would be brought on for discussion as soon as it can be reached. A full discussion may be held on the second reading, when the terms of the legislation would be before hon. members.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, from the explanation given by the minister I understand the main purport of the bill is to provide superannuation for those of our senior servants in the Department of External Affairs, principally diplomats—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Exclusively diplomats, serving outside Canada.

Mr. BOUCHER: —who have been appointed from private life, not having served previously in the public service. I take it that where such appointments are made from the civil service itself an individual appointed to a diplomatic post would have served a number of years in some department of government, during which he would have contributed to the superannuation fund, and that he would be permitted to continue that contribution and eventually to receive superannuation. On the other hand as I see it this bill is being introduced to bring under the superannuation act persons who have not formerly been employed in the government service, so that they will get superannuation benefits similar to those received by people who have won distinction and promotion through many years of public service.

Take the case of a man who assumes a high post in the diplomatic service, at the request of the government. I would say he would be required to have a vast experience in the type of work he is undertaking, and to be in close touch with and sympathy for government policy. When such a person is appointed from outside the service I do not see why his compensation while in the service should not be sufficient to compensate him for leaving his position in industry or whatever it may be and accepting such an appointment at the request of the government, instead of putting him in the station of those who, by actual contribution, have earned their right to superannuation. Such an individual would be put in a better position than a man who has been in the service, by virtue of the fact that he has not contributed to the superannuation fund, and also by virtue of the fact that he may be in the diplomatic service for only a short time. During his service he may have little opportunity to contribute to the superannuation fund; yet after his service he will be permitted to retire with superannuation benefits for himself, his wife and his family. That may be merited in many cases, but I think it would be a very bad example for this parliament to establish, for many reasons. In the first place a man who has qualified himself in his own business for such an appointment should be a man of substantial means, and as such would be in a preferred position as compared to those who have spent long, faithful years in the public service. Again, while today we in Canada are very much in favour of superannuation and retirement allowances, we must realize that as yet comparatively few of our people have the opportunity to obtain superannuation, even on the basis of contributions made by themselves. One of the greatest inducements our civil servants have is the security they establish when they are permitted to pay into a superannuation fund, to which a contribution is made by the government. To let a new class come in who hold senior positions, positions which carry with them great dignity, honour and respect, and which require the exercise of a real national spirit, is in my opinion not a proper development of the principle of superannuation. To my mind this type of servant, while their numbers may not be great, cannot be looked upon as urgently requiring superannuation. With the social reform legislation now envisaged, and the need for social improvements among the needy, I do not believe we should place on a pedestal perhaps higher than ever before those to whom this measure refers.

My understanding is that if a person in this group accepts a diplomatic or ambassadorial post abroad he is provided with a substantial salary together with a living allowance and the other emoluments which go with a post of the kind. If he is not, then he should be. There is no reason why we should be niggardly in the compensation we give those who undertake positions carrying with them high responsibilities and requiring special qualifications. It is an entirely different approach, however, if we say to men of that type: "If you take this job with its meagre pay—" and we may call it miserable, or insufficient, or any other term which would seem appropriate—"we are going to give you permanent security by way of superannuation for yourself and your dependents for all time." I do not believe that is a proper procedure. The people of Canada are not looking to parliament to create special privileges for a limited number of individuals.

I have the highest respect for those who accept diplomatic posts to serve their country abroad, and I recognize the fact that they must have the highest qualifications. But I do not believe we should give them lifetime security in this fashion, rather than by adequate compensation while they serve. I can easily envisage an appointment to a high office in the diplomatic corps—a political appointment, if you like—involving a prominent and a capable man. After serving only a short time he could retire from that service, reassume his previous vocation and perhaps earn an added income because of the experience he had gained, the contacts he had made, and the business relationships he had established while in the diplomatic service. Yet this man, upon returning to his earlier vocation, would have security thrust upon him through the beneficence of the government of Canada, rather than through the position of merit he may have earned while in the diplomatic service.

A condition of this kind is not fair to those who serve in the Department of External Affairs and other branches of the government service and who in those years have acquired wide experience and knowledge, but who for many years have been paying for their own superannuation. Placed alongside these civil servants would be this new group of those from outside the service who on retirement would be entitled to superannuation benefits, for themselves and their dependents for the rest of their days. There may be individual cases which merit support, but in my view those cases should be compensated by way of salary while in the service rather than by superannuation as a means of security for the rest of their lives and those of their dependents. While a few cases should receive treatment of this kind, I believe that in adopting this principle we would be setting a bad example, and in the eyes of the rest of the service would be establishing a preferred class who would be given special treatment.

I do not believe the people of Canada want their members of parliament to set up special legislation establishing superannuation for a limited few when there are so many more who need extra help to a much greater degree.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the resolution before the house. Hon. members of this group do not intend to enter the debate on the resolution stage, chiefly because of the insufficiency of the information set out in the resolution. In view of the fact however that certain statements have been made by hon. members on both sides of the house, I should like to indicate our desire to reserve our opinion until we see the actual details of the bill.

We agree there are cases in which special consideration should be given. In the main however I believe we must follow the point made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher) with respect to the superannuation plan among civil servants. We should have regard also to the extent to which we in parliament are prepared to go in respect of superannuation benefits and old age pensions for Canadians generally.

With regard to the insufficiency of information in the resolution, I respectfully suggest to the government that this is a practice which ought not to be continued. Beauchesne's Rules and Forms states definitely that care should be taken in the drafting of resolutions preceding money bills to cover all the points. Only a few days ago the committee of the whole got into quite a dilemma because of a resolution drafted along lines similar to this one. The government in drafting resolutions should take care to give more details, and particularly to fix in the resolution the maximum amount of money to be spent under the bill based on the resolution.

Having said this much may I add that we reserve the expression of our opinions until the bill is before us.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 412, to provide superannuation benefits for senior appointees of the Department of External Affairs serving outside Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VETERANS' PREFERENCE, INCREASED SALARIES FOR COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Civil Service Act to provide, inter alia a statutory basis within the act for veterans' preference in appointments to the civil service; to provide for payment of increased salaries to the chairman and members of the civil service commission; payment of annual increases in rates of compensation to temporary employees; and for the establishment of certain temporary positions, appointments thereto, and remuneration thereof.

Mr. BROOKS: Does the minister intend to give an explanation on the resolution stage?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Like my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), I do not wish to institute a debate at this stage if it can be avoided, and if the discussion can more conveniently take place on second reading. The main purposes of the bill are to provide veterans' preference for veterans of the second world war and to carry it through into the Civil Service Act, to make provision for the remuneration of temporary employees and also for the remuneration of members of the civil service commission. There are other minor amendments to the act, but those are the three chief features of the bill that is to be introduced.

Mr. RENE HAMEL (St. Maurice-Lafleche) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before this resolution is concurred in, I should like to say a few words. I do not intend to discuss it at great length, but I believe it expedient to make a few remarks in regard to the civil service. The object of this resolution is to increase the salaries of the chairman and of the members of the civil service commission. I believe that the whole problem may be gone into at this time.

In the first place, I wish to point out the status of French Canadians in the civil service. I shall then show the consequences, try to place responsibilities for such a situation, and finally propose certain reforms. In regard to the civil service, the situation must be envisaged on the basis of population. The 1941 census, volume IV, page 334, places the population as follows: total population 11,506,655; population of French origin, 3,483,038; population of English origin, 2,968,402; population of Irish origin, 1,267,702; population of Scottish origin, 1,403,974. Two facts are apparent from those figures: first, that the French-speaking population constitutes the largest ethnical and homogeneous group in the country; second, French-speaking citizens represent over 30 per cent of the total population of Canada. With those figures in mind, let us see what is the proportion of French-speaking persons in the civil service. Two sources of information are available for this purpose. The report of the Montreal chamber of commerce which was submitted, I believe, to the Gordon commission and to the members of the cabinet, and a statement of the so-called "committee of five" which appeared, last week, in the Journal.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but during the debate on this resolution he must confine himself to the general principles of the resolution now before the house. The hon. member is now bringing up a case which deals with a certain racial group. He will undoubtedly have the opportunity to discuss special cases when the bill is before the house or the committee; he may then base his arguments on certain clauses. I do not think he should bring up special cases at present; he should confine himself to the general principles of the resolution. It is my duty to call the attention of the hon. member to this fact. If I were to allow him to continue, I would be forced to allow the same privilege to any other member who would like to discuss special cases pertaining to the civil service commission. I therefore suggest that the hon. member should confine his remarks to the general principles of the bill.

Mr. HAMEL: Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to abide scrupulously by the rules of the house. The object of the resolution is to increase the salaries of the members of the civil service commission. I wish to prove, Mr. Speaker, that the civil service commission has been a total failure since its inception. Now, how can I prove my point without quoting figures. However, if Your Honour, refuses to allow me to proceed, I shall have to submit to your ruling inasmuch as your authority must be respected.

Mr. SPEAKER: The resolution before the house does not allow the hon. member to discuss whether or not it is advisable to have a civil service commission. The resolution reads as follows:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Civil Service Act to provide, inter alia, a statutory basis within the act for veterans' preference in appointments to the civil service; to provide for payment of increased salaries to the chairman and members of the civil service commission; payment of annual increases in rates of compensation to temporary employees; and for the establishment of certain temporary positions, appointments thereto, and remuneration thereof.

Specific needs of the commission are therefore dealt with. It has often been repeated that when a resolution is brought before the house, hon. members can only speak of the general principles on which it is based. However, I wish to draw the hon. members attention to the fact that he will have the opportunity of making representations when the bill is brought before the house, as the minister stated a moment ago. I would therefore ask the hon. member to limit himself to the general principles contained in the resolution. If he wants to deal with specific cases, he should wait until the bill has been referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. HAMEL: Mr. Speaker, my only intention is to deal with the principle of the resolution. I am opposed to increasing the salary of members of the civil service commission and, as I must base my judgment on facts, I may say that it has been derelict in its duties, and I shall prove it. I do not want to be disagreeable and I would gladly await another occasion; however Your Honour knows very well that in these dying days of the session, when we are sitting eight hours every day and expecting to sit ten and even twelve hours daily, I can hardly take the risk of the matter coming up while I am away. But, my main reason for continuing my remarks is that I believe them to be in order. If I am ruled out of order, I shall evidently be relieved of all responsibility in the matter.

I want to show, Mr. Speaker, that the civil service commission has failed, because it has not been able to give the Canadian population representation in the civil service—which at the present time constitutes a fourth power —based on that fundamental democratic and British principle of representation according to population, and has violated since its inception another great principle on which our charter is based: no taxation without representation.

Now, since Your Honour prefers it that way, I shall keep my statistics and give them later. However, I will mention a few figures. There are, at present, 112,658 employees in the civil service. According to a statement published in the Journal, only ten per cent of that number is made up of French Canadians. That is to say, French Canadians should hold 22,000 more positions than they do at present. What does it represent in actual dollars? It means that between 35 and 40 million dollars, which should be paid French Canadians every year, go elsewhere. The situation is particularly noteworthy in the higher grades. I am asking hon. members to my right, my compatriots and all other representatives in this house what they would say if at a certain time French-speaking members were excluded from the cabinet? If it is considered that it is fair that French-speaking citizens be represented in the cabinet, if it is fitting that French-speaking citizens be represented in this house on the basis of population, that French-speaking citizens be represented in the judiciary according to population—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am very sorry, but I cannot allow the hon. member to continue his speech which is completely out of order.

May I remind him once more that he will be given an opportunity for making certain representations when the bill comes before the house. But his remarks are absolutely irrelevant to the resolution now before us.

(Text):

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, this resolution is to provide, among other things, a statutory basis within the Civil Service Act for veterans' preference in appointments to the civil service. We all realize that one of the most important benefits that can be granted to a returned soldier is a preference in appointment to the civil service. I think all returned soldier bodies have recognized that since the last war, and the returned soldier has become very jealous of this preference.

I want to ask the minister a question with reference to the recommendation that was made by the veterans affairs committee last year and which will be found in No. 51 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence. It reads:

> That the present civil service preference for disabled veterans who served overseas be extended to cover all employment, both temporary and permanent, by the House of Commons and by dominion government agencies, inclusive of crown companies.

We have discussed in this house on many occasions the question whether the veterans' civil service preference should be extended to crown companies. I think that the returned soldiers today feel that these crown companies are the thin end of the wedge which is getting rid of the returned soldier preference, and considerable bitterness and resentment is felt by returned soldiers on this account. There may be some justification for setting up these crown companies. I am sure there is in some cases; in others we feel that possibly there is not, but whether there is justification for them or not, these crown companies employ civil servants and it is felt by the returned men that these civil servants should be recruited from the ranks of the returned men as far as possible. Yesterday when the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking on the Canadian Commercial Corporation it was brought out that this particular crown company employed 184 men, of whom only 56 were veterans. It would seem to me that if the veterans' preference was applied to crown companies we would have a much larger percentage than that.

There is another point I wanted to mention. I understand that quite a number of civil servants enlisted during the war without the consent of their departments.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is being covered by this act. The same provisions are being extended to them that were extended to those who resigned from their departments during the first world war.

Mr. BROOKS: Up to the present time I know that these men have not been reinstated in the civil service with the seniority to which they felt they were entitled. I am pleased indeed to hear from the minister that that situation is being corrected. I shall say nothing further about it at the moment.

The third matter on which I wish to speak is the merchant marine. As the minister will remember, it has been discussed in the house before. Speaking in the house yesterday on another bill I said that the merchant marine is generally considered by the people of Canada, as it was considered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his speech the other day, as being on the same footing with the army, the navy and the air force. Here, then, it seems to me is an opportunity for the minister to do justice to these men of the merchant marine by giving them a preference in civil service appointments. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) yesterday was very much grieved, according to his statement, that nothing had been done for these men. The circumstances had been unfortunate. I feel that it was the intention of the veterans affairs committee to see that these men received their due. Unfortunately we thought that a bill would be brought in by the transport department, which is looking after this matter, but nothing practical was done. I suggest to the Secretary of State that this bill be amended to do justice to that extent at least to the men of the merchant marine.

Another matter I would bring to the minister's attention concerns returned soldiers who have written an examination for appointment as postmaster or some other civil service position and who, after the examination has been held and the successful candidate named, have been informed that the position was being opened up again, for different excuses. One that I would refer to particularly is the excuse that another examination was being held because all the returned men were not back home. This excuse does not seem altogether right to me. The case I have in mind has to do with the appointment of a postmaster in Milltown in my own province. The examination was advertised and a good number of returned men applied and took the examination. One of their number was successful, and understood that he was to get the appointment, but apparently that was not satisfactory to certain powers that be in the constituency. Apparently he was of the wrong political stripe, if I may put it that way, and a demand was made for another examination. The excuse which was offered, and I contend it was an excuse, was that all the returned men were not back home. I would ask the minister if it has been the general practice of the department to wait until all the returned men were home before these vacancies were filled, and if second examinations are held, after a candidate has passed successfully the first examination, on the ground that all the returned men were not back home. In this particular case the examination was held on December 3, 1946, and it seems to me that by that time there would be at least sufficient returned men back home to fill a position of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If I may interrupt my hon. friend, we endeavoured as best we could to meet that situation which my hon. friend very properly brings up. I arranged to visit the troops in Holland and we went through all the divisions and other corps organizations with two representatives of the civil service commission, who held examinations in the field, so that those who were there would not feel that they were being ignored in civil service appointments by the examinations being held before they got back home.

Mr. BROOKS: I am not criticizing the Department of Veterans Affairs. I am satisfied that they did what they could and what they felt was necessary. What I do criticize is the fact that after these examinations are held—and in this particular examination there were ten returned men who applied—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I just called the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche (Mr. Hamel) to order because he was discussing an individual case. I would ask the hon. member to discuss only the general principle of the resolution. He will have an opportunity at some other stage of the proceedings to discuss individual cases.

Mr. BROOKS: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. In this particular case I was asking if it were the general principle to act the same way in other cases. It was the general principle on which I wished to get information. I knew of this particular case and I have not the least doubt that there are a great many more. If there are, I feel that it is an unjust way in which to treat these men. There is nothing further that I wish to bring to the minister's attention; I hope he will be able to answer what I have said.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to read the portions of the resolution which are pertinent to the remarks I wish to make. First, it says:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Civil Service Act to provide, inter alia, a statutory basis within the act for veterans' preference in appointments to the civil service.

What the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has said I am in agreement with and will not repeat. However, there is one matter that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. If the veterans' preference has been generally applied as the government indicates, then I point out that very few veterans serving in the civil service who were entitled to the preference have been made permanent.

The other day I had occasion to ask the following question:

How many veterans of the first great war entitled to veterans' preference and who entered the government service on or after the 19th July, 1927, are recognized as being permanent and subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

The answer that I received I have summarized, and it shows that of the total number of veterans who are in the civil service and who have been appointed within the last twenty years, only 5,577 are recognized as permanent and subject to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The departments and the numbers are as follows: Department of Agriculture, 250; Public Archives, 1; Office of Auditor General, 8; Civil Service Commission staff, 5; Comptroller of Treasury, 33; Department of External Affairs, 8; Department of Finance, 1; Canadian Farm Loan Board, 7; Royal Canadian Mint, 6; Department of Fisheries, 44; Governor General's secretary, 3; Department of Insurance, 4; Department of Justice, 192; Department of Labour, 7; Unemployment Insurance Commission, 331; Department of Mines and Resources, 255; Department of National Defence, 92; National Film Board, 3; National Harbours Board, 4; Department of National Health and Welfare, 39; Department of National Revenue, 1,088; Post Office Department, 1,202; Department of Public Printing and Stationery, 62; Department of Public Works, 228; Department of Reconstruction and Supply, none; Air Transport Board, 1; National Research Council, 11; Department of the Secretary of State, 4; Department of Trade and Commerce, 154; Department of Transport, 524; Department of Veterans Affairs, 1,010; total, 5,577, which indicates that of the number of veterans who have joined the service since July of 1927 a very small proportion have been made permanent. Something should be done to end as far as possible the temporary classification which in certain cases lasts for many years, not because of inefficiency or neglect of duty on the part of the individual but apparently because of neglect on the part of officialdom somewhere. The difficulty, of course, is that when these veterans are denied permanence they are also in consequence denied superannuation. Finally when they are allowed to accept superannuation they have to pay back for the time in which they have been in the service. That has proved exceptionally costly and difficult.

I have before me one case, and it is representative of many, in which a temporary civil servant finally was allowed to come within the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. For instance, the protective staff were denied that privilege for many years. Finally when they came under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act they had to pay contributions for the years in which they were not within the provisions of this act, and also the interest thereon, which in many cases has become almost prohibitive. Let me give an example of the figures in that connection. One of these men was required to pay back—

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I must interrupt the hon. member. The matter dealing with the superannuation act has nothing whatever to do with the Civil Service Act.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I understand that another bill will be before the house dealing with the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The hon. member can discuss the matter then.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Since the matter dovetails in with the argument I am advancing I decided to deal with it now rather than have to bring it up again on the other bill. If the minister will permit me to complete it, I think he will understand the pertinence of it. The amount that this man was ordered to repay was $2,998.34. He continued to pay a monthly amount for a period of five years and three months, during which time he paid $1,364.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member of what I said to the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). I would ask every hon. member to confine his remarks to the general principle of the resolution which is before the house, and not discuss individual cases. Moreover the remarks should be relevant to the resolution. I do not believe that the remarks of the hon. member are relevant.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I certainly could not quarrel with that decision. What I am trying to show is that even if the veterans' preference is applied, these veterans today, by reason of the long delay in permitting them to qualify under the superannuation act, are placed in a difficult if not impossible position. However, sir, agreeing entirely with your ruling, as I do, and of course accepting it, I will simply point out that having paid that amount, the total credit allowed the veteran is only $400. I suggest therefore that when the bill based upon this resolution is introduced, something should also be done to provide for the removal of too great a load on veterans who, having the preference, will have been appointed to permanent positions in the civil service.

Yesterday I dealt at some length with the general question of the extent to which the veterans' preference had been applied, I pointed out then that even since the end of the war, on the first of May, 1945, 31,000 out of 75,000 appointments have not had the veterans' preference.

Mr. McILRAITH: I have not had an opportunity of seeing the return. Does that figure include females as well as males?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. I pointed out frankly yesterday, and I repeat, that it does to the extent of 19,969. One of the objections I have received from veterans is that, out of work as they are, and able to do some of the work that today is being done by females recently appointed, they have strong reason to object to the fact that an opportunity is not given them to hold some of the positions that are vacant and are being filled by young women who are not veterans.

That these positions are not unimportant is borne out by this fact.

In appointments made by the civil service commission from May 9, 1945 to April 30, 1947 there were 66,078 with a salary under $2,000, there were 4,464 in the salary classification between $2,000 and $3,000, and there were 1,242 in which the salary paid was over $3,000. When it is understood, as this reply indicates, that 11,094 appointments were made of males to whom the veterans' preference did not apply, I suggest that the time is overdue when a bill based on this resolution should become the law of the country. Today it is the law under order in council, and now, if this bill passes, it will be the law of the country, and it should not be departed from to the extent we have seen in the last two years.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Were these appointments made in all departments of government, or in one particular department?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All the departments are referred to in the return, but the return does not indicate which departments have been the offenders. The Postmaster General the other night absolved himself by his answer, so that it indicates that while in the Post Office Department there were a great many appointments—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will admit, I think, that he is discussing the subject in too great detail. He should confine himself to the general principle set out in the resolution, which is:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Civil Service Act to provide, inter alia, a statutory basis within the act for veterans' preference in appointments to the civil service; to provide for payment of increased salaries to the chairman and members of the civil service commission; payment of annual increases in rates of compensation to temporary employees; and for the establishment of certain temporary positions, appointments thereto, and remuneration thereof.

I would ask him to discuss the general principle of the resolution. If he wishes to discuss the details of it and to ask questions, he should wait until the proper time comes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say, Mr. Speaker, that if there was any offence, I was the offender, because I asked the hon. gentleman a question which he was graciously trying to answer. I apologize for having transgressed the rules of the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister was most kind to make that explanation. I was trying to show how necessary it was that the principle of the resolution should be carried out and the extent to which the application of that principle is overdue so far as civil service appointments are concerned. The principle of this resolution has been the law under order in council up to the present time. This merely translates that principle into legislative form, if the bill based on the resolution is passed. My reason for giving these details is to point out that in spite of the fact that there was an order in council providing for veterans' preference, it has not been properly lived up to. I hope that when the house passes a law to establish this principle, that law will be observed to a greater extent than the order in council which has been in effect and which was designed to put into practice the principle enunciated in the resolution.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): I wish to keep strictly within the confines of the resolution, and I shall be brief. The resolution is divided into three or four parts, the first being to provide for the payment of increased salaries to the chairman and members of the civil service commission. I hope that, in effecting that, the government will go a little further and do some modernizing and revitalizing of the civil service commission generally. I believe the Gordon report tabled some time ago contained some constructive suggestions, though some of them would not in my opinion increase efficiency. I believe further that the government is very much behind in bringing the commission up to that point of efficiency which we have a right to expect today.

The resolution provides for the payment of an annual increase in rates of compensation to temporary employees. I should like to discuss that point for a few moments. I do not know whether the bill covers the point I am going to make, and in case it does not I would urge the government to put it into effect. During the past five or six years, owing to wartime regulations and controls, a great many employees were hired temporarily by the civil service commission to do a specific war job, without annual increases, superannuation benefits or permanent status. I am sure the people of Canada are very grateful to the men who did that work. Most of them were incapable of serving in the forces overseas; they could not qualify for such service, or they would not have been working here. They undertook employment with the government and gave diligent service, many of them working an hour extra every day and many extra days during the year. If they had been members of the permanent service in peace time they would have had leave of absence, annual holidays, sick leave benefits, superannuation benefits, and very likely permanent appointments.

I am sure every member of parliament is frequently consulted, as I am, by individuals who have given such service, many of whom have taken no sick leave at all during the past six or seven years, though some of their comrades did; few having taken their statutory holidays, as they normally would; a great many having worked extra hours every day, while seeing some of the senior men more fortunate in that they received war supplements. I have before me at the moment, for instance, the case of a friend of mine who was rejected several times when he applied for enlistment in the armed forces and who took a position in a government department, at a fair compensation. He has worked almost every hour of every day during the past six years. He took no sick leave. On June 28 of this year he was given notice that he could take his eighteen days' annual leave, after which his employment would be terminated. I believe these cases were dealt with by the civil service federation in a brief submitted to the government last April, and I do hope the Secretary of State has taken that brief under consideration and that some of the recommendations contained therein will be embodied in the act to be founded upon this resolution.

It seems to me that after people have served the government for five, six and even seven years it is not sufficient to tell them that after their eighteen days' statutory holidays, with no leave of absence and no more notice than that, their services are no longer required. I do believe they should have at least one month's separation pay, or in any case that much notice. I believe we should treat these people as they were treated after the first great war, by an order in council passed in 1918, and as I understand they are being treated by the British government; that is, that they should be given credit if they have not taken their sick leave, to the extent of fifteen days for every year they have been in the service, in addition to a separation allowance. In many cases these officials put in a great deal of overtime, with no extra compensation whatever.

During the war I believe the civil service worked overtime willingly, and the work of these men was satisfactory and efficient during that period of stress and strain. Some of the permanent employees who worked overtime received handsome war supplements while many of the others, much more in need of compensation, received no supplements at all and no compensation for the many hours of overtime they put in. Now that peace has come, a great many of these people who did their work well are being released from the government service. That is quite proper if they hold positions to be given to returned soldiers who have the preference and the permanent employees who are returning. It is probably quite reasonable to expect that many of these people should be released from the service; I think perhaps that should be done on an even larger scale, but when temporary employees are released I believe they should be given compensation by way of some consideration for their extra work and overtime; and I do not think it is enough to say, "You are entitled to eighteen days' holidays this summer, so take that time and don't come back. We don't need you any more." I do not think that is treating the civil servant fairly. I certainly hope the minister has taken these points into consideration in preparing the bill that is to be brought in.

I do not want to delay the house longer at the resolution stage, because when the bill is brought in we may find these things provided for.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I feel that we might have postponed the discussion which has taken place until we had the bill before us, but in view of the fact that a number of statements have been made I think perhaps a word is necessary at this time.

We are all primarily concerned about the efficiency of the civil service, and I think that should be the criterion by which whatever we do in regard to the first part of this measure should be examined. As far as the civil service preference for veterans goes, by their service to their country the veterans themselves have demonstrated that they have real ability. As to how this preference should be measured, recently I read something in regard to the system adopted by the British government for qualifying applicants for appointments and the way in which the civil service preference for veterans is measured there; and I should be glad if the minister could see fit to make some statement as to what the department has done with respect to studying closely the points basis in connection with the appointment of veterans to the civil service, instead of an absolute preference for those who have had overseas service. Undoubtedly modern techniques of personnel management make a very considerable use of such things as aptitude and mechanical tests of various kinds, depending upon the nature of the position for which candidates are being examined. I believe much of the abuse of the veterans' preference, which sometimes is definitely ignored because the head of a department wants a man of a certain type and will not take anyone else, could be avoided if we had some form of point rating based on a preference for overseas service, for service which resulted in a wound, and possibly for service during which the individual had no opportunity to get overseas for reasons over which he had no control. I should like the reaction of the minister to that suggestion, either now or during the debate on second reading of the bill, because I believe the British system has considerable merit.

In introducing the measure a few moments ago the minister made one statement which I heard with some gratification, though he did not enlarge upon it. He said those civil servants who had enlisted without the consent of the heads of their departments, or perhaps contrary to the wishes of their departments, were to be completely reinstated with respect to salary schedules, seniority and so on. I should like him to indicate, if he will, whether that applies to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as well as other members of the civil service. I presume, as he indicated, there will be something in the bill to cover that point.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire to detain the house by making any observations on the resolution. Hon. members of this group feel that whatever contribution we may have to make or criticism we may desire to offer may be made when the bill is being considered. For that reason, and in the interests of making progress, we have deferred consideration of these matters until that time.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I have only a brief word because I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that the resolution need not be discussed, because an opportunity will be afforded on second reading. However before the bill is introduced I should like to say only a few words because I note that the measure is to provide veterans' preference in appointments to the civil service. This provision has been in effect for a considerable number of years. I feel however that the principle of preference should be extended to all veterans who were on active service, whether they served in Canada or overseas. Many Canadian veterans on active service never left the shores of this country, but it was through no fault of their own that they were unable to proceed overseas. Many of them made several applications to go overseas, but that privilege was denied them. I believe the preference should be based upon service to the country at home and abroad, and that the government should give consideration to giving preference, first, to overseas veterans, and secondly, to veterans who were on active service in Canada.

In my view those who served in isolated spots in Canada, either in the army or in the air force, or those who served in territories contiguous to Canada, were just as necessary to the service of the country as were those who proceeded elsewhere.

I hope the minister will give consideration to this suggestion, and that some provision will be made in the bill for it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. HAMEL: On division.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who said that?

Mr. HAMEL: I did.

Motion agreed to on division, and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 413, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 364, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have only one or two observations to make in connection with this bill, the principle of which is that amendments to the criminal code are necessary. As we shall have an opportunity of discussing the several sections as they arise, I shall not make reference to them at the present time.

May I reiterate what I have said on previous occasions, that as it is now constituted the criminal code is composed of many incongruous sections, and a very considerable portion of it is no longer applicable to present-day conditions. For that reason I suggest that in his position of Minister of Justice the minister could perform no more useful piece of work than at the earliest possible day to proceed with the recodification of the criminal code so as to bring it up to date, to remove many of the sections which are obsolete in effect, and also to amend the punishments, many of which have continued down to the present day from the year 1830, about which time cruel and unnatural punishments were done away with.

The recodification of our criminal code is long overdue. It was done last in 1892. Since that time psychological and penological advances have been made which in considerable measure necessitate an early alteration in the law with respect to insanity, and also with respect to the principles applicable to responsibility.

In connection with the question of responsibility, as hon. members know, anyone under the age of seven years is incapable of committing a crime, while in respect of those between the ages of seven and fourteen before an accused person can become liable the onus is placed upon the crown to establish knowledge as to the nature of the act. Two hundred years ago, when those principles were established, physical and mental age were believed to be synonymous. In recent years advances in psychology have shown that many persons of the physical age of more than fourteen years have the mental development of a child of seven years or less; yet they can be convicted of crime.

There is one other matter I would bring to the minister's attention. Having regard to the number of cases going to the courts of appeal on the question of the admissibility of statements and confessions, I am surprised that something has not been done to render uniform throughout the country the general principles applicable in this regard. We have only to point out two recent cases, namely the Dick case in Hamilton and the Sears case in Windsor, where persons had been convicted of murder, such convictions having been based upon statements the accused had made. On appeals those statements were held inadmissible for the reason that police officers failed to follow principles established in a multitude of cases with respect to the admissibility of statements. Many people place strong reliance upon the admissions of accused persons, but experience has shown that persons do confess even though they are entirely guiltless because under certain circumstances they have been taken into custody and have not realized the consequences.

In Saskatchewan some years ago a man was charged with the murder of a little girl. He confessed and went into complete details as to how he committed the crime, which had been preceded by criminal assault. He came up for preliminary hearing and his statement went in which revealed him as a person who had committed one of the most sordid crimes in the history of our province. He was brought to the place where the crime had been committed, which happened to be in the constituency of the hon. member for Humboldt, and he reconstructed the crime. After he had been in custody awaiting trial some one read of his confession and could not understand why he had confessed to the murder when for two weeks before and two weeks after the date in question he had been two hundred miles away. This was brought to the attention of the attorney general of Saskatchewan and the accused man was released, even in the face of his confession. Later another man was arrested and confessed, but by reason of his suffering from insanity at the time of the commission of the offence he was sent to the North Battleford mental institution where he remained for some ten years. Some weeks ago he was found fit to stand trial but was found not guilty because during the interval the star witnesses for the crown had disappeared or were not available. That indicates the danger of confessions extracted from accused persons.

The minister may say that we have rules. True enough, general rules have been adduced from a variety of cases, but we have not the uniformity of rules that they have in the United Kingdom, where in 1912 Lord Alverstone and a committee of judges enunciated rules which must be followed by police officers all over the United Kingdom before proceeding to interrogate persons against whom there is a suspicion of guilt. Whether he can incorporate it in the criminal code or not, I think the minister would be making a splendid contribution to uniformity by having judges in various parts of the country join together and arrive at certain fundamental conclusions as to admissibility of statements so that there will be uniformity in practice.

You cannot maintain respect for the law when one court determines that a person shall die for murder and another court determines that because a person happens to appeal he is not guilty of the offence charged because wrongful evidence was admitted. I mentioned the case in Saskatchewan because it is an authenticated case which indicates that persons do confess under interrogation regardless of whether or not they are guilty. You may ask why that man confessed. The reason given was that he was in Portage la Prairie and thought it would be a way to get to Macoun, where he had lived, without having to pay any fare. He not only got back; he had to remain in gaol for a period of time, and but for gratuitous circumstances he would in the ordinary run of events have been executed for that murder.

My second suggestion is that uniformity should be established on another ground: when men are convicted of murder and their convictions are quashed on appeal, respect for the administration of justice is undermined. It is difficult for the average laymen to understand how such things can happen. The fact that death would have followed in the cases to which I have referred but for the court of appeal indicates the necessity of proper rules being established.

There is the other side of the question. Guilty men should not be permitted to escape because of mistakes made by police officers because of the fact that no police officer in this country, no matter how well versed he may be in criminal law, can state with certainty what the law is and what course he should follow before a statement which he secures will be admissible.

There is one other matter in connection with which I had hoped there would be an amendment to the criminal code. May I say that since becoming Minister of Justice the minister has been moving forward in making these amendments with commendable speed—one does not expect him to do everything within a few months of becoming the custodian of the king's conscience in our country. I had hoped that the minister would remove the sections dealing with the alternative penalty of imprisonment which today is levied on those convicted of minor offences and who, when they are unable to pay the money penalty, must go to gaol. It happens frequently that men come before the courts charged with petty offences such as being drunk and disorderly, and a fine of $5 or $10 is imposed with an alternative of 30 days in gaol.

Mr. LESAGE: It is always the same men who are accused of drunkenness.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not understand what my hon. friend means by that. It is a fact none the less that when a penalty by way of fine with the alternative of imprisonment is imposed for a petty offence or petty acts of mischief, the inability to pay should not be a passport to a penal institution. I have referred before to its having been abolished in the United Kingdom. There the right to imprison as an alternative rests with the magistrate, who imposes the alternative of imprisonment when and if he ascertains after examination that the man is in fact able to pay the monetary penalty.

It is true enough that today many magistrates extend the time contrary to the provisions, and they are sometimes criticized by provincial attorneys general for following that course. I suggest that the minister give consideration to removing those sections which provide for the alternative of gaol under the circumstances that I have mentioned. The stigma of gaol stays with a man throughout his life. No matter what he does he is always faced with that circumstance, that some place, somehow, he served time.

With regard to the sections in question I refrain from mentioning any of them until we get into committee, at which time I shall direct my attention to one particular section which I believe contains a principle that is dangerous in the extreme.

Mr. DAVID CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few comments to make on this bill which I think the members will give a wide measure of support. I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that an act such as the criminal code must inevitably get out of date as a result of judicial decisions, so that it is necessary from time to time to tighten it up.

I am not going to discuss the sections, but there is in the bill a new principle which comes as a rude awakening to the Canadian people because for the first time the bill recognizes that there is in Canada a definite criminal class. We have liked to think of ourselves in the past as a law-abiding people. We are, but for the first time we are admitting the truth, what is even better than that, we are facing up to the truth, and I wish to commend the minister for the remedial action he is taking.

For a variety of reasons, not least of which has been our antiquated penal system and our outmoded methods of prison therapy, there has grown up in Canada a class of habitual criminals. Members of the house have been calling attention to this for many, many years, and even in this parliament we have called attention to it from time to time. The Archambault report emphasized the inadequacy of our penitentiaries to prevent repeaters and insisted on proper classification and segregation of the prisoners. General Gibson has agreed with that report, and the minister is now taking some definite action. Although this amendment to the criminal code is only a small beginning, it does attack the problem in the weakest part of our penal system. Here we are screening out and detaining in separate custody those criminals whose criminal habits are so deeply ingrained that they are persistently leading a life of crime. The action that the minister is taking is a definite, progressive step. Now that we have both the Archambault report and the Gibson report as guides, we can clean house from top to bottom. The segregation of habitual criminals will make ever so much easier the task of regenerating the younger inmates of our prisons, many of whom, as the example of the Borstal system has shown, will respond to intelligent and patient handling.

The minister said, in speaking in the house, that in the main we were following the United Kingdom legislation on the same subject. I consider it well worth while to point out that there are some important differences in this bill from the British bill. In the United Kingdom the accused must be over thirty years of age. In the present bill the age is fixed at over eighteen years. In the United Kingdom the limit of preventive detention is from five to ten years. Here it is indefinite and it may very well be for one's natural life. In the United Kingdom it is necessary to obtain the consent of the director of public prosecutions. A similar office in this country would be the attorney general, but the bill does not provide for that. In one other important aspect this bill differs. In the United Kingdom, provision is made for counsel for anyone who is charged as an habitual criminal, counsel to be provided by the state at the request of the accused. No such provision is made in this bill.

I want to touch on another aspect that was touched on by the hon. member for Lake Centre and it is an important matter, the one dealing with voluntary statements. The spy trials, the Dick case in Hamilton and the Sears case in Windsor have pointed up the confused and highly unsatisfactory state of the law on this matter. Under the law as it at present exists there have been grave miscarriages of justice against the person on trial and sometimes in favour of the person on trial. Unless the confusion is cleared up, we may soon find that no statement made by an accused person or any person under arrest will ever be admitted as evidence at any subsequent trial. That may be very good. That perhaps puts the onus where it belongs, but I think it is time for the highest legal authority in the country to clarify that situation and for all purposes attempt to make the practice uniform.

There are other parts of this bill which appeal to me. One part of the bill recalls last year's Tobias case, where a Toronto storekeeper was shot to death in cold blood by five youths who escaped the death penalty because the jury decided that the young killers had not intended to cause his death. I think the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) discussed this case last year. This case and all the attendant publicity constituted a travesty of justice.

Mr. MacNICOL: It certainly was.

Mr. CROLL: I am glad to see that the present amendment will prevent it from happening again. From now on under this bill, to kill a man in such circumstances will be murder, and if this amendment comes too late to afford any satisfaction to the dead man's family I hope it may be some consolation at least to them to know that his death was the cause of remedying a serious defect in our criminal law.

I wanted to say one word about what I thought was a distressing spectacle which occurred recently in the investigation of a young woman's death at Bracebridge. I think we can all regret the personal tragedy involved, but just as regrettable was the public exhibition which occurred. Somehow in our courts we seem to have borrowed a little from the United States. What does not appeal to me is the three-ring circus that seems to be an instrument of justice over there finding its way over here. I think any parent who read the newspaper accounts of bobby soxers thronging the courtroom must have been filled with disgust. I do not know what can be done to prevent this sort of side-show happening in the future. I should like some direction from the judicial authorities which bars children from court proceedings of this kind. I think they see enough of it in the movies. They should not be allowed to witness these tragedies which unfortunately occur all too often in real life.

I commend the minister for bringing in this bill at this time. I join with the hon. member for Lake Centre whole-heartedly in saying to the house that more progress has been made in the department in recent days, not only with respect to judicial matters, but also with respect to penitentiaries. We have a great deal of confidence that the minister will bring into effect many more of the recommendations of both the Archambault and the Gibson reports, so that we shall not find it necessary to use this new section dealing with habitual criminals.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, we need only to discuss the principle of the bill now before us, but I find that there are thirty-four principles involved. I may say that I more or less agree with all of them and commend the minister for bringing in the amendments to the criminal code.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I have always had great respect for his knowledge not only of criminal law, but of criminology in general which he has gained in his experience as a distinguished criminal lawyer in my province.

As I say, there are thirty-four principles involved in this bill, and we can discuss them in committee. I think they are all commendable and should be supported; but there is one principle contained in section 18 which is something revolutionary, I may say, in our criminal law, and has been revolutionary in any other country where it was first introduced. I agree that an habitual—I might call him an incurable criminal—should be put in a place of safety so that he will not be able to do any more damage. I would consider an incurable criminal on a par with a mentally incompetent person. Criminals who persist in committing crimes, in spite of their previous punishments, are, in my opinion, mentally defective as compared with ordinary law-abiding citizens who accept our moral code, which is reflected in our criminal law as reasonable and necessary. The difficulty is to establish who is an habitual or an incurable criminal. The royal commission presided over by Mr. Justice Archambault devotes a chapter to the subject. They recommended an amendment to the criminal laws which is now before the house.

The amendments proposed by the minister are substantially the same as those proposed by the Archambault commission. There are a few differences, which are only procedural, but I think there are two vital differences. The Archambault commission recommended that the trial of an habitual criminal should be by a judge alone, regardless of whether or not the criminal was convicted by a judge and jury. The bill before us proposes that the same court which tries the criminal for the criminal offence should also be the court to decide as to whether or not the convict or prisoner is an habitual criminal. I have not made up my mind as to whether or not the recommendation of the Archambault commission or the bill before us is the better method. I always favour the principle that a man, if he desires to be tried by a jury, should be tried by a jury. Offhand I would say that the amendment before us is better than the recommendation of the commission.

Then, the amendment provides that the facts to be produced at the trial of a person who is tried for being an habitual criminal are, first, of his criminal habits; second, of a criminal mode of life, and, third, that there must be three previous convictions under which he could have been sentenced to at least five years imprisonment. Perhaps the minister might take into consideration that a fourth fact might have to be established before the man could be convicted as an habitual criminal, namely, that there should be some facts on his mental attitude toward the accepted standards of morality. Perhaps the minister would consider some amendment to section 575B to that effect.

There is another important difference between the recommendations of the Archambault report and the bill before us. The bill proposes that in order that a man may be tried as an habitual criminal there must be the consent of the attorney general of the provinces. I do not think I favour this particular section, because it tends to produce different practices in different provinces. In order that there may be uniform practice, I think the consent should be obtained from the commissioner of penitentiaries rather than from the attorney general of the province. After all, the commissioner of penitentiaries has the record of the particular prisoner. His consent should be obtained rather than that of the attorney general of the province, because it is my opinion that this will produce more uniformity of practice in this connection. The last subsection of section 18 states that the minister shall review the cases every three years. An amendment might be put in here stating that the minister ought to act upon the recommendation of the commissioner of penitentiaries.

As I mentioned in the opening sentences of my short remarks, the state of mind of an habitual criminal is somewhat equal to a defective mind, and I hope that the minister will soon see to it that one of the assistant commissioners to be appointed is an expert along that line, an alienist, as I mentioned yesterday. If that is done, then I think we might be more successful in working out the amendments now before the house and they will be of real benefit in connection with our whole criminal administration.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): There is one question I should like to place before the minister and the house, namely, the alarming increase in Canada in moral offences against children. I believe that that increase has taken place in all of the provinces; certainly it is so in my own province of British Columbia.

I have had different petitions requesting that some action be taken at this session to amend the criminal code to meet this situation. For example, one petition was signed by a large number of people from one of the junior high school parent-teacher associations, in the city of Vancouver, urging that the criminal code be so amended as to deal adequately with moral offences against children, regardless of which section of the criminal code these charges come under. I have had further representations from another parent-teacher association containing a resolution passed by the provincial convention of parent-teacher associations. At that convention there would be representatives of parent-teacher associations from all over the province, and this is the suggestion made by such provincial convention:

> Resolved (1) that representations be made to the federal government recommending that necessary legislation be enacted to provide for sentencing offenders against public morals where those offences are due to a psychopathic condition, to preventive treatment and detention in a separate institution provided for that purpose.
> (2) That representations be made to the government of the province of British Columbia recommending that all sex offenders (offenders against public morals) have medical and psychiatric examination before being sentenced in order to obtain, before disposition, an understanding of the personalities of the offenders.
> (3) That in view of the many protests concerning the number of light sentences imposed on moral degenerates, we make (a) representations to the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General that adequate psychiatric treatment be provided for such offenders and (b) to the Minister of Justice that adequate provision be made in the criminal code for retaining in custody these offenders until the treatment of the prisoner has proven sufficiently satisfactory that he may be safely returned to society.

Apparently under the present law many of the people committing criminal acts of this kind are sentenced, serve their time, are turned loose and commit the same crimes again. That happens time after time. Certainly something must be done to meet the situation. Just this week I received a Vancouver paper reporting an attack on two small girls. The father of one of the girls summed it up very well, I think, when he said:

> "I don't know. It's got me beaten," the eleven-year-old's father said this morning. "This sort of thing seems to be getting worse all the time and something has got to be done about it. But what I don't know."

I had hoped that there would be some amendment this year, but I can find nothing in the bill as presented to the house that meets the situation. There is some change in section 260 of the code, but that does not really meet the situation to which I have referred. I hope that when the minister speaks he will explain why it is that the government is not making a move at this time to cope with this very serious condition.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): I notice in this bill reference to motor car accidents, and penalties against drivers have been in many instances considerably increased. I have no objection to that at all if it will decrease the tragic number of highway accidents all across the country every year.

The question that I wish to raise at the moment is this. It has been found in the United Kingdom and in other countries that increasing the penalties for infractions of the various highway acts, and increasing the penalties against operators of motor cars, did not in the main have the effect of decreasing accidents on the highway. The main purpose of this legislation is to prevent such accidents.

I see there is a clause in the bill increasing the penalties for stealing motor cars. That is an excellent and necessary step. For leaving the scene of an accident the penalty is also increased. It appears to me, however, having studied some of the insurance records, that a great percentage of the highway accidents are caused by a very small percentage of drivers. It has been said that eighty per cent of the accidents are caused by some ten per cent of the drivers.

I suggest that some consideration should be given to preventing the drivers from operating motor vehicles after the third or fourth accident. I realize that it would be difficult to enact such a provision in a statute or in the criminal code, but a recent accident caused the tragic death of someone very close to a member of this house. Before the trial took place, the driver of the car was operating again and was actually involved in another accident. The jury in both cases brought in a verdict of not guilty. The evidence adduced was that this driver had actually caused four accidents, two of which had been fatal; yet no penalty was imposed on that driver and the jury in both cases failed to register a conviction.

I feel that increasing the penalties for infringements of the law in connection with motor cars is necessary, but some further study should be given to the case of the driver who repeatedly has accidents. A man is not guilty unless he has been found guilty by his peers, but in the bill we have the repeating criminal clause, and we also have the other problem of the driver who has repeated accidents. It is one of the most serious situations we have to face on the highway today.

To increase the penalties is probably a good thing, but you run into this psychological fact, that a very stiff penalty may result in juries not wishing to convict because to do so would be to impose a heavy mandatory penalty on the driver. I know that is so in a number of cases where the attitude of the jury frequently is, "That is the sort of thing I might have done myself." I have had jurymen tell me their decision was based on that sort of reasoning. As I say, I do not know what could be added to the criminal code to overcome that kind of thing, but we have a small number of drivers who habitually cause accidents. Perhaps they are psychopathic cases, the same as the habitual criminal, but apparently there are some people who are incapable of driving a car without causing accidents. If some consideration could be given, after a driver has had three or four accidents, even though convictions may not have been registered, to preventing that man from continuing to drive I believe the accident rate would be greatly decreased.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Before the motion is carried—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. ILSLEY: —I should like to express my sense of indebtedness to the hon. members who have taken part in the debate for the suggestions they have offered and the interest they have shown in the improvement of the criminal law.

The bill before the house contains a fairly large number of important amendments proposed by the government, but a great many other suggestions have been made to the Department of Justice and, upon examination, have been rejected. I am not at all sure that if they had been brought before the house they would have been rejected by the membership of this house. Opinions would differ as to their efficacy, and as to the desirability of enacting them. In this field of legislation judgment plays a very large part. It is most difficult to know whether to embody certain suggestions in the form of amendments to the criminal code and propose them to the house; as I say, it is a matter of judgment as to whether or not they really would make an improvement in the code.

Some important matters have been mentioned in this debate. One is the question of whether imprisonment in default of payments of fines should be possible, where the person convicted is unable to pay a fine. As a matter of fact I had the officials of the Department of Justice prepare a series of amendments to the criminal code which would carry into effect roughly the provisions in that respect of the criminal justice administration act, 1914, of Great Britain; but I felt that we should not enact those provisions in this country until the whole criminal code is examined with a view to ascertaining whether changes should not be made in the penalty sections themselves. I listened to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and I gather that is what he suggests; that the penalty provisions of these sections themselves be changed. We have a great many sections where a fine is provided and imprisonment in default of payment of the fine. If we were to enact a provision that the person convicted need not go to jail if he is unable to pay a fine I am afraid a great many persons would rapidly discover that they could commit certain offences with complete impunity. Therefore a provision of that kind, which roughly speaking is the provision of the British legislation, should not be enacted until we examine the sections themselves with a view to possibly revising the penalties. For instance, perhaps many of those sections should be changed in this way, that at the discretion of the court there be a fine or there be imprisonment. If that were the case the prospective offender could not say in advance for sure that he could commit the offence with impunity. I hope I have made that point clear to the house, and that is my reason for not proceeding with changes of that kind. I think the matter is well worthy of consideration, but only after thorough study is given the penalties imposed by the criminal code, which, I must say, are not altogether consistent.

Another important matter that has been mentioned is whether some attempt should not have been made to enact law relating to the admissibility of statements by an accused. I am willing to look into that matter, and I must confess that up to this moment I have not looked into it at all thoroughly. I have been going on the assumption that these situations arise from time to time where difficult points seem to come before the courts, that if just a little time is given they are settled by the courts of ultimate jurisdiction, by the final courts of appeal; and that when they are settled by the courts that is sufficient and better than for parliaments to attempt to cover by legislation matters which are extremely difficult. I must say I thought the law was fairly satisfactorily settled on the question of the admissibility of these confessions, but recently I am told there are differences between the courts. I would hope that by the process of judicial decision the points would be settled in such a way that legislation would not be necessary.

Then the hon. member for Lake Centre suggests that the whole criminal code should be revised, and perhaps that is true. As the years go on, I think a thorough-going recodification of the criminal law of Canada becomes more and more necessary. It is just a question of judgment, again, as to the time when that will be undertaken. It will be a colossal task when it is undertaken. If the commissioners who undertake that task spend as much time in considering the pros and cons of the desirability of making an amendment to each section as I have spent on these few sections, it will be a very long task indeed. It is so hard to say what penalties ought to be, and so hard to say what should be constituted as offences in the field of criminal law.

Then the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) made some suggestions about a certain section of the criminal code, as did the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), and perhaps I can discuss those suggestions when we come to the consideration of that section.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has brought forward the important question as to what should be done about sex offenders, and he has asked why the government has not introduced some amendments in the criminal code to deal with that situation. The reason is that we must get a little more information about what would be effective. I have undertaken to read some articles with respect to this matter, dealing with sex offenders, and one of the best articles is one entitled "Sexual Offenders." It is written by W. Norwood East, M.D., F.R.C.P., who was special consultant to the royal navy, and was formerly His Majesty's commissioner of prisons in England and Wales. It is to be found in the Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases, an educational journal on neuropsychiatry, in the issue of June, 1946. Appended to this issue is a bibliography of books and articles on the subject.

It is a field in which there is much disagreement. There are various schools of thought. The officials of my department, particularly General Gibson, have been pursuing this subject with the Department of National Health and Welfare in an effort to get from them some conclusions upon which people can now agree.

There are those who think psychiatry is not the whole answer. Psychiatrists, of course, may do much good. There are not many of them in Canada, and, indeed, not very many in the United States. We are beginning to bring them into the penitentiary system of the country to see what we can find out, and to learn what is practical.

If hon. members would read these articles and the articles to which reference is made they would see at once that there is no agreement as to just how far a country ought to go. It might be that we should construct certain institutions which would be more in the nature of hospitals than prisons, staff them with psychiatrists and then take the word of those psychiatrists as to when the offenders convicted of these offences should be released. Immediately that opens up a large question and provokes considerable opposition as to whether, in addition to taking steps with respect to habitual offenders, we should also take offenders who are not necessarily habitual and place their liberty in the hands of psychiatrists.

In many instances they cannot be sure. Let me quote from one article by Doctor East, in which he quotes from another article as follows:

> The extremists who see in psychiatry the sole and ultimate solution of sex crimes claim that most if not all, of these offenders suffer from some individual mental disorder which should be treated by psychological individual methods. They want the psychiatrists to decide once and for all which individuals are treatable and determine how long their treatment should last. They want the doctors to decide definitely that they are cured or else pronounce them definitely incurable, as if it could be predicated that every sexual offender would fit into one of two cubby-holes for the rest of his life.

The writer of that article is skeptical as to whether that can be done with certainty. On the other hand, I believe considerable progress can be made, and we are trying to get as much information on the subject as we can. However we are not in a position to introduce an amendment to the criminal code prescribing preventive detention for sex offenders for indefinite periods, when we are not prepared to state for sure that we can say when they should be released again.

Mr. GREEN: Has consideration been given to increasing the penalties?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot say that consideration has been given to increasing the penalties. But I am under the impression that that is not the solution of the problem. I do not believe that that type of crime is committed by persons who are keeping in mind the penalty involved.

Mr. GREEN: But they would be out of circulation that much longer.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is true that they would be out of circulation that much longer. But, there again, whether the state would be justified in taking that action with regard to persons who are not habitual offenders I do not know. I think it is quite justified in taking action of that sort with regard to habitual offenders.

The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) referred to an important subject, namely the question of driving motor cars by persons who are intoxicated. This is a matter of increasing importance. With the increasing amount of liquor being consumed in Canada, the increasing drink bill of the Canadian people, the increasing numbers of motor cars on the highways and the increasing number of accidents, parliament should take any steps it can which would be effective to prevent the causing of accidents or deaths on the highways.

Much thought has been given to the matter without, I must admit, very great results in the bill. The penalties for hit-and-run drivers have been increased. That is a peculiarly unpleasant sort of offence. We thought we would be justified in recommending an increase in the penalty. On the other hand, we did not think we would accomplish anything by increasing penalties for drunken driving. At the present time the penalties for drunken driving are seven days or thirty days, as the case may be. I, personally, do not think that raising it to fourteen days or sixty days would act as a deterrent.

There again I believe that many of those persons convicted of drunken driving dread the seven days or the thirty days in gaol just as much as they would the longer periods. If we make the detention longer magistrates and courts become increasingly reluctant to make convictions. In some cases they are reluctant now to convict. So we turned our attention from penalties to definitions, and considered how best we could define intoxication. The present definitions could possibly be made more satisfactory. The ordinary definition of intoxication in relation to drivers is that degree of intoxication or of being under the influence of liquor which renders the driving of a car dangerous to the public. This means that if the person were permitted to drive the car it would be a danger to the public.

That is accepted by most of the courts. Therefore there did not seem to be much to be gained by trying to extend that definition. It is almost impossible to say that a man is intoxicated if he has had a drink we will say, within one hour, two hours, three hours or four hours, because the variation is so great. It would be extremely severe to make it an offence to drive an automobile while under the influence of liquor. The courts have ruled that a person is under the influence of liquor after he has had a drink. The influence may be quite slight, and it hardly seems sufficient to make a criminal out of a man who has had a drink. So we abandoned that.

We gave consideration to the reversal of the onus in some cases. The best section that I could evolve, and which I want to put on record for the consideration of members, is this:

> Provided that whenever a motor vehicle is involved in an accident evidence that the person driving the said motor vehicle acted at or about the time of the accident in a manner indicating that he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, shall be prima facie evidence that the said person was intoxicated.

I am not recommending it at this session, but if in the course of time it is found that we have to do something, from what consideration I have been able to give the matter this is the most practical amendment I can suggest if an amendment is to be made to stiffen the section. The proposed amendment has much to commend itself, but it also has much against it. I should like those who are interested in the subject to give it some consideration between this and the next session. I may say that we have had strong representations to the effect that we ought to go quite far in amending the section. I have not gone very far, as will be seen when the section is reached; what I have done is to try to offset the decision of the courts with regard to one particular phase of the matter which will be explained when the section is reached.

Mr. GREEN: Is that section 3?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 10.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister elaborate on the Bracebridge case, the particularly revolting case which was referred to by the hon. member for Spadina?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the general rule is that an inquiry may be held in camera. It is the duty of the presiding officer—I think a coroner would have the same right, although I am not sure—whether a judge or other officer, to do what is right in that regard. I am not familiar with the case mentioned by the hon. member for Spadina, but I do know that judges often hear cases in camera if there is sufficient reason for doing so.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Imprisonment to be served consecutively.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, if this is the best bill the government can bring down on this 104th day of the session regarding law reform, then we might just as well realize that there is no law reform proposed in the said bill. The bill is a disappointment to me. You cannot discuss the principle of the bill because there is a different principle in each clause. Each clause deals with a different subject matter. I am disappointed if this is the best law reform that Canada can get after being twenty-five years behind the times.

One section deals with accidents, but it offers no effective means of preventing accidents. The bill does not deal with some of the most important problems we have. We have had no opportunity of discussing the bill on second reading, and for that reason I do not think the minister will object if I make a few remarks in connection with the bill.

This bill is a disappointment to the chief constables' association, to the bar associations of the country, to the magistrates, to the judges and to the police officials who are enforcing the law. It would be better if the Attorney General of Canada would enforce his own statutes, and not leave their enforcement to the attorneys general of the provinces. As I see it, these amendments will not prevent any further accidents. You are going to have a lot of trouble. When you go over the bill you find that it absolutely forgets some of the main principles involved in law reform, or road accidents that cause death from the motor car, the abuse of which is one of Canada's greatest scandals.

We should have a complete revision of our criminal code every ten years, but I do not think there has been one since it was first passed. Is this the best law reform that the members of the two old parties and the other parties to my left can bring about? This bill of reform is not in accordance with the principles of real law reform which they have in England. There is nothing in this bill to prevent imprisonment for debt. Our gaols are filled with people, some of them soldiers, who cannot afford to pay their fines. Nothing is done about that in this bill. The summary offenders act was adopted in the mother country twenty-five years ago. Before the war, half of the prisons in England were closed as a result of time given to pay fines under the summary offenders act there.

Our newspapers are filled with details of accidents every day, but so far as these measures are concerned, we might as well meet in secret for all the public know of what is said here. It will be noticed that the bill contains some mention of the payment of fines, but that will have very little effect. The only thing to do is to adopt the same principles of law which have been in effect in England for twenty-five years. This minor change in the principle will not keep people out of gaol who have not the money with which to pay their fines. Some of our gaols are filled with these people, notwithstanding what has been said.

In these days the motor car is the cause of many deaths. Thousands of people are injured on our highways and the amendments proposed will have very little effect. I can find very little cure in these amendments for the problem of the hit-and-run driver, one of the most beastly types of murderer you can find. This is the man who runs away and leaves a child on the pavement. This is the most cowardly form of murder. Women and children are left on our pavements, some of them killed. In the riding I represent and in the ridings of Danforth and Greenwood, including Danforth avenue, and in York East also, who have this great problem concerning deaths of the hit-and-run type. There have been a number of children killed by the hit-and-run type of driver on the streets of our cities. If we hope to get a lead from parliament we hope in vain.

In view of the decisions handed down by the court of appeal, the sections dealing with "voluntary statements to the police" should be clarified, but I can find very little in the bill touching on that important matter. The court of appeal has divided on that question and the judges and police have been asking for some clarification of those sections of the criminal code. We should know what the duties of the police are. At present they can hold without bail a man on a charge of which he is not guilty, and in some cases they have extended the law regarding vagrancy. We had, in my opinion, a miscarriage of justice in a city in central Ontario recently.

Where a female is on trial, women should have the right to compose half the jury. That is done in some states of the union, and women on the jury would be far more intelligent than some of the men we have. I am sorry that the minister did not include that in these amendments. I proposed it in a bill not very long ago.

There are minor changes proposed with regard to youthful offenders. Some do not have counsel. I think provision should be made for that, and that, before trial, the parents should be notified. Such an amendment is not to be found in the bill.

The chief constables' association have been making representations to parliament. They are the people who have to enforce the law. The enforcement of the criminal code is not done by the dominion at all but by the attorneys general of the provinces, who in turn leave it mostly to the municipalities, and there is a different enforcement in every province and no uniformity at all in the sentences handed out. Some people are given ten days for an offence for which another man gets thirty days or two years. Some of the savage fines imposed for infractions of the control regulations were ridiculous.

I should like to see some protection afforded to those who hire motor boats, rowboats, canoes and other craft, to ensure that their lives will not be endangered by such craft. Penalties should be provided by an amendment to the code for those who hire out these boats when they are not safe, or to make it reasonably certain that the applicant can swim or is safe to rent a craft to.

I would refer to section 15 of this bill which says:

> Paragraph (c) of section four hundred and forty-six of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> (c) being armed with an offensive weapon or instrument or imitation thereof robs, or assaults with intent to rob, any person.

The words "or imitation thereof" have been added. That puts the person who carries a wooden gun and grabs a payroll out of a girl's hand but does not hurt her at all in the same class with reckless bandits going all over this country seizing payrolls, and bandits who mean murder and get away with it.

I shall not take time to discuss the bill clause by clause. On the 104th day of this session this bill is a disappointment to those who are looking for real law reform all over this country. The law courts are closed for the long vacation. Many lawyers, as well as judges and crown attorneys, are away on their holidays, and no opportunity is given to the chief constables' association of the dominion or the provinces to see what the amendments are. I object to the way we do our work. You ignore the chief constables' association, and the same with the bar association and the judges and magistrates who know the law. They have no opportunity of seeing the bill or of making suggestions to strengthen it. It passes this house and then goes over to the other part of this building to be passed there seriatim without much, if any, inquiry whatever. In future the bill should be introduced in the early days of the session and distributed thus.

We should have a legal committee. I have urged that earlier this session, and for twenty years. They have a legal committee in all the provinces. Ontario and Quebec were the first provinces to have one, and then it spread to the other provinces. It is a very good committee, which can sit down and consider the merits of a bill and its principle, hear deputations and see that the law is brought up to date so that we get some real law reform.

I am sorry to see that the recommendations of the women's organizations of our country such as the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, the Council of Women and other organizations have not received consideration. They have been asking for measures to protect the wives and the families of our citizens, and some of them have made representations with respect to the non-payment of fines by a poor person.

I should like to see some clarification of the vagrancy clauses of the criminal code, so as to bring them up to date to meet changed conditions, but there is no clarification of them at all here.

With respect to section 18 dealing with habitual criminals, I am sorry that the law of England has not been copied in toto. Here you have to get the consent of the attorney general of the province; and it sometimes takes months to secure it, and you are kept running around in a circle by the circuitous methods of this section.

If there is any real law reform in this bill I cannot see it. I am dissatisfied with the bill. I am not criticizing the present minister at all, because he cannot be expected to cure the troubles of twenty-five years in less than twenty-five months. He has been in office for only a short time. But there should be a drastic revision of the code, and I would suggest that Mr. Justice Keiller Mackay be appointed to a committee of three or four or five judges to revise and consolidate our whole criminal law, so that a bill could be presented to the house next session. The code has been unrevised with very few exceptions since it was started in 1905 or 1906. It is true that statutory amendments are made from session to session, but so far as making real changes in response to representations by public bodies for real modern law reform after two wars, or with respect to the jury system of the country is concerned, that is another matter. The jury system should be protected and strengthened, and further amendments should be made to protect that system, which has not been satisfactory in all respects for the liberty of the subject.

Then with respect to appointments to the judiciary, I am not here to criticize the judiciary. I do not wish or intend to do so, but some of them have had no training and no practice at the criminal bar in the sections of the code which they are trying to enforce, with the result that in some cases there may be or may not be a miscarriage of justice.

It takes two people on a highway to make an accident. One driver may be eighty per cent responsible for the accident and the other twenty per cent. I do not see why the owner of the car who is eighty per cent responsible for the accident should not be prevented from driving a car for two years, with a penalty as well, which was the law of New York and which I included in the bill that I proposed.

I hope I can get some support from the estimable young lady who is a member of the House of Commons for the policy which I propose in allowing women to sit on grand juries. If the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is competent to become a member of the high court of parliament she ought to be able to sit on a jury. I think she would be a far better juror than some members of juries whom I have known.

Mr. KNOWLES: We should have a lot more like her in the house.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not know about that. She might make an excellent judge. My colleague the hon. member for Davenport used to be a learned justice of the peace. Judge Cohen of Toronto was a good justice of the peace who became a magistrate. As a matter of fact he was one of the best magistrates we ever had in Toronto, and I have the authority of the late Colonel Dennison for that. He gave most excellent and efficient service at no cost to the city. He was a most patriotic, reasonable and painstaking man. I have heard some of the lawyers say that he was the best magistrate they ever appeared before. My good friend, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher), when a fine law student, learned a lot from Judge Cohen. I understand that at one time he went to get a search warrant, and Judge Cohen called his attention to the code and told him he was not entitled to a search warrant; that if he issued one to him he would be personally liable. That just goes to show that it is not necessary to be a lawyer to make a good magistrate. You, Mr. Chairman, are an able lawyer; you have had vast experience. Some of the best magistrates we have had in our province have had no legal training at all. I hope that during the recess of parliament the minister will be able to study the situation sufficiently so that he will be able to give us a better bill next session, one that will commend itself to the wisdom and the judgment of the country along the lines I have suggested.

I believe this is not the kind of law reform which we should have. I believe that we should have a consolidation of the code every ten years, and a judicial committee at once to consolidate it, along the lines I have suggested.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Causing a disturbance.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This new section constitutes a departure from every principle of criminal law in so far as causing a disturbance is concerned. As a matter of fact, over all the years, under British common law and in Canada, under common law and then under the code, never before has it been an offence to create a disturbance in any place other than in a public place. I submit that this section is not very well drafted. It provides for the definition of a dwelling house by reference to section 335 of the criminal code, which is in part VII, which states in the headnote:

Offences against rights of property and rights arising out of contracts, and offences connected with trade.

Actually what is taking place is that a section is being used as a definition section that is in another part of the code altogether, although that part is in no way applicable to the part in which section 222 is to be found. The new section reads:

Any one who causes a disturbance in any place other than a dwelling-house as defined in paragraph (g) of section three hundred and thirty-five, by screaming, shouting, swearing or singing or by being drunk or by impeding or incommoding other persons shall be guilty of an offence...

If a person happens to be on his own land and screams and if anybody happens to hear it who is not located on a public highway or in any other public place, this section makes it an offence.

Mr. KNOWLES: Can he scream in the House of Commons?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As a matter of fact this section could apply to the House of Commons. If a member of the House of Commons becomes noisy and disturbs the sensibilities of other hon. members—and on occasion all of us do that—he would be guilty of an offence under this section. That shows the danger of drafting a section designed to prevent one wrong and thereby substituting an offence in a different situation which was never contemplated by the amendment. My hon. friend has pointed this out. There can be no question whatever that any hon. member who today does anything that disturbs any other hon. member could be brought before a court of this country and charged under this section.

I shall tell the committee the reason for the section. Some eighteen or nineteen years ago one Benson was charged with disorderly conduct in a public place, to wit, a restaurant. He was found not guilty because a restaurant is not a public place. Public places are places where all of us as citizens have an inherent right to enter. In order to make a person liable for creating a disturbance in places like that, the law officers of the crown have so constructed this section that incongruous results will follow therefrom. The more I look at the section, the more impossible it becomes. On consideration, I can understand why it is that in the United Kingdom, with their centuries of experience, have been very careful to maintain that no disturbance can be created in other than a public place. I suggest to the minister that if this amendment is passed in its present form, no matter whether a person is noisy in his own place or in some other place—

Mr. FRASER: At a ball game.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, at a ball game; that is how it is drafted here—an offence is committed. It was never intended that an offence should be created under those circumstances. I should like to hear the minister discuss this important matter. It is not a simple amendment as is indicated by the explanation. "Public place" is removed. The doing of these things in a public place has always been the essence of the offence. I think it is a case of indifferent draftsmanship designed to get around one difficulty and, having got around that difficulty, created another more serious than that it was intended to cure.

Mr. GRAYDON: Out of the frying pan into the fire.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. That is possibly the best description of it. I know something of the situation as it is today under that section, "public place" being defined as it is in the Benson case. But I would point out that at some time a situation will arise and a charge laid under this section which will render this house subject to considerable ridicule. I would suggest to the minister that the matter be re-submitted to the law officers, so that we do not under this section create a new type of offence, because certainly we are not intending to create these anomalous conditions by this section. When, however, the matter comes up for interpretation before the courts in the future, our ideas and intentions will not be taken into consideration. The words themselves will determine what we intended to convey in drafting this new section.

Mr. MICHAUD: I should like to add a word to what the hon. member has said. I, too, find it difficult to determine what the purpose is in amending the law in this way. I am under the impression that these vagrancy clauses are severe enough. I happen to have had a little experience under section 238 in little country places where I come from. We have had a great many such cases. Many trivial cases have come before the courts under section 238, a great many cases that are much too trivial to come before the courts. I have always found section 238 (f) as it stands broad enough to include anything of a criminal nature which may constitute a nuisance. I do not think the offence should be broadened unless there are very good reasons therefor. I would urge the minister to give us the reason for which the amendment is sought. Is it urgent? Is it considered advisable to have this enlargement at the present time?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the draftsmanship of the section is all right. I am not impressed with the observations of the hon. member for Lake Centre on that score. The question is whether the content is defensible or not. The reason for the section is the unsatisfactory state of the existing law. The wording of the present section requires a change mainly on account of the interpretation given to the words "public place".

In Rex v. Benson, 50 Canadian Criminal Cases, page 426, to which my hon. friend referred, restaurants, railway stations, public libraries and shops were declared not to be public places.

In Rex v. Carney, 12 Canadian Criminal Cases, page 349, licensed saloons and billiard halls were considered public places.

In ex parte Ashley, 8 Canadian Criminal Cases, page 325, a theatre was considered to be a public place.

There is therefore considerable confusion as to what is or is not a public place, and it was considered that it would be an offence for any person to make a disturbance in any place except a dwelling house. Causing a disturbance has been defined as raising a clamour or commotion, or quarreling or fighting, and applies to the comfort and convenience of the inhabitants and not necessarily to a breach of the peace. This was decided in Rex v. Martin, 12 Ontario Reports, page 800.

This offence is being moved from the vagrancy section, 238, to the nuisance sections, because it would appear to be at present wrongly placed. A person who engages in a fight on the street, or who obstructs traffic, is not necessarily a loose, idle, disorderly person or vagrant. In Rex v. Law, 42 Canadian Criminal Cases, MacDonald, P.M., dismissed such a case and said that it shocked his sense of justice to hold that a respectable citizen should be dubbed a vagrant simply because he blocked the sidewalk through causing a disturbance. He said he felt it could not have been the intention of the parliament of Canada to brand a man as a vagrant unless there was something else to show that he was a loose, idle or disorderly person.

Therefore the reason underlying the amendment was that causing a disturbance is not a badge of vagrancy. It is a nuisance, and the offence should be moved out of the vagrancy section into the nuisance sections. It was thought that when it was placed in the nuisance sections something should be done to define with more consistency the place within which a disturbance created by persons would be a nuisance.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Could you not define "public place" as including a place where the public have or have not an inherent right to enter? I think that would cover it. I would point out once more to the minister that to create a disturbance, as he has indicated, has been defined as raising a clamour or a commotion, and I again point out the incongruity of the fact that, as it is at present worded, it would apply to the raising of a clamour in this house or in any other public place. I know the reason for the amendment. My hon. friend mentioned Rex v. Benson, 50 Canadian Criminal Cases. I happened to be counsel for the appellant in that case, where it was decided that a restaurant was not a public place and I realize that, since that case was decided, wrongs have been committed which have gone unpunished. For that reason there must be some change in the law.

I think it is a good move to transfer this offence from section 238 and put it under the head of nuisance, because in the past any person who was noisy and was convicted under section 238 was forever thereafter designated as a vagrant.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will see what can be done in the way of drafting between now and eight o'clock.

Mr. ADAMSON: I certainly think the words "or singing" should be taken out. Every time there is a division in this house we might be charged under that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but it does not cause a disturbance.

Mr. ADAMSON: It says "swearing or singing".

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but in addition to that it must cause a disturbance, and what my hon. friend mentions in illustration does not cause a disturbance within the meaning of the act.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the intention of the committee to proceed with the consideration of this bill after private bills?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at seven o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

OTTAWA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 241, respecting the Ottawa Electric Railway Company—Mr. Benidickson—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Company empowered to subdivide shares.

Mr. REID: Are we to have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. BENIDICKSON: This is a routine amendment of a private bill which was introduced in the senate, considered by a committee there and passed, came to this house for first reading and then was sent to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, which reported it without amendment. This private company is quite old, and the main amendment it is seeking is in section 1, under which it simply proposes to multiply the number of shares as now authorized by four. On another occasion the house imposed upon the company the restriction that its shares should not be issued at less than $100 each. In the proposed amendment effect is given to that restriction, in that the shares when split four for one are not to be issued at less than $25 a share.

The principal object of the amendment is that there may be a wider distribution of the shares of this company. The present capitalization, based upon a figure of $100 per share, is a stock issue of only 40,000 shares, of which some 35,197 have been issued. It is hoped that the new shares, priced at a lower figure, will be purchased by employees of the company, who have already shown some interest in that possibility.

Mr. CHURCH: It is just a change in the financial set-up of the company?

Mr. BENIDICKSON: Just a change in the capitalization; I assure the hon. member for Broadview that is all. It is hoped that when the individual shares can be purchased for a lesser amount more employees of the company will participate in the ownership of the company itself.

FEDERATION INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 266, to incorporate Federation Insurance Company of Canada—Mr. Cote (St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville)—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Power to acquire rights, etc. of a certain insurance company.

Mr. JAENICKE: This company is to take over the assets and business of a French company, and it is the understanding that only the Canadian business of this French company is to be taken over. That being so, I believe section 8 should read accordingly. I therefore move that section 8 of Bill No. 266 be amended by inserting the words "within Canada" after the word "property" and after the word "liabilities" in line 35.

Mr. RINFRET: That is exactly the amendment I was going to propose.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. JAENICKE: The section will then read:

> The company may acquire by agreement to insure or otherwise the whole or any part of the rights and property within Canada, and may assume the obligations and liabilities within Canada of "La Foncière, Compagnie d'Assurances Mobilieres et Immobilieres à primes fixes,"—

COMMONWEALTH INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 294, to incorporate Commonwealth Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

EILEEN MAUDE GARDNER RICHARDS

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 273, for the relief of Eileen Maude Gardner Richards.

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I understand there are forty or fifty divorce bills on the order paper for tonight. We know in recent years of the controversy and difference of opinion in the house in regard to this procedure. However, sir, until the house wishes to alter its own rules with reference thereto, it would be, I believe, in the process of expedition of the business of parliament if we could have these bills disposed of. I know there is opposition to them, and I am not at all objecting to that opposition; not in the slightest. But in my own humble way I commend to the house the necessity for getting these bills advanced one stage and off the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: How any girl ever refused you, after an appeal like that, I do not know.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had wished to draw to your attention something which I believed would be preliminary to any observations which might be made by other hon. members.

Mr. SPEAKER: Since the hon. member is the sponsor of the bill, it is his privilege to speak first.

Mr. MAYBANK: It was not exactly as mover of the motion that I desired to address the house. Rather it had been my intention to let the bill stand. However I did not hear Your Honour clearly when my name was used in the motion. There has been some confusion as to which should come first.

I had not intended to move the bill tonight, at all, but I do not know whether I am now in a position to withdraw it from the house. I have no desire to make an issue of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Go ahead.

Mr. MAYBANK: If, on the other hand, it is agreed that the bills should be presented tonight, I shall make a short statement with respect to them. I believe the house knows well my attitude with reference to these private divorce bills. For two or three years I have been introducing them, but definitely I am not in favour of the practice. I realize that, since I do not favour it, I could refrain from moving them. I do that, however, because I am chairman of the miscellaneous bills committee. It is not a rule of the house, nor indeed until a few years ago was it the practice, for the chairman of the miscellaneous bills committee to do as I have been doing for the last two or three years. I understand, however, that in the other place that has been the practice for many years.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with this?

Mr. MAYBANK: It has considerable to do with these divorce bills. As I say, I have followed that practice for the last three years, and I am willing to continue to do so, solely because it appears to be the desire of the house that divorce bills should be dealt with in this way.

I cannot express too strongly my opposition to this business of granting private divorces. This year a great many cases have passed in front of my eyes which I think would have been handled differently in the courts. I say that with all respect to the committee of the other house which is doing this business of hearing divorce cases. I think hon. gentlemen over there who are giving their time and attention to these cases are to be commended for the assiduity with which they prosecute the duties that have been put upon them; nevertheless I cannot help thinking a large number of these cases would be handled differently in a court of law.

As an illustration, this year a husband was the applicant in one case, while the wife was the applicant in another case based upon a set of circumstances that she alleged. Unquestionably in a court of law there would have been an examination into both petitions at the same time and the whole domestic trouble between the parties would have been dealt with then. However, under the procedure which we have in the House of Commons and in the other chamber the committee can deal only with the bill before us. The result was that one bill was passed and there was no occasion to pass the other, but we were in danger of being in the position of offering a bill to this house for acceptance in connection with which all the facts had not come out. Indeed, that was admitted. Our procedure makes that sort of thing possible.

I believe the best rule that this house could adopt for the future would be to declare that we will not pass private divorce bills. There might be a chance of some other satisfactory procedure being worked out if that were done.

Mr. REID: I doubt it.

Mr. MAYBANK: At any rate things could not be more unsatisfactory than they are. We are in the position apparently of the house not being willing to pass a general divorce law for the province of Quebec. That is the nub of the difficulty. What do we do then? We do not pass a general divorce law for Quebec, but we pass two or three hundred divorce laws for Quebec. There is no use in the people of Quebec saying that they do not have divorce in Quebec; they do. The only thing is that they get it in pieces; I mean little bits of legislation.

It seems to me that if a person wants to live in a place where there is no general law covering divorce that person should accept the place which he or she has chosen as his or her domicile. If Mrs. Richard Roe lives in Brazil and there is no general divorce law there, she would not run to the parliament of Brazil if she had a husband who was a philanderer and say, "I have a philandering husband; I want to start over again, perhaps with a new husband, and I wish you would give me relief." The parliament of Brazil would not do that. But this parliament will do that for people who live in Quebec. The parliament of Canada would not do that for a woman who came from Manitoba, Ontario, British Columbia or one of the other common law provinces. They would say to that woman, "You have a general law there that can handle this situation; we will not pass it." I am quite confident that if any of these bills were from one of the common law provinces we would not consider them because there is a general law for the common law provinces.

In effect, every one of these bills says that there is a philandering husband or a philandering wife, and the husband or the wife asks for relief, as the case may be. Year after year hours of senators and of members of the House of Commons, not to mention the possibility of the Chairman getting writer's cramp by having to sign his name to every section, are taken up with these bills. We cannot give adequate consideration to these matters. Even though we could give adequate consideration, I submit that this is a practice from which we ought to get away.

I have every respect for the fine people of Quebec. If they do not want a common divorce law, then they had better see to it that some other system is adopted. It is no use for hon. members from Quebec to say that they have no divorce law in the province of Quebec because they have a divorce law there. The only difference is that they get it in this sort of undercover way, and in using that word I am referring to the law, not to the acts that lead up to these bills. The law is pretty much under cover. As everybody knows, the criminal code forbids the publication of these senate cases. That is a bad thing in itself. One of the worst things you can have in connection with the administration of law is to have it administered in camera.

One of the cases we had before us was actually defended on the ground that there was connivance by the husband with respect to the adultery of his wife. It came out down in the basement over there from the evidence of one of these investigators that the husband who engaged him said, "Follow my wife and get the evidence; if you cannot get evidence, make evidence. Then come and tell your story but, of course, don't let on that you and I framed this proposition against her." This scoundrel actually went on to follow out the instructions the husband had given.

If that sort of thing occurred in a court the attorney general would take some action against that blackguard. But this man came before the parliamentary committee and told a story of that kind. No check-up could be made. When a divorce is granted, it is immediate; there is no waiting period in which to check up whether there has been perjury. There is no opportunity of checking a great many other things, whether there has been collusion and so on. The divorce is absolute the moment His Excellency gives royal assent to the bill. It is well known to me that there are numerous people just waiting for that word of His Excellency to get their licences to remarry. If any of these divorces are obtained improperly before these houses of parliament there is no possibility of correction open to anyone.

It seems to me that, despite the long history of the granting of divorces in this fashion, we ought to get away from it in another session of parliament.

With respect to the bills which are this evening before this chamber and with respect to the few more that are yet to come and go to the miscellaneous private bills committee, there is a peculiar set of circumstances that we have to take into consideration. I think I have made it abundantly clear that I am opposed to this procedure; yet I have to admit that on a vote on this question tonight I would have to vote that these bills should pass, just as I have sponsored them as a matter of duty as chairman. Of course the reason, if there were no other, that I would advocate their passing at the present time is that great numbers of people have been led to believe that they can get these divorces through these houses of parliament in this way, and it would be visiting upon them a severe punishment if we were to throw out these bills. Take any one of these bills and you can figure it out that, on the average, the applicant has not very much left out of a thousand dollars.

There is a large amount of money invested in all these divorce bills, and summarily to turn down these applicants after they have all presented their cases to the Senate would seem to me to be harsh. There would be no opportunity for redress for the many innocent people who have spent their money in moving thus far in the direction of obtaining a divorce, and I would regret greatly to see that happen to this large number of people.

But I think we ought to let future applicants know that this business has come to an end; that, so far as this manner of getting divorces is concerned, the honeymoon is over, to use an expression that is fairly common nowadays to indicate that a great change in conditions has occurred, a phrase that the Minister of Reconstruction used effectively once or twice in dealing with matters which came under his jurisdiction. It may not, of course, be appropriate to talk about a honeymoon in connection with this sort of thing; but the honeymoon is over, that is clear, and we should let the public of one province, because only one province is involved, know that this method of obtaining a divorce cannot be followed any longer.

I submit that the rule of the house should be changed which permits this kind of private bill to come in. One simple change would be that, instead of private bills of this sort coming in with a payment of whatever fee there is, the fee should hereafter be $25,000 or $50,000, or any other ridiculous sum of money to make it clear that they are not to come here at all. If they happen to pay nothing to the House of Commons but $200 to the Senate we could easily say that it will be $50,000, $60,000, $70,000, $80,000 or $90,000 for each petition. I have no friends who could get a divorce if they had to pay $90,000. I do not want a divorce, and if I did I could not get it at such a price. That is only one way to amend the rule.

We could amend the rule to say that whenever an application for divorce came in it had to come in within the first thirteen minutes of parliament meeting, or something like that, or we could simply pass a resolution that in the opinion of this house it is not desirable to continue the practice of granting divorces in this way.

Some of my friends from Quebec have said to me, "It is an odd thing, but down our way a great many people are asking how it comes about that you are always introducing these divorce bills. You have a sort of reputation down there for being strongly in favour of divorce, and more of it, and easier divorce. We try to tell them that that is not quite right but still the idea persists." I hope that after tonight every person will understand that I am engaged in this practice because up to now it had been the desire of the House of Commons—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Because it is a public duty.

Mr. MAYBANK: Yes, I have taken it in that way, that it is a public duty, and I hope that hereafter no person will think I am in favour of this method of granting divorces. I do not wish it to be understood that I am against divorce. On the contrary, I am in favour of divorce. I think there are marital difficulties which arise for which there is no other suitable solution than divorce. So far as I am concerned I would liberalize divorce. Divorce solely on the ground of adultery or some sexual perversion is demanding too much. It would be better if we went more, probably not wholly, in the direction of the English practice and liberalized our divorce laws. But my whole point is that, whatever the law is, it should be a general law administered by the courts, and not a specific law for every outraged spouse who wants to come around.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): I wish to take exception to some of the statements made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) on the ground, first, that I am not in favour of divorce; second, that the amount of money involved is not so important that we should do away with principles far greater than divorce bills, and, third, that our divorce law is voted by a large majority of members from the other provinces which give laws to the province of Quebec. That is abnormal and should be abolished. I agree with the hon. member on that point. I will go farther and say I think divorce should be abolished in the whole dominion. Every minister of the church, every priest has preached that divorce is a very bad thing; that it is a calamity, and that it should disappear. For half a century divorce has brought bad results in countries like the United States, Canada and Great Britain, and everybody agrees that it would be better to have no divorce, but nobody can say that we should abolish divorce. So, if we have to face the situation we have only to abolish the law by which divorces are granted and in that way we shall have peace.

(Translation):

As I glanced through the order paper this afternoon, I was pained to see the long list of divorce bills it contained. I counted 123 such bills which we are asked to pass tonight.

Economic problems of great import, particularly in this period of reconstruction, are discussed daily in this house. But let us not stop to consider only economic values, which are worth much less than moral and spiritual values. Therefore, I do not think I am exceeding my rights as a member of this house in emphasizing, for a few moments, the importance of spiritual values and marriage according to Christian precepts, and the abomination of divorce in a country such as ours.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that any country which accepts divorce is headed for decadence and ruin. I am not setting myself up as an authority. One need only read the great London and New York dailies, or some Canadian newspaper to realize that decadence threatens and disorders are rife in countries where divorces are mounting up. Statesmen gather around tables to pave the way for a just and lasting peace. They would establish a doctrine of love in the world and kill all germs of dissension. Unfortunately, they forget to protect the root of love in the home itself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARQUIS: Mr. Speaker, statesmen should in the first place direct their efforts and turn their minds to the upholding of this principle, in order to stabilize the home, to strengthen the family and to foster in our country as in other nations the establishment of a christian society, resting on solid ground and assured of future peace.

When France reached the highest pinnacle of intellectual and spiritual fame, when she filled the pages of her history with glorious conquests did France then draw her strength from divorce? No. When France suffered reverses, the sacred bonds of married love had been broken, the home had been overthrown and disorder had been gnawing at the heart and soul of the nation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARQUIS: Great Britain, which had always been a model of discipline, has also allowed divorce to become rampant. What happens today? Ministers of the gospel hold meetings to devise means of uprooting this poisonous plant which is threatening the Christian way of life in that country.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I am not saying anything new—but truths take on a stronger meaning in their application—when I say that divorce is doing an injustice not only to husbands and wives but to children as well. Recently I noticed in a newspaper the picture of a child, her mother and her grandmother. The court had decided that the child should be given out for adoption because her parents had been divorced; the mother remarried and the father was found unfit to look after the child who was only two years old. The picture showed the grandmother looking sadly at her daughter and her granddaughter, both unfortunate victims of this social evil.

Mr. Speaker, recently I read in a Montreal newspaper, Le Devoir, an article which dealt with statistics published by the Toronto Star, and I would like to quote a brief excerpt therefrom:

> Recently, the Toronto Star made a parallel between the United States and Canada from the point of view of divorce.
> In 1946, there were 2,300,000 weddings in the United States, which represents an increase of 680,000. On the other hand, divorces numbered 620,000, an increase of 118,000, or four divorces for every ten weddings.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): It is unbelievable.

Mr. MARQUIS:

> A comparative census shows that in 1932, there were four divorces for every 25 weddings.
> In Canada, states the Toronto Star, there were about four divorces for every 250 weddings in 1932, as against four divorces for every 85 weddings in 1945.

An hon. MEMBER: A tremendous average.

Mr. MARQUIS:

> Of course, the divorce to wedding ratio is not as alarming as in the United States, but divorces were five times as numerous in 1945 than in 1932 and the statistics for 1946 will show a further increase. In other words, the progression takes place at a faster rate here than among our neighbours.
> What is the explanation of this tendency in both countries? The gradual forsaking of sound principles . . . is no doubt responsible to a large extent. The war has also been an important factor. Hasty marriages, long separations and war-provoked circumstances have largely contributed to the increase in the divorce rate. The example given by Hollywood, both in real life and the films has been an influence. But, above all, divorce provokes more divorces. The more common it becomes, the less reprehensible it appears and the more frequent it is. What will this lead us to?

Mr. Speaker, one principle should never be forgotten: that marriage is the very foundation of human preservation and that it is a divine institution. I feel it my duty to state in this house that human laws can never supersede the dictates of God, nor abolish the hard-and-fast rules, nor modify them one whit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. MARQUIS: What was good long ago for the ancestors of those who advocate divorce, which allowed them to people the earth with sturdy and righteous men, should be equally good for those of their descendants who, at the present time, can no longer differentiate between licence and freedom, disorder and order, caprice and sound morals, immorality and morality. Let us not delude ourselves; we are facing quite a serious problem, and if we do not consider important matters on their merit and from their true angles, we shall grope in the dark on a course leading us to error. Marriage is assimilated to concubinage and people are told that if they have mistakenly contracted marriage it is up to the man or woman who has made that mistake, to make a fresh start. However those who after a first marriage, found that they had made a mistake, have married a second time. Seeing that they had made a second mistake, they married a third time, and then found out that they had been just as much mistaken the last time as the first. Moreover, we are asked to cover up that shame with our ridiculous legislation. How stupid! Divorce is condemned by all church authorities, Protestant or Catholic. Protestant denominations have repeatedly done so. I feel that in a country like ours divorce should be prohibited, for the sound reason that marriage is not a whim and does not exist for the mere satisfaction of husband and wife. Marriage is a divine institution whose purpose is the procreation of the generation which will come after us, which will develop this country and ultimately ensure the continuity of our traditions and our national heritage.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARQUIS: Mr. Speaker, I admit that my hon. friends have every right to hold different views, but there is quite a difference between an opinion and a principle, and as far as I am concerned, I consider that in such matters we should be governed by the principles proceeding from a divine source, which is the same for all religions which glorify God and for all countries where faith exists. The principle which we must uphold is the protection of marriage and the elimination of divorce. Besides, did not the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) admit it a few moments ago, when he said, there was no sense in this, that this legislation should be changed.

The province of Quebec has its own law as regards marriage. Section 185 of the civil code, which governs property and civil rights in our province, reads as follows:

185. Marriage is dissolved only through the natural death of the husband or wife; as long as they are both living, it is indissoluble.

In our province, the law says that marriage is indissoluble and that no legislation can annul it. Because, as Catholics and Christians, the husband and wife must live in conformity with the principles which have been the basis of their education, which must govern their lives and lead them toward the great beyond. It is not through a bill of the Canadian parliament that their status can be established from the standpoint of religion or family because this divorce law prevents their being arraigned for bigamy, and precludes any criminal proceedings.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that divorce legislation should be abolished in this country. The hon. members of the Senate are tired of hearing divorce cases. Many hon. members of this house, especially those from the province of Quebec, object to the passing of divorce bills. Catholics and even some hon. members of other denominations or from other provinces, whom I wish to congratulate, voted last year against some divorce bills. I respectfully submit that we should do away with divorce and leave each province free to settle marriage matters.

Finally, we have, at the present time, in the province of Quebec, a statute relating to marriage. Now, what is the effect of these divorce bills? The Quebec civil code is eluded. Indirect methods are countenanced of doing things which cannot be done directly. These acts are passed in the Canadian parliament and enforced in the province of Quebec, in spite of the opposition of its representatives. The time has come for these matters to be considered most seriously, for they constitute a vital problem for the country. Once for all, let us rid this house and parliament of the divorce problem.

Mr. Speaker, I wished to quote statistics. Unfortunately, the time allotted to me will not permit it. However, I want to refer to what the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) stated a few months ago, in connection with divorces in Canada:

In 1901 there were only 661 divorces in Canada, for a population of 5,300,000; in 1911, 1,530 actions were taken and in 1921, the number had climbed to 7,410. Between 1911 and 1921, a period similar to the present one, inasmuch as it was marked by an armed conflict, the troublous times resulted in a five-fold increase in the number of divorces, which climbed from 1,500 to 7,401. In 1941, divorces numbered 14,032 in our country compared to 7,441 in 1931. This is an increase of practically 100 per cent. On the strength of these figures, unless we endeavour to curb this tendency, if the five-fold increase in the number of divorces holds for the period 1941 to 1951 as for that of 1911 to 1921, 70,000 homes will have been broken in Canada in the ten years previous to 1951.

(Text):

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hour reserved for private bills having expired, the house will now revert to its business prior to six o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

ADDITION OF PART DEALING WITH HABITUAL CRIMINALS—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 364, to amend the criminal code—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock it was considering section 3 of the bill.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the minister in a position now to answer the question regarding this section, as to whether or not an amendment should be made to make this section applicable to an offence being committed in a place to which the public has or is permitted to have access, whether by licence or otherwise?

Mr. ILSLEY: The motion I propose is that section 3 be amended by striking out the words "any place other than a dwelling-house as defined in paragraph (g) of section three hundred and thirty-five" in lines 24, 25 and 26 on page 1, and substituting the following:

in or near any street, road or highway, or in any restaurant, railway station, public library, tavern, billiard hall, theatre, shop or other place to which the members of the public are admitted whether as a matter of right or otherwise . . .

Do hon. gentlemen think that is too broad, or what? Perhaps we could let this section stand while I have the amendment copied for the benefit of my hon. friend.

Section stands.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Culpable homicide murder in certain cases.

Mr. REID: Has the minister given any consideration, or will he give consideration, to the number of indecent assaults occurring in the various provinces? The suggestion is made that a crime of this kind is committed by a person who is mentally ill, and it is complained that when these men are sent to penitentiaries or reformatories the practices still continue in spite of the surveillance to which they are subject. My request to the minister is that the entire situation be reviewed with a view to segregating these offenders instead of having them mix with other prisoners.

Mr. ILSLEY: The matter to which the hon. gentleman has referred is being studied at the present time. I have taken note of the articles in the press, the resolutions that have been passed on this subject, and the scientific arguments that have been advanced. We are in communication with the Department of National Health and Welfare on the matter, and I can promise the hon. gentleman that the matter will continue to receive most careful and intensive consideration.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Proviso.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I quite realize the circumstances under which this amendment is being introduced, but I question whether it is not going too far in placing the onus upon the accused. The principle of common law is, of course, that the onus must always rest upon the crown. The amendment reads as follows:

. . . any person who while intoxicated or under the influence of any narcotic occupies the seat ordinarily occupied by a person driving a motor vehicle shall be deemed to have the care and control of the said motor vehicle unless the said person establishes that he did not enter or mount the said vehicle for the purpose of setting it in motion.

I can appreciate the reason for the amendment, because certain judges have held that a person sitting behind the wheel of a car that is not in motion is not driving that car, nor has he any control over it. I rise only for the purpose of pointing out that in accepting this departure from the major principle of criminal law, namely that the onus rests upon the crown, I hope the minister does not take it as a precedent to remove that safeguard, which is of the essence of British criminal law, as far as other sections are concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: When I have more time I want to give the house the long list of sections in the criminal code where the onus is shifted in circumstances something like these, and to point out that if this were not the case, law enforcement would be impossible. I realize the validity of the underlying general principle, and that it should not be interfered with except in the case of necessity, and, generally speaking, where the means of proof are peculiarly with the defendant.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In the knowledge of the defendant.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is the general principle. Perhaps it does not apply in every case; but in this instance, as I think the hon. member appreciates, no injustice can be done.

Mr. MILLER: Does the minister not think perhaps this amendment will encourage a drunken driver to keep on driving in an endeavour to get home? It seems to me that if a man is driving a car and realizes that he is drunk the proper thing for him to do is to pull over to the side of the road and sleep it off instead of trying to get home. It seems to me that, under this amendment, once a man has started to drive while in that condition, he is guilty of this offence, and, knowing that, he will try to carry on until he gets home, whereas what he should do when he finds he cannot handle the car is to get to the side of the road and sleep it off.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is taking the case of an intelligent man who finds himself getting a little too drunk to drive. All he has to do is to pull over to the side of the road and get out of the driver's seat.

Mr. GRAYDON: How intelligent is he when he is too drunk to drive?

Mr. ILSLEY: If he is intelligent enough to realize it, he is pretty intelligent.

Mr. FRASER: I wonder why the minister does not include the driver of a motor boat in this section. I say that because at many summer resorts people get into motor boats and ride around in circles near people in canoes, and cause a great deal of trouble. There should be a stiff penalty for anything of that kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe the suggestion of the hon. gentleman is worth looking into. I have had no representations about drunken drivers of motor boats; I did not know there were any.

Mr. FRASER: That has happened at many places throughout the country, and I do not think there is any law to protect those in other boats. If these drunken drivers get into the ship channel then the Minister of Transport has a law for them, but if they get into the bay or out of the channel there is nothing to protect other people.

Mr. LESAGE: Suppose this motor boat driver realizes he is drunk; what should he do? He cannot park on the side of the road. Should he jump in the lake?

Mr. CHURCH: Notwithstanding the heavy loss of life, we have yet to provide a section dealing adequately with this offence. As the chief analyst for the Ontario government has said, eighty per cent of the accidents on our highways are caused by people who are not fit to drive their cars because of the intoxicants they have taken. It is all very well to talk about those who are in charge of a car. Some people sleep in their cars. Recently in my own city they have moved all the cars off the downtown streets and put them on the waterfront. Others sleep in trailers, which they are trying to move now to make room for the sick children's hospital. This section has not been strengthened at all. The proposed amendment will cause far more confusion than there has been under the existing law. The appalling fatal accidents and injuries from highway motor traffic are mounting steadily night and day. Every highway in Canada is coloured red with the slaughter. The loss in men, women and children, as well as the economic loss, is deplorable.

Several months ago, when I proposed an amendment somewhat similar to this one the minister showed a great deal of sympathy. Many of these accidents are caused by failure to exercise care and judgment on the part of those who drive these deadly, menacing machines. Nothing has contributed so much as the motor car to the education and enjoyment of the public. But, like every other great invention, and as in connection with medicine, science, physics and chemistry, use is one thing and abuse is another. Because of the abuse of the motor car in Canada today, we read in our newspapers every day about these casualties. On Dominion day, Tuesday of this week, there were seventy-five casualties, some of which were from drowning, but the great majority from the use of motor cars.

I hope that something may be done under this provision to remove this public scandal. Every highway is coloured red with slaughter, and nothing has been done, so far as I can see in this section, to cure the disease. The total list of those killed and injured on the highways of England, the United States and Canada during the six years of the war was almost equal to the number of casualties of those killed and injured in the war.

I have referred to this matter on many occasions, and I shall not occupy more of the time of the committee this evening. I do not say anything by way of criticism of the minister or of his deputy, because the minister has indeed a most able deputy at the present time, a man who has the advantage of having come from Toronto. The deputy minister of justice, Mr. Varcoe, K.C., C.M.G., was educated at Harbord collegiate, which has produced some great men, including Sir Edward Beatty, Beverley Baxter, Garfield Weston and others.

I call to the minister's attention the recommendations of chief justices, judges and magistrates and the law courts, the bar association, the chief constables' association and others for the cure of this disease. I doubt very much that the changing of a few words here and there will obtain the object the minister has in mind, because anyone can say now, "I did not intend to drive the car, no matter where I was sitting", and he will get the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like the minister to tell us in what way he thinks he is strengthening the section, or in what way it is better than the original one. It states:

(4) Everyone who, while intoxicated or under the influence of any narcotic, drives any motor vehicle or automobile, or has the care or control of a motor vehicle or automobile, whether it is in motion or not, shall be guilty of an offence.

Surely that section is as clear as it can be. If the accused person has the care or control he is guilty, whether it is in motion or not. I know a court has decided that if it was not in motion and the man was drunk there was nothing to show that he had it under his control.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. McMASTER: But I cannot see how we have made it any stronger by this amendment. The way it is now, the only difference it makes is that the onus is thrown upon a man, and it must have been on him before.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. McMASTER: He was guilty if he was sitting in the car.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. McMASTER: In the amendment the only difference is that he can get up and say that he did not enter the vehicle to set it in motion. He may have had it in motion, and may have stopped a moment. He may have been under the influence, but if he says he did not mount it for the purpose of starting it he is free. It should be stronger than that, if we are ever to get a court to make a conviction.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only way to make it stronger is to leave out the concluding words, "unless the said person establishes that he did not enter or mount the said vehicle for the purpose of setting it in motion." If we leave off those words we expose a person who accidentally, in a drunken stupor, gets into a car to go to sleep, or something of that kind. He is left open to a conviction. That person never did have the control of the car, and he should be given an opportunity of showing that he did not enter the car or get on the motorcycle, if a motorcycle is involved, for the purpose of setting it in motion, and that he was not in the car for that purpose at all. That should be a defence to such a person.

But if those words are left off everyone would be subject to conviction.

Mr. McMASTER: Those words were not in the old act. If he was in it, whether it was in motion or not, he was supposed to be guilty of the offence.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. ILSLEY: No, with deference, I think the hon. member is wrong. Before this amendment, if his state of intoxication were sufficiently advanced the courts in many of the provinces held he did not have control of the motor vehicle. It is no longer open to an accused person to defend himself on those grounds. The early words in this proviso take that defence away from him. But they leave a defence to a person who, having got into the car for the purpose of setting it in motion, goes to sleep.

Mr. McMASTER: It takes away a defence that was not very strong and gives him a defence that is strong.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MILLER: I return to the point I tried to make a moment ago. It seems to me that a man who is drunk and stops his car on the side of the road for the same purpose, namely to sleep it off, should be in just as strong a position as the drunken man who got into the car, not intending to start off with it. The other man got into the car with the intention of driving it. He does drive it for a distance and finds he is incapable of doing so. Therefore he wisely drives off to the side of the road. I say he should be protected just as much as the drunken man who gets in but does not start the car at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member's argument leads to this conclusion, that we should not change the section at all. Perhaps we should not. But certainly we have been severely criticized by the courts for not changing it. There is a recent judgment of a judge in the supreme court of New Brunswick which is most caustic in its reference to the lawmakers. The reason is obvious.

If persons accused of driving a car while intoxicated can go into a court and say, "I was too drunk to be guilty," it shocks the public; indeed it shocks us all, I believe.

Mr. MILLER: I hold no brief for the drunken driver; I hate him. I do not like defending them, either in court or in parliament. But I believe that if we are giving a break to the man who gets in and does not start the car, the man who uses his head and, when he finds he is drunk, is wise enough to stop, should be protected possibly more than the other chap.

Mr. HACKETT: I am going to suggest that the words which have been used to indicate that the man entered the automobile be changed. It does not seem to me that it makes much difference what his purpose was on entering the automobile, so long as he was in it without the intention of setting it in motion. The words now are:

Provided that any person who while intoxicated or under the influence of any narcotic occupies the seat ordinarily occupied by a person driving a motor vehicle shall be deemed to have the care or control of the said motor vehicle unless the said person establishes that he did not enter or mount the said vehicle.

If the words "enter or mount" were changed to the words, "unless he establish that he was not in the said vehicle" he would then be in the position in which I think the minister wants him to be. It would enable a person to show that, having entered an automobile with the intention of setting it in motion, he had not done so, or, having done so, had ceased to keep it in motion. I would think that change would enable the person to set up a defence which might exculpate him in circumstances where he would necessarily be condemned if he had entered the car with the intention of setting it in motion, whether he did or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may logically be so, but would it not really mean that the section would become unenforceable. An accused person could step up and swear, "It is true I was in the car; it is true I was behind the wheel; it is true I was driving the car, or I entered it with the intention of driving it, but there came a time when I did not intend to drive it any more. I was drunk behind the wheel of the car; I had been driving it, but I stopped driving it and I did not intend to start the car again." I do not think he should get off under those circumstances.

Mr. HACKETT: Nor do I. If he said that he would be guilty.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not under the amendment suggested by the hon. gentleman. His suggestion is that the section be amended so that it will read, "unless the said person establishes that he is not in the said vehicle for the purpose of setting it in motion." That would enable him to say, "True, I got in for that purpose and I drove it; I was drunk at the time and drunk before I got in, but there came a time when I decided not to drive it any more. I am testifying to that; nobody can deny that was my state of mind and, therefore, I am not guilty." That man ought to be held to be guilty.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not going to carry the argument much farther, but I do not think my suggestion lends itself to that interpretation. If a man were driving a car I do not think it would be open to him to say that it was not his intention to do so. What I am endeavouring to do is to protect the person who, having entered a car with the intention of driving it, was not driving it, in that it was still at the moment of the collision or whatever happened.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman suggesting that he never drove it, that he entered the car and did not drive it at any time?

Mr. HACKETT: He may have driven it, but he had ceased to drive it. As I interpret this amendment, it merely means that the man having entered the vehicle for the purpose of setting it in motion, a situation is created from which he cannot escape. My suggestion is that, having entered it with the intention of setting it in motion, if he ceases to keep it in motion, then he may escape.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is a bit fine spun to incorporate into legislation. If a man is drunk and gets in a car, while he is behind the wheel of that car I think he comes within the spirit of the original section which was that he should be convicted if he had the care and control of the car while intoxicated. It should not be open to him to say, "I was too drunk to be said to have the car under my control even though I was sitting behind the wheel." It should not be open to him to be able to say that.

Mr. HACKETT: My suggestion was not that he be able to avail himself of the suggestion set forth by the minister.

Mr. MILLER: Is there any other section in the criminal code under which a man may be convicted of an offence when, under the statute, he is guilty only of the intention to commit an offence? That is what this amendment does. If a man gets in a car and intends to drive it and does not drive it, under this amendment he is guilty of an offence although he is guilty actually of only the intention to commit an offence.

Mr. ILSLEY: He is not to be convicted of intent only; he is being convicted of intent plus the act. The act is taking custody of a car, being in the car, having the car under his care and control while he is drunk, plus the intent of setting the car in motion after he got into it.

Mr. CHURCH: The explanatory note to this section states that the amendment is made following recent court decisions to the effect that a driver may be too drunk to have the care or control of a motor vehicle. There is a great need for a drastic revision of this particular section which is amending subsection 4 of section 285, as enacted by section 6 of chapter 11 of the statutes of 1930. Professor Jocelyn Rodgers, medico-legal expert of Ontario and of the attorney general's department, a gentleman who has been giving evidence all over the province in connection with this section, says it is not the drunken driver who is the greatest menace—he is, as a rule, quite harmless—it is the man who drives in a state of slight conviviality with enough alcohol to give him a little exhilarated feeling and inspires him to take a chance at a time when that amount of alcohol will slow down the action of his brain and nerve cells so that when a crisis arises he cannot act quickly.

The railroads have a rule, known as rule G, which forbids any employee to touch alcoholic beverages while on duty. That rule states that a man driving a railroad engine should have no alcohol in his system. The same provision should certainly apply to the driver of a motor car, which is a more dangerous instrument of destruction. In some cases this has been provided by amendments to the law with regard to vendors.

I should like to quote from a letter which I received from the Reverend John Coburn, who has been writing to the government for many years in connection with this matter. In this letter he referred to the evidence which had been given by Professor Jocelyn Rodgers, to which I referred a moment ago. A decision was given by a police magistrate in Mimico and also by two or three other judges, which is referred to in the explanatory note to this section. This gentleman, the Reverend John Coburn of Toronto, goes on to say, in his letter to the minister and to members of the house, as follows:

> I think you will recognize that the police officers are up against an immense task. Magistrates and judges often seem to think that unless a man is drunk he has not committed a violation of the law. This is entirely erroneous. Some states in the union have passed a law making a blood test compulsory. According to Doctor Rodger's estimate, liquor is killing 5 people and injuring 84 every week on the highways of Ontario alone.

I believe he gave that evidence recently. I am very doubtful if this law goes far enough. The public want some better law provisions.

Mr McMASTER: The minister is dealing with the case of a person occupying a certain seat in a motor vehicle. All the accused has to do is to establish that he did not enter the seat for the purpose of setting the vehicle in motion. He might have been sober when he entered the seat, and his excuse might be that someone gave him a little liquor and that it went to his head. I suggest that he should establish, not that he did not "enter or mount the said vehicle" but that he did not "occupy the seat." You are referring previously to his occupying the seat. Why go back to the time he entered it, which may have been an hour before?

Mr. ILSLEY: You would never convict. They would say that they changed their minds about driving the car any longer.

Mr. McMASTER: They must get behind the wheel.

Mr. ILSLEY: If he is behind the wheel and is drunk the car is under his control.

Mr. McMASTER: I suggest that the intention is to make the law stronger. Then why not use the appropriate words?

Mr. CROLL: I rather agree with the hon. member. The man not only must have the car under his care and control, but must actually be occupying the seat if he is behind the wheel. Those three things are necessary. It must be part and parcel of the offence.

Mr. FAIR: It seems strange that you should have one set of government officials selling liquor to a man and another set of government officials convicting him because he is drunk. Why not fix up the sales of liquor rather than arrest and convict and fine a man or hang him if he injures or kills anybody after drinking?

Mr. MILLER: In Manitoba they have watered the liquor down to about fifty per cent.

Mr. MANROSS: What clause protects us from the backseat driver?

Section agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, an amendment was moved to clause 3, and the hon. member for Lake Centre wished to see a copy of the amendment.

On section 3—Causing a disturbance.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think the amendment suggested by the minister covers the point that I raised this afternoon. It provides that you only commit the offence of creating a disturbance, in other words a clamour, if you are at or near any street, road or highway, or in any restaurant, railway station, public library, tavern, billiard hall, theatre, shop or other place to which members of the public are admitted whether as a matter of right or otherwise. I think that brings it strictly within the rule in the Benson case, and it does do one thing: it protects members of parliament from now on from being liable for any offence under the section as originally drawn.

Mr. McMASTER: This bill is to protect the public, and it does seem a little easier to get the minister to lighten the burden on the public than to make it stronger. You cannot possibly cover every place by specifying them all. I can think of a noise being made in an automobile. I do not see why a man should make a big noise in his own house. This government will keep a good man out of his own house and will not let a bad man be turned out of somebody else's house.

Mr. HARTT: Why not read the clause first and speak afterwards?

Mr. McMASTER: I still think the amendment weakens the clause. A man should not be allowed to create a disturbance in his own house. In Toronto if you telephone the police and say that there is an awful noise next door, unless you can prove that there is somebody almost being murdered the police will say, "That is going on in his own house". The public have a right to be protected against a disturbance.

Sections 11 and 12 agreed to.

On section 13—"Dwelling-house".

Mr. FRASER: Will this clause not have to be changed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wish to make a suggestion in regard to section 13. I do not know whether the draftsman in drafting this section had before him a case that took place in Saskatchewan in reference to having liquor in a dwelling-house. There the definition was very much the same as here, and it was held that a room in a hotel did not constitute a dwelling-house. I would suggest that the amendment does not exactly cover what the minister had in mind. What harm would there be in adding, in order to ensure certainty, words somewhat to this effect: "without restricting the generality of the foregoing shall be deemed to include a room or rooms in a hotel or house." Once you define it as it now is, I am little afraid that some judge might hold that it does not cover what the minister has in mind, namely, hotel rooms. I make that suggestion because I know of a case under the liquor act—I sent out for it but did not get the right volume—in which the person was charged with having liquor in a hotel room. The question of the definition of "dwelling-house" came up, and the appellant won his appeal because the definition of "dwelling-house" was not sufficiently explicit.

Mr. ILSLEY: It certainly was intended to cover a hotel room which was occupied as a permanent or temporary residence. I was a little concerned about getting too far away from what I assumed was the common law. This is a change of definition of part VII of the criminal code. That is the part that deals with offences against rights of property and rights arising out of contracts and offences connected with trade. This has the effect of making theft in a hotel bedroom a much more serious offence than it has been heretofore, because if we have properly drafted the section it will hereafter be the same as theft in a dwelling-house. That is, the offence carries twice the punishment or something like that. I do not think there would be any objection to making it explicit if it is necessary. I doubt whether it is necessary. It has been drafted at the request of one of the provinces where there is considerable trouble with this kind of theft.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Was it drafted in that form by the province which submitted it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot say exactly. They did not refer explicitly to hotel bedrooms; they used general language. The deputy thinks it is just as it came to us.

Section agreed to.

Sections 14 and 15 agreed to.

On section 16—Tampering and interfering with fire extinguishers or equipment.

Mr. FRASER: This section reads:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment, or to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to both such imprisonment and fine, who wilfully damages or interferes with any fire protection or fire safety equipment or device so as to render it inoperative or ineffective.

There should be a period after the word "device", because if a person interferes with any fire equipment he certainly ought to get the full penalty. There should be no half-way measure.

Mr. ILSLEY: If they knock some enamel off or something like that?

Mr. FRASER: They would not do that wilfully.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they would.

Mr. FRASER: The section says "wilfully damages or interferes".

Mr. ILSLEY: Suppose they did some damage to it mischievously but so as not to affect the working of it at all?

Mr. FRASER: If they do it mischievously it is not wilful.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: In a case like that, no. There should be the full penalty on this, because I know one case where a person did not interfere with the apparatus so that it would not work; but he disconnected the end of the hose so that when the fire hose was pulled out the other end was not connected; it took four or five minutes to connect it, and a lot of damage was done in the meantime. This person would not be guilty under this section, because the apparatus was still operative although they disconnected it. There should be a period after the word "device".

Mr. LESAGE: There is something in what has been said. If the offence is small justice will be satisfied with a small fine.

Mr. HARTT: I respectfully submit to the hon. gentleman who proposes that the sentence should stop at the word "device" and leave out the words "inoperative or ineffective", that it would mean the person who caused the mischief had not caused any damage; because, unless the instrument is made inoperative or unless the act complained of interferes with the working of the apparatus, no person can be held responsible and liable for something that he has not damaged.

Mr. FRASER: He has damaged it.

Mr. HARTT: If a man just touches a machine and a malevolent complainant wishes to take him before the courts and says that this man has tampered with a fire apparatus the judge has no alternative and no discretion but must condemn him to one year's imprisonment or a fine of $500.

Mr. LESAGE: No; that is the maximum.

Mr. HARTT: I am not bargaining with the committee. What I say is that the judge has no option if it is proved that the mischievous person has committed an offence. If he has not made the machine inoperative; if the machine is still working he has caused no damage and has not interfered with the working of the fire apparatus. I submit that the only time a person can be held liable for an offence is when the offence is committed. As a matter of fact, when no injury is caused no offence is committed.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. gentleman has tried to put up a case, but I still say that a fire apparatus, no matter where it is, is sacred.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER: It really is. It is protection of life and should not be touched.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FRASER: The minister has not given his decision.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would be a little worried about taking these words out, on the ground that we ought to be careful when we create a crime that we are dealing with something that should be made a crime. "Wilful" means "intentional"; that is all. Technically, wilfully interfering with fire protection or fire safety equipment or devices would include the moving of some apparatus, and might technically come within the wording of the section even though the person did not intend to render it inoperative or ineffective. In other words, if these words come out it would include slight damage which did not render the apparatus inoperative or ineffective, and it might mean just moving it around or something of that kind.

Mr FRASER: There is some fire apparatus that you can put out of operation by just moving it around.

Mr. HARTT: Then it is inoperative.

Mr. FRASER: All right; I should like to see these words taken out.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some fire marshals' association suggested this wording. I do not like to create crimes unless the act is in its nature criminal. Before we pass this section, I wish to say to the committee a word about the explanatory note opposite the preceding section. I have been informed that the explanatory note is incorrect. The note says that the court of appeal of Ontario quashed a conviction on certain grounds. The conviction was not quashed on the grounds set out in the explanatory note. That is immaterial from the point of view of the section. In my judgment the amendment is still a meritorious one. I have been informed, one might say officially, that that explanatory note is incorrect; that the grounds set out were not the grounds on which the conviction was quashed. I do not believe that written reasons were given.

Mr. CHURCH: With reference to section 16, the amendment is not necessary for this reason. The criminal code provides for the wilful destruction of certain classes of public and private property. That is provided for already. From the records I have of our own city and others, as well as schools—and it applies in other places as well—except on Hallowe'en there has been very little tampering with the safety devices set out in the explanatory note to this section. The note says:

> Its purpose is to make it an offence for anyone to tamper or interfere with fire extinguishers or equipment in or on any premises which would render it inoperable in the event of a fire.

That is the proposal now put into section 16. I suggest that far more damage has been done, as any school board can tell you, certainly in our large cities, damage amounting to anywhere from $15,000 to $20,000, I am told, by children throwing stones at hydro electric lights and globes. It runs into a large sum of money. The same complaint comes from other cities. I have seen reports in one paper about the destruction here in Ottawa, to a lesser degree. I think for more damage is caused in that way, but school boards and community clubs are checking on it.

As regards fire calls, I think the fine of $500 is too much. For the most part it will be found that juveniles are at fault, especially on October 31, Hallowe'en, and offences of this sort also follow every war. There is always wilful destruction of public property. The Addington administration faced the same problem as far back as 1801. I would ask the minister whether he has had any recommendation from the fire chiefs in this regard.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: Nevertheless I think the penalty is severe, a year and $500. Surely the police can stop this without such a penalty. Damage has been done also to some public buildings. I know that, from the insurance rates having been marked up, because of fire protection not being ample. There has been damage to some of the public departments, to schools and public institutions by reason of such interference with fire equipment or fire boxes. A few minutes' delay in getting to a fire might result in a heavier loss. I know this is a serious matter, but I think the penalty is too great because most or some of the offenders are juveniles.

I suggest that there should be some other remedy with regard to wilful destruction of globes, and interference with direct currents and primary and secondary lines of electricity, and fire and police electric boxes on highways. Often lights go out on street cars and in subways because someone interferes with a pole or globe or with conditions around plants, or right of way, or on overhead and all that kind of thing. The minister says he has had recommendations from the fire chiefs association?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: Many of them?

Mr. ILSLEY: Several.

Mr. CHURCH: I still think the penalty is too severe, and it is dangerous to imprison for this in the case of juveniles who cannot shell out.

Mr. BROOKS: It occurred to me that if, as suggested by the hon. member for Peterborough West, a period is put after "device", it means that a mischievous boy ringing in a false fire alarm would be subject to a $500 fine or imprisonment.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: Would that not be a severe penalty?

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Would this allow anyone to fool around with fire equipment, take it away and bring it back, as long as it was not damaged or rendered inoperative or ineffective?

Mr. ILSLEY: If he has it at home it is inoperative and ineffective.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: It seems to me that a parallel case would be to allow a man to use a rifle to shoot at somebody else and it would be all right as long as the bullet did not hit him.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Section repealed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the reason for the repeal of subsection 7 of section 554?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been redundant since 1941. It is a little complicated.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it only a case of redundancy?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—"judge" defined.

Mr. JAENICKE: This is the important section of the amendments before us. As I understand it, if a person is convicted of an indictable offence and has been indicted three times previously of an offence for which he was liable to imprisonment for over five years, he can be tried by the same court as an habitual criminal, and apparently the only evidence necessary to find him such, either by judge or by judge and jury, is that, since attaining the age of eighteen, he has at least three times previously been convicted of the crime charged in the indictment, and for which he was liable to five years' imprisonment.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not quite right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is the question of leading a criminal life.

Mr. JAENICKE: That all has to be proved, and then the court, according to section 575B, if it is of the opinion that, by reason of his criminal habits and mode of life, it is expedient for the protection of the public, may pass a further indeterminate sentence. Suppose he is tried by a judge and jury. He will be tried by the same court, judge and jury, for being an habitual criminal, and all the jury has to determine is whether he has been three times convicted. The question of his mode of life and criminal habits is for the judge to decide, according to my interpretation of this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. JAENICKE: I may be wrong, but that is my interpretation of it. I would suggest to the minister that something else be included in line 30 after "mode of life", or in line 29 after "criminal habits". Would his attitude toward accepted standards of morality be taken into consideration? I should like the minister to consider that point.

Mr. CROLL: Perhaps the minister can answer a number of questions at the same time. Might I direct his attention to subsection 2 on page 7:

> In any indictment under this section it shall be sufficient, after charging the crime, to state that the offender is a habitual criminal.

As I think the minister knows, if perchance the man is tried before a jury and he does not see fit to give evidence, it is the custom for the jury to take the indictment with them into the jury room, and on reading the indictment they see immediately that he is an habitual criminal. I submit that we are prejudicing the case of the man who is being tried, and I do not think it is the minister's desire to do that. You are giving information that would not ordinarily be obtained. That is my reading of the section. I do not know what others make of it, but in that way he may be three times the loser, much too quickly under that method of procedure.

Mr. HEON: It would be equivalent to reading the criminal record of the accused before he was found guilty.

[Mr. Jaenicke.]

Mr. CROLL: I am suggesting that the man does not enter the box and there is no way of the jury knowing. They would have nothing before them except the evidence. But it is mentioned in the indictment that he is a habitual criminal.

Mr. CROLL: That is my point.

Mr. JAENICKE: That is what I say; it would inform a jury that a man had a criminal record, before he was found guilty.

Mr. CROLL: Quite; that is my suggestion.

Mr. McMASTER: It has been suggested that the minister answer all the questions at once, and I should like to know if the records show that there ever was such a person, who has been convicted four times of indictable offences and punished with sentences of at least five years. If there are such people, how many are there?

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us take the questions one by one. In the first place, the hon. member for Kindersley asked a question. If the case is tried by a judge with a jury, before a man can be convicted of being a habitual criminal the jury must find not only that he has been convicted three times previously of offences for which he was liable to at least five years' imprisonment, but also that he is persistently leading a criminal life.

Mr. JAENICKE: With all due respect, I do not think the section says that.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister has been in charge of the department for only a short time, but I should think that already—

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish the hon. member for Kindersley would elaborate his point, because he has a different understanding of it.

Mr. JAENICKE: Section 575C says:

> A person shall not be found to be a habitual criminal unless the judge or jury as the case may be, finds on evidence . . .

There is only one condition there as to what they have to find.

Mr. ILSLEY: Read it.

Mr. JAENICKE:

> (a) that since attaining the age of eighteen years he has at least three times previously to the conviction of the crime charged in the indictment, been convicted of an indictable offence for which he was liable to at least five years' imprisonment, whether any such previous conviction was before or after the passing of this part and that he is leading persistently a criminal life . . .

Mr. ILSLEY: "And that he is leading persistently a criminal life."

Mr. JAENICKE: That is all they have to find.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I say, and that is plenty.

Mr. JAENICKE: I would suggest, as I did before, that there should be evidence of his mental attitude toward our accepted standards of morality.

Mr. ILSLEY: Too indefinite; too vague.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I want to refer to subsection 4 of section 575C. We are setting up machinery to punish—

Mr. ILSLEY: Would my hon. friend just defer his remarks for a moment, until I clean up these other questions?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thought the minister was going to answer all the questions at once.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps that is what I should do, but I will try to answer them as we go along. The hon. member for Spadina raised the point that this prejudices the fair trial of the accused, because the indictment will have on its face the charge that the offender is a habitual criminal in addition to the charge concerning the offence for which he is being tried. I was not aware of the practice to which the hon. gentleman refers; that is, of handing the jury the indictment. I should have thought the accused would be arraigned on the offence for which he was being tried and, after that matter was settled, without any knowledge on the part of the jury of the other charge, that then and only then would he be charged with the other charge, and it would be dealt with. This is the language used in the English statute. I will read it, so that there will be no doubt. This is the prevention of crime act, 1908, and section 10(3) is in these words:

In any indictment under this section it shall be sufficient, after charging the crime, to state that the offender is a habitual criminal.

(4) In the proceedings on the indictment the offender shall in the first instance be arraigned on so much only of the indictment as charges the crime, and if on arraignment he pleads guilty or is found guilty by the jury, the jury shall, unless he pleads guilty to being a habitual criminal, be charged to inquire whether he is a habitual criminal, and in that case it shall not be necessary to swear the jury again:

I think we have followed that language here.

Mr. CROLL: But I think the deputy minister will tell the minister that the procedure followed in this province is that the indictment must go with the jury into the jury room. That is the common practice, so that it becomes a serious matter. You might let the section stand to look it up and see what may be the answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As a matter of fact, if the indictment were handed to the jury with the record of three convictions on it and the accused had not testified, the conviction would be quashed because evidence of bad character would have been before the jury, which would be fatal.

Mr. CROLL: But that is what this provides.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not say I disagree with my hon. friend, but I do not think any judge would allow an indictment to go to the jury upon which appeared the record of previous convictions.

Mr. LESAGE: No crown prosecutor would do it, anyway.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is only a matter of procedure in any event, and I submit that it would be a simple matter of directing the attention of the courts to the fact that such a course should not be followed; and it is not being ratified by the passing of this bill in its present form because it is only a matter of procedure. Today there are cases where the penalty is larger because of a previous conviction. In certain types of obtaining under false pretences the penalty provided is larger on a second offence. So this is what is done. That is inserted in the indictment and not read at the time of the arraignment of the prisoner. Then, when the jury retires, invariably the judge directs the attention of the crown prosecutor to the fact that the indictment contains the record of a previous conviction, and that portion of the indictment is deleted and the indictment, with only the charge in it, is handed to the jury.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am pleased to have that information. Another hon. member has brought to my attention the provisions of section 851 of our criminal code. It is a long section, but perhaps I had better read it, because it is a precedent for this type of section:

In any indictment for an indictable offence, committed after a previous conviction or convictions for any indictable offence or offences, or for any offence or offences, for which a greater punishment may be inflicted by reason of such previous conviction, it shall be sufficient, after charging the subsequent offence, to state that the offender was at a certain time and place, or at certain times and places, convicted of an indictable offence or offences, or of an offence or offences, as the case may be, and to state the substance and effect only, omitting the formal part of the indictment and conviction, or of the summary conviction, as the case may be, for the previous offence or offences, without otherwise describing the previous offence or offences.

So, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out, certain indictments contain reference to previous convictions, and apparently the courts find no difficulty in preventing that fact from prejudicing the fair trial of the accused.

Mr. McIVOR: I do not know a great deal about law, but I must confess that I am afraid of this amendment. It seems to indicate that, no matter what influence is brought to bear on a man's life, he is not capable of change. I should like to think that no one is so depraved that he cannot be changed for the better.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is contemplated under the section is that habitual offenders will be placed under preventive detention, on an indeterminate sentence, but that their conduct will be reviewed by the Minister of Justice. The minister must keep in touch with that man's conduct, and provision is made therefor in the section. He must review at least every three years and, as a matter of fact, a review will be made by the remissions branch more often than that. The sentence is not a life sentence, necessarily. It contemplates release, if a man reforms.

Mr. McIVOR: That is good.

Mr. CHURCH: I should have thought that, in respect of this innovation which the minister brings to the house for the first time, he might better have waited until he saw the results of his prison reform programme. I would point out to the committee that we have had a report with respect to prison reform before us for many years, but nothing was done about it until about two years ago when the minister took office. He has appointed an officer for this purpose.

Would it not be better, when adopting a new system of this kind, which may be upset by the courts later on, to wait until we see what the results will be of the proposals for prison reform? In the first place, the minister has appointed a chief inspector and deputy minister, and he has made a report. A bill was passed only a few days ago in this connection. We should wait to see the development of the penal institutions being conducted. After every great war, there has always been a wave of crime and of suggestions with respect to these institutions.

One of the cardinal principles of Magna Carta is that the people shall have a large share in the administration of criminal justice. Whether these institutions are rightly or wrongly managed, the fact is that they are managed by crown officers, and the public have no right to enter them. Boards of visitors consist of members of the House of Commons and of the Senate, and the heads of the provinces, lieutenant governors and others. But how many of them have made visits to those institutions in the last few years? I was told by one warden that he has not seen a single soul.

Yet we go to work and, in one sweep, we pass this new section. I say those who are habitual offenders are the victims of a vicious, half-baked system. We have never had a real system of prison reform in Canada; it is a relic of the middle ages. Many of the provincial, municipal and dominion institutions were started before confederation against all known laws of public hygiene. We should wait to see what the results of prison reform, so far on paper, will be. As I have said, "Abandon hope all ye who enter here" should be placed over the whole of them. I have seen some of those institutions. I am familiar with the one at Guelph, from criticism of Ontario's court of appeal. The city of Toronto has spent large sums of money to help this type of offender. In 1912 it spent a large sum of money in connection with the establishment of a farm for young men on Yonge Street, and in 1914, on one at Concord, in West York, three miles away, for women. Then, in this connection we must think of the Mercer reformatory for girls and women; which was established in 1866, a long time ago.

How can we expect anyone placed in institutions like those not to be a habitual offender. In our prison system in Canada we are twenty-five years behind the old country, so far as prison reform is concerned. We have never had any up-to-date, national Borstal system.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, we have in British Columbia.

Mr. CHURCH: To a large extent the officials are appointed, and it is proposed by the hon. member for Lake Centre to transfer them so that they will come under the civil service commission. These officials, wardens, guards and all of them, are crown officers. No one from the outside, not even a grand jury, goes in to see what is going on. Is there any wonder that there are habitual offenders? They are the victims of our vicious system. Our institutions have been condemned, and reference has been made to them by Chief Justice Robertson of the court of appeal of Ontario, and Chief Justice McRuer, of the high court of Ontario, trial division. Our institutions have been severely criticized by various judges of the court of appeal and other courts and magistrates, that they have no place to send first offenders to. Ontario is adopting new places.

Attack has been made against the indeterminate type of sentence. The late Chief Justice R. M. Meredith, one of the ablest judges on the circuit for forty years, said that the indeterminate system had resulted to some extent in the development of perpetual offenders, and he gave as a dictum, he, questioned whether the indeterminate sentence was not ultra vires.

If you ask me, the bringing of the attorneys general of the provinces into it is just a roundabout way of killing it, because one attorney general will act one way, and another will act another way. The proposals in the various following sections and this dual roundabout way of it all will be condemned.

The system will fail because it is not founded on real prison reform. The explanatory note with respect to section 18 states that this part is new and makes provision for the preventive detention of habitual criminals. Is it any wonder we have them, with the way in which Canada has acted? Then the section goes on to refer to the proceedings on crime, and then there is inquiry as to whether the offender is an habitual criminal. Then we find that the provision is retroactive, and that a sentence may be commuted and turned into a habitual sentence, a contradiction of terms and sentences. Where are they to be housed? These institutions are overloaded now.

I doubt if this system has been very much of a success in the United States because the repeaters are there coming back. I read something in the press only yesterday with respect to the condition in the Mercer reformatory at Toronto, where eighty per cent are repeaters. From what I have seen of it and the pictures in the Globe and Mail, that institution is one of the worst factors in the prevention of real prison reform. I have not been in it; but, as head of a police system, I had some knowledge of it. It, too, has been condemned, and was to be sold and torn down, which it should have been long ago.

I am not criticizing the officials there or any other place; far from it. They are men and women who give their life to this work, and should be complimented upon so doing. But there are others who are not so efficient. Many have been appointed under the patronage system, and they must learn only by experience. Before their appointment, they have no experience at all, and with such a system of prison reform is it any wonder there are repeaters?

I should like to compliment the minister upon one thing, and that is that, since taking office, he has begun reform. No doubt it will take a long time to carry it out, but I should like to see some of it done at once and completed before he adopts this new system. After all is said and done, we must not forget the liberty of the subject. There is a great deal of talk about that. This provision is going pretty far, especially at a critical time like this. But if there is to be such a policy, do not hand it over to the attorneys general of the provinces so that they will do nothing about it. Make a success of reform first, before we adopt this.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is only one section concerning which I should like some information. So far as part X (A) is concerned, which covers habitual criminals, I believe the minister has gone too fast in introducing this provision before bringing into effect a system of rehabilitation as recommended by the Archambault commission. I agree with the hon. member for Broadview that what we are doing here is bringing in punitive legislation against the habitual offender, without having given him an opportunity of rehabilitation after discharge from a penal institution. I am not going to deal once more with that subject because I have dealt with it on previous occasions, but I do feel that more attention should be given to rehabilitation by carrying out the recommendations to which I have already referred. The idea of establishing two penal institutions wherein young prisoners can be removed from association with old and experienced prisoners should first be tried out in order that new opportunities may be given to those who, having once served, are returned to their ordinary life. However, the government has taken the stand that this measure should be introduced now. I would point out that in Great Britain this type of legislation was not introduced until every means of reformation had been exhausted by means of the Borstal and other institutions to assist those who have been punished for crime following their discharge from the penal institution. The subsection to which I take objection is subsection 4, which reads:

> A person shall not be tried on a charge of being a habitual criminal unless
> (a) the attorney general of the province in which the accused is to be tried consents thereto.

If being an habitual criminal is to be the subject of punishment, why should there be a provision enabling the attorney general of one province to determine that proceedings shall be taken under this section and the attorney general of another province to determine otherwise under like circumstances? Criminal law being what it is, it should be uniformly enforced in all parts of the dominion without regard to the wishes of individual attorneys general. In this section there is a marked departure from the uniformity which should be aimed at. This section means that for the first time in the history of our criminal law there will be a departure from uniformity of application in all parts of the dominion. The application of this section of the criminal law is to be left in the hands of the provincial attorneys general.

Hon. members will see what will happen. There may be an attorney general who is of my mind. If I were in the position of an attorney general I would be opposed to allowing proceedings to be taken against a man as a habitual criminal unless the opportunity had first been given for reformation. I would look at the matter from the point of view of one who had for years been somewhat concerned with defence rather than prosecution. On the other hand, there may be an attorney general who for years had been a crown prosecutor or crown attorney, and his attitude of mind would necessarily be different from mine. The result would be that a person convicted of three crimes in one province could commit a fourth crime, and because of the attitude of the attorney general in the province in which he had committed that crime he could be prosecuted as a habitual criminal, or not prosecuted.

I urge upon the minister that this introduces into our criminal law a lack of uniformity, in that the person in one province may be prosecuted as a habitual criminal, whereas if the same person committed a crime in another province he would not be subject to prosecution.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: What about nolle prosequi?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The principle of nolle prosequi is that the attorney general of a province may determine that there is no evidence upon which a conviction can be registered, or he may conclude that a man has already been sufficiently punished for the offence committed. For instance, it arises quite frequently that a man is charged with three different thefts. He is sentenced on those thefts and, later on, a fourth theft arises. Instead of having that person again go through the mill of a trial the attorney general may direct the crown prosecutor or the crown attorney to return a nolle prosequi. Under those circumstances the prosecution would not be proceeded with. In that principle there is no lack of uniformity. That principle dates back to the time of habeas corpus when, for the first time, the crown vested in its servants the right to direct that in the interests of justice prosecution ought not to take place. But this is a departure which I view with considerable alarm. It places the human factor foremost in the determination of whether or not a person shall be proceeded against.

Mr. LESAGE: In certain provinces they will not prosecute in connection with slot machines.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That matter rests with the province because property and civil rights are involved. That point was raised in connection with confiscation, I believe in a case in Windsor, and it was argued that the property and civil rights of the province were being interfered with. For that reason, matters having to do with slot machines rest with the provincial attorney general.

Mr. LESAGE: What about bingo games?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend may know something about bingo. That is not a case where the attorney general of the province would determine whether prosecution shall take place.

Mr. LESAGE: Oh, yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In one city in my province you may operate a bingo game while in another you may not. That is because of the different attitude adopted by the officers in charge of prosecution. There is not one law in one part of the province and another law in another part.

Mr. LESAGE: That is not what is happening here; the law will not be different.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not advancing this argument in any contentious way.

Mr. LESAGE: I know that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am trying to point out the situation which, I think, will arise. I tried to put myself in the position of the attorney general of Saskatchewan. As one who is used to defence, I naturally would object without opportunities for reformation to penalizing a person because he is a habitual criminal. On the other hand, my hon. friend the Postmaster General, who had a most distinguished career as a prosecutor, would, if he were in that position, naturally and instinctively and subconsciously look at the case from the point of view of the prosecutor.

Mr. LESAGE: He has changed a lot since.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I find him to be a most kindly man; but I am speaking of his psychological reactions, of emotions that affect us all. That is why I raise my objection against this section, because I believe it means the first departure from a uniform application of the criminal law everywhere in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall not answer the first part of my hon. friend's remarks about there having been no opportunity for reformation, because I cannot accept responsibility on the part of previous governments of Canada for the fact that men commit crimes.

But we have a situation where some persons are apparently going to commit crimes every time they get out and have a chance. The first object of criminal law is the protection of society and this seems to be necessary for the protection of society. My hon. friend says that it will induce a lack of uniformity in the law; he referred to the law of England and undertook to show that the right of the attorney general to direct that no prosecutions take place is there and has been carried into the law of Canada and attorneys general have the right to call off prosecutions. The same principle was incorporated in the British legislation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why not say the Attorney General of Canada? In England they have only one attorney general and you can get uniformity.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not our system in Canada. Nothing is more fundamental in our system than the administration of justice and the enforcement of law are the responsibility of the provinces, not of the Attorney General of Canada, but of the attorney general of each province. In England they have passed similar legislation providing that no charge of being an habitual criminal shall be inserted in an indictment without the consent of the director of public prosecutions. They put that in, because it is a serious thing to charge a person with being an habitual criminal, leading a persistently criminal life. They wanted to make it clear that he did not have to be charged with that in every instance, and so they said that the consent of the director of public prosecutions would be required. We are putting in the same provision here in Canada and substituting the only officials we can substitute under our constitution, and that is the attorney general of the province for the director of general prosecutions. That is not peculiar to this act at all. It is worth while to put on record some of the sections where the same principle applies. I will give the numbers of the sections first: Sections 205A, 592, 594, 596, 597, 598, 777 and 825. These relate to various offences with which persons cannot be charged without the leave of the attorney general of the province and, in some cases, the Attorney General of Canada where the matter has some peculiar connection with dominion jurisdiction. Section 205A deals with parading while nude, and so on, and the section concludes with these words:

No action or prosecution for a violation of this section shall be commenced without the leave of the attorney general for the province in which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

Section 592 relates to the offence of disclosing official secrets and provides that no person shall be prosecuted for that offence without the consent of the attorney general of the province or of the Attorney General of Canada. Section 593 makes necessary the leave of the Attorney General of Canada. Section 594 deals with explosive substances and there can be no prosecution without the consent of the attorney general. Section 596 deals with criminal breach of trust—no prosecution without the consent of the attorney general. Similarly for the other sections I have mentioned. So there is a class of offences where no proceedings can be taken without the consent of the attorney general. It is the attorney general who prefers the indictment through his officer, the crown prosecutor. This makes it clear that he is not obliged in every case to prefer this charge. I do not see how you could have it any other way.

Mr. JAENICKE: I wanted to support the hon. member for Lake Centre in his plea to the minister, but the minister has already given his answer. The idea struck me as he was speaking his last sentence, why not change subsection 4 (a) by saying that consent must be obtained either from the provincial attorney general or the Attorney General of Canada. The minister has just read a section where the consent was possible either of the attorney general of the province or the Attorney General of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Attorney General of Canada comes in where the matter is one in which the dominion has definite concern. Section 593, for example, provides:

No one holding any judicial office shall be prosecuted for the offence of judicial corruption, without the leave of the Attorney General of Canada.

It is the government of Canada that appoints the judges. That is tied up to the dominion. But the ordinary prosecution of criminals is a provincial matter, and I do not think it would be proper for the dominion government to endeavour to project itself into that field by trying to say what charges should be laid by provincial attorneys general and what should not, because that is what it would amount to.

Mr. JAENICKE: I would suggest to the minister that the criminal code provides for a penitentiary system which is under the jurisdiction of the dominion and that the man who would be tried for being a habitual criminal will have spent at least one or two terms in the penitentiary. Therefore the federal department would be much better able to judge whether that man should be tried as a habitual criminal, because it would have the information from the superintendent of the penitentiary and the penitentiary officials as to just what sort of person the man was.

Mr. HARTT: I do not rise to discuss this clause in a spirit of criticism. It is perhaps due to some mechanism in me that I cannot conceive or understand how we can incarcerate anybody by anticipation. I know it is the principle of magna carta that no man shall be held in prison without having previously been judged by his peers. That is an established principle we were all brought up to respect and to follow. And if I were met with the answer that the man had been judged because he had committed three offences and that is why he should be incarcerated for an indefinite period—that is something I just cannot assimilate. It makes me think of the poem of Alexander Pope who said: "It is a question whether want of skill appears in writing or in judging ill." By what measure of psychological conception, by what interpretation of law, by what system of calculation can we arrive at the conclusion that, because a man has committed an offence three times, he is therefore a habitual criminal and whether, with the consent or without the consent of the attorney general, he can be put away, subject to revision which will always confirm the reports of the superintendent of the penitentiary? I am wondering whether we are not committing a crime against criminals.

I have seen hon. members sitting on this side of the fence; I have seen a man psychologically, perhaps by a perverted mentality, by a sadistic attitude who will say, "come on; let us put him away." Society admits that it can do nothing with its offenders; that it cannot reform them; that it cannot redeem them; that it has gone bankrupt in social conduct and that we want to put a man away because we anticipate he is going to commit a crime. You say to him, Well, this man has been condemned three times. This is an importation into Canada. I do not want any precedents cited from the state of Michigan which condemns a man probably to life for having committed three small crimes. I do not want to play with the gastric juices of any judge who some morning may have an attack of indigestion and say, "I am going to put away this fellow." The word "judge" does not scare me. Judges are not infallible. Even God Almighty does not want to destroy the sinner. All He wants is for him to redeem himself. Here we are smarter than God Almighty. We are going to do something that God would not do. I want to know by what standard of measurement, by what norm we come to the conclusion. I know that some psychologists, some psychoanalysts, some of those who probe the minds and souls of men have something to say about such treatment. Personally I think they know nothing at all about it, because if they were psychoanalyzed in turn it would be found that it was too soon to let them out and too late to let them in.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I do not understand by what principle this is being done. Is it because some men want to show their usefulness? Up to the seventeenth century there were 175 crimes punishable by death in England, which did not deter crime. It has been going on. I remember reading of a case where a man witnessed the hanging in Virginia of a man who had picked the pocket of somebody. While he was witnessing the hanging, he was picking the pocket of somebody else. Did that stop the habitual criminal?

I do not want to compare the legislators of this house to the dictators of Europe who, being personally corrupted and perverted, infused their attitude into the administration of their respective governments and put people in concentration camps under the pretext that it was protective custody.

Mr. MacNICOL: And gassed them.

Mr. HARTT: Gassed them and made soap out of them. It was a paying proposition. They were doing it for the good of society. I do not know of any law that is not introduced for the good of society. Canada has got along well for eighty years. We have a criminal code that is as rigid as can be. We have noted every crime that can be committed that is punishable on its own merits and by judging each incident. Why is it that we have to give this latitude of incarcerating men by anticipation. Who is to read their minds? Who is to take that responsibility? We are somewhat civilized. I said "somewhat".

Mr. MacNICOL: Oftentimes we are far from being civilized.

Mr. HARTT: I should like to agree with the hon. gentleman, but I must be very careful. The point that I am trying to make to the committee is, what caused the necessity?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HARTT: Some hon. gentlemen are in a hurry and want this bill carried. I have no doubt they will carry it, but let it be on their conscience. They have to remember that they are the elected representatives of the people. It may inadvertently strike the son of any man who is here, and then they will say, how foolish the law must have been.

What I object to, Mr. Chairman, is the principle of the thing, to condemn a man for an offence he has not committed. It is not British; it is not Canadian. We have never heard of such things. Who is to review the case? With all due respect to the deputy minister of justice—he may be a man of great knowledge—he cannot review all cases. Some junior comes into the Department of Justice. Hon. members ought to see some opinions handed out in the name of justice. I do not think there is a court in Canada which would uphold them, but that would be the opinion and the man would remain incarcerated. We are consoled by the assurance of the Minister of Justice who, I know, is a fair man, an honest man, that the case will be reviewed every three years. What a splendid vacation, to put a man away on some subjective suspicion because he was condemned three times before. There are a lot of men who are not caught the third time and are still loose, and often these men are to go away for life. I ask the Minister of Justice to consider the matter. It is an Americanism we have imported. The state of Michigan has it. I think the state of New York has it; but it is a state law; it is not a federal law and does not apply to the whole of the United States. Here we are passing a law that is going into perpetuity, that because a man has committed a crime three times he ipso facto is condemned as a habitual criminal.

On this point I must agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre. We want to protect ourselves and excuse ourselves for our failure to reform these criminals. Whether it is psychological, or whatever it is, we have done nothing in Canada to reform the criminal.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not of any consequence.

Mr. HARTT: No, we have not done anything in Canada. For a prisoner to live in incarceration, society will consider that he has paid his penalty. In order to clear ourselves of that delicate consciousness of ours, we say we can do nothing, that the man is a habitual criminal. I hope that the Minister of Justice will reflect on the matter. I am not here to teach him. I know he is a good lawyer; I know he knows the social conditions under which we live. I know there are some inadvertent moments in the playing around with this problem of attorneys general. I agree again with the hon. member for Lake Centre. I have my suspicions, because I do not know who are the gods and who are the devils. I do not know who is to judge advantageously to himself and who may play politics with a law such as this. We have heard of the principle of nolle prosequi. An hon. member was asked about the case of nolle prosequi. That is a thing they play with. In criminal law constitutionally it has become general. That is the constitution of Canada. Of course the attorneys general always have the discretion. Then they have to resort to nolle prosequi, no proof to proceed further. Those who practise law know very well what it means. I appeal to the Minister of Justice and to hon. members to reconsider the idea of putting a man in a concentration camp and to justify our action to say, "Now, you are a bad little boy; we are going to call you a habitual criminal" I think we are committing a crime against the criminals.

Mr. ILSLEY: I just want to say that I believe the hon. member for Cartier is thinking too much about the criminal and too little about society for whose protection we have to pass these laws. I think that is the fallacy of his approach. The important thing, after all, is the protection of society, and I cannot work up very great feelings of righteous indignation in favour of the suggestion that we are unjust in this law to men who have been guilty of serious crimes three times, as shown by their convictions, and who have committed a fourth crime and have been found by judge and jury to be leading persistently criminal lives. That is what they are punished for and not for any crime they have not committed. They are not punished in anticipation, but for what they have done, and this is a form of punishment which is necessary for the protection of society.

Mr. JAENICKE: If a man is charged on three different counts and is found guilty on all three, that is only one conviction? It is the same crime.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I think so.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend has raised a point that is worth serious consideration, because the section reads:

A person shall not be found to be a habitual criminal unless the judge or jury as the case may be, finds on evidence,

(a) that since attaining the age of eighteen years he has at least three times previously to the conviction of the crime charged in the indictment, been convicted of an indictable offence for which he was liable to at least five years' imprisonment . . .

—and also that he is leading a persistently criminal life. The hon. member has raised a point that is particularly sound. If a person were charged with theft, obtaining under false pretences, and a third offence within the same indictment, all of which were subject to punishment of at least five years' imprisonment, and if he were found guilty of all three he might very well come within these provisions.

Mr. LESAGE: Or even three counts of breaking in at night would be sufficient.

Mr. ILSLEY: I take it to mean, different times.

Mr. JAENICKE: It does not say that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is what it states. I certainly intended, and I think the intention of the law is, that if he is charged in one indictment with several crimes, the convictions on that indictment are deemed to be at one time.

Mr. LESAGE: They may not be.

Mr. HEON: Could it not be stated, three different indictments and three separate convictions?

Mr. LESAGE: I have seen it happen that there were ten counts of breaking in—

Mr. HEON: On one indictment.

Mr. LESAGE: Yes. He pleaded guilty on four and not guilty on six. He was found guilty, later, on three, so that there were two convictions at different times on the same indictment, and it is possible that there might be three convictions on the same indictment at different times.

Mr. HEON: That would make a good point for appeal.

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly intended that the convictions on one indictment should be deemed to be the one conviction at that time, so that you could not say he was convicted at different times simply because different convictions took place as a result of one indictment. I should think, if there were any doubt about the matter, the attorney general would proceed accordingly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Another case that might be imagined is this. Suppose a person has lived a decent life and suddenly he begins to commit crimes. He commits three different thefts in different parts of his province all within a matter of a few days, and he is charged in point A, in point B and in point C and is convicted in each. You have three convictions and the man is a habitual criminal, unless some change is made here.

Mr. ILSLEY: It must also be established that he is leading a persistently criminal life, and I should think that would be a case where he would not even be charged with it.

Mr. HEON: He would have to be found guilty of being a habitual criminal.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: Is it intended that the person charged with being an habitual criminal shall have served a sentence on each of three different occasions; that is to say, that he shall have served three sentences for three different crimes before this would apply?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENTLEY: Could it not be worded in that way, then, so that he would not be serving two or three sentences concurrently, but three separate sentences one after another? That is what the minister is trying to get at.

Mr. HEON: It says "convicted".

Mr. ILSLEY: The important thing is that he be convicted at successive times. The essence of the section, is that there be conviction at this particular time of his life, and a conviction again at another time, and a third conviction at still another time, and that it be established also that he is leading a persistently criminal life. That is the intention, and that is the way in which it should be viewed by the attorneys general who administer it. I think the intention is clear enough.

Mr. BENTLEY: I believe that is what is meant, but legal opinion here seems to differ.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is clear.

Mr. JAENICKE: I suggest 575C (a), at the top of page 7, might be looked at. After the word "imprisonment" there might be added the words "and has served three separate terms of imprisonment for such offences."

Mr. ILSLEY: The trouble there is that the sentence might be suspended. He might have been released on suspended sentence the first time, but that should not prevent him from being regarded as having committed a crime. That was a conviction, and I think that should be counted.

Mr. TIMMINS: It seems to me that, since so much doubt has been cast upon this clause; since we are dealing with the freedom of people, and so many proper and valid objections have been raised, this might very well be left over for one more year so that it might be given serious study. We cannot be trifling with a few words which we may insert and which may be interpreted quite differently from the way in which the minister interprets them here. I am just throwing out that suggestion.

On section 27—Fees.

Mr. LESAGE: I should like to draw attention to the fact that in connection with summonses taken out by officers of the mounted police it has been the practice of the mounted police to serve these summonses themselves, even at distances as great as twenty miles and at places where there are bailiffs who could perform the service. The result is that the defendant has to pay large costs. I have seen one case in which the costs amounted to $18 for the service of the summons, whereas if it had been sent to a bailiff the cost would have been only fifty cents, because he lived less than a mile from the person served.

Mr. HEON: C'est le même principe que dans un cas de procédure civile.

Mr. LESAGE: Yes. In our code of civil procedure in the province of Quebec we have a rule that the greatest amount which may be charged for the service of a summons or writ is the amount that may be charged by the bailiff living nearest the defendant. This provision in the code will create an injustice. It is not the same thing as the case of an arrest. As a matter of fact, in Quebec the department of the attorney general always used the services of bailiffs, and the officers of the provincial police or of the liquor commission do not serve these summonses. I think it is only fair that they should be served by bailiffs, and it would not require any change in the law; it would only require instructions to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is as simple as that, and it would correct an injustice which is contrary to the general practice in the province.

Mr. MILLER: Does not the criminal code say the summons has to be served by a constable?

Mr. LESAGE: No, it does not.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give consideration to the hon. gentleman's suggestion. I was not aware of the practice he mentions, and I do not think it can be extensive.

Mr. LESAGE: It is extensive. As far as I know, it is done in every case in the province of Quebec, and I have had many complaints.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall look into the matter and see whether my hon. friend's point can be met.

Mr. MILLER: In the schedule the witness fee is fixed at $3. That is too much, if I may say so. In the west you may bring six or eight or ten witnesses in a small case, even one heard by a justice. If that is done in trials of small importance the costs are made too great. People cannot afford them; they will go to gaol instead of paying a fine and costs. In many of these small trials they have more witnesses than the courtroom can hold.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think it is recognized that even these fees are subject to the discretion of the presiding judge or magistrate. One hon. member spoke of the excessive cost of having summonses served in certain districts. I believe the presiding magistrate or judge sees that these summonses are served in the most economical way possible, and police officers are not permitted to travel long distances and run up large costs. I know in my own experience the presiding magistrate or judge generally insists upon the most economical service being carried out, because if we run up heavy costs in court actions we shall do more harm than good. The minister might take that into consideration and see that the fees are only permissive, giving the magistrate or judge discretion in awarding them.

Mr. McMASTER: I would suggest that there be a basic rate for service by constables. It does seem unfair that because a man lives twenty miles from the county town it should cost him more to be served. The offence is no greater than in the case of a man living in town. I should think that, by averaging the amount so that everyone would pay the same for service, we would get a fair method.

Mr. MILLER: I should like to support that suggestion. In the west they have long distances to travel. Sometimes a man must be brought from thirty or forty miles away, and even farther in my own district. The costs of serving witnesses, with mileage and so on, become so burdensome the people simply cannot pay them.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. MILLER: Can we not get an answer?

Mr. ILSLEY: If there is anything wrong with this scale of fees we should not pass it. As I understand the objections that have been raised, they are, first, that the witness fee of $3 a day is too much, and, then, that the fees of the constables should be averaged in some way. Were there any other suggestions I did not hear? I believe those were the only two. At the moment I do not see how this averaging that has been suggested could be done. I believe this is the system followed everywhere.

Mr. BOUCHER: I believe the minister understands the situation which is encountered more particularly in the rural districts, where they have long distances to travel. In this city, for example, costs are much higher in the county police court than in the city police court. In the city court they can serve individuals charged with various offences within a very short time, and the costs are reasonable. But take the case of an individual who has committed an offence, who lives some distance from the city and who has to be served with a process. If a policeman is sent out thirty or forty miles to bring in a witness one will find that the same two men, charged with exactly the same offence, will pay entirely different penalties for their offences. I say a gross injustice is being done, and having that disparity does not work to the benefit of proper law administration. If the minister could equalize it by having a flat rate I believe there would be a better administration of justice, and in the end it would be much better than the scale basis. Presiding judges or magistrates may have some discretion, but they do not always use it. One can realize that particularly in connection with offences where fines are imposed; and where the fines are going to one department of government or another, the magistrate must consider seriously the costs of serving processes as well as the collection of fines from the culprits. The accused person is often handicapped thereby.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not believe that I shall offer any amendment to this, because much consideration has been given to this matter of fees. I have been making some inquiries from one hon. member who has had considerable experience in at least one province in respect of witness fees, and he informs me that there is considerable difficulty in having witnesses attend, at all, because the fees have been so low.

Mr. LESAGE: They claim it is not sufficient.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose the witnesses are obliged to come.

Mr. LESAGE: But they complain about it.

Mr. BOUCHER: Anyone who has had any experience in the administration of justice can assure the minister that, no matter what fees were paid to witnesses, they would not want to come. I do not think any witness will come to court simply because the fee is raised.

Section agreed to.

Sections 28 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On section 32—Reduction of imprisonment on part payment of sum adjudged to be paid.

Mr. TIMMINS: Is this not a vicious section, in that it seems to make the court a collection agency? A man receives a term of imprisonment for non-payment of a sum of money, and then he can pay part of it and, by so doing, receive a reduction in the number of days he must serve. Probably that is a benevolent thing to do, but it is hardly in accord with the manner in which we carry on British justice.

Mr. ILSLEY: This amendment was recommended by the commissioners on the uniformity of legislation, and it seems fair. On what ground does the hon. member object?

Mr. TIMMINS: In many cases matters are rushed to court because the damages are not taken care of. The result is that a conviction is registered and money is to be paid. This indicates that the force of law would be used to force a man to pay.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): This reduction of sentence when the accused has been convicted and is subject to fine and imprisonment applies only to the fine being paid to the crown. It does not apply to a remittance of money when a magistrate orders an accused person to make a remittance. An unjust situation arises when a man who has been convicted and is subject to fine or imprisonment does not happen to have enough money to pay all the fine. He has to go to gaol because he cannot pay the $100 he has been fined, when he has only $50 with which to wipe out half the term of imprisonment. I believe this provision is fair to the accused man.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a clerical error in the first line of section 32 and I will ask my colleague to make the necessary amendment.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier) moved:

That the words "that the said act be amended" in the first line of section 32 be stricken out and the words "the said act is further amended" be substituted therefor.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES

PROVISION FOR ADDITION TO LIST OF REFORMATORY INSTITUTIONS

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 377 to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister make a statement?

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, this bill was requested within the last two weeks by the government of Nova Scotia, and it is rendered necessary by reason of the fact that the Halifax industrial school will soon close down. In Nova Scotia Protestant boys are sent to the Halifax industrial school and Roman Catholic boys to the St. Patrick's home. A new school is being established called the Nova Scoita school for boys, and is to be added to the list of institutions mentioned in the Prisons and Reformatories Act. The act will provide that boys of either the Protestant or Roman Catholic faiths may be sent to the Nova Scotia school for boys. This bill was introduced because of a recent request by the attorney general of Nova Scotia.

FOREST CONSERVATION

EASTERN SLOPE OF ROCKY MOUNTAINS—AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 362, respecting the protection and conservation of the forests on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains—Mr. Howe—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, for perhaps half a dozen or more years I had the pleasure of travelling over the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains, and at that time I became greatly alarmed at the lack of protection against fire and other things which might destroy the forests. I am rising to support this bill strongly for the second time. I appreciate that the minister who is piloting this bill is doing so because the minister in charge of the department is away ill. I am not going to extend my remarks any longer than necessary because I am in favour of the bill.

There is a great need for what this bill sets out to accomplish. Anyone going through that area cannot help but be struck by the destruction that has occurred. I have a report here showing the results of ten years of administration, five years under the federal government and five years under the provincial government. In giving these figures, I do not intend for one moment to censure the provincial government, because their administration of the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains was during the depression years when, as everyone knows, revenues were at their lowest ebb. The government of Alberta could not have been expected to provide the same standards of protection that had been provided by the federal government. I have a letter from the department giving the fire losses on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains at the headwaters of the Saskatchewan river for the years 1925 to 1936. During the period 1925 to 1930 inclusive, when the federal government was administering the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains, the total acreage of timber land destroyed was 58,530 acres, or an average of 11,756 acres a year. During the five years 1931 to 1936 inclusive, when the provincial government was in control—this was at the very depth of the depression when little money was available for these matters—the losses amounted to 235,155 acres, or an average of 47,031 acres a year. That is a terrific loss.

The department was not able to give me any figures following 1936; but if the same rate continued for the ten years since that time, on the basis of 47,031 acres destroyed each year it would mean that another 470,000 acres of timber land could have been destroyed. Whether or not that is the case does not matter for the purposes of my argument, because I want to support the programme the government is now putting forward to assist the Alberta government in preventing the destruction of forests on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains.

If I had a complaint to make it would be that this bill should have been introduced years ago. As the committee knows, I have advocated such a bill for quite a few years. I am not going to complain over that not having been done, because during that period every dollar was required to prosecute a victorious war. First, because of the depression and, second, because of the war these forests have been destroyed to an extent far beyond what they should have been.

Their importance is hardly estimable. I made a survey last fall in connection with the forests on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains at the headwaters of the Platte river in the western states. I was informed that the forests on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains at the headwaters of the Platte river—and this would apply also to the Missouri river—contained approximately one-eighth of the forest wealth of the basin of the Platte. I do not know whether that is the case in Canada, but I imagine it would be safe to say that the forest resources on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains at the headwaters of the Saskatchewan river would be approximately one-eighth of the wealth and the water resources fifty per cent of the whole basin of the Saskatchewan, which is approximately 149,000 square miles.

The forest wealth on the eastern slope is far greater per square mile or per acre than it is in any other part of the watershed where there is so much in the way of scrub trees, jack pine and trees of little consequence whatever. On the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains there are many fine stands of timber. The importance of the eastern slope to that whole area lies in the fact that in the past it did retain for a long time into the spring and right into the summer vast sheets of ice and snow, and by the retention of that ice and snow the flow in the Saskatchewan river was more even. That, of course, goes without saying. But the reverse effect has followed from the destruction of the forests, and the figures show that the destruction has been great. The result has been that the flow of the Saskatchewan river, as was demonstrated clearly this spring, has been in greater volume than it should have been with the result that it runs off more rapidly and gives little return as it flows down to the sea. In other words, the more that the forests are destroyed by fire, the more rapid is the run-off of the water; and the more the forests are retained, the more permanent the water resources, which are almost priceless to the west, are retained for the benefit of the whole country. So I hope that this legislation will result in more retention of the water resources on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains.

If I have any comment to make on the bill itself I would inquire, first, why the commission is to consist of two appointees of the federal government and one from the provincial government. The whole of this work is in Alberta; and, since Alberta is vitally interested, why should not two members of the commission be appointed from Alberta and only one from the federal government? Being on the job there all the time, Alberta might be expected to have a more intense interest in the maintenance of the forests than someone appointed from Ottawa. But I am not going to quarrel with that.

I would ask, further, if the measure is to be considered as a more or less permanent arrangement. I believe that the present limit is twenty-five years, and during the first five years this government is to contribute $6,300,000, plus one half of the cost of maintenance, which is estimated at about $250,000 a year. The federal government will contribute up to $200,000 for maintenance if that should be required, the provincial contribution to maintenance being $125,000 a year. I am not able to say whether that is enough or not. I would hope that the federal government will not stick at the cost of maintenance if it should cost more than $200,000 a year, because the water resources of the Saskatchewan river constitute the most priceless single resource in the west. If the water resources go, everything goes.

It is not mentioned in the bill, but I presume there will have to be some arrangement whereby the commission will consult with the P.F.R.A. The P.F.R.A. is a branch of the federal government and it is engaged just now, and I hope will be more so as the years go by, in the conservation of the water resources of the Saskatchewan river watershed. I should therefore think this commission ought to work in close harmony with the P.F.R.A. Under the bill the P.F.R.A. would have no authority, but I have no doubt that the commissioners from Alberta and the dominion government, knowing full well the importance of water conservation, would cooperate together.

The minister will, I hope, tell us something about the programme. Formerly there was some programme for the setting up of fire towers such as we have all through northern Ontario. There would also have to be reservoirs created, although the bill does not mention that, so that water will be available to put out fires either by hose or to be carried by fire truck to put out the fire. I presume that would be part of the capital investment.

I am glad to see that this government is to contribute $6,300,000 for the next five years.

I hope that when the five years expire another grant of equal amount will be made for the same purpose because of the vast importance of the preservation of the water resources on the east slope of the Rocky mountains which comes about through the maintenance of the forests. That makes it an investment that is good business. It is money well spent by this government.

I could say a lot more, but perhaps if I sit down the bill will get through more quickly, and I am anxious to see the bill get through. There may be a few amendments to propose; I do not know whether there are or not; but if the western members have amendments that will be helpful, I shall not oppose them. I am grateful to the government as a humble member and as a Canadian long interested in the preservation of the forests on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains for what the government is doing by this bill. I am anxious to see it in operation.

My last word is this. While this bill pertains only to the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains, anyone who has travelled through British Columbia must have been horrified times without number as I have been, to contemplate the vast destruction of the forests in that province. One of the most pitiful spectacles one can see is those vast areas along the Fraser and Thompson rivers where formerly thousands and thousands of acres of fine timber grew but which section, through destruction of the forests by fire, is of no more value. So I hope that when the minister finds out, as he will, all the benefits that accrue from reforestation, the preservation of the forests, the conservation of water, the maintenance of the ice and snow which will be the result of reforestation and preservation of the forests, he will bring in another bill to assist British Columbia in the preservation of its forests from destruction by fire. This is almost too big a job for any single province. I look upon the preservation of the forests of the Rocky mountains on both the eastern slope and the main slope as national business. The headwaters of our great rivers are almost priceless and their maintenance is almost priceless. I strongly support this bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not going to detain the committee very long. I just wish to do something similar to what was done by the hon. member for Davenport who has just taken his seat. I wish to approve the purposes for which this bill is brought before parliament. If there is anything in Canada more important than anything else it is the conservation of our forests. In these circumstances, I believe that the preservation of the forests and the water resources in this area is more than any one province can undertake by itself. I believe that the government has done the right thing by coming to an agreement with the province whereby the work is to be undertaken by both.

What the hon. member for Davenport said with regard to British Columbia and the destruction and devastation of the forests is true. As a matter of fact he did not put the case as strongly as it should be put. No one can travel by our railways from Alberta through British Columbia to the coast without being appalled at the terrible destruction of the finest forest stands in the world. The same is true in a great many cases right across this dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Forests are disappearing. With the disappearance of the forests will soon go the water resources if they are not conserved, and then will come the destruction of the soil through erosion of various kinds.

So far as this group is concerned, this bill will have our full support.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any set government policy with regard to giving assistance and protection against forest fires and in furthering conservation methods?

Mr. HOWE: The ownership of the forests carries with it the responsibility for their protection. That is the usual policy and has been over the years. When the dominion government owned the natural resources of the prairies it bore all the costs of protecting the forests and fighting forest fires. The reason for the government's intervention in this case is, as I said earlier in the debate, that the three provinces are dependent upon the protection of the forests on the east slope of the Rocky mountains. The purpose of the bill is not primarily to protect the forests, although by protecting the forests we achieve the real object of the bill, which is to protect the run-off in the headwaters of the Saskatchewan valley.

The hon. member for Davenport inquired why the commission had two members appointed by the federal government and one by the provinces. The reason is that the federal government in this case provides all the capital expenditure. The interests of the three provinces must be protected in the carrying out of the work. It is suggested that the capital expenditure in the amount of $6,300,000 be expended over six years. That is the fixed capital appropriated by this bill. It is provided that the maintenance expense is voted annually by parliament. If the maintenance expense is over $350,000, the province of Alberta pays $125,000. If the maintenance expense is less, the province pays half the maintenance expense. If it is more than $250,000, the money can still be voted by parliament as required, but the provincial contribution is limited to $125,000.

No one can estimate the value of having the forests of the east slope amply protected. Without that, the run-off of the rivers is disturbed and the cost of regulating the flow of the rivers is greatly increased, if not made impossible. Therefore the commission will be made up of at least one forestry engineer of proven capacity to plan the programme of the development of the east slope, and he will be associated with at least one good businessman to see that the government's money is well spent and a representative of the province who, I am sure, will also be competent in the field in which he is appointed.

Mr. GREEN: Has there been any negotiating with any other province for a similar work?

Mr. HOWE: No other similar situation arises that I know of where the forests of one province protects the headwaters of the rivers of another province.

On section 6—Purposes or objects of board.

Mr. MacNICOL: With reference to this section, will there be a regular sub-branch having to do with the destruction of insects and so forth in the forests in addition to the fire prevention branch?

Mr. HOWE: All the resources of the government will be available to the commission. At the moment there is a forest insect control board in operation. It happens to be in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply at the present time. It is doing splendid work in experimenting with pests to check insect devastation. The information of the board will be available to this commission. In fact the commission can, of course, call on all the resources of the federal government which may be required to enable it to carry out its work efficiently.

NATIONAL PARKS

ADJUSTMENT OF BOUNDARIES, ADDITIONS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 365, respecting certain national parks and to amend the National Parks Act.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain the bill?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, since this bill, if enacted, will divest the crown of areas of land in certain of the national parks, the title to which is at present in the crown, His Excellency the Governor General was informed in respect thereto and has given his consent to the consideration of the bill.

Briefly, the purpose of this bill is:

(1) To add to Fort Beausejour historic park two small parcels totalling a little more than four acres of historic ground.

(2) To withdraw from Riding Mountain national park a marginal 640 acres of land which is being exchanged with the owner of a similar area of land well inside the park which is of greater value for park purposes and which will be included in the park by this legislation.

(3) To add to Elk Island national park approximately twenty-four square miles of territory immediately south of the park which is required to protect the health and welfare of the buffalo herd.

(4) To withdraw from Prince Albert national park 373 square miles of territory which is not suitable for park purposes and which is needed for a dominion-provincial fur conservation scheme which will benefit the Indians, half-breeds and other residents leading the hunting life.

(5) To withdraw from Waterton lakes national park sixteen square miles of territory on the east end that is not suitable for national park development, but is actually required for grazing and timber by nearby settlers.

(6) To abolish Nemiskam park near Forcmost and Buffalo national park near Wainwright as these areas are no longer required for park purposes.

(7) To vest in the governor general in council the additional power to grant leases of lots in subdivisions for the purposes of residence during summer months only and to provide for extensions and changes in existing townsites and subdivisions.

(8) To authorize agreements with any province in which a national park is situated extending to park residents social services which are supplied by that province to persons resident outside of the park.

The explanations given in the bill are, I believe, quite adequate. However, for the information of the committee, I should like to explain more fully some of the changes being made in regard to certain parks.

Hon. members will recall that at the 1941 session a bill was introduced to amend the boundaries of Prince Albert national park, and that bill was withdrawn because of the opposition raised at that time. The war was then in progress, and the matter was not of sufficient importance to engage too much of the time of the house.

Section 3 of the present bill now asks that the same areas be removed from the park and be declared to be no longer required for park purposes. I might say that this park was created in 1927 prior to the transfer of the resources and was originally known as the Sturgeon forest reserve. The area is 1,869 square miles. It is proposed to remove three areas containing approximately 376 square miles; the area remaining in the park being approximately 1,493 square miles.

Parcel No. 1 containing 340 square miles is located on the northeast side of the park and is unsuitable for park purposes. There are no lakes of outstanding value; the ground is very low and full of muskegs, and there is no fishing in any of the small lakes. Vertical aerial photographs of the area were taken in 1946, and later the area was cruised. The timber resources are very limited. The total amount of the merchantable coniferous saw timber is estimated at 1,577,500 feet board measure of white spruce located in six separate blocks, some of which are in insufficient quantities to make an economical operation feasible. The remainder of the area does not at present contain any timber of sawlog size, although there are small quantities of jack pine ties and poplar cordwood. Generally the area is unattractive. On the other hand, it surrounds the Montreal lake Indian reserve and is suitable for incorporation in the fur conservation programme that has been agreed upon between the dominion and the province for northern Saskatchewan.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the minister say "surrounds"?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. That is my information.

Mr. MacNICOL: It does not surround it.

Mr. HOWE: My officers say it surrounds it. Perhaps the hon. member can look it over.

Mr. HACKETT: He is going to have it corrected.

Mr. HOWE: The provincial government has agreed that when the area is deleted from the park it will be included in the scheme which will permit the Indians to have equal trapping rights with the native population under the conditions of the agreement.

I should add that this reason for removing the parcel did not exist when the matter was before the house some years ago. I do not wish to take up time to discuss the joint fur conservation programme except to say that it is hoped it will be of great benefit to the trapping Indians in Saskatchewan. The inclusion of this parcel will facilitate the plans being made in that section of the country.

Parcel No. 2 comprises approximately ten square miles and is located on the southeast corner of the park. It is of no particular value to the park and is required as an addition to the adjacent Little Red River Indian reserve 106A. It is an area which juts out from the main block and adds unnecessarily to the length of the park boundary. When the land is reverted to the province it will then be transferred to the dominion to be added to the Indian reserve.

Parcel No. 3 contains approximately twenty-six square miles. It is located in the southwest corner of the park and is of no value for park purposes. On the other hand, it is suitable for agriculture. Like parcel No. 2, it lengthens the boundaries of the park and thereby increases the cost of administration. Apart from a certain portion of the park highway, approximately five miles, running through it and the telephone lines, there are no other park improvements situated in it.

In reference to the abolition of Buffalo park at Wainwright, as most members are aware the buffalo herd at this park was disposed of in the years 1939 and 1940. A number of the healthy animals were transferred to Elk island and the remainder slaughtered. At the present time there are approximately 1,200 animals in good condition at Elk island park. An arrangement has been made with the province to increase the area of this park by adding approximately 23·6 square miles from the Cooking lake reserve immediately adjacent; this is being transferred to the dominion and is being incorporated in the park by section 2, paragraph (c) of this bill. With the added area, which is very suitable for pasture, there will be sufficient land to maintain the present number of animals and to ensure for all time the preservation of this species.

Perhaps that gives a fair sample of the provisions of the bill, and we can take up the others, if hon. members are interested, as we reach the sections.

On motion of Mr. MacNicol the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, July 4, 1947

The house met at two o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. TOWNLEY-SMITH—NEWSPAPER COMMENT RESPECTING WHEAT PRICE

Mr. F. W. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has been called to an editorial appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 26, which reads in part as follows:

Speaking on June 21 at Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan, Mr. F. W. Townley-Smith, C.C.F. member for North Battleford, criticized the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement at $1.55 and the guaranteed minimum price for all wheat of $1.35 per bushel. Mr. Townley-Smith was not opposed in principle but he argued that the price as fixed in the agreement and the five-year compulsory pool were too low.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would suggest that the hon. member quote only the relevant part, and then state his question of privilege.

Mr. MacINNIS: He did not get time to do it.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: I wish to state that I discussed the agreement but did not criticize it, and also that the last sentence, namely, that "Mr. Townley-Smith was not opposed in principle but he argued that the price as fixed in the agreement and the five-year compulsory pool were too low" is a misstatement because it is incomplete. What I really said was that if the prices of other things that farmers had to buy were to be allowed to skyrocket, then the price of wheat and wages should be allowed to go up with them. With this correction, the remainder of the Fress Press editorial is quite pointless.

Mr. KNOWLES: As usual.

MR. POULIOT—EDITORIAL IN MONTREAL "DAILY STAR"—UNITED NATIONS

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege based upon the fundamental freedom of speech. As a member of parliament today I went before the human rights committee and drew the attention of hon. members to the following extract from an editorial published in the Montreal Daily Star of Wednesday, June 25. It states:

Were the characters involved in this episode other than they were, this debate would assume national importance.

The debate was about the united nations organization, and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and I expressed honest views in the debate. Here is the commentary of the Montreal Daily Star:

It would be rightly interpreted as a resurgence of old-style isolationism—the kind of doctrine which above all else brought on what Mr. Churchill has called "the unnecessary war." It will be so interpreted in Moscow and elsewhere; for the students of public opinion in those parts can hardly be expected to know very much about the irresponsibility of Mr. Church, Mr. Pouliot and their strange allies from Alberta.

This morning I went before the committee for protection of freedom of speech. Perhaps there was a little exaggeration in my calling the owner and chief editor of the Montreal Daily Star a bum, but there was much less exaggeration in my language than in their description of the hon. member for Broadview and myself as irresponsible.

My contention is this, that the human rights committee serves no more purpose than an umbrella made of only wire. Everything is gone out of it. I asked them for protection and I did not get it. I was referred to the house. I protest most strongly against the uselessness of that committee.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I have not seen the reference in the Montreal Star but I want to tell the hon. member for Temiscouata that I do not pay any attention to what that newspaper says. I found out years ago that there is no use trying to answer a newspaper; they always have the last word. As far as I am concerned I do not care what they say. My position can be explained in the house. I contend that there has been a flat failure of the UNO and I gave my reasons for it. This paper or its columnists never report what is said here in the house. President Roosevelt when attacked called some of them calumnyists.

PAUL TRIQUET, V.C.

WINNERS OF VICTORIA CROSS FROM CONSTITUENCY OF RIMOUSKI

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Rimouski): The Evening Citizen of July 3 states:

Canada's first French-speaking winner of the empire's most coveted award, the Victoria Cross, Lt.-Col. Paul Triquet, of Cabano, Que., has retired from the Canadian army after twenty-one years' service.

We are all very proud of Colonel Triquet, but I should like to have it on the record that we are also very proud of two other Victoria Cross winners who came from the constituency of Rimouski. They were Captain Jean Brillant and Corporal Joseph Kaeble, who won the Victoria Cross in 1918 and 1917.

MORNING AND SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members may have noticed that I have had placed on the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday the notice of a motion for the house to sit in the mornings next week at eleven o'clock from Wednesday until the end of the week and on Saturdays thereafter. If I can be given unanimous consent, I would move the motion this afternoon so that hon. members will know at once just what to expect. Otherwise I will leave the motion over and move it on Monday. May I ask the house if I have unanimous consent?

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I take it that the Prime Minister is obliged to get unanimous consent before he can move this motion today, and I take it that is his object in making the request he has made. Perhaps the house ought to be brought up to date in connection with the ramifications of the whole matter of shortening the time of the session. At the opening of the house yesterday we heard that there were to be some negotiations with respect to Saturday sittings, and I was wondering whether that had been decided upon. I ask that because it would have a direct bearing upon any move made with respect to morning sittings next week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the previous discussions, there was an understanding that we would not meet tomorrow without considering the matter in advance to see if we could reach an agreement. There was no understanding with regard to future sittings. We have reached the point now where, in the light of the circumstances as we know them in connection with bringing the business of the house to a close, the government must itself take the initiative and responsibility. It is for that reason that I have had this motion inserted in Votes and Proceedings to cover the sittings of the house for the remainder of the session.

Hon. members perhaps may not realize that we have been sitting here since the month of January and we are now into July. Near the close of every session of parliament measures have to be taken to expedite the business. I would point out that not only is the convenience of hon. members of the house to be considered but, as they will have noticed, there is the position of members of the public service including the officials of this house. For six years past the civil servants at Ottawa have not had the opportunity of enjoying summer shorter hours. As long as this house continues to sit, members of the public service in Ottawa have to be on hand. They do not get a chance to enjoy the earlier hours of closing during the summer months they otherwise would have. I am sure hon. members will be prepared to consider that aspect. There are the employees in the printing bureau, those connected with Hansard and others whom I might name, on whom there is great pressure at this time. I submit that that is something of which account might well be taken, particularly by those who are interested in seeing that as much consideration as possible is shown in as many directions as possible.

So far as the business of the house is concerned, if I thought that there was the slightest reason why we should not expedite matters at this stage, I would be the first not to permit any attempt at hastening the conclusion of the session. However, we know that all important measures have been brought forward. I have asked time and again that if there was any particular measure that hon. members wished to have brought forward, or if there were any items of the estimates hon. members wished to have brought forward, the government would have them brought forward at once. I have had no further requests, and I think that with the items that there are on the order paper, if we have, as I hope we shall have, the cooperation of hon. members generally, we should be able to bring the proceedings of this house to a close next week, and that before the end of the week.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this group has no objection to giving unanimous consent to having the motion put today in the terms in which it appears in Votes and Proceedings, but there are one or two questions I should like to ask. Is it the intention of the government to go through with the labour bill? If it is, I doubt very much if that bill can be got out of committee in time to go through the house. Is it the intention of the government to go through with the bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act which appears in Votes and Proceedings? I would like to know how much we are supposed to get through next week.

I would remind the house that if we sit from eleven o'clock to one, from two o'clock to six and from seven o'clock to eleven we shall be sitting two hours longer each day than we ever did before, at least in my time in the house. That puts a burden on the staff, the printing bureau and others. If the Prime Minister could give us some information on the matters I have raised, we shall have some idea of what we have to do before we leave here a week from tomorrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government naturally has been concerned with the matters my hon. friend has raised. So far as the Dominion Elections Act is concerned, as the hon. member has mentioned, a number of amendments have been proposed. I do not think, after this session, that there will be a general election before there is another session of the house. For that reason the government has thought it would be preferable that hon. members should have an opportunity of studying these proposed changes to the elections act between this session and the next. Therefore we will not proceed with this measure at this time.

With regard to the labour bill, there are a great many who feel that we ought to get that measure through at once, but there are a very large number who are of the view that perhaps it would be the part of wisdom, in the light of what we know has happened in connection with legislation in some other parts of the world, particularly legislation affecting industrial questions, that it would place hon. members in a better position to deal with that most important question, if we allowed this measure to stand over until another session. Hon. members would then have an opportunity of carefully studying the statements made to and the evidence which has been given before the committee.

Those are the two measures my hon. friend has mentioned. I cannot say offhand whether there will be any others which will not be proceeded with, but I do know the government will seek to accommodate hon. members of the house as long as we are not hindering in any way the essential business of the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister if his remarks about the elections act would apply also to the redistribution bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is important, I think, that the redistribution measure should be proceeded with at this session.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I would not wish to say a word to impede greater progress in the house, but I am rather in a difficulty with regard to Wednesday next. Some of those associated with me have been endeavouring to arrange a public memorial service for the late Right Hon. Viscount Bennett, and overcoming a considerable number of difficulties we chose noon on Wednesday for that service at Chalmers church. My card has only just reached me, and it is possible that the Prime Minister's card has not yet reached him. But if he would give consideration to putting off the morning sittings from Wednesday to Thursday of next week it would be considered a very courteous thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, may I say that naturally I would be the first to wish that as many members of this House of Commons as possible would be present at the memorial service to the late Lord Bennett. I hope very much to be present myself. I did not know at the time this motion was drafted that there was to be a special service at twelve o'clock on Wednesday. I wonder if the house would agree to meeting on Wednesday at ten o'clock and adjourning at eleven-thirty? If that amendment were made to the motion, perhaps that would meet the situation.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That on Wednesday, July 9 instant, the house shall meet at 10 o'clock a.m., and on that day there shall be an additional intermission from 11.30 a.m. to 2 p.m.; that on and after Thursday, July 10 instant, until the end of the session the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day, and that in addition to the intermission at 6 o'clock p.m. there shall also be an intermission every day from one to two o'clock p.m., and that on Saturday the 12th July instant, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m., and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Second report of the special committee on radio broadcasting.—Mr. Maybank.

JAPANESE PROPERTY IN CANADA

QUESTION AS TO APPOINTMENT OF INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. Has the government taken action on the recommendation in the fourth report of the standing committee on public accounts that a commission be appointed to inquire into alleged loss of property by persons of the Japanese race, residents of Canada? If a commission has not been appointed will the minister say if it will be appointed, and when?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): Consideration is being given to that, and arrangements are being made to secure a commissioner. The announcement I hope will be made shortly of the appointment of a commissioner to carry out the inquiry.

BRITISH EMPIRE CONFERENCE

PRESS REPORT FROM AUSTRALIA—"STRATEGY FOR WINNING 1947 BATTLE FOR BRITAIN"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I was handed just before coming into the house an Associated Press dispatch from Canberra, Australia, in which it is intimated that the suggestion has just been made in Australia's legislative body that all the British dominions should send their most senior representatives, preferably their prime ministers to a British empire conference for the purpose of "devising general strategy for winning the 1947 battle for Britain". I would ask the Prime Minister if Canada would be prepared to participate in such a conference and what his views are towards the suggestion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to know what is meant by a conference in aid of winning the battle for Britain. I do not wish to commit myself to any view that there is a battle for Britain to be won at this stage. I believe that Britain is well able to look after her own troubles just now, without anticipating that there is going to be a battle that will require all the dominions to assist her. I would prefer to say nothing about the dispatch until I receive something official.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that it is the economic battle of Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know what is meant.

HONG KONG

DEDICATION OF CEMETERY TO CANADIAN SOLDIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, in view of a recent press announcement in reference to the dedicating of a cemetery on the outskirts of Hong Kong, where the remains of some three hundred Canadian victims of the Hong Kong tragedy are said to be buried, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether the names of those soldiers are to be published, or are all available particulars to be forwarded to the next of kin?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has said, the cemetery for Canadian soldiers who died at Hong Kong was consecrated and a memorial service was held for them on the first of July, Dominion day, of this year. My understanding is that the names of all those buried there have been or under existing arrangements will be communicated to the next of kin. If that has not been done, I will see that it is done.

AIR TRANSPORT

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND SWEDEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the government of Canada and the government of Sweden have concluded an agreement for air services between the two countries. This agreement is similar in form to previous bilateral air transport agreements already concluded by Canada.

The agreement provides for an air line of each country to operate a return service originating in its own territory and terminating in or passing through the territory of the other country, and includes an exchange of third and fourth freedom traffic rights. The route to be operated by the designated air line of Sweden is from Stockholm via intermediate points to Montreal, and the route laid down for the designated air line of Canada is from Montreal via intermediate points to Stockholm. Since, however, Canada does not propose to operate an air service to Sweden in the near future, the agreement makes provision for subsequent review of the services to be performed by the air lines of the two countries at such time as Canada designates an air line to operate scheduled services between the two countries.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT WITH RESPECT TO AGE OF RETIREMENT, ETC.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act by providing a new and extended definition of civil servant and civil service; changing the age of retirement; amending the conditions upon which contributions may be made to the superannuation fund and benefits paid therefrom; and by a comprehensive addition to the act covering temporary employees in the service.

Mr. BOUCHER: Is the minister going to make an explanation at this stage?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will make an explanation when we are in committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I wish to give a brief summary of the main provisions of the bill which this resolution precedes and of the reasons which have led us after careful consideration to recommend the changes which it proposes to make in the present law.

Several of the amendments contained in the bill are based on recommendations of the special parliamentary committee set up in the session of 1939, which were not acted upon in 1939 or subsequently when the act was again amended in 1944. Other changes are necessary to permit war service to count for superannuation in certain cases additional to those now covered. Other changes covering temporary employees, retirement age, entry into the service from pensionable employment, eligibility for superannuation of persons appointed for a fixed term, and the types of benefit available to such term appointees and to persons retiring voluntarily or for other reasons before the normal retiring age, have been found to be desirable to provide a superannuation plan suitable to meet the constantly growing variety and complexity of conditions in the public service of Canada.

In regard to the age of retirement, the house will recall that under the law as it now stands the age for voluntary retirement is sixty-five years and the age for compulsory retirement seventy, subject to extension by order in council for a further period of five years. The 1939 parliamentary committee had recommended that these ages be reduced to sixty and sixty-five years respectively, and the royal commission on administrative classifications in the public service recommended that the Superannuation Act should be so amended as to permit of superannuation in certain cases at the option of the government at age sixty for men and at age fifty-five for women. The superannuation committee of the civil service has also recommended earlier retirement ages than now prevail, feeling that general earlier retirement would make for greater efficiency in the public service "not only by separating those whose efficiency may have diminished but by accelerating the rate of promotions in the service which very frequently are much delayed in large portions of the civil service in existing circumstances."

The government has therefore decided to reduce the voluntary retirement age to sixty for both men and women, and the compulsory retirement age to sixty-five for both men and women, subject to extension year by year for a further period of five years by order in council on the recommendation of the head of the department and the treasury board for reasons of peculiar efficiency and fitness for the position. The bill is so drafted as to implement this decision but the new provisions will not require any contributor to be retired by reason of having attained the age of seventy years until at least two years after the coming into force of the legislation. Provision is also made that effective August 1, 1957, additional retirement benefits may not accrue after the age of sixty-five years. This provision will strengthen the effective application of the compulsory retirement age of sixty-five years. We believe that these changes, while perhaps increasing slightly the financial burden on the superannuation fund itself, will nevertheless make for increased economy in the public service because of greater efficiency and improved morale.

Perhaps of greater importance are the changes we are suggesting in order to increase mobility of personnel to and from the civil service. The present act, it will be recalled, empowers the governor in council to grant annuities only after a minimum of ten years' service and only if the contributor has reached retirement age, or is incapacitated, or is retired because of abolition of office or inefficiency. In every other case of a retirement, the only benefits provided by the act are either withdrawal of contributions without interest or a gratuity of one month's salary for each year of service. This involves a serious and almost prohibitive financial barrier in many cases to voluntary retirement and is a major contributing factor to rigidity in the public service. The plan was obviously developed primarily to meet the needs of permanent employees in a career service, and even in this field it is subject to serious difficulties—first, from the employee's point of view in subjecting him to too drastic a penalty in case he wishes to leave the service, and from the employer's point of view in making it difficult to get rid of unsuitable or incompetent employees, clogging the channels of promotion, and so on. For other than permanent employees, however, it is obviously most unsuitable.

As a consequence, special provision has had to be made in various acts of parliament for special superannuation benefits to members of boards and commissions in some cases, while in a good many other cases there exists the unfair and discriminatory situation of a lack of provision for retirement benefits of any kind whatsoever. There are also other cases where a sound personnel policy makes it desirable to appoint employees only for a fixed term. This is the situation, for instance, with substantial numbers of employees of the national research council and the defence research board. The need for some kind of retirement plan has led the governor in council in certain cases to authorize the establishment of separate pension plans. However, the development of a variety of pension plans, applicable to different groups and classes of employees in the public service, tends to constitute in the view of the government a constant source of dissatisfaction. If different pension plans are established for special groups in the public service, demands inevitably arise from interested parties for the most generous features of all plans. Consequently, our efforts in the bill before the house have been directed to making the Civil Service Superannuation Act suitable for application in a considerably wider variety of circumstances than at present and in general a sounder and more efficient instrument of employment policy.

The changes which are proposed to this end are somewhat complicated to summarize but their details will become clear as the individual clauses of the bill are examined. Broadly speaking, they involve elimination for most purposes of the ten-year rule, and provision for granting deferred or in some cases immediate annuities where at present only a return of contributions or a gratuity may be granted. As a result we are able to extend the act, under certain conditions, to term employees and to members of certain boards, commissions and corporations. A list of boards, commissions and corporations the members of which are included automatically in the eligible category is given in an appendix to the bill and power is given to the treasury board to add to this list and to designate as eligible, employees, either individually or as members of a class, who are appointed for a fixed term of years. Any civil servant who becomes a contributor under the act will henceforth be able to carry with him on separation from the civil service for any reason other than misconduct his accrued pension benefits in total, if he has completed twenty years' service, and on a reduced scale if he has not completed twenty years' service.

Under the present act, a civil servant who becomes a contributor and who retires, before he has served ten years, receives either a gratuity of one month's pay for each year of service or a withdrawal of contributions without interest. In future, a permanent civil servant with less than ten years' service who retires voluntarily before age sixty, and any member of a board, commission or corporation or other term appointee who becomes a contributor and retires on completion of a term of appointment, will be entitled, as an option to the benefits mentioned above, to an adjusted annuity, deferred to age sixty. This adjusted annuity is the amount of the ordinary superannuation annuity adjusted downward by one per cent for each year of service less than twenty. To illustrate: a contributor who resigns voluntarily at say age fifty-six after twelve years of service would have the right to an annuity beginning at age sixty equal to 92 per cent (100-(20-12)) of the normal superannuation annuity, while a member of a board who had completed at say age fifty-two a term of appointment of seven years would be entitled to an annuity starting at age sixty of 87 per cent of the normal superannuation benefits for such a term of service. On the other hand, if in either case the cause of retirement was incapacity or age, then the contributor would be entitled to an immediate annuity for the adjusted amount. Similarly, if in either case the termination of employment was due to death, the contributor's widow and his children would be entitled to the normal proportions of the adjusted annuity beginning immediately. If in the above cases the permanent civil servant or term appointee has more than ten years' service, the corresponding annuities to himself if the cause of retirement was age or incapacity or to his widow and his children in case of his death in the service would be payable on the basis of the full rate. In other cases the corresponding annuities would be payable on the reduced basis for service of less than twenty years. In the case of abolition of office the annuity for those having more than ten years' service will be payable immediately, but for those with less than ten years' service, it will be deferred to age sixty. In the case of retirement for inefficiency after ten years' service, the present provision for payment of an immediate annuity equal to 50 per cent of the full rate until age sixty-five and to 66⅔ of the full rate thereafter is dropped and instead there is provided what seems to me the far more satisfactory treatment of a deferred annuity, payable at age sixty, and adjusted for the number of years of service as outlined above.

This very brief summary explains the principal new provisions relating to retirement or transfer from the service. The counterpart of these provisions is a section of the bill which is designed to encourage mobility into the service. It enables an employee who enters the civil service from an employment in which he was subject to a pension plan to count his period of employment in such "pensionable employment" as service for the purpose of the Superannuation Act, if his separation from such employment involves the loss of pension benefits under the said plan and if he elects to contribute twice the amount of the regular contributions with interest (in order to cover his own and the government's share). Such contributions in regard to past service so purchased are to be based on the contributor's salary immediately after his appointment to the service. Pensionable employment is defined as any employment designated by the treasury board as employment in respect of which there was an established superannuation or pension fund or plan.

This privilege has been extended to a limited extent in the past in the case of certain special groups such as provincial government employees transferred to the unemployment insurance commission or the Department of National Revenue. It is now proposed to give it the more general application outlined above, in order to facilitate the recruitment of persons who might make a valuable contribution to the public service but who are now debarred from entering it because of the heavy financial sacrifice they would have to make by giving up their pension rights in their present employment and their inability to secure immediate comparable protection in the service.

I come now to a series of amendments which extend the benefits at present enjoyed by war veterans.

Provision is being made to count the period of absence of a contributor who resigned to enlist or of an employee other than a contributor who resigned to enlist or was granted leave of absence to enlist, if he served on active service overseas—subject to payment of contributions on the basis of salary of the contributor or employee immediately prior to his enlistment. In the case of a contributor who resigned to enlist—that is, a permanent civil servant who resigned and got his contributions back—his service in the civil service may be counted on payment of his withdrawal allowance plus interest at 4 per cent from the date of payment to him to the date of his election to count such service.

This provision reopens the privilege of electing to count service in world war I to certain employees who were given the option of counting such service in 1940 pursuant to recommendations of the special parliamentary committee. A small number of eligible persons failed to take advantage of the opportunity at that time and they will be given another chance. In addition, employees who served in world war II will be given the opportunity to count their service in similar circumstances. The permanent civil servant, who was subject to retirement provisions at the time of his enlistment, may count his period of absence on active or full-time service with the forces during world war I or world war II without contribution, provided that in the case of world war I he was granted leave of absence. With these added provisions, all persons who were employed in the civil service immediately prior to enlistment may count their period of absence on war service, except those who were not contributors or resigned to enlist and did not serve overseas.

There is another new provision relating to war service. From time to time we have had representations that employees who served overseas and who have since entered the public service should be allowed to count war service although they were not employed in the public service prior to their enlistment. While these representations have been considered with a good deal of sympathy, it had to be recognized that to extend benefits to a comparatively small group of veterans through the superannuation account would hardly be fair to the great body of veterans entering other employment, to whom such benefits would not be available. As I mentioned earlier, we now propose to allow certain service in pensionable employment outside the civil service to count on payment of double contributions. While war service could not be categorized as this type of employment, we are nevertheless proposing that veterans who were not civil servants prior to enlistment be given a similar privilege. This, we believe, will meet the problem where the counting of such service is of some consequence in building up an adequate pension and is, at the same time, eminently fair to all veterans.

Another important provision of the bill is the continuance, on the basis established by order in council during the war, of contributions by temporary employees to the retirement fund. The problem of temporary employees has received a great deal of careful consideration. At the moment the situation in regard to temporaries is abnormal and, although the matter is being dealt with as expeditiously as possible, it will be some time yet before the public service reaches a normal level in this respect. In the meantime, we consider it inadvisable to disturb the present plan which has worked very satisfactorily during the war and under which the employee contributes to the retirement fund and receives on retirement the amount of his contributions plus interest at four per cent.

There are a number of other amendments, including provision for a minimum return of contributions in all cases, the establishment of $15,000 as a maximum amount of salary countable for purposes of the act, and some minor changes required to give consonance to the act and to meet circumstances which have developed since the act was last amended in 1944.

In conclusion, I express the hope that the amendments I have outlined will commend themselves to the house. We believe that they are in accord with modern developments and progressive thinking in the field of personnel management and pension planning. We hope that some of the principles they now incorporate into our superannuation plan will be favoured by an increasing number of employers and that the Canadian worker will not be unduly restricted in his freedom of choice of employment by severe penalties involved in the loss of all accumulated pension benefits should he change his employment. We would like to see a more general acceptance of the principle that retirement provision is earned in respect of each period of employment.

I thought that on the resolution stage I would give this explanation of the general purposes of the bill, in the hope that the committee would allow the bill to be introduced and given first reading and be distributed to members so that they might study it over the week-end. Then, if it were the wish of the committee, we could have the main debate on the second reading.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave in introduce Bill No. 415, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the bill ready for distribution?

Mr. ABBOTT: The Clerk says it is ready.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

41. Departmental administration, $1,534,144.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In introducing these estimates of the Department of External Affairs I do not think it is necessary to say much to the house about the international situation generally. I will, of course, where appropriate, attempt to answer any questions which may arise out of these estimates and which concern that situation, but I think the general picture is sufficiently clear to those who read to make any public explanatory comment almost superfluous.

Though we must admit that picture is not a cheerful one, I am sure we all feel that there is no reason to become panicky. On the other hand, of course, it would be folly to ignore the fact that there are difficulties ahead and that those difficulties might possibly develop into serious dangers. To assume a complacent attitude is certainly not warranted by the facts. Realism is the best foundation for national and international policies, and a realistic analysis of the situation at the present time cannot be said to give much cause for too great optimism.

What might, I think, become a serious danger to the peace of the world is its division, both politically and ideologically, into two great groupings. Somehow, methods which can make possible peaceful cooperation, political and economic, between those opposing groups, must be found. The sources of fear and suspicion between them must be removed. It must be the first objective of every country's foreign policy to avoid, or do what it can to heal, these tragic divisions. No government of men of good will can accept the irrevocability of any development of this kind. No government, least of all the Canadian government, can accept the view that there is any fundamental hostility or division between the common peoples of the several nations. Such hostility or division, however, in this age of mass propaganda, can easily be created by ruling groups whose authority rests on the power they exercise rather than on the freely expressed will of their peoples. If somehow we can break through the fog of ignorance and misrepresentation which seems to surround certain peoples, international affairs will be conducted in a much more sincere and amicable fashion. No fog of this kind obscures the vision or judgment of our own people, because our way of life and rule is democratic and popular, not only in words but in reality. We are conscious of the will and aspirations of the people of our nation and we act accordingly.

Another source of our strength is the fundamental unity of our people, and of all parties in this house, on these matters of international consequence and on the principles of peaceful cooperation which must govern our relation with other states. These are times when one cannot help but feel that other principles—the creation of discontents and enmities, the emphasis on the influences which divide rather than on those which unite men—unfortunately prevail in some other quarters. It had been hoped, and indeed it is still hoped, at least as far as I am concerned, that the united nations can be the agency to counteract these dividing forces, that it can act as an organization of civilized states within which universal and friendly co-operation will become possible and should be realized. It is because it still thinks that this can be done that the Canadian government feels that the growth and strengthening of the united nations must be a real cornerstone of Canada's policy in foreign affairs. It would be folly to disparage the organization merely because it has not, in its short history, already accomplished all that we hoped for from it. The weaknesses which have been displayed make it all the more necessary that support for it be strong and steadfast with a view to removing those weaknesses At the same time we must not complacently allow any one state or group of states to use the united nations for their own selfish national or propagandist purposes. It must be a form for the expression of the collective will of all peoples and not a sounding board for false and misleading propaganda.

Within the united nations there is room, of course, for closer associations not inconsistent at all with the ideals of the world organization. One such association which day by day and every day proves its enduring value is our commonwealth of free British nations, which during the last few months has in recent developments again shown the genius of the British people for adaptability and political wisdom.

Within the united nations there is room also for the closest and most friendly cooperation between Canada and the United States. That cooperation has been strengthened during the year, and one reason for its strength is that it respects the sovereign independence of the parties to it. The United States, of course, is a great country; Canada is a much smaller one. But the relations between the two are based not only upon frienship but upon scrupulous respect for each other's rights. The intimacy and friendliness of this cooperation bears no threat to any other nation. We would hope that our collaboration, for instance in the north, could be extended to include other interested powers. On our part there is no reason why this should not be done. We seek the closest and friendliest contacts with all northern powers so that the development of that great area of the world may be for the welfare and progress of all peoples, and that it take place without the kindling of national envies or national fears. Also our association with other nations of the western hemisphere is growing in friendship and mutual value. The development of our diplomatic contacts in Latin America are one reflection of that growth.

I do not think it is necessary to make any more general observations. I think all hon. members will agree when I say that the foundation of our international policy must be hostility toward none, and peace and friendship with all. That, of course, is not a foreign policy in itself; but it is a statement of the principles upon which foreign policy must be based in order that peace may be maintained.

It certainly is no exaggeration to say that should there ever be another war, what we have experienced in the past in the application of human ingenuity for purposes of destruction will be merely child's play to what this unhappy planet would be subjected to in the future.

As to the activities of the department during the calendar year 1946, they were in broad outline stated in the report of the department for that year which I tabled some time ago. two matters of major concern in the department during the past six months have been, precisely, the united nations and the European peace settlement. I mention the two subjects together purposely, because it has become increasingly clear that the future of the world organization upon which we embarked when the Prime Minister signed the charter of the united nations at San Francisco two years ago will succeed only if political and economic reconstruction of the world is achieved sufficiently speedily and according to some coherent pattern.

We have therefore directed our attention closely to the European peace settlement. The government has recently secured from parliament approval of the treaties prepared with four of the satellite states, and in due course Canadian ratification of these treaties will be deposited. We know however that acts of ratification on this occasion, while ending a state of war, will not of themselves establish real peace, the real conditions for which depend, first of all, upon a reasonable settlement with Germany and then upon the implementation of a great programme of reconstruction.

In the light of the general frustration which has fallen upon the process of peace-making with Germany and Austria, our own efforts to take a reasonable part in that settlement may not seem to be of particular worldwide significance. There is no escaping the fact, however, that if we are to contribute, to the measure of our ability, to that settlement, we must deal with the problem of securing adequate means for the expression of our views. In this connection, as hon. members know from previous discussions on the subject, we have sought to take a practical line which would not interfere in any way with the initiative of the great powers in the settlement of Europe but which would, however, permit us to play an active and constructive role. We have formulated and prepared our views in this connection and we have also made constructive suggestions in regard to the settlement itself.

The conference of foreign ministers which met this spring in Moscow did not get very much farther than to consider in what ways they could define with unmistakable precision the major issues upon which compromise will have to be reached before it will be possible to proceed with the settlement. In some cases the area of disagreement is small, even though the issues appear to be stubborn and unyielding. It is clear, however, that a new effort at compromise will have to be made before further progress can be achieved. That effort is now being undertaken by the Austrian treaty commission to find a solution to the major outstanding problem in regard to the settlement with Austria. Certain questions with regard to Germany were also referred by the foreign ministers to their deputies, but we have not heard that any real progress has been made, since the foreign ministers themselves adjourned their meeting. Hon. members know that they are expected to meet again in New York, and that the further session is to take place in November. We are still hopeful that the work of peace-making will go forward in the near future, and we shall be ready to contribute to the full measure of our ability in that process.

In the meantime, we are doing all we can to support the expanding activities of the united nations. I should like to call the attention of hon. members particularly to the special session of the general assembly which met for three weeks during May to discuss the question of Palestine. This was an occasion of great importance. For the first time in history a great modern state, confronted with a difficult international problem, has turned voluntarily to an assembly representative of the nations of the world and asked for guidance and assistance toward settlement. It seems to me that we shall have achieved a very great measure of success in our efforts to establish a world organization if, within two years, we have created a body which can be looked upon as capable of dealing in a practical manner with a problem of that kind.

The future of the united nations depends, I am convinced, upon its ability to contribute to the solution of questions of this nature on a realistic basis and in a practical manner, rather than perhaps upon progress being made in respect of some of the other activities of its committees in formulating theories of world government. The Canadian delegation to the special session took, as we know, an active and constructive role. The Canadian delegate was chairman of the main committee of the assembly in which the greater part of the actual work was done.

I do not wish to offend his modesty, because he is sitting before me at the present time, but I do not think that in the opinion of the world there has been a man who has handled himself better in these international meetings than did the head of our Canadian delegation at Lake Success in May last.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I rejoice in saying that that is the opinion of the world at large, and not merely the opinion of his admiring fellow citizens in Canada. We have also accepted membership in the special committee which was established to report on the Palestine problem, and the Canadian member of that committee, Mr. Justice Rand, is in Palestine with the committee at the present time. I think that is striking testimony of our willingness to do everything that is within the power of Canada and the Canadian people to contribute to the reestablishment of world peace. That was a serious problem, one that was not ours but one to which we have made an important contribution, whatever the results achieved in the end may be.

We have also participated in the regular activities of the united nations. We have sent delegations to sessions of the economic and social council and other commissions of that body on which we were represented. We have attempted to relate the work of the united nations to the life of our own country. In the report to parliament on the united nations we have endeavoured to set forth, not only for hon. members but for the citizens of this country generally, the major issues which are now before the united nations. I am sure that hon. members have felt that the department did a pretty creditable job in connection with the report it published on the second part of the general assembly of the united nations. I feel free to say that because all I had to do with it was a little editing while it was being prepared. All the material was supplied to me by the hard-working officials of the department.

As members of the external affairs committee and the special joint committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms know, we have attempted in the discussion of subjects such as refugees and human rights to relate our activities in the united nations to our own interests in immigration and proposals for a draft bill, if it be necessary, on human rights in our own country. I have no hesitation in saying that the time and effort which we have expended in participation in the united nations has been justified by what has been accomplished up to the present time. We have reason to still continue to do our best to strengthen the united nations and to make it capable of performing the lofty purposes for which the charter was signed.

I shall be glad when dealing with the various items to supply such further information as to the new missions we have had to open, staff, the incorporation into the department of the Canadian information service, appointments, other international conferences we have attended, and generally the things for which we expended last year the money which was voted by parliament and for which we are asking parliament this year to vote the supply we are now considering.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister would answer a question with reference to the statement made in connection with offshore fisheries, a matter I brought up last year. The minister said earlier in the year that he intended to bring down a resolution in regard to Canada's attitude towards these fisheries. Will he make a statement now in the light of the fact that that resolution has not been brought down?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is quite right. It was stated in the house that it was the intention of the government to introduce a resolution to assert a policy that would in fact be in accord with that announced by the President of the United States, and drafts of resolutions were prepared to make sure that there would be a uniform policy for the western hemisphere. The terms of the resolution were discussed with our United States friends. So far it has not appeared that we had reached the point where we were both agreed as to the best form of language to be used, and for that reason it was felt that it might be preferable to wait until there had been complete agreement on the exact language before bringing the resolution before the house. I should like to give hon. members the assurance that as far as the government is concerned the general policy is in accord with that which was expressed by the President of the United States.

Mr. HAZEN: Will an act be passed by the congress of the United States, or is the proclamation which the President made sufficient? Are we to pass legislation here before legislation is passed by congress?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Those are precisely matters which are now under discussion. The two governments are in accord as to the aims to be achieved, but there has not yet been full agreement as to what is the best way of laying the foundation for an effort to get international agreement to the implementation of proper conservation methods for offshore fisheries.

Mr. HAZEN: Has there been correspondence with any of the other commonwealths, or have they been consulted about this principle? I do not say that is necessary, but I was wondering if that had taken place in the interests of conservation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The answer would depend upon the meaning one gives to the word "consultation." These are matters which are brought to the knowledge of the others, and the observations which any may have to make are welcomed and considered. The objective we are pursuing is to try to get a policy which will ultimately become world wide, and which can be implemented to the benefit of the whole of humanity.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few observations on what the minister has said and perhaps range a little farther afield. I should like to reassure the committee at the outset that I have no intention of making a long speech. I think I can settle for ten minutes, or fifteen minutes at the outside.

I think we should be grateful to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) for having given us this statement. In my short experience, and it is short, this is the first time that I have heard such a statement when passing these accounts.

I think it would be hard to disagree with a single word which the minister has said. For myself I do not see how any person who would not echo what he said about the desirability of working for the success of the united nations, however disappointing that may be at times, could retain his sanity. Otherwise it seems to me that the world would have lost all meaning.

I echo strongly what he said about the difference between those countries where freedom is practised and those where it is not. I find myself asking from time to time: How is it that people behave in the way that our friends on the other side of Europe behave? I have been able to answer it to myself only by saying that they are prisoners of the situation which they have set up, that they are no longer free to behave except in the way they do behave. I suppose their power depends upon creating those feelings which they have created, and that they have reached a situation where they are terrified of uncreating it for fear that the source of their power may slip and they themselves fall.

Having expressed, and expressed most sincerely, my thanks to the minister I now want to make some comments which perhaps are not ones of eulogy. I still feel that the members of parliament are left in the position of receiving a report after things have been done. I want to say very quickly, and I said it in this house the other day, that I think I have common sense enough to know that the government cannot come into this house and discuss in advance with parliament everything they are going to do. I do not mean that at all. What I mean can best be described by referring to what goes on in England. I suppose we can in some ways regard them as a model because they have been dealing in foreign affairs, they have had such experience; and of course foreign affairs is one thing when you are a small island off the coast of Europe and it is another thing when you are three thousand miles away, although that distance is becoming vastly less than we used to think it was. Nevertheless, we must admit that in England they have had this experience and no doubt it has given them a technique which we can hardly expect to attain overnight.

I looked up today to see just what had happened and I noticed that in February last there was a debate in connection with supply for foreign affairs. That was opened by the foreign secretary who spoke at length. There was a subsequent debate in May and a further debate in June. The foreign secretary did not open the debates in those cases, but he spoke in both debates. What struck me was that in those debates every opportunity was given parliament to make a contribution. Mutatis mutandis, what had been done there enabled parliament to do what parliament did yesterday afternoon when we were considering amendments to the criminal code. There was a discussion across the gangway by hon. members on both sides who had experience in these matters, and the result was a meeting of minds.

I am not suggesting that that can be done exactly in connection with foreign affairs, but I am suggesting that if it were possible to have from time to time reports such as we have had today, with perhaps a little addition—I shall refer to that in a moment—then two things might happen. First, this house would be better informed and, second, the people of Canada would be better informed and I think that is important.

I should like to say a word further on another point. I notice in particular how Bevin in his speech last February closely related economic things to political and diplomatic things. If I heard him accurately, the minister made no specific reference to what I suppose is the most important thing affecting our welfare, the meeting at Geneva. I fully realize that that primarily concerns other departments; nevertheless I take it that it does concern also the Department of External Affairs to a considerable extent. I suggest that whatever the department be, the people of Canada and of parliament have been too long in ignorance. That is a most unsatisfactory position as regards that all-important matter. I suppose it is no exaggeration to say that our economic welfare —I do not want to say it will stand or fall—may be vitally affected by the success or failure of those proceedings. Subject to being corrected, I have been able to gain no knowledge of where we stand. As far as I know there has been no opportunity for anyone in this house to express his opinion on the general policy that we should follow. We know nothing of the instructions that have been given—and when I say instructions, again let me say that I am not seeking to get the fullest information, which can only be within the knowledge of the government itself; but I am suggesting that there could have been and should have been opportunities for this house to express itself on that all-important question.

Therefore while thanking the minister gratefully for what he has done and for this review, I feel that it is lacking in two respects: first of all in specific reference to these things which are so vital and secondly I feel that it should have been made earlier. It is earlier than last year or the year before, and we have time enough now without immediate pressure to discuss these things, but I suggest that a good deal still remains to be desired. Meanwhile of course decisions are made and have to be made, and as I said at the outset, we are in danger of becoming more and more a rubber stamp—I should not say becoming more and more but continuing to be a rubber stamp, which almost inevitably parliament had become during the war.

I should like to read a small extract from Mr. Bevin's speech in February last to show what I mean by saying that he had diplomatic and economic things in his mind. He said this towards the end of his speech:

> The present situation is very difficult. We want houses, and, in order to keep themselves warm, some countries are burning timber which we need for the houses. They cannot let us have the timber unless we can let them have coal. Therefore, we get a bottleneck both ways. They want goods, but there is a terrible vacuum in the world. I am constantly being pressed, first by one side and then by another, to try to help them to get supplies for which they are willing to pay.

I said a moment ago that I thought the practice which has been followed leaves gaps in our knowledge, and what is even worse in my opinion is that it leaves gaps which give rise to misunderstandings. The Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon spoke very warmly and to my mind very wisely in what he said not only about UNO but about other groupings in the world; he spoke about the commonwealth and what it had done, and he spoke about unity in this country. Of course compared with some countries we in Canada are united. Nevertheless I cannot feel that we have the unity in this country which I believe we could have if we had been able—and when I say "we" I am not speaking of any political party—if we had been able to talk more frankly and openly to each other about our difficulties.

Frankly I do not think we are a united country. I think there are great gaps, and the great problem in this country is that we should try to be frank about it and try to overcome them. They did not always exist. For a long time in the early history of confederation both old parties, and I take them as symptomatic of the political life of the country, were adequately represented throughout Canada. I can best illustrate that by saying that Sir John A. Macdonald was beloved and followed in Quebec just as Sir Wilfrid Laurier was beloved and followed in Ontario.

An. hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am glad to say that. Any Conservative would be glad to say that. That was a healthy situation for this country, and I believe we shall not have a healthy political situation in this country until that comes back again. I remember just before the last election a life-long Liberal friend of mine—I think I would be describing him correctly if I called him a Grit—said to me: "If you people can do anything to create a situation in the province of Quebec similar to that which prevails in Ontario where both old parties have substantial recommendation, you will have done a great thing for this country". We did not make a good job of it in the last election, but we are going to do better next time, and no fair-minded man who has the interest of this country at heart can for one moment deny that that is true.

Mr. CLAXTON: Deny that you are going to do better? That is denied.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I will say that we shall do much better.

There are two things to which I wish to refer as causing gaps in our unity: first, mutual distrust and suspicion, and the second in my opinion is the failure to make clear to ourselves what our true interests are. As to that distrust and suspicion it no doubt depends on a good many things, but I believe it depends on one thing to which I shall refer. I believe it is better to speak openly about these things and try to overcome them instead of pretending that they do not exist. It is better to face them openly and try to strike at the root of them and remove them.

I believe that one of the great reasons for distrust and suspicion is that there is a belief that there exist in this country a great many people who are not one hundred per cent Canadian, who somehow or other have a divided loyalty. I wish to say that outside of museum pieces such people do not exist. If I may for a moment speak personally, I am one hundred per cent Canadian both by birth and by conviction. Both my parents and some of my grandparents were born in this country. I say this about myself merely because I believe it describes virtually everyone else of my background in this country. I have a one hundred per cent loyalty to this country. There is no division of any kind in my mind. I am loyal to the commonwealth to, because I am a Canadian and because Canada is loyal to the commonwealth. I say this deliberately because I believe that if what I say could be accepted throughout the length and breadth of this country a great deal of the suspicion which has poisoned our lives would be removed. I say without fear of contradiction that that has been true of the great leaders of this party, of Macdonald, of Borden, of Meighen, and of Bracken. I was reading in Maclean's the other day a cheery article about Sir John. When Canada was asked to send troops to the Sudan back in 1885, Sir John asked what the Suez canal meant to us—showing how remote we were at that time, and also showing how one hundred per cent Canadian Sir John always was.

The second point I wish to make is this: we need a true appreciation of the vital interests of this country. The suspicion exists that there are people about who are not one hundred per cent Canadian but who somehow or other have the interests of Britain more at heart than the interests of their own country. In that connection I would like to read from a speech made in this house on June 9 by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) in the debate on visiting forces, in which he said this—and I quote this because I accept it and because I think every Canadian can accept it:

> When you hear a member from Quebec speak in favour of an accord with the United States, or in favour of privileges to be given the United States army, it is not because we in Quebec want to turn our eyes away from the British empire or the British commonwealth of nations and turn them toward the United States of America for good, leaving the former alone. It is just because we have the experience of the last war, because we want those two organizations, those two nations or groups of nations, to stand firmly on their feet right in front of the menace from without and from within.

I say that that is satisfactory to me and I am sure it is satisfactory to the members of this party, and if it is equally satisfactory, as I believe it is, to gentlemen on the other side, then why should there be any division on that point between us?

The next point I want to make is this. Just as in war time we cooperated most effectively and usefully with the United Kingdom and with the United States, so it is necessary for us to do it still. We are still part of the strength of both. The United States are so nearly self-sufficient that our usefulness to them may be less. Nevertheless in a debate in this house not long ago it became clear that we were a useful and necessary ancillary to their military preparations.

When we come to the commonwealth, of course, the need of us is far greater. We know the grievous losses suffered by the United Kingdom, and we know the difficulties in which the commonwealth stands, difficulties which have suggested to some people, to my mind foolishly and prematurely, that the commonwealth is in the process of liquidation. I wish to make this point—and I do not think the Secretary of State for External Affairs will disagree; as nature abhors a vacuum, so the world of politics abhors a political vacuum. All the best commentators that I have ever read, notably Lippmann, whom I respect greatly, have noted with extreme alarm the possibility of the British commonwealth losing its power and its beneficient influence.

I suppose we must face the fact that we have a great part to play in that respect. It is not altogether easy, because, as I say quite frankly, I do not think there is unity among us. I think that governments, and this government among others, have probably had to do certain things by indirection, perhaps not making too specific just the course they were following. I am earnestly suggesting that if these misunderstandings which I spoke of can be cleared up then that would not need to be done.

I have referred to the experience of Great Britain in the world of diplomacy, and I should like to read to the house just a word from an interesting statement which was related the other day by Sir Samuel Hoare in his book "Ambassador on Special Mission". He was inveighing against the iniquities of the Falange, and he says this:

> The rector of the great Dominican university in Manila said to me, "You must not lose your temper. If the British lose their tempers, all is lost in Europe." It was perhaps worth showing irritation to elicit such a tribute to my fellow-countrymen.

I think we can be very frank. It is quite true that we do not always find Englishmen the easiest people in the world to get on with. They are different from us. I do not imagine that Mr. Churchill was always the easiest person to get on with. They may find tiresome the little things that we lesser folk are interested in. Nevertheless I should like to go back and say that we have had the experience in two wars that the British are great people to be with in a pinch. And what is more important, going back to my first point in speaking about the commonwealth, the future of peace which hangs on a quite slender enough thread, however optimistic we allow ourselves to be, if you take the long view, the future of peace depends I believe greatly on the strength of the commonwealth. I remember a speech of Churchill which he made some time in the thirties. At that time he was speaking chiefly about the United Kingdom and its chance of survival. He based its chance of survival chiefly on two things. He said he thought the United Kingdom had as good a chance to survive as any nation, because it was more united and more experienced. It seems to me that just as the prelate in Spain said the other day to Hoare, that calmness, that self-confidence which we often find irritating, nevertheless is valuable to us all, just in the same way as our contribution to the commonwealth can be the plus quality of energy and of initiative and inventiveness which we have shown.

I am afraid that I have cheated a little on my indication to you, sir, as to the time I should take, but I am just about to finish. I have tried to make two points. I have tried to say something on this question of foreign affairs because I believe it is of enormous importance that people should come to know more about it. I do not see how they are to come to know more about it unless we of the House of Commons know more about it. Second, I have emphasized the question of unity in this country which seems to me of an importance which I cannot find words to express.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I have almost concluded, but I wish to express another thought.

I referred to the importance of unity at home, in a world confronted with so many difficulties and dangers. I emphasized that our country needs all her might and that she can achieve it only if sympathy and friendly understanding prevail among all sections of our people.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Such sympathy and understanding will materialize if we desire them whole-heartedly. For my part I sincerely and deeply long for them.

Finally, I believe that a nation is fortunate if her people show such understanding and sympathy, but it makes for the glory of a country if her citizens have those feelings, and in addition strive to achieve a common objective.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

(Text):

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): My remarks shall be even briefer than those of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, not because I do not think there are many things that could be said about foreign affairs; but the more I consider the world situation at the moment the less am I convinced that any good could be achieved from what I should like to say. Consequently what I shall say under the circumstances may not be very important.

I missed a part of the minister's statement because of being called out of the house. If what had gone before what I heard was of the same quality as the part of the speech I heard, I wish to congratulate the minister on what he said.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who has just taken his seat, referred to the fact that we were not a united people. Taking the limited view of our affairs perhaps that is right, but I believe that today if the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) stated correctly—and I believe he did—the foreign policy of this government, then the house is fairly well united on that foreign policy because it is based on the united nations. While there may be some disagreement between us on this or that point, so long as the policy of the country is based on the united nations charter I do not think there will be any wide differences between us. Of course today, for reasons of which we are all aware, the united nations organization moves extremely slowly in the settlement of world problems, and I believe that in various matters this country cannot wait altogether on the united nations. It must do certain things on its own behalf, so long as these things are not contrary to the principles of the united nations charter—and at the moment I cannot recall any of our relations with other countries which go beyond the charter. I too am in favour of the utmost cooperation among the members of the commonwealth. I am in favour of that to any extent beyond where the commonwealth would act as a block in opposition to member nations of the united nations. In my opinion nothing but good can accrue both to ourselves and to the world from the closest cooperation within the commonwealth. Today I think we are within a few days of the time when the self-governing nations which comprise the commonwealth will be enlarged by the addition of the two Indian sections which will remain within the commonwealth at least for the present. I think it is a matter for rejoicing that that transition was made in the way it was. To me at least it is an accomplishment of the greatest importance.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to the necessity, if we were to have peace, that the political and economic affairs of the nations of Europe be put in order. I think we will all agree with that. It is said that man is a political animal, but I suggest that before being a political animal he is an economic animal, and that the first step in building peace and in putting the world's affairs on a stable basis will have to be the economic restoration of the world. And that includes, as a must, the reorganization of Germany and the setting up of self-government within that country. It will also mean the settlement of a peace treaty with Japan and the instituting of normal trade relations with that country. All these things are of the utmost importance if we are to build the peace for which the war was fought.

I think that one of the things that have retarded progress all over the world has been the demand in both Canada and the United States for an end to the restrictions and the cooperation which was so useful to us during the war—to get back to normal. The result of that is making it difficult for the countries of Europe today. They cannot reconstruct themselves, they cannot get back to stability without assistance from the United States and from Canada, and the removal of controls over prices has to a large extent nullified what these countries tried to do through borrowing. The values of these loans today are a fraction of what they were when the loans were made. That is so because of what has taken place here and in the United States and not because of anything that has happened in Europe. So I suppose what we shall have to do is to give as gifts what we cannot provide by way of loans.

It is the same conflict of interests that is making it so difficult to reach agreement in Geneva. It is not today at Geneva so much a question of conflicting ideologies as of conflicting economic interests between countries who have the same political points of view. Therefore until we resolve these economic contradictions in our system we shall find the restoration of normal conditions very difficult, if not indeed impossible.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred to the lateness at which these estimates were brought down, and he said that we have not time to debate them. The same was said last year and the year before, so I think that under the circumstances what must be done by anyone who wants to talk now is to talk, because if we forgo that we shall find the same obstacle at the next session. If we want to debate and question we shall have to debate it regardless of time.

As far as the Department of External Affairs estimates are concerned, we have had plenty of opportunity for discussion in the external affairs committee, and I doubt whether there are many items in the estimates that we disagree about. But again, as I said at the beginning, I do not think that any remarks I might make today would be of any great importance, and I shall leave it at that.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): The minister is to be commended for having initiated this debate, because, to use his own opening words, it brings, stark realities before the country. I think that many of the causes of division of opinion in our land rest upon diversity of what is accepted as fact. I believe that our people as a whole, if they could agree upon the facts, would almost inevitably be in agreement on any course of action.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If we could find the facts.

Mr. HACKETT: That being the case, the minister is to be congratulated on opening the discussion, because as a rule discussion tends to throw the truth into the open and to make it available to all those who seek it.

The minister has said that this country entertains hostility toward no one and sentiments of peace toward all. He was quick to add that that is not a statement of foreign policy. It is a statement of the attitude of Canadians toward one another and of Canada toward the world at large. We are not seeking the lands of other nations, and we are not seeking to impose our will upon other peoples. We want peace, and if evidence of the truth of that statement were lacking, it is possible that events which have taken place in this city within the last fortnight would convince the doubting that the people of Canada are solicitous for the maintenance of peace and have turned their eyes and addressed their prayers to the Almighty that He might give this greatest of boons to Canada to this tortured world. Nevertheless within our own time peace has twice vanished from the earth and all the nations have been engaged in deadly conflict.

A great war is not always a matter of human choice. It sometimes marks the point where events pass out of human control. It is a kind of social convulsion, an eruption of forces which lie dormant like the subterranean forces of a volcano on the slopes of which men build their cities and cultivate their fields. Wars do come, and it behooves peoples to be ready to meet the scourge when it comes to them. There has been diversity of opinion among Canadian people as to facts. An element in the country who are loyal citizens of Canada, who have been here for a long time, who are willing to make every sacrifice for the betterment of Canada and for the protection of her people, believe that we have no interest in wars which take place beyond our territory. That group is not extremely large but is eminently respectable, and it expresses opinion forcefully and not infrequently. Just to show how that element feels I turn for a moment to an editorial which appeared in Le Devoir a short time ago, in which the editor argued that the only way Canada could escape from the entanglements of war and financial difficulties was to cut loose from Britain. He states:

(Translation):

The only practical way for Canada to become independent is to proclaim herself a republic.

(Text):

Then he goes on to say that in South America states have become republican and in that way have achieved their entire independence; and he intimates that it is probably for this reason that they have escaped war. I do not think this opinion is universally held in the province of Quebec; in fact, I know it is not. I know it is but the opinion of a small element. But being an opinion which is held, I think it is well that it should be openly expressed—in our country everybody is entitled to his opinion—and it is well that such opinions should be brought to the touchstone of discussion and debate; that their value be tested.

A series of articles was printed in this newspaper about that time, and I do not think it is going too far to say that the opinion expressed there was that Canada had no interest in either of the great wars, that she had uselessly wasted the lives of valuable citizens, uselessly squandered her treasure and uselessly burdened herself for all future time by participation in these wars. The reason for that point of view as I understand it—and it is always dangerous to attempt to make oneself the interpreter of the motives of others; I have no right to speak for the element whose views are so forcefully set forth in this newspaper—is that the group feels that the enemy which it has to fear is an element or elements within Canada which might be hostile to the culture, the religion, the language and the way of life of the French people. They make frequent references to methods of taxation which they think are unfair, to reluctance to accord the privilege of speaking over the radio in their own tongue, and sundry other matters of the kind. As I understand the attitude of that group, the possibility of Canada being overrun by an enemy or subjugated by force of arms is something which has never come upon their horizon. The possibility that Britain might be defeated in the field, as I understand it, has never occurred to them. They believe in the enduring supremacy of British arms as ardently as ever any little boy believed in the supremacy of his father.

I am saying these things, not to be disagreeable, but in an effort to bring before the house an explanation for the attitude of eminently decent Canadians. They call everybody an imperialist who seems to differ from them on this point. When Canada took up arms with Great Britain, France and the United States they deemed that Canada was making a mistake and that she was urged into that position by an element which they style imperialist, by an element to whom the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred a moment ago, namely those people who, having to choose between Canadian and English or British interests, would always sacrifice the Canadian interests for the British or imperial.

I believe there may be some people like that in Canada because in most large groups of population one generally finds a few extremists. However I think their number is very limited. Some day I should like to meet a person of that kind because so far I have never met one. I believe all Canadians are devoted and loyal to Canada. They give their first, their abiding and continuous allegiance to Canada. If some have gladly taken up arms in other wars it is because they desired that Canada be a good place for their children to live in, exactly as the element to which I have referred, desired the same thing for their children. They conceive however that the peril is not a local one. These people who are called imperialists were the people who feared that if the world were overrun and dominated by a combination of Germans, Italians and some of their satellite countries, our country would be overrun and dominated by these elements, our liberties would disappear and our lives would cease to be the lives of free men.

These people loved Canada no less than the first group; but they are not in agreement with the first group as to where lies the great danger to Canada. And seeing that danger of foreign aggression they made common cause with the others to defend Canada.

A debate of this kind affords an opportunity to discuss coolly and, I like to think, quite beyond the scope of party controversy, these questions of external affairs, where truth may be known in its fulness, and where wise decisions may be taken in the light of that truth. I am one who likes to believe that if frank and full discussion of this type can be had with reasonable frequency there would be developed a public sentiment based on the acceptance of essential facts which would do much to bring complete harmony to elements which may have been somewhat out of harmony in the past.

Oh, sir, I am not suggesting that people of one racial strain can be expected to have all the enthusiasm for the glories of the past of another racial strain that they have for their own. No; that is against nature, and it is not necessary. What we need is agreement as to essential Canadian interests. We want peace; we want it beyond everything else. We want to be free to live our own lives, to grow up and to develop; and as part of that programme we must be in a position to defend ourselves should war come.

And war does come, whether we will it or not. In the past it has come twice within the memory of all within sound of my voice. If we can so determine the course we are to follow as to bring ourselves into complete internal harmony, then I believe a great deal will have been accomplished to maintain peace. Nothing is more provocative of war, nothing does more to encourage the aggressor, than evidence of division among those whom he would attack.

Canada must realize the great treasure of which she is custodian. When I say "treasure" I refer not only to her wealth and her broad acres. I mean that she is the depository of the genius of two great civilizations which, if they have not fused, have so reacted upon each other as to engender a type of liberty, a type of freedom, a type of tolerance that has made us the envy of the world. We have that to protect, that we may ever hold it high as a beacon to those distraught nations which have suffered in the furnace of war. We have a double heritage: we are heirs to the culture of two great civilizations, the French and the British. We hold these as a trust. To be faithful we must defend them. The words of Victor Hugo depict this duty:

(Translation):

And, besides, true to the blood I have inherited from my soldierly father and my Vendean mother.

(Text):

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the committee for a few moments. My primary reason for speaking at this time is the fact that I have the great honour and heavy responsibility of having been appointed chairman of the committee on external affairs in 1945. That was an honour which I greatly appreciated. I knew from the membership of that committee that its work was bound to be a success. I am glad to state now, and I think all hon. members will agree, that to some extent we made a success of our activities.

The deliberations of that committee were on the same plane as those we have had this afternoon. There was no trace of partisanship. We dealt with matters more or less in an academic way and in the abstract. We all realized what was involved in the international and national questions which were dealt with. In external affairs the pivot of things seems to shift most rapidly. We found in our deliberations that a thing which was new today might be expected to be old within a few days.

I considered with some trepidation the first order of reference to the committee. I think all members of our committee will agree when I say that we brought forth an organism which I believe has proved to the country and to parliament that that standing committee has a place in our national life. The next order of reference was the extradition bill. I speak for myself, but I believe I am voicing the sentiments of most members of the committee. Our committee did not have the same power as the external relations committee of the United States, but opportunities were afforded to people from every section of Canada to express their opinions on certain matters. A certain amount of good publicity was given to our deliberations which I think has proved beneficial to both countries.

Last session there was an innovation as far as the committee was concerned. We were given as an order of reference the estimates of the external affairs committee. The doors of that department were opened wide and to some extent we were given wider latitude than we had before. In a word, and without taking any undue credit, I believe we improved even on the activities of the sittings in 1945. Last year there appeared before our committee representatives of the Zionist organization and of the Arabs who gave their views on the Palestine situation. I think a certain amount of good resulted from having those representatives appear before the parliamentary committee. They presented some very good briefs which received a lot of publicity, and on that score I believe much was accomplished.

The thing that struck me in our first deliberations was the knowledge of some of our members, such as the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Rose-town-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). These hon. members had had opportunities to see for themselves what went on in London, in Europe and in San Francisco. No doubt their knowledge and experience was an important factor in our discussions on international problems.

Early during the present session I had the good fortune to head a delegation of our membership to Flushing Meadows and Lake Success. I believe that every one who attended was greatly benefited from what he heard and saw. I was always a supporter of the old league of nations, and I am a still stronger supporter of the united nations. I am positive that some good is bound to come from the united nations. You cannot have representatives of 54 or 55 nations, representatives of all colours, all races and all creeds, meet sincerely in a deliberative assembly in an effort to solve the problems that confront the world as well as their own countries, without beneficial results. If I could have my wish at the moment it would be that every citizen of the world could assist in three or four or half a dozen of those meetings. I am sincerely convinced that they would come away converted to the necessity of the united nations and also of the great good it has accomplished and is bound to accomplish in the future.

I do not want to elaborate these matters because I realize the lateness of the session. However, I should like to pay a tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who was Secretary of State for External Affairs when the standing committee on external affairs was established. I want to thank him sincerely and every official of his department for the fine cooperation they gave. That applies just as forcibly to the present Secretary of State for External Affairs. Those two statesmen have brought honour, not only to themselves but to Canada as a whole through the way they have participated in international deliberations.

Speaking now as chairman of the committee I should like to pay a tribute to the members of the committee. I appreciated immensely the fact that they cooperated with me one hundred per cent. If we have accomplished anything it is due to every member of the committee, individually and collectively. One hundred per cent credit must be given to the members of the external affairs committee. I want to pay a sincere tribute to the officials who appeared before our committee. I can easily understand that when they were first called to appear before us they may have experienced some uneasiness, but the moment they realized the open-mindedness of our members, the moment they saw that there was no trace of politics in our deliberations, we received from them the finest cooperation possible. That was a revelation, not only to the members of the committee but to the whole of Canada through the reports of the committee. My hope at the moment is that that committee will continue to do in the future the good work it has done in the last three years. It has not been an easy job, but the government and parliament did the right thing in getting this committee to function. We must of necessity make our Canadian people more and more conscious of external affairs and international problems. No matter what we may think, we must at the moment to some extent be our brother's keeper. We cannot get away from that. We cannot erect a national wall around our country that will prevent us from seeing what is going on in the world outside.

One of the finest experiences I had when we were at Lake Success and Flushing Meadows this spring was to see the respect and love that the delegates of the united nations organization had for Canada and Canadians. That is easily explained. During the last two world conflicts we answered the call loyally and spontaneously to save democracy and fight for freedom and liberty, for Christianity and all the things we cherish so dearly, and now having gone into the battle to the limit so that our side may be victorious we go to the united nations organizations with an open mind. We seek no aggrandizement, no expansion of our territorial frontiers. We go there with only one objective in our minds, and that is peace, peace for Canada, peace for the whole world and for all time to come.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I rise to call the attention of the committee to the estimates of this department, amounting to $6,484,000, and to say that there is room for very wide differences of opinion on all important questions which relate to the peace of the world and foreign affairs. How does it come about that we have not yet had an opportunity, even though this be the one hundred and fifth day of the session, to discuss these very important matters? I would like to find out where Canada now stands as a nation in regard to external and foreign affairs. The old policy was: no commitments; parliament will decide. Just like the United States, which never had a foreign policy. They had a war with Spain and another war with Japan and two wars in our generation.

against Germany, yet until recently they never had a foreign policy. That was true of us. Our policy was one of wait and see; no commitments; parliament will decide. I was almost alone in this house between the two great wars in calling the attention of the government, especially before the outbreak of the second war, to the need of rearmament. But we saw the result of the policy that was followed.

And now where does Canada stand so far as our policy on external affairs is concerned? What are our commitments? As Mr. Walter Lippmann once said in his textbook on foreign affairs, our foreign affairs policy is something like an accounting system which shows you who are your friends and who are not your friends, and what are their commitments and debits and liabilities and assets. How do we stand as a nation, and is Canada able to carry out certain commitments? What are those commitments? And when, where and how are we to carry them out?

We were discussing the other day article 41 of the charter of the united nations. I looked up the Oxford dictionary definition to find out what "charter" meant. It gives: "written grant of rights by sovereign, or grants or privileges." The definition contained in the dictionary does not describe the charter at all. It is now turned into a phrase, Atlantic charter—U.N.O. charter. A lot of these charters are moonshine, or vague hopes of those who create them. When it comes to a showdown they do not amount to anything. What power has the government to carry out these Canadian commitments? Remember once before there was trouble with Italy in regard to Ethiopia, and this government passed sanctions. No sooner were the sanctions passed than we had to rescind them, if you please, because we were depending upon the league of nations and the league of nations depended on peace pacts and the Young plan, Dawes plan, scraps of paper and all that kind of thing. We saw the futility of it all. It led to the greatest war in history, and we shall be led into another one unless we stop, look and listen and do not make alliances unless we know how to carry them out.

What are those commitments, and when and where? Have they been made with the knowledge and consent of parliament? The answer is no. Parliament has never been consulted about them at all. One would think the officials were dealing only with their own personal affairs.

The last war closed nearly two years ago. The mother country and the dominions had to do it all alone for two and a half years during the last war. Two of our allies, Russia and the United States, came in because they were invaded. Russia no doubt had been in league with Germany. It came out in the evidence at the Nuremberg trials that Russia was ready to make a deal with Germany and call it off. Britain for two and a half years of the war went it all alone because of its pledge to Poland, save for the help of the dominions.

We have no foreign policy so far as the empire goes. We have ambassadors all over the seven seas. They occupy so many hotel suites and railway cars that it is appalling to think what is going to become of it all. It has now gone up by leaps and bounds to $6,500,000 a year—all the novice ambassadors and diplomats.

Where were we two years ago? Britain was at the zenith of her power. She had won the war; she was supreme. Where do we stand today, two years afterwards? We find that two of our allies who did not go into the war voluntarily but went in because they were invaded are now claiming supremacy, a place in the sun, and all that kind of thing, and dear knows what will be the end of it all. The empire will be dissolved if we do not have a foreign policy and allow things to go into liquidation, where the empire is now heading.

The Prime Minister has done a great deal of good work. He knows more about these matters than any of us, and I agree with what he said on Monday in regard to the treaties with Italy, Finland, Poland and other countries. Unless the dominions are going to hang together they are going to hang separately. None of us can go it alone. The Prime Minister was quite right when he said with respect to the treaties with Italy, Poland, Finland and the other countries mentioned in the resolution, that we could do nothing about them. We had ourselves to blame very largely for that, because we agreed to this settlement made at Potsdam, Yalta, Moscow and other places by the great powers. No doubt the best settlement was made, not in the interests of the peace of the world but because Mr. Stalin and the late President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill had agreed on certain things at several conferences that were held, and the small powers cannot alter a line of it. So we can do nothing about these treaties as a dominion, nor can the other dominions, nor any of the smaller countries. Once you signed at San Francisco the veto charter you signed your death warrant. You gave any one country of the four the right to veto the others. You used to play lacrosse, Mr. Chairman, and you know you could not talk back to the umpire or the referee. He had veto power to rule you off, and one of the four great powers can refuse to play with the other three and veto it all.

What has been the result of this policy? The United States want our place in the sun, and they are going to get it because there is nobody to stop them. Talk about what happened in India. You will wake up some day and find out what is going to happen there. United States and Russia are two great countries; they were our allies in the war. We hope that they will continue in peace as they did in the war. If the various parts of the British empire would hang together with the mother country they are in every way vastly superior in resources on land, sea and in the air, to the other countries I have named. This is the fourth of July. I am surprised that at the opening of the session today not one word was said about it by the government or by anybody else. We are proud of our great neighbour and ally. I congratulate them today on their great anniversary. They left the British empire. We had the President over here the other day. He and the Prime Minister have done a great deal for the peace and security of the world. I think our United States friends will appreciate us far more if we were to talk out in plainer language and tell what is going on, express the views of this country. I have always contended that between the two wars and during the last war we surrendered too much of our political, economic, military and social initiative to Washington.

They are a great nation, and as I say, I am surprised that at the opening of the house today not a word was said about the fourth of July. There is no union jack on the building today. Some days ago the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) told hon. members that two flags were sent all over the country to be placed on public buildings. Is that not right? That is what he said. He said the caretakers could choose either one, and that both were issued and they had his authority for it. When the President came there were quite a few union jacks around this building. I was glad to see them. There is still room for them, because parliament has not as yet adopted any change in this.

There is a very large body of public opinion in this country that is in agreement with the opinion expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on these small treaties. I am glad to see the Prime Minister has chosen the twelfth of July as the day for prorogation, because there will be many union jacks on the streets that day. I hope my good friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) will carry out what he said. He said he was going to ride in here on a white horse that day. I think he was talking in a humorous way, and to some new, young reporter who took it seriously. We appreciate what he has done.

Coming back to more sensible talk, I am surprised that we have not heard from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on this question.

Mr. KNOWLES: You will.

Mr. CHURCH: He is an eloquent orator. We have not heard from him yet on this topic. I am glad he is going to speak because during the dark days before the war his party said that they were going to depend on pacts and peace talks and all that kind of thing. They did not need an army or a navy, but would just depend on Washington instead of London and Glasgow for defence. That is what some of them said. My hon. friend was not in the house at that time; therefore he is not to blame for these views.

We are spending $6,500,000 on this department. Away back in 1898 Sir Wilfrid Laurier went to the Diamond Jubilee. He was first in the Diamond Jubilee procession. He told the people over there, "If you want our aid at any time, invite us to your councils." What is badly needed in this country is an empire conference. I made reference to that the other day. We should have had an empire conference long ago instead of the present policy of just being informed of events. Are we to sit still in the house and in the country and see the empire made a scrap of paper, scuttled and dissolved as is being done all over the world? Are we not interested in it? A million men went from the dominions in the first great war on their own status of sovereignty, autonomy and all that kind of thing. One million men went over there under their own status of their own free will. They were all volunteers. They went over there and fought for the mother country on their own sovereignty, status and autonomy. One hundred and thirty thousand fell on the field of battle, and a great former prime minister said that by that action they "changed the history of the whole civilized world." In the recent war history repeated itself. Here we are today practically out of the empire. Separatism abounds in this country. There is talk of changing the flag and the anthem. We have embassies all over the world. We are making our own treaties. It is now proposed that privy council appeals be abolished. There is one appeal that can never be abolished, namely, appeal by grace to our sovereign king. Every British subject all over the world today has the right of appeal by grace to the King of England who is King of Canada also.

In the British House of Commons the other day they discussed a change in the name "dominion". They have changed designation of the colonial secretary and all that kind of thing. They have struck out the word "dominion" and want to put in the word "commonwealth", to change our British North America Act or the term "Dominion of Canada". They cannot change that without an amendment in this country to that act. I warn them about that. We had a debate in this house on a motion by a private member which was rejected. That cannot be changed without amending the British North America Act.

The Statute of Westminster in 1932 was one of the greatest empire wrecking statutes we ever had. It was one of the reasons we had another war. New Zealand and Australia were exempted in five or six clauses, which they have only recently adopted. I believe an empire conference should be called immediately. I regret I was not here last Friday when tributes were paid to the late Viscount Bennett. Speaking in the House of Lords about a week ago he called for an empire conference. Mr. Casey and Mr. Fraser did the same thing. He said that an empire conference should be called to go into the position of the empire with the mother country for the future. He said that in the days to come the empire was going to be dissolved. He said as follows:

> We have not had an imperial conference for some time at which all of the commonwealth was represented and we have no parliament which speaks for all. We, therefore, are developing separate policies in the various nations of the commonwealth and you cannot have a commonwealth last long if all the nations that comprise it are developing separate policies.
> What we are facing is the greatest crisis this country has ever faced—and the epitaph has been written in cold-blooded terms just as accurately as far as guessing can be accurate. Many countries believe we are through.

Others have expressed the same view. We had the able representative of Australia, Right Hon. Mr. Bruce, in London for thirteen years. He is no longer the high commissioner now; he has retired from the post he held for thirteen years. He is a man who did a great deal for the empire and was a soldier in the great war. He appeared in 1923 as a representative of Australia, the high commissioner in the old country. He was a great supporter of empire preference, empire councils and empire meetings all the time.

Then we had the statement made the other day by Sir Thomas Blamey, which was quoted in the Sydney Morning Herald of May 18 last. They have a lot of newspapers down there, and you can find some of them in the reading room. He said:

> That the maintenance of the Suez canal and other strategic points in the east has had and will continue to have a far-reaching effect on empire relations is evident to all. The future of empire unity centres in the canal. The enemy could go through the Red sea and cross the Pacific. They are talking about abandoning Alexandria as a base, notwithstanding that it has been one of the life lines of the British empire. We are in danger of parting with the Suez, Hong Kong, Singapore and all our other bases the world over, but where would we have been in the last war and in this second war if Britain had given up all her bases on the seven seas? The result would have been that Germany would have won the war. We can grant rights to the use of raw materials and to the use of bases, but sovereignty, never! When Mr. Menzies was here, speaking with emphasis, he made light of the differences between the dominions. He argued for empire unity.

The policy in the United States is something like ours, continued world peace and friendship with all nations. That is all very well as far as it goes, but no one in this house has yet told the nation exactly what Canada's policy is in external affairs. No one really knows where we stand because there is uncertainty, evasion and inertia, and the country and the house are both completely in the dark. The people are not given the facts, but are blindfolded. We are given very little information. No statement has been made by the government about our commitments abroad, about the questions of defence at home or outside Canada, or what our defence will cost us. In other words, we are repeating the error we made between the two wars.

Mr. Attlee said that he was much disappointed with the united nations organization during the past two years and that we were as close to a third war as we ever were, and it is disappointing that no one can tell what Canada's foreign policy really is. An external affairs committee was appointed to study this whole question, but nothing has been done. Trivial matters are discussed but no attention is given to the grave problem regarding the dismemberment of the empire which has been going on day and night since the government now in office in Great Britain has been in power. After the last war, Lord Milner asked this very pertinent question in 1922 at Oxford, how it was that the dominions were all willing to make treaties with every nation throughout the world but apparently were not willing to come together and map out a common economic policy among themselves for the good of the empire in view of world conditions. The fact is that all important questions are being left to executive action of this government and we do not know what is even said or done.

What has the empire parliamentary association really done? It seldom meets and it is so Washington-minded it seems to pay more attention to pan-American affairs than to its duties to the mother country and the British commonwealth with a view to keeping the dominions and the old land together, for which it was founded. We have not had an interim report from the government on what has been taking place in that connection.

We are still a part of the British empire. We still belong to the empire, and if there is trouble again we shall have to depend upon common action on the part of all members of the commonwealth. I contend that we are not doing what we should to hold the empire together. We are not going to be talked out of it, but will have to be fought out of it. I warned the government, when I spoke in this house at the time, in 1945, that the conference at San Francisco would be a complete failure. I had no confidence in it. Churchill did not go to it, nor did Mr. Stalin. It was really President Roosevelt's idea, and it was most unfortunate that he should have died at that juncture, after what he had done for civilization. I am opposed to the policy that came out of that conference and the veto fiasco. I contend that the government of the day must bear the responsibility for the foreign policy of this country so long as it remains the government. The responsibility belongs to the government and not to the opposition. It is not for the opposition to propose a policy, though I would emphasize that all parties in the house should line up to treat this question in a non-partisan spirit. There is no room for party considerations so far as the foreign policy of Canada is concerned. We are faced with questions of life and death, if we do not work in peace as we did in war, with America, Russia and France.

After the last war we had the league of nations, and what did it accomplish? It was responsible for the rebuilding of Germany. Britain and Canada lent the Germans money, and so did the United States. The result of the actions we took at that time—and when I say we, I mean all the nations that had fought against the Germans—was to prevent any real recovery in Europe. We lost two of our allies at that time, France and Italy, because attention was concentrated on building up Germany through loans. All that led to the second world war.

Besides helping Germany through the loans we made, we foolishly disarmed and threw away the finest army, navy and air force the world ever saw. We had notes and pacts and all sorts of things which we thought would bring about peace. We thought we could have peace by means of agreements, but we found to our sorrow that the pen is not mightier than the sword, and it only led to another war. And now the nations are meeting again at Lake Success—with what success no one knows. All that has been accomplished has been talk. It has rightly been described as a modern tower of babel. That is what Churchill called it. It is that and nothing else, fifty-four countries, talking twenty-one different languages.

Because of our failure to get together within the commonwealth we are, I contend weaker as an empire in international affairs than we were after the last war. I hope no one in this country will forget for a moment that we are still a member of the British empire, that the British empire has been our best friend, and that unless we hang together, we will hang separately. None of us can go it alone. If anything should happen it will mean the complete disruption and dissolution of the empire and Britain will be, like Denmark, but a little island country in the North sea. Does anyone want to see that? It will happen, however, unless we bestir ourselves.

It is interesting to note the views expressed by the New York Times recently. That journal remarked editorially, only in June of this year, that from the day the American colonies broke away from the mother country the United States had been dependent upon the British fleet for protection. That newspaper said:

> The members of that empire are our best friends and our nearest relations. Their friendship and their earnest desire to work with us should be encouraged in every possible way. But instead of any effort to work with the empire we have the strange scene of the Geneva trade talks which the British empire has attended, not as a powerful unit, but as a scattered and unrelated number of countries. We are not allowed to know what is going on there but we can guess.

Britain used her fleet to make the Monroe doctrine a reality in the western hemisphere. That doctrine was made effective because of the existence of the British fleet. In fact, the British navy was the Monroe doctrine. It was the British navy that safeguarded the freedom not only of the empire but of this hemisphere as well. Britain got the world peace, justice and security for four centuries, in the wars with Philip of Spain, Louis XIV, Napoleon, and twice with Germany in our generation, by her great command of the sea.

It is interesting to recall on February 4, 1899, Rudyard Kipling's poem addressed to the United States was published in MacLean's magazine and entitled "Take up the White Man's Burden." No man knew better in his time the load of the buoyant and expanding British empire. Perhaps Kipling said what is happening to-day—a bankrupt Britain, unable to carry the load as of old.

Turn about is fair play—the royal navy kept the shores and ports of the Americas inviolate against the predatory powers. For a century or more. Britain maintained peace in all the troubled spots of the earth and now two gigantic wars, ten years in all, have sapped British resources, and talking about the royal navy when Dewey went to smash the Spanish fleet at Manila it was a British admiral who signalled to a German commander to shy off and not barge in, or else!

That is true today.

To come to these estimates, what has been going on? What value do we get from them? We see these vast expenditures of six and a half million. They are of little or no value, and involve duplication in countries where we have trade commissioners and other officials.

In a return made to this house, our ambassadors and their staffs and retinue are shown all over the seven seas: in Buenos Aires, Brussels, Rio de Janeiro, Santiago, Nanking, Bogota, Havana, Prague, Copenhagen, Cairo, Paris, Berlin, Athens, Guatemala City, Rome, Tokyo, Mexico City, The Hague, Oslo, Lima, Warsaw, Lisbon, Stockholm, Berne, Moscow, Washington; and away over in India where the civil war is today, the greatest civil war in history. Then coming to Ottawa you find ambassadors. In fact, we are building up almost a standing army of these ambassadors all over the seven seas. We are shipping them houses and coal at fabulous costs to the people of this country. I can tell you this, that there is a useless waste of money through duplication. As I said the other day, some of them do not know anything at all about diplomacy. They have never had any training in it. Yet it seems we have the ambassador cure for employment in the city of Ottawa, at large cost. They have food, clothing and housing, a first secretary, second secretary, third secretary and various other secretaries, and all that kind of thing; and the people have to pay for it by taxation, which they cannot afford. I hope something will be done to reduce it. Our ambassadors are only novices, who learn by experience.

Regarding this particular matter of Russia, she was our great ally, and as was stated in a great British paper, and as I mentioned the other night:

Russia is too weak to fight anybody now, and will be so for many years to come. Even if she had superior armaments of the most dreadful kind she would not attack, though she might grow provocative, to the point of disaster preferring to see the capitalist world break itself up, if possible, without embroiling the communist world in war. This does not mean that the soviet government is not the enemy of the west. It is, and it must be. There is no escape from this. But equally, there is no inevitability about a war. If we in the west can keep our own houses in order and base ourselves so firmly that there is no danger of internal collapse we have nothing to fear from Russia. Either the Marxist theory is right, or it is wrong. If it is right, there will be war with Russia whether we like it or not, and Russia will ultimately, though not by any means immediately, triumph. If it is wrong, it is up to us to prove it wrong by keeping our heads and refusing to play the Russian game.

Then it goes on to say:

Nor is any purpose served by quarrelling with Russia. If there is any good left in us, we can afford to agree to differ. If there is not, then nothing matters. Our task is quite straightforward. We have to organize the British empire and Europe, wholly disregarding Russian threats and feelings, on sound and decent lines which will make for the contentment of the millions.

That is correct, and I believe it is true that we should have open diplomacy with them, because they suffered terribly in this war. They lost twenty million men. The cities and towns in eastern Russia and on the border of Germany were reduced to rubble. They are suffering greatly. I hope that we shall get and keep together with them as we did in the war.

With regard to lease-lend, how did lease-lend come about? Britain gave up bases all the way from Newfoundland to British Guiana to America on 99-year leases. Those leases ought to be cancelled for the protection given in the Atlantic, which Britain and the dominions gave during and after the war, keeping the axis powers from America's shores. The leases should be cancelled accordingly, and charged to lease-lend.

The question of India has come up. The other day I referred to it. I quoted authority for it, the June number of the National Review, and gave the page and the book:

The Viceroy of India, Lord Mountbatten, is in England by request of the cabinet. He has appointed June 2 as the day when the plans for handing over India are to be declared. At this eleventh hour the truth must be apparent even to those politicoes who have created the present situation, and the truth is that there is no one, neither group nor leader, to whom India can be handed over. If the Indians had been capable of self-government, if any Indian prince had been capable of imperial rule, the British would never have been established in the great sub-continent. We unified India; when we leave, the structure we have created will fall to pieces. It is this tragedy we are about to see enacted with an amount of suffering and destruction that will make the Balkans seem peaceful. Under the viceroy, one of Queen Victoria's great grandsons, we are abandoning the helpless peasants and workers in India to the savagery awaiting them at the hands of congress and of the Moslems. The funeral pyre is built and the Indian peoples, millions of them, are laid on it. The torch is lit, the fire is already smouldering. Let our Crippses, our Alexanders and our Attlees look at their handiwork and realize for once what their false policies lead to. Never before in our history has there been so bitter a betrayal of trust as this English scuttle from India. But Conservatives cannot lay the whole blame for this shocking chapter in our history on the Socialists and Liberals. True, they started the fire and fanned the flames, but it was under a Conservative Prime Minister, Lord Baldwin, that the India Act, which has led to the present chaos, was passed, and it was a Conservative viceroy, Lord Halifax, who threw the mantle of his great influence over the disreputable affair. Do any of these men realize even now their personal responsibility? We doubt it. They are unaccustomed to understanding what they see and quite out of practice in regard to the appreciation of reality. The news which fills our papers daily with accounts of massacres and burnings in Lahore, Amritzar, and elsewhere is the curtain raiser of the much greater tragedy that lies ahead. The destruction of wealth is already incalculable. Money and goods are looted and burned, hospitals are full of wounded. There are no longer enough English people to keep even a semblance of peace. The few remaining British officials have warned the viceroy that they cannot maintain order. Never was there so shabby an affair as this of our letting ourselves be tumbled out of the empire to which for two hundred years we have given order and justice.

I have about concluded, Mr. Chairman. I should like to say this, that had we not gone over the heads of the dominions we would have had an empire conference and this would never have happened, nor would we have the Indian situation, or the Palestine or the Suez situation. See what happened in India because we adopted a policy which has been against the security of this dominion, the other dominions and the empire. I can tell you this. It is a retrograde step for the people of Canada, the way things are going, and the loss of Suez is deplorable.

In conclusion, may I say that I am glad the government has given us an opportunity to discuss this. I have always been opposed to private meetings. I do not think there is anything in them. I believe the Prime Minister was quite right in what he said the other day, that the agreements with Italy, Poland and Finland should be studied, so far as we can study them. After that, in the recess of parliament, the executive or cabinet has full power to act for us. There is no doubt we shall be through by July 12, a fine time for get-away day. We have been here for seven summers. Last year we were here to Labour day.

I think it is the duty of the opposition to give the government every support it can, as long as they are right. But it is also the duty of the opposition to try to express some sentiments on these matters and criticism of them. I am glad there is enough freedom in this free parliament for me to express my views, because they are not only my views, but also those of a large and intelligent body of public opinion. I have always held consistent views. I believe that the British empire, for the past two or three hundred years, has been one of the greatest influences for peace, truth and justice. I am sorry to see what is happening to it by dissolution throughout the world, because I believe that the British empire, next to the Christian church, has done more for the world and for peace, justice, religion and civilization than any other organization or agency in all history.

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Chairman, I believe I can say in about two minutes all I have to say in reply to the remarks made by members of the official opposition. I refer particularly to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) and in passing, may I say that on a couple of occasions this afternoon I heard him described as the hon. member for Ontario-Muskoka. I am wondering whether since the redistribution committee began working on it, the name of his constituency has been changed. I knew, of course, that it had been eliminated, but I did not know it had been changed.

Mr. GRAYDON: Like Madawaska-Restigouche?

Mr. MICHAUD: The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred to a lack of national unity in this country. It seemed to me that he exaggerated somewhat a cleavage that is no more serious than is found in other places. As a matter of fact, I feel we are much more divided in financial matters, labour relations and controls, taxation, the united nations and other international organizations, private enterprise and nationalization. So I say that, so far as national unity is concerned, we are in no worse position than any other country.

Let us remember that in times of peace national unity is necessarily limited. In the United States, the United Kingdom and France there is considerable diversion of views on principal items of interest. We have the so-called union sacré in time of war only.

So I believe we should not be disturbed too much when we find that occasionally we disagree, or when Quebec disagrees with Ontario, or the maritime provinces disagree with western Canada.

I believe it was the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) who, speaking along much the same lines, dealt with what we might call the isolationist movement in some parts of the country and, in that connection, referred to Quebec. I suggest that this isolationism is not peculiar to Quebec. We saw it in the United States before the war. Indeed it was much stronger there than in Canada. Had there been no Pearl Harbor attack, I doubt very much whether the United States could have been induced to get into the last war. The same thing happened in world war I; if the Lusitania had not been sunk, perhaps they would not have entered that war.

So I do not believe we should be disturbed unduly over the so-called isolationism which may exist in some parts of Canada. On this point I would say a few words to the hon. member for Stanstead. I believe the greatest isolationist movement in Quebec at the present time is that conducted by the present premier of that province. Pick up any of the larger daily newspapers of Quebec and you will find, practically every day, one of those large-sized advertisements, published under the auspices of the Union Nationale, in which a concise and vicious statement is made some what along these lines, "Duplessis gives to the people of Quebec; the Liberals give to strangers." If there could be anything designed more accurately to cause isolationism and lack of unity in Quebec, I fail to see what it is. I believe that is the worst thing that could be done so far as national unity is concerned, and so far as any isolationism may be developed.

My advice to the hon. member for Stanstead would be this. His party is on friendly terms with Premier Duplessis. Indeed, we hear of talk of possible union before the next election between the forces of Duplessis and the official opposition. If the hon. member for Stanstead is in earnest about developing a greater amount of national unity in this country, let him bring his influence to bear upon Mr. Duplessis, and induce him to cut out this most despicable kind of political propaganda.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Chairman, first of all, may I express my appreciation to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the statement he has made this afternoon. I followed it with keen interest, as I am sure all hon. members did, and I believe the people in this country will be pleased to read that statement. I support it whole-heartedly because he announced definitely this afternoon the policy of the Canadian government and its whole-hearted support of the principles of the united nations.

I have followed with interest the meetings of the external affairs committee. I believe the work that committee has done this session is a considerable improvement over what has been accomplished by it in past sessions, if I may draw an accurate impression from a reading of the minutes of the proceedings of this and previous sessions. In my opinion, the reports now issued periodically by the Department of External Affairs are excellent, and I believe it is wise to supply hon. members with reports of that type. As a member of the house may I express my appreciation of that arrangement.

I also support whole-heartedly the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and other hon. members to my right who have urged the closest possible cooperation within the British commonwealth of nations. We often hear criticism of sections of the British commonwealth throughout the world, but I believe anyone who reads history carefully must recognize the great contribution the British commonwealth has made to the world in times of crises, and what contribution it is capable of making in the future.

I would ask hon. members to bear in mind that all empires have had some things to their credit, and that all have had disgraceful things in their records. That must follow in the nature of events as empires. But where in the history of the world would one find such a voluntary abdication of power on the part of a great nation as is found in the giving of self-government to the Indian people at this time by the government of Great Britain? Surely this indicates great progress and the possibility of development within the framework of the British commonwealth.

I believe the people of Canada—and I have met a great number of them, of all classes,—are anxious to have the truth. They want an objective approach to all these international questions. Give the people the truth. Let parliament and officials of the government have an objective approach to all international questions, and I am sure the Canadian people will be satisfied.

One hon. member speaking this afternoon said that world peace cannot be achieved unless it is based upon a sound economic foundation in all parts of the world, or words to that effect. I wish to direct my thoughts for a few moments along those lines. I believe our present international difficulties will not be solved unless we have great improvement in the economic condition of many millions of people in Europe and Asia. In that respect we hear the constant demand for the giving of materials and the lending of money to those people. I support such demands. But I say it is useless for us just to suggest that the government lend money at a low rate of interest or to furnish materials on a lend-lease basis to other nations, unless we are willing to support words with action.

If we are to be successful in doing anything to improve the economic position of these sub-standard peoples I maintain that we shall have to have sacrifice from all groups of the people of Canada. Industry will have to be satisfied with a lower rate of interest. Labour will have to forgo some of the immediate benefits which would flow from our productive machinery. Farmers, too, will have to make some sacrifice. But I am convinced of this, that if the government would give leadership to the people of Canada in an effective mobilization of our people, far beyond the confines of partisan politics, in support of a programme for peace based upon production, and toward the assistance of under-standard people, I believe without doubt the Canadian people would respond.

If the facts and necessities of such a programme were presented, the people of Canada would be willing and ready to make temporary sacrifices for peace and future development. If that were done, the unity of purpose so splendidly expressed in Canada during the war would return to serve the purposes of peace.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a few words. First of all, I want to express appreciation, which I think will be shared by all who are present, of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has found it possible to remain during this debate. We know of his heavy responsibilities, and the fact that he has stayed indicates his realization of the great importance of these matters, not only to Canada, but to the entire world. There is one suggestion I should like to make to him in his capacity as leader of the Liberal party. As we all know, each of the parties in this house has certain free time on the national hook-up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and I should like to suggest that at as early a date as possible arrangements be made for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) to speak to the people of Canada along the lines that he followed when speaking to this house today.

These are times when the headlines in the papers from day to day tell us of the discouraging things in the world situation. We must be realistic; we must know about these things, but it is also important to have our attention turned to fundamental things as the Secretary of State for External Affairs did in his remarks when opening this discussion. It seems to me that more attention should be paid by all the political parties in this country to international affairs in an endeavour to educate our people more about these matters and also to dispel fear by instilling faith in the things that are fundamental.

I am not going to attempt to make a poor rehash of the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I did appreciate in particular his reference to the fact that the united nations must be the cornerstone of Canadian foreign policy. I was impressed also by his reference to the fact that the source of our strength in this country and in other western countries is in our fundamental unity. I suggest that there is in those words the goal at which the entire world must aim. I suggest that we shall not have peace and the strength that goes with it until we achieve more unity among the peoples of the world.

I urge that in Canada we should place all the emphasis we can on the things that unite the peoples of the entire world. As I was listening to the remarks of the minister, I felt that there must be in his mind the wording of the charter of the united nations which is cast in these terms, "We, the peoples of the united nations." He spoke about the united nations and the attempt to achieve the collective will of all the people. In other words, there is in that approach a recognition of the fact that what we are trying to build in this world is not just a great get-together of nation states; we are trying to achieve the will of the peoples of the entire world for peace and human accord.

The fact is that all peoples do desire peace. That is one of the things which can unite us. I urge that we place more emphasis upon that fact. It is easy enough for us to recognize in others tendencies in the opposite direction, but I think we should go out of our way to discover the desire for peace that is in the hearts of the people of the world around. There is also a desire all over the world for economic reconstruction and economic well-being. I urge that our foreign policy and our discussions and talk about these things should centre a great deal more around that fact.

There is also a common desire among the peoples of the world to live and let live. We do not always appreciate that fact; we usually think that is our attitude, but that is not the other fellow's. The tragedy is that the other fellow thinks exactly the same way, that he is prepared to live and let live, but that we do not accord him that privilege. I suggest that we who want peace, we who pride ourselves on being in a democracy, on being in a part of the world that is free, should go out of our way, go more than half way if you like, to establish as much as we can the realization that the world around there really is this desire to live and let live. Let us place emphasis on the desire that there is among all peoples to preserve the things that are sacred to them. From our experience in our own country we know that these things vary. There are things that are sacred in different parts of our land and these things vary from part to part.

Let us place emphasis on the fact that there is a desire on the part of all peoples to resolve difficulties without resort to war. We have that desire even when things get pretty dark and sombre, as they are at the present time. It is still our hope that we can resolve our difficulties and get together. Let us realize that there is some of that same attitude on the other side. With all the effort that we must put into economic reconstruction and into devising a foreign policy that is concerned about our own welfare and our own well-being, let us do our best to keep the door open, not just for one nation or another, but for all peoples of the world. We must realize that if we can place more emphasis upon the things that unite us there is still hope that we can achieve the high ideals which bound so many nations together in time of war and which can bind us together in an attempt to win the peace.

I urge upon the Prime Minister most seriously that he consider the suggestion that I made when I rose to my feet, and also that all political parties give more attention in their work in this country to the educating of our people in foreign affairs.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I desire to make a few general observations before this first item carries. First of all, I should like to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister and to the members of the committee that I consider it a great privilege to me to have served in a humble capacity for the last three sessions on the committee on external affairs. That service has been made happier because of the splendid chairmanship of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). A few minutes ago the hon. member paid a generous tribute to the members of the committee. May I say that if the membership of the committee did a good job, which we hope we did in some small measure, it was largely due to the fine and diplomatic handling of the committee by the hon. member for Cochrane.

I should like to make one or two suggestions with respect to minor matters before I go on to deal with some general matters which have come to my mind. This is the first session in which we have had a separate minister of external affairs. I think that was an innovation which everyone in the country and in this parliament was glad to see brought about. Of course it was inevitable, and I fancy the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as well as everyone else who was close to the picture, realized the inevitability of a separate ministry of external affairs as soon as conditions and situations generally warranted that change. We were glad to welcome a separate ministry with a full-time minister in charge.

There is another suggestion I should like to make which perhaps may be only one of convenience. This is the first session in which we have had a full-time minister, and I think the awkwardness of his title is no doubt an embarrassment to him as it is an embarrassment to those of us who from time to time have to rise in our places and address him. More than that, it is a great embarrassment, I fancy, to anyone who has to call the under-secretary of state for external affairs even on the telephone, and by the time you get to the associate under-secretary of state for external affairs, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggests, you really have a long chain, which makes it very awkward indeed.

May I make this suggestion to the government? I know it would take legislation to change the name, but I suggest that next session we do change that name. There have been many suggestions as to what it should be. There may be objections to "Foreign Secretary" and to "Minister of Foreign Affairs", but there is no reason why the name could not be changed to either Minister of External Affairs, which he is largely called by most of us for convenience sake, or Minister of International Affairs. Such a change would be helpful as well with respect to the under-secretary, who, of course, would then be known as the deputy minister of external affairs or the deputy minister of international affairs. I make that suggestion by way of perhaps a small reform, but nevertheless one which would add greatly to the convenience of the department and of the members who are from time to time interested in the affairs of that department.

As this debate is being instituted and as it progresses, we are facing a serious condition in world affairs which needs little elaboration by anyone as humble as I in the international field. Nevertheless to a layman it is a startling and alarming condition. I am one who believes that we should not emphasize unduly the alarming and startling condition of our world affairs, because these are days when cool heads and calm judgment will be needed in the top as well as in the lower levels of international life in a way which we have never demanded or needed before. The safety and security of the firesides and the homes of the people of Canada demand that public men and people in private life should not utter statements or make decisions which will in any way make it more difficult or harder for our statesmen to keep the peace along with those of like mind all over the world. Having that in mind, may I say this, that while we must take that attitude at all times, still we must face this reality. I wonder if the members of this chamber or the people across Canada fully realize that today in the world, after two years of peace since the German collapse, there are no fewer than 19,000,000 men under arms. Not only that, but I wonder if we all realize too that exclusive entirely of other kinds of preparation, not for war perhaps but for defence, there is being paid out and budgeted for no less than $27 billion for the upkeep of these armed forces from one side of the globe to the other. That, I think, is enough of the story. Nothing further need be said to emphasize to this house the importance of Canada's position as well as the position of other nations in an uncertain and certainly a very restless and uneasy world.

So I would say to the government that I appreciate this opportunity, even though it comes late in the session, of having an expression of opinion by men and women from all sides of the house on the question of our external relations and our external policy. After all, 245 heads ought to be better than two or three. I think everyone in this chamber is anxious that, so far as we can, we should try to find common ground on at least the major points of our policy with respect to world affairs. That, of course, does not necessarily mean that there should not be the ordinary parliamentary criticism of these estimates, because it would be a denial of the people's rights were that policy to be adopted by the opposition. Our job is to see that the government keeps on its toes and does things right.

External affairs are in a slightly different position from domestic matters. I have always been one who has felt that so far as humanly possible, whatever may be our differences at home, we should try very hard to have one voice for Canada in the councils of the world. I think we can best have that one voice by having more frequent discussions on external affairs on the floor of this house. There is no way in which we can capture the one-voice idea of parliament better than to find it from time to time through the voices of the representatives of the people reflecting what the people at home are thinking.

Do not let us make any of the mistakes of the past. Peace will not be kept in this world of today just by professional diplomats, no matter how good they may be. We have moved past those days. The peace of tomorrow will be a permanent and lasting peace only if that peace has the support and the unanimous support of the common peoples the world over.

I was interested in what the hon. member for Cochrane said a little while ago this afternoon, that he would have liked the common people to witness what went on at the united nations discussions at Lake Success and Flushing Meadows. I have long been an advocate and hope I shall continue to be an advocate of having the common peoples the world over understand other common people all over the world, because when that is done you will have all over the world the same condition that exists between two great friendly countries separated by that parallel of latitude between Canada and the United States. Just think for a moment how far a professional diplomat or a high level politician could get on either side of that boundary if he attempted to excite bad feeling between these two countries. Why, if any professional diplomat or politician or high-ranking member of the armed forces were to attempt to put any defence ramparts between this country and the United States the common people of Canada and the United States would tear them down next morning. That is the kind of peace that lasts; that is the kind of peace that is enduring; that is the kind of peace that is worth while.

I am afraid that one of the difficulties of the past has been that the common people of some lands have not always understood the views and the aspirations of the common people of other lands. The sooner we do something to bring these lines of thought together, the sooner we can be assured of the permanent peace that we all desire. That brings me to this point. The House of Commons being what it is, a great forum for the discussion of domestic and external matters, this parliament ought to take into consideration the suggestion which was concurred in by the house last session, and which came originally from the external affairs committee itself. While from time to time we spend a good deal of time on domestic matters, as we should, I do not think that in the past—and I am not sure that it is doing it now—parliament has spent enough time in discussing international affairs and exchanging ideas, having in mind the gravity of the world situation and the importance and vitality of international issues as they affect the very lives and property of our people. Unless we exchange these ideas, it makes it just that much more difficult for us to speak as a united voice in the councils of the world.

Hon. members will remember what happened in 1936. I remember very well an important journalist who was in the press gallery at the time taking notes. Being interested in statistics, that journalist made this report to his paper. During one of the great crises in world affairs which was taking place at that time, which was about the time that we were discussing the United States trade agreement, that journalist, after careful consideration and a review of the statistics of the time taken, told his paper that only twenty-seven minutes had been spent upon external affairs and over eight hours had been spent upon the tariff on asparagus. I am not one who is in any way going to detract from the importance of the tariff on asparagus, because we grow a lot of it in my part of the country, and I know how important it is, but I say, having regard to the time spent on external affairs in those days, it was little short of a scandal. It has not been very much better in recent times so far as the time that the house is actually putting in on a discussion of external affairs. Last session, while we had some twenty meetings of the external affairs committee, the sittings were limited to a certain number of hon. members. Certainly the sittings could not be regarded in any way as an opportunity for members generally to debate international matters. While we did have twenty meetings last session, only two days out of 119 sitting days were used in the discussion of international affairs. This session there has been some improvement; but, Mr. Chairman, I want the government to go farther. I would like them to adopt that recommendation of the external affairs committee of last year which was concurred in by the house. The committee recommended that a set period every week, in addition to the normal channels and avenues of debate, should be granted to the house, during which external and international affairs could be discussed on the floor in the same way as certain rights and privileges are given in connection with private bills and certain other debates that we find useful in parliament from time to time.

The time has come when parliament has to keep abreast of our changing and expanding position in external affairs. The under-secretary of state for external affairs, in an excellent report which he made to the minister, which was later tabled in the house this year, and which was repeated by the Prime Minister in his opening address this session, indicated the expansion of our external affairs work in a practical way. In 1939 this government had official representation at seventeen international conferences. In 1946 this government had official representation at ninety-eight international conferences. The whole story can be repeated, continued and enlarged by reference to the work of the external affairs committee and the expansion of its activity. While that has expanded in the way it has I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and the government if you think we are keeping abreast in parliament of the great expansion that is going on in the department, having in mind our various and multitudinous international obligations all over the world? This parliament must keep abreast; but it cannot keep abreast if only three, four or five opportunities during the session are given to the people's representatives to reflect the opinion of the people as it comes from various parts of the Dominion of Canada. I ask the government if it will not consider giving this parliament some additional opportunities during the next session.

There is one other matter with which I wish to deal. It has to do with what I have been speaking on. I refer to the question of this so-called secret session of the external affairs committee. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am not one of those who feel that we should be looking for difficulties at every turn, and I am not trying to criticize for criticism's sake. We should not really be going into a secret session of the external affairs committee on the question of international policy until we have at least exhausted the normal channels and avenues of discussion of policy in open session in that committee. I say that in all seriousness and with every bit of gravity that I can summon to my command. This is what has happened in the experiment of sending the estimates of the external affairs department to the standing committee. It is an experiment; it is an adventure. Having that in mind, let us see where our mistakes have been made. If the external affairs estimates are to be made the guinea pigs for the estimates of other departments—and I am pleading with the government not to overlook the importance of having other estimates sent to standing or special committees for discussion, because in the main this committee's work has been reasonably satisfactory and successful except for one particular thing—I would hope that if estimates of other departments are sent to committees this will not happen. In the committee we have not had the opportunity of discussing government policy, and in external affairs that is of tremendous importance. We have had the under-secretary of state for external affairs and we have had others in the department come before us, all of whom have been frank as they could possibly be in connection with certain matters. But what we need, in addition to that, is to have a wide discussion on the policy underlying the administration of the department. I do not think it was ever intended that the policy of the department should be relegated to a secondary position and that we should spend most of our time in dealing with the question of the administration of the department itself. What will happen in the secret session is this. Instead of having a wide-open discussion on policy in the committee, we are to have a discussion of policy behind closed doors. I want to make that objection; I want to make that criticism, because when the Prime Minister replied to me on Monday of this week when I asked that the peace treaties be sent to the external affairs committee—and I made that suggestion because I felt that broad matters of policy would come out in the discussion of the treaties—I did not feel, nor did anyone else, that the treaties would be changed because they had already been signed; nevertheless the background and the European position generally was one which was of great public interest and value. Because of that I felt that the peace treaties might normally have come before the committee—

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend has referred to me. May I say to him that at this very time this house is discussing the policy of the government on external affairs. The minister has stated the government's policy in the preliminary statement he has made this afternoon. It has been referred to by several members this afternoon as something they were glad had been stated in so clear and frank a way. In regard to the meeting referred to the other day, my remark was a mere chance remark, one might say, as to the opportunity which the committee on external affairs would have with respect to obtaining particulars as to procedure with respect to treaties in general which it has been suggested the reference of the particular treaties being discussed would permit inasmuch as the committee was having a meeting within a few days and the matter could be discussed there without any reference to the committee or the treaties themselves. My remark could not be given the significance that the government in some way was trying to disclose policy in a secret meeting. In fact, it was while I was on my feet that I was informed there was a meeting the next day, and the word "secret", as far as I know, did not have any more significance that is usually attached to meetings held by the external affairs committee where they discuss things freely, sometimes in secret.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think the explanation alters the picture as I understand it. The Prime Minister did make the statement that there was to be a secret meeting of the external affairs committee, and he used that as a buttress to his argument that the peace treaty should not go before that committee. He added, of course, that no one had asked for them to go to the external affairs committee before. After all, the government had not brought the resolution before the house until that time so that we did not have an opportunity to allow them to go. But the Prime Minister did not attach very great importance to the question of timing, as I remember his argument. His argument was that this secret session now would perhaps take the place of any question that might arise relative to the peace treaties and a general discussion of policy.

I think the Prime Minister has perhaps missed the point I was trying to make, and I hope this will be taken to heart by the government. It is that next year, in the external affairs department, we should have the minister before the committee more often than he appeared this year. I wish to exonerate him personally in that regard, because it is hardly fair to ask the minister to be present at all times, when he is Acting Prime Minister under the circumstances of this year, which perhaps presents some special reason for his not being there. I say that to him personally because I am not suggesting that there was any remissness on his part.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should say on my own behalf that I attended the first meeting and declared that I would be at the disposal of the committee whenever invited, and I do not remember having refused any invitation.

Mr. GRAYDON: We did not understand that as much more than a formality, and from time to time, as the discussion came on, the minister may have been overlooked. But I will assure him this time that he will not be overlooked next session. He will have full opportunity to deal with policy.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I hope my hon. friend will not consider that the statement of my readiness to attend was any more a formality than the statement he has made this afternoon about my not being there.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps we can call it a draw.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: And the Prime Minister can be referee in this case.

Mr. MITCHELL: It was a one-sided draw.

Mr. GRAYDON: And that is a one-sided opinion. The Prime Minister a moment ago talked about a policy that had been laid before the committee today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. One of my objections to the statement, in criticism of the minister this afternoon, was that he did not lay before this committee any detailed policy of the government on many of the most important matters upon which the country would expect a policy to be laid down. For instance, this country is interested in the reaction, as well as in the policy, of the government toward the proposed Pan-American invitation. This country is interested also in the recent discussions which call for some hemispheric meeting in Brazil a little later this year. The country is interested, further, in the whole question of our relations with the Soviet Union. Two points in particular, as regards these relations, are first, that which was raised by the minister himself a few days ago with respect to Canadian citizens who are in that country and are not allowed to come to Canada, and, second, the whole question of our diplomatic relations with Russia, having in mind that neither country, now or for some considerable time, has had a normal diplomatic relationship so far as the senior diplomatic posts are concerned.

None of these things was touched upon in the minister's statement. He may not have attempted in any way to gloss them over, and I appreciate the fact that he said the cornerstone of our international policy was, of course, to be adherence to the united nations organization. I was glad indeed that he made the statement he did, but there are many other matters which ought to have engaged the minister's attention when he was making a statement that was supposed to be on a question of the policy of the government.

During the last week we have come closer as nations to a parting of the ways than perhaps we have been at any time since before the last war, but I share the view that has been expressed on one or two occasions this afernoon that, after all, we should not give up. We should not be discouraged by the difficulties which arise and the obstacles which have to be overcome. But one thing that greatly concerns me—and I suppose it greatly concerns everyone in the country—is this. In our relations with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics I do not think we always get to the real root of the trouble that sometimes seems to arise. I say openly and frankly that, in my opinion, one of the great difficulties is that, so long as any nation engages in ideological paratrooping with fifth columnist activities, it makes it very difficult for nations to sit around the conference table. Certainly it would make it quite difficult for me, if I were sitting at a conference table, to feel that someone sitting opposite was anxious that the government I was representing ought to be changed to another system altogether.

That is not the neighbourly thing that we expect. As I said in this house a year ago—and I repeat it now, because as time has gone on it has emphasized itself more and more in my mind—I think the way for nations to get along is to do what people on the farm always did in your community, Mr. Chairman, and in mine. The best neighbours in farming communities are those who are always ready to help you when you are in trouble and who are there, when you are in distress, ready to do a good deed at the right time.

Mr. JAQUES: As well as mind their own business.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I be permitted to proceed? It is difficult. I cannot hear what hon. members are saying.

Mr. McIVOR: It does not matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was going to say this so far as farm neighbours are concerned, that not only are those the attributes of a good neighbour, but the people next farm were never regarded as good neighbours if they were trying to interfere in your domestic household. I think that is a lesson which countries all over the world should take, because nations are not different from individuals. After all, we are all just groups of people, the world over. Human nature runs through all peoples, classes, races and colours. Having that definitely in mind, I believe we could be assured much more easily of relationships of a permanently peaceful character throughout this whole world if the nations of the world, in the days that lie ahead, would leave alone other nations' systems of government and ways of life. That is one of the things which has impressed me as being almost a prime essential in order that nations may have friendly relationships in the days that lie ahead. I hope we shall reach the stage where we shall have a permanent truce with respect to that kind of ideological aggression which seeks to overturn the systems of government which are enjoyed at the moment by other nations that wish to be friendly, and which they feel is best.

I have not much more time, but I just want to say this other word, while we are talking about the heavily endowed security council and all our enforcement measures of power and strength, and so on. I am not so sure that that alone will ever guarantee world peace. If we are to remove war, we must remove the root causes of war. Of course we shall not all agree in some respects as to what are the root causes of war; nevertheless I think that is one of the things that are of great importance. Having in mind the competing ideologies of the world, I think the democratic way of life must display, exemplify and exhibit to the other types of ideology that, after all, our way of life is founded on the cornerstone of economic and social justice; that democracy does guarantee freedom to the individual, but that totalitarianism denies it; that under a democratic way of life, the ordinary common man or woman the world over has a better chance to succeed, a better chance to enjoy an abundant life than he or she has under any state of regimentation, oppression or totalitarianism which has so far been known to the world. I think those are things, along with the necessity of seeing to it that armed aggression does not threaten the peace of the world, which are important. Men and women in every democratic land have a duty to see to it that there are no drones in the democratic beehive, so that we, in the end, may show to the world that we have the answer to the happiness, contentment and economic success of people everywhere in a greater way than has any other new system which has so far been evolved. That way lies security; that way lies happiness; and, Mr. Chairman, that way lies peace.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at seven o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Chairman, first of all, I would express my deep appreciation for the courtesies and assistance extended to me by a number of Canadian representatives whom I met while visiting the United Kingdom and several other countries of Europe. I believe that too few Canadians appreciate the tremendous responsibilities which our foreign representatives must carry. I had the privilege of meeting with a number of them and discussing the important problems of the day. I must say I was most favourably impressed by the calibre of men the Secretary of State for External Affairs has sent out, and of course I approve those who were in the various countries before he took over.

During my several weeks in London, I met Mr. N. A. Robertson, whom we all know, Canada's high commissioner in London. He is dependable and able, and is giving a good account of himself. I believe he is doing a good job for Canada, and if he is left in London long enough he will gain valuable experience from experienced British statesmen, which, in turn, will bring benefits to Canada.

In his first secretary, Mr. J. W. Holmes, he has an able, young and dependable general assistant. He also has with him as third secretary a young man named P. T. Molson Mr. Molson is a likeable young man with a fine personality. While I listened to a meeting of the intergovernmental committee, I noted that Mr. Robertson took young Mr. Molson with him so that he might gain the benefit of experience. It is good for Canada to have our young men in foreign service benefit from all the experience they can get.

I would mention two other names. First, there is H. W. Kember, our passport officer, who does a great deal for every Canadian calling at Canada House. I would mention, too. Mrs. Western, who, I believe, is a former Canadian and who, too, is doing a good deal for many Canadians who visit Canada House.

Then, when I was leaving London for Berlin I had the privilege of travelling in the same aircraft as the head of the Canadian military mission in Berlin, General Maurice Pope. General Pope impressed me most favourably.

Mr. POULIOT: He was born in Rivière du Loup.

Mr. HLYNKA: He really has a thorough grasp of international problems, and takes a broad view. He does not believe that Canada should take a narrow view on any matter, but that we should be ready to play our part. General Pope was kind enough to invite me to his home for luncheon, and in the evening I had the pleasure of attending a gathering at which were representatives of fourteen nations. I had the privilege of meeting them and discussing with them those problems in which we were all interested.

General Pope had with him Professor S. M. Scott who, I understand, taught history for several years in one of the United States universities, and who was asked by the Canadian government to assist General Pope in Berlin.

Then, there was Colonel J. G. McQueen, formerly of Medicine Hat, Alberta. This young man is doing a fine job. He is most efficient, and I am only sorry that Canada has not in foreign service a greater number of men of the calibre of those I met in Berlin and throughout Germany.

I also met a young gentleman named J. A. McCordick, who, I believe, was first drafted by the Department of External Affairs in Canada. I believe he will make a name for himself, because he has a keen brain, he is young and most likeable. He is the type we should train for service in foreign countries.

In my view Canada should begin to pay a little more attention to foreign affairs. I realize that we are only beginners in the field, and I appreciate the fact that the minister took over this portfolio when Canada faced many important problems.

While I should not like to subscribe 100 per cent to everything done by the department, or to everything it may do, I believe the minister is doing a good job in his department. While travelling in Europe, I found that Canada was not represented at all points at which she should be represented, bearing in mind our financial contribution and the contribution by way of man-power we made during the war. I believe there should be more of our young men holding the various positions in such organizations as UNRRA, the intergovernmental committee, and the like. Wherever I went I found very few Canadians. At times I would travel for a week before meeting one. I feel that we made a mistake by practically pulling out our men as soon as the war was over. Young Canadians who fought in the war should have been given the chance of getting experience with these organizations, and they should be given the necessary training to fit them for the future.

Our representative in Rome is Lieutenant-Colonel James P. Manion, son of the late Doctor Manion whom all members knew. Mr. Manion is our commercial representative in Rome and he was the only Canadian I met there. My impression was that he was capable and is the type of man who should be retained in the service. I was shocked, if I may use that term, to find that Canada had no embassy in Italy. Mr. Manion had a staff of two or three people and that was all. Canada should have an embassy in a country like Italy, even if that embassy served only as a listening post. Surely it is important that Canada should have a representative in the important centre of the Catholic world. Like other hon. members, I never paid much attention to the matter; I took it for granted that we had our representation there, but when I arrived I found that there were no Canadians in Italy. I recommend to the minister that he do establish an embassy in Rome.

From there I went to Paris, France, where I met Major-General G. P. Vanier, head of the Canadian embassy in Paris. He also made a fine impression on me because he is the type of man who commands the respect of all who meet him. He is courteous and well versed in matters that come within his scope. His capable first secretary is Mr. Jean Chapdelaine, a young man who, I believe, comes from Montreal.

There is something else that I noticed while I was in these countries. We seem to treat our representation in foreign countries as temporary rather than as a permanent service. For instance, the Canadian ambassador in London has not a permanent residence. He is forced to rent such homes as are available, and of course that works a hardship on any representative who must get acquainted with the people. This applied also to our representative in Italy who had to spend weeks and weeks before he could find a home he could rent. I am not certain what arrangements have been made in Paris and other places, but I take it that we have not purchased homes for our representatives there either.

I should now like to make a few general suggestions. Canada should train young people, and of course those of mature age also, for foreign service. I want to congratulate the minister upon the wisdom he has shown in putting through a measure to provide pensions for our representatives abroad. The only shortcoming that I can find in that legislation is that these benefits are not extended to all the personnel in our foreign service. If we want to encourage these young men to serve Canada in this field we must guarantee their future. A number of the young men who spoke to me told me they felt that their futures were insecure, that they did not know whether they would stay or leave. These pension benefits should be extended to every person who serves in foreign countries.

I am repeating what I said, that we should establish embassies in countries where we feel such representation would do a certain amount of good. We should strengthen those already in existence. There is plenty of room for strengthening our embassies. Canada is new in this field; we cannot begin to compare our experience with that of the British, but the only way to learn is to apply ourselves to the task.

I repeat again the suggestion that Canada should build permanent homes for the heads of our various embassies and provide accommodation for their assistants. That is a necessity too, which will encourage these young people to stay in that field.

I should like to offer two or three other suggestions to the minister. One is in regard to the emphasis which Canada places on the united nations. I have no objection whatsoever to Canada supporting the united nations and staking a small card or two on that organization. I do not think it would do us a great deal of harm if we risk a deuce or a trey or a four-spot on it, but I would reserve the aces and kings and queens and place them on a surer bet. I would reserve these high cards and place them on the British commonwealth of nations. It is a fine thing to dream and speak of the united nations. I have made the statement in this house before that I do not believe there is such a thing as the united nations, because there is more disunity among them now than there has ever been before. But the term "united nations" is used perhaps cleverly in this regard to cover disagreements, or perhaps because it is the objective towards which the various nations would like to go. It is a fine thing to support new ideals and aim at noble objectives and perhaps think of the time when some of the problems of today may be solved, but at the same time it seems to me that neither the mentality of the nations of the world nor their problems have changed very much, and for that reason we must place our most important cards on the British commonwealth of nations.

I should like to make one more point. It does strike me as strange that a certain group of people now consider that they can no longer support the United Kingdom because of a change of government there. That seems to me to be the wrong attitude to take. It is an unrealistic attitude; it is not the right stand to take. Nor was it right for another group to say that they did not want to have anything to do with the United Kingdom so long as a certain form of government was in power there. It seems to me that Canadians generally should be bigger than that and that their loyalty, if you like, should be to the people of the United Kingdom and not to one form of government or another in that country. The form of government in the United Kingdom can change because one government can be put out and another put in in its place, and the same thing applies to Canada. So I say that various parties in this house would be well advised to consider, in the first place, the British people, and not the form of government that may be in office there today and be put out tomorrow. So my own stand has been in the past and still is and, I am sure, will continue to be to approve and have every confidence in the British commonwealth of nations and in the British people.

I should like to make one final suggestion to the minister and that is that Canadians, at least those Canadians who occupy important diplomatic posts and those in various departments of the government, should take more interest in the various peoples of the world and study their background and their history and their problems in order that we may better be able to deal with both their problems and our own. I find that Canadians generally—this is no reflection on the people of Canada or on the civil servants or representatives—do not make a deep study of the history or the origin of the various peoples of Europe and their problems, but rather feel that we are living on this continent and we are not going to bother with Europe. As a matter of fact I directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) two or three years ago on a matter that touched many Canadians deeply. It was about displaced persons. The Prime Minister replied, in effect, that that was a European problem and did not concern Canada very much. It seems to me that if Canada is to play a more important part in the affairs of the world we should be interested in European problems, because many of these problems are tied in with our own. I am satisfied that if Canada continues to lead the so-called smaller nations of the world in the fight for what are really and truly human rights and fundamental freedoms there will no doubt be a great future for this nation, and if we cooperate with the British commonwealth of nations and with our great neighbour to the south of us and other nations there is hope that the world will achieve the objective at which it aims.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Chairman, I rather think the Secretary of State for External Affairs has had more than his share of speeches to listen to today, even though they have been good ones. I should like to ask one or two questions just for a change. First of all, with regard to this situation as it has developed in Europe within the last week or two, I think no one will disagree with the statement that those happenings have been of the utmost importance to the whole world, including Canada. It does seem to me that we shall never get world affairs straightened out until we have Europe again on its feet, and I wish the minister would tell the committee just what the position there is from the point of view of the Canadian government, and also tell us whether there is any way in which Canada can help solve that problem. Great Britain and France called several other nations into conference to get things on a more satisfactory basis, and the United States has offered to give great help for that purpose. It would seem that there should be some way in which Canada too could lend a hand. When the minister has answered that question I propose to ask one or two about the Pacific, but I should be glad if he would give us, first, some statement with regard to the European situation and Canada's attitude in regard thereto.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am afraid that the hon. member has set for me a task that it is practically impossible to discharge.

Mr. GREEN: I mean only recent developments in Europe.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The recent developments have been very important and interesting. There has apparently been a feeling expressed in the United States that Europe should show some concrete desire to put itself in order and to contribute to that with everything that its resources make available. I think we were all very favourably impressed when we heard that the foreign secretary of the United Kingdom was taking the lead in trying to bring together those who could draw up a concrete plan that would show some prospect of being successful. Apparently the three foreign ministers, Mr. Bevin, Mr. Bidault, and Mr. Molotov had serious discussions, and Mr. Molotov does not appear to have shared the views of the others, and does not appear to have felt that what they were proposing to do would be apt to bring about the desired result.

From what we gather from the newspapers —and that is all I have to go on for the present time—Mr. Bevin and Mr. Bidault feel that the possibilities are sufficient to warrant their attempting, even without Mr. Molotov, to draw up a plan that will show some reasonable prospect of stabilizing the European situation. I am sure we, on this side of the Atlantic, would all have been more optimistic about the future if we had evidence that there was going to be a genuine desire to cooperate between all three great powers; but in view of the unwillingness of one of them, I think there is reason for us to hope that the other two can still achieve results which will help to bring about that restoration of the European situation which is, I think, almost indispensable to the prosperity of the whole world.

Mr. GREEN: And possibly to the peace of the world.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And possibly, even probably, to the durable peace of the world; because we can hardly hope for a durable peace that is not at the same time the kind of peace that will make reasonably prosperous conditions for humanity. It is unfortunate that there should not be working together all those whose interests seem to be the same, but I hope that there will still be a large number, and that it will not take the form that can be looked upon by any other group as aggressive.

Mr. GREEN: Of course there was no aggressive intent at all.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sure that there is no other desire than the desire to bring about the betterment of conditions of those who inhabit the European continent and the British isles. I hope that it will be possible for some plan to be worked out which will be beneficial to the largest number of states. The more there are benefited by it, the surer will be the foundation for our hopes for durable peace resulting from it.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not deal with the Canadian position. I hope the Canadian government is willing to do everything possible to help Great Britain, France and the nations which join with them to rehabilitate Europe. Apparently the Americans have taken a fine stand in their offer to help. Is it a fact that the Canadian government is also prepared to help?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, I should not like to make any other declaration of policy of the Canadian government than would conform with decisions that have already been taken. Canada has never been backward in its contributions to the betterment of world conditions. The only concrete problem that the government has had to deal with has been with respect to post-UNRRA relief. I should not say that is the only one; that is the most recent one. That was a concrete problem. It has been dealt with and the Prime Minister has already announced to the house that in the supplementary estimates the government will recommend a vote of $20 million which is practically in the same relation to the vote of the United States congress that our contributions to UNRRA were to the contributions of the great American republic to UNRRA.

With respect to displaced persons, we have even preceded action by our United States friends. The proposals of the United States government have not been formulated in any such fashion as would enable our government to make a concrete decision about it. There is no doubt that Canada realizes that it is as much concerned as is the great republic in the restoration of good conditions throughout the world.

Mr. BROOKS: Has Canada been asked by the United States to assist in any way in her latest proposals for the reestablishment of Europe, the Marshall plan?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; there have been no representations made to Canada as to what concrete action it could take to be of assistance in respect of the implementation of that plan which has, of course, to remain rather vague until the European nations themselves have surveyed their situation, and assessed the resources they have themselves and how they can be used for the general welfare and what additions would have to be made to enable a reasonably satisfactory result to be achieved.

There have been declarations by the Secretary of State and by other spokesmen of the administration, but they have had necessarily to be in very general terms. They are not in such form as would make it possible for them to make any concrete suggestion to anybody else.

Mr. GREEN: I take it that the intention is to cooperate to the full.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No one minister can by declarations in the house commit the government to any line of action. Speaking as one of the members of the government, all I can add is to remind the committee that Canada has never been backward over the last several years in its contributions to whatever measures were devised as being proper to help the situation of the world at large. That has been the attitude of the Canadian government, of the Canadian parliament and of the Canadian people, and so far I have not found that any of us have regretted what we have done, nor have I found any evidence anywhere of any desire to follow any other line of conduct. I cannot go beyond that, because no specific matter has come up for actual decision by the government.

Mr. GREEN: I thank the minister for his statement. Then, with regard to the Pacific, nothing at all has been said today about the position in the Pacific area and it would be helpful if the minister could give an explanation of the present position there and of Canada's policy. For example, I would ask him to deal with the far eastern advisory commission on which Canada has membership. I should like to know what work that commission has been doing, whether there have been any reports by the commission, and, if so, the general tenor of those reports. I believe there is also an allied council for Japan on which Canada has a member or at least an observer. I would ask the minister to let us have a statement with regard to the work of that body. Then, there is the question of the possible treaty with Japan. The minister advised us a few days ago that Canada was to be represented at the commonwealth conference in Canberra next month, the purpose being to discuss peace terms for Japan. Will he let us have a report with regard to that situation and also with regard to the question of reparations? Apparently there are to be some reparations from Japan. I should like to know whether Canada is making a claim for a share of such reparations.

Finally has any thought been given to the setting up of a regional organization in the Pacific? I believe there is what is called a South Pacific commission, the members of which are Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, the United States, France and the Netherlands. Their function is to deal with the territories south of the equator. Presumably they have nothing to do with the territories north of the equator. In addition, there have been press reports with regard to the possible formation of a Pacific economic and defence council. I cannot find out whether those reports are correct or not.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: What was the last?

Mr. GREEN: The Pacific economic and defence council. I saw that in an editorial in the Gazette on September 6 of last year. The editorial was headed "Canada blind to Pacific obligations". It stated that a preliminary conference had been called, leading to the ultimate formation of a Pacific economic and defence council to promote peace and industrial development in that area, and that originally the discussions would be limited to the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, but that it was intended to invite the United States, France, the Netherlands and Portugal. That may have collapsed; nothing further may have been done. On the Pacific slope of Canada we are very much interested in the Canadian policy for the Pacific area, and I would ask the minister to make a statement on these subjects.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to the far eastern commission, the hon. member knows that this commission is made up of representatives of Australia, Canada, China, France, India, New Zealand, the Netherlands, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States. It has met regularly in Washington through the past year and has continued to perform its functions in accordance with the terms of reference laid down at the Moscow meeting of foreign ministers in December, 1945. Policy decisions have been reached on a variety of subjects, including a new Japanese constitution, interim reparations removal programme, the level of postwar economic Japanese life, trade relations with the allied powers, trade unions, education, war criminals, aliens in Japan, and Japanese atomic research. These policy decisions have been the basis for directives issued by the United States government to the supreme commander for the allied occupying forces in Japan. Canada is represented on the commission by the Canadian ambassador to the United States, Mr. Wrong, and by his alternate, Mr. R. E. Collins, a member of his staff in Washington.

With respect to the reparations team, following the receipt of the invitation extended to member countries of the far eastern commission by the supreme commander of the allied powers, the Canadian government, in February, 1947, established in Tokyo a three-man team to look after Canadian interests in Japan with respect to restitution and reparations. This team is under the chairmanship of Mr. J. E. Kenderdine, special representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce on the staff of the Canadian liaison commission in Tokyo. The allied council is a military-control body on which Canada is not represented.

Mr. GREEN: What nations are on that council?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The United States, Russia, France, the United Kingdom. I believe there is one representative for the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and India. There is one representative for those four commonwealth nations. Canada's liaison officer and the official through whom the Department of External Affairs is kept informed about what is going on, is Mr. Norman, who has been stationed in Tokyo for several months now.

The hon. member asked about the Canberra conference; that has now been arranged to be a conference on ministerial level; that is to say, each one of the commonwealth nations is expected to have a delegation headed by a minister.

Mr. GREEN: Who is going from Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That has not yet been determined. For several weeks past the Canadian government has been giving much of its time and attention to the proceedings of the Canadian parliament, and since that conference is for the end of August, it was felt that we could reasonably hope to reach prorogation early enough to have some time to arrange it thereafter. There are several requirements that will have to be met, and all those, except the one that has been announced so far, will have to be considered together in making the arrangements. It has already been announced that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will be going to the economic and social council, which is in July. That had to be decided in advance because the date was earlier than the others. There will be other engagements for ministers which will have to be considered at the same time consideration is being given to the selection of a candidate for this Canberra conference. The Canberra conference is preparatory and exploratory. The commonwealth nations are getting together to communicate to each other the information they respectively have and to explore the situation; but not at all, to use a local expression, in the spirit of ganging-up to make their views prevail. They are going to discuss, as they do constantly by dispatches and correspondence, their respective interests, so that each will know what data is available to the others and what repercussions each may expect on his own situation from any given decision. It seemed to be proper that that preliminary and exploratory meeting be held in the Pacific area because it had to do with the situation which was of more concern to Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. GREEN: But it is of great concern to the west coast.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, it is of great concern, but it appeared to us to be of even greater concern to Australia and New Zealand—

Mr. GREEN: Oh, that is right.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —and that they had grounds for urging that the meeting should be in their zone rather than in any other zone.

On this matter of the South Pacific commission, I must say that I remember that some months ago there were dispatches in the newspapers about it, but I do not think it was ever set up. There have been in the department no official communications about it.

Mr. GREEN: Has any thought been given to the setting up of a Pacific regional organization under the united nations?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No doubt there has been thought given to it, but I cannot say that is one of the most probable solutions which will be agreed upon for the Pacific situation. From everything I have been able to see, there is no doubt that the allies are firm in their desire to establish conditions under which Japan is not apt again to become a menace to peace in the Pacific. As to the methods which will be adopted to that end, the matter has not progressed sufficiently for me to be able to speak with any definiteness about it. It may be felt that something similar to the system which will have been devised to prevent Germany from again becoming a threat to the peace of Europe will serve as a model for what will be adopted with respect to Japan. I think the most that can be said at the present time is that there appears to be substantial unanimity on the determination that the proper machinery must be found to achieve that end.

Mr. GREEN: Is it clear now that the peace conference for Japan is to be an eleven-nation conference? Has that yet been settled?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, that has not yet been settled; though there has not yet arisen anything which would appear to prevent effect being given to the desires of the United Kingdom, the United States and other nations that that be the body used for the purpose of drafting the treaty. That does not mean that our Russian allies may not have the same views with respect to the eastern situation as they have expressed, and so far adhered to, with respect to the German peace settlement. But the eastern situation has not developed to the point where that has become an expressed statement of soviet policy.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has mentioned the work of the far eastern advisory commission, on which Canada has a member. Apparently we get no reports from that commission. Would it not be possible for those reports to be made available? I take it from what the minister says that they are reporting direct to the United States government. But it is not a United States commission; it is a commission composed of representatives of various nations. Surely we should be entitled to get reports from the commission in just the same way as the United States government gets those reports.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We get communication of the decisions which are communicated to the United States government, so that the United States government may give directives to its commander in chief; but they have always been marked "confidential", and we could not attempt to publish them without the consent of all the members of the commission. Even if it were felt desirable that some portions be made public, there would no doubt be some portions of those directives which it would not be felt proper to make public until they had been carried out. They are the kind of directives which, through the far eastern commission, the eleven nations communicate to their representative; because, of course, General MacArthur not only represents the United States government but acts for the united nations, and these recommendations have been regarded as matters which are not for publication.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister look into the possibility of making some sort of reports available for the Canadian public and the Canadian press? I dare say very few people in Canada realize that Canada has any representation at all on that advisory committee. The general impression is that the United States is in sole charge in Japan. From the point of view of informing our own people and keeping them advised of what is going on, I think some method should be devised by which at least portions of the reports of that commission may be made available to the Canadian public. We are a Pacific as well as an Atlantic and Arctic power, and it is important that this information get out to the public.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, but it does not even get out to the United States public. I can say this much; there is not always immediate unanimity as to the directives to be given to General MacArthur. There are decisions arrived at; then there are directives which are given to him, and he announces in Japan the policy he is going to implement. That is about as much as the public gets.

I can have inquiries made to see if the far eastern commission could not have a report which would be available to the public of the eleven nations it represents. But it would have to be something agreed to by the commission itself. We know there are many matters of administration upon which at the start there may be divergence of views. Finally a decision is arrived at, and directives are given on behalf of the commission to General MacArthur who announces the policy to be implemented in Japan. However I shall see if it would be possible to have a report which would be available to the public of all the nations represented on this far eastern commission.

Mr. GREEN: We hope to take part in the peace conference with Japan, and I think it is essential that the Canadian people should have just as much information as possible with regard to the facts on which the peace treaty will be based.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The importance of having in advance information for the public at large is also a matter concerning which there is not unanimity of opinion. There are many who feel that the attempt to determine peace treaties with the satellite powers at Paris, in the full light of publicity, was not helpful to the achievement of the best possible results.

Mr. GREEN: I did not mean the full light of publicity; I meant that we should have as much information as possible.

Mr. QUELCH: Could the minister say what are some of the main features of the Marshall plan? For instance, would it entail Russia's becoming a party to the Bretton Woods agreement in the same way as Great Britain was forced to become a party to it in order to obtain a loan? Would it also entail Russia's agreeing to a policy of non-discrimination in the same way as Great Britain was forced to, in order to get help with respect to the United States loan?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot say anything more about the Marshall plan than I have learned from the newspapers. I am not saying I did not get some confidential reports from our representatives in Washington, but we have had no official communication from the United States government as to what the Marshall plan is, and I cannot venture to state here what I think the conditions are.

Mr. QUELCH: May I say that I believe that, until we know what the conditions are, we are not in a position to judge as to the actions of Russia. If part of that agreement meant that she had to become a party to the Bretton Woods agreement or that she had to agree to a policy of non-discrimination, then I think Russia can be complimented upon having viewed it as she did.

Can the minister tell the committee what is chiefly responsible for holding up agreement at the Geneva conference today? I remember when the nations first met we were given to understand that they were likely to reach agreement in a few weeks. Now it is going on for some months, and still no agreement has been reached.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My hon. friend's impression differed from mine. From the very start I was told by our representatives who had returned from the preparatory conference in London that they expected the conference would last until September, and they were looking to the date of the meeting of the general assembly as something which, toward the end, would help bring matters to a head.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the minister say what the main point of disagreement is?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know that there is any disagreement. I understand that for several weeks there have been negotiating teams dealing with specific requests of one country or another for modification of tariff arrangements. I am told that at one time there were forty-six different teams which were working on these individual items.

Mr. QUELCH: When the minister says that what he understood is different from what I understood, let me say that we are dependent upon the press. We have never been able to get much information from the government as to what has occurred there, so that naturally we are in the dark.

Can the minister say whether or not any consideration has been given to trying to reach some form of agreement with the United States along lines similar to those of the Hyde Park agreement, in order to deal with the adverse exchange position of today?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am afraid I would have to see the terms of that question before venturing to answer it. I can say, however, that the Canadian and United States authorities have been discussing for several weeks the difficulties arising throughout the world out of the shortage, on the part of consumers, of United States dollars, and have been examining what they consider to be every possible angle of things that can be done to help relieve that situation.

The Hyde Park agreement is something which it is rather difficult to define in terms sufficiently specific to say that another thing resembles it or that in some particulars it differs from it.

Mr. QUELCH: May I clarify my question? About two weeks ago I read a press dispatch to the effect that the United States might possibly buy Canadian wheat to ship to Europe, in the same way that she bought Canadian munitions to supply Europe. In that way the United States would be supplying us with American dollars while providing goods to Europe. In other words, instead of our providing goods to Europe and accepting sterling we would be supplying via America and receiving American dollars, which would greatly help to offset the difficulty in obtaining American dollars.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That specific form has never been officially discussed.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I have a double question to ask. What did we gain in the past two years from our association with the united nations? Secondly, what are the serious grounds, if any, for future hopes? I ask these questions because I have met many people who have told me the united nations are our only hope. I have asked them, "Do you believe in the government of Russia, of France, of England—as the government exists now—of the United States or of China?" They have said no, when the question has been asked with respect to each of those individual countries. They do not agree with the governments of each of the separate countries, but they are ready to accept the government of the whole of them. I ask them, "Why do you say that?" And they reply that there is nothing else. A stone has never been a life-preserver.

I understand the difficulties we face there, and I will tell the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), for whom I have the greatest admiration, and who has asked some timely questions—and I congratulate the minister upon having answered them so well—that when he wants to know, not only the Canadian position in international affairs, but also the foreign situation at large, he has only to read newspapers such as the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, the New York Sun, or some of the Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec, Vancouver or Toronto papers. They will give him full information. He will be able to get more information from the papers than he can get in the house. Strangely enough, it has happened that I could not get, through official channels, some official papers which were published verbatim in United States papers.

I will tell him something else about representation. He may have read the book by a former leader of his party, entitled, "Canada and the Commonwealth" by Sir Robert Borden. Sir Robert referred to the Washington conference held after the first war, and he said that South Africa was mad because the dominions had not been invited; it was only the big powers. There was a compromise, and Mr. Balfour, who represented the United Kingdom, represented a couple of the dominions, particularly South Africa. I do not see any use in such dual representation.

I will draw the attention of my hon. friend to something else. The ideology of Canada and the ideologies of the Big Five are entirely different. The Big Five are imperialistic powers. They all want to get more and more. Great Britain is trying to save all she can.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think so.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend has a pious view of the whole thing, but I have my own opinion. He may be right or I may be right.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps we are both wrong.

Mr. POULIOT: France is fighting to save Indo-China. China is trying to save all she can of Mongolia and other parts of the country. What about Russia? My hon. friend will not tell me that the United States is not an imperialistic power. So we have five imperialistic powers, or perhaps we may except Great Britain for the sake of argument. But at least four of the five are imperialistic. They decide everything; we decide nothing. We have to take it for granted that they are right when they quarrel and set a bad example to the world. I think it was the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) who said that "united" is a false label for the united nations; that it should be "disunited".

Foreign policy is a bluff from beginning to end. For instance, take the Canadian high commissioner in England. What difference is there between the position of the present incumbent and that of Sir Charles Tupper when Canada was described as a colony, as she should be now? There was no difference at all. At the time of Sir Charles Tupper the high commissioner reported to the colonial office. After we went into the commonwealth they did a great thing; the colonial office was split in two, one branch being the dominions office and the other one the colonial office. From then on, the high commissioner of Canada got in touch with the dominions office. They now propose to change it to this commonwealth relations business. Is that being done to please us? Is it being done to satisfy Canada? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that Canada had been informed about the change but had never asked for it. It is done because India is no longer an empire and the King of Great Britain no longer can describe himself as the Emperor of India. From now on, India will be a commonwealth and Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Nehru and the Moslems of India have all agreed to the change. It is just a change of words. There has been nothing more than changes of words since the beginning of the British empire at the time of Queen Victoria.

Mr. GREEN: That is where you are wrong.

Mr. POULIOT: I may be wrong and my hon friend may be wrong, but I want to try to make my point. I want to try to convert him, although I may not succeed. I want to explain my views to him. British foreign policy with regard to the dominions has been bluff from beginning to end. I will start, first, with the Statute of Westminster. As a lawyer, my hon. friend knows very well that the main provisions of a law are never found in the preamble.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not forget that he is a Tory.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps he will have a different interpretation of the law because of that; nevertheless he is a fine fellow.

Mr. GREEN: Do not try to convert me, for you will be wasting your time and the time of the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I would not be wasting my time. I have converted Orangemen, and I have letters to that effect written in French by their own hands. I am very persevering. One way to gain the attention of an audience is to address one individual. When you convince that individual he radiates his conviction. That is the best way to turn a noisy meeting into a sympathetic one. Let us consider the Statute of Westminster which was passed in the first year of the reign of the late Lord Bennett. I will not try to convince my hon. friend as a Progressive Conservative member of parliament; I will simply appeal to his intelligence and knowledge of the law. He knows very well that the preamble of a statute is nothing more than a description of the provisions which follow. There is nothing in the following provisions with regard to Canada except the abolition of the colonial laws validity act. That does very little, because the disallowance provisions are still in our constitution which permit the nullification of legislation passed by this parliament. The disallowance provisions are enough; it was not necessary to have the colonial laws validity act.

By means of the Statute of Westminster they tried to create an optical illusion that the dominions were getting more than they had before. It was drafted by Lord Passfield and some other Fabians with the same ideology. They set out to create an optical illusion for the representatives of the dominion. Since Mr. Bennett did not believe in the commonwealth but in the British empire, he was satisfied with it. It was an effort to put something over on the colonies of the British empire. They were given the illusion that they were gaining some rights when in reality they were gaining nothing. In French we say, "Un beau rien tout neuf"; the new nothing, the new nonentity. Notwithstanding the suggestion of some nationalists or the celebrations over the passing of this Statute of Westminster, the fact remains, as my hon. friend knows very well, that there is a provision in the body of the act to the effect that nothing in the British North America Act is changed.

Mr. GREEN: I feel guilty for wasting the time of the committee by bringing this lecture on it and on myself. Does the hon. member question the fact that the British government would pass any sort of amending legislation that Canada requested with regard to that statute or any other law having to do with Canada? Is that not a fact?

Mr. POULIOT: First, I want to tell my hon. friend that I am not lecturing him; I am simply expressing my views, after deep study of the matter. Answering his question, I will tell him that imperialism is not so much in the United Kingdom as it is in the minds of colonial Canadians, and that is precisely because colonial Canadians have an inferiority complex in regard to the United Kingdom. They consider themselves the little ones who are not on a footing of equality with the great geniuses of the United Kingdom.

Mr. GREEN: Where do you find Canadians like that?

Mr. POULIOT: Right here in the House of Commons. I have not to go outside the house; I find them right here. They do not realize that they have an inferiority complex concerning everything that is done overseas. I remember when some anti-nazis were put in concentration camps in Britain during the war after Dunkirk, when the British made a round-up of all the people of foreign extraction on the soil of Great Britain without any distinction. These anti-nazis were put in concentration camps in Britain and later were transferred here. One day in the house I asked information about that move from Colonel Ralston, and another minister told me that he knew nothing about it. Yet the camps were under Colonel Ralston's jurisdiction. I asked the minister how it came about that he knew nothing about these anti-nazi prisoners in concentration camps in Canada. I was indignant about it, and one of his colleagues told me: "Do not bother; so long as we tell the story that it has been done by Great Britain, it will be O.K., and the Tories will not discuss it." That is their frame of mind. So long as it is done by Great Britain, it becomes a precedent. They bow deeply and everything is O.K. I have noticed that feeling here and it is an anti-Canadian feeling.

I have something more to tell my hon. friend about the Statute of Westminster.

Mr. GREEN: Tell the rest of the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I will address the Chair so that everything will be strictly in conformity with the rules. I do not want to offend my hon. friend because he has been kind to me. I believe that a man of his intelligence should have another conception of this whole thing.

Going back a little, we heard a lot about the imperial conference resolutions of 1926. Those resolutions—what were they? They had no force of law at all. They meant nothing. The representatives of the dominions were gathered together in London and the resolutions were just their good wishes. I wish for fine weather tomorrow. It may rain. But it is a fine wish anyway. Those resolutions were not embodied in a statute. They were just wishes. But the colonials were so credulous and so naive that they thought it was very important that they had expressed wishes at an imperial conference.

Afterwards there was the imperial conference of 1930. More wishes. Finally came the Statute of Westminster. Then there was the beating of the drums and the commonwealth was saved. The empire was gone. It was replaced by the commonwealth. When I asked the Prime Minister of Canada what the difference was between the British empire and the British commonwealth he told me that the two words were interchangeable. That will be found in Hansard.

Mr. Massey in a lecture in Montreal last fall said that on account of our war effort Canada had gained a high rank and had risen from a small power to a middle power. When I asked the minister of external affairs whether certain middle powers existed in virtue of the UNO business he said: "No; there are only small countries and the big ones."

The big ones are on the security council. So there is no middle power. There are the big and the small, the giants and the dwarfs. The giants are the imperialists, and the dwarfs are the nice little fellows who are always ready to act according to instructions received from the big ones. This is a true picture of what has been going on everywhere.

I have something else to say about the Statute of Westminster. My hon. friend knows that some people have said serious things; that the great advantage of the Statute of Westminster is that, before that, the governor general was representing the king and the British government. That was a wrong thing; it was beneath the dignity of the British government. Then it was decided, after the Statute of Westminster, not by the Statute of Westminster but after that, to have somebody in the dominion to represent the king and another person to represent the British government. I find that a wrong decision. I do not see what progress there is in having these two people. It is all right to have the governor general who represents the king and the British government, and I think the British government should have felt honoured to be represented in any country by one who is good enough to represent His Majesty the King. But what happened? These high commissioners came into this country and their offices were at times a nest of intrigue and of plotting and a nest of spying as we have seen by the trial of a woman who was in one of those offices since 1932, since Sir William Clark was here, and while sheltered under the roof of the high commissioner she was supplying to another country information as to what was being done in Canada.

It was a bluff to say that the present incumbent of the post of high commissioner in England is greater than Sir Charles Tupper, who has been dead and buried for almost half a century. There has been no change of status. It has been a change of words only. Now they are coming again with another change of words. It is not to offend India. It is not to please Canada. This policy of to please or not to please is not the right one. The policy we should have should be in accordance with the needs of the world, and the needs of the world are more spiritual than material. Of course we cannot discuss with those empires their objectives because their objectives are material, the gain of more power. The objective of Canada—and I give credit to the right hon. minister—is a spiritual hope, the hope of improving the conditions of mankind and preventing a future war. Some at least of the big powers are apparently ready to go to war at any time, to get more. They are ready to destroy each other to get more. We want peace throughout the world. That is the great difference.

I wonder if my hon. friend has read the book written by Elliott Roosevelt about his travels with his father and meeting with the big leaders throughout the world. I imagine Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill there on the white sands of Casablanca, discussing the future of the world as they could see it. They were satisfied with themselves, and quite rightly so. They were two big men together, and they tried to make their own peace to be accepted by the whole world. Of the big three, Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin, there were only two that were agreeing, and my hon. friend knows it. It was Roosevelt and Stalin. Perhaps if Mr. Roosevelt were alive today the world would be in better condition than we are now, although to a certain extent I admire the qualities of Mr. Churchill. It must be admitted, as I said in this house when his son was in front of me in the gallery, his role as a diplomat has been a failure because he never succeeded in gaining the confidence of Stalin. It was not because they sent each other birthday greetings once a year that the world should be satisfied with what happened between them. If my hon. friend, the member for Vancouver South, had been there in the place of Churchill meeting Stalin on so many occasions, I am sure that with his genial disposition he would have gained the heart of Stalin and that today we would not be in the bad condition in which we are. It is not to bring discredit and disrespect on our own men. They are just as good as anybody but they are not given a chance to do anything. They are not given a chance to give advice to any of the big powers. If they did so they would be told to be quiet. Ready to sit at the table but no advice should be given by the small powers to the big powers. That description of small powers is the invention of Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin, who wanted to share the world together after the end of the war, or to dispose of it as they thought best. It is history.

Here in this chamber it is impossible at times to do otherwise than follow the fashion. Fashion is established, the fashion of the united nations, and we are bound to accept it without discussion. It has been established by certain big men. We have the united nations. The united nations will rule the world. I am opposed to that ruling; I am opposed to that world government because I am not satisfied with what the united nations have done so far. They have done nothing useful for the peace of mankind.

Mr. BROOKS: I would think that makes it correct.

Mr. POULIOT: I would tell the hon. gentleman that I am not joking now. If I were he would find it painful, but I am talking very seriously. I have some concern, although I am not jittery. I have some concern because, according to the old saying in the bible, Desolatione desolata est terra quia nullus est qui recogitet in suo corde, from desolation the land is desolate because there is no one who thinks in his heart. Everybody is ready to accept canned ideas; everybody seems to be satisfied to be invited to these great gatherings, which may satisfy personal vanity and similar human feelings. Those who are there are given the impression that they are accomplishing something, but they are accomplishing nothing. They are there sitting at the conference tables just the same as we are sitting here in the House of Commons. We have the impression of accomplishing something; we are working hard but we accomplish nothing at all, and it is the same result that comes from these conferences. I am sorry. When I asked if we were represented at Teheran and Cairo the Prime Minister said no. I asked, further, if we were bound by the decisions reached at these conferences. He said no, but added that what has been decided by the great powers at these conferences must have some weight with the other united nations. If I have not given the exact words, it is the true meaning of what he said. In those cases we were not represented but even when we are represented nothing else is changed because of that inferiority complex of the small countries, not only Canada, but all small countries, with regard to the big powers.

I have the deepest admiration for South Africa and for Australia and for the stand that they have been taking at world conferences. They have been defending the rights of the small powers. Why? Because the rights of the small powers were right, and the ambitions of the big powers were just greed. As a lawyer, and as a man who has respect for the law and moreover, a respect for justice, which is more than respect for the law, because law is not always in conformity with justice, I believe that, leaving aside for the moment the consideration of spiritual values, we shall have peace in the world only when the small nations are given the same rights as the big ones. The question of right, the question of justice, the question of equality, the question of autonomy, are foremost in importance, and there can be no equality within the British empire when all decisions are made by the representatives of the United Kingdom, even if we are young enough and childish enough to be represented by these British ambassadors at large who have not our feelings, who have not our views in the settlement of past disputes and the establishment of peace for the happiness of mankind.

I will not say any more now, but I could say much more. I come back to my question and ask the minister to be kind enough to tell us what we have gained in the last two years from our association with the united nations and what are the serious hopes of a better future and the establishment of peace, if any.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member has displayed such a wide knowledge of facts and perhaps some fiction, that I am sure no answer I could give would change his interpretation of the facts or fiction in any degree.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. I have a high regard for the minister but he misjudges me. I did not display any complete information about the matter, and that is precisely why I have been asking questions.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Two great nations have celebrated their national birthdays this week. The peace of the world depends more than anything else on preserving good feeling between the British and the United States people; but it is clear that there are forces which are working to destroy these friendly relations and to stir up hatred between the British and the United States people. I might mention two of these forces. One is political zionism and the other is international finance which we can sum up by the name "Wall Street". May I quote the Cardinal Archbishop McGuigan at the Marian congress when he said that liberty is dependent on truth; that truth will make you free. Truth is the mother of liberty. Truth is its light, its actions and its glory. How much truth is hidden when external affairs are discussed? I do not mean in this chamber but wherever they are discussed. Do we hear the truth, or do we hear something which is passed off as the truth? I should like to quote the magazine Truth, the magazine of the once great Liberal party of Great Britain. On May 23, 1947, there appeared in that magazine an article with regard to a meeting in Albert Hall, London, held for the purpose of discussing international affairs, and this report is made with respect to the Archbishop of Canterbury:

> His Grace referred to Europe as having once been known as Christendom, but he expressed no hope that Christendom would be revived. Instead, he went out of his way to stress that the campaign for a limited Europe was being waged by people of all creeds and of none. He spoke, too, of the heritage which Europe had derived from Greece, Rome and Palestine, but so carefully were his sentences chosen that the Palestinian contribution was worded without one reference to Christ. No American President during the past quarter of a century has dared to refer to the United States as a Christian nation, the reason being that a small but formidable minority of American citizens resent the title. Things have come to a pretty pass, however, when the Archbishop of Canterbury feels obliged to pick his way with similar caution when aproaching the problem of Europe's future.

The last speaker referred to powers and small powers, and he said there were no middle powers. I wonder where he would put that small but formidable minority who resent the title of Christian nation. Would he say that was a minor or a major power? It seems to me they are able to control all the powers.

It is strange that so far no mention has been made of the visit of the external affairs committee to Lake Success. We were invited there as the official guests of the united nations organization for the express purpose of hearing the discussions on Palestine. I was one of those who went and I was greatly interested in listening to the debates of the delegates. I mention this because I believe that the Palestine question is at the present time perhaps the greatest threat to world peace.

I should like to refer to a statement I made in this house on December 17, 1945, when I spoke on the Arab-Zionist question. I said:

> I have no brief for either side, my sole concern is to establish the truth, for just as truth and freedom are indivisible so mutual faith in the given word is the basis of friendship, individual and international. Once that faith is destroyed or even impaired, trust and friendship turn to suspicion and hatred. But in spite of historic fact, the zionists base their case on racial, cultural and commercial superiority. These claims on behalf of a favoured nation and a chosen people are upheld especially by leftists and internationalists, by the very people who denounce racism and nationalism. They also are the people who claim especially to be the world's peacemakers, but who, in the face of continued and fatal rioting in Palestine, are going out of their way to embarrass Great Britain in her efforts to maintain peace by encouraging tolerance by both Arab and Jew.

At that time I quoted a letter I received in answer to one of mine from Mr. Herbert Mowat, who was executive director of the Canadian Palestine committee. I will not quote the whole of his letter, but I will quote enough to show that there are people who are not worrying about the future peace of the world so much as they are about furthering their own interests or rather the interest of those whom they serve, because in this letter he makes it clear where he believes Canada stands in regard to the Palestine question. He says:

If the Arabs fight a united nations decision on Palestine it is apparent that they have forfeited their place of good standing in this world organization. Our committee represents the united nations point of view and technique in respect to Palestine. If the Arabs fight what the world agrees should be done about Palestine they fly in the face of world law and order and, so far as the united nations organization is concerned, they are outlaws and as such are subject to military measures to be taken by the security council of the united nations, a body which Canada is bound to support in whatever action it takes according to the unanimous adoption of the united nations charter which took place in our Canadian House of Commons and Canadian Senate not long ago. Whatever responsibility rests on Canada through membership in the united nations organization accruing from the situation in Palestine our committee believes should be accepted.

According to that, we are committed to take part in a war before this Palestine question is settled. But since I made that speech and since Mr. Mowat wrote that letter the very thing has happened about which I warned the members at that time. And I confirmed it when I was in New York attending the united nations organization discussions on Palestine. I discussed this question with leading Arabs and other delegates who are vitally interested in the matter. What is happening? As a result of the pressure put upon the united nations by this small minority of political zionists who seem to have political control, not only in the United States, but in Great Britain and in Canada, the Arab people are being driven to become more sympathetic to the soviet overtures, and behind the scenes the soviet agents are working all through the Moslem world from the East Indies clear across to Morocco on the Atlantic ocean.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): They have not had much success.

Mr. JAQUES: I do not know.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): I know.

Mr. JAQUES: I would say that the position in India is due largely, or at any rate in part, to propaganda which has its origin in Moscow.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): They have been put out of all the parties in India.

Mr. JAQUES: They may have been put out of the parties; but, as hon. members know very well, the communist party man is no danger anyway. It is the fellow traveller who is the danger, and he is inside every party in all countries. As I was saying, that is the position with regard to Palestine at the present time, and that is what we face. When I was in New York I made inquiries; and, as far as I could understand, whatever is decided by this Palestine commission of the united nations organization, neither Great Britain nor the Arabs nor even the zionists are bound to accept it. I believe Great Britain made that clear. The Arabs say they will accept it, of course, if they consider it favourable; if not, they fight. That is what I learned in New York when I was at the UNO conference.

Not only is that mainly the danger in Palestine and the near east; the same danger threatens the relations between the British people and the people of the United States, owing to the zionist anti-British propaganda which is most violent and virulent in the United States. I have been a witness to that on several occasions. There is also, of course, a similar propaganda being used in Great Britain to turn the friendly feeling of the British people against the people of the United States. The whole purpose is to separate the English-speaking peoples in order that they can be that much more easily dealt with. As I said when I started, I believe that the peace of the world, politically at least—and I am leaving out any moral and religious consideration—depends, more than on anything else upon the continued and increased friendship between all the English-speaking peoples; that is, between the peoples of the British commonwealth of nations and those of the United States. Those friendly relations are being threatened by a deliberate propaganda which is aimed at the separation of the two great English-speaking peoples.

I might quote from a petition which was sent last fall from the public affairs forum of Los Angeles to President Truman. When I was in Los Angeles last winter I met the chairman of this public affairs forum and he gave me a copy of this resolution. I will not read it all, but just two or three paragraphs:

Whereas the President of the United States, the state department and members of congress are daily subjected to a barrage of telegrams, resolutions and letters from Jewish-Zionist organizations urging the government of the United States to interfere in the conflict between zionists on one hand the Arabs and Great Britain on the other, for the purpose of forcing the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine, contrary to the wishes of the native inhabitants, and

Whereas such agitation spreads disunity among the American people and weakens the government of the United States in its diplomatic relations with other countries, thus making more difficult the establishment of permanent, honourable peace between our country and other nations, and

Whereas certain well-financed professional Zionist agitators, radio commentators and newspapers who cater to so-called minority groups (whose activities suggest that they have a dual allegiance inconsistent with loyalty to the United States) are now engaged in Russia-first, pro-communist, pro-zionist, and anti-British propaganda thus giving aid and comfort to subversive foreign ideologies and organizations.

Let me say that I have witnessed active displays of that propaganda, and its importance cannot be exaggerated. I believe it is the greatest threat at the present time to any real permanent peace. I say again that anything which threatens or injures British-United States relations, threatens world peace. Everywhere in the United States among people who take an interest in international affairs, I was told that responsible opinion is that the deterioration of Europe's condition since the war is largely due to the so-called Morgenthau plan.

To conclude, Mr. Chairman, may I say that it seems to me that the greatest threat to world peace is this idea of one world and one-world government. How can there be one world and a one-world government shared by two ideologies which are absolutely opposed to each other? They are as far apart as the north and south poles. I have said in this house and elsewhere many times over during the past several years—since the war ended anyway—that if there is one certain way of bringing about another war, it is the drive for one world and a one-world government, because there are, in fact, two worlds at the present time. There is the world and the way of life that we know; then there is the soviet, the totalitarian, the communist or the Marxian socialist way, I do not care what you call it. Those are the two worlds. If there is to be one world, then I say that one of those worlds will have to be eliminated; and in that process it is possible that both worlds will be destroyed.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): The statement made this afternoon by the minister was on such a high plane that much of the discussion which follows on his estimates is bound to appear trivial. The minister is to be congratulated on having expressed in such appropriate words Canada's aim in the world today. The committee will agree with him in all that he has said.

I had intended to review what has happened since I spoke on this subject last year. However, in view of the advanced stage of our proceedings I shall touch upon only two points at the present time. On one of those points I would associate myself with what has been said by other hon. members by way of regret that a subject of this importance should come before the committee at such a late hour in the session. The situation in the world at large is such as to have warranted more time being devoted to a discussion of this subject. Yet I believe I would not be fair if I were not to admit, or if I failed to recognize the fact that much has been done in the last three years to improve the situation.

The committee on external affairs, first under the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who was the former Secretary of State for External Affairs, and now under the present minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is to be commended for the work it is doing. Both the Prime Minister and the present minister of the department are to be commended in this regard because, through the evidence given by officials in the department, hon. members have been able to gain a much better knowledge of the inner workings of the department, and a better knowledge of the problems of those officials who must advise the government on these questions.

I think much can be said, too, of the good work done by the chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), since he has taken charge of it. The next step would seem to be for the government to accept the suggestion which has come from all sides of the house, namely, in the next year and years to follow, to bring down the estimates for the Department of External Affairs earlier in the session.

My chief object in rising at this time is to emphasize anew the importance of giving adequate remuneration to those in our diplomatic service. At times we are bound to be criticized for expenditures made. But here is one place where I believe we are not as generous as we should be. It would be to the advantage of the house and the country if we understood better the necessity for appropriating larger sums for our external service.

Perhaps on this occasion I might be permitted to repeat what I said on March 21, 1946, when a similar debate was in progress before the house. On that occasion I said:

I saw the evolution of our diplomatic service during the years I was in contact with its members when on many occasions I accompanied the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe to imperial or international conferences. I think we have as good a staff of men as or in some cases even better than, the big powers. We should make life in the service more comfortable and free from worry and criticism. We should pay them more generously from the rank of third secretrary up to that of ambassador. I hold no brief to speak for the personnel of the Department of External Affairs, but I think it is only fair to say the good I think of them especially when they have been doing such a good job.

And later in the same speech I said:

We have in external affairs a body of men who are highly trained, who are hard working, but who are strangely unpaid. This is not said in criticism of the minister or his deputy minister, but I do want to offer a word of advice to the press and to the house that better service will be rendered to the country if the government is encouraged to lift the standard of pay of our diplomats. During the early stages of their careers when these men have to spend many years in acquiring knowledge they are greatly underpaid when compared with the returns that could be obtained in business. A young man in business may have some value, but certainly he has not the cultural achievements possessed by our officials in external affairs.

I know the minister, personally, is sympathetic to the staff which serves him; but I believe I can show, if I may take a moment or so, that the salaries paid, particularly in the lower positions, are quite low. A third secretary, according to the estimates, appears to begin at $2,500 and goes up to $2,840. In this year's estimates we have some as low as $2,520 and others as high as $2,820. In order to reach that point, these men must have had college training. They must be college graduates, and they have had to attend universities and spend a long time to acquire the proper training which the duties in these important positions demand. This is a most important department of government.

I suggest that consideration should be given to a review of the present situation. The examinations which I know these men had to pass a few years ago—and I believe they are equally as difficult today—are quite exacting. These young men must know more than the average man would need to know who would receive three times the salary. When they enter the service they are young, and may not mature immediately. Even so, I believe they are deserving of higher salaries.

Then, the allowances are shown in a lump sum. Although I asked for details, my request was received too late to be of service in this debate. I would point out, however, that, although they may appear satisfactory, certainly in certain cases they are not too high. I have been in many of our embassies abroad, and I know that young men with families in those positions find it difficult to follow those who are in the foreign services of other countries. It may be that many of the older countries attract wealthier men to their foreign service, while in Canada we take young men who have passed the required examinations and have shown that they have the necessary qualifications but may not have private means. Therefore they find themselves at a disadvantage when they must deal with diplomats of other countries who are better paid or who have private means.

I believe that is a point which should be given careful consideration. If we expect to attract the high calibre of men it has been our good fortune to attract up to this time, we cannot expect that they will always have private means, and we should consider improving their position either by giving them better allowances or higher salaries, and especially those who are stationed in Ottawa.

I have mentioned third secretaries because their salaries are the lowest; but I do not think a man would reach the position of first secretary much before the age of forty, or somewhere around that. We find that first secretaries are receiving salaries as low as $4,500, and ranging up to $4,900; and these men have been in the service for at least fifteen years.

I believe we would be ill-advised to criticize expenditures in our diplomatic service. We are wise to make sure that there is no waste of money; on the other hand, we should be generous in our appropriations for our representatives abroad. In those countries we have very few people from Canada and Canadians at large are judged from those few. We should be giving them fair salaries and allowances so that they would be able to maintain their rank and give the impression that Canada is really a rich country, a country of the future, and that it pays well those in its service who are deserving.

Mr. GRAYDON: How does the Brazilian post stand at the present time? I understand that some change is in contemplation, and I was wondering whether it is likely to take place soon. I understand the Hon. Jean Desy is now in Switzerland, and I had in mind whether it was the intention that he should go back to Rio de Janeiro or whether he was being selected for some other post.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Jean Desy is at present on leave from his post in Brazil, a leave to which the regulations entitle him. However, he consented to represent Canada at the refugee conference in Geneva. He was taking his leave in Europe and complied readily with our suggestion that he represent us at that conference. No change has yet been made with respect to his post in Brazil.

The hon. member has said that a change is contemplated. There is in contemplation the establishment of a mission in Italy as soon as the peace treaty with Italy is ratified; or perhaps it might be established even earlier. That is a matter which is under consideration. Mr. Desy is one of those under consideration for the Italian post. If he is appointed to that post, some other representative will have to be chosen and recommended to His Majesty for Brazil.

Mr. GRAYDON: Wherever Mr. Desy goes, I am sure that most of us feel that he will do a most excellent job on behalf of Canada. Has the minister any further information to give other than that which was tendered a few weeks ago with respect to the exchange of senior diplomatic representation between Canada and Russia?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, there have been no developments there. When the former ambassador to Russia took his leave of Mr. Molotov he was informed that the question of appointing a senior representative of the soviet republics in Canada was under consideration, but there have been no developments since that time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Kearney was appointed high commissioner to India some time ago, and a point that rises in my mind is whether Mr. Kearney has been delegated to Pakistan, Hindustan and so on.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Kearney was delegated to India. So far, we have not been officially notified that there has been any change in the status of the nation to which he was delegated.

Mr. GRAYDON: I intended that my next question would be as to what would happen after the official designation comes through, but I fancy there is little use in my asking it. Experience tells me that the minister will say that they will cross that bridge when they come to it; only he will use language much more perfect and delicate and say that that is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member's words are sufficiently polished and delicate to express my views.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not sure whether my next question would come under the minister's department or not. It has to do with reparations in connection with the S. S. Athenia upon which a number of Canadians were passengers and which was sunk in the early days of the war. I understand that some progress has been made with respect to reparations to those who lost property as well as in cases where lives were lost. I should like to know if the minister can say when Canadians may expect payment of their reparation claims.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am afraid I would not venture to forecast any date. A conference of those countries entitled to reparations from the western zones of occupation of Germany under the terms of the Potsdam agreement was held in Paris during November and December, 1945. This conference agreed to an allocation of all German assets available for reparations on a percentage basis between the countries participating in the conference and also agreed to the setting up of an inter-allied reparation agency charged with the distribution of these assets between the claimant countries.

It was also decided at the conference to establish two categories of external assets; namely, category A and category B; the latter category to include industrial and other capital equipment, merchant shipping, and inland water transport. Category A includes all other forms of German assets available for reparations, such as (a) German assets within each country's jurisdiction, (b) German assets in neutral countries, (c) future deliveries from current German production, and (d) reciprocal deliveries from the eastern zones of occupation of Germany.

I think the hon. member will feel as I do that the prospect of delivery from current German production or of reciprocal deliveries from the eastern zones of occupation in Germany have not yet proved to be very good, and there are not very sanguine hopes at the present moment that they will improve.

The conference did not determine what total amount of reparations should be paid by Germany or the period over which payments should be made. I would imagine that the restoration of conditions in Europe would be looked upon as having prior claim on current production over reparations. The Canadian ambassador in Paris signed the reparations agreement on behalf of Canada on January 30, 1946. The agreement has been published in treaty series, 1945, No. 23, and was tabled in the house on March 15, 1946.

The first session of the assembly of the inter-allied reparation agency, set up under the reparation agreement, took place at Brussels from February 28 to March 7, 1946. Since then, the assembly has met eight times. The first Canadian delegate to the inter-allied reparation agency was the Hon. W. F. A. Turgeon, at that time our ambassador to Belgium. When the Hon. Mr. Turgeon left Brussels in September, 1946, to become Canadian high commissioner to Eire, Colonel G. W. McPherson took over his position at the agency.

During the initial meeting of the assembly, several standing committees were organized, on which Canada has representation on the following: the committee of German external assets; the merchant shipping committee; and the committee on industrial property.

During the past year and up to the present time, no German reparations of importance have been allocated to Canada by the inter-allied reparation agency, except the three merchant vessels: Huascaran, Tiefland—now called Empire Gatehouse—and Weserwehr—now called Empire Gangway. Of these, the first two are already under Montreal registry and the other will also be registered there upon its arrival from England in the near future.

I have no information I can give the hon. member about the claims of persons who suffered through the disaster to the Athenia.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am wondering if the minister will not find, on further investigation, that the claims of the Athenia victims were underwritten by the United Kingdom. It seems to me that that information came to me during the past year and that is one of the reasons I asked my question. I will not ask the minister to elaborate on his answer now, but perhaps some time before the session closes he will give what information he has on that point. I think he will find that the Athenia victims are in a different position with respect to their claims from any other reparations claimants.

The next matter to which I should like to refer is the Canadian information service. I have looked in vain for details covering this branch of external affairs. If they are in some other place I should like the minister to indicate just what the position is. Will he state whether there is to be a new chairman appointed and what the future policy of the department will be with respect to this branch which has been taken over from another department?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On February 5 the duties of the Canadian information service relative to the distribution abroad of information concerning Canada were transferred to the Department of External Affairs by order in council issued under the Transfer of Duties Act. The estimates had been prepared and the headings were the same as the headings in external affairs. The amounts were added together and they constitute the estimates now before the committee. On each item I shall be able to give the amount which concerns what was formerly external affairs and the amount which concerns what was formerly the Canadian information service. When the service was absorbed into external affairs, its permanent employees became part of the permanent employees of the department and the temporaries became part of the temporary employees of the department. Travelling expenses, printing and so forth were the same, so that no distinction was made in printing the estimates, which were formerly presented separately. For instance, permanent salaries, all concern the former external affairs service; temporary assistance, the estimate is $680,943, and of that amount $534,499 was for former external affairs service, and $146,444 for the temporary employees.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the number of that item?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is in the details on page 106 of the estimates with respect to the item for departmental administration.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Are the duties which were being discharged after the absorption exactly the same as the duties before?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The domestic work was practically eliminated just as quickly as that could be arranged. The department is now carrying on information service only for its foreign affairs. With respect to the replacement of the head of information service, he will be replaced by an official of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. GRAYDON: A new appointee?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, one who was already in the service of external affairs. That is the present intention. Mr. Andrews, as the hon. member knows, is going to become assistant to the president of the university of British Columbia, but at our request he has continued and is cooperating with us in preparing the transition to some other person in the department as head of the service.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not yet quite sure as to the exact position of information service now in this department. Has it been completely absorbed and has it lost its identity so far as a branch of the external affairs department is concerned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is the information division of the Department of External Affairs. There are six or seven divisions under the under-secretary of state for external affairs, each one having a head responsible to the under-secretary.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that is the case, can we have a break-down of the expenditures which are contemplated in these estimates for that one division? Perhaps that will answer the question.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The item for departmental administration is $1,534,144; services performed by those employed in Canada, $477,144; estimate for the services to be performed outside Canada, $169,406.

Mr. GRAYDON: What does the minister mean by those employed in Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A certain number work here. Then we have a certain number of representatives in Washington, New York, London, one in Mexico, Canberra and Paris. Those are the places where there were representatives of that branch, but they have now been integrated into external affairs, and wherever they are they are a part of the staff of the mission established there.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have all domestic characteristics of this branch been abandoned entirely, and is it now dealing entirely with external affairs?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, that is so. We have eliminated the service performed or asserted to have been performed for the Canadian public and have confined it exclusively to servicing our offices abroad.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): My understanding was that at one time the service provided information not merely for our own officials abroad but for use in foreign countries. Was that true and is it still true, or is it now purely a service for our own officials abroad?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is still true. They are still a part of our missions abroad supplying information with respect to Canadian affairs to inquirers and to the press. There is an inquiry service; also the preparation and distribution of reference materials abroad; the production and distribution of publications; the provision and distribution of photographs, posters and other graphic materials abroad; the procurement and distribution of books for reference libraries abroad; arranging facilities for journalists visiting Canada and for Canadian speakers abroad; the handling of arrangements for cultural projects; the preparation and distribution of circular dispatches; the coordination of information activities abroad; the arranging of departmental press conferences; the preparation and distribution of departmental press releases; the handling of Canadian press releases at international conferences; the operation of area desks, that is, desks in charge of responsible persons for various areas in the world. They carry on the duties of information officers.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have we an information service for the Department of External Affairs and another overlapping information service for the Department of Trade and Commerce? I am not criticizing the minister especially, but I look with some considerable suspicion on this taking over of Canadian information service. I think you have adopted a kind of delicate child, if the minister does not mind my saying so, and you may have some trouble in bringing it up. Here you have hundreds of thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money being spent on this information service. Has the minister read over the various jobs that this information service did? I must confess I think the public is pretty well fed up on all this canned information. You would be surprised how little the public bothers with canned stuff in the way of news today. A lot of people said that there was a paper war in certain respects. You are moving into a paper peace now. We should not do that. I should like the minister to give assurance to the committee that in between sessions he himself will go into this question of the Canadian information service and go into it with a fine tooth comb because it deserves a real combing out. I would be surprised if we are not to duplicate a lot of news services that are already available. This vote is up half a million dollars now. If the figures I heard are correct it is an outlandish and scandalous business. If it were to go on in this way I am pretty sure that we shall not get good value for our money. Government policy will have to be reviewed carefully. We have the Department of Trade and Commerce making a move all over the world trying to get our goods sold. If we are to get back the money that we spend that is all right, but I am not at all sure that this is not just a big unprofitable balloon that the government has up in the air. It had better deflate it before the public get wise to what is going on, because, once they do, this distribution of paper all over the world will arouse them. We are paying very heavily for it. I do not want to be unreasonable about the matter. Most hon. members will take a similar view to mine. In all fairness to his department and to his government, the minister ought to go into the matter very carefully before he commits himself to any big expense in the formulation of other estimates.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should like to reply at once to the hon. member for Peel. When I first came here, for the first two or three sessions I listened to vehement speeches from the hon. gentleman who preceded my hon. friend as acting leader of the opposition. The tone of his speeches was that the government was not doing its duty to the public of Canada because it did not have a press relations service in the United States. For the first two or three sessions that was repeatedly drummed into us, that we were doing a pretty good job in our war effort, but that we were not publicizing it and that we did not have good press relations in the United States. Later, there was set up an organization under an experienced gentleman who had previously been dealing with the publishers in the United States in his capacity as representative of the manufacturers of paper. Within a relatively short time there was a change in the attitude of public opinion in the United States, or at least there were very much more favourable things being said and printed about Canadians and the Canadian war effort than had been said before. Hon. gentlemen opposite quickly became suspicious of the activities of that war information service, and I think it was at the last session or the one before that they were quite vehement in their denunciation of the fact that we were using taxpayers' money for government propaganda.

Mr. GRAYDON: In the domestic field; you should not have done it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In order to make sure that was not done, it was suggested that this department be brought under the control and supervision of the Department of External Affairs, and that it had no right to do anything that those responsible for the conduct of our external affairs did not feel it was necessary to do to disseminate proper information about Canadian affairs. That integration was made, and instructions were given that there was to be no domestic propaganda, and there has not been any domestic propaganda.

When the hon. member for Peel suggests that I take what time I may have between sessions to make a personal investigation of the situation I tell him that I will not do that. I have in the Department of External Affairs officials in whom I have sufficient confidence to take their word in their report to me that the instructions which have been given are being carried out. Whenever the House of Commons decides that that is not sufficient, that it has to have a minister of the crown who will do it personally, I will not be that minister of the crown.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Did the Prime Minister say that he expected the house to rise on the twelfth? If so, did he take into consideration the political propaganda of the opposition?

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Chairman, I rose a couple of hours ago to ask a simple question. Evidently your eye was cast somewhere else, and that was all right; I have no objection to that. But since that time, after listening to quite a few speeches I rather felt a speech was growing on me, and my thoughts since that time have now become rather elaborated. However I am not going to punish the committee any more tonight with a further speech. I have confidence in the leader of this group, together with the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) who represented us on the external affairs committee.

I am interested in international affairs, and if it were not so late in the session I would have spoken at some length. May I make just one observation before asking my question? It is with respect to one or two things that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said. I always enjoy his speeches.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. HANSELL: Because I always enjoy a little comedy. Sometimes he speaks words of real wisdom. However, tonight I think a good deal of what he said was a little bit of puffing and blowing. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) answered him very appropriately. In his proposal the hon. member attempted to evaluate some of the world's diplomats. If I recall rightly he said that Mr. Churchill when he was with Mr. Stalin and Mr. Roosevelt had failed miserably as a diplomat. That depends very largely on what information we may have on which to base our opinions. We are all subject to propaganda; we are all subject to what comes to us in the press and over the radio. Propaganda is very powerful. The propaganda machine can make a man overnight, and it can break him overnight. If we were to appraise the value of these men on the basis of that which is true, if we were able to gain access to the truth, I am certain we would find that Mr. Churchill ranked with the highest of diplomats.

The hon. member referred to these three great men in conference at Teheran. Personally I believe that Mr. Churchill went to that conference with plans for the reconciliation and reconstruction of Europe, plans which evidently met their Waterloo. Why they did so we are not able to say, because we are not in possession of all the facts.

I wish to quote, from the New York Sun of May 8, 1945, part of an article written by a well known columnist, Mr. George Sokolsky, who had the following to say with reference to that conference:

> One of these men (the Big Three) is a British aristocrat, conservative, imperialistic, proud, the most heroic political figure of the war. But he heads an empire that has long been used to the limit. Its principal resource now is the treasury and industry of the United States. His mind is robust, but his purse is bare. At a bargain he sits with empty hands and high hopes.

If that observation is right, then I think some responsibility rested upon the shoulders of Mr. Roosevelt at that time, and my personal view is that Mr. Roosevelt was a much overrated world figure.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): I do not think so.

Mr. HANSELL: When history is rewritten a century or two from now, perhaps that will be found to have been the truth.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Both were good men.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not saying they were not both good men, but if this observation by this columnist is true it proves one thing. It proves that those world powers which hold the purse strings of the world control the destinies of the nations. Let that be put down as, in my opinion, one fundamental principle.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask my question. It is not along the line I have been talking. It is a simple question. Perhaps I could have telephoned the minister, but it might as well be on the record. I had an inquiry from a university graduate who is interested in going into the diplomatic service. Would the minister tell us what the procedure would be for that young man? He has a Master of Science degree in education and is going on from there for some other degree. What procedure will be necessary? Will any preliminary training be required by the department? Perhaps the minister would amplify that for me.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I understand that a competition is to be announced at an early day by the civil service commission for entry into the service of external affairs, and if the gentleman in question would write to the commission I am sure they would inform him as soon as the competition was announced and send him forms to apply as one of the competing candidates. If, on the other hand, he wishes further information and will write to the department, giving information about himself, the personnel officer of the department will reply and tell him what further qualifications, if any, are required, and will facilitate to the greatest degree possible his participation in the civil service competition.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand that most of the positions which are open in the department are being filled by university graduates. If that is the case I should like to plead the cause of those who have graduated from agricultural colleges across Canada. From a question I asked last year in the external affairs committee, I do not think a single man from an agricultural college was admitted to the department. In our relations with other countries the people whom we sent abroad are the only show-windows by which those nations can judge the Canadian people, and it would seem a shame if graduates of agricultural colleges could not have their quota so that they might be sent to other countries, in view of the fact that Canada occupies so important a position in agricultural matters.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am informed that graduates of agricultural colleges are not in any way debarred, but they tend to go to the Department of Agriculture or to trade and commerce. There is being established a system of interchange between trade and commerce and external affairs, and there is a desire in both departments to make them complementary to each other and to make the personnel in each of the two available for promotions that become open in either. I think that is a move which not only will be helpful to the morale of the personnel in the two departments but will give the two departments a broader field from which to select the best persons for any post which is to be filled.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Now that the air is cooler, I want to come back to the question of the information service. The minister seemed to become so interested in one aspect of the question asked by the hon. member for Peel that he forgot to answer the question. We are in earnest about it. We know that when a going concern of this kind gets into action it is hard to prevent it from going on and even increasing and we want to know whether there is danger of overlapping or of parallel action. From what the minister read to us of the activities now being conducted within the Department of External Affairs, that long list which was read seemed to include a number of items which the layman would think were within the scope, let us say, of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister say whether in some important country where we have quite an organization for the Department of Trade and Commerce and an organization also for the Department of External Affairs there are actually two publicity organizations, or whether, in such a case, it is all done by one. We do not suggest that there is carelessness or impropriety, but we do suggest that there is real danger of overlapping, and it is our duty to find out about it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My information is that it is all done by one. There is close cooperation between the two departments to make mutually available all facilities that either provides. It was found that there had been, in the growth that was a natural consequence of the way in which the Canadian information service had been established, things that could be eliminated, and they are being eliminated. It is, as I believe the hon. member will concede, the sincere desire of external affairs to avoid anything that could become the object of partisan controversy. The Secretary of State and the under secretary have given instructions that we avoid responsibility for anything that could become the object of partisan controversy. That is being attended to just as closely as possible. I can give the hon. member the assurance that these items are lower than they were last year. Last year the estimates were more than was expended. There will not be anything done which we feel can be avoided. We are doing much less in that field than other countries. The figures in that respect were put on the record in the committee on external affairs. We shall probably do some things which were not done by the Canadian information service, but we expect to do only that which we feel will be providing full value for what is expended.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In the list of ministers and ambassadors which I received I do not find the name of General Odlum. Is he still in the public service?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: General Odlum is still on leave, and there is no public announcement I can make at the present time. I should be glad to tell the hon. members just what the situation is, and I hope that it will not be many days before I am in a position to make a public announcement. The hon. member realizes that we have to get agreements of foreign countries when we make an appointment and to get the approval of His Majesty to appointments in a foreign service; and no announcements are ever made until those agreements and approvals have been secured. I hope that I shall be able to announce at an early day the appointment of General Odlum to a foreign post.

Item agreed to.

43. Representation abroad—including salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $3,178,256.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can the minister give some indication as to what the general policy is with respect to the balancing of non-professional diplomats and professional diplomats, if I may classify them in those categories, in so far as appointment to senior diplomatic posts across the world is concerned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Whenever a senior post was to be filled, if there was available in the department an officer who was considered to be qualified to fill it, he was appointed to the post. Whenever there was not in the department someone who appeared to be ready to take on the post, we looked outside for a representative.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some reference was made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario to the former ambassador to China, General Odlum. At the bottom of page 190 and the major part of page 191 of the minutes and proceedings of evidence of the standing committee on external affairs, certain questions were asked with respect to the new arrangements made for the new ambassador to China who has had extensive baggage go over with him, the baggage including four houses, a truck, a substantial amount of foodstuffs and some coal. One of the witnesses said that the baggage had taken about $30,000 to transport it from here to China. That would indicate a sort of adventure into what, I should think, might be called trailer diplomacy. In any event, whatever it may be called, I asked some questions of the witness who was on the stand at that time, and I think it was Mr. Matthews. He indicated he could get me the actual details of the shipment. I know the minister will not have those with him now; but before the session is ended, in order that we may have the information complete, will he provide that information? I think I myself am partly remiss in not having followed up the question in the committee on external affairs at a subsequent meeting.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think I have most of the information here. Mr. Matthews noted the question and prepared a note for me in order that I might deal with it. First of all, with respect to coal: In July, 1946, General Odlum advised the department that the price of poor coal in Nanking was $150, United States, per ton and suggested that we consider shipping coal for heating the residences and offices in China. As the situation regarding fuel in Nanking had not improved, it was decided to ship coal in the vessel which was taking the prefabricated houses to Nanking. Two hundred and four tons were purchased at a price of $10.90 a ton and were shipped to Nanking at a freight cost of $28 per ton. In this manner, the embassy was provided with a good quality of coal for $37.90 a ton, whilst poor quality coal had been purchased the year before at $150 a ton.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister doing the same thing in France where it is $80 a ton?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have not yet done the same in France. I was not informed that coal cost the equivalent of $80 a ton.

When a Canadian legation was first opened in Chungking, no premises were available for lease since the movement of the Chinese government and of all foreign missions to Chungking, had more than doubled its ordinary population. It was, therefore, necessary to construct a building which served as a residence for the minister, for all Canadian members of his staff and also as offices premises. The total cost of this building was approximately $135,000. The building was modest in size and extremely simple in its design and furnishings. The large cost resulted entirely from the fact that the official rate of exchange for Chinese national currency at the time of construction multiplied costs by at least five times what they would have been for a similiar building in Canada. When the capital was moved to Nanking the problem of suitable premises became acute.

In June of 1946, General Odlum, who was then ambassador, advised us that, after a long search, a small house which would be just adequate for the first secretary was available at a rental of $600, United States, per month, on a two-year lease, all to be paid in advance. He advised us this was the lowest rent for which any property was available. As it was necessary to provide accommodation for the ambassador, the counsellor, the first secretary, the Canadian members of the stenographic and clerical staff, the military attache and for offices, the department decided to explore the possibility of sending to China prefabricated houses. In the meantime accommodation had to be leased. It was decided that eventually we would have to adopt the practice of other missions in China and to provide all residence and office accommodation in a single compound. So that any buildings erected now would be of continuing use, land for this compound has been purchased.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is at Nanking?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, at Nanking. I have the costs here.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was really rising to ask the details of the shipment across. Perhaps the minister might add that in that Chungking case, with the cost $135,000, I think the house when sold brought only $12,000.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is on the record.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The freight charges on these prefabricated houses was $20,280.65.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can the minister give the details I asked for in my question regarding the freight shipment over, in addition to the houses? The minister gave the information with respect to coal, but in addition to that there was a truck, if my information is correct, and a quantity of foodstuffs. Has the minister those details?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. I have a note with respect to the coal on which the freight was $28 a ton, and the charge on the prefabricated houses amounted to $20,280.65. But it was felt, in view of our experience with the cost of building with materials supplied at Chungking, that anything we could send over from Canada would cost much less than if we attempted to secure it in China.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have three questions to ask. First, are there any developments in connection with filling the senior diplomatic post at Moscow, and also are there any developments in connection with the Soviet Union filling their senior post here?

Mr. GRAYDON: I asked that question.

Mr. KNOWLES: Second, I have a question relating to the purchase of the new residence in Washington. Has that been completed? Third, could the minister indicate the number of countries in which we maintain both diplomatic missions and trade commissioners' offices?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My hon. friend will find the reply to the first question in Hansard, where it was answered for the hon. member for Peel. The purchase of the residential property at Washington has been completed, but the ambassador cannot obtain occupation until November. It is the property that was described before the committee on external affairs.

With respect to the third question, I would ask if it would be satisfactory to have a statement prepared. I believe the hon. member would like to know in what places we have both external affairs representatives and representatives of trade and commerce. That being so, I shall have a return prepared. It can be tabled if the hon. member wishes.

Item agreed to.

52. Portion of expenditure of the imperial economic committee, $14,500.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The imperial economic committee was reorganized in 1933 on the recommendation of the Skelton committee and took over the marketing intelligence notes, the commodity series and world surveys on production and trade formerly issued by the empire marketing board. In addition, it prepares reports to governments on special subjects. Throughout the war, subscriptions were reduced in view of the limited amount of work that could be done. The committee is now planning resumption of the work and subscriptions are to be resumed. At first they are to continue on the reduced basis until work can be extended.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is a committee based in London?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, a committee composed of representatives of the United Kingdom government and other members of the commonwealth. The expenses are shared by the members of the commonwealth, and the services are available to all of them.

Item agreed to.

55. Provisional international civil aviation organization, $125,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: I take it that there is a change of one word in the name of this organization. It is no longer provisional. May I ask the nature of the expenditure? Is it a portion of the expenditure, or a grant. What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member knows that the convention on international civil aviation was drawn up in Chicago in December, 1944, and made provision for the establishment of this organization upon ratification by twenty-six of the signatory states. The twenty-sixth ratification was received this year and the international civil aviation organization came into existence on April 4, 1947. Thirty-eight ratifications have been received. This amount is our proportion of the budget of the organization.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Marine service—

425. River St. Lawrence ship channel; contract dredging in the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, including cost of administration—capital, $1,022,150.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps on this item I may be out of order in what I wish to say, although I do not think I am. I am going to speak about the Richelieu river, which is part of the St. Lawrence canal system.

When I was last in Sorel, in September, 1946, I had the joy and pleasure of spending a few hours with the late Hon. Mr. Cardin, for whom I always had a warm feeling, one which I knew he reciprocated. At that time I was in Sorel making a survey in connection with the Richelieu river.

On this occasion I am going to ask the minister, as I have on one or two earlier occasions, to interest himself in the problem of completing the canalization of the Richelieu river. In my judgment it is nothing short of an outrage against navigation on the Richelieu river for conditions which have remained there for so long to remain longer.

It will not take long to tell about it. The minister has been there, and he knows that a steamer of perhaps 2,000 tons, the ordinary lake steamer operated by the Canada Steamship Lines, can ascend the Richelieu river as far as St. Ours. At St. Ours the river is dammed, although it is a poor dam, and is just a barrier across the river. Ships can go no farther without going through St. Ours lock. That lock, I believe, is about 339 feet long by 45 feet wide, and has a 12-foot draught. The amazing picture is that, once they have passed through St. Ours, reaching the Chambly basin, they cannot proceed up the canal any farther. The Chambly canal from the Chambly basin up to St. Johns has about nine small locks approximately 120 feet long by 23 feet wide, with a draught of six feet six inches.

That creates a vicious bottle-neck in transportion on the Richelieu river from Montreal to New York. I am convinced that if the Richelieu river were properly equipped with draught and locks equal to St. Ours, as it should have been long ago, there would be large increases in transportation and commerce which would benefit Sorel, St. Johns and Montreal. After you pass St. Johns going south, there is a 12 foot draught through lake Champlain and through the Champlain canal right down to Albany. After you pass Albany there is a much deeper draught to New York.

I am going to ask the minister to interest himself, as did the former minister who represented that constituency for many years, in this matter. I supported the late minister years ago when he diffidently, almost timidly asked for a vote to build the Fryer's dam north of St. Johns in order to raise the water level at that point to twelve feet, so that ships could come down from lake Champlain as far as the dam. I am going to ask the minister to interest his engineers in this. I am sure the plans are already in the department. This transportation route should be completed and it is an outrage that it was not completed long ago. The Richelieu river constituted one of our first transportation routes and it is the most neglected of all our routes, at least in the east.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman is quite right about that being a bottleneck on the Richelieu. I will not attempt to say that I am as familiar as he is with the situation, but in the last few months I have interested myself in the project because of delegations and representations I have received. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is aware that a joint report was made some years back—I do not remember the date which stipulated that until the St. Lawrence waterway had been finally developed to a 35-foot depth all the way, it would not be advisable to undertake the deepening of the Richelieu. I may not be using the exact words of the report, but that is their gist. Because of that finding, the engineers of the department have taken the stand that it would be preferable to await the completion of the other project, and I am sure my hon. friend is as familiar as I am as to when the time of completion will be.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am going to ask the minister not to take the word of his engineers. The words they use may not be their own, and I am afraid they are the result of some campaign in opposition to Richelieu river transportation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is the report.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am opposed to the report.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: I hope I made myself clear. That is the report of a joint board of Canadian and United States engineers.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have all the reports and I oppose the report as strongly as I can. It is nothing but nonsense to have a 12-foot draft to St. Ours and from then on have only a six foot six inch draft, and then, after passing St. Johns, to have a 12-foot draft right down to Albany. Anyone who opposes the completion of that canal is not working in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The joint board did not oppose it.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I were the minister I would see that they changed their opinion and got on with the completion of the canal, so that ships could come up from Albany right to the river St. Lawrence where there is a 30-foot draft. The St. Lawrence canal has in my judgment nothing to do with this. This is part of the over-all picture with which I am familiar. Part of that picture is a 12-foot draft right up to Sorel from Albany. I am going to ask the minister again to pay no attention —I do not mean this unkindly—to his engineers if they oppose completion; let him tell the engineers what to do.

I am sure if he does that I will do my best from this side of the house to support the completion of the canal with a 12-foot draft to Sorel. I am convinced that this would mean increased transportation business all along the river. This river has been neglected for too many years. The draft in some of the locks is too shallow; the locks themselves are only twenty-three feet wide, and some of them will not take a boat more than 120 feet long. That is quite a small boat. The only boats that can use this canal are the small oil boats. This draft should be the same as that in the St. Ours lock, and that would mean increased traffic right from Albany to Quebec. Shipments from Three Rivers and elsewhere could be made in good-sized steamers rather than in the small driblets as at the present time. This would mean a great deal, not only for Quebec, but for the whole of Canada.

I know the minister is interested in our canals and you will not find such bottlenecks anywhere else as those that exist in the Canadian canal system. I will not take the time to name all the locks, but the Lachine is the first one out of Montreal, then the Soulanges, then Cornwall, and then the Williamsburg group and the Galops locks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will be through in one minute. The canal system in Canada is important, and it is all very well to say "carried." There is a lot of stuff that is of no moment at all, but the canalization of the Richelieu river is a matter of great importance. It has been delayed long enough. The depths and the width and the draught of the canal locks are not uniform. A shipper sending a boat up to the great lakes must inquire about each lock and then judge what sized ship he can send up. I believe the smallest lock on the St. Lawrence is at Cornwall. I have great respect for the young minister, and I mean young in experience.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is right because he has been in the cabinet for only a few years. I have been a long time at this business of transportation and I know these canals very well. As I say, I have a lot of respect for the young minister, and one of his ambitions should be to make the locks in the canal system uniform throughout. They are not today. I think I have said enough. I promised the late Hon. Mr. Cardin that I would again this session promote what I knew was nearest to his heart, the completion of the Richelieu canal system.

Railway service—
428. Hudson Bay railway—construction and improvements—capital, $10,500.

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to ask a question in regard to stevedoring at the port of Churchill. My information is that shippers who wish to ship through that port this year some four and a half million feet of lumber had considerable difficulty in getting a stevedoring company to move the lumber from the railway cars on to shipboard. Has the minister any information on that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The last information I have is very encouraging. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was in the house when I stated, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Saskatoon City, that, so far as mixed cargoes of lumber and grain were concerned, there was no difficulty at all. The national harbours board felt they could raise a sufficient number of stevedores. There was some difficulty as regards whole cargoes of lumber; but I am informed, although not officially, that there will be a sufficient labour force in the area to move the lumber that so far has offered itself for movement.

Mr. WRIGHT: My information is that the grain people had objected to the lumber being loaded on grain boats and that this shipment of about four and a half million feet would have to secure a boat which carried only lumber. The boat has been obtained, provided that the necessary stevedoring can be done.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Stevedoring is not the responsibility of the national harbours board but the responsibility of the shippers. I am informed, however, that there will be a sufficient labour force to move the lumber cargo which is offering.

Mr. BRYCE: Have the cattle sheds been removed at Churchill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. That was the answer given in a return brought down in the house.

Mr. BRYCE: Why were they removed?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They were taken down to make room for the United States army when it was in there, and they have not been replaced.

Mr. BRYCE: Will they be replaced so that cattle can be shipped out of Churchill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If there is a demand for them they will be.

Mr. BURTON: Can the minister give us the latest information as to the possibility of the maximum amount of grain and other products being shipped over the Churchill route?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The amount of grain that can be stored in the elevator at Churchill is two and a half million bushels. There has been a great deal of talk about shipping as many as sixteen or seventeen million bushels. The facilities are there to ship that much. The movement of the grain is the responsibility of the Canadian wheat board. I am informed by them that they expect to ship more than they did last season, but what amount I am not in a position to say.

Mr. BURTON: The road will have the necessary facilities?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, the facilities are there to ship far more than two and a half million bushels.

Mr. WRIGHT: Information was given to me last year with regard to freight rates from points adjacent to Hudson Bay Junction to the port of Churchill on pulpwood as compared with the rates for a similar distance on pulpwood shipped from somewhere in the neighbourhood of Fort Frances. The figures I was given indicated—I am speaking from memory—that it cost approximately twice as much to ship pulpwood from the neighbourhood of Hudson Bay Junction to Churchill as it cost to ship a similar distance to Fort Frances. Has the minister any information on that? I was given to understand that was one of the reasons why it was difficult to use the port of Churchill for the export of poplar logs for making matches. There were inquiries from interests in Great Britain as to the export of poplar logs for that purpose, but they found that because of the high freight rate to Churchill as compared with shipments east they could not use the port of Churchill successfully. If there is that difference—and I have reason to believe there is—I think the minister should look into the matter and see just what the reason for it is.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member knows, of course, that the classification of freight rates is perhaps the most complicated thing there is, and I would not attempt to answer his question offhand. I know there are no export and import rates in existence on the Hudson Bay railway, but I shall be glad to inquire into the case he has mentioned and send him a note on it.

430. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—construction and improvement of terminal facilities—capital (estimated cost $5,964,000) (revote, $1,815,000), $4,000,000.

Mr. McLURE: What proportion of this $4,000,000 for the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals will be for the car ferry?

Mr. CHEVRIER: None of this vote is for the car ferry. It is all for the terminals at Tormentine and Borden.

Mr. McLURE: That is what I thought it might be, but it says "car ferry". Are the terminals at Tormentine completed? The terminals on the Borden side are only just started. Have contracts been let for them?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Contracts have been let in both cases.

Mr. McLURE: The contract for the Borden side has been let to two different contractors, I understand.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. McLURE: Would the minister state the amount of each of these contracts?

Mr. CHEVRIER: One is let to Canadian Dredge and Dock Company and the other to Foundation Maritime Limited. The contracts are: the former, $747,512, and the latter, $1,409,571.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. McLURE: Does the minister consider that a sufficient amount for the terminals at Borden, or will a further sum have to be voted to complete them?

Mr. CHEVRIER: According to the engineers who made the survey and prepared the estimate of costs, this vote will take care of the contract, but there will perhaps be required a small additional amount.

Mr. McLURE: Will it be practicable for the new car ferry to load and unload at Borden while the work on the terminals is going on?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It will be extremely difficult. The contract has been given to repair the terminals, and the ship must dock at these terminals. I understand that arrangements are being made to dock the ship in the usual way, but it is going to hold up the work.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED ENTERPRISES

National harbours board—

478. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1947 on any or all of the following accounts:

Reconstruction and capital expenditures—
Saint John	$125,000
Quebec	149,000
Generally—unforeseen and miscellaneous	200,000
	$474,000
Less amount to be expended from replacement funds	222,500
		$251,500.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain to the committee whether there are any plans for modernizing the national ports of Canada? I believe there has been practically no work of that kind done for seven or eight years, perhaps longer than that. There is great concern in some of the ports about modernization programmes being undertaken.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are under consideration and continually under review plans for the betterment of the national harbours board facilities in this country. Since 1935, the national harbours board has spent in various provinces of Canada not less than $17,500,000 of capital money for the extension, improvement and establishment of new facilities.

Mr. GREEN: In what years was that spent?

Mr. CHEVRIER: From 1935 down to date.

Mr. GREEN: There has been nothing spent since 1939.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, there has. I have not the figures before me but I could get them fairly quickly.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to know that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It runs from a quarter to half a million dollars a year since 1939. It was half a million dollars in the last three or four years and a million dollars from the beginning of the war to that time.

Mr. GREEN: Over all the war years?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: That is spread over all the different national ports.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Spread over the different national ports. In this year's estimates there are votes for projects which will run into well over $7 million.

Mr. GREEN: What amounts by way of capital improvements are under contemplation for the current year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot give that offhand. For instance, there is for Saint John an item of $125,000 for building a wharf, which will mean an additional expenditure. There is an item in Vancouver for some $153,000. That is a preliminary expenditure.

Mr. GREEN: What for?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can give that when we come to the item. We are dealing with another item now. We are dealing with item 478. There is an item dealing with Vancouver a little later on. I will give the details when we get to it, if desired.

Mr. GREEN: We are very much concerned in Vancouver about the fact that there is no local control over the harbour. As the minister knows, a recommendation was made by Sir Alexander Gibb in his national port survey of 1931 and 1932 for a form of local control. We are far removed from Ottawa and are not satisfied to have all the control centered here in the national harbours board.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But it is not.

Mr. GREEN: We think there should be some definite form of local control. At least there should be a committee on which the representatives of the various groups in the city who were interested in the harbour could sit; for example, labour, shipping interests, business, merchants and various other interests of the city. We have had that up time and again in the house, and the minister was asked to make a change of that kind when he was in Vancouver in January. At that time apparently he would not do anything about it. What is the picture at the present time?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will tell the hon. gentleman, in the first place, that his statement that there is no local control is not quite correct. There is local control through the port manager. That is the idea of the whole set-up of the national harbours board. There is a centralized administration here in Ottawa which does business through its local port managers in each of the seven ports of Canada. That is local control. That port manager is in touch with the local situation. He knows what the shipping interests want; he knows what labour wants; he knows what the board of trade and the other various organizations are interested in.

With reference to the other matter that my hon. friend speaks of, it is true that Sir Alexander Gibb recommended advisory councils in these ports.

Mr. HOWE: In 1933.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In 1933. But there are a lot of things that are recommended in reports which the government does not see fit to adopt. I am not saying that the government will never consent to advisory councils in the harbour boards of this country, but thus far it has not seen fit to do that. I have visited Vancouver and Halifax. I know that what my hon. friend says is the feeling in some quarters but not in all. I have had representations right in the city of Vancouver saying, leave the thing as it is now. Before the position is changed, I want to be quite sure that we are not going to move toward a worse position than a better one. I can tell my hon. friend that the door is not closed and I am always open to conviction.

Mr. GREEN: Of course that is really just repeating the statement the minister made last year. It is quite obvious that the intention of the government is that there shall be no local board. Certainly that position is not satisfactory to the great majority of the people who are using the port of Vancouver. I should like to know what survey the minister has made of the situation and whether he has any reasons other than those that he has given this evening for refusing to set up a board, because they are very slim ones.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know that I need give any other reasons. I am not under any obligation to tell the hon. gentleman what the reasons are for the decision of the government. I do not think he will expect me to do that. But I can tell him the main thing that the port of Vancouver and, I think, most of the harbours are interested in is the development of business and traffic, and that important thing is right in the hands of the port manager.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has outlined no plan tonight for modernizing these great Canadian ports. These ports cannot stand still; they must be kept up to date.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are not standing still.

Mr. GREEN: They must have new facilities all the time. The minister indicates no change at all tonight, no attempt to bring them up to date. We feel that if there were local people having some say in the planning of the port we would be far more likely to have the port kept up to date. Can the minister make any announcement about any plans for improving these ports?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have already told the hon. gentleman that in this very year we have votes for projects costing over $7 million toward improving the facilities at these ports.

Mr. GREEN: Has a general plan been drawn up by the national harbours board toward which you are working?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give us any idea what that plan is?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are plans, but the hon. gentleman knows the plans that the harbours board work upon must be approved. They must be approved by the committee on reconstruction. They must have the approval of the engineers, and until they have, the national harbours board is not in a position to make them public. Should the board make an over-all plan public, a five-year or a ten-year plan, the way things are developing in the country today, they might have to change the plan after two years. I know of a situation in Montreal where a plan was announced for five years in connection with the building of a certain wharf, and because of a change in navigational plans the wharf had to be entirely changed. It is, therefore, not safe to announce a five-year or a ten-year or a twenty-year plan and lead the people to believe that we will do these works and then, for some good reason, have to alter them. I think that is dangerous. Therefore, rather than do that, what the board has been following is to have a plan for each particular harbour announced in the estimates. In these estimates there are certain works for Saint John, Halifax and Vancouver.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. REID: I would ask the minister to consider the question of refinancing the debt of the New Westminster harbour commissioners. If one had time to place the whole picture of our harbour boards before the country I think it would be found to be a startling one, but I would point out that New Westminster is the only harbour board that paid interest charges in full up to 1939 when the war broke out. New Westminster is the only city and port in the entire country that has spent huge sums of money in the development of the port. Some years ago a bond issue was put out amounting to over $500,000 in connection with our port. Looking at the figures for some of the other ports, I find Halifax with an interest debt of over $3 million; Saint John, over $7 million of matured unpaid debt; Chicoutimi, $2,500,000; Quebec, $29,500,000 of matured interest unpaid, and Vancouver, over $5 million of matured interest unpaid. When I look at all these figures and consider the fact that in all cases there has been a refinancing this year, and then come to the port which I have the honour to represent and find that, as I have said, it is the only port in Canada which has paid its debt and, notwithstanding that, has not received the same consideration, I think I am justified in asking the minister to give it that consideration. Some of the principal becomes due this coming year. I would ask him to consider the question of refinancing in the case of New Westminster.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am familiar with the problem to which the hon. gentleman refers, and I have studied it. Unfortunately, however, we have not been able to do much to assist him, although I feel strongly for him. It is a matter about which I hope something can be done, and I assure him again that I will look into it and see if we cannot find some solution.

Mr. REID: Thank you.

Mr. HAZEN: All credit is due the municipality of New Westminster for what it has done in the respect indicated by the hon. member, but I must point out that he made a statement which is not correct when he said that New Westminster was the only municipality that had invested money in the development of its port. That statement is inaccurate, because the port of Saint John a good many years ago invested money—

Mr. REID: I am glad to hear it.

Mr. HAZEN:—in the building of wharves and the development of its port.

Mr. MacNICOL: About Toronto harbour—

Mr. REID: I have not it here.

Mr. MacNICOL: We have a new minister. He will make a good one by and by. About Toronto harbour, what draught of ships can now enter both the east and west entrances and sail through the bay, and what dockage depth have they?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot give that information now but I will get it. This is a national harbours board item.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are not many harbours that can beat Toronto as a national harbour.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Quite so. I will get the information.

Mr. JAQUES: May I ask the minister a question with reference to the railway service between the cities of Calgary and Edmonton?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That item will come later on.

Item agreed to.

Deficits—transport—

479. Amount required to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1947-48 to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made from time to time by the national company to the Minister of Finance and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year 1947, $707,000.

Mr. McLURE: I see that this item indicates, just as the item last year indicated, a deficit in respect of this service. When there are deficits in connection with canals that fact is not indicated, but when there is a deficit in connection with the car ferry service the fact is stated. Why should the word "deficit" appear here at all? The item should simply indicate that it is for the operation of the ferry service. If you designate it as a deficit in one case, why not in the other? Last year I was looking for a breakdown of this amount of $700,000 odd and I suppose we should get it. I am not going to ask for it tonight because it would be a huge question. May I say this, however. When the new boat is put on, I hope that the freight rates on trucks on the car ferry will be treated in such a way that the whole system of nine miles will be taken into account as if it were part of a national highway. I understand from press reports that the new ferry rates will go into operation as soon as the new boat is put on.

Mr. CHEVRIER: July 1.

Mr. McLURE: I suppose they are in force now on the old boats. I should like to know what these rates are. The only information I saw was that they would be favourable, but no specific statement was made with reference to the trucks or the loads they carry.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Canadian National authorities announced two or three days ago that the rates for trucks would be the same as on the Wood Islands, Cariboo ferry, and that commodities on trucks would be exempt, provided that they were products of the farm or fisheries.

Mr. McLURE: I might mention one point in that connection which we were arguing last year. In my opinion, the Canadian National Railways should not make these rates. I submit that the Minister of Transport should set these rates in conjunction with the government of Prince Edward Island. They are the two parties to the contract, to whom we look for its fulfilment. If the Canadian National Railways take their direction from the Minister of Transport, should he authorize them, declaring that this must be treated as a highway, then the matter is settled.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The minister takes the attitude that he has no authority to fix rates. That is for the board of transport commissioners. That is the attitude I took in answer to a similar question by the hon. gentleman last year and it must be the answer this year. I am afraid I have to take the same attitude this year.

Mr. McLURE: I think that was pretty well threshed out before. We know that the terms of confederation in 1873 come first. The board of transport commissioners have no authority in that whatsoever. They have no right to set the rates. Why do they not set the rate from Charlottetown to St. Johns, Newfoundland? Because they have no authority.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not want to get into an argument with my hon. friend on that. But if the board of transport commissioners have no right to set rates, why does my hon. friend accept the rates set by them?

An hon. MEMBER: They have to.

Mr. McLURE: We have to accept them and take what we get.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They have fixed the rates.

Mr. McLURE: Last year when the board went down to Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, to hold their sittings on freight rates, they themselves acknowledged that they did not have any authority.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, they did not say that. They said they doubted whether they had; but they proceeded to fix them.

Mr. McLURE: Well—

Mr. CHEVRIER: And they have again fixed them.

Mr. McLURE: But their chief legal man, Mr. Dysart, definitely made the statement, as he is reported, that they had no authority. Why should we accept it from them now, unless it is what we really want?

Item agreed to.

Deficits—
National harbours board—

480. To provide for payment to national harbours board, of the amount hereinafter set forth, to be applied in payment of the deficit (exclusive of interest on dominion government advances and depreciation on capital structures) arising in the calendar year 1947, in the operation of the Churchill harbour, $83,641.

Mr. MacNICOL: How is this deficit made up?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is an operation deficit.

Mr. MacNICOL: Operating what?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Operating revenue for the year 1947 is $80,000, and the maintenance and expenses amount to $163,641. The operating deficit is, therefore, $83,641.

Mr. MacNICOL: That does not include any repairs to either docks or roundhouses?

Mr. CHEVRIER: All current repairs.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That does not take into account any of the dredging?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. JAQUES: Will the minister tell me when we reach the item I am interested in?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes; I will tell the hon. gentleman when we reach the item he wishes to discuss.

Item agreed to.

Deficits—National harbours board—

482. Advances to national harbours board, subject to the provisions of section 29 of the National Harbours Board Act, to meet expenditures applicable to the calendar year 1947 on any or all of the following accounts:

Reconstruction and capital expenditures—
Montreal	$419,500
Vancouver	153,800
	$573,300
Less amount to be expended from replacement funds	41,800

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. GREEN: That includes two payments, one for the port of Montreal and one for the port of Vancouver. Has any arrangement been made within the last few weeks with regard to the Second Narrows bridge in Vancouver? A newspaper report on June 16 said in the headnote, "May cut bridge charge; government makes offer," and read in part as follows:

Second Narrows bridge will probably be returned debt-free and in good condition to its original bondholders, Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company by the end of 1951.

This is expected following an announcement made in Ottawa today by Hon. Lionel Chevrier, Minister of Transport.

Can the minister explain the facts with regard to that report?

Mr. CHEVRIER: What happened was that there was a refinancing of the debt. The matter was studied over a period of years. I have the facts here. It is a fairly involved matter which I should not like to go into, but representations had been made by a number of people, by the various public bodies there, and by members from this side of the house.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The hon. member for Vancouver North.

Mr. CHEVRIER: By the hon. member for Vancouver North and by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—

Mr. KNOWLES: He is an Independent.

Mr. CHEVRIER: —in addition to those I have mentioned. They asked that there be a refunding of the moneys, or at least that there be a reduction in the interest from five per cent to 2¾ per cent. This money, which in amount was in the neighbourhood of one million and some thousand dollars, had been advanced by the predecessors of the national harbours board in order to provide for the building of the Second Narrows bridge. The board paid off the money lent from the banks by its predecessors. It was paying a lower rate of interest than it was charging up to these people. It consented to reduce the rate from five per cent to 2¾ per cent upon certain terms and conditions. By that reduction it will hasten the return of the bridge to the owners. With the amount of tolls which are being collected today, I think in five years the bridge will be turned over to its original owners with full payment of the amount owing. I am just reminded of this which is important. There was a conditional offer. There were one or two conditions, the terms of which I have not before me. If those terms are met, then the offer stands. If they are not met, of course it may be necessary to withdraw the offer.

Mr. GREEN: Then, in effect, it is a conditional offer subject to these special conditions being met?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry, but I cannot hear the hon. member.

Mr. GREEN: It is a conditional offer?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. It is not conditional in so far as the reduction of interest is concerned; that is, the reduction of rate.

Mr. GREEN: What is conditional?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The city and district of North Vancouver are grateful for this offer and are going to accept it, so that the hon. member can put his mind at ease.

Mr. GREEN: A strong request has been made that cargo rates in the port of Vancouver be done away with. I believe that our port is the only one in which cargo rates are charged. What is the present position with regard to that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is true. There are cargo rates in Vancouver; but there are no dockage charges such as there are in other ports. It is true that representations have been made asking that these be removed. The average charge is small and, when compared with the rates in the Pacific coast ports of Seattle, Tacoma and San Francisco, the rates in the port of Vancouver are much lower.

Mr. GREEN: We consider it unfair that we should have to pay cargo rates when none of the other national ports are charging them. I do not think it is fair to maintain them because they may have them in Seattle and Portland.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The totality of the charges in Vancouver is less than in Pacific Coast ports and no higher than in eastern ports.

Mr. GREEN: That is not the submission made by the Vancouver people. Will the minister have any special investigation made into that question of cargo rates?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The charges have not been touched since the national harbours board took over. Local boards and local bodies fixed those rates, and we have not increased them in any way, notwithstanding the fact that all other things have gone up and applications have been made for increases in many transportation services.

Mr. GREEN: This is just another good example of why there should be some local control of the Vancouver harbour. This business of control from three thousand miles away simply is not good enough.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It was local control that put the rates on.

Mr. GREEN: That was a condition many years ago before the national harbours board was set up. Under present conditions, we feel that these rates should be taken off; and we shall not be satisfied until there is some sort of local control set up in this regard.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The hon. member for Vancouver South mentioned the Second Narrows bridge. The city and district of North Vancouver, who are the bondholders concerned, are most grateful to the minister for the reduction of the interest rate from five per cent to two and three quarters per cent after seven years of negotiation, and have gladly accepted the condition that all revenues be applied to the reduction of the loan so that they will return the bridge to the owners in four years.

CAPITAL PLANNING COMMITTEE

FIRST INTERIM REPORT—INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT AREAS—RIDEAU CANAL BRIDGE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table the first interim report of the national capital planning committee, together with related documents and reports, with the exception of appendix 4 to the first interim report.

The present report of the national capital planning committee is an interim report dealing with two particular projects involved in the general planning of the capital. The first recommendation in the report deals with the acquisition of certain areas on the outskirts of the cities of Ottawa and Hull for industrial development purposes. The second recommendation deals with the construction of a new bridge across the Rideau canal, at a point about midway between Rideau and Laurier streets, in order to provide a new thoroughfare to relieve the present congestion of traffic in the area of confederation square.

So far as the first recommendation is concerned the proposal is to have certain areas acquired by the government in order that they may be made available for industrial uses. A tentative recommendation with regard to the precise areas involved has been submitted on appendix 4 to the report. However, it is felt that on these details further study is desirable and, for this reason, copies of appendix 4 are not being tabled at this time. The appendix, or such modification of it as is finally decided on, will be tabled at a later date.

The broad purpose in recommending the acquisition of industrial sites is to enable land to be used for industry in locations where there would be no conflict with the general plans for the capital. These locations would be so selected as to make possible the ultimate removal of many of the railway lines which at present intersect the capital in such a way as to mar its appearance and to add to the hazards and congestion of traffic. The proposal is that initially the cost of acquiring the areas should be borne by the government. However, it is recommended that the property should be sold, over a period of time, to industrial users wishing to locate in the capital area, in such a way that the project would become largely or completely self-liquidating.

So far as the second recommendation, with regard to the bridge, is concerned, I believe hon. members who have had experience with the traffic congestion in confederation square and in front of the station will agree that something must be done at an early day to improve conditions. The proposal for the bridge appears to be a possible solution, and an item will be included in the supplementary estimates for $100,000 to enable preliminary engineering surveys and estimates of cost to be made.

I wish to emphasize that both projects which I have mentioned are at present simply recommendations of the national capital planning committee, carrying with them the approval of the federal district commission. Before any final decisions are taken with regard to them they will be given most careful consideration by the government and discussed in such manner as may be necessary with the municipal authorities involved.

Mr. BOUCHER: Does the government contemplate taking any further action on this report this session?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have mentioned that there will be a vote in the supplementary estimates which will refer to what I have just said. It is intended to permit of further action forthwith.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 105

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK moved:

That for the remainder of the session standing order 105, respecting the posting of private bills, be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 431, for the relief of Mary Hrab Navrotzki.—Mr. Maybank.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 417 (from the Senate) to amend the Trust Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*CONVERSION OF SHIP FOR TRANSPORT OF IMMIGRANTS

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Is the government at present converting or overhauling a ship, to make it suitable for carrying immigrants?
2. If so, when will the conversion be completed?
3. By what company is the work being done, and at approximately what cost?
4. Upon completion, how many passengers will the ship carry?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to answer this question in its present form, but perhaps I can give the information my hon. friend desires. The question refers to the ship Huascaran, which was delivered to Canada by Germany as part of the reparations. The ship was reported to be available at a German harbour in a damaged condition. The government had no convenient means of taking charge of the ship in a German harbour; therefore it was turned over to War Assets Corporation and tenders were called for, with reserve bid by the government in the amount shown by the reparations commission. The ship was purchased by a Canadian firm, was repaired in Germany and then moved to Britain for further repairs, and has now been delivered in Canada. The ship has been surveyed and is found capable of carrying 600 immigrants. The survey was made at the request of the present owners, who propose to convert the ship at their own expense for carrying immigrants. The Department of Mines and Resources will cooperate to the extent of furnishing the immigrants, provided that the ship will accept immigrants at such points as are nominated by the department.

*POLYMER PLANT AT SARNIA

Mr. WINKLER:

1. What was the cost to the government of the Polymer plant for producing rubber at Sarnia?
2. When did it begin producing rubber?
3. What would be the amount of depreciation of capital allowed for taxation purposes had the corporation been a privately owned plant constructed for and working for war contracts?

Mr. HOWE:

1. $49,931,163.92 to March 31, 1947.

2. September 29, 1943.

3. This is a hypothetical question amounting to: if it paid taxes how much taxes would it pay? Hypothetical questions are barred under the rules, as the hon. member will see if he consults Beauchesne, third edition, page 119, paragraph 295. I may say, however, that up to March 31 last the earnings of the Polymer Corporation, if applied to reduction of capital, would have reduced capital expenditure by something in excess of $19,000,000.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WAR ASSETS—EMPLOYMENT OF AGENTS

Mr. SHAW:

1. Has War Assets Corporation at any time employed agents to assist in disposing of surplus crown assets within Canada?

2. If so (a) what are the names of all such agents; (b) what was the total amount of sales made or arranged by each agent; (c) what commission and/or other compensation has been paid to each such agent to date?

Mr. McILRAITH: Return tabled.

CHALK RIVER, ONT., FOREST RESEARCH STATION—SUPERINTENDENT

Mr. GREEN:

1. How many applications were received for the position of superintendent, Forest Research Station, at Chalk River, Ontario? (Competition No. 46-3458.)

2. How many of the applicants were veterans?

3. Who was awarded the position?

4. Is he a veteran?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

5. Previous to this appointment was this man permanently employed with the dominion forest service?

6. If not a veteran, what special qualifications did this man have to give him preference over veterans who applied for this position?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING OF SECRET SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would ask a question of the government. Is there a secret meeting of the house to be held tomorrow, and on what matters? Because when Sir Robert Borden had a secret he used to tell it to his cabinet.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There is no secret meeting of the house.

FURS

EXCISE AND SALES TAXES—PETITION FROM BREEDERS' ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Did he receive a resolution or petition from the Canadian National Silver Fox Breeders Association asking for the removal of the excise tax on ranch furs and the sales tax on articles manufactured or trimmed with ranch raised furs?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I do not recall. I may have received such representations. I received a great many of a similar kind. I will make inquiries.

DOMINION COAL BOARD

ADMINISTRATION OF SUBVENTIONS OR SUBSIDIES—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 340, to establish the dominion coal board.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain the amendment?

Mr. HOWE: It is to correct a small drafting error. The word "and" is substituted for "or".

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

NATIONAL PARKS

ADJUSTMENT OF BOUNDARIES, ADDITIONS, ETC.

The house resumed from Thursday, July 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe for the second reading of Bill No. 365, respecting certain national parks and to amend the National Parks Act.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): This seems to be a sort of omnibus bill covering quite a number of parks. With some of the recommendations contained in the bill I can find no fault. Some of them are excellent, but there is one vicious recommendation, namely, the part which refers to the Prince Albert park. A measure having to do with this park was withdrawn in this house some six years ago.

I see no objection whatever, in fact I am quite in accord with the recommendation to increase the size of the Fort Beausejour park. If I understand the bill properly, the land consists of twenty acres, and is being donated by Doctor J. C. Webster who is the chairman of the national parks board. If I might digress for a moment—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman. May I ask the hon. members to moderate their voices? It is almost impossible to follow the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was about to say that the house and the country should pay marked respect to Doctor Webster for his great generosity in donating some twenty acres of land, as I understand it, to the country. If it can be done in any way that will be accepted, the house should pay that mark of respect to Doctor Webster. Fort Beausejour is a fine park and one that is visited by many tourists. The parcel of land which Doctor Webster has donated contains the site of General Moncton's lines of attack in the siege of 1775. That part of the bill I can very strongly support.

I see no objection to the part pertaining to Riding Mountain. It looks to me like an exchange of one square mile of land inside Riding Mountain park in Manitoba for a square mile of land on the borders of Riding Mountain park. I have been in Riding Mountain park on several occasions. In Riding Mountain park Manitoba has a magnificent area, but I should like to see it enlarged. I am sure that the people of Manitoba are delighted to have such a splendid park in their province, and I see no reason why the part of the bill having to do with this park should not be supported.

As I understand it the bill does not indicate that any payment is to be made for this exchange. When the minister closes the debate I should like him to explain whether the exchange in Riding Mountain park is an exchange of 640 acres in the park for 640 acres outside. If so, whoever is responsible for the exchange should be complimented.

Elk Island park, which I have visited, is some distance east of Edmonton where we have many buffalo which belong to this country. That part of the bill I can support, because it increases the grazing area for the buffalo and the other animals in Elk Island park. I do not know why the government wishes to reduce Waterton Lakes park. I cannot understand it. If there is some legitimate reason for it I would not particularly oppose it, but that area of Alberta needs all the watershed of Waterton that it can get. The reduction will not be very large, some sixteen square miles, I believe, but we own it, and in my judgment, any reduction of the area adjacent to Waterton Lake will be bad for this country. It should not be supported. It is such a small matter that I am not going to carry on the debate too long. I should like the minister to look into that. I realize that the minister who is piloting the bill is perhaps not familiar with all these areas. I want to be as sympathetic to him as I can; I want to help him rather than to obstruct him. Waterton is a beautiful lake. I doubt whether there is a more beautiful lake in North America. These sixteen square miles adjacent to it have been used for the feeding of wild animals. We are now told that these animals are getting numerous. If we take this feeding area of sixteen square miles away from that area we shall be reducing the feeding area roundabout for the animals. If we do not have to do it, and if the public does not gain anything by doing it, if I were the minister I would oppose any recommendation to reduce the area around Waterton Lake.

Another recommendation of the bill has to do with the Nemiskam park and Buffalo park areas. I am not familiar with either one of those, therefore I cannot comment on them. Apparently these two parks are to be wiped out. Not having seen them I am not going to say anything about either one of these changes. If there is no reason why they should be kept, perhaps there is no reason why I should oppose their not being kept.

The next recommendation is one which I strongly oppose. I refer to the reduction in area of the Prince Albert park. The one province in Canada that has very little park area is Saskatchewan. I know of only two other Saskatchewan parks, one near the Cypress hills and the other around Watrous. The third is Prince Albert park. I do not know whether I have been to Prince Albert park. I drove northwest of Prince Albert for perhaps forty or fifty miles at the time I was making a survey of the watershed of the Sturgeon river. I was interested in that because during the Northwest rebellion the Hudson bay boats wintered at the mouth of the Sturgeon river. Years before that the Hudson bay boats traversing the Saskatchewan river wintered at the junction of the Sturgeon and Saskatchewan rivers. I like to see areas in which I am interested. I was interested in the history associated with the Sturgeon river. The Sturgeon river forms about one-third to one-half of the west boundary of the Prince Albert park.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish the hon. member woud face this way. I cannot hear a word he says.

Mr. MacNICOL: I had started to say that one reason I became interested in the Prince Albert park is that about one-third of the west boundary of the park is formed by the Sturgeon river. It is an historical river in that part of Saskatchewan. In the early days the Hudson bay boats wintered at the mouth of the Sturgeon river because of the water roads at the mouth of the river. During the rebellion of 1885 it played a small part in that rebellion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member is now discussing Prince Albert.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes: I believe the south boundary of Prince Albert park is about forty miles north of Prince Albert. I do not claim to know anything about the inside of the park, never having travelled through it. I travelled through much of the area east of it. I presume the area is much the same as the park itself. It is about fifty-four miles down the west boundary and about thirty miles across the top boundary; there is a large part of the park projecting about eighteen miles east of the third meridian, and that projection ranges about twenty-four miles north. It is that part, that eighteen by twenty-four miles, that the bill proposes taking off Prince Albert park.

It has been said, although I do not know whether the minister himself has expressed the same opinion, that that particular area is of little importance or value. Whoever says so, I would say that he is not at all familiar with the river watersheds in that locality. He cannot be if he feels like that. That particular 350 square miles comprise in the area which it is proposed to take out is, in my judgment, a mighty important part of the watershed of the Montreal river which drains into Lac la Ronge and then into the Churchill river. A few nights ago we passed a bill granting $6,300,000 for the preservation of the watersheds on the east slopes of the Rocky mountains in connection with the Saskatchewan river. This strikes me as being the reversal of that policy, because we are going to throw away—that is all we are doing—an important part of the watershed of the Montreal river in that area.

Mr. HOWE: I would point out that it is not proposed to alienate all the property in question from the crown. Part of it is being changed from a national park to an Indian reserve, on the theory that the Indians can make better use of it than the park commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said I wanted to be easy on the minister because I know that he does not know much about the area. He does not administer that department, and unless he travels through the area he cannot be familiar with it. If he had travelled through it I do not think he would make that statement. This 350 miles, comprising between 75 and 150 lakes, is a very important part of that area. Two or three of these lakes are quite extensive. Part of the Montreal lake, which is a fairly large body of water, is also included.

It has been said that it is largely a muskeg area, but I must tell the minister that, next to a lake there is no part of the watershed that is as valuable to the river as muskeg. The other day the statement was made that the area was of little value because it was muskeg. Muskeg is of great importance to the watershed of any river, and I suggest that every possible effort should be made to preserve the watersheds of our rivers instead of throwing them open, I was going to say, to destruction. In fact, I think that term expresses it correctly, because as soon as this 350 square miles is taken out of the national park it will be denuded of forest. I believe there are a million and a half feet of timber on this 350 square miles, and that forest will be denuded if that territory is taken out ruthlessly.

I am not opposed to the taking out of timber that should be removed. The Ontario government is doing it in Algonquin park, but it is doing it under the instructions of engineers who mark the trees that should be taken out. I would not oppose trees being cut in that park by the government. The statement has been made that there are a million and a half board measure feet there. What I am opposed to, however, since I have taken a great interest in the conservation of our natural resources all my life, is the ruthless destruction of any of the watersheds of any part of them. When this park was created in 1927 or 1928, those who undertook the work deserved every credit. I suggest, however, that if they had looked ahead they would have carried the line of the park right up the Churchill river and so created in Saskatchewan the largest national park in Canada. That is one province that should have a large park and there is little park area in southern Saskatchewan. There are only the two small ones I referred to earlier. This is a natural national park area and the part it is proposed now to take out should be retained.

I wish the minister could visualize as I do the effects of the proposal now before us. He would draw his pencil through that part of the bill without any hesitation. So far as the rest of it is concerned, it may not involve any great amount of trouble, but certainly that part of the bill is one that I shall oppose as strongly as possible and when we get into committee I intend to move a motion to throw it out. I shall do this because of the great value to Canada of all the head waters of the Churchill river. Up to the present little has been done on the Churchill river. As the minister knows, it flows into Hudson bay at Churchill. There is a large volume of water which, six miles west of Churchill, provides a fairly substantial power site. I have heard various figures mentioned—one million, two million or three million.

Every part of that watershed should be preserved for power purposes. I know that is only a small part of it, but many a mickle makes a muckle, and if this area that I speak of is destroyed, many other parts of that watershed will suffer likewise, and in due time we shall find ourselves faced with exactly the same situation as we have had to face on the Saskatchewan, being under the necessity of voting millions of dollars for restoration. There is no reason why we should have to do any such thing, because the country owns that area now.

This area does not play an important part inside the park itself, but it does possess the attribute of being muskeg, which preserves the moss, as muskeg does, for the feeding of wild animals; and, as the minister knows, that part of Prince Albert park is a breeding ground for wild animals in all that area. Moreover, east of this area, outside Prince Albert park, is one of the best hunting grounds in Canada, and certainly in the province of Saskatchewan. But the breeding grounds would be destroyed if the trees were cut down.

As I view it, it would be a retrograde step to take that 350 miles out of the Prince Albert park and I must protest as strongly as I can against the introduction of what I would call a vicious proposal, a proposal that was pretty well thrown out of the house six years ago. As a matter of fact, the bill was withdrawn at that time. I suggest that it should have been thrown out; it should have been kicked out, and I would like to see this particular part of the measure now before us kicked out at this time. In my opinion it is a vicious proposal to bring it in together with several good things we do not wish to oppose.

Why was not this Prince Albert park part of the bill brought in by itself? Some members may not wish to oppose it in view of the fact that it contains other features that they would like to support. However, as I say, when we are in committee we can move to delete this particular part.

I have travelled the area adjacent to it and I look upon all these areas as very valuable from the standpoint of the watersheds of our rivers. In this particular case, when you consider the Montreal river, the headwaters of one of the branches of the Churchill river, and appraise their importance to the country, I submit that it would be a retrograde step to take this territory out of the park area with the possibility of the timber being ruthlessly taken off and the muskeg being destroyed.

Someone will say that the purpose of the bill is to help the Indians. I am all for that, and if I thought the Indian would get any part of it I would say, yes, let the Indian have a part of it. But he will not get it. There are a good many halfbreeds in that country; indeed there are more halfbreeds than there are Indians. These halfbreeds as well as the Indians and the whites would have their rights there, because once you surrender title to it and it goes back to the province they can do what they like with it. In my opinion that would be very bad business.

The Prime Minister has a special interest in that park and I should think he would like to see it preserved. It was opened in 1927 when he began to represent that part of the country, and the people, out of respect for his great support in creating the park, presented him with an ideal cottage on the shores of Lake Waskesiu. I have heard it said that when you stand on the verandah of that cottage and look over the lake the scene is one of the most picturesque the eye can behold. If this part of the park is taken out it will seriously affect that locality.

If you take away two other small areas on the south side of the park, as is proposed—and it consists, I believe, of thirty acres more or less—and open it up to settlement, are you not going to invite a fire hazard into the park itself? I think we should make every effort to preserve that park. Saskatchewan needs it more than does any other part of Canada, but we all need it. What do we get out of any reduction of the park? We are told that we get a reduction of the cost of perhaps one or two fire rangers. But what is that? When this house cuts things down so small that it is going to throw away good park land for the sake of saving the salaries of one or two fire-rangers, it is getting down pretty small indeed. If we were so careful as that in the expenditure of all our moneys we should have today a surplus of hundreds of millions of dollars instead of what we have.

I would urge the minister not to let anyone convince him that the surrender of this additional thirty odd acres more or less, on the south side of the park, will be of benefit to Canada. It will not be of benefit to Canada. We do not have to surrender it and we get nothing out of it in any event. The same thing applies to the big eastern area. I want to plead with the minister as strongly as I can. He has heard me say many times that I have a warm feeling for him. He has done a big job. I have said that before. That is not flattery. I say to him: Do not let somebody come in here and tell you—and they must know you are not familiar with that area—to jam this bill through. Do not let anybody do that. The minister has done too many good things to be mixed up with a business like this; and I do not mean that he is mixed up in it in any way other than that the country is surrendering land which should be retained for park purposes, muskeg and trees, and for the preservation of the watersheds of the Montreal river. As one who has travelled to the headwaters of most rivers and surveyed their origin, I am intensely interested in their preservation. As far as the Montreal river is concerned, that 350 miles is almost priceless to its preservation. I know it starts in Waskesiu lake in the main park itself. I know it gets some of its water from Kingsmere lake, called after our Prime Minister. But a large source of it comes out of that 350 square miles which contain some 75 to 150 lakes. This is my last word. I know one thing. If the minister just sees the picture as I see it—and I have seen a lot of it—he will have the same opinion as I have, namely, that the watersheds of these rivers are priceless and should not be ruthlessly thrown away. We own them now and we should retain them.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, when I first entered the House of Commons in 1922 I brought to the attention of parliament the great value a national and provincial parks system could have to the people of this country, from the point of view of preserving the regions named, of the beautification of the country, of health and recreation, and the providing of educational facilities and outdoor sport for all classes of our people. The bill before the house today is a limited one. Its purpose is to adjust the boundaries of four national parks under the general statute and also to close two others. The purpose of the bill is all right as far as it goes, but I desire to call attention to one fact. Part of the bill provides for certain social services, for health, recreation, and so on, which the people outside of the national parks system are given by the provinces. I would call the attention of the minister to one or two things about this policy. The principle of the bill is very largely what I wish to speak about. I remember years ago, when I first entered the House of Commons, I called attention to the deplorable condition of the battlefields and parks in the Niagara district. The house at Queenston Heights which was formerly the printing establishment of the Prime Minister's grandfather, William Lyon Mackenzie, was dilapidated, and the battlefields of the war of 1812 practically in ruins. My calling the attention of the government to that led to a debate in the house and later to a large expenditure by the Niagara Falls park commission and the rebuilding of the forts, parks and driveways.

How does it come about that this particular bill should be left to the hundred and sixth sitting day of the House of Commons? It deals with the important matter of the national parks system and the natural resources of this country, which are unsurpassed by those of any other country in the world. We should have had this up in the early days of the session. It comes up like external affairs estimates, in the dying days of the session. I do not wish to prolong the debate, but I want to say to the government that I am very much dissatisfied. I admit that little or nothing could be done during the war about this national parks system; the war was paramount. But now that the war is over—and it has been over for two years—there has been plenty of time to get on with the work and the programme and have surveys made in all the provinces. I remember taking this matter up, and set out in the explanatory notes, with regard to the two parks named. I have no objection to the policy or the principle of the bill, but I want to call attention to one thing. The province of Ontario, from which the present minister comes, is a forgotten province. I remember ever since I have been a member of the House of Commons that has been so. We see only five or six members from Ontario here today who are interested in a big matter like this. We have great natural resources in our province, in new Ontario, in the Rideau canal built by the British government in 1844, the Trent canal connecting Muskoka and Temagami, lake Ontario and lake Simcoe, up to Severn bridge and beyond that, connecting with Georgian bay. We have a magnificent system of inland lakes and rivers in Northern Ontario and in the Peterborough district—Georgian bay, Parry Sound, the Nipissing district and right to the head of the lakes which the minister officially represents.

The general principle of the bill deals with the whole policy of a national parks system for the whole country. The act has now been amended three or four times; I think the last time was about 1941. As a result of the criticism I made in the house I was glad to see that the maritimes obtained some national parks in 1941. I have a list of the parks here. I will not refer to them, but they are set out on page 33 of the "Canada Year Book" and in the minister's annual report. The development of our national parks system was held up by the war—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the general principle of the bill. If he wants to discuss the general policy of the department, or part of it, he should do it when the estimates are before the house.

Mr. CHURCH: You are quite right, Mr. Speaker. In my opening remarks I said I was going to discuss the principle of the bill. The principle of the bill is all that may be discussed at this stage.

As I have said already, nothing has been done about the parks since the war, but I believe an interprovincial conference has been held within the past year or two with a view to coordinating the national and provincial parks. Surveys have been made but aside from this bill nothing has yet been done. We in Ontario get no help at all, except in the Niagara district, from the province, and I call the attention of the minister to the lack of national parks in our province.

As to this particular bill may I say that I believe we have a great opportunity to make the whole of Canada like Switzerland, not only a huntsman's paradise but a thing of beauty and a joy forever. We have summer sports and winter sports, wild life, fishing and everything that could be desired—a huntsman's and fisherman's paradise. No other country in the world has such great natural resources; and instead of having these matters brought up in parliament in the last days of the session I hope they will be taken up at the coming interprovincial conference so that we shall get real value for the money expended on our park system. We are fifty years behind the times in catering to the tourist trade and developing our great natural resources.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I spoke on a bill similar to this in 1941, in relation to the Alberta national park; and I oppose the transfer of these lands from the dominion to the provincial governments at the present time. When the minister spoke on July 3 he said the land in question was not of much use anyway, that the land we were turning back or giving away was all muskeg. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) pointed out, however, that the muskeg was the water supply for the various lakes. From what I have heard and what I have been told by Alberta members I believe the dominion government is extremely foolish in turning back this land to the province of Saskatchewan. The bill states that some of this land will be turned into farms, which means it will gradually be encroached upon until there will not be a stick of timber left standing in the whole district. Even the timber in the portion the government intends to retain will be affected by the remainder of the land being denuded of trees, as will be the case, with the resulting loss of moisture. On June 24 of this year, in the other place, the minister who tried to pilot this bill through this house in 1941 said:

> I recall being in the park in 1937, at the height of the drought in Saskatchewan, when everything was parched. I saw a farmer, his wife and three children drive into the park in an old model T Ford car with some provisions. They found a suitable place and pitched a tent to sleep in at night; and I thought what a wonderful thing it was that these people from the parched prairie country could come in and see evergreen trees and water and animals; and that, even if the park conferred no other benefits, what a boon it was to the children. This vacation feature is one of the great advantages of our park systems all across Canada.

In the estimates this year is an item of $650,000 for the tourist bureau. That money is to be used to attract tourists to Canada. If this bill goes through it will mean that on the one hand the government is paying out money to draw tourists to Canada while on the other hand it is getting rid of the attractions for the tourists. The minister knows that when they begin to cut trees eventually the pine, hemlock and spruce all disappear, because they cannot live without water. He also knows that if this land is turned over to the government of Saskatchewan, or any other government, who will allow settlers and Indians to go in there, eventually their holdings will be expanded into the present park so that before too long we shall have another bill before parliament asking that another 373 square miles or more be removed from our parks. Just think what that means. The 373 square miles mentioned here would be equal to a piece of land a mile wide reaching from here to Kitchener, Ontario, which is a good deal of land. I plead with the minister to amend this bill by deleting that provision. Let this park remain as it is. It is foolish for this government to spend money to attract tourists to Canada and at the same time destroy the attractions that bring them here.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): I am not familiar with the Prince Albert national park, but the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) made a statement opposing any reduction in its area, which I think deserves some reply. When we have once established a park I think it is a great mistake to cut down its area, unless there are very good reasons for doing so. However, I do not rise this afternoon to discuss that matter because, as I say, I am not personally familiar with the park. My purpose in rising is to join with the hon. member for Davenport in expressing appreciation to Doctor J. C. Webster and Mrs. Webster of Shediac, New Brunswick, for their very generous gift to the Dominion of Canada of over twenty acres of land, which will form an important addition to our historic parks. Doctor Webster, who was born in New Brunswick, for many years was a prominent physician in the city of Chicago, where he had an international reputation. When he retired from practice he returned to his native province, and since that time both he and Mrs. Webster have devoted a good part of their time and some of their wealth to its welfare. This gift he and Mrs. Webster are now making to the dominion is just one of many gifts they have made for the benefit of the people of this country.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I should like to add my word to the discussion of this bill, because I understand a certain portion of Waterton Lakes national park is to be cut out, with the net result that the area of that park will be reduced. I am not altogether satisfied with the reasons that have been given for taking out that portion of the park set out in the bill. Evidently it is not a large portion; nevertheless there must be some reason for cutting it out. When the minister replies I should like him to give that reason, and the arguments in support of it. As a general principle I think we must take the attitude that we do not want our national parks reduced in size. If anything we want them to be extended or additional national parks acquired.

We have to preserve wild animal life in the mountainous regions. Most of the wild animals of Canada need plenty of grazing lands. Perhaps I could give an illustration. Banff national park is one of the finest virgin national parks in the world. There are a great many bear, mountain sheep, elk, antelope, moose, buffalo and other wild animals in that park, but I understand their number is gradually diminishing. They should be preserved. Banff is a great tourist attraction because the mountain scenery is simply magnificent. If tourists go to Banff hoping to see the wild animals of Canada they find that it is almost like looking for a needle in a haystack. They are there somewhere, but the park is quite large. Going into Banff you notice a sign with an arrow or hand pointing to the animal paddocks, but when the tourists go there expecting to see wild animals all they find are a few small mangy buffalo. The grass all over the paddock is worn and I am sure that tourists must get a wrong impression of the wild life in Canada. I do not believe that any other animals but buffalo are fenced off in the park.

If a tourist in Banff wants to see the bears he must wait until night and go down to the old stinking dump ground where they come in for their evening meal. There is no reason why a considerable portion of the park could not be set aside for bears.

In the southern part of Alberta, particularly around the Waterton lakes, there is wonderful mountainous country, although the scenery may not be quite as magnificent as at Banff, lake Louise or the Columbia ice fields. However, the southern part of Alberta is perhaps more prolific in forest growth and grazing pasture, and I believe plenty of room should be given to these animals. I know the department has spent considerable sums in Waterton lakes park. They have built a number of cottages and more and more people are coming to the park every year to spend their vacations. It is on the direct highway to the United States, and more and more tourists are coming from the United States to the park.

As a matter of broad principle the government should retain these parks and if possible make them larger instead of reducing their size. More money should be spent to make them real tourist attractions. On these broad principles I am afraid that I shall have to oppose the bill. I noticed from the discussion in the other place in respect to Prince Albert park that it was argued that the part to be taken out is of no use. I do not know whether that would refer also to the Waterton lakes park, but if it is of no use, what are you going to do with it? Someone will say: Give it back to the Indians. That is a nice argument—when it is of no use, give it back to the Indians. Or you may say: Give it back to the province. There is some reason for this government giving anything to the provinces.

If it is costing too much to maintain that portion of the park because of bog lands and the maintenance of highways, then is the government going to saddle the province with that expense? That does not make common sense and I do not think it is fair. As I say, on broad principles we shall have to oppose this bill unless the minister in charge can give a better reason for reducing the areas of these parks.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in a general way I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who has just taken his seat. One defect in this bill is that the ordinary member is not in position to know about the whole situation. I hope the minister when he makes his statement will clarify a number of matters which seem obscure to me. Waterton lakes national park is in my constituency. All that the hon. member for Macleod has said and a good deal more is true. I can understand how it might be wise to consider removing a certain portion of that park so that settlers could pasture their stock and so that timbering operations might be carried on, but I should like to know if there has been a demand for this from the settlers who live in that part of the park. Will the minister tell us whether Alberta has asked that this portion be taken out of the park, and whether the settlers nearby have asked for the same thing? Is it deemed advisable, in the light of these two circumstances, that a change be made in the boundaries of Waterton Lakes national park?

I should like to ask two or three questions with regard to Prince Albert national park. This park is not in my constituency, but coming as I do from the west I am interested in it. Why does the government wish to dispose of an area from this park? The argument seems to be, first, that it costs too much to maintain, and second, that it is not suitable for park development. What constitutes suitability for park development? How is it that the area which it is proposed to remove from the park does not qualify as suitable for park development?

There seems to be considerable uncertainty as to whether this area is to be added to an Indian reserve. I am not very much impressed by the argument that it is to be added to a reserve. I find in the explanatory note that approximately 373 square miles are to be removed from the park. If I read what is stated aright, only ten of the 373 square miles are supposed to be handed to the Indians to be joined to the Little Indian River reserve. If that is the actual state of affairs, it looks to me as though this argument about adding lands to the Indian reserves is unimpressive.

It is said that the cost of patrolling this parcel of land which it is proposed to remove from the Prince Albert park has been excessive in respect of looking after forest fires and the game. Will the minister tell us when he makes his statement what has been the actual cost of maintaining Prince Albert park during each of the last twenty years—he should have the figures—and what portion of that cost may be properly applied to the area which it is proposed to remove from the park? It seems to me that only by such figures can we form an estimate of the validity of the arguments in respect of the upkeep cost.

This whole bill and everything that has been said about this project up to the present time fills me with a considerable amount of suspicion. I had a good deal of suspicion in 1941 when the measure was brought into the house and I certainly have not had any of my suspicions allayed by reading what the Hon. Mr. Crerar had to say on this subject on June 24. It looks to me as though he was not very well informed about the matter and therefore not a very satisfactory witness.

I should like to read to the minister some of the statements that were made in the other place regarding this transfer of property, and ask him to explain away the statements that are made. I find that the Hon. W. M. Aseltine made the following statement as reported in the Senate Hansard of June 24:

> An explanation given in committee was to the effect that there were some 400 Indians in the Montreal lake area, and that it was advisable that they should be given the right to trap in the area of some 350 square miles which it is now proposed to withdraw from the park.

Is it the intention to allow the Indians to trap over the whole 350 square miles? If that is the case I can see that there might be considerable value in making the transfer if the Indians could use all that land. But later on the hon. senator says:

. . . whether or not they would be the only ones allowed to trap in the area in question I learned that half-breeds and white settlers were also given permission.

If that happens, the poor Indians are not going to have very much chance at the game in this area. Further on he says:

It was added to the park originally for the purpose of preserving wild life, including muskrats, mink and all kinds of fur-bearing animals, particularly the beaver, and big game, such as elk, moose, and deer. It is known for a certainty that the animals we were hunting on the eastern boundary of the park were bred in that park and had spread throughout the surrounding country. This is particularly true of Candle lake, the home of the last surviving band of elk running at large in western Canada. That territory is their home ground, and if it is taken out of the park and thrown open to the public it will only be a year or two before all those animals are shot and killed.

If what the hon. senator says is correct, and the fact that he is from Rosetown, Saskatchewan, and states that he has been over the area concerned and has hunted over land contiguous to that area seems to make his words worthy of consideration, would the minister explain that matter to us also when he speaks? The hon. senator went on:

The honourable senator has no idea how many hunters there are since the end of the war. During the war years all the young men were away but now they are back and are taking out hunting licences. They are allowed to go into this area. Even if the limit were one deer or one bull moose, it would only be a year or two before all these animals would be shot off.

I find myself strongly impressed by that statement because it is in conformity with what I have seen happen in parts of Alberta. Further on the hon. senator said:

This land was set aside, not only as a park but as a place in which to preserve for posterity the wild life of that part of Saskatchewan.

If that is the case, certainly the reason for preserving the wild life of Saskatchewan must be just as strong today as it was when this land was set aside, and if the wild life of the dominion is to be preserved the dominion government ought to assume as much responsibility therefore as any province. The hon. senator went on:

The timber will be cut down . . . I do not think the area proposed to be taken away is good for anything but park purposes.

That is widely at variance with the statement of Senator Crerar, who asserts definitely that it is not good for park purposes. How can any member be blamed for being completely confused over this matter when men supposed to know the most about the situation disagree so widely? When we have the hon. Senator Crerar, who was in this house as minister of mines and resources when the bill was introduced in 1941, and the hon. Senator Aseltine from Saskatchewan, who, by reason of his intimate experience with the park and the area in question, ought to know just as much about it as any other man, differing so widely, it seems to me that that is a situation which requires careful explanation on the part of the minister when he makes his reply.

The hon. Senator Kinley makes this statement in the Senate on June 24:

He stated that these Indians were not allowed to hunt in the park area, and that if this section was taken out of the park it would provide a source of livelihood for them. We hear a lot these days about the Indians, and what Canada took from them, and I think if they will live up in the north country, under such conditions as must prevail there, they should have the rights to any available hunting. We could very well turn the land over to the Indians.

The important aspect of that statement is that undoubtedly Senator Kinley was influenced to support the measure by the consideration that the whole of the area would be turned over to the Indians, when by the very statement in the bill itself opposite page 2, only ten square miles of this 373 square miles to be taken out of the park are to be turned over to the Indians. Surely there is something seriously wrong there. Senator Kinley went on to say, on the same page:

I said that if any land was available to the Indians we ought to let them have it.

With that I completely agree, and we should be sure before we take the land out of the park that it will be turned over to the Indians. In the same discussion Senator Crerar said:

As a matter of fact, the greater part of the area is muskeg. A little bit is developed and might be salvaged by some small operations, but it is not suitable for park purposes.

What is the explanation why muskeg is not suitable for park purposes? I fail to see why it would not be. Certainly it is excellent land for the raising of wild animals and it is attractive from the tourist standpoint. There are muskeg areas over which corduroy roads have been built which constitute some of the most interesting scenery to be found in Alberta, and I take it that muskeg in other parts of Canada would be equally interesting. Senator Crerar went on to say:

The Indians will not have the sole right of trapping, but they will be assured of their fair share, and thereby a substantial means of livelihood will be provided for the band of Indians at Montreal lake.

There again is uncertainty about this whole thing. It is said by some people that the Indians are not able to go in and hunt there today. As this area is part of a national park owned by the dominion I should like to know why the Indians should not be given access to hunting in that area. I cannot see why they should not be. Why should it be necessary to take this land out of the park in order to give the Indians a chance to hunt in the area? I shall say no more at this time, but when he makes his speech I would like to hear the minister's explanation of these conundrums.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the idea which has been put forward by several hon. members that our policy should be to increase rather than decrease the area of our national parks. The decrease which is provided for in this bill personally I should be loath to vote for until we have had a much better explanation than we have had so far as to why it is necessary. That is particularly true of the Prince Albert national park and the Waterton Lakes park. I should like a better explanation than the one given in the explanatory notes as to the abolition of the Nemiskam park which was originally set aside to provide a refuge for antelope. It is stated here that it is no longer necessary to have a refuge for animals because they have increased materially during the last ten or twenty years. That is correct, but there is no guarantee that they will not be practically wiped out again, particularly with the increase in population in the southern part of Alberta and Saskatchewan owing to the development of irrigation schemes. Personally I think there is every possibility of these parks being required for the protection of animals again in the not too distant future. I do not want to hold up the business of the house and therefore will not press the matter now, but when we reach the committee stage we should have a better explanation of the sections than has so far been given.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): As hon. members know, I am the acting minister of the department, and in that capacity can only convey the information which is given to me by the officers of the department. The officers of the department believe it is important that these amendments be made to the National Parks Act.

In the case of the Waterton national park it is pointed out that the sixteen square miles to be removed from within the present park boundary and transferred back to the province lie in another watershed from that of the remainder of the park. The area of the Waterton Lakes park is considerable. The sixteen square miles is only a minor section of the park.

The maintenance of national parks by the federal government is a considerable obligation. There are certain standards to be maintained. We have standards of protection and of development, and we have certain standards of improvements. As I understand the situation from the officers of the department, the purpose of the bill is to reduce the parks to an area which can be kept up to the standard set by the government for these national parks.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the minister leaves the Waterton park will he answer this question, if the information has been given to him: Has there been a request on the part of Alberta—

Mr. HOWE: I am told there has been.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And a request by the settlers?

Mr. HOWE: Through the province. I am assured that the province and the federal government are in complete agreement that the boundaries of the park should be altered as proposed in this bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would carry a great deal of weight with me.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I suggest to the hon. member that he wait until we are in committee to put his questions.

Mr. HOWE: The remarks I have just made apply only to the Prince Albert national park. The 350 square miles that are to be either returned to the province or added to a nearby Indian reserve consist of acres that cannot be kept up to the standard required in national parks.

Reference has been made to this being a suitable hunting ground for Indians. Hon. members will appreciate the fact that the government cannot allow hunting in its national parks and still preserve the game in these parks. If an area is to be hunted over it must be outside the park boundaries. Conversely, if the area is to be kept within the national parks it cannot be hunted over. It so happens that a fur conservation plan is in operation, in partnership between the dominion and the Saskatchewan government, in a nearby area. The purpose of the fur conservation plan is to provide a means of livelihood for a band of Indians on a nearby reservation, and for certain other settlers in the area. It is felt by both the province and the officers of the federal department, and by the government, that the well-being of the area will be better served by turning back the 350 square miles to the fur conservation plan, where it will be administered by the province under terms laid down by the federal government for a period of ten years, during which time its fur-bearing potentialities will be increased to the maximum possible. Ten square miles of the area is being transferred to the Indian reserve, and the remainder is being turned back to the province to be included in the fur conservation plan.

My purpose in rising, however, is to discuss section 9 of the bill. Section 9 is entirely new. At the present time the permanent residents in the parks do not receive the advantages of social services provided for other residents in the province in which the park is situated.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but it is against the rules to discuss a section of the bill on second reading. I suggest that he wait until we are in committee.

Mr. HOWE: It is not my purpose to discuss the section. This is a procedural point arising out of the fact that in the other place they decided that it was not competent to deal with one subsection, since it involved levying a tax. Therefore I find it my duty to ask for the unanimous consent of the house to introduce a resolution after second reading of this bill. After second reading I will move that the house go into committee on a resolution which will restore to the bill one subsection which was deleted in the other place.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MacNICOL: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the second time.

Mr. HOWE moved:

That the house go into committee of the whole this day to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that the following provision be inserted as paragraph (p) of subsection one of section nine of Bill No. 365 (letter M-9 of the senate), intituled: "An act respecting certain national parks and to amend The National Parks Act," now before the house:

(p) levying taxes upon the residents of a park in order to defray the cost of health and welfare services supplied to such residents by a province pursuant to an agreement made under paragraph (o) of this subsection or supplied to such residents by the government of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, may I ask this question. Does the minister assume that the house concurs in the recommendation to add to section 9 something that will mean taxation on the residents of the park?

Mr. HOWE: No. The purpose is to bring the section before the house for discussion and thus restore it to the bill. It by no means means an acceptance of the provision.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. HOWE: I move, Mr. Speaker, that the house now go into committee on the bill.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Additions to national parks.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not know what the proper procedure is, but I should think there ought to be some motion, or at any rate a letter addressed to Doctor J. C. Webster, C.M.G., acknowledging the splendid gift he is making to the country in connection with this important park. If his wife is associated with him in the gift, I suggest that her name be coupled with any such acknowledgment.

Mr. HOWE: That has already been attended to by the minister of the appropriate department. The formal opening of the park was held and I believe that all honours have been bestowed upon Doctor Webster appropriate to the occasion. I cannot think of anything else, short of a vote of parliament, that would be appropriate.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is fitting that the minister should have mentioned the fact in the discussion of the bill.

Mr. HANSELL: The minister assured us on the second reading that as far as Waterton park is concerned the province has agreed to this change. I would like to have an elaboration of that statement. How were the negotiations carried on with the province? Has the minister any correspondence in that regard? Perhaps I might add to the question. Is this parcel of land of approximately sixteen square miles simply to be passed over to the government of Alberta? Will they now be in possession of the land? When it is passed over to them will it be crown land in the right of the province to do with as they desire? I would like to know in what way the negotiations were conducted and whether there is any documentary evidence.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is not discussing section 2 at the moment.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would come under section 5.

Mr. HANSELL: Then I will wait until we reach that section.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Land withdrawn from Prince Albert national park.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would like to move an amendment to have this clause struck out but I am informed that I cannot do so. I would ask the minister, however, to take steps to withdraw it, and if he does not care to do that then we shall have to ask for the yeas and nays. Before doing that, however, I wish to say a few words to the minister. As I said at the beginning, I have a warm feeling for him and it is easy to see that he was not familiar with the areas he described in connection with Prince Albert park. I know he would like to set it right.

Reference was made to the muskeg area being the breeding grounds. That muskeg part, which is for the most part the 350 square mile area that is taken out of the park, is undoubtedly the breeding ground. There is no shooting there. No one can shoot in a national park and for that reason it is all protected breeding ground, so far as any government can protect breeding grounds. It is to all intents and purposes a protected breeding ground but the moment it is taken out of the national park area it ceases to be. The minister said that the province could see to this aspect of the matter. I do not know. Perhaps they would; on the other hand, they might not. The province will run its own show. Everyone with any knowledge of hunting in that area knows that it is the animals that are bred in that part of Prince Albert national park that move east, and every year there are hundreds of hunters who go out to that district to the east because they know that the animals are bred in that protected area.

The minister said something to the effect that if it were taken outside of the park it would become a potential area. That is what it is now. It is a real breeding area, as a matter of fact. It is not simply potential, because it is in the park where shooting is not allowed.

Someone spoke about muskegs and it was said that muskegs will never be good agricultural land. It was not intended for that purpose at all. Something was also said about its reverting to the Indians, and I think the minister is under a misapprehension there. There might go to the Indians a small area of 10 square miles out of the 350 square miles in the eastern part of the park. Perhaps ten or eleven miles, I believe the description is, might be given to the Indians in Montreal river and Montreal lake area. But they now have the whole area north of that and to the east of it in which to trap and hunt. I still say that should remain in the park, no matter what anyone advises the minister. As someone over here said, instead of taking that area out of the park, we should increase it by another 350 miles right up to Lac la Ronge if we can. We cannot have it too large in that country.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to make my position quite clear. At the present time the 340 miles at present under discussion is in the park.

Mr. MacNICOL: In that particular area.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Animals can breed there; they cannot be shot.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is where they breed.

Mr. HOWE: In other words, it is just wild land in which animals can breed. Both the provincial and federal government would like to include this land in a joint plan of fur conservation for which they have both provided funds. By arrangements between the two governments a certain area already has been set apart to be developed for fur conservation. It is a long term agreement, I think for twenty-five years. Each government has undertaken to spend a certain sum of money over that period in developing the area for the breeding of fur bearing animals. The purpose is to divert all of this area into the fur conservation plan, under this dominion-provincial agreement and to develop it as a fur conservation area rather than to maintain it as a federal park. As I say, all the officials of the federal government believe that constitutes a proper use. The province itself wishes to have the land transferred for the purposes of the other agreement, and I see no reason why parliament should not implement the wishes of those responsible for the development of the area.

Mr. MacNICOL: A moment ago the minister said ten years.

Mr. HOWE: I am corrected now by my officials. The period is twenty-five years.

Mr. FRASER: The minister changes all the time.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister said ten acres. What the Indians are to get, if they get anything, will be near Montreal lake and will be approximately eleven square miles. I am sorry for the minister in his present position; I have the highest regard for our officials, but I lose my regard when I find officials in the parks department wanting to get rid of this large area of park land.

An hon. MEMBER: We are not getting rid of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, you are getting rid of it. Do not take any stock in this idea that there is to be any cooperation with the provincial government. The provincial government has all the land outside of that and can start a park whenever it likes, the same as we have in Ontario. There is nothing in that. It has been going on too long. Six years ago a determined effort was made to detach this area from Prince Albert park. I am going to oppose this to the limit of my power. If the minister is not prepared to withdraw this provision, I shall ask the chairman to call for the yeas and nays on section 3.

Mr. JAENICKE: The explanatory note to section 3 says that the department has been in communication with the government of Saskatchewan, which government has agreed to accept the return of the lands. If there is an agreement I should like to know it. If it is just a matter of correspondence, perhaps the minister could read to us the letter of the Saskatchewan government agreeing to the cancellation of this 350 square miles and turning it back to the province. If there was an agreement, as the minister intimated, with regard to the conservation of game and fur, what is the date of it? What is the date of the recent correspondence with the government pertaining to the return to the province of this 350 square miles? Does the agreement with regard to fur conservation cover the whole 350 square miles or only part of it?

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member asked the present status of the fur conservation plan. It has been in operation now for some two years. I am told that it is working satisfactorily. I am told that it is the wish of the province, and of the minister responsible, Hon. Mr. Phelps, that this additional land be added to the fur conservation plan.

Mr. JAENICKE: The whole of the 350 square miles?

Mr. HOWE: Three hundred and forty square miles go into the plan and ten square miles go into the Indian reservation itself. All 340 square miles go into the fur conservation plan.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the provincial government agreed to maintain that road from Waskesiu to Montreal lake?

Mr. HOWE: I am told they are already maintaining that road. The road was built by the federal government and by agreement is being maintained by the provincial government.

Mr. FRASER: What agreement is there as to cutting timber on that piece of land which is being turned over?

Mr. HOWE: The land comes under the management of the province. In future if any arrangements are to be made for cutting, they will be made by the province. It is my understanding, however, that as long as the land is used for fur conservation it will not be cut over.

Mr. FRASER: There is no agreement to that effect, though?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. FRASER: There definitely should be an agreement to that effect.

Mr. JAENICKE: Has the minister the letter from Saskatchewan agreeing to this proposition?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry, but the officials cannot find it in the folio that was given to me. I am assured that there is such a letter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the federal authority agreeing to pay over any money to the province?

Mr. HOWE: No. We were contributors to the fur conservation plan, but no money is involved in this present transfer of land.

Mr. HAZEN: By this section, land is being taken out of the park for the purpose of the development of a fur conservation plan. It seems to me that it would have facilitated matters greatly if the explanatory note had so stated. Now for the first time we learn that there is to be a fur conservation plan and that some agreement has been entered into between the provincial government and the dominion. Had we known this before, it might have facilitated to a considerable extent the passing of this bill. The explanatory note on page 3 says, "Some of the lands have a distinct value for development and settlement." How much of this 340 square miles have a distinct value for development and settlement? Are they to be developed for agricultural or mineral purposes, or what?

Mr. HOWE: The area mentioned as having possibilities for settlement refers to 26 square miles which jut out from the southern boundary of the park, as distinct from the 350 square miles we are discussing. It is an excrescence on the map, you might say, at the southwest corner, and it is believed that it would be more appropriate to return that land to the province than to maintain it as part of the park.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Land withdrawn from Waterton Lakes park.

Mr. HANSELL: I wonder if the minister would care to answer the question I asked some time ago.

Mr. HOWE: The cost of maintaining Prince Albert park over the last twenty years, including capital expenditures, is $2,502,696.43; a very accurate reply.

Mr. HANSELL: But that is not the question I asked.

Mr. HOWE: Well, it is nice to know, anyway.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not concerned with how much it has cost to run the park. I wish it had cost twice that much, because then we would have had a park twice as good. The minister assured the hon. member for Lethbridge that the province of Alberta was agreeable to this change in the boundaries of the Waterton park, and I asked how the negotiations were carried on and whether there was any documentary evidence. Were they carried on by mail? Has the minister the letter with him so that from the record he can assure us that the provincial government is agreeable to this change? Following that question, instead of taking my seat I want to ask another one. Is this parcel of sixteen square miles in Waterton park to be handed over to the Alberta government for that government to use as they wish? Are any strings attached to it? What sort of agreement is there between this government and the government of Alberta? Those are the questions I put to the minister on section 2 in error; I should have waited until section 5.

Mr. HOWE: I am told that negotiations for the return of this property have been conducted verbally between Hon. Mr. Tanner of Alberta and the Minister of Mines and Resources; and I am told also that there is a file of correspondence on the subject confirming the final decision. Unfortunately that correspondence is not at hand at the moment, but it can be produced if the hon. member wishes. As to whether the land is to be delivered to the province without strings, I would remind the hon. member that the Alberta Natural Resources Act provides that any land not required for park purposes automatically reverts to the province, and this land will so revert without strings of any kind.

Mr. MacNICOL: A few moments ago the minister said this sixteen square miles was in some other watershed than that of the Waterton river and lake. What watershed is it in?

Mr. HOWE: The area in question drains into Lee creek, which in turn drains into some area off this map, whereas the balance of the park drains into the Belly river and into the Waterton river.

Mr. MacNICOL: The two rivers in that area are the Belly river and the Waterton river; the latter drains into Waterton lake.

Mr. HOWE: But this area does not drain into either the Waterton river or the Belly river. As I say, it drains into Lee creek, which in turn drains into the middle fork of Lee creek, which in turn according to the hon. member for Lethbridge drains into the St. Mary river, which is the river now being dammed for irrigation purposes.

Mr. HARKNESS: It seems to me we are going to get all this water behind a dam some place in spite of anything we may do. However, I must say I do not agree with this statement in the explanatory note.

"This land is not suitable nor required for park development." If this is the most easterly portion of the park I do not see that it would be a bit less suitable than the rest of the land in this national park. As a matter of fact I should think that when the number of people in southern Alberta materially increases and the park has a great many more visitors than is the case at present, that land might very well be required for riding and grazing purposes, for people who may be in the business of maintaining horses within the park. The simple statement that the land is not suitable or required for park purposes I think is denied by the statement following, which is:

It is of value specially as grazing and timber land for the benefit of the settlers in the vicinity.

I have no doubt it would be of benefit to some of the settlers in the vicinity, but I should think it would be of much greater benefit to the people of Canada as part of one of our national playgrounds than to turn it over to two or three people in the vicinity. As a matter of fact I have been wondering whether one of the reasons behind this move to get rid of these sixteen square miles is the fact that one or two people in that vicinity are extraordinarily anxious to add this area to their present grazing lands. I can also quite understand that the province would not put up any complaint about receiving that land, and in fact might be quite anxious to get it, because when the province gets it the provincial revenues can be increased, either by leasing it as timber and grazing land or by selling it. Naturally the province would not look a gift horse in the mouth. The fact that the province has agreed to take it is not an argument for eliminating it from the park. As a matter of fact it might be an argument in the opposite direction. Before this section carries I think the minister should give us much better reasons than have been given so far, or that failing this the section should be deleted. Personally I think it should be deleted and the land retained as part of the park, because the Waterton park is not very large as it is. As parks go in the Rocky mountain region it is quite a small park, and I am really very much opposed to having it whittled down any further, particularly since no good reasons for doing so have been advanced.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think probably it will be found that an addition to the park can be made at the northern end, where there is a good deal of land which is not of particular value for grazing. As I recall it the area which it is proposed to remove from the park is valuable for grazing purposes and I think that was the reason why the Alberta minister of mines and resources agreed to take back this portion. There was no desire on the part of the province or anyone else to cut down the area of magnificent Waterton park, it was simply that the sixteen square miles would be a little more valuable if it were on the north end of the park where there are trees and mountains.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do we need the consent of the United States before taking any land out of the Waterton Lakes national park? I remember supporting a bill some years ago called the Waterton lakes boundaries bill, in connection with which both countries were associated in setting apart land on both sides of the boundary for park purposes. Have we authority to extract any of the land from the park which was created by a bill passed here in conjunction with one passed at Washington?

Mr. HOWE: I am advised by the officers that Canada has complete jurisdiction over the area.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am familiar with this park and I know it will be found that it is only a little bit on the southeast corner of the park that is being taken away. There will remain plenty of park alongside the international boundary.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Parks abolished.

Mr. HARKNESS: Is the area now in Nemiskam park to be covered by the St. Mary irrigation project, and has that anything to do with this park being abolished?

Mr. HOWE: The park is near Foremost, Alberta. I am told that this park was originally set aside for the propagation of antelope, but these have increased to the point where the province is actually permitting the hunting of them.

By agreement with the province it has been decided to allow this area to revert to the province under the natural resources act.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this area in the southwest corner of Alberta, or is it east of the St. Mary river?

Mr. HARKNESS: It is half way between Lethbridge and Medicine Hat. As the minister probably knows, the land in this area is quite dry. If it is not to be irrigated as a result of the project now going forward I think it would be much better to keep it as a park. If they do not want to use it for antelope at the moment, it could be rented out for grazing. I think that would be better than to turn it back to the province to be put to general use. Some of it would be broken up and a good deal of the land would be blown away. This is in the part of the province which comes under the P.F.R.A. and I think it would be better for the dominion to keep it as a park so that it would be available in the future if it is needed for the protection and preservation of antelope. If it is not needed for that purpose it at least would not be broken up and blown away.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Health and welfare services.

Mr. ABBOTT: I move:

That the following provision be inserted as paragraph (p) of subsection one of section nine: "(p) levying taxes upon the residents of a park in order to defray the cost of health and welfare services supplied to such residents by a province pursuant to an agreement made under paragraph (o) of this section or supplied to such residents by the government of Canada."

Mr. KNOWLES: Upon the adoption of this amendment will these various services come into effect immediately, or is this just permissive legislation?

Mr. HOWE: This is permissive legislation. The purpose is to allow citizens residing on federal park land to obtain the social services of the province within which the park is situated in return for paying appropriate taxes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it the purpose of the government to see that these citizens get these social services?

Mr. HOWE: Negotiations are going on at the present time.

Mr. HARKNESS: Who is going to levy this taxation? Will it be levied by the Department of Mines and Resources, parks branch, and will it vary from park to park? Will the council, or whatever it is called, at places like Banff have anything to say in regard to the amount of taxation? Is it to be a straight imposition or are the people concerned to have anything to say with regard to the amount they are to be taxed?

Mr. HOWE: The parks branch, Department of Mines and Resources, will levy the taxes, and I am sure that the imposition will not be made until representations by the residents of the parks have been heard.

Mr. HARKNESS: Will the views put forward by the citizens groups—these correspond to municipal councils—in the parks be taken more or less as a guide? In the past one of the complaints by the people living in these national parks was that their representatives received very little attention from the department when making complaints on their behalf. I should like to be assured that they will receive proper consideration from the department.

Mr. HOWE: I can assure my hon. friend that the representations of the association to which he refers will be considered. He will hardly expect me to say that their representations will be accepted, as we both know that people do not like to be taxed.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): I am not sure that the question I want to ask comes under the particular item we are discussing. For some time there has been dissatisfaction over conditions in our national parks, particularly in the Kootenay park and the Yoho national park. Many persons are operating tourist camps on the banks of fine creeks, and they are anxious to get permission to use the water to generate enough electricity for their own camps. In the past this permission has always been denied. We are spending a lot of money in beautifying our parks and inducing tourists to come here to enjoy them; yet when visitors stop at some of the camps in these parks the only light they have at night is a smelly coal oil lamp belonging to the antediluvian days. There is ample water running by these camps year in and year out which could be harnessed to supply electric light and make things more comfortable for the tourists who come into the park.

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Justice has ruled that streams in the national parks can be developed for park purposes only. I am told that it would require an amendment to the National Parks Act to permit the development suggested by my hon. friend. Personally I would be inclined to favour an amendment that would permit that sort of development, but the matter is not before the house at this time.

Mr. HARKNESS: What is meant by "the abatement and prevention of nuisances"?

Mr. HOWE: That is only a repetition of what is in the act already. It applies to the taxation clause. It is in section 7 of the act and is being reenacted in section 9 of the bill.

Mr. HARKNESS: What is the reason for it?

Mr. HOWE: It is for the prevention and abatement of nuisances.

AMENDMENT OF ACT WITH RESPECT TO AGE OF RETIREMENT, ETC.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 415, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. ABBOTT: I made an extended explanation running to about half an hour when the resolution was before the house, and there is nothing I can add at this time.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are a few words I should like to say about the measure that is before us, and I rise to do so now because this is the only opportunity I shall have to bring to the attention of the house and of the government certain matters relating to pension and superannuation rights.

The bill before us calling for improvements in the Civil Service Superannuation Act has already received considerable acclaim. There may be some details concerning which improvement is desirable, but in the main the principle of the bill is highly commendable. The point I wish to bring to the attention of the government is that the considerations which they have found it desirable to implement in the case of civil servants are considerations which sooner or later must be implemented for all the people of Canada. This bill provides, for example, for mobility of employment without the loss of pension rights. In other words persons who have been working in other lines of employment with which pension rights were associated can now move into the civil service under certain conditions without losing the pension rights they had built up previously. It is also now possible for civil servants under certain conditions to leave the civil service to go into some other line of work and not lose their pension rights.

We also have in this bill a provision for definite recognition of the period spent in military service overseas so far as civil service pension rights are concerned. We have, too, a recognition that those who have been classed as temporary civil servants should be given consideration with respect to pension rights.

It is good to note the extent to which the principle of providing for security in old age is being recognized by the government with respect to the civil service and also to an ever larger extent by industry. We must not, however, lose sight of the fact that these various pension plans have to be paid for. That is true of any pension scheme, including old age pensions, which some of us advocate very strongly. The point I wish to make is this, that we are getting into a situation in this country where large numbers of people, rightly, are earning pension benefits portions of which have to be paid by persons who do not enjoy pension rights. When employees of an industry are earning a pension they pay for part of it themselves and part of it is paid for by the public who buy the product of that industry, and that public includes many people who do not have the opportunity to provide pension benefits for themselves. And so with civil service superannuation: in part it is paid for by the civil servants themselves out of their own remuneration; in part it is paid for out of the consolidated revenue fund, which means that the taxpayers of Canada are helping to make it possible.

I want to make it very clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favour of all these pension plans, and I am pleased with the extent to which they are growing. But the fact is that they still leave out in the cold a great many other Canadians who do not have the opportunity to provide their own old age security and yet they have to help pay for the security of others. All of this means that the time has come in this country for parliament, and I say that because it seems to me that it ought to be a major plank in the platform of every party, to force whatever government is in power to move in the direction of a universal superannuation plan.

Some industries, for example the Canadian National Railways, already have in effect a plan whereby they give to their employees a certain gratuitous pension, a certain amount as a matter of right apart entirely from the employee's contributions; and then on top of that the employees receive a pension based on their contributions. I feel that the time is long overdue when not only the civil service but Canadians generally should have the benefit of some such plan. We should have an old age pension plan which provides the basic minimum, but we must have in addition to it for all Canadians some such plan—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that according to the rules, on second reading the discussion should be confined to the principle of the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: I know that rule, and that is the reason I am making these remarks on second reading. It seems to me that this is the only place I can make them. I submit to Your Honour that the principle of this bill revolves around the extension of certain principles. These principles relate to making it possible for workers to move from private industry into the civil service or from the civil service into private industry without the loss of pension rights. The whole principle of this bill is to make more secure the old age of Canadian citizens both in and out of the civil service. It is not confined just to those who spend their lifetime as civil servants. The point I am trying to make is that the time has come when the government should bring before parliament a measure to provide such over-all security for all the people. I am not talking about old age pensions as such; that is another matter. I submit that in addition we should have a universal superannuation plan which should be, as this is, on a contributory basis. As a matter of fact it should go farther than that; it should cover all of the things that happen to people over which they have no control. I urge upon the government and upon this house the realization that there is perhaps no more desirable social objective toward which any party or any parliament or any government should strive.

We have come to the realization in our day and age that one of the things that our people need most is security; one of the things the lack of which causes so much hardship, suffering, frustration and loss of efficiency is insecurity. One of the shortest ways to offset all these evil things and to bring security into the lives of our Canadian people is to give them the assurance that we are giving by this act to this group of people who having done their turn, having done their share of work in this country, will have at a reasonable retirement age, such as is now suggested in this bill, sixty-five or sixty, ample security.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think I have already given too much latitude to the hon. member. We are dealing with the second reading of a bill to amend the Civil Service Act, and the hon. member's remarks should be confined to the principle of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. BOUCHER: Under this section I notice that the civil servant is to a large extent dependent upon designation by the treasury board. I believe that we should have gone a little farther and put into statutory form the various classifications of civil servants, because we can see gradually encroaching upon the civil service many persons who are not in the ordinary sense of the word servants of the government, but who are given equal status to career civil servants or permanent employees of various departments of government. For that reason I think it would be better for the civil service of Canada generally and for the civil servants themselves if the designation of a civil servant were put in statutory form and not subject to the ratification of the treasury board.

I can see situations developing by which persons who might be called secondary or third-class civil servants, members of committees, members of commissions, members of crown companies, who are not in the same classification as the person who lends to the nation his talents and his abilities as a career or permanent civil servant, will encroach upon the civil service. They may be employed by the officers of a company, or by the heads of committees, on a temporary basis—not hired or fired, strictly speaking, by the government of Canada, but employed and discharged and given rights of salaries, superannuation and remuneration, leave of absence and so on, entirely apart from that set out in the Civil Service Act. I see a move on foot to bring these people into the same status as those who have given their talents, their ability and their education as a career within the civil service of Canada.

Generally speaking we Canadians are proud of the work our civil servants have done for Canada over the years. Their efficiency, their devotion to duty, their loyalty to the service is well known. We are not enhancing that prestige or increasing the efficiency of the career civil servants by adding to their category those who are not in the same status. In other words I believe that nobody should be given the classification of a civil servant unless he is employed under the Civil Service Act, with the rights, privileges, benefits and obligations common to the other ranks. It seems to me that we are going to see three, four or more different classes of civil servants under different terms of employment, with different rights and privileges; the treasury board—which is not known to the public to any great extent, and which varies from time to time, from government to government and from minister to minister—giving different rights, privileges and determinations as to their status. I do not think it is to the interest of Canada as a whole or to the civil service generally that this condition of affairs should prevail. I am disappointed that when the amendment to the Civil Service Act and to the Civil Service Superannuation Act was brought in, that line of demarcation was not put in statutory form instead of being left to the treasury board as at present.

In the employment of the government of Canada we have many people who have been temporary. I believe that by an amendment to the Civil Service Act they are to be made permanent. We do not know in what department, in what board, on what commission or with what crown company these employees are to be found who are to be accepted by the treasury board. Much advantage could be gained and much satisfaction given to the civil service generally if the civil servant were put into the class by statute rather than by—I was going to say the whim or fancy of individuals, but I do not like to use these words in a disparaging sense. It depends a good deal upon the representations made to the treasury board and the time at which these representations are made whether they are put in the classification.

Many of the civil servants appointed under the Civil Service Superannuation Act are making contributions to the fund equal to the amount paid by the government. They are now to see other classes come into the fund and draw benefits under conditions different from those under which they draw their benefits when they retire. It is not fair to the career civil servants. I would urge the government when dealing with the Civil Service Superannuation Act and the Civil Service Act to bear in mind that when persons are contributing to a superannuation fund, the fund should be earmarked as held in trust for the contributors and not dispersed in a manner which will be unfair to the career group.

Generally speaking the people of Canada appreciate the amendments to the Civil Service Superannuation Act which are embodied in this bill. I am sure that there are many improvements in it which the civil servants and the people of Canada welcome. My learned friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. KNOWLES: "Honourable", please.

Mr. BOUCHER: I beg his pardon, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am glad to note he denies the "learned" part of it.

Mr. KNOWLES: For reasons this house well understands. I am not a lawyer.

Mr. BOUCHER: And you know yourself better than anyone else. I was going to say that the people of Canada do help to pay for the superannuation for our civil servants, but they are amply repaid for their contribution by the devotion of the civil service to duty as well as by the service which is rendered. I think the government as an employer of thousands of people should lead the way in providing for superannuation benefits. I do not think that in setting up these superannuation benefits it should continue the policy it has followed in the past of saying to civil servants "We have hired you for so many years. You have contributed to the fund, but if you leave the service you will not get the advantage of the security which you have been helping to build up". In my opinion this bill makes the fund much more flexible and more advantageous to the civil servants.

In providing superannuation for the civil service, we must not merely consider the inducement held out to capable persons to join the service; we must consider the encouragement which is being given to the man who is doing a good job to remain in the service, and security to him when he reaches the age of retirement forms a part of that encouragement.

These three points have, I believe, been thoroughly considered in this bill, and I commend these portions of it. I think, however, we could go quite a bit farther than we have in the directions I have indicated.

Mr. REID: I suppose it is well understood that members from the city of Ottawa or members who live close to Ottawa generally take an active interest in any bill of this kind, but to those of us who are not so close to the capital the picture presented is not quite the same. It is not the same as the picture painted by those who either live in Ottawa or live close to Ottawa and who depend upon the great vote of the civil service. I am not one of those who are against superannuation, but I am one of those who believe that our philosophy of life is all wrong. When you tell a person that he must retire at the age of sixty-five I think you are going directly against human nature itself.

Let me say to those who are advocating compulsory retirement at the age of sixty-five as a means of affording employment that they would do well to look up the figures, because if I were going to advocate anything from that point of view I would retire every one at the age of fifty. That is what I would do if my object were to give employment and a pension.

I say to hon. members who intend to vote for this bill that they had better also seriously consider their own position when they reach the age of sixty-five, because what is good for this group of citizens should apply to members of the House of Commons. I am not advocating it. I do not advocate it. I am one of those who think the best life for any man or woman, provided that he or she is in health and strength, the best life is one in which they can carry on as long as possible and is the life that will enable them perhaps to do their best work. Let us see what we are doing. We are making provision for this great class of citizens in the belief that we are doing it from a humanitarian point of view, whereas we are actually sounding the death-knell of the majority of these citizens. If you look at the figures in regard to those who are compulsorily retired at sixty-five years of age you will generally find that, once they quit, their length of life is, on the average, about five years.

These people may have worked thirty-five or forty years; they have, during that time, had their sociability in their comings and goings among their fellow men; but one fine day the superintendent comes and says "Jack, it is too bad; next week you will have to retire". Then others go around the office and collect some money, and on Wednesday or Thursday or some suitable day the individual is presented with an umbrella or a fountain pen. Perhaps he has been looking forward to this day, saying to himself "Well, now I will enjoy life". But does he enjoy life to the full when he has nothing to do? If you live on the coast you may find them later sitting on benches along the shore with nothing to do. In this condition it is not long until the individual feels that he is the forgotten man.

I say to hon. members that we had better take more seriously what we are doing. The old country, I see, is now going to encourage its aged citizens to do some work, and so should we. Our philosophy of life is entirely wrong. However, I can understand members living in or near Ottawa extolling this bill. Bear in mind that I am in favour of superannuation, but I am not in favour of compulsorily retiring everyone at the age of sixty-five. Therefore, I would vote against this bill and not have it said of me at the age of sixty-five that as a member of parliament I should retire.

Is the usefulness of a man or woman gone because he or she has reached the age of sixty-five? What about Churchill? If we continue along this line we may soon find the man of thirty-five or forty pointing his finger at every one who has reached or is near the age of sixty-five and saying, "It is high time you quit that job and allowed someone else to step in." We are beginning to think people are old and finished at sixty-five. I am not saying that those who are ill, those who may have been wounded in the last war and who may wish to retire, should not be allowed to do so. Provision might well be made for them to retire on a decent superannuation. But when you compel every man or woman of sixty-five and say to him or her, "We have no more use for you; you must retire", then I warn those who contemplate the glory of this that they had better cultivate some hobby or other because when they are sixty-five and find themselves with nothing to do in life, they will not enjoy it as they may now think. The good Lord never intended it that way.

With things developing in this way, it is a wonder you can find any man or woman willing to work on a farm. They might very well say, "Why should we put in long hours on a farm and receive no holidays or superannuation? Instead, we will go to the city or maybe get some government job."

Let me now take a minute or two to refer to a class of public servants about whom I have heard no word from any member of the House of Commons. There is a class of public servants around this building without whose work no member of parliament could get along. I know I may not be popular in what I am about to say, and I may receive a lot of black looks. We could perhaps get along without the masseur or the barber and some attendants, but not a member of parliament can do without a stenographer. The correspondence which every member gets must be attended to.

But these indispensable people are not in the bill? Someone will say they are only temporary and they can find another job. Let me refer to another group of public servants. I do not want anyone to think that what I am going to say applies to all who work in the public service, because we have many public servants, here and elsewhere, who are working long hours and giving the best of their ability to their duties. But generally speaking, the civil servants in the government work six and a half hours a day, and then we turn round and say to the trade union men who advocate shorter hours that it cannot be done. I find some around Ottawa almost cursing the House of Commons because we are sitting. They say, "If you fellows were not talking so much we would get off at four o'clock." My heart bleeds for some of them working six and a half hours a day because I know that if we were out of here they would be working a full five and a half hours. They are entitled also to three weeks' holidays with pay, eleven statutory holidays and eighteen days sick leave. But that is not all. They are entitled to six days of special leave if someone dies in the family or if there is sickness; and some of them have the neat system of piling up days until they have accumulated 800 days of sick leave with pay.

They are getting all this with superannuation as well, for which the country pays half. As I say, they are in a special class, and yet we have a group of stenographers and secretaries around this building who have to seek jobs and have none of those advantages. I am not apologizing to anyone for saying a word on their behalf. In fact I would advocate a royal commission to look into all positions around this building.

It is not always popular for a member of parliament to get up and speak in this way. That opinion has been expressed after the experience of a former member of parliament. Well, I will take a chance on that happening to me, and I want to see who will push me around or who will be rough with me because of what I have just said. I have a duty to perform. Not one member of parliament has risen to his feet today to say one word on behalf of those without whose help they could not get along. I have heard charwomen mentioned, but not stenographers—

Mr. KNOWLES: With regard to the representations the hon. member is making, may I say on a point of order—

Mr. REID: That is not a point of order at all. Sit down.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order.

Mr. REID: That is not a point of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is saying he has never heard anyone rise in this house and speak on behalf of the stenographers. I submit that I, for one—and I know others have done so also—have risen on behalf of the stenographers. I submit that the hon. member would strengthen his case if he would admit that others have done so. By refusing to do that, he does not help his case.

Mr. REID: I am willing to accept that statement. But that was not a point of order. It was just another little speech.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then it is a point of truth.

Mr. REID: Well, I am truthful, too. I hope the hon. member does not think he is the only one carrying the beacon of truth around with him. At one time he changed his cloth. I have not changed mine. I do not wish to be diverted from what I have to say. I make no apologies to anyone for rising this afternoon and speaking on behalf of that class of people. I should like to see the whole matter looked into. If others on the opposite side have spoken about them, I should like to see them join with me this afternoon on behalf of the stenographers of the House of Commons. The next time they raise the matter, I shall certainly support them, and I hope they will do the same for me.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are right with you.

Mr. REID: Without this class of people to whom I have referred, no member of parliament could carry on his duties. This is my eighteenth year in parliament. I can remember the time when there was a great deal of competition to get a position in the House of Commons. In those days the civil service, of course, did not receive the few benefits which they today receive. But if you look at the civil service today, they are in a much preferred class to what they were in back in the 1930's. These girls who work here will have to look for a position after the session ends. They have no superannuation. They have no sick leave. Their hours are long. As everyone knows, they work from nine in the morning till six in the evening, with an hour and a half off for lunch. Many, if not all of them, work in the evenings. There is hardly one who does not work one or two nights a week. Many work on Sundays to assist members, when required. When these hours they work are taken into consideration, they are not in any way in a class to compare with civil servants of the same grade. I think most of them would rank as grade three stenographers. If they do not, it is up to the member to say whether or not they are capable. But I think most of them would rank as grade three stenographers, and as such I claim they are not being paid sufficient.

I am going to make this suggestion. I do not believe it would cost the country any more money to put them on a permanent basis by the year, and I shall explain why. When the session is over, many of them have to seek employment. Some do not. Some may find a position in the civil service as temporaries, and some do not. The entire staff could be seconded into the various departments after the session is over. Their services would be valuable to many departments. I ask the minister to consider seriously the request and recommendation that I am making this afternoon.

But again I am coming back to what I stated first of all. We had better review whither this nation is going in the matter of compulsory superannuation. I say there should be voluntary superannuation. I repeat to those who are in favour of retiring people in order to give jobs to younger people: let us do it decently and retire them at fifty and give them a decent pension: then everyone will have work. But I say that by retiring people at sixty-five compulsorily you are practically giving the death sentence to at least sixty or seventy per cent of our splendid citizens.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise, not in any sense to quarrel with the hon. member for New Westminster, but to support him in the matter he has once again brought to the attention of the minister. I would refer him to Hansard of this year, for March 28, 1947—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member cannot do that.

Mr. KNOWLES: —where he will find this matter was dealt with. It so happens that I raised it, and was supported by the hon. member for Fraser Valley—

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, the hon. member cannot do that.

Mr. KNOWLES: —and the hon. member for Vancouver North as well as the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order. The hon. member cannot quote from a previous debate in the same session.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not quoting from the debate.

An. hon. MEMBER: He is merely referring to it.

Mr. KNOWLES: We were also able to get His Honour, the Speaker, as a member of the committee, to take part in the discussion. It was a worthwhile discussion except that, as the hon. member for New Westminster might point out, it ended up in the air. I think the hon. member is to be commended for raising it again today, and he need not worry about any black looks so far as the general membership of this house is concerned.

Mr. STIRLING: They were not meant.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are all with him. It seems to me that the time has come when the government should give consideration to including these people in a number of matters, particularly pension rights, and that is what is now before us. Some of these stenographers have been in the service of this House of Commons for a good many years. As a matter of fact, I have in my possession a document which indicates the number of years some of them have served. To find that some of these women have been here for twenty or thirty years and still have no pension rights seems to me to be a rather black mark against parliament. We realize that there are difficulties in working out a pension scheme for people who do not work the year round, but this bill is recognizing the fact that other temporary employees should be given pension rights, and I submit the time has come when we ought to get the usual answer that this is a matter to see His Honour, the Speaker, about; or that it is a matter to see the treasury board about. I submit it is time that the government, which is interesting itself in these other people, should pay some heed to these representations from members of parliament. I am sure the hon. member for New Westminster and I are expressing the thoughts of members in all sections of the house when we say that these people who do so much work for parliament and for the country should receive the recognition of security.

Mr. McILRAITH: It seems to me that we have wandered a little bit off the section and into a contest to see who has spoken the most about a particular phase of an item. I am quite sure that hon. members on all sides of the house are interested in the administration of the public service of the country. I do not know that any useful purpose is being served by trying to prove on what date or by which individual member certain representations were made.

One matter I wished to point out was that the effect of the suggested change mentioned by the hon. member for Carleton would be to exclude about one-quarter of the present number of persons under the superannuation act from the benefits of that act. I am quite sure it was not his intention to exclude that large number.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the hon. member explain what he means?

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes. The hon. member's suggested definition of the term "persons" to come under the act would exclude, for example, all prevailing rates men in the printing bureau who are hired by the civil service commission and all public works prevailing rates men hired by the civil service commission. It would exclude practically all the ones who were brought under the act by the 1944 amendment. I am quite sure that was not what was intended by the hon. member. However, that would be the effect of it. I am sure that is not his desire.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am afraid the hon. member has entirely misconstrued my intention. My intention was that, instead of having treasury board designate who gets superannuation and who comes under the Civil Service Act, it should be done by statute. That is very far from the hon. member's interpretation of my statement.

Mr. McILRAITH: You went farther, however.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill. I imagine it would pass without my support, but I am glad to have the opportunity of endorsing it. I am particularly glad because, in addition to looking after some of the better paid civil servants, this bill is doing something for those receiving lower salaries. The other evening in the house I made reference to the fact that our methods seem to be all wrong, because when we can find a job for a person the salary goes with the job, and not according to the usefulness of a person to the community; and I was told I was going against human nature. I should like to point out that if every group is going to use all the pressure it can to further its own advantage, then we are rapidly approaching the time when we shall have to do something to bring about equality on a more rational basis than anything we have as yet tried.

I was interested in the implications of the remarks made by the hon. member for New Westminster. On numerous occasions during my seventeen years in this house, and more particularly during the last few years, I have heard of the terrible things that would happen to the individual when we all came under the control of the state and all were paid by the state. After hearing the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster, I have not the slightest doubt but that there will be more people clamouring to get into the civil service than ever before. I would say to hon. gentlemen to my right that their warnings will not count for much, because, after all, what the ordinary individual is looking for is security and what he fears is insecurity. To the extent that a position represents security, he will take that position. I believe he would rather have a secure position at a lower wage than an insecure position at a higher wage; and in that I think he shows good judgment.

A great many things could be said about this bill. I am wondering if the same people who drew up these amendments to the Civil Service Superannuation Act also drafted the Old Age Pensions Act. If so, how did they come to the conclusion that a person was no longer a useful civil servant after reaching the age of sixty or sixty-five, and also come to the conclusion that in ordinary civil life a person should carry on until the age of seventy? Personally I should like to see a little more logic in our approach to questions of this kind. However I am glad these improvements are made by this bill, since they will constitute a lever by which we may get further improvements for those who do not now have them.

Section 2 agreed to.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

On section 3—Service in the forces and pensionable employment prior to appointment.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is the section that makes provision for persons to move out of other pensionable employment into the civil service without losing pension rights previously earned. That seems to appear at two places; it comes in section 5A (1) (a), and also in subsection 4 on page 5 of the bill, and I should like to ask a question particularly in reference to the definition on page 5. The clause reads:

> In this section "pensionable employment" means employment designated by the treasury board as employment in respect of which there was an established superannuation or pension fund or plan for service therein . . .

In other words, if I may borrow the language the hon. member for Carleton was using a moment ago, this seems to leave the matter in the hands of the treasury board. Can the minister give any indication as to what rules or principles are to be followed by the treasury board in deciding that in case A an employee coming from a private firm which had a pension plan is eligible, whereas in case B an employee coming from another firm may not have his former pension rights continued?

Mr. ABBOTT: I discussed this point at some length with the officials of my department. It is difficult to lay down in the statute a definition of what would be an acceptable pension plan. The committee will recall, for instance, that under the Income War Tax Act contributions to pension funds were deductible for income tax purposes if the plan had been approved by the Department of National Revenue. This is a somewhat analogous position here, in that the treasury board in this case must approve the pension plan in the service from which the employee comes. It will be interpreted very broadly and generously, but those who are expert in these matters tell me it really is essential that there should be some body to scrutinize a particular plan and see that it is a genuine pension plan operated on sound actuarial principles.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like a little more information on that, because I believe this is a very unusual principle. A pension plan in a private company would be on an actuarial basis, and the civil service pension plan is on an actuarial basis.

Mr. ABBOTT: In the first case it may not be.

Mr. MacINNIS: We were discussing that matter in the industrial relations committee this morning, and were told that a certain plan was on an actuarial basis. Will any funds be transferred from the one pension plan to the other? If no funds are transferred, then how is the fund, under which the employee comes, to be compensated for that part of the service for which no contribution was made to the pension fund?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will appreciate that under the terms of this bill a man who comes to the civil service from pensionable employment can count his service in that employment upon the payment of double contributions plus interest. He contributes toward his pension during the period he serves in the other employment, and the assumption is that on leaving that employment he will receive some cash payment, perhaps with interest, in lieu of his pension contributions. What I think we would rather hope is that employers with pension funds of this kind would do as we propose to do under this act; that is, when an employee severs his employment with them, give him a deferred pension annuity payable, say at the age of sixty, for the term of his employment with that private firm. Then he comes to the government service and starts his pensionable service here. At the retirement age he will receive a pension from his first employer and a pension from the government, and the sum of the two will represent his services during the pensionable period. We are hoping that this plan may commend itself to those setting up pension plans in private employment, and that it will encourage this mobility of workers from one pensionable employment to another which will involve no payment by any pension fund and no transfer from one pension fund to another.

Mr. BOUCHER: Following along this suggestion of giving discretion to the treasury board, may I say it is my feeling that during the last number of years the treasury board has to a great extent been usurping the functions of the civil service commission. I believe that some body should decide whether a pension fund is acceptable within the civil service, but I wonder if the minister has given consideration to having the civil service commission decide what pension fund would be applicable? A great number of civil servants are apprehensive over the tendency by the government to take power away from the civil service commission and give it to the treasury board, even to the extent of a suggestion that a director general be appointed. While there may be some reason for having some body accept the responsibility of deciding what pension fund shall be accepted, I do not think the minister has given us a good enough reason that that body should be the treasury board.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is purely a financial matter, and my hon. friend will appreciate that the civil service commission is not equipped or staffed to handle matters of a purely financial nature. It is not responsible for the administration of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Under the circumstances it seemed to me that the proper body to exercise such control as is necessary should be a financial body; that is, the treasury board.

Mr. KNOWLES: The usual practice in connection with pension funds is to have a committee on which both the employer and the employees are represented. An example of this is the pension funds of the two railroad companies which we have been discussing in the industrial relations committee. I feel that the same principle should be carried forward here and I think the hon. member for Carleton is quite right in pressing this point. Our experience with treasury board leads us to accept with a grain of salt the minister's use of the word "generous".

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is aware that there is a superannuation committee which reports to the treasury board.

Mr. KNOWLES: The treasury board has the final say as to who are pensionable employees. It seems to me that the minister would have done better if he had gone to national health and welfare, to the annuities branch or to some department or group of people who are interested in pension rights rather than to a body which is interested in keeping down expenditures wherever possible. I confess that there are two sides, but when you leave the final say in the hands of the treasury board I am not satisfied that the other side is adequately represented. To many of us it seems that the commendable principle which is incorporated in this bill has only one logical conclusion, namely, that soon or later we must have a universal superannuation plan to provide for general mobility of employment and security for our Canadian people, regardless of where they spend their life's work.

Mr. ABBOTT: The superannuation fund is under the direction and control of the Minister of Finance, who is the responsible minister. The Minister of Finance is ex officio the chairman of the treasury board which, as my hon. friend knows, is a committee of ministers. There is a staff of competent officials in the treasury board. While one of the functions of that board is to see that expenditures are kept down and that no money is wasted, at the same time the Minister of Finance—I am speaking for myself, but I know that I speak for my other colleagues—and the treasury board are interested in the efficient operation of the public service and seeing that the members of the public service are fairly treated.

The amendments now before the committee were evolved in the Department of Finance by officials of the much maligned treasury board. The deputy minister of finance, as secretary of the treasury board, took an active personal interest in the drafting of these amendments. I am not rising to defend the treasury board as such, but I think the committee can rest assured that this matter will receive sympathetic administration under the aegis of that much maligned body, the treasury board, and under the Minister of Finance, whoever it may be, myself or my successor.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about my second question?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is something to which I would have to give careful thought. This is a superannuation provision for those in the public service, and that is as far as we are going today. If my hon. friend wants my views on a general superannuation plan I shall be glad to give them at perhaps some other time.

Mr. SHAW: It is quite possible that this section provides the information which I desire, but I want to have the matter absolutely clear. A number of veterans of world war I entered the public service after September, 1939, during 1940, 1941 and so on. Those persons were not engaged in pensionable employment, but they are now on a permanent basis and contributing to the superannuation fund. Are they permitted, by paying double or whatever the provision is, to count their two, three or four years of service in world war I?

Mr. ABBOTT: If they so elect.

Mr. BROOKS: I understand that they have to pay four per cent interest.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct; that is the standard basis for all who wish to count prior service, whether it is in the armed forces or in what we call pensionable employment.

Mr. BROOKS: If it were service in world war I the interest would be quite an amount?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid my hon. friend is right. Service in world war I would be some distance back. This probably would be of more value to veterans of world war II who are now entering the service.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Allowance to contributor after ten years service.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister state clearly the position as to superannuation of a civil servant in each of three classes: first, one who retires with less than ten years service; second, one who retires with more than ten years service but less than twenty years service and, third, one who retires with more than twenty years service but prior to the normal retirement age?

Mr. ABBOTT: The civil servant with less than ten years service who is retired by reason of age or incapacity is given the option of receiving a gratuity of one month's salary for each year of service or an immediate annuity reduced by one per cent for each year of service less than twenty. The latter is a new provision. In the case of abolition of office, there is the same option, a gratuity of one month's salary for each year of service or a deferred annuity reduced by one per cent for each year of service less than twenty. In the case of inefficiency, he is given the return of contributions without interest or the option of a deferred annuity reduced by one per cent for each year of service less than twenty. In the case of misconduct, there is no change; he receives a return of contributions without interest. When he is retired for other reasons, such as voluntary retirement, completion of a term appointment and so on he is given the option of the return of contributions without interest or a deferred annuity reduced by one per cent for each year of service less than twenty.

In the case of a civil servant with over ten years of service retired for age or incapacity, he is given an immediate annuity. There is no change from the present act. In the case of abolition of office, he is given an immediate annuity reduced by one-third to age sixty-five. There is no change there. In the case of inefficiency, he is given under the present act an immediate annuity reduced by fifty per cent to age sixty-five and 33⅓ per cent thereafter. That is changed to a deferred annuity reduced by one per cent for each year of service less than twenty or withdrawal of contributions without interest, whichever he prefers.

There is no change with respect to dismissal for misconduct. The employee is given the return of contributions without interest.

For other reasons, such as voluntary retirement, completion of a term appointment, he has under this bill, if he has less than ten years service, the option of a deferred annuity reduced by one per cent for each year of service less than twenty, or the return of contributions without interest. If he has over ten years service he gets his full annuity rights, whatever they may be, reduced by one per cent for every year of service which is less than twenty, and at twenty years he gets his full annuity rights at the appropriate rate, deferred to age sixty years.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thank the minister for that detailed statement which clears up certain ambiguities. But there is one point I should like to get clear. The minister listed various reasons for the termination of employment but did not refer to a civil servant who leaves voluntarily for reasons of his own.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did give that. I said that for various reasons, such as voluntary retirement, or completion of a term appointment, he has the option of a return of contributions without interest or a deferred annuity reduced by one per cent for each year of service less than twenty years.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought the minister said voluntary retirement on completion of a term of appointment.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was a slip of the tongue.

Sections 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Retirement age.

Mr. BOUCHER: Subsection 2 says, "Nothing contained in subsection one of this section," and so forth. If that refers to subsection 1 of this new clause 8, I do not know what it means at all. On the other hand, if it refers to the section of the old act it is referring to section 10 and should read, "subsection 2 of section 10" of the old act.

Mr. ABBOTT: The purpose of this subsection is to provide that the reduced retirement ages of sixty-five and sixty shall not apply until two years have elapsed after the coming into force of this subsection.

Mr. BOUCHER: Has the minister checked the wording?—because, as it is, there is confusion. It seems to me that it should read "subsection 2 of the old section 10."

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the reason for the language used here is that this is not necessarily a permanent section in the Civil Service Superannuation Act, but is merely an enabling section to carry us through that two-year period.

Bill reported.

Mr. ABBOTT moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I say just one word to the Minister of Finance. Will he be ready at some stage, perhaps on his estimates, to discuss the question of a cost of living bonus for the present superannuated civil servants?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will do my best. I will think it over.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am just warning the minister that that is coming.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PENSION OR SUPERANNUATION BENEFITS TO SENIOR APPOINTEES SERVING OUTSIDE CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 412, to provide superannuation benefits for senior appointees of the Department of External Affairs serving outside Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister indicate how many persons in the service of the department at the present time this bill will cover?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: From the information that has been given me by the officers it will apply to twelve persons, six of whom would not otherwise be entitled to any superannuation allowance, and six of whom would get some increased benefit from the time spent in the service of external affairs.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was going to direct a similar question to the minister, only I was going to make it a little more definite. Since there are not many involved, perhaps the minister would give the committee the names of those who are affected by this bill as we know them at present, together with their present salaries and their other allowances.

whatever they may be. It may be that they have some blanket arrangement about expenses. I should like to know their actual remuneration and their basic salary in each case.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the only one to whom the bill will apply immediately, if he were to retire from the service as soon as the act comes into force, is the Hon. Mr. Justice Davis who has, I think, been for a sufficiently long period in the occupancy of a public office. But those who are not entitled to any superannuation benefits under any existing legislation of the parliament of Canada and who are now heads of missions for external affairs are Mr. W. F. Warwick Chipman, who is Canadian ambassador to Argentina and who served as Canadian ambassador to Chile before that; Mr. Victor Doré, who is ambassador to Belgium and minister to Luxemburg.

Mr. GRAYDON: He took Mr. Justice Turgeon's place.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, he replaced Mr. Justice Turgeon. Mr. K. A. Greene, who has just been appointed high commisisoner to Australia; Hon. T. C. Davis, now Canadian ambassador to China and formerly high commissioner to Australia; Mr. Vaillancourt, Canadian minister to Cuba; Mr. Laureys, minister to Norway and Denmark, and formerly ambassador to Peru, and Mr. J. D. Kearney, at first high commissioner to Ireland, then minister to Norway and Denmark and now high commissioner in India.

The others to whom the bill might apply, in meaning additional superannuation benefits to what they would be entitled to under other acts of the Canadian parliament, are Major-General G. P. Vanier, who is ambassador to France, and Major-General Maurice Pope, who is head of the Canadian military mission in Berlin; but with respect to Major-General Pope it would be only if the governor in council decided that the mission to Berlin was a mission comparable with ambassadorship or the office of consul general. Major-General LaFleche, ambassador to Greece; with respect to Major-General LaFleche, I am not in a position to say just what the effect would be. Major-General LaFleche was a member of the civil service for a number of years before he became a member of parliament and a minister of the crown; but he is not one who was in the civil service immediately before his appointment as an officer of external affairs. That is a matter that I asked to be given precise information upon, and have not as yet received information as to whether or not he would be entitled under the superannuation act to superannuation benefits for the number of years he served in the civil service.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the gap between the time he was in the civil service and took on the job in Greece disqualified him, this bill would enter in.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This bill would affect him just as if he had never been in the civil service, but only, of course, upon the conditions prescribed in the bill; that is to say, had the period of service that the bill calls for. When we come to the appropriate section it is my intention to ask that an amendment be moved to make sure that no one, no matter what his service may have been, can get more as a consequence of this bill than the maximum that this bill would provide if he had nothing else. Under this bill no one can get more than thirty-five fiftieths or seventy per cent of his salary. If a man was entitled to a superannuation benefit of a certain amount under another act of the parliament of Canada and by application of this bill got another allowance, the additional allowance will have to be cut down so that the two together will not amount to more than if his whole service had been in external affairs.

Mr. MacNICOL: He will not get two rates.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. He will not be allowed more than if his whole period of public service had been service with external affairs.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about the military pension?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I had not quite finished giving the explanation. That would apply whether it was a military pension, pension as a permanent member of the permanent force of Canada or any other pension. It is drawn in general terms, any pension or annuity for any prior service under any other act of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: What about disability pension?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Of course this would not cut down a pension that might have been earned before coming into external affairs, but this would not grant anything additional to such a pension, but would leave the total pension what would have been the maximum for service under this act.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, if the other pension is already providing an amount greater than this bill would provide—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will not be interfered with in any way; but if it provides a lesser amount than the maximum under this bill, then there is the difference between that amount and the maximum which could be made available provided it is earned under this bill.

Mr. BROOKS: A returned soldier's disability pension would not be interfered with.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under the terms of the amendment as it has been drawn, it would be any pension in respect of prior service. I understand that disability pensions are not pensions in respect of prior service; that they stand on an entirely different footing. That is what happens in the R.C.M.P. or in any other scheme. They are not pensions in respect of prior service; they are compensation for disability.

Mr. BROOKS: I was thinking of General Vanier's case.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. The only other persons I had not mentioned were Mr. Justice Turgeon who is entitled to a pension under the Judges Act, but who has never drawn it because he is in the service of external affairs. Under the Judges Act I understand his pension would be $6,666. Since the total pension here would be presumably $7,000, there would only be the margin between the amount of $6,666 and the $7,000 which could be added to his pension under this bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have counted only eleven; I think the minister said twelve.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Major-General Odlum is the next one. I understand that Major-General Odlum is not entitled to any pension in respect of prior service for any other service in the civil service of Canada, and from the information I have, the only pension he could get would be what would be earned by his service in external affairs under this bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Now, the salaries.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The salaries are $10,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it $10,000 each?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; each of these heads of missions receives a salary of $10,000. Then, along the line of the previous question, Warwick Chipman, for instance, gets $10,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: What has always concerned me is this. These judges are, so to speak, seconded from the bench for the time being into the diplomatic service. Do they not get some special advantage over others, or do they get the same as other people? Actually, under the changes in the Judges Act last year, I should think Mr. Justice Davis would be entitled to more than $10,000. I do not know about Mr. Justice Turgeon. Does he get more than the others, or are they all on an equal basis?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: All on an equal basis. Mr. Justice Turgeon had retired from the bench before the Judges Act was amended.

Mr. GRAYDON: What about allowances?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Allowances are not counted for pension purposes, with just one exception. If a civil servant under the superannuation act is appointed head of a mission in external affairs at a salary that is less than would have been his salary in the civil service, under the superannuation act, the governor in council can, for the purposes of his continuation under the superannuation act, deem as part of his salary enough of his allowance so as not to prejudice him. That was particularly brought to our attention in connection with the case of Mr. Fraser Elliott, who accepted a position in external affairs at a salary of less than his salary in the civil service, and he was informed that I would ask parliament, in dealing with this bill, to make provision whereby enough of his allowance might be deemed salary so that the change in salary would not affect his pension rights, although he would have to pay the contribution on the portion of the allowance that was for that purpose deemed salary. I think that is the whole scope of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I want to take advantage of clause 1 of the bill to make a reference to those honourable gentlemen who are serving us so well so far away from home. They are great citizens, great Canadians. During the war particularly they put enthusiasm, vigour and understanding into their work and it was my privilege to observe them in action.

I do not like to single out any particular name. I have not had an opportunity during the last two years to make the observations which, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should now like to make. I would mention Major-General Vanier, who, exiled to Algiers at the time I had the privilege of being a guest in his temporary domicile, did everything that he could possibly do on behalf of a Canadian, burdened though he was with war cares.

In other parts "down under" we received similar consideration, and I have no criticism whatsoever to offer with regard to those names that have been mentioned. Most of the persons in question I have had the privilege of meeting, and I pay the highest tribute to them as great Canadians away from home doing a great job on behalf of Canada.

With your permission, sir, I should like to add one further tribute to the families of these gentlemen, to Madame Vanier and Mrs. Davis. These ladies, in their own way, made things pleasant to persons who were strangers to them, yet at the same time Canadians. To their guests they were as Canadians to Canadians. They went out of their way to do things, and I consider it my duty as well as a high privilege to pay tribute to our Canadian ambassadors—call them what you will—and their families away from home for making us feel at home when we ourselves were away from home. In the last two years I have been anxious to make this statement.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I wish to express my sincere appreciation of the words which the hon. member has spoken and which, we all know, are fully deserved by those who are doing their best to serve Canada's interests abroad, and by their families who are assisting them in every way possible and in an efficient manner.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to get some information about these various excellencies because I have objected for years now to the extension of the ambassador, minister, consul general and high commissioner principle. I have great admiration for the present minister, but I must object to voting money for ambassadors of one sort or another all over the seven seas. They have no knowledge whatever of external affairs. They learn by experience only. Even Solomon in all his glory was never arrayed like one of them; and, to refer still further to that passage in Scripture, "they toil not, neither do they spin." The thing is becoming ridiculous for a small country, and I think we had better get out of it. What have we in this department? We have a large number of these excellencies all over the globe. We have men in China and Japan, and before the war we had Hon. Mr. Bruce and, after it, General Odlum. Now we have Judge Davis, who has been in Australia. He has been all over the world, on all the seas.

What have these people been doing except fostering the separatist tendency all over the empire and dividing Britain's representation? We have public officials called ambassadors; we have high commissioners; we have consuls general and all that kind of thing everywhere; to such an extent has this system been developed that their excellencies are beginning to make a laughing stock of the country, by so many of them being sent to great and small countries all over the world. That is the plain truth, if you ask me. For a country of ten and a half million people we have altogether too many of these useless representatives abroad. There is nothing but duplication and more duplication all along the line. There are officials under this department who do work overlapping that of the trade commissioners, agents and other officials of Canada. I have a splendid book on the Department of Trade and Commerce giving a list of countries, cities and towns where there are trade agents, commercial agents and so on. Some provinces and many businessmen have associations over there also. All this, in my opinion, is unnecessary duplication. If it were necessary I would not say a word, but are all these people necessary? No. What do they do? Nothing that I know of but get the country into trouble making speeches in foreign countries which they have no right to make. A lot of them are in uniforms. One landed in India the other day. He was formerly in southern Ireland. Now he has gone to India, and there were profuse articles about him and his uniform in the public press. And what about the staffs that assist these gentlemen? You have a first secretary, a second secretary, a third secretary and a fourth secretary; there is a secretary to the fourth secretary, and in addition to that this particular gentleman has a military staff with him to accompany him on land, in the air and on the sea, as he moves from one place to another.

Since I have been in the House of Commons, there has been discovered one great basic industry in Canada, located in the city of Ottawa, known as the ambassador cure for unemployment. I call it the ambassador cure for unemployment, for that is the only object I can see in it. Apart from that, they are doing nothing at all. They are of no value to Canada or to the Empire that I can see. We are talking about our status all the time, our autonomy and our sovereignty. Well, the status we had at the time of the last war, the sovereignty we enjoyed then, saw us through that war and another, in which thousands upon thousands of our young men were killed, and thousands upon thousands of others wounded. If that status was good enough for us then, it ought to be good enough for us today and especially for those of us who stayed at home. We should not be wanting to roam the seven seas.

We are fortunate that the position of the United States is far different. As a great ambassador or a great president of France said—I refer to Clemenceau—Britain and the dominions were the hardest countries in the world to make a treaty with. Why? Because they did not speak with one voice as the United States does. Fortunately in the United States there is one federal authority in control and not forty-eight separate states, each with ambassadors all over the seven seas. I do not mind the hon. member for Carleton supporting the measure as he does, because he is no doubt able to get some employment out of it, as are all the members for Ottawa city and Carleton county; although I do not think he has in his constituency any of these gentlemen who are roaming all over the seven seas.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Withdraw.

Mr. CHURCH: I think this has gone far enough. For example, when you look at the large powers such as Britain and France, and the others, how many ambassadors have they? The other day I saw a return, I think it was in British Hansard, which indicated they have only nine ambassadors. We have about twenty, if you ask me. I had a list of them which was in a return to an order of the house, giving their names. One would think we were a first-class power with 100 to 180 million people, having all these people roaming around on Cook's tours, par excellence and de luxe all over the seven seas learning the embassy business by experience. Everyone wants to be an ambassador. The hon. member for Vancouver South would qualify as an ambassador. He would make a very good one, as would many other hon. members. The hon. member for Temiscouata —he is not here today; he is taking a holiday —may be an ambassador some day. Some not only want to send ambassadors to various countries, but want to extend it to religious denominations. Some want to go to Canterbury cathedral and no doubt represent their denominations. Some want to go to Rome. Some want to go to the Church of Scotland where the hon. gentleman opposite—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I beg the hon. member's pardon; I belong to the Free Church of Scotland, not to the Church of Scotland.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to say to Edinburgh's most distinguished graduate, that he would make a good ambassador of the Free Church of Scotland. I have seen him doing ambassadorial work on many occasions in the house, and he is a competent ambassador.

With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, for a country with eleven to twelve million people I think we are going much too far with these vast expenditures. No doubt the pension is contributory. A man shall have to serve for five years first. But not one of them stayed five years in Australia; not one stayed more than one year. There have been three of them down there, and now they are off to South America, and all that kind of thing. We are going too far. There is no public opinion to maintain this. In my opinion we are making a great mistake and causing separatism.

Mr. MacINNIS: In what I have to say I do not wish to be considered as unappreciative of the services our representatives abroad are rendering to Canada, but I believe we should have some sense of proportion in these matters. Last week or the week before, we were considering pensions for people who have served this country as citizens, people who have given a lifetime in the service of the country. The conclusion this house came to was that our old age pensioners, man and wife, can live on a pension of $360 a year. I do not see how we can harmonize the provisions of this bill with what we did last week or the week before with regard to old age pensioners. For that reason—and I am speaking for myself and myself only—I intend to oppose this measure.

Daily I receive letters from constituents, indeed from people in all parts of Canada, who have to live on the war veterans allowance; and, mind you, they are not people who have taken a pleasant and easy job at a good salary, but people who risked their lives for Canada. I had two letters today, one from an elderly couple who have to live on $60.83 a month. The man is not able to work. This man risked his life for Canada. Before we pay pensions of the amounts mentioned in this bill to people who have given only a few years' service, I think we should give more consideration to our senior citizens and to those who are now on what we call the burnt-out pension. We are told that we cannot do it, that the country cannot afford it.

Last year in the Judges Act there was provision for a pension for Mr. Justice Davis. It did not go through. Now we find that a completely new bill can be brought into this house for the purpose of providing a pension for one individual; that others come in on it is merely incidental. I just cannot understand people who are fair—if my hon. friend wants to say something, let him get up and say it and stop murmuring while I am talking.

Mr. LENNARD: I just said I did not want the hon. member to be looking at me and preaching to me.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not looking at the hon. member; and if he did not look at me he would not notice that I was looking at him even if I were. But as I said, I cannot understand how intelligent people, people who believe in equity and equality, can do this kind of thing. How can we explain it to our constituents when we go back home? How can I meet an elderly gentleman and his wife, people who have given their all in building up Canada and who are now told that they must live on $360 a year, when we have pensions of these amounts for others which we approve? Personally, I do not believe that those covered in this bill are any more entitled to the pension than is a member of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We do not get any, though.

Mr. MacINNIS: They have not sacrificed nearly as much.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not half as much.

Mr. MacINNIS: I doubt if they have given any greater service to the country. I should not like to be personal in this matter, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not mind my saying this, but I believe the Minister of External Affairs himself is just as much entitled to a pension. I may be wrong, but I am of opinion that he undertook his present work as a duty to the country rather than from a desire to engage in politics. I appreciate that and honour him for it. That being the case, he is just as much entitled to a pension as are those who serve our country abroad. If you were to bring it down to that, all members of parliament are entitled to the same consideration. So far as I am concerned, I intend to oppose this and every similar measure until we deal with greater equity with the common, ordinary, citizens of Canada.

Mr. BOUCHER: Will the minister explain to us what he means in section 2 by "such other persons of comparable status"? In the section he has already named the ambassadors, ministers, high commissioners and consuls general.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall be very glad to do that on section 2, if section 1 is carried.

Mr. GRAYDON: In his remarks as to the advisability of proceeding with such a measure, the hon. member for Vancouver East raised one question in my mind. Did any of these appointees enter the service with any guarantee or assurance or undertaking or promise, direct or indirect, that they would get the advantage which this measure would seem to provide? I think that is an important point, because, after all, if they came in on the understanding that they would get $10,000 a year I am not sure that there is any need to give them something further, particularly if it applies only to one man. I do not know whether it applies to more than one, but at the moment the minister would seem to be a little concerned as to whether it does apply to more than one. I should like that point clarified.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At the moment I am not sure that it even applies to one; I am not sure that Mr. Justice Davis has been five years in the service of external affairs. I do not think he has. He was in the Department of National War Services until nearly the end of the war. The other question must be answered in the negative. These gentlemen who were appointed to external affairs during the war accepted the appointments as a matter of public service to be performed for the country. Some of them were not inclined to continue. They were told that for persons brought in from outside the civil service it was intended to ask parliament to vote pensions which would be somewhat similar to those paid members of the judiciary. No bargain was made with anyone. I would not think it would be proper for me as minister of external affairs to make any promise as to what parliament would do about salaries or pensions. I do remember speaking to two or three and telling them it was my intention to ask parliament to enact a measure of this kind. I did not get the impression that had I not told them this they would have insisted upon retiring, but it came up in the course of conversations as to whether or not they would continue in the service. The only person to my recollection who was much concerned about this was Mr. Fraser Elliott, because he already had superannuation benefits and did not think it would be fair to ask him to abandon those benefits to serve in another capacity. I did tell him that I was going to bring this bill before parliament, that I hoped parliament would adopt it, and that if it were adopted I would ask that there be a provision in the bill which would permit him to continue making contributions based upon an amount equal to the salary he would have been receiving had he remained in another branch of the public service. But as far as my recollection goes, and I think it is pretty clear, that is the most that was done.

I did have some conversation about the matter with Mr. Justice Davis. I told him it would be contributory, and that to have the benefit of the years since he was first appointed to the bench there would be arrears of contributions to be paid. I asked to have a calculation made of what that would be, and it amounts to something close to $5,000. I did tell him that he would be required to pay that amount if he wanted to get the benefit of the years which have elapsed since his appointment to the bench; but it did not go beyond that. It was something spoken of in the discussions we had about appointments to these offices.

I clearly remember that when Mr. Chipman was first appointed it was understood that he was being asked to serve during the period of the war; and the same was true when Mr. John D. Kearney, Mr. Ralston's former partner, was appointed. Then, when the war was over and it was found that they had performed what we looked upon as valuable service they were requested to remain, and were told that I was going to bring a bill before parliament containing provisions of this kind. But no agreement was made with them that their resignations would be accepted if the bill did not go through.

Mr. GRAYDON: These twelve cases stand on a little different ground from what would be the case if they had been appointed under normal civil service arrangements. Reading some history of cases that occurred before I was in public life at all—perhaps things have changed since then—I find that sometimes when governments change some of these men are changed. I should not like to hold out either the hope or the threat that such things would happen if the government were to change again, but just suppose a future government was of a similar mind to past governments, shall I say. What would happen in the case of any of these men who might be removed on the same grounds on which other people have been removed? What would happen to the superannuation in that case; because the bill only calls for retirement or resignation of a public official.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If that happened there would be no pension payable under this bill unless the one who retired came under the conditions set out in section 3: if he had attained the age of sixty-five and had served for not less than five years, or if he had become physically disabled from continuing to serve. Otherwise it would not apply; and that was frankly stated to these gentlemen. I think they all realize that situation.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is nothing in this bill, as I see it, that would prevent a succeeding government from removing any of these people.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, no; and there is nothing in this legislation that would give them an indemnity if they were removed. That was fully realized by all those with whom I discussed the terms of the proposed bill.

Mr. SHAW: I do not want to delay the passing of section 1. While agreeing that the observations of the hon. member for Vancouver East contain a good deal of merit, personally I cannot feel that opposing this bill would automatically bring justice to these other groups he mentions. I am one of those who believe that anyone performing a service, outside Canada or within Canada, should be adequately compensated for service rendered. However I say that, by virtue of the government bringing in this bill, and by virtue of the party on the other side supporting it, the government is placed under a greater moral obligation to give justice to the other groups referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I shall not oppose the bill, but certainly I shall feel that I have a greater argument to use in fighting for justice to the recipients of war veterans allowances, to our older persons and others within the country.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the committee that the principle of this bill was accepted by the house on second reading and that discussion should now be directly relative to the section. Most of the discussion that has taken place so far would have been more appropriate on second reading. Could we carry section 1 before six o'clock and then proceed with section 2?

Section agreed to on division.

On section 2—Definition.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have an amendment which I will ask to have moved to add certain words to section 2, and I want to answer the questions put by the hon. member for Carleton.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at seven o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock it had just passed clause 1 and we are now on clause 2.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Carleton had asked me a question on clause 1 to which I promised an answer when we got to clause 2. It was with respect to the words "and such other person of comparable status serving in another country in the public service of Canada as the governor in council may designate". The hon. gentleman asked me what that might apply to. The words were inserted so that, in the event of its becoming necessary for Canada to have a permanent representative at the seat of the united nations, that permanent representative might, if the work he was doing there was of similar importance to that performed by an ambassador, be designated as coming under the clause. It was felt that might be necessary because it is not at all improbable that, in the event of Canada having to have a permanent representative at the seat of the united nations, someone now in the service of external affairs as ambassador might be designated to fill that office.

The question also arose as to whether the office at present occupied by General Pope at Berlin should be included. As a matter of fact, until very recently General Pope was a member of the permanent forces, seconded to the Department of External Affairs, and for that period would not, of course, even if he were included, derive any benefit from the bill. The post was not expressly mentioned because it may very well be that it will be only of quite short duration. It was thought that in bringing the bill before parliament there should be the possibility of including such officers of external affairs as might be heading the kind of mission we have had in Berlin or the kind of establishment we might have to have at New York or Lake Success to represent us in the organizations of the united nations. But that will not necessarily be so, and if we put in precise language it might extend to more than would be the intention of having it apply to. That was the reason for putting those words in. It was felt that in a case of that kind consideration should be given to the specific circumstances and that there should not be an attempt to cover it by general language which might include other than those it would be felt necessary or proper to include.

Mr. GRAYDON: Might I ask the minister apropos of his suggestion that, as time goes on, it may become necessary for Canada to have permanent representation at the seat of the united nations, is that an immediate prospect, or does the minister envisage it more particularly if, as and when—and may I emphasize all three words—we become a member of the security council?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: What we had in mind was that if, as when we become a member of the security council, the charter requires, as the hon. member knows, that every member on the security council shall have a permanent representative at the seat of the organization.

Mr. BOUCHER: I appreciate what the minister says, and probably his argument is sound that if we have the head of a military mission in some of the occupied countries he would be performing work similar to that of an ambassador, or if we had a representative at the united nations organizations with some permanency about his appointment the holder of that office would similarly merit superannuation as much as a diplomat. But both these cases are problematical, and the wording of the section is "such other person of comparable status serving in another country in the public service of Canada," and the governor in council is given pretty wide scope there to decide what other offices have comparable status to that of a diplomat. Only a five-year tenure of office is required until they become entitled to some pension. I do not want to speak on the next clause, but generous provision is being made, and it is within the realm of possibility that someone might be able to get this generous treatment that is meted out only to our diplomats. I think, therefore, we would be well advised to wait until the occasion arises, when an amendment could be made to the bill, rather than to leave it in fairly general terms as it is now. Would the minister consider restricting it to the position of ambassador, minister, high commissioner or consul general, and then, if the occasion arose within the next five years, an amendment could be made to the bill.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think it is pretty closely restricted already. It says: "such other person of comparable status serving in another country in the public service of Canada". The hon. member says that the tenure may be only five years. But that, of course, applies only when, after five years, one has reached the age of sixty-five or has become physically incapacitated. The possibility to which the hon. member for Peel referred is one which might arise within a very short time. There will be selection of new members for the security council at the September meeting, and if it became necessary to have one appointed we would be apt to be drawing on those who are already in the service. It was felt that it would be convenient if there did not have to be any gap, and in the event of that happening it could be provided at once that, on moving an ambassador from an ambassadorship to the post of representative at the united nations, it could be declared by order in council that that would not affect his rights under the superannuation provisions. That was the reason for inserting that provision. I would hope that the hon. member would not insist upon its being removed. If it is removed there is the probability that one would have to come back soon to have a provision made, and I should not like to come back. I should like to feel that this matter had been disposed of and that there would not be applications to have it extended beyond what is here provided for.

There is one other matter with which I wish to deal. I said that I would ask my colleague to move an amendment that would add, after the section, the words:

. . . and a person shall be deemed to be serving in a public office during such time as he is entitled to receive the salary annexed to such public office.

That is to avoid a possible technical difficulty which may arise in a case such as that of General Odlum who has already served in several posts, but went on leave according to the regulations, and who was replaced as ambassador to China while on leave, without at the same time his posting as ambassador to another country being announced. Under the definition, this applies only to ambassador, minister, high commissioner or consul general to another country. It might be said that while he is on leave, having been replaced in China, he is not ambassador to China, and that, having been officially posted somewhere else, he was not an ambassador in the meantime. These words would be to provide that when one has been made an ambassador and is, under the provisions applicable to his office, entitled to salary even though he may not every day of the period be posted somewhere, the period would not be interrupted.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move that section 2 of the bill be amended as follows:

Delete the period at the end of section 2 and substitute a comma, and add the following words:

". . . and a person shall be deemed to be serving in a public office during such time as he is entitled to receive the salary annexed to such public office."

Mr. GRAYDON: As the minister will recall, the name of General Odlum was mentioned in the discussion on Friday. After his name had been mentioned, press reports indicated that he said he was receiving an appointment. He left the matter perhaps not quite as vague as the minister did, but he said that he was to be appointed to a place where most of the trouble lay. I was hoping that he was not referring to the united nations or that he was not to be appointed to Lake Success. The minister spoke about the possibility of a permanent representative there. I was wondering whether he had General Odlum in mind for that post, because I should think the general's statement was somewhat inappropriate if that were the post to which he was to be appointed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not at all sure that the words quoted from memory by the hon. gentleman are those that were used by General Odlum. As I remember the dispatch, he said that he was going to be appointed to a place that was the scene of much interest at the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: "Trouble" was the word that I read.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure just what language he used, but I am quite sure that he did not have Lake Success in mind when he made those remarks.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am greatly relieved on that point.

Mr. HARKNESS: Did I understand the minister to say that this amendment has been moved particularly to cover General Odlum?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, but the necessity or the advisability of the amendment was suggested by the fact that General Odlum had been replaced as ambassador to China and therefore, could no longer be regarded as Canadian ambassador to China on leave. That is something which occasionally happens. One of our representatives goes on leave that he has earned, there is the intention to post him somewhere else, and the post he has left while going on leave is filled. We discussed the language of the section, and it was felt by the legal officers of the department and, I think, also by those of the Department of Justice that it would be better to have it stated that one would be looked upon as continuing in the post during the whole time that he was entitled to the salary that the post carried, though in the meantime the post occupied by him might have been filled by somebody else.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Pension to public official.

Mr. HARKNESS: I take a considerable amount of objection to subsection 2 (a) which provides for a pension for a man who has served for five years. It seems to me that the giving of a pension which amounts to 15/50ths or 30 per cent of the average salary of a man who has a salary of $10,000 a year, which is the ordinary salary in these cases, or $3,000 a year, is not justified. Before we pass a bill which will give pensions of that kind to these diplomats serving in senior posts, we should give serious consideration to the matter of providing pensions, at least equal in a percentage way, to the members of the armed services of this country who served overseas for five years or more. To my way of thinking, the senior officers of the armed services rendered a far greater service to Canada than any of these diplomats did.

In this connection the name of Major General Odlum comes particularly to my mind. Along with some twenty thousand other Canadians I had the misfortune to serve under his command in England.

Mr. CROLL: That is a nasty remark. It does not do credit to my hon. friend.

Mr. HARKNESS: I know it is a nasty remark, but I am making it.

Mr. CROLL: It is a shameful thing to say. I also served under General Odlum.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am making the speech. I know that most of the men who served in the second division and received anything but good treatment from General Odlum will take it very much amiss that he should be put in that position. I use him only as an example. They will take it amiss that he is put in the position of receiving a pension of $3,000 a year when the people who went abroad and served in the armed forces throughout the war for five years or more are not entitled to any pension unless they were wounded. I should like to be completely fair about this bill.

I would be quite willing to pass provisions which would give pension privileges to diplomats who have served a minimum of ten years. If a man has devoted ten years of his life to the service of Canada in a diplomatic post he is probably entitled to a pension and I would raise no objection to that, but I think this business of paying a pension to a man who has served for only five years, or a day more than five years, or whatever it may be, can hardly be justified by any arguments I have heard advanced in connection with the matter.

Personally, I think we should strike out of the bill subsection 2 (a) which provides for pensions to men who have served for between five and ten years. If that particular provision were struck out I think most people in Canada would be prepared to accept the rest of the bill; but, as it stands, I think there will be serious objection to it. In fact I know there will be.

I mentioned General Odlum as one instance. I am sure that nearly every man who served under his command in the second division will take that as a serious reflection on his own service, and I would request the minister to delete that section.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I must say at once I most deeply regret the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), himself a distinguished soldier. I have known General Odlum for thirty years. As a boy he went to the Boer war and fought for his country. In the first great war he covered himself with glory as commander of the eleventh infantry brigade, and in the recent war he was largely responsible for the organizational efforts made to prepare for the invasion of Europe on D day. He is one of the most gentlemanly of men, as Christian a gentleman as ever lived. He is a grand and gallant soldier. He is a splendid fellow. He is a true Canadian through and through, and I resent, with all the resentment that my Highland emotion can command, the hon. member for Calgary East having the supreme effrontery to attack a bigger and greater man.

Mr. HARKNESS: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Veterans Affairs is entitled to his opinion and so am I. As I said before, I know something of the effect that General Odlum produced on the unfortunate soldiers of the second division during the time he was in command of it, and I mentioned that only as an example. I am casting no reflection on the service General Odlum performed in the South African war or in the first great war. I know nothing about it except from hearsay. But as far as this particular war was concerned, he certainly produced a great deal of misery for a large number of people of whom I was one; and I stated and restated that a provision of this kind, which gives him a pension of $3,000 a year as a result of being pushed into a diplomatic post from the command of the second Canadian division, is one which a large number of people in this country are not, I believe, prepared readily to stomach. I protest against it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say one other word, sir? My hon. friend mentioned the question of pensions of others who served in the last great war. I defy him now; I challenge him now on the floor of this house, to show me any country in the whole world that has treated its returned soldiers, in regard to pensions, as well as this Dominion of Canada has done—the ordinary soldier, the plain soldier, the private, the corporal, the lieutenant—and this suggestion that there has been discrimination in regard to senior officers is an unworthy, mean and dirty insinuation.

Mr. HARKNESS: I made no implication in regard to pensions of senior officers or anything of that kind, and the right hon. minister knows it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that we are discussing—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman mentioned $3,000.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: —clause 2.

Mr. HARKNESS: Mr. Chairman, if I may finish replying to the right hon. gentleman, I made no reference whatever to pensions of senior or junior officers. I am in favour of them. They earned them in most cases. But this is a different matter altogether. This has nothing whatsoever to do with pensions or gratuities or rehabilitation credits provided for members of the Canadian armed forces, and I do not think—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HARKNESS: If I may finish—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HARKNESS: I do not think the right hon. gentleman should have introduced that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, I did not introduce it. My hon. friend mentioned the sum of $3,000, and he also mentioned discrimination as between senior officers and others who were junior in rank.

Mr. HARKNESS: I deny that absolutely. I made no mention of discrimination between officers and others.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would point out—

Mr. MACKENZIE: You cannot get by with that stuff.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to clause 3.

Mr. BOUCHER: I intend to comply implicitly with your ruling, Mr. Chairman, because I am not going to enter into a controversy over what this government did or did not do for returned soldiers generally. According to this section, any man, who being sixty years of age—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Sixty-five.

Mr. BOUCHER: —is appointed to the diplomatic service and serves therein for five years at a salary of $10,000 per annum and pays six per cent of that salary in the five years, which means a total of $3,000, becomes entitled to a total superannuation benefit of $3,000 per annum. In other words, in this section we are providing for benefits by way of superannuation to any man, from the time he is sixty-five years of age, at $3,000 per annum, even though he has not served Canada in the diplomatic service, or anywhere else within the public service, for more than five years prior to that. My own frank opinion is that we should appoint to the diplomatic service the best men in the country who will be an honour and a credit to Canada, and that these men should have some security when they leave their private vocations to enter that service. I do not believe that any man reaching the age of sixty or thereabouts and desiring to serve for five years, anxious to serve his country well for a short period of five years, would demand a pension for the rest of his life for doing so. I do not think it would be fair to the service generally, to the men in the Department of External Affairs and in the government service at large, who have spent a lifetime in acquiring knowledge, experience and the necessary ability to represent Canada abroad. On retiring on superannuation, they would realize that they could have worked almost their whole lives in their private vocations and could then have spent five years in the public service and obtained superannuation to this extent.

I agree entirely with the hon. member for Calgary East when he says that the minimum length of service for anyone in a diplomatic post, if he is to be entitled to a pension, should be ten years, if not even more. Then he has been away from his country and his vocation and he does want security when he comes back. But a man who has been in business, commercial or professional life for a great many years, acquiring for himself the necessary qualifications for a diplomatic appointment, will not accept a job for five years by any inducement that may be held out in the form of a superannuation of $3,000 a year after that.

Bear in mind that people who have served ten, fifteen or twenty years are contributing six per cent of their salary, a material amount, towards superannuation, whereas the man who has served for only a few short years pays only a small percentage of his annual salary. There is very little of the merit of the contribution element in that aspect of it. I believe there are occasions when the superannuation provision may secure the services of men highly qualified for a diplomatic post, if they need it. But bearing in mind the many people in the Dominion of Canada who have not available to them any superannuation scheme, I do not believe we would be justified in saying that men getting a salary of $10,000 or more and serving for a short time, should get this benefit. I believe our diplomats should be highly paid, but if they are not paid a sufficiently high salary, we should not try to amplify it by giving them superannuation benefits. I understand that there is provision here that if a man, even if he is not sixty-five, becomes disabled, he can draw his pension. There are a great many other posts in the public life of Canada where disability does not bring entitlement to any pension. When one realizes that many people within Canada served for years in public office at salaries much less than $10,000 a year, and did not receive any superannuation whatsoever, I think it will be found that what we are doing here will be held against us as being a discriminatory preference to a certain few. A minimum of ten years' service abroad should be required before any superannuation is granted.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am surprised to hear this from the hon. member for Carleton who is, as I am, a lawyer and who may, as I may some day, become a judge. He would then not feel at all scandalized at having applied to himself or to me the provisions of the Judges Act. In that act, with respect to supreme court judges, there is no minimum period prescribed and there is no gradation. If the retirement becomes necessary, the full pension under the Judges Act is awarded immediately, and there have been cases where that has happened, to the knowledge of the hon. member for Carleton and myself. We members of the bar have never felt that any kind of outrage was being perpetrated in those cases.

Here the hon. gentleman speaks of the possibility of a pension being earned by five years' service. The preceding paragraphs provide that no pension can be granted unless one has attained the age of sixty-five or has become physically disabled. When one has attained the age of sixty-five in heading one of these missions, it does not in any way mean that he necessarily retires. One of those who, during the war, served Canada in a most admirable fashion was well over seventy. Our ambassador to Washington served for several years while he was over seventy, and did it in a competent, efficient and beneficial manner for the public affairs of this country. The fact is that there are now in the service among those I mentioned as persons to whom this bill might possibly apply, one who is sixty-seven, one who is sixty-six, one who is seventy and one who is sixty-six; all of them are performing the kind of service which was referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Davenport, and I think that is something which may be expected to continue. I do not think it is quite true to say that it is unfair to the other men in the service. This applies only to a person appointed from outside the service to head a mission abroad. I think that requires as high a standing in the community as is required in the case of a lawyer who is taken from his profession and put on the bench. The difference between these men and those who come under the superannuation act is that those who come under the superannuation act have had quite long years in service acquiring the experience and qualifications which presumably the man taken from the outside has acquired in other fields of endeavour.

Mr. JACKMAN: He ought to have pension rights where he was.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps he ought to have pension rights where he was. I heard it suggested that I should have a pension, and that members of parliament should have a pension. Perhaps that is true. But that is not the question which is before the committee at the present time. The fate of this bill will not make any difference as to the time when and if—if ever—the other matter is dealt with, just as the fate of this bill will not make any difference as to what other pensions are paid. This bill should be regarded on its own individual merits. There may be something in what one of the hon. members said this afternoon. He said that he is not objecting to this bill, but intends to hold it as an argument for the purpose of trying to induce this parliament to make better provision for some others. Perhaps it may be all to the good that he should have the additional argument, but I think this bill should be considered on its own merits.

I am sorry that I cannot accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary East that the first portion of the section be cut out. It is already something which is not as favourable to office holders as the provision for the judges throughout the country. The only reason which occurs to me for there being more surprise about these provisions is that the existence of pensions for members of the judiciary is something which is sanctioned by long years of practice. Those pensions have always been non-contributory, without any other discrimination because of years of service than that which exists with respect to county court judges. It was the provision with respect to county court judges which inspired us in this regard. The county court judge who retires after five years' service gets only half the pension he gets after having served as much as ten years. That was not the basis, but it was the inspiration of the provision which is made here.

Mr. JACKMAN: I cannot help feeling that the provisions of this section with regard to the pension are unwarrantably high. It is not that I am against what I could consider an adequate pension for those serving our country in the diplomatic field. The salary of $10,000 which is paid a full-fledged ambassador is by no means out of the way for the position he holds; and I should think that in course of time, the way costs are rising, that salary is likely to be increased. Therefore the whole basis of the pension would be enlarged on a percentage calculation. If I felt that most of these men who were appointed to represent our country abroad had to encroach substantially upon their private means during their term of office so that when they retired they did not have their savings intact, there might be something in the scale the minister is suggesting. But certainly a great many of our ambassadors at the present time are not men who are likely to encroach severely upon their private means. May I just point out to the committee what can happen under section 3. Five years is not perhaps an unusual term of office in this field, owing to the fact that many of these appointments will come from one political side or the other, so that five years may be the normal length of service. After five years of service, during which period he will have received $50,000, one of these men can retire on a pension of $3,000 a year for life. Let us say this man is fifty years of age when he retires.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: But he would not get a pension, because it does not apply unless he has reached the age of sixty-five.

Mr. JACKMAN: If he is under sixty-five he gets nothing at all?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Read the bill.

Mr. JACKMAN: If he retires at the age of fifty does he get anything for his past service, even at the age of sixty-five?

Mr. MACKENZIE: He gets fifteen years older.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not unless he retires through disability.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether, since he drafted this bill, consideration has been given to the bill that was passed by this house this afternoon providing for what was called mobility of employment. That bill makes it possible for the treasury board to determine that a person coming into the civil service has come from a pensionable employment. Surely a judge was in pensionable employment if there is such employment in this country. In other words, in view of the fact that we passed the other bill this afternoon, is this bill necessary at all? It seems to me that it is now possible to cover under the other bill such cases as may have to be covered in this field.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The matter was carefully considered, and it was felt that the provisions of the other bill would not meet these cases, of which there are only a few at the present time and the number of which is not likely to be substantially increased. As the hon. member knows, we have been so fortunate as to recruit quite a large number of brilliant young men in the Department of External Affairs. The hon. member has been in contact with several of them at these international meetings; and I think we are training in the department an efficient staff so that, like other countries, we shall have the personnel required as career men, who will be under the superannuation act.

Mr. KNOWLES: I cannot see that there is any great difference between covering these men under the bill we passed this afternoon and under the bill now before us except the difference in amount. I can see that under this bill the pension would be considerably greater than under the other bill; but, following out the minister's own declaration as to the desirability of building up a career service in this field, I feel that the whole principle of the measure now before us is wrong in that it vitiates that very principle, the building up of a permanent civil service to serve this country.

A suggestion of real merit has already been made by some hon. members to my right. I want to make it clear that I am not attempting to steal their thunder, but it happened that I had already written out a proposed amendment to this section, which I now wish to move. Our attitude toward this whole bill was expressed this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East. We feel that the bill, as it stands, should be opposed and these people taken care of under the other measure. However, since the government seems determined to go ahead with the bill, it is our duty to improve it if we can. I think hon. members generally will agree that a pension after five years of service, even though that service does not commence until the age of sixty, is cutting it pretty fine. If I may say so to the hon. member for Rosedale it means that a person can go into the diplomatic service at the age of sixty and get a pension of $3,000 a year at the age of sixty-five. Surely that should be struck out. Therefore I move:

That section 3 be amended by deleting subclause (a), being lines 26, 27 and 28 on page 1, and relettering subclauses (b) and (c) as (a) and (b) respectively, also by deleting all the words after the word "office" in subclause (3) in line 14 on page 2.

The reason for the deletion in subsection 3 on page 2 of the bill will be obvious. The first part of it refers to those covered under present subclauses (b) and (c), but if we delete subclause (a) the last half of the sentence in subsection 3 will no longer be necessary.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The deletion of the words in subsection 3 would be the natural consequence of the deletion of subsection (a) of section 2 of this clause. It would mean that this would be a very much inferior scheme to that which was put through this afternoon, because under the other bill there is a pension whatever may be the length of service, if there are grounds for retirement. This would mean that, unless we got someone to agree to serve for a period of not less than ten years, there would be no possibility at all of superannuation, which I think would seriously affect the utility of this bill. The hon. gentleman knows that there is a provision in this bill, as there is in the Judges Act, that an option may be exercised to take for oneself two-thirds of the pension the bill would provide, and to attribute one-third to one's spouse. In the event of the death of a public officer who would have made that option, one-third of the pension would be payable to the public officer's spouse. I think that is a very desirable provision to have in a bill of this kind. There are some of these public offices which are exercised in climates that are not as healthy as our own, and the fact that there is now no provision for the persons appointed to those offices is a serious factor. My submission to the committee is that this section should be accepted, although I did intend to ask one of my colleagues to move that a subsection be added to carry out the statement I made when we were on section 1, that provision would be made that no one could, by getting two pensions, have more than the maximum of one. The subsection which I intend to suggest adding reads:

(4) Notwithstanding subsection one, the pension authorized to be granted under this section to a public official shall not exceed an amount which, when added to any superannuation or retirement pension or annuity received by him in respect of any prior service under some other act of the parliament of Canada, equals the pension that might have been granted to him if the prior service and the annual remuneration upon which such other pension or annuity is calculated were, respectively, additional years of service in a public office and salary as a public official.

When the amendment now before the committee has been disposed of I will ask my colleague to move this as an amendment.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. HARKNESS: I was disappointed to hear the minister say that he was not prepared to withdraw subsection 2 (a). I had prepared an amendment almost identical to that moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which I intended to move as a result of the minister not withdrawing the subsection. I shall certainly support the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Secretary of State for External Affairs knows the high regard I have for his attitude toward public affairs and the high regard I have for the men who have been recruited in the service of his department. I shall endeavour to remain cool in what I have to say; but as one who has been fighting hard in this parliament since I came here for the pension rights of men who worked for forty or fifty years, true not for the government, but for a corporation in this country, I find it pretty hard to work up much sympathy for the minister's contention that we should provide pensions after five years' service in the diplomatic field. Perhaps I should not say any more or I shall get worked up about it; but when I think of the cases I have in my files of men with forty-five and fifty, one with fifty-two years of service, for which we cannot get consideration or help from this government, I think this bill is going a little too far. If any sympathy is needed for the men in this service who have had less than 10 years service they can get the protection they need under the bill we passed this afternoon, and there is always the old age pension of $30 a month at age seventy.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to suggest to the hon. member who has moved this amendment that he bring subsection 2 into harmony with subsection 1, which would necessitate moving an amendment to subsection 1 to change the word "five in line 16, to "ten." Otherwise the two subsections will be contradictory. Subsection 1 would then read:

The governor in council, upon retirement or resignation of a public official who has served as such for not less than 10 years—

Subsection 2 as it would be amended does not make any provision for pension unless the offiicial has served for not less than 10 years. I suggest that subsection 1 should be brought into harmony.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thank the hon. member for his suggestion. Perhaps he will move that amendment after my amendment carries.

Mr. FLEMING: There is a little information I should like to have from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Apart altogether from the theoretical aspects of the section, I should like to know if the minister can point to any cases where an individual agreed to accept an appointment under the section as it now stands, but would not accept it with the amendment which has just been moved. Can he point to a case where an official has been appointed on an undertaking by the government to introduce legislation of this type, but who would not enter the public service on the basis of the amendment proposed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, there have been no undertakings given to anyone in respect of what the bill would provide. I did say to some that I would recommend a bill to parliament along these lines, but no undertaking was given and no acceptance of office was made conditional by any appointee.

Amendment, (Mr. Knowles) negatived: yeas, 40; nays, 57.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I move the amendment which the minister has read.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like some information from the minister about this superannuation scheme. Last week I had occasion to speak of superannuation for the warders and guards in Stony Mountain penitentiary and I pointed out to the house that, after they had paid up all their back debt, they still had to pay for their pensions until the day they died. I want to ask the minister if the people who are being provided for by this bill—I cannot go over their names; it does not make any difference anyway—will have to pay six per cent of their salary until the day they die after they have started to draw their pensions. I want to know if there is a law for the rich and a law for the poor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRYCE: I cannot see it any other way. Because you have the warders and the guards in the penitentiaries—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. member to deal specifically with this clause.

Mr. BRYCE: I am doing the very best I can, Mr. Chairman, to stick to this clause and I am raising this question to get information. I want to know why this difference is made. Why should the poor man have to pay for his pension to the day he dies and the rich man gets his pension right away? There is no fairness there, none whatsoever. I want the minister to answer me, and I shall not say any more if I get a satisfactory answer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under this clause no pensioner would pay after he becomes a pensioner. He pays six per cent of his salary while drawing his salary. When he ceases to draw salary he commences to draw pension and he does not have to pay any more. I do not know if there is any law anywhere else for any other class of pensioner. I would be very much surprised if one would cease to draw salary and continue to pay for the purpose of acquiring superannuation benefits. He has acquired superannuation benefits when he ceases to draw salary.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to assure the minister that my facts are correct. You have these custodians and warders and guards and officers in the penitentiaries today, some of whom will retire at sixty-five years of age; they will continue to pay for their pension until they are sixty-eight and sixty-nine years old, and, after that, they are committed to pay until the day they die, after they have paid everything. But in the case of these gentlemen for whom this bill provides, they get their pension right away without paying any more. It is not fair and I will vote against it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member may be confusing the matter. When one counts more years for the purposes of superannuation than he has actually served when he goes on superannuation, he can count those years by paying up the arrears with interest. Instead of paying up the arrears with interest in one lump sum at once he may say: I will pay them over a period of years. If they have not all been paid up when he becomes a pensioner they continue to be payable for the remaining years necessary at the instalment rate chosen to discharge the arrears. That is provided for in this bill too. If anyone goes into external affairs and counts prior service he can count his prior service, provided that he pays up the arrears with interest. Instead of making that payment in a lump sum, he may pay it off at so much a month, and if he has not finished paying it off when he becomes a pensioner he continues to pay it until he does finish paying it off. I think that is true of all superannuation systems.

Mr. BRYCE: I admit that, but the penitentiary guards and warders and custodians, after they have paid it all up, have to continue to pay until the day they die.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRYCE: Yes, and that is the difference. Under this bill a man serves five years and gets a pension.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 5 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ST. LAURENT moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke in committee on this bill the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) followed me and stated that, even if I opposed this bill, it did not automatically follow that there would be an improvement in other pensions. I am not so green as to expect that anything like that would automatically follow; but, unless a protest is made in cases such as this, grievances will never be rectified, and it is for that reason that I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the word "now" be deleted and that the words "this day six months" be added at the end of the question.

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very quietly to the debates on this question, and I must say now that I deeply resent the assumption of a monopoly of desire to help social security in Canada by any party in this house. I have worked for pensions since I was eighteen years of age. In the old country I fought for them under Lloyd George. I fought for them in Canada under the Liberal government which introduced them in 1927.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under pressure.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Today you have one of the most generous superannuation measures ever introduced into the Canadian parliament, and what do you find?

Mr. JACKMAN: Too generous.

Mr. MACKENZIE: An exhibition of political tactics, cheap and mean political tactics by the socialist group in this house opposing a real fundamental liberal measure of reform in this parliament of Canada. I wonder, if I may, without any suggestion—I am going to appeal—

Mr. JACKMAN: Count me with them and I am not socialist. It is too generous.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member is a splendid gentleman. There is no suggestion of a partisan appeal. I am going to appeal to the idealism, to the reforming idealism of this house to resent and repudiate the mean and indefensible socialist tactics in defying and destroying one of the measures introduced by one of the greatest ministers that Canada has ever known in this house, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). We challenge you on the vote. We shall meet you and we shall beat you. We shall defeat you on the vote; we shall go to the country and we shall beat you there.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the record be kept straight—

Mr. MACKENZIE: You cannot possibly do it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) does not seem to realize that he has stated our case against this bill. He says that it is the most generous pension provision ever brought before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said the superannuation act.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is exactly our complaint against it. Among other things, it provides—

Mr. MACKENZIE: We brought in pensions before you ever arrived in this country.

Mr. KNOWLES: It provides for generous pensions, for example $3,000 a year, for people who have been in the public service for a period of only five years. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when the Minister of Veterans Affairs appeals to his followers to support this measure, as he is doing, he is doing something that they in their conscience will have a difficult job to support.

As to his suggestion that no group in this house is claiming a monopoly of interest in social legislation generally, we shall let the facts speak for themselves. I will say to him and to his followers over there that they seem to have a monopoly on this kind of legislation of special concessions and high pensions for a few privileged individuals.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): A short while ago, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned what the cost would be to the country and the value to the annuitants of these various pensions for a man in the service for only five years, who retired at an age which was lower than that contemplated in the bill. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) was good enough to call my attention to the fact that the age I had taken was lower than that contemplated in the bill. Taking the age at sixty-five, which is the earliest retiring age, I find —and this is where I find myself in agreement with my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party as well as, no doubt, many in my own party—that a man can work for five years as an ambassador or in the diplomatic service, and during that time he gets a salary of $10,000 a year, which is not adequate according to the standards which they must maintain. But he is going to retire after five years' service with a pension of $3,000 a year. If he is sixty-five, then that pension, even under the extremely cheap rates which are charged by the department of annuities of the government, it is worth $30,000 to him. He has received $50,000 for his five years service, and that is where, according to my lights, the pensions are too generous. If a man has worked for ten years or longer he will have received $100,000. Retiring at sixty-five, he will have a pension which, under the same government annuity calculation, is worth $50,000 to him. I think a man who goes into the service at fifty-five and works for ten years is not entitled to a pension in that amount. We have too many needy cases elsewhere, and I must say it rebels and offends against my social conscience that those people who come into the diplomatic service at an advanced year of their life should receive a more than adequate pension for the services rendered. I do not find myself sufficiently in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to vote for it, inasmuch as he would give them nothing. I would give them something, but certainly not the amount which the minister has set forth in the bill, namely, after five years and under ten, 15/50ths of $10,000. Perhaps if the minister had been a little more reasonable and had given them 10/50ths I should find myself in a position to support the government. After a man serves in this capacity for more than twenty years, he is entitled to a pension of $7,000, and if he retires at sixty-five years of age that pension is worth $70,100. To my way of thinking, Mr. Speaker, that is altogether too much and too heavy a burden on the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I just wish to say a word before this bill passes. I have never been one of those to begrudge anybody a decent pension. On no occasion have I objected to a man receiving fair remuneration for the work he is performing for his country. I have been one of those who have fought as strenuously as I could to have the condition of the less fortunate people of this country ameliorated and for them to receive a greater amount of pension than they will receive under the bill which was passed a few days ago.

In view of the fact that not so many days ago we could not find money in this country to pay our old age pensioners more than $30 a month, I cannot bring myself to believe that on this occasion we should vote a pension of $3,000 to those in the diplomatic service for only five years. I cannot bring my conscience to justify that action and, Mr. Speaker, I must vote against it.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I was surprised at the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) getting so hot under the collar about our not giving more credit to his party for social legislation. There are other people in Canada who served overseas besides the men in the diplomatic service. Our men served overseas for six years. I notice that the minister's pension bill with respect to them is not nearly as generous as this is. I should like him to explain that. I think there should be some measure of fairness with regard to pensions that we pay in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask a question. Is there an official system of pensions in the whole world that can be compared with our Canadian ex-service pensions?

Mr. WRIGHT: That is not the question at all. I am not questioning that. I am saying that when we in Canada can afford to pay pensions at the rate we are suggesting in this bill to certain classes in Canada, then I am not so proud of our veterans pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You should be.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not think the minister should get hot under the collar about the matter.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): I do not think this question should be tied up with the old age pensions that are paid or the pensions that are paid to judges. The thing should stand on its own merits, as to whether it is a reasonable pension to pay to these men or not. As I have already indicated, when we were dealing with the amendment to subsection 2 (a) of section 3, I think that particular section which gives a pension of thirty per cent to a man who has served for five years is an unreasonable provision. Few arguments can be produced to support the pension provided by the government for those who have served over ten years. It may be generous; I think it is generous. I would not say that it is unduly excessive, but it is certainly generous. So long as subsection 2 (a) of section 3 is in the bill which gives pensions of thirty per cent to men who have served only five years, I cannot bring my conscience to vote in favour of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I wish to say one or two things on this amendment. First, the suggestion has been made that those who are in the diplomatic service abroad are serving Canada. I admit they are, but they are serving Canada no more than the miner is serving Canada, no more than the farmer is serving Canada—

Mr. MacNICOL: Nor the moulder or the blacksmith.

Mr. IRVINE: —and no more than any ordinary working man is serving Canada. These people are all serving Canada. As has been pointed out, many such men have forty, fifty and sixty years of hard work behind them, and yet they now find themselves without any pension.

There are two points I wish to make. The first is that the type of servant who is being provided for in the present legislation receives a very much higher reward for his services than the great masses of people who are serving Canada and, that being so, they are much more competent to take care of themselves without a pension. I am not arguing that they should not have a pension. In that regard I feel as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) does. I do not wish to put myself in the position of opposing a pension for any servant of Canada. But, as the hon. member who moved the amendment pointed out, we must of necessity, under circumstances such as these, make a protest or there would be no change.

The second point is that the miners, the farmers and the ordinary working people of the country must pay the pensions which these people will receive. Therefore it is not unreasonable that we should challenge the extraordinarily high pensions paid to them, while the great masses of the working people have no pensions at all. I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I wish to support the opposition that has been expressed to the principle of this bill. I suggest that when we decide to give our old age pensioners something far better than $30 a month we can then entertain more reasonably any suggestion of providing a pension of $3,000 for service of five years, and paying high pensions to those who, in many cases, have drawn substantial salaries for a long term of years. I do not see the logic of this type of legislation and therefore, while I am not opposed to the paying of proper pensions to officials in all departments, I agree that we must make a protest against this procedure.

Motion (Mr. St. Laurent) agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VETERANS' PREFERENCE, INCREASED SALARIES FOR COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Gibson moves that Bill No. 413, to amend the Civil Service Act, be now read the second time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried. Mr. Gibson moves that I do now leave the chair—

Mr. GRAYDON: Before you call the next order of business, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid some hon. members cannot hear what order is being called. Perhaps you would repeat it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion has been put.

Mr. GRAYDON: What motion? We could not hear a single word.

Mr. SPEAKER: The item on the order paper has been called and the motion has been put. Mr. Gibson moves that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the said bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Might we know what bill it is? We have to reserve our rights in respect to the principle of this bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I repeat: Mr. Gibson moves that bill—

Some hon. MEMBERS: What bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE: If I may rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is Bill No. 413, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 413, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am sure the civil service generally will receive with approval most of the amendments contained in this bill, and I do not think I need dwell upon it at any length. Section 1 deals with definitions, and in particular deals with the extension of certain preferences to war veterans. In checking it over, I do not find that the section takes into consideration many who went overseas, not as members of the army, the air force or the navy, but who, I believe, should have the benefit of the veterans preference in the civil service. I speak particularly of such groups as the merchant marine, the fire-fighters and the Victorian Order of Nurses. Provision is made in this bill to extend the preference to those who served with the Y.M.C.A. and other auxiliary services, who really were not in the fighting services but were overseas doing work in hazardous positions. However I suggest that a Y.M.C.A. worker or a member of some other auxiliary service did not do any more exacting work and was not in a more dangerous position than members of the merchant marine or of the Victorian Order of Nurses, or even the fire-fighters. I believe very few of these are in the civil service, and perhaps not many of them would have to be considered, but there are those who have done their duty to their country in a notable way, and who, I believe, should be given consideration when seeking positions in the civil service or when applying for promotions, and so on. Would the minister make a comment on this particular clause and state whether or not the government is willing to give them the status of veterans preference?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I do not intend to make a long speech on this bill. The veterans preference covered by this bill is the result of a recommendation made by the veterans affairs committee which sat last year. That committee recommended that the preference which had been provided during the war as a temporary measure be continued.

Mr. BROOKS: Did the veterans committee not state that it should be continued for the present, and was there not an expectation that a committee on the civil service would be set up this year to give further consideration to the matter of veterans preference? The committee on veterans affairs recommended that the preference remain as it was. I am sure the words "for the present" were in there because I looked them up only yesterday.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I am not sure of the wording, but I know that was the recommendation of the committee. I was gratified to receive today two letters from civil service organizations, one of which came to me only this evening from the acting president of the civil service federation, who states:

> I thought you should know that the Civil Service Federation of Canada, at an executive meeting held yesterday (Sunday) approved of the proposed amendments to the Civil Service Act and is anxious that they be adopted at the current session of parliament.

Then I have another letter from the national joint council of the public service of Canada. I do not want to pat myself on the back because I do not deserve it, but I want to read this letter, which is as follows:

> The national joint council of the public service, having examined the provisions of the bill to amend the Civil Service Act,
> (1) endorses the provisions of the bill;
> (2) expresses its appreciation of the action of the Secretary of State in facilitating its consideration of the bill;
> (3) expresses its appreciation of the work of the civil service commission, the Secretary of State and the government in connection with the bill; and
> (4) expresses the hope that the bill will be passed at the present session of parliament.

I read those letters so that they may be on the record. I appreciate the support of the bill that we have introduced which is given by these members of the civil service.

[Mr. Boucher.]

Mr. BROOKS: I do not think the minister answered the hon. member for Carleton who asked if it were possible to have the term "veteran" include a merchant seaman and members of the other services that were mentioned.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The matter was discussed by the veterans committee, and I would not take it upon myself to put it into the bill unless it came as a direct recommendation of the veterans committee. The Minister of Veterans Affairs suggested that next session the veterans committee might be reconvened and, of course, if that happened the matter would receive consideration.

Mr. HAMEL: I want to deal with the functioning of the civil service commission and I do not know whether I can do this on section 1 or section 2.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I think section 2 would be more appropriate.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to appeal particularly to the members of the house who served on the special committee on veterans affairs which sat during 1945 and 1946. The minister was a member of that committee, but he was not able to attend very frequently. I am sure that from the beginning to the end of those sessions there was not one member of that committee who did not want to see merchant seamen treated as members of the fourth arm of the services. I do not think there was any sentiment against their being so treated. The minister has just suggested that he is not prepared to include them in this bill because there was no recommendation from that committee, but I think I can assure him that no member of that committee is against the merchant seamen being given the civil service preference. If we delay until next year, the government will not want to open up the Civil Service Act, and that is easily understood. This is the time to set that matter right.

The merchant seamen are not getting the benefits given to the members of the other forces. Many who were disabled cannot get a pension under the present law and here is a case where they can be helped. I suggest that this preference be extended to cover them. It is merely a matter of extending the definition. Time and again, leaders across the country have taken the position that the merchant navy were the fourth arm of the services. I happen to have before me the speech from the throne, delivered on September 6, 1945, in which we find these words:

> Our country will ever remember with pride the heroic exploits of Canada's fighting men and merchant seamen.

Here is a chance to do something for these men. I do not think there is one argument that can be advanced against extending preference to the men of the merchant navy. I ask the minister not to close the section without giving further consideration to amending it to include the men of the merchant navy. I appeal to those members who served on the veterans affairs committee to support us in in this respect. I am quite sure that there is not one of them who would have the law other than including preference for the men of the merchant navy. Now is the time to come to their aid.

Mr. BENTLEY: I want to support wholeheartedly what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South. During the sittings of the veterans committee I, along with many others, believed that the merchant seamen were going to get much more consideration than they have. Frequently benefits for merchant seamen have been requested by members on this side of the house, and I believe they had at least moral support from members on the other side. I could understand, though I could not justify, the government's reluctance to change this legislation if it meant that a great many more men were to come under pension and other benefits, but in this case it costs the government no more to hire a merchant seaman for a civil service job than it does to hire anybody else. I do not believe that the veterans organizations across Canada would oppose the inclusion of merchant seamen in the definition of those eligible for civil service positions. The government has no excuse whatsoever on the ground of costs for refusing to include them. The government might be afraid that this might be the opening wedge, which it will not be because I can assure them we shall persist in our attempts to get even further justifiable benefits for the merchant seamen of Canada. This question will be raised as long as there are veterans in this house and merchant seamen still alive, and the least the government can do is to give the merchant seamen partial recognition at least by including them in the definitions.

Mr. HAMEL: I would like to say a few words on this section, but I will be brief. I have begun my remarks on the resolution which preceded the first reading of the bill.

(Text):

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche wishes to have a little more latitude allowed in discussing this bill than is permitted under the rules. He states that he rose on the second reading but did not have an opportunity to speak. Is it the unanimous desire of the committee that he should speak at this time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. HAMEL: When speaking on the resolution, I showed, Mr. Chairman, that the French-speaking element makes up 30 per cent of our population and I mentioned that its representation in the civil service was considerably below that percentage. I proved that in the civil service as a whole that percentage was very low. I wished to give certain details, but I was not permitted to do so. I believe that it would be appropriate to give them now.

If we examine the various departments, from the first to the last, we find a shocking injustice in all ranks of civil servants. For example, out of twenty-two deputy ministers, not one is a French Canadian. The Montreal chamber of commerce made a complete investigation of the matter and drew up a very interesting table showing the proportion of French Canadians in the civil service, according to certain classifications. For example in the $8,000 yearly salary bracket and over, they note that the percentage of French Canadians is only 12·3 per cent, while the percentage of the French-speaking element makes up 30 per cent of the total population. Among employees earning $6,000 and over per annum, 8·12 represents the percentage of French Canadians, while among civil servants whose yearly salary is fixed at $4,000 and over, the proportion of French-speaking citizens is estimated at 9·52 per cent. In the class earning a yearly salary of $3,000 and over, the percentage comes to 11·39 per cent while at the level of $2,400 and over per annum, which includes the largest number of ordinary employees, the proportion is found to be 12·25 per cent.

Obviously, Mr. Chairman, French-speaking Canadians are not given their fair share of employment in the civil service. Why? It is claimed at times that they are not sufficiently qualified and that the reason why French Canadians do not have as much opportunity for promotion in the civil service is that they lack the required ability. Such an argument is not only extremely humiliating, but it is also ridiculous. First, what is meant by ability should be determined. How are qualifications decided upon? I find, for instance, that an ambassador was appointed deputy minister of mines. In what manner does an ambassador's post lead to that of deputy minister of mines? On the other hand, the deputy minister of national revenue, a tax collector, has been elevated to the rank of ambassador. On what basis does the civil service commission or the government judge ability?

Now, that argument may be open to question. It would be another matter if this unfairness towards French Canadians affected only a small number of employees from whom specialized scientific knowledge would be required; but that is not so, Mr. Speaker. Discrimination, as I have shown earlier, is found all along the line, in every department and in every branch. Now, it must further be assumed that in selecting French-speaking candidates, the Civil Service Commission eagerly seeks those who offer the very least in the way of future possibilities. Further, it is ridiculous to claim that among three and one half million French Canadians, sufficiently qualified personnel required to fill even the $2,400 posts cannot be found. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the ability factor does not come into play.

What does all this bring about? I have shown that because of this discrimination towards French Canadians, my French-speaking fellow-citizens lose $30 to $40 million per annum. If you add to that, Mr. Chairman, the fact that about 40 million dollars are now being lost every year as a result of tax agreements between the dominion and the provinces, you will see that French-speaking Canadians will lose about 70 million dollars each year.

Some are wondering why disunion exists in this country. Good will pilgrimages are organized across Canada. Other provinces are told, for instance, that the reason why there is not understanding is that our schools are teaching that the deportation of Acadians occurred in 1755. I say that if there is disunion in this country it is not because our schools are teaching that the Acadians were deported in 1755, but rather because in 1947, and especially since 1919, the deportation of French Canadians from the civil service is going on systematically. That is the true cause of misunderstanding in this country.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. HAMEL: Who are those responsible for that situation, Mr. Chairman? I notice the French representation in the civil service has sharply decreased especially since the creation of the civil service commisison. The chambre de commerce of Montreal, which gives us most interesting facts, shows for instance that in 1918 before the civil service commission as it now exists came into being, our proportion was much greater than it is now. As regards the total number of positions in the country, our proportion was then 21·58 per cent, while it is now 12·25 per cent.

The downward trend has been particularly noticeable since the establishment of the civil service commission. Is that body responsible for such a state of affairs? I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it is not the only one to blame. However, it has its share of responsibility for the following reasons: first, it has given its approval to the so-called "made-to-measure requisitions" which have been so much ridiculed. A deputy minister or the head of a department wishes to have Mr. So-and-So appointed; he sets out himself the required qualifications and does so in such a way that only one person can meet the requirements, namely the one who has been chosen in advance and who quite often is already filling the position. Secondly, the responsibility of the civil service commission comes from the obligations it has under the act. The Civil Service Act places upon the commission, among others, the following duty:

> Of its own motion to investigate and report upon the operation of this act and upon the violation of any of the provisions hereof or of any regulation made hereunder; and, upon the request of the head of a department, to investigate and report upon any matter relative to the department, its officers, clerks and other employees.

And besides:

> To report upon the organization or proposed organization of the departments or any portion of any department or of the civil service, and upon any proposed change in such organization;

I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that this clause of the Civil Service Act entrusts the commission with the duty to see that, in the civil service, the fundamental principle of our democracy "representation by population" is adhered to. The civil service commission has failed to do that and therefore bears full responsibility in the matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what reforms are indicated? I wonder whether the civil service commission is capable of making them. The first reform is to demand of every federal employee whose jurisdiction extends to the whole country that he be perfectly bilingual. What would be the result, I ask all hon. members of this house, if at a certain time one of them wishing to speak to the timber controller, for example, were to get the following answer: "I am sorry but I cannnot speak English." What could be the result of such a situation. If it is preposterous in the eyes of the English-speaking members, I respectfully submit that it is just as preposterous for French-speaking members.

Mr. Chairman, we are being told at times that, according to a school of thought now taking shape in the province of Quebec, the federal government is considered somewhat as a foreign government. It may be true. But who is to blame?

Take for instance the case of some constituent of mine who, coming to Ottawa and calling at various departments, finds that officials are exclusively English-speaking.

Here are a few instances: Veterans Affairs, out of four officials paid $8,000 or more, none are French-speaking. At the Department of Agriculture, out of five officials getting $8,000 or more, none are French-speaking. At the Department of Insurance, none. At the Auditor General's, none. At the Department of Commerce, none; at the Mutual Aid Board, none; at the Civil Service Commission, among those paid $8,000 or more yearly, none. I know there is a French-speaking commissioner, but he does get less than $8,000. At the National Research Council, none; at the Privy Council, none; at National Defence, out of four officials who get $8,000 or more, none are French-speaking. At the Department of Finance, out of four officials receiving a yearly salary of $8,000 or more, none are French speaking. At the Governor General's, none; at the Department of Justice, where three officials get $8,000 or more—those figures apply to 1946 and there may be one now, but of those three none are French-speaking. At the National Film Board, none; Fisheries, nil; Reconstruction, not a single French-speaking official out of seven. At National Revenue, no French speaking official. And so it runs in almost every department.

Mr. Chairman, how do you expect and how can members of this house expect that our French-speaking compatriots will feel perfectly at home in Ottawa when, for the discussion of their problems they cannot contact officials who understand their language and appreciate their outlook?

Mr. Chairman, to achieve fairness, the indispensable programme I now submit to the hon. members opposite is as follows: the appointment of six French-speaking deputy ministers; 18 officials paid $8,000 a year or more; 88 officials getting $6,000 or more; 352 officials with a salary of $4,000 or more, and 1,185 other French-speaking civil servants paid at least $3,000.

Those, Mr. Chairman, were the few comments I wished to make in this connection, and I hope they will be taken into consideration.

Mr. HACKETT: I wish to add a few words to what has just been said by my learned colleague, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Hamel).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. HACKETT: Unfortunately, I am the only member of my party in Quebec and since the majority of my electors are French Canadians, I believe it is my duty to support the remarks of my colleague the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche.

Mr. FERGUSON: Hear, hear!

Mr. HACKETT: I have already stated in this house that it is unfortunate that a whole ethnical group should surrender to one party. That is unfortunate for the group, it is unfortunate for the party which takes in its fold; it is unfortunate also for the opponent which is deprived of its support. I think it is unfortunate that my party should have no French-speaking representatives.

As a result, we do not know exactly what they think and we do not have the benefit of their philosophy of life and of their point of view.

I say it is unfortunate for the party in power because they take the liberty of doing injustices as were described by the hon. member who has just spoken. Injustice is prejudicial to everyone, especially to those who render themselves guilty of it. It is also unfortunate for the group which surrenders entirely to one political party because they will be treated inequitously and, like poor relatives, that is like penniless relatives, who we accept somewhat scornfully and against our will.

I know that those problems are difficult to solve, but I hope that the situation will be remedied. I know the matter is being dealt with and I hope that the commission which is looking into the problem will shortly be in a position to report to the house that French-speaking Canadians are equitably represented in the public service and that there will be a sufficient number of French-Canadian senior officials suitably to represent that element of the population.

Mr. MICHAUD, Hear, hear!

Mr. HACKETT: Let us put aside that question of ability. It is non-existent and none of those who are aware of the situation would even suggest that there is lack of talent, training or experience among French Canadians.

I therefore hope and wish that a fair solution will soon be found to that problem.

(Text):

Mr. HAMEL: I wish to ask certain questions. Will the minister tell the committee: (1) whether a resolution voted unanimously by the legislature of Quebec, in connection with the situation of the French-speaking Canadian in the civil service, has been received by the federal government? (2) Whether a delegation of the chamber of commerce of Montreal has met the federal government and presented a brief on the same matter? (3) If so, what steps have been taken following such resolution and representations?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I assure the hon. member that representations from Quebec were received sympathetically. I was present when the delegation came from Montreal, and I can assure him that the representations made have been taken into consideration and that every effort will be made to put into effect some of them, if not all, at the earliest possible date.

Mr. HAMEL: Have any official steps been taken by the government? If so, what steps?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can assure my hon. friend that I have four major appointments in my department from the province of Quebec.

Mr. FERGUSON: Is that four out of four hundred or what?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Major, I said.

Mr. FERGUSON: In what proportion have they been made?

Mr. MACKENZIE: In the rightful proportion, according to the population of Canada. There is not, and there should not be, any preference of any province over another in our confederation. It is only a matter of fair play.

Mr. FERGUSON: Actually, has fair play been carried out according to population?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I regret to say, in my opinion, it has not been carried out.

Mr. FERGUSON: That is your fault apparently.

Mr. HAMEL: Will the Secretary of State tell the committee whether an answer has been given to the legislature of Quebec.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I cannot say that an answer has been given. The answer would not be sent from the civil service commission. I do not know whether or not the Prime Minister has sent one.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was present at the interview, and the delegation was assured by the Prime Minister that the representations would receive the utmost consideration of the government in its different aspects.

Mr. HACKETT: I fear there is a slight misunderstanding. My hon. friend the member for St. Maurice-Lafleche is speaking about the resolution that was passed in the legislature and he is asking, if it was received, what action has been taken on it.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I thought the hon. member was talking about the chambre de commerce resolution.

Mr. HACKETT: That is where the error has crept in. He was asking first, about a resolution passed in the legislature of Quebec and, second, about a delegation from the chambre de commerce. The second question has been answered, and he is now asking what has been done about the resolution from the Quebec legislature.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Speaking purely in a personal capacity, I must say that the resolution from the province of Quebec as such, never came to my attention, as one of the ministers of the crown. The only representations that we received as a committee of the government were from the chambre de commerce.

Mr. HAMEL: The government has received nothing from the legislature of Quebec? The government has received no resolution from the government of Quebec?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I only said I was not aware of any.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In response to a question asked by an hon. member, the minister said he regretted to say that fair play had not been carried out. I gather he meant that care had not been exercised to see that there was the correct number of appointments of persons speaking each language in relation to the population of the nation. Did he mean that there were too many English-speaking civil servants for the number of English-speaking people, or too many French-speaking civil servants for the number of French-speaking people?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sorry indeed if my hon. friend got that interpretation from my remarks. There have been great difficulties in securing personnel, but I say, that in the result, in the final analysis, there has been a degree of unfairness, in my judgment, and I am speaking only for myself and not for the government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And is that unfairness against the French-speaking people?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I would not say it is against the French-speaking people. There must be an equal adjustment of appointments, having regard to all the diversified peoples who make up our united Canadian country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: While on that subject, I think it is a matter of deep interest to all members of the house and to all Canadians for the minister to give us an idea who has been supervising the whole matter. Who has been watching appointments in an overall capacity, acting as a board of referees, so as to enable the government to find out whether there has been a correct appointment?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The civil service commission is an agency set up by parliament and is responsible for appointments. It is independent of any department of government and it makes appointments. It holds examinations and fills vacancies.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What I am concerned about is, what agency in the civil service commission is responsible for seeing to it that a correct proportion is maintained, that there are not too many English-speaking appointees for the number of English-speaking people and not too many French-speaking appointees in relation to the French-speaking population. Is there a definite committee whose business it is to see to that, in order to ensure that justice is maintained?

Mr. MACKENZIE: There are examining boards under the civil service commission, and they generally assess the applicants upon technical qualifications for the various positions that are vacant in the government service. Unfortunately, in some cases the necessary personnel were not available according to what one might call regional justice across Canada. That has been the result; there is no question about it, but it has not been deliberate in any sense. It is something that has developed and something that should be corrected.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was surprised that any question should be raised at all as to whether there were not enough French in the civil service; and I wondered how that came about, whether it was a condition that actually existed, and how the person who raised the question knew it existed. What evidence did he have access to which was not available to the ordinary member of parliament? That is what I am concerned about. If someone raised the question that there were too few French-speaking people in the service I want to know where he got his information, and if the Secretary of State can give that information it will help us. I am not asking the question in any spirit of unfairness, because I want to make sure that there is fairness, just as everyone else does. All I want to know is, have we an objective way of determining this matter? If we have not, I think it is time the house and the government took steps to see that a committee is appointed to see that justice prevails. Can the Secretary of State set at rest these anxieties which are in the minds especially of English-speaking members of the house?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): If anybody asks a question on the order paper as to the relative numbers, that question is answered. I am not sure, but I rather think that earlier in the session some questions were asked, and the answers were given. There is no secrecy about the matter. But as my colleague mentioned, the situation did gradually develop with the result that the civil service commission was holding competitions and making appointments according to the marks obtained on the examination; and it was found that the service had become somewhat out of balance. I know that many representations have been made recently on the same subject by members of parliament.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister used the expression "out of balance". Does that mean that there are more English speaking civil servants than there ought to be, considering the English-speaking element of Canada, or that there are more French-speaking civil servants than there ought to be?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I cannot say what there ought to be, but I can say that there are fewer French-speaking civil servants than representation by population would entitle them to.

Mr. REID: Is there any intention to change the regulations? Is there any intention to change the examination of the civil servants with a view to adjusting that, because that to me would be important? I do not know how it can be adjusted if the regulations call for certain qualifications and the papers are marked accordingly. The nation is watching what is going to happen and the people are wondering—and I am wondering, too—if the examination will be made a little different because one speaks French and another speaks English.

Mr. FERGUSON: The civil service commission is a separate body and is not supposed to be dictated to by members of the government, as I understand it. Civil servants are admitted to the civil service by examination. Surely that rule has been followed. If not, why not? This government has been in power for some time now. It is supposed to be supervising these things to some degree. We now find a considerable amount of turmoil across this country over the contention that there are too few French-speaking Canadians in the civil service. I understand that the rule is that the man who obtains the highest marks in the examination is the one who is appointed. If we are following the correct course, irrespective of whether he is a French-Canadian or not, the man who attains the highest standard is the one who should have the job. Where does this trouble creep in which the Minister of Veterans Affairs says he is sorry to say exists? I believe we are entitled to an explanation for a statement like that. He must be firmly convinced that this condition exists because civil servants did not pass the examinations correctly or did not obtain the high standard necessary to obtain the position. What has it to do with whether a man is a French-Canadian or not? If the civil service is being run properly, the condition cannot exist which the Minister of Veterans Affairs would have us believe he is sorry to say does exist. If it does, then this thing is not being run properly. I think the committee is entitled to an explanation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I never said that, and I resent the suggestion.

Mr. FERGUSON: Words to that effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I never said anything of that kind.

Mr. FERGUSON: Then repeat it so that members can understand it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There are two principles to be observed: first of all, there is the efficiency of the civil service; second, there is the promotion of national unity in Canada. Those are the two principles which we are endeavouring to observe and which we shall continue to observe.

Mr. FERGUSON: I am just as much in favour of national unity in this country as the minister is; and I do not take second place to anybody in this committee in that regard. Divide and rule is the principle followed by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member does not help unity very much.

Mr. FERGUSON: The minister will do anything to be elected.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was elected long before the hon. member was born, I think.

Mr. MacNICOL: Oh, you are not that old.

Mr. FERGUSON: The minister must have been a child then and still talks like one.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Appointments of veterans who were permanent civil servants.

Mr. BROOKS: This section deals with the appointment of veterans who were permanent civil servants and who served overseas. The other day, on the resolution stage, I mentioned the fact that in crown companies the preference was not recognized. I asked the minister at that time if in this bill something could not be done to see that the veteran was given the preference in these crown companies, as well as in other departments of the government.

I should also like to ask the minister with reference to the permanently employed. We know that in the civil service there are a great many temporary employees, as well as permanent ones, who went overseas. There were a good many young men who left this country, who went overseas and came back, who were not permanent employees in the civil service, but were temporary employees. Why does this bill not include the temporary employee as well as the permanent one? If the minister checks up, I think he will find there were a great many of these young men in temporary employment. I also understood that temporary employment was the first step towards permanent employment in the civil service. I think that is correct, in a great many cases.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is not necessarily so, but usually it is the case that a man is first appointed temporarily.

Mr. BROOKS: A case in point would be as follows: A young man had just entered the civil service as a temporary employee. He was looking forward to being permanently employed later on. He goes overseas and comes back. Being a temporary employee of the civil service, under this measure the government department would not be compelled to take him back and give him the same preference he would receive had he been employed by a civilian company. Under the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, the company would have to take this man back and give him the same position he had before. Under this bill, if he were employed as a temporary employee and came back from overseas, the government has no responsibility at all with regard to taking him on. I would suggest to the minister that the word "permanently" should be struck out, so that the section would read, "a person who was employed in the civil service and who had resigned", and so on. I should like the minister to comment on that and give his opinion.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): This section deals with extending the privilege which was granted after the first world war to veterans of the second war. During the first war, permanent employees who had resigned and joined the forces were not automatically taken back into the service and they were not granted the privilege of coming back to their employment. But after the war was over, they were reinstated. Early in this war, in order to prevent the permanents from resigning and going overseas, they were told they would not be reinstated at the end of the war. However I think better judgment was displayed later. Those who had permanent positions before the war now have the right of being brought back to the service, but in many cases the positions for them are not available. For example, a man does not come back and resume the permanent position he had before the war. As will be understood, it being a permanent position, when the man resigned the position was filled. The result is that the man who resigned applies to the commission to be reinstated in the civil service and the commission places his name on the list of eligible persons. Then, when there is a vacancy he is entitled to be taken back to a position of the same kind as that from which he had resigned. I quite agree with my hon. friend that this does not specifically provide for temporary employees. A man who resigned from his temporary position is entitled, when he comes back, to take a position for which he is qualified, but I admit that this forces the commission to place his name on the eligible list.

Mr. BROOKS: Could the word "permanently" be taken out? Do you think that would injure the clause at all? I believe it would make it stronger. I should like to hear the opinion of the Minister of Veterans Affairs on that point. Section 5 says "a person who was permanently employed," and I suggest that the temporary employee who went overseas should also have the opportunity of resuming his position. If the word "permanent" were taken out this clause would cover both temporary and permanent employees.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Perhaps this section could be left over for a moment, so I can discuss that suggestion with the chairman of the commission. It is possible that could be done.

Mr. BENTLEY: I should like to follow up what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South and myself on the first section. At that time we were endeavouring to have merchant seamen included in the definition of "veteran."

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am right on this section, which has the word "veteran" in it. At that time the minister did not even comment, indicating that he was not remotely interested in the welfare of merchant seamen, and the committee gaily passed the section without further comment. I should like to find out from the minister whether any men, either temporary or permanent employees, resigned from the civil service to join the merchant marine and, if so, whether on their return they will be included as veterans under this section and reinstated. Or does the word "veteran" in line twenty-six simply apply to those who are described as veterans in section one?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The word "veteran" means a veteran as defined in section one of this bill.

Mr. BENTLEY: Has the minister nothing further to say in regard to the attitude of the government toward the suggestion that the interpretation be widened to include members of the merchant marine previously employed in the civil service, who resigned to join the merchant marine, and who gave the sort of service we have heard so much about from all sides of this house? Has the minister anything to say on the suggestion that they be included within this section so that they will have the same opportunities they had before?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No, I have nothing to add. This section simply extends the same preference to veterans of the second war that was given veterans of the first war, and I am not prepared to widen the definition in section one.

Mr. BENTLEY: And the minister is not prepared to include the merchant seamen under any section of this bill? Is that the situation?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, that is the situation.

Mr. BROOKS: According to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the veterans affairs committee is being set up again next year.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We hope so.

Mr. BROOKS: Would the minister entertain a recommendation in this regard coming from the veterans affairs committee next year?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The government gives careful consideration to the recommendations of the veterans affairs committee; that is why the committee is set up, in order to get the advice of those who were veterans of the two wars. My hon. friend brought up the possibility of removing the word "permanently". I have spoken to the chairman of the civil service commission, who tells me they now have a regulation under which any temporary employee who saw service overseas may be reinstated upon his return to this country.

Mr. GREEN: In regard to the setting up of the committee next year, am I to understand that the only reason the merchant seamen are not included in the amendments this year is that there was no recommendation to that effect from the veterans affairs committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE: If I may reply to my hon. friend, that is not the reason at all. Last year in the veterans affairs committee there was a certain amount of confusion of thought, if I may use the expression, as to whether my good friend and colleague the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Veterans Affairs should accept direct responsibility for either the initiation or approbation of legislation in regard to merchant seamen. I am sorry I have not my files with me tonight, but I should like very much to have the privilege of informing this committee how much has been done for the merchant seamen of Canada. We have done more than any other country in the world, more than England has done. I must bring the list down some day and read it to the committee on my own estimates, because I think I owe it to myself as one who had something to do with the matter before my hon. friend took over active direction. And I had the cooperation of my hon. friends opposite. Today, under veterans' legislation there are fourteen distinct and specific benefits given merchant seamen in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs this question? Is he against giving this preference to merchant seamen who served in a theatre of war?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend knows I have been prominent now in these endeavours for nearly thirty years—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: —and I am not going to be caught in any trap that may be set by my hon. friends.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask hon. gentlemen to take their seats when the Chairman or the Speaker rises. There is not room for two on the floor at one time. I should like to call attention to the fact that the minister has repeatedly said this section does not apply at all to merchant seamen. He has explained that several times already, and no good purpose is to be served by discussing a matter which has no relation to this clause.

Mr. GREEN: Well, Mr. Chairman, but—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask my hon. friend to tell me how merchant seamen can be discussed under this clause.

Mr. GREEN: We are asking that the merchant seamen be put under the clause.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: But the minister has said repeatedly that he is not putting them under this clause, and no good purpose can be served by repeating the same question.

Mr. GREEN: But because the minister says he is not going to do it does not prevent us from speaking about it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Any speech in committee must be strictly relevant to the clause under discussion. How can my hon. friend discuss the merchant marine under this clause and abide by the rules?

Mr. GREEN: We are entitled to ask that merchant seamen be included.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: But my hon. friend has asked and the minister has answered.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Veterans Affairs has made a statement, and I have a right to ask him a question on it. I asked him a question which was perfectly straightforward, which was not a trick in any sense of the word. I asked whether or not he thought the merchant seamen should get this veterans preference. He should be able to answer either yes or no to that.

Mr. MUTCH: He is not a witness.

Mr. GREEN: My hon. friend should have got up a few moments ago and said what he had to say.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member not to discuss the point further.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The matter has been referred to by the minister himself, as I understand it. As can be verified by the records, I was one of those in the committee who definitely asked that this particular problem should be considered. We were requested to delay the matter, because it would be dealt with by the Minister of Transport. The records will show that this matter was discussed in the committee on veterans affairs. I disagree with your ruling, Mr. Chairman; I say we have every right to ask whether this is or is not going to be considered.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I want to tell the hon. member for Fraser Valley again that this question has been asked and the minister has answered definitely that it is not going to be included in this bill. Furthermore, the other night the Minister of Transport gave a summary—this is on the record—of what has been done for the merchant seamen. Apart from all that, there is no place in this clause for a discussion of merchant seamen.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: With all deference to your ruling—and I shall abide by it—may I say that we were given to understand in the veterans affairs committee that the Minister of Transport would bring forth a section which would cover the members of the merchant marine in the way asked for by the hon. member.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You were given to understand no such thing by the minister.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The minister did not give us to understand that because he was not privileged to be a member of the veterans affairs committee, but we were definitely given that understanding.

Mr. BENTLEY: Do I understand that you have ruled that no hon. member has the right to argue with the minister that merchant seamen should be included in this?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: That is right.

Mr. BOUCHER: May I ask your reconsideration of the statement you made a moment ago? If your ruling is that nothing that is not in the bill can be discussed it will mean that we cannot discuss an amendment.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member knows very well that speeches in committee must be strictly relevant to the clause, and there is no provision in this clause for the merchant seamen. The question has been asked several times, and the minister has repeatedly said that he had no intention of including that in this clause. I cannot see what good purpose can be served by repeating this discussion which is out of order.

Mr. BOUCHER: As you have asked that question, I will answer it. I do not think there is any necessity to hammer at the same question, but I do not think the rules of this house are that you must stick to the positive enactment of any piece of legislation. When legislation is put before the House of Commons it is for hon. members to speak on what is in it and as to what improvements should be made. That being the case, they must go beyond the wording of the bill. I think your ruling to restrict discussion on the bill goes altogether too far.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to take exception to that ruling. I may be corrected and called to order, but my definite understanding in the veterans affairs committee was that the Minister of Transport would bring in legislation which would bring forth what we are now asking for. It was given to us as a distinct understanding and now members of the merchant marine are left out in the cold.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I deny that.

Mr. CROLL: Then they were left out in the heat.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The Minister of Veterans Affairs comes from a good province and he is generally in good humour, but the members of the veterans affairs committee had that distinct understanding. If we cannot discuss it now, when can we discuss it?

On section 6—List of competitors eligible for appointment.

Mr. HAMEL: In order to find out how this section would work, I should like to place a case before the minister. Suppose five candidates have sat for an examination. One receives the minimum marks, and he is a veteran. Another receives higher marks and he is not a veteran. Another is still more qualified, and he has no veterans preference. Who will be chosen?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): As long as the man with veterans preference gets the minimum requirements he will get the position over a man who may have got full marks but who is not a veteran.

Mr. HAMEL: The veteran will get the position, provided that the minimum marks are obtained?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is correct.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Mr. Speaker—

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Mr. Speaker—

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GOLDING: Item 583.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, before you proceed. I think we should have more respect in this house. I think the Speaker should look to see if anyone wants to speak to the motion. If the leader of the house was as keen about his duties as he is to criticize this side of the house he would see that there was a better deal for us in this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sorry if my hon. friend feels that there has been any injustice to any of his group. If I had been aware that anyone intended to speak before the Speaker left the chair I would have seen that my hon. friends were completely protected.

Mr. MacINNIS: They are not fully protected. The hon. member rose to his feet before the motion was put.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sorry; I did not see him.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I was on my feet before the Speaker put the motion and I said, "Mr. Speaker" several times and members of the house heard me.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is quite probable that we shall have supply tomorrow, and my hon. friends will have every opportunity if they so desire to debate any question they wish.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a point of order, I do not often disagree with my own party, but the hon. member was definitely on his feet and asked for a hearing before the Speaker had left the chair. Surely if parliamentary procedure is followed and if we represent the people, as I think we are supposed to represent them, the hon. member is entitled to be heard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member will certainly have an opportunity tomorrow to say whatever he wishes to say. I can assure him that if I had seen him on his feet I would have protected his right.

Mr. HACKETT: If the right hon. gentleman were to move that the committee rise and report progress that might be a way out.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is it necessary to do that?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: On a question of privilege, it will involve no more time tonight than it will take tomorrow, if expediting the business of the house is to be considered. We have no guarantee that the same thing will not be repeated tomorrow. I would therefore ask the leader of the house to move that we report progress and ask leave to sit again, so that I may say what I want to say, because it is a matter of urgency.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think my hon. friend and the committee will admit that my attitude has been very reasonable. I am sorry that I did not see my hon. friend on his feet. I assure him that he will have an opportunity to speak tomorrow and that postponing what he has to say until then will not infringe his rights in the slightest. I can assure him definitely that there was not the slightest intention, so far as the government is concerned, of depriving him of his rights.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the house appreciates the attitude which the leader of the house has taken, and I am sure the hon. member for Dauphin shares in that appreciation. I would just point out, however, that there have been occasions before when the Speaker has left the chair and a minister has got him back. In fact, a few days ago he came back and we put through another piece of legislation. So it can be understood how the hon. member for Dauphin feels.

Mr. MACKENZIE: His rights will be amply protected tomorrow.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have been bewildered in the last few weeks at this new way we have of conducting business in this house. A number of precedents are being set, amounting to a serious thing for parliament. The ordinary rules of procedure have been broken and the order of business interfered with. It is not a question of whether the minister will protect the rights of the hon. member tomorrow. We all saw the hon. member standing on his feet and calling to Mr. Speaker, but Mr. Speaker deliberately ignored him, walked from the chair and left the chamber. That is a serious matter. It is something that should be righted now if there is any way in which it can be done.

Mr. MacINNIS: We have drawn the attention of the house to the matter, and I would be very much pleased and think it would be better if we now let the matter drop.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can assure the hon. member for Dauphin that we will accommodate him in every possible way in regard to any grievance he wishes to present to the house.

Mr. BENTLEY: With that assurance, will the minister also couple the assurance that this will never happen again in the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I had no responsibility in the matter. As a matter of fact I was speaking to one of my hon. friends behind me when the motion was put and I did not see the hon. member for Dauphin on his feet at all. If I had seen him on his feet—I think I have as much respect for the rules of this house as anyone, though I sometimes break them—I certainly would have drawn attention to the fact that the hon. member had risen. But I think now, as the hon. member for Vancouver East has suggested, we had better let the matter rest until tomorrow.

Mr. BENTLEY: His Honour the Speaker is surely not unapproachable. Someone can draw to his attention what happened tonight so that he will look to right and left before he leaves the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: As leader of the house, I cannot for one second permit any reflection on the Speaker. I have the greatest personal admiration for him, for his conduct of business in this house and for his fairness to all parties. If something happened tonight, things sometimes happen quickly without anyone being responsible for it, and I am sure it was not the fault of the Speaker. I, as leader of the house, at once accept full responsibility that the hon. member for Dauphin was not seen on his feet, and I assure my hon. friend that he will have ample opportunity to speak tomorrow.

Demobilization and reconversion—
583. Departmental administration, $72,740.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this item? It comes under demobilization and reconversion. I should like to know for what purpose the money is being voted.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): It has to do with the administration arising out of demobilization. During the war we had certain administrative services in the Department of Transport having exclusively to do with war. The vote is gradually going down. It has to do with demobilizing these services.

Mr. GREEN: There is an increase this year over last. What are the services performed in this connection?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is transport control, for instance, which is being wound up; nautical services; compensation for loss of effects; joint Canada-United States defence.

Mr. GREEN: What is that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is a service we shall discuss in a moment. It was set up during the war to purchase property on behalf of the United States government. That is now being wound up. It also operated and disposed of property. This service was established in the Department of Transport for other departments.

Mr. McLURE: I wish to draw to the minister's attention that vote 583 for $72,740 comprises an item of $66,700 for temporary assistance. All through the estimates of the Department of Transport there are items for temporary assistance, totalling eight or nine million dollars. It is very hard to get a satisfactory answer from any minister to the question, what is temporary assistance?

Mr. CHEVRIER: So far as this item is concerned, there cannot be much difficulty because this was a non-continuing service and, of necessity had to be temporary. That is why it is so described in the details.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
585. Director of merchant seamen, $425,340.

Mr. GREEN: This is a vote of nearly half a million dollars. Is any provision being made for the training of merchant seamen for the future?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Provision is made for vocational training within the seamen's calling.

Mr. GREEN: I do not mean that. The Minister of Reconstruction explained very fully a few weeks ago that Canada proposed to maintain a merchant navy of considerable size. Is any plan in effect for training the personnel for that merchant marine? We had such a plan during the war and quite a few thousand men were trained for the merchant navy. Has such policy been dropped, or are we going to have any facilities for training these men for our merchant marine?

Mr. CHEVRIER: During the war we had two schools, one at Prescott for engineering and one at St. Margarets, Nova Scotia. Both were set up specifically for the training of merchant seamen during the war. These two schools have been discontinued. There are, however, a number of schools such as existed prior to the war, as for instance, the marine technical training school at Prescott; school of navigation, Vancouver; the Hopkins School of Engineering, Vancouver; government navigation school, Halifax; dominion navigation school, Yarmouth; and vocational training such as I mentioned a moment ago. At the schools men receive training for engineering and seamanship generally.

Mr. GREEN: These facilities could train only a few men.

Mr. CHEVRIER: A limited number.

Mr. GREEN: Is the government accepting any responsibility for training the personnel that will be required to man the Canadian merchant navy? In the United Kingdom I believe they have regular training schools for the merchant navy, and probably the same thing is true of the United States. It does seem reasonable that Canada should have some provisions of the same kind. We cannot continue to keep an efficient merchant marine without efficient personnel. New men will be coming in all the time. What facilities are there, if any, for giving that training?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can only repeat what I said a moment ago. During the war we had the two schools mentioned, and we have closed them down. There are no facilities for training merchant seamen now. I know that at the I.L.O. convention in Seattle a recommendation was made to the effect that certain groups of the navy should be certified. If that recommendation is approved—

Mr. GREEN: Certain groups of what?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Certain groups of the merchant seamen should be certified as cooks, able-bodied seamen and other groups such as boatswains and so forth. If that convention is ratified, then we shall have to set up schools here.

Mr. GREEN: Will the dominion accept the full responsibility for providing facilities for training?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the convention is approved I presume that will follow.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister referred to a number of schools. Are these schools carried on under the auspices of the Department of Transport?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are they private schools?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are not carried on under our auspices, but we subsidize them.

Mr. MacINNIS: They are private schools subsidized by the Department of Transport?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are provincial schools assisted and subsidized by the Department of Transport.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is meant by "provincial schools"? Does that mean schools under the provincial government?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not necessarily; it means schools within the province such as the one I referred to at Prescott, a marine technical school. I think I spoke of a school of navigation at Vancouver.

Mr. MacINNIS: Can the minister give us any idea of the number of students in these schools at the present time?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I cannot give the information now. I shall have to get it by communicating with the directors of these schools. I can get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the minister any information as to the number of seamen in Canada now unemployed, if any? I am not suggesting that there are any.

Mr. CHEVRIER: From the position as I know it, I would think there are very few because there is a great demand for seamen.

Mr. HERRIDGE: What are the duties of the director of merchant seamen?

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I be allowed to answer the previous question? I am informed that at the moment we are paying out-of-work benefits to fifty unemployed seamen.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Can the minister explain briefly the duties of the director of merchant seamen?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The director of merchant seamen had important duties during the war. He was responsible for the manning of merchant ships; he was responsible for the manning pools, the schools that were set up, the various bonuses that were paid and so on. Now that the war has come to an end, there are a number of benefits to which merchant seamen are entitled and which must be administered by the department. They are administered by the department through the director of merchant seamen. For instance, there is a war service bonus of ten per cent paid to certain groups of merchant seamen who served in dangerous waters. That bonus is paid through the office of the director. Likewise there is a special war service bonus which is also paid through him. Vocational training for merchant seamen is under his direction, and the claims for detention allowances, claims by merchant seamen who lost their effects, or by dependents of merchant seamen who lost their effects, some of which are still coming in, are under the direction of the director of merchant seamen. His duties are, I must say, diminishing considerably.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do the out-of-work benefits which the minister referred to a moment ago come under the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, it is a different thing altogether. This comes under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. MacINNIS: For persons who had war service?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is correct. They are put in the same category in so far as unemployment insurance is concerned as the members of the armed forces.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Do the provinces have a director of merchant seamen?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who is in charge of the manning pools?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They were under the direction of the director of merchant seamen during the war, but they have now been closed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They are not active now?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. GREEN: How many men are there in the merchant navy at the present time?

Mr. CHEVRIER: About fifteen thousand.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who looks after the merchant seamen in the province of British Columbia? Apparently veterans affairs have disowned them.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In so far as their employment and discharge are concerned, the shipping master at the port of Vancouver looks after them. In so far as their benefits under these various orders in council are concerned, it is the director of merchant seamen.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Apparently veterans affairs have disowned them. If they have a complaint in British Columbia, do they have to bring it to Ottawa? Is there nobody in that Pacific coast port to whom they can take their complaint?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are referred by the various seamen's organizations across Canada to the director of merchant seamen.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In other words, they have to go to their unions and the union has to take it up by indirect control with Ottawa; is that correct?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not necessarily the unions. There are many groups looking after merchant seamen who are not unionized or organized.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The federal government has no representative in the main coast port of British Columbia?

Mr. CHEVRIER: My department has many representatives on the Pacific coast, but not all of them deal with merchant seamen. They deal with various matters. A moment ago I referred to the shipping master who has to do with engaging and discharge of merchant seamen, the registration of seamen and so on. The supervisor of nautical services has these responsibilities under his control.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What I am trying to get at is this. If a merchant seaman on the Pacific coast has a complaint, veterans affairs have told me tonight that they disown him entirely; has that merchant seaman any recourse?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I have to disagree with the hon. member. The Minister of Veterans Affairs did not say that the department had disowned merchant seamen.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not agree with the minister and he does not agree with me. What recourse has a merchant seaman on the Pacific coast? Who does he approach with his complaint? Does he have to come to Ottawa?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should like to know to what my hon. friend is referring. If he will give me an example of the complaint he has in mind, perhaps I can give him a more definite answer.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Suppose a merchant seaman considers that he was unjustly treated in the merchant marine.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If he considers that he has not received a bonus or has not received the benefits to which he was entitled, what I suppose he would do would be to complain to the minister. I have received some such complaints and the Minister of Veterans Affairs has received a number of such complaints. If he is referring to matters dealing with nautical service or with registration, then I presume he would make his complaint to the shipping master in the port where he is stationed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The minister has surmised correctly what I meant, but what I wish to know is this. Is there no means on the Pacific coast of dealing with his application? Is it necessary that he should have to go through all the red tape at Ottawa in order to present his case?

Mr. CHEVRIER: He makes his complaint through his organization in the port where he resides, whether it be the west coast seamen's union or the Canadian seamen's union or the seamen's welfare society if he is in Montreal. There are various organizations in all parts of Canada, and if he has a complaint to make he can complain directly to the minister or through one of these organizations.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Montreal is a long way from Vancouver. My question is this: Have you no representative in your department in Vancouver?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have already told the hon. gentleman that there are several representatives of my department in the port of Vancouver.

Mr. GREEN: Are we clear as to who is responsible for the merchant seamen? We have had a good illustration tonight of the difficulties of getting fair treatment for merchant seamen. They are involved in the two departments of transport and veterans affairs, and I do not believe they will get justice until it is decided which department is responsible for them. The minister said on July 2, at page 5001 of Hansard:

> I wish someone would clear up in my mind and to my satisfaction whose responsibility this is.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hear, hear.

Mr. GREEN: I feel exactly like the minister. I should like to know whose responsibility this is, because the Minister of Veterans Affairs promised the other day that next year a special committee on veterans affairs would be set up again. This injustice will be brought up in that committee, certainly if I am a member of it, and I am sure that the hon. member for Fraser Valley would take the same view. There are certain injustices to be considered, such as failure to give these men pensions for disabilities, failure to provide vocational training, and failure to give the benefits of the Veterans Land Act and many other benefits. Who is to be responsible for them—transport or veterans affairs? We should like to know, because when we sit on that committee next year the whole question will be gone into thoroughly and someone will have to answer all the questions that are asked. We are not going to fall between two stools as we did last year.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I shall not be the one to answer those questions. However I will answer the first part of the question my hon. friend asks, when he wishes to know what the responsibility of this department is. In so far as the engagement and discharge of seamen, the amount of payment due, and so forth are concerned, that has been the responsibility of the Department of Transport through the shipping master in the various ports. In so far as benefits approved by the government under various orders in council are concerned, they have thus far ben under the administration of the director of merchant seamen. That far I can go, but beyond that I cannot.

Mr. GREEN: There is one item of $97,040 for vocational training, but that means only vocational training for merchant seamen who want to go to sea.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Those who do not want to go back to sea do not get such training?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are not covered by the order in council.

Mr. GREEN: Then I am correct in putting it that way.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You are correct.

Mr. GREEN: If a recommendation is made next year by the veterans affairs committee that these men should get vocational training apart from training to fit them to go to sea, or that they should get the benefit of university grants, such recommendations would have to be carried out by the Department of Transport?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not necessarily. The government would then have to decide whether the recommendations should be carried out by the veterans affairs department or the director of merchant seamen. It may be that next year the latter may not exist. I do not know.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know whether this discussion is in order, but I have listened to the hon. member for Vancouver South on several occasions making a plea for merchant seamen who were in the merchant navy during the war. I too have said a little on the subject, but I felt that, as the matter was being discussed, we could not get anywhere in a debate of this kind. My feeling is that the government must decide where the responsibility rests. They should refer it to the veterans affairs committee if they think these men have service comparable with that of men in the armed service as I believe they have. I suggest that the question should be referred to the committee on veterans affairs and have it decided once and for all, so that we can get away from this discussion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have the greatest appreciation of the hon. member for Vancouver East, but I would point out that the hon. member for Vancouver South and I were vocal on this point last year when we tried as members of the veterans affairs committee to have it decided. Every member of that committee will bear me out when I say that we were two members who were vocal on the point. We fought this matter and we are not now satisfied as to who is responsible.

Mr. HOWE: This is about the sixth debate I have heard on the question of injustice to merchant seamen. Let us analyse the question of the merchant seamen. He was a civilian doing a hard and dangerous job. He had always been a civilian free to work or to stop work. He got special bonuses for going into dangerous situations. But there were other dangerous jobs in the country. I could mention one where the percentage of loss in a civilian job was higher than it was among merchant seamen, and that is among men in commercial transport service, the operators who ferried new planes across the Atlantic.

Mr. GREEN: That is another complaint we have. Those men are not protected either.

Mr. HOWE: They were not as numerous as the merchant seamen.

Mr. GREEN: And they are not protected.

Mr. HOWE: Now here were men doing a civilian job. It is true that some of them went into dangerous waters, while others did not. I know about the work of the merchant seamen because I have suffered with them, and I know how tough it is, but I am not prepared to say that a man who did not put on a uniform, who did not sign up for a term of duty, who did not place himself in the position where he would have to go into a dangerous stiuation when he was so ordered, is in the same position as the veteran who wore the uniform. My hon. friend contends that he is. I am not even prepared to agree that the terms of reference to the veterans affairs committee extend to men who did not serve in uniform. The position of the merchant seaman has been well taken care of. He is not a man who was put out of his job when the war ended. There are more jobs for Canadian merchant seamen today than at any time during the war, and there will be more jobs five years hence, or at any rate three years hence, than there are today.

Seamanship is a trade like any other. My hon. friend might as well ask who was responsible for carpenters. The man responsible for carpenters, as far as the government is concerned, is the Minister of Labour, and the Minister of Labour is responsible for merchant seamen. The merchant seaman has a union which is well able to protect his interests, and he has the Minister of Labour to arbitrate in any differences he may have with the government.

It seems to me that we are wasting a great deal of sympathy to men well able to take care of themselves. The wages of merchant seamen have increased more as a result of the war than the wages in any other line that I know of. These men have kept all their wartime gains and bonuses and have had two or three substantial increases since the war ended. I would say that the merchant seamen of Canada are in an excellent position today and they have a future which few other tradesmen in this country can look forward to.

Mr. GREEN: I am amazed that a responsible minister of the crown would take an attitude like that.

Mr. HOWE: What is the other attitude? The poor downtrodden merchant seamen!

Mr. GREEN: Just sit still and listen.

Mr. HOWE: I have been listening for weeks.

Mr. GREEN: Right from His Majesty down, responsible leaders of the democratic nations have taken the position that the men in the merchant navy were the fourth arm of the service, and quite properly so. The minister's own leader, the Prime Minister of this country, just two or three days ago, on Dominion day, praised them and treated them as though they were members of the armed service. Now the Minister of Reconstruction stands up in this house and says they were just the same as a carpenter working on land.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He did not say any such thing.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say anything of the kind. May I ask the hon. member not to carry his prejudices so far as to put words into my mouth?

Mr. GREEN: He said that they are not entitled to any special consideration. I would point out to him the fact that there were thousands of young men, and older men too, who went into the merchant navy to do their bit in the war.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: They were not regular merchant seamen. They do not want to go back to sea now that the war is over. They went in there to do their bit. Perhaps they were not eligible physically to go into the army. They did a grand job. They suffered many casualties. I think the casualties in the Canadian merchant marine were heavier in proportion than those of all the other three arms of the service. If the minister talks for ten years, he cannot tell me that a merchant navy man who was crippled for life by falling on a ship in the blackout, say in Liverpool, is not entitled to any pension.

Mr. HOWE: I am not trying to say that.

Mr. GREEN: That is the position the Canadian merchant seaman finds himself in today. He is not covered for that. He gets pension only where he suffered by reason of direct enemy action. In the same way a young lad from Vancouver not even waiting until he is eighteen—even at sixteen and seventeen they went into the merchant navy—gets a tropical disease. His health is ruined for life, and he can get no compensation under our present law. Nobody can tell me that is fair. Nobody can tell me it is fair that a young man who served in dangerous waters with the merchant navy has to pay his way through a Canadian university when a boy who served only in Canada in the army gets his way paid. Having listened to the minister, we have probably now got the reason that it is so hard to get justice for these men. The Canadian Legion welcomes them to membership on the same basis as a member of the navy, the army or the air force. Without exception, the members of the veterans affairs committee treated them as though they were in the same category as men who served in any of the other forces.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Almost.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member for Fraser Valley will bear me out in that. There is not a member of the veterans affairs committee who will get up and deny that statement. We are trying to see that they get a fair deal. Apparently they fell between the two departments, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Department of Transport; and they are still falling between those two departments. We believe they have had a raw deal and we want to see that they get a fair deal. It does not matter what the Minister of Reconstruction says. In my opinion, he is wrong again, just as he has been wrong on many other occasions in the past few years.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend tell me what country gives the type of treatment which he proposes? Does Britain or the United States give it?

Mr. GREEN: What is that?

Mr. HOWE: What country gives to merchant seamen the same benefits as they give to their troops?

Mr. GREEN: I am not interested in what other countries do.

Mr. HOWE: No, evidently not

Mr. GREEN: We hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs—

Mr. HOWE: Everybody is wrong but the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. GREEN: Well, sometimes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Quite often.

Mr. GREEN: This is one time when we are all right except the minister of reconstruction. We hear so much in this house about the benefits for the veterans being so fine in Canada, and their being better here than they are anywhere else in the world.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: They are still not good enough. There are many things still to be remedied with regard to benefits for veterans. We cannot see why the merchant seamen should not be put in the same position. I warn the government that sooner or later it will have to be done; because if it is not forced on them by the opposition it will be forced on them from their own back benches. Sooner or later this thing must be faced. I would suggest that some thought be given to it in the interval between this session and the next one.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to say one word in reply to what the minister said. Apparently everyone except the merchant seamen got the O.B.E. or the M.B.E. All you had to do was to serve as a dollar-a-year man in Sorel or somewhere else, making a fortune, and you got the O.B.E. or something. I want to tell the minister that it is all poppycock to tell me that the salary we pay to merchant seamen is adequate compensation, and nobody knows it better than the minister; he himself was sunk in the middle of the Atlantic. The fact that we have done so much does not answer the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I am surprised, and I think some of the legionnaires will be surprised, that the members of the veterans affairs committee from the various parts of Canada have not risen in this debate and mentioned what was said in that committee. We were deliberately side-tracked.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The committee was not deliberately side-tracked because I was there every day.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, no, the minister was not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I shall not dispute my own minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member had better not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We could not get anywhere because we were told the matter was going to be raised under another branch. That is what we were told, and no member of the veterans affairs committee sitting in this house will dispute that. We were told it would be brought up under another department when we insisted that equal treatment be accorded members of the merchant marine. To tell me that they got extra pay is no answer. I want to tell the minister something in connection with a man from my own battalion. I served with a good battalion in the first great war. In that battalion there was a man named Conley. I hope he does not mind my mentioning his name. He was an Irishman who served in the 29th battalion in the first great war, was wounded and contracted tuberculosis in this war while he served in the merchant marine. He is suffering now in Tranquille and can get no proper benefits. I am told that he was getting extra pay for working down in the stokehole where he might get sunk any day. I want to tell the minister and my other military friends—and I have many of them—that it is all poppycock to talk about extra pay being paid these men for serving down in the stokehole, when they might be sunk at any moment, and to say that they are not entitled to all the benefits enjoyed by members of the force.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. member be kind enough to give me the name of that case privately because it cannot be true, and it is not true?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have given it publicly. I do not know why I should hesitate to give it privately. The name is Patrick Conley of the 29th battalion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If he has overseas service, he is getting treatment.

Mr. GREEN: There is no law to cover a case like that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, there is.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want this to be borne in mind. I should not like to see this man suffer one iota from my mentioning his name.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I ask my hon. friend if I can get the name from him privately ? If so, I will give a public answer in the house tomorrow in regard to that case to prove that what he says is not true.

Mr. MacNICOL: He gave the name publicly.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He did not.

Mr. MacNICOL: He did.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If this man suffers one iota as a result of my mentioning his name, his condition, and the way he has been treated, I shall be very sorry. And the minister tells me that they get extra pay—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I never told you that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: —in the merchant marine. I feel bitter about that merchant marine. I think they got a dirty deal.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I absolutely resent that remark. It is not true. It is a falsification of the facts. They did not get a dirty deal. They got a very generous deal in Canada.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Vancouver South or the hon. member for Vancouver East made me retract one time. I think that is hardly parliamentary.

Mr. MUTCH: I should not like this debate to conclude without saying a word; and if my intrusion is resented by the last speaker, perhaps he will realize that more than anyone else he invited it, in spite of the fact that the other day in the committee he told me I talked too much. There can be no doubt that in the veterans affairs committee of last year consideration of the claims of the merchant seamen were set aside from our deliberations because the committee understood that the whole question of merchant seamen, excluding the civil service preference which was within a different department, was being considered by the Department of Transport. We were not told that the transport department was going to provide benefits paralleling the veterans benefits, but our understanding clearly was that certain benefits were being considered for merchant seamen and that our committee, which was to deal strictly with veterans' matters, should await the decision on that legislation before entering into the discussion.

I have forgotten the date, but I believe it was about February 12 when a sub-committee of the veterans affairs committee was set up, of which I had the honour to be chairman, and we were asked to consider such benefits accruing to Canadian veterans of the last war as might be applied to those who had served in a civilian capacity during the war, and the extent to which our committee would be prepared to recommend that these veterans benefits be extended. At that time the terms of reference to the sub-committee expressly excluded from our consideration the large question of the merchant seamen, and that sub-committee did not report on merchant seamen except with respect to those benefits, limited in number and chiefly with respect to pensions and other benefits which would accrue to merchant seamen who had become pensionable through being injured in action or in evasive action, which had already been announced.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Fourteen in all.

Mr. MUTCH: I do not remember the number, but subsequently they were extended and I am told they now number fourteen. It is not correct to say, as was said in the house some time ago, that the veterans affairs committee expected that transport would deal with the question, for instance, which was up a little while ago; that is, the matter of the veterans preference. It was realized then that this would have to be part of the larger picture, on which the committee did not make a recommendation last year; and I presume, in fact I know, it will be a part of that larger picture when these things come up again. But in my view it is not fair to say, as was said here tonight, that the committee was misled, that the committee was told the merchant seamen were being taken care of and, by implication, that we in the veterans affairs committee did not need to make a recommendation. Quite frankly, I do not think a suggestion of that kind would have been swallowed by that committee or by any member of it.

The record is clear. The statement in that regard, if I remember rightly, was made by the chairman of that committee, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who told us quite frankly that the matter was under consideration by the Department of Transport as to what benefits were to be given, and by implication I think we all understood that, should our committee feel the recommendations of the Department of Transport did not adequately meet the case—and certainly many members of the committee now feel that they do not meet the case—we would have an opportunity of considering them specifically. That, I think, is an honest and fair picture of what took place then. When the committee rose after some fifty-one sittings, and I do not know how many sub-committee meetings, there was still no definite programme before the committee from the transport department with respect to merchant seamen; and I think in the mind of every member of the committee the situation with respect to merchant seamen and such war benefits as should accrue to them was and is unfinished business.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I feel I should say just one word, and I would not do so but for what was stated a moment ago. I do not want to repeat, but this matter has been gone over frequently this session; I think this is the third debate we have had thus far on merchant seamen. I am sorry it has to take place, but I feel that I should place the position of the Department of Transport clearly before the committee once more, for the third time. I, as minister, certainly had no understanding as to what was being done by the committee on veterans affairs, nor did I or my officers have any such understanding as was stated here. I have to repeat that statement in fairness to the officers of my department. I did have in mind bringing down a bill, which I brought down later, concerning compensation to merchant seamen. That was in the nature of workmen's compensation, for injuries arising out of the nature of the occupation.

Mr. GREEN: And only post-war.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, beginning in 1945. That was the only thing I had in mind. Over and above that was the question of unemployment insurance to merchant seamen. There was the matter of vocational training for merchant seamen in their own calling, and there was one other matter which slips my mind at the moment. Those were the things for which I was responsible, which I brought before this house and which received the approval of the house. Beyond that I know nothing of what took place in the veterans affairs committee. So I wonder if we could not get along with these estimates and particularly with this item. We have had three or four debates on it this session.

Mr. FERGUSON: The Minister of Veterans Affairs has said that he attended the meetings of the committee quite regularly. In order to end this debate, since we are now discussing the Department of Transport, if in his opinion the merchant seamen are not receiving fair treatment, why does he not, as Minister of Veterans Affairs, get up in the house and briefly express his opinion, and say he will try to work on his colleague the Minister of Transport to see that the merchant seamen are looked after as in his opinion, speaking as a veteran, they should be looked after.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to accept an undeserved rebuke from an hon. member who is sadly misinformed about this whole situation. I have been working on this problem for thirty long years; I have given my whole life to it. I know the problem of the merchant seamen; I know what England has done for them; I know what Canada has done for them; and if my hon. friend knew the facts he would be proud of what Canada has done for them in comparison with any other country in the world. If he is trying to dragoon or bludgeon me into any admission of failure he is talking to the wrong man, I can tell him. I will have the policy outlined as the government may determine that policy. That is the Liberal doctrine. The Tories might have one minister declare a policy for himself, but not the Liberal government; because we are a collective agency of democratic independence. Our policy is prepared by our spokesmen for the party, and by those policies we stand always.

Mr. FERGUSON: Did I understand the minister to say this is the Liberal doctrine and the Liberal way of carrying out these matters? He has not yet stated his personal opinion as a veteran, as to whether he thinks this is fair treatment. That is a precise question, which should receive a precise answer.

Mr. HOWE: What did the Tory government do for them after the first war?

Mr. MACKENZIE: They sent them to slave camps.

Mr. FERGUSON: I can speak as one who had over four years of service—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I tell my hon. friend that our record in regard to the veterans will far outshine anything the Tories ever did for them.

Mr. FERGUSON: As a veteran of four and a half years of service in the first war, I can say I believe I received everything I was entitled to. I did not fight in the hope of getting a pension. I considered it a privilege to fight for my country. I tried to do it again in this war, even going so far as to dye my hair.

Mr. WARREN: Answer the question.

Mr. FERGUSON: I will answer it. I think the Tory party gave the veterans all they were entitled to. We did not try to buy votes one way or the other.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You did not get them, anyway.

Mr. FERGUSON: Is the past going to run the country? You say the Tory party never did anything. Is that any reason why you should do nothing?

Mr. MACKENZIE: You never did anything for the merchant seamen in all your existence.

Mr. FERGUSON: You say we did nothing, and neither will you. Is that your answer?

Mr. CHURCH: We had a large number of members of the air force, the army and navy in our city during the war. This item 585 covers the director of merchant seamen. There is an item of $70,000 a year to extend for eight years, or a total of $560,000 for life-saving. Why should the city of Toronto go all over the great lakes to do the work of the Department of Transport? There are no life-saving stations on the great lakes on the Canadian side. I asked the minister on his main estimates what they proposed to do about setting up a national life-saving system on the great lakes. All the money for this purpose is spent on the gulf and on the oceans. Will the minister make a reply before the transport items are finished?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman's question is not within the scope of this item, but I shall give him the information he wants. On the main estimates he asked what life-saving equipment and appliances we had on the great lakes. There are on the great lakes between Kingston and the Canadian-United States border near Fort William, 426 light stations, fog-alarm plants and light and signal buoys and, in addition thereto, there are approximately 1,100 unlighted buoys, beacons, et cetera. Also, there are seven ship to shore radio telegraph and telephone stations to provide constant 24-hour communication with ships on all the great lakes. These stations regularly broadcast weather forecasts, storm warnings and notices of dangers to navigation. There are also fifteen automatic radio beacons from which ships take their bearings by radio. Over and above that, a number of ships are equipped with special appliances such as radar equipment, which is of great assistance in combating weather conditions.

Mr. CHURCH: When a ship on the Canadian side is in trouble it must sound its siren and wait for the United States life-saving station to send out help.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
Marine service—
587. Nautical service, $106,450.

Mr. GREEN: Part of this vote is to cover the repatriation of Canadian merchant seamen prisoners of war. Some of these merchant seamen who were prisoners have been brought back by the Canadian government and charged their fares.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed by the director who is here that there are none. If my hon. friend has any cases I wish he would give them to me.

Mr. GREEN: I have a case right here which I will place before the minister privately, in which a man was charged $423.38 repatriation expenses.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. member will give me the particulars I will look into the matter. I am sure there must be some error.

Mr. GREEN: All these men were brought back by the government?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: And they are not supposed to be charged for their repatriation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not if they come under the description of a merchant seaman prisoner of war.

Mr. GREEN: How wide is that description?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It covers the personnel of Canadian ships and Canadian seamen on other ships as well.

Mr. GREEN: Would it apply to a Canadian who served on an allied ship?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. If the hon. member will send over the case I shall be glad to look into it.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
Railway and steamship service—
590. Steep Rock mines—construction, $50,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: How much has been paid under this item altogether?

Mr. CHEVRIER: $3,000,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Can the minister give the same information for the next item?

Mr. CHEVRIER: $453,153.58.

Mr. MacNICOL: On my return from Steep Rock, I was informed that they were held up because of a lack of cars, and I should like to know if this company is now able to get all the cars it requires to send out its ore?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are not able to get all the cars they require, but they are in a better position than they have been at any time because of the cars they have on lease and the new cars that are being purchased by the Canadian National Railways.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
Government employees' compensation—
592. Administration, $24,000.

Mr. JAQUES: I want to bring to the minister's notice the unsatisfactory train service on the Canadian National Railways between Calgary and Edmonton. I had occasion to bring this to his notice last session and I believe it was referred to the railway board. At that time I compared the service on the Canadian National with that on the Canadian Pacific. On the Canadian Pacific they have three trains each way each day and, besides, there is a paved highway and a good bus service. On the Canadian National there is one train south one day and then the train goes north the next, so that they get a train every other day. There is no paved highway and no bus service. My constituents feel that they are entitled to at least one train a day in each direction, which is what they used to have before the war. This was discontinued, and they feel there should be at least one train a day each way. I might give an instance. If a person wanted to go to Edmonton for some function on Saturday evening he would have to start on Thursday afternoon and he could not get back to Mirror until Monday afternoon. I trust that the minister will take that into consideration.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. If I might take one moment to reply to my hon. friend, it is true, as he says, that the service on the Canadian Pacific is excellent and that there is a difference between their service and that on the Canadian National, the reason being that the Canadian National railway between Edmonton and Calgary has a mileage of 232, as opposed to 194 for the Canadian Pacific, and the population along the Canadian National line is much smaller than along the Canadian Pacific and the traffic much lighter. Those are the reasons for the difference in service. I drew the situation to which the hon. member refers to the attention of the management of the Canadian National railways. I wrote him at some length on it, but in view of my hon. friend's added representations I shall be glad to take the matter up with them again.

Mr. JAQUES: We do not expect a service similar to that on the Canadian Pacific railway because they have three trains each way each day. All we ask is one train each way each day.

Item agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, July 8, 1947

The house met at two o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Tenth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

Third report of standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.—Mr. Clark.

Second and third reports of the standing committee on industrial relations.—Mr. Croll.

RADIO BROADCASTING—THIRD AND FINAL REPORT

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) presented the third and final report of standing committee on radio broadcasting.

Mr. FLEMING: On a question of privilege, I should like to say that this is a majority report. No Progressive Conservative member of the committee voted for it.

Mr. REID: I did not vote for it.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the order for first reading of senate bills:

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Croll, for Mr. Maybank, moves, seconded by Mr. Winkler, that bills Nos. 432 to 442 inclusive, divorce bills, be now read the first time.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I wish to take exception to these bills being read the first time until we have a copy of the evidence. I have not a copy of the evidence of Bill No. 432.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the first reading of senate bills is not debatable.

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 432, for the relief of Pierre-Ben-Danais Warren.—Mr. Maybank.

83166—332

Bill No. 433, for the relief of Ethel Florence Rhodes Pompetti, otherwise known as Ethel Florence Crowdy Pompetti.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 434, for the relief of Elisa Jamoul Hull.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 435, for the relief of Ernest Stanley Rundell.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 436, for the relief of Thelma Lillian Dalton Hilger, otherwise known as Thelma Lillian Dalton Goernert.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 437, for the relief of Mary Alice Berrigan Hamelin.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 438, for the relief of Dorothy Mary Boyce Jackson.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 439, for the relief of Edith Oberfeld Mintz.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 440, for the relief of Roger Lebeau. —Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 441, for the relief of Sheila Marcus Issenman.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 442, for the relief of Zenobia Perrow Broadbent Emond.—Mr. Maybank.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Croll, for Mr. Maybank, moves, seconded by Mr. Winkler, that the said bills be now read the second time.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, I do not think any member of the House of Commons should be asked to pass any bills about which he knows nothing at all. As I see it, we should have the evidence before we pass the bills. I object to Bill No. 432 being passed until we have a copy of the evidence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No. On a point of order, I am entitled to that information. A bill cannot be passed when the evidence is not submitted.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the bills will be distributed today. We have had first reading this afternoon. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a point of order, a bill cannot be submitted to the house for second reading unless the evidence has been made available.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there is any objection, next sitting of the house.

NATIONAL PARKS

ADJUSTMENT OF BOUNDARIES, ADDITIONS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the third reading of Bill No. 365, respecting certain national parks and to amend the National Parks Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING VETERANS' PREFERENCE, INCREASED SALARIES FOR COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 413, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Last night on second reading and in the committee stage there was considerable debate on this bill because of the failure to include in the definition of veterans for civil service preference members discharged from the merchant navy of Canada. Quite a few hon. members have different interpretations of the understanding that members of the veterans affairs committee of last year and the year before had with regard to merchant seamen rehabilitation. In the main I agree that most of us on that committee believed that we were to have something better than we have had. As I pointed out last night, it does not cost the government any more to hire merchant seamen than it does to hire veterans of any other service. Hon. members on all sides have supported the view that merchant seamen should be given the preference. Because the veterans committee was composed of hon. members of all political parties, and because I should like to see veterans affairs kept as free from partisan politics as possible, I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), who has given yeoman service to the cause of the seamen, that the bill be not now read a third time. I do not want to detract from the very valuable work that is being done by other hon. members, but because the hon. member for Vancouver South was in the forefront of the battle last night he is going to second my motion. I move:

That Bill No. 413 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions to amend the said bill so as to extend to merchant seamen the provisions accorded to veterans in the said bill.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I am very glad to have the privilege of seconding this amendment, and I trust that the Prime Minister will allow the government supporters to treat it as non-controversial and let us have a test of the feeling of the house on the question. I am quite sure that the members of the veterans affairs committee which sat last year were unanimous in the view that the merchant seamen should be treated as the fourth arm of the forces, and I do not think any of them would object to these merchant seamen being given the veterans preference under the Civil Service Act.

After all, Mr. Speaker, this veterans preference is based on the principle of service to the nation. That is the reason the preference was given after the first war to men who had served in the Canadian forces, and is also the reason it has been extended to men who served in the forces in the second war. I submit that the merchant seamen should be considered, as indeed they are considered, as having constituted the fourth arm of the Canadian service.

I would refer the Prime Minister to the speech from the throne in the session of 1945, dated September 6, which, as members will see, was only about three short weeks after the fighting had stopped. In that speech from the throne we find this expression:

Our country will ever remember with pride the heroic exploits of Canada's fighting men and merchant seamen.

Just a week ago today, on the first of July, the right hon. the Prime Minister made a statement which was really very much to the same effect. Speaking on Dominion day, he said, as reported at page 4888 of Hansard:

We look back with tremendous pride on the part which our defence forces were able to take, along with those of allied and associated forces; the contributions made by our army, our navy, our air force and the merchant marine; . . .

There you have the picture. The Prime Minister himself treated these men as having been one of the arms of the service, and I repeat that they should be given the veterans preference under the Civil Service Act. I would appeal for support for this amendment from the Prime Minister and his cabinet, and also from the private members of the government party.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): This subject of the veterans preference is one that received very careful consideration last year by the veterans affairs committee. I do not take second place to anyone in my admiration of the merchant marine and the members thereof, but I do feel that there is a difference in service as between the merchant marine and those who served in the armed forces overseas and are now entitled to the veterans preference in the civil service.

Various other benefits have been provided for members of the merchant marine, and I would refer to a letter that was received by all members of parliament from the merchant marine rehabilitation society, head office, Vancouver, British Columbia, dated April 22, 1947. The letter was sent out by A. J. Heide, secretary treasurer, addressed to the Department of Transport, in which he states:

In answer to your request, in the course of our conversation last Saturday, for specific benefits this society believes the men who served in Canada's merchant marine during the war years are entitled to, we submit the following three as the most urgent.

Then he sets out the three as follows: first, medical and dental care; second, educational and vocational training; third, disability grants.

I submit, sir, that the merchant marine do not consider that the veterans preference is one of the benefits in which they are particularly interested or to which they are particularly entitled. I would also refer to the resolution passed by the army, navy and air force veterans of Canada, in which they state:

Therefore be it resolved that the dominion government be requested to maintain this preference as it now stands in the statute of this dominion.

I want to point out that consideration has been given to extending or modifying the veterans preference, but it has been considered that if the veterans preference is to mean anything it should not be extended to such a wide field that those who served overseas would not secure any particular advantage. For that reason the veterans preference has not been extended to those who served in the armed forces in Canada, and I can see that if we started extending it there are other groups that could come in, particularly for example those members of the Royal Canadian Air Force who were in Canada in the air acting as instructors in very dangerous work. They would have a claim and could say that they had also risked their lives.

The preference could be extended widely if we opened the door. I feel we have adopted the right policy in restricting it to a limited number and I do not think that we should open the door any wider. I would also point out that in the recommendations of the veterans affairs committee last year the committee recommended in its final report:

Various proposals have been examined for extension or curtailment of the veterans preference for employment in the civil service. Your committee does not recommend any change in the existing legislation at the present time.

In view of that recommendation the present bill has been submitted, and until a further recommendation is received from a similar committee I think that the veterans preference, as included in the act, should stand.

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): As one who was closely identified with the activities of the veterans affairs committee a year ago I want to endorse entirely the remarks of my colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Gibson). If anyone should be inclined kindly to the cause of merchant seamen it should be I, because my father was one in the service of the merchant navy in Scotland. But I wish the committee would know the facts as the facts were adduced before us last year.

Last night my hon. friend the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) made a statement in this house which I resented and still resent. He said that these men were left out in the cold. Let me tell the house what was done for these merchant seamen by the people of Canada. The monthly remuneration was increased to a basic rate of $89.93, to which was added a war risk bonus of $44.50, making a total of $134.43 per month. Was that leaving them out in the cold?

Income tax was paid on the basic rate only, war bonus and subsistence being exempted. A special bonus was paid on gross earnings, for a minimum period of six months' service in dangerous waters prior to April 1, 1944, provided a seaman signed an agreement to serve for two years or the duration of the war, or alternatively, signed an agreement to join a reserve of seamen if called upon. Merchant seamen who have received a special bonus for war service prior to April 1, 1944, are eligible to participate in the Veterans Insurance Act. Was that leaving them out in the cold?

A war service bonus of ten per cent on gross earnings was paid for service subsequent to April 1, 1944, until the end of the war, for seamen who served on agreement or were listed as permanent employees of a Canadian company. Was that leaving them out in the cold?

Leave on pay at the end of each year on agreement was allowed, together with round trip rail transportation from a manning pool to the seaman's home, at the low cost of one-third of the one way fare. Was that leaving him out in the cold?

Merchant seamen on completion of service were entitled to receive railway transportation from the port of discharge to their place of permanent domicile. During service on a manning pool two year agreement a merchant seaman, if incapacitated for sickness or injury, received basic pay for a maximum period of twelve weeks. Was that leaving him out in the cold?

Merchant seamen who qualified for the special bonus are entitled to vocational training to assist them to advance in their profession at sea. Is that leaving them out in the cold?

Mr. GREEN: But not general vocational training.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Within their own profession. Merchant seamen who left civil employment to serve at sea during the war are entitled to the benefits of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act. Is that leaving them out in the cold?

An hon. MEMBER: That did not give them much.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Merchant seamen entering insurable employment are entitled, after fifteen weeks in such employment, to have their service at sea during the war counted under the Unemployment Insurance Act as if that time had been spent in the insured employment subsequently entered upon. Is that leaving them out in the cold?

Thus the extent of unemployment insurance benefit is calculated on the fifteen weeks plus the time spent at sea for which a merchant seaman has received a war service bonus. Is that leaving him out in the cold? Any unemployment occurring prior to the end of the fifteen weeks is covered by a special out-of-work allowance, provided the merchant seaman had received a war service bonus and was in good standing with the manning pool on August 1, 1946. Is that leaving him out in the cold?

Pension for disability incurred from enemy action or counter-action is payable to merchant seamen serving on any Canadian ship, and to Canadian merchant seamen serving on ships of allied nations employed in service essential to the prosecution of the war. Is that leaving them out in the cold?

A disability pensioner is entitled to free medical care, with allowances during hospitalization for his pension disability, and is eligible to participate in the benefits of the Veterans Land Act and the Veterans Insurance Act.

Mr. GREEN: Only if a pensioner.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said so.

Mr. GREEN: There are very few of those.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I said "a disability pensioner". My hon. friend did not hear me aright.

Mr. GREEN: There are only about thirty pensioners.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If debarred by their disability from following their former profession of seamen, they may be given vocational training under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act for any other occupation.

In case of death from similar causes, widows and dependent children are pensionable. A Canadian merchant seaman in receipt of a pension from an allied nation is entitled, during residence in Canada, to have his pension raised to the Canadian scale.

Merchant seamen detained by the enemy received a detention allowance equivalent to their basic pay and war risk bonus, and also the special bonus. Dependents of merchant seamen who were detained by the enemy received appropriate portions of this detention allowance for their maintenance, the balance being paid to the seaman on his return to Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: And workmen's compensation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And there was a compensation measure introduced by my colleague in addition to that.

Mr. GREEN: That was post-war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would the hon. member like to compare what Canada is doing with what is being done in England?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKAY: This is Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, this is Canada; and we are far ahead of any other country in the world in what we have done for our merchant seamen. I do not take second place to anyone in this house in my sympathetic friendliness to the merchant seamen of Canada. I think they are a glorious band of men.

Mr. GREEN: Then why not give them the preference?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Because there is an essential and fundamental difference between the terms of service of the merchant seamen and those of the members of the armed forces. Listen to this question which was asked in the English parliament. This was on February 27, 1945. Sir W. Wayland asked the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of War Transport whether His Majesty's government propose to accord to the personnel of the merchant navy any recognition of its splendid services on the same lines as the services gratuities. Mr. Noel-Baker, who is a thorough democrat if there is one in the empire, made this reply:

> His Majesty's government have frequently expressed their deep appreciation of the magnificent services rendered to the nation by the officers and men of the merchant navy. But they must take into consideration the fact that these officers and men have been employed throughout the war at industrial rates of wages, negotiated and settled by the national maritime board. In view of this fact, the government consider that they would not be justified in granting to the men of the merchant navy the gratuities which the services will receive.

In conclusion, sir, may I say this. This government is most kindly disposed to the case of the merchant seamen. I am sure that I have the support of my Prime Minister in saying this, that the government will be glad to give further consideration to this entire problem. But in the light of what has been done in these fourteen benefits already extended to them, when I hear anybody in this house say, as happened last night, that they were left out in the cold, I get a little bit sore, as I did. I can assure the house that the government is not indifferent. The government will not be forgetful. The government will be generously disposed towards every possible further consideration of this problem. At the present time, however, I think the bill as it is should be passed by this house.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): May I say a word, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MacNICOL: Get in out of the cold.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Apparently the hon. member for Fraser Valley has been left out in the cold. I am sorry I have not the poetry of expression enjoyed by my colleague, the minister from British Columbia.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member is better off without it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: But I can still appreciate, as I am sure he can, that patriotism and service to one's country cannot be judged in dollars and cents. When I hear my good friend, with all his eloquence, describing the men as not being left out in the cold, I wonder how the minister would feel if he were in the stokehole, with no chance of escape, and the boat was sunk in the middle of the Atlantic ocean. Would he be left out in the cold?

An hon. MEMBER: He would be all wet.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am proud of what Canada has done for her merchant seamen, and of what Canada has done for everyone who served his country. But no minister or any one else can tell me that service to country, or the patriotic feeling which impels it, can be measured in dollars and cents. I do not know anything about the merchant marine. I never had any experience in serving in the navy. But I know something about soldiering; and I want to tell my friends that my experience in soldiering was in the front line. I do know something of the feeling of a man who is staking his all, not for $1.10 a day as in the first great war or $1.50 a day as in the last war, but because he believes in something; because he believes in Canada, because he believes in democracy, because he believes in all the things that are right and just. When these men went out there to serve in the cold Atlantic they took all the chances in the world. I want to point out that in our own literature we boast of the fact that the largest convoy to cross the Atlantic in the last war consisted of 167 ships from Canada. Under the leadership of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) we produced the sinews of war. The people at home did their part, but they did it at good wages. I saw pictures of that convoy published by a board; I think it was called the information board, or the national film board, or something. Anyway I know it cost a lot of money. Those people stayed at home; certainly they did not get cold. This picture showed all those boats deploying for the trip across the ocean, guarded by destroyers; and on that trip they were at all times subject to attack by submarines. Neither the minister nor anyone else can tell me you can judge what these men did for their country in dollars and cents, even at $134 a month, with income tax paid only at the basic rate. I don't care what the income tax was paid on. We in this House of Commons paid income tax, but we sat here in security because the merchant seamen were able to get the sinews of war over to Britain to enable the Canadian army to carry on. The minister mentions people being left out in the cold. I want to tell you that those who should feel left out in the cold, those who should feel cold in their hearts, are the people who sat in security in this house while the merchant seamen were crossing the Atlantic.

I admit that Canada has done much. I grant all the points mentioned by the minister. But I do not take into consideration what any other country has done. I am a Canadian and proud of it. I was not born in Canada but in the United States, and came to Canada when I was eight months old. My father was born in Canada and all my people were Canadians. I am proud of Canada, proud of her record in the war, proud of what she has done for her veterans and for her merchant seamen. But I tell the minister that I think these people are being left out in the cold as long as there is anything more Canada can do to improve the lot of the merchant seamen.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, this question of the merchant marine has been discussed on many occasions since the opening of parliament and, as has been pointed out, it was the subject of some discussion in the veterans affairs committee last year. The point I think we must consider is that the merchant seamen have been placed in the same category as soldiers, sailors and airmen as far as fighting was concerned. Only the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) joined these four services together, indicating that in his mind he considered that these men should be placed on a par with those in the other branches of the service. It was for this reason that last year the veterans affairs committee felt these men should receive the same consideration. I do not think a member of the veterans affairs committee had any other opinion; and I am satisfied that the feeling we have seen manifested in this house on this and other occasions during the present session arises from the belief that those who gave service to their country equal to that given by men in the other branches which have been mentioned have not been shown the same consideration.

I think that is the kernel of this whole matter. Possibly the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) does not consider that these men are wards of his department. They should have been; but he says they have received favourable consideration. There is no doubt that some consideration has been given them, but they have not received the benefits the other branches of the service have been given. The minister spoke of education. A few merchant seamen are being given vocational training so they may carry on in the merchant marine; but many of them do not wish to continue in the merchant marine. These young men who joined during the war did so for patriotic reasons. Today they wish to attend universities, to become doctors, lawyers and so on, and take their place in this country, just as the airmen, the soldiers and sailors are doing. That is the point. Why, I have letters from young men at different colleges throughout Canada. These young merchant seamen sit down beside young men who served in other branches of the forces. These other young men are getting their $60 a month; the merchant seamen are getting nothing. The minister asks who is left out in the cold. I say the young merchant seaman is being left out; he is not being paid his $60 a month while thousands of men who did not leave Canada are receiving that amount while going to college. These young merchant seamen who were in the battle of the Atlantic, who were convoying ships in all kinds of weather, who were perhaps torpedoed, receive absolutely nothing. To my mind that is rank discrimination. The minister speaks of dental care. I am given to understand that the only dental care merchant seamen receive is the extraction of teeth. That is not dental care. There were older men in the merchant marine, who received very little medical attention. Today these men would like the opportunity to come under the Veterans Land Act. As the minister knows, only those merchant seamen receiving pensions are today eligible for the benefits of the Veterans Land Act, though I think all merchant seamen are entitled to it. Then the minister spoke of the bonus. As we know, a ten per cent bonus was given to members of the merchant marine, but I would point out that the bonus was not given to men who served on other than Canadian ships, and I believe almost fifty per cent of our merchant seamen served on the ships of other countries. To my mind this is also a grave injustice.

A few moments ago the Secretary of State (Mr. Gibson) said the government did not want to extend the civil service preference to these other branches, that to do so would make it too limited. That is not a very logical argument. I would point out to the minister one way in which that preference could be extended to merchant seamen, if no other way can be found to make room for them. Since the beginning of this session we have been pressing that crown companies, for instance, should come under the civil service commission. If the benefits and privileges of the preference were extended to crown companies I am satisfied that ample provision would be made for any men who might be taken from the merchant marine.

I think enough has been said on this matter to convince the government, as I am sure the people of Canada are convinced, that these men have not received the justice to which they are entitled. Last evening the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) spoke about the consideration of this matter by the veterans affairs committee. There was a complete misunderstanding in that committee from start to finish. Not until the last few days did the members realize that this matter was not receiving the attention of the Department of Transport, and that something more should be done. It was then too late for the members of the veterans committee to give it the attention it should have received.

I could go on and mention many other matters, but I do not think it is necessary to do so. These men are not receiving the same privileges as the men who served in other branches of the service. They have been mentioned in this house by the Prime Minister, and they were considered as rendering equal service by General LaFleche when they were asked to join up. The Canadian Legion has taken them in as comrades in their organization. They are recognized everywhere as equal to those who served in other branches of the services. The sacrifices of these men were as great as, if not greater than, the sacrifices of those who served in other branches. There were more casualties in the merchant marine than in any other branch of our service. If blood be the price of service, they certainly have done their duty. I think we should give serious consideration to this matter, and this bill affords us an opportunity of giving these men at least some measure of justice until something can be done later on.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group are of the opinion that the men of the merchant marine are entitled to the same benefits as the men of the armed services. To my mind it has always been incredible that men who served on oil tankers and faced such tremendous hazards should be denied benefits given to men who served in the armed forces in bomb-proof jobs. I recall that when this matter was brought up from time to time in the veterans committee the majority of the members were of the opinion that greater benefits should be given these men.

When we were discussing the Veterans' Land Act we requested that merchant seamen be included in its provisions, and at that time the minister said that he did not think it would be wise to include them because their services would be required on ships after the war. We know now that many men for one reason or another have had to leave the merchant marine, and surely those men should be entitled to full benefits under the Veterans' Land Act rather than having those benefits confined to those who receive pensions. For these reasons we in this group will support the motion before the house to refer the bill back to committee with instructions to amend it so as to extend to merchant seamen the benefits extended by the bill to veterans.

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) does not involve any expenditure of money by the government; it merely gives to the members of the merchant marine the same right to apply for positions in the civil service as is now accorded to veterans of the three armed services.

It can be stated with a great degree of truth that the men who served in the merchant navy went through experiences equally as difficult and dangerous as those faced by any of the other services. It is true that the only men who faced experiences more difficult were those who served in the air crews of the allied forces. It must be remembered that the men who served on merchant ships had little protection during the early days of the war, particularly in 1941 and 1942, when escort vessels were few in number. At this period merchant ships went down by the dozen in the north Atlantic, and the casualties were extremely high. As I say, the protection provided by the allied powers was meagre indeed. In answering some questions which had been asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) the minister stated, as recorded on page 1651 of Hansard:

> The monthly remuneration of able seamen was increased to a basic rate of $89.93, to which was added a war risk bonus of $44.50, making a total of $134.43 per month.

But no mention is made of the fact that the war risk bonus was paid only while the ship was at sea. It is impossible for a ship to operate any length of time without going into port for repairs or to load or unload a cargo. Thus a ship would be actually at sea for probably not more than nine months in the year, so there would be three months during which the war risk bonus would not be paid. That would bring down considerably the monthly remuneration when averaged over the year. It should also be remembered that the merchant seaman had to buy his own wearing apparel, which meant a considerable reduction in his monthly pay.

A little further on the minister said:

> Pension for disability incurred from enemy action or counter-action is payable to merchant seamen—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am not sure whether he is referring to a previous debate in this session. If he is, he is out of order.

Mr. IRVINE: He is following the argument of the minister.

Mr. MOORE: Those were answers to questions which had been on the order paper.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand the hon. member is referring, not to a debate but to answers to questions on the order paper.

Mr. MOORE: On April 16 I asked how many men who had served in Canada with the merchant marine during the war were in receipt of disability pensions. The answer I got was that there were 22 receiving such payments, together with ten Canadians who had served on ships not under Canadian registry. That makes a total of 33 men who served in the Canadian merchant marine or on ships of the allied nations who are receiving disability pension. That is not a very large number when we remember that more than 3,000 Canadians serving on our merchant ships were lost during the war. I have not the total number of those who served during the war years, but the number must be great. When these things are taken into consideration it will be recognized by all members of the house that something more should be done for these men who served so well during the war years.

I do not think it need be mentioned again that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) have given many indications of their understanding of the status of merchant seamen as compared with other war veterans. It was a mistake right from the start that these men were not considered to be on the same basis as others who served in the three armed services. I urge upon the minister that immediate steps be taken to give veterans of the merchant marine the same rights when applying for civil service positions as are accorded to members of the other armed forces.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the minister charged with the responsibility of administering the branch of the director of merchant seamen I think it is fitting that I should say a word in this debate. I am pleased to note the difference of attitude in the debate on this subject today from that last evening and in previous debates. The attitude today is to the effect that the men of the merchant navy are not entitled to the same benefits as the members of the armed forces.

Mr. GREEN: I do not know where the minister got that idea.

Mr. BROOKS: I would like to correct the minister. I stated definitely that I thought they were entitled to the same benefits.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am quoting the words of certain hon. members in this debate. I have them down before me now. One said: The men of the merchant navy are entitled to the same benefits as those of the armed forces. That is the whole problem we are faced with, whether or not they are so entitled. That is an entirely different attitude from the one that was taken last night which was, first of all, that the men of the merchant navy were left entirely out in the cold, and secondly, on a previous occasion the attitude of one hon. member on the other side of the house who said that Canada had treated her merchant navy shamefully. My colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) dealt with that point, as I did myself on another occasion, and placed on the record enough evidence to establish I think to the satisfaction of the house that those charges are not well founded and are far removed from the truth.

The point is this, that the men of the merchant navy, rightly or wrongly, were not treated as being entitled to the same benefits as the members of the armed forces. I am not going to debate whether or not that should have been done at the time. I am simply making the statement that faced with the position that they were not considered as veterans in the same light as were members of the armed forces, the government had to deal with the problem accordingly. And so what happened was this. The government gave consideration to a number of recommendations that were made by the veterans affairs committee, by the director of merchant seamen and by others, granted some of those recommendations and refused others.

The members who have spoken thus far feel that we have not done enough. That may be so. But I am still of the opinion, and I do not think there can be any successful contradiction of this, that Canada has done for her merchant seamen far more than any other country has. It has certainly done more for them than the United Kingdom because in that country neither of the two bonuses that Canada gave were given to their merchant seamen—the special bonus of ten per cent granted by Canada on certain earnings of merchant seamen who served for six months in dangerous waters, and the war service bonus on gross earnings for the year. Neither of these was granted by the United Kingdom. My colleague has given the reason why that was done in the United Kingdom. It was because there the merchant seamen were considered as civilians and were not placed in the same category as members of the armed forces and were dealt with accordingly. We followed the same practice in this country. But notwithstanding that we granted benefits to men of the merchant navy which they did not receive either in the United Kingdom or in the United States.

One hon. gentleman went on to say something about the number of those who had received pensions. I placed figures on the record the other day showing that 6,752 merchant seamen had received the ten per cent war service bonus at a cost of $1,500,000, and 4,700 merchant seamen had received the special war service bonus at a cost of $1,300,000 which together with other benefits ran the total to something close to $5,000,000. The total expenditure made by Canada on behalf of merchant seamen during the war and since ran over $14,000,000. In the face of that I do not think it can be said that nothing was done by Canada for her merchant navy.

I want to conclude with this, and I think it is significant. In 1945 the estimates of the director of merchant seamen were brought down in the house and very little, if anything, was said about the treatment given to the men of the merchant navy. In 1946 again the same thing happened. Very little was said about the ill treatment that parliament or the government was giving to the men of the merchant navy.

Mr. BROOKS: In 1945 the veterans affairs committee was sitting and it was felt that these men would be considered.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Answering my hon. friend I will quote the conclusion of the report of the veterans affairs committee at page vii. Let my hon. friend listen to this:

> Various proposals have been examined for extension or curtailment of the veterans preference for employment in the civil service. Your committee does not recommend any change in the existing legislation at the present time.

Mr. BROOKS: At the present time.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That was in 1946, and at that time that was the conclusion of the committee.

Mr. GREEN: They did not deal with the merchant seamen in that at all.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In 1946 the Minister of Transport brought before the house an act establishing compensation for merchant seamen. Was there any discussion on that bill concerning additional benefits for merchant seamen? There was a discussion as to extending workmen's compensation to the merchant seamen, I grant you, but there was no discussion such as we heard in the house last night and again today concerning extensions. What has brought this on? There is an organized campaign by a certain group in favour of additional benefits. I have no quarrel with that. They are entitled to make all the representations they want provided they present the facts accurately. Unfortunately the facts have not been presented accurately, and until recently the story had not been told of the benefits Canada had given to her merchant seamen. I say that now in the dying days of the session there is an organized attempt to extend benefits and to allege that absolutely nothing or very little has been done for the men of the merchant navy.

Mr. GREEN: You had us ruled out of order months ago.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Since 1946 over and above what was mentioned by the Minister of Veterans Affairs these additional benefits were granted: unemployment insurance, out-of-work benefits, vocational training in their calling, and the act granting workmen's compensation. I think this country has done pretty well in assisting these men. And now a motion is made, that this bill be sent back to the committee, with certain instructions. In the face of the benefits granted to the merchant seamen I do not think it can be said that Canada has treated her men of the merchant navy shamefully or has left them out in the cold. I only wish that other countries had done as much for men of the merchant navy as the Dominion of Canada has done. In view of that I submit the house should reject the amendment and adopt the motion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have hesitated to say anything about this amendment up to this moment, believing it would be to the advantage of the house to hear the arguments which might be presented from both sides as to giving additional consideration to the position of merchant seamen at this time. I have, in listening, been impressed by remarks made by two hon. members which would indicate that, in their minds at least, there may be some doubt whether this amendment is in order. I refer, first, to the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore), who at the time he was speaking said there was nothing in the amendment which would involve any additional imposition of taxes. In that, I disagree with him entirely. It is not to be expected that we are going to be able to assist in a substantial way the merchant seamen without an additional outlay of public money. I would point out to hon. members that the bill it is now sought to amend was introduced by a resolution because it involved an expenditure of public money. It has passed the second reading and committee of the whole. The principle of reference to the armed forces has been adopted. If we are to deal with merchant seamen at this time, I submit that will require, in the first instance, a resolution, and a recommendation from the crown, and, later, a bill based on the resolution. That is the point which I would raise at once. The amendment is not in order because it does involve a contingent additional impost on the public which was not contemplated when the crown recommended that only certain expenditures be made under the bill to amend the Civil Service Act.

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) was the other hon. member whom I had in mind. I sympathize very strongly with many of the arguments he put forward, but he made one statement which, at the time he made it, I thought was incorrect. He said, we can do so and so in this bill. He will remember saying that we could amend this bill so as to assist the merchant seamen.

Mr. BROOKS: I did not intend that, if I said it. What I meant was that we could assist them by extending the civil service preference, which, to my mind, would not increase the expenditures in any way. It would have to be done in other ways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point is that we have a certain bill before us at the present time. My hon. friend admits the truth of what I am saying, that we have a bill before us which is before the house for third reading. That bill has gone through the committee stage. The committee had power to do certain things under the general powers of the committee of the whole. It did not exercise those powers to the extent that some hon. members at this moment would like to have them exercised. I submit that the bill cannot be dealt with as suggested. The amendment is to the effect that the bill be referred back to the committee with certain instructions. I contend that that is out of order, and I shall give my hon. friend the reasons for so contending. I would quote first of all Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, 1943, citation 407:

> An instruction is a motion empowering a committee to do something which it could not otherwise do, or to direct it to do something which it might otherwise not do. It directs the order and course of the committee's proceedings and extends or restricts the order of reference according to the discretion of the house. If the subject-matter of an instruction is within the scope of the question referred to the committee then such instruction is useless and irregular. Committees, in case of doubt, may ask instructions from the house as to the course they should take with reference to the matters under their consideration.

Surely that is as clear as language can make it that when the bill was in committee of the whole the committee had full powers to do what the instruction purports to ask. The committee would be instructed at this stage to do something which it has already considered, and had power to do at the time. May I—

Mr. BENTLEY: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment, please; I should like to complete the citation. I now turn to Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure at page 513:

> Considerable misapprehension appears to exist as to the meaning of an instruction. An instruction is given to a committee to confer on it that power which, without such instruction, it would not have. If the subject-matter of an instruction is relevant to the subject-matter and within the scope and title of a bill, then such instruction is irregular since the committee had the power to make the required amendment.

I need not cite the cases that are set forth in Bourinot. It is perfectly obvious that the facts are as I have stated them. But let me say this, listening to the hon. members presenting the arguments which they have, and knowing the point of view from which this matter was considered by the government, I would say that it would be a misfortune if we were in any way to divide on this question at this time, and that the proper way to proceed would be to have the position of the merchant seamen further considered at another session of parliament. I will undertake to say that I would advocate that that course should be taken before a special committee in the light of what has been said here this afternoon. But I do say that we would only be prejudicing the case of the merchant seamen were we to seek to amend a measure in a manner which is contrary to the rules of the house. There is more that I might add, but I think what I have said is sufficient to cover the point at issue.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising now to deal with the merits of this amendment. If I were I would argue in support of it. I am rising only to deal briefly with the point raised by the Prime Minister, namely, that this amendment is out of order. I will deal with only one feature of it. I think every hon. member recognizes that if a private member brings forward a proposal which would increase the tax burden on the people or lessen the tax revenue of the government it would be out of order. As I understand this amendment, it proposes not a greater expenditure by the government on the merchant seamen but only that they be given preference in appointments to the civil service. If that is correct, it means no additional expenditure by the government of Canada, and from that point of view I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment is in order.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Would it not be possible for the government to make a survey of this question? If it is too late to do it now, it could be done next year, and make it retroactive. I do not want to see the country charged with acting the part of the deadbeat, but these men who helped to save us in the battle of the Atlantic and on the great lakes should be given a preference. In the marine city from which I come we have large numbers of these men, some of whom are almost in destitute circumstances.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the point of order raised by the Prime Minister—

Mr. CHEVRIER: A great authority.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought I would—

Mr. MacINNIS: Give us a better one.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are many on this side of the house but they are not as loquacious.

Mr. KNOWLES: I submit that any hon. member has the right to fall back on the rules of the house without being subjected to sniping from the other side. I ask, Mr. Speaker, your consideration first of all of citations 112 and 113 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition. Citation 112 reads as follows:

A point of order against procedure must be raised promptly and before the question has passed to a stage at which the objection would be out of place.

I submit that for the Prime Minister to let the debate go on for over an hour, during which time three cabinet ministers took part, and then to raise a point of order, is contrary to citation 112. I would ask Your Honour to consider citation 113, which reads:

The Speaker decides questions of order only when they actually arise and not in anticipation. He is bound to call attention immediately to an irregularity in debate or procedure and not to wait for the interposition of a member.

I submit that if in Your Honour's opinion there was anything irregular about this motion it should have been pointed out immediately, and that you would be violating citation 113 if you acted now after the interposition of the Prime Minister.

With regard to motions for instructions, I would point out that citation 708 gives the authority for a motion of this kind. It reads:

When a bill comes up for a third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular.

That is what the motion now before the house does.

The Prime Minister read from citation 407 to suggest objection to this measure, but he should have gone on and read citation 408 which gives the general principles regarding instructions. There are three laid down and I shall read all of them. They are as follows:

First, an instruction must empower the committee to do something which the committee is not otherwise empowered to do. Secondly, the purpose of the instruction must be supplementary and ancillary to the purpose of the bill, and must fall within the general scope and framework of the bill.

That is what this instruction does. It proposes something supplementary and ancillary and at the same time within the general framework and scope of the bill.

Mr. HARTT: Not supplementary and ancillary, I respectfully submit. It is contrary.

Mr. KNOWLES: By no means. The general provisions of the bill call for extending the civil service preference to veterans. The proposal of the amendment is that the term "veterans" be extended to include those who served in the merchant marine. I submit that this is supplementary and ancillary.

Mr. MACKENZIE: One is civil and the other military.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is where you are all wet.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope that language is on the record.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I hope it is. It will be on the platform too.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members not to interrupt the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. KNOWLES: In view of the interruptions that have been made I feel that I should call the attention of the house to the fact that in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, it is stated:

The principles that lie at the base of English parliamentary law, as Bourinot so aptly says, are to protect the minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of the majority.

I submit that the minority in this house has a right as well. On the point of order that the Prime Minister raised with regard to the fact that a resolution preceded this bill, a resolution which had the royal recommendation, on the basis of which he contended that this was a money bill, may I point out that the reason there had to be a resolution with the royal recommendation preceding this bill was that one of the provisions in the bill was for increasing the salaries of the civil service commission.

But so far as the veterans preference is concerned, no expenditure is involved. Even if that were the case, I submit that citation 486 is quite clear:

The committee is not bound by the terms of provisions which ministers have inserted in the bill, and when no amount has been mentioned in the resolution—

That is the case here.

—any member may propose to increase the grants specified in the bill or to extend the application of the provisions of the bill, whatever may be the cost resulting therefrom, so long as the power conferred by the royal recommendation is not exceeded.

I submit that on every count this amendment is clearly in order, and that some day in this House of Commons the rules should be used to protect the rights of the minority; in other words, that the rules that are permissive in character should be respected as well as the rules that are prohibitive.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question before the house is the third reading of Bill No. 413, an act to amend the Civil Service Act. We have before the house now an amendment moved by Mr. Bentley, seconded by Mr. Green, which reads:

That Bill No. 413 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions—

It is not written, "for the purpose", but "with instructions".

—to amend the said bill so as to extend to merchant seamen the provisions accorded to veterans in the said bill.

The point of order has been raised that this amendment is out of order because it imposes upon the crown an expenditure. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), both today and a few days ago, has left with the house the impression that, in certain cases it is the privilege of any member, by means of an amendment, to impose expenditures upon the government. I would like to draw the attention of the house to a book entitled The Law and Custom of The Constitution, by Anson, from which I quote, at page 268:

Money only granted on recommendation of the crown.

I believe it is important to read this to the house in view of what was said the other day in moving an amendment to the old age pension bill, and what has been said again today by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

The responsible advisers of the crown, the ministers of state, are alone capable of proposing that public money should be raised, or if already raised should be spent; and the house would not entertain a motion by a private member for a specific outlay on any object which he might consider deserving of public support. The relations of crown, lords and commons in respect of money grants cannot be better stated than in the words of Sir Erskine May.

The crown demands money, the commons grant it, and the lords assent to the grant; but the commons do not vote money unless it be required by the crown; nor impose or augment taxes, unless they be necessary for the public service as declared by the crown through its constitutional advisers. No private member may propose specific grant.

It is possible for any member of the House of Commons to move a resolution to the effect that public money might profitably be expended upon purposes specified in the resolution; and if the house agree to the motion it thereby commits itself to a general approval of such an outlay. But it would not be in accordance with the rules of the house for a private member to move that a specific sum be granted for a specific purpose; such a motion could only proceed from a minister of the crown. For it cannot be too strongly impressed upon the student of constitutional law, that all the money spent for the public service is spent by the crown; that all the money granted for the public service is granted by the commons, and that the commons have imposed upon themselves a rule that they will not grant a penny unless it is asked for by a minister representing the crown for a purpose specified in the terms of his request.

Such a rule is the great safeguard of the taxpayer against the casual benevolence of a house wrought upon by the eloquence of a private member; against a scramble for public money among unscrupulous politicians bidding against one another for the favour of a democracy.

The amendment proposes that the bill be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions to amend the said bill so as to extend to merchant seamen the provisions accorded to veterans. The Prime Minister called the attention of the house to 407 of Beauchesne, third edition, which I believe is quite clear. Previously, basing my ruling on the same citation, I have declared out of order an amendment drafted on the same lines, and an appeal was made from my decision. That appeal was sustained by the house.

An instruction is a motion empowering a committee to do something which it could not otherwise do, or to direct it to do something which it might not otherwise do. It directs the order and course of the committee's proceedings and extends or restricts the order of reference from the house. In other words, an instruction gives power to the committee in that it enables the committee of the whole to do something which the committee had not the power to do. The committee of the whole had the power, and moreover had the opportunity, to amend the bill in such a way as to read as the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. gentleman reads. So according to Bourinot and Beauchesne I have no reason to do other than say that this amendment is out of order.

Mr. BENTLEY: In spite of my great respect for you, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to appeal from your decision.

Mr. SPEAKER put the question as follows: Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West) moved, seconded by Mr. Howe, that Bill No. 413 be now read a third time. Mr. Bentley moved, seconded by Mr. Green:

That Bill No. 413 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions to amend the said bill so as to extend to merchant seamen the provisions accorded to veterans in the said bill.

Mr. Speaker ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that it was in the form of an instruction and that an instruction could not be given to a committee to do that which it already had the power to do. From this decision Mr. Bentley appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. McLURE: I was paired with the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling being sustained.

Mr. CLAXTON: I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted to sustain your ruling.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I was paired with the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling being sustained.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker, it has always been against my principles to pair, but this afternoon I find myself paired with the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling being sustained. I would have voted for justice.

Mr. MARSHALL: I was paired with the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Baker). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling being sustained.

Mr. HLYNKA: I was paired with the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling being sustained.

Mr. WYLIE: I was paired with the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Gour). Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling being sustained.

Mr. J. I. HAMEL (St. Maurice-Lafleche): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is carried I want to put on record my strong opposition to it. To my mind, to raise the salaries of the members of the civil service commission at this time is to give a premium for incompetence and systematic discrimination against almost one-third of Canada's citizens, those of French origin. I charge publicly and formally the civil service commission with being responsible for the disunity existing so openly in this country at the present time. I charge formally the civil service commission with having violated the fundamental principles of our democracy, namely, representation by population. I charge the civil service commission with being responsible for the loss of millions and millions of dollars of income yearly by my compatriots of French origin.

Before I resume my seat I want to express my deep regret at not having heard the leaders of the various political groups in this house take their stand on this all-important matter. That being so, those same leaders should stop wondering why they cannot obtain and secure substantial support in the province of Quebec.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I want to express briefly my disappointment that this bill does not include merchant seamen in the veterans preference. I support the argument put forward by various members in that connection. I want to read a resolution which was passed at the provincial convention of the Canadian Legion held in Vernon, British Columbia, in May, and at which there were in attendance some three hundred members. I want to draw this resolution to the attention of the right hon. ministers. It reads:

Resolved that this convention request the dominion government to extend vocational training, university grants, and all other rehabilitation benefits to all veterans of Canada's wartime merchant navy who had service in any theatre which authorized the payment of the war risk bonus.

Veterans preference is a rehabilitation benefit. I hope that before another session rolls around the government will listen to the views of the troops, not only those in British Columbia but I am sure those throughout Canada, the men who served overseas and who recognize the great work these merchant seamen did.

Mr. GEORGES H. HEON (Argenteuil) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say a few words on this matter before the motion for third reading of the bill is carried?

The debate on this measure has made clearer the deplorable treatment meted out to our French-speaking fellow-citizens in the dominion civil service.

Mr. LANGLOIS: The Conservatives speak along the same lines.

Mr. HEON: So do intelligent liberals.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEON: Right-thinking people, who are free from narrow-mindedness or language or religious prejudice, recognize the merits of the representations submitted in that connection by the chambre de commerce of Montreal, the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEON: It ill becomes you to laugh it off! The Quebec legislature and other representative bodies and they admit how urgent it is that according to principles of justice and equity and in the common interest, something should be done to remedy such a situation which reflects no credit on those who created and encouraged it—

Mr. RINFRET: Who created it?

Mr. HEON: The hon. member had better ask who encouraged it. It is an insult to the racial group so victimized.

Mr. Speaker, need I repeat that it is dishonest to appeal for unity and point out that the two great races should cooperate in making this country greater, and more united, if in the dominion executive and administrative field, the representatives of the French-speaking group are excluded? It might also be worth while to emphasize that never, in the last twenty-five years, has French-Canadian public opinion within all provinces been so much roused than on this matter. It is obvious that such concern will only cease when the wrongs are remedied and redressed.

I, for one, believe that the government should have the courage to deal at once with this problem; in so doing they will have the support of Canadians from all groups which are not blinded by fanaticism and hatred.

We are also informed that a committee of French-speaking members has been established for inquiring into the manner in which our fellow-citizens are treated, to the end that it may make whatever recommendations are called for under the circumstances and that our people may obtain full justice.

I am second to none in wishing the greatest success to my hon. friends in the tremendous task which they have so resolutely tackled.

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

FLOOD DAMAGE IN MANITOBA—STATEMENT OF MR. ZAPLITNY

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair there is a matter of urgency I wish to bring to the attention of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I take this occasion to suggest to the hon. member that when a motion is put from the chair, and before the Speaker says "adopté—carried", if an hon. member wishes to speak he should rise and address the Speaker. If he does not do so the Speaker does not know whether the hon. member wants to speak or to leave the chamber. Moreover, I would suggest that if there is a noise in the house an hon. member who rises should speak in such a voice that he can be understood. I am sure all hon. members will appreciate that, because they are very jealous of the prerogatives of the house and will be pleased to have the Speaker recognize and hear an hon. member who rises to address the house.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your guidance. The matter I wish to bring to the attention of the house will not take long but must be brought up at this time in order that effective action may be taken. I refer to the serious flood damage which has been caused in Manitoba by the recent torrential rains. I realize that the house is in a hurry to get on with its business, but this is a matter of urgency and importance to the farming economy of Manitoba, and I am sure that other members from Manitoba will appreciate some of the things I am going to say.

I shall not take much time to describe the damage which has been done, because it has been published in the press and over the radio. The rains in the area of Dauphin and north and south of Dauphin have been unprecedented. We have had in some parts of Manitoba what amounts to disaster. The area immediately around Dauphin was most seriously affected, but the area around Brandon, and I understand south of Brandon, also suffered severe damage. I could quote figures as to what the damage amounts to, but as hon. members realize, it is difficult to get exact figures of damage of that kind. Estimates vary. In order to avoid argument I will give a round figure which is a composite of the information given to me, and that is that the damage to crops, buildings, bridges, roads, live stock and so on will amount to around two million dollars. This is in a part of Manitoba which has been one of the best farming areas of the province for many years. It is a serious blow to the farmers in the areas affected. It is also a serious blow to food production in this country.

I want to place certain representations before the government in order to impress upon them the urgency of coming to the assistance of the people in the area of Dauphin and also in the area of Brandon. But first I wish to thank publicly the officials of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, who have cooperated cheerfully and kindly with me up to this point in providing priorities in lumber, steel and nails in order that repair work may begin immediately on the bridges which have been washed out in that area.

I might quote from a telegram which I received from the reeve of the municipality of Dauphin in order to impress on the house the extent of the damage in that area. This telegram, which is addressed to myself, reads:

> Damage to municipality three hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

That is to the municipality alone, which includes bridges, culverts and so on. The telegram goes on:

> Crop damage over million dollars. Farmers on Lake Shore total loss of hay and crop over area of fifteen miles long and three miles wide. Lake Shore extended one and a half to five miles. Immediate action required to lower level of lake Dauphin.
> William Cruise, Reeve of Dauphin.

There is an area of approximately forty-five square miles on the lake shore of lake Dauphin completely inundated by water, an area which is settled by farmers who now have an absolute one hundred per cent crop loss.

To throw a sidelight on the seriousness of the situation I quote from a clipping which I have taken from the Dauphin Herald, our local paper, it refers to a farmer who waded in water up to his neck and got the cattle and horses to swim and wade through a quarter mile of water until they reached dry land. The clipping also states:

> The first passenger train between Dauphin and Flin Flon for more than a week went through Sifton on Monday evening.

It goes on to say that certain towns still are isolated and that travel on some of the roads is an impossibility.

I bring this matter to the attention of the government because the damage is so serious and so extensive that it is not possible for the local authorities to cope with the situation.

I should like to extend thanks publicly to the Canadian Red Cross which as soon as the disaster struck our district extended their offer to help. It was not necessary to take advantage of their offer at the time, but I wish to put it on record that they were right on the spot and ready to help.

The extent of the damage is such that it will not be possible for the local authorities to come to the assistance of individual farmers, and although we have asked the province of Manitoba to come to the assistance of farmers in that area it may not be possible even for the province to cope with the damage to the crops. I am therefore asking the federal government to assist in every way possible to get these people rehabilitated.

I want to appeal particularly to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to continue to cooperate in providing priorities for timber and steel in order that the bridges may be restored. The requests I have received so far have covered only one rural municipality, the one most severely hit, but there will be requests coming in from other municipalities and I hope they will be dealt with as promptly as the ones I have already taken up with the department.

I also wish to appeal to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who I regret is not in his seat today, to do everything possible to make sure that the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are so interpreted that the farmers—who have suffered such a serious crop loss, running all the way from ten to one hundred per cent, and averaging probably forty per cent throughout—may receive compensation for that crop loss. The recent amendments to the act will make compensation easier than it was before in the case of flood damage. In previous years as those who are familiar with the act realize, it has been difficult, if not almost impossible, for farmers to apply for crop damage under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act because of the way in which the damaged areas were described, and because of other regulations. The recent amendments placing the act on a township basis make it a little easier, but there will still be difficulties because of the extent of the damage done. There are areas in certain districts where one-third of the township has been completely inundated and the crops completely destroyed, while the other two-thirds may still have a crop. In such a case there may be just enough of a crop in the whole of the township to put it over the top so far as the act is concerned. In these borderline cases I hope the minister will stretch a point in coming to the assistance of those whose crops have been completely lost.

Over the years from 1939 to 1946 the farmers of Manitoba have contributed to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act well over $3,000,000. During that same period they collected from the fund just a little over a million dollars. In other words since 1939 they have contributed to the fund more than twice as much as they have received from it. As I said before in this house, I have never used that as an argument for withdrawing from the act, although some people are inclined to take that view. I have always taken the stand that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is beneficial to the farmers as a whole. Here is an opportunity for the government to show the value of this act by being as generous as possible in the interpretation of the provisions of it in order that people who have suffered this severe damage may receive compensation out of the fund.

There are other things which the federal government can do and in which they might cooperate with the provincial authorities where there is a division of responsibility. For example, a while ago I mentioned the level of lake Dauphin, which is extraordinarily high at the present time. There is an immediate demand from people living around the lake that the level of the lake should be lowered. It is a burning question with them, because if the lake is allowed to remain on their property for a few months it may destroy permanently the value of the land. One of the ways in which the lake might be lowered is by cleaning out the silt which has accumulated at the mouth of the Mossy river where it enters into lake Winnipegosis and drains lake Dauphin. Not very much dredging work has been done there recently, and I am given to understand that there is a serious obstruction at the mouth of the river which prevents water from running off as quickly as it otherwise would.

There is also the question of control dams on the run-off side, the west side of Riding mountain, which is not a new question so far as the government is concerned. I have taken it up before and I bring it to the government's attention now only because I believe that had work been done in the area at the time representations were originally made, a great deal of this damage could have been prevented. I want to be fair and say not all of it could have been prevented, but a great deal could have been prevented in the immediate area. I have a great deal of correspondence with the Department of Mines and Resources dealing with the question dating back as far as April 30, and earlier than that, of 1946, in which I urged upon the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen) the necessity of building control and diversion dams on the creeks and rivers coming down that mountain side in order to prevent flooding in the future. I will quote from one dated July 16, 1946 in which I said this:

> This is a grievance of fairly long standing and we are hoping that something of a concrete nature will be undertaken this year in order that flood waters may be prevented from doing damage again in future years.

That was about a year ago. In fairness I must admit that the Minister of Mines and Resources did make an effort to get a survey of the area to which I referred. Steps were being taken to cooperate with the provincial authority to find out what could be done to prevent flood conditions in the future; but unfortunately the action that was taken was too slow and we find that this year the damage done in that particular area is such that I believe if half of that amount of money had been spent in building control and diversion dams on these creeks we would have prevented a great deal of the damage.

As a permanent feature possibly the only thing that will prevent floods in the future in the long run will be a programme of reforestation on the side of Riding mountain which affects that district. I do not want to go into that in detail, but it is something which the government might look into in the near future. I merely wish to add that when the government receives the applications which have been made by the rural municipalities for assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, I hope they will be generously considered. We have had some experience in that same area before where it has been difficult to collect compensation under that fund. I wish to quote a representation taken from an editorial of the local paper, the Dauphin Herald, which I think sets out the question clearly and briefly:

> The rural council's appeal to the dominion government for aid through the prairie farmers' assistance act is completely justified. In withholding payment of huge sums of money to effect permanent control measures, the federal authorities should surely be prepared to shoulder the cost of damage which can be directly attributed to their policy.

The policy referred to is the lack of control by dams to which I have been referring. I continue with the editorial:

> This is aside even from the responsibility assumed by the federal government in past years with regard to finanical help for drought areas. It follows logically that assistance should also be forthcoming to farmers who suffer loss of income from flooding.

I want to emphasize again that the farmers in the area which I have the honour to represent have for a number of years contributed to the prairie farm assistance fund and have not been in a position to collect from it, because in that area we are not severely subjected to drought; but we have had repeated losses from floods, none of which have been nearly as serious as this one. Now we have had something which amounts to a disaster in the area, and I hope that the government will realize that the farmers are entitled to a little extra consideration because of the fact that they have contributed so much.

What I say about the area around Dauphin applies to a greater or lesser extent to the other areas which have been affected, namely Brandon and the section south of the city. I hope that the government will do everything that is possible and as quickly as possible to come to the assistance of the people there, who have for a number of years been producing large quantities of food and doing excellent work as farmers and who at this time are not asking for a handout but simply for something which I believe is coming to them.

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation of the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny). He has explained what is really a serious situation. I have been in touch with it to a greater or lesser degree for the last two weeks and have had representations from various municipalities, boards of trade and other civic bodies. Manitoba is being blessed with a banner crop practically all over the province, but that does not assist very much the unfortunate farmer or market gardener whose crops are completely destroyed by this flood.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is in the west, I understand, and I have no doubt that before his return he will have acquired first-hand knowledge of the losses which have been sustained. I believe I speak for practically every hon. member of this house when I say that I hope something may be done to alleviate the losses which these men have met after the hard work of putting in their crop. I am sure we are all one in hoping that they may be amply recompensed.

PRICE OF USED CARS—STATEMENT OF MR. ARGUE

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): I wish to refer to a matter which is of considerable importance to hon. members and to the people of Canada generally. It has to do with the situation which prevails in the used and slightly used car market. On May 26 I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) a question as to the situation which was developing in that regard. His reply was that he believed the situation was spotty and did not warrant any action by the government at that time. What I referred to are the very high prices that are being charged for used cars, prices which, according to newspaper reports, are from $500 to $1,000 higher than the retail selling price of a new car, and often obtained after the car has been sold and driven only a few miles.

The basis of my first question in the house was a report in the Toronto Daily Star of May 28, which set out the situation which had arisen in the city of Quebec. The report in that paper reads as follows:

> There are plenty of new cars of most makes available in Quebec city, and anyone, regardless of priority or waiting lists, can get one—provided he is willing to "tip" the salesman a cool $500 in addition to the top price of the car. This practice is more or less general at present, although the average buyer is loudly protesting and refusing to come across.

It goes on to say that the tip ranges from $300 to $500. The used-car dealers are cleaning up on the car shortage too. Everything from battered jalopies to well-used 1938 taxis are selling for fantastic prices in the $1,000-plus class, and most of the cars are little better than heaps of junk.

In the Montreal Standard of May 10 there was an article referring to a similar situation which had been developing in the city of Montreal. I have here an article that appeared in Le Devoir of June 11, some twelve days after I asked my question, and at a time when one might have thought that, in the words of the minister, the situation might have cleared itself. I have had this article translated, and I will quote from extracts from it:

> We have stressed several times in this column recently the hard-to-believe state of affairs of the automobile market, used and new cars. Our last article, of last week, I believe, dealt with a statement which had just been made in Toronto by one of the principal officers of the automobile salesmen's association and which confirmed what we had previously exposed and denounced, that is, that a real black market existed and that transactions at exorbitant prices are currently taking place. Old cars, which were used during ten and twelve years, are being sold at unbelievable prices, while recent models may be obtained only at prices $500 to $1,000 over those of new cars of the same make. Very few new automobiles, or none at all, are available on the normal market. On the other hand, automobiles in new condition which have travelled but a few thousand miles, and even a few hundred miles, are frequently offered for sale at prices far beyond list prices established by manufacturers' agents and by regular automobile salesmen.

This article goes on to quote from a letter written to the paper by the vice-president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, Mr. R. M. Sale, who stated:

> The articles you forwarded to me deal with a matter of great concern to the people in the automobile industry. Even if the manufacturers, no more than their salesmen, are unable to check the exorbitant prices asked for used cars owned by individuals or dealers, we note that the public reaction is very unfavourable.

What I want to point out is that the vice-president of the Ford Motor Company in this letter to the newspaper admitted that cars are being sold at exorbitant prices.

I have here an article which appeared in the Financial Post of June 14. Most members, I believe, will agree that when it comes to financial matters the Financial Post is accurate. I may say that this article is headed "I try to buy a car!" Then there is a subhead which reads:

> Slightly used machines bring double list price, in crazy market—public cashing in on fantastic prices.

The article states:

> There's gold in used car lots these days. And to strike it rich, the second-hand car dealer doesn't have to do any prospecting. All he needs are some shiny new used cars, and car-hungry Canadians will beat a path to his door.
> In a two-hour survey of half a dozen used car lots in Toronto this week eighty-five '46 and '47 cars were counted. And this represents only about one-tenth of the lots in the city.
> So far, the trade hasn't been able to stop this traffic in a scarce commodity. Makers have men out checking the serial numbers of cars found on lots to trace the original owner and put him on a black list, but at best, this can only have a slight effect on the back-alley trading.

One lot was jammed tight with 41 new cars. Not one was priced lower than $1,995. Highest was $4,500 for a four-door Cadillac sedan, listed at $3,775.

On another lot was the newest car seen in the survey—a sleek Oldsmobile which still had some of the factory-wrapped brown paper around the bumpers. In the new car showroom, it sells for around $2,775; in the used-car lot, $3,595. The speedometer registered 165 miles.

The article goes on to state that a man brought in a 1941 Ford and wanted to trade it in for a 1947 model Tudor Ford. He was asked to pay for the new Ford $2,295, in spite of the fact that that particular car is listed with the retail dealers at $1,437, and he was allowed $895 for the '41 model. There is a good deal more to that article, but I think I have quoted enough to show the situation which has been developing and which exists in Canada today.

I have received a number of letters from business men in Montreal confirming what has been stated in these articles and saying that anyone can get a new car there if he is willing to pay from $500 to $1,000 above the list price.

Recently in Regina I saw a 1941 four-door Dodge for sale with a price ticket of $1,350. I was told by the owner of a 1942 Chevrolet, four-door, that he had numerous offers of $1,550 for that car and was about to sell it and expected to close the deal the following day. In Ottawa I was asked by the owner of a 1936 Nash coupe whether I cared to buy it for $1,200. Imagine $1,200 for a car that is more than ten years old! I see some members chuckling. They see where they can cash in on some money too.

I think it should be pointed out that the situation which has developed is perfectly legal. I do not think anyone is breaking the law in doing this. Used cars and new cars have been removed from price control. The companies selling cars in Canada do not condone the situation that has developed. They are asking for their cars only the regular retail price, but some people are willing to take a car and then sell it and make a good deal of money. I believe the people of Canada are law-abiding, and if the government would reinforce price ceilings on cars the people would be willing to live up to the law and a situation of this kind would be curbed.

I notice the Minister of Finance is not in his seat, but I would ask that this matter be brought to his attention and that the government take proper action. He stated on April 14, as reported in Hansard, that he would be willing to do so if such a situation developed, with respect to a commodity which had been removed from price control and with respect to which the people of the country were being exploited. Farmers who have not been able to buy a car for five or six years, and who need a car to carry on their farming operations, and the many people who have to travel, carry on business and make their livelihood, and need a car for that purpose, should be protected; but at the present time these people are being exploited. If the government means what it said on April 14, it should reimpose fair and proper price ceilings on cars. Certainly no car should be sold by anyone in this country at a price even one dollar higher than the ordinary retail selling price.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to endorse the request made by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) for assistance for these unfortunate people who have suffered from floods. Many of them will lose the fruits of their entire year's work as a result of this extreme flood condition which has taken place in the past few weeks. It was my experience to be in Dauphin when that flooding took place and later to go through Brandon. It is an extreme situation and is something which I have never seen happen at this time of year in the province of Manitoba; and I was born and raised there.

The hon. member for Dauphin also spoke about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Under this one per cent deduction, up to date the farmers of Manitoba have contributed approximately double what they have ever received out of the fund. Since new regulations are now being put into effect, based on amendments recently passed in this house, I sincerely trust that they will be interpreted so that the people in that area—and there is a large area in that great and productive area of Dauphin, where the people have lost their all in the matter of this year's work—will get some help. I hope these regulations will be interpreted so that something can be done under them for these people. There are many people along the Assiniboine and in Dauphin and also in other isolated areas in southwest Manitoba, who will lose their entire year's work so far as their crop is concerned. I just want to add my word to that of other hon. members in their plea for assistance from the proper authorities in the not too distant future.

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without saying just a word regarding the flood conditions in Manitoba. We in the east can all, I am sure, appreciate fully how the farmers of Manitoba feel regarding the situation. I just wish to point out again that we in the east this year encountered the worst flood conditions which have existed in years, and that includes practically the whole of eastern Canada. I am sure that in many districts the crop will be less than thirty per cent. In many districts it will be practically nil. Some others may be fortunate enough to get around fifty to sixty per cent. I just want to point out to the government that if they see fit to give aid, eastern Canada should certainly receive something as well as Manitoba.

ASSISTANCE IN EXPORT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA AND NOVA SCOTIA APPLES—MR. HERRIDGE

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Just briefly I wish to bring to the attention of the house a matter of great importance to the apple growers of British Columbia and Nova Scotia, with regard to the possibility of exporting certain export varieties of apples to Great Britain this year. Some few days ago, after the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had made his statement with regard to Canada giving $20,000,000 aid to relieve distressed conditions in Europe I asked him this question: In view of the fact that the British government have announced that, owing to the shortage of dollars, they will not be able to purchase apples from Canada this year, will the Canadian government give consideration to making similar arrangements for the export of certain varieties of Canadian apples to Great Britain, say in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000 worth. This proposal originated with the fruit organizations in my own constituency in British Columbia, has been widely publicized and has received support from the fruit organizations both in British Columbia and in the maritimes. It is of particular concern to growers of certain varieties of apples, particularly in British Columbia. There is the Jonathan, a small red variety which has little sale on the Canadian domestic market, but which is purchased to a great extent in Great Britain by poor families. They like to buy a box of apples, which contains a great many of them, and give the children an apple a day before going to school. A box lasts a long time. There is a certain variety known as Cox's Orange, which is exported largely to Great Britain. There is very little sale for Cox's Orange in Canada or in the United States because the Canadian palate does not seem to be attracted by that variety. I understand that the same condition exists in Nova Scotia with regard to Gravensteins. Again I urge that consideration be given to this question.

I might say that the fruit growers of British Columbia have received hundreds of letters this year from housewives in Great Britain, expressing appreciation of the apples which have been shipped to Great Britain since the end of the war, and how much they would like to see them again. I hope that some arrangement will be made so that the British people, particularly the poor people, may have an opportunity to purchase the varieties I have mentioned. I urge the government to give consideration to assisting the fruit growers of British Columbia and Nova Scotia in this respect. At the same time they will be assisting a great people whom we should be concerned about assisting.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I wish to say to hon. members who have spoken in this debate that the attention of the appropriate ministers will be called to the subject matter of their remarks. The government has been deeply impressed with the serious situation at Dauphin, as mentioned by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews). I understand that the Brandon area is also being damaged by flood conditions. The hon. member for Dauphin was kind enough to say that the Department of Reconstruction and Supply had given highest priority to the requirements of that area for reconstruction. I can assure him that if anything further is needed in that direction it will be forthcoming.

The attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will be called to the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) in the matter of the interpretation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I think I know the Minister of Agriculture well enough to be able to say that if the situation comes within the orbit of the act, the act will be interpreted in as favourable manner as is possible. The hon. member mentioned work in progress by the Department of Mines and Resources. It is unfortunate that this acute flooding occurred before the results of that work could alleviate the situation, but I can assure the hon. member that the surveys which have been made will be followed up and that remedial steps will be taken so that, we hope, the same condition cannot occur in other years.

I shall be glad to call the matter of both used and new car prices, to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), under whose jurisdiction the matter came before the removal of controls. Whether at this late stage it is possible to consider the restoration of controls in a market which was always difficult to control, even under war conditions, I am doubtful; but in any event the minister will be informed of the remarks which have been made.

The matter of apples is receiving the urgent attention of the government, and I feel sure that a solution will be found to the conditions which have arisen as a result of a shortage of dollars in the United Kingdom.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Air service—

440. Air transport board, salaries and office expenses, $150,000.

Mr. BENTLEY: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister and of the committee a situation which is greatly disturbing the good people of my little city.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just the good people?

Mr. BENTLEY: There are no bad people; they are all very good, and the great bulk of them are very much concerned over a situation that has arisen there. I do not want to take any more of the time of the committee on this matter than is necessary, but it has to do with Donald M. Walz, a veteran with a wonderful record in the air force. He gave good service as an instructor in Canada. Then he went overseas and was shot down behind the enemy lines shortly after D-day. He was taken prisoner but escaped through his association with the underground. He came back, reported for duty and flew again until he was later shot down over Germany, where he remained a prisoner until the end of the war. He returned to Canada, where he obtained a licence as a civilian pilot, and is an excellent one by every standard on which he has been tested. Then he formed a partnership with another man by the name of Schrader, who operates a farm south of Swift Current and also a business, in both of which he is very successful. I might add that Mr. Shrader is not a veteran, not by design but because he was not accepted for service. This partnership was formed with the intention of operating an air training school and a charter air service for that part of southwestern Saskatchewan, which requires a service of that kind.

Prior to Mr. Walz being released from the air force, another gentleman, who is not a veteran but who otherwise is an excellent citizen, made application for a similar licence. Please do not misunderstand me when I compare these two men. One is a veteran with a fine service record; the other is a good citizen and a successful business man. He arrived in Swift Current some time before Walz and Schrader came there, and both asked the air transport board for a licence to operate the same kind of service. The civilian gentleman is Mr. Karels. He operates several cold storage plants in Saskatchewan and Alberta and has other business interests which make him independent and not in need of rehabilitation measures, while Mr. Walz needs to be rehabilitated. That is the difference between the two. They both applied to the air transport board, and I have in my hand decision serial numer 211, which sets out the application of Russell E. Karels as follows:

> . . . for a licence to operate the following commercial air services from a base at Swift Current, Saskatchewan: non-scheduled charter to transport passengers and goods, flying training and recreational flying (sightseeing and barnstorming).

In his case the application was approved. The other application is described as follows:

> Application by Donald M. Walz and Charles W. Schrader, carrying on business under the firm name and style of Swift Current Air Services, for a licence to operate the following commercial air services from a base at Swift Current, Saskatchewan: non-scheduled charter to transport passengers and goods, flying training and recreational flying (sightseeing and barnstorming).
> Decision: application denied.

I take exception to the denial of this licence, particularly on the grounds set out by the examiner for the air transport board, who stated that Karels had a substantial investment in local business and a permanent residence in Swift Current. He also had his application in slightly before the other application, and his financial statement shows assets in the air service of over $28,000, including a capital investment of $25,000, with $40,000 in cold storage plants at Swift Current and elsewhere and substantial interests in Calgary, Lethbridge and Humboldt. Apparently it was considered that because of his financial position he was more likely to be a successful operator of an air service. I should like to point out to the minister that Swift Current Air Services, comprising Walz and Schrader, have assets of $12,000, of which $10,000 have already been subscribed, and that the partners have additional assets of $30,900, consisting of bonds, grain, farm machinery, land and sundry assets which could be easily liquidated, and which would furnish sufficient capital for their purposes.

The air transport board sent a gentleman to hold hearings and decide the issue. The hearings were held, and I have in my hand a complete verbatim transcript of the proceedings. I am not going to take time to put it on the record, but it indicates that the reasons I have cited as those given by the examining officer are correct; that is, it was felt that Karels had a prior claim because his application had been made first and also because he was in a slightly better financial position. I believe the decision should have been the other way, because the veteran and his partner had sufficient assets and certainly needed rehabilitation more than the well-off gentleman.

I am not alone in this view. I have had frequent representations from the Canadian Legion there, and there have been items in the local weekly newspaper, which is one of the best in Canada, having frequently won the prize in that field. Even the board of trade, while it did not make any particular recommendation, threw the balance of its support in favour of Walz and Schrader on the ground that Walz is a veteran with an excellent record, and that the partners have sufficient capital and knowledge to go ahead with the project. I have also letters from other branches of the Canadian Legion and others supporting the case of the veteran, but I do not think it is necessary to take time to put them on the record. They are available to anyone who wishes to look at them, and I am trying to make a fair presentation of the case. I am not saying anything that cannot be supported by documentary evidence, and the file on this matter is quite lengthy. If I may, however, I should like to read a resolution on this matter by the board of trade, which appeared in the Sun, the newspaper I mentioned a moment ago:

> At a general meeting of the board of trade in the Healy hotel on Tuesday evening, a resolution was unanimously adopted in connection with the recent announcement that in the granting of a commercial air service licence, a veteran, Don Walz, had been denied a licence, one of the reasons being given that one service is all that is economically feasible for Swift Current.
> The meeting went on record as disapproving this action of the examining officer who later made his recommendations to the air transport board at Ottawa. In addition the meeting felt that a returned veteran should have been given equal consideration when he was trying to re-establish himself and apparently had been led to believe that his application would get favourable consideration. The resolution will be directed to the proper authorities at Ottawa. President Slater Alexander presided at the meeting.

Mr. Slater Alexander is a fine gentleman. I should like to draw attention to another factor that entered into this examination. When any person makes an application to the air transport board for a licence to operate a service anyone who feels that that person is not the proper type can make representations to the board and oppose the application. Mr. Karels made representations which are to be found in the transcript of evidence. He opposed the granting of a licence to Walz and Schrader, the veterans concerned. His opposition was on the ground that there was not room for two services in the area.

On the other hand, the evidence showed that Mr. Walz and Mr. Schrader were prepared to compete for the field. They were willing to spend what money they had in the belief that they could give the kind of service which would either make them paramount in the field of competition or establish the fact that there was room for two services. They made no representations opposing the application of Mr. Karels. This should be distinctly in favour of Walz and Schrader when the matter is being considered by anyone who believes in the right of free competition, as many in this committee do. Walz and Schrader were not asking any favours; they were willing to let Karels operate, provided that they could operate. They contended that if there were room for two they would both be able to exist; if there were not, the best man would win. I understand that to be competition. They were willing to adopt that attitude, but Mr. Karels was not. He opposed the veteran and his partner getting a licence.

I have another clipping from the Sun dealing with the same matter, and if the minister and the committee want it placed on the record I shall do so, although it is fairly long. It simply supports the statement I have already made. I do not wish to delay the deliberations of the committee, but I did want to place this matter squarely before the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply who administers the air transport board and to plead with him to see that the government do what they have said they are going to do, give the veteran every opportunity to rehabilitate himself.

As I said before, anyone reading the evidence will arrive at the same conclusion, that the veteran and his partner are qualified by every test that could be made. These men have the ability and the means and the knowledge of business administration to operate this service. They are willing to compete and they ask for a charter. On the other hand, the other man wants to exclude them from that field in order to have it for himself. While I do not think he is a wealthy man, he is well enough established in other lines of business not to require rehabilitation. He can get along quite comfortably without his air operations.

I should like the minister to give the committee and myself, and particularly the people back home who are so concerned with this, some assurance that he will take a personal interest in this case. I believe if he does he will have no hesitation in saying that this veteran flyer has at least as good a right if not a greater right to this charter. I say all this without any criticism or charge against the examining officer. I expect that he had certain terms of reference and probably he did what he thought was best. However I disagree with his finding, and I want to impress the minister with my reasons for disagreement. If the minister cannot make a statement now I ask him to assure us that he will give personal consideration to this matter which is so deserving.

Mr. HOWE: I want to thank the hon. member for Swift Current for placing this matter before the committee in some detail. I am quite familiar with the case, as it was called to my attention some days ago. I have read the evidence and looked into the matter thoroughly. There were two applicants for the same licence. The function of the air transport board is to rehabilitate the veteran in a manner which will permit him to make a living, not in a manner which may get him into difficulties where he may lose his gratuity and other assets. That is the reason why some care is taken in sorting out applicants for licences of the type in question.

As I say, there were two applications. Karels' application was the prior one, the application of Walz and Schrader coming in at a later date. The examiner was sent to Swift Current to investigate. A hearing was held and written evidence was taken. The recommendation of the examiner was followed in issuing a licence to Karels. My understanding of the situation is that Karels is a resident of Swift Current, whereas the veteran Walz has never been a resident there.

Mr. BENTLEY: Karels had not been a resident for long. He came in there only recently; I think he was there for less than a year when he made his application.

Mr. HOWE: It was thought by the board that there were other desirable locations as a centre for flying and that possibly the veteran Walz could locate in an area which might provide a better living. Representations were made by the board of trade and responsible citizens of Swift Current suggesting that licences should be issued to both parties. Personally I am reluctant to accept them because I think eventually one of the licensees will lose his investment, but who am I not to bow to local opinion? There is no great principle at stake. The air transport board is holding hearings in the west at the present time, and I have asked the board to stop at Swift Current and hold another hearing so as to ascertain whether there is any serious reason why both applications should not be granted. I am inclined to think the result will be that both applicants will be granted a licence. I hope my hon. friend will not be reluctant in taking his share of the responsibility in case the situation ends in disaster.

Mr. BENTLEY: I will not. I thank the minister very much.

Mr. WINTERS: Under what items will the T.C.A. be considered?

Mr. HOWE: The T.C.A., being a self-supporting enterprise, has no estimate. It earns its own revenue and does not depend on parliament for funds.

Mr. CROLL: From the report I had, I thought there was a deficit.

Mr. HOWE: It had an earlier surplus to cover the deficit. I shall be glad to have my hon. friend discuss the T.C.A. under this item if he cares to.

Mr. WINTERS: I should like to say a few words in connection with what seems to be a growing complaint about T.C.A. service in the maritimes. Almost everyone who flies to Ottawa comes to see me to complain about what they say is an increasingly bad service to the maritimes, a service which I had always thought was increasingly good. They complain of long stop-overs in Montreal which make it necessary for people to leave here in the middle of the night, wait in Montreal, leave Montreal still later in the morning and then arrive in Halifax on the same day. They complain of the lengthy stop-overs.

Another serious cause for complaint is the uncertainty as to when the planes will leave both from Halifax and from Montreal. I hear an increasing number of complaints from people who have called up the air port to find out what time the plane is leaving; when they get to the field they find the departure has been delayed for an hour or two, and they come back to town and then find still further delays. During the past week or so, an eminent gentleman from the maritimes took off from Halifax and the plane made an unscheduled stop at Blissville. There were ladies on the plane, and at Blissville there were no facilities whatsoever for ladies or anybody else.

Mr. HOWE: I have stopped at Blissville several times. I hope my hon. friend has.

Mr. WINTERS: I was told that the facilities had been removed from the buildings. It was a hot day and the place was almost insufferable because of mosquitoes. In the light of all these complaints I should be pleased to hear the minister make a statement, because I know there must be something to be said on the other side too, on the service to the maritimes.

Mr. HOWE: I am surprised to hear my hon. friend speak of a lack of service to the maritimes, as operating results indicate that T.C.A. may be giving them too much service. T.C.A. has four flights daily from Montreal to Halifax and these are running about fifty per cent occupancy, whereas in the very busy section, Montreal-Ottawa, Toronto-Winnipeg, there are four flights, all running nearly 100 per cent occupancy, with many complaints because of lack of accommodation. The same care is taken in operating T.C.A. in the maritimes as elsewhere on the system. I would not mention the peculiar weather conditions on that route at a time like this, but sometimes we do have difficulty at the Halifax end, and sometimes difficulty at Pennfield. The only reason for going to Blissville was that Pennfield was closed in on that particular day. Blissville is not a regular stop at the present time. Pennfield is a well-equipped air port and ordinarily that is the stop. I can assure my hon. friend that, so far as weather in all parts of Canada is concerned, we have had the worst four months that have ever been experienced on our air lines. I think he will find that the operation is sound, and that, with the improved weather that we always get in summer and autumn in the maritimes, we shall have first-class operation.

Mr. WINTERS: Would it not be possible to arrange a schedule from Ottawa to Halifax to avoid the lay-over in Montreal and work out a better through service?

Mr. HOWE: There are four services daily, but perhaps my hon. friend takes the evening plane. That plane is held to meet the convenience of the Post Office Department, to collect the last mail from Montreal. If my hon. friend would take one of the earlier services he could make better connections.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister give us a short statement with regard to the domestic aviation situation and the policy of the government at the present time, also with regard to the international aviation picture. For example, I understand that it has not been possible to work out any multilateral agreement, which was the original policy announced by the government several years ago. I think it would be helpful if the minister would give us a short statement with regard to both the domestic and the international aviation situation.

Mr. SKEY: I was going to ask the minister much the same question. Would he include in his statement a comparison of how T.C.A. has survived the last six or eight months, which have been so difficult for the United States air lines, and has he any views to offer on our organization as compared with theirs?

Mr. HOWE: In the international field, as hon. members are aware, PICAO, the international civil aviation organization, has Canada as its location and Montreal as its headquarters. That orgnization has been meeting continuously since its formation, and at its last assembly, in May of this year, it became a permanent organization, with its headquarters at Montreal. The location of the international organization in that city has been helpful to Canadian aviation, and has helped to place Canada prominently on the world air maps.

The international organization has been dealing with the matter of a multilateral agreement. An attempt has been made to arrive at common ground, but to date that attempt has not been successful. The last meeting of the international organization debated the subject at great length, but failed to reach agreement and decided that a special meeting of the organization would be called for this autumn in Rio de Janeiro for the sole purpose of discussing the problem of a multilateral agreement. Therefore I can report at the present time that there is no multilateral agreement covering traffic matters other than the first two freedoms; that is, the freedom to fly over a country for peaceful purposes and the freedom to land for repairs or refueling. The first and second freedoms are the only multilateral freedoms at present. In the meantime, a great many bilateral agreements have been made. Canada has made five or six, all of which have been reported to this House of Commons. To date we have not given the fifth freedom, as have some other countries. We believe our location is such that our agreement should be confined to the first four freedoms. We have kept to that course.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister explain the third, fourth and fifth freedoms?

Mr. HOWE: The first freedom is the right to fly over a country for peaceful purposes. The second freedom is the right to land for repairs or refueling. The third freedom is the right to pick up passengers in the home country and take them to any other country with which Canada has a fourth freedom agreement. The fourth freedom is the right to pick up passengers in any country in which Canada has traffic rights and bring those passengers to the home country. The fifth freedom is the right of a Canadian air line to pick up passengers, we will say, in the United Kingdom and deliver them in France. It is the right to handle passengers who are not nationals of its own country or destined to or from its own country.

Mr. GREEN: We are not prepared to give that freedom?

Mr. HOWE: We have not as yet. We are prepared to give it on a multilateral basis. If there is a universal exchange of fifth freedom rights we are prepared to join, but our situation on the air lines is such that we feel that bilateral agreements granting fifth freedom rights would work to our detriment so far as Canadian traffic is concerned.

On the international routes at the present time we are operating eleven round-trip crossings a week between Montreal, Prestwick, Scotland, and London, England. The flights are running full at the moment. We are operating the new North Star planes. These planes have worked out amazingly well. I think no other new aircraft has taken the punishment in its initial operations that the North Star has been subjected to. With five planes in commission, we have been operating eleven round trips a week across the Atlantic, which is rather a phenomenal operation. In some cases the turn-around time at London is no longer than an hour and a quarter. The plane delivers its passengers there, takes its load and returns to Canada with no more overhaul than can be performed in that time.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the length of time taken in crossing over each way?

Mr. HOWE: The schedule is fourteen hours from Montreal to London, with an intermediate stop at Prestwick.

Mr. FRASER: Can the minister say whether the United States firm which operates out of Montreal cuts into the T.C.A. business at all?

Mr. HOWE: What United States firm is that?

Mr. FRASER: I saw an advertisement in the paper in which a United States firm was advertising flights to England.

Mr. HOWE: That would not be the Ontario government immigration project?

Mr. FRASER: No, from Montreal.

Mr. SKEY: Acting in competition with you.

Mr. HOWE: The Ontario government immigration plan has made arrangements with a United States charter operator, I believe, to bring their immigrants from the United Kingdom to Canada, but there may be some difficulty about working out details of the operation.

Mr. FRASER: This was an advertisement in the Montreal Star advertising flights to England. I do not know whether they go via New York or not.

Mr. HOWE: They must be advertising a flight from some point outside Canada which can be reached by a connecting line.

Mr. SKEY: Do you not need more than five aircraft?

Mr. HOWE: We have twenty on the way. As my hon. friend knows, we are using an interim aircraft now. We took five of the twenty aircraft being built for the R.C.A.F. As a matter of fact, we are using these until the pressurized version is completed, the first of which will be out this month. By late autumn we expect to have twenty pressurized aircraft, which will represent the permanent international planes for T.C.A. As far as the domestic services are concerned, they have been expanded. In the maritimes we are operating four services a day between Montreal and Halifax; two of them go on to Sydney and Newfoundland. We also have a new service operating between Halifax, Yarmouth, Pennfield in New Brunswick, and Boston; two services each day. In the central region service is about as last reported. From Winnipeg west there have been some changes. We have opened a new route, Winnipeg to Edmonton by way of Saskatoon, a direct route. We have opened a new route between Winnipeg and Calgary direct, and we have put on a service from Winnipeg to Lethbridge, with stops at Swift Current and Medicine Hat. These are the new developments in the field.

Mr. GREEN: When are you flying across the great lakes?

Mr. HOWE: We are flying across the great lakes at the present time. All flights from Toronto to Winnipeg are across the great lakes, with stops at Sault Ste. Marie, Port Arthur and Winnipeg.

Mr. REID: What time is cut off by crossing the great lakes?

Mr. HOWE: As I remember it, about an hour and fifteen minutes.

Mr. GREEN: What is the main obstacle to the completion of a multilateral agreement? Is the United States against a multilateral agreement at the present time? Originally that nation was very much in favour of a multilateral agreement. What are the main obstacles to the completion of such an agreement?

Mr. HOWE: The main obstacles to a multilateral agreement are that the various countries believe that there should be limitations to competition, and limitation on the number of services. There are various differing opinions which I think can, in time, be reconciled. Discussions seem to be coming more in the direction of reconciliation, and I am quite hopeful that the conference in Rio this autumn will bring about agreement. The reason there is no multilateral agreement today is that the countries have not been able to reach a sufficient measure of agreement to make it possible.

Mr. GREEN: What position does the United States take?

Mr. HOWE: That country has its own idea of what an agreement should be, which differs from ours and differs from that of the United Kingdom, and differs from that of many countries. In the last assembly, the Canadian proposals seemed to have the support of the smaller countries, but they did not have the support of the United States or of the United Kingdom.

Mr. GREEN: When is it expected that the transpacific flights will be started? I believe the Australians are now giving that service, and New Zealand is also doing so. When will Canada have a service to Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. HOWE: The present service is being operated under the sponsorship of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom which share the expenses. It is actually being operated by a private company in Australia, Australian Airways. The undertaking was that Canada would run a parallel service as soon as we could make the necessary arrangements, and that still holds. Just when it will be I cannot say at the moment. We had never expected to be running eleven round trips a week across the Atlantic. I think we could put twice that number of trips on and still be booked full in both directions. Faced with that situation, we are at the moment, reluctant to divert planes from that service. With more planes coming out this autumn, I hope that early next year we shall be able to undertake the Pacific service as well as the service through the West Indies to South America.

Mr. SKEY: Are there any penalty clauses in the agreement to take delivery of these machines from Canadair because it definitely penalizes the T.C.A. in its further expansion to be held up for months and months in getting delivery of aircraft? As I understand it, the first machines to come off the line were R.C.A.F. machines. They are just a temporary measure, and if competition is very keen in this field and the T.C.A. is to keep up its good reputation, then an assured supply of planes on schedule is absolutely necessary to its continued operation.

Mr. HOWE: Trans-Canada Air Lines could have borrowed more of the military type planes except that the cost of converting them into luxury passenger planes and converting them back to military planes is an item that should not be enlarged too greatly. There has been no particular hold-up. The only hold-up has been the slow delivery of Rolls-Royce engines, which resulted from the black-out in industry in the United Kingdom last winter. I understand that deliveries are now improving. I understand that ten or a dozen of the military type planes are ready for delivery, except for engines. The arrangement was that the military type of plane would be finished first, and the pressurized type, which has a good many differences in structure, would follow. The schedule for the first pressurized type plane was always July. It is my understanding that there will be no delay in delivering the twenty pressurized planes to the T.C.A. on schedule set up in the contract.

Mr. SKEY: Has the minister investigated the possibility of having a good aircraft engine made in Canada or a Canadian contract to make the Rolls-Royce engines here? The ridiculous part of this whole business is having an American boat company manufacture an American hull with a British engine in the Dominion of Canada. Our air picture is just as ridiculous as that.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has his own idea of what is ridiculous.

Mr. SKEY: I say that is.

Mr. HOWE: This whole production was Canadian sponsored. The original design was turned out by Canadian engineers and the original production was carried out by Canadians. It is only the fact that the government felt it should not properly be in the business of manufacturing and selling aircraft that induced it to sell to a company which, though certainly it has United States capital, contains on its board of directors a number of able Canadian business men. It is no more a United States company than a good many others that I could name which are respectable Canadian companies as far as ownership goes. We believe that Electric Boat had a type of experience that was valuable to the operations. It is not a United States plane. It is true we have a basic design from the United States, but Douglas would be the last to say that they care to sponsor a design that is flying the Atlantic in the name of the North Star today. It is a Canadian version of what is required for the route, based on Douglas design. The Rolls-Royce was chosen, first, because it is of British make. It did not represent a drain on Canadian dollars, and we believed it was the engine most suitable for aircraft to perform the service we had in mind in the North Star planes.

Mr. SKEY: I am aware of all these things, but you cannot control operations properly nor can you control production if you cannot get parts in Canada. You should set out to have every part you can make in that aircraft produced in Canada, employing Canadian labour and industry.

Mr. HOWE: The immediate requirements for Rolls-Royce engines would be perhaps 160 or 170 or 200. The cost of setting up an establishment to build them would be in the neighbourhood of $15 million or $20 million. The cost per engine would be colossal. I was criticized by hon. members opposite for what they thought would be the cost of the North Star planes. That they were mistaken about that cost does not mean that they would not be fully justified in condemning such a capital cost for so small a production of engines. We must use reason in these things. I admit at once the desirability of the objective. I wish we made Rolls-Royce engines in Canada, but I would not recommend to parliament appropriations of the size necessary to bring that about.

Mr. SKEY: Did the minister not explore this matter during the war? He spent $21,825,777.33 on Cartierville. The sum of $15 million more spent during the war to produce a good engine in Canada would have been money well spent in a post-war programme.

Mr. HOWE: During the war we spent $21 million on Cartierville and we had a production in excess of $100 million worth of equipment over the years. If I could spend another $15 million and turn out $60 million worth of engine equipment I would be happy to recommend the expenditure.

Mr. SKEY: Probably the mistake was made during the war.

Mr. EMMERSON: I should like to ask the minister a question in reference to the air service in the maritime provinces. What principle governs the schedule by which these planes fly? It seems to me that they are not getting as great a popular support as they should, and I was wondering to what extent the flights were used for passenger and mail service respectively. Going east from Ottawa, there are two flights a day. One takes place at an opportune time in the morning but the other comes at midnight. If one is going to Moncton and from there on to the island, one has to fly at an uncomfortable hour and can get no sleep. The passenger arrives around five-thirty or six-thirty o'clock in the morning. There is another flight that could be made in the morning if you could get to Montreal to catch the six-thirty o'clock plane. If there were some other hour at which these planes flew there might be a more popular use of them. I am wondering whether the schedules have been drawn up from the point of view of passengers or with the mail service in view.

Mr. HOWE: On all routes we must have one mail service. There is one plane that serves the convenience of the Post Office Department and that plane is never very convenient to passengers. It must not be forgotten that we get considerable revenue from the post office. The schedules are balanced to meet connecting planes, having in mind the desirability of choosing hours that are of the greatest convenience to the travelling public.

Mr. KNOWLES: Although this has been said before, I feel that this item should not pass without a word of commendation to the minister for the service and the courtesy and safety being afforded in the operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines. Those who have travelled by air can appreciate the point of view expressed by an hon. member to the effect that it is a bit annoying sometimes to have to wait for a take-off, but most of us who have had that experience realize that it is a guarantee of safety so far as the operations of the air lines are concerned. The experience that has been had in some other countries in recent months during some bad weather we have been having simply serves to highlight the splendid record that our Canadian air line has achieved, and we are all extremely proud of it.

I think, too, a word should be said, not only for this record of safety, but for the service which Trans-Canada Air Lines is rendering to this country, and which may not be fully recognized until historians of the future write about this period. It is serving to unite the country, and in every way, it seems to me, this is one achievement that the minister can speak of with a great deal of pride. On the other hand, there are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister about another phase of the work of the air transport board, or indeed about another phase of civil aviation policy. I would ask the minister whether the government or the air transport board is giving any consideration to an over-all plan with respect to Canada's north land. The minister knows the disagreements I have with him over the policy he is pursuing with respect to the north land, but at the moment I will confine myself to a few questions.

I take the position that we have, to the north in this country, a continent in itself, rich in minerals, oil and other natural resources, and the fact that we have that country up there places certain responsibilities upon us. We should be thinking in terms of its fullest development, both for its own sake, for the sake of Canada and for the sake of the world at large.

I recall remarks that the minister has made in the past about mistakes that were made in the early days of railroading. I hope that similar mistakes are not now being made in the early days of civil aviation. I do not like the idea of that north country seeming, as it does to me, to be just a field for exploitation by private companies in the direction of transportation on the one hand, and mining on the other, particularly when these companies are interwoven as they are.

We have up there minerals and oil in a great expanse of country, and I think that in the process of developing new plans for that country we should be looking, not just in the direction of private exploitation, but in the direction of what is best for that country for the sake of Canada and for the benefit of the world at large. I should like to know from the minister whether the air transport board is just receiving such applications as come along from Canadian Pacific Air Lines and others, considering them and granting them; or whether any over-all planning is being done with respect to the northern half of this country, particularly in relation to air service.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that the most careful planning of the northern services has been and is being carried out by the air transport board. One of the first acts of the board was to travel over every existing route and service in Canada. The requirements of each area were investigated. The service being given was explored and the needs for further service were noted. I might point out to hon. members that a tremendous expansion in aviation has taken place from 1939 to the end of 1946. The personnel engaged in the air services has been multiplied approximately by ten; the miles flown have been multiplied by more than six, and the areas served have been greatly increased. Before the war there was a great deal of dissatisfaction with the service given in certain areas, and among those engaged in air transport work there was a good deal of dissatisfaction with regard to unfair and cut-throat competition. Both complaints have pretty well disappeared. I know of no area today which has more than an occasional complaint about the service being rendered by air transport.

I was happy to look over the operating results for 1946 of all the air operators in Canada. I may say that one service which the air transport board has rendered is the establishment of a statistical department which gives prompt and accurate statistics of the industry as a whole. A study of those results for 1946 indicates that, with amazingly few exceptions, the operation of air services had been profitable to the operators. A great number of new services have been undertaken by retruned men. It has been the business of the board to try to place these veterans in areas where they could make a satisfactory living; and that objective has been attained beyond my greatest expectations. Occasionally we are told that in carrying out that objective we are being unfair to someone. The hon. member for Swift Current suggests that we are being unfair to a veteran in his city. My own thought was that the difficulty arose because we were trying to be fair to the veteran. We were trying to tell him that he would find a better field in some other part of western Canada. However we cannot carry these points too far. If the veteran feels we are doing him a wrong, we will right the wrong, and let his own judgment prevail. Perhaps we were wrong. But in general we have succeeded in convincing new operators that they would be wise not to enter the territory they had in mind in the first instance. We have been able to show them the potential traffic in the area. Careful traffic studies have been made of every part of Canada. When a veteran or pioneer in aviation comes to the air transport board and talks about an area, the board is able to produce a traffic study of the area and tell him what they believe to be the potential traffic of the area and give him advice as to whether or not he is wise to undertake to make an investment and try to make his living from that particular area. I believe the air transport board has performed a great service for aviation in sorting out the industry, in making sure that the user of the service has service, and in making sure that operators in the service are given a fair competitive position.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister indicate the proportion in the northern services, say on the route to Yellowknife and the routes down in the Mackenzie? What is the proportion as between Canadian Pacific Air Lines on the one hand and these smaller services operated by veterans on the other? Will the minister also tell us if Canadian Pacific Air Lines is now showing a profit on these northern operations?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot give an arbitrary proportion. In general, a preview of the routes by the air transport board resulted in the Canadian Pacific Air Lines retaining the routes that could be operated on wheels with heavy equipment. They kept the route from Edmonton over the northwest staging route to Alaska. They kept the service to Yellowknife. They gave up a great variety of services which were formerly operated on floats and skis; and those services, generally speaking, were assigned to newcomers in the field.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does anyone else operate on those main lines?

Mr. HOWE: No. Similarly, we do not allow anyone else to operate on routes which we assign to operators of floats and skis, if it is a scheduled operation.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about profits?

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister mean that some other operator now flies the plane from Norman Wells to Aklavik?

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure.

Mr. MacNICOL: I went on a Canadian Pacific plane.

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure who operates that particular service. I shall be glad to look it up. As I remember it, that is a seaplane operation. I think it is flown by others.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a float plane from Norman Wells to Aklavik. I went by Canadian Pacific plane; at least, I thought so.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. But that was a year or two ago. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked about profits. Canadian Pacific Air Lines showed a small profit last year, the first year of operation when Canadian Pacific Air Lines have shown a profit.

Mr. CROLL: Has the minister available here comparable figures on the incidence of fatal accidents? He may or may not have those figures with him. In the case of fatal accidents and claims being made, does Trans-Canada Air Lines carry its own insurance, or does it reinsure through some other company? How are the claims settled?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know that I can give just the figures on fatal accidents which my hon. friend wanted. The airways have the best record of any form of transportation with regard to number of fatalities for the number of miles travelled. Their record is much better than that of the railroads, and much better than that of the highways. In its history T.C.A. has had two accidents in which passengers have been lost. The first occurred at Armstrong, Ontario, I think in 1941; the second tragic accident occurred this year, when a plane flying from Lethbridge to Vancouver was presumably lost in the Pacific ocean off Vancouver. At the present time T.C.A. carries its own insurance funds, and claims are settled promptly. In the early days it was customary to reinsure part of the liability, but the fund is now strong enough so that T.C.A. carries its own risk.

Mr. CROLL: The figures I had in mind were those giving comparisons with other air services in the United States, not ground services. If the minister has the record it might be well to put it on Hansard.

Mr. HOWE: Our safety record still stands high among the air lines of the world. We were almost perfect until the accident this spring, but it is difficult to make comparisons, as some of the smaller operations have never had an accident. Among the transcontinental operations, I think T.C.A. is easily the best.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to ask the minister a question in regard to the West Indies service, particularly the service to Bermuda. I understand that there was some disagreement or difficulty in getting an agreement with the authorities at Bermuda, whom I understand to be the United States army which operates the airfield there. Can the minister say what the difficulties have been, and whether any progress has been made in overcoming them. Will he also say whether it is the intention to operate an air service from Canada to the West Indies. I have one or two other questions, but this is the main one, if I can get an answer to it.

Mr. HOWE: Canada has been ready and anxious to operate a service to Bermuda since December, 1945. The difficulty has been that the airport in Bermuda is one of the American bases built in British territory. The Americans were reluctant to allow other countries to use the base until an over-all agreement could be reached between the United Kingdom and some of her colonies and the United States covering the operation of all those bases. I understand that the agreement is now complete in all particulars except in regard to the use of Gander airport at Newfoundland. We have reason to be hopeful that within the next two weeks that difficulty will be overcome and the agreement in regard to the bases signed. It is the present intention to start the service to Bermuda not later than September 1 of this year.

Mr. ADAMSON: What other bases would come under the general agreement? The minister mentioned Gander and Bermuda. I understand that there are United States air bases on other Caribbean and West Indies islands. Is it the intention to continue the service further south than Bermuda?

Mr. HOWE: It is our intention to continue farther south. We have agreements with Bermuda, Jamaica and Trinidad. Negotiations are continuing with Nassau, but no agreement has been reached; and it is our hope to extend the service beyond Trinidad toward Rio and perhaps farther into Latin America.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am very glad to hear that statement.

I have just one other question in regard to the North Star. This question was asked me by several people who have been in the R.A.F. on the technical side. I understand that the North Star is using the Merlin engine. Is that a specially designed engine for peacetime use? It is not the war type of Merlin engine?

Mr. HOWE: At the beginning of the mail operation with the Lancasters we attempted to use military type engines, with indifferent success. Modifications were brought about and a satisfactory engine was developed for that operation. The Merlin engines at present in use are a complete modification even of the engines used in the Lancasters. It is a highly developed engine with special characteristics for transport work, and I am happy to say that we are very well satisfied with the results of our operation.

Mr. ADAMSON: One more question and I am through. I am not a member of the railway committee, but hon. gentlemen who are on that committee said they thought some of this information was given there. Is there available a break-down showing the amount of freight carried on lines other than T.C.A.? Does the air transport board keep a record of the ton-miles of freight and the passenger-miles of other services? I know T.C.A. has such a record, but is there also a record in connection with C.P.A. and the other smaller air lines that are licensed at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: We have complete data on the freight carried on each separate route. That information is contained in the annual report of the air transport board. It is also contained in monthly bulletins that are issued. If my hon. friend is interested I shall be glad to send him the information.

Mr. ADAMSON: Thank you very much.

Mr. McKAY: A few moments ago the minister refered to the loss of a trans-Canada air liner off the coast of British Columbia last April. Is he in a position to give the committee the result of the inquiry into the loss of that plane? Some time ago I asked the minister whether a board of inquiry would be set up, and at that time he indicated this would be done. Since then I have not heard the results of that inquiry.

Mr. HOWE: A board of inquiry was immediately established and a thorough investigation was carried out. The operation was checked from every possible angle, and no flaw could be found in the operation or the condition of the plane. The report of the board was published. It boiled down to this, that for no known reason the plane disappeared in the few minutes between its passage over the airport and its usual landing time. It reported in over the airport. Ten minutes later an attempt was made to reach it by radio, when it had not landed on schedule, but the attempt to make radio contact failed, and no trace of the plane was found thereafter. The consensus of all concerned seems to be that something occurred over the Pacific, and that the plane is at the bottom of the ocean.

Mr. McKAY: Is that evidence available to members of the house?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I feel obligated to congratulate the minister on having maintained the Canadian Pacific air service in the northwestern part of Canada. I remember that when the bill was going through the house I vigorously opposed one proposal, but I am now very glad to congratulate the minister on having maintained that service. I have nothing but confidence in what is done by T.C.A.; as one other hon. member has said, it gives a splendid service, and its personnel are of the best. Since no one has spoken about the Canadian Pacific service, however, I am going to do so because they do render a splendid service in that north country. Everyone who travels on their planes speaks just as highly of the personnel of Canadian Pacific Air Lines, and of their courtesy to travellers, as we all speak of T.C.A. In my judgment Canada is well served by both these lines, and I hope the minister will maintain them both. He really fathered the T.C.A., and I hope he will continue to maintain Canadian Pacific Air Lines up in northwestern Canada. They are a private concern and are doing an excellent job in opening up that part of the country. I wish them every success.

Mr. SKEY: What is delaying the arrangements to fly the Pacific from Vancouver to Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. HOWE: No particular delay, except that all the planes that we have immediately available are working on more profitable routes. When we get more equipment and trained crews we expect to undertake the Pacific run.

Mr. GREEN: A year ago the Canadian ambassador to Mexico announced that the T.C.A. was to fly from Canada to Mexico City, while a Mexican line would fly to Canada. Has that proposal been dropped?

Mr. HOWE: I think the announcement was that a Mexican line intended to fly from Mexico to Canada. Canada has never entertained a proposal to fly a service to Mexico City. No bilateral agreement has been signed between Mexico and Canada. There were discussions, but I understand they were dropped. I think the enthusiasm in Mexico City died down.

Mr. GREEN: In 1945 an amendment to the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act was passed, by which power was given to set up crown companies under Trans-Canada Air Lines. Have any such companies been set up and, if so, what are they?

Mr. HOWE: Trans-Canada Atlantic Air Lines is operating the north Altantic service.

Mr. GREEN: Is that the only one?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: When does T.C.A. plan to inaugurate flights to Sweden to implement the joint agreement that was signed?

Mr. HOWE: T.C.A. has no present plans for operating a service from Canada to Sweden. We have the right to do so, but we know of no Canadian traffic between Canada and Sweden which would warrant a service between the two countries.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could the minister say something with regard to the private plane situation in Canada, the personal plane or the so-called flivver plane? Is any encouragement being given to the development of this kind of flying? What is the situation at the present time in Canada, as compared with that in the United States?

Mr. HOWE: Every encouragement short of subsidy has been given. We subsidized flying schools to teach our citizens to fly in private planes. We have worked out a system of charges at air ports which allows the small private plane to land without paying a landing fee. We have put in a scale of hangar rentals which permits the small plane to have accommodation at a lower cost than the large planes. We have made the air as free as possible to the private plane. As far as I know, anyone who desires to fly privately in Canada can have a very good time.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the minister any figures of the number of private planes in Canada and in the United States? When he gives that answer, would he answer a question on the other side of the picture? What is the situation with regard to safety precautions in connection with private flying?

Mr. HOWE: The annual report of the department dated March 31, 1946, indicated that there were twenty-seven private aircraft licensed in Canada and 446 commercial aircraft as of that date.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the minister the figure for the United States?

Mr. HOWE: No. The enthusiasm for private flying is not as great today as it was before the war. Commercial air lines services have been developed to a great extent since the war. It is much safer for a man who may wish to travel from point to point to go by the commercial air lines. Fifteen or twenty years ago I used to be very fond of flying about in anyone's private plane, but today I would not step into a private plane if I could avoid doing so. I prefer to travel on the air lines. I have had an opportunity of seeing the safety measures taken by the air lines, both in the air and on the ground, as well as the communications services and so on, which are not available to the private aeroplane. All I can say is that, if anybody wishes to fly a plane himself, he has my blessing, but I take no responsibility.

Mr. KNOWLES: I agree wholly with the minister. I was just asking for information.

Mr. ADAMSON: Many of those planes would be company-owned planes used in company operations?

Mr. HOWE: No. The planes my hon. friend speaks of would be listed as commercial planes. They would be owned and operated by companies.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to echo much of what has been said about the service given by T.C.A. I have, however, a complaint to make which, while it is of a somewhat personal nature, will, I believe, be regarded as being reasonable. I wish the seats could be placed farther apart. I think I will get support in this from the Minister of Fisheries. This would add greatly to my comfort and I hope the minister will take it into consideration.

Mr. HOWE: If the hon. member will patronize our North Star trans-Atlantic service he will find that we have put in only thirty-six seats in the space in which other competing air lines put forty-four seats. We hope that passengers of greater stature even than my hon. friend will find plenty of leg-room in the Atlantic crossing. I recommend the trip to him and I assure him that he will find it most comfortable.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish I could count on the minister complying with all my requests so quickly.

Mr. FRASER: When planes arrive in Canada from Great Britain or the United States Canadians are not allowed to pass through customs and immigration first. I know at LaGuardia and other fields in the United States, United States citizens are permitted to go through customs and immigration first.

Mr. HOWE: Several conferences have been held with customs and immigration officials in various countries. We are attempting to minimize the red tape now involved in a passenger from one country arriving in another country. No one resents more deeply than I being treated as an immigrant when entering the United States, but that happens to me and to every Canadian. The citizens of that country are taken first. We in Canada do not do that; we take them as they come. I think ours is the better method because we save the resentment which I always feel toward the other procedure.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Air service—

440. Air transport board—salaries and office expenses, $150,000.

Mr. McLURE: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that in the maritimes we have the Maritime Central Airways servicing Prince Edward Island and part of the maritimes, connecting up with the T.C.A. at Moncton. One little disadvantage we have is in getting reservations through Charlottetown via Moncton to go to Montreal and such places. We have always felt that we should have a few seats reserved on each plane up until at least a few hours before it leaves Moncton. If we could have those seats it would be a great help to maritime travellers and to maritime airways.

The minister knows that the president of T.C.A. made a statement in the committee on several occasions that Maritime Central Airways was one of the best feeder lines that the T.C.A. had. If the minister would look into that little matter about which the people are complaining once in a while, I am sure that it would meet with their approval and perhaps he could adjust it.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can say just a word. Maritime Central Airways is giving a fine service, not only to Prince Edward Island, but to such places as Pictou and the northern shore of Nova Scotia. It would be the intention of T.C.A. to give it the best of connecting service. I shall be glad to call the attention of the officials to the remarks made by my hon. friend. If any steps can be taken to improve the connection, I am sure they will be taken.

Mr. SKEY: Before six o'clock we had a fairly thorough discussion of the operations of T.C.A. and of some of the air policies in Canada. We could almost call it a probe. I should like to say a few words about it generally. I do not wish anything that I have to say to be construed as criticism of the Trans-Canada Air Lines because I think, under the circumstances and perhaps even under the direction in some cases, they have done an amazing job. As an airman, I would be the first to appreciate what they have done in carrying out their schedule of eleven return flights to England with the small number of aircraft they have.

However we have been informed that they are operating with six aircraft which were destined for the R.C.A.F.; that they are unable to operate their Pacific route; that they do not plan to operate to Sweden, and that they are in need of both aircraft and crews. To me that seems like a condemnation of the policy of the government which, in this competitive age, has led them into the position where they find themselves short of engines, short of crews and short of aircraft. It seems to me, that the government have a job of explaining to do, because, in competitive air line travel, the fact that Canada should be placed in this position is quite deplorable. They had the aircraft. They had the aircraft in the United Kingdom the end of the war. They had lots of Lancasters with which to fly the north Atlantic to Sweden and to the West Indies if they chose. They had another kind of aircraft with which they could have flown the Pacific. They had the Sunderland, a flying boat which was capable of operating out of Vancouver in the warm waters of the Pacific through the winter.

We have recently seen in the newspapers that this wonderful new aircraft in the United States will carry eighty passengers, and there has been a great deal of publicity behind it. As one who has flown Sunderlands, I should like to tell the committee that one of these aircraft took eighty people out of Greece in the dark days of 1940. I should say, eighty people and the air officer commanding's parrot. They are without a doubt the finest type of flying boat that has been developed up to the present time, with all respect to Mr. Howard Hughes and his gigantic machine.

Canada paid for these aircraft with dollars, and it was this government's policy not to bring them back here, not to take this opportunity which was open to them, as everyone informed in the business knows. In fact, as the minister is probably aware, we have been criticized by our Australian and New Zealand partners in the commonwealth for not taking the opportunity to develop our Pacific air lines as we could have done.

We are in the air age in a civil as well as a military sense. I shall have more to say about the latter when the defence estimates are before us, but in the civil age we had an opportunity, and this government have probably thrown it away for all time unless they can pick up the threads of a mismanaged job. Trans-Canada Air Lines have done well with what they had. I for one will support them in everything they try to do. I would like to see them develop still further, develop by independent-minded airmen and not by niggardly government policies. As a Progressive Conservative, I criticize the conservative policy which Canada has followed in her air operations from the close of the last. war. I cannot say too strongly to the government in this house: You have lost an opportunity, a great opportunity. You had the crews; you had the men; you had the aircraft. You discouraged the men and threw away the machines.

It will be remembered that a year ago I spoke in this house about airmen trying to get a licence to service aircraft, to operate radios to fly in this country, but by some means or another the Department of Transport managed to discourage these men.

I will say, in closing, that the government will have to operate with great energy to pick up this lost opportunity. I feel that in one way this is a criticism of public enterprise versus private enterprise. If you had given the initiative to some of the men who knew what could be done in this country, which is so adaptable in every way to air development, you might be in a better position than you are in today.

Mr. HOWE: I should not allow these remarks to go unchallenged. I am fully aware of the splendid record my hon. friend has a military flier, but the remarks he has made indicate clearly the difference between military flying and commercial flying. My hon. friend obviously would proceed without any regard whatever to earning or to balance sheets. If the hon. member for Trinity could persuade—

Mr. SKEY: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOWE: Just a minute. I did not interrupt you. Suppose you keep your seat until I have finished. If my hon. friend could persuade some of his colleagues who appear in the committee on railways and shipping to discuss the T.C.A. balance sheet, to adopt his view point, we might develop flying in this country on other lines, but we do try to keep on the basis of commercial operation.

My hon. friend says that we could have got plenty of Lancasters, and flown them across the Atlantic or the Pacific. Well, we have some Lancastrians the equal of anyone's Lancastrian planes. We used them for five years to cross the Atlantic. I would hardly wish to operate them under present conditions of competition. At the time we were operating our Lancastrians, the rates were double the present rates and we managed to break even in operating the service. To attempt to carry passengers at $325 from Montreal to London in a Lancastrian would not be profitable. I can assure my hon. friend that he could not possibly make fifty per cent of his operating expenses.

The hon. member speaks of lost opportunities to buy aircraft, and he speaks of the Sunderland.

Mr. SKEY: You owned them.

Mr. HOWE: No one would seriously attempt to operate a Sunderland flying boat commercially, especially from Canada. The weight of the boat calls for a tremendously excessive amount of gasoline to be burned per passenger, and the icing conditions on both coasts—let us not forget that we have such conditions on the Pacific as well as the Atlantic—would make Sunderlands unsafe as a means of transportating passengers to and from Canada.

The hon. member mentions lack of equipment. I would point out that we are supposed to be in equal partnership with the United Kingdom in operating from Canada to the United Kingdom, and I believe that at the present time we are carrying at least seventy per cent of the traffic against their thirty per cent. Why? Because we have more equipment.

We underestimated, it is true, the potential traffic on the north Atlantic, or at least our share of it. Had we anticipated running in excess of eleven trips a week, which we never expected at this stage of our development, we would have had more trained crews. The bottle-neck in the Atlantic is not equipment but crews. We could make many more trips with the aeroplanes than we have crews available. We are building up our operating staff as rapidly as we can. I expect to be censured next year for having too much equipment. If anyone happened to ask me what I will do with all these planes T.C.A. has on order I could not tell him, but we have always been short of equipment. We had a chance to buy exceptionally fine planes at a reasonable price. We bought twenty. If we can keep twenty North Stars busy we shall be in international aviation in a big way.

As regards refusing licences to returned airmen, I have said we have ten times as many men in aviaiton today as in 1939, all with licences and all with suitable outlets for their energies, all making a bit of money, which I do not think was a bad achievement. I do not mind fair criticism and accurate criticism, but I have never heard a man talk about civil aviation who obviously knew so little about the problems to be encountered in that direction.

Mr. SKEY: The minister has challenged me on technical grounds and I am willing to reply to him on technical grounds. His first criticism was about the numbers of aircraft. If he will recall it, he himself this afternoon said that he could use on the north Atlantic run twice the number of aircraft he has at the present time.

Mr. HOWE: If I had the crews.

Mr. SKEY: I am saying to the minister that he had the crews, only he discouraged them since the war was over; he and some of his air people, afraid of the challenge of military men in that field, were parties to that discouragement. In case the minister does not know it, the Sunderland aircraft is the military version of the Imperial Airways aircraft which flies a comparable route from the United Kingdom to Australia. We would be merely starting in about the same latitude and flying over the same route across the Pacific to the other side.

Mr. HOWE: No. There are totally different weather conditions, and I think those aircraft are being discarded. I believe there are few in operation today.

Mr. SKEY: That may be. I am talking about getting on the job. The minister had the opportunity and the aircraft to be on the job, and he missed it. That is what is bothering him now. I do not blame him for being annoyed.

Mr. HOWE: I might mention that we are the second country in the world in civil aviation, in miles flown and passengers carried.

Mr. SKEY: I am saying that we should be the first. In case the minister does not think that I know anything about civil operation—

Mr. HOWE: I am sure the hon. member does not.

Mr. SKEY: We must disagree on that, because I am practically telling the minister that he does not know anything about it either. I should like him to know that in 1938 I was one of the pilots of the Sunderland aircraft which handled the royal mail deliveries from England to Singapore, and that the military version of the same aircraft which the Imperial Airways civil pilots were flying stacked up well against them and did a better job because we delivered spare parts and many other things to the United Kingdom. However I am not going to quibble about that, except to say this to the minister. He says that Canada is carrying seventy per cent of the north Atlantic traffic and that the United Kingdom is carrying only thirty per cent.

Mr. HOWE: Between Canada and the United Kingdom.

Mr. SKEY: Let me say that is practically the only overseas traffic that Canada is carrying, whereas Britain is supporting routes to the near east and to the far east—to Australia, to New Zealand and South Africa—at the same time.

Mr. McIVOR: I will just take a minute, but I will not allow this minute to pass without expressing a word of appreciation for the efficiency of the Trans-Canada Air Lines and the department. At the lakehead we now have a terminal. The other day I was speaking to a young man, one of the officers. I said to him, "You seem to be extremely particular about having things just right." He said, "When you are dealing with human life, you have to be particular." I have not seen anything more particular and more efficient in Canada than the service rendered by Trans-Canada Air Lines. On behalf of the two cities at the lakehead, I should like to express appreciation for our being allowed to have a terminal there.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wish to ask the minister a question or two with regard to a city such as Yorkton which finds itself directly on a Trans-Canada Air Lines route. In this case the route runs from Winnipeg to Edmonton, and I believe arrangements have been made for a stop-over in Saskatoon. Yorkton is a centre in which was located a service flying training school. The airfield is still there, as are the runways, the beacon meteorological service and the directional beam. The people are naturally interested in finding out what will be necessary in order to have their airport recognized as a regular stop-over for Trans-Canada Air Lines. What are the requirements?

An hon. MEMBER: Passengers and freight.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes, and passenger service. What are the actual requirements before a place of that size could be used as a stop-over place for Trans-Canada Air Lines? What are the passenger requirements? What about the length of the runway? I understand that the runway in Saskatoon had to be elongated. The people are interested in knowing what the requirements are. I am sure that the citizens and civic organizations are anxious to comply with these requirements as far as they can. Can the minister enlighten us as to what the requirements are, and what the present situation is with regard to the likelihood of having those requirements met?

Mr. HOWE: The only physical change which would be required woud be the addition of about another five hundred feet to the runways; I understand that they are about 2,700 or 2,800 feet long. The requirements are 3,300 feet. The other requirement would be sufficient potential traffic to pay for the cost of the stop and the delay in the schedule. That will be studied by the traffic people. As my hon. friend knows, we have just started in operation over the north route. Today Yorkton is an emergency stopping-place. I am sure the officials of Trans-Canada Air Lines will be studying the situation to determine when a stop at Yorkton is justified. As my hon. friend will know, after operating over Medicine Hat and Swift Current for some seven or eight years, it was just recently that a stop was introduced at those two points. I understand that it is the intention to introduce a stop at Brandon as soon as the necessary alterations are made in the field; and I would not doubt that Yorkton might be the next stop.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would it require an application to be made by the city?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They merely make the decision regarding a stop there, on their own.

Mr. ADAMSON: I wish to say one thing more on this vexed matter of Canadian Pacific Air Lines versus any government-operated scheme in the northern territories. This is no criticism of Trans-Canada Air Lines at all. It is merely an answer, and I think it should go on the record at the same time as the rest of this debate. Criticism has been levelled at Canadian Pacific Air Lines to the effect that they might not be developing the north country in the way that some socialist scheme might develop it. There is just one thing which shows the job they have been doing, and that is the ton-miles flown. The north country is developed by getting tons of equipment into it. These are the figures which the minister was good enough to let me have this afternoon. I think they are important at this juncture. The ton-miles flown by Canadian Pacific Air Lines in 1946 were 1,150,734 compared with Trans-Canada Air Lines ton miles flown of 513,493. That is no criticism of Trans-Canada Air Lines, but it does show what job is being done by private enterprise, by Canadian Pacific Air Lines in developing the northern part of this country today.

Mr. MASSEY: I have no desire to detain the committee for more than a moment in order to ask two or three questions of the minister. As he is well aware, the T.C.A. facilities in New York city are, from the passenger point of view, pretty grim. Actually that is the front door to Canada to the American who is boarding an aircraft in New York. Now that there is considerable flying from Europe to a New York port and thence on into Canada, it seems to me that the passenger who is entering Canada for the first time gets a rather perverted view of what we are like. This is no criticism of the personnel who have the usual Trans-Canada Air Lines courtesy; but the facilities in New York are far from desirable Can the minister inform the committee what plans are in mind or in project for the improvement of those facilities?

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend mean the T.C.A. facilities?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: We were latecomers at LaGuardia field and took the only accommodation we could get, which was at the end of the ramp. Our traffic is handled at the field by American Air Lines. There is congestion at LaGuardia airport. As I understand it, there will be a reassignment of space when Idylwilde opens. The transcontinental and transocean lines will be moved to Idylwilde; the local lines will have more space at LaGuardia; certain other traffic will move to Newark, and I believe private flying will go to a fourth field in that area, so that after a while there should be some relief. In the meantime I think we are doing as well as we can with the space we are able to get.

Mr. MASSEY: I think the minister will agree that a little paint and a few bits of attractive furniture might add to the appearance of the space we now have.

Mr. HOWE: That is true.

Mr. MASSEY: It is very dirty. The personnel are perfectly clean and treat the passengers very well, as I have said, but the facilities are not good and I think they can be improved.

My second question is whether there is any idea in mind at all of the island airport at Toronto being used at any time by T.C.A., by extending the runway.

Mr. HOWE: No; T.C.A. has no plans for the island airport. There are too many obstructions in the area and too many difficulties as compared with Malton, which is almost an ideal airport from a flyer's point of view. No matter how long the runways were, the island airport would be unsatisfactory for T.C.A.

Mr. MASSEY: Are any plans projected for additional direct runs from Toronto to Montreal, without the Ottawa stop, and vice versa?

Mr. HOWE: One service runs direct now, leaving Montreal at 1.35 o'clock in the afternoon and arriving in Toronto at 3.55 o'clock, and there is a corresponding service the other way. It is just a matter of studying traffic requirements. We are a little underequipped in the Montreal-Winnipeg area at present, and I dare say there will be additional non-stop trips later.

Mr. MASSEY: Then, as perhaps the minister may have noted himself, if for any reason there is a delay in the take-off, I have observed at several different airports that you are told there will be a ten-minute delay; then it is a fifteen-minute delay, then thirty minutes, then forty minutes and fifty minutes. I quite realize there are times when it is quite impossible to forecast the length of a delay, but on one or two occasions I have taken the trouble to ascertain the reason for the delay, and certainly when the delay occurred it should have been know that it would amount to at least an hour. It is very unsatisfactory to passengers to have the departure time put back three or four times, and I think T.C.A. is a bit remiss in that direction.

When the aircraft were first put into service by T.C.A. they were of the Lodestar type, and accordingly the head room was somewhat limited and a restriction was placed upon the height of the stewardesses. Now the aircraft are of a very different type, and even the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, who finds it difficult to sit down comfortably, can stand at full height in the passageway of the aircraft. Therefore it seems to me that stewardesses should not continue to be restricted to a height of five feet five inches, which I believe is the present limit. Has there been any idea of changing the specifications of the stewardesses?

Mr. HOWE: I have heard no complaints from the travelling public about our small stewardesses. It is some advantage not having to carry too much weight through the air, and probably we shall keep to the present standards.

Mr. MASSEY: Quite seriously, and I imagine many hon. members have been approached by graduate nurses who are anxious to become stewardesses on T.C.A., But who are five feet six inches or five feet seven inches in height, and as a result are not considered, it does seem to me it would be quite reasonable to consider a girl who is a little taller. I was not questioning the weight; I was thinking of height.

Operation and maintenance—
446. Radio aviation services, $1,231,580.

Mr. SKEY: What type of blind landing equipment is being considered by PICAO for standardization, and what type is the Canadian government recommending?

Mr. HOWE: Canada has standardized on the ILS; that is the instrument landing system operated by the pilot from the plane. Some eleven installations are now in process of construction at our principal airports from Halifax to Victoria. We believe that from the practical point of view the ILS has advantages over any other system, and our pilots share that view. The pilot likes to be responsible for the plane, rather than depend upon a man on the ground telling him what to do. We believe the efficiency of the line will be greatly improved when these installations are completed and the necessary training has been done.

Mr. SKEY: I agree with the minister as to the efficiency of the installations. I was wondering if the department was considering installing the ground controlled landing equipment at overseas airports, to give the benefit of this equipment to aircraft of other lines which may be carrying it.

Mr. HOWE: No. The R.C.A.F. have installed that system at one or two points, notably at Rockcliffe near Ottawa, and we are studying their operations. If we find that any purpose can be served by having both systems we shall be glad to consider it.

Air service—civil aviation division—

447. Grants to organizations for the development of civil aviation, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $30,500.

Mr. ADAMSON: I see there are three grants under this item, one to the university of Manitoba, one to the Canadian flying clubs association and the third to the national research council, which is by far the largest of the three. First, I want to ask, what qualifies a flying club for a grant? My second question is in relation to the national research council. Does this represent all that is being done to promote experimentation and research in civil aviation, or is that carried on in some other way as well? Despite our drive for economy, it seems to me that $25,000 is a very small sum, if that is the total.

Mr. HOWE: In the early days of flying clubs, grants were voted by parliament and paid to the clubs on a certain scale. I dare say there would have been no flying clubs today if that policy had not been followed. That was the practice up to the time war broke out. Then, as my hon. friend knows, the clubs were given contracts with the R.C.A.F. to train pilots, and they all became wealthy. Today we are not giving grants to flying clubs. The item of $5,000 is a grant to the association of flying clubs to pay for its secretariat, but the flying clubs are on their own and, I understand, are doing very well.

As far as the item of $25,000 goes, that is only to provide for special research ordered by the department. Aeronautical research at the laboratories of the national research council is paid for under an appropriation of the council itself, and is on a scale wholly out of proportion to this amount of $25,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does the minister know offhand how much it is?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know. The council maintains an airport of its own. It is working on frost and winter conditions in relation to aircraft. It has a wind tunnel, and it conducts experiments with models. They do work on jets particularly, and freezing, which is the main problem in connection with jets. I would say that a considerable part of its income must be devoted to studies of aviation.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is Professor Parkin still there?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: In many of the smaller centres of Canada there are airdromes which may be described as the residue of the empire air training plan. As the minister knows, many of these communities want to keep these airports in operation, and I should like to know if the department has any policy by which these smaller airports can be assisted and kept in operation?

Mr. HOWE: If the airport is a key port on a transcontinental line it is maintained by the department, or an arrangement is made with the municipality to keep the airport up to departmental standards. If it is an off-line airport the city or municipality is given an opportunity to lease it for $1 a year. As long as they maintain it as an airport they are permitted to operate it in any way they like. Many smaller centres have taken advantage of the offer and have taken over local airports for local purposes.

Mr. SKEY: Has the minister any knowledge as to whether some of the smaller centres are able to stand the cost of operating these airports?

Mr. HOWE: The operating cost is what they wish to make it. They are not required to keep them up to any standard. As far as I know, no one is going into the red ink through operating a local airport.

Air service—radio division—

450. Administration of the Radio Act and regulations, $193,320.

Mr. FLEMING: This brings us to four items under the general heading, "Radio Division." I should like to make a few remarks with regard to the chaotic system under which the administration and the control of radio and broadcasting are being continued under three departments and two ministers when common sense would dictate that the administration should be brought under one department and one minister. In saying what I am about to say I do not intend to enter into the subject matter of the final report which was tabled earlier this evening from the radio committee, or the earlier report which came from that committee and which was tabled in the house last Friday evening. I am informed that the government has given an undertaking that full opportunity will be afforded the house to discuss those reports on a suitable occasion this week. Therefore hon. members may be assured that in forgoing the opportunity to discuss more widely the question of radio broadcasting at this time, they are not forgoing that opportunity for the entire session. This matter is of such leading importance that this house has no right to prorogue without having discussed it fully. In view of that undertaking which I understand the government has given I shall confine my remarks to certain aspects of the situation created by the present system of administration and control by the government.

Radio and broadcasting at the present time are regulated under two statutes of this parliament, the Broadcasting Act of 1936 and the Radio Act of 1938. Under both of those acts certain functions were assigned to the minister named in each act, and it happens that in the case of both acts the minister named was the Minister of Transport. We have the amazing situation today that the hon. gentleman who holds the portfolio of Minister of Transport has nothing to do either with the functions assigned to the Minister of Transport under the Radio Act or with the functions assigned to the Minister of Transport under the Broadcasting Act.

The effect of the Broadcasting Act of 1936 was to give certain functions and powers to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and also to the Minister of Transport. The effect of the Radio Act of 1938 was to give the Minister of Transport the power to license radio stations. He alone is the fountain of licences for broadcasting in Canada. Under the present system he seeks the advice and recommendations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; but, as I say, he is the sole fountain of licences. His radio division has been ordered by the government to carry on this form of administration.

The committee will recall that when these acts were passed the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) was Minister of Transport. When the war came along and he was appointed Minister of Munitions and Supply he took with him certain functions of the Minister of Transport, even though he was relinquishing the portfolio of transport. He took with him the functions assigned under both these acts to the Minister of Transport.

There followed a series of orders in council under which jurisdiction which was vested by these two acts in the Minister of Transport was juggled, with this curious result. First, we had order in council 3076, dated July 8, 1940, which provided that the duties, powers and functions vested in the Minister of Transport under various acts, and the radio services of the Department of Transport under the Broadcasting Act of 1936, were transferred to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. The next order in council was 3435, dated July 25, 1940, which conferred upon the Minister of Munitions and Supply the duties, powers and functions vested in the Minister of Transport under the Radio Act of 1938. Then came order in council 8207, dated October 24, 1944, under which the duties, powers and functions in respect to the radio services, Department of Transport, and under the Radio Act of 1938 and other acts, were transferred to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. There was a further order in council, P.C. 6552, dated October 18, 1945, under which the functions of the Minister of Transport under the Broadcasting Act were conferred upon the minister who was Minister of National War Services and who is today the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). The portfolio of national war services being in course of liquidation, we can expect a further order in council vesting in the Minister of National Revenue the powers assigned to the Minister of Transport under the Broadcasting Act.

That situation is a hodgepodge. There are three departments involved and two ministers. We have the curious anomaly where the minister now holding the portfolio of transport has nothing to do with two important branches of the Department of Transport, the one which we discussed earlier this evening, namely, air services, including civil aviation and meteorological services, and, second, this radio division. It is anomalous also that the control of radio, including the licensing of stations for the purposes of broadcasting, should be vested in one minister. and then that other jurisdiction should be vested in still another minister by the act which establishes the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and gives it its sweeping powers, including its powers over private broadcasting in Canada. I urge upon the committee that that anomaly should not be allowed to continue. If the right hon. gentleman who holds the portfolio of reconstruction and supply is, with the will of the government, to continue to hold and exercise the functions of Minister of Transport in respect of the Radio Act of 1938 and the functions of the Minister of Transport in respect of air service, it would certainly seem to be the part of common sense that the functions of the Minister of Transport under the Broadcasting Act of 1938 now exercised by the Minister of National War Services, who is now the Minister of National Revenue, should also be vested in the right hon. gentleman who holds the portfolio of reconstruction and supply. That anomaly and that puzzling situation constitute I submit, a source of constant confusion. The confusion is evident among hon. members in the questions they ask from time to time in the house. The situation is confusing also to members of the radio committee, and it is high time that the government take the matter in hand and take the sensible course of bringing both jurisdictions, namely jurisdiction under the Radio Act and under the Broadcasting Act, under the one minister.

Here is the situation that was recently before the radio committee in a very striking form. It is quite possible that government policy may lead in one direction in respect of the administration of the Broadcasting Act by one minister and that it may lead in quite a different direction through the other minister, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, in respect of the licensing functions he enjoys under the Radio Act.

In the radio committee quite recently we had this amazing situation. After extensive submissions had been made to the committee looking toward confiding in an independent tribunal both certain of the powers given under the Broadcasting Act to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the licensing powers of the minister under the Radio Act, a brief was introduced before the committee, presumably from the radio division of the Department of Transport, which had not been asked for by the committee—an amazing situation! But the controller of the radio division of the Department of Transport, an official who functions under the Minister of Reconstruction, introduced into the committee a brief in the minister's absence, which brief I repeat had not been asked for. That brief undertook to give statements of opinion in relation to policy, statements of opinion which were intended to answer opinions submitted to the committee by those who were seeking the establishment of an independent tribunal for the purposes I have mentioned. On further inquiry, it transpired that the Minister of Reconstruction, to whom the official was responsible, disclaimed all knowledge of the brief and disclaimed any responsibility for it. Here was a committee of the House of Commons receiving and considering a brief submitted on the letterhead of the Department of Transport, Ottawa, which was disclaimed by the minister who exercises the functions of the Minister of Transport in respect of radio under the Radio Act. That is a sample of the sort of thing that happens and is likely to continue to happen so long as we permit the condition to continue where we have two ministers and three departments all mixed up in the one matter.

The minister's disclaimer of any responsibility for this brief was not conveyed to the committee by himself, as I think ought to have been done, but second-hand by the chairman of the committee.

Now that the committee has submitted its final report and comment on the matter is permissible under the rules, let me say that I introduced a motion in the committee that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply should be invited to come before the committee and state how things like this are permitted to happen, how a senior official of the radio division takes it upon himself to prepare a brief answering submissions which had been made to that committee with respect to a change in government policy. My motion was that the minister be invited to appear before the committee and explain how all that could happen without his authority. The Liberal and C.C.F. majority on that committee with one exception, the hon. member for New Westminster, whom I compliment on not being a party to that Liberal-C.C.F. majority on the committee, turned down the motion, and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply accordingly was not invited to come before the committee to make a statement on this question.

I ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply not merely to take in hand this curious anomaly that has been permitted to continue in respect of three departments and two ministers, not merely to explain how this brief, dealing with far-reaching questions of policy, was permitted to be written by a senior official of his department and be presented to the committee, but also to say how he, the representative of the government in respect of the licensing functions of government under the Radio Act reacts to the submissions in this brief. To what extent does this brief, which I am sure he must have seen and read by now, represent government policy? All that the members of the committee and the members of this house know is this, that this brief has been presented by the senior official of the radio division, that the minister, through the chairman of the committee, has disclaimed, second-hand, all knowledge of the preparation of the brief and of its contents and disclaimed any responsibility for it. Nevertheless the brief appears on the letterhead of the Department of Transport, and it unquestionably left on the minds of many members of that committee the firm impression that this brief bespoke government policy. I am prepared, Mr. Chairman, to give expression to more than a surmise that that brief had very much to do with shaping the terms of the final report which was read in this house tonight. I am not going to discuss that report now but shall reserve what I have to say on it for the opportunity which the government has promised us we shall have later this week to discuss it. But I say that that brief, in the form in which it was submitted and in the circumstances in which it appeared before the committee, could not fail to convey to the members of the committee, particularly the Liberal members, the firm impression that the brief represented government policy. It was evident to members of the committee from that point on that there was much less sympathy for the proposal which had seemed up to that time to have had a substantial measure of acceptance in the committee, namely, the proposal that the regulatory powers of the broadcasting corporation over private stations and the licensing functions of the minister under the Radio Act should be vested in some independent regulatory tribunal with powers and functions and jurisdiction similar to those exercised by the Board of Transport Commissioners in the field of transportation.

These are serious matters. The issue to which I have referred was undoubtedly the most important one confronting the radio committee this year. The circumstances to which I have referred have undoubtedly had a substantial effect in shaping the attitude of certain members on the radio committee, culminating in the issuance of the majority report which was read here tonight, and which was opposed by members of the Progressive Conservative party and also by the eminent member of the Social Credit party who sits on the radio committee. I think the committee is entitled to know from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply whether this brief, now that he has had a full opportunity to peruse it, now that he knows, I trust, the effect it has had on the minds of the Liberals and C.C.F. majority in the committee, again with the exception of the hon. member for New Westminster, meets with his approval. He owes it to the committee to say where he stands with reference to this brief. Does this brief contain a true statement of government policy? If it does not, will the minister say that he not only disclaims any responsibility for the contents of the report but state emphatically that the report does not represent government policy but is an expression of what is not government policy.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised that my hon. friend is confused about the relationship of the various departments. After hearing him explain what I thought was a very simple relationship, I am almost confused myself. He speaks of three departments being involved and then he proceeds to eliminate one himself, thus leaving two. I thought the functions of each were quite distinct. Perhaps I might run over them once again. I have been over the ground before in the radio committee in other years and in the house. First, the Radio Act; the hon. member speaks about 1938. The Radio Act is about as old as confederation.

Mr. FLEMING: The Radio Act was passed in 1938.

Mr. HOWE: Amendments to the Radio Act.

Mr. FLEMING: The present act is the Radio Act, 1938.

Mr. HOWE: The Radio Act was passed in 1902. If my hon. friend will go back into the records of the Department of Marine, one of the predecessors of the Department of Transport, he will find the Radio Act very much as it is today. The functions of the—

Mr. FLEMING: If the minister will permit me; if he will look up the statutes of 1938 he will find the Radio Act of 1938. I have a copy in my hand, which is an act with respect to radio, assented to in 1938. It is always referred to as the Radio Act, 1938. I know there was another Radio Act before that.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will read the act of 1902 he will find that it is not very much different. The reason there is a Radio Act is that someone had to control the wave lengths of the spectrum. In the spectrum there are wave lengths that have to do with broadcasting; there are wave lengths that have to do with wireless telegraphy; there are other wave lengths that have to do with the control of radio beams; there are other wave lengths used for police broadcasting, and there are certain wave lengths reserved for ship to shore telegraph, safety of ships and so forth; but one important function is to make sure that, once a wave length is assigned, that particular wave length is the one used and that the signal does not stray over into another band or into another wave length. It is the duty of the administration of the Radio Act to be the policeman of the air.

At the present time a large part of the staff of the radio division is at Atlantic City, for what purpose? To reassign all the wave lengths of the spectrum and to work out the use of these wave lengths between all the countries of the world. It is true that broadcasting wave lengths are involved in that discussion, but it is only a minor part of the whole discussion. The policing and assignment of the wave lengths of the spectrum is an important duty of government, of this or any other government. It can be discharged only by government, and it is discharged only by government in any part of the world. So much for the radio. As I say, for many years the Radio Act was in the Department of Marine. When there was a consolidation of the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Marine the work of administration of the Radio Act was brought into the Department of Transport.

By act of parliament the Prime Minister is given the privilege of assigning the duties of government to any minister that he may decide to make the assignment to. In 1940 the Prime Minister assigned the work of the air branch of the Department of Transport to the Minister of Munitions and Supply and later to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. When my hon. friend becomes Prime Minister he will have the duty of making these assignments himself, but perhaps in the meantime he will let the duly authorized authority carry out that function which has been given to him by parliament. So much for the reason why the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is at the moment administering the air service branch of the Department of Transport under which is the Radio Act.

Let us trace the broadcasting side. Broadcasting was another function of the Department of Marine. It was formerly carried out as a side issue of the air service administration of the Department of Marine. Along about 1930 the radio commission was set up and the duty of administering broadcasting was turned over to it. Then in 1936 the present Broadcasting Act, or something similar to it, was passed and the work of broadcasting was turned over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. If my hon. friend will read that act he will find that all matters of policy affecting broadcasting are the function of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Therefore, if anyone has any question on broadcasting policy he does not need to look to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply; he does not need to look to any other minister. His relations are confined solely to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

So far as the Radio Act is concerned, that part of the spectrum which is used for broadcasting is assigned only on the recommendation of the Department of Transport. Any hon. member who has been a member of the radio broadcasting committee is well aware of that fact, because testimony to that effect is given to that committee every year.

We shall now come down to the question that is exciting my hon. friend, namely, the brief submitted to the committee by Mr. Browne, director of radio. Mr. Browne was called before the committee, by whom I do not know. It was not through me. I presume that the committee clerk sent a message to Mr. Browne saying that he should appear before the committee. He has appeared before the committee every year. He appears in his capacity as director of radio and he appears because the committee sends for him. It does not send for the minister or ask him to delegate someone; it sends for Mr. Browne. In this case Mr. Browne is leading the delegation to Atlantic City which has been in session for some months and will be for some further months. Before going he felt that the work and the time that he had put in, in following the work of the committee should be capitalized on in some way. The result was that he wrote a report of his views on the evidence that had been submitted thus far. He did not refer it to the deputy minister; he did not refer it to the minister. He handed it over to the clerk or to the chairman, I am not sure which, of the radio committee. No one was more surprised than myself when I heard that there had been a report no one was more surprised than the deputy minister.

My hon. friend says that undoubtedly I have read it and considered it since then. I have not seen it since then. I was told by the chairman that there was some report. He gave me a summary of what was in it. He wanted to know if it was government policy. I said: "It is not government policy or my policy or anyone else's policy." There is no reason why I should have a policy because it is not a function of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply to have a policy on radio. That is the responsibility of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Mr. Browne, as I say, was called as a witness before the committee by the committee. He felt it his duty, since as he was leaving the city for an extended period, to supply his views. If he had asked my opinion as to whether that was his duty, I would have said that his duty would have been to submit it through his senior officer. However, he did not take that view, and I made haste to say that the views contained in that brief were the views of Mr. Browne, who prepared it and submitted it on his own responsibility. I hope I have made the position clear. My hon. friend gets confused about three departments and two ministers, but I assure him that the work of one no more overlaps the work of the other than my work as Minister of Reconstruction overlaps with the work of external affairs.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has indicated that he has not seen the brief since the issue arose in the committee and that it does not represent his views or government policy. Do I understand that there is no government policy opposed to vesting in an independent regulatory board or tribunal the regulatory functions of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation over private stations under the Broadcasting Act and licensing powers of the minister under the Radio Act, and that government policy is not opposed to vesting these powers in an independent regulatory board?

Mr. HOWE: I have been a member of the government for a considerable period and a fairly regular attendant at meetings of council, and I have never heard the government asked to express a policy on that, nor have I ever seen a report indicating why a policy should be expressed. The policy on broadcasting is a function of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Unless the government is asked for a decision by the corporation, it has been in the past, and, I think, will be in the future, quite satisfied to leave the matter of broadcasting policy to the corporation.

Mr. FLEMING: One further question arising out of the minister's answer. May I ask the minister whether he has any objection or sees any obstacle in the way of his taking over the functions of the minister under the Broadcasting Act. If he is to continue to exercise the functions of the minister under the Radio Act, is there any reason why he should not also exercise the functions of minister under the Broadcasting Act?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: There is no reason why I should or should not. There is no relation between the two functions. There is no relation between the administration of the Radio Act and the administration of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. At one time I was administering both, when I was Minister of Transport and subsequently for a time. During the war it was considered wise—and I agreed with the decision—that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should report to another minister. There is absolutely no reason why it should report to the minister who administers the Radio Act.

Mr. HANSELL: I rise to say a word in the present discussion since I am on the radio committee and take a good deal of interest in my work there.

Mr. HOWE: Are you the distinguished member referred to by my hon. friend?

Mr. FLEMING: The answer is yes.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member has answered yes, and I thank him for the compliment.

Mr. HOWE: A very apt description.

Mr. HANSELL: It comes from him and not from me.

Mr. KNOWLES: What kind of marriage is this?

Mr. HANSELL: I will not discuss the radio committee's reports because we have had the courtesy extended to us by the minister that the opportunity will be given at a later time for the consideration of that report when a bill is to be brought down to the house. But there is some merit in what the hon. member for Eglinton has said with respect to three separate departments of government all having a finger in the radio pie. I have listened to the minister's explanation and I am sorry to say he did not tell us anything we did not already know.

Mr. HOWE: Hear, hear. I was trying to explain that to my hon. friend in this corner. He did not know.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Eglinton knew too. What I have been listening for is a justification for having three separate ministries looking after two acts with respect to radio. I could understand perhaps that there might be some justification for two ministers. I can quite understand that there is a difference between the functioning of a radio licensing authority, that is an authority that licenses radio stations for the purpose of broadcasting, because, as the minister has already explained, there are various types of air channels, some of which are taken up by the different kinds of services in Canada requiring these channels. I can also quite understand how there could perhaps be another responsibility imposed upon the minister with respect to radio broadcasting as it is generally known in Canada for entertainment and commercial purposes. But why there should be a third, I am at a loss to understand.

Mr. HOWE: Can my hon. friend explain to me what the third minister does?

Mr. HANSELL: If he does not do anything, then I am more bewildered than ever, because we find here an item in connection with the radio division under the Department of Transport. If the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply wants to know what the Minister of Transport thinks, there is the Minister of Transport now. No, he is not there. He was there a moment ago but he has fled now.

An hon. MEMBER: He is there.

Mr. HANSELL: Oh, he has suddenly become a backbencher. Well, the very fact that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is now piloting through this estimate under the Department of Transport indicates that there cannot be any reason for three ministries looking after radio in Canada. I do not think I need to say any more and I do not know that it affects me so greatly, but it does seem strange to me. As an illustration, suppose we take the Department of Transport. Suppose we should discover suddenly that under the Minister of Transport there should come into existence another minister whose responsibility it is to determine where railway lines should run and where they should be built. If after a while, a third minister should suddenly appear upon the scene as a sort of connecting link between the government and the actual functioning of the railway business in Canada, we would think a divided ministry in respect of transportation would be a strange thing. Some of us are wondering why it is any the less strange for three ministers to be occupied with radio in Canada. As far as the public are concerned, I do not know whether it makes much difference. I suppose John Jones out in the street here does not know very much about whether it is under three ministers or one.

Mr. MacNICOL: And cares less.

Mr. HANSELL: But from the point of view of efficiency in government, it does seem that it could very well come under one ministry.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said that the two functions do not come together, the functions of one minister and the functions of the other. The question of licences comes under both ministers. Despite what the brief says—and it was written by Mr. Browne and fathered by none—I cannot for the life of me see why there cannot be a proper tribunal to license broadcasting in this country. It seems to me most necessary that it should be done, especially in view of all the controversy now going on.

I just wish to make one or two other observations. We had set before us in the radio committee some statistics in connection with licensing and licence fees collected. I will defy any member of the House of Commons to go through this thing and make any head or tail of it. For instance, we have here administration of radio, $189,000. I understand that some of that goes into the collection of fees, but I do not know. Then we have the issue of radio licences, $241,000 in the estimates. We have here in this brief which we received, that the total cost of administration, as a matter of fact, in connection with the collection of radio fees, was $237,000 last year, and yet this year they want $241,000. Let us look at another picture. We have here total licences issued, 4,406,964. Those are licences issued. Now we go over to another page and we find receiving licence fees, $4,099,795. Then we go back over to this first figure and we find the cost of collection of the $4,406,000—to work it out you take 12·36 per cent of $4,406,000—is $543,000. You go over to another place on this thing and it gives you what the total cost of collection was: $206,500, plus $237,388, or $413,888. Then we have net revenue of $3,905,000, when we first of all had licence fees issued, $4,406,000, and yet had costs of $543,000 to collect it. The difference between the amount collected, $4,406,000, and the net, $3,905,000, is only $501,000. There certainly must be some confusion in the department itself, with this document we have here, because the whole thing does not make sense. You can go through it from top to bottom and you cannot make anything balance. You cannot make anything jibe. The question I should like to ask is, what was the total amount of revenue collected from private broadcasting stations and how much was turned over to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. HOWE: For receiving licences, the amount of cash collected was $4,099,795.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not want the amount of cash collected. I want to know what the total amount of fees was and I want to know how much it cost to collect them.

Mr. HOWE: The number of licences issued were: private receiving station licences at $2.50 each, 1,584,710.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just while the minister is on that, might I ask—

Mr. HOWE: Just let me finish my statement, because it will upset the hon. member worse if he tries to add this.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What was the amount given?

Mr. HOWE: It was 1,584,710 licences at $2.50 apiece. Then we sold 231,470 licences at $2 apiece. Transmitting stations were 111, which also paid fees.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not asking for that.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member has them.

Mr. ROSS: I just want the receiving licences.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member has those. There are two kinds, for the electric sets and for the battery sets. I gave the figures on those. If you multiply those by the appropriate figure you will get the gross collections. However I might point out that the department does not collect the gross, because commissions are allowed to post offices and various agencies. The gross amount received by the department in cash was $4,099,795.15, plus transmitting licences of $44,550, making a total gross paid to the department of $4,143,345.14.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What did the broadcasting corporation receive?

Mr. HOWE: The net revenue to the Canadian broadcasting corporation was $3,905,841.17.

Mr. FLEMING: Can the minister give us the cost of collection which was deducted before the fees came into the hands of the Department of Transport? Has he that figure? In the same return I find the costs of the Department of Transport given as $206,388.40, and there were other costs of $31,115.57. The note states that the last item includes all costs additional to direct Department of Transport costs and involves salaries of staff of treasury branch engaged in licence work, rental of space occupied by the licensing organization, and so on; but the return does not give us the total of collection costs.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to give a break-down of that. The total gross cost of collection was $544,672.85. The commissions deducted at the source amounted to $307,169.20; the cost of administration was $237,503.65. I think my hon. friend will find that accounts for everything.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then it cost roughly $544,000 to collect $4,406,964.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the minister think that is economical?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I think so. That is about twelve per cent, or around thirty cents a licence. I think the hon. gentleman will find that other countries collecting licence fees in this way would consider that a reasonable cost of collection. I would remind my hon. friend that this involves the handling of some 2,000,000 pieces of paper, 2,000,000 separate transactions; and for that service I think the cost is reasonable.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How large a staff is required to collect that amount of money?

Mr. HOWE: A salaried staff of sixty-four.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then does the minister think a man with a radio should be penalized to the extent of $2.50 just because he has that radio? Does he not think each individual should be licensed, or does he think it should be the radio? Why not license washing-machines?

Mr. HOWE: Well, it seems to me the man who wants to use a radio should properly pay for the service. We pay for most services we get in this country. If my hon. friend wants a washing-machine he buys one. If he wants entertainment in his home I see no reason why he should not pay for it. The cost is very reasonable.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): To a certain extent I agree with the minister; but if you license one radio, why should you not license ten radios? You are licensing the radio; you are not licensing the man who listens to it. It is the man who should be licensed, the man who gets the benefit of the service. If a man has five radios he still buys only one license. A poor old pensioner who gets only $30 a month has to pay the same $2.50. That is the point; the principle of licensing is wrong. And I venture to say that it does not cost 12 per cent to collect money for the consolidated revenue fund of this country. I believe another method of collecting fees of this kind for the corporation might be looked into to great advantage.

Mr. HOWE: I once shared the view advanced by my hon. friend that each separate radio should pay a tax, and the law so provided for two or three years. Several reasons were advanced against that point of view. A man might have a radio in every room in his house, but he can listen to only one at a time. The second reason was that we were making too many offenders out of the population of Canada. In other words, they had to report the number of radios they had, and we were not always sure they were accurate. So we came to the conclusion that for practical reasons we would license the place rather than the set.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have only one more question and then I am through; it is in connection with the prosecutions which took place under the act. I find this matter very interesting. I notice that there were 11,624 prosecutions for not having licences, but the point which interests me is that in Ontario there were 7,572 prosecutions, while the next highest province had only 1,164, in Quebec. There were only 109 in New Brunswick, 191 in British Columbia, 734 in Alberta, and so on. Could the minister say why there should be over 7,000 prosecutions in Ontario and so few in the other provinces? That does not seem logical to me, because I do not believe the people of Ontario are any worse than the people of any other province in reference to evading the payment of these fees.

Mr. HOWE: All I can say is that the number of prosecutions conforms to the number of violations reported. It may be that our staff in Ontario is more efficient in spotting violations, but as far as the department is concerned we only prosecute when we have the report of a violation. When we receive such a report it is handed to the proper officers and the prosecution follows.

Demobilization and reconversion—
Air service—civil aviation division—
596. Radio aviation services, $1,948,455.

Mr. McLURE: On looking up the details of this item on page 281 of the estimates, I find what I have brought to the attention of several ministers in connection with other items, namely, that the provision for temporary assistance accounts for the greater part of this vote. In this case the amount for temporary assistance is $1,023,480. I have asked several of the ministers so far to explain this point, and I must say my question has not been answered very satisfactorily. Perhaps the minister might be able to give me something definite as to what this is for, and so on.

Mr. HOWE: I think I can do that. The purpose of this vote is to administer installations that are purely for war. The men involved, paid out of the vote, are temporary employees, and today their services are temporary. For instance, I will give my hon. friend a list of the services paid for out of this vote. There is the radio range at Yellowknife, at Graham, at Gore Bay, at Wiarton, at Sarnia, at Cape Ray, at Cape North, at New Waterford, at Sandspit and at Mount Hayes. There is the requirement of the point-to-point Atlantic stations. These are services which were war services and have not yet been incorporated into the civilian services of the department. My hon. friend will find that this vote is much smaller, although this particular item is somewhat larger than it was last year. However, this is a disappearing item. I suppose this is the last year there will be demobilization estimates. By that time we will sort out the services which require to be incorporated into our system, and the services which can be abandoned.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
Air service—civil aviation division—
597. Care, operation and maintenance of Royal Canadian Air Force airfields transferred to the Department of Transport, $374,800.
Mackenzie river route—operation, maintenance, and acquisition of equipment—now included in normal estimates.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would direct the attention of the minister to the last four lines in the estimate. Where, in the normal estimates, are the votes pertaining to the Mackenzie river route?

Mr. HOWE: They are in vote 445, for civil aviation services.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
Air service—civil aviation division—
598. North East (Crimson) staging route—maintenance of airfields, $25,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the reduction in this item mean that the amount is being transferred somewhere else, or that the maintenance of this route is being abandoned?

Mr. HOWE: That was never really a route, so far as war operations were concerned. Churchill is now to be taken over by the army. The Pas airfield will continue to be operated on a civilian basis. Southampton island is on a maintenance basis, with just a watchman in charge.

Mr. ADAMSON: These are airports built by the Americans during the war, are they?

Mr. HOWE: Not necessarily by the Americans. The Pas was built by Canada, and I believe Churchill was largely built by Canada. The Americans built Southampton island.

Demobilization and reconversion—
Air service—civil aviation division—
Alaska communications system—
599. Additions and betterments, including transport equipment, capital, $216,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is a new item. Would the minister give the details of it?

Mr. HOWE: The funds are required for the continued operation and maintenance of the Canadian portion of the so-called Alaska communications system from Edmonton to Fairbanks. This system was formerly operated by the United States army. This is a capital vote. It is capital which it is estimated will be required in operating telegraph and telephone lines between Edmonton and Alaska.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is, the lines over which Canadian Pacific Air Lines operates in part on its own and in part on behalf of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. HOWE: Part of it is through service and relates to American operations in Alaska.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
Air service—civil aviation division—
Alaska communications system—
600. To provide for the difference between the expenditures for operation and maintenance and revenue accruing from operations during the year ending March 31, 1948, not exceeding $682,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister give a break-down of this item?

Mr. HOWE: It is as follows:

Revenues
Lease of lines to U.S. government	$271,000
Lease of lines to Department of Transport	103,000
Lease of lines to airline operator	35,000
Commercial traffic and other leases	191,000
		$600,000
Expenses

Salaries and wages—Permanent	$690,920
Salaries and Wages—Temporary	1,080
Salaries and wages—Casual	20,000
Allowances—Board	71,200
Travelling expenses	64,475
Teletype rental	470
Printing and stationery	2,126
Materials, supplies and equipment	331,663
Freight, express and cartage	24,000
Management fee—3 per cent	37,337
Allowances—Living	10,000
Pension charges	24,925
Sundries	3,804
		$1,282,000
Estimated operating deficit 1947-1948		$ 682,000

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. FRASER: This is a loss being taken on the operations in that section?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: And it is a new operation?

Mr. HOWE: It was operating throughout the period of the war. It was built by the United States government and was purchased by the Canadian government. For a time it was operated by the Royal Canadian Air Force. For reasons of economy it was turned over to the Department of Transport for operation. That department made an operating agreement with the Canadian National Telegraphs. The statement I have just given is the expected revenue and expected cost of operation by Canadian National Telegraphs.

Mr. FRASER: Will this be in next year?

Mr. HOWE: I should think so.

Mr. GREEN: Why is this not shown in the ordinary estimates? I understand that it has to do with the Alaska communications system. The Department of Transport will be handling that each year. Why is it shown as a demobilization and reconversion vote rather than in the ordinary estimates?

Mr. HOWE: We are demobilizing at the present time. We took it over only last spring, and we are changing it from war to peacetime operations. By next year we shall know what to include in the permanent estimate, and shall include it accordingly.

Mr. GREEN: But it is to be kept by the Department of Transport?

Mr. HOWE: That is the present intention.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
Radio division—
601. Administration of the Radio Act and regulations, $252,520.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why is this not in the main estimates? While I am on my feet, I should like to make it clear that I am not in favour of licensing every radio in every house, just in case I might be misunderstood. Why does this not come under the other estimates for the Department of Transport?

Mr. HOWE: This has not anything to do with radio. There is some misunderstanding in this respect. Some people seem to think the radio branch has nothing to do but look after radio broadcasting. I suppose radio broadcasting takes about two per cent of the time and attention of the administration of the Radio Act. This has to do with the real functions of the radio branch of the Department of Transport, and is in connection with the acquisition of two transmitters for the radio ionospherics stations at St. John's, Newfoundland, and Clyde River, Northwest Territories, in replacement of obsolete and uneconomical present equipment, to the cost of $30,000. This is an appropriation for the technical and clerical staff at Ottawa headquarters and district offices engaged in administering services which were developed during the war and which are necessary functions in the normal peace-time administration of the act. Provision is also made for the full operating expenses of radio monitoring stations at Hartlen Point, Nova Scotia; Winnipeg and Vancouver, and for a portion of the expense of the Ottawa and Strathburn stations, and for two ionospherics stations at St. John's and Clyde River in Arctic bay.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is vote 450 for the administration of the Radio Act and regulations not for the same purpose as this vote?

Mr. HOWE: That other item refers to normal peace-time activities. This item has to do with the operation of certain war-time equipment which has not yet been converted into peace-time equipment or abandoned. I dare say part of it will be abandoned.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

75. Departmental administration, $184,000.

Mr. REID: There is one important and, I believe, serious matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries with respect to which I am going to ask him that between now and next session every possible investigation be made and steps be taken to prevent what I claim is a menace to the fisheries of the Fraser river. But before dealing with that one specific question which I have in mind tonight, may I draw to the minister's attention some of the communications which I received following a speech I made in this house a short time ago when the Fisheries Research Board Act was under review.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was a good speech.

Mr. REID: Thank you. At that time I dealt particularly with the quality of fish, amongst other matters. Following a report of my speech which appeared in many newspapers, I received, in all, thirty-five to forty letters; and invariably the writers, whilst reminding me that quality was essential to the consumption of more fish, pointed out, each and every one of them, that price was just as important a factor, if not more so, in increasing the consumption of fish. I wish to put one of those letters on record tonight, and I do so because I think the minister will agree that, while we must go after quality, nevertheless something more must be done than has been done to make fish cheaper and more readily available, particularly to those living in the interior provinces. This is one of the many letters that came to me:

Dear Sir:

In the Saskatoon Star issue of April 23, you are wondering why the public does not eat more seafood. Perhaps a few price quotations will help you.

		cents
Shrimp	per tin	85
Lobster	per tin	95
Crab	per tin	69
Salmon	per half tin	35
Sole fillets	per lb.	45
Salmon	per lb.	45
White fish	per lb.	43

and so on down the line to the once so cheap Canadian sardine, which has doubled in price. Who with a family can afford such prices?

At least one can buy a cheaper cut of meat. Hamburger, for instance, at 25 cents per pound, and shoulder cuts at much less than any of the above fish quotations.

There is really no object in spending a great deal of money in an educational campaign unless prices come down or purses are better filled. Then you won't need a campaign of any sort. The eating of fish will take care of itself. The price of whole fresh fish is much higher than the cheaper cuts of meat.

I like fish and would rather eat it than meat, but my budget won't allow it too often.

That was the gist of the majority of the letters I received, following the debate in this house on the Fisheries Research Board Act. I am bringing them to the minister's attention to emphasize that some steps will have to be taken by his department, and the industry as well will have to be reminded that fish must be distributed more abundantly and more cheaply than is the case at the present time.

My particular reason for rising at this time is to bring to the minister's attention what I claim is a serious menace to the salmon industry of the Fraser river. In fact, if no steps are taken in the matter it is my opinion that we face in the near future the depletion of the salmon industry on the Fraser river.

It may interest the members of the committee to know that the great Columbia river to the south of us in British Columbia, which has its head waters in that province but its outlet in the United States, was once the great salmon river of the Pacific coast. But dams were built on that river in the state of Washington to develop hydro-electric power, and on three occasions I raised my voice in this house drawing to the attention of the government, both Conservative and Liberal, that by simply closing our eyes and remaining silent we had lost a great fisheries heritage through the building of dams on the Columbia river by the United States. Away back in 1845 there had been entered into between Great Britain and the United States an agreement which contained a clause stipulating that the Columbia river, which rises in British Columbia, was to be free of access to all British and Canadian citizens. But when the United States started to build dams on the Columbia river for hydro-electric power no voice was raised at that time by the government of Canada to maintain the rights which were given to us by that treaty. I may inform the minister, although it is too late to tell him now, that when the hearings were being held in the state of Washington at the time these dams were projected, those who had to do with the fisheries in the state of Washington firmly believed that the voice of Canada would be heard in protest against the building of these dams for power development.

What has been the effect? I had the pleasure of visiting one of these dams where there is a fishway or ladder which cost seven and a half million dollars to build. That fishway, it is true, takes the salmon up over the dam. Ever since, the United States authorities have been trying to bolster up the whole project with figures and statistics. They have men engaged in what they call a counting-house where machines are used to count the fish and classify the various species or varieties. The machines operate very much like a typewriter. The fish travel over a white table and the men who are sitting above the table can easily see the fish through a glass floor, and they know the varieties, and hence can make a fairly accurate count of the fish passing up the river. Every year they can show the great numbers of salmon that go up over the dam. For many years they have been endeavouring to put across the idea that this fishway was a success, owing to the numbers of salmon which were able to go up the river and which previously could not go over the hydro-electric dams. I can tell hon. members, and I want the minister to remember this—

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the hon. member please tell us which hydro-electric dam?

Mr. REID: I am speaking particularly of the one at Bonneville in the state of Washington. They constructed there a $7,500,000 fishway to take the salmon up around the dam; but in all the dams that they have built to take the fish up, that is, but one aspect of the situation, for they have never been able to find a way to bring the little fingerlings down successfully, and those who know tell us that the Columbia river is doomed. It is doomed because, after ten years of research, they have never been able to discover how to bring the fry or little fish down over the dams or through the turbines without great mortality. The result is that the fishway in the Columbia river will in time be of no use in that regard. It will be only a matter of time until there will be no fish left in the Columbia river.

Mr. MacNICOL: The fish would have to come up over the Grand Coulee dam and come down through the turbines.

Mr. REID: The Grand Coulee dam is too high.

Mr. MacNICOL: How do they get them through?

Mr. REID: They do not go through; it stops them. The dam blocks them; but on the Bonneville farther down the river they built a fishway at the cost which I have just mentioned, which is able to take the fish up over the dam; but as I said a moment ago—and I wish to repeat it—they have never been able to bring the small fry down successfully. It is estimated that every year the small fry die by the millions; consequently, in spite of the fish going up to spawn, the fishery actually is decreasing.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is it a fact that the fish do not get up to British Columbia to spawn at all?

Mr. REID: The hon. member is right. Since the dams were built on the Columbia, no fish are now going up in British Columbia. We lost the entire fishery in the interior of British Columbia by the building of dams, and no protest was made by any Canadian government, although we had a right to protest under the treaty of 1845.

I shall now deal with what I particularly wanted to say, namely, the menace to the Fraser river. In 1938, the province of British Columbia had a survey made of the potential water power of the Fraser river. I shall quote what was said:

> When the demand arises, the waters of the Fraser river are capable of furnishing over six million horse-power.

They put out a little booklet—hon. members from British Columbia may have seen it—called "Water Powers, Fraser River, British Columbia." In this report of the power commission of British Columbia there is outlined all the potential hydro-electric development of the Fraser river watershed. Almost each page shows the spot where hydroelectric power could be developed. Those having to do with fisheries view with alarm the building of dams on the Fraser river. Let me say that, speaking as a member of the international salmon fisheries commission, we realize, as a commission, that dams will have to be built on the river for the development of electric power. We are not entirely against the construction of dams. Our engineers have also made a survey of the waters of the Fraser river,—and we have discovered that there are great areas to which no fish go. There are other areas to which the fish go, and therein, we believe, lies the danger.

Beginning a year or two ago, the British Columbia Electric Company started with a project on the Bridge river which I think is to be completed this year. Most hon. members from British Columbia have received a copy of the "Construction World". In that booklet is outlined the great project of hydro-electric development on Bridge river. An 800-foot reservoir dam is being constructed. They are raising the level of one lake forty feet and taking the water through a penstock many miles, thereby developing power for electricity. No intimation has been given by the company to the fisheries department of what the effect might be. May I point out to the committee that when the British Columbia Electric constructed a dam at Stave lake some years ago, certain streams were completely dried out and the salmon that used to go up these streams disappeared. The report now is that they may now abandon this dam after the Bridge river project is completed. But may I point out to the committee that when they built the Stave lake dam and put in the project there, no protest of any kind was made either by the provincial or dominion government or by their officials against the building of the dam.

Mr. BRIDGES: What year was that?

Mr. REID: I am not sure. If my memory serves me correctly it was back in 1925 or 1926. I think it was around that time. No protest of any kind was made, and I claim there was a great loss to the salmon industry.

If the sockeye salmon comes back to its once great value on the Fraser river, as we hope and expect it will—I mean to the extent which it was in 1913 at the time the slide occurred, and which it is the duty of the commission of which I have the honour to be a member to endeavour to bring about, and we are working to that end—it will mean an annual return of between $35 million and $40 million. In 1913 two and a half million cases of sockeye salmon were canned from the salmon that went up the Fraser river to the headwaters of that river in the interior. After the disaster of 1913-14, of course the decline took place; but we are hopeful that, before long, we shall be able to bring back that great fishing industry.

Mr. MacNICOL: To what does the hon. member refer?

Mr. REID: I refer to the disaster that took place when the contractors were building the Canadian National Railways through the mountains to Vancouver. They blasted hundreds of thousands of tons of rock into a place on the Fraser river called Hell's Gate canyon. In the spring of 1914 a slide also took place. In the year that they blasted the rock into the canyon millions of sockeye salmon were unable to pass up the gorge and so died without spawning. Since 1913 the industry has gone down and down. In 1937 the commission was set up to overcome the difficulty. That, however, is a story all by itself and would take an entire evening to tell.

I am dealing particularly with the menace of the water-power development, and I suggest to the minister that he look at what is now being done in the United States. It is true they are doing this in the United States after some disaster has befallen the fishing industry. I shall read to the minister the laws of the state of Washington. I realize that he may probably have to consult with the province of British Columbia. Someone in the dominion government should, however, approach the province and have a law something like this put into effect. I quote from the "Annotated Laws relating to Food and Shell Fish 1945" of the state of Washington.

In the event that any person, firm, corporation or government agency desires to construct any form of hydraulic project or other project that will use, divert, obstruct or change the natural flow or bed of any river or stream or that will utilize any of the waters of the state or materials from the stream beds, such person, firm, corporation or government agency shall submit to the department of fisheries and the department of game full plans and specifications of their proposed construction or work, complete plans and specifications for the proper protection of fish life in connection therewith.

I want to compare that with what we have in our law today. We have nothing like that to prevent the building of dams, but we have something which many years ago might have acted, I presume fairly well, although some of us have doubted it. If you take the revised statutes of Canada and refer to the Fisheries Act you will find that section 31 merely states this:

Every slide, dam or other obstruction across or in any stream where the minister determines it to be necessary for the public interest that a fish-pass should exist, shall be provided by the owner or occupier with a durable and efficient fishway or canal around the slide, dam or other obstruction which shall be maintained in a good and effective condition by said owner or occupier in such place and of such form and capacity as will in the opinion of the minister satisfactorily permit the free passage of fish through the same.

That was in 1927. I claim that that law is antiquated and is useless in the face of the potential dangers confronting us on the Fraser river. The present section will come into operation only after the dam has been built, and if, in the opinion of the minister, a fish-pass is required he can then order the company to build one. That is hardly good enough because, once the dam is up, the damage may well have been done, as it may take only one year to wipe out a fishery valued at many thousands of dollars.

Let me point out another danger on the Fraser river and, I suppose, on other rivers as well, and that is the dredging which is taking place. There was dredging for gold at a place called Quesnel many years ago. On the Quesnel system we estimate that we have one of the greatest potential sockeye salmon streams in the entire Fraser river watershed. In 1912 or 1913 some four million sockeye salmon went into that area, and last year, by actual count, there were only around 685, or a drop from four million to 685. In other words, that area has been practically wiped out. In consequence of the gold mining company going there with a mammoth dredge and expending many millions of dollars in dredging, they have blocked rivers and lakes. No steps were taken to have them remove the gravel. The damage has been done and now it is our duty as a commission to endeavour to bring that area back to what is was in 1912. If the department of the day had been fairly active or had had some power such as I have cited from the laws of the state of Washington, steps could have been taken immediately against such an operation or company.

I contend that our laws will have to be amended and brought up to date, because we stand in grave danger, on the Fraser river at least, of the entire fishery being wiped out.

Let me bring another instance to the attention of the minister, and this one is nearer home. A certain project is being carried out by the dominion at Pemberton Meadows. They started work early in March of this year. If that work had been carried out as intended, they were going to dig a canal and divert the river. If they had proceeded with that we would have lost one of the finest spawning beds in that area, one that usually harbours some thirty thousand sockeye salmon. By good luck we were able to get hold of the engineer, and when the matter was drawn to his attention he was good enough to order that the work be discontinued until a complete survey could be made as to its effect.

I mention this particularly to the minister in order to bring it forcibly to his attention that there is no protection at present against digging canals, gold mine dredging or the construction of hydraulic dams. There is some protection, seemingly, in the act, that if a dam is built and it is found to be to the detriment of the fishing industry the minister can take certain steps.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am very much interested in what the hon. member is saying, because he is perhaps the best-posted member in the house on this subject. According to what he now says, if they are to build dams on the Fraser river, I believe the whole fishing industry there will go to pieces, because on the Columbia the Grand Coulee is 550 feet high and fish cannot go up that dam, and the same will happen on the Fraser river.

Mr. REID: Everyone knows the high pressure sort of propaganda campaign that can be put on by a company that wishes to construct a dam across a stream for the development of electrical power, especially if the people in the area are not receiving any benefit from the salmon on the river. It can be pointed out that there would be cheap electricity for the farms and industrial power for those who wish to go into industry. A beautiful picture can be painted to the people generally and I fear that in a campaign of that kind the fishing industry may suffer and become the victim of such propaganda. I am calling this matter to the attention of the minister in time, as I believe, and I submit that it is time steps were taken before any great development or building of dams takes place. I doubt whether one of his officers has been up to see what effect the Bridge river project may have on the salmon industry on the Fraser river.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the hon. member whether his commission has registered any complaint to the minister?

Mr. REID: We have protested for the past five years to the provincial government. We have asked the provincial government on every occasion if they would be good enough to consult with us, to present their plans to us and give us a chance to look at them before going ahead with the work. But although we have requested that, and had an assurance from the premier that that would be done, so far it has not been done Fortunately or unfortunately, these works are carried out by officials, and since the province of British Columbia, like certain other provinces, do not control their fisheries, perhaps they are not as much interested as they might be if they had the control, as the province of Quebec and some other provinces have. I believe the province of Saskatchewan controls its fisheries, but we in British Columbia do not control ours. The fisheries come exclusively under the dominion, and therefore the province may not be so much concerned. There is sitting in Victoria a little group of men who are power-minded—I say that advisedly—their thoughts being for the development of hydro-electric power on the Fraser river, and they have no thought whatsoever of what effect the building of these dams may have on the fishing industry.

The fishing industry is so valuable to British Columbia that we cannot sit idly by without taking proper steps and putting in the proper safeguards now. What I suggest to the minister is that every department, both provincial and federal, before proceeding with projects of that kind, and private industry as well, should be required to place their plans before the fisheries department and so give them a chance to find out what effect these projects will have on the fishing industry.

There is a principle or, at any rate, a precedent that we can act upon. Neither a provincial government nor a private individual can construct a bridge over a navigable river unless, first of all, the project is approved by the Department of Public Works. There you have a precedent, and if that safeguard is provided to take care of shipping, surely we should be more concerned or, at any rate, as much concerned about an industry that gives employment to thousands of men and is worth many millions of dollars.

I am asking the minister to give serious thought to the matter between now and the next session of parliament, and to take steps to see what can be done so that in future we shall not witness on the Fraser river what has taken place on the Columbia.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Am I to understand that the provincial government would permit the damming of the Fraser river, which I believe is a navigable water, without consultation with the government?

Mr. REID: There is issued by the provincial government a booklet in which the entire Fraser river is outlined, giving the places they recommend should be used for the development of hydro-electric power, and Bridge river is named in this booklet. That is the first one that is being proceeded with.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am merely asking the question for information. My understanding is that the Fraser river is navigable. Surely the federal government has control of that, has it not? The famous beaver we hear so much about went up there and the whole development of Canada other than Ontario was through the Fraser river. If it is not navigable, I do not know what it is.

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): We all certainly have enjoyed listening to the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster in connection with the damage which may be caused to the fisheries of the Fraser river and in British Columbia by virtue of the possible development of hydro-electric power. I have not had an opportunity to make a full and complete study of the legislation which now exists in regard to the construction of fishways and dams for this purpose. I would point out, however, to the hon. member the fact that the present act under which we are now functioning is the Fisheries Act of 1932. It is quite possible that in section 20 of the Fisheries Act of 1932, which contains some ten sections, there may be some powers which the minister now has, but which he did not have under the old revised statutes of Canada which were passed in 1927. I would, however, assure the hon. member most sincerely that, so far as I am concerned, if the legislation as it now exists is deficient, having regard to the proper protection of the salmon fisheries, I and the officials of my department will certainly make a careful study of the matter between now and the next session and see what can be done.

Mr. WINTERS: I should like to invite the attention of the committee for a few minutes to the fisheries problems on the east coast. At this late stage I hesitate to take up the time of the committee, but when one realizes the proportions which the fisheries are assuming in our economic life, I feel that the subject merits all the consideration we can direct to it from the people of Canada generally. The solution to the immediate problems facing the fishing industry lies with the people of Canada themselves in the way of increased consumption, as was brought out in a recent debate. Therefore, I feel it is a problem which is of great concern to each and every person in Canada. For that reason I feel we are justified in asking the committee to bear with us for a short time even at this late date.

At the outset I should like to say that, from the point of view of the industry on the east coast, the past year has been one of development as far as the relationships between the industry and the department go. We feel that, in the dying days of the last session, we had in this house a good debate and one which was constructive. Since that time the department has embarked on a wide programme of reorganization which has certainly benefited the department and the industry. We feel that a great deal of credit is due the minister who has applied himself with such great vigour and constructiveness to the problems facing the industry. We are now looking hopefully to the new deputy minister who has shown, by his ability in such matters as assisting the industry through the recent support announcement made by the minister, that the department is certainly on the right track.

The first problem I should like to draw to the attention of the committee tonight is an international one, and it has to do with the general problem of depletion. The hon. member for New Westminster ably brought to the attention of the committee tonight the matter of the depletion of salmon from the great salmon rivers of British Columbia. I am concerned with the depletion of deep sea fish on the Grand Bank and other banks off the coast of Nova Scotia, involving principally the fishing industries in the United States and Canada. The minister is well aware of the situation. It has been brought to his attention a number of times, both through his own departmental channels and through the industry. I know he has a sympathetic feeling toward the problem. Recently, on July 4, the question was brought to the attention of the government by the hon. member for St. John-Albert, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs at page 5080 of Hansard indicated that he is fully aware of the scope and difficulty of the problem and its solution. The problem arises out of the fact that the modern way of deep-sea fishing is by means of dragging or trawling, whereby draggers tow behind them a net which scoops up fish more or less indiscriminately. It is a method which is directly opposed in that respect to the old-fashioned and still existing method of dory fishing, which is a hook-and-line propostion and is, therefore, more selective. There is no doubt that this dragging method does destroy a wide variety of types and sizes of fish. At the present time one difficulty is associated with the fact that there is sufficient codfish on the market. The inventories are high. Some countries, particularly the United States, have little or no demand for fresh codfish. The accent and emphasis is on fresh haddock. The result is that many of the draggers, which catch cod in greater quantities than they catch haddock, are forced to dispose of their cod whilst still at sea. The United States has always adopted a reasonable attitude toward this problem. It is the nature of the industry that it is destructive. There is no intent on their part to deplete the banks. I would, however, again urge this government to do whatever they can by way of negotiation with the United States to see if some reasonable understanding cannot be arrived at to avoid the depletion which will so greatly affect the industry in the future.

Then there is the matter of the continental shelf, which was raised last year by the hon. member for New Westminster and emphasized during the debate on the fisheries estimates in the last session of this parliament. That problem has not been solved. Our fishermen are still encountering destruction of their gear and running the hazard of having their ships destroyed, with the attendant loss of life, on what we have always considered to be our very own banks off the coast of Nova Scotia. I refer particularly to the Banquereau or, as it is otherwise called, the Quero bank. I would again ask the minister if he would seek some avenue for approaching the other nations involved in this fishing problem on the coast of Nova Scotia and try to come to some understanding and create regulations which will circumvent this hazard to our own fisheries.

Before proceeding farther, I should like to say that we feel there is a need for a further extension of the protective service we have off the coast of Nova Scotia. In my particular part of the province, the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg, the only protective craft we have immediately available is one known as the Gilbert, which is entirely inadequate. The accommodation in this boat is poor. It would certainly be well worth the department's while to look into the matter of providing a replacement craft for the outmoded Gilbert.

There is the new air-sea rescue service which we feel fits nicely into the programme of protective service, and so far there are good indications that it is performing the function it was intended to perform. There have been one or two instances, however, where the service was slow in going to the rescue of craft which it deemed to be not in immediate danger. The craft in one instance, and I believe in two, was drifting helplessly, and the protective service, when it was got in touch with, is reported to have said the craft was in no immediate danger. The craft in question were rudderless and had no radios. It is pretty difficult to convince seamen at the height of a storm, on small craft, that they are in no immediate danger. If the obstacle is towage; if the matter of competing with private enterprise for towage is the consideration, then I feel that at least the protective service should stand by in case of danger, to see that there is no loss of life.

I should like also to repeat our oft-presented demands that further consideration be given the question of breakwaters and wharves, which are such an important feature of any fishing community. There is a great economy drive on now, and we know that government expenditure is to be cut to the minimum; but I think the minister must urge that discretion be exercised and see that the wrong emphasis is not applied to cut down the number of wharves and breakwaters. I would urge also that more dredging be done, because inshore fishermen simply cannot operate without dredging and the dredges available on the coasts of Nova Scotia are entirely inadequate.

As various hon. members informed this house during the debate on the Fisheries Research Board Act, the industry is in a difficult position brought about by the conversion from a wartime to a peacetime economy. Without going into this matter fully again I desire merely to state that war-produced changes in the markets for our fish placed more emphasis on frozen fish than had been the case up to that time. In addition, heavy demands for food occasioned by the war made it necessary to produce fish in larger quantities than ever before. Now reconversion to a peacetime economy means that we must revert to our old markets, which in many cases are no longer available to us because of increased competition. We may also be obliged to place more emphasis on salt and pickled fish, as was the case prior to the war, rather than on fresh fish. This was thoroughly covered in the minister's statement on June 24, in which he announced that up to $8,000,000 would be made available to support the fishing industry for the remainder of this year. The industry was very grateful for the programme of relief feeding outlined in the minister's report. Under the Fisheries Prices Support Act, funds will be made available for engaging in an extensive programme of education which should increase the consumption of fish in Canada. When we realize that the fishing industry in the United States has been trying for some time to raise a fund of half a million dollars to embark upon a programme of education within that country, the industry realizes how fortunate it is to have the government come forward with this offer of assistance.

An analysis of the minister's statement will clearly indicate where the difficulty lies in our industry at the present time. For relief feeding the government is prepared to buy sizeable quantities of dried, pickled and canned fish, but for various reasons it cannot see its way clear to purchase frozen fish for the same purpose. To deal with the east coast, this boils down to the fact that the government's programme of relief feeding, with the exception of the canning industry, provides support for that phase of the industry which could best get along without it, and makes it necessary to find other means of supporting the fresh fish industry, which is the only part of the industry left in real difficulty after the relief feeding programme is implemented. The minister's solution of this problem is to implement the Fisheries Prices Support Act to permit the government to buy frozen fillets, and to recommend that the industry divert as much raw codfish as possible to salting rather than freezing. I wish to emphasize that on the east coast the codfishing involving fresh fillets is the only phase of the industry in real difficulty. That is the only item which is giving us any concern; our other problems in the fishing industry are considerably in the future.

The minister's statement presents several outstanding difficulties with which the department is fully familiar. As in the past the industry will adjust its own production to suit outstanding demands, and there will be some diversion of cod into the salt fish industry. But too much should not be expected in this direction, because refrigeration and other facilities were built during the war at great cost to accommodate an expanded demand for fresh fish, and it would seem to many a retrograde step to leave these facilities idle to any great extent if it is possible to find other solutions. A second outstanding difficulty would be encountered by the government in selling domestically the frozen fish it would buy under the Fisheries Prices Support Act. At the present time, speaking very approximately, there are two and a half million pounds of frozen cod fillets in existing inventories, and it is estimated that, under normal circumstances of production and in the light of present markets, this surplus will rise to approximately ten million pounds over the next eight to ten months. This means that the government will be faced with the necessity of purchasing and disposing of approximately ten million pounds of frozen cod fillets. This programme will involve all the difficulties of storage, transportation, financing, merchandizing and so on. However, it is assumed that by the end of the period I have mentioned, from eight to ten months, this reconversion phase will be completed and the industry will know what its markets are, so that it will be able to gauge its production accordingly.

There would appear to be a much more direct solution to this problem than government purchasing, a solution which the industry on the east coast would much prefer. However, in view of the international monetary situation the solution I have in mind is dependent upon the availability of Canadian funds in foreign fish-consuming countries. The invoking of the Fisheries Prices Support Act naturally gives the impression that there is no export demand for frozen cod fillets, but this is not the case. There are known to be demands in England, France and Italy, and it may be that there are demands elsewhere. We know that inquiries have been received from representatives of these three countries seeking to work out an arrangement to buy cod fillets. The obstacle is that these countries lack Canadian dollars. The industry itself is confident that it can find the markets and can readily circumvent such problems as transportation, storage and distribution, because it has well-established channels. The quantity of fish involved is approximately ten million pounds, and this quantity can be absorbed in these three countries where people are ready and able to pay for it in the currency of their own country. This would not be a programme of relief feeding. The cost of the amount of fish involved would certainly not be more than $1,500,000. There is no certainty that the countries concerned, England, France and Italy, would accept loans to buy fish, but we in the maritimes feel that this is an approach to the problem that should be fully explored.

It seems clear to the industry and to all in the maritimes that the direct solution to this problem would be to make loans available to these three countries in the amount required to purchase the approximately ten million pounds of fish that are likely to be surplus over the next eight to ten months, rather than to have the government use the same amount of money to purchase those fish and attempt to have them consumed domestically in a market which at the present time must be considered somewhat doubtful. When I say that I do not mean in any sense that I believe the consuming capacity of the Canadian public is doubtful, because I am strongly of the opinion that, with an intensive programme of education and inspection to ensure a good quality being on the market, the per capita consumption in Canada will increase sufficiently to take care of our present surpluses.

[Mr. Winters.]

The government may take the stand that it has gone as far as it proposes to go in the matter of making loans available to foreign countries, but we in the maritimes do not see the justification for that stand. In the first place, the government is making the money available anyhow. In the second place, as has been pointed out previously in this house, the maritimes have benefited from the government's heavy loan programme less than any region in Canada to date. The returns to the maritime provinces from the hundreds of millions of dollars lent to foreign countries have been infinitesimal when compared with the returns to Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia; and when one considers the contracts for wheat, beef, and other farm products which bring good returns to the western provinces, it must be conceded that the maritime provinces have not fared at all well in this programme of external trade.

In a speech in the house at an earlier date I showed that, of the total amount of $330,872,575 in contracts awarded against these loans by the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the Canadian export board as of March of this year, Nova Scotia benefited to the extent of only $2,151,351 or ·65 per cent. The three maritime provinces together benefited to the extent of only ·76 per cent, whereas they comprise ten per cent of the total population. In this particular instance, we are not asking for additional funds; the funds are there anyhow; we are asking, however, that the funds be rediverted to be made available as a further loan rather than for the purpose of government purchase of fish for domestic use. There are many advantages accruing from the foreign loans approach to the problem which are self-evident, the most obvious being that this programme would permit the industry to stand on its own feet rather than lean on the government, and this is all to the good. It would also serve the important purpose of letting it maintain valuable contacts and markets abroad, which it already has. Furthermore, it would save the government all the difficulties involved in purchasing large quantities of fresh fish and disposing of them domestically.

I feel quite certain that the other maritime members feel the same as I do in this respect. My colleague the hon. member for Vancouver North says that the British Columbia members feel that way, too. I did not wish to give the impression that the industry is not appreciative of the government's splendid offer of assistance. I am sure the industry fully appreciates that offer, and every fisherman in the industry on the east coast will appreciate this government's willingness to come to the industry's assistance when trouble arises.

We have no criticism of the government's action at all; we are merely trying to suggest how funds already available may be used to the best possible advantage of the industry and with the least difficulty to the department.

I would say, in conclusion, that this fund of $8 million to be made available by the government for relief feeding is a great boost or "shot in the arm" for the fishing industry on the east coast. The industry, as we are aware, is facing problems which are growing more difficult. Fish prices took a small slump, and there was some indication that they would take a further slide because of mounting inventories. This offer of assistance through the channels of relief feeding and the Fisheries Prices Support Act is the impetus the industry needs at the present time.

Mr. McLURE: Mr. Chairman, I know how anxious the minister is to have his estimates passed, and for that reason I am not going to make any extended remarks. I shall discuss the different items in which I am interested when they are reached. We have listened to two excellent speeches, one from the west and one from the maritime provinces. I was, however, disappointed that the Minister of Fisheries did not, as usual, give his excellent address respecting the policy and the organization of his department. Probably he was in a hurry to have his estimates passed and did not make those observations this year, as has been his custom.

On this item I should like to ask him about the allocation in connection with the $8 million which will be spent on relief feeding and for the fishermen of the maritime provinces. Then, perhaps he would give us a statement with reference to the prices board, as to whether they are operating and whether definite floor prices or ceiling prices have been put on lobsters for the season.

I would ask from him a report respecting the fishing season on lobsters, which is now, at least in part, closed for the maritime provinces. I shall not speak at length because I realize that all hon. members are anxious to have the estimates passed, and I realize that under the different items I shall have an opportunity to say what I have in mind.

Mr. BRYCE: This seems to be fish day in the House of Commons.

Mr. McLURE: I should like to have an answer.

Mr. BRIDGES: I can answer the questions on the different items as they come up.

Mr. BRYCE: I have listened attentively to the hon. member for New Westminster, who told us a wonderful story about sockeye salmon. I listened to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg tell us about cod and haddock, and the hon. member for Queens tell us about fish in the waters of Prince Edward Island.

I would remind the committee, however, that we have some excellent fish in the prairie provinces. I would refer to the Winnipeg goldeye and the lake Winnipeg whitefish. We do not trouble the dominion government so far as the care of these fish is concerned. The provincial government looks after the matter. Would the minister be good enough to do as his predecessor did, namely, to give me a report respecting the work done in connection with the whitefish in lake Winnipeg so that I may use that information when I return to my constituency.

Mr. BRIDGES: We have reports from the national research board. They are not confined to lake Winnipeg alone, but deal with research work in all the prairie lakes.

Mr. BRYCE: This is research carried out by the minister's department with respect to whitefish. He will know what I mean.

Mr. BRIDGES: I shall be glad to give that information.

Mr. LANGLOIS: Mr. Chairman, may I offer my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Fisheries upon his timely statement of June 24 when he announced the new policy of the government with respect to purchases of fish and the proclamation of the Fisheries Prices Support Act.

However, I fully concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. This policy of the government is indeed a step in the right direction, but we feel that this policy does not bring a complete solution to the most important problem of fish marketing in eastern Canada and more especially for the Gaspe region, which I have the honour to represent in this house. In his statement the hon. minister said:

> The act gives the board powers to buy and sell fish and to prescribe prices. The board will be established without delay. It will confine its operations during the present fiscal year to fish produced during the remainder of the 1947 season. It will be asked to prepare in collaboration with industry a general distributional programme, including advertising, designed to increase domestic sales of fish of all species and kinds, and particularly packaged fish, and in particular to consider the specific species of the east, prairies and British Columbia in which the prices received by fishermen from the freezers are unduly low in 1947, and to devise means of maintaining these prices at or near their current levels.

This programme of support of the prices of fish for sale on the Canadian market does not, as I said a moment ago, solve the problem in my part of the country. Indeed, if the government tries to sell our fish on the domestic market our fishermen will be at a great disadvantage in comparison and in competition with the fishermen of British Columbia and of the maritime provinces. The fishing season in Gaspe lasts normally from three to four months a year, and by early December or January our frozen fish cannot compete with the fresh catches from other parts of the country. Therefore our products are not as easy to sell on the domestic market as fresh caught fish coming from other parts of Canada. What our fishermen are interested in is to regain former markets in world trade. At the beginning of hostilities, and more especially at the beginning of the Ethiopian war, the Gaspe area lost its main market, which was then Italy, through the sanctions which were imposed against that country. During the last great war we sold most of our fish to UNRRA, and today, since the foreign market demand has fallen, our fishermen are faced with the fact that if they do not regain their market in Italy they will soon have either to stop fishing completely or to go into it on a part-time basis only. I am told that recently offers were received by my fishermen for quite a considerable order of fish from Italy and France; but, unfortunately, since these two countries cannot afford to pay in either Canadian or United States dollars, we cannot sell to them. In agreement with my hon. friend, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, I hope that the government will, without delay, study this problem, which is more of a financial nature, and try to find a solution to it.

While I am speaking on these estimates, I wish to bring to the attention of the minister some of the resolutions which were adopted at the last meeting of the organized fishermen of my county, held at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière on January 9, 10 and 11, 1947. The first of these resolutions reads as follows:

That a request be made to the Hon. H. F. G. Bridges, federal Minister of Fisheries, to appoint a superior officer of the United Fishermen of Quebec, a member of the national research office on fisheries, to represent the fishing industry of the province of Quebec.

In this connection I wish to mention that our industry in Quebec is not represented on the board. The second resolution reads as follows:

That a request be made to federal Department of Fisheries to assume entire responsibility of the fish inspection service in the province of Quebec as provided by the federal-provincial agreement of 1922 and this in order to relieve a part of the provincial budget that could be used for other urgent needs of the industry.

This resolution is most important to our industry on the Gaspe coast. In that part of the country our fishermen cannot benefit from the many advantages of having dominion inspection, since this inspection is done by officials of the provincial government. I hope, now that our organized fishermen are asking to revert to dominion inspection that the autonomists of Quebec will not come out and say that this is an attack on the autonomy of the province, because those who are mainly interested in this dominion inspection and are asking for it are the fishermen of the province of Quebec themselves.

The third resolution reads as follows:

That the united fishermen of Quebec accept to actively collaborate with the International Bureau of Salt Fish to be organized in London, under the following conditions:

(a) No engagement shall be taken for a period of over one year;

(b) the provincial department of fisheries shall pay a strong proportion of the contribution required from the producers of the province;

(c) that Canada be represented on the executive office at London through the intermediary of a distinct section for the salt fish industry at the National Council of Fisheries but with the same secretary.

I do not think I need comment on that resolution. I know the minister has a copy of it and is giving it his active consideration.

Before closing my remarks, I wish again to impress on the government the urgent need for more suitable fishing harbours along the Gaspe coast.

On several occasions I have made representations, both in this house and out of it, to the departments concerned especially the Department of Public Works, on the urgent need for such harbours. I hope that our urgent plea will be heard this time and that action will soon be taken.

I think we must realize that the fishing industry of Canada is an important one. As I said at the beginning of these remarks I was informed a short time ago that we received favourable orders for fish from Italy. I am told that the shipments for which Italy is now asking are just sample shipments, but these orders will amount annually to some thirty million pounds of dried fish and some ten million pounds of frozen fish. These figures will, I believe, convince the committee that this industry is not to be neglected and must be given every opportunity to increase its production and should also be given all the advantages that the government has the power to give to our fishermen for the expansion of their industry.

As I intimated at the opening of my remarks, I have congratulations to offer to the minister on the efficient manner in which he is heading his department. I also wish to add my congratulations to his able assistant, the deputy minister of fisheries, who is new in the department but who is also doing a very good job indeed.

Mr. HAZEN: It is not my intention to make any extended address, but I should like to ask the minister one or two questions. Are any investigations being made at present with a view to conserving and increasing the salmon fisheries in the bay of Fundy? The Atlantic salmon is one of our best fish. The supply by no means meets the demand. I do not believe these fish are increasing in number; in fact I have reason to believe that they are decreasing. During the present season in the port of Saint John and along the shores of the bay of Fundy at Lorneville and at other fishing villages the catch is, I understand, very poor indeed. Study should be made to ascertain ways and means of conserving and increasing these fish in the bay of Fundy and also in other waters of the maritime provinces. It would help to conserve these fish if certain dams which serve no useful purpose at the present time were removed to permit the fish to get to their spawning bed. I have in mind dams at the mouth of the Mispec river in the county of Saint John, a great salmon river which enters the bay of Fundy about the village of St. Martin's. The Nashwaak river, as the minister knows, flows into the Saint John river almost opposite the city of Fredericton. On January 14, 1946, a delegation from the Saint John branch of the New Brunswick Fish and Game Protective Association interviewed the minister at the Admiral Beatty hotel in the city of Saint John. This delegation, which was headed by Gerald H. Cox, president of the association, asked for the construction of a new fishway on the Big Salmon river at St. Martin's in order that the river might be developed into a first-class salmon angling stream. The report that appeared in the papers stated:

> . . . pointed out to the minister that the present fishway is not only poorly constructed but it is on the wrong side of the river, where the water is oftentimes too shallow for the fish to take advantage of this means of getting upstream.

The report goes on to say:

> Mr. Cox stated that Mr. Bridges had promised to have the matter investigated, and it was indicated that a survey would be made of the present fishway and conditions existing there.

Mr. BRIDGES: What is the date of that?

Mr. HAZEN: I am reading a dispatch from the Telegraph-Journal of January 15, 1946. Has the survey been made? Has the investigation been completed and a report made to the minister's department? If an investigation has been completed and a report made, what action, if any, has been taken?

I read in the press not long ago that the minister was interviewed by a delegation from the city of Fredericton about the dam in the Nashwaak river. Has an investigation been held into the possibilities of improving the salmon fishing in that river? If a report has been made, what action, if any, is contemplated?

There is also a dam in the Mispec river near Saint John which the Saint John branch of the fish and game protective association has been endeavouring for a long time to have opened to enable the salmon to get upstream, but so far no arrangement has been entered into to permit that to be done. I should like to bring that dam, which obstructs the fish from getting up the river, to the minister's attention. There was another dam in the province of New Brunswick about which I should like to ask the minister a question and about which complaints have been made by some associations in Chipman or in Queens or Sunbury county. I refer to the dam at Newcastle near Newcastle bridge. Have the conditions of that dam been examined with a view to having a fishway put in it to enable the fish to get up the stream? I should appreciate it if the minister will give us a statement as to the conditions at that place.

There are one or two other questions I should like to ask the minister. A year or two ago the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Fisheries issued an order preventing the sale of clams in certain areas along the shores of the bay of Fundy, in Saint John and in Charlotte county. I protested at the time. I had some correspondence with both departments about that order. I knew of no person who had suffered from eating these clams. I ate them regularly myself. However, the order was made. What steps are being taken to ascertain what causes the toxic condition in these clams? Has the biological branch of the minister's department or of any other department of government made a study of the matter for the purpose of ascertaining what causes the toxic condition? Certain areas which were closed have been opened at different times. This evening the minister kindly furnished me with a statement of the dates when certain areas which have been closed were opened, but certain areas are still closed. It has been a cause of great loss to the people who made a living digging these clams and selling them, and I think it is important for us to see that steps are taken, if they have not already been taken, to ascertain what has caused the toxic condition in these clams. So far as I know, there is no difference in these clams today, compared with what they were twenty or thirty years ago. However, if there is a difference, a thorough investigation should be made to find out what causes that toxic condition.

There is one other matter to which I would refer. I would draw the minister's attention to these figures with regard to the lobster catch in the state of Maine. In 1939, 7,570,800 pounds of lobster were caught in the waters of Maine. In 1943, that had increased to 11,468,025 pounds. In 1944, there was a further increase to 13,300,000 pounds and, in 1945, another increase to 19,130,000 pounds. While the total catch of lobsters in Canada in 1939 was 31,466,000 pounds, in 1943 it was 30,000,000 pounds. It had dropped, and in 1944 it was 33,350,000 pounds. There had been a slight increase over a period of five years, but if you go back over a longer period of time you will find that there has been little variation in the figures. There has been no increase and, in some years, a decrease.

What I should like the minister to ask his officials is this. Will they explain why there has been such a large increase in the lobster catch in the state of Maine, a steady increase in the amount of lobsters caught in Maine, while in the whole of Canada, which is really the Atlantic coast, the lobster catch has remained stationary or has decreased?

Can it be said that the fact that in Maine they have established lobster hatcheries has nothing to do with the results shown by these figures? I should also like to ask the officials this question. If, as some of the officials state in their report, these lobster hatcheries do not produce results, why was it that only last year the state of Massachusetts, after, I presume, a most careful investigation, built a fish hatchery?

Mr. BRIDGES: Was it a hatchery or a rearing pond?

Mr. HAZEN: I understand that it was a hatchery. As I read the dispatch, it was a hatchery. There must be some reason why the lobster fisheries along the Maine coast have increased. In six years they have more than doubled, while our lobster fisheries remain stationary. There must be a reason for that. If it is not due to the hatcheries it must be due to something else, and we should discover why it is that our lobster fisheries remain stationary or only hold their own, while under the method they have adopted in Maine, their lobster fisheries have increased to such a great extent.

I will not delay the committee. There are one or two other matters I wish to speak about, but these are essential points I wanted to bring to the minister's attention, and I hope that in the course of his estimates he will give us as complete an answer as he can.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: In contributing to this discussion I wish to thank the minister for the courteous way in which he meets the fishermen on the Pacific coast. It does not go unnoticed by them, nor does the courtesy of his officials. It is not often that I rise to compliment a minister of the government, but in this case I believe it is his due.

I know I am taking my life in my hands in rising at this time because the hon. member for Comox-Alberni will be right on my heels. However I will do the best I can.

There are two points I would raise at this time. First, I would ask the minister to press upon the British Columbia government the need of a loan board for the fishermen. In the debate in the provincial legislature the Minister of Finance, Mr. Anscomb, turned it down on the ground that it would interfere with dominion-provincial relations. How this could possibly be so, I do not know, inasmuch as they have a loan board on the east coast. This is becoming absolutely necessary on the west coast because during the fishing season in area 2, many of the boats just made two trips. Some of the luckier ones made three, their boats are equipped to fish in area 2, and they are quite suitable for that purpose, but are not large enough to fish in area 3 continuously. If a loan board were established a greater proportion of the Canadian fleet would be enabled to compete in area 3. At the present time, to a large extent, it is a private hunting ground for Americans with their modern equipment.

I should like to see this loan board put through so that we could maintain our independently owned fleet on the Pacific coast, and this has particular reference of course to halibut. I should not like to see the fishing fleet fall back into large company-owned boats because these men do appreciate their freedom.

Another point I wish to bring up is the question of the fisheries prices support board. I should like to mention some of the fears that are bothering the men on the coast at the present time. There is an embargo on the export of salmon, frozen and fresh. There is a premium price in the United States. The independently owned fleet sell their own fish through their own cooperative and are mainly interested in frozen and fresh fish, and they would like to enjoy that premium market which now exists in the United States.

It was pointed out to me that in certain cases on the east coast the fishermen of Gaspe are exporting their Gaspe salmon to the United States and enjoying that high price and at the same time eating British Columbia salmon.

An hon. MEMBER: Better food.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Yes. It may be better food, but let us not take it out on the west coast fishermen. In the past, certain laws have been put through that have been a detriment to west coast fishermen. First, during the war they had their income tax ten per cent deducted at the source. Dogfish livers also were up against the embargo, inasmuch as certain amounts were put into chicken feeds for Canadian use, whereas east coast cod livers had the right of the export market. We do not wish to see that condition arise owing to the setting up of this board, which is essentially a good piece of legislation; but it could be detrimental to the west coast fishermen, and they are rather sceptical of it in many cases, inasmuch as the prices support board will apply only to cod, which is a small item, taken in general, on the Pacific coast. So that in the condition in which we find ourselves in this country, being short of United States dollars, we could very well allow these fishermen to export their salmon and enjoy the premium price. At the same time it would bring in United States dollars to this country. I am sure that the members from British Columbia, such as the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, could enjoy eating goldeye or east coast cod.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Never.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: They could sacrifice their ability to consume high quality fish in the meantime so that the fishermen could enjoy those high prices. I outline this programme to the minister because I have no doubt it will become a burning issue in the not far distant future.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Far be it from me to throw any rocks at the hon. member for Skeena. I want to congratulate him on what is probably the most reasonable speech I ever heard him make in the house.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Just one of the last twenty.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): With respect to Gaspe salmon enjoying the privilege of export to the United States, I wish to point out that it is comparable with our own spring salmon which we market fresh. I am sure the minister will tell him that if they wish this privilege, all they have to do is ask for a permit and they will receive it; and they can export all the spring salmon they have. There has been quite a high level of speeches in the house tonight. I am sure the minister has received some valuable suggestions. I, too, wish to congratulate him on the provision of this fund he was speaking of for relief purposes for European feeding. I do not want the committee to feel either that when the fish industry undertakes to deliver $8,000,000 worth of high-class fish products to the government, it is in any sense receiving a dole or subsidy. I think the government has looked around and has found no other source of high protein food available to it at the present time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Good fish produce brains.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is the reason we all have them in British Columbia.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): On the setting up of the fisheries prices support board —and that, as I said, was a particularly good job—we are going to face a big problem. I should not like the board, or even members of parliament who are very often fond of talking the government out of money, ever to get the idea that this $25,000,000 is for the support of an industry which has not taken every means in its power to pull itself up by its own effort. We certainly do not want to use this money to create any surplus stocks of fish in this country. I just have the feeling that if certain fish is in surplus supply, the government should come to the conclusion that it would be an excellent plan for them to discontinue heavy fishing of that particular species.

It is getting late, and I sincerely trust that the minister will be able to get through with his estimates tonight; I will do everything I can to facilitate the progress. What I wished to place before the minister is the problem facing the pilchard industry on the west coast, in fish reduction, the making of meal and oil out of pilchards. That is the most hazardous business I know of in Canada. When I was first associated with it in 1926 there were twenty-six plants on the west coast, but through business failures and mortality in the industry, they are now down to six operations. I might say that the industry is even more hazardous than the by-election, as far as I can see. It has always struck me that the fishing industry has never had from the government anything like the support the agricultural industry has had. Probably there are not enough members from the maritimes. I certainly do not begrudge the farmers any of the legislative measures they have been able to get through this house in order to support that great industry of theirs. However, as far as the pilchard industry is concerned, I feel that in the particular instance where the wartime prices and trade board has undertaken to place an embargo on the export of pilchard meal until we produce ten thousand tons—after that we are allowed to export fifty per cent—there is a measure of unfairness. I might point out that there is a difference in price of approximately $40 a ton in the United States, which is actually our traditional market, and the domestic price which we shall be able to receive. When you speak of ten thousand tons of pilchard meal—and I do not think the industry has any possibility this year of producing anything like that amount—it does seem to me that the minister—and I hesitate to advise him—ought to take a strong stand. When the wartime prices and trade board has undertaken to dictate to the fishing industry what they shall do in a matter of this kind, I feel that we are not being fairly treated. I would suggest to the minister that the industry be allowed to export fifty per cent of its production. I am quite sure that the Minister of Finance will support that measure because we would be able to get a large quantity of United States dollars in that way. I might also point out that if there is small production in the industry, that is certainly the time when we shall need higher prices; and, as the minister knows, there has been a substantial increase this year in the cost of production. I also think this is an appropriate time to call to the attention of the public generally in Canada that the production of fishmeal, rather than being a waste of a high-class fishery product, is actually an important contribution to our agricultural industry, because now we can produce far more beef and poultry by the mixtures of fishmeal with the ordinary grain feed.

Mr. FRASER: Through this $8,000,000 which is being spent, is the fisherman to be guaranteed the present price for his fish? Is that indicated in the agreement or whatever there is when you buy? At the present time I understand that the fisherman gets about two cents a pound.

[Mr. J. L. Gibson.]

Mr. BRIDGES: In the statement which I made the hon. member will note that in the purchase of $8 million worth of fish, prices will be paid which will be regarded as fair to the fishermen at this time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the fishermen working in lake Athabaska, Great Slave lake and Great Bear lake profit by the arrangement the minister has announced?

Mr. BRIDGES: What I am referring to there is this $8,000,000 of post-war UNRRA relief. Unfortunately that type of fish does not come from lake Athabaska or Great Slave lake.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where are we getting it from?

Mr. BRIDGES: It has to be of the salted or canned variety, and there is no salted or canned fish coming from lake Athabaska.

Mr. FRASER: There has been quite a controversy across the country in regard to the use of luminous bait for fishing. I understand that comes under the minister's department. It is not provincial; it is federal. I just wondered if the minister had any remark to make with regard to that, because I know it has been taken up in all the provinces across the country, and they all disclaim any responsibility. They say it is purely federal.

Mr. BRIDGES: In reply to the hon. member may I say I will look into the matter. This is the first time it has been brought to my attention by anyone.

Before the item carries, Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer some of the questions that have been asked. Certainly I shall be very brief, because I am most anxious to get as many of these items through as possible. First, I wish to thank the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg for the constructive suggestions he has made. All I can say at the moment is that, of course, they will receive careful consideration. In connection with his remarks concerning the conservation of fisheries on the high seas I would point out that sometime in August a meeting of the food and agriculture organization of the united nations is to be held at Geneva, Switzerland, at which it is hoped that conservation regions will be established or at least considered.

In reply to the question by the hon. member for Queens I would say that the possible or probable break-down—it is really only an approximate break-down—of the $8,000,000 he mentioned is as follows: on the east coast, dried and salted fish, 10,000,000 pounds amounting to approximately $1,800,000; pickled fish, 40,000 barrels amounting to approximately $520,000; bloaters, 50,000 boxes amounting to $100,000, and canned fish, 100,000 cases amounting to $900,000, making a total of $3,320,000 for the east coast. On the west coast the possible order is for canned herring up to 900,000 cases, which would amount to approximately $4,680,000. Of course these figures are only approximate and they may be varied as time goes on. The hon. member also asked for some comments regarding the existing lobster season on the Atlantic coast. I cannot give him any break-down or special information at the moment with regard to Prince Edward Island, since I did not anticipate that this question would be asked. The final figures are not yet available, since some seasons are still open in the maritime provinces, but it is estimated that the catch is down about thirty per cent and the value down about twenty-five per cent. It is suggested that this is due, first of all, to the unsuitable fishing conditions, and especially to the weather during the early spring season; also, of course, to the scarcity of lobsters; and the price is down because of the less favourable market conditions for both fresh and canned lobster as compared with the brisk markets we had in the past few years in that connection. I think the hon. member also asked whether anything would be done under the prices support act as far as lobsters were concerned. No definite, permanent policy has been announced as yet as far as the board is concerned, and all I can say at the moment is that for the time being it is not the intention of the department to recommend to the board that lobsters come under that act.

The hon. member for Gaspe offered some remarks and referred especially to the fact that the Quebec united fishermen were not represented on the fisheries research board. If it were possible to give them representation on that board I should be only too happy to do so, but unfortunately at the present time all the positions on the board are filled. There are three representatives from the province of Quebec, but they happen to be scientists from McGill university, the university of Montreal, and Laval university. It does happen that, as far as Quebec is concerned, there is no representative on the board of the industry, either cooperative or what one might call private enterprise.

The hon. member for St. John-Albert asked quite a long series of questions. I am afraid I shall not be able to answer them all this evening. As far as Atlantic salmon are concerned, however, I would point out that investigations have been carried on in the bay of Fundy area for the past three years. If the hon. member will refer to the annual report of the fisheries research board for 1946, he will see in it some reference to this matter.

In regard to reports and investigations made with respect to certain dams on certain rivers I would advise the hon. member that a report was made in respect of the dam on the Great Salmon river. That report is in the department, and I shall be only too happy to let him have it. In addition, an engineering investigation is being made to devise ways and means of improving the situation there.

As to the investigations mentioned in the press concerning the Nashwaak river, I would advise the hon. member that the water in that river is still too high to permit those investigations to be carried on. I believe the water is still nine or ten feet above the ordinary summer level.

As to the dam at Newcastle Bridge, I am afraid that is something I shall have to look into; at the moment I cannot seem to remember it.

Then I should like to point out with regard to the regulations concerning clams in the bay of Fundy area that all we do in this connection is impose the prohibition on the digging of clams after we have been so advised by the Department of National Health and Welfare. A careful investigation is being made by the St. Andrew's biological station of the fisheries research board in conjunction with the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and every effort is being made to find a solution to this most difficult and unfortunate problem in that area.

In regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for Skeena, I wish to thank the hon. member for his compliments as far as I am concerned. I would point out that this question of an embargo or export control on raw salmon in British Columbia, frozen and fresh, is not new this year, but is the continuation of a policy which has been in existence for some years. Not only is there an embargo on the export of the raw salmon; there is also an embargo on the export of canned salmon. It is quite possible that certain persons would like to obtain the benefit of the higher prices in the United States market, just as I have no doubt persons engaged in agriculture would like the benefit of higher United States prices, but there are similar regulations against the export of certain agricultural products as well. However I believe the export of red spring salmon to the United States market will not be too difficult, and I understand that permits will be freely issued by the representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is intended to have the whole policy as flexible as possible.

I do not think there is any need of going into these matters in greater detail at the moment. To revert to the remarks of the hon. member for St. John-Albert concerning lobster hatcheries and lobster rearing ponds, I know a report was made on this matter, of which report I think I sent the hon. member a copy. It dealt with the advisability of reestablishing either or both hatcheries and rearing ponds, but our scientists have not come to the conclusion that they have been of the great benefit so many people think they are in Maine and Massachusetts. I am frank to admit that I am insisting that the matter be further studied, because of the arguments which have been advanced over the years, and because the fact that these hatcheries and rearing ponds have been maintained in those states undoubtedly indicates that they must have made some contribution to an increase in the take of lobsters in those areas. At any rate I assure the hon. member, as I would also assure the hon. member for Charlotte if he were here, that the matter is still being carefully considered.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Before we pass this main item, may I say I was interested in the minister's figure of $4,680,000 with which he purchased 900,000 cases of fish on the Pacific coast. It works out at $5.20 a case. Is that the correct figure?

Mr. BRIDGES: It is only an approximation.

Item agreed to.

77. Building fishways and clearing rivers, $25,000.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): This item is much too low. The amount mentioned could be spent on any one of a dozen streams in British Columbia in connection with the clearance of obstructions. How much of this $25,000 is to be spent on the project which the minister and his department know is so dear to the hearts of the fishermen along the south coast of British Columbia, namely the building of the fishway dam at Saginaw lake.

Mr. BRIDGES: I told my hon. friend some time ago that investigations are being made about this.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): They have not yet been completed?

Mr. BRIDGES: No.

Item agreed to.

79. Fish culture, $306,000.

Mr. McLURE: Are the millponds in different parts of the maritime provinces, and particularly Prince Edward Island, now being used as breeding ponds for fish, or as fish culture ponds? I know that in Prince Edward Island several of these old mill dams and millponds have gone out of use as mill property, and the government took over some of them for purposes of reconstruction, with a view to making them ponds for fish culture and fish breeding.

Mr. BRIDGES: I am told that we are working out a joint scheme with the Prince Edward Island government; that we are cooperating with them and using the properties for that purpose.

Item agreed to.

80. Oyster culture, $37,580.

Mr. McLURE: What is the revenue from royalties and from leases in the maritimes? What is the value in dollars and cents of oysters imported from the United States into Canada? What amounts of oysters, either dried or in barrels, are imported from other places?

Mr. BRIDGES: The revenue to December 31, 1946, was $8,235.23 as compared with $6,116.53 for the fiscal year 1945-46, or a gain of approximately $2,100. I have no figures with respect to importations of oysters from the United States.

Item agreed to.

Fisheries Research Board of Canada—

81. Operation and maintenance, $789,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I note that $407,000 is for temporary wages and salaries and only $86,000 for permanent. Why is there so much for temporary assistance?

Mr. BRIDGES: Employees of the research board are not regarded as civil servants, and are taken on as temporary employees.

Mr. HODGSON: Does the fisheries research board or the federal department contribute in any way toward research with respect to the freshwater fisheries on the great lakes? I know it is mainly under provincial jurisdiction. Is there any federal contribution at all?

Mr. BRIDGES: In so far as the great lakes are concerned, and the inland fisheries of Ontario, the fisheries research board has not been making any studies in those waters.

Item agreed to.

85. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission to overcome obstructions to the ascent of sockeye salmon at Hell's Gate canyon and for investigating and overcoming obstructions to such salmon at other points on the Fraser river watershed (revote), $300,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: This refers to a large sum of money which, I know, is to be put to good use by the international board for the conservation of fisheries in connection with the Pacific coast salmon industry. The minister heard the hon. member for New Westminster, perhaps the best-posted member in the house on fisheries problems, and his statements respecting the effect of dams on the Columbia river. Was the hon. member's statement correct with respect to preventing the salmon coming up the Columbia river into British Columbia?

Mr. BRIDGES: What the hon. member was referring to actually occurred many years ago, before my time in the department. I did not know until I heard about it this evening, to be perfectly frank.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are two very large dams not far south of the boundary. One at Grand Coulee is a dam 550 feet high, and then there is another dam almost as high, fifty miles down the river. The hon. member's statement sounded serious to me, if the whole of the Columbia river in British Columbia is no longer to be the spawning ground for salmon. It will certainly have a marked effect on the salmon industry of British Columbia.

Mr. BRIDGES: Both the dams on the Columbia river are in the United States. I am sorry I cannot give more information.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do I understand that the salmon do not any longer ascend the Columbia river into British Columbia?

Mr. BRIDGES: I do not know.

Item agreed to.

87. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing, and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 8 and 19, 1942, $400,000.

Mr. McLURE: On item 87—

Mr. GREEN: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: Call it eleven o'clock. I did not receive an answer to my question. It is incredible that the Columbia river is no longer a salmon spawning river in British Columbia.

Mr. BRIDGES: My information is that the Columbia river never did produce salmon commercially for Canadian interests. I do not know very much about it, to be perfectly frank.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): And it never did.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, July 9, 1947

The house met at ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. With what provinces have agreements been reached for the provincial department to handle family allowance investigation work?

2. What are the financial arrangements with each province in the carrying out of this work?

Mr. MARTIN: Stand.

Mr. WRIGHT: May I ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare? When can I expect an answer to part 1 of this question—before the conclusion of the session?

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot add anything to what I have already said. I hope to be in a position later to deal with the matter more definitely. I cannot say when.

CANADIAN ARMY—CAPT. H. E. GILBERT

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. At what date was Captain Harry Edward Gilbert discharged from the Canadian army?

2. What was the reason for his discharge?

3. What was his age?

4. Did he make application to be retained in the Canadian forces?

5. How many years of service did he have in the Canadian army?

6. What is the rate of pension he is to be paid for his services?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. March 8, 1947.

2. He was considered for service in the interim force and Canadian army (Active force) but the officers selection committee did not select him from among the large number of applicants and he was retired under the provisions of KR (Can) 267 (c).

3. At date of retirement he was 33 years of age.

4. Yes.

5. Permanent force and Canadian army (active), 11 years 233 days; Non-permanent active militia, 4 years 194 days. Total service, 16 years 62 days.

6. He will receive a retiring allowance under the provisions of the Militia Pension Act Part V as follows—

(a) Until he is 65 years of age, $677.91 per annum.

(b) After that age, $1,016.86 per annum.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—SWIFT CURRENT AND MEDICINE HAT

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Have the cities of Swift Current and Medicine Hat been made stop-over points on one of the trans-continental main line flights of T.C.A.?

2. Has it been decided to make Moose Jaw a similar stop-over point?

3. If not, for what reason?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes, as of July 1, 1947.

2. No.

3. A regular stop is made on all T.C.A.'s transcontinental flights at the city of Regina, which is approximately 40 miles from the City of Moose Jaw. Frequent stops on a transcontinental mainline flight and considerably to the scheduled time of the through service. Local service is provided to the City of Moose Jaw by Canadian Pacific Air Lines with connections to T.C.A.'s through transcontinental service at Regina and Saskatoon.

MATADOR RANCH

Mr. MENARY:

1. Has the government purchased the Matador ranch, situated in Alberta and Saskatchewan?

2. If so, how many acres did it contain and how much per acre was paid therefor?

3. What was the total purchase price?

4. For what purpose was the ranch purchased?

5. Who is now the owner?

6. Has the area thereof been subdivided by the government? If so, how and why?

7. For what purposes has the area been used since acquired by the government?

8. Has any part of it been leased? If so, to whom and on what terms?

9. Have any buildings been built thereon by the government? If so, how many and what is the outlay for each?

10. Has the government employed any person to manage directly or work on the ranch? If so, what is his name and at what salary or wage is he paid?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. No.

2 to 10. See answer No. 1.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

DESIGN FOR CANADIAN FARM HOUSE

Mr. WINKLER:

1. Has the national research council or any other department of government done any research toward plans for the construction of a suitable and distinctive Canadian farm house?

2. If so, when and by whom?

3. Have any provincial governments offered to cooperate in the production of plans for a farm house? If so, which?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes, Central Mortage and Housing Corporation.

2. Since February last, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been actively promoting the organization of an extensive research programme, having as its object the development of a number of house plans and designs particularly suited to the needs of farm families, and improved modern equipment for farm homes.

3. As a result of discussions which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has held during the last few months with the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, a prairie rural housing committee has been established representing the three prairie governments, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and the Dominion Department of Agriculture, to plan a programme of rural housing research. This committee held a special meeting in Saskatoon on May 20, 1947 and as a result, seven specific rural housing research projects were recommended. The recommendation in respect of each project also suggested at what prairie research institution the particular project should be conducted.

The research projects to be investigated are improved farm house plans, more economical methods of wall construction using materials available locally, the development of improved running water and sewage disposal systems for farm homes, farm house electric lighting and electrical appliances, better methods of heating farm houses, a special study of farm kitchen planning and equipment, and the development of a few suitable designs for the construction of rural community centres. The individual projects are now being considered by the governments concerned, and it is expected an early start will be made on most of the projects, particularly the study of farm house plans. The research programme will be financed jointly by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the three prairie governments.

There has also been established in British Columbia a rural housing committee through which the British Columbia government and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will carry on research and promotional activities in an effort to improve the standard of rural housing in that province.

ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL COMMEMORATIVE POSTAGE STAMPS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many of the Alexander Graham Bell commemorative postage stamps were (a) issued; (b) distributed?
2. Are the plates destroyed?
3. Is it intended to issue any more?
4. How many sheets were unperforated and retained by the Postmaster General or his department?
5. Was this stamp issue made available to the postmasters in the smaller post offices?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): In answer to the first question, generally we do not give this information until six months after the stamp has been issued and distributed; but since the newspapers have already given the information today I have no objection to answering it. The answers are as follows:

1. (a) 25,000,000 (b) 25,000,000.
2. No.
3. No.
4. None.
5. Yes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXTENDED SITTINGS—HOURS OF DUTY OF PAGE BOYS AND OTHERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the long hours that we are now making it necessary for the page boys and others to be on duty, may I ask the Prime Minister whether consideration might be given either to staggering their hours or providing overtime, or both?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that I am sure His Honour the Speaker will take all necessary care of the officials of the house.

Mr. REID: What about the stenographers?

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear.

IMMIGRATION

DISPLACED PERSONS—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): May I ask the acting Minister of Mines and Resources if he can elucidate on the order published yesterday that displaced persons to the number of five thousand will be admitted to Canada? I want to know whether this new extension of the immigration regulation covers people in Europe other than displaced persons.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Acting Minister of Mines and Resources): The order which was tabled in the house some days ago provides only for displaced persons. Immigration of other types of persons is moving to Canada steadily, and has no reference to this particular order.

Mr. SKEY: It applies only to those in camps?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

INQUIRY AS TO EFFECT ON CANADA OF 25 PER CENT CUT IN BRITISH IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? I am sorry that I did not give more notice than I have, but I did send him the newspaper clipping this morning as soon as I saw him. My question has to do with a statement made by Mr. Herbert Morrison in the British House of Commons yesterday as to the possibility very shortly of a twenty-five per cent cut in imports to the United Kingdom. I should like the minister to comment upon that statement and to indicate whether any consultation has taken place between this government and the United Kingdom government, and also how it may affect our economy.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Peel spoke to me as we were coming into the chamber. The matter to which he refers is receiving the earnest attention of the officials of Trade and Commerce, of myself and also of my colleagues, the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It would appear that the United Kingdom government feels that it has to restrict imports, and this will affect Canada. Among other things, newsprint will likely be affected. It happens that newsprint is in scarce supply in parts of Canada, particularly in Alberta and British Columbia, as far as our own newspapers are concerned. On the other hand, there is of course a great market for Canadian newsprint for which we can get American dollars not only in the United States but in other countries in this hemisphere. However, the producers of Canada are very anxious about this matter, inasmuch as it may affect the traditional market we have enjoyed in the United Kingdom, and that is being watched very closely.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ANNUAL REPORT FOR YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1947

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour a question. I believe he tabled the unemployment insurance report for the year ended March 31, 1947. Has this report been printed, and will it be available when we deal with the estimates of his department?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I do not think so but I will inquire. As soon as it is printed I will see that a copy is forwarded, in English and French, to every member of the house.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADDITIONAL ALLOWANCE TO GOVERNMENT AND OPPOSITION LEADERS IN SENATE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act to provide an additional annual allowance to the member of the senate occupying the recognized position of leader of the government in the senate and the member occupying the recognized position of leader of the opposition in the senate.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are definitely opposed to this resolution and to the bill which it is proposed to base upon it. As a matter of fact, had I realized that it was this item that was being called a moment ago when the Speaker was in the chair we would have opposed the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair. It so happens that last night the Minister of Veterans Affairs told us that this morning there would be nothing but third readings and supply. We did not expect this until this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend will find that I envisioned the possibility of this bill being called any time today.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister envisioned the possibility of its being called this afternoon, but that is neither here nor there, though it is the reason I did not realize that this was the item that was being called. However, now that we are in committee I want to state our definite opposition to this measure and to indicate to the Prime Minister that if it is the intention of the government to proceed with it and to bring in a bill based upon it, we shall oppose it at all succeeding stages.

To us this seems a strange expression of the promise of the Liberal party down through the years to reform the senate. To us the function played by the senate in our Canadian life is a useless one, and to be strengthening its position in this way just does not come very well from a Liberal government.

I want to make this one point very clear, Mr. Chairman, that in our opposition to this measure we are not expressing any criticism of the two hon. senators immediately affected by the proposal. I personally have a great deal of regard for both these hon. gentlemen. Though I do not know personally the government leader in the other place, I have had occasion a number of times to read speeches he has made and I have been impressed with his attitude towards both domestic and international affairs. I recognize him as a distinguished public servant. I may say also, as regards the opposition leader in the senate, that I have known him personally a good many years and in the province from which we both come, despite any differences of ideas or political opinions that may be held, he is held in high regard in every quarter. I say that in the hope that in this discussion no one will introduce any personalities at all.

To us, however, the principle of strengthening and rendering still more vested the interest in the other place is contrary to the whole principle of representative democracy. It is contrary to the promises of the Liberal party down through the years to reform the senate, and we believe it is contrary to the wishes of the Canadian people.

Further, I might point out that there is a definite incongruity in this session between the kind of measures we seem to find time to pass, such as this one, and the fact that we have not time to pass or to deal with an important measure such as the labour code. Therefore I wish to make it known that we in this group are definitely opposed to this measure.

Resolution reported and read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the resolution be read a second time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now.

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

Resolution read the second time on division and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King, thereupon, moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 443, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Speak louder.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Next sitting.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Next sitting.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to moderate their voices. It is impossible to proceed with the business of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I realize that it would require the unanimous consent of the house to proceed with the second reading at this moment, but seeing that there is only one clause in the measure and that it is so readily understood, I thought that at this stage of the session the house would permit the second reading this morning. However, if hon. gentlemen of the C.C.F. group are opposed to the second reading taking place this morning, perhaps they would permit it to take place later on today. I ask that simply because I am anxious to expedite the business of the session and there are some other matters to which I have to give a great deal of attention in these closing days.

Mr. MacINNIS: It seems to be the practice of the government to hold contentious measures back until the end of the session and then try to force them through because of lack of time. We are not opposed to the sections of this bill; we are opposed to the principle of it and do not intend to facilitate its passage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand it, the C.C.F. do not give their consent to proceeding with second reading today?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then, we shall proceed with second reading tomorrow.

An hon. MEMBER: The government will railroad it through tomorrow.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Demobilization and reconversion—

551. To provide for the orderly establishment and organization of the defence forces of the army, navy and air services on a peacetime basis and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $29,833,648—$226,709,331.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, the practice has been for ministers of the defence departments in introducing their estimates to make a general statement covering the work done in the previous year as well as plans for the future.

On June 17, 1947, P.C. 2372 was adopted providing that the members of the armed forces shall cease to be on active service as at September 30, 1947. At that time the formal change from a war to a peace footing for the armed services will be related to the inauguration of a campaign to obtain recruits for the active and reserve forces. In the meantime, however, now that our wartime forces have in fact ended the work to which they had set their hands, it will, I believe, be the wish of hon. members that a brief summary of the facts and figures of their accomplishments should be set down in Hansard as a permanent record of a magnificent achievement.

Canada's war record in reminding us of the nature of modern war will inspire and strengthen us to work with other nations to create the conditions for enduring peace. Canada's part in two wars will lead us, until progress is made in ensuring peace through collective action, to establish our own forces on a post-war basis which will be related to the defence needs of the country as these may change from time to time. Our policy must be informed by war time experience just as it is inspired by war time achievements.

In the statement which follows, after reviewing the achievements in war I propose to set out what I take to be the defence needs of Canada, to indicate some of the matters which must receive the most immediate attention and to describe long-term objectives with regard to the department and the armed forces.

The war of liberation started on September 1, 1939. Germany's brutal attack on Poland was followed by the so-called "phony war", when Germany was growing in strength to make the sweep through Denmark, Norway, the Netherlands, Belgium and France. From the fall of France in June, 1940, until Russia was brought into the war a year later, Britain and the countries of the commonwealth stood almost alone. The will to be free was for a time the main armour that stood against the evil thrust to make Germany supreme and everyone else slaves.

Canadian territory was not attacked but from the outset we recognized that this was a fight in which our vital interests were involved, and, by act of our own government on the all but unanimous support of our own parliament, we entered the war on September 10, 1939. Our contribution mounted steadily.

At sea, our main job was to keep the bridge of ships open to Britain. The submarine menace was a major threat. Our young navy carried out a major part of the work of escort across the Atlantic. At the start of the war our navy had 1,769 full-time officers and men. Before its end, 100,000 men had passed through its ranks and we had a total of 780 ships.

The first division left Canada in December, 1939, and was joined by the second division early in 1940. These two divisions were among the few bodies of trained troops ready to withstand a German assault on Britain and some of them at Dieppe paved the way for future landings. The first Canadian infantry division landed at Sicily in July, 1943 and was followed soon by the fifth Canadian armoured division and other units. These comprised the first Canadian corps and fought up the whole long length of Italy to the finishing battles on the river Po.

The third Canadian infantry division landed on D-Day, June 6, 1944 followed by the second Canadian infantry division and the fourth Canadian armoured division. The Canadian Army was formed in July, 1944, comprising the second Canadian corps and the first British corps. The Canadian Army took a foremost part in the fighting in Normandy and up the channel ports through Holland, and Germany beyond the Rhine. Forming part of the Canadian army at one time or another were all but two of the British divisions, as well as a number of American divisions, a Polish armoured division, a Belgian brigade and a Czech brigade. The Canadian army was an effective international force and its components got on well together under Canadian leadership, of our own General H. D. G. Crerar, Companion of Honour. Early in 1945 more than half a million men of half a dozen countries formed the Canadian army which stretched over 250 miles of front and being at this time probably the largest single army formation on the western front. From the beaches through Caen, Falaise, by the channel ports, over the Scheldt and Rhine, the Canadians lived up to the reputation they had made in world war I.

Our peacetime permanent force of 4,492 officers and men was multiplied more than a hundred and sixty times. Before the war was over 709,007 men had served in the Canadian army, in addition to 21,618 members of the Canadian Women's Army Corps.

The British commonwealth air training plan from its start in December, 1939, was a spectacular undertaking. Soon we had nearly 200 training schools across Canada. By the time the plan was finished it had trained 42,110 young flyers from the United Kingdom (including 5,293 Royal Air Force and Fleet Air Arm pilots trained in Canada at R.A.F. schools prior to July, 1942 when these schools became part of B.C.A.T.P.) 9,606 from Australia, and 7,002 from New Zealand. In addition we trained 72,835 Canadian air crew, and altogether a total of 131,553 air crew. It is believed that Canada had the highest per capita number of air crew of any nation fighting in the war.

The first Canadian flyers to reach the other side were members of auxiliary squadrons. These were soon followed by a steady flow of pilots, navigators, air gunners, radar operators and the all-important ground crew. At the outbreak of war there were 2,948 officers and men in the R.C.A.F. During the war a total of 249,624 Canadians served in the Royal Canadian Air Force in addition to another 4,000 serving with the Royal Air Force.

Canadians came to play their part, to offer their lives, from the farms, the woods, the mines, the city streets, the workshops and the schools. Here is a summary of their numbers and of the losses suffered.

Served During the War	Men	Women	Total
Navy	99,479	7,043	106,522
Army	709,007*	21,618	730,625
Air Force	232,594	17,030	249,624
Totals	1,041,080	45,691	1,086,771

Casualties	Killed	Wounded	Total
Navy	1,981	319	2,300
Army	22,964	51,410	74,374
Air Force	17,047	1,416	18,463
Totals	41,992	53,145	95,137

*This includes 3,633 women members of the R.C.A.M.C.

Twelve lists of the Canadians who were awarded operational or foreign decorations were placed on Hansard by my predecessors taking the fine record up to October, 1945. I believe it would be the wish of the house that the gallant story of those who were decorated should be completed by placing on Hansard those names which have not previously been recorded here. The list is long and, with the consent of the committee, I suggest that it be printed as an appendix to Hansard when the sessional flood of printing has somewhat abated.

A summary of all awards from the commencement of the War in September, 1939 to March 31, 1947 follows:—

	Navy	Army	Air Force	Total
British Awards.	1,677	11,932	8,735	22,344
Foreign Awards.	54	1,475	213	1,742
Totals	1,731	13,407	8,948	24,086

Included in this final list are four more Canadians who were awarded the Victoria Cross. The citations for these awards have always previously been placed on Hansard, and with the consent of the committee I will have these citations printed in the appendix to which I have referred. The additional Canadians to whom the Victoria Cross was awarded are: Lieutenant Robert Hampton Gray, RCNVR, (deceased); Honorary Captain John Weir Foote, Canadian chaplain services; Company Sergeant Major John Robert Osborn, Winnipeg Grenadiers, (deceased); Pilot Officer Andrew Charles Mynarski, RCAF, (deceased).

Canada made notable contributions to the war in the supply of munitions, food and financial assistance to the allied cause. Canada produced finished munitions of war to a total of about $10 billion. Despite the fact that 25 per cent of our younger farmers joined the armed forces or worked in munitions, the farmers of Canada produced more than 40 per cent more food than in 1939 and by making our surpluses available to Britain and other countries prevented starvation succeeding where the enemy had failed.

The total cost of the war to Canada and its immediate aftermath to March 31, 1947 is estimated at $20·25 billions. Of this $6·43 billions was spent in mutual aid or other financial assistance to our allies.

At the peak of war production 1,166,000 men and women worked directly in the production of munitions and, with the 1,086,771 in the armed forces, made a total of more than two and a quarter million Canadians who served either in the fighting forces or in the direct production of munitions.

These figures give the measure of the problem of demobilization, rehabilitation, and reconversion. At the peak, which may be taken to be V-E day, May 8, 1945, there were 349,159 Canadians in England and Europe, including R.C.N. who moved under their own steam. Before they had all been brought home, there were 37,016 wives and 14,630 children, making a total repatriation job for about 400,000 persons. In addition to this total some 10,000 dependents, wives and children had been brought to Canada prior to V-E day. This was proceeded with more expeditiously, more smoothly and with less discomfort than anyone could have hoped for. There are 127 members of the armed forces still in the United Kingdom and Europe, doing work in connection with graves and records, including our military mission to Berlin and liaison staff in the United Kingdom. That work will have to continue for some time. There are some 1,000 dependents who have long ago been offered transportation which for one reason or another they have so far been unable to take advantage of but who still want to come to Canada.

The repatriation and demobilization of the armed forces ranked first in priority and the way this was organized and pressed through to completion by both my immediate predecessors earned the gratitude of the hundreds of thousands concerned and of their families, indeed of all Canadians.

From time to time suitable tributes have been paid to the ministers and deputies, to the generals and privates, to the workers and the farmers who did their utmost. Canada's national effort in the war was a great national partnership.

We have tried to ensure for our sailors, soldiers, and airmen that they should not be any worse off because they had served. Consequently parliament authorized the introduction of what is regarded everywhere as the most comprehensive and generous plan of rehabilitation in effect in any country. That work and the work of hospitalization and treatment will go on.

The liquidation of surplus war stores proceeded alongside the demobilization of men. At the close of the war in September, 1945 in Canada we had more than a billion and a half dollars worth of military equipment and munitions. At one time or another in Canada there were some 6,000 different military establishments, all of which have had to be examined to decide which should be kept and which should be disposed of.

We have kept the munitions necessary to equip the Canadian active and reserve forces on a scale never before known. We have also quantities of stores for replacement and a large quantity of stores for mobilization reserves. But more than a billion dollars worth was declared surplus, and the operation of putting all this material in condition for distribution, storage or disposal made the Canadian armed forces and War Assets Corporation the greatest warehousing and merchandising concerns in the history of the country.

As men were demobilized from the armed forces, civilians were taken on to replace them in the work of demobilization and liquidation, with the result that the civilian personnel reached almost to its wartime peak in December, 1946 with a total of 33,000. As the work of warehousing and disposal was being pressed forward with all possible speed, we were able to reduce the numbers of civilian personnel and at 31st March, 1947 the figure was 20,131 or a reduction of 13,131 representing 37 per cent in four months.

Mr. STIRLING: That is for the three services?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right, and the three departments until their unification. As the work of consolidation and disposal is proceeded with, there will be further reductions from time to time. Every possible care will be taken to see that these reductions are effected with the least possible hardship to individuals. The small amount of disturbance or complaint in consequence of reductions already made reflects on the capacity of our national economy to absorb these people and also on the good sense of the Canadian people to recognize that there is no justification for keeping them on any longer than they are needed.

The civilians now on strength of the department total 19,783. Of these 9,249 are civil servants, or do work similar to that done by civil servants, the remainder are prevailing rate employees engaged in the dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt, in the construction or conversion of married quarters, in the handling of stores, in various duties, like watchmen, caretakers, firefighters and so on. Our plan is to have as much of this type of work done by civilians as possible, so as to have as many as we can of our armed forces engaged on planning, training and operations.

This brings me to a consideration of the defence needs of Canada, the organization of our defence forces and the progress made to date.

Taking up first the question of the defence needs of Canada, Canada's defence forces may be required,—

1. to defend Canada against aggression;

2. to assist the civil power in maintaining law and order within the country;

3. to carry out any undertakings which by our own voluntary act we may assume in co-operation with friendly nations or under any effective plan of collective action under the united nations.

Obviously our needs must be considered in the light of circumstances as they change from time to time. The factors bearing on this are numerous. Among them, the following are particularly important:

(a) the geographical position of Canada;
(b) the capacity of any possible aggressor to make an attack;
(c) the disposition of friendly nations;
(d) what may be called "the international climate."

Developments in warlike materials, particularly new weapons, have an important bearing on the whole position. As the war neared its end, four new weapons had been introduced and were in process of development. These were the atomic bomb, jet-propelled planes, rockets and higher speed submarines.

Sufficient quantities of any one of these four new weapons probably would have been sufficient to win the war for the side which had them first. These new weapons and the chemical and bacteriological agents now known are so much more devastating than anything previously used that of themselves they may make major changes in the nature of war, should war come again to scourge the earth.

These new powerful weapons reinforce the powerful appeal of those who work to make war impossible. What we have seen of destruction and devastation in world wars I and II would be small in character or extent when compared with the appalling destructiveness of any further large-scale war. For this reason our first line of defence and the object of all our policy must be to work with other nations to prevent war.

This is just as true today in Canada as it is in every other country. Distance and space still combine to give us great natural advantages for which we cannot be too grateful, but distance and space have been drastically reduced and are still shrinking; and the shaping of world events and the changing centres of power have put Canada in a more important strategical position than she has ever been before.

Let us set down here that we believe that it is possible for nations to live in peace—perhaps the fate of humanity depends on this belief becoming an eternal fact. We also believe that in the united nations there is the beginning of an organization which may be developed progressivly into a great instrument for peaceful cooperation. But that progress depends on the way in which powers, and particularly the great powers, work with each other. While the proceedings of the assembly last December gave some ground for encouragement, it is still too early for this or any nation to rest on its arms with the assurance that there will be no aggression.

As the first aim of our foreign policy is peace, so the first aim of our defence policy is defence against aggression.

Having set out what I take to be the defence needs of Canada, it is quite evident that the need for defence forces at any given time must be considered with regard to the proportion of the national budget which we are prepared to spend for that purpose. The business of government involves the balancing of means and ends. No government department would be worth its salt if it was ever satisfied with the functions it was exercising. No defence force will ever be satisfied.

But quite apart from budgetary considerations, I doubt if more than the sum sought of $240,000,000 could be wisely spent in Canada on defence during the current fiscal year. While much progress has been made no one appreciates more than myself that there is still a lot of work to be done in reorganization before we can provide a proper organizational and administrative basis for any defence forces that we may have in the future.

The sum of $240,000,000 will represent about 12 per cent of our national budget. It compares with $35 millions spent in 1938-39 or the low figure of $13 millions for 1932-33. Last year the appropriations voted for the three departments totalled $486,849,141 millions and the expenditures for the year totalled $383,325,686. The amount underspent is partly accounted for by the very much more rapid rate at which our forces were repatriated and demobilized than anticipated. The estimates for 1946-47 were prepared on the assumption that the strength of the three services would total throughout the year 98,360 whereas halfway through the year by October 1, the actual strength had been reduced by demobilization to 55,132. Another reason contributing to the difference between appropriations and expenditures was the postponement of defence purchasing and construction in favour of civilian purchasing and construction.

The work of repatriation and demobilization is to all intents and purposes complete. The work of overhauling and liquidating stores is rather more than 75 per cent complete. We still have, however, large numbers of civilian and service personnel engaged in this work and some of them will be engaged on this for a year or more longer.

In addition, we have a very large number of civilian and service personnel engaged in making necessary conversions in camps and air stations so as to fit in with the post-war plan. The biggest job being undertaken is to provide married quarters for married personnel. This is the most urgent single need in all three services. We have personnel at work endeavouring to convert into married quarters every available convertible hutment. Our target is to create more than a thousand new dwelling units in Canada this year, but whether or not we can do it depends on the availability of materials and labour. We have largely removed the limitations on what used to be called the married establishments so that anyone in one of the three services who saw active service, and officers over 25 years, and soldiers over 23, who have completed initial training, who are married are entitled to the relevant marriage allowances. Because a large proportion of the officers and men in the armed forces saw service overseas, many of them from the start of the war to the close, a very much larger percentage, probably 65 per cent are married.

At Shilo Camp in Manitoba which I visited during the Easter recess, the military hospital provided assistance at the birth of eleven children in June. Under the regimental institute committees of officers and men and their wives run on a cooperative basis, modern well-equipped butcher and grocery shops, a hairdresser's, a shoemaker's, wet and dry canteens, a moving picture theatre, all kinds of recreations, concerts and dances, as well as a nursery school. In addition to the usual facilities, the army provides a library and a two-room elementary school where sixty children are taught by army-hired instructors and this and similar arrangements elsewhere for the education of the children of our men in the armed forces who are in isolated communities are being geared into the provincial school system.

Despite all our efforts, we are still short of married quarters in almost every establishment, but efforts are being made to remedy this just as soon as possible. I mention this because it shows the changed nature of Canada's post-war armed forces. We aim to create conditions which will attract the best of our young men and enable them to live useful lives as respected citizens of the community.

As in other countries, this is still a year of reorganization. Without excluding other objects of activity, I might mention particularly five matters which have a very high priority in all our activities today

1. Organization.
2. Training of officers.

3. Reserve training.

4. Research.

5. Industrial organization.

As all these matters have been touched upon in speeches before this house and elsewhere, it will shorten the proceedings if I do not develop them here, but I will, of course, be only too glad to answer questions on these or any other matters arising in connection with the department.

Since my appointment in December I have taken advantage of every possible opportunity to visit units of the navy, army and air force in many parts of Canada. The total strength of the active forces today is 32,610. They represent a fine body of fit and highly qualified Canadians, well worthy of taking up the record made for them in world war I and which so many of them helped to make in world war II.

Mr. IRVINE: Is that the total active force in the three services?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right, active only. I have taken advantage of every possible opportunity to meet representatives of reserve associations, cooperating organizations like the Navy League of Canada and the Air Cadet League, as well as representatives of industry and experts from other countries. All these have extended the most helpful cooperation. In this new world of supersonic talk and saucers flying in formation, it is important that there should be a wide measure of informed and interested support of adequate defence measures by people who have a sense of responsibility and who are willing to accept the responsibility. We can never express too warmly the appreciation this country owes to the officers, N.C.O.'s and men and their civilian friends who, by their voluntary support, maintained our reserve forces through the difficult period of the years between the wars. I must say I am most grateful to them and to their successors who are carrying on now and to all those who have been of such great assistance in this work of national importance.

In closing, I enumerate the long-term objects of the department and services:

1. Progressively closer coordination of armed services and unification of the department so as to form a single defence force, with the three armed services working together as a team.

2. Joint intelligence and planning groups to review defence appreciations and plans.

3. Clothing, food, quarters, pay, pensions and working conditions suitable for young Canadians of high physical and educational standards.

[Mr. Claxton.]

4. Means to provide the active and reserve forces of the three services with adequate numbers of highly qualified officers.

5. Development of reserve forces of an age and with educational and physical standards and training approximating those of the active forces competent to go to sea, take the field or fly in action.

6. Provision for reserve forces of training syllabuses, administration and training officers, and equipment on a larger scale than before the war.

7. Maintaining adequate reserves of equipment and weapons.

8. Close integration of the armed forces, the defence purchasing agency, government arsenals and civilian industry, looking towards standardization and industrial organization to permit of the speedy and complete utilization of our industrial resources.

9. Cooperation between the armed forces the defence research board and private industry regarding defence research so that we keep up to date with regard to the design and planning of weapons.

10. Support for Canadian Arsenals Limited and a limited number of Canadian industries to maintain and increase skills in the design and manufacture of munitions and aircraft.

11. Organization of government departments and civilian agencies capable of putting into immediate effect a plan for civil defence.

12. Government leadership to obtain civilian support of the armed forces.

13. Armed forces to form an integral part of the life of the community.

14. Cooperation with the countries of the commonwealth, the United States and other like-minded countries in working out common standards, planning and training.

These objectives will not be achieved at once but we are working towards them. I hope we shall have the support of all parties and members of this house, of members of the active and reserve armed forces, of industry, indeed of the whole community of Canada. The measures to be taken for the defence of our country are matters of individual interest as well as national responsibility.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): The statement to which we have just listened from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was in the nature of a rapid synopsis of past, present and the future. I want to add a few words with regard to one portion of this matter, namely, the Royal Canadian Navy. Before I do so I should like to ascertain from the minister what his ideas are with regard to the discussion which should take place. The trend of his remarks this year all led one to suppose that he desires to look upon the defence forces as one service.

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. STIRLING: That was the idea I got from the minister's remarks.

Mr. CLAXTON: One team of service forming one armed force.

Mr. STIRLING: The figures which he gave on various occasions in his statement were of the three services combined, and I am glad if, as the minister says, he is ready to receive discussion of the three services separately; for in the past, both before the war and during the war, that was the custom of this committee and I think that it tended to better discussion than if it browsed around amongst the three services.

His remarks, of course, of necessity were brief. In consequence he could not deal as fully as I am sure he would have wished with the services rendered to this country and to the allied cause by the Royal Canadian Navy. He referred to a good part of its duties having been the retention of the bridge between Canada and Europe, but he did not refer to any of the fighting services which they rendered in the far north, in the channel, and in the Mediterranean. One of the things which I should like the minister to deal with later on is the extent to which our ships have been winterized. It is only after hearing accounts of those who served, either in convoy work or in actual fighting in the far north, that we realize the hardships which the sailor has to put up with in that climate. Now that more consideration than ever is given to defence problems in the far north it is necessary, if we expect our ships to serve within the Arctic circle, that we do everything we possibly can to render the ships adequate living quarters.

The minister did not, I think, go into details with regard to the present strength of the navy. I want to draw his attention to the figures of a year ago and to the figures which he gave in answer to certain questions which I put on the order paper in June. It is the duty of the government to devise the strength of the three fighting services. I am not disposed to criticize the government in this regard, for they are in possession of information which is not available to us. They have had the benefit of the discussions of the permanent joint board of defence. Canada and the United States sit together to discuss the problems. I do not know at what levels discussions take place between Canada and the United Kingdom. Perhaps the minister will give us a little information with regard to that; but a year ago the minister's predecessor gave the actual strength of the navy on July 31 as 8,216. He said the permanent force was then 6,005, and he tacked on to that the interim force of 1,137; and hostilities only, approximately 1,000. We have to endeavour to compare with that the figures given in June in reply to my questions. He gave the figure 7,386—I do not know whether to relate that to the 8,216 actual strength last year or to the 6,005 given as the permanent force. I do not know whether the interim force is still a considered unit which was supposed to carry until September 30 of this year. The minister made no reference to that portion of the Canadian navy figures in June; consequently I want some explanation of that.

Of the 7,386 which the minister gave, 3,590 served afloat, which leaves 3,796 on shore establishments. This more than bears out my contention last year that for every seaman afloat there was necessarily a seaman ashore, and it enters into the consideration of the strength in ships. Last year the minister's predecessor gave these figures as two fleet aircraft, two cruisers, twelve destroyers, eighteen frigates and twelve escort mine sweepers, referring to the fact that only certain of these were in commission; and he finished that statement with the following: "there would be a certain proportion of the fleet always in reserve". I presume that that covers the ships which we now own but which are tied up. The minister explained that we have one aircraft carrier which Canada does not own but whose services we benefit from; one cruiser, five destroyers, one frigate, and four minesweepers. But that does not quite tally with the statement attributed to the minister when he met the press on board H.M.C.S. Nootka, in which he said he hoped very shortly that there would be an air fleet carrier and four destroyers on one coast and a cruiser and three destroyers on the other. Perhaps the minister would enlarge on that matter of strength. Then he dealt at short length with the civilians now in the employe of the three services, but he did not separate those into their various establishments. I wonder whether he would be good enough to give us the total of the civilians employed for naval purposes, and if possible divide them up into their locations and the work which they are carrying out in the various parts of Canada.

He indicated that up until, I believe, March 31 the numbers were drooping, but I should like to know, whether, in view of the enormous amount of work he described as being still necessary outside of the fighting people, that figure has risen again or has continued to droop.

Then with regard to the reserve, Canada's plan for her navy has for many years been the retention of a highly trained, efficient, small force which could be readily expanded when the need arose, and the success of that plan was undoubtedly proved during this recent war as it was in the previous one. Now we are sliding back again into the condition of a highly trained but small navy which can again be expanded if unfortunately it should need expansion, and supporting that highly trained force there would be a reserve. The last information I have seen from the minister with regard to that reserve force is that there would be eighteen, possibly twenty divisions, across Canada, and the figures which I have for June 9, 1947, spoke of a force of 2,693, which is a notable increase from a year ago. But it does not come very close to the figure which I think the minister gave as the number which he expected to be able to raise.

That leads me to the point of recruiting. Recruiting in that term is not used with regard to the reserve. What efforts is the minister making to induce the gradual expansion of that reserve in the various divisions across Canada, and where do we stand today with regard to actual recruiting for the navy? A little while ago in the press I read that certain classes of trained personnel were required, but there was no reference at that time to anything in the nature of general recruiting, and I should like the minister to give us an explanation in that regard.

There are two other matters I want to touch on shortly One is that which the minister, both today and two or three weeks ago, referred to,—the question of housing for personnel. It is my information, whether it be correct or not, that the navy has not come off as well as the other two services in the question of providing roofs for married personnel. I do not need to emphasize to the minister the fact that you cannot have a happy service if you are not able to provide reasonably adequate quarters for that portion of the personnel who are married.

The other point that I want to take up is the question whether it would not be possible to give recognition in the way of assistance in transportation at time of leave. I did take this matter up with the minister some weeks ago and he told me that a great deal of consideration had been given to that point when the new rates of pay and allowances were arrived at. He pointed out that it was the opinion of the department that further assistance for transportation on leave for the permanent service was scarcely advisable because the new rates of pay had taken care of it.

The illustration which he gave did not impress me very strongly. He said that the new rates of pay and allowances were such that they brought the men into fair relationship with their brothers in industry. I do not follow that illustration, for this reason. When a man goes into industry he picks and chooses where he will go and decides whether it would be desirable for him to stay there or to move on somewhere else. That is not the case of a man in the service. He is directed to go to a certain place. He is directed to remain there until he is directed to go somewhere else. It would be but reasonable, in a country of the extent of Canada, that our sailors, drawn from every province, and a great many of them from the central provinces, should have some assistance that they may travel to their homes at the times of their leave—assistance in the payment of a certain portion of the cost of that transportation. In many cases when the distance is great they could not afford to do it out of their pay.

We have had a not very good advertisement in the form of "H.M.C.S. Poverty", where eighteen naval ratings purchased a truck because they could not afford to travel otherwise from coast to coast. They pooled their initiative and energy in what the public called "H.M.C.S. Poverty" and drove to the Pacific coast, dropping off en route their members who belonged to other places, and very ably arranging the return journey so that they could pick them up. It does not seem to me that is a very good advertisement of the way we are treating our permanent force employees, and I should like the minister to give further consideration to something in the nature of what, in my railway days in the old country, used to be called privilege tickets.

I understand that the United Kingdom does give assistance to its personnel at the time of their leave. Because they do it is no warrant in itself that we should do it, but when one remembers that the United Kingdom is a tiny country, involving journeys of a few miles comparatively, it makes one recognize the necessity of assisting service people in this country where journeys run into thousands of miles. Surely there is necessity for helping them here.

I should like to understand from the minister before I sit down how he proposes to proceed with this discussion. Item 551 has been called, which covers all three services. I do not know whether he will consider it wise to let the discussion range over the three services at this time or whether we can discuss naval matters first and then proceed to the other services.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member has raised a question which I must say gives me some difficulty, but perhaps during the adjournment which is about to take place I may have a word with him and the chairman of the committee and representatives of other parties to see what would be the best order. We can proceed to have a general discussion on all the services and the department together, following this with consideration of the details which appear on page 275 under eight items; or we could as the hon. member has just suggested, deal first with general discussion service by service. It is quite immaterial to me and I am completely in the hands of the committee as to which method we should adopt. I certainly feel, with the hon. member for Yale, that we should adopt one course or the other so that we shall know what we are doing.

Mr. STIRLING: May I point out that the details on page 275 do not help us in this regard—

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. STIRLING: —because they are common to all three services.

Mr. CLAXTON: On that account I think it might be better to do it subject by subject after the general discussion. But if there is any disposition or feeling that it is preferable to treat it service by service, I would be quite prepared to meet the wishes of hon. members with regard to that. If the course is acceptable to my hon. friend, during the adjournment I can meet with him and representatives of the other parties and the chairman of the committee, to decide on a course of action. I might now take up some of the other points he raised.

I want to make it quite clear that when I referred to one set of armed forces, I had in mind the continuation of the three services. In our plans for consolidation and cooperation we want to ensure that they work together as a team in one department and under one national defence headquarters, so that they carry into peace time the reality of combined operations which was an essential ingredient of victory in time of war. As has already been pointed out in this house, the reason why one minister of defence was appointed instead of three, was to bring about that result. But it would be quite wrong to suggest that we have in mind anything in the nature of a complete wiping-out of the differences which result from the different functions and are useful in maintaining the traditions of the armed forces.

The hon. member has had an interest in the Royal Canadian Navy which we all know and appreciate. No doubt it began because his father had a distinguished career in the Royal Navy. That interest grew because he himself was once minister of national defence, and now it has flowered because as hon members know, he has a son who is serving in the Royal Canadian Navy. It was my great pleasure and privilege to take the first trip I had on a Canadian naval vessel in H.M.C.S. Nootka, which was under the command of Lieut.-Commander Michael Stirling, who was captain of that fine and happy Canadian ship. As to the adequacy of the living quarters, all I can say is that the captain was good enough, while he was occupying his deck cabin, to give up to me his day cabin, and those quarters were adequate indeed.

The plan is to have all Canadian vessels equipped so that they can operate in our northern waters. That is one of the main reasons why the Warrior is being exchanged for the Magnificent. The Magnificent will be winterized. The Warrior was not. All the Canadian-built tribal destroyers are winterized; and the Ontario, when it puts to sea, will also be winterized. The hope is that our ships will all be winterized and made as comfortable as possible for the fine young officers and men in our Canadian navy, of whom we are exceedingly proud. Conditions will be found to be very different from those at the time when the father of the hon. member for Yale served in the Royal Navy—served I believe as a captain in that splendid service.

With regard to the part played by the navy during the war, its major part of course was in the work of escort. As hon. members will recall, that was referred to in an editorial in the Saturday Evening Post as a miracle of the war. But reference could be made to the fact that ships and crew of the Royal Canadian Navy were in every one of the seven seas, and that no less than 10,000 took part in the landings in Normandy, when they supplied over 100 ships.

As the time for the recess has come, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask if we shall continue with this business when we come back at two o'clock?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As you will perhaps notice, Mr. Speaker, it is now 11.30, but the motion, as it is worded in the Votes and Proceedings, refers to 11.45. However, I moved that 11.30 would be the time for adjournment and that motion was carried; so perhaps you could see that it is now 11.45 by the clock.

At 11.45 a.m. the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at two o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Demobilization and reconversion—

551. To provide for the orderly establishment and organization of the defence forces of the army, navy and air services on a peace-time basis and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $29,833,648, $226,709,331.

Mr. CLAXTON: When the committee adjourned I was endeavouring to answer some of the questions asked by the hon. member for Yale, and particularly to deal with his inquiry as to the order that should be followed in this discussion. I have not had an opportunity of discussing the matter with other hon. members but I think it would meet the convenience of the committee if on the general discussion of these estimates we followed as well as we could the order of navy, army and air force; then later, when we come to details, we might follow the order of those details on page 275 of the estimates. It is recognized, however, that some hon. members may wish to speak on more than one aspect of these matters and of course they should have full opportunity to do so as well as to deal with the work of the department in general. I would suggest that probably the work of the committee would be expedited and the discussion more orderly if as far as possible we followed the order I have indicated in the general discussion, and took up the details under the eight heads listed on page 275. If that is agreeable I shall proceed now to deal with the rest of the questions raised by the hon. member for Yale.

Mr. LENNARD: If one wished to discuss the matter of the cadet corps, would he have to deal with naval cadets under the navy, with army cadets under the army and air force cadets under the air force, or where should one discuss the cadet questions?

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Mr. CLAXTON: If the hon. member chooses to discuss navy cadets exclusively then I should think it might be convenient to do so in the early part of the discussion. However, I am sure the committee will accommodate itself to the discussion as we go along. If that is the general understanding I shall proceed to answer the rest of the questions put by the hon. member for Yale.

The CHAIRMAN: Then do I understand it is agreeable to the committee to proceed in accordance with the suggestion of the minister?

Mr. GREEN: I do not think we should be bound. If the minister goes ahead with his discussion we will see how it works out.

Mr. CLAXTON: The next question put by the hon. member for Yale was with regard to the strength of the navy. As at June 15 the strength of the active navy was 6,621 officers and men, which figure is included in the total of 32,610 for the three active forces which I mentioned this morning. In addition there is on the strength of the navy at the present time, until September 30, in interim and "hostilities only" personnel some 820, making a total strength of 7,441 for the naval forces of Canada, active, interim and "hostilities only".

The hon. member asked about recruiting, and what measures were being taken to obtain recruits. I should say the recruits have been coming in at a satisfactory rate. In toto the navy is nearly up to the ceiling of 75 per cent of the ceiling as announced last year. As has been announced from time to time in the press, there have been vacancies for various trades and ratings, and men have been responding to those announcements. We would like to see more men coming in as tradesmen. We would like to see a steady flow to replace the men who are going out of the navy as ratings in practically all groups; and it is proposed that at the end of the summer, possibly in the months of August and September, a campaign will be conducted to enlist recruits for the active and reserve forces of all three services. Our belief is that when the advantages and opportunities are presented to the young men of Canada we should be able to secure through the instrumentality of a campaign, not on a very large scale, sufficient recruits not only to fill up the vacancies but to provide a fairly steady flow to offset the wastage which always occurs.

Then the hon. member referred to his own remarks last year in regard to the proportions of men at sea and on land. I think it is still too early in the organization of our post-war forces to say exactly what that proportion is likely to settle down at, because it depends to a large extent upon what proportion of the armed forces is fully trained. If there is a rapid flow of men in and out of the armed forces then the number undergoing training at the outset of their service career will be high, and that will reduce the number at sea. However, I would not be surprised if the proportion stated by the hon. member is not far off the mark, and it may settle down to something like that figure.

He also asked about ships in the navy at the present time. I do not think hon. members would wish us on all occasions and in every year to give the strength in ships commissioned and in reserve, but at the present time I certainly have no objection to doing that. Based on the east coast there will be the Warrior, and when she is replaced by the Magnificent, the Magnificent, an aircraft carrier. There will also be the destroyers: the Nootka, the Micmac, the Haida, plus two destroyers in reserve; the algerine, the New Liskeard; three frigates and four algerines in reserve. On the west coast in addition to the Ontario there would be the other cruiser, the Uganda, in reserve when she is decommissioned this month; also three destroyers, the Crescent, the Cayuga and the Athabaskan in commission, as well as three destroyers, two frigates and four algerines in reserve.

He asked next with respect to the distribution of civilians in the navy. The present distribution is as follows: On the east coast at H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax and Dartmouth, 1,718; at the armament depot at Renous, 192, and at Sydney 143. On the west coast at H.M.C. Dockyard, Esquimalt, 1,285; armament depot, Kamloops, 143; Vancouver, 110. At headquarters, including the joint liaison officers at London and the joint staff at Washington, 776; armament depot, St. Hubert, 61; Montreal, 83; attached to the sea cadets, 4; attached to the royal naval military college at Royal Roads, 84; or a total of 4,602.

The next question was with regard to the reserve force. That is organized in twenty divisions. At the time of the last return that was made in the house it had a strength of 2,693. It is expected that there will be no great difficulty in bringing that number up to the present ceiling of 4,300 by the beginning of the autumn and winter training period.

I have had the opportunity of visiting eleven out of the twenty naval reserve divisions and I must say that with very few exceptions they are in an advanced state of organization, with their establishments of officers and petty officers well up to what one would expect at a period like this, and with a nucleus of some very good men as ratings. All the divisions are being equipped with the most modern equipment, and with the exception of two or three they have admirable buildings well suited for the purpose, located in twenty of the principal cities of Canada. At this time after the first great war the number of officers and men in the royal Canadian volunteer reserve was about 500.

With regard to housing the hon. member said that he had heard that the navy was not doing as well relatively as the other armed services. I think the only principal places where the navy requires married quarters are at Halifax and Esquimalt.

At Esquimalt the situation is generally speaking better than it is in comparison with the army and air force at most establishments, and even at Halifax it compares favourably with the other two services. There is I think a very acute need for additional married quarters, particularly for the members of the naval air arm centred at Dartmouth. Steps are being taken to convert all possible houses there so as to meet this need as well as we can as soon as possible.

The final suggestion made by the hon. member was with regard to some allowance for transportation on leave. As he said, when the rates of pay were established in 1946 at the new scale it was the feeling of the inter-departmental and inter-service committee that dealt with them, as well as of the departments and the government, that the rates of pay had been fixed sufficiently high to put the officers and men of the armed forces on an equivalent basis with that of civilians. Since then, however, there have been a considerable number of movements of officers and men between the two coasts, which I think put a considerable amount of hardship on them, and the question of its being possible to arrive at some allowance for transportation, at least for this interim period of organization, is being very carefully examined. My information is that neither in the United States nor now in the United Kingdom is any allowance made for transportation on leave. That is my information and I am verifying that. However in view of the very special circumstances in connection with this period of organization the matter is being very carefully considered.

Mr. KIDD: I listened attentively to the remarks of the minister but I heard him make no mention whatsoever of the Royal Military College at Kingston. Can he inform the committee of the disposition of the department at this time as to the Royal Military College, why it was closed, when it is to be opened, and the type of personnel that will be permitted to enter the college? I would like the last question answered first.

Mr. CLAXTON: The Royal Military College was closed as a cadet college in 1940, long before I had anything to do with this department. I think the answer to the hon. member's question was given in the discussion on the estimates in 1945-46, if I recall correctly. At that time the need was for very large numbers of officers who would not be trained on the same basis as officer candidates were being trained at the Royal Military College before the war but who would be trained to meet particularly the urgent demands of war, and for that purpose a school was established at Brockville. I think the graduates of Royal Military College would have been the first to object had the college being used in the same way as before the war, as exclusively a college for training officer candidates. It was not possible to devote three years to that process, and totally different methods and a totally different curriculum were applied. Consequently special cadet colleges were established at Brockville, on the west coast and at St. Jerome. That was the reason why it was not continued as a cadet college. As hon. members know, it was continued to give company officers' courses, senior and junior staff courses and courses in allied military government.

Since the end of the war we have been looking into the question whether Royal Military College should be reopened and, if so, upon what basis. Hon. members know that a committee was set up under the able chairmanship of Brigadier Lett and a report was made. Since that time we have been looking into ways and means whereby the college might be reopened. I have announced on more than one occasion that the present proposal is to have Royal Roads operate as a joint Royal Canadian Navy and Royal Canadian Air Force college, beginning in September, 1947. In September, 1948, Royal Roads may be extended to include army cadets as well. R.M.C. would be reopened in September, 1948, as a cadet college on a tri-service basis. The curriculum, entrance requirements, conditions of service, pay, clothing and so on have not yet been worked out. It is not an easy programme, as I think hon. members will appreciate when they examine developments in other countries.

Our aim is to do everything possible to see that as far as it can be managed officer cadets of the three services are subject to the same training and environment and achieve much the same educational standards during their formative years. Our belief is that we must have the highest standards possible. Senior matriculation or the equivalent will be required for entrance, and the curriculum will be such that as far as possible year by year the course will be equivalent to that of the Canadian universities. I have been in close communication of the R.M.C. clubs of Canada who have been most constructive and cooperative. They also have been regarding this problem from the standpoint of the development in Canada of the best possible type of officer. We put that almost first in the priorities for our three services.

I should not close without mentioning the other two plans, namely, the university officers' training corps and the university naval training division, and the university flying cadet arrangements under which undergraduates of the 22 universities of Canada, with all of which we have made satisfactory arrangements, will during their four year courses at the universities take work in addition to the regular academic work and probably sixteen weeks during each of three summer vacations at practical work with pay. Our belief is that in this way we will develop a large group of highly qualified, well educated officers who will have had at the end of their university courses additional military and practical work. We have some 2,700 officer candidates at the universities under this plan.

Finally, there is the third means of becoming an officer, through the lower decks or from the ranks. We are working on a plan whereby other ranks showing the required educational qualifications, promise and capacity for leadership will be fitted into one of these three plans. In that way we believe that we will have a group of officers second to none.

Mr. KIDD: I should like to thank the minister for the information he has given with regard to the Royal Military College at Kingston. I am not placing any onus on him, but I do place it on his predecessor. I think I am speaking the mind of a great many people across Canada, ex-cadets and others, when I say that the Royal Military College should never have been closed. West Point was not closed, nor were the schools in the old country. Royal Roads was kept open, and at that time there was nothing in Canada for the training of R.C.A.F. officers. I hope nothing will be left undone to see the Royal Military College is opened in 1948. It should have been opened in 1947. The minister has not told the house the number of cadets who enter the college, whether it will be 50 or 250. I say that advisedly because usually about 50 or 60 enter each year. It is only my judgment, but I say that if you let 1946 and 1947 go by you are losing the opportunity of getting many young men into the service at the ages of seventeen, eighteen and nineteen years. If you wait until 1948 you will have lost this opportunity. There are many young boys who would like to enter the service and who have just received their senior matriculation. You cannot have young men of nineteen, twenty or twenty-one years enter the Royal Military College.

I want to say as forcefully as I can that the department made a mistake and it is making a mistake today. I thank the minister for the information he has given the committee. This is the first time we have been able to get information of this kind. I tried to get it last year from the Minister of National Defence but I could not accomplish anything. I think I am justified in offering a little constructive criticism. I tried last year and also in 1945, but what did the minister's predecessor do? He journeyed off to Cornwall and addressed a service club there and made more or less a public statement in order to get the reaction of the press across Canada. He got it. I asked him to make the same speech the following afternoon at three o'clock but he said jokingly that members of the house would not want to hear a political speech.

I want to thank the minister and I hope that nothing will be left undone to see that the college is opened in 1948. Since 1916 and world war I, I have seen many cadets graduate from the college. Whoever advised the minister's predecessor erred in his judgment in having the Royal Military College closed. It is part of the life of Canada and we cannot get along without it. The sooner it is opened, the better.

The minister has placed on Hansard a carefully prepared brief on what Canada has done as far as the war is concerned, but I think that statement is two years late. Last year we tried to get the Minister of National Defence to make a similar statement when his estimates were brought down, but he said, "There are the estimates; shoot your questions at me and I will do my best when the questions come along." As compliments are in order, I must compliment the minister upon his statement. He paid a compliment to nearly every branch of the service, but there is one branch to which he did not refer. He did not refer to the boys who went overseas and joined the R.A.F. before war was declared in 1939. He paid a compliment to nearly everyone else. There is hardly a constituency represented in the house that did not have in it some boys who went over at that time. Everyone knew in 1939 that war was coming. Some of them went over in 1938. These boys offered their services to various branches of the Department of National Defence, and what happened? They did not want them; they had no place for them. Establishments were made up to a certain size. What did these men do? They were the best flyers in Canada. They were mixed up with the civilian airfields. They went over in cattle boats to the old country. They paid their own transportation and joined the R.A.F. I wish to pay a compliment to them. They fought for Canada and made a name for Canada. Most of them joined the R.A.F. before Canada was organized for war. Many of them paid the supreme sacrifice. They should not be forgotten.

There is one further comment I should like to make. The minister referred to the permanent force quarters. I brought it to the attention of the minister last year, and what did I get from him? He said: We are paying them well; they can find their own quarters. I appeal to the minister, who is the employer of the permanent force. I should like to see him throw back his shoulders so far as the permanent force is concerned, whether it is army, navy or air, and to say that everything will be done as far as possible for these men. I appealed to the minister last year to find married quarters for these men. He did not do it. He said that we were paying these men and that they were getting separation allowance. I know that at Barriefield and in every district across Canada there were huts which these men could use for married quarters.

I wish to refer to one other thing. A man may be in the army one day and out the next. I notice that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is just leaving the chamber. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply was here some time ago. There are men in Canada who are discharged soldiers and who bought homes for themselves but cannot get possession of them. I shall give an instance. I know of a young man who was a junior civil servant.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KIDD: Just a minute.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. KIDD: All right.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that we are discussing the estimates of the Department of National Defence. A discussion of veterans affairs or of men who have been discharged from either of the three branches of the service is not permitted at this time.

Mr. KIDD: I quite agree with your ruling, sir. I will put it this way. I am going to appeal to you and to the minister because I think it is the minister's job to fight for the man who has been employed by him. Here is the case of a young man who in 1939 enlisted and served overseas for five years. He came back after five years' service. Do not forget that there was an election in 1940 and another one in 1945.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We won them both.

Mr. KIDD: Yes. Election promises were made which are not being lived up to.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am sure it is the desire of the committee that we should discuss only the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. KIDD: I agree with that. I want to appeal to the minister to fight for the men who served under him and who are still serving. This young man served overseas for five years. He saved up and came home, and like every other man he wanted to buy a home. The Minister of National Defence is his former employer. This young man came back and what happened? He bought a house—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If the hon. member is discussing a former member of the armed forces he is out of order. I would ask him to discuss the estimates before the committee.

Mr. KIDD: All right.

Mr. FRASER: He is out of order and the man is out of a home.

Mr. KIDD: I may be out of order, but the man is out of his home; he cannot occupy his house. I am appealing to you, sir, to use your influence on the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to see that a man who served under you gets a fair deal, which he is not getting at the present time. I have a concrete case. I will bow to the ruling of the chair, but I still think that I am in order. I want to appeal to the former employer of this young man—

The CHAIRMAN: When the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs are before the committee the hon. member will be in order to discuss this subject.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. KIDD: I quite agree with your ruling, sir, but at the same time this young veteran is receiving nothing. I do not like to say this, but the Minister of National Defence is falling down on the job. This young man served under the Minister of National Defence and went overseas.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member said that he agreed with my ruling. I would ask him to abide by it.

Mr. KIDD: I quite agree with your ruling. I know I shall have ample opportunity to bring this matter up again. I want to thank the minister for his reference to the Royal Military College at Kingston.

Mr. PROBE: I wish to make a few general remarks at this stage before we get into the details of the particular items in the estimates of the Department of National Defence. This morning the minister reminded the committee that last year there was a vote of $486 million for the department which he now heads, of which some $383 million was spent. Last year that estimate represented approximately one-quarter of the Canadian budget for all purposes. The amount spent was some $100 million less than the estimate, due to a speeded-up demobilization, for which some credit is due to the government with all the difficulties they had in that connection. This year I notice that about one-eighth of the entire budget is devoted to this department, roughly $240 million. As near as I can gather that is to be spent almost entirely on Canadian peace-time military expenses.

In his opening remarks the minister referred to certain general considerations of the organization of the peace-time forces. At the moment I am not concerned with the details. They can well be left to the staffs concerned, with whatever criticisms we may have here and there. I just wish to refer to the remarks of the minister in connection with the organization policy which he said it was the intention of the government to establish. He said the primary purpose was to defend Canada; the second purpose was to maintain law and order in Canada, and the third—and I am not too sure that I got him correctly in this, because I am a little concerned about it in part—was cooperation with friendly nations or to meet the demand of the united nations.

In my view and in that of the party to which I belong, the C.C.F., the armed forces of Canada are not needed to maintain law and order in this country. As a matter of fact if hon. members go over the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the past number of years they will see that there has been an enormous expansion in that field.

There are other civilian police groups which have to attend to the enforcement of the laws of this country and of the provinces and of the municipalities. It seems to me that law enforcement in Canada should not be the primary role of the Canadian army. We are not a lawless nation. To put ahead of the objective, as I see it, of the Canadian armed forces—that of playing its part in the peace of the world in cooperation with the united nations organization—the maintenance of law and order among our civilians at home as an ideal for the organization, seems to me to indicate improper emphasis.

To refer to the first point that the minister raised in this connection, that the chief consideration of this large expenditure was the defence of Canada, I would point out that if the implementation of the present policy in the defence of Canada is, as it is now, in this interim force, using procedures which to me look very much like those of the old professional service days, then there are some terrific gaps still left to be taken care of. If we take the minister at his word and consider only the defence of Canada, the defence of the shores of this country, the methods he has outlined today are utterly inadequate.

If the minister thinks his department is laying the groundwork for the defence of Canada against attack by an outside aggressor, and that it is doing so by means of what he outlined this morning, I would ask him this question. Does he not believe that if this country is due for an attack at any time we would have a general civilian participation in its defence? And that includes men, women and children. If that is so, has the minister indicated to the house, anywhere in his statement this morning, to what extent he is preparing the civilian population of the country for the defence of our home land?

Anyone who has the most elementary knowledge of military attack and defence knows that the brunt of defence is nowadays borne by civilians and not by trained troops, that is, by uniformed troops. If we are thinking in terms of air attack we must have our fire-fighting defences and our first aid equipment. We are undoubtedly going to have anti-aircraft gunners and they will be drawn largely from the civilian ranks. The minister has made no reference at all to that form of training, and there is no evidence in his statement that he is making a realistic approach to defence against invasion from any source.

We have our troops employed after a fashion. We again have the procedure we had during the war, mentioned by the minister a few moments ago in answer to a question by the hon. member for Yale, in which we are moving troops back and forth from one end of the country to the other over the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. To give added travel revenues to the railway companies because of a change in the decision of some officer on the national defence staff is not my idea of training troops for the defence of this country. What other means have we in this country, or has the minister indicated he intends to use in this country, for the rapid deployment of the forces that are being trained or that are about to be trained?

If the minister is really sincere in talking defence, he should tell us about some auxiliary transportation facilities other than the railways of the country. Not one word is mentioned in his report about highways, for example. I take that back in part, because I believe there is an item of some $10 million for the northwest staging route. We cannot possibly defend Canada by maintaining no other than that highway built during the last war by the United States. The government of this country, if it is going to follow realistically the policy which it has itself expressed, must envisage a highway system in Canada such as we are not likely to see for many decades if the government of the day does not do any more about highways than it has done in the past.

We cannot move troops and equipment by these two ribbons that run across this country, the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian National railway. Where are our highways? Where are our feeder highways? If we are going to move troops and move them rapidly, if we are going to move ordnance supplies and other equipment, we cannot rely on railways or airborne transportation. The minister might have mentioned the Hudson Bay route. We have troops training in the north, but there is no indication that the military staff is realistic in its professed intention to defend Canada by using some of the avenues that nature has provided.

I maintain that the minister's department is still making an easy living for a military caste in so far as present defence plans in Canada are concerned, and, further than that, that it is going back to the old laissez-faire ideal which I had hoped was outmoded for war purposes, in which monopoly munitions makers or equipment purveyors are being cut in on the melon if and when a war should take place.

It seems to me that the minister is trying to build up a modern fighting machine. I will give him credit for good intentions, but he is using horse and buggy tactics that are definitely in disrepute. It seems to me that if we are sincere in defence procedure in this country there is a major field for the Department of National Defence, and that is in the utmost utilization of the research facilities of this country and the extension of these research facilities far beyond what is envisaged in the amount of money authorized for military research purposes.

I want for a moment to refer to what I think are still a number of hangovers from the demobilization period. The minister referred to the fact that some three-quarters of the military stocks, buildings and so on, had been disposed of. Surplus stores and establishments, to the extent of some two-thirds or three-quarters, had been disposed of through War Assets Corporation. Have we not a ridiculous picture here again? On the one hand the minister and his department are declaring stores and equipment surplus to War Assets Corporation, which will be sold or given away to the trade, and we immediately ask for some $200 million odd. Of course, I realize that some of this is for salaries, but there are large commitments again for additional equipment and I would like the minister to assure the committee that the stores that have been disposed of and the establishments that the Department of National Defence has declared surplus, particularly buildings, are such that in no sense are they duplicated by new contracts or new purchases by his department. We certainly do not want that continuous building and handing over and building that seems to go on so planlessly for the defence needs of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: It is well planned.

Mr. PROBE: It is well planned, but for whom? Not for the Canadian people but for a few individuals who will make easy money out of the suckers, the Canadian government and the Canadian people. This group, the C.C.F., emphasizes the fact that interested groups can again hang like leeches to the governmen'ts skirts, and can again make a profit from the weapons of destruction in whatever form they may be, and that this policy is one of the contributing factors to war fever.

I was pleased that the minister this morning made a rather laughing reference to the so-called flying discs which for some days now have disturbed many of the good citizens of this country, because the hysteria as a result of which we can get into a war panic is so easily aroused. We must prevent such rumour spreading; we must make it unprofitable for anyone, whether it be the military caste in the seats of the Department of National Defence or whether it be in the commercial organizations which profit when there is a war on. We want to still their voices, their gossip and their propaganda so that we can have a chance for this world to establish the peace in which every hon. member in this house is sincerely interested.

I was pleased to hear the minister state that his department is now willing to assume responsibility for living quarters for the married members of the interim and permanent force. After all, with our housing situation in this country as acute as it is, the department is best fitted to make accommodation available for those whom it employs in the forces of the country. I think that is a matter with regard to which either the minister's department owes this committee an explanation, or perhaps he can tell us that he has made the utmost use of the buildings which were in possession of the Department of National Defence for conversion into suites and quarters for the members of the forces. I want to compliment the minister for his humanity in taking the role of a benevolent employer and assuming the responsibility for providing the quarters in which the married members of the armed forces live.

Before the dependents' allowance board is closed off with respect to the last war, there are still quite a number of cases which the minister should investigate with respect to improper cutting off of the dependents' allowance paid. As hon. members will note from the wording of the regulations of the dependents' allowances board, it is not the right of a dependent of a soldier, airman or naval rating to receive the allowance permitted by the regulations. That is, it depends on the whim, if you like, or the good wishes of the dependents' allowance board. To my mind that is a vicious principle. If in the future allowances are to be paid to members of families of serving personnel, those allowances should be theirs as of right once they are established as members of such families.

The minister referred to the fact that going wages were being paid to civilian employees of his department. To my knowledge, and by admission of the minister's own department, employees of the Department of National Defence in the city of Regina—at the Regina ordnance depot, to be specific—have not only not been receiving the going wage but in some cases have been receiving less than the minimum wage of $18.50 a week provided by the laws of Saskatchewan. I know the government of Canada is not bound by the labour laws of any of the provinces; that is, it is sovereign in that respect. But if we can throw away thousands and millions of dollars on pensions for the brass hats of the service—and I do not say that in the sense in which the hon. member for Temiscouata sometimes uses the term—and the higher officials of the professional services can receive pensions as high as $8,900 a year, surely the man whose sole income is the wages he earns, working for the Department of National Defence, is worth more than $18.50 a week.

In closing I would once more remind the minister that, if he is sincere in his suggestion that his department is intent on the defence of Canada, he should organize Canada so that it is a defensive unit. But, above all, while he is doing that—because we have not yet made the united nations function as those of us who are its well-wishers hope it will function—I hope he will exert every effort of the Canadian government and the Canadian people to the end that the military set-up of the united nations be implemented at the earliest opportunity. Once again I should like to thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the excellent contribution he made last winter when, on behalf of Canada, he spoke first before the united nations asking that the enforcement of the peace of the world be assured by a rapid and early setting up of defensive forces on a global basis, not on a bloc basis.

Mr. HANSELL: I rise at this time not to discuss defence in general but to get down to a little matter of detail, one which concerns part of our national defence which my small community might have to do with. The minister will know what I am talking about the very moment I mention that the community of Vulcan, Alberta, requires a drill hall.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. HANSELL: We have been working on this matter for at least a couple of years. I have had several interviews with officials respecting the matter, and some with a previous minister of national defence. As I understood the situation we thought a drill hall was already in sight. Then about a month ago I was informed that perhaps a change would have to be made because there was no appropriation for that small project in this year's estimates. I interviewed the Minister of National Defence, who was very kind and courteous, and promised to look into the matter. I do not know whether he has a report as yet, but by this time perhaps he has and will be able to say something about it.

The amount included in last year's estimates for this undertaking was approximately $32,000. It was my understanding that a drill hall had been secured somewhere in the northern section of the province and that tenders were being called for its removal to Vulcan. Following that I understood something went awry but that a suitable building had been secured in the southern part of Alberta, which would have to be moved only about sixty miles. The people felt quite happy about that; then, much to our disappointment, this further information came to us. I do not quite understand why that item is left out of this year's estimates. Indeed, I do not know whether it is left out. As a matter of fact I doubt whether it would be technically correct to say it is left out of these estimates, because I expect that quite apart from parliament voting this sum, if this project has been left out at all the department has left it out of its own particular administrative orbit, in that it has not included the project as one of those to be undertaken.

As far as this parliament is concerned I do not know that we are particularly informed as to every project that might be involved in an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars. This appropriation amounts to $226,709,331 or nearly $227,000,000. The details appear on page 275, where I see an item of $14,348,558 or nearly $14,500,000 for the acquisition, construction, purchase, maintenance, repairs, rentals and operating expenses of properties. That is a considerable sum of money. I am not objecting to it at all, but I would point out that it is for new equipment and repairs, which means it is at least in addition to what the defence department already have by way of buildings as a result of the recent war. I believe this amount of over $14,000,000 is sufficiently elastic for the minister to include the Vulcan drill hall in the list of projects for this year.

Now may I say that my small community of Vulcan feels quite justified in asking for a drill hall for the reserve forces that train periodically in that district. They feel justified for more reasons than one. The community has a very proud war record. I know that is the case with all communities, but we feel that we can put the record of our community up against that of almost any other in Canada. It is only a small community. In the purchase of war bonds I believe we rank among the highest in Canada on a per capita basis; and the same applies even to such small matters as salvage campaigns. My own children came home wearing upon their arms stripes they had earned in a campaign to collect salvage. That is a small thing, of course. The Red Cross in our community has a wonderful record. Perhaps the thing of which we are prouder than anything else is that our war memorial, in the form of a cenotaph, has inscribed upon it the names of thirty-three young men, the very cream of the community, who gave their lives somewhere in the world during the last war. When I say this I am not boasting in any way, I say it in all humility. I know other communities have similar records, but I am stating these facts because to some extent we are dealing with public feeling. In spite of this record, to my knowledge the community of Vulcan has never asked the federal government for one nickel. That community has been on the contributing end of the nation's business. They are not sounding a grievance at all; they are proud of their efforts. Anything the town has it has obtained through its own efforts. We do not even have a publicly-owned post office, though very many communities of that size have such a building.

I say these things because I know if this town does not get this drill hall this year the people will feel extremely disappointed, and as far as I am concerned personally I will feel that the community has been slighted. I do not want to leave the impression that we are coming along asking for a favour. We are not. The community is asking that it might assist in our national defence programme, and that it be permitted to give that assistance under the most adequate conditions. That request, I think, is only reasonable. Furthermore I might say it is recognized by the departmental officials that such a project is needed. I wish to read a paragraph from a letter written by Colonel Snow, the officer in command of the western command. It is a letter that was recently received by a service club explaining why the $32,000 was not included in this year's estimates. In concluding his letter Colonel Snow says:

> I am very sorry indeed that this matter has taken the course it has and I agree with you that Vulcan must have military accommodation very soon if our reserve force in that area is to continue to function.

If the lack of a drill hall means that the reserve force in Vulcan is not going to function, surely that is a serious matter. Colonel Snow is a highly respected official of the department and I think what he says should be enough for the minister now to say: We will do all we can for you.

I understand that the policy of the government in respect to these drill halls is to expect that they might be used for community recreational purposes as well, and I agree with that policy, I think it is an admirable one, and since it is the policy of the government I suggest that our community has many small organizations without a place to carry on their activities. We have the boy scouts, the girl guides; we have cadets in that community; we have physical training classes and quite a few other movements of the kind. If it should rain, and I am sorry to say that we do not get much rain in that part of the country, but if it rains on the night on which one of these organizations is to meet, they have to postpone their meeting and stay home; nothing can be done. In the winter time their activities are almost non-existent. If a drill hall were constructed at Vulcan, the defence department would be doing a great deal for the community as well as in promotion of their own defence programme.

I have two suggestions to make. I suggest and urge as strongly as I can that if the minister cannot adjust his programme to include this project in this vote, he bring down a supplementary estimate to cover it. I do not want the minister to take advantage of my next suggestion, which is one that has been made by one or two of the organizations in that community; but if it is impossible for him to bring down an estimate for the construction of this drill hall, there is a recreation hall in the Vulcan air training school, which is situated about six miles out of the town. It would not be as satisfactory as a new drill hall, but perhaps it would be the next best thing; it would serve temporarily at least. It would have to be moved a distance of six miles, and I am suggesting that if it is impossible to go ahead with the plan for a drill hall as originally proposed, this recreation hall be moved and used for the purposes I have mentioned. I suggest that as the next best step. I understand that the building I have in mind has already been declared surplus. I must qualify that statement by saying that I did not get the information from official sources, but I understand that is correct, and if it is, the building belongs to the national defence department.

In conclusion, I know that the minister has called for a report on this matter and perhaps there has not been time enough yet to get the report from the western command at Edmonton or Calgary, whichever it is. If the minister has not yet received that report, I feel I know what his answer is going to be, that he will do his best to carry out my suggestion. I wonder if he can say to me now that something will be done about this matter this year. I want to thank the minister's parliamentary assistant for the time he is spending on what might appear to be a very small thing when we are talking in terms of hundreds of millions of dollars. But it is not a small thing so far as that community is concerned. For them it is a big thing indeed, and the department needs a drill hall too. Will the minister now promise me that he will do something about it this year?

Mr. CLAXTON: Mr. Chairman, I think I should reply to the hon. member for Macleod at once, because some other hon. members may have drill hall problems on their doorsteps and perhaps a brief statement as to the position might be useful.

I think nobody appreciates more than the department and the officers of the services the very strong desire which has been repeatedly expressed by reserve units and members of parliament and other community leaders for the provision of suitable armoury accommodation where that is not now available. I can assure all concerned that plans are being prepared to enable the department to proceed with a construction programme just as soon as the government feels that the time is ripe. My predecessor had hoped to begin last year with the construction of four or five different types of armouries in different localities so that we could get on with the job and show our serious intent and also gain some experience. However, the shortage of housing accommodation was so great throughout the country that the feeling was expressed by the government, and I am sure was shared by members of parliament as well as by the people generally, that during these immediate post-war years we should deal with houses first. That is the policy of the government and of the department. As I have already pointed out, our target this year is to try to convert or construct over 1,000 new dwelling units for married personnel, thereby relieving the general pressure on housing accommodation throughout the country. On that account it has not been possible to calculate on making any new construction of armouries this year. I am sure that the hon. member for Macleod realizes that though his need is great and that of the reserve unit at Vulcan is great, there are units and places in Canada where the need is even greater. I know in the case of my old drill hall on Craig street, where they had only two major units before the war they now have four regiments of artillery and the Regiment de Maisonneuve. I can think of the drill hall at Quebec where instead of having two major units they now have four.

Mr. BENTLEY: Can the minister think of the drill hall at Swift Current?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, and also at Edmundston, Saskatoon, and a few other places where the need is great. What we are doing is to try to convert existing buildings which were built by one or other of the armed forces during the war to be used on a temporary basis. This has been done successfully at Winnipeg and other localities.

Mr. HANSELL: That is the very thing I am asking for.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can assure the hon. member for Macleod that the matter he raised is receiving the most active consideration. We have not yet reached the point where we can carry out the alternative he mentioned. Wherever it is possible we will do that, and when later on circumstances permit I hope we shall be able to proceed with a long term programme of construction.

Mr. MERRITT: Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the minister say what he had to say to the hon. member for Macleod. The question of training quarters for our reserve units is one of great importance, and it should be receiving close attention even though there is a housing shortage in Canada. I hope the hon. member will get a drill hall, either on a temporary or permanent basis, as soon as possible.

I should like to try to wrench the hon. minister's mind away from the consideration of a drill hall at Vulcan to the statement he made this morning. I was glad to hear him make that statement, and I was pleased with most of what he said. It represents quite a change from what I can only describe as the sorry attitude of the government during the past two years toward matters of defence. I use those words advisedly, because the policy was apparently dictated by the idea that all people interested in the defence of the country must remain in complete uncertainty as to what they were supposed to do until the united nations had laid down some task for us to follow. In saying what he did the minister was adopting what we in this party have been advocating in every session since this parliament began. He said that the first job of the armed forces of Canada is to defend Canada. By saying that, the minister has put certainty into the purpose for which our armed forces exist, and I commend him for that statement. From now on we will have a chance to create an adequate defence force in this country and to keep it up through the years. It seems to me that at last the government is really coming to grips with defence problems and is getting its feet on the ground. I was so delighted with most of what the minister said that I can only express the wish again that he or his predecessor had said it two years ago, because it was as obvious then as it is now, and it was as necessary then as it is now.

I want to refer in particular to only two of the minister's statements, although I think all fourteen of the points he brought out were good. First, he said that the purpose of the armed forces was to defend Canada, and, second, one of his fourteen long-term points was that there must be government leadership to get the Canadian people behind the armed forces of Canada. By making those statements he is hitting the nail squarely on the head, and I am heartened by their having been made.

I should like to say one word about what was said by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) who expressed the views of the C.C.F. party on defence matters. The statement he made was most interesting, because to me it showed that the socialists have not changed.

Mr. PROBE: They have not.

Mr. MERRITT: The policy enunciated this afternoon by the hon. member, that we have no need of armed forces for internal security, that the first need of armed forces is to carry out some obligation imposed on us by a global organization, is just the disarmament talk of 1920 to 1940 dressed up in 1947 clothes. I warn the minister not to pay any attention to this disarmament policy. It was blown up before or by the last war. If he sticks to the policy which he has announced, which we in the Conservative party have urged on him, he will not go very far wrong.

I want to refer to one of the fourteen points announced by the minister, that there is need for government leadership to get the support of the Canadian people and of all Canadian organizations behind the armed forces. I mention that point to underline its importance and I ask the minister to underline its importance throughout the country. He should lose no opportunity of enlisting the support of various civil organizations and individuals making up our national life. We are not a warlike people; we are inclined to wait until we get into trouble before we make these preparations. In the past the armed forces have been handicapped by a lack of public realization of their value. I do not think that attitude has changed much. The Minister of National Defence should always keep that idea in his mind and should prevent us from sinking back into the attitude we had between the wars.

The new certainty which he has given by his statement was badly needed by both the active and the reserve forces. You cannot, as the minister has done, suddenly cut Canada's armed forces twenty-five per cent below what was stated to be the irreducible minimum without making people in the forces start to wonder whether the career they have chosen is worth while, and whether the opportunities they thought were ahead of them before that change still remains. Today they will feel reassured that their future is a safe one. The minister's statement that provision is to be made for permanent quarters for people in the active forces will do much to make these forces contented and of good morale. But when I turn to the reserve army—and I am dealing with the reserve army in particular, although I think it will apply to the reserve air force and to the reserve navy as well—I am not sure that the minister's statement today has really met their problem at all, at least not as far as it should.

The reserve army ought to have an honoured place in Canadian life. It should not be, as it is now and as it always has been, a poor relation of all other public functions. When the minister stated that the whole purpose of our force was to defend Canada, he might also have said—and I think he will agree with me—that the reserve navy, army and air force are the first line of defence of Canada's shores and of the Canadian people. It is the reserve forces upon which we must rely in case we ever need to defend this country. The active force cannot possibly hope to provide more than an infinitesimal number of the force necessary. The minister should keep pounding on that idea when he goes around the country, and perhaps state the purpose of the Canadian forces, and particularly the reserve forces, more specifically even than he did today when he said that they were to defend Canada. He should emphasize that the reserve forces are our first line of defence and are vitally necessary to us in these unfortunate and uncertain years. I do not think it can be said today that either the people of Canada or the reserve army itself feels that their purpose is so important in the mind of the government.

I took the trouble to find out from various parts of Canada how some chaps in whom I had considerable confidence were feeling about the reserve army of post-war days, and I was amazed at the uniform nature of the answers I received when I asked them how they were getting on. In every case it was said that the government had no certain policy. In other cases it was said that nobody had ever told them what their purpose was. In still other cases it was said that as a result of a failure to state the purpose and the policy behind the reserve forces recruits were not coming in, and the high morale with which a large number of excellent officers and N.C.O.'s entered the reserve army at the end of the war was not being maintained as well as they would have liked to see it. It is true that they had other complaints which are perhaps more difficult of solution, such as adequate training quarters. But the complete agreement of all these people right across Canada, from one end to the other, people who did not know each other, people who served in different parts of the country in different units and under completely different circumstances, is something which I do not think can be ignored.

While I commend, as I have said already, the minister on his statement today, I am bringing this point to his attention now because I say to him that we have had fine words but we have had no performance as yet. We are delighted to accept his words but we require a considerably higher measure of performance than has been provided by the department up until this year. I want to say to him, too, that there is a great deal of ground to be made up; that, as I understand the case, it is not as though he can now catch easily the spirit which existed in 1945. He has to go and dig for people, and give not only the units themselves and the officers and N.C.O.'s, but also the general public, the idea that he is behind his reserve army and that he proposes to make it good and popular and to bring it up to adequate strength; that he is going to provide both moral and material backing; and the most important of these is the moral backing which he alone in his capacity as Minister of National Defence can give. I told his predecessor last year that he could be the least expensive and the most effectual recruiting agency this country could possibly have.

I want to ask the minister to give us now, having stated his principles so excellently, a statement of the practical steps that he is proposing to take to stimulate interest in our reserve army. I want him to tell us its strength, to give us an idea of the average number of men on the strength in some typical units, to let us know how recruits are coming in, what the wastage is in the discharge of people who have joined and are now going out, and to give us some further information on this recruiting programme that he plans in September.

I also wish to say to him that for the reserve forces at least, a September recruiting programme will not do; that it has to be a continuous recruiting programme going on all the time, and recruits being provided not by a campaign but by a continuous knowledge on the part of young people in each centre that in their armoury they can find interesting work, health-giving recreation, and above all that they have a useful part to play in Canada's service. I hope the minister will make a statement on the specific steps he proposes to take with respect to the reserve forces in carrying out these good principles that he has laid down.

Mr. PROBE: Before the gallant member for Vancouver-Burrard concludes I should like to direct one remark to him with your permission, Mr. Chairman. He made reference to the necessity of propagandizing this country as to the needs of defence. His statement, which I presume represents the policy of his party, is to my mind somewhat reminiscent of the conditions that prevailed in nazi Germany prior to 1939.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SKEY: Sit down.

Mr. PROBE: Let me finish. You do not have to agree with me at all.

Mr. SKEY: We do not.

Mr. PROBE: All right. Let me say—

Mr. SKEY: You had your say before.

Mr. PROBE: I will say it again. As I say, the German nation was prepared to the hilt for war by every possible manner of means before 1939. The Canadian nation, to quote the hon. member who has just sat down, and whose military opinion I value very highly, was totally unprepared in the sense that he wants us to be prepared now for war. I wonder, then, how he would account for the fact that the unpreparedness of the citizen army of Canada was equal on all occasions to the arms of Germany.

Mr. MERRITT: Two years of training after war broke out.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the British navy?

Mr. ADAMSON: And we so nearly lost the war that we don't want to be in that position again.

An hon. MEMBER: How many C.C.F. went to the war?

Mr. PROBE: May I say that if the statistics were recorded there were more members of the C.C.F. in the overseas armed forces than from any other single political party.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Where do you find those figures?

Mr. SKEY: What did your leader say? Cash on the barrel and not a man overseas.

Mr. PROBE: Not an industrialist would work for the minister of munitions and supply until the five per cent lid was taken off.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. PROBE: I asked a question in all sincerity, and I do not have to take dirty slurs from these warmongers to my right.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Not a man overseas.

Mr. PROBE: Don't worry. A lot of our men went overseas. Don't you kid yourself. You know better than that.

Mr. TIMMINS: What fighting outfit was the last speaker in?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HARKNESS: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the hon. member withdraw the remark he made in which he called us in this particular party warmongers. He has no basis in fact or anything else for making that assertion, and I think he should withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I did not hear the statement.

Mr. HARKNESS: The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) finished his outburst a moment ago by accusing the members of this party of being warmongers. We are not warmongers, and I do not think any instances could be cited to show that that is the case. I would therefore ask that the hon. member be required to withdraw that remark.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are losing time.

Mr. HARKNESS: Can we have a ruling, Mr. Chairman?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I did not hear the remark myself, but if—

Mr. STIRLING: He shouted it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I am quite sure that if the hon. member said anything offensive he will be willing to withdraw it.

Mr. PROBE: If I injured the pride or the feelings of any of the members to my right I am exceedingly sorry I wounded their susceptibilities.

Mr. HARKNESS: On the question of privilege, the hon. member made an absolutely false statement—

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. PROBE: Now you take that back.

Mr. HARKNESS—and I ask that he be requested to withdraw it.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am glad to feel that I did not contribute anything to the heat of this afternoon. I shall try now to contribute something in the way of light upon the situation with regard to the reserve forces. I appreciate the kindly spirit of the remarks of previous speakers and their very cooperative attitude, and I would like to deal with the question of reserves, because, as I have said on numerous occasions in this house and outside, they do form the foundation, the nucleus of any forces that might be needed to defend Canada in the event of an emergency.

I may tell the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who took his seat a few minutes ago, that I have some first-hand experience of the work of the reserves because before going overseas in world war I, I was in a reserve infantry unit and upon returning I was in a a reserve artillery unit, and since then I have kept up the connection with that unit in Montreal. I can tell hon. members, as I believe many know, that immediately after the last war the reserves were in a very low condition indeed. For the year ended March 31, 1920-21, the sum of $1,160,000 was all that was provided for reserve training. In the unit in which I was, there was no equipment, there was very little training, there were a few officers and a few non-commissioned officers, there were very few men, and very soon interest diminished and it took years before the reserve was put on a proper footing. I believe that following this war we have taken steps to avoid that happening with regard to the reserve navy, the reserve army and the auxiliaries of the air force. First of all we have tried to create a new approach to the whole subject of reserves. Previously they were regarded as a rather special and frequently a social group who spent one or two days a week and sometimes some of their summer holidays in drill and some exercises. That was quite an improper attitude, but it was the attitude that was taken. Our view is that, the importance of the reserves having been shown in two wars, we should now take them for what they are, namely, an essential part of the armed forces of Canada, and that all differentiations between the active and the reserve should be wiped out. We have done it with regard to the navy by abolishing the wavy stripe. As far as possible it is done with regard to the army. Further, as far as possible officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the active and reserve forces mix together, wearing the same uniforms, undergoing the same training and using the same weapons. The psychological approach is therefore quite different.

With regard to the supply of training, there again we are on a different footing. New syllabuses, new methods of training developed during the war, are available, and every unit has full-time administrative and training personnel. This is an experiment that is being worked out in close cooperation with the reserve units themselves.

In addition, we aim to have in the reserve forces men who are physically fit and qualified from the military point of view to take their place in the field of action, should it become necessary, with a minimum of additional training. We believe that in many fields of activity it is possible over a longer period of time to bring the reserves up to the same efficiency as the active forces, and this year it seemed to us that the right place to start was first of all in getting these administrative and training officers attached to the various units and fitted into them; second, to have the units established through a cadre of officers and senior non-commissioned officers; and third, having them set up working conditions and administrative establishments that can really do the job when they get the men.

It would have been wrong for us to get large numbers of men without having officers, non-commissioned officers, training personnel and equipment to make really effective use of them so that they, in turn, would feel that they were making good use of their time. I believe from what I have seen, that in most units that have been activated across Canada, great progress has been made in these preliminary steps of organization. To indicate something of the magnitude of the difference between the reserve army now and what is was before the war, or still more at the end of the last war, I might mention that the amount provided in the army estimates alone for the reserve forces is of the order of $13 million. That is a sum equivalent to the total provided in the year 1932-33 for all the armed forces of Canada put together. But that is only part of the picture, because a major part of the work of the active forces is the training of the reserve and the supplying of stores, equipment and motor vehicles for them. This is now being done on a scale quite different from anything which has been done in the past.

With regard to numbers, the total number in the reserve army at June 15 was 33,704 men, to which should be added, I think, 1,418 in the Canadian officers training corps, although they do not form part of the reserve properly so-called. That makes a total of 35,122 men. For those on the establishment, training is provided this year for thirty days; and in addition, 10,000 are to receive fourteen days' training at summer camps. Provision is made to give 15,000 tradesmen and specialists, if they are available, fifteen days' additional training at local headquarters.

Mr. GREEN: How many of those are officers and non-commissioned officers?

Mr. CLAXTON: Of the 33,704, there are 4,716 officers.

Mr. MERRITT: Can the minister say among how many units that total is divided?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have not the figures.

Mr. MERRITT: Has the minister a rough idea?

Mr. CLAXTON: I will see if I can give it. It would be misleading to give any total number of units, because they vary from units which exist only as names on paper in the total establishment provided for, to units which are over their established strength; hence any notion of the number of units would be quite misleading. But there are approximately 650 units active in the reserve army in Canada.

Mr. MERRITT: Could the minister give a rough average of the number who would be on the strength of an infantry battalion, an artillery regiment, and field company engineers, so that we would have some idea of whether a unit existed on paper only or was one sufficient to train.

Mr. CLAXTON: The fact that there are 35,122 officers and men on the strength indicates that there is a substantial group of officers and men on the strength. However, I will try to get for my hon. friend some indication of the kind he has requested.

Mr. GREEN: That is not as many as there were before the war, is it?

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, no. Before the war there were about 45,000, according to my recollection.

Mr. MERRITT: That is correct.

Mr. CLAXTON: Then, before the war I think the largest number to receive annual training at camp was about 14,000.

Mr. MERRITT: Seventeen thousand in 1938.

Mr. CLAXTON: This year we hope that an equal number will receive a superior type of training at camp.

Now with regard to recruits: there are exceptions, but in the great number of units that I have seen it would not have been a good thing for those units to have more recruits than they have at the present time. Their state of organization, the state of the equipment and training must be put into good order before they are ready to handle recruits properly. In some units that is not so. I have no doubt that with a campaign such as we envisage taking place towards the end of the summer, we can obtain for the reserve army the recruits that are needed to fill up whatever is fixed for their establishment for the next training year. I think that result will follow very easily for the great majority of units.

The hon. member has rather flatteringly urged that more attention be paid by myself, in my speeches, to the reserves. I have done what I could, I must say, on four occasions in the house so far, and I think in speeches in every province in Canada, including the four western provinces; certainly in a large number of speeches. I have not only endeavoured to draw the attention of the communities to the importance of the reserve, but also I have met reserve officers and men of the navy, army and air force at meetings specially arranged, and have discussed frankly with them the plans we have for them. Also I should say that I have met representatives of the council of defence of the reserve associations of the army—there are some eleven of them—representatives of the associations of the naval and air force officers in various parts of the country, and discussed frankly with them arrangements for reserve training and ways and means whereby we can work together in order to do this important job. I must say that the response has been good, and I believe that with the support of hon. members and other leaders in the community we can really make progress in this field.

I wish to say one word in conclusion on that subject, and it is this. In the western command there has been established a practice which has been found most useful. Under Major General Worthington there has been set up in each reserve unit in the western command a civilian committee charged with the function of supporting that unit in every way possible. In the great majority of cases these civilian committees are doing useful work in support of the reserve units. We hope that the same procedure will be applied in other commands across Canada. I may tell hon. members that as part of the changed organization of the armed forces, general officers commanding commands, and there are five of them across Canada, are given very much greater authority than ever before on a decentralized basis, and for the first time they can say what units are ready to take what classes of training. If a unit is ready to take training to a greater extent than is provided in the quota, he has power to make the necessary adjustments. Also the per capita grant made to the officers commanding units is to be on a flexible basis for the first time, so it can be adjusted by the general officer commanding. These arrangements have been made pursuant to suggestions by the reserve associations, and they have met with very general support. I would say our expectation is that the reserve units will be established on a very sound basis by the time they begin their autumn training this year.

Mr. MERRITT: If I may follow up what the minister has just said, I simply want to repeat that according to my information the men are not coming into the reserve army. I ask the minister to take that as an honest statement of opinion after investigation and look into this question again. Then I want to ask him this question. When the reserve army was first formed my understanding is that its total strength was to be 180,000, and that it was on a six-divisional basis. Since that time it has been cut, along with the regular forces, by two-thirds, according to a press report I have here. This would mean it was cut to about 50,000 men. Were the units in the reserve army, that is the divisions and the individual units, cut at the same time, or did that cut of two-thirds mean that an infantry battalion, for instance, would be authorized to train only one-third its proper strength, and so on with other units? From my own experience in the non-permanent militia before the war I feel quite certain that if you authorize the training by a unit of only one-third its strength, or perhaps even less, and only pay it for that number of men on strength, you will do quite a lot of damage to the reserve army, even without intending to do so. If the minister is going to cut the total force envisaged I think it very important that he cut the number of units instead of cutting the number of men who can be trained in a unit.

Mr. CLAXTON: The newspaper report to which the hon. gentleman has referred of course is quite wrong. There is nothing whatever in it. There was no justification and no basis for it. The establishment of the reserve forces of Canada remains exactly as it was, and no change has been announced in that.

Mr. GREEN: It remains at 150,000?

Mr. CLAXTON: It stands at 180,000 plus, and that is about what it was before the war. There have been adjustments to bring the figure into line with changes in the types of arms, and changes in the population of Canada, but there has been no great change in the figure of 180,000 as compared with what it was before the war. That is the establishment which has been set down on paper for six divisions, should it ever be decided to raise six divisions in the event of a war. However, it was never planned by anyone that there should be 180,000 officers and men in the reserve army of Canada in peace time, or if that was planned I never heard of it. The figure generally set has been of the magnitude of 50,000, or something of that kind; and for this year the ceiling was set at 30,000. We have exceeded that, as I have indicated, by some three or four thousand; and the figure for training will be set early next year so the officers commanding units may know what the programme is. We are combining that with what my hon. friend suggested; that is, leaving units dormant, on paper, rather than activating them when there seems very little chance of getting them up to strength and efficiency. The greatest possible attention is being paid to units in centres having quarters, equipment and traditions which indicate the strong probability of their being successfully brought to a state of efficiency at an early date.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I listened with great interest this morning to the comprehensive review of his department given by the minister. While it took some time to present that statement I think it was well worth while. I believe it was one of the most informative statements we have had from a minister of national defence in recent years.

I rise at this time to obtain some information from the minister. Recently in this city we had the opportunity to witness a parade of uniformed corps, under the discipline of officers and non-commissioned officers, bearing arms. Some of us judge there were between 2,500 and 3,000 men in these units. Large numbers of them carried rifles which were issued to the French army in the war of 1914-18. A smaller number carried Lee Enfield service rifles of the most recent issue, and some carried swords of a cavalry type. While I and others associated with me were enjoying the martial music and the rather gorgeous and unusual uniforms and admiring the military appearance of these corps, we were wondering what section of the Canadian armed forces we were seeing march by, because most of us had not been in eastern Canada for very long. Therefore I would like to ask the minister this question. Are these corps, which were under the discipline of officers and non-commissioned officers and bearing arms, under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence? If they are not, is it safe for us then to assume that there is nothing in the Militia Act or the law of this country or any regulation that prevents any organization from training uniformed men in corps under the discipline of officers and non-commissioned officers, and bearing arms?

Mr. CLAXTON: I must say I did not see the officers and men to whom the hon. gentleman has referred, so I am not in a position to speak about them at first hand. I recognize that he has had a very gallant war record and a great deal of experience and that he is in a position to speak at first hand, so I take it that what he says is correct. I must say it surprises me very much to hear that these forces, which I should think were quite outside the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence, had anything in the nature of Lee Enfield service rifles. We have not disposed of any rifles in Canada except to some of the Pacific Coast Rangers, and they received American sporting rifles, not the service Lee Enfields. I do not know of any other rifles that have been disposed of to civilian corps or organizations in Canada. I shall be very glad to look into the question and also to look into the question of law to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. SKEY: We have had some discussion of the navy estimates, and also some discussion of the army and the reserve army. I should like now to draw the attention of the minister and the committee to the air force. But before doing so may I answer an observation by the hon. member for Regina City, who asked how it was that our citizen army did not lose the last war and how it had time to mobilize. May I tell him that it was the air force that gave the army time to mobilize, and that is why I wish to speak on the air force today. If the hon. member thinks that anyone in any government in Canada has any idea of aggressive warfare his thought is complete proof of his absolute military ignorance, and all that he has said on defence should therefore be treated with the contempt it deserves.

Mr. PROBE: I hope the hon. gentleman will not attempt to put words into my mouth. I can express myself volubly and adequately without any assistance from my excellent friend.

Mr. SKEY: You asked how a citizen army won the last war, and I am telling you.

Turning to the minister's statement of this morning, I was delighted to hear him place on the record of this house the war records of all the Canadian services. I am sure that we were delighted to see that the government have at last an appreciation of what the aims of the defence forces should be and that they have also a plan of action, which I should like briefly to discuss.

This fourteen point plan has already been referred to. In my opinion it is very domestic in nature. First the minister speaks of the unification of the departments, then of joint intelligence and planning. I feel that the intelligence side of it is important. The planning should be well on its way now; the department has had two years at least in which to consider its plans. Then the minister spoke of an appreciation of the factors in the last war. I happen to know a little bit about this subject, and whether Canada has an appreciation of it or not I would like to inform the minister that the military appreciations of most other fighting nations on the democratic side were arrived at before this war was over.

The fourth point speaks of active and reserve qualified officers—again domestic in its nature. When we get to the seventh point we begin to get something which seems to me important; it has to do with adequate reserves of equipment and weapons. It was amply proved in the last war that the degree of technology required to equip adequately any fighting service was of growing and tremendous importance. This seventh point seems to me to be the only really important one up to this stage. The eighth point deals with the integration of the armed forces, the ninth with cooperation with industry, and the tenth with Canadian Arsenals Limited, and with the design and manufacture of munitions, etc. If we intend to design and manufacture munitions in Canada it will be necessary for the government to give certain contracts both to our industrial organization and to Canadian Arsenals Limited. It will be necessary in those contracts to lay down service specifications which will keep our arms up to date, instead of letting them get out of date as we have done in many cases heretofore.

Then there is civilian defence and government leadership. The same government leadership that we asked for two or three years ago is now on the fourteen point programme. It is heartening to see it there and I must congratulate the new minister on his recognition of this necessity. It is indeed a step forward, though it comes at a rather late date.

[Mr. Skey.]

Point thirteen deals with commercial cooperation and point fourteen with cooperation with the commonwealth and other friendly democratic nations not inclined towards aggression but inclined to stand and fight for their country.

I said at the outset that I wished to refer particularly to the air force. It seemed to me at the end of the war that the job which the air forces of all the nations did actually spoke for itself, and I thought it would not be necessary to speak on behalf of the air force in this house at least, because it was so evident in every action that we fought successfully in the last war that the air was the dominant factor. However, the rats have been gnawing at the policies of the government since the war, and I feel that it is necessary for me here today to remind the Minister of National Defence and the government that they are behind the times with regard to Canada's air defence, so deplorably behind the times that I am actually shocked when I read the answers that were brought down for me on the fifty-eighth day of this session in reply to seven questions that I had asked. I call attention particularly to one thing. We find that the strength of headquarters establishment is over double the actual number of men who should be there. In other words in non-effective jobs, in non-operational functions, there are over double the number of men who should be used on this particular type of work.

We have heard earlier of the auxiliary and reserve forces being the backbone of our defence system. The government authorized fifteen auxiliary squadrons to be established and equipped across Canada. I understand that six of these squadrons have actually been established, that four are in process of establishment, and that five have been deferred indefinitely. I shall not discuss their equipment. The minister knows what kind of equipment they have and what sort of shape it is in, and I am sure he is not awfully proud of it.

Just why the government has failed to establish auxiliary squadrons at Halifax and Victoria is very difficult to understand. Halifax, as the minister well knows, was one of our key defensive sites in this war, with a fine harbour, aerial headquarters for the north Atlantic convoy patrol, and equipped also with excellent fighter defence. Why we should not have had an auxiliary squadron established at Halifax, which is our key winter port, is difficult to understand. It is equally difficult to understand why an auxiliary squadron should not have been established at Victoria. Ottawa could have been left out for a while, because after all there are so many airmen here at headquarters that perhaps they could defend us without an auxiliary squadron. We find also that no auxiliary squadron is established at Calgary and Quebec. In my opinion the fight for recognition of the auxiliary air force must begin all over again. It seems to me that here in Canada our air force has been pushed into the background until today it is actually but a shadow of its former self.

I would not take up this fight today if I were not sure that the defence of Canada is tied completely to our air strength. I speak only of defence; I speak only of the repelling of an aggressor. It was that same air strength that gave Britain her time in 1940, and it is that same air strength which can stop any aggressor flying over our country and rendering us helpless in something like sixty days, which people now predict is all that would be required to knock out a modern industrial power. If we take those sixty days into consideration we realize that we would not have time to prepare our air defences after there has been a declaration or indication of war. Those air defences must be prepared now. So that the minister may not think I am extreme in asking him to prepare the air defences now, I should like to quote an article from the Letter Review of June 30, 1947, with reference to statements made by Colonel Goforth:

> We have perhaps ten years of comparative safety from attack, perhaps followed by another five or ten years of rather acute danger, after which, if war has not occurred, the odds against it will become definitely better.

Colonel Goforth says that we have perhaps ten years of comparative safety. His opinion is not altogether agreed with by a presidential commission in the United States, which is referred to in a report in the Globe and Mail of June 2, 1947. The question was asked: When should such an attack be expected? This is the reply of the commission:

> For a period estimated by responsible scientists at not less than four years and not more than ten years, we can expect immunity from such an attack because we alone possess the atomic bomb.

That commission in Washington gives the United States four years of immunity. They said earlier in their report that the possibilities of an atomic age war are so great and the destruction would be so ferocious that it would require sixty days or less to determine whether the United States would win or lose. We have a Canadian authority saying we have ten years of immunity and a United States authority saying we have only four years of immunity. They are referring to a war fought with the same weapons we used in the last war; but a lot of people are concerned with a push button war. A report in the Globe and Mail of April 10 quoting a dispatch from Washington states that it will be at least twenty-five years before an atomic rocket war is possible.

I am laying the position before the government that there is an immunity of from four to ten years, with the possibility that a rocket war is twenty-five years away. The government have the defence of Canada in their hands. What are they going to do about it? Are they going to build drill halls and dig a few trenches here and there, or are they going to be realistic? Are they going to face the problem and say, "How can we defend Canada; how can we repel an aggressor?" I think the only answer that can be given is that an interceptor air force must be built up.

Lest the minister should think that I am merely expressing my own opinion with regard to the functions of the air force I would refer him to Sir Arthur Harris, who is reported in the Globe and Mail of April 26, 1947, as follows:

> He said he "supposed" the invasion of Germany was carried out because "we had the troops to invade with," but insisted air power could have done the job alone.

I emphasize that word "alone". There is also a report made in October, 1945, by the D'Olier civilian commission, and in this connection I quote from the New York Times of October 31, 1945, as follows:

> A civilian committee, after an exhaustive survey of the air war in Europe, declared today that, while allied air power was "decisive" in forcing Germany's defeat, a number of phases of the strategic bombing campaign were ineffective in their long range results.

I just call the minister's attention to the fact that that is the report of a civilian commission. They declared that the allied air power was decisive. I want also to refer to German military experts. This is the opinion of one of the enemy who felt the weight of our air force in the war. He said:

> Your bombing of our communications prevented our troops from ever coming into effective tactical employment against your forces. Without this strategic bombing the invasion would have been a dismal failure.

I regret that I cannot give the name of the German expert as that is taken from the speech delivered by Sir Arthur Harris in Montreal. He quoted another German expert as saying:

> We had forty reserve divisions in readiness. Your bombing made it impossible to move our troops rapidly, if at all,

In sending a message to the air forces General Montgomery said:

> But we also know well that you are always ready to bring your mighty effort closer in when such action is really needed and to co-operate in our tactical battle. When you do this your action is always decisive.

Those are the words of General Montgomery who was so successful in the organization of our ground forces. He said that the air force was always decisive.

In the past in Great Britain and also in the United States there was a fight for recognition of the air force. In Great Britain Lord Trenchard fought for recognition and understanding of the air force. In the United States the great General Billy Mitchell's words and predictions were well borne out in this war. In Canada great men like Bishop, Barker and others carried on the same fight. We also had the premier of Ontario, Colonel George Drew, an artillery man who wrote that great volume "Canada's Fighting Airmen". Somehow between the first and the second war the job that the airmen did was forgotten or not properly appreciated. It is my desire today to bring these facts to the attention of the government to see whether they really intend to carry out the first aim that the minister expressed when he said the aim was to defend Canada, because if he wants to defend Canada he must make the same decision today that Great Britain made in 1936 when they started to build up their fighter forces. They started to build up these fighter forces in preparation for what they knew would happen should a war develop. They chose to build their defensive forces. I speak today not of anything in the way of aggression as far as the air force is concerned. I speak only of defence so that my socialist friends cannot misinterpret anything I say. All I want to do is to defend Canada. I do not want to strike anyone else, or do anything like that. I am merely pointing out that the way to defend Canada is the same way that Britain defended the British isles in 1940. If the minister is sincere in his first aim, then he must get his air force on an effective operational basis and see that it is properly equipped and manned by sufficient people at least to repel the majority of any invading air force that may stand prepared to attack our country.

Mr. CLAXTON: May I first answer the hon. member for Trinity. He almost challenged me to find his statement extreme, and I must say that I do in some respects. His advocacy of the role of the air arm does great credit to one who has had a great record in the air force, but I think there are some hon. members in the committee who feel that in the end the infantry had something to do with it too. The way he has put it leads me to say at once that within recent weeks I have made a collection of a number of prophecies about the nature of the next war, from which it can be developed out of the mouth of somebody, not under the rank of lieutenant-general or its equivalent in the other services, that every single arm or weapon is obsolete today.

With regard to the air force, in testimony before the senate military affairs committee in the United States in 1945 Rear Admiral Forrest P. Sherman said as reported at page 505: "The carrier may prove to be less obsolescent than the strategic air force." And no less a proponent of air power, Lieutenant-General James H. Doolittle at page 296, said: "The weapons of the future may not be aeroplanes." I just mention these two to indicate that we are at a stage in development where armies and weapons are changing rapidly. In Canada we ended the war with a very large supply of planes such as Lancasters, of planes which had done such magnificent jobs as the Mosquitoes, as well as training planes of various types. We believe that every single one of these planes with which we ended the war is now obsolete. We are waiting to receive some of the latest jet propelled planes which have been on order for a number of months, but which have been delayed in delivery.

Mr. GREEN: Where is the minister getting them?

Mr. CLAXTON: From the United Kingdom.

Mr. SKEY: Is the minister making any effort to produce them here?

Mr. CLAXTON: We have experimental work going on with both planes and jet engines. The situation is as I have described it. When my hon. friend speaks as if we should have a large, fully manned and equipped operating air force on a basis to take the air in defence of our country against attack tomorrow, it seems to me that he is failing to take account of the realities of the situation.

We have weapons that were used in the last war. We are going to get aeroplanes that may be useful in some future war, when we can get them, but we cannot get them unless they are being produced, and unfortunately the production does not lie within our own hands; it lies within the hands of another country.

With regard to our ignoring the air force, as the hon. member seemed to indicate, I think

I need mention only one figure to him to indicate that that is simply not so. Out of this total appropriation of $240 million for the armed forces not less than $73 million is the portion which is applicable to the air force; in other words more than twice as much as was applicable to all the armed forces of Canada in 1938-39. Further, the strength of the Royal Canadian Air Force at the present time in officers and men is 11,804, plus an interim force of 337, making a total of 12,141. The air force is being reorganized, as are the other armed forces, on a post-war basis, which we believe to be sound, with reference to the needs and the capacity of the country. In the first place they have been formed into two commands with a very high degree of decentralization. Air stations have been established or are being established to conduct every kind of training, and I can refer my hon. friend to a press release which has just been issued, indicating the places where that training is being carried on at this very moment.

This year we have the largest programme of aerial photography ever to be undertaken in this or I believe in any other country. We have a very considerable number of air crew, planes and ground crew engaged in photographing for mapping purposes no less than 700,000 square miles of Canada. The air force has also undertaken the responsibility for work in connection with the northwest staging route and various other outlying parts of Canada. It has been working closely with the naval air arm in this work at Dartmouth. It is responsible for search and rescue at sea under our arrangement with the international civil aviation organization. This is going on at the same time as tradesmen of all kinds are being trained. The joint services training which has been continued at Shilo is being moved to Rivers, which is now being activated. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that from his own knowledge of the men with whom he served in the Royal Canadian Air Force overseas, the officers and men in our air force at the present time are among the pick of the Canadians who made the great record of which we are all so proud.

Mr. SKEY: Yes, I should like to agree with that immediately.

Mr. CLAXTON: Men with remarkable flying and fighting records. I visited some of them at the air staff college. I remember saying to the commanding officer, Air Commodore Ross, G.C., as I left: "These are a magnificent group of men," and he said: "Yes, sir, I do not think there is any group like it in the world." And that is my conviction from what I have seen of them.

Mr. SKEY: I have advocated that we equip our air force with modern weapons for the next four to ten years. When General Doolittle and the others made their statement they were looking into the future.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not necessarily agree with them. I quote them to show that there are two extreme points of view.

Mr. SKEY: It seems that in Canada we are always waiting for something. We will not buy the 1947 model because the 1948 car will have an automatic refrigerator, or some other new gadget. We never get anything because we are waiting for something that is nebulous and in the future. The important point is that we must have an air force in being.

Mr. HLYNKA: I am glad that the minister takes a realistic attitude on the problem of defence. Speaking in Halifax on June 24 he is reported to have said that Canada considers that peace must be based on understanding and knowledge, and meanwhile she, meaning Canada, meant to see there is nothing second-rate about her navy, her army or her air force. I agree whole-heartedly with that attitude, and the minister is to be congratulated on it.

I rose to say a word about another matter and that is the wearing of military dress in peace time by officers and men in Canada's permanent services. I was told by several officers that owing to the ridiculing references in this house and in one or two newspapers, officers have had to abandon wearing their uniforms when attending various social and other functions. If that is true, then it is a shocking state of affairs. What sort of defence shall we have when irresponsible attacks on officers force them to abandon the wearing of their uniforms for fear they may be called "brass hats" or something of the kind? What is the government's attitude on this matter, and does it intend to correct the situation?

I do not know whether the two gentlemen in front of the minister are military men, but if they are they should have had the privilege of wearing their uniforms here this afternoon unless they themselves chose otherwise. This matter is more important than it may appear on the surface. The situation reflects a retreat on the part of our national defence in the face of irresponsible utterings. I call this to the attention of the minister and ask him to take steps to correct the situation. Personally I am not at all disturbed when I see our own Canadian soldiers in uniform parading in Canada. We must make sure, however, that no foreign troops parade here.

Mr. ADAMSON: Like many other members of the house, I was pleased to have the elucidation of the defence programme put in fourteen rather clear points this morning. However, before I go on to discuss one point in particular, I would ask the minister to comment on a question that has received a great deal of attention in the press. I refer to the statement made, or alleged to have been made, and reported in the Calgary Herald of July 3, by the chief of the general staff, Lieutenant-General Foulkes. The statement as it appeared in the press on that date is:

> Asked about Alberta's probable role in the event of an enemy attack across the Arctic, the general decried all the poppycock that has been given out regarding such a possibility. He went on to say, "Fifty-seven pounds of freight to maintain a single man."

This is a direct quotation.

> "Can you imagine how many aircraft would be needed to keep an enemy force going in the Arctic? The Arctic wastes are our strongest defence.

If that statement is correct, I am reminded of those wishful thinkers who before the last war said that the Atlantic was our first line of defence. I want to remind the house that an enemy operated in the gulf of St. Lawrence and operated there quite successfully. If the statement I have quoted is correct, I would suggest that the minister find out from the chief of the general staff what he meant by it.

There is one more thing about this that I think should receive attention. It is an editorial in the Montreal Gazette the day before yesterday on the same subject:

> Lieut.-General Foulkes, rejecting the professional opinion of every United States general officer who has expressed himself on the subject, maintains that talk of Canada as a victim of invasion in another world war "is all poppycock." The defence of his unique position rests on the question-begging statement that "a little simple arithmetic proves this;" together with a vague remark concerning supply problems in the northland.

Two other paragraphs which I think are very important I would quote.

Mr. CLAXTON: Mr. Chairman, is there not a rule about reading editorials? I was called to order by the hon. gentleman himself on a previous occasion.

Mr. ADAMSON: If there is a rule, then I will paraphrase.

Mr. CLAXTON: You can adopt it as your own.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

Mr. ADAMSON: I do not think I ever called the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. CLAXTON: Then somebody sitting close to the hon. member did.

Mr. ADAMSON: I will certainly abide by the rules. To go on, the two paragraphs are that General Foulkes appears to ignore the constantly extending offensive power of the V-weapons, of which V-1 and V-2, which we knew during the war, were, although extremely effective, but early types of self-propelled projectiles which are to come and which will be very much more destructive. The second point is that he envisages a force maintained in the Arctic. It does not take very much of a force to launch the modern type of self-propelled weapons, particularly those which are known as self-guided or guided weapons. Experiments, I believe, have taken place recently in which these weapons have been known to travel extraordinary distances of well over two thousand miles. Whether that is still on the secret list I am not aware, but that statement has been made in the United States press.

The point I bring out, Mr. Chairman, is that the chief of the general staff is making a statement at considerable variance with the statement made in this house by the minister himself, and certainly at great variance with what was said in the railway committee room yesterday. I suggest to the minister that great care should be taken with utterances of highly placed officers of the Department of National Defence. Particularly should this be so with regard to the chief of the general staff, who occupies a position of tremendous importance in this country. For him to have made these statements—as he did if the paper is correct—is something that I contend goes far beyond the function of the chief of the general staff. It gets definitely into the question of policy and politics, and I think it was an unwise procedure.

I now want to continue with the minister's statement of this morning. The fourteen points he brought out were sometimes duplicates of each other, but I think his second point is the most important of all at the present time. He referred to the joint intelligence and planning groups. There is no service today which is as important as the intelligence service. With an efficient and effective intelligence service, a surprise attack can be forestalled or largely prevented. May I say that it is surprise attacks that we must expect if we are attacked. The old days of declarations of war and withdrawal of ambassadors have gone. The new type of warfare now exists. The war starts before it is declared.

Intelligence can be divided into three parts: political, military and commercial. Up to the present time we have regarded our intelligence as three separate services. Intelligence should be regarded as one service, as is defence. Coordination should be complete and absolute. I want to say to the Minister of National Defence, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that there is no cheaper service to any country than an effective and efficient intelligence service. Intelligence is the fourth and the newest of the services. It can truly be said to be a defence service. We must be prepared and we must know what is likely to happen. It is being said that a push-button war, so-called, is not likely for a period of a quarter of a century. That may or may not be so, but we should be extremely foolish to assume now that it is not so and, therefore, to leave ourselves open. To be without an effective intelligence service would be to court disaster. The unfortunate abolition of the United States intelligence service, particularly the military intelligence service, known as the O.S.S., has caused a serious situation in that country. I feel that the most important immediate step the government should take is the creation of an effective intelligence service at all levels. Naturally I shall not ask the minister to say what is being done, but I want to make the plea that this is the most important immediate necessity.

Before the war the foreign office experts in London warned the British government, particularly the Prime Minister, of the conditions in Germany. There was a mass of information well known by the consular and diplomatic service; there were statements of the number of troops, of the number and types of weapons and other statements concerning the effectiveness and efficiency of the German army. The then Prime Minister of Great Britain, if one can believe the memoirs which have subsequently been written, refused to believe his own experts and went on with the policy of appeasement which so nearly proved disastrous for the whole civilized world. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, and to emphasize most strongly that the intelligence service at all levels should be kept up to the highest pitch of efficiency. We in Canada have a peculiar flair for intelligence, and we should not allow our talents to go without being utilized; I will not say "rewarded", because there is no reward in intelligence.

I wish to turn to another side of intelligence. Today we have a necessity for providing commercial intelligence and intelligence in research. New processes and new offensive weapons are being perfected all the time. That information must be made available to those whose duty it will be to defend this country should another war break out.

I emphasize the fact the minister also mentioned, that one of the big problems of the armed forces, particularly the navy, is to winterize the ships and equipment, so that they can operate in Arctic and sub-Arctic waters. I want to point out also that today in Russia there are 500,000 men north of the Arctic circle, where an efficient and effective piece of work is being done by the Soviet Union. I say that to indicate that our meagre efforts, such as Exercise Musk-Ox and other small exercises carried on last year, were minuscule in comparison with the operation going on in Siberia. Whether we like it or not, the world is divided into two camps; you may call them totalitarian and free, if you like. We have the two great protagonists, Russia in Asia and Europe, and the United States; and we are sandwiched in between. We cannot afford to risk finding ourselves in an unprepared position. Geography cannot be denied.

I want to say one last word about the air. The battle of Britain protected the civilization of the world in which we now live. If it had not been for the gallant work of that extremely meagre force the airfields, the landing strips, the centres of communications and the harbours of the United Kingdom would have been put out of business. Had that happened, as we have since learned from the records of the German army, England would have been virtually undefendable. Had England become undefendable, the last bastion would have gone and the raw and undefended flank of the Atlantic coast of North America would have been the immediate object of attack by the efficient Nazi regime.

We talk about always waiting for the most effective and most efficient weapon to turn up, but it has been said that as soon as a weapon gets into production it is already obsolete. It is true that the Hurricane and Spitfire aircraft were most effective in the battle of Britain; yet such old types as the Swordfish, the Wellington, the Hampden, and others did extremely effective work at that time. It is unlikely that the Hurricanes and Spitfires, effective as they were, could have won that battle without the help of the old, inefficient and even obsolete aircraft, both fighter and bomber which were also used. Just because some aircraft are not the latest type, are we going to say we will not even use such of them as we had at the end of the war—

Mr. CLAXTON: We have plenty of them in Canada now.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is so, but according to the minister's statement this morning the training being done is very limited indeed. We are not carrying on training with these aircraft because to do so would be a waste of money.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sorry, but I did not say that. I said that to acquire new aircraft, unless they were the most modern types, would not be useful at the present time.

Mr. ADAMSON: Then I misunderstood the minister.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I did not make myself clear.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to bring out clearly that to have an airman trained, even in an obsolete aircraft, is infinitely better than to have an untrained man.

I go on now to the important matter of training. The chief of the general staff, speaking of university cadets and junior officer training, according to a report in the Calgary Herald said that, after serving for three months a year for three years, such officers would be well trained in the most modern weapons. Well, in my opinion there months a year for three years will not adequately train an officer in the most modern weapons. I doubt whether three years of intensive training will bring an officer up to high efficiency in the most modern weapons. Every day, every month, every year we are getting more complicated weapons. More and more do we need engineering scientific and technical skill. To say you can train a man for three months, then send him back to his civilian occupation for nine months, then start training him again, and carry this on for three years, and that at the end of three years you will have an efficient officer capable of instructing others is in my opinion, not a correct statement of fact. I am not being critical of what has been said because, as I indicated, this is merely a newspaper report; but I want to show that with the present highly intricate, extremely technical and high speed methods of warfare it is infinitely more important now than ever before that those in our fighting forces should receive the highest and most intense type of training. We cannot allow ourselves to get into the position in which we found ourselves in 1939. We can never take that risk again. Whether it is a push-button war or a war on the surface of the tundras, no matter what it is we must have our intelligence giving us proper and complete information; and we must be prepared at least to repel the first attack before it reaches the centres of population. One thing is absolutely sure, the speed of warfare is constantly accelerating, and the range, accuracy and destructive power of all weapons are increasing tremendously.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member referred to an article in the Calgary Herald of July 3 which reports Lieutenant General Foulkes, chief of the general staff, as rejecting the possibility of a push-button war occurring in the immediate future and calling it poppycock. If that is what the chief of the general staff said I must say he made the statement on the best authority, because on July 2 Field-Marshal Viscount Montgomery said at a press conference there was no evidence yet of a future war of the push-button variety. It seems to me that the chief of the general staff was speaking with the best possible authority and also with good sense. There has been a great deal of talk about push-button wars as well as about saucers flying in formation and the like. That does not mean that we should not keep up to date and do the utmost in research and industrial organization and have as much as we can afford of the most modern weapons. But it does seem to me that we should keep our feet on the ground and look at the realities and consider what the probabilities are in the light of the best kind of intelligence we can get. I am sure that the chief of the general staff in speaking as he did was endeavouring to meet this extreme kind of excited and unrealistic statement which is doing a good deal at the present time to upset the world and effect the chances of our working out some foundation for living together.

I should also like to say this. The chief of the general staff and, I must say, all the other officers of the armed forces with hardly a single exception have, since I have been there, been scrupulously careful to speak only on matters that would properly come within their fields. Sometimes they are quoted when they do not expect to be, and sometimes they have been misquoted, but I want to say at once that there has been nothing but the most loyal cooperation in what I believe every hon. member would regard as the best kind of parliamentary as well as service practice.

I take the opportunity while on my feet of raising a matter as a kind of personal privilege. I find that when I said that eleven babies were delivered at the Shilo military hospital in June I was basing my statement on advance information. There must have been some miscalculation. In June there were only four babies delivered. I was also in error in understating the cooperative activities. The cooperative activities functioning or being formed include in addition a service station and garage, outdoor swimming and wading pools, seamstress, riding school, bus service, drug store, butcher shop, dry goods and hardware shops and milk delivery.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister has, in my judgment, impressed the house with his sincerity and his realistic approach to the problems of his high office, and I wish to congratulate him on his approach and on the way in which he is attacking his problems. The social crediters he will find will endeavour to take a realistic attitude toward Canada's defence as they have done since first coming into public life. In 1936 I made a statement supporting the immediate preparation by Canada for effective participation in the war before ever I came into parliament. Social crediters have taken the attitude consistently, that we should be prepared. It will be altogether too late if we are caught unprepared. One of the speakers referred to the miraculous way in which we came out of the last war with everything against us, seeming, I thought, to imply that we need not now worry too much about being prepared, that we shall come out of the next war in a similar way. That reasoning is probably satisfactory if one does not carry it too far. But what came into my mind as he spoke was: How far and how often should we tempt Providence? Our coming out of the last war successfully was, I think, the result of a great many miraculous interventions by Providence by which we were enabled to save ourselves when our own management did not justify us in expecting to come out of that war successfully at all.

The minister's words have a pleasing and reassuring sound, as most hon. members have pointed out to the committee. All will depend upon the interpretation which he and his department place upon his words, and also upon the attitude which the people of Canada adopt towards defence matters. I thought the remark made by the hon. member for Vegreville concerning silly remarks made about brass hats and the effect that they had on certain gentlemen in the country were very appropriate. In any democracy such as Canada, comprising peoples of different racial origins and with four parties participating in Canadian political life, the greatest care must be exercised by everybody who expresses himself in public or in private, whether it be through the press or otherwise, because so frequently what is said has effects which were not intended.

In a general way I am somewhat concerned about the substantial cuts which have been made in these defence estimates. The minister has said nothing either privately or publicly to indicate that the treasury board were hard on him. If they were, probably the first thing we shall have to do is to assure the treasury board that we do not want the defence needs of Canada to be controlled by the treasury board. We want the treasury board to be controlled by the defence needs of Canada. I think the minister should assert himself definitely in this respect. I gathered from his words that he had in mind the defence we could afford rather more than the defence we needed. I think he should determine the kind of defence we need in Canada and then, having determined that, tell this parliament how much money this is going to cost and require parliament to vote the money. That may sound a little extreme. But if we got into war we would not hesitate regarding money. We would give the minister a blank cheque just as we did in the last war. Why not give him a blank cheque while we are preparing for war? That seems the sensible thing, and that is the policy that, I with moderation, would advocate that parliament should adopt with respect to defence.

I believe the minister ought to inform parliament from time to time as to Canada's needs so that he can take us into his confidence. We shall trust that there will come into parliament no members who will be as irresponsible as a number of members were before the last war, and who will say things that never should be said to the minister. I trust we shall all be able to keep our feet on the ground, all political parties and all racial extractions all over Canada, so that we shall have the best chance of coming through these perilous times we face with the best possible hope of coming out successfully, so that our children and our grandchildren and future generations may continue to enjoy the freedom which our race has struggled for through the centuries.

Canada should, I believe, assume that her defence will depend, of course, upon her own efforts, but mainly upon the efforts of the British commonwealth and empire as a whole. Our friends in the commonwealth and empire have always been ready in the past, and there is no reason why they should not be ready in the times to come. Twice within the memory of all of us we have faced what seemed to be an impossible situation. The British commonwealth has proved to be the backbone, the stomach and the sinews which saved us, under God, in both those wars. I think we would be well advised to assume that similar conditions will obtain in the future.

Canada should look very carefully to the British commonwealth and empire. I suggest to the minister that we should endeavour to build up that commonwealth and empire, so that it will possess the industrial strength which is necessary to fight a major war. To defend ourselves in such terrible times, we must have industrial self-sufficiency.

I would direct the attention of the minister to what Canada has done in providing herself with rubber through the Polymer establishment. It would be well if Canada would see that every major necessity which it is possible to provide is provided, including large supplies of vital commodities. Every member of the commonwealth should follow the same policy, so that we shall not be in danger of being emasculated, by being cut in two or probably in four through the exigencies of a future war. There should be the greatest cooperation among the members of the commonwealth and the empire in all matters pertaining to the economic and financial strength of the empire.

I think we should strive to build up morale in the commonwealth. We should bring about such conditions in our commonwealth that we shall have prosperity and a high standard of living, so much so that the people will know that the commonwealth is a good place in which to live. We have a good illustration of what might happen if such conditions do not obtain. I think it is well known that the main reason why Eire did not fight in the last war was that conditions economically in Eire had been allowed to deteriorate below a reasonable standard. Eire made up her mind that she simply had to be independent in order to have a greater measure of prosperity. There is no reason why Eire should not be more prosperous as an integral part of the British commonwealth than she could possibly be alone. There have been faulty policies adopted throughout the empire which have resulted in Eire feeling that she had to go out of the empire. People are much inclined to look at the standards of living which they have when they are estimating the value of conditions under which they live. I say that we should raise commonwealth morale by bringing about high standards of prosperity in every part of the empire.

This may all seem a little off the subject of defence, but we must bear in mind that in times of war there is a good deal of truth in what was said regarding the contestants in world war I. It was said that that war would be won by the nation with the deepest stocking; in other words, by the nation that had the strongest financial resources. We should keep in mind that we simply must keep ourselves economically strong all over the empire; otherwise we are not going to fight successfully. Let me mention to the minister, in passing that there has been a determined attempt on the part of a nation that should know better, to break down imperial preferences in the British commonwealth, thereby weakening the economic structure of all the members of the commonwealth. Such attempts as that should be resisted with every bit of strength that we can muster, both publicly and in private, until everybody comes to realize that we must insist on safeguarding our economic and financial strength as a part of our preparations for defence. Imperial preference is one of the devices which we have found advantageous in the past in the development of our financial and economic strength, and obviously it will be a device of great value in that respect in the future.

There should be financial cooperation among the members of the commonwealth to obtain expansion of production and consumption. There should be adopted a scientific method of distribution, both domestically and throughout the commonwealth. I do not propose to enter into a discussion of what method should be used, but I do say that nothing has been found up to the present time that begins to compare in theory with the social credit proposals. If social credit were applied throughout the British commonwealth and empire the empire's fighting strength would be astoundingly increased. It would enable all parts of the empire to take advantage of the resources of all the empire, a thing which today is quite impossible. I point that out to the minister; I point that out to the members of the house and to the people of the country who will read my words.

Up to the present it has not been a question of the capacity of the various members of the empire to produce; it has not been a question of the resources they have; it has been a question of whether we can use those resources. In the past, except in times of war, we have not been able to use the valuable resources which Providence has put in our hands. Let any man who thinks he is able to devise a way of solving the problem proceed immediately to offer his suggestion. I suggest that the application of social credit is a means at our disposal which would make us strong for the terrible times which I think every member in this house feels are not very far ahead.

After the commonwealth, Canada should count upon the United States. I think the minister is doing that quite satisfactorily. There is no objection to close cooperation and collaboration with the United States, but in our dealings with the United States we should be sure that we are protecting our interests politically, economically, financially and strategically. This we should do before we enter the next war, during that war and after that war is over.

It may not be entirely in order for a member of the Canadian House of Commons to make observations concerning the transfer of so many of our commonwealth bases for forty or fifty outmoded ships during the last war, but I think every red-blooded Britisher from one end of the empire to the other resented deeply the fact that the United States took advantage of the difficulties we were in to get 99-year leases on certain vital bases in the British commonwealth. When we consider that her own safety was at stake just as much as ours, I think we must all agree that the correct words to use about that occurrence would not be suitable words to use in a parliament of the empire.

So I say we ought to take pains to see to it that we protect ourselves politically, economically, financially and strategically before the next war, during the next war and after the next war whenever we are dealing with the United States. I have no desire to be harsh about things which happened during the last six or seven years. We are grateful for the assistance that the United States gave us, but I hope she is equally grateful for the assistance we have given her.

Canada should not neglect the united nations organization, but we should be very careful with respect to that organization. Of course most hon. members are quite at variance with me in regard to that organization, but I think the day will come when they will see things very much as I see them in respect of the whole united nations organization and the charter. I would warn that we do not trust too far in our dealings with that organization. We should take every care to guard our sovereignty and freedom, politically, economically, financially and strategically, just as we should with respect to the United States before the coming war, during the war and after the war.

All we need to do is to remember the dismal record of the league of nations. There are those who will say, "Well, the united nations organization is quite different from the league of nations." I do not see that it is any more likely to succeed than the league of nations was. Hon. members know what happened to us as the result of the league of nations. I was as ardent an advocate of the league of nations as anyone, but this is what actually occurred. The league of nations caused the British commonwealth to count upon it too much. It caused us to neglect our defences in every way. It even made it so that it was difficult to get an intelligent and realistic discussion in the matter of defence in the various houses of parliament of the empire. If anything like that occurs as a result of the united nations—and we see signs of that already—then the united nations organization can be something that we may regret very deeply. Therefore I say, let us just be careful in respect of that organization. I am afraid it will be found by the people of the future that the whole united nations organization and united nations covenant were devised as a United States commercial contrivance, aimed at increasing the sales of United States goods all over the world. That was the primary object.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have allowed the hon. member wide latitude, but I feel that he should direct his remarks to the department which is being considered, the Department of National Defence. I realize that there is some connection between economic theories and defence, but I do not think the estimates of the department should be used to illustrate economic theories. May I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks more directly to national defence.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have said all I want to say in that respect, Mr. Chairman, but I think it would be quite in order to point out to you and to hon. members that whenever we have endeavoured to bring these matters up before the House of Commons they have been always out of order on one ground or another. Yet it can be found that these matters are of the most vital concern to us. There is something radically wrong in the world today; otherwise we should not have a world divided into two great camps, led by two great nations, each of which prides itself upon being a peace-loving nation. There is something terribly wrong somewhere. We ought to find out what is the matter, but I will say no more on this now. I would simply say that the nations would be well advised to be wary how far they put their trust in the united nations organization for their defence.

In my judgment steps ought to be taken to have the people of Canada informed as fully as possible on all matters pertaining to Canadian defence. The value of the British commonwealth, the greatness, the strength, the potentialities of the British commonwealth should be brought before the people. In centres throughout the country, in the press and elsewhere, I find a tendency nowadays to disregard these matters. I was principal of schools for some twenty years before I entered parliament. I know what was on the curriculum of the schools in Alberta. I think Alberta was no different in this regard from the other provinces. The attention which has been given to these vital matters of our defence has been so slight that the boys and girls have had no chance at all to form a sound opinion as to how to plot their course for the greatest possible safety of their society. How you can possibly have a nation safe when it is so ill-informed on vital matters is something that I fail to be able to see. What I suggest to the minister is that a part of his work should be devising ways and means whereby we can get out to the youth of this country and the people generally the essential facts. The remarks of the hon. member for York West regarding intelligence were appropriate. I would take the matter of intelligence just a little bit further and advise that intelligence for the people all over the country concerning all matters pertaining to the national well-being and defence should be more carefully attended to. Every precaution should be taken to see that nothing but the absolute truth is given. That is a matter which would help us greatly in our defence in the future.

Much attention ought to be given to the causes of war and how to remove them. In his statement this morning, the minister said nothing as to the causes of war or whether or not we are doing anything to remove them. I would think that if we want to defend ourselves one of the very first things we ought to discover is whether or not we are contributing to the causes of the next world war by the policies which we are pursuing. I think there is hardly any doubt that we are contributing to the causes of the next war by the policies we are pursuing. In my opinion, much attention should be given to that by the minister. Let it be borne in mind that the cause of war is hot commercial rivalry, the struggle for markets and for raw material; also unemployment and poverty which brings about such extreme movements as the nazi movement and other movements which indirectly resulted in the last war. To what extent are we pursuing policies which are resulting in the accomplishment of the evils from which we suffered in the last war? In my judgment, much could be done to eliminate or at least to remove the intensity of the struggle for markets and raw materials. It seems to me that the minister is partly responsible for discovering what that may be and advocating that it ought to be done.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think the Minister of National Defence, as Minister of National Defence, has any control over the discovery of markets. I do not think that discussion should be carried on under these estimates.

Mr. BLACKMORE: As a matter of fact, it is a matter of difference of opinion. The minister is meeting with the other members of the cabinet and the cabinet is devising the policy for this country. However I am not going to pursue the matter. I submit to the minister that he seriously consider it just as other hon. members should.

The citizens of Canada ought to be trained in first aid of all kinds. In his statement, the minister hardly mentioned that. Possibly he has something of that sort in mind, but we should not wait until the V-1 and the V-2 bombs and the other horrible monstrosities come, to begin to teach our people first aid. The people should know all about these things. They should have first-aid shelters all over the country. I had the privilege of being in Britain in 1941 along with the Chairman. He will remember how difficult it had been for them to establish first-aid shelters and how important they were. I should think they ought to be established all over the country before the trouble comes along. Why should people not be trained? I should think it would be a part of our defence mechanism.

We should have people trained in fire-fighting, because certainly if any credence can be placed in the suggestions as to what terrible instruments of war are being developed, fire is going to play an important part in the suffering which people have to go through in the next war. Fire will be among the people just as it was in Britain.

There should be an organization for local defence. The minister has talked about reserves. I would commend him for all he said about keeping up the reserve force, but I have an idea that the people should be trained as citizens' armies. I remember the great anxiety which was felt in certain parts of Canada when we were in the midst of danger from attack by the Japanese. I heard people in western areas say they would give almost anything if they had a few machine guns and knew how to use them, because the possession of the right kind of arms, and skill in using them, by the ordinary citizen, by farmers and others who might be in danger of being overrun, could easily have turned the tide in case of a Japanese invasion. This matter should be given a great deal of thought while we are training reserve forces. I may have more to say regarding defence at a later time, but perhaps this is sufficient for the present.

Mr. WYLIE: During this debate we have heard many speeches about the navy, the army and the air force, and I feel that I should say a few words at this time. I cannot be accused of taking up much of the time of the house. As a matter of fact, this is only the third time I have risen to speak. I hear certain murmurs on the other side of the house but I ignore them. I could discuss the army and perhaps do so sensibly since I was a member of the southern Alberta regiment for three years, but I will not go into that question at the present time. I intend to discuss it under another item, particularly with regard to the uniforms that men in the army have to wear. I have worn these uniforms, and when I put them on I certainly did not feel very well dressed in comparison with members of the air force and the navy. I intend to go into that question under the appropriate item when we come to it.

The matter I now wish to discuss does not pertain to any of the three services. I am not sure where I am in order, thought I hope I am. If not, then I can discuss it under some other item. What I shall have to say now has reference to the area that is known as the British block adjoining Medicine Hat. It is an area that was taken over in 1941 by the Department of National Defence, and this meant the moving of 130 families from the area.

The area comprises 700,000 acres of land. Last January, at the convention of the united farmers of Alberta a resolution was passed unanimously endorsing steps taken by one of the men who were moved from that area. In the course of this session every hon. member must, I am sure, have received a copy of the resolution. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in reading the resolution now, since, as I say, everyone has a copy of it. The minister, I believe, also received a copy. The resolution was passed, as I say, at a convention of the united farmers of Alberta, which is the largest organization of farmers in that province, and it was passed unanimously.

On March 15, 1947, there appeared in Maclean's magazine an article under the title "Cross Country", from which I will read certain excerpts for the information of hon. members. This is what the writer of this article states:

> In the dark wartime spring of 1941 a party representing the British government appeared in the "British block" of southern Alberta, a sparsely settled area of more than 700,000 acres between Suffield and the Saskatchewan boundary. They wanted the land, and they wanted it fast.
> To each of the 130 families in the block this offer was made: trade acre for acre, for crown lands north of the Red Deer river, plus a cash settlement for buildings, or, instead, a straight $6.50 per acre. The farmers thought both offers unfair.
> But the government—and the war—couldn't wait. R.C.M.P. officers summoned the farmers to court in Medicine Hat, where they were summarily ordered off their land in 15 days, and recompensed at $1 an acre for raw land, five cents per acre for each unexpired year on leased land, and $4 per acre for standing crops, $2 per head for moving livestock and no stated offer for buildings.
> When the settlers had gone, the area around Suffield became the "New Mexico" of Canada. It was used by Canada, Britain and the United States as a supersecret testing ground, chiefly for poison gas, but also for explosives and other weapons. The area is now a permanent military experimental station, including three camps and an airfield, that cost more than $8 millions.
> The 130 families scattered across Canada and the United States. Some of them refused to accept a cent of the award. All of them felt that they had been treated unfairly, that the people of the "British block" got less than British justice. Now they want the question reopened. The united farmers of Alberta support their appeal for arbitration.

After that article appeared in this magazine, one of the members of the board who had something to do with making settlement with these farmers put another article in Maclean's magazine. I read that article, as I have no doubt many other hon. members did, and after reading it I wrote to the Minister of National Defence suggesting that the case be reopened and further consideration be given the farmers. I thought that possibly that would be done, but this, in part, is the letter which I received from the minister dated April 30, 1947:

> A short time ago Maclean's magazine published an article on this matter with the result that one of the men who acted for this department wrote a letter to Mr. Horace T. Hunter, president of the Maclean-Hunter publishing Company Limited, copy of which is enclosed, and which I think deals with the matter thoroughly.

That is the letter I got in reply to my letter to the minister. I will read the letter to Mr. Hunter. It is quite a long letter, but I will read it and another letter before I am through. It is dated March 14, 1947, and is addressed to Mr. Horace T. Hunter, president

Maclean-Hunter Publishing Company Limited, 481 University avenue, Toronto 2, Ontario. It reads:

Dear Sir: An item "Cross Country—The Prairies," which appears on page 72 of the March 15, 1947, issue of Maclean's magazine, is the type of misleading malicious report which is fuel for communist propaganda.

May I digress for a moment. First of all, I want to say that the man who wrote this letter did not know the first thing of what he was talking about. If he had lived in that area, as many of the farmers, and as I myself have done, he certainly would not say that it was communist propaganda.

Mr. CLAXTON: But he did not say that in the letter. He said that the article was fuel for communist propaganda.

Mr. WYLIE: That is exactly what he said, and he certainly did not know the facts or he would not have said that. I know every farmer who resided in that area and I am sure there was not a communist there.

Mr. CLAXTON: But he does not say that. He does not say there was a communist there. He says that that kind of attitude, that kind of misstatement, would be fuel for communist propaganda.

Mr. WYLIE: I will accept the statement of the minister, but I still contend that he should have kept that out of this letter. He goes on:

As a member of the real estate adviser's staff who proceeded to Medicine Hat in May, 1941, to acquire the "British block," comprising approximately 1,100 square miles, and which was so urgently needed at that time by the British government for experimental purposes, I am fully aware of all the facts, which are as follows:

I do not know the details of any offers which might have been made to the owners of the property prior to May, 1941, before the real estate adviser's branch was requested to take over, but I know no progress had been made in obtaining this land.

Lieut.-Col. Goodwin Gibson, O.B.E., at that time real estate adviser to the Department of National Defence, and presently president of Gibson Brothers, Toronto, assembled at Medicine Hat the following:

Mr. H. A. Dyde, O.B.E., lawyer, Department of National Defence, presently practising law in Edmonton; Mr. G. M. Bowes, O.B.E., of the real estate adviser's office, Department of National Defence, presently vice-president, Oldfield, Kirby and Gardner, Winnipeg; Mr. Frank W. Collins, industrial commissioner, Canadian Pacific Railway; Mr. G. H. S. Dinsmore, assistant to real estate adviser, Department of National Defence, presently director, lands and buildings, War Assets Corporation; Mr. J. Wurtele Rankin, O.B.E., assistant to real estate adviser, Department of National Defence, presently vice-president, Westmount Realties Company, Montreal; Mr. Harry Allum, chief field representative, soldiers' settlement board for Western Canada, Edmonton, presently head of Department of Veterans Affairs, Edmonton, Alta; fifteen field representatives of the soldiers' settlement board from all sections of Western Canada; Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel stenographers, et cetera.

Because of the urgency of possession, the property was expropriated, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were used to distribute the notices of expropriation over this huge area, and they had nothing whatever to do with issuing summonses to farmers to appear in court in Medicine Hat. The expropriation was dated June 4, 1941, and everyone had to be off the area by July 1.

The court house in Medicine Hat was loaned to the real estate adviser's department only because there was no other suitable vacant space available in Medicine Hat, and it was just coincidental that this location was obtained.

Digressing for a moment from the letter, may I say that according to the letter the court house was used entirely for this purpose. At that time my office was in the court house and they certainly did not use my office. It is quite true they used a small space in there, but once again this writer is wrong. I continue:

A complete inventory and valuation of each owner's property was made by field representatives of the soldiers' settlement board, who are acknowledged as being well versed in prairie farm values, and who worked day and night to accomplish the task in short order.

The buildings were put in at full value to the farm, and not the depreciated value as they should have been. After paying the owners for the buildings, they (the owners) were given the right to remove any or all buildings, fences or equipment, and as a result many buildings were moved to Medicine Hat and elsewhere, and are in use today.

Among allowances given were $3 per head for driving off cattle, $1 for each horse, 50 cents for each sheep, being amounts determined by drovers and cattlemen as being fair and reasonable; $3 per ton in stacks for what went as hay but which would not be regarded in better areas as feed at all; from $50 to $250, depending on the size of the family and the distance from Medicine Hat, was allowed for moving expenses, 25 cents per foot for each dug well, 5 cents per acre per year, limited to ten years, for unexpired ranch leases, the rentals of which were in many cases in default and yearly grazing leases had not been renewed but were recognized just the same.

In regard to the type of land, the biggest rancher in the area had about 40,000 acres under lease and, by drilling gas wells by the river, obtained power to pump water by which he irrigated some three thousand acres of land. In this way, he was able to grow alfalfa grass and thus obtain winter feed for his herds. In spite of this, however, his foreman claimed that the land could only support thirty head on each section of 640 acres. This should show that $1 per acre was a generous amount for raw land of this description, but it should be noted that as high as I think, $27 per acre was paid for some of the best land. Naturally, in such a large area, the type of land varied and was priced accordingly.

In spite, however, of all the allowances given to the various owners, it was found in many cases that their accumulated debts were still greater than what could be allowed them. Colonel Gibson contacted Hon. Mr. W. A. Fallow, at that time Minister of Agriculture of the province of Alberta—

May I digress just here for a moment and say that Mr. Fallow was never minister of agriculture of Alberta. Mr. Fallow is minister of public works of Alberta. The minister of agriculture of Alberta at that time was Mr. D. B. Mullen, if I am not mistaken. To continue:

—and appealed for help for these unfortunates. As a result, the province generously agreed to forgive all debts up to the point where $1,500 could be paid these settlers for their lands and buildings with the other allowances made added to that amount.

The owners of the cultivated land had the opportunity of either accepting $4 per acre for standing crops, or could harvest their crops, whichever they chose, but could not live on the land after July 1, 1941. Practically all decided to accept the $4 per acre for crops, and as for the very few who did not, I understand they did not net more than the amount offered for standing crops. This area is in a dry belt, occupation of the area should never have been permitted in the first place, and it was a godsend to get these settlers off this type of land.

Mr. MacINNIS: Six o'clock.

Mr. WYLIE: May we call it six o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member desire to finish reading the letter?

Mr. WYLIE: I can finish after six o'clock.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at seven o'clock.

PRINCESS ELIZABETH

ANNOUNCEMENT OF BETROTHAL TO LIEUTENANT PHILIP MOUNTBATTEN

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the next item I should like to say a few words with respect to an important and historic announcement which has been made in the United Kingdom today. It will be with the greatest pleasure, I am sure, that the people of Canada will have learned of the announcement made in London today that Their Majesties the King and Queen have given their consent to the betrothal of their elder daughter, the Princess Elizabeth, to Lieutenant Philip Mountbatten, Royal Navy, the only son of the late Prince Andrew of Greece and the Princess Alice of Battenberg. The Canadian government was informed earlier by His Majesty of the betrothal of the Princess Elizabeth, and was most pleased to give its concurrence.

I am sure that hon. members of both houses of parliament will wish to join in an expression of our warmest good wishes to the Princess Elizabeth, whose charm and sincerity have already endeared her to the Canadian people, and also in hearty congratulations to Lieutenant Philip Mountbatten. It will be the wish of all that health, happiness and Divine guidance may gladden the path through life of Her Royal Highness and Lieutenant Philip Mountbatten as they face the future together.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure it will be the wish of every hon. member of this house to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in extending to this young couple our congratulations and best wishes. As for myself, as they enter upon a new career in a new world I should like to express the hope that it may be given to Princess Elizabeth and her prince consort to do as much for the commonwealth and the world at large as it was given to Queen Victoria and her consort to do in an earlier period in our history.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I am sure all hon. members on all sides of the house and of all parties will wish the young couple everything that is good in life.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the members of the Social Credit party join with the other hon. members who have spoken in extending the warmest good wishes to the princess and her prince consort; and we wish them a long life and great achievements in their reign.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Fifth and sixth reports of standing committee on public accounts—Mr. Picard.

TAX AGREEMENTS

COMPENSATION TO PROVINCES IN LIEU OF INCOME AND OTHER TAXES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Abbott for the second reading of Bill No. 411, to authorize the government to enter into agreement with the governments of the provinces pursuant to which, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes for a limited period.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): The bill now before the house embodies the final outcome of negotiations that have extended over a period of almost two years. It authorizes the governor in council to enter into agreements with provincial governments embodying the terms and conditions so negotiated, it gives authority to carry out certain ancillary actions, and it provides the necessary appropriations.

As hon. members well know, the arrangements which have been agreed upon represent a compromise with our original objectives which we found it impossible to achieve, because of the failure to reach agreement with all of the nine provinces. I do not intend by that statement to cast blame in any direction. I am only stating a fact. I cannot let the occasion pass, however, without again affirming that the dominion government has made every effort to reach unanimous agreement, and far from being rigid and uncompromising in its attitude, as has been alleged on several occasions during the course of the negotiations, it has repeatedly made adjustments in its proposals, repeatedly accepted suggestions put forward by various provincial governments, repeatedly made concessions to secure unanimous agreement. In order, therefore, to place the present position in its proper perspective, I wish to say a word about its historical background and then to review briefly and simply the course of the protracted negotiations from 1945 to date.

The genesis of the current phase of dominion-provincial relations dates back to the financial difficulties faced by several provinces during the depression years of the thirties. In spite of large dominion grants in aid and heavy construction expenditure, the burden of unemployment relief had been such as to weaken the financial position of all provincial governments, but in the prairie west drought and depressed agricultural prices had created an additional, almost intolerable strain, leading to default on the part of Alberta and threatening the solvency of the other two provinces. Further financial assistance of an interim character was granted to Manitoba and Saskatchewan as a result of reports made by the Bank of Canada in the spring of 1937 but it had already become clear that no permanent or satisfactory solution could be developed without a fundamental inquiry into the financial powers and responsibilities of Canadian governing bodies at all levels. This led to the establishment in August 1937 of a royal commission, first under the chairmanship of the Honourable Justice N. W. Rowell of Toronto, later under that of Doctor Joseph Sirois of Quebec, to inquire into the constitutional allocation of revenue sources and governmental burdens in Canada and—

> . . . to express what in their opinion, subject to the retention of the distribution of legislative powers essential to the proper carrying out of the federal system in harmony with national needs and the promotion of national unity, will best effect a balanced relationship between the financial powers and the obligations and functions of each governing body and conduce to a more efficient, independent and economical discharge of governmental responsibilities in Canada.

If I may say so, that statement, extracted from order in council P.C. 1908 of August 14, 1937, of the high objective of a healthy and vigorous federal system of government, has remained throughout the long years and the changing circumstances since that time the fundamental objective of the government of Canada.

After the most thorough-going and comprehensive inquiry into the problems of federal government ever undertaken in the history of any state, the commission submitted its report on May 3, 1940, nearly three years later and after the outbreak of war. Stated very briefly, its chief recommendations were: (1) exclusive dominion jurisdiction in the fields of income and corporation taxes and succession duties; (2) acceptance by the dominion of responsibility for relief to the employable unemployed; (3) assumption by the dominion of net provincial debt charges; and (4) payment by the dominion of national adjustment grants designed to put each provincial government in a position to provide average standards of services without imposing higher than average rates of taxation.

A dominion-provincial conference was called in January 1941, to consider the royal commission's report but after sitting two or three days the conference broke down in the face of opposition from the premiers of three provinces.

It soon became apparent, however, that Canada's chaotic tax structure would not permit the financing on either an efficient or an equitable basis of a war effort of the magnitude which the necessities of the second world war were to make imperative. Consequently, in the budget of April 29, 1941, the then minister of finance made an offer to the effect that if the provincial governments (and their municipalities) were prepared to suspend imposition of income and corporation taxes until the end of the war and one year thereafter the dominion government would make annual payments to the provinces equal to either the 1940 revenues of the particular province from these sources or the amount of that province's net debt service less succession duty collections in 1940. The offer also included some relatively small "fiscal need" subsidies proposed in those cases where budgets could not otherwise be balanced, and an offer to guarantee provincial gasoline tax revenues at the 1940 level. Agreements were negotiated with all the provincial governments in 1941 and the necessary legislation was passed in the spring of 1942. I think it not unfair to say that it is impossible to exaggerate the contribution which this co-operative arrangement made to the efficient and equitable financing of the war, to the maintenance of Canada's financial stability during the war, and consequently to Canada's ability to meet the financial and economic problems of postwar reconstruction.

It was our experience with these war-time tax agreements and the knowledge that after their termination a number of the pre-war financial and constitutional problems would probably arise in an exaggerated form that led the dominion government to take the initiative in preparing the way for postwar agreements with the provinces. After a great deal of consideration over a period of many months, there had been worked out a comprehensive set of proposals which were broader in scope than the Sirois report recommendations but were framed in an earnest effort to avoid, if at all possible, the major objections that had caused the rejection of those recommendations. The agreement was to be for a temporary period and therefore its terms would be subject to review prior to any renewal. In particular it would require no constitutional changes, although there was one recommendation for a constitutional amendment to provide for delegation of powers from the dominion government to a provincial government or vice versa, whenever desired by both governments. Other less important features were designed to avoid possible objections.

The purpose of the dominion in preparing these proposals was to endeavour to work out with the provinces a coordinated programme by which the dominion and provincial governments could most effectively work together to maintain high and expanding levels of employment and national income such as had been attained in war time, to provide a wide measure of economic and social security, and finally to give the Canadian people a less burdensome, more efficient tax system, which indeed was a prerequisite for attaining the other objectives. In the field of public welfare, the proposals included constructive measures for a programme of health insurance and health grants, a comprehensive scheme of pensions for the aged and the blind and the provision of unemployment assistance, with the whole or a substantial share of the cost being borne by the dominion. In the field of public investment the dominion outlined a substantial expansion in its programme for natural resource development, conservation and public works, and also a large increase in dominion assistance to provincial services and construction projects either through joint participation or by grants in aid. Particular emphasis was placed upon, and tangible encouragement offered to, the advance planning of public projects, and in so far as practicable, the timing of public investment expenditures with a view to helping stabilize employment and offset fluctuations in the business cycle.

To avoid duplication and conflict in the tax field and to enable the dominion to develop an equitable and efficient tax system, the proposals included a provision that the provincial governments should rent to the dominion for the term of the agreement their rights in the fields of income and corporation taxes and succession duties. As compensation or rental therefor, the dominion would make annual payments to the provinces on the basis of $12 per capita of provincial population, with an adjustment for increases in gross national product per capita over the base year 1941. These payments would include the ordinary statutory subsidies. This formula would guarantee the provinces a minimum annual payment of $138 million and for a year in which the national income had risen to $950 per capita, as is now roughly estimated for 1947, the formula would call for a total payment of about $195 million. The dominion felt at the time that payments of this magnitude, coupled with the various other proposals in the field of public investment and social security, would enable all provincial governments to carry out their constitutional responsibilities with assurance and adequacy; under prosperous conditions they would be expected to have surpluses, perhaps even substantial surpluses, but at the same time they would be protected against any major deterioration in revenues when business fell below normal. If I may quote from the so-called Green Book proposals (page 51):

> To sum up, it is the belief of the dominion government that the proposed financial arrangements in conjunction with the other measures recommended would strengthen the federal system under which all ten governments here represented function. They would give to each government an assured basis of financial responsibility and freedom of decision in the matters entrusted to it by the constitution.

The proposals of the dominion were presented to the provinces in a dominion-provincial conference held in Ottawa during the week beginning August 6, 1945—incidentally, the week which saw the surrender of Japan and the end of world war II.

At this conference, the provincial governments accepted the dominion's proposals as a basis for discussion. It was suggested, however, that better progress could be made if an opportunity were given to all governments for studying the proposals and if the procedure was such as to avoid projecting controversial issues into public discussion. It was therefore decided to establish a coordinating committee, composed of the heads of the various governments, to consider further procedure and to examine in detail the proposals made by the dominion as well as those that might be made by any other government.

This coordinating committee met in November, 1945, in camera and there was a full and frank discussion of the important issues involved. At this meeting it was decided to establish an economic committee composed of technical representatives of the dominion and nine provincial governments to examine in detail all the dominion's proposals against the background of the economic prospects that might be expected during the period of the agreement. This committee carried on its work during the months of December, 1945, and January, 1946, giving detailed consideration not only to the dominion's financial, social security and public investment proposals but also to proposals made by certain of the provinces, particularly those of the province of Ontario.

In January, 1946, the coordinating committee was reconvened to discuss the dominion's proposals and any alternatives advanced by provincial governments in the light of the findings of the economic committee. This conference, which lasted for several days, was also held in camera but there was later public disclosure of the fact that the dominion had made substantial concessions to the provinces, in particular the proposal to increase the guaranteed minimum payment from $12 to $15 per capita with adjustments from the 1942 base for increases in provincial population and in gross national product per capita. Two additional options were provided. In the first place, no province was to receive less than $2 million, an option designed to fit the special case of Prince Edward Island, and in the second place, any province had the right to accept as its minimum 150 per cent of the amount which it had been receiving from the dominion under its war-time tax agreement, an option which had special appeal for British Columbia. The effect of these proposals was to increase the total of the guaranteed minimum payments to the provinces from $138 million to $180·4 million, an increase of over thirty per cent. The dominion also gave an undertaking in this conference that it would not enter certain fields of taxation which the provinces were currently cultivating, would not increase certain of its own excise taxes, and would undertake to seek a new constitutional amendment that would allow the provinces to impose a limited retail sales tax. Certain modifications were also proposed in the public welfare measures, which entailed additional commitments by the dominion.

Like its two predecessors, the January conference adjourned without reaching a decision but it was decided to hold a further meeting at the end of April, 1946. During a two-day session in camera, the dominion answered certain questions that had been asked by provincial premiers, and made an important modification of its earlier proposals, the effect of which was to allow any province to remain in the succession duty field if it so wished, in which case an appropriate adjustment would be made in the annual payment due to it. It was then decided to move the conference into plenary session and public meetings were held daily from April 29 to May 3. In these open sessions the dominion proposals as revised from time to time in the preceding conferences were presented and discussed. An alternative proposal was presented by the premier of Ontario which was found unacceptable to this government because of the large additional cost which we estimated it would involve to the dominion treasury. In its revised proposals the dominion felt that it had made as comprehensive an offer and had undertaken to assume as great a financial burden as it then believed it possible to justify to the people of Canada. The negotiations had already extended over nine months and during that period of time the dominion had repeatedly revised its proposals in the endeavour to meet the several requests made by the provinces. The dominion was still willing to accept suggestions for modification of its proposals provided that they did not further increase the burden upon the taxpayers of Canada. In particular and because of the strongly expressed desire of several provinces to have fields of taxation solely for their own use, the then minister of finance expressed the dominion's willingness to rent for a temporary period our rights to use certain fields of excise tax (gasoline taxes, amusement taxes, taxes on pari-mutuel bets) in the same way as we were asking the provinces to rent to us temporarily their rights in certain fields of direct taxation. However, there was no agreement reached among the provinces with respect to an appropriate rental consideration. On May 3 the conference adjourned sine die without any agreement having been reached.

Failure of these protracted efforts to achieve general agreement on its comprehensive proposals posed a difficult problem for the dominion, as well of course as for at least several of the provincial governments. The dominion budget had to be brought down within a matter of weeks. The war-time tax agreements were to lapse in the case of three provinces in the late fall and in the case of all other provinces in the spring of 1947. Under these wartime agreements, the dominion was committed to making certain reductions, in its income and corporation taxes as from January 1, 1947, but it could not simply carry out its commitments and remain indifferent to the financial problems which at least the less favoured provinces were bound to face. For several of these provinces the pre-war situation had been intolerable but meanwhile provincial expenditures had expanded greatly and while revenues had also increased to some extent, it was obvious that without new agreements several provinces were going to be faced with a difficult budget problem. Financial pressure on these provinces, it was clear, would give rise to increasingly arbitrary and discriminatory taxation tending to hamper production, would lead to interference with interprovincial trade, and would tend to promote the extension of government operation of business merely in order to obtain additional provincial revenues, which of course would mean loss of revenues to the dominion. An inefficient and chaotic tax structure might seriously impair the capacity of private enterprise to provide high and expanding employment. Budget difficulties and financial pressures would tend to weaken the financial autonomy of the provinces and impair the strength of the federal system. Some provinces might indeed find it difficult to maintain their solvency.

After very careful consideration the government reached the conclusion that it would be shirking its responsibility to the people of Canada if it allowed such a situation to develop without a further attempt to prevent it. It sought therefore to devise some modified proposal which could be accepted by those provinces which wished to accept it and be left aside by those which did not desire it or felt they had no need for it. It was this type of proposal which the then minister of finance outlined in his budget speech of June 27, 1946. Without the prospect of unanimous agreement, it was necessary to limit the proposal to the financial provisions relating to the rental of tax fields. No changes were suggested in the formula for calculating the annual payments to the provinces but the proposal as a whole was so designed that any province that did not accept its terms could impose its own taxes without placing its taxpayers in an unfair position relative to the taxpayers in other provinces. The agreeing provinces, for example, were to impose a 5 per cent tax on the income of their corporations, so that a corporation in a non-agreeing province which imposed a tax no higher than that rate would be in the same position as a corporation in an agreeing province. The dominion also offered to allow a taxpayer a credit against his personal income tax up to five per cent for personal income taxes paid to a province; this would allow a non-agreeing province to impose a tax of this weight without subjecting its citizens to double taxation. Finally, the dominion proposed that its succession duty rates should be doubled and a credit given up to one-half thereof for duties paid to a provincial government, as a means of allowing any government, including that of an agreeing province, to continue to impose succession duties if it so wished.

As I have stated, the formula for calculating the annual payments to the provinces was the same as that outlined to the dominion-provincial conference by the Prime Minister on April 29, 1946. However, in the course of the negotiations with individual provinces during the months following the delivery of the budget, the government became convinced that these financial terms, standing alone and extracted from the broader context of the original proposals which provided assistance in other forms to the provincial governments, might prove inadequate in certain cases to protect a province against the rising costs of government that might be anticipated in the years ahead. This was particularly true of the special formulae, applicable to the provinces of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, as the flat payment of $2 million in the one case, and the payment based on 150 per cent of the war-time tax agreement receipts in the other case, were not subject to adjustment for increases in population and gross national product. To correct this situation, the dominion first undertook that these minimum payments to Prince Edward Island and British Columbia would be subject to adjustment for increases in population and gross national product. Later, when it was urged by the other provinces that the basis of their compensation should also be reviewed, a modification of the original formula was worked out, and made applicable to all provinces, in January 1947, under which it is believed the maximum practicable degree of "equalization" of the terms of payment to the various provinces has been achieved.

Under the new formula every province will have a guaranteed minimum annual payment which will be subject to adjustment upward for increases in provincial population and in gross national product per capita, in just the same way as for all other provinces. For the province of Prince Edward Island, the guaranteed minimum will be the flat sum of $2,100,000. All other provinces will have the choice of either one of two formulae for determining their guaranteed minimum annual payment.

As the house will recall, the first option involves the addition of the three following elements:

1. $12.75 per capita based on the 1942 population of the province;

2. Fifty per cent of the revenue of the province from income and corporation taxes for the year ending nearest to December 31, 1940, as agreed for purposes of the wartime tax agreement; and

3. the amount of the statutory subsidies payable to the province in 1947.

This option is the one which proves to be most favourable in the case of New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia. It will be noted that it has the great merit of including in the guaranteed minimum payments the amounts of the statutory subsidies payable to the various provinces, which have been the product of eighty years of historical development and negotiation. For the rest this particular option is based on a reasonable compromise between the principle of basing the annual grants on equal per capita payments and the principle of adjusting the grants to the varying capacity of the provinces to raise revenues from the tax sources which they are renting to the dominion. The greatest weight is placed on the principle of equality but at the same time reasonable weight is given to the principle of tax ability or tax potential, which is of advantage to the more favoured provinces, and reasonable weight also to the principle of need, which is reflected in the statutory subsidies and which is of course of greatest advantage to the less favoured provinces.

The second option gives the province the right to receive a guaranteed minimum annual payment equal to the sum of its statutory subsidies payable in 1947 and an amount equal to $15 per capita based on the 1942 population of the province. This is the option which proves most favourable to the provinces of Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan. In the case of Nova Scotia the province had not been cultivating the fields of income and corporation taxes as intensively as other provinces in the base year of the war-time tax agreement and in the case of Saskatchewan prevailing economic conditions in that province had led to a relatively low yield from these tax fields in 1940. It could have been contended, therefore, that the first option would not be fair to either of these two provinces, and consequently the second option was worked out to meet their special situations.

With the consent of the house I shall now place on Hansard a table showing the calculation of the guaranteed minimum annual payment for each province, as well as a table showing how the adjusted annual payments for 1947 are calculated and how they work out for each province on the basis of the latest data now available.

(Tables appear on following pages)

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the minister extra copies of these tables?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not. They are long, complicated tables and that is why I am placing them on Hansard. They show in detail how the calculations were arrived at. I thought that was information which hon. members would like to have. I am afraid I have not additional copies with me at the moment.

The first of these tables shows that if all provinces should enter into agreements, the aggregate of the guaranteed minimum annual payments (including statutory subsidies) would be $206,463,248, made up as follows:

Prince Edward Island	$ 2,100,000
Nova Scotia	10,870,140
New Brunswick	8,773,420
Quebec	56,382,127
Ontario	67,158,027
Manitoba	13,540,038
Saskatchewan	15,291,490
Alberta	14,227,882
British Columbia	18,120,124
	$206,463,248

As already indicated, the amounts payable to the various provinces will never fall below the amount of the above-mentioned minima. However, the actual payment to any province in any one year will be the higher of two amounts, that is to say, either the amount of its guaranteed minimum or alternatively the amount of that minimum adjusted upwards for changes in gross national product per capita and in provincial population. This adjustment is based on the average of the amounts for each of the three calendar years immediately preceding the fiscal year in respect of which payment is made. Calculation on the basis of this three-year average, it will be noted, will serve to reduce the fluctuations from year to year in the revenue receipts of the provinces.

The second table which I have placed on Hansard, showing the relevant factors in the calculation of the adjusted annual payments for each province and just how the calculations are made, indicates that on the basis of the data at present available and if all provinces should accept the agreement, the aggregate of the adjusted annual payments (including statutory subsidies) in respect of 1947 would be $228,745,144 made up as follows:

Prince Edward Island	$ 2,304,246
Nova Scotia	12,103,824
New Brunswick	9,504,009
Quebec	63,388,520
Ontario	74,438,221
Manitoba	14,454,807
Saskatchewan	15,844,217
Alberta	15,305,376
British Columbia	21,401,924
	$228,745,144

The amount payable by Canada to any province in respect of any fiscal year is to be estimated forthwith after September 14 in the said year on the basis of certificates from the dominion statistician in regard to the gross national production ratios and the provincial ratios that are pertinent to the calculation. The excess of this amount over the ordinary statutory subsidies less certain deductions which I shall later describe, is to be paid to the province in four equal quarterly instalments on September 30, December 31, March 31 and June 30, respectively. Appropriate provision is made for adjustments in respect of recalculations made after September 15, in the following fiscal year on the basis of revised estimates of population and gross national product. A final adjustment is also to be made at the termination of the agreement in 1952. At that time the population figures obtained by the census for the year 1951 will be available and it will thus be possible to correct earlier estimates of population made by the dominion statistician on the basis of a straight line projection between the base year 1942, or, in the case of the prairie provinces, the census year 1946, on the one hand, and the census year 1951 on the other hand. If changes or improvements in the method of calculating the gross national product have been made by the dominion statistician during the course of the agreement which result in a series of amounts for the gross national product different from those produced by the method used at the beginning of the agreement, the province will be given the benefit in the final calculation at the end of the agreement of whichever method results in the greater total of payments for the period of the agreement.

I referred a few minutes ago to certain deductions which are required to be made from the amounts otherwise payable to the provinces.

The first of these types of deduction arises from the rather complicated provisions which have had to be evolved in order to avoid substantial unfairness as between the corporate taxpayers of agreeing and non-agreeing provinces respectively. If a province chooses to remain out of the agreement, it will presumably have to levy taxes on its own corporations in order to secure adequate revenues, and there would therefore be unfairness if the government of an agreeing province were to receive full payment from the dominion for the rental of its corporate tax rights while at the same time its corporations were not subject to provincial tax. Consequently, even though an essential part of the new agreements involves the dominion renting full provincial rights in the corporate tax field, nevertheless the agreements contain clauses allowing adhering provinces to impose a standard of five per cent tax on corporate income earned within the province, to be collected by the dominion without cost to the province, and providing that the amounts otherwise payable to a province shall be reduced by either the amount of the provincial corporation tax actually collected or one-sixth of the dominion corporate tax relevant to corporate incomes earned within the particular province, whichever is the greater. It will be noted that no province is required to levy this tax but if a province chooses not to levy it, the payments it will receive from the dominion are correspondingly reduced. Incidentally, the agreement includes carefully worked out provisions for allocating as between the various provinces the income of a corporation which is operating in more than one province; it is believed that if these rules for allocating income were adopted by all provinces, there would be eliminated the tendency which prevailed at times in the past for various provincial governments to impose tax, in the aggregate, on more than the total income of a corporation carrying on business in several provinces. The agreements also contain a provision to the effect that if Canada so requests, all the agreeing provinces will take such steps as are necessary to repeal or suspend their legislation imposing the standard five per cent tax on corporate income.

The second type of deduction from the annual amounts otherwise payable to an agreeing province, relates to deductions which may be made if a province which has agreed to rent its corporation taxes to the dominion proceeds to take over the whole or any part of the business or undertaking or assets of a corporation and thus serves to reduce the tax revenues which the dominion would otherwise obtain. This section of the agreement has been worked out with great care but I need not go into all its complications.

I should at this point call special attention to a provision of the bill which is of an entirely different character. Stated briefly, this provision authorizes the dominion to pay to a provincial government one-half of its net collections of tax on the income of certain specified public utility corporations resulting from the distribution to the public or the generation for distribution to the public, of electricity, gas or steam in the province concerned. From these payments is to be deducted the amount of certain royalties or rentals and taxes and fees paid by the corporations concerned to the government of the said province or its municipalities. This refund of part of the dominion's collections of taxes from specified public utility corporations will apply not only to governments which have entered into agreements with the dominion but also to the governments of non-adhering provinces as well. The only difference between an adhering and a non-adhering province in this respect will be that in the former case the dominion will be bound to make these refunds for the five-year term of the agreement. In the other case, it will have the power to do so but will not be bound.

There is another provision of the bill to which I should call attention. In addition to making provision for the guaranteed minimum annual payments and the adjusted annual payments for all agreeing provinces for the five fiscal years beginning April 1, 1947, there is a provision in the bill which authorizes special payments to be made to the maritime provinces to fill in the so-called gap in their case between the beginning of the new agreements, April 1, 1947, and the end of the old wartime tax agreements—October 31, 1946, in the case of New Brunswick, November 30, 1946, in the case of Nova Scotia, and December 31, 1946, in the case of Prince Edward Island. These payments are the appropriate fraction in each case of the guaranteed minimum annual payments to each province less the proportionate amount of the statutory subsidies payable in respect of the periods in question and less deductions in respect of provincial succession duties collected by the province or allowed by the dominion as credits in respect of deaths during these periods. Before the deduction relating to succession duties, the amount is $2,975,430 for New Brunswick, $360,768 for Prince Edward Island and $2,955,000 for Nova Scotia. These payments are to be charged as an expenditure to the fiscal year 1946-47.

There is only one other provision of the bill or the agreement to which I feel I should call attention at this time and that is the option provided to adhering provinces in the case of succession duties. Any province may come into the agreement and still retain its own succession duty levies if it wishes to do so. The dominion believes that there are important reasons to justify the elimination of double taxation in this field but at the same time it recognizes that certain provincial governments place special emphasis on the desirability of continuing to levy their own succession duties. In the desire to remove any obstacle that might otherwise prove an insuperable barrier to unanimous agreement, the dominion has made it possible for any province which so desires to rent to the dominion only its rights in the field of income and corporation taxes and to retain its own succession duty levies. In such a case, taxpayers in the said province will receive a credit against the dominion succession duty of the amount of the duty paid to the province up to one-half of the dominion levy and the annual payments otherwise payable to the province by the dominion will be reduced by the aggregate of such tax credits.

Before I conclude, I wish to deal briefly with a few general aspects of these agreements.

My first point has to do with the basis of determining the amount of rental we are to pay for the tax fields in question. Our contention is that our formulae represent the most equitable and most realistic basis so far devised for determining the rentals to be paid to the various provinces. I have been asked why we have not based them solely on the principle of equal per capita grants. The simple answer to that question is that it would be inequitable. Equal per capita grants may sound like equality but, if so, the equality is of a very specious type. It is certainly not equity.

For one thing, you cannot consider separately each type of assistance given by the dominion in the various provinces. If you put these on a per capita basis and look at each one alone, you get the most amazing results. Take the statutory subsidies, for instance. Based on 1946 population estimates, they run all the way from about 80 cents per capita in the two central provinces to $1 in British Columbia, $2.36 in Manitoba, $2.45 in Saskatchewan, $2.51 in Alberta, $3.28 in Nova Scotia, $3.40 in New Brunswick, and $6.99 in Prince Edward Island. Yet in spite of these wide variations, no one would regard the subsidies as unfair—on the contrary, the variations represent the historical result of a series of attempts to achieve equitable treatment under very diverse conditions. Then, as another instance, take the family allowance payments. Here it is British Columbia which turns out to have the lowest per capita payment ($16.11 for the twelve months ended May 31, 1947), while Quebec has one of the highest per capita payments ($23.04), against an average of $20.26 for the country as a whole. No one could regard these variations as unfair, nor the similar variations in the dominion's per capita contributions to pensions for aged and blind persons. However, if we take all these payments by the dominion, including the annual rental payments to be made for the rented taxes under our latest offer, we will find that the aggregate per capita payments to the various provinces are very much closer to equality. On this basis the average for Canada as a whole is $42.54, with $41.29 for British Columbia, and $43.83 for Quebec.

But even this greater approach to equality on a per capita basis should not be overstressed because—and this is my second point—equality per unit or per head does not represent equity, if the units or the heads differ in character or importance. The fact is that the units do differ—and differ widely—because of the varying composition of the population in the various provinces. In other words, the percentage of children in the population, the size of families, the relative numbers of adult income earners and of taxpayers—all these factors and others vary from province to province. It should be obvious that this type of variation makes it quite impossible to satisfy the test of equity by making annual payments to the provinces on the basis of an equal amount per head of population.

There are some who realize that equal per capita payments would be unfair but ask why our annual payments should not be based on the principle of fiscal need. It should be clear from the figures I gave some time ago that our basis for determining the annual payments does recognize this principle of fiscal need to a very substantial extent. The reason that certain provinces may be in a position of fiscal need (assuming that it has not been due to reckless spending in the past) is that the head offices of large corporations as well as the wealthy individuals and large estates are concentrated to a very substantial extent in two or three provinces, and consequently it is impossible for the other provinces to derive from income and corporation taxes and succession duties adequate revenues to meet their constitutional responsibilities. Now the proposals which we are making are designed to correct this difficulty. What they accomplish is to make sure that a maritime province or a prairie province is able, by renting its rights in the three great fields of direct progressive taxation to the dominion, to derive approximately as much revenue per capita from these major sources of revenue as any other province.

I contend therefore that the proposals meet substantially the test of fiscal need but they do it in a way which is not open to the objections to which ordinary fiscal need grants are subject. If we adopted in toto the principle of grants on the basis of fiscal need, I suggest to hon. members that we would be faced with this dilemma: Either the government of Canada would be forced to raise money from the taxpayers of Canada as a whole and hand it over to provincial governments to meet their deficits, no matter how reckless their expenditure policy might be, or, conversely, the dominion would be forced to supervise the budgetary policies, including both the spending and the tax levying policies, of provincial governments. This government does not believe the first policy would commend itself to Canadian taxpayers and it will resist to the utmost any proposal which would require it to supervise the budgets of provincial governments.

We are forced to the conclusion, therefore, that there is no single principle which can be applied exclusively in determining the magnitude of these annual rental payments. Our formulae are based on the several principles which seem to be pertinent. They may seem complicated but, we believe, the complications are necessary if we are to meet fairly and equitably the varying needs and conditions of all the provinces.

My second point relates to a problem which led to a good deal of discussion during the negotiations, namely, the treatment of certain minor fields of taxation. It was understandable that the provinces generally would desire to have, if possible, certain tax fields specifically reserved for their own use. The levies which they most frequently requested should be left to them exclusively were succession duties and taxes on gasoline, amusements, pari-mutuel bets and electricity.

In appraising this request, it is desirable to call attention to four or five relevant considerations.

First, to grant the request would not be in accord with the constitution, for the British North America Act quite clearly provides that the dominion government has full authority to impose taxation by any mode or method whatsoever, whereas the provincial governments are limited to direct taxation.

In the second place it is always desirable to remember that in the case of war or emergency it is the central government upon which responsibility must fall. It was probably for this reason that the fathers of confederation felt that the dominion's taxing powers should be unrestricted and their wise foresight has now been amply confirmed by Canada's experience in two world wars.

Thirdly, it had to be remembered that any sacrifice of these minor taxes by the dominion would almost certainly under prevailing conditions of revenue and expenditure and with the national debt at so high a figure have to be made up by increases in income tax, a tax already at such high rates and so steeply graduated, that in the minds of most people it constituted or was likely to constitute a serious impediment to increased employment, production and national income.

In the fourth place, some of the taxes over which the provinces sought exclusive jurisdiction would bring important advantages, if collected solely by the dominion. I refer particularly to succession duties. I shall not repeat here the various arguments advanced by the Sirois commission and others for transferring or renting this tax field to the dominion but I believe most people would agree that the pre-war system under which nine separate jurisdictions impose succession duties, resulting in double and sometimes triple taxation of the same estate, producing great variations in burden as between one province and another and tending to encourage transfer of estates from one province to another solely for tax reasons, was burdensome, inequitable and harmful to the free flow of capital and natural economic development. Perhaps an even more compelling reason from the dominion's point of view is the very important part which dominion succession duties play in contributing to an efficient enforcement of the income tax. The former deputy minister of national revenue (taxation) has stated that we get more revenue from them indirectly than we do directly. However, in spite of the powerful arguments for unified collection by the dominion of succession duties we recognized, as I have already said the apparent strength of the desire of one or two provinces to remain in this field and we modified our offer in such a way that any province which wished to do so could continue levying its own succession duties. I am happy to be able to report that all of the seven provinces which have signified their intention of entering into agreements with us apparently expect to repeal their succession duties for the term of the agreement.

Finally, neither the government of Canada, nor anyone else, so far as I am aware has ever been able to discover any way in which the total tax field could be divided between the dominion and provincial governments in such a way as to make it possible for the dominion government on the one hand and all provincial governments on the other hand to obtain from the sector of the field allotted to each the revenues required to carry out their constitutional responsibilities. It would of course be possible to assign such a portion of the tax field exclusively to provincial governments as to enable some provincial governments to meet their requirements but most methods of allocation would leave other provinces in a weak or impossible position financially. This of course arises from the highly different potential yields of different taxes in various provinces, and is one of the major factors making it so difficult to get all provinces to agree on any single course of action in the fiscal field. To approach the objective of meeting the requirements of the less favoured provinces as well as of those most favoured would mean assigning to provincial governments so large a portion of the total field as to make it completely impossible for the dominion to meet its responsibilities.

In spite of all these considerations, the dominion has gone very far in its endeavour to meet the wishes of provincial governments in this connection. In the revised offer outlined by the right hon. the Prime Minister to the dominion-provincial conference in April-May, 1946, the dominion made several commitments in regard to its future tax policy. It undertook for the duration of the agreement not to enter the fields of real estate tax and automobile licenses now exclusively occupied by the provinces. It agreed to allow the provinces to tax mining and logging operations either by royalties or by taxes on the net profit of these operations, and to recognize such levies as an expense for purposes of dominion tax. It undertook for the duration of the agreement not to increase its special excise taxes on gasoline, amusements or pari-mutuel betting, subject of course to the condition that in the event of a national emergency it would be free to take whatever steps might be necessary to meet the emergency. It undertook to pay to the provinces one half of its own net collections of tax on the income of certain specified public utility companies derived from the distribution to the public, or the generating for distribution to the public, of electrical energy, gas or steam. It undertook to seek a constitutional amendment permitting delegation of powers from the dominion parliament to provincial legislatures or vice versa, and it stated that once such an amendment was made the dominion government would request parliament to broaden considerably the field of provincial taxation by delegating to the provinces, for the duration of the agreement, the right to levy retail sales taxes within limits to be specifically defined. Finally, it stated that, while in view of the enormous financial burdens and responsibilities falling upon the central government, it could not in justice to the taxpayers of Canada increase the magnitude of the burdens which as a result of the new proposals it was undertaking to bear, nevertheless it would be willing to consider renting to the provinces for an appropriate financial equivalent agreed upon by the provinces the field of gasoline tax and some of the other minor tax fields. This meant that the dominion was offering to rent to the provinces its own rights in certain specified fields of taxation for an agreed consideration, just as it was offering to rent from the provinces their rights in certain other fields of taxation for a consideration which all will agree is highly advantageous to the provinces.

Several of the provinces expressed themselves as willing to accept this offer but they were unable to agree on an appropriate rental for the reason mentioned above, what one province would accept as a fair rental was believed to be highly unfair or inappropriate by another province. Nevertheless the dominion continued to give careful study to this whole problem. Late last fall, the prospect of substantial improvement in dominion revenues made it possible to sacrifice $40,000,000 of expected revenue by dropping as from April 1 this year, its three cent a gallon tax on gasoline. Not only was this tax the most important of the minor taxes which had been the subject of controversy but in dropping it the dominion recognized the force of arguments made on several occasions that it was a particularly suitable source of provincial revenue and related closely to the maintenance of provincial highways.

This action by the dominion left only two disputed taxes of any significance, the tax on electricity and that on amusements, including pari-mutuel betting.

With regard to the former, hon. members are aware that there is no electricity tax as such and that what is referred to is merely our ordinary sales tax applied to electricity purchased for domestic use, the previous exemption of this item having been cancelled early in the war. The sales tax is a long-standing and important feature of the dominion's revenue system. Moreover the sales tax on electricity is an indirect tax which could not be levied in any case by provincial governments which are restricted by the constitution to direct taxation. On the other hand it is true to say that the dominion recognizes the importance which the provinces attach to the taxation of electricity because of their interest in rural electrification and their desire to supply electric light and energy to rural dwellers at the lowest possible cost and for this reason a tax on electricity sales is one which the dominion would prefer to avoid if it could afford to do so.

The tax on amusements and pari-mutuel betting is a high-yielding tax, accounting for about $17,000,000 of our revenue at the present time, and is also one which is generally regarded as a desirable tax under present circumstances. Certainly I think hon. members will agree that it would be impossible to raise a corresponding amount of revenue either from income tax or any other field of taxation without producing more harmful economic and social effects. It is also true that this is a tax, the yield of which varies greatly as between the different provinces. If the dominion were to step out of the field, some provinces would not increase their rates of amusement taxation at all, and some might raise their rates but receive very little additional revenue, whilst others might obtain fairly substantial benefits from an increase in rates. On the other hand, I am free to admit that some provinces feel that taxes on amusements and pari-mutuel betting go hand in hand with licensing and regulating functions which provincial governments necessarily perform.

From the correspondence with provincial premiers which has been tabled, the house will be aware that we had been giving the most careful consideration to these remaining minor fields of taxation over a period of many months. They were part of a whole series of special taxes which we had been forced to impose during the war emergency and which included a number which we did not regard as likely to continue indefinitely. No government wishes to keep taxes on a moment longer than they are needed and the areas where reduction or removal can be effected soundly and equitably are under constant study. As the end of the war receded into the past, we were succeeding more and more in effecting large reductions in our expenditures, and at the same time as a result of the speed and smoothness with which reconversion was being accomplished our revenues were showing a buoyancy to which no one could have looked forward with assurance. It was against this economic and financial background and in the desire to do as much as the dominion government could responsibly do to assure the agreement of all provinces that on April 21 last I wrote to the premier of Nova Scotia outlining the dominion's position in regard to the remaining minor taxes. In regard to the electricity tax I referred in the terms I used a few minutes ago to the dominion's recognition of the interest which provincial governments attach to this tax and concluded with this sentence:

> At the moment I cannot go beyond assuring you that the representations of the government of Nova Scotia and those of other provincial governments, respecting the present sales tax on electricity, will be fully considered.

In regard to the amusements tax, I made the following statement:

> The dominion recognizes the desire of the provinces to have taxation fields of their own. We are prepared, therefore, to say that in view of the nature of the amusement and pari-mutuel fields, and of the special interest of the provinces in respect thereto, it will be our policy to vacate these fields as soon as circumstances permit.

In a later letter to Premier Macdonald I made it quite clear that in the sentence just quoted I was stating that it would be our policy to vacate the amusement and pari-mutuel fields without compensation as soon as circumstances permit, although this of course did not imply recognition by the dominion of the desirability of any change in the constitutional position respecting taxation.

I have dealt at this length with the question of minor taxes because I wished to remove any cause for misunderstanding or misrepresentation of the dominion position. In addition I trust that this exposition has made it clear that there cannot be found in this question of minor taxes any sufficient basis for failure of any province to enter into an agreement with the dominion.

My third point relates to the magnitude of the annual payments to the provinces. There are some who point out that they are larger than those contained in our original offer to the provinces of August, 1945, larger even than those contained in the budget offer of June 27, 1946, and criticize us for making several improvements in our proposals during the course of the protracted negotiations. We certainly did try to go as far as we could to meet the objections and secure the agreement of all provinces. We admit that the annual payments to be made to provinces under our present offer are substantially higher than those recommended by the Rowell-Sirois royal commission, than those made under the war-time tax agreements, and than those we originally offered. If we can be criticized at all, I think it would be on the ground of the generosity of our proposals. On the other hand, we believe we can justify these agreements, if they result in placing the governments of all provinces in a position to carry out their constitutional functions efficiently and independently, if they safeguard against a scramble amongst ten competing governments for revenues in the field of direct taxation, and if they allow the dominion to develop a sound and efficient tax system calculated to increase employment, production and national income rather than one which acts as a drag upon production.

I believe that those provinces which enter into the agreement will find themselves in an enviable financial position as compared with anything which they have experienced in the past. They will receive revenues from income and corporation taxes and succession duties very much larger than ever before. The guaranteed minimum payment of $206 million and the estimated adjusted payment for 1947 of over $228 million to which I have already referred compare with a peak yield obtained from the rented tax fields by provincial governments of some $117 million. What is more important in enabling provincial governments to plan programmes of service and expenditure over a period of years is the assurance that for the next five years they will have at least the very high guaranteed revenue from these tax sources, regardless of fluctuations in the national income, regardless of whether the next few years are to bring a business recession, a crop failure or a substantial decline in commodity prices. If, on the other hand, the national income increases and their own population continues to grow, they know also that they are assured of proportionately increased revenues from these tax sources.

Finally, as I said in my budget speech, instead of the provinces which accept the agreement—

> —weakening their autonomy or sacrificing any of their constitutional rights, they have merely found a method of utilizing one of these rights, a method of renting instead of cultivating a tax field, whereby they can assure this revenue at generous levels guaranteed against the risks of economic adversity and participating also in the profits of growth and prosperity. With this assurance of stable and rising revenues, they are for the first time in a position to plan with courage and confidence and a sense of real independence, programmes for the efficient discharge of their constitutional responsibility.

If I may state this in a different way, we are convinced that acceptance of the proposals will increase rather than diminish the power and prestige of provincial governments because it will enable them to carry out far more effectively and independently the responsibilities which have been assigned to them under our constitution. Nevertheless, it is quite open to any provincial government to hold a contrary view. There is no obligation on any government to enter into the agreement unless it is convinced that such action would be its own best interest. We trust and believe that when the proposals are fully understood, they will commend themselves to all provincial governments. Such general agreement is necessary in order to make possible the achievement of the great national purposes which inspired the comprehensive proposals of August, 1945. The details of our original proposals may of course change as a result of further study or of developing public opinion or of discussion with provincial governments at a general conference which will be necessary before they can be implemented. The proposed contributions which the dominion may be able to make in the field of public investment and social security may, as I have said publicly and as I advised the provinces which were negotiating with us last winter, have to be revised to take into account the substantial increase in the financial payments which the dominion has now undertaken to make as rental for the tax fields in question. But the main objectives expressed in those proposals remain the guiding objectives of this government. We are hoping that agreement of all provinces may be secured in order that the people of this country may be able to secure the benefits of an efficient and equitable tax system, and in order that all governments may be able to follow policies which promote high employment and high national income, and safeguard against the recurrence of the "boom or depression" experience of the pre-war period.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us this evening is one which has to do with the financial relationships between the provinces and the dominion. This is a country which has a federal system of government, one in which we find a division of government responsibility. We have the central government—in this case the dominion government—and we have the provincial governments. Each of these governments has certain responsibilities and certain taxing powers.

In Canada the responsibilities are divided between the dominion and provincial jurisdictions. In some cases these responsibilities are not clearly defined. In this country the taxing power is limited in the case of the provinces, and unlimited in the case of the dominion. In other words, there is no taxation field in which the dominion cannot operate. But the provinces are limited to direct taxes.

The bill before us tonight is one to authorize the government of Canada to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces, agreements in which, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes. In other words, the dominion government in this bill asks the provinces to refrain from taxing in certain fields, and for that concession the dominion government undertakes to pay money to the provinces. I believe I have thus correctly described the basic principle in the bill.

The minister has reviewed in brief the history in recent years of dominion-provincial financial relations, and I do not propose to go over that ground again. I did it in a general way on one or two occasions in the last session of parliament, and I do not know that there is anything I can add by way of detail to the statement I then made.

May I at this point refer to one or two comments made by the minister. He referred to the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission, a commission which was appointed by this government ten years ago and which made its report to the government seven years ago. It was a commission the functions of which were to study this question. It did study this question; indeed it studied it thoroughly and for a longer period of time than any other dominion commission of which I am aware. That commission made a most valuable report, one in which is contained what I believe is the fullest and most valuable statement of dominion-provincial affairs made since confederation.

The basic recommendation of that commission was that the provinces of Canada should be aided by the central government on the basis of fiscal need. What does that mean? In a federal system where we have a central government and, in this instance, nine provincial governments, some of those provincial governments may be operating in an economy which does not give as high a standard of living as is enjoyed by other sections of the nation. That condition is true in Canada. The standard of living varies in different parts and from time to time; and one section may be down today or five years from now as compared with the others. In this nation the economy of each province is not exactly a duplicate of the economy of every other province: in fact there are vast differences, so that we find in this nation six different major types of economy.

In the past, some of these provinces have not been able to secure as high a standard of living or of public service as some of the others. In the past, they have been the prairie provinces and the maritime provinces. The result is that in those areas if the people are to have a standard of public service equal to the average in Canada they have to apply taxation rates much higher than the average taxation rates throughout the rest of the country.

For many years that condition was permitted to pass by without serious protest, although it is a fact that practically since the time of confederation there have been protests pointing out the inequality of the situation. Any province which has had this condition has considered it a serious matter, but it was not until the depression in the early thirties that the difficulty came prominently to the fore. At that time the provinces in those sections of Canada to which I have referred —and perhaps others—felt they could not face the future and meet their obligations unless these problems were solved.

I believe it will be admitted that it was partly due—and I was going to say largely due—to pressure from certain of those provinces that the dominion consented to have this study made ten years ago. As I have pointed out, the basic recommendation of the royal commission was that the less favoured provinces of Canada should be aided by the central government, the only government able to collect taxes from whatever sources they may be obtained throughout the nation, and that they see to it that the needed moneys will be spent where they are required. The recommendation was that the central government should collect taxes wherever they can be obtained, and that the provinces suffering from poorer economy should be benefited on the basis of fiscal need; that is to the extent of the amount of money necessary to enable those provinces to have the same level of public service as the other provinces have, without having to apply a higher level of taxation.

I need not go into the history of what happened to that report. Everyone knows that in the second year of the war a conference was called and that owing to the objections of certain provinces and the unwillingness of the dominion government to proceed in the face of those objections, those proposals failed of acceptance. The dominion government came along with another kind of agreement which met these difficulties in somewhat different terms. Those agreements were arranged to terminate at the end of the war.

Then, anticipating the termination of those agreements, the government came forward about two years ago with the plan to which the minister has referred. He has spoken of it as a plan broader in scope than that envisaged by the Rowell-Sirois commission. It is true that it is broader in scope, much broader. The cost of the plan proposed by the Rowell-Sirois commission cannot in fairness be compared on equal terms with the cost of the present proposals. It is just as well, however, to know what the costs were. The minister says the plan of 1945 was on a broader scope. The net cost to the dominion government under the plan proposed by the Rowell-Sirois commission was not $228 million a year; it was but $40 million a year. I am not suggesting that the figures are exactly comparable, but those were the figures they gave. Tonight the minister intimated that the cost of paying the provinces during the war was $117 million, although I had thought the figure was lower than that—some $86 million.

The Rowell-Sirois commission plan was to cost the dominion $40 million; the war-time tax agreements, as I gathered from the minister, $117 million, although I thought the cost was less than that; the 1945 proposals, $138 million; the 1946 proposals, $198 million; the present proposals, $228 million. We are in this position then; not only were the 1945 proposals much broader than those of the Rowell-Sirois commission, but the proposals tonight are very much broader at least in cost; they constitute a much greater burden on the Canadian people than the proposals made by the Rowell-Sirois commission; they are very much greater than the payments made by the dominion under the war-time tax agreements; they are very much greater than the proposals brought forward in 1945, and they are very much greater than the proposals brought forward in 1946. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) intimated the other night that if the 1945 proposals were fully implemented they would mean a charge upon this country of $500 million to $600 million a year. Briefly, there is the growth in the development of these projects in recent years.

In my judgment, no good Canadian in any province can oppose payments by the dominion to the provinces on the basis of fiscal need. I do not think any provincial government in Canada would oppose that. I do not think any thoughtful student of these matters in Canada would oppose it. I would think they would all take pride in trying to bring about that measure of equity in this nation. Certainly that is my view and I hope it will be found to be the view of those who sit with me. I am sure it will.

I have not seen certain of the calculations and figures which the minister put on the record tonight, but I am going to refer to them in a moment. But in so far as this measure provides fiscal need for the provinces of Canada, it will receive our support. In so far as it fails to provide fiscal need, the bill is weak and should be remedied. In so far as it provides more than fiscal need, it is not a sound method of financing in Canada.

Does this proposal meet fiscal needs? I will not answer that myself; I will let the government's figures answer it. The 1945 proposals were to cost $138 million; the 1946 proposals, $198 million, and these proposals, a minimum of $206 million, and on the basis of the 1947 figures which the minister gave, $228 million. If in the 1945 proposals the government was planning to meet the fiscal needs of the provinces by providing $138 million, certainly it is paying enough to meet the fiscal needs of the provinces now by providing $228 million which is $90 million more. On that basis I do not think there can be any question but that this plan does meet the fiscal needs of the weaker provinces.

The question now arises: How wise is it to proceed to do more than that? Do not misunderstand me; I am not proposing that the provinces of Canada get less than the plan offered now. We are looking at the question of the wisdom of the policy of one government raising money and giving it to other governments to spend. To the extent that it is necessary to meet fiscal need, I will support it and I think every good Canadian will support it; but to the extent that it goes beyond that, I ask this question: Is that sound fiscal policy? Is that sound financial policy? I am not going to depend upon my own opinion in that matter, I am going to quote what another authority had to say several years ago on this question. I should like to quote from page 316 of Hansard of February 21, 1929. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking at that time, had this to say:

> I believe that everyone who has given any attention to public finance will agree that it is a thoroughly vicious system to have one body raise taxes and another body expend the money thus secured. In other words, give to the provinces these grants from the federal treasury, without their being obliged to raise the money themselves by taxation, and you will not get, with respect to expenditure, that careful supervision which would be exercised if the provinces themselves were obliged to raise the money in the first instance. It is a bad system, a thoroughly vicious system, and that is the reason why the present administration has been seeking to put an end to a system that grew up at a time when the country was in the throes of war or had to meet a post-war situation—a system which, had it been permitted to develop, would have become thoroughly destructive of anything in the shape of economy with respect to the expenditure of the people's money.

The same position was taken later on, on April 3, 1930. The same authority, the present Prime Minister of Canada, had this to say, as reported on page 1237 of Hansard:

> When on a previous occasion we were discussing this matter of grants from one treasury to another, I said I thought it was an unsound principle; in fact, I think I used the expression that it was a vicious principle to have one body raise the taxes and another body spend the people's moneys thus raised. Is there any hon. member who will disagree with me in that statement?

Those are not my words; they are the words of the Prime Minister. That question is his question, not mine. Then he went on to answer it as follows:

> There is none. That is the extent of the statement I made. I was referring to a principle of financing, speaking simply in relation to what is sound and what is unsound in financing. Anyone interested in financing, whether of a municipality, a province, a dominion, an empire, or a league of nations, will, I think, admit it is unwise, an unsound, a wrong principle for one body to have to do with raising the taxes and another to be concerned with the spending of the money so raised, that other body not having to account to the representatives of those who have paid the taxes.

As I said, this measure, in so far as it provides fiscal need to the provinces of Canada will, I hope, receive the support of every right-thinking Canadian. This measure does that; but I criticize it on several grounds. I criticize it, first, because the government goes at the question of solving this problem in the wrong way, a way which makes for disunity in Canada. It approaches the provinces one by one. It has now got seven provinces in out of nine. These seven provinces represent only about one-third of the tax-paying part of Canada and only a little more than one-third of the population of Canada. Of the money that is being used by the government for this purpose, two-thirds or three-quarters of it come from those provinces which, under the present arrangement are receiving no benefits. The point I am now making is that the approach is wrong; the government, as I said, is going at the problem in the wrong way. It is an approach which makes for disunity. Was there ever any question in anybody's mind that when a proposal like this came forward, a proposal in which the government of Canada said to the provinces, "we will get two-thirds or three-quarters of this money from two provinces and give it to you", those six or seven provinces would eventually accept? None at all. That is my first criticism. Is it a healthy condition that we should have seven provinces accepting this, seven which get much more than they could raise from these revenues in their own jurisdiction, and two not having it; yet paying much of what the others get? I ask, is that a healthy state in this nation? Should we not be applying ourselves seriously to trying to solve these problems without having such a situation as this arise?

My second criticism is this. In a federal state this policy of the government goes a long way toward centralizing taxation powers. Whether that is good or bad there can be no question of the facts. That is what it does. We have admitted that it does secure a small measure of equality, having regard to the responsibility of the provincial governments. This measure helps certain provincial governments; but it does not help correct inequalities in the economy of the different parts of the nation. It helps governments improve their problems with respect to public services. My immediate criticism is that in a federal state, with each government having to raise its own revenues, this plan goes a long way toward centralizing taxing power in Canada. The government asks the provinces to give up their powers to tax. The government says, "We will give you money back for this concession; we will give you more than you raise yourselves". But the fact is, that having been done, the powers of taxation rest in this government, not with the provinces.

The minister talks about "renting" taxes. It is more than renting taxes; it is asking the provinces to give up constitutional rights.

Mr. ROWE: Renting rights.

Mr. BRACKEN: My third criticism is that in a federal state—and that is what ours is—this plan fails to give to the provinces any clear field of taxation of their own; it does not give them even any minor fields. There is not a single taxation field into which the dominion cannot go. There is scarcely a single field into which the dominion has not gone. I do not think there is a single field into which the dominion has said that it would not go. It has left some fields temporarily; it may stay out for a while, but it has not said it would stay out indefinitely. It does not say that the provinces can have any small taxation field of their own from which the dominion would keep away.

My fourth criticism is that the government's procedure, as it worked out, has failed to achieve continuance of plans for dominion-provincial conferences. That is a serious criticism. The government may say, "Well, we tried and we failed; we have not any hope of getting anywhere if we call another conference," and the other folks will give their answer and say, you were too rigid, and so on. If we are to wait until these problems are easy to solve before we are willing to sit down together and face hard difficulties and overcome them, we are going to be a long time in getting a better country. My criticism is that the government has failed to achieve a continuance of dominion-provincial conference. In a federal state that is a serious condition of affairs. Here we are working together, dominion and provinces; sometimes our jurisdictions overlap; sometimes they do not, but they are always closely related. The healthiest condition this nation could have would be for the dominion to have regular conferences with the provinces. I feel that, to the extent powers are centred here in Ottawa and used here, we are arriving at a dangerous situation where a few men can make major decisions on important matters. This nation will be a healthier place if the dominion and the several provinces were to sit down together more frequently. If the provinces are not well informed, inform them. But do not try to order them. Inform them and educate them. Get them to come together with the dominion. But I am not suggesting that the provinces need education.

Mr. HARTT: I think they do.

Mr. BRACKEN: All right; name which ones.

Mr. HARTT: I will name them.

Mr. BRACKEN: My fifth criticism is that this policy has resulted in delaying certain social security, health and public investment policies which were well received across this nation when they were put forward by the experts of the government some two or three years ago. This government brought forth these policies and said they were good. They said, we will put them into effect if the provinces will agree. It turns out that these policies will cost the nation $500 or $600 million a year when they are implemented. The government now comes forward and says, only seven provinces having agreed, it cannot bring forward these policies which it said would help this nation head off a depression in the future. It is said that a depression is in the offing and these things would help avoid it. Yet, the government fails to come forward with these measures itself and it fails to call the provinces together to try to get a plan to put them into effect. I say their plan has delayed the bringing forward of these policies of social security, health and public investment—public works or whatever you like to call them—policies aimed to correct certain social inequities in Canada and at the same time help to head off the danger of a recession.

My sixth criticism is that the plan abandons the principle of fiscal needs. The minister referred to that. He said that it is different from fiscal need. He said that his plan had covered the principle of fiscal need; but, Mr. Speaker, this plan is not a plan of fiscal need; neither is this plan on the basis of equal per capita payment; this plan is the result of going at things piecemeal and having to consider something different for each province. This plan is the result of going at this thing piecemeal; having got three provinces to agree at first, the government found that British Columbia wanted more and they had to give more to get British Columbia in. The government having got British Columbia in, the other provinces felt they had a grievance and came here and the government felt it had to give them more.

Mr. REID: We think we did all right in British Columbia.

Mr. BRACKEN: Finally, as the minister said tonight, the seventh province has come in. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say this to the minister who has introduced the bill. He put on the record certain calculations, certain figures, which none of us have seen. I can complete my remarks tonight at this stage and be through, but I am wondering whether that will accomplish most in the way of expediting the debate. We are not planning to have many speakers on this side. I should like to deal with the matter as fully as needed and as fairly and frankly as I see it. If the government is not ready to go on with anything else and wishes me to complete my remarks tonight I will do so but if I do, and I find in the record something that we have not seen, or something that is new, or something that needs to be answered, we shall have to deal with it as necessary in committee of the whole. We can do that, and from the point of view of the opposition, perhaps from a purely political point of view, that would be the better thing for us to do. I am willing to go on and finish my remarks tonight, or I am willing to leave the matter over in order to see what there is that is new in what the minister has put on the record, and then conclude tomorrow. I am not asking any favour of the minister. If he feels that it will expedite the work of the house in dealing with this particular matter to go on with other matters now, that can be done, but if he prefers to have me conclude now I can follow that course.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am willing to meet my hon. friend's convenience, but I do not think he will find in the tables I placed on Hansard tonight anything that contains new material. It is largely informative, to show how the increased commitments are calculated on the basis of the gross national production, set out in detail, the minimum payments on the latest population figures we have for the various provinces, and so on. But if my hon. friend prefers to adjourn the debate and go on later, I would not object. As I say, however, he will not find that the tables I have put on Hansard tonight will supply any material for which he would have any particular need for the purposes of his statement.

Mr. BRACKEN: I will leave it with the minister. He may not think so, but I am trying to help him.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps the hon. member had better adjourn the debate.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then, if the minister is willing, and the house as well, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The committee is considering item 551, national defence.

Mr. WYLIE: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was reading a letter which appeared in Maclean's magazine, and I should like to finish it now:

> Before the price to be offered to each owner was finally decided upon, each property was reviewed by a board of appraisers, made up of those listed herein, when the soldiers' settlement representatives appeared before the board to discuss and justify their valuation of each property. All were treated alike, there was no coercion, no favouritism, and in my estimation, never was an expropriation more carefully planned and more equitably settled than this undertaking.

If the owner thought the amount offered to him was not fair, and he had even the slightest reason for his contention, the property was re-appraised by two soldiers' settlement representatives, and adjustments made if found warranted.

How you can print such a report without fully investigating the facts, does not seem in keeping with your usual standard. Surely you do not print everything any crackpot says, and I suggest a little more vigilance on the part of your editors would keep out such erroneous reporting.

It seems to me that in a spirit of justice you should rectify this statement by printing the facts in your next issue.

Yours very truly,
Westmount Realties Company,
J. W. Rankin,
Vice-president.

That is a letter which appeared in Maclean's magazine. I may say that many of the statements in that letter were entirely wrong. The letter may express the writer's point of view, but it was certainly not the point of view of the settlers who had resided in that area for thirty or forty years, and some of them perhaps longer.

While I do not wish to tire the committee, I should like to read a letter which I received from one of the residents in that area, a man who had lived there for thirty-five years and who perhaps knew the conditions in that district better than any of those the government had in there. The letter is from a man named Philip E. Birtwistle, a resident of Medicine Hat, who had resided in the area. The letter is dated June 21, 1946, and reads:

An item appeared in Maclean's magazine of March 15, referring to the British block and the injustice of the settlement with the expropriated residents. It evoked a letter from a Mr. Rankin of Montreal, which appeared in Maclean's of June 1, in which he says the article is misleading and makes several statements in support of his contention. I have written a reply to his letter, refuting his statements. I am enclosing a copy of the letter as it will probably be a month before it appears in print. I also enclose a resolution from the Redcliff town council. Plenty of supporting evidence can be produced should the case be reopened.

This is what this gentleman has to say. He s writing to the editor, Maclean's magazine, Toronto, Ontario:

Dear Sir: I have read the article in Cross Country of Maclean's, March 15 and a letter from a Mr. Rankin of Montreal, commenting on it. As the first article was a fair, but by no means complete statement of the case, I did not feel called upon to amplify it. But, as Mr. Rankin's letter may prejudice the chances of a reopening of the case, I would like to answer, and refute, the statements he made.

As a farmer in the block I was served with a notice of expropriation by an R.C.M.P. officer, not by mail, and told I must get out by a certain date. There was no question of negotiating agreements, but, being dissatisfied with the amount allotted to my partner and myself, I saw Colonel Gibson, who was in authority, who did not think it necessary to interview me in an office, but did his business with me in the lobby of the court house, standing up. He refused to discuss the settlement in detail, or to give me a detailed, itemized statement. He said I could accept or let it go to the exchequer court, but, he added, by the time the exchequer court settled it, the buildings and other improvements, which we were to be allowed to remove, would be gone. I asked him where they would be and he replied, "Oh, just smashed up and got out of the way."

The statement that all interested parties accepted the terms offered, although apparently correct, is actually wrong. Two factors forced the farmers to accept, although most of them tried to get better terms with little or no success. The first factor was, that it was a war measure. We were told, and it was correct, that the area was needed for the prosecution of the war. To buck it or delay it would be unpatriotic and we definitely agreed with this.

The second factor was economic. The farmers had just been through the worst depression in history, with prices for farm products at an all-time low. They were making out all right, but were unable to leave their homes and finance themselves until the exchequer court settled the case. How could they set about securing another location, purchase another farm, move on to it and wait a year for returns from it, without any settlement of their holdings? What would the majority of them live on, for perhaps a year, before the exchequer court settled it, while their crop was in the ground and they could not harvest it? Although not legally forced to accept, actually they had no alternative.

The next statement, that, "of 275 interested parties, more than half had found it impossible to make a living," is another half-truth. There were actually 126 families residing in the block at the time of the expropriation. Like all such pioneer settlements, many left at different times for many different reasons. Some left for their health as the climate did not suit them. Some were unable to stand the grind of pioneering. Some left because of the distance from town, and the depression and low prices was a main factor in forcing many away. But the 126 that remained were doing all right, many of them were engaged in large scale farming, with power equipment, and stock as a sideline, and, had they been left there, would have made very good and substantial gains in the past five years of rising prices. The last statement, referring to the delegation who wished to be included in the block, is on a par with the other statements. They knew nothing of the prices, good or bad, but as their grazing and other holdings would be seriously reduced by the closing of the block and, as this would cut out a large part of their income, they considered they would be unable to carry on with their diminished holdings.

I enclose a statement of the holdings of my partner and myself, and the amount we received, which I believe is fairly average, and it may be appended if the editor thinks fit to do so. I could amplify this further but I think the above is sufficient to show we have a good case for reconsideration.

That is a letter from a resident of that block, who lived there for many years and made a success of farming in that dry area. I may say that the settlement in this Bingville district was one of the happiest communities in Alberta. Many social events were held there where the people got together. They were the ones who had been left there while the others moved out, and the settlement they got was entirely inadequate.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried:

Mr. WYLIE: It will be carried when I am through.

Mr. LESAGE: Is that a promise?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. WYLIE: I want to put on Hansard a statement regarding the settlement made with this farmer and his partner, and what he got for 640 acres of land with buildings and everything. This is a statement of holdings in the spring of 1941: land, 640 acres, full title, unencumbered and all taxes fully paid; 1,280 acres under crop lease from provincial government; 320 acres under grazing lease from provincial government; house, 18 by 24, two story with verandah and porch; granaries, capacity, 10,000 bushels—five, 12 by 14; one, 12 by 16; one, 18 by 24; barns—one 18 by 30; one, 18 by 28, with lean-to 24 by 16; garages—one, 12 by 20; one, 10 by 16; blacksmith shop, chicken house and coal shed; fence, five miles, 850 posts, 12 miles barbed wire; two wells, one dam and two miles of graded road, built by them at their own expense. In addition to that, they had 620 acres seeded to wheat in that year. For those holdings they received the sum of $5,700. After a period of forty years, does anyone consider that to be a fair settlement? I should think not. I am afraid that those farmers are not in the same class as those whom we were discussing in this house just a little while ago, where one could go to the government and get a better settlement, and then another come along. These farmers were not in that class. They had to accept what was offered to them; and, being good patriotic citizens, they did that and assisted in the war effort all they could.

I feel that more consideration should be given to them and I see no reason why the case should not be reopened. I know of one farmer in particular who had gone through a period of bad years, when he had no crop for six or seven years. By 1941 he was just getting back on his feet and had a nice herd of cattle. He was running about 125 head of cattle and about forty head of horses. He was too old to go out and start up in a new community. Therefore he had to dispose of his stock and everything and move into the city of Medicine Hat. Everything he got for his holdings is now pretty well gone, because of the increased cost of living and many other items. I hope the minister and the government will see fit to reopen this case and see if these farmers cannot get a better settlement and if a readjustment cannot be allowed on many of the settlements which were made. I should like to know what the government intends to do about this matter. There is no use in letting it slip along. The parliamentary assistant to the minister is here and he should be able to let me know what the government intends to do about it.

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I can only say that I shall be pleased to bring the matter to the minister's attention for his consideration; but, as the hon. member knows very well, it has been considered from time to time. Up to this date it has been considered that the settlement was adequate and no decision has been made to reopen the case. I shall again draw the matter to the minister's attention.

Mr. WYLIE: Can the parliamentary assistant say when the consideration will be given and how many applied for consideration?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has I know, been given just lately. As soon as the estimates are through, I shall be very glad to have the matter reopened.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant four or five questions, and in doing so I would not want to be understood as trying to injure the defence forces in any way. The present position of Canada is such that we must do everything possible to help the men who are trying to give us efficient defence forces. We have moved from the bush league into the big league in world affairs, and from now on for all time we must be prepared to face this question, not only of whether we are able to defend ourselves, but also of whether we are able to do our share in building up an effective world police organization.

The first question I would ask the minister, who has now come into the house, has to do with the trained field force, about which very little has been said today. When the former minister of national defence laid down the policy in this house on October 16, 1945, he dealt fully with this field force. He was giving the two main elements of the post-war army. In the first place, he referred to the part-time reserve army, and then went on to deal with what we call the permanent force. At page 1135 of Hansard for October 16, 1945, he said:

The second will be the permanently employed active force, whose duty it will be to assist in the training and administration of the reserve army and to supply the necessary staffs, services and scientific research and development personnel, augmented by a small formation of essential field units. This formation will be maintained as a trained field force, fully epuipped, ready to meet whatever commitments may arise. Until we know more about our international obligations and consequent requirements, these active force units will be retained as a minimum and would be subject to whatever expansion might later be required in the light of any obligations which we might accept to assist in maintaining the peace of the world. Preliminary estimates indicate that the numbers involved in the active permanently employed force will be between 20,000 and 25,000 all ranks.

We were given to understand at that time that this trained field force would be, in effect, a brigade group, with infantry, armour, artillery, engineers and so on; that it would be a field force ready to operate as such. A year later, in October, 1946, the same defence minister, the present Minister of Finance, was questioned about Canada's peace-time forces while he was visiting in Victoria. At that time the Russians were demanding a general reduction in armaments, and the minister was asked what Canada would do about reducing her armaments. His answer was to this effect, that Canada's peace-time forces were so small there was nothing to cut. That was the substance of his statement at that time. Then in January, 1947, the present minister announced a twenty-five per cent cut. I should like to know what has happened to this trained field force, whether it is still in existence or just what has happened to it.

Then I wish to ask a question in the same connection about the reserve army. In the statement on October 16, 1945, the former minister laid great stress on the role of the reserve army, and referred to it as—

. . . this important force which will form the background of any possible future military endeavour . . .

Today we find much the same statement made by the minister as the fifth paragraph of the programme he presented, in these words:

Development of reserve forces of an age and with educational and physical standards and training approximating those of the active forces competent to go to sea, take the field or fly.

Yet this afternoon he said the men in the reserve forces would get only fourteen days of training in a year, though some groups such as trade groups may get extra training. In the face of a programme of that kind I would ask him to explain how it is going to be possible to build up a reserve army with standards of training approximating those of the active forces, competent to go to sea, take the field or fly. Two years ago we warned the then minister that he would have to give a very strong lead at once if he wished to build up a reserve army in Canada. I have here a clipping from the Montreal Gazette, published in the minister's own city, dated June 28, just a few days ago—

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Not my paper, though.

Mr. GREEN: Well, the minister will agree that it is a good paper.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not think I agree with that in regard to its news items or its editorials.

Mr. GREEN: This is a news item, and I do not think he will question it.

Mr. CLAXTON: I certainly do.

Mr. GREEN: The heading is:

Black Watch only military unit to arrange for summer camp.

All other reserve bodies are much below strength due to general lack of public interest, is claim.

The article goes on to say this, about this famous regiment:

The Black Watch (RHR) of Canada will be the only military unit in this area to attend summer reserve camp in a body this year, it was learned yesterday. The Black Watch will spend a week end in July at Farnham.

Because of a general lack of interest in reserve army training since the end of the war, all units are very much below strength.

I would ask the minister to deal with those two points, the matter of the field force and the possibility of building up a fully trained reserve army on the basis of a few days' training a year, as he announced this afternoon.

Mr. CLAXTON: In regard to the last remark of the hon. member, concerning a quotation from the Montreal Gazette, I should say that is the kind of incorrect editorializing that frequently appears in some newspapers in Canada. That article is not in accordance with the facts as I know them. Other units are going to train; and the kind of training provided, as I have said, is on a scale never before equalled in Canada. Provision is made for thirty days training for the quota of 30,000, and, in addition, fourteen days at camp plus fifteen days additional training for tradesmen. I would ask any hon. member who has had any experience with the reserve forces to say whether anything has ever before been done to this degree in Canada. With regard to the statement about the twenty-five per cent cut—

Mr. MERRITT: If I may ask a question, surely that 30,000 covers all three services, not just one?

Mr. CLAXTON: This is just for the army alone.

Mr. MERRITT: Thirty thousand for the army alone?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; and, with regard to the 25 per cent cut, may I say that is something which I believe was developed out of the newspapers. What has happened is that for the purposes of the armed forces this year we are recruiting only up to 75 per cent of the established strengths of the active forces. There has been no change in their establishment. That applies also to the brigade groups. It is quite right for the hon. member to ask about the status of his brigade group. It does not yet exist as a fighting unit fit to take the field at any moment. That work is still in progress. The men are still being trained and organizational work is being done. In it at the present time there is a total of 192 officers and 1,952 men.

Mr. GREEN: What would be the establishment for that field force?

Mr. CLAXTON: A brigade group has always been a fairly indefinite term. I believe the idea in mind at the time it was first suggested was that it should amount to something of the magnitude of about 5,000 officers and men.

Mr. GREEN: That is the figure I had in mind.

Mr. CLAXTON: And I believe, on the 75 per cent strength, it would be of the magnitude of 3,541 officers and men.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister not think it would be wise to carry out the original policy, recruit this brigade group up to strength, and keep it up to strength and trained as a fighting unit? As I understand it, they are now scattered all the way from Esquimalt to Sydney or Halifax. Would it not be wise to relax the 75 per cent rule in respect of that field force, bring it up to strength, and have a first-class and efficient fighting brigade group in Canada?

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member's question is a difficult one to answer because it depends upon a great many technical and strategical considerations, with which I am not competent to deal. But I should think that once one regards the armed forces of Canada from what I believe is the right point of view at the present time, that is as a training force for future staff officers and leaders, and for the reserve forces of Canada, then I should think the wisdom of keeping constantly mobilized and ready for action anything in the nature of a brigade group in one place would be a mistake.

It all depends upon time, circumstances, dangers and everything else. Given the present development of weapons—and I say that advisedly in view of what was said this afternoon —we can take care of anything that happens in Canada in the immediate future. Given another kind of development of weapons and technique, that might not be adequate. But for the time being I believe our primary purpose should be to develop staff officers, officers training establishments, depots, technicians and tradesmen, as well as trained personnel who are competent to provide the nucleus for anything that might happen in the future.

Mr. GREEN: That can only mean, then, that the government has now abandoned the policy announced in 1945.

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, it does.

Mr. CLAXTON: It has to be related to the time.

Mr. GREEN: The policy then as stated by the Minister of National Defence was perfectly clear, and here it is:

> This formation will be maintained as a trained field force fully equipped, ready to meet whatever commitments may arise.

The minister's statement tonight means that we are reverting to the days of the thirties, when we are using our permanent force for training and staff work. Obviously there is a change of policy, and I do not think it is a proper change. I suggest, however, that the committee can see for itself what is meant. The minister cannot rise in his place now and say that the policy he has announced is anything but an absolute turning away from the policy announced on October 16, 1945, with regard to the field force.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is a question of time and of the wise spending of such resources as we have.

Mr. GREEN: Of course things are more serious now than they were then.

Mr. CLAXTON: Well, they may be. The fact is that I believe we can take care of things as they exist today in Canada. We are not abandoning, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the idea of a brigade group which might be ready to take the field if that were necessary. That has not been abandoned at all; it is being organized, trained and worked at. On the other hand, we are concentrating our attention equally on the other necessities of defence: how much we do of each depends, in part, on the flow of training schedules, the flow of recruits and on other considerations which vary from time to time, as well as on the necessities of the case.

As I see it at the present time, we are going sufficiently fast with both, provided that during the current year we can encourage, with the support of hon. members and other public-spirited people throughout the country, young Canadians to go into the armed forces in sufficient numbers to bring them up to the strength authorized. That requires some additional enlistments, particularly in connection with the army. They are coming along; and in order to secure them we are putting on the campaign next September to which I have already referred.

Mr. GREEN: I believe the minister would find that one of the greatest attractions to the young men of this country would be the possibility of enlisting in a crack field force where they would receive the most modern training. We understood, in 1945 for example, that the whole field force were to be trained as paratroopers. If the minister were to set up something of that type he would find that young Canadians would respond quickly and would make the finest force in the world. But I say to him it will be very difficult to build up a first-class force if these units are to be scattered right across Canada, away under strength, and simply doing sentry duty or routine training of one kind or another. I would ask the minister to turn that over in his mind between sessions.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is one of the difficulties any country the size of Canada has in apportioning its armed forces among three services over a great area. I appreciate the point the hon. member made, because that is one thing that gave us much concern. I must point out, however, that all the men entering the armed forces receive the most modern training and that very few of them are engaged in sentry duty or anything of that kind.

Mr. GREEN: I meant duties of that sort.

Mr. CLAXTON: I understand that. But in anything of that kind our aim is to have as much as possible of the work of security guards, fire-fighters, clerks, mess orderlies, cooks and the like done by civilians, so that all in the armed forces will be trained fighting soldiers. Whether one of those soldiers is at any given moment made part of a brigade group, which is a fighting operational unit, or is made part of a training establishment in one of the training camps in Canada probably matters very little from the point of view of that man's efficiency. We hope to have everyone efficient and we believe they are. It may be that we shall find that to isolate them in brigade groups doing nothing but operational exercises will not be the best way to keep up their keenness and that they should be associated with men in training in other fields. The whole operation and plan will have to be worked out, and I think it is being done in a sensible way.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister that he have some special name for that brigade group; make it a corps d'elite. I think, if it were permitted to train in different parts of Canada at different times he would find that the effect would be most beneficial both to the reserve army and to the active army.

My next question has to do with these more modern weapons of war. This morning the minister referred to atomic bombs, jet-propelled planes, rockets and higher speed submarines as being the principal new weapons introduced near the end of the recent war. He referred also to chemical and bacteriological agents. During his statement this afternoon he explained that the jet-propelled planes were on order from Great Britain. Has the Canadian government taken any steps to invite the British government to send their airmen here to train in jet-propelled planes? I believe they have the greatest difficulty in training over the United Kingdom because they hardly get started before they are over the sea. Out on the prairies we have the air fields, the distances and the suitable weather, and it seems to me that it would be appropriate for Canada to take a lead in setting up some type of commonwealth air training plan for the training of personnel in the handling of these jet-propelled planes. The same thing is true in connection with training in the use of mechanized units by the army. Has Canada taken any steps to arrange for this kind of training to be done in Canada? The Ottawa Citizen of June 14 contained an article headed, "See Canada as key in era of superweapons. Even atom mist range in northland reported." This was a dispatch from London, and referring to Canada it said:

> For Canada this scheme is believed by these sources to envisage the setting up of an atomic range in the frozen northland on the lines of the Australian rocket range in the bush country. Here experiments with radio-active "clouds" could be carried out in safety. This was forecast for the near future

Will the minister state whether anything has been done along the lines I suggest?

Mr. CLAXTON: There is a great deal of misunderstanding about jet propelled planes. I certainly am far from being an expert in this or any other military field, except perhaps the six-inch howitzer which is long obsolete, but I understand that flying a jet propelled plane does not entail any particularly new problem. I am informed by my advisers that they are as easy to fly, if not easier, than many of the later type planes in the last war and that their landing speeds are not very different from those of other planes. Apart from their higher speed and probably cheaper cost of production, they are not very different from ordinary planes.

We have not had any request from the United Kingdom that we should provide training fields for flyers along the lines of the British commonwealth air training plan, nor have we had any request for training in mechanized warfare. I would think that the United Kingdom had ample facilities for both types of training. On the other hand, we exchange staff officers and technicians every now and then; we exchange information and have the closest kind of cooperation with the United Kingdom as we have with the United States. There is nothing additional that appears to be necessary to be done in this connection at this time. It has not been suggested by anyone with army experience. Our cooperation with what I described as other like-minded nations is free and frank and leads to greater efficiency on both sides.

Mr. GREEN: Would this suggestion, if carried out, not help our own air men? Would there be any objection from the Canadian point of view to carrying out a plan of that type? The training would be done under the department and the Canadian authorities.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am not sure how that would work out and I would have to discuss it with my colleagues. If it seems to be desirable from the air force point of view, then it would have to be considered from the point of view of policy and so on. I am not in a position to give a reply offhand. I can assure my hon. friend and the committee that there is the closest cooperation with regard to staff work, instructors and technicians.

Mr. GREEN: In recent weeks there has been considerable publicity with regard to the acquisition of United States equipment. There have been discussions in the United States congress about putting through a statute allowing them to help other nations in the Americas to equip their forces. According to newspaper articles, it would appear that Canada can acquire only used equipment or equipment which has been discarded by the United States forces. Is that correct, and can the minister outline the situation with regard to this equipment?

Mr. CLAXTON: The bill referred to by the hon. member was introduced in the United States congress quite recently and is still under consideration, not having as yet been adopted. It is purely facilitative or enabling legislation. It would permit the President of the United States or the administration to make arrangements with any of the American states to provide them with equipment or assistance with regard to defence. So far that bill has not been passed. Whether or not it is passed is, of course, for the United States congress to say. If it were passed it would, I think, within its terms, and probably hon. members will agree that it might, enable the United States to make equipment available to us on any terms that were agreed to by the administration. We, however, have a quite different arrangement with the United States, that expressed in the Ogdensburg declaration of August 19, 1940, and now carried forward by the declaration of the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States of America on February 12, 1947. Under this we agreed to cooperate with regard to the defence of this continent. All hon. members are familiar with the provisions of that declaration.

So far, with regard to equipment we have bought from the United States with United States dollars the equipment we have felt we needed, and we have got it on terms that have been worked out by agreement between the two countries. There has been no suggestion that we get only used equipment. That is not so. We get what we want when they have what we want and what we cannot make ourselves, and we have so far paid for it.

Mr. GREEN: Then we really do not need this enabling statute which is before the United States congress.

Mr. CLAXTON: So far we have not used it. It has not been in force and we have not used it. We cannot see everything that will happen in the future, but so far this measure, which is HR-3836, and which was introduced in the house of representatives on June 13, 1947, has not been enacted. It has not been applied, and so far Canada has got along under a totally different arrangement.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to Canada's commitments to the united nations. In his statement this morning he said that Canada's defence force may be required:

1. To defend Canada against aggression;

2. To assist the civil power in maintaining law and order within the country;

3. To carry out any undertakings which by our own voluntary act we may assume in co-operation with friendly nations or under any effective plan of collective action under the united nations.

Can the minister give us any idea of what sort of assistance Canada would be expected to furnish to the united nations? Within the last few days proposals have been put in to the security council for a world force. Does the minister know where Canada fits into that picture? I see that on April 12 of this year he ventured into print on the question at Winnipeg. That is a long way from Ottawa and the quotation may not be correct, or the minister may have been enjoying the western air out there, as we westerners all hope to to do in a few days. The heading is:

Canada may send troops overseas for peace force.

The press dispatch is dated April 12 and reads as follows:

Canada is prepared to send troops overseas to take part in an international peace force should one be established, Defence Minister Claxton said here. He is in Winnipeg on a tour of western Canada.

Can the minister give us some further statement with regard to that position?

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard to what I said at Winnipeg, it was just the same as what I said today; it is the same as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said on previous occasions, namely, that any arrangements for our contribution to a united nations force would have to be agreed to in accordance with the charter of the united nations by the Canadian government and the Canadian parliament. I said that in Winnipeg; I cannot say anything different; it is a fact, both from the charter and from the realities of Canadian policy. If the hon. member had quoted all of what I had said—

Mr. GREEN: That is all they printed. I do not know what else the minister said.

Mr. CLAXTON: Then the newspaper may have left out something of what I said. The report that I saw of what I said at Winnipeg was completely correct; that is, that it was qualified in the sense in which I have just qualified it, and the only sense in which it could be qualified; that is, that we will agree to use our forces in conjunction with those of the united nations by act of our own parliament after they have seen what the situation is and learned what it is. I could not say anything more than that, but certainly we are not committing ourselves in advance to any blank cheque. As to what we may be expected to commit ourselves to, I can only say that, as a fairly realistic people, we would like to see what it is before I can give an answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give us any idea at the present time?

Mr. CLAXTON: There is not the slightest idea in anyone's mind as to what it might be. The discussions of a possible united nations force have certainly not yet reached that level; but I would think myself that whatever it might be it would be well within our capacity to give.

Mr. GREEN: One final subject, the question of civil defence. The minister listed as his eleventh objective today:

Organization of government departments and civilian agencies capable of putting into immediate effect a plan for civil defence.

What is in mind in that connection? Such a plan necessitates support of civilian bodies all over Canada, and that support cannot be gained in a hurry. They have to be sold on the need for some such organization, and there is a great deal of preliminary work to do before such an organization is made effective. Has the department taken any steps at all, or what is the picture at the present time? In April of this year, Colonel W. W. Goforth, retiring deputy director of defence research gave a five-point programme in Vancouver to prepare Canadians against possible atomic assault. He was not speaking officially for the Department of National Defence, but he listed five interesting ways of building up this special defence. They were as follows:

1. That the three forces "will so combine and organize their strength within the limited resources assigned them that they may provide efficient early warning, interception and close support services to guard our great cities and vital centres from the first waves of enemy attack."

2. That each community of 50,000 population and over, "encouraged and guided by provincial authorities," study the results of atomic destruction as now known and "translate these into amendments of greater dispersion, even into their system of granting building permits relative to the zone of danger."

3. That professional societies such as the Engineering Institutes of Canada, Royal Architectural Institute of Canada, Canadian Medical Association, and others "study and devise codes and simplified instructions for use by their members in local surveys and in expert counsel to local authorities."

Mind you, all these are startling proposals.

4. That individual industries and public utilities start reviewing ways and means for achieving gradual dispersion "but with comparable productivity and economy."

5. Not an immediate problem but "one needing serious preliminary attention within the next five years," is the question of "a revived and greatly-strengthened air raid precaution (ARP) organization with gradually developed plans for mass evacuation and billeting of non-essential population from the larger cities.

The minister should give the committee some statement with regard to this question of civil defence. His department is obviously concerned about it, and there should be something more definite than statements such as that given by Colonel Goforth. It is an alarming statement which may be a thoroughly wise warning. Will the minister make a statement with regard to civil defence?

Mr. CLAXTON: Colonel Goforth spoke for himself. With regard to what I had in mind when I suggested that, I can say at once that what we intend to do is to have the Department of National Defence and other departments concerned work out plans which might be put into effect progressively as the threat grew. We certainly have nothing in mind along the lines of the suggestion made by my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BENTLEY: There is quite a chorus of "carried" from the other side. If hon. members had the privilege of seeing the list of speakers, as I have had, they would not call "carried" for a while yet, because there are quite a few. Incidentally, I am not one of those who clamour for a hurried-up closing. I never did believe that we would finish on the 12th of July and I do not believe it. There are too many matters to be discussed. Those hon. members on the other side who shout "carried" should exercise some influence in their party caucus to have some of the important legislation introduced in the early part of the session. If they had done that, instead of fiddling a month away in February, possibly it would not be necessary for them to join the chorus shouting "carried." However, let them have a good time.

I wish to compliment the minister on the clarity of his statement this morning. It was one of the clearest and most definite we have had on this or any other government subject since I have been a member of this house. I have not a copy of the statement, but I listened carefully, and the Evening Journal prints a copy of the fourteen points which the minister announced this morning. I presume that copy is correct. There are one or two of the points that I might feel like questioning, but in the main I agree with them.

This afternoon the hon. member for Trinity spent a little time in extolling the value of the particular branch of the forces in which he had such distinguished service. I do not blame him for doing so, nor do I blame some other members who have promoted the particular branches of the service in which they were engaged; but I would remind them, without drawing comparisons as to which branch is better or worse, or which is more valuable, that we old mud-sluggers, the P.B.I.'s did our job too. The others might not have done so valuable a job had not our service played its part too. That is not an odious comparison. It is simply a reminder that whether you fly or tramp around in the mud to your waist you are doing the best you can.

Mr. FULTON: How about a little more pay for the infantry?

Mr. BENTLEY: Now you are talking. I suggest that it be brought up to the others. I will support the hon. member there, even though I may not succeed.

Mr. CLAXTON: They get the same rate.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am glad to hear that. All the way through, considering allowance?

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, yes, all three services.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am glad to hear that. The hon. member for Selkirk says we joined too late, or too soon rather. We were born thirty years too soon. I want to point out that this group do recognize the need for a defence board. Once in a while some unfortunate statements are made in the house, possibly in consequence of a little stir-up, but I do not think the C.C.F. group need take a back seat to any other group, and again that is not an odious comparison. We all made what contribution we could during the war. There may be a difference in policy and in ideas from time to time as to when is the strategic time for Canada to enter war, but I do not think there will ever come a time when Canada is at war that those of our group, and those associated with us in the country, will not make their full contribution in man and woman-power and in other ways when they are called upon to do so. Whether there are more from one group or from another represented in the military forces, I do not know, and I do not see much difference in proportion to membership in the house.

Certainly we recognize the need for, and we should like to see, a well-balanced military establishment, and that is one thing about the minister's statement that I liked. It appears at least that he has a good idea of how to bring about a well-balanced and well-coordinated military establishment. That means not only well-trained but well-equipped troops, and I hope he is successful, because, while I do not like war, and cannot by any stretch of the imagination be said to wish that we ever have another one, unfortunately we have not yet any assurance that we shall have the permanent peace we all hope for but still are not too sure of.

We have our obligations to defend ourselves in the event of attack, which I hope never takes place. We have our obligation to the united nations organization when and if the security council makes some decision as to what Canada's part should be, and we must be ready to play that part if we believe what we say when we are members of the united nations. I am not particularly impressed by the minister's statement that we need military forces here for peace, order and good government in Canada. It has been a long time since the citizens of Canada have required anything more than a little bit of caution from the regular police forces to keep us in order. Generally we do not do much that requires a regiment of soldiers to come and prevent us from doing what we might be supposed to be doing.

I want to point out to the committee that there does not seem to be the urgency in this matter that some seem to indicate in their speeches. I would remind the committee that yesterday the Ottawa Journal, evening edition, carried what they said was a report of a statement made by Mr. L. B. Pearson at the secret session of the external affairs committee to which members of parliament and members of the other place were invited. I would never mention this myself, but I took it from the Journal, so that somebody must have told them and they reported that Mr. Pearson predicted that, in his opinion, there was no danger of a war before 1959. And we are led to believe that Mr. Pearson's opinion is something to which it is worth while giving consideration.

That being the case, considering the type of establishment the minister has envisaged in his statements, in answer to questions, it seems to me that he has time enough to introduce a well-coordinated scheme for national defence and training. This afternoon and at other times it has been pointed out that the Canadian army did an excellent job in both world war I and world war II, and without a great deal of previous training. That is true. There are others who point out that a considerable time was needed between the day we entered the war and the time we had the troops trained, and we could not afford to be unprepared the next time.

I agree with that, but I do not agree with the ideas put forward for preparedness. I want to remind the committee that before world war II, and in the early part of the war, there were many people in this country and in Europe who thought the Mannerheim line and the Maginot lines were good forms of preparedness. But when they came to be attacked by a modern force they were entirely out of date and therefore the preparedness they represented was not preparedness at all. I have no doubt the Maginot line, as a line of fortifications, was well built and well equipped, if it represented all that the builders expected it to be, but it did not meet the needs of the blitzkrieg or the lightning warfare that came upon it at that time. It is equally possible that anything we may envisage now in the way of physical facilities would not be adequate if war came in 1959 or thereabouts. The kind of fitness and preparedness that is always in order is the physical and mental and moral fitness of our citizens. That is the most important fitness and preparedness that Canada can visualize. I believe the lack of that fitness was an important factor in our unpreparedness in the opening days of world war II. Time and again it has been stated that forty-seven per cent of those who submitted themselves for enlistment in our forces were physically unfit. Had those forty-seven per cent all been fit, as they should have been, and as a national plan before that would have made them, they would have been ready for their military duties much sooner and in greater numbers than they were. The same condition might have applied in our war and other industries if the same physical examination had taken place. The same weaknesses and unfitness might have been disclosed there. If they were there—and I believe they were—then undoubtedly Canadian productive industry, including agriculture, mining and all others, suffered to the extent that probably forty-seven per cent of the workers were in the same physical category as those who offered themselves for the armed services. If we are to have a well-coordinated and well-planned defence equipment in this country we must have it powered by men and women who are themselves physically fit. Everything that goes to make that military establishment an efficient machine for Canada's defence and every one of the other industries must be powered by men and women who are physically fit and able to attain all the skills and speeds necessary to do the job at that time.

This afternoon the hon. member for Regina City mentioned the fact that there is a tendency sometimes for our military authorities to decide, for reasons of their own, that it is necessary to move a body of troops from one place to another. I know there was a terrific movement in war time. I remember one sailor telling me that he had joined the navy at Esquimalt, had immediately been posted to Halifax away from his home in Esquimalt, and had served out of Halifax and saved up his leave, which I believe could be done then, so that he might have enough leave to spend a nice Christmas at Esquimalt. A couple of years after he finally achieved that leave which he had saved up for, and went across the continent on that leave thinking he was going to have a happy Christmas with his family. He just landed at Esquimalt when he received a wire from Halifax to report back to duty. He galloped back across the country and reported for duty; he marched in, saluted and said, "Here I am, sir, in accordance with the instructions in the telegram." He was immediately told that he had been reposted to a ship in Esquimalt; so back he went there again. I do not know whether that happened very often, but that was the story I heard.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It was good for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. BENTLEY: If it is necessary in peace time, while troops are being trained and while we are building up this country for peace and for war, if war does come, instead of moving troops from one place to another by train, let the department organize and assemble all the necessary troops, working, engineering and others. If we are to take troops from a point "A" to a point "B" in Canada, let them build a road as they go along; then, when they get to "B" the road will be built, and from then on they will be able to get back and forth on it without using the railroads. And goodness knows, if we never again have a war, we still need plenty of roads. One could mention similar things all the way through, but I offer those suggestions for the minister's consideration in the hope that he will integrate some ideas like that in his new defence plan.

I want to ask the minister a question on his statement, in particular on point No. 10. As it appears in the paper—as I said before, I believe it is correct—it reads in this way:

Support for Canadian Arsenals Limited and a limited number of Canadian industries to maintain and increase skills in the design and manufacture of munitions and aircraft.

I am not questioning the minister's integrity in this. I am asking him why it says a limited number of Canadian industries? Would not all Canadian industries, in some form or another, be required in any kind of defence plan? I should like the minister to explain that to me. Then point No. 14 reads as follows:

Cooperation with the countries of the commonwealth—

With which I heartily agree.

—the United States and other like-minded countries in working out common standards, planning and training.

The phrase "like-minded countries" is a rather loose one. They are like us in some respects; we are like them in some respects; but we also differ in some respects. I should like us to be like-minded in many more things before we start to standardize our military equipment. I should like us to be so like-minded that we standardize our agricultural equipment, as a result of which every tractor combine, mowing machine or cream separator made here or in the United States, may have a screw or bolt bought for it which will fit in any place. That would be what I would call like-mindedness. I should also like them to let our wheat in there without the 42-cent tariff. I should like us to let their radios in here without any tariff on them. I should like many of those things to come about before we can say that we are like-minded to them or that they are like-minded to us. I do not think we should just plan for our defence equipment.

I know that, in the opinion of others, it might interfere with some of the profit industries of this country. But again I draw to the attention of the committee that if we, unfortunately, some day have to go to war again, then profit and all other privileges of citizens will have to take not only second place, but a place quite low down on the list in comparison with other national needs. Therefore, when we start to standardize, let us try to get others to be so friendly toward us and let us try to be so friendly toward them that we can forget some of our little past traditions of protected profit-making enterprise and have complete free trade and free exchange right across the border.

In conclusion, I wish to ask the minister a question which he was asked this afternoon but did not reply to. The hon. member for Regina City asked the minister this question about military properties which have been turned over to War Assets: To what extent have properties been turned over to War Assets Corporation and then others bought to replace those disposed of? There is a good deal of feeling in parts of the country that too much of that sort of thing has gone on, that some individuals have reaped the benefit, and that the Canadian taxpayers must now replace those things which went for little, or certainly not enough, to private individuals and which must be replaced as military equipment.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall reply at once to the hon. member for Swift Current with regard to his last question. Referring to the question asked by the hon. member for Regina City as to what properties had been turned over to War Assets Corporation and then other properties bought in order to replace them, I can answer, absolutely none by the Department of National Defence, and I do not know of any by any other government department.

The other question the hon. member asked, to which I think I should refer, was in relation to point No. 10 in the objectives I set out, which reads:

> Support for Canadian Arsenals Limited and a limited number of Canadian industries to maintain and increase skills in the design and manufacture of munitions and aircraft.

If I had not put in the word "limited" I am sure someone would have asked, how much support; for what industries; how can we support all industries; why should we support industries, and so on? The fact is there are a limited number of Canadian industries which have developed special skills in the production of munitions and aircraft which are not economic in peace time but which it is valuable to continue and which can be continued with a certain limited amount of assistance through orders, and the like; and we hope to be able to assist a very limited number of industries in the way I have indicated.

Mr. BENTLEY: Without being too critical, I think the minister might well have worded the paragraph a little more clearly. If he had said, "those industries which are especially equipped" in the way he has just described, we would have understood.

Mr. CLAXTON: I should think that would be understood by anyone.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have no desire to make a speech, but I want to ask a question. In referring to that branch of the service which won both wars, my understanding of the answer given by the minister to the previous speaker was that a private in the army will receive the same pay as the corresponding rank in the air force. Is that correct?

Mr. CLAXTON: Right.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then I want to ask the minister this question so that his answer will be on record. What pay does a private in the army receive? I do not know whether you have two ranks for privates in the army now, but I also want to know what pay is received by an L.A.C., which I believe is the correct term for the man in the air force. I have a couple more questions, the answers to which I want on record also. They slipped it over on the army during the war, and they are not going to do so in peace time if I have anything to say about the matter. I am an army man. I want to know what uniform the private or corresponding rank in the air force gets; what uniform and equipment the private in the army gets, and whether they get the same treatment in the army in regard to transportation as they get in the air force. In order to explain to the minister what I mean, during the war when a private was being taken across Canada he went in a colonist car, while an L.A.C. in the air force went in a tourist car. I have every respect for the air force, but no one can tell me that an air force man needs sheets more than an army man. I can tell the minister I am serious about this. I want to know definitely, and I want it on the record, what is the pay of every rank in the army and every rank in the air force? I am speaking of other ranks now, because when you get up to the generals and vice-admirals they are all air marshals or something like that, particularly when they want to be superannuated and get a pension. Is there any difference in any shape or form between the treatment given a private in the army and that given an L.A.C. in the air force? If so, what is the difference, and why?

Mr. CLAXTON: The pay of all equivalent ranks in the three services was put on exactly the same basis and at the same rates last year. The basic rate of pay for a private on entry is $50; for a trained private, $54; for a private first class, $61; after three years, $64, and after six years, $67. In addition there is a separation allowance and a marriage allowance, which are exactly the same for the three services. All other conditions of service I can think of, including pensions, are identical for the three services. The uniforms still have some differences—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, yes.

Mr. CLAXTON: They are different uniforms.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And the air force gets the best.

Mr. CLAXTON: The navy, the army and the air force do wear different uniforms; but there is a committee of the three services called the senior supply officers committee, and another one called the personnel members committee, of the top people of the three services in those two fields, which have to clear all new provisions, and any existing differences are being worked out. I must say I share the view of the hon. member who has just spoken. I could see no reason why three Canadians who enlisted from the same house and who happened to wear the uniforms of the navy, the army and the air force, should have received during the war different rates of pay, different scales of rations and different uniforms. Except for the uniforms that are essential to the functioning of their services and in accordance with their traditions, our aim—and we are rapidly approaching it—is to have them on exactly the same basis for all three services. I believe that all three services are on exactly the same basis in every other particular.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then will the minister answer my question as to the rates of pay? I understand that he has given them for the army?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Now will he give me the rates of pay for members of the air force, so that there will be no misunderstanding?

Mr. CLAXTON: The ranks in the air force are aircraftman second class, equivalent to a private on entry; aircraftman first class, equivalent to a private, trained; leading aircraftman, equivalent to private first class. Exactly the same rates of pay prevail for the same service.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In other words, there is no difference between a private in the army and a private in the air force, whatever he is called?

Mr. CLAXTON: An aircraftman; no.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then suppose you are moving an army man from Camp Borden to the best camp you have in Canada, at Chilliwack, and you are also moving a man the same day from Camp Borden, where you have some air force men, in Patricia Bay; do they have the same accommodation on the trains, whether they are on leave or on duty; if so, when did that come into effect?

Mr. CLAXTON: For every equivalent rank in the three services the transportation allowance, living allowance and subsistence allowance while travelling are identical.

Mr. HARKNESS: I have been waiting so long to make a few remarks on this matter that if I had not a fairly good memory I would have completely forgotten what I was going to talk about. I am sorry I was not in the house this morning for the major portion of the minister's statement. However, from the report in the newspapers and the comment I have heard, together with the way in which he has answered the questions which have been asked this afternoon and this evening, I believe I must express my appreciation and, I am sure, the appreciation of a large number of other people for the marked increase over the past two years in the frankness and, I think I can say, the definiteness he has shown in giving parliament the general policy in regard to defence, and in answering questions. Perhaps this improvement may be due to the fact that the minister is an ex-gunner, as are a considerable number of members of the house, including myself, I am glad to say; and that as a result he learned to shoot straight and has not forgotten. However that may be, I hope it will not be taken as any reflection on any other service. I should like the hon. member for Fraser Valley particularly to remember that some two years ago I made a plea to make the pay of infantrymen in action the highest of any servicemen. I still believe that would be a reasonable move.

However I wish to speak chiefly about the reserve army. I believe the minister knows that for many years before the war I had and at the present time still have an interest in the reserve army. Between the last session of parliament and this one, I believe I saw and talked to, at various conferences, nearly every commanding officer of reserve units in Alberta. Among them I found a general feeling such as that expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard; it is a feeling of discouragement. In some instances the commanders of these reserve force units were ready to give up, and in each instance the cause of discouragement was that they found it extremely difficult to stir up interest among the younger men in their respective communities to get them to enlist in reserve force units.

They were almost universal in their belief that this lack of interest was due to the fact that the government had not stated a definite defence policy. However I believe the minister's statement of this afternoon will go some distance toward correcting that condition. They were further convinced of the fact that when such a statement of policy was made—and they believed it should be made immediately—it should be publicized and that the department should take means to bring home to the general citizens of Canada the fact that the reserve army is necessary, and that it is the duty of able-bodied young men to devote a certain amount of their time to reserve army, air force or naval training, as the case may be.

I believe these men, whose experience covered the province, were correct. I do not believe we shall have a successful reserve army, nor shall we be able to recruit our reserve force units up to any reasonable strength until steps are taken to impress upon the general public the fact that the defence army is necessary and that every encouragement should be given to people to join reserve units.

I was glad to hear the minister mention citizens' committees this afternoon which, I believe, were set up in every locality in Alberta to increase interest and to give support to the reserve units in their particular communities. I believe, however, the minister was under some slight misapprehension as to who started those committees. The man responsible for that was Colonel Eric Snow, who at that time was in command of military district No. 13. My information is that he evolved the idea and had some of the committees started. The idea seemed such a good one that General Worthington then introduced it into his whole command. I believe that since that time an effort has been made to make it effective throughout Canada. I would ask the minister to indicate what success the movement has had and to what extent citizens' committees have been established throughout Canada, because I believe they will prove, with proper support by way of publicity from the government, one of the most potent means of making our reserve army a success.

I believe the whole question of our reserve army policy should be given more thought. I am very doubtful, as are other reserve force officers, as to the possibilities of a six-division reserve force. The minister said this afternoon it was never intended that all the units of these six reserve force divisions would be brought up to full strength. However, so far I have been able to observe, an effort has been made to activate all or practically all those of any size. The result is that in a city like Calgary with a population of about 100,000 we have three regiments of artillery. It is true that the batteries of two of those regiments are scattered. Then, we have an infantry battalion, a tank regiment, a complete divisional army service corps set-up, or at least a lieutenant-colonel's command of army service corps. We have an engineers company, a field ambulance corps, an ordnance corps, a signals company and so on.

To bring those units up to strength would require, I should think, at least 7,000 men. There just are not 7,000 young men in Calgary, and there are not going to be—indeed I do not think there should be the hope that there would be—who will be willing to serve in the reserve army under anything like present circumstances. In addition, the navy and the air force are bidding for the services of these young men.

Considerable thought should be given to the whole scheme of a six-division reserve army. I do not believe Canada can possibly support it, and I do not believe we can get the men into it. We were not able to support six divisions during the last war, and had trouble to support five. It seems to me that the scheme is too ambitious, and should be recast to something which would be more capable of efficient operation. I offer that suggestion to the minister in the hope that it will be received in the spirit in which it has been offered, namely, one of sincere desire for the improvement and success of the reserve army.

There is one other observation by the minister with respect to the reserve army upon which I should like to comment. He said that in the past year an effort has been made to secure a training nucleus of officers, non-commissioned officers and staffs, with administrative and training officers in each unit. Theoretically that sounds all right; but from the practical point of view and from experience, let me tell the minister that if a group of officers and non-commissioned officers have no men to train they lose interest, because they have nothing to do. It is practically hopeless to attempt to bring down a group of officers and non-commissioned officers once or twice a week to have them go through a course of training when they have no men to train and to work with. In other words, in actual practice and from experience I know this just does not work out, although theoretically it may appear all right. If the minister expects the reserve army to be a success efforts must be made to get men into the reserve units. In fact, they must be got in, or the nucleus of officers and non-commissioned officers will disappear, so that we shall have nothing.

Somebody told me that the minister had said that there would be some sort of recruiting scheme carried on this fall. Will that be for the permanent force or for the reserve force as well?

Mr. CLAXTON: Both.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am glad to hear that. I should like the minister to tell the committee on what scale it is to be carried on and what form it will take. I do not want him to go into details, but perhaps he can give us a general idea of what is to be done along that line. It certainly is necessary. The minister was to give some figures to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in regard to the numbers in a typical reserve army unit. When he is giving those figures, will he give the number of men in the reserve army by commands?

The reason I ask that is this. The people in Alberta are extremely interested in knowing what is the situation. Some six to eight months ago, when most of the commanding officers were discouraged over the situation, army officials were telling them that the situation in the reserve units in the west, particularly in Alberta, was the best in the dominion, that they were doing very well and to keep up the good work. They were told that they had more men than anywhere else in the dominion. The general idea among those men at that time was that if that was the case the reserve force was certainly in a bad way. Therefore I should like the minister to put those figures on the record.

There are one or two other points in connection with the permanent force brigade group matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver South. There is no doubt that in 1945 and 1946 we were assured that this brigade group would be an absolutely up-to-scratch force which would be trained for airborne operations and would be ready to move more or less on one or two days notice against any small attack which might be made. In other words, it was to be an up-to-the-minute force capable of immediate activity. We are now told that it has a strength of only some 2,000 men, that it is scattered all over the country and that there is no idea of bringing it together as a group. It seems to me that you have not a brigade group at all; you have not anything. All you have are men scattered here and there over the country who are not serving any useful purpose as a fighting force. They may be serving a useful purpose for training certain reserve units, for providing a training ground for permanent force officers and so on, but that is about all.

There is a disproportionate number of people, it seems to me, employed at national defence headquarters, on command staffs and so on. That number should be cut down a bit and this brigade group built up into a force of which we would be proud, into a fighting force. During the war it was found beneficial to switch men from staff duties to regimental duties. That policy was generally followed, and I would suggest to the minister that men be switched from the brigade group to staff jobs of various sorts and from staff jobs to the brigade group. I think that would be most beneficial as far as our permanent force is concerned.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member must know that those kinds of changes go on steadily. For example, the commanding officer of one of the active force units at Calgary was recently moved to take a staff course. On the other point, there is no intention not to activate and form into one outfit this brigade group.

Mr. HARKNESS: I did not think there were enough in the brigade group to permit changes.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is coming along. With regard to the number of units, I carry the figure in my head. In order to constitute a six-division army out of 180,000 men of the reserve in Canada it would take about 2,000 units. At the present time we have somewhere in the neighbourhood of 650 units. My hon. friend will see that his idea is already being acted upon.

Mr. Harkness: It is mainly the larger units which have been activated, rather than the small units?

Mr. CLAXTON: In a country like Canada it is most important to have units where the population is. For example, a unit like the South Saskatchewan, which probably was not very active in peace time, was one of the best regiments we had in war-time. The fact that it had a nucleus in existence enabled it to mobilize and raise its officers and non-commissioned officers rapidly, so that it proved a useful thing to have.

The hon. member asked what success had attended the effort to have citizens' committees throughout the country. That is not a new thing. For years units have had committees back of them. What is new is that, possibly at Colonel Sims' suggestion, General Worthington made it universal throughout his whole command. As the hon. member said, that has been a great success, and I think it is spreading throughout other commands.

Mr. HARKNESS: To what extent has it been successful throughout the others?

Mr. CLAXTON: It has spread gradually as units can form committees or as committees can be formed for units. It has not been applied as an order, because this is the kind of thing which should grow spontaneously in the community under the encouragement of the G.O.C. of the command or the officers commanding the unit. It is being encouraged and worked on.

With the other remarks of the hon. member I have a great deal of sympathy, and I will give consideration to a great deal of what he has said. With regard to the general policy in connection with the reserve, the policy has been to form, first, a nucleus of officers and non-commissioned officers. That is following largely along the lines of the discussions we had with the reserve representatives. I can remember several of them saying that they had to get going on the basis of officers and non-commissioned officers and tradesmen strength before they could do very much with men. As the hon. member and all those familiar with this will agree, it is a question of timing. As soon as you get the officer and non-commissioned officer and unit organization working, then you must get the men for them to train. We are trying to work on that timing as well as we can.

Mr. LENNARD: Before saying a word on the Royal Canadian Sea Cadets, I should like to say that I was pleased to hear the minister state this morning that living quarters would soon be available for married personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy in the Halifax area. I know he knows that there are many cases where great hardship has been experienced. I have had several cases brought to my attention where families have had to live hundreds of miles from Halifax. I know of one case where the family needed fatherly discipline. The man was interested in his work in the navy but, because his family had to live hundreds of miles away, he became greatly dissatisfied with his situation. As I say, I was pleased to bear the minister state that that situation would soon be rectified.

Mr. CLAXTON: We are going to do our utmost to correct it as soon as we can.

Mr. LENNARD: In connection with the Royal Canadian Sea Cadets, as I said before in this house, I know of no movement in Canada over the past few years which has done so much for the youth of this country. It is not a flash in the pan. The Navy League of Canada has been operating for years. A great deal of the personnel of our Canadian navy of the past years was furnished and made available because of the Royal Canadian Sea Cadets movement. In that connection I should like to quote Frank S. Rutherford, deputy minister of education of Ontario. He was appointed a few months ago. He said in part:

> My association with the navy league sea cadet movement has convinced me that the training provided is essentially good, whether a young man enters the navy or civilian employment. Naval training presents opportunities for the use of mind and hand which are bound to be affected in any type of employment.

[Mr. Claxton.]

The associations which a young man will make in the sea cadets will be lasting and most helpful in the years to come.

I would go a step farther than that, and I believe the minister will agree with me. The Royal Canadian Sea Cadet Corps have within their ranks reserves for the navy of tomorrow or when they are desired. I would urge the minister to give every consideration to expanding that service. I know that a few months ago the cadet services were curtailed, and through negotiations with the navy league, I believe, certain adjustments were made. But there is one point I should like to draw to the minister's attention, which is one I brought up in the house some few months ago.

About a year ago, the sea cadet training officers were put on pay by the Department of National Defence. At that time I suggested that the remuneration should be in the form of clothing allowances and not as pay, because when it is given in the form of pay it is added to their income and the greater part of it is wiped out in income tax; it does not meet the purpose for which it was intended. Over the years, the sea cadets have given of their time and of their money. I know that, because I have been more or less actively engaged in the movement. They are constantly using their cars and different things to further the movement. When they are given pay it certainly does not go anywhere near recompensing them for the time and energy they put in the movement.

I should like to mention one other point. Certain curtailments were made in the size of corps, and there was also a restriction put on the units going to camp this year. Originally they were to go for one week. That was changed by the defence department and they were allowed the two weeks training as they had previously enjoyed, but the size of the unit that was allowed to go to camp was practically cut in half. One corps in which I am directly interested of one hundred cadets and officers was allowed to send to camp this year only forty cadets and two officers. I wish to bring that to the minister's attention, because it is discouraging to these boys, and especially to some of the boys who have worked hard all year in the hope that they would be selected to go to camp. It is a hardship; it is a discouragement to the officers and boys who are training. It should be considered and a change should be made, if not this year, next year to remedy the situation.

In closing, I wish to say that the sea cadet movement of Canada is one of the finest youth training schemes we have had. In its ranks you have the reserve navy of tomorrow.

Mr. FULTON: I wish to ask the minister a few questions with regard to cadet training in Canada, but before I do so I want to say a few words about the statement which he gave this morning which, as has already been said, is perhaps the first clear statement we have had since this parliament convened as to what would be our defence policy. Some of the things which were pointed out a short time ago by the hon. member for Swift Current as to bringing the training of our forces into a form which will make certain that they are attractive to all people of the country so that it will be realized there is a real career in the service for men of ability and activity, are important. They have been said before in the house. I shall not go over them, but I should like to emphasize what seems to me to be one of the most essential things today, and I hope that that aspect of the matter will be emphasized in the recruiting programme which the minister has indicated will be brought into effect this fall; giving our engineers practical work to do in the country which will make a contribution, not only to their training, but to the development of the country; giving the signal corps in the various services practical work in the construction of communication systems, which will not only be of value to them as training but be of value in building up the communication system of Canada. These things should be emphasized so that the training of our forces will equip them, in order that when they retire from the forces at the reduced age which is now in effect they will be able to take their place in the civilian life of the country on an equal footing with other persons who have not been in the forces, but who have perhaps been on a superior level because their training and experience will all have been practical.

With regard to the cadet programme for Canada, I should like to say at the outset, as has just been said by the hon. member for Wentworth with reference to the navy, the cadet corps in this country are certainly the pool from which normally one would expect the armed services to be drawn.

At the outset one should pay a tribute to the work which has been done by civilian personnel and by officers in connection with cadet training. It would not be proper to stop at that. One should also pay a tribute to the provinces in this field, and to the work of the ministries of education of the various provinces. We recall that during the war they were urged to try to bring up their cadet training programme so that practically one hundred per cent of those attending secondary schools would be receiving cadet training. It is a fact perhaps worth recording that in some of the provinces, in one at any rate, a programme was worked out by agreement with the Department of National Defence, so that one hundred per cent of those boys in secondary schools would receive cadet training. The importance of this is not only in the military value which those young men themselves will get from it, and therefore our armed forces will get, but the value to the whole country in training in citizenship which will follow and the contribution to the health and welfare of our youth. Perhaps these aspects are as important as the military value which can be derived from any cadet scheme.

In the light of these remarks I should like to refer briefly to an outline of the programme given by the minister on February 17, at which time he indicated to the house that, although certain reductions were contemplated, it was not intended actually to reduce the number of cadet corps in training in this country. The minister said that, following the end of the present school year, army cadet training would be organized in two types, open corps affiliated with reserve corps units and school corps sponsored by boards of education, some of which are also affiliated with reserve units. At the end of that statement on February 17 he said, as reported at page 506 of Hansard:

> There will be no reduction in the number of cadet corps of boys who fall within the classes I mentioned, aged fourteen to eighteen, provided that they are organized in corps of twenty or more.

Since that time there have been indications that there is a substantial reduction in the number of cadets authorized to receive training in our schools throughout the country. I suppose that might have been done partly as an economy measure. Certainly it was indicated that some saving was to be effected by it. We all realize that saving is essential; but it seems to me, since the major contribution to cadet training is made by the provinces in the schools in which the training is taken, the saving will be negligible. I think I could go so far as to say it is another typical case where the government is taking a step in the wrong direction and at the wrong time, because the value of this cadet training, in terms of citizenship and in increase in health and welfare in the country, cannot be measured in terms of the money expended on it. The saving itself is certainly negligible and far more than offset by the value that would be derived from a thoroughgoing scheme of cadet training.

I would ask the minister some questions with regard to the present programme. Were notices sent out by the Department of National Defence or the various headquarters or any of them in the country to school principals that they must reduce the number of cadets in training?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, certainly. The cadets in respect of whom the federal government would pay the grants would be cadets in schools who had entered in September, in the 9th grade, and were under eighteen years of age, and in open corps cadets between the ages of fourteen and eighteen. That was gone into fully in the house on February 17 when the same question was asked and the same answer given. As far as I know, it has been acted on.

Mr. FULTON: In the light of that statement I would ask whether any notice was given at that time to the provincial governments and the ministers of education concerned that this cut would be made.

Mr. CLAXTON: The question of defence is a federal matter. The designation of the cadets in respect of whom the federal government pays money voted by parliament for defence purposes is a federal matter. It always has been and I do not know why it should not be. The question of cadets regarding whom federal grants are paid has always been a matter for federal determination. The communication was issued, as far as I know, in exactly the same way as all other communications have been issued with regard to cadets.

Mr. FULTON: The point is that there was in effect in one province an agreement made with the Department of National Defence and approved by the then ministers of national defence, that they would train all their boys in secondary schools, and they were prepared to pay their share of the cost of doing that. It seems that, subsequent to that agreement, notices were sent out from various defence establishments in the country that they would be required to cut down the number of cadets in training. I would ask whether any arrangement was sought to be reached with the provincial governments in that connection, since the provincial governments made their contribution and their ministers of education were anxious to continue cadet training. It is unfortunate the attitude was taken that this is so exclusively a federal matter, that we had already reached an agreement with the provinces, that there should be unilateral action to vary that agreement without consultation with provinces which were anxious to continue such training.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. CLAXTON: Notification was made in this case, as in all other cases where there have been changes. Agreements were made with all the provinces in 1911 under the Strathcona trust and during the thirty years since, the Department of National Defence, under various names, has made changes in accordance with the votes and provisions for training, and those changes have been notified as they have been made. I have never heard it suggested before that, prior to making any change, the Department of National Defence should secure the acquiescence or agreement of each of the nine provinces. That is a new notion.

Mr. FULTON: Perhaps not with each of the nine before the department makes any change in any one province; but certainly, inasmuch as cadets are trained in the secondary schools, if there is to be a change in the basis on which training is given, I should imagine the intention to make the change and the working out of the change would be a matter of consultation with the province.

Mr. CLAXTON: There are in every command cadet officers available for consultation, and they consult with the local educational officers.

Mr. FULTON: I recall that sometime earlier this year a public statement was made by the premier of one province to the effect that in that province they were willing and anxious to continue, and I believe he went so far as to say they would continue, cadet training in their secondary schools for all boys in those schools. I want to know whether the minister has received any official communications from any provincial minister of education asking that he reconsider the position and inquiring whether the department will not enter into consultation with the provinces to work out some scheme whereby universal cadet training in secondary schools can be continued.

Mr. CLAXTON: The only communication received from any provincial educational authority was one I received last week from the minister of education of Ontario. The communication was dated June 25. It was the first I had heard from a provincial minister with regard to this matter and I made a reply. The officers of the department of education concerned with cadets and the officers of the Department of National Defence were in communication back at the end of February and the beginning of March, but these direct communications were stopped, and this is the first I have heard about it since.

Mr. FULTON: The direct communications were stopped? That, I think, is unfortunate.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think it is very unfortunate. They were stopped by the province of Ontario.

Mr. FULTON: Well, the public statement made by the minister of education of Ontario was to the effect that they desired to continue 100 per cent cadet training in their schools.

Mr. CLAXTON: We shall be glad to cooperate with them on the terms we announced.

Mr. FULTON: What was the last communication received—June 25? Was that a request to reopen negotiations?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not suppose I should table that letter without the consent of the premier. I certainly have no objection to tabling it, or yet my reply, but that letter was one in which he referred to a state of uncertainty in the province of Ontario with regard to this matter and to his own attitude. Until I secure some consent from him to tabling the letter, I probably should not go any farther. The fact is that the first sign of any difficulty that came to my attention as a result of the communication from the province of Ontario was this letter of June 25, which was just about four months after the announcement of policy I had made; a little more than four months.

Mr. FULTON: Is the minister considering a revision of the policy or some steps to enable—

Mr. CLAXTON: No. We have announced that we are not in favour of continuing junior cadets, and we propose to make federal grants from the federal treasury with respect to senior cadets; that is, cadets generally speaking in school cadet corps who enter the ninth grade on September 1, and who have not reached the age of eighteen, and in open corps who are between the ages of fourteen and eighteen. We do not propose any more to make grants in respect of junior cadets. That is a definite government and department policy arrived at, we think, for sound reasons, and we have no disposition whatever to change that. I do not think there is any desire on the part of the country that we should.

Mr. FULTON: Have the department any objections, or have they made any representations against the provinces continuing cadet training outside of the categories which the minister has just mentioned?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have not had any representations with regard to cadets from any province except Ontario, and the letter of the minister of education does not suggest extending the ages. He does not deal with the question of ages.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope my hon. friend opposite is through with his questions. I have only two questions to ask the minister, and they are clearcut, concise and precise. I hope the minister will be kind enough to give me a clear answer. In the first place, I want to know if the experts of his department believe that Canada will be the theatre of the next war. In the second place, I want to know if we can expect peace-time compulsory training this year, or if it has been put aside for some time.

Before the minister answers, I will draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the fact that the discussion has been going on for a whole day on item 551. There is another item, 552, in the demobilization and reconversion part of the estimates. Then at page 25 of the estimates there are ten other items which are as yet untouched. As I look at the list, I see that we still have quite a large number of items to pass. There is the auditor general, finance, part of fisheries, governor general and lieutenant governors, insurance, labour, legislation, mines and resources; all of national defence, all of labour, all of mines and resources, all of national revenue—

Mr. MacNICOL: Reconstruction.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes; and the Prime Minister's office, privy council office, reconstruction and supply, veterans affairs, loans and investments; and under demobilization and reconversion, auditor general, finance, fisheries, labour, mines and resources, national defence, privy council office, reconstruction and supply, trade and commerce and veterans affairs. There are several hundred items. If we do not catch a fast train, we shall stay here for a long time, and we can say good-bye to summer as we did last year. This is not a lecture to anyone; it is an olive branch that I show to all.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member had better sit down.

Mr. POULIOT: As I say, it is an olive branch that I show to all, in the expectation that there will be a certain spirit of cooperation and that we shall all do our best to bring the session to an end. I may tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I had some very fine stuff about the brass hats, about the dealings of the Canadian Department of National Defence, the British government, the United States government, the United States army, the British army and so on; but I have put all that aside, to think it over, and have not said a word about it. I asked two short questions about matters of general concern. I hope there will be more of a spirit of conciliation. Members may ask questions, as we have heard them ask them all day, but it will not change a single vote in the great old city of Halifax on Monday next. This must be kept in mind. While I am sure that hon. members have not that objective in view when they discuss the estimates, I will tell you what I have in view, Mr. Chairman. It is to get home as soon as possible.

Mr. GREEN: Then why does the hon. member not go?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not want to interfere with the fundamental freedom of speech of all hon. members.

Mr. MacINNIS: Eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes; and I leave it at that. I wonder if it would not be possible to pass at least one estimate immediately after the minister has answered my question?

Mr. CLAXTON: To answer the first question, not possible for a good many years; to answer the second question, no.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you very much.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Chairman, I have been in the public accounts committee since three o'clock, and I should like to ask a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. STOKES: I should like to ask the minister a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. CLAXTON: If the hon. member has only one question, could we not pass one item?

Mr. STOKES: I am not sure whether I am asking this question under the proper item or not. My question has to do with the moneys which were expended in the Belleville armouries, principally in regard to the laying of a concrete floor. This floor in the Belleville armouries was laid in 1945, and was relaid in the early part of this year. The returns which I have been furnished show the expense for laying the floor in 1945 to be $2,770; and this year $4,344 were spent to replace that floor.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. KNOWLES: It is eleven o'clock. We cannot get an item through. Why go on?

Mr. STOKES: It was an asphalt floor laid in 1945. My information is that the inspector of the work refused to pass it at the time. According to the return I have, the contractor was paid for the work, and the floor proved to be practically useless; it was going to pieces. During the early part of this year the floor was torn up and another asphalt floor was laid. The inference is that something was wrong with the first floor; and I understand that the inspector would not take the responsibility of passing the work.

Another question I should like to ask the minister is whether there is anything in these estimates for the erection of an armoury at Trenton, Ontario.

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. GREEN: What was the answer to the other question?

Mr. CLAXTON: In regard to the first question, return No. 286 was brought down in answer to order of the house on June 18, 1947. It shows expenditures of $683.09 for material and $169.32 for labour, and also $3,514.97 on the armoury to which the hon. member refers. I believe the information was given then. If the hon. member has any further questions I shall be glad to answer them directly.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The question was whether the contractor was paid when the inspector did not approve the work. That is a simple question.

Mr. CLAXTON: I will have to look into the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Can we carry this one item?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FRASER: I would not agree to this item being carried unless the minister would guarantee that I would be allowed to ask three questions on another item tomorrow.

Mr. CLAXTON: Very well; I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 10, 1947

The house met at eleven o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Fifth report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines—Mr. Breithaupt.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LACOMBE—LOOTERS IN THE CONSTITUENCY OF LAVAL-TWO MOUNTAINS—PROTECTION OF THE R.C.M.P.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Looters have invaded my constituency, at Saint-Eustache. I request for my constituents the protection of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Those bandits are breaking into houses ravaged by the floods which have caused damages amounting to more than one million dollars. The Right Hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) will no doubt issue instructions accordingly.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND AND THIRD REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. DAVID CROLL (Spadina) moved that the second report of the standing committee on industrial relations, presented on Tuesday, July 8, be now concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. FLEMING: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, does that not have to be a separate motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. MacKINNON: They are separate motions.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is the procedure which is being followed. I have presented the motion which was that the second report of the standing committee on industrial relations be now concurred in. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a minute, Mr. Speaker. What is the motion, please? Is it that the second report be now concurred in?

Mr. SPEAKER: That the second report of the standing committee on industrial relations, presented on Tuesday, July 8, be now concurred in.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is no desire for a debate on the report, Mr. Speaker, I quite agree to its being concurred in at this moment. But if it is likely to give rise to a debate at this stage of the session I should like to point out certain reasons why concurrence should not be given at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CROLL moved that the third report of the standing committee on industrial relations be concurred in.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West) presented the fourth report of the special joint committee on Indian Affairs, as follows:

Pursuant to orders of reference dated 13th February 1947, your committee has held 67 meetings and has heard 102 witnesses, including departmental officials, church dignitaries and Indian representatives from all provinces in Canada except the maritimes which were visited last autumn by a commission under the Inquiries Act, appointed by order in council PC. 3797, dated 11th October, 1946.

Embodied in the minutes of evidence, as appendices thereto, are 153 written briefs or submissions received by your committee from Indian bands or organizations and from other Canadian individuals or groups interested in the welfare and well-being of our natives of Indian descent. The minutes of proceedings and evidence cover approximately 2,500 pages.

Your committee was instructed to "continue and complete" the examination and consideration of the Indian Act. However, the actual recasting, or revision of that Act, which is long overdue, could not possibly be attempted until a full opportunity had been afforded to all interested parties to make representations in that regard.

Your committee is agreed that the joint committee on Indian Affairs which was appointed in 1946 was warranted, as it reported to parliament, in adopting a programme which envisaged the revision of the Indian Act only during the 1948 session of parliament.

The 1946 joint committee on Indian Affairs, on August 15th last, also reported:

> ...The hearing of departmental officials has disclosed the necessity for certain administrative improvements which can be effected without the revision of any existing legislation and which, when put into effect, will remove some of the causes out of which have arisen grievances and complaints of many Indians...

Your present committee notes with extreme regret that recommendation No. 8 of the said report of August 15th, 1946, which was concurred in by both houses of parliament, has not yet been implemented.

That recommendation was:

...8. That more direct methods be employed for the return of rentals collected on the behalf of Indian lessors.

Your committee, therefore, recommends:

1. That immediate steps be taken by all responsible officials to remove without further delay this long standing grievance with regard to rentals due to Indians, and your committee further finds and recommends:

2. That a commission, in the nature of a claims commission, be set up with the least possible delay to inquire into the terms of all Indian treaties, in order to discover and determine such rights and obligations as may therein be involved, or any subsequent substitution therefor, and to appraise and settle in a just and equitable manner any claims or grievances arising thereunder;

3. That the questions involving band membership be left for definition and determination during the 1948 session when the Indian Act is next examined and considered;

4. That immediately parliament next reassembles a special joint committee be constituted with powers similar to those granted your committee on 13th February last;

5. That the matter of enfranchisement of Indians be left for further consideration when the Indian Act is under revision;

6. Certain Indian bands resident on "lands reserved for Indians", particularly in the province of Quebec, are compelled to pay taxes other than those imposed by dominion legislation. It is therefore recommended that a reference be made to the proper court to determine the legality of any taxation imposed on Indians;

7. That encroachments of persons other than Indian upon lands reserved for Indians are not reviewed with favour by either the members of the Indian band concerned nor by the Indian Affairs branch. It is recommended that the Indian Affairs branch take immediate steps, consistent with the wishes of the Indian bands concerned, to remove from Indian reserves all persons other than Indians who reside in, or carry on business on an Indian reserve;

8. That the whole matter of education of Indians be left over for further consideration. In the meantime, however, it is recommended that all educational matters, including the selection and appointment of teachers in Indian schools be placed under the direct and sole responsibility of the Indian Affairs branch;

9. That the administration of all aspects of Indian Affairs should be under one ministerial head.

10. The director of the Indian Affairs branch should be given the status, if not the rank, of deputy minister to permit him to have direct approach to his and other departmental heads; or, he should be named a commissioner who shall rank as a deputy minister and who shall have at least two assistant commissioners of whom one should be a Canadian of Indian descent;

11. That Indians who are qualified for any position in the administration of Indian Affairs, at any level, be given a preference for appointment to such positions within that administration for which they qualify or are suited;

12. That when the Director of Indian Affairs becomes aware that an Indian agent will shortly be leaving the service, he should, in ample time before the said agent retires, request that the Civil Service Commission select and appoint a successor to the said agent, so that there shall be no interruption in the carrying out of the duties of that most important office in Indian administration, that of Indian agent;

13. That the retiring leave of any agent or officer in Indian administration be granted to him simultaneously with the payment to him in a lump sum of his leave payments instead of retaining him on the payroll pending actual retirement. This in order that the position may be filled without delay by the person selected and appointed to succeed the retiring agent or officer;

14. That whenever possible a vacant position of Indian agent be filled by the promotion of an assistant agent who will have had the opportunity of receiving training in all the duties of an Indian agent;

15. That in view of the fact that Indian reserves are widely scattered across Canada, and in view of the diversity of the problems confronting those charged with the administration of Indian Affairs, the Indian Affairs branch should be decentralized and the regional directors be appointed to look after and to determine such matters as appropriately fall within this particular regional jurisdiction;

16. That the establishment for the Indian Affairs branch be increased to provide for the appointment of a sufficient number of Indian agents and Indian agents-at-large, to provide for the adequate and proper administration of Indian reserves.

17. That when a promotion from the staff of an agency is not possible, a promotion should, when practicable, be made from junior officers in the district who may desire promotion and who are suited and qualified for a senior post;

18. That when promotion within the staff of an agency is not feasible, the field of competition for applications from the general public should be made wide enough to ensure the selection and appointment of a fully qualified person;

19. That examinations, whenever possible, should be conducted by the district offices of the Civil Service Commission rather than at headquarters of the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa;

20. That Indian agents who have undergone a period of probation satisfactory to the Director of Indian Affairs should be made permanent civil servants at the end of such probationary period;

21. That, by order in council, appointments to the Indian affairs administration should no longer be subject to the "permanent quota" now in force, as imposed by treasury board regulations;

22. That the preference accorded to any veteran be consistently accorded with regard to all appointments to positions in the administration of Indian Affairs;

23. That future appointments of officials concerned with the administration of Indian Affairs should, where practicable, be restricted to applicants who have had previous experience in the field. Field officers in the said administration should, from time to time, be posted to the divisional or headquarters office of such administration;

24. That in the best interest of the administration of Indian Affairs, if there be officials therein who are incompetent, or incapacitated, or for any reason unable to fulfil their duties, such officials should be superannuated or retired from the service, without undue delay;

25. That the project of building a central governmental hospital in northern Indian agencies, with nursing stations in far outlying districts be proceeded with at once; and

26. That some statutory provision be made for the adequate care of aged, infirm or blind Indians; and that in the meantime rations given to properly care for Indians should be sufficient in quantity and quality.

Whilst your committee would like to express due appreciation to all those individuals and organizations who have rendered valuable assistance to the deliberations of your committee, we feel that occasion must be taken to single out for special mention the very valuable contribution made by Mr. William Zimmerman, Jr., Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Department of the Interior, U.S.A., who came to Ottawa to inform your committee with regard to the administration of Indian Affairs in the said United States of America.

A copy of the minutes of proceedings and evidence is tabled herewith.

Mr. BROWN moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, so far as the deputations which have appeared before this committee during the past two years are concerned, the committee was a great disappointment; it did not take the action which was requested. There is only one point they had to decide, namely, are the Indians citizens or not. They were here 186 years ahead of the British and French. Surely they are citizens; and if they are citizens they are entitled to all hospitalization and other services. It is really too bad that, after two years of talk and Cook's tours of the committee, nothing is done about it but talk.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that something ought to be said on this report before it is concurred in. I am not at all satisfied with the progress which is being made in dealing with our Indian problems in Canada. It seems to me that now is the time to register a protest. It looks to me as though all we as a parliament are endeavouring to do is to pass the buck, to use a common expression, in matters pertaining to the Indians. Last year we had a report from the committee on the Indian Act. It certainly was strong enough and certainly should have resulted in action this year, but no action has been forthcoming in any way commensurate with the recommendations of the committee. Now we have another report, and though I hesitate to say it, it looked to me as though the government had not even the interest in it to hear the report—

Mr. MacKINNON: Oh, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —because it was suggested that the reading of the report be dispensed with. Had that report been read, every member of the house would have been able to hear what the report was.

Mr. MacKINNON: That suggestion was not from the government side.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If this is an indication of the general attitude of the government to the Indian question, I think it is high time that the members of the house had a good deal to say about the matter.

Mr. MacKINNON: That did not come from the government side.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hearings of the Indian Act committee, I believe, have filled all members of the committee with grave concern with regard to affairs pertaining to the Indians in Canada. There is a serious shortage of educational facilities for the Indians. The Indian's means of earning a livelihood are far too inadequate. Much needs to be done in regard to that. The housing situation for the Indians is almost intolerable and their health conditions are simply deplorable. There is widespread unhappiness among the Indians because of the fact that many of the treaty obligations into which this government entered with them have not been observed; in fact, they have been broken.

I am speaking only in a broad and general way in order to avoid taking up an undue amount of our time, but I think what I have said is serious enough. I would urge the government that before this parliament meets again they have a programme which will really come to grips with the problem of the Indians and deal with it. As I recall it, our committee last year recommended that the old age pension be given to the Indians. Yet notwithstanding that, the old age pension was not given to the Indians this year, although an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act was brought in. That would seem to indicate that the government is prepared to flout the recommendations of the committee. All this indicates a serious situation, Mr. Speaker. I am not at all satisfied, and the Indians throughout this country are not satisfied.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BLACKMORE: On division.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL STYLE AND TITLES ACT

OMISSION OF WORDS "INDIAE IMPERATOR" AND "EMPEROR OF INDIA"

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 449, to provide for the alteration of His Majesty's royal style and titles.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise to a point of order in connection with this bill. It appears in the Votes and Proceedings today and it also appears on the order paper. If the Prime Minister wants the unanimous consent of the house, we are quite happy to give it; but unless that is done this procedure is irregular.

Mr. CHURCH: I am opposed to this change in the King's title, for the reasons I gave last Friday, Hansard, pages 5093-94. It will lead to civil war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say I was surprised myself when I saw this bill on the order paper this morning. I had given the notice of the bill to be placed on the Votes and Proceedings yesterday afternoon. If the house will give its unanimous consent to introduce the bill now, I would be pleased, and I think there is everything to be gained and nothing to lose by having the measure introduced at once. May I take it that I have the leave of the house to introduce the bill?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members will recall that in enumerating the measures which would be considered before the end of the session I was careful to say that some measures might come up of which I had no knowledge at the time I was referring to the remaining list of bills that would be brought in. This is a case in point. The request for the measure which I am now introducing came from the British government at the beginning of this week; I had no knowledge of any probability of this measure being introduced this session until I received the communication from his majesty's government in England with respect to what they hoped might take place before this session of parliament prorogued. For that reason I shall give the house immediately a more lengthy explanation in introducing the bill than otherwise might be necessary. The purpose of the bill is simply to delete the words "Indiae Imperator" and "Emperor of India" from the style and title of his majesty, but so that hon. members may see the significance of this proposal and also the necessity for it I will give the house some details as to the circumstances which have rendered it advisable to enact this proposal at this time.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Last week the United Kingdom government introduced in the House of Commons at Westminster the India independence bill. This bill provides for the setting up in India of two independent members of the commonwealth, India and Pakistan. It will take effect on August 15. Full legislative power is conferred by this bill on the legislature of each of these countries and provisions comparable to those of the Statute of Westminster are applied to them.

When this bill becomes effective the relation of His Majesty to India and Pakistan will be the same as his relation to the other fully self-governing nations of the commonwealth. It follows from this that the title "Emperor of India" which was added to the royal style and titles in 1877 will not be appropriate.

There has been included in the India independence bill a clause declaring that the parliament of the United Kingdom assents to the omission from the royal style and titles of the words "Indiae Imperator" and "Emperor of India."

In accordance with the recitals set out in the preamble of the Statute of Westminster the consent of each parliament in the commonwealth is necessary for an alteration in the royal style and titles. The purpose of the legislation which I am introducing is to give the assent of the Canadian parliament to the deletion of the words in question.

The matter of the general revision of the royal style and titles, raised earlier in this house, is not raised either by this bill or by the bill introduced in the house at Westminster. It is to be expected that this matter will be discussed at the next meeting of commonwealth prime ministers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read the second time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; next sitting. The purpose in giving an explanation of such length this morning was to give hon. members an opportunity to see for themselves exactly what the measure amounts to before second reading.

Mr. POULIOT: If I am permitted, may I ask the Prime Minister what is the meaning of "royal style"? Is it the royal status, or what?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a description, which speaks for itself; it is a style of address.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WARTIME HOUSING—NORTH VANCOUVER

Mr. GREEN:

1. What costs, additional to contract price, were incurred through the allocations of material to the contractor, in the wartime housing project in the city of North Vancouver, under which approximately 695 houses were constructed?

2. Were roads, sewers, water mains and septic tanks put in by contract on such project?

3. If so, who were the contractors and what amounts were paid to each of them?

4. What was the cost of the re-survey of the area?

5. Who carried out such re-survey?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No additional costs were incurred through the allocation of material to the contractor in the wartime housing project in the city of North Vancouver in which approximately 750 houses were constructed.

2. Yes.

3. Smith Brothers & Wilson were the general contractors and were paid an amount of $447,746.03 for this work.

4. No resurvey of the area was made. Survey costs $589.34.

5. The survey was carried out by J. Rodger Burnes, dominion and British Columbia land surveyor, Vancouver, B.C.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—J. E. SHIELDS

Mr. STOKES:

1. Has J. E. Shields, a solicitor of Kerrobert, Saskatchewan, during the years 1943 to date been retained by the wartime prices and trade board as prosecuting counsel?

2. If so, on how many cases?

3. What is the total amount of fees he has received in each of said years?

4. What was the amount of the accounts rendered by him during the said period and what was the total amount taxed off, if any, before payment?

5. Are there any outstanding bills of costs which have been rendered by him? If so, what amount?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Yes.

2. Thirteen.

3. Fiscal Years—

1943-44	$ 60.00
1944-45	166.36
1945-46	206.10
1946-47	523.80

PUBLIC WORKS—ACTING CHIEF ARCHITECT EXPENSES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

What is the total amount paid for expenses incurred by C. G. Brault, acting chief architect, in the year ending March 31, 1947?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): $283.52 (travelling expenses).

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

INCOME TAX—PROSECUTIONS, ARREARS, ETC.—SUCCESSION DUTIES

Mr. TIMMINS:

1. How many income tax centres are there in Canada and where are they situated?

2. What officer is in charge of each income tax centre; what is the name of the officer second in charge; what are their respective salaries, and how long has each been in the public service?

3. For the years 1943, 1944, 1945 and 1946, what are the arrears of income taxes in each of the income tax centres?

4. How many income tax cases were tried in the exchequer court or any other court, for income tax arrears in each of the years, 1943, 1944, 1945 and 1946?

5. How many prosecutions were instituted in each of the years 1943 to 1946, inclusive, for non-payment of income taxes?

6. How many persons in Canada are making payments in respect to income tax arrears after having been prosecuted or sued for such tax arrears?

7. What is the aggregate amount of said arrears?

8. How many of these cases are subject to payment by instalments, pursuant to settlement arrived at with the Minister of National Revenue or the deputy minister of national revenue or other departmental official, and what is the aggregate amount involved in such settlements?

9. How much money has been collected for succession duties, during each year since the Dominion Succession Duty Act came into force?

Mr. McCANN: Return tabled.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENT TO CREDIT TO CORPORATION GROSS PRIVATE RECEIVING AND BROADCASTING LICENCE FEES

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, to provide that the Minister of Finance shall deposit to the credit of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the gross amount of the moneys received in each year from licence fees in respect of private receiving licences and private station broadcasting licences without deducting therefrom any costs of collection or administration; with a consequent charge to the government for such costs of collection and administration.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been informed of the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. REID: On division.

Mr. CHURCH: It is one of the most mischievous corporations in Canada.

JAPANESE PEACE SETTLEMENT

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE AT CANBERRA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief announcement with respect to the conference of commonwealth nations to be held at Canberra on August 26 next.

At the invitation of the Australian government a meeting of representatives of the governments of the British commonwealth is being held in Canberra commencing on August 26 to exchange views in an exploratory and noncommittal way on the forthcoming Japanese peace settlement. The Canadian government will be represented by Hon. Brooke Claxton, Minister of National Defence, assisted by Mr. K. A. Greene, high commissioner for Canada in Australia, Mr. E. H. Norman, head of the Canadian liaison mission in Japan, Mr. R. E. Collins, alternate Canadian member on the Far Eastern commission, Washington. The governments of Australia, United Kingdom, New Zealand and South Africa will, I understand, also be represented by cabinet ministers.

No decisions will be taken at this Canberra meeting which will affect the freedom of action of the Canadian government at the Japanese peace conference which is to be held, but it is thought that this preliminary exchange of views will be helpful to all the governments concerned.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO SUBSIDIES TO DOMINION COAL COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, based upon a statement made by President Arthur Cross of the Dominion Coal Company to a meeting of the shareholders of that company in Montreal. He is reported as having said:

Federal subsidies now being negotiated will be based on a fixed amount per ton, which will be gradually reduced as production per man increases.

Is the government negotiating the payment of subsidies to the Dominion Coal Company? If so, will other producers of coal in the maritime provinces receive the same consideration?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Hon. members will recall that the royal commission on coal recommended an interim subsidy for the mines of Cape Breton island to permit remodelling of the operation in that area so it may become self-sustaining. The government at present is studying the operation of the mines on Cape Breton island, and is considering subsidy provisions which will extend not beyond the end of the calendar year and will be very modest in amount, but which it is hoped will bridge over the transition period.

The report of the royal commission made no reference to the mines in other areas in Canada. Therefore no consideration is being given to subsidies to other mines.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

IMMIGRATION—DISPLACED PERSONS

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources or the Secretary of State? On June 16 two orders for return standing in my name were approved by the house. The return to one was tabled today. When may I expect a return to the second?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I shall be glad to look into it immediately and endeavour to bring it down this week.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADDITIONAL ALLOWANCE TO GOVERNMENT AND OPPOSITION LEADERS IN SENATE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 443, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to provide an allowance of $7,000 to the leader of the government in the Senate, and an allowance of $4,000 to the leader of the opposition in the Senate, in addition to the regular allowance made as sessional indemnity. May I say at once, as was mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that this measure should be considered apart altogether from the personalities involved at the moment as leaders of the government and of the opposition in the Senate respectively. All hon. members will appreciate what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the effect that both leaders in the Senate are held in the highest regard and esteem by members not only of their own house but of this house as well.

The question to be considered at the moment is the particular question of whether a certain allowance should be made for the leader of the government in the other house and also for the leader of the opposition in the other house. So far as the principle of the measure is concerned, it has already met with acceptance in this house. I refer to the principle of giving to the leader of the opposition an additional allowance by statute for his service as leader of the opposition. The leader of the government, of course, receives a larger remuneration than ministers of the crown generally. That may be taken in part as a recognition of the duties which he has to perform as leader of the house as well as Prime Minister.

May I say a word first of the duties of the leader of the government in the other house. In most of the parliaments of the British commonwealth, the leader of the second chamber or upper chamber, whatever it may be called, is usually a member of the government who receives the salary of a minister of the crown. For example, in the United Kingdom, Lord Addison is a member of the House of Lords. He is also the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, and he receives the salary which goes with that important government position. In Australia, New Zealand and in South Africa I think the arrangement is often similar, that the leader of the upper house is a minister holding a portfolio in the government and receiving the larger salary which goes with the portfolio he holds. So far as the leaders of the opposition are concerned in other parliaments of the commonwealth, I think Australia is the only country which has made provision for the leader of the opposition in the upper house. I understand that a bill has just gone through making provision for the leader of the opposition in the upper house.

May I point out that both the positions are of great responsibility. They are on the side of the house to which they relate, the most responsible positions in the two houses, because the leaders have to do with carrying on the business of the house and their office efficiently and effectively. The purpose of this measure is solely that of enabling them to perform this public function and duty more effectively and efficiently than might otherwise be possible.

The present leader of the government in the Senate is a member of the government without portfolio. He has to give to his duties an amount of his time much greater than that of any other senator.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." I think everyone will agree with that. He has to give a greater amount of time to the business of the country than any other member of the Senate would be expected to give. In order to perform that duty efficiently the leader of the government in the Senate has to be familiar with the government's policy and programme in all particulars. To be familiar with the government's policy and programme he has to attend meetings of cabinet very regularly. He has to attend those meetings not only during the time when the Senate is in session but between sessions as well. If hon. members opposite ever come to have the experience of preparing a parliamentary programme they will realize that it involves a good deal of time and thought on the part of ministers, whether with or without portfolio, for some little time before parliament meets. That is but one of the official duties. I need not say to hon. members today how much more complicated the business of legislation is at this time than it has ever been heretofore. The best evidence of that is the length of the parliamentary sessions themselves. If parliaments held sessions of two, three, or four months it might be expected that leaders might be found to take on these extra obligations without expecting to be in any way recompensed financially for that obligation; however when a parliamentary sessions lasts, as ours apparently are going to continue to last, and as they have been in the last few years, for half a year or more, it is imposing a very heavy obligation on any individual, both financially and otherwise, to expect him to be able to familiarize himself with the legislation that comes before the two houses in the course of a particular session, and to explain policy as well as particulars of legislation. The character of the legislation, as I have indicated, is much more intricate and comprehensive in every way than has been the case with legislation in the past.

This house is familiar with the amount of time that has been given this session to international questions. The Senate is perhaps in many ways in a better position to devote a great deal of its time to international problems than is this house. Every encouragement should be given to the members of the upper house to give a great deal of time and attention to all-important world problems. The leader of the government and the leader of the opposition in the Senate have to familiarize themselves with these problems. If they are to do that they will have to give a great deal of extra time to that particular work. There are also the individual measures that come from this house. The leader of the government has to make arrangements with members of his following, no matter in which house it is, to take charge of particular measures as they come up. To do that he himself has to be more or less familiar with the measures that are being brought forward. As I say, all of these things make the office of leader of the government in the other house a much more responsible one today than it has been at any previous time.

Here I think I might as well answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at once about the strengthening of the Senate. He said yesterday he was surprised that a Liberal government, which has aimed at reforming the Senate, should bring in a measure of this kind. May I say I think what we are seeking to accomplish is a very necessary reform. We have been hearing a great deal—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends of the C.C.F. group laugh; but may I tell them if that is their attitude it will be a very long time before they will have anything to do either with the government in the House of Commons or with the business in the Senate. If they took the business of the government as a whole more seriously they would begin to realize the force of what I am saying at the moment.

Mr. MacINNIS: The argument is getting pretty weak.

Mr. KNOWLES: And the Prime Minister knows it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The responsibility of the leader in the Senate is very great. As I was about to say when I was interrupted, hon. members are talking about not enough business being done in the Senate, about not enough bills coming from the Senate to this house. I say that that is largely the result of the fact that no leader, under the financial obligations which he must incur at this time, can, unless he is going to be compensated in some way for the extra time he will have to give to these questions, manage effectively the business of the Senate so as to ensure measures being introduced there in the first place, debated there and brought over to this house. The provision this bill seeks to make will help both the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition to give more of their time to the introduction of legislation in the other house and to careful discussion of it before it comes over to this house.

My hon. friend said that he was surprised that a Liberal government should introduce this measure, because we stood for democracy as well as for reform of the Senate. He argued that this was not a democratic measure. May I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that we have pretty well reached the point so far as the Senate is concerned, and indeed so far as this house is concerned as well, where, unless the leaders are wealthy men, they are not going to be able to carry on the business of leadership. A measure of this kind will make it possible for any man, whether he be a man of means or one who is not too well off, if he is a leader to devote his time to the extent that it should be devoted to public business in the other house.

I attach a great deal of importance to that because I think one of the great reforms that has been made through the years has been that of recognizing that even members of parliament, who may not have any special obligations, have a right to expect a certain indemnity. But you cannot expect a person receiving only the ordinary indemnity, especially with taxation as it has come to be, to give as much time as he would like to be able to give, if he wishes to do his work effectively, in the position of leadership, with all that that involves at this time. So I say to my hon. friend that this is a reform in that it will enable the Senate to function more effectively than it has up to the present, if on that score there is any exception to be taken. It will enable the leaders to organize the business of the upper house in a more effective way, and to that extent it will be assisting public business generally.

My hon. friend went on to say that the Senate was a useless institution. I think that was the phrase he used, or something to that effect. May I say that we are not debating the question at the moment whether the second house should be abolished, but I should be very surprised indeed if the people of Canada generally would not perhaps feel a greater need than ever for a second house if the C.C.F. ever got into power. I can assure them that they need have no anxiety over the attitude of the public toward this measure. If my hon. friends were in power the public would need no end of safeguards—

Mr. MacINNIS: Big business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—in the conducting of public business. It is not big business. May I say to my hon. friend who interrupts and to his acting leader: Do they think that they are the only righteous men in this country?

Mr. MacINNIS: To hear the Prime Minister speak one would think that he thinks he is the only one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am getting tired of having hon. members of their group talk as though they were the only honest men in this country, as though they were the only men with ideas in this country, as though hon. members in other parts of the house had not as high ideals and purposes as any other group. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, I think, that we were strengthening vested interests in helping to strengthen the position of the Senate. I would remind the hon. member that most of the members of the Senate came from the House of Commons. How did these hon. gentlemen get into the House of Commons other than by the support of the majority of the electors in their constituencies and with the confidence of the people of the constituency which they represented, and who knew them best.

Mr. KNOWLES: Many of them were beaten, and that is why they were sent over there.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not as many as the C.C.F.; there were 200 defeated in the last election.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point I wish to make is this: so far as the other house is concerned, if one takes its complexion it is impossible to say that it is representative of the vested interests or the big interests, or is made up of wealthy men. When one has regard for the positions which those hon. members held in public life, whether they were appointed by this government or by previous governments, he will realize that in most cases the appointments to the Senate were made from members of this House of Commons, from those who had had great experience or extra experience as ministers of the crown, or long experience in conducting the affairs of government. They were appointed because the government of the day knew that they represented the will and the wishes of the people or they would never have got into this House of Commons. I say to my hon friend that he had better not seek to reflect either upon the characteristics or the callings of hon. members of the other house of this parliament.

I have spoken of the necessity of giving the leader of the government in the other house a salary. I have said very little about the position of the leader of the opposition. I would draw the attention of the house to the fact that at one time no salary was paid to the leader of the opposition in this house. Twenty years and more ago special provision was made for the position of the leader of the opposition in this house. Why was that done? It was done as a means of furthering the public interest by assigning to one leader the special obligation of watching the progress of legislation as it went through this house and continually guarding the public interest from the point of view of the opposition as well as of the government.

So far as the positions of leader of the opposition in the Senate and in this House of Commons are concerned, the difference is in degree not in kind. The leader of the opposition in the Senate has to give a great deal of extra time to studying the measures that come before that house, in making arrangements with the leader of the government in regard to the conduct of business from day to day, in associating himself with the work of committees, in meeting delegations and deputations. He has to meet the extra expense to which all leaders in public life are put. Unless we are going to have only wealthy men filling positions of high responsibility some additional remuneration will have to be given to the gentlemen who are in these responsible positions or else they will not be able to give as much of their time to them as otherwise would be the case.

I submit to the house that the time has come when, in the public interest and for the more effective discharge of public business, some additional allowance should be made to both the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition in the other house. I repeat, the reasons are much the same as have governed in this house. The change in the times necessitates this as their duties grow greater and greater from day to day and from year to year. Some special provision, I submit, is imperative if we are to have public business done as the country expects it to be done in both houses of parliament.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, Bill No. 443, is a bill to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, in this bill the government proposes giving an additional allowance to the leader of the government and to the leader of the opposition in another place. In this discussion I am wondering whether one has to use that outmoded term or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think it is time we got back to straight talk and spoke of this institution respectfully as what it is, the Senate of Canada.

The bringing forward of this bill indicates that the government feels that the position of both leaders in the Senate carries with it greater responsibilities, and on this ground they base the present proposal of giving them an additional allowance. As to greater responsibilities, I am sure there can be no question about that. The question that does arise is one of curiosity: Why, if greater responsibilities justify an increase to the men who now hold these positions, has an additional allowance not been given prior to this time? This government has been in office for twenty years or so, but has never before made any move in this direction. We have had confederation for eighty years, and no move has been made in this direction. The Prime Minister has indicated that at the moment greater responsibilities devolve upon us all. That is true. Yet the fact remains that in all these past years the men who occupy these positions in the Senate did carry greater responsibilities than their associates who were private members in that house.

In view of the statement which the Prime Minister has made and the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the other day I think perhaps I should take a moment to explain our position with reference to this measure. It can be briefly stated.

If the leaders in the other house have added responsibilities I think there is every justification for giving consideration to a larger allowance for them. How much that should be may be a matter of judgment. The government in its wisdom has indicated that the leader of the government in the Senate should get an additional allowance of $7,000 and the leader of the opposition an additional allowance of $4,000, making a total allowance to the leader of the government there of $13,000 and a total for the leader of the opposition of $10,000. I think on the basis of added responsibilities there is something to be said for making these greater allowances. If the Senate is an essential part of our government institutions we cannot just pass off a measure like this without giving it some reasonable consideration. On the other hand if that institution does require some reform and has not had it, and there is no proposal here that measures shall be taken to bring about reforms in the Senate that would be in the public welfare, there is some excuse for saying, as a measure of protest, that we do not want to take a position of supporting this institution in its present form by this action. I say there may be some justification for that.

As to greater responsibilities there can be no question. As to the essential place which this institution occupies in our government there can be no question. The only question is whether steps should not be taken for its reform.

Our position is briefly this: We believe in a second chamber. We do not believe in the abolition of the Senate. We do believe in its reform. We believe in maintaining that institution for several reasons, as a check against hasty and ill-considered legislation, as a protection for minorities, as a protection for the provinces in a federal system, and there may be other reasons. As I said, we are opposed to the abolition of the Senate. But we do think it should be reformed. I make no comment now on the various suggestions which have been made as to how it should be reformed. Some have said that its members should be elected by the people and not be appointed by a party government.

Mr. HARTT: Then I would have a better chance.

Mr. BRACKEN: The hon. member's chance will be good if he gets defeated in the next election.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no chance of that.

Mr. BRACKEN: One suggestion that has been made is that the members of the Senate should be elected by the people rather than appointed by a party government. Another suggestion is that their term of office should be fixed, some have said at ten years, others for different terms, rather than that it should be a life appointment. Some have said that the provincial governments should be allowed in some way or other to choose some of the members of the Senate, and some have suggested that they should choose half of its membership. Some have said that the present incumbents in the Senate should not be disturbed. I am in some sympathy with each one of these proposals, but I make no comment on them now.

My suggestion is this, that there should be called together a joint committee, a representative body composed of representatives of this house and from the other place and representatives from the provinces, to consider the situation as it now exists in our parliamentary system and see what can be done to strengthen the Senate, having in mind nothing else but the welfare of the Canadian people. That is my proposal. That is our position, and in that position I have the support of some outstanding men in Canada. I want to read what one of them had to say at a time when he was a crusader for Senate reform and other kinds of reform. I am glad to know that at one time he supported the policy we now stand for. I am quoting from a paper which at that time was a strong supporter of the present government, known then as the Globe. This is from its issue of Monday, September 7, 1925, when the party opposite had a crusading spirit and progressive policies and when some of its members supported what I now advocate, and I hope when I sit down they will all support my proposal. This is what that great Liberal newspaper had to say, referring to the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King):

No declaration by the Prime Minister throughout the whole of his address was more enthusiastically received by the North York electors than that in which he declared for Senate reform. Loud "hear, hear" and applause which lasted nearly two minutes greeted his declaration: "We believe one of the great necessities of the time is Senate reform."

We have had this morning one evidence of his notion of senate reform. I do not know what others there have been in the intervening 21 or 22 years, but we have had one evidence this morning. The report goes on:

But the difficulty in consummating Senate reform, Premier King proceeded, lay in the fact that the Senate itself had to approve of any parliamentary measure to reform it, and its members could not be removed by any action of the people or the commons.

"Who appoints them?" demanded a member of the audience. "I am coming to that", replied the premier.

"Throw them out", demanded several others in chorus.

Then the report continues:

Proposed interprovincial conferences to discuss Senate reform, went on Mr. King, constitute at best an attempt to reform the Senate from without, whereas reform from within was the only effective way in which it could be brought about. He proposed reforming it from within by appointing hereafter only men pledged to carry out the policies of the Liberal government.

Now in so far as that particular reform is concerned, the Prime Minister has carried it out.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRACKEN: When he started there was a majority against him, I believe he said, of 23 or 24 or 25. Now he has 66 on his side and there are only 22 on the other side, so that he has been faithful in carrying out his policy in that respect. This report goes on to quote the Prime Minister. These words are a quotation and evidently they are his:

"We believe the effective way to reform the Senate is to take advantage of the opportunities as they arise," declared Mr. King,—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just what we have done.

Mr. BRACKEN:

"and to see that no one is appointed to the Senate who will not undertake to support the policy of the Liberal administration—"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRACKEN: You applauded a little too soon that time. You did not give me a chance to finish the sentence:

"and to see that no one is appointed to the Senate who will not undertake to support the policy of the Liberal administration with respect to reform of the Senate."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRACKEN: This is a very enlightening document and one that supports the position I am taking. That is why I am reading it. To continue:

Responsible government had been threatened, he agreed, by the action of the senators in throwing out government legislation, and he was the last man who needed to be prodded into activity in the defence of responsible government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRACKEN:

Supposing last year he had dissolved parliament upon the Senate issue, he was not so sure, he said, that that issue would have been accepted throughout Canada as a major one. To-day the issue was more apparent.

Then the report goes on:

"In addition to that," he said, "the government of to-day—

Speaking of his own.

—is in the position to come before the people and give a guarantee of how it will be able to effect that Senate reform. When we came into office there were twenty-six of a majority in the Senate.

That is, I presume, twenty-six against him.

It was twenty-three, I think, the day before yesterday. Today the number has been reduced by ten, or will be within the next few days. The government has waited for the filling of the different vacancies until it could take the right moment to act. We have appointed to the Senate gentlemen to fill vacancies in eight out of ten vacancies—the other two will be appointed shortly, and every one of these men gets his appointment on the understanding that he stands for the policy of the Liberal government with respect to Senate reform,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is democracy.

Mr. BRACKEN:

—and will fight for that policy in the Senate itself".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: Très bien.

Mr. BRACKEN: I presume all the senators who have been appointed since that time have signed on the dotted line this requirement by the Prime Minister so that he can now have any kind of Senate reform that is desirable. I think that is a good position to have them in, but I would like to be assured by the Prime Minister that he has that assurance from them all, and I would like to have that verified by them all.

Now what is the situation, Mr. Speaker? Here is a body which is necessary to our form of government. It is filled by appointments from the parties that are in power. One party is in power a long time and gets many of its supporters there. At the present time there are 66 supporting the government and 22 against them, appointed on the regional basis. I believe there are 24 from the maritimes, 24 from each of the central provinces and 24 from the west. But it has resulted in a one-sided representation over there; it has resulted in failure to get anything like occupational representation.

I am the last to suggest that that should be the basis of representation in any parliamentary body, but at least there should be some approach to better occupational representation than there is today, because in that body, out of 96 members there are only 13 who can be classed as farmers and only one who can be called a labour man.

Our position, briefly, is this. Some justification can be made for paying men for additional work they do. We can approach this thing from the point of view of prejudice and say, "Well, there is popular prejudice against this institution and we will not do anything to help it". I do not think that is a constructive approach. We can approach it from another point of view also, and say, "We have done little for old age, the aged people in this country, giving them an increase of only $60 a year, and here we are going to give seven thousand to one man and so much to another.

I suggest that is not the statesmanlike approach to the matter. We are prepared to support the government in this measure provided they will give us some assurance that some steps along these lines will be taken to try to lay the foundation for reforming this institution so as to make it more useful for the people of Canada. If the government can give us that assurance we will support them in this measure even though at the moment it may not be the popular thing to do. If they cannot give us that assurance they must proceed with their measure without our support.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in just a sentence I should like to repeat the remark I made yesterday, that we approach this matter on its merits with regard to the principle at stake and not with reference to any personalities at all. I am grateful to the Prime Minister for echoing the sentiments I expressed yesterday with regard to the two men who would be immediately affected. I would like to go one step further and say that not only have I a high regard for the two men immediately affected, but I have had the privilege of meeting and getting to know a number of other senators, and I regard them as men who have rendered a distinguished public service, men to be held in high esteem. We are all agreed on that phase of the matter and on the fact that we are discussing this as a matter of principle.

I also wish to point out that the amount of money involved in this bill is, in terms of federal budgets, infinitesimal. The total amount of money to be added to the cost of government by this bill is only $11,000 a year. When one takes time to debate such a measure it is because a principle is at stake. I want to say that I agree with those who have said that work should be paid for. But I am not yet convinced that Their Honours in the other place are underpaid for the amount of work which is given them to do. As for the suggestion of the Prime Minister that they should be given more work and that we start paying their leaders first in order to encourage them to take on more work, I submit that is contrary to the democratic approach and contrary to the whole aim at Senate reform which was in the crusading heart of the Prime Minister over twenty years ago. I know that during recent years from some quarters of this house there have been requests for more work to originate in the Senate, but they have not come from this group. We feel, as the Prime Minister felt twenty years ago, that the elected representatives of the people should have supremacy in matters of legislation. The Prime Minister's whole case for paying this extra money rests upon the assumption that the place of the Senate in our parliament set-up is a justifiable one.

I am not going into the arguments for abolition of the Senate at this time, because we who favour that course are in a minority in this house. But I feel, as the leader of the opposition did, that we have a right and duty to appeal to hon. members opposite to measure up, as the Prime Minister put it, to their own high ideals and purposes. I do not deny for one minute that hon. members opposite are just as high in their ideals and purposes as we in this group claim to be; and I am tired of these references to righteousness on the part of members in any quarter in this house. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, as one reads the pages of Hansard in years gone by, and as one reads party platforms, he finds in Liberal literature the highest of idealism and purposes down across the years. But what bothers us is that they can hold those ideals for years and years and never do anything about them.

I observe, Mr. Speaker, that you have picked up the bill, no doubt as a suggestion that I should speak about it; and that is, in fact, what I propose to do. The bill before us is No. 443, an act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, to provide what the Prime Minister implies today is reform of the Senate. The Prime Minister used that very expression; he said he thought this was a reform which was long overdue. I cannot see that it is in any sense an expression of the kind of reform of the Senate for which the Liberal party has stood down across the years. I want to say something about the position of the Liberal party, as did the leader of the opposition. But before I do so, there are two other remarks of the Prime Minister to which I wish to make a brief answer.

First of all, I wish to point out to the Prime Minister that in my remarks yesterday I did not refer to individuals in the Senate as representing vested interests. What I said was that we were creating a vested interest in the Senate itself, by strengthening it in this way. The other point I wish to make in reply to what the Prime Minister said is to the effect that I think he let the cat out of the bag when he said that when the C.C.F. comes to power it might, in his opinion, be good for Canada still to have the Senate there. The implication there was that, after the people of Canada have decided in a democratic way that they want the C.C.F. in power, a Senate appointed by the Liberals, appointed largely by the Prime Minister himself, should, he thinks, still be there to block legislation which the people of this country had declared they wanted by putting this party in power. That is a far cry from the position the Prime Minister took in this House of Commons on July 19, 1924, which was a position similar to the one he took on a number of occasions during those early twenties when the majority in the Senate was against him. In that period of time, with his crusading spirit, he rose in this house time and time again and declared that this House of Commons should be supreme, that this House of Commons should have the right to enact the legislation which it was elected by the people of Canada to put on the statute books.

On July 19, 1924, the Senate had, by a certain device, rejected proposed amendments made by the House of Commons to the Pension Act, the act having to do with military pensions. The House of Commons was put in a jam; they had to accept the deletions made in the other place in order not to lose some of the benefits that were in the amendments to the Pension Act which had been passed by this house. After the house had faced the fact that it was in a jam and had to agree to it, the Prime Minister had this to say, as reported in Hansard of July 19, 1924, at page 4872:

> Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, having in mind the action of the second chamber with respect to the measure which has just been amended and also the fate of a number of bills adopted by the Commons and defeated in the Senate, I think hon. members will agree with me that the time has come when the Commons in Canada should seek to gain rights and privileges with respect to legislation originating in this chamber similar to those which have obtained by the House of Commons in the parliament at Westminster. I may say that the government had under consideration, prior to the opening of this session, legislation with this end in view, but we were anxious the public should feel fully convinced of the necessity before pressing it on the attention of parliament.

Later in that same statement—and remember that this is back in 1924, twenty-three years ago—he said:

I desire to assure the house that when parliament reassembles steps will be taken by the government to obtain, if possible, means whereby bills may be enacted by and with the advice and consent of the House of Commons under conditions similar in principle to those which have been sanctioned for the parliament of the United Kingdom.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if the principle that the Commons should be supreme was sound back in 1924, the Prime Minister should not alter that principle when he envisages the possibility of the C.C.F. being in power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never envisaged it. I was careful to say "if", not "when", they came in.

Mr. KNOWLES: Even on the Prime Minister's terms, he said that if that should happen it might be good for Canada to have the Senate there which he had appointed, to block—

Mr. MacINNIS: The will of the people.

Mr. KNOWLES: —the will of the people as expressed through a C.C.F. government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is going too far when he says that I should like to see a Senate which will block what hon. gentlemen opposite might do should they ever come into power. I have never given an intimation of anything of the kind. I would hope that whatever party is in power in this house would get good support from the Senate so long as their measures did not involve going to such lengths in some as might seem to unsettle the Senate altogether.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I will let the record speak for itself. I am not surprised the Prime Minister wanting to put what he said aright a bit, because it was pretty clear to us that he had let the cat out of the bag in the statement he made when he spoke a little earlier.

The Prime Minister objected to my remark of yesterday that this would have the effect of strengthening the Senate. I want to point out that this is exactly what it does; it crystallizes the Senate in its present form. I found it a bit difficult to follow the position taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), but I think I got it before he finished. I take it that he is not prepared to agree to this measure unless he gets an assurance from the Prime Minister that the Senate will be reformed somewhat along the lines he suggested. In view of the fact that these promises to reform the Senate have been made by the Prime Minister for twenty-three years, I would advise the leader of the opposition to demand that some of these reforms be made before he agrees to these increases. The assurance that it will be done puts it on a pretty long-range basis, from our experience with the Prime Minister. I think it is going about it the wrong way to say yes, we will agree to this now, but we do so on the understanding that next year or the year after you will bring in some Senate reforms. I think the leader of the opposition would be better advised to say to the Prime Minister—and I am talking on their terms, not ours—"We will oppose this measure until you bring it in as part of an over-all reform of the Senate."

Mr. BRACKEN: O ye of little faith!

Mr. KNOWLES: The leader of the opposition had faith in the Prime Minister for a good many years, until finally he decided he had better break his connections and get into another party. The hon. gentleman referred to pledges extracted by the Prime Minister from gentlemen he appointed to the Senate back in the twenties, to support Senate reform. I should like to add to the quotations given by the leader of the opposition. He quoted from a daily newspaper; I wish to quote from Hansard for July 12, 1926, at page 105. At that time Mr. C. W. Bell, then member for West Hamilton, quoted, without its being challenged, a statement made by the Prime Minister in London, Ontario, on October 16, 1925, while speaking in the rink in that city. This is the quotation:

Only a few days ago a number of senators were appointed. Every one has given me his pledged word he will be prepared, once a measure passes the Commons, to give it his support. Subsequent senators will be appointed with that understanding, and as Providence takes away a few of the older senators you will have a Senate pledged to bring about the reforms for which the administration stands.

Well, Providence has done its part; many of the older members have been taken away during the years that have intervened, and I wonder now if this is the kind of reform those members were pledged to support. Then on February 26, 1927, as recorded in volume 1 of Hansard for that year at page 355, the matter was made still more one of record by questions which were placed upon the order paper and answered by the Prime Minister. Let me read the questions:

Mr. Evans:

1. What is the form or wording of the pledge, if any, taken from those who have been appointed senators during the last two years with a view to Senate reform?

2. How many have been thus pledged?
Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King—

There can be no doubt about the authenticity of this. It is not a quotation from a newspaper; it is the Prime Minister's answer to questions placed upon Hansard:

Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King:

1. An assurance of support of such measure of Senate reform, in conformity with the requirements of the constitution, as may be introduced by the Liberal administration.
2. This assurance has been given by all who have accepted appointment to the Senate within the time mentioned.

I will not bother to reecho the comments which appear in Hansard of those days about the dictatorial methods involved, for as a matter of fact, holding the view I do of the Senate, I think in his crusading spirit the Prime Minister was doing a good job in those days to get these pledges and to tell the country that on the basis of those pledges the Senate would be reformed from within. But we have waited a long time; and, as the leader of the opposition says, he cannot recall any other reforms in recent years until now we get this one, to increase the salaries paid two members of the Senate.

Another interesting quotation, which is particularly appropriate in the dying days of a session, appears in Hansard for June 4, 1926, volume 4 of that year, at page 4030:

Senate Reform

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. Arthur Meighen (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if there is to be any action taken this session with respect to Senate reform? If not, when is the next move to be made in this direction and of what character?

This question reminds me very much of the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition today.

Mr. Jacobs: At the next sitting of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister): I might say to my right hon. friend that the government would not like to prolong the session unduly by introducing the subject of Senate reform at this stage. My right hon. friend may be sure it will come up in due course.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if I may use the word, that is a honey. In 1926 it was thought by the Prime Minister unwise to prolong the session in its dying days by introducing a measure of Senate reform. In those days his idea of Senate reform was to clip the wings of the Senate. But now in 1947, when we are at the close of the session, it is perfectly all right to prolong the session by introducing this sort of measure of Senate reform, which instead of clipping their wings gives them a few more feathers. The leader of the opposition and I have been quoting an outstanding authority in the person of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to note the retroactive support of hon. members opposite for the views the Prime Minister held over twenty years ago, and my appeal to them is to stand by those convictions even though the Prime Minister seems to have moved away from them. But we should not take all our cues from the Prime Minister in this matter; for there might be some other authorities. I am going to refer to one other. This quotation is from volume 1 of Hansard for 1935, at page 102. The speaker was Mr. Humphrey Mitchell, who was then a private member sitting over on this side. He said:

I believe it was the leader of the opposition who raised the discussion concerning the Senate. I am making reference to all these points because I believe one would do better to put his finger on the spot where the sand may be put into the machinery.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: I take it that hon. gentlemen have no doubt this is a quotation from the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell).

The right hon. gentleman has said that we have a Tory Senate. If I gather anything from the temper of the Canadian people, and if it is the policy of the Senate to put sand into the machinery, then we will have to reform the Senate.

Then come these words, with particular meaning in view of the portfolio the minister now holds, and one of the branches of his department:

The time has long since passed when the Senate should be used as unemployment insurance for many of those in political life.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because of this long build-up with regard to the attitude of the Liberal party toward the Senate I quite sincerely suggest to the Prime Minister that he consider withdrawing this measure or at least letting it die on the order paper. We are near the end of the session; it is quite easy to do that. All he has to do is to have some hon. member move the adjournment of the debate and let it die when the session ends. I am sure if he does that he will have the support of many hon. members on his own side.

I do not profess to know too much about the attitude of supporters of the Liberal party in eastern Canada, but I know that Liberals in western Canada do not take kindly toward the unrepresentative, undemocratic character of the Senate, and they will find it very hard to understand their Liberal representatives in parliament supporting a measure of this kind. If the Prime Minister will not withdraw it I suggest that he do the democratic thing and permit the house to take a free vote on this measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope it will be noted that the "hear, hears" come from the other side, which indicates that Liberal members would like to have that opportunity. I suggest to the Liberal members on this one occasion that to think they are willing to be misled by any suggestion that a defeat of this measure would bring on an election would be a ridiculous rumour to spread. The Prime Minister would never go to the country because of the defeat of this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Don't be too sure.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, if there were a chance of going to the country on the defeat of this measure, coming on top of such an unproductive session as we have had this year, we of this group would welcome it wholeheartedly.

I ask the private members of the Liberal party opposite to consider the difficulties they will have when they go back to their constituencies and try to explain this measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. KNOWLES: Nothing has been done about health; nothing has been done about housing.

Mr. MUTCH: Don't worry about us.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Wait until Monday evening in Halifax.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house is that the house give second reading to Bill No. 443. It seems to me that gives me the right to discuss the circumstances in which that bill is introduced. I submit that coming at the end of a session which has failed the people, and which has failed to get many other things, but has provided a special pension for diplomats of $3,000 a year at the age of sixty-five to bring this thing in is adding insult to injury so far as hon. members opposite are concerned.

An hon. MEMBER: Speak for yourself.

Mr. PROBE: And reclassification of the civil service.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. KNOWLES: When the government of this country finds it possible to raise the old age pension by only $5, as the leader of the opposition said, and increase one man's salary from $6,000 to $13,000, I suggest with all respect to the leader of the opposition that it is not showing any feeling of prejudice to oppose that kind of thing. Hon. members come down here to fight for the interests of the people. That applies to hon. members opposite as it does to us. I know that, and I could name a number of them. All of us, government supporters and opposition supporters, find it difficult to go home and explain to our people that all kinds of things which are just and right for the ordinary people of this country cannot be done, because—

Mr. MARTIN: Why does the hon. member not tell the truth?

Mr. KNOWLES: —there is no time. When diplomats come into the service at sixty and need a pension at sixty-five, a special act can be brought in. When leaders of the Senate, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, are overworked, despite his arguments for reform across the years, a special act can be brought in. I submit that it is getting a long way from the concept of democracy that our people have. Our people feel that parliament represents the people and is here to do the things that are in their best interests. We hear a great deal of talk these days about threats to democracy. The threats to democracy are not so much the threats from without as the threats from within, such as the scale of values that the government brings before this parliament with respect to the kind of legislation that we have had this year. Therefore Mr. Speaker, throughout what I have had to say I have tried to argue on the basis of the position of the Liberal party. I go farther than they do and I admit quite openly that I feel the Senate should be abolished, but the Liberal party does not stand for that; it stands for reform and I am asking Liberal members to stand by their own principles.

By the way, the Prime Minister made some reference to the fact that there are extra payments for leaders in the upper houses in some other parts of the commonwealth. May I point out that in Australia the upper house is elected, which puts it on quite a different basis. If my information is correct, there are no salaries as such attached to membership in the House of Lords in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MARTIN: What about the Lord Chancellor? The sum of £5,000 is allowed to him.

Mr. KNOWLES: I stand corrected on that, but so far as the lords generally are concerned there is no salary associated with their job.

Mr. FLEMING: The Lord Chancellor does much more than lead the government in the House of Lords.

Mr. KNOWLES: As a matter of fact members of the cabinet in this parliament and in the legislature of the various provinces get these extra salaries not for their position as cabinet ministers, but because they head and administer a department. I submit that it is discrimination against cabinet ministers over there, who get extra salaries for the job they do the year around administering their departments, to give a similar extra amount to gentlemen who do not head departments.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): What about the leader of the opposition?

Mr. KNOWLES: The leader of the opposition here is a member of an elected institution. That is the underlying principle about this whole matter, which the Prime Minister has overlooked. He has made his argument about the Senate on the assumption that it plays a proper place in our parliamentary set-up. That is not the view he took back in the twenties.

Perhaps I had better bring my remarks to a close and say to hon. members opposite that I do not doubt they find this situation a difficult one. They know where their party has stood down across the years. On the other hand there is a sort of tradition that anything that comes from our side of the house must be opposed by them; but they know that the Prime Minister, despite what he said a few minutes ago, would not go to the country on this issue. I suggest that at least the vote on this matter might be delayed until the Liberal members have conferred with their leader to see if they could not find some way out. I appeal also to the leader of the opposition to realize that if he wants to get the side of the bargain he is interested in he had better hold off his support of this measure.

To sum up, and feeling that this measure should definitely be blocked so far as this session is concerned, I have pleasure in moving, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Bowerman):

That the word "now" be left out, and the words "this day six months hence" be added at the end of the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I want to say just a word on the amendment. My hon. friend who has just moved this amendment has taken exception to the measure coming at this stage of the session. May I draw his attention to the fact that the notice of this bill has been on the order paper for a very considerable time. It was placed there so that hon. members would know the intention of the government with respect to the legislation of the session. It was left until this moment because there were more important measures which the government thought should have precedence.

Mr. KNOWLES: And there still are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will allow me, I should like to make my statement. The measures in which the government thought the house as a whole were most interested received precedence. I also tried to arrange matters in such a way as to leave to near the end any measure that was likely to prove controversial. I knew hon. gentlemen opposite were going to take the attitude they have, and I therefore gave precedence as far as I could to other measures in order that we might be sure of their getting through in plenty of time.

It is now about a quarter to one o'clock; I do not want to delay the vote, but I should like to answer one or two points that have been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The leader of the opposition asked why this reform, as it has been called, has been delayed so long. May I say to him that the same argument could be applied to the question why no allowance was given to the leader of the opposition in this house for so long a time. My hon. friend went back to the days of confederation. As I remember, a Conservative government was in power most of the time from the days of confederation up to 1896, and during all that time they made no provision for any salary for the leader of the opposition. It was the leader of the Liberal administration who introduced that reform. I find that Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced a bill to amend the act respecting the Senate and House of Commons on April 20, 1905, and section 2 of that bill reads:

To the member occupying the recognized position of leader of the opposition in the House of Commons there shall be payable an additional sessional allowance of seven thousand dollars.

That amount has since been increased.

I said a moment ago that I thought that had happened some twenty years or more ago. I do not think one should trust one's memory too much as one becomes older, because I find now that it was in 1905, forty-two years ago, that that measure was introduced by the Liberal administration of the day. As I say, the business of the country has increased vastly with the years, and the obligations of the leaders have grown in the other house as well as in this. That is why we are asking for this increase in allowances.

Many quotations have been made from previous speeches of mine in regard to reforming the Senate. I must say that I feel highly complimented by the extent to which hon. gentlemen opposite are beginning to take so many of my teachings to heart. It is like the Senate itself; it has taken a long time to reform it, but there has been a tremendous reformation.

My hon. friends have read quotations of mine about democratic legislation having been thrown out whenever it went over to the other house. That was the condition when we came into office. There was very little chance in those days of getting through both houses measures of the type of social legislation we have since put through because it would be turned down in the other house. But what a change has taken place since that time. I promised that we would see that the Senate was reformed so that liberal measures that were being enacted would be put through. May I say that we have carried out that reform much more thoroughly and effectively than I ever believed would be possible at the time I made that statement. If we stay here much longer you may be sure that that reform will go on, and we will make doubly sure that democratic measures and social legislation passed by this house will get through the upper house.

I should like to correct one impression some hon. members appear to have. Apparently it is thought that the leader of the government in the Senate, as a cabinet minister without portfolio, receives a salary. May I say that he gets nothing at all as a minister without portfolio either in the way of salary or allowance. Being a member of the government and having to have a knowledge of government business, its programme, policy and the like, the leader of the government in the Senate is obliged to have a residence in this city practically the whole year round, and he is put to that additional expense.

These are things which I think it is only right should be known to hon. members. The provision being made by this bill is something that will govern through the years to come. Before I conclude, may I say this to my friends of the C.C.F. who suggest that Liberals in the Senate might be inclined to throw out some of their legislation should they come to power. If I am correctly informed, the president of the C.C.F. party in British Columbia made this statement:

> The first duty of this party when it comes to power is the bold and ruthless removal from private hands of the means of production.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

If there is anything like that, I can tell my hon. friends that it certainly will be thrown out by the Senate. If their idea is that they are going to bring measures before the house which will mean that no business can be carried on under private enterprise, I shall be very much mistaken if they might get it through either this or the other house at any time.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the house for only a moment, to make clear the position of this group with respect to Bill No. 443. We have tried to consider it apart from the persons who occupy the two positions mentioned in the bill. I have a high regard for both those gentlemen, whom I know; and I have tried to keep, personalities completely out of my consideration of the matter.

We look upon the bill as one more evidence of the tendency of the government which has been demonstrated so many times during this session, that is, to raise the incomes and grant security to certain selected classes of people while neglecting to consider measures to increase adequately the incomes of substantial groups who are much more in need. When the government presents tangible evidence of a determination to make possible for the masses of the Canadian people a fair level of income and social security, then I will not hesitate to support the Prime Minister in his proposal to provide allowances for the leaders in the senate.

I suggest that when the government have given tangible evidence of a determination to make it possible for the masses of Canadians to have a fair level of income and social security, then the bill to provide allowances for the leaders of the senate ought to be brought in along with a general reform measure for the Senate. I believe that this house would have received this bill with much more grace and would have given it more favourable consideration had it been attached to a general reform measure. Under the circumstances our group will not support the Prime Minister's bill.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I think the few remarks I have to make can be completed before one o'clock. I would not have risen except for the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the members of this group were not taking their duties in the house seriously. What is hurting the right hon. gentleman is not that we are not taking our duties seriously but that we are taking them too seriously. He knows that very well.

I have been here quite a long time now, and I have noticed that the Prime Minister is becoming more and more impatient with opposition to his proposals. That is usually the result of a long period in power. So far as this group is concerned his impatience is not going to do him any good, because we are going to deal with questions as they arise regardless of what anyone may think.

What the Prime Minister thinks of the Senate should not be measured by what he said today, but by his action in 1945 when he brought in the first resolution to increase the indemnities of members of parliament. The members of the Senate were not included; consequently the Prime Minister must have felt that the senators if not overpaid, were at least paid enough without any increased indemnity. But finally they got that increase, and now, a very short time afterwards, a bill is brought down by the government to increase the allowances to the leaders of the two parties in the other place.

I wish to associate myself with other members who have said that in this matter personalities do not count at all. I know the leader of the official opposition in the Senate fairly well. He is a gentleman for whom I have a high regard. I know the government leader in the Senate not so well, but I think he is a great improvement over the senators who were in the Senate in 1926 when they were considering the first old age pension bill in the other place. My position, therefore, has nothing whatever to do with the personalities of the two gentlemen concerned.

I would draw attention again to a quotation made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), from page 105 of volume I of Hansard, January 12, 1926. Mr. C. W. Bell, the then member for Hamilton West, was speaking, and he said that the present Prime Minister, speaking in London on October 16, 1925, made this statement:

> Only a few days ago a number of senators were appointed. Every one has given me his pledged word he will be prepared, once a measure passes the Commons—

I want hon. members to note this:

> —once a measure passes the Commons, to give it his support. Subsequent senators will be appointed with that understanding, and as Providence takes away a few of the older members, you will have a Senate pledged to bring about the reforms for which the administration stands.

If that means anything, it means that if every one of these appointed to the Senate gave such a pledge, he gave a pledge that he would act as a rubber stamp for the Prime Minister in the Senate.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, for the people of the country.

Mr. MacINNIS: My understanding of the duty of a public representative is that he will wait before making a decision until he has satisfied himself as to the facts in the case and then make his decision on the facts. A public representative who acts in any other way is merely a rubber stamp for somebody.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The will of the people.

Mr. MacINNIS: The will of the Prime Minister, not the will of the people. If there were no other argument against this measure and against perpetuating a condition of that kind, this argument in itself is so overwhelming that there is not a member of this house who has any regard for democratic institutions who should not oppose this bill.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to call it one o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): If you want to waste time you might as well waste it now.

Mr. HANSELL: It is two minutes to one o'clock and I wish to speak longer than two minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSELL: Then I will go on until one o'clock and perhaps can deliver my introduction in the two minutes remaining.

I have listened with tremendous interest to this debate today because it has been extremely interesting. I was almost spellbound as I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) give our friends immediately to my right the sort of tongue lashing that it seemed to be at the time. I have rather regarded those two parties as carrying on a bit of a courtship over the last few years, and as the Prime Minister was speaking I thought perhaps the courtship was coming to an end. I have been somewhat accustomed to family squabbles, not in my own home, but by reason of my profession I have sometimes been called in to help out in such situations. I remember being called in once to a home where they had had a squabble; I tried diplomatically to lead things up to where I might be of some help, and the lady of the house said, "Mr. Hansell, you know we do have our spats and sometimes they are pretty bad, but it's great to kiss and make up again." I suggest that when a subsequent measure comes before the house, such as the radio bill, we may find those two parties kissing and making up again.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at two o'clock.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at one o'clock we were discussing Bill 443, an act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, and I had only nicely started my introduction. The bill proposes to increase the present allowances to the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition in the Senate. My first reaction is something like this. Of course, I am a social crediter, and my social credit conscience seems never to permit me to vote against giving something to somebody, especially when that person or those people contribute something to the country's welfare.

Even though I have sometimes perhaps expressed myself on increases in judges' salaries and increases in the salaries of those engaged in the diplomatic service, I always feel a little guilty if I oppose them, because it is only increasing the benefits to the individual, and why should I not want to increase the benefits accruing to people? But of course a principle is involved. While I am a social crediter I am not living in a social credit country. I am living in a country controlled by a party that believes in a policy which will not permit of my social credit instincts functioning. Therefore it boils down to this, that living as I am in this country, apparently to vote to give someone an additional financial benefit means in the net result voting to take something away from somebody else. That is the position in which I find myself.

I can quite understand, perhaps, my friends to my immediate right being so enthusiastic about their position in respect to this bill, because, as I understand that socialist philosophy, it is that in order that benefits may accrue to the substratum of society it is necessary to reduce the benefits from those who have more than others. I do not believe that has to be done; it would not if the country were handled properly. In other words, I do not believe that you have to tear the top fellow down in order to build up the fellow who is underneath. That is a wrong philosophy, it is a wrong mental attitude to take, and anyone who looks at a bill like this and says, "Well now, here these people in the other place, who are getting the same as we are getting, $6,000 a year, are to have another addition, which will mean that one will get $13,000 a year and the other less, and perhaps some other additions—well, I cannot stand for that; he is getting too much"; to such a person, I say, that mental attitude is wrong.

[Mr. Hansell.]

To my mind nobody gets too much provided he is not taking it from somebody else. There is my position. I am dealing now with a mental attitude, and I would like the house to think that through some time, particularly when members are suffering from insomnia and want something to think about.

As to what has been said about abolishing the Senate, I must confess that with my present knowledge of the entire parliamentary set-up, plus the history of parliamentary institutions, I personally would not be so bold as to say at the present time that I want the Senate abolished, that they are no good—what is the use of them. You hear that sort of talk, and I am inclined to think that underlying that attitude is another principle, and that is the desire that I must not be checked in what I am going to do. That too is a mental attitude. I do not know whether it would be the best thing for a government to be elected and have an absolutely free hand, without any check whatsoever, to do whatever they thought best on the spur of the moment. I can visualize a danger there. Governments are not always right, and if the Senate of Canada were what I think it should be, they would have an excellent opportunity of checking something that governments might do which in the end would be wrong.

I do not want to bring in my friends to my immediate right, but they were wrong in their attitude towards the war when the war broke out. There is no question that time proved they were wrong, just as wrong as anyone could ever be. Of course that was on a negative proposition; they did not want something done that was about to be done. But suppose they were in office and desired a positive thing that was just as wrong; I do not know why a properly functioning body in the other place would not be a good thing.

I am perhaps thinking out loud now when I mention those particular things. I can visualize, under this party system, a government being elected on a tremendous emotional appeal at a time when people's hearts and minds were tremendously confused and the country was being saddled with an irresponsible government. I am not now referring to my hon. friends opposite. They may or may not be. I do not care about that. I am visualizing a situation which might easily arise, where the country is confused and dissatisfied and a great emotional appeal is made to the people. They are fed up with what they have and they are taking a chance on something new, something of which perhaps they have little knowledge, and an irresponsible government is elected with no check whatever on what they do and the methods they take.

They may be well-meaning; they may have good intentions. They desire to reach a certain objective, but in trying to do so they pass legislation and devise methods of reaching their objective which might very well wreck this whole country. I say it might be as well if we had some little check through the medium of the Senate.

There is another point I should like to make here. There does seem to me to be some justification for increasing the salaries of the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition in the Senate. What I mean is this. I understand that they now receive the same remuneration as all other senators. It seems to me that their responsibilities are heavier and that they should receive something more than the other senators receive. I am not opposed to an increase. Whether the increase should be the amount provided, I am not prepared to say. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke he pointed out that the leaders in the other house are under additional expense. Perhaps the government leader in the Senate has to maintain a residence in Ottawa. Those arguments are all right, and I am not opposing them; but the Prime Minister did not refer to another phase which I think is worthy of consideration, namely that under the present system all senators are appointed for life. One cannot compare them with the leader of the opposition in this house, for instance, or the Prime Minister, or any other minister, because their tenure of office may not be long. They do not know how long it will last, while the senators have economic security for the rest of their lives. That should be taken into consideration, I think, when an amount is determined.

There was another thing which struck me, and it was this. All that the Prime Minister said, even though we grant it to be true, has been true for the last thirty, forty or fifty years. I cannot quite understand why at this session the government has suddenly decided to increase the salaries of those two leaders. If they need that increase today, they needed it last year and they needed it twenty years ago. That is a point which I think is worthy of noting.

With respect to that part of the debate which has emphasized Senate reform, I have just a word or two to say. I certainly believe that we need Senate reform. I would go farther; I would say we certainly need parliamentary reform, and the Senate is part of parliament. I once said that I thought senators should be elected. I still think so, because upon their election they would be sent to the Senate to represent the will of the people. At the present time, when they are appointed by the government in office, they naturally feel that they must be loyal to those who appointed them. But they might be loyal to those who appointed them and not loyal to the people. If they are not elected I think that at least the provinces should have something to do with the appointments. Is it not passing strange, for instance, that although there is in Alberta a government which has been known as a Social Credit government, holding a different concept from that which the present Liberal administration holds, a Social Credit government which swept out all its opponents twelve years ago and has been in office ever since, yet the Liberal government here in Ottawa has been appointing Liberal senators from that province from that day twelve years ago up to the present.

Mr. KNOWLES: There has not been a Liberal government there for twenty-five years.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre reminds me that there has not been a Liberal government in Alberta for twenty-five years.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There will be next time.

An hon. MEMBER: What a hope!

Mr. HANSELL: It is nice to dream about these things we should like to see happen. But let the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) come out there and do all he is able to do; I am afraid he will not have much effect. I have great regard for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Speaking of eloquence, he can really move the people. But a few days before the last election he was in my home town. After he had spoken—and the theatre in which he spoke was crowded to the doors—I went around the next day feeling I was surely defeated. But when the people went to the polls I received more votes from that section than from any other. So if the government wants to send the ministers out there again, it is all right with me.

I believe that Senate reform is essential. There is one thing I think we look to the Senate to do, and that is to protect the rights of the provinces. Yet it is possible for a province to have a government which is unalterably opposed to this government and still have no senators representing the views of that provincial government. I do not think that is right. I believe some body should be set up—first I thought of a joint parliamentary committee of both houses, and then in terms of a royal commission, but somehow or other

I do not rush too quickly into suggesting it should be a royal commission—for the purpose of going into parliamentary reform, with the specific view of bringing about such reforms as will ensure that at all times the will of the people is reflected. That is not what happens today; positively it is not. The other day we had a bill dealing with old age pensions. Would anyone say that the means test reflects the will of the people of Canada? It does not. So I say there is need for Senate reform.

In conclusion let me say that I do not like to oppose a reasonable bill. I am not saying I oppose an increase for these two public servants who sit in the Senate. However, I think my position will have to be that of the leader of this group; that what we want is a bill embracing the over-all picture of parliamentary reform. If that is done, and something of this sort is brought in, it will meet with more favour as far as I am concerned. I shall have to take the position my leader has well taken, and oppose the bill. I do so on these grounds, not necessarily because I do not believe in some further consideration being given these public servants.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I have just one brief observation to make. It is well known that there are many members of this house who will never go to the Senate. We are all interested in social security; but I know of many hon. members who have passed through this house who have not even the hope of the old age pension. If we are to have social security then I believe that at another session some consideration should be given hon. members who serve in this house for a number of years just as faithfully as those who are appointed to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the house for more than a very few minutes. Perhaps it is unwise for a man of my age to make an attack upon the Senate, because I should have hopes. I was thinking the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) might give me some consideration, which would be a great step toward the reformation of that institution. I do not know whether we should be discussing Senate reform in connection with this bill. If so, there are many things I should like to say, but I shall not trespass upon the time of the house by saying them now. However, I think we must go this far; that is, to say we are disappointed in the failure to do anything toward real reform of the Senate.

I want to express my disappointment at the attitude of the Prime Minister, particularly in regard to the slam he took at this group when he suggested it would be necessary for the Senate to remain to check legislation if the time ever should come when this party was in power. I think that was a gratuitous insult to this group. It was also a gratuitous insult to the people of Canada; because if ever we come to office we shall do so with exactly the same power the right hon. gentleman now possesses, and with the same right to exercise the authority of government that he has. To suggest that the Senate should be there to prevent the will of the people from being carried out seems to me an undemocratic attitude to take.

I should like to say one word about the Senate. I believe the strength of a democracy rests largely in the democratic organization of the people themselves throughout the country. I could mention scores, I am sure, if not hundreds of democratic organizations that keep democracy alive in this country. It is true that this is a democratic parliament, but if it were all that was democratic in this country we would have an awfully hard time to maintain democracy. I think of our labour unions, of our farm organizations, of our boards of trade, of our chambers of commerce, of our rotary clubs, of a hundred other organizations that are democratic and are working in the best interests of this nation. I shall not dispute that there may be some good reasons for having a second chamber in any system of government, but if we are to have it then I think it is reasonable to say that it should be democratically appointed or elected, and in some way should be responsible to the people of this country. I should like to see, then, a Senate composed of representatives appointed or elected by the various organized democratic groups within the nation. I would like to see so many senators allocated to the labour movement, so many to the farmers, so many to business organizations; let them do the electing, let them recall the senators when they think they are not doing their job, and when Providence intervenes let them elect another man. I should like to enlarge on that thought, but as I said I shall not trespass upon the time of the house by doing so just now.

I think it unfortunate that we should have to use a bill of this kind to make our protest, because I am sure no one in this house wants men in the other chamber or here to undertake tasks of public service for which they are not properly remunerated. I shall not say they should not be so remunerated; I think they should. If we are going to maintain that second chamber, those who are called upon to serve there should be properly paid, and they should be responsible to the people of Canada.

The reform that has taken place so far is of a very suggestive type. As I understand the pledges which were signed by the appointees of the present Prime Minister, they were pledged to support the legislation passed by this government. If that is all they do, then there is no need for them, because this government can pass the legislation. If they are just to go in there and say "Me, too" then they are getting plenty now, if that is their function. Moreover, let me point out that if they are pledged to support only the legislation passed by the present administration, then by implication they are pledged to oppose legislation passed by another party which may come into power. This reveals the anti-democratic set-up of the present Senate.

However, I am not going to say any more about it except to ask the Prime Minister in the kindliest way, and with great respect, if he would not consider removing the party whips on this question and allowing hon. members to express their views. If this bill should be defeated on such a motion it will not be because we do not wish to pay responsible men in the other chamber, but it would say that if it is to be done we want proper Senate reform to be taken up immediately. I think that that is the point behind the opposition to this bill. I once more ask whether the Prime Minister will not give consideration to releasing the whips and allowing the house to vote on this question as it pleases.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have just a word to say in reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Irvine) who has made as usual a delightful speech. He says that the Senate does not always reflect public opinion. It is a respectable view, but I think that my hon. friend is wrong, because in the Senate there are twelve or fifteen owners of newspapers. They establish public opinion, and therefore the views of the public must be in conformity with their own.

At first I was opposed to the Senate. I said to myself, so long as Senator Dandurand and Senator Aylesworth, dear Sir Allen, are there, I will not go further with the suggestion of abolishing the Senate. But if the government has not done much that has been seen in the reform of the Senate, the senators have taken it up themselves and they have reformed themselves to a great degree. We see that they are very active now and they show some independence. In the Senate we see some dignified old Conservatives and some Liberals who are really democrats. They unite together to make some profitable suggestions to the government.

I must say, sir, that I am honoured in counting amongst my friends some old gentlemen who sit in the Senate and who are just as worthy of sitting there as any hon. member is to sit here. The Senate has done no harm in the past, and now it is starting to do some good. The only thing is to warn the government to be very cautious about the appointment of a future leader in the Senate. The present one stated one day that the Prime Minister would lead the small nations at the peace conference, which was just flattery. It was not interesting, it was not worth listening to, and he got his place. But there are others who practise flattery in order to replace the present incumbent. I will name no one, but it is clear and evident that the practice is followed. The Prime Minister has too much experience of men not to read between the lines when something of that sort is said to him.

Even when I was opposed to the Senate because at the time they had not started their own reform I never complained bitterly about them as some of my hon. friends did today. The senators are able men who represent a good slice of mankind. They do not pretend that they are any better than the commoners but they live a life that is more boring when they wait for legislation that takes so much time to come from the House of Commons. They deserve our sympathy; they deserve our assistance; they deserve our help, and it is to be hoped that in the future the Senate will not be castigated by the House of Commons any more than the Senate does this house, but that there will be a spirit of cooperation between both houses. That spirit is highly desirable. It is unfortunate that at times there are closed walls between both houses. There should be more frequent communication and exchange of views between the senators and the members of the House of Commons. When that is done there will be no more complaint about the Senate.

This bill is a trivial matter; it is just to increase by a few thousand dollars the amount that is paid to the leaders of both parties. I am not very well acquainted with the leader of the government in the Senate. I believe that he is doing a good job in his position; but I am well acquainted with the leader of the opposition in the Senate, who has been here for a very long time. He is a dignified old gentleman and works very hard. I remember that Senator Dandurand, although he was very old, used to wake up at four or five in the morning to start his day. As the Prime Minister said, he had no extra pay to lead the government in the Senate; it was quite meritorious of him to be up so early in the morning to start his day. I know some other senators who are public spirited just as much as any other member of any group in the house. They express independent views —perhaps because they are in the other house, I do not know; but they express independent views for the welfare of the community and on this account deserve highly from the country.

Mr. GREEN: This morning the leader of the opposition asked the Prime Minister if any plans were being made for the reform of the Senate. Is the Prime Minister not making any reply in closing the debate?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is an amendment before the house, and I have already spoken to it. I presume that I am precluded from speaking again on the amendment. If it is a question that is being asked, I would say to my hon. friend that I have had several conversations with the leader of the government in the Senate and with some of the senators as to the possibility of some immediate reforms being made which would enable the Senate to play a more important and effective part in the business of parliament. As a result of these conversations I understand that there has been consideration by hon. members of the Senate of some of the matters raised and that at the present time they are receiving favourable consideration by members of the Senate.

I might mention one question. I had suggested that I thought it would facilitate further cooperation between the two houses if ministers of the crown were granted permission to appear on the floor of the Senate chamber when important government measures were being presented and that they should have the right to participate in the debate and to answer any questions which might be asked. I believe that that reform would be most helpful and I have reason to believe that it is one which will be favourably entertained by the Senate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the ministers like it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not a question of who likes this or who likes that; it is a question of what will most effectively further public business. That is the purpose of the particular bill before the house. Many references have been made to the necessity of Senate reform beginning in the Senate itself. As hon. members know, all public bills have to pass both houses. It seems to me appropriate that the Senate should as far as possible initiate measures for the reform of the Senate.

Reference has been made to pledges exacted from members going to the Senate. The only reference in that connection that I can recall is the matter of senators being prepared to favour a shortening of the years during which service would be given in the Senate. Many Liberal members who went to the Senate after this government came into office gave their word that they would favour a shortening of the term, that is, instead of having a life term that some age limit would be fixed. That was not in the nature of making a rubber stamp out of the Senate; it was if anything to ensure that Liberal members who went to the Senate would be helpful in bringing about that reform. That was a mere understanding, a gentleman's agreement with some of those who went to the Senate at the beginning of my term of office as Prime Minister. Of late years I have not felt it was necessary to suggest this reform to any senator; I believe many already favour it.

I have always looked upon every member of parliament, whether he was in the Senate or in this house, as being independent in the matter of expressing his views, and I hope this measure will help to further that same independence.

Mr. STIRLING: I understood the leader of the opposition to indicate this morning that he would like the Prime Minister to state his views with regard to the suggestion made that a joint committee composed of members of the Commons and members of the Senate and representatives of the provinces be set up to consider the reform of the Senate. I further understood my leader to indicate that unless there was a probability that such a committee would be set up to examine the question of the reform of the Senate, this party would reconsider the decision which he expressed in favour of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not understand that the leader of the opposition was asking me to commit myself to the extent of agreeing to set up a committee of both houses to take up the question of Senate reform. If he had asked that question specifically I would have said, I have ro hesitation in saying that I am wholly in favour of a committee to consider matters affecting Senate reform. My hon. friend brought in a reference to the provinces. I would wish to have the joint committee of the two houses consider for themselves whether the provinces should be brought in before that step was taken.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Knowles), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. McLURE: I was paired with the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne).

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the motion that the said bill be now read the second time. Shall the motion carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Additional allowance to the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition in the Senate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, we accept the decision of the house in the matter and therefore will not take further time. We want to record our opposition to the measure at every stage.

Mr. CHURCH: I have just a few words to say on this bill. This is not the time to make any change in the constitution in the present state of the world. That is one of the reasons I have for supporting the bill. Second, the gentlemen in respect of whom this bill is being passed are both good men who are doing splendid work. I have a third reason, and it is this. I remember the time in this house, five or six years ago, when a measure was put through this house which would have had the effect of duplicating the tariff in Canada by means of indirect taxation, given to the provinces, because it gave the provinces the same powers that the dominion had to tax directly every article used by the consumer. That measure had the support of hon. gentlemen to my left and the result would have been to put an indirect provincial tax on every implement the farmer uses. It virtually gave the provinces the powers enjoyed by the dominion. The Senate threw it out, and that is one more reason why I am supporting this bill. There are other reasons, one of which is that I would like real Senate reform, but in my opinion this is not the time to make a change in the constitution.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. KNOWLES: On division.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. KNOWLES: Next sittting of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Now.

[Mr. Marshall.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless there is unanimous consent the bill cannot be read the third time now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Third reading. There is no amendment.

Mr. KNOWLES: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. ABBOTT: Cooperative as can be.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do you believe in the rules of the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Standing order 77.

Mr. ABBOTT: We believe in a little cooperation.

TAX AGREEMENTS

COMPENSATION TO PROVINCES IN LIEU OF INCOME AND OTHER TAXES

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for the second reading of Bill No. 411, to authorize the government to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces pursuant to which, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes for a limited period.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when this question was before the house last evening the Minister of Finance was good enough to allow the adjournment of the debate in order that I and others might have an opportunity of examining certain documents he asked to be placed on Hansard and which had not been seen. I am sure that all hon. members of the house have since seen those documents. The minister was good enough to let me have them last night. I have looked them over. They have to do only with the formulae for arriving at the amounts of money to be paid to the various provinces under varying conditions. I think they contain nothing more fundamental than that. As far as that point goes, the documents which the minister tabled I think added nothing new, except in detail, to the facts he presented last night and to other facts he had presented at other times. Since last night I have also had the opportunity of looking over the minister's remarks, and I think I can conclude my observations with respect to them in a very short time.

What the minister had to say only confirms our worst doubts and fears. He simply repaints the dismal picture of this government's calculated objective to get from the provinces certain taxation rights by any means and at any cost. The minister also made it plain that the government is going to back away from its 1945 proposals because they are more burdensome than it can afford. In that respect the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) a few days ago also gave us notice that he expects the provinces to assume a greater share of the cost of old age pensions. With respect to public investment, public works, unemployment and so on, those plans which were aimed not only at a greater measure of social security but also at lessening the prospect of a recession, there is nothing proposed. The minister makes it clear with respect to the minor taxes that while the government will bargain with respect to them, the dominion will abandon nothing. If all these things had been considered in a conference and an agreement had been achieved, the story would have been different and the effect would have been different. But this method of playing one province off against another, and playing some provinces off against others, is to be deplored. For that kind of procedure the government is deserving of the severest censure.

The question now is, what are we going to do about the bill? What is this bill? This bill is simply enabling legislation. Apparently seven provinces have assured the government that they are prepared to accept the government's plan. As I understand it, no agreements are signed. This is therefore an enabling bill to give the government power to enter arrangements with the provinces by which the provinces will give up the right to collect certain taxes and in return the government will make certain payments to the provinces. In that respect we do not intend to take the position that this agreement made between the government and several other governments cannot be signed. We therefore shall not vote against this bill. But we want it made clear that certain of the results of the method which the government has followed are objectionable, not only to us but, we think, objectionable to most Canadians.

Last night I stated my objections to the government's whole programme. It is now clear that the government has abandoned its social security, health and unemployment proposals as announced two years ago. Its policy does not embody in any real sense the principle of fiscal need. If the principle of fiscal need is in it, it is only incidental in this arrangement by which the government is proposing to extract from the taxpayers of this country a great deal of money and hand it over to the provinces to spend. It is virtually buying the provinces out of their taxation rights, and doing it with the money that the government is going to subtract from its own plans for social security, health and so-called public investment, as proposed two years ago. That is made clear by the minister's own statements here and elsewhere, which I shall put on the record in a moment. I am sure he will not object, because he repeated last night statements which he had made previously. He stated that to the extent these offers to the provinces are generous, to that extent will the provinces have to assume greater responsibility and to that extent will the dominion government do less in the way of carrying out its proposals of two years ago.

By way of summary, let me say this with respect to the criticisms I offered last night. I said the government's proposal goes a long way to promoting disunity. That must be apparent to anyone who reads the minister's address of yesterday. On page 7 of the typewritten address he let me have—and it is at page 5310 of Hansard—he put on the record the minimum amounts which would go to the different provinces in Canada if this scheme goes through, and the maximum amounts that might go to them on the basis of the year 1947. In the one case the amount is $206,000,000 odd; and in the other case it is $228,000,000 odd. When one looks at those figures he sees that the minimum amount that is going to the provinces, if the whole nine of them went into it, would be $206,000,000, and the amount going to the seven provinces which have indicated their willingness to sign is $83,000,000. I suppose two-thirds of that will be collected from the taxpayers of Ontario and Quebec, which provinces have not signed and are therefore left out of this arrangement. The province of Quebec was to receive $56,000,000 odd and the province of Ontario $67,000,000 odd, in minimum amounts, a total of about $123,000,000. So as a result of the government's policies we have seven provinces getting $83,000,000, two-thirds of which is collected from outside their boundaries, and the two provinces in which that two-thirds is collected getting nothing. In that there is not only cause for disunity, but we must also keep in mind that if this government does not pay the money to Ontario and Quebec, or if those provinces do not accept it, the taxpayers of Canada will have that much less to pay, and the budgetary problems of this government will be made that much easier.

I want to examine now the other table of payments that are based on the 1947 figures. This shows the total cost to be $228,000,000, with seven provinces getting $91,000,000 odd, of which, as I say, two-thirds or more would be collected outside those provinces. The remaining two provinces would receive $137,000,000, in the case of Quebec $63,000,000 and in the case of Ontario $74,000,000, with the taxpayers of those two provinces being taxed to pay two-thirds of the money going to the other seven provinces while themselves getting nothing. My point there is that this method, whatever merit it may have, at least leads to disunity.

My second point is that in a federal state a procedure of this kind goes a long way toward centralizing the taxing power in one government. To the extent we go in that direction, to that extent we are leading to a unitary state; and to the extent that we become a unitary state we are simply saying good-bye to confederation as we have known it in this country.

My third point is that in a federal state the plan now before us fails to give the province any clear field of taxation. In that connection I want to read a brief statement from page 85 of book 2 of the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission, a report which I regard very highly and to which the minister paid a high compliment last evening. Dealing with the proposals brought forward which aimed to leave with the provinces certain of the minor fields of taxation, the report says:

It is implicit in the plan, but should be clearly stated, that the dominion will respect the tax fields left to the provinces. Adjustments in the joint dominion-provincial-municipal tax structure will undoubtedly be necessary and desirable from time to time. But the dominion can no longer consider itself a free and independent agent to take unilateral action to this end when it pleases. The essence of the plan is to leave provinces and municipalities with adequate, stable revenues, and this would clearly be defeated if the dominion should extend its taxation into fields already occupied by the provinces or on objects jointly taxed without making satisfactory compensatory adjustments. Such action would violate the whole spirit of the arrangement.

That was their statement with respect to minor taxes under their proposed settlement.

The fourth criticism I offered of this plan was that it has failed to achieve a continuance of plans for dominion-provincial discussions, which in my view is a serious matter in a federal state. Here it is important that we go to great lengths to try and get the maximum of cooperation between the central government and the other governments across the dominion. In my judgment the course the government is following will lead to the liquidation of the dominion-provincial conference system which has been inherent in our set-up since the first years of confederation.

[Mr. Bracken.]

My fifth criticism was that this procedure delays the bringing into effect of the social security, health, unemployment and other plans envisaged in what was spoken of two years ago as a great national plan. In that connection I want to read a statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) himself, and then to refer to his own words in closing his address last evening. Addressing the Toronto board of trade on January 27 of this year the Minister of Finance had this to say:

As a result of increased rental payments from the dominion—

That was after the dominion had proposed to increase its rental payments above the figures proposed in some earlier discussions.

—the provinces will be able to assume, and must expect to assume, a somewhat greater financial responsibility.

I commend the minister for his frankness. The dominion offered to give the provinces more, but to the extent that it gave them more it would do less itself. That should be clear to anyone examining the matter, but when we have the statement so frankly from the lips of the minister there can be no doubt as to the position. Then he went on:

The dominion government will be able, correspondingly, to reduce some of the burden it was prepared to assume for a public investment and social security programme.

Then last evening in this house, at page 5319 of Hansard, the minister had this to say:

The details of our original proposals may of course change as a result of further study or of developing public opinion or of discussion with provincial governments at a general conference which will be necessary before they can be implemented. The proposed contributions which the dominion may be able to make in the field of public investment and social security may, as I have said publicly and as I advised the provinces which were negotiating with us last winter, have to be revised—

In that case the word "revised" means "reduced".

—to take into account the substantial increase in the financial payments which the dominion has now undertaken to make as rental for the tax fields in question.

My point in reading these quotations is this. The government made certain proposals to the provinces that it would undertake a great national programme. In its negotiations with the provinces it had to increase the size of its offers. This it did, as the minister frankly said, on two or three occasions. He said that having increased the government's contribution to the provinces, the provinces can now expect less from the government in the future.

My sixth criticism last night was that this plan brought forward by the government abandons the principle of fiscal need. I think the minister's statement last night on fiscal need was a specious argument. There is one way to give fiscal need, and no other, namely to recognize the periodic, or in some cases, I am afraid, the permanent, inability of some provinces to provide adequate standards of social services. That is one of two reasons given in justification of the kind of measure by which the dominion collects taxes from the people and gives some of it to provincial governments to spend. I support the government to a degree in that policy. But I agree with the Prime Minister's statement of past years that to go beyond that is a vicious principle.

There is one other thing I might have said, which I shall say now, it is this: This proposal or these related proposals are not charity, not merely taking from a wealthy section of Canada and having the money distributed in needy sections. It is not that only. In this federal state of ours, with nine provinces, the people in all these provinces contribute to the wealth made by large institutions, which by circumstances find themselves located in the larger centres of population in the central parts of the country. The net result of that is that the taxing capacity of the outlying sections is reduced, and the taxing capacity of the central sections is increased. To the extent that that is so, any state is warranted in taking taxes where they can be obtained and allowing a part of them to be spent where they are needed. I did not mention this aspect last night; I am sure it was not necessary. I mention it now only because one might take from the discussion that this was wholly a charitable arrangement—one by which money was collected in the wealthy sections of our economy and spent in other sections. It is not wholly that. Some of the wealthiest sections of our economy have been made such by wealth made in business done in other sections of the nation. It is entirely defensible to use some of that to help correct in a small way the inequities that result.

Let me conclude by this one statement. In my judgment the course the government is following means the liquidation of the dominion-provincial conference system which has been inherent in our confederation system since its inception. Certain provinces need help. That is granted. And help to a degree can be justified . But the procedure the government has followed has brought about serious criticism. It is resulting in disunity and all the other objections I have raised. Certain provinces having undertaken to come into this arrangement, we ought not to deny them that right. We can defend it to a point. Beyond that it is unsound policy.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this party does not intend to make any long debate on this measure. In our opinion it is not a measure that one can get particularly hot about either way. We regret exceedingly that the dominion-provincial conference which was called in August, 1945, broke down and that now the arrangements between the dominion and the provinces are on a province-to-province basis. I can agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) that that is a bad aspect of our dominion-provincial relations.

I should like to draw attention to the fact that the dominion-provincial conference was called by the dominion government. The impression is abroad that the conference broke up because certain premiers were, to use the language of the street, playing politics. But even if that were so I do not think the dominion government is in a strong position when it refuses to call the conference together again. Because of the position of the dominion government, where it has an over-all view of the needs of Canada, knows what the needs are in every part of the dominion, in fact knows that the provinces as a whole constitute the dominion and that there is no dominion of Canada outside the provinces, it should pocket its pride and, regardless of what the attitude of any provincial premier had been or might be in another provincial conference, call a new conference.

In my opinion the dominion government has all the trumps in this game, and it would be the easiest thing in the world to expose any provincial premier who tries to disrupt the over-all programme that the dominion government is attempting to put into effect. Therefore I do not believe the dominion government can be excused for the failure to call a dominion-provincial conference after the last one broke up in April or May of 1946.

Let me read two short paragraphs from the statement made by the Prime Minister on the first day of the conference, August 6, 1945. On page 6 of the proceedings of the plenary session of that date, the Prime Minister said:

> Above all, we aim at the maintenance of a high level of employment and income. In no field are the interests of dominion and provinces more thoroughly one than in the maintenance at all times of a high level of employment. The fear of war is undoubtedly the worst of all fears in the minds of men today. But next to the fear of war, the greatest fear for most men is the fear of unemployment. There are men and women who almost dreaded the coming of victory because they feared that depression and unemployment might come in victory's train. That fear we must all seek, in close cooperation, to remove.

I agree with every word the Prime Minister said. The fear of unemployment cannot be removed by the arrangements that are now being made between government and government. That fear is just as prominent in the minds of the Canadian people in 1947 as it was in 1945. The Prime Minister went on to say:

Finally, our proposals are designed to make possible a comprehensive system of social insurance, partially federal and partially provincial, through which the community will share with the individual in meeting the variations of income and expense to which the rise and fall of business activity, natural disasters, accident, ill health and old age render all of us liable. Improved standards of nutrition, housing, health and social amenities, for both urban and rural populations, are also objectives of our reconstruction policy. Of these housing is a most urgent need in the period of reconstruction.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance or any member of the government: Have any of the problems mentioned by the Prime Minister in that paragraph been solved by any agreement that has been made up to date or that can be made under the present policy? Obviously the answer is no.

There is a little background to this whole question of which we should not lose sight. I am old enough to remember what happened at the end of world war I as well as at the end of world war II. At the end of both wars people had come to the conclusion, because of what we were able to do during those wars in the matter of production, that never again would we go back to the haphazard, unplanned way of providing for our needs. They felt that there had to be more planning and, as the Prime Minister so well said, a sharing by individuals who were in good circumstances with other individuals who were not. What we need is an over-all policy where the rich provinces will share with the poor provinces because all together are Canada.

I found some difficulty in following the reasoning of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), but that may be my fault and not his. I had the same difficulty last night and my difficulty was not decreased today. At page 5321 of yesterday's Hansard the leader of the opposition referred to the way in which the amounts needed by the provinces had been increased step by step. He said it was $40 million under the Rowell-Sirois commission; it was $117 million under the 1942 tax arrangements; it was $138 million under the 1945 proposal, $198 million under the 1946 proposal, and it is $228 million at the present time.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. ABBOTT: A minimum of $206 million.

Mr. MacINNIS: Last night he said $228 million.

Mr. BRACKEN: $206 million was the minimum.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then he referred to the statement made a few evenings ago by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), that the proposals outlined in the 1945 proposals would cost at the present time from $500 million to $600 million a year. He then went on to say:

I have not seen certain of the calculations and figures which the minister put on the record tonight, but I am going to refer to them in a moment. But in so far as this measure provides fiscal need for the provinces of Canada, it will receive our support. In so far as it fails to provide fiscal need, the bill is weak and should be remedied. In so far as it provides more than fiscal need, it is not a sound method of financing in Canada. Does this proposal meet fiscal needs?

Then he continued:

If in the 1945 proposals the government was planning to meet the fiscal needs of the provinces by providing $138 million, certainly it is paying enough to meet the fiscal needs of the provinces now by providing $228 million which is $92 million more. On that basis I do not think there can be any question but that this plan does meet the fiscal needs of the weaker provinces.

If I understood him aright today, he said that these plans did not provide for the fiscal needs of the poorer provinces. I am simply stating how it appeared to me after listening to the hon. member.

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not mean to say that today.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think that is what my hon. friend said. However, I am not going to refer to it any more. I am in a quandary, now and I was in a quandary last night as to whether he was supporting or opposing this measure. I am wondering now just where he stands. I hope when I finish I shall not be in the same boat.

I should like to know what is meant by fiscal need. Does fiscal need mean the programme of social services and public investment which was mentioned in the 1945 proposals? In my opinion fiscal need means just that. Let us see what was in that programme. I shall refer only to the headings. There was a national health programme for all the provinces. There was provision for old age pensions to those seventy years of age and over, for which the dominion government would assume full responsibility without a means test. That would mean that everyone over seventy would automatically get a pension. If he had income over and above the maximum amount of the income tax exemption, then the tax would take it away. For those old age pensioners between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine years the government would go fifty-fifty with the provinces on a means test basis.

Then there was provision for unemployment assistance benefits. I have not looked this up recently, but my memory is that those benefits were to cover persons not covered by unemployment insurance or who had exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits. Then there was a policy of public investment. After a social security programme I think that a policy of public investment which would provide employment, which would increase the wealth of the country, is of equal importance to a social security programme under which benefits would be paid. In the one case benefits are paid, and in the other case we enable people to provide incomes for themselves. Of course the kind of social security programme that we would be able ultimately to provide for ourselves would depend upon the amount of wealth produced and the national income created by that wealth.

My criticism of the government's policy is that it does, as the leader of the opposition says, throw overboard the whole social security and public investment programme. I am inclined to believe that the government was pleased rather than otherwise that the conference broke down, because the psychology in favour of cooperation and state assistance in 1946 was not as strong as it was in 1945 and in the last years of the war. In 1946 the psychology of private enterprise was on the make—take what you can and the devil take the hindmost. I believe that the government had come to doubt its own programme and was glad when the premiers of two of the central provinces broke up the conference in 1946.

The leader of the opposition several times referred to the fact that the federal government in its taxing arrangements was encroaching upon provincial tax fields to such an extent that no field of taxation was now clear for the provinces. Let us take a look at that picture.

The Canadian constitution provides for a distribution of powers and responsibilities as between the dominion and the provinces. We found that during the depression years, with all the taxing powers that they had ever had, most of the provinces found themselves in a position where they could not discharge the responsibilities given to them under the British North America Act, and the federal government had to come to their assistance. That being so, I think it is far more important to the provinces that they should have sufficient income to enable them to discharge the responsibilities that they now have, regardless of where the money is to come from, than that they should have taxation fields which will not provide them with sufficient revenue to discharge those responsibilities. I do not believe that any province should be greatly disturbed if the dominion is collecting all the taxes, because the people who are paying the taxes are all Canadian citizens and they are the same people whether it is the dominion or the province that collects the tax. If there are two sets of tax collectors there will be two expense accounts to pay.

What is required is that the dominion and the provinces should come to an arrangement whereby each province would be provided with sufficient revenue to discharge the responsibilities that it assumed under whatever arrangement it entered into with the federal government. The present arrangements do not do that; they do not provide for social security services, and while we may get along without those services at the present time, perhaps in a few more years, maybe sooner, we shall be in the position in which we found ourselves between 1930 and 1939, when seven of the provinces of this dominion were not able to discharge the responsibilities assigned to them under the constitution.

In conclusion I would urge the government at the earliest possible moment to call the dominion-provincial conference. If pride deters them, let them throw it overboard. Big people are not deterred by a little pride. When the conference is called together, if any premier of any province begins to use that conference as a political platform I am satisfied that the dominion government, if it wishes to go ahead with the programme outlined in the green book, has sufficient material to expose that individual and bring him to time. The people of his province will repudiate him if he puts them in such a position that they are not able to take advantage of benefits which they could enjoy if he accepted a reasonable arrangement with the dominion.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I think I should say just a word to place on record the position of my group with respect to these agreements. I certainly shall not take long because I would not want to thresh old straw or to cover any territory that has been so well covered thus far this afternoon.

I must agree with a good deal that has been said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and follow much the same line that he did. There were some things in the speech of the hon. member who just preceded me (Mr. MacInnis) with which I can also agree.

As is well known, Mr. Speaker, our group has always taken a strong position against centralization. We do so now. We feel that this is a move for centralizing control in the federal government. We do not think that that is in the interests of Canada and its strength, and in due course I am satisfied that whatever government may be in power at the time, it will come to recognize that centralization is not the answer and will take steps to see that Canada is strengthened by a decentralizing move. However, that is not what I wanted to develop at any length, except to place our position on record as strongly against centralization.

The agreements seem to be based on quite reasonable terms, at least in relation to conditions at the present time. I have no particular objection to the terms. But it must not be overlooked that the money which is being paid back in these increased grants to the provincial governments is collected out of taxes which come from the very people to whom the grants are being paid.

It is not a question of the provinces getting a better deal than they have ever had. It is simply a question of the provinces receiving from a central collection agency taxes which they could very well collect for themselves if they wished to tax their people that heavily. I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, what the dominion government would do should another disastrous unemployment situation arise. I went through that sort of thing in Alberta in the thirties and I know what it means to a province with limited revenues. It was not during that time a question whether we could collect taxes to take care of unemployment and the needs of hungry people. It was not that at all. The money just was not there. There were plenty of goods and services that could have been made available, but the money was not there. There was only one authority in this dominion of Canada that could have made that money available, but they did not do it.

Now I am wondering if, under the terms of this agreement, the federal government might not back out of the picture in case of the development of a serious unemployment situation and say to the provinces: We have provided for all that in this agreement, and it is your responsibility from now on; take it.

I protest against that most vehemently. I think the provinces will have to guard themselves against such a possibility and I hope they will. I can do no better, Mr. Speaker, than to put on the record a statement made by the Hon. Mr. Manning, premier of Alberta, in his budget speech delivered on March 7, 1947, in the Alberta legislature. This sums up his attitude towards the whole agreement. It is the stand that we in this group will take in this house, because it is the stand that we have consistently followed. Mr. Manning said:

> The government of Alberta is convinced that the accumulating force of circumstances will continue to add still further emphasis to the impossibility of a satisfactory permanent solution to the problem of dominion-provincial relations until three basic factors are recognized and acted upon. First, there must be a redefining and, if necessary, a reallocation of the rights and responsibilities of the respective governments in the light of conditions as they exist today.

Not as they existed, Mr. Speaker, back in 1867, but as they exist today.

> Second, each government must be assured adequate revenue under its own unfettered jurisdiction to enable it to discharge fully its constitutional responsibilities and provide adequately for the just requirements of its people. Third, to make this possible the Canadian monetary system must be reformed in the manner necessary to permit the monetization of the entire national production and the use of the financial credit thereby created to supplement and progressively to replace excessive taxation as a means of providing public revenue. The Alberta government will continue to do everything in its power to secure recognition of these basic factors to the end that this important problem, ultimately, will be solved in a manner satisfactory to the dominion and all the provinces, and on a basis that will assure the Canadian people the national and provincial economic stability which they desire and to which they are justly entitled.

That is the attitude of the government of my province with respect to these agreements. They do not look upon the arrangement as in any sense a permanent one. I think they are quite well satisfied at present with the terms of the agreements, but I think too that I should emphasize that they signed the agreement with the reservation that it would be for a preliminary five-year period, and also on the understanding—I believe an undertaking was given by this government that would lend credence to their understanding—that one year prior to the termination of these contracts another conference would be held at which further efforts would be made to reach a permanent solution that would be satisfactory in the interests of all concerned.

In conclusion let me say this. I quite recognize the importance of social security measures and of public investment possibilities. I do not think, however, that it would be possible to conceive a better programme of social security and public investment than that which is embodied within the terms of the statement which Mr. Manning made, particularly in the third provision, which I quote once more:

To make this possible, the Canadian monetary system must be reformed in the manner necessary to permit the monetization of the entire national production and the use of the financial credit thereby created to supplement and progressively to replace excessive taxation as a means of providing public revenue.

There you have the answer to our calls and demands for public investment and for social security agreements. The provinces, if given their rights under a proper monetary system, can provide their own social security, and they will not have to come here on their stomachs with hat in hand asking the federal governmet to help them. They can provide their own public investment programme and take care of their own people if this government will sit down with them and work out a definition and perhaps an allocation of powers that will enable the provinces to discharge fully the responsibilities that are placed upon them under the terms of our constitution. I wanted to emphasize that as our position.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which has been discussed at other times and which is of the utmost importance to the country. I appreciate the fact that everyone has spoken in a friendly disposition and with a view to trying to help the community by making suggestions.

When we discuss any matter we must have the same basis for discussion. The leader of the opposition said yesterday that the dominion government and the provincial governments have certain responsibilities and certain taxing powers. He should have said that they have the right to impose taxation within their respective jurisdictions. The hon. member used the word "jurisdiction" later on in this speech, and he knows very well that the meaning and scope of the word "jurisdiction" is entirely different from that of responsibility. He added at page 5319:

In other words, the dominion government in this bill asks the provinces to refrain from taxing in certain fields, and for that concession the dominion government undertakes to pay money to the provinces.

This is the main issue. Speaking of the Rowell-Sirois commission, he described it as the fullest and most valuable statement on dominion-provincial affairs made since confederation. It was certainly the fullest, considering the size of the books that were published; but when he concludes that it was the most valuable report, distinctions should be made. It was an orgy of words. It was the fiesta of the intelligentsia, and all the clever brains from all over the country were invited to do something to make that report thicker. I remember hearing one of these super-brains in a broadcast in 1940 or 1941—1941 I believe— say that the time had come when Canada should no longer be an amalgamation of several small countries but should become one great country, meaning that the provincial legislatures should disappear in order to make room for a larger dominion parliament. He seemed to be embarrassed when he said that over the radio, but he went on and finally finished the sentence. I was down home and I heard him over CBL, Toronto.

Mr. IRVINE: Who said that?

Mr. POULIOT: He was a professor at Queens, and with regard to the book he had published for the commission he was praised by the editor of Saturday Night who sat in the press gallery for some time and was a civil servant on many occasions but described himself as a reporter even when he was in government pay.

The issue is that of giving uncontrolled power to the intelligentsia. I have seen it from that angle from the start. Ten years ago I wrote articles in a Montreal paper to the same effect. It is my deep conviction.

In this matter of dominion-provincial relations I have formed my own views, and to me it is a matter of paramount importance to all Canadians. Because one expresses a certain view, he should not be described as a supporter of Mr. So-and-So here in Ottawa, or Mr. So-and-So in Quebec city, or Mr. So-and-So in Toronto. In a discussion I seldom consider a subjective reason. To do this is referred to as the use of the argument ad hominem—recalling the past sayings of a man to show his contradiction in certain statements. I am reluctant to do that, but I shall be bound to do it in a minute. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we all should consider any matter objectively. Because Mr. So-and-So has said a certain thing, we should not be bound to fall in line with him, and we should not be considered as bad Canadians whether we do or do not think as he does.

In the first place, I must say that I have deep sympathy for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) because he has inherited a heavy legacy from the war. I cannot understand the controversy between the various parties and groups with regard to dominion-provincial relations, for this reason: if we have to bear such a heavy burden of taxation now, it is precisely on account of war finance, on account of the loans and gifts which were made to other countries, and on account of the expenditures which were not scrutinized by any party during the war. I remember that Mr. Hanson, the predecessor of the present leader of the opposition, used to say, "Well, I close my eyes during the war; but after the war is over, we shall see to it."

Mr. MacNICOL: That was too late.

Mr. POULIOT: We see that very well. But I am in sympathy with the present minister because he has shown determination not to fall into the trap as often as his predecessor did every time some country asked something of him.

An hon. MEMBER: Give him time.

Mr. POULIOT: He deserves a great deal of praise for that. During the war, when a handful of members of parliament were pointing out the results of that nonsensical crazy extravagance, everybody was saying, "It is all right." In spite of what was said, the money was voted blindly just the same as if we were never to face a situation as the one which now confronts us.

The leader of the opposition has been frank in his utterances, and that is possibly the best explanation for his contradiction. I give him credit for his sincerity. Everyone knows that he was one of the instigators of the Rowell commission. It was initiated by the Sanhedrin of Winnipeg, as is well known, and one of the members for a time was the late Judge Hudson, who was a personal friend of mine but with whom I never had any business dealings. There were some other members; some of them are still alive. It is known as the Sanhedrin, and when I mention it to the leader of the opposition he will know whom I mean in Winnipeg. The Sanhedrin controls the spirit of the Winnipeg Free Press, and the Winnipeg Free Press in flesh and bone was John W. Dafoe. Mr. Dafoe was self-educated, but perhaps not absolutely enough. He could not give to his own brain the last finishing touch. But he was there and he probably wanted to organize something for the benefit of the prairie provinces. If ever anyone had the personal ways and, to use a royal expression, the personal style, to canvass the readers of his newspaper, he had. There was Mr. Rowell, and there was also Senator Crerar, a delightful man, who was then the Manitoba minister in the dominion government. My hon friend the leader of the opposition was then premier of the province which was so ably represented in the dominion cabinet by Mr. Crerar. So we have Mr. Crerar, Mr. Dafoe and Mr. Bracken. Naturally they wanted to have the whole scheme promoted by a premier of one of the nine provinces, and they could not find any better man than the premier of their own province, who is now leader of the opposition.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is that the whole of the Sanhedrin?

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, no.

Mr. KNOWLES: There have to be seventy members.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, no; there are the big grain merchants, too.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Sanhedrin has to have seventy men in it.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot count them, but my hon. friend knows I am on my way to truth.

Mr. BENTLEY: We can count them for you.

Mr. POULIOT: Before that the dominion was most generous with the western provinces. They used to come here with a top hat asking for just a guarantee. Then they came with a homburg for a loan. Finally they came bareheaded, like the burghers of Calais, for a gift. The guarantee became a loan; the loan became a gift, and then everybody had to pay for it. I asked some questions of Mr. Dunning at the time; but the western provinces have always been the spoiled children of the government, just as in a large family the children who are of a weak disposition are more loved than the others.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend does not belong to that category it is because he was born in Halifax.

Mr. LOW: These tough guys from the central provinces!

Mr. POULIOT: But it is the true story. Then the Sanhedrin wanted a judge to preside over the commission, a man who would be entirely disinterested; and according to the official figures I obtained he was well looked after. At the time he was not a judge; he was not a cabinet minister; he was not a member of parliament; he was not a civil servant, but in the ten years from 1927 to 1937 he received from the dominion government $168,332.51. In addition, from November 20, 1926, to June 14, 1928, he received an amount of $48,641.63 for services, travelling expenses, expenses, allocations and so on, not taking into account what was paid by other departments than justice and national revenue. So he received $216,000 in that period of ten years. He was full of disinterest. He was there as chairman of the commission; he had

Mr. Dafoe sitting with him and another French-Canadian judge who was there for a time but who became sick—probably he became sick of it, though he was not in such bad health as the second chairman, who died not long after he was appointed. It was impossible to live in that atmosphere. It was babel at its worst. It was indeed a fiesta of the intelligentsia. They came from all over the world, a caravan of learned fellows with thick glasses, bringing statistics in brief cases which were well loaded with important documents. It was not paper they wanted; it was straw to make nests and feather to make pillows. They wanted to make themselves comfortable in the fine atmosphere of Ottawa.

Mr. IRVINE: There was no gurgling sound from the brief cases?

Mr. POULIOT: No; it was all generosity, abnegation and the spirit of sacrifice, and they forgot themselves completely. They were coming here to serve the country, this gentleman who had been paid $216,000 in ten years and all the rest. It was self-sacrificing abnegation. Then they organized that scheme, and we saw a mountain of reports. It was the Rowell commission. Strangely enough they recommended exactly what the Minister of Finance, Mr. Dunning, had suggested after the election in 1935—to take over succession duties and that sort of thing, which I opposed many years ago when the matter was brought before the house.

The leader of the opposition has admirably summarized the recommendations contained in the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission: that the central government should collect taxes wherever they can be obtained, and that the provinces suffering from a poor economy should be benefited on the basis of fiscal need, that is, to the extent of the amount necessary to enable those provinces to have the same levels of public services as the other provinces without having to apply a higher level of taxation. His suggestion was that some provinces which he considered richer because they were not his own would have to be called upon to pay for the other provinces that were supposed to be not so fortunate; but the hon. gentleman also said the basic recommendation of that commission was that the provinces of Canada should be aided by the central government on the basis of fiscal need. It is very difficult to establish that; and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked for some information from the leader of the opposition, who also said, "In fact there are vast differences, so that we find in this nation six different major types of economy". I wonder if he perhaps missed a page in which those six different major types of economy were described. I am very anxious to know what they are, and I hope that when the bill is in committee the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to tell us.

In the past, Mr. Speaker, it was stated that some of these provinces have not been able to secure as high a standard of living or of public services as the others. Those mentioned have been the prairie provinces and the maritimes. When it comes to helping any Canadian, whether he is from the east or from the west, there should be no objection. But there should be order in government, and the only way to have order in government is to have the same treatment for all. If some provinces both east and west have difficulty in making ends meet it is precisely because they do not have the powers of taxation that have been given them by the constitution. That constitution has been in force for eighty years, and until ten years ago there was no difficulty. At that time the difficulty came about not in the east but in the prairie provinces, and due to drought and other reasons, some of which may perhaps have been good reasons. They were given a palliative, just as though the government were ashamed to act properly toward the western provinces. Instead of saying, "You need something, and we will fix you up", it was always given by the back door. After a certain time the prairie provinces were most generously treated, especially after the Bennett regime went out. They were better treated than the eastern provinces; but the government seemed to be ashamed to do anything in the open. There was always a screen and a reason to hide what had been done. I had to ask special questions to get full information from the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Dunning, who seemed reluctant to give a true picture of what had been done for the western provinces.

What has been said about the inferiority of the maritime and the prairie provinces is an insult to the population of these provinces. The propaganda is to the effect that the older provinces, Ontario especially and Quebec, will have to pay the system of social security for the whole country. It seems that if the taxes had been adjusted properly there would be no difficulty about social security in any part of the country.

When the motion to appoint the Rowell commission was brought before the house I remember that I uttered thunderous "hear, hears", and it was struck out from Hansard. The purpose of the motion was to bring some order in the relations between the dominion and the provinces. The purpose was excellent. If it was falsified by those who wanted to serve certain areas at the expense of the rest of the country. Mr. Speaker, you would be astonished to see the fabulous sums that have been paid for the Rowell-Sirois report, about half a million dollars at the time. But that is nothing compared with what we have to pay now.

In the summary of the report it is said that Ottawa will be able to collect more taxes than the provinces ever could. That is one of the arguments that have been brought out by the commission. But, sir, the reason that I am opposed to it is that I consider that the collection of taxes is something most unpleasant and it should be left to those who spend the money. I do not see why Ottawa should have the opprobrium of collecting taxes and pass the amount over to the provinces. That is one reason. Besides that it is an occasion for red tape to show up. There are many reasons why I cannot understand that policy, and I wonder whether all the difficulties which have been raised in regard to dominion-provincial relations have not been caused by the bureaucrats who have taken advantage of the Rowell-Sirois report to fatten themselves at the expense of the public treasury. You know very well, sir, that it is most difficult to make some people who have been appointed on a temporary basis understand that as soon as their time is ended they will have to go. When someone is employed as a temporary in Ottawa it is for the duration of his life. What we see now is the old struggle. It is not a fight between the provinces and Ottawa; it is the old struggle between the taxpayer and the bureaucrat, and the bureaucrats are much more numerous here than they are in the provinces.

Why not consider the question objectively? Those who made the report wanted to make it big and thick to impress those who would never read it. It is a well known fact that not one out of ten thousand people has read the full report of the Rowell-Sirois commission. But when the report is so big it creates a deep impression on the people, even on those who do not know how to read and write. It would have been much better for this country if some of the university professors and journalists who worked on the report had never been taught how to read and write. Therefore, sir, I have always agreed with the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his statements of 1929 and 1930 when he said, as was quoted by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Bracken):

> That it was a thoroughly vicious system to have one body raise taxes and another body expend the money thus secured.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

On February 5 of this year, I offered my services as an intermediary between the dominion and the provinces to try to get them to come to an understanding so that we would have order in this country and so that grants which are made to the provinces should no longer be considered as bribes but given as due. If we look at the British North America Act we shall see the equal treatment which was given the first four provinces at confederation. Naturally each province did not have as much, but the proportion was the same for all, and so long as the same proportion of money is paid to all provinces it is difficult to have an objection to it, although it is much better and economically sounder to give the provinces the opportunity to collect their own taxes and to do what they think they have to do with their own money. It is a question of decentralization. Decentralization is a Liberal principle. It is the principle of giving the same opportunity to all in every part of the country. That is the way in which the country was governed at the time of Alexander Mackenzie, at the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and at the time of Mackenzie King before Bennett came to power. I remember those happy days when the country was fortunate and when everybody seemed to be prosperous even in spite of the crash of 1929.

If I took the trouble to speak about this today it was not with the expectation to convert anybody right now, but it was to afford all hon. members the opportunity to think over what has been said. I may be right; I may be wrong. I am not prejudiced, but I hope that in the near future the quarrels between some provinces and Ottawa will stop. I find it a disgrace. The provinces are considered wrong because they do not accept the views of this government, because they are not ready to accept what has been cooked up in the Rowell-Sirois report.

It is not a question of so many more millions to be given by Ottawa, because I submit that the provinces have a right to expect that the same proportion will be paid to all. When it is done to all the provinces there can be no question of bribing. I can remember that not later than last year the question came up of giving other countries some large gifts which would have to be paid out of taxes. Members of parliament were told, "If you do not vote for this, you will not have family allowances any longer." If that is not blackmail, I do not know what blackmail is. That was not said by the present minister; it was said by someone else who was putting undue pressure.

That is not the way to act with the provinces. The provinces have a right to be proud and dignified because they have exclusive rights within their jurisdiction under the British North America Act. I need not refer hon. members to the various provisions of that imperial statute because they know that the provinces on the one hand, and the dominion on the other have exclusive jurisdiction respectively. That means that the provinces are the equal of the dominion in their respective fields. The dominion is asking the provinces to make a concession in connection with taxing powers and in return the provinces will be given the returns from the collection of those taxes. It cannot go on like that. Let the provinces be independent; let Ottawa be independent, but let us all be friendly. I hope that in the near future, with the fine disposition of the Minister of Finance who is open-minded and broadminded, and with the equally fine disposition of the premiers who have not accepted the proposals, there will be a complete revision of what has been done with seven provinces. This should be done at the earliest possible opportunity in order that all the provinces can be treated fairly and squarely.

If the leader of the opposition has reached this conclusion, I congratulate him. I do not know how he will vote. His speech was based on the false principle of gifts. I am against gifts to provinces as I am against gifts to other countries. The provinces should be given the right to maintain themselves through their own taxation.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, the title of the bill is rather long but it is fully descriptive. It is styled:

An act to authorize the government of Canada to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces pursuant to which, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes for a limited period.

As its title indicates, this bill entails the surrender by the provinces to the dominion, for a period at least, of certain constitutional rights. It suggests that among some of the provinces there are necessities which should be met. As a preface to what I have to say, I should like to make two definite statements. The first is that I believe that, as a civilized community, it behooves Canada so to administer its affairs, in conjunction with the provinces, that need may be relieved where it exists. I do not wish anything I say to be interpreted as hostile to a revision of taxing rights and to a reallocation between the dominion and the provinces of the revenue of those taxes. The next statement is that these questions are not free from controversy. It is possible for men to hold divergent views, to hold them in good faith and with some degree of enlightenment. For that reason I was sorry to hear the acting leader of the C.C.F. group state this afternoon that two premiers—there were three a short time ago—

Mr. MICHAUD: There will not be any before long.

Mr. HACKETT: My hon. friend would be prophetic; if he were better acquainted with the attachment to principle of the people of the province in which is located the county I represent, he would not be quite as certain of the accuracy of the allegation he has made. Be that as it may, I am sorry that the hon. gentleman who leads the C.C.F. group found it necessary to characterize the attitude of two or three premiers as political. If my ears did not mislead me, he said that they had been playing politics. I would be loath to make that suggestion in view of the sound arguments which were advanced by each of those gentlemen at the conference and, forsooth, because of many convictions which I hold myself. One of the characteristics of this chamber and of our political institutions is that a man may state views which may not be universally accepted, without his motives being challenged.

This bill, if enacted, will enable the federal government to pay to the provinces the sums of money stated in the bill, the consideration being that the provinces yield for a period of time their right to levy certain taxes. The policy of taxing by one authority and spending by another is false in principle and wasteful in practice. It has been condemned by all authorities, including Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and by none more roundly, more completely, more forcefully and more eloquently, than by the right hon. gentleman who leads this house.

We are told that agreements have been entered into separately with seven of the nine provinces. In several instances these agreements have been renegotiated because a province, finding that some other province had subsequently to its arrangement with the dominion, received better terms, came back and insisted that it be given terms as satisfactory as those conceded to the last province with which the dominion had dealt.

I should like to make it quite clear that my objection to this method of dealing with the provinces rests on what I believe to be a principle. This country's genesis, this country's beginning, this country's origin as a confederation rests on conference, on agreements arrived at in the open, and if we are to put an end to the era of conference and agreement which makes it obligatory that all the provinces should be treated in a way which is satisfactory to all, then I fear that we have come upon very sad days for this dominion.

How are we to deal with each of these provinces separately? What are we contending for; what is the group which sits to my immediate left contending for as well as other groups in the house in the field of labour? It is that everybody should have complete freedom of bargaining. Is one to believe that a province whose necessities are extremely urgent has the same freedom of bargaining the same power and capacity to bargain with respect to its own interests as a province which has a relatively larger revenue?

To take a case, let us take that of Nova Scotia; let us remember that only a short time ago an announcement was made in the house that the province of Nova Scotia had finally accepted the offer which had been made to it by the dominion. Here are the words of the premier of Nova Scotia only a little over a year ago. At page 419 of the Dominion and Provincial Submissions and Plenary Conference Discussions he said this:

In return we are asked to surrender our rights to collect income and corporation taxes, two fields which, as I said, yielded last year something in excess of one and a half billion dollars. We have then to surrender the rights to collect income and corporation tax, two fields which I said last year yielded something over one billion and a half dollars. That is the position which the provinces are asked to take. Let me ask you, Mr. Chairman, and the delegates here, whether they represent the dominion government or the provinces, let me ask anyone who is within sound of my voice, let me ask that greater body to which we as public servants are all accountable, the citizens of our provinces or of Canada, let me ask any of those people whether they think that is a fair or honourable or dignified position in which to place the provinces in this dominion. Provincial autonomy will be gone. Provincial independence will vanish. Provincial dignity will disappear. Provincial governments will become mere annuitants of Ottawa. Provincial public life—and I do not think these words are too strong—will be debased and degraded. I cannot think that such a state of affairs is desired by the representatives of the government of Canada here today, my one-time colleagues. I am sure that they have no wish or desire to see such a state of affairs come to pass in this country, nor can I believe that such a state of affairs is desired by the people of this country.

Yet the same hon. gentleman, if we are to believe what has been stated in the house, has signed an agreement with the dominion. He has had to yield up the dignity of provincial life. He has had to foreswear the autonomy in which he believed. Why? Because he and his people have been starved into that acquiescence. I say, Mr. Speaker, that agreements which rest upon a basis of that kind are insecure; they are not durable, and they will not bring about a happy, contented or prosperous Canada.

[Mr. Hackett.]

The taxing powers under the constitution have been divided between the federal and the provincial authorities. It is now sought so to divide them that the federal government may collect the taxes and pay over large sums to the provinces. That system is subversive of the whole idea of confederation and it will make, as has been said by the premier of Nova Scotia, vassals of the provinces. I submit that it is far better that a dominion-provincial conference be called together and that an arrangement be arrived at with all the provinces whereby each province, retaining its right to tax within the terms of the constitution, shall provide by direct taxation for its own needs.

How did this difficulty come about? We have heard this afternoon something said about the Rowell-Sirois report. At the time that study was undertaken the provinces were in the greatest distress. That situation has been modified. The party that now needs money most urgently is the dominion. The dominion, having acquired taxing rights from the provinces for a period of time, having enjoyed them for the duration and for the purpose only of winning the war, directed them to another purpose. It used them to win an election. It used the proceeds of the taxing rights conceded to it by the provinces for the purpose of winning the war for the purpose of providing family allowances. Family allowances are an excellent thing. Dishonesty is not a virtue. When a government is in possession of certain borrowed taxing rights and revenues for a specific purpose and it diverts them to another purpose, it seems to me it is nothing short of dishonest. Filial piety is a fine thing itself, but were a young man to break into the home of a neighbour and take away a large sum of money and, with a portion of it, buy an armchair or an automobile for his parents, his conduct would hardly be lauded.

That is exactly what has happened here. But that is not all. At the end of the period, when the time came to return to the provinces their taxing rights, the dominion said: We cannot do that because, if we do, we shall not be able to continue these social services, social services which were excellent in themselves but which, in reality were within the jurisdiction of the provinces, which, upon a proper reallocation of the taxing privileges, were better equipped and better able to provide those services than was the dominion itself.

We have found that the dominion received something over $2 billion from the exercise of these taxation rights. It paid out to the provinces, as the leader of my party said last night, about $117 million per annum during the war, keeping the balance for its own purpose. The amount has increased rapidly since that time. It was $117 million during the war, $138 million in 1945, $198 million in 1946, and according to the table which the Minister of Finance put on Hansard last night, it will be $228 million for 1947. There is evidence of the unsatisfactory result following the method which the government has pursued. It has made a secret arrangement with one province and another secret arrangement with another province, and when the first province has found out what has happened it has required a larger amount of money.

An hon. MEMBER: How were they secret?

Mr. ABBOTT: There were no secret arrangements made with anyone.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are not a Tory party.

Mr. HACKETT: As to the secrecy, they were not made openly in public conference; they were not made with the knowledge of all the provinces; and the point I am endeavouring to make, Mr. Speaker, is that any arrangement with a province which is made outside, the knowledge of all the provinces, any arrangement which is made in the absence of any member of the family, is a secret arrangement and one which tends to undermine the very basis of confederation, one which makes for rivalries and jealousies and for misunderstanding throughout the country.

We have just about emerged from a period of sordid division which has prevailed throughout the land since the first great war. It is not my intention to go into all the details of that sad story which grew out of the question of where Canada's duty lay with regard to defence. You know, Mr. Speaker, that the situation was such that a large element, a very respectable and intelligent element in one section of the country was told and told frequently that it had no duty to serve anywhere unless this country were attacked. We are through with that. The fallacy of those statements has been brought home to those who made them. It was only the other day that we enacted in this house legislation to provide for tribunals before which members of visiting forces who had misconducted themselves might be haled, meaning, if it meant anything, that visiting forces would come to Canada for the purpose of coordinating their military endeavour with our own, so that our country might be, if not immune from attack, made strong in resisting it.

Now we are at last free from the divisions which arose out of enforced military service, are we to be injected into a new era of division in the economic area by permitting the government again to rule by means of dividing? Are we to permit the government to make arrangements with individual provinces? Is each province to be put on the block and to be bid in according to its necessity or the whim of him who has the moneybag?

This whole idea of centralizing taxation is bringing to Canada a theory and practice which are entirely contrary to the scheme of government which was developed and enacted eighty years ago; and if we are to continue, as my leader said, to permit the centralizing of the taxing power and of the spending agencies in Ottawa we are imperilling confederation. The interests of this country are too diverse. Our origins, our outlook, our hopes are so far apart that they cannot find expression in a unitary form of government. We can only hope to exist if complete and continuing provincial autonomy be preserved in this country.

We have been led astray to some extent, I think, by the use of words. I noticed that the minister last night referred to the "rental of fields of taxation". That is not exactly a new phrase. It is rather a glittering one, and it is certainly a loose one. It is not unlike that other term used by a master of words, "lend-lease", which was really an aphorism to describe acts of war, while the semblance of peace was maintained. I say again that the words "rental of fields of taxation" are misleading. We are witnessing the transfer of provincial rights to the dominion. It is all very well to talk of it in terms of rental; but, once an act of this description is perpetrated, it is difficult to undo it. In my hand I have the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, and the last words found in the first volume—which is really the last volume, because it is the report—indicate the aim of the transfer and make clear how final is the step that will be taken if this bill be passed. Here are the words found at page 259:

> Where legislative power over a particular subject matter is divided, it is ordinarily desirable that these powers should be pooled under the control of a single government in order to secure unified effort in administration.

And on the same page in a preceding paragraph we find these words:

> Thus the dominion must always hesitate long before withdrawing a grant. The provinces know this and they are not seriously impressed by threats of such action. The power to withdraw the grant is not an effective sanction except against the most flagrant of abuses.

So that we can draw but small consolation from the fact that this is only a five-year agreement. When these moneys have been paid and this method of dealing with the provinces has been established we shall, I fear, have gone just one step farther toward complete centralization of administration and centralizing of taxation in this dominion. The result will mean rivalry, dissatisfaction and waste; it will mean that the provinces will be weakened and will be forced, as Nova Scotia was forced, to accept the terms of the dictator, the centralizer, the powerful totalitarian who holds the purse strings.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ABBOTT: What nonsense!

Mr. HACKETT: I hear hon. gentlemen opposite dissenting. I naturally do not wish and cannot hope to force my views on anyone. I merely wish to express them. But when that dissent comes from hon. gentlemen from my own province, I marvel at their temerity; because if there is an element in this country which is interested in the maintenance of the integrity of the constitution, if there is an element in this country which needs the British North America Act and needs the power given to it by the constitution to develop its own institutions, to advance its own culture, to interpret its own soul, it is the element represented by the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite. I for one would feel remiss in the duty which is vested in me by my electors did I not say these few words against the terms of the bill and against the philosophy which underlies it.

I say again that our constitution found its genesis in understanding and in conference. Everyone who knows the story of Canada will recall that in 1866 only the two Canadas and Nova Scotia seemed willing to come into confederation. New Brunswick was not interested then. It was not until after what were called the Fenian raids, after the fear of invasion had arisen, that the latter province changed its mind and decided that it would participate in the strength and power which come from brotherhood, understanding and complete disclosure. Could confederation ever have been achieved if the fathers had gone about knocking at one door of each province? This dominion could never have been born had it not been for the endless conferences and a fathomless spirit of trust and faith which the various provinces placed in each other.

I want to say just one word before I take my seat. No one has greater awareness than I of the transcendant abilities of the right hon. gentleman who leads this parliament. But when his story is told, free from all propaganda and all prejudice, I think it will be said that his genius—his sorry genius at times—has found expression in the creation of situations which the Canadian people were frequently unable to resist, although these situations were neither helpful to nor healthy for them. I reiterate what I said a moment ago about family allowances. The people wanted family allowances; to get them they had to sacrifice provincial autonomy and accept centralized authority in this government.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Why did the hon. member vote for them?

Mr. HACKETT: That is a pertinent question. I am not going to vote for the bill which is now before the house, if it comes to a vote. I did not vote for family allowances, and I would not have voted for them had I been here because I believe it was a mistake in principle to introduce them as they were introduced, a mistake that will cost all the provinces of this country dearly, and none more than the province of Quebec. Only a short time ago this house was asked to pass a resolution, which resulted in an amendment to the constitution. Thus was another situation created! The good province of Quebec was to have eight more seats in this house than it had before; and for that mess of pottage the members opposite consented, by a mere expression of party whim, by a mere parliamentary majority, that that sacred thing, the constitution, might be torn up.

I will point out one other instance in which a situation was created that men just could not resist. Possibly some hon. members will remember the plebiscite. What was that plebiscite? The people of Quebec—not the people of Canada—had been promised there would be no war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HACKETT: The people of Quebec were promised there would be no participation in war. The people of Quebec were promised there would be no overseas service.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Never.

Mr. HACKETT: When the war came, what happened? Quebec was not asked to relieve the government from its promise; the whole dominion was asked, to which no promise had ever been made. Quebec refused to relieve the government from the promise which had been made to it; the plebiscite sought relief from the whole dominion.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with the bill?

Mr. HACKETT: It has this to do with it, that one situation after another has been created which, I suggest with all respect, are as cynical as they seem to be irresistible. They have been hostile to the interests of the people; yet, as in this instance, there are provinces in need, and their need is so great that they are being forced, as it were, into surrendering their autonomy, which is the genesis and the basis of confederation. Once provincial autonomy disappears, of necessity the dominion will dissolve, because there is not sufficient identity between the different elements of the country for them to submit to an all-pervading and unitary government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not intervening in the debate at all, but I should like to ascertain the wish of the house in regard to this evening's procedure. It was our intention to ask that private bills be called at seven o'clock, but notice was not given. Therefore, if the house would prefer to have them deferred until tomorrow evening at seven o'clock that will be quite satisfactory. I should not like to call them at seven o'clock this evening without unanimous consent. There are several on the order paper.

Mr. BRACKEN: We will be disposed to accept the judgment of the acting leader of the government in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then we will call them at seven o'clock this evening, with the consent of the house.

Mr. BENTLEY: From seven to eight?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not later than eight o'clock.

(Translation):

Mr. GEORGES H. HEON (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the government should have waited until the last days of an already quite long session to introduce this bill. As a matter of fact, I feel that none of the measures which have been put forward during the session now nearing its end, was more important than the one which is before us today. This bill, if it is favourably considered by the house, will enable the central government to enter into agreements with the provincial governments, pursuant to which the provinces, for a consideration, will sell their already limited direct taxation powers, with a redemption right apparently exercisable after five years. The language of the bill is by no means clear, because of the ambiguity of the definition of the "value of gross national product"—which will apparently be the value as estimated by the dominion statistician by "methods generally recognized as the accepted statistical techniques"—and because of the highly intricate calculations by means of which the compensation to be paid will be determined. I doubt whether the Canadian ratepayers who, after all, will once again have to pay for the proposed compensations, as they always have, will, unless they are well up in mathematics be able to make or understand the complicated calculations whereby they will take with one hand what they afterwards will give away with the other.

However, if the proposed measure is difficult to understand as regards definitions and figures, it suddenly becomes quite clear when enumerating the constitutional rights which the provinces will have to relinquish if they want to obtain further subsidies. To put it briefly, the measure requires the provinces to renounce their definite constitutional right to levy personal income taxes, corporation income taxes, and, in the language of the bill itself "corporation taxes as defined in the agreement", as well as their right to levy succession duties, if they want to obtain further subsidies. Moreover, while that is not stated in the bill, we may easily conclude or at least surmise, that the provinces unwilling to accept the proposed bargain can expect the central government to keep on levying the taxes which the provinces are required to give up, but without any compensation for the latter. Anyone familiar with the more or less satisfactory financial position of some provinces whose taxation revenue is far from large, can understand that the temptation to barter their constitutional prerogatives for gold is too great to be long resisted. To those who believe in a greater fiscal and economic centralization, in cyclic finance, in ever-increasing subsidies, the proposed measure appears most advisable. I do not question in the least the good faith or the sincerity of those who hold such views; however, I do not agree with that doctrine as I have frequently indicated by my speeches and my votes in this house, because I believe, in the first place, that centralization, even if based on the best grounds cannot, if continually extended, but lead to socialism, which, as we know, does not favour overmuch private initiative and free enterprise. We can easily imagine where such a centralizing policy would lead, should our socialist friends assume power, as they so often think they will some day.

Mr. Speaker, because I believe in decentralization, both legislative and administrative, owing to our immense territory, the multiplicity and diversity of our natural resources, the particular needs of our ethnical group, settled mainly in the province of Quebec, with its praiseworthy and distinctive culture and traditions; because I also especially believe that provincial rights, already restricted by our constitution and encroached upon to a considerable extent during two wars, must be protected instead of being auctioned off to the highest bidder. I see in this piece of legislation, another serious menace: the present policy is the clever but far-reaching continuation of a policy initiated during the first world war, by which the dominion government, at a slow though deliberate pace infringes more and more upon provincial sources of revenue. Should this policy be pursued any longer—and it will seemingly be perpetuated in spite of everything—the provinces, some having almost reached that point already, would be completely at the mercy of the dominion government in the matter of fiscal needs.

To my mind, such is not the spirit and even less the basis of the federal pact. Our authorities in constitutional law, in the Quebec universities, at any rate, have always taught, and our courts have often emphasized that our constitution rests on the autonomy of the provinces in their own spheres. Some people, knowing that the fiscal rights of the provinces are limited to direct taxation and that incomes and profits are the main sources of this method of taxation, realize that the surrender of these sources to the dominion government, even at a huge price, can neither be approved nor promoted by supporters of autonomy and decentralization. I do not hesitate to state that I have always belonged to that school of thought, even before I entered parliament and before the Hon. Mr. Duplessis became premier of my province.

For Quebec particularly, each constitutional right surrendered represents a real danger, perhaps not so much for the time being as for the future. In fact, considering the new ideas afloat, which lead almost inevitably to absolute socialism and the omnipotent state taking over all economic and financial activities, considering also the veiled hostility forever smouldering in certain quarters against Quebec and French Canadians, do we know what the future has in store for us, and more especially, what will be the complexion of future dominion governments?

I have already said and take pleasure in repeating that personally, at any rate, I prefer the guarantees and rights granted by our constitution to the good will and possible sympathy of future dominion governments. Mr. Speaker, six provinces, after months of bargaining and overbidding, felt that they ought to sign an agreement based on the surrender of their rights: no doubt they acted after serious consideration, free from all compulsion, I hope, and convinced that they had taken the right course. Although I am indeed most happy that, by holding back, they finally secured tidy sums of money, I cannot approve of the methods, tactics and procedures followed with respect to the presentation and signing of the agreements.

However, one should not conclude from what I have said that I am opposed to the payment of new and more substantial subsidies to needy provinces. I have a great deal of admiration and respect for Canadians of all racial origins who have settled in the west, and also for the courageous maritimers who have played a most glorious part in the history of our country. I readily agree that they were treated unfairly in the past and despite the fact that their population is smaller and their sources of taxation less numerous, they are nevertheless entitled to the same social security, the same full employment, and the same general services as the provinces whose population and revenues are larger. I would approve with much pleasure and satisfaction an agreement under which the dominion government and the more favoured provinces would agree to pay to provinces actually in need subsidies which they could justify, after collecting all the taxes they reasonably can. Every Canadian will approve the payment of additional subsidies to those provinces which can show their real need for them; however, I cannot agree that those same provinces should be placed in a situation where they have to sell, surrender, loan or rent acquired and fundamental rights in order to obtain that to which they are inalienably entitled.

Mr. Speaker, La Chambre de Commerce de Montréal, which no one can, in good faith, charge with electoral propaganda or partiality, submitted through sheer patriotism and a sincere desire to help the government, a brief on the ticklish matter of dominion-provincial fiscal relations. The report had been previously unanimously adopted by the executive council of the chamber on April 2, 1947. I wish to stress the fact that I agree with the recommendations set forth in the report, and that my views on the legislation under consideration are practically the same as those of the Chambre de Commerce. For instance, on pages 3 and 4 of section No. 1 of the brief, the Chambre de Commerce states the following:

La Chambre de Commerce is of the opinion that the present dominion proposals would entail too large an economic and fiscal centralization. However, it considers that it would be urgent to put forth clear proposals satisfactory to all concerned, governments and taxpayers.

And further:

The present legislative procedure constitutes, by its definition, at least partial centralization, not only with respect to collection of taxes, but also to legislative initiative in the field of taxation, which hinders the free use of the rights guaranteed the provinces by the constitution. One must not forget that the constitution limits the powers of the provinces to direct taxation and that a direct taxation policy rests upon the right to tax income and profits. For the above reasons, the Chambre de Commerce is opposed to such centralization.

And I conclude with another quotation from the same brief:

Unfortunately, it is impossible to ensure sufficiently uniform conditions as between one province and another without a certain contribution of subsidies, but the Chambre de Commerce is of the opinion that it should be restricted as much as possible.

Any province which has not yet decided to relinquish all taxation powers in the fields covered by the agreements should not authorize the carrying out of a federal permanent plan on economic control and social security, if, in order to maintain its constitutional rights it must, five years later, withdraw from and thereby disorganize such a plan.

On page 5 of the same section, the brief suggests the following basis of negotiations:

Both federal and provincial governments should come to an agreement which would clearly define their respective fields of direct taxation, according to their respective rights and needs, on the basis of the following fundamental principles—

(a) Each government to keep the power of initiating legislation in the taxation fields granted to it by the constitution, which is the only system consistent with the exercise of the rights pertaining to their respective jurisdictions;

(b) Provincial governments, being confined to the field of direct taxation, should be given the assurance that they may cultivate it according to their needs.

(c) The various governments should devise means to simplify tax collection and to exchange information on ways and means of simplifying or standardizing legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I ask my hon. friends to the left as well as to the right not to interpret my attitude as being prompted by picayune electioneering motives. I am not voting against this measure because it is brought down by a Liberal federal administration, nor, despite what some hon. members may think, because the Quebec provincial administration, under the leadership of Premier Duplessis, takes a definite stand on provincial autonomy, but for the simple and only reason that I have always looked upon legislative and fiscal decentralization as the policy best suited to serve and to protect the interests of the people in the future. I would oppose this bill, were it presented by a Conservative or other federal administration. I would be on the side of any Liberal provincial administration which would advocate the policy of decentralization and autonomy in which I believe. After these remarks, no one doubts, I hope, that I shall vote against the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. J. I. HAMEL (St. Maurice-Lafleche): Mr. Speaker, the bill now being considered is, in my opinion, one of the most important of the whole session and probably of the present parliament, since it relates to the powers of the various legislative bodies of the country. I deem it my duty to state the reasons on which I shall base my vote.

First, in my humble opinion, the bill is unconstitutional and ultra vires. A legislation is ultra vires and unconstitutional when it is contrary to the basic principles of the constitution. To my mind, the present measure infringes upon the fundamental principles of the Canadian constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that this bill is a violation of the British North America Act for two main reasons.

First, (a) it empowers the federal government to collect direct taxes for provincial objects. But the levying of direct taxes for provincial objects is an exclusive privilege of the provincial legislatures. The British North America Act is positive on this matter and section 92 reads as follows:

(Text):

In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

2. Direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

(Translation):

Who will dare claim that such revenues are not wholly or largely levied for provincial purposes, inasmuch as the bill provides that, by means and out of these revenues, the federal government will grant provinces subsidies possibly in excess of $200,000,000 a year?

(b) It infringes upon the constitution because it despoils the provinces—or some of them at least—of their powers of direct taxation. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it does despoil them for not only does it exhaust all reasonable possibilities in this field but, in addition, it penalizes provinces for refusing; in the case of the province of Quebec, it does so to the tune of $40,000,000 a year.

Second, besides violating the constitution, the bill marks a dangerous departure from the sound economic principle that taxpayers' money should be spent by the same legislative body that levies taxes.

Third, the centralization entailed by the bill, will only multiply the iniquities already suffered by my compatriots, by further extending, at their prejudice, the federal government's sphere of influence.

Fourth, the refusal by the two central provinces to surrender rights guaranteed by the constitution, unfairly penalizes them to the extent of $100,000,000 a year. I see no alternative for those two provinces—which, according to the 1941 census, hold 64 per cent of the population of this country—but jointly to consider the possibilities and desirability of secession. Unless the central government agrees to reconsider the matter, I wonder what other choice is left open to those two provinces.

Fifth and last, because of the many uncertainties I mentioned in the debate on the budget, which are far from being cleared up by the bill, I shall cast my vote against its second reading.

(Text):

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of this bill I wish to call the attention of the house and the minister to the fact that, although it provides for compensation for the nine provinces of Canada in consideration of their refraining from levying income and other taxes, there is no mention of remuneration or compensation for Yukon. Yukon levied personal and corporation income taxes, but under agreement with the federal government it refrained and still refrains from levying income taxes. For a few years, Yukon received a grant of money in compensation for that, but that was discontinued and has not been resumed. The reason given by the federal government for not resuming compensation to Yukon is that the territory makes a profit on the sale of liquor. It is true that Yukon makes a few thousand dollars on the sale of liquor in which the federal government generously shares, but where Yukon makes thousands, the provinces make millions and they still get their compensation. I wonder if the minister could tell me why Yukon has been overlooked in this legislation and whether he has any plan in mind for compensating Yukon in some other way for not levying income tax.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I could answer the hon. member at the committee stage if that would be convenient.

On motion of Mr. Bentley the debate was adjourned.

[Mr. Hamel.]

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1947-48

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1948, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at seven o'clock.

THIRD READING

Bill No. 395, to incorporate the Canada Permanent Trust Company.—Mr. Cleaver.

TAX AGREEMENTS

COMPENSATION TO PROVINCES IN LIEU OF INCOME AND OTHER TAXES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for the second reading of Bill No. 411, to authorize the government to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces pursuant to which, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes for a limited period.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to speak for just five or ten minutes on this section. I intended to say something on the second reading, but perhaps I can express my views on this clause. First of all, I should like to point out two or three facts in connection with this subject. The bill before the committee is one of considerable importance to me, representing as I do a city which is a large tax-paying corporation in Canada. This bill empowers the government to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces, pursuant to which agreements, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes for a limited period.

This whole problem of taxation was covered by the British North America Act. At that time there were no motor cars and no telephones; there was no radio; there was nothing of that kind, and the British North America Act was looked upon then as something after the fashion of the law of the Medes and Persians. It could not be changed. At confederation certain powers were vested in the provinces, and the municipal systems that came into being then were, one might say, almost an afterthought of the intentions of the founders of confederation. As a result of the system adopted then, we have overgovernment and overtaxation in the country now. We have a duplicate system, provincial and municipal, foisted on the country, with taxing powers. As a matter of fact, we have a triplicate system, federal, provincial and municipal. The bill we have before us tonight indicates the necessity for constitutional reform. This was admitted in all the discussions that led to the appointment of the Rowell-Sirois commission. I may say that I introduced a motion dealing with parliamentary, cabinet and constitutional reform, and the minister of justice of that day arose and said that he would appoint a royal commission. Such a commission was appointed with Chief Justice Rowell as its first chairman; later on he was succeeded by Mr. Sirois, and that commission, which has come to be known as the Rowell-Sirois commission, functioned for two or three years.

If this bill is to be the law for a short period; if this legislation is temporary, in my opinion it sounds the death-knell of the provincial system. We are virtually empowering the provinces to impose taxation, but we are also taking away from them certain powers they have. It gives Ontario only $67 million.

From confederation down to the year 1917, income tax was the exclusive prerogative of the municipalities, and many federal burdens, following confederation, were placed upon the municipalities which the fathers of confederation had not intended. The result was that the municipalities had that form of taxation down to 1917, when Sir Thomas White was Minister of Finance, and they objected to the dominion invading their field at the time. But they were told it was just to be for a year or two during the war and when the war was over it was intended to be the end of it. But they still hung on to it.

We now come to the province. There was no income tax in the province before. It was the exclusive field of the municipality. But after the action taken by the dominion government with regard to income tax in 1917, the province came along and imposed a tax of a mill on the dollar of assessment on the municipalities and raised a large sum of money in our city at the time. It was a burden on real estate from 1917 to 1921. I want to point out in connection with this item that we must be careful that we do not adopt the principle which caused the separation of the American colonies from the mother country, namely, taxation without representation. That is a principle which is largely wrapped up in this bill. What I wish to see is the policy of confederation with regard to taxation. I believe, for confederation, in the old Cornish battle-cry, "Each for all and all for each." I believe that in this bill there has been the greatest invasion of the rights of the municipalities and the provinces. Ontario seems to be the forgotten province.

In connection with the merits of this bill, the allotment of the province is $67,000,000. When you look at the return of the Minister of National Revenue in the blue book, at pages 24 and 25, and see the returns from the income and excise taxes, it is a large sum of money running into $423 million. In connection with income tax the tables are set out at pages 897, 898 and 899 of the last issue of the Canada Year Book. I will not read the figures. The province of Ontario has been discriminated against. The taxation clauses of the Sirois report are unfair to our province and to Quebec. According to a return I saw, those two provinces pay about seventy per cent of the total taxes of the whole dominion. There are certain provinces which one might call "have" provinces and there are two of them. Then there are certain provinces one might call 'have not" provinces. The "have not" provinces have been given a large share of the funds of this bill. I wish to say that Ontario is the forgotten province.

In conclusion, may I say in connection with these agreements that I hope they will be only temporary. They are interfering with all the municipalities. The municipalities are starving. They cannot have any money left under the system of taxation we have, which is a system which I described as that of robbing Peter to pay Paul, and under which the finances of the "have not" provinces are loaded on to the "have" provinces. How the municipalities are to live, I do not know. They are all having a hard fight. There are high taxes on real estate and on personal property. When you see that form of taxation which the municipalities have relied upon in order to get public buildings roads and public utilities, libraries, more schools and many social services, being assessed for social services by the dominion and province, it is a heavy burden. If it is only temporary, it is another matter. But on behalf of a large tax-paying city I protest against this way of handing out moneys and dealing with agreements. There are two forms of agreement in the bill. One is a statutory agreement under the British North America Act, with statutory subsidies paid. Then you add on to that what you might call politics. Politics is the science of government. A large number of others have been added on by statute from time to time regarding Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, provincial subsidies, Alberta natural resources, Railway Act, Manitoba resources, Saskatchewan and the maritimes. Our province seems to be the forgotten one when it comes to this.

I believe that charity should begin at home and that the two industrial provinces should have enough to live on. At the present time they have not; nor have the municipalities. The result is that taxes are a burden on industry, labour and capital. There should be some way of lessening that. We should be able to adopt a better system than the one we have, which is a haphazard system of handing out in some form varying amounts of money, with no standard agreement and no equality of treatment.

[Mr. Church.]

(Translation):

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Chairman, I shall take but a few minutes. The bill now under consideration is of such importance that I would be remiss in my duties were I to refrain from taking part in the debate.

How often have I objected to such intrusion of the federal government in exclusively provincial matters. Why have the government declined to call another conference with the provinces?

Because they knew full well that they were at fault. There are lawyers of great renown in the cabinet. They also know that the provinces enjoy rights guaranteed by the constitution. Why not respect the provincial jurisdiction and privileges recognized by constitutional law?

The federal government is ready to pay the price for ensuring the betrayal of the provinces. Only Judas is capable of such a foul deed. I fearlessly say that the hon. Maurice Duplessis had ample reason to state that he would not permit his province to be crucified, were it on a golden cross.

On July 21 next, the Huntingdon constituency will vindicate the hon. prime minister of the province of Quebec for his devotedness, his loyalty, his straightforward, energetic and splendid attitude toward his province. I have spoken.

(Text):

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Payments respecting income tax on specified corporations.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but this has been going a little bit more rapidly than I had dared to hope. I have an amendment to section 7 which I shall have to introduce or ask one of my colleagues to move. I think it will be here in a moment, but in the meantime I might avail myself of this opportunity to answer one or two points which were made in the course of the debate this afternoon. Perhaps we might do that under clause 6, which is the clause now under consideration.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are on section 7.

Mr. ABBOTT: Then, under section 7, although what I have to say has no relevance to section 7. That clause is something which is apart from the agreement. However, perhaps the committee will allow me to make these general remarks under section 7.

In the course of the debate a number of points were raised by some of the members who spoke, in particular the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Stanstead who is not in his seat at the moment, with which I should perhaps deal briefly. I should like to deal, first, with a point which was raised by the hon. member for Stanstead when he said that the negotiations which had led up to these agreements were secret negotiations and that the attitude of the dominion governmen in presenting these proposals—and I am paraphrasing his words—was characterized by cynicism. I take strong exception to that description. There has been no secrecy about the negotiations with the seven provinces which have so far evinced their intention of signing agreements with the dominion. In my explanatory statement last evening on the second reading of the bill I outlined in considerable detail and in chronological order the various steps which led up to the conclusion of these agreements. Any discussions with any particular province have been promptly made known to the other provinces with which the dominion was negotiating, and, moreover, have been made known promptly to all provinces, even those which up to the present time have evinced no particular desire to enter into agreements with the dominion. I could refer particularly, of course, to the negotiations which took place last December with the premier of British Columbia, in which he placed before the dominion government the views of his province with respect to these agreements and following which, speaking broadly, it was decided that we would extend to that province the benefit of the escalator clause which had been made available to the other provinces. That understanding or agreement was conditional upon the provinces which had already evidenced their desire to enter into agreements on the basis of the original budget proposals being prepared to agree; and that offer was promptly made known to those other provinces. As I stated last night, they put forward the view that under those circumstances they felt their position should be reconsidered. It was reconsidered and in January—I have not the exact date before me—the new formula or new formulae which we worked out were made known to all the provinces.

I cannot emphasize too strongly that there have been no secret, hole-in-the-corner negotiations with anyone. The circumstances which made it necessary for the dominion to make an offer to the provinces in the budget speech of last year on an individual basis have been fully outlined, and there is no reason for me to review them now. But there has been no concealment, no secrecy, and no attitude of cynicism on the part of the dominion government in presenting these proposals to the provinces.

As I listened to the hon. member for Stanstead, knowing the interest he has in history I thought to myself there is nothing new under the sun. I remembered a letter which had been written by Sir John A. Macdonald to Hon. Joseph Howe in 1869, at the time confederation was being worked out and when agreements were being made between the various provinces. I sent out a note to the librarian, asking him to send me the letters of Sir John as collected by Joseph Pope; and I think it might be of passing interest if I were to quote from a letter written on January 12, 1869. I need not read the whole letter; some of it relates to other matters, but it does have to do with the negotiations which were going on at that time concerning financial arrangements between the provinces of the new confederation of Canada. This is the third paragraph of the letter. The letter itself is a very interesting document, and I commend it to all hon. members. It is to be found at page 83 of the "Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald, 1840-1891", as collected by Sir Joseph Pope. He is referring to Sir John Rose, who was then Minister of Finance.

> Rose, who will give you this, will meet you with a strong and sincere desire to come to some satisfactory arrangement. I need not, however, caution an experienced statesman like yourself, not to ask for too much. We shall have our own difficulties with the general parliament in carrying any concessions. Already has George Brown, through the Globe, protested against any pecuniary advantages being given to Nova Scotia, beyond those secured to them by the Union Act. This course will not at all deter us here from agreeing to what is reasonable, and staking our existence upon it in the legislature.
> The province of Quebec, whose government is the reverse of economical, will, we fear, attempt to put on the screws for additional pecuniary aid if it is granted to you. So you see that we must take great care as to every step we take.
> I have no doubt that you and Rose will find common standing ground, but whatever you agree upon must be kept strictly a secret. If divulged prematurely, the opposition press in Ontario will protest against any additional charges being put upon the people of that province, which, it is alleged, from its greater wealth, already bears more than its fair share of the public burdens. In Quebec, the united press will demand a slice for that province, and all the anti-papers in Nova Scotia will denounce the arrangement as being altogether insufficient and unsatisfactory, and you will have the usual charge brought aganst you of "selling your heritage for a mess of pottage," etc.
> It will be very difficult I know, for you, on your return, to resist the pressure of your friends to disclose the arrangement; but the answer should be satisfactory, that any arrangement with the government is of no value until sanctioned by parliament, and that we, having the responsibility of carrying it, should have the opportunity of submitting it to the public and parliament at our own time, and in our own way.

I quote from that letter only to show that things have not changed a great deal in the last eighty years. As the French say, "Plus cela change, plus c'est la même chose"; and I just suggest to the hon. member for Stanstead that in these proposals to the provinces we have been at least as frank and open as was that great statesman and leader of the party of which the hon. gentleman is a distinguished member, Sir John Macdonald.

In the course of his speech last evening and today the leader of the opposition raised a number of points with which I should like to deal briefly. First, he made the point that he approves fiscal need grants, but that he would not be prepared to agree to anything which went beyond the requirements of fiscal need. The hon. member for Vancouver East asked what he meant by fiscal need. Of course he did not have an opportunity of replying and I do not suppose the hon. member particularly wished that he should. Well, I have no intention of defining fiscal need, either, but my understanding has always been that a grant to cover fiscal need would be a grant to enable a particular province or particular organization, whatever it might be, to balance its budget, and that no matter how extravagant the administration of the province might be.

Mr. BRACKEN: I would not agree with that definition.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, that is one suggestion. Another might be that it would be a grant or an allocation to a province which would enable that province to maintain an average standard of services without imposing higher than average rates of provincial taxation. But whatever basis one may take, I suppose the broad principle is that the grant or allocation should be sufficient to enable the particular government, provincial or municipal, to discharge its legitimate responsibilities. Later in his speech the leader of the opposition questioned how long we could go on making payments to the less favoured provinces from money collected largely in the two most favoured provinces. Well, I found it hard to understand that position, because it seemed to me that the two attitudes were contradictory. How can you have fiscal need subsidies unless money which is collected in more favourable provinces is spent in less favoured areas? Then he went on to say, as I mentioned a moment ago, that he favoured payments to the extent that they met real fiscal need but not to the extent that they exceeded fiscal need; and he contrasted the payments of approximately $40,000,000 under the Sirois proposals with the $226,000,000, roughly, under the 1947 agreements. The first point I wish to make is that that comparison in itself—and I think my hon. friend will agree—is misleading, because the Sirois plan envisaged the assumption by the dominion of servicing provincial debts in addition to fiscal need subsidies. The total outlay for net debt service and sinking fund estimated for 1940 was $73 million. So if you add that to the $40 million contemplated by the Sirois report you have something like $120 million.

I think the committee would agree that since 1940 the practical value of taxation fields which are to be turned over to the dominion, or which it was suggested in the Sirois report should be turned over, have been greatly increased. The proposed 1947 agreement was made up of the statutory subsidies plus annual rentals for tax fields now occupied by the provinces.

I believe that on a moment's reflection the committee will agree that the rental for those taxation fields had to be high enough to compensate the so-called more favoured provinces for the tax sources which they were renting, and the rent, of course, is higher than the value of the tax fields in the less favoured provinces. The difference, I suggest to the committee, provides a convenient and, in fact, a largely automatic measure of the economic disadvantage and consequently the fiscal need of the less favoured provinces.

As I listened to the leader of the opposition I thought I should ask him if he considers that British Columbia, for example, is getting a higher rental than the tax fields are worth to that province. Does he believe that the payments to Manitoba and Nova Scotia are in excess of the fiscal needs of those provinces?

Then the leader of the opposition took exception, as did the hon. member for Stanstead, to the method of making agreements with the provinces individually. Well, I spent some time yesterday evening and I have spent considerable time on other occasions in outlining in some detail the efforts which were made by the dominion government through a series of conferences to arrive at a mutually satisfactory agreement with all the provinces. I see little purpose in my reiterating tonight what I have said on that score.

But I wish to make this observation, that a desire for agreement on both sides is necessary to arrive at an agreement. I do not wish to impute motives to anyone, and indeed I am not doing so, but what has taken place does not convince me that there is a genuine desire on the part of all provinces to arrive at agreement. The budget speech of my predecessor in office, the present Minister of Justice, shows what the dominion was willing to offer. Seven of the provinces have now indicated that they are prepared to accept that. Since that budget only a little over a year ago, the governments of two provinces, Quebec and Ontario, have consistently failed to indicate on what terms they would be prepared to confer. It never seemed to me that there was much use in calling a conference without some kind of agenda to work on. Seven provinces have already evinced their desire to enter into an agreement, and there is little to confer on so far as taxing matters are concerned.

I want to repeat what I said before, that the dominion has repeatedly expressed its willingness to confer with all the provinces, and to confer with Ontario and Quebec if they would indicate some specific basis for conference.

I know I am not permitted to quote from a previous debate, and I do not intend to do so, but what was said by the Prime Minister as it is reported at pages 69 and 70 as to what Canada did in 1946 and 1947 is exactly what the leader of the opposition recommended in 1941 when he was Premier of Manitoba, namely not to permit one or two provinces to obstruct essential action to give justice to less favoured provinces.

Another point which the leader of the opposition made was that the proposed agreements make for centralization of taxing power. I say the dominion is not asking for the slightest abatement of the constitutional powers of any of the provinces. Their taxing powers remain intact. We are merely seeking to rent—and I use that term, although I know the hon. member for Stanstead took exception to it—taxation fields, which the Sirois report suggested should be exclusively and permanently federal.

Mr. HACKETT: After amendment.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is why I find it so difficult to understand the attitude of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, who was a staunch supporter of the Sirois report. It was the Sirois report which recommended that these powers be exclusively and permanently assigned to the dominion.

I am not going to quote from the speech of the leader of the opposition which was made at the conference of 1941, but I would point out that he strongly endorsed the permanent surrender of income and corporation taxes and succession duties to the dominion.

I do not suggest for one moment that the proposals which we put forward now are the most desirable. We had hoped that, as a result of a general conference, we could arrive at a general over-all understanding. They are perhaps not the best, but certainly in my judgment they are better than nothing at all. And it was no fault of the dominion government, may I say, that we were driven to this particular method.

There are one or two further points. The leader of the opposition referred to the well known statement made by the Prime Minister in 1929 and 1930 to the effect that the raising of money by one government to make grants to be spent by another government was a vicious principle. Neither the Prime Minister nor anybody else has ever disputed the truth of that. But this statement was taken from its context. It referred to unemployment relief grants and to other grants in aid where the provinces had control of expenditures and the dominion made grants in proportion to the expenditures, the full size of which it could not possibly control.

What is vicious, of course, about such grants is that they are open-ended commitments. The dominion has no possible means of controlling the extent of its liability. But the payments under the present agreements are not grants in aid. They are contractual payments in the form of rents for the use of taxation fields. The rent is determined by an objective and well known formula; the grant does not increase and the province can get no more if its administration is lax or if it is extravagant. I think the principle of a grant is vicious when there is an incentive to extravagance or inefficiency. But that is not true of the payments proposed under this agreement, because if the provinces inflate their budgets they still have to raise money by provincial taxation to balance them.

I believe I have covered most of the points raised. I must say I was not entirely clear, after listening to the leader of the opposition, whether he was for or against these agreements. I gathered, however, that on balance he was for them. He did make one other statement to which I would refer. He said we were backing away from the 1945 proposals. I covered that point yesterday evening in my statement upon introducing the bill. My hon. friend was good enough to quote what I said and, he having quoted it, I wondered how he could justify his stand that we are backing away.

I am going to repeat this evening what I said as it appears at page 5319 of Hansard:

> The details of our original proposals may of course change as a result of further study or of developing public opinion or of discussion with provincial governments at a general conference which will be necessary before they can be implemented. The proposed contributions which the dominion may be able to make in the field of public investment and social security may, as I have said publicly and as I advised the provinces which were negotiating with us last winter, have to be revised to take into account the substantial increase in the financial payments which the dominion has now undertaken to make as a rental for the tax fields in question.

Then I emphasized these words which he did not quote this afternoon:

> But the main objectives expressed in those proposals remain the guiding objectives of this government.

I leave it to the sense of the committee to decide whether or not the dominion government is backing away from those proposals.

Mr. BENTLEY: I do not know whether I am going to be able to make a speech at this stage. I have become a little confused within the last week or two with regard to the rules of the house and I find myself even more confused at the present time. Just before six o'clock I rose to speak and the minister requested the remaining time in order to introduce another matter which was important to the government and to the house. Therefore I adjourned the debate. It happened that during the dinner hour I had to attend the final meeting of the radio committee. Knowing that private bills were to come on at seven o'clock and would continue until eight o'clock if necessary, I did not think there was any great rush to get back and I was a little late in entering the chamber.

Mr. ABBOTT: I was in the same position.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The speech which the minister made was not strictly in order, but I think the committee was anxious to hear his statement. While it may not be strictly in order to make a general speech on this clause, I think with the permission of the committee the hon. member should be permitted to say what he wants to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not sorry that the slight irregularity occurred, even though it might have prevented my speaking, because I was interested in hearing the minister's statement. I had hoped to hear it in the proper place. I was afraid, Mr. Chairman, that possibly you might consider he was closing the debate and therefore I was diffident about asking your permission to speak. Before I proceed I want to say that I would have supported the principle of the bill if I had been here when it carried. But that does not mean that I agree with all that has been done.

This afternoon I listened to a couple of speeches which were most interesting, one by the versatile and amiable hon. member for Temiscouata. The hon. member went through quite a lengthy series of legal or mental gymnastics to arrive at a conclusion I would have arrived at through another process, one with which I would agree no matter what process was used. He argued that it was necessary for the dominion and the provincial governments to be independent, but that they should be friendly. I do not think anyone will dispute that conclusion.

Then the hon. member for Stanstead, not quite as versatile, but quite as earnest and a little ponderous, surprised me somewhat with his argument. One of his main arguments was that, while this agreement would be only for five years, it would be difficult to change it at the end of that period and therefore he was opposed to it. He said that it was different from what had happened eighty years ago. After eighty years he now opposes any change whatsoever, and yet in the same breath he says that we would not be able to make a change at the end of five years. I was unable to follow the hon. member in that line of reasoning, but otherwise he was interesting.

One of the things he referred to was that the provinces are responsible for their own position. Speaking for Saskatchewan, I want to say that we would not hesitate to accept that responsibility if all other things were equal. I think I can say the same thing for our sister prairie provinces. In order to do that we would have to turn back the pages of history and start somewhat differently. I shall not take advantage of this opportunity to review the history of Saskatchewan and make a political speech, but I want to remind the committee that it would be possible to do so and make out a good case.

When the dominion government insists upon interfering with the work or the decisions of a provincial government in order to prevent that provincial government from doing something which the dominion feels is within its field, it seems obvious to me that the dominion government has some responsibility. I am going to refer to two things to illustrate what I mean, one having occurred in Alberta and the other in Saskatchewan. I do not sit with the hon. gentlemen of the Social Credit group, so that obviously there are points of disagreement between us, but there is one point of agreement between us. If the people of a province by a democratic election have elected a government on a programme which those who sought their votes claimed they could put into effect, then they should be allowed to do it. Whether social credit will work in Alberta we shall never know until it is tried and this government deliberately prevented them from making the experiment. Canada is poorer for not knowing the results of that experience. Having interfered with the democratic decision of the people of Alberta, this government owes that province the necessary fiscal aid to carry out its social services, regardless of what might have been said eighty years ago at the time of confederation.

Recently a new government was elected in Saskatchewan on a somewhat different ticket but through the same democratic process. That government was elected because a majority of the voters felt that their programme was good. One piece of legislation which they passed to carry out their election promises was the farm security act. Because one of the clauses of that act might, through some obscure method of reasoning, be considered to interfere with interest on capital, which this government claims was its exclusive field, the dominion government took steps to see that that particular legislation was disallowed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all; correct that statement.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister can correct it any time he cares to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will do so now. The dominion government referred the legislation to the courts. That is all they did; they did not disallow the legislation.

Mr. BENTLEY: The dominion government did not need to refer it to the courts. The dominion government could have allowed the private companies concerned to refer it to the courts and not taken any hand in it whatsoever. I still say that the dominion government interfered unnecessarily in that arrangement.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman think it is a good thing to have ultra vires legislation on the statute books?

Mr. BENTLEY: I am not asking for ultra vires legislation; I am simply saying that when the dominion government is determined to retain in its possession certain powers, then it must accept certain responsibilities, and one of those responsibilities is to see that the fiscal needs of the province are taken care of. That is the point I am making. I am not going to criticize the government in this debate for what they did—I may do it at some other time, but not today; I am simply citing this as an illustration of what took place and in order to show that in my belief this government has a responsibility along with these powers.

When the Rowell-Sirois commission presented their report some years ago many of us in Saskatchewan—and this was before the C.C.F. government was elected in that province—felt that there was a great deal of good in that report. I remember going to a meeting at which the former member for my constituency, a supporter of the present administration, gave an exposition of the report to the voters of our city, and I remember being very much interested and listening carefully to his explanation. He indicated complete support for the report at that time. The premier of Saskatchewan at that time was a Liberal, and he also supported the report, as I believe the premier of Manitoba did. Some others did not. But I did not feel the disappointment over these disagreements that many seemed to feel because, when a report on so complex a subject is presented, it is only natural to expect that, until the report has been studied and discussed and mental changes have taken place in consequence, some people will not agree with the report right off the bat. The discussions went on, and finally we had the dominion government's offer to the provinces. Many of us considered that a good thing, and I commend the government for having made those proposals. I think the government deserves commendation for its offer at that time. I go farther and say that the government and the Minister of Finance deserve commendation for the adjustments they have made and for the flexibility of their arrangements in arriving at agreements with the different provinces.

The hon. member for Temiscouata this afternoon said he was sympathetic with the Minister of Finance because of the heavy load he carries. I am not a bit sympathetic with an able man who is well able to carry the load. His bearing of the load will make him an even better man than he is at present, and he is very good. So I waste no sympathy on him because he does not need it. I give him all possible commendation for having been capable of arriving at some kind of solution with seven of the provinces.

But I would point out to the government that Saskatchewan, through its previous and its present administration, indicated its willingness to enter into these taxation agreements, knowing well, from the history of Saskatchewan and considering the way in which we got stuck and our not having industrial organizations which would stand the taxation load which would be required to meet the fiscal needs of the province, that we would have to call on the rest of our sister provinces who are more favourably situated in that regard for their contributions. We have the same situation within the province itself because there we have some good areas, some not so good, and some very poor, and we have to ask the good areas to make a larger contribution, so that our social, educational, and welfare services will be better equalized for the men, women and children of the province. We expect the same type of cooperation from our sister provinces. Even though two provinces of this dominion have not yet decided to enter into this kind of agreement, we feel that, even at that, we should have had implemented in our province the full amount of the government's original proposals. We have not yet got the sixty per cent of the medical, health and welfare proposals of the dominion government. We have not got the full amount of old age pensions and assistance for the employable unemployed assumed by the dominion government, as well as a number of other things. We believe that we should have those things in the province of Saskatchewan.

I want now to say something that is not quite so commendatory of the government. The provinces of Quebec and Ontario through their premiers—I believe that they are called prime ministers down here—have indicated an unwillingness at the present time to enter into this kind of agreement, for reasons of their own, and they are being headlined in the press. Not for one moment am I supporting either one of these gentlemen. I deplore the attitude they are taking, but I do not think they, as only two corners of the triangle, are entirely to blame. While they are being blamed in the press and elsewhere, I feel that the government here has not done all that it might have done to resolve some of these differences and to have brought about a better understanding with these two provinces; and if our situation in Saskatchewan is to depend upon the provinces of Ontario and Quebec entering into agreements with the dominion government I think the dominion government should be infinitely more energetic in trying to bring that about. I do not agree it is the proper attitude for this government to take, to say that what is done for Saskatchewan must depend on Ontario and Quebec entering into an agreement with the dominion government. I think the dominion government should deal with Saskatchewan on the basis of its original proposals, and similarly with any other province willing to enter into an agreement. But if the dominion government will not carry out its original proposals until all the provinces have entered into an agreement, the dominion government should be infinitely more vigorous in trying to bring that about and should carry its share, at least one-third of the blame for these agreements not having been arrived at up to the present time.

(Translation):

Mr. LaCROIX: I had intended to say a few words but owing to the lightning speed with which second reading was proceeded with, I have had no chance to do so.

Here is what I have to say with regard to Bill No. 411, authorizing the government of Canada to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces, pursuant to which, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes for a limited period. May I be permitted to say, at the outset, that while I do not support the stand of the government headed by Mr. Duplessis, who left the conference even before its conclusion, and who has submitted no counterproposal with a view to working out some kind of agreement, I cannot, nevertheless, understand how individual agreements could be entered into with the provinces without the cooperation and outside the presence of the province of Quebec, because in my humble opinion it is contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act that separate agreements should be entered into with the provinces in that respect without the consent of all.

You may tell me, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the stand taken by Duplessis, no agreement can be reached with Quebec. My answer is that above Duplessis there is the province of Quebec to consider, and that, to my mind, it would have been preferable to enter into no separate agreement with the provinces as long as the possibility of negotiations existed. Indeed, I feel that the economic depression which those agreements are supposed to ward off, will not be prevented if the two richest provinces of this country have no part in them.

It is unthinkable that the province of Quebec, which pays a large part of the taxes, should not be a party to those agreements, from which the western provinces will greatly benefit.

I wish you would bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that I am not discussing the merits of the proposals submitted by the dominion to the Quebec government; I am dealing exclusively with the fact that such separate agreements are likely to undermine the very foundations of confederation and to foster a principle fraught with danger, so that their implementing may contribute to lead us farther and farther from our greatest objective, Canadian unity.

I have already had an opportunity to explain in this house what I consider as the reason for the aloofness of Messrs. Duplessis and Drew, and the selfish grounds on which they have taken their stand. I still hold that view, but I deem it my duty to oppose agreements entered into separately with the provincial governments, without Quebec being a party to them.

In concluding, I wish to express the hope that Messrs. Drew and Duplessis may change their stand, because otherwise we shall have a system of double taxation detrimental to all Quebec taxpayers.

(Text):

Mr. ABBOTT: I have an amendment to move to section 7, that subsection 2 of section 7 be amended by deleting the phrase "twenty-fourth day of June, nineteen hundred and forty", which will be found in lines 32 and 33 on page 6 of the bill, and substituting therefor the words "first day of July, nineteen hundred and forty seven", and by adding after the word municipality, in line 3 on page 7, the words "which in the opinion of the said minister are not part of a sales tax of general application". By way of explanation, I may say that this is the appropriation section which will enable the dominion to pay to the government of any province half of the receipts from income tax derived from companies selling electricity, steam, gas and the like as defined in the section. It was found that it would be more appropriate to put July 1, 1947, which was the day before this bill was introduced, than the 24th day of June, 1940, and the words which have been added to line 3 on page 7 relieve the requirement of deducting a sales tax, which is part of a general sales tax and not a concealed corporation tax.

Amendment agreed to.

WESTERN PROVINCES

ADJUSTMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS—NATURAL RESOURCES CLAIMS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to make provision for the refunding and adjustment of the liability of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia to the government of Canada, in respect of loans made to them by the government of Canada to finance expenditures on direct and agricultural relief and other purposes during the nineteen-thirties; and for the final settlement in full of claims of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan against the government of Canada in respect of the administration and control by the said government of natural resources in those provinces before the transfer thereof to the provinces.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. BRACKEN: I presume the minister will make a full statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would hope that the committee might be willing to follow the procedure we have adopted in the last week of permitting the main debate on the measure to take place on the second reading of the bill. Briefly, as the committee knows, the bill which will be founded on the resolution will authorize the dominion government to complete settlements already arrived at with the western provinces and British Columbia respecting certain relief indebtedness incurred during the 1930's and also settlement of the natural resources award to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. BRACKEN: We are agreeable to this procedure on the understanding that we shall have a copy of the bill before we deal with it again.

Mr. ABBOTT: It should be available immediately.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask whether any financial arrangements have been made with any of the provinces other than that outlined in the bill which the minister is about to introduce?

Mr. ABBOTT: None whatever. As a matter of fact, the terms and conditions of the arrangements which this bill will confirm were announced by the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan and by my colleague, the Minister of Justice, some months ago, and this is merely asking for legislative confirmation of settlements which have already been negotiated.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then there are no other major agreements on financial matters with any other provinces within the last year?

Mr. ABBOTT: None whatever.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 451, respecting the refunding and adjustment of indebtedness of the four western provinces to the government of Canada in respect of certain outstanding loans for relief and other purposes and final settlement of the claims of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan in respect of natural resources.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The committee is considering item 551, national defence.

Mr. BROOKS: I was very much interested, having been connected with the reserve force for a good many years, in what the minister said with reference to reserve training of the army. There were a couple of questions I wished to ask in this connection, and I may say that I am pleased indeed to see that a much larger estimate than usual has been given for this training this year. No one knows the necessity for this better than an officer who has been with the reserve army for a number of years. The question I wish to ask the minister has reference to the training of tank regiments in rural areas, and I speak particularly of the tank regiment in my district. There are a number of squadrons. The regiment is not a city regiment but a rural regiment, and therefore these squadrons are scattered pretty well over two counties.

Some time ago I understood from the commanding officer that it was the intention of the department to send tanks for training purposes to the different squadrons. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant to the minister can tell me whether that is correct.

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): That is correct.

Mr. BROOKS: In criticism of that, it was felt that it was not feasible to send these large tanks, weighing from thirty to forty tons—I have not the exact weight, but that is about what they weigh—over country bridges, rivers and so on. That was not felt to be practicable unless the regiment is brought together in one central place. My suggestion with reference to this particular tank regiment would be that it should be brought to one centre, and if there is to be training with tanks, then it can be done in a more practical way. As a matter of fact, I do not believe tanks could be used in this area if it were attempted to carry out training by the different squadrons. This is a matter I should like to have the department look into.

I might say also, as the parliamentary assistant knows, that there has been a training centre at the town of Sussex for a good many years. This rural regiment has its headquarters at Hampton, a few miles from Sussex. I would think that the better plan for this regiment and probably for other tank regiments across the country would be to bring them together for a number of days during the year and give them training when they could all be brought together. I should also like to ask the parliamentary assistant if it is the intention to use the camp at Sussex as a training area. Some time ago I heard that training was not to be at Sussex but at Utopia, another camp in the southern part of the province. I might say that Sussex camp has been a training area now for, I think, over fifty years. That area was greatly extended during the war. The parliamentary assistant himself spent some time in Sussex and we were pleased to have him there. I think he knows it is a good training area. I hope consideration will be given to using it as a training area.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I wish to thank the hon. member for Royal for his constructive remarks. As regards his first point about tank regiments, I think the point he raised has been already appreciated by the department. It is realized that it is quite impossible in some areas where a tank regiment exists, to have training going on in that area. Tanks will be issued to those units in order to permit the men to be trained in the maintenance and operation of those tanks; but I dare say that training as a tank squadron would not take place in areas where it would cause any damage.

As regards Sussex, I regret that I have not the information here. I quite appreciate my hon. friend's point of view. I know of the facilities which exist in Sussex, and were it not for the fact that I should probably be contradicted by other members, I would say that one of the best brigades that ever went overseas was trained in Sussex. However I will look into this matter and give the hon. member the information he seeks.

Mr. FRASER: I have before me a letter from a man who says he joined up in the air force believing that he would be an instrument mechanic; he signed up with that agreement but, after he got in, he was told that there would not likely be a course in that subject and he would just have to take anything at all that was available. He wanted to have a trade of that kind, and there not being a course of that kind in there he said,

"Well, then, can I get out?" He was told that he could get out, but I understand that in order to do so he has to buy his way out. Is that right?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is quite right.

Mr. FRASER: Will the parliamentary assistant explain that? How does a man buy his way out?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have not the regulations before me; but roughly, the principle is that a man who has enlisted for a period of three years, five years, or whatever it may be, and who wishes, for reasons of his own, to withdraw from the service before the expiration of that period, must pay a bounty of so much a month. I believe in the case of the air force, although I would not say for certain, it is $2.50 a month for each month he still has to serve. That provision has always been in the king's regulations. It was there prior to the war and is still in force.

Mr. FRASER: In this case, I would judge that the air force was at fault to some extent, owing to the fact that they took him in believing that he would be an instrument mechanic. Now they are asking him to pay $100 in order to get out.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend quite realizes that I cannot tell him whether or not the particular air force officers concerned were at fault in this particular case. If he wishes to give me the particulars of the case, I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. FRASER: I will do that. I will write to the man and then I will speak to the parliamentary assistant.

I have another case. I wish to get a little bit of information in regard to a course. A boy in Peterborough tried to join up at Royal Roads, but his age was just three months out and they would not take him in. But a Royal Canadian Air Force officer was in Peterborough interviewing the different boys, and he said that in 1948 there would be a course there for graduates of high schools with senior matriculation standing, and that they would be graded and given short-term commissions in the Royal Canadian Air Force. Is there to be some special set-up in 1948 for the Royal Canadian Air Force?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The only thing that comes to my mind that would explain this would be that this particular officer would be referring to university training, the equivalent of our Canadian Officers Training Corps in the army or U.N.T.D. in the navy—I do not know exactly what the name for it in the air force is—where a student, having senior matriculation, following the university course can follow the equivalent course in the air force and, after the period of service, be qualified to enter into the air force.

Mr. FRASER: There is another thing I should like to ask in regard to a course or joining up in the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force and the conditions of entry at Royal Roads. Some of the boys in my district or, as I said before, one especially tried to join up and he was just three months over the age. As to age limits, a candidate must have attained the age of sixteen and a half years but not the age of nineteen and a half on July 1 of the year of entry; but in the case of candidates from French classical colleges the maximum age is extended to allow entry up to twenty and a half years on July 1 of the year of entry. These boys feel that they should have the same privilege to join.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The explanation that I could give the hon. member for that is—

Mr. FRASER: I know that has been the rule.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —that the matter has been looked into, and the authorities in all services looking into the setting up of qualifications necessary to enter these various schools have come to the conclusion that students coming out of these colleges to which my hon. friend was referring would be, generally speaking, one year older than students graduating from high school with senior matriculation. In other words, to have two men with equal qualifications coming from two different institutions of the sort, one would, generally speaking, be a year older. In order to permit of a fair representation amongst the students, the regulations were set in that way. This was thoroughly investigated before it was finally decided by the services themselves.

Mr. FRASER: These boys felt that the authorities were haggling over just a few months with respect to their age, and they did not like it. They thought they should have the same privilege.

I have not been able to be present in committee on the defence estimates, owing to meetings of the public accounts committee. Has the minister said anything with regard to bands which are being set up across the country? There is a Major Streeter who is in charge of bands in the army. He is setting up bands, or allowing units to set up military bands and bugle bands across the country. What is the set-up there?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Only bands authorized by headquarters are recognized and receive grants. I can give the hon. member the number of authorized bands and those organized up to date. The principle followed, if I may use that word, is that headquarters decides which units shall be entitled to bands. In the active force I believe two infantry units and one artillery regiment are authorized to have bands. In the reserve units the number is larger, based on the situation that existed before the war. Some units had bands before the war and still have the instruments, so it is only logical that they should be the first to be authorized to have bands now, but nothing final has been done.

Mr. FRASER: Does the department say whether they are to be bugle bands or brass bands?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I believe the request is made by the unit.

Mr. FRASER: Has the parliamentary assistant any statement on the matter?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry, but all I have here is the number that have been authorized and those already organized.

Mr. FRASER: I do not want to take up the time of the committee. If the parliamentary assistant would just place that information on Hansard I would be satisfied.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is very short. In the case of the navy, active, four bands are authorized and three have been organized to date. In the case of the navy, reserve, nineteen are authorized and eight have been organized. In the case of the active army eight are authorized and four organized. In the reserve army 317 are authorized, but I have not the figures as to those organized to date. In the air force, active, one is authorized and three are organized; this will have to be readjusted. Each auxiliary squadron is authorized to have a band, but I do not think any have yet been organized.

Mr. FRASER: Some few years ago I asked the then Minister of Munitions and Supply about helicopters. I understand that the United States navy has set up squadrons of these machines, and I wondered if our navy had anything of that sort in mind. They have been a great help in saving lives, in rescuing people who have crashed in planes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know the air force has a few helicopters at the present time, but I do not know of any plans to develop that further.

Mr. MERRITT: The other day I asked the minister several questions to which I hope the parliamentary assistant has the answers. I should like to call his attention to one in particular. I asked for a statement of the wastage in the forces, by which I mean a comparative statement of the number taken on strength and the number discharged, say in the most recent six months' period for which the parliamentary assistant may have figures. Then there are other questions I should like answered.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If the hon. member permits I shall deal first with one of the other questions he asked. I believe he asked if we could give the strength of various units so he might get an idea of the average strength of the reserve forces. I am sorry I did not give him the information yesterday; I had it a few minutes after he asked the question. I have here the strength of three infantry units, two artillery units and two engineer companies. The infantry units are located in Toronto, Windsor, and in British Columbia. In the case of the Toronto unit the strength is 34 officers and 270 other ranks. In British Columbia the regiment has 30 officers and 226 other ranks. The Windsor unit has 32 officers and 262 other ranks. As to artillery, the one field regiment in Ontario has 20 officers and 102 other ranks; the one in Montreal has 28 officers and 278 other ranks. In the case of the engineer companies, one in Quebec has 4 officers and 82 other ranks and one in Ottawa has 6 officers and 40 other ranks. These were given to me because they were the most readily accessible.

With regard to wastage I can give the hon. member the number of discharges over a period of a few months. In April, 1947, there were 746 enlistments and 53 discharges. In March, 1947, there were 568 enlistments and 37 discharges. In February, 1947, there were 700 enlistments and 25 discharges. During the period from October, 1946, to April, 1947, enlistments totalled 12,974 whereas the number of discharges during the same period was 135.

Mr. MERRITT: Is that the active force?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the active force.

Mr. MERRITT: Would it be possible to get any figures on the reserve forces?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid I have not those figures.

Mr. MERRITT: I should like to make one comment to the parliamentary assistant. The figures for the infantry battalions—and I think on the artillery regiments, though I cannot speak of that from personal knowledge as I am sure the hon. member for Calgary East will be able to do—seem to indicate that these battalions have not sufficient strength for adequate training. I say that from my own experience. I feel that an infantry battalion with a strength of only 250 including officers is not in a position to train to best advantage. I know the parliamentary assistant will take note of that comment, but I hope he will apply it.

Mr. PROBE: Would the parliamentary assistant indicate whether or not there are approximate compulsory ages for retirement in all ranks of the permanent force? If there are, what are the ages when, except for special circumstances, it is considered that officers or other ranks should be retired from the permanent force?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I recall giving that information last year. There are ages for compulsory retirement of officers, depending upon rank.

Mr. PROBE: Would the parliamentary assistant put that on record?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would be glad to have that information placed on record, although I have not it at hand.

Mr. PROBE: While that is being looked up, I would bring to the attention of the committee the specific case of an officer who was retired on March 8 of this year. This case was brought to the attention of the hon. member for Yorkton. It refers to an officer who had attained the rank of captain and who was thirty-three years of age at the time of his retirement. This man had made application to be retained in the Canadian forces. He had had eleven years and 233 days of service in the permanent force and the active army, having served overseas, and prior to that had four years and 149 days of service in the non-permanent active militia, or a total service of about sixteen years.

At this early age of thirty-three years he was anxious to make the army his career. To the best of his knowledge, no adverse reports had been made about him, but he was retired by an officer selection committee under the provisions of K.R. Canada, section 267 (c). Not being compulsorily retired, he received a retiring allowance under part 5 of the Militia Pension Act, amounting to $677.91 per annum.

Mark you, this man had reached only the age of thirty-three years. The pension is to run until he is sixty-five years of age, at which time, if he is still living, he will receive a pension of $1,016.66 per annum. This man worked his way through the ranks of the permanent force and attained the rank of captain. The army has been put to a considerable expense in training him, and the country will now be put to a further expense in providing him with a pension for the rest of his life. In my view he has a considerable number of useful years of service left to him. The country will be placed to the further expense of training someone to take his place. It seems to me that, in respect of a man of only thirty-three years, the Department of National Defence must have strong reasons for retiring him. Otherwise the bases upon which retirements are compulsorily made are unnecessarily wasteful and poor business for Canada.

Yesterday the name of General Worthington was mentioned, a man who has served with considerable distinction in the Canadian permanent force and on the field of battle. General Worthington is not a young man. In the view of the departmental administrative officers, however, he is still able to give excellent service. I would presume that he is in his sixties or thereabouts. Surely a policy under which a man of thirty-three years with the rank of captain can be retired is not in the best interests of Canada. Would the parliamentary assistant comment on this case?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I believe I know the case to which the hon. member refers, because the hon. member for Yorkton brought it to my attention earlier. It is similar to those of many other service personnel who, having served in the permanent force prior to the war and having served in the active service during the war, naturally made progress. Some were commissioned and others received promotions. However, when the time came to establish a peace-time service a choice had to be made among many applicants, and it was found that some were not quite as suitable as others who were applying for appointments to the same rank.

With respect to the matter of pension, it will be recalled that last year we discussed the Militia Pension Act. Provision is made in that act whereby an officer who may have served over a period of years and who has given good service, but who, because of certain factors, suddenly is not found as useful as his subordinates, or others of equal rank, may be retired from the service, with a view to promoting efficiency and economy.

That is exactly what happened in the instance to which the hon. member refers. In view of the fact that this was a relatively young man and the fact that he had served eleven years, his case was looked into with even more attention than some others. In addition to the decision rendered by the selection board, assessment was made in his case by serving under officers, in a training centre. It was on the report made following this period of service that the decision was taken to retire him.

Mr. PROBE: In other words, there is a standardized basis for the assessment of such cases?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Definitely.

Mr. PROBE: It is not a matter of personal opinion?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not at all.

Mr. PROBE: And there is something reasonable and scientific about it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Definitely.

Mr. PROBE: May I now pursue another matter. Last night, when there was discussion with respect to properties turned over to War Assets Corporation which had formerly belonged to the Department of National Defence the minister was asked if it had been found necessary to make rentals or purchases of other properties to replace those turned over to War Assets Corporation for disposal. The minister's answer was that no properties had been surrendered which had to be repurchased or replaced later.

In this connection I would refer to the break-down for defence services as it is found at page 275 of the details in the estimates. At that page, under the heading of "Defence Services", there is reference to the acquisition, construction, purchase, maintenance, repairs, rentals and operating expenses of properties, to an amount of $14,348,558. There is a further amount of $25,263,748 for personnel supplies and services; food supplies, medical and dental stores, clothing and personnel equipment, barrack, camp, hospital and miscellaneous equipment, laundry and dry cleaning. There is a further item for stores and equipment to the amount of $13,844,887, and under this heading are included such things as mechanical transport vehicles and spare parts, tractors, cranes and other engineering equipment. These items total more than $53 million.

When methods of disposal were under discussion before the public accounts committee there appeared before the committee a representative of the army ordnance corps who informed the committee that about a year and a half ago an ample supply of kit, barrack and other equipment was again being requisitioned. We realize, of course, that food supplies would have to be replaced from time to time. I should like some details as to the properties that are in the course of being acquired this year or are to be paid for this year, because I presume some may have been acquired last year but are to be paid for out of this year's estimates. I should like a list of the principal properties, those costing over $5,000 or $10,000. I do not want the petty items; I simply want the major items of property that are to be paid for this year. Then I should like the parliamentary assistant to indicate what properties have been held in the vicinity and what properties have been disposed of to War Assets Corporation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What particular vicinity does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. PROBE: That is the point, I do not know. You have an item here of $14,348,000 for the acquisition, construction, purchase, maintenance and so on of national defence properties. I want to be satisfied that the Department of National Defence has not acquired properties in the vicinity of areas where properties have been disposed of to War Assets Corporation. Could the parliamentary assistant give a break-down of this item, giving expenditures in excess of $5,000 or $10,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In connection with the acquisition, construction and purchase of properties, the amounts for the services are as follows:

Navy	$1,436,940
Army	5,034,427
Air force	3,233,200

Most of that was for construction and additions to existing buildings. In the case of the army it would cover the construction of ranges or repairs to such things, and in the case of the navy—I know of one case—it covers the acquisition of property around a magazine in order to create a safety area. I can assure my hon. friend that no buildings are being purchased into which the services are being moved when there are already existing quarters or where facilities have been declared surplus and we now find ourselves under the obligation of purchasing others. During the war some branch of the service may have been in leased quarters, and in order to continue the operation of that station or that division we may find that we cannot lease the property and must acquire some temporary buildings in the meantime.

Mr. PROBE: Would this item cover the 1,000 dwellings which the minister mentioned yesterday were being acquired for the purposes of housing permanent force families?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This item covers one group of 556 family units and another one of 600 family units, which is more than the minister referred to yesterday.

Mr. PROBE: In those particular housing areas were any military properties declared surplus?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those are married quarters and none were declared surplus.

Mr. PROBE: I am thinking of buildings which might have been suitable for conversion purposes and which have been declared surplus in those areas.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am informed that in those various areas the services retained all buildings which it was considered might be necessary for conversion into these temporary married quarters.

Mr. PROBE: What are the two areas to which the minister has referred?

Mr. LAPOINTE: When I referred to two groups I am afraid I gave the wrong impression. There are two separate construction schemes, but they cover many areas, such as Borden, Shilo, Chilliwack, Lachine, Centralia, Calgary, Greenwood, Sea Island, Vancouver, Saskatoon, Valcartier and Suffield.

Mr. PROBE: In none of those areas have buildings which might have been converted been disposed of to War Assets Corporation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There might have been some, but none that were necessary for reconversion.

Mr. PROBE: Clothing and personnel equipment is part of the next item. The officer who reported to the war expenditures committee a year and a half ago indicated to us that the services had ample supplies of clothing and personnel kits to run over varying periods, as I recall it, from three to five years. Would the parliamentary assistant indicate how much it is estimated will be spent under this item this year and also justify to this committee the need for that particular item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The break-down of clothing and personnel equipment is as follows:

Navy	$ 682,666
Army	2,065,878
Air force	1,600,647

Mr. PROBE: Those seem to be rather large expenditures in view of the large stores which the ordnance officers of the various branches told the war expenditures committee were in reserve. Would the parliamentary assistant elaborate on the need for those expenditures?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In the case of the active force, army, this item is broken down as follows:

Clothing and necessaries	$153,000
Officers' clothing	220,000
Individual equipment	35,000
Web equipment, trials	5,000

Mr. PROBE: What is meant by that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: For the testing of various web equipment under certain conditions.

Mr. PROBE: Is it the opinion of the departmental officials that the equipment turned over to War Assets was not suitable for the particular use to which this equipment is being put?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am informed that most of it is completely new equipment. My hon. friend understands that the ordnance service and various other branches of the army are continually making tests of personnel equipment and clothing and that changes are being made from time to time.

Mr. PROBE: There was so much equipment in store that considerable quantities were dumped into the lap of War Assets. Surely conditions have not changed to such an extent in the past year and a half that it is found necessary to buy new equipment. Even clothing, yardage goods, was turned over to War Assets by the hundreds of thousands of yards to the best of my recollection, and any that I have seen since look very similar to what was in use when I was in the service.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am informed that these sums are for equipment that was not possessed and was not returned to War Assets. I know that a huge quantity of uniforms was turned over to War Assets, but these items do not cover that type of equipment.

Mr. PROBE: One more question with regard to tractors, trains, and other engineering equipment and mechanical transport vehicles and spare parts. Huge quantities of these types were turned over to War Assets for disposal, and now apparently the Department of National Defence is in the market again for such equipment. Would the parliamentary assistant justify this item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am told that this does not cover the purchase of wholly new equipment. But a considerable amount of equipment which we had on hand and which we retained did not have the spare parts which must necessarily be carried or kept in reserve for proper operation. This item covers spare parts and components in order that the equipment might be put into operation in the field.

Mr. PROBE: Would the parliamentary assistant give us some indication of what is being done in the maintenance of the northwest highway system and say why it is now a part of the function of the Department of National Defence to look after this piece of road? What further highway construction is being undertaken by the department?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand that the only responsibility of the Department of National Defence for the Alaska highway is the maintenance of the highway. The operation of the highway comes under mines and resources. The army is concerned with the maintenance of the highway and keeping it in good order.

Mr. PROBE: Has the department a highway building programme?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not at all; it is purely maintenance.

Mr. STOKES: Last evening when there was considerable confusion in the house just before we adjourned, the minister said, in reply to a question that I had asked, that if I required further information he would give it. I was speaking of the installation for the second time of an asphalt floor in the armoury at Belleville city. It was first installed in 1945 at a cost of approximately $2,800. In the early months of 1947 that floor which had become useless and had failed to fill the bill was torn up and a new floor laid at a cost of nearly $4,500. Information that has come to me is to the effect that the work in the first instance in 1945 was not passed by the inspector. It was in charge of a government official. The return I have received shows that the contractor in that case was paid. It seems to me that something must be wrong with a job which the inspector did not O.K. and which afterwards fell down as he probably thought it would.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Following my hon. friend's remarks last night, I had the file concerning the Belleville armoury brought to me and, after studying it, I find that in 1945 a contract was given to replace the then existing wooden floor by an asphalt floor. At the time the unit that was called upon to use the armoury was an infantry unit, and an asphalt floor was the common thing for infantry units in drill halls. I find from the file that the floor when finished was accepted and certified by the officer, and the contractor was paid, as my hon. friend said. Following that, a changeover was made in the unit and the armoury was put at the disposal of an artillery regiment which used self-propelled equipment, such as tanks use. The use of self-propelled equipment over asphalt flooring had the same effect as it would have on our city streets when tanks are moved around. The floor did not prove adequate for this equipment, and consequently the officer in charge recommended that the floor be taken up and a concrete floor be put down, which I understand has been done. The matter is not yet finally decided as far as I can find out from the headquarters file, which I studied this morning.

Mr. STOKES: The officer in charge of the regiment there told me that even when an infantry unit was using the drill hall the dust was so bad that right from the start it affected the men's throats. So it was not much of a job.

Last night I asked the minister as to the possibilities of an armoury being erected in the town of Trenton, and his answer was no. Just on Monday last I was informed by a member of the municipal council of Trenton that certain properties on which they had hoped to erect housing which the municipality is badly in need of and for which plans had been prepared have been taken over by the government, and a government official said, "We are in ahead of you on this. We are going to build an armoury there". That does not agree with the statement made by the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minister was quite right when he said there would be no drill hall constructed at Trenton. There have been negotiations with the municipality and a piece of ground, I understand, has been made available on to which two army huts are being moved for the use of the reserve army as temporary quarters. I doubt whether my hon. friend would be willing to accept that as a drill hall. I am sure he will come back again next year.

Mr. HARKNESS: Would the parliamentary assistant answer two questions I asked the minister last night, first, as to the numbers of the reserve army by commands, and, secondly, as to what form the recruiting campaign will take which is to be put on in the fall for the reserve army? When will it start and just what is proposed to be done, so that we may form some idea of whether it is adequate or not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As regards the first question, I have the figures on the reserve army strength by command as of May 31:

	Officers	Other ranks
Central command	1,676	8,509
Quebec command	1,094	8,284
Eastern command	581	2,625
Prairie command	596	4,644
Western command	769	4,926
	4,716	28,988

That gives a grand total of 33,704.

As regards the second question which bothered my hon. friend. I cannot give him a definite reply. The form which the recruiting campaign will take is at present being studied by a committee and the minister is awaiting its recommendations. I understand that they will get into communication with the various defence associations, but there is no definite information I can give that would satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HARKNESS: How much is it estimated will be used for that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have an item of $134,000, but I am afraid I have no other particulars.

Mr. HARKNESS: The question of armouries came up last night, and I wanted to ask a question with regard to armoury accommodation at Calgary. Eight months ago there was a scheme on foot to take over what was at that time a deserted air force camp on the north hill in Calgary and to use it for armoury accommodation, which was very scarce owing to the large number of units that existed there. That scheme fell through by reason of difficulties with the provincial government on account of ownership of the land. What steps have been taken since to meet this acute need for armoury accommodation at Calgary? If nothing has been done so far, what is contemplated during the coming few months?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I believe the minister mentioned last night that for this year there are no prospects of the construction of new armouries.

Mr. HARKNESS: I was thinking more particularly of the utilization of the numerous huts and drill halls left over from the war.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is now under consideration. Wherever buildings are available which can be made accessible to the service we are anxious to get hold of them and we do so. The difficulty is more to convince the owners of such properties to let us use them.

Mr. HARKNESS: In that connection I should like to inform the parliamentary assistant that already in the neighbourhood of Calgary several very good drill halls which existed there and were used by the air force in their training scheme have been sold for the purposes of garages and other uses, and if the army simply continues to "consider" this matter, in a short time there will be no drill halls left because they will all have been disposed of otherwise. That was the situation, and that, I believe, is what finally happened in regard to these buildings on the north hill, which were eminently suitable. But that scheme, which would have solved the problem, was allowed to drop. What alternative, in the matter of utilizing these national defence buildings, is now contemplated in Calgary? A large number of buildings existed there, but unfortunately nothing was done. The matter was simply being considered, and in the meantime War Assets were taking over the buildings and selling them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I said that this matter was being actively considered, and I might add that the minister has given instructions that a complete survey be made by all three services in order that all available accommodation may be made use of at an early day.

Mr. HARKNESS: I trust that some definite action will be taken before it is too late because, otherwise, I am sure it will be too late shortly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I appreciate that.

Mr. BROOKS: I wish to ask a question in connection with drill sheds. I know there are a great many throughout the country. It was stated that some of these drill sheds would be taken and moved to different points to be used as armouries in smaller centres. Has that been tried in any centre, and what success have they had in moving these drill sheds from camps to other centres?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know that some of these drill sheds have been turned over to the reserve army, and as regards moving any of them, I know one which either has been moved or is now being moved. But that is part of the survey to which I was referring a moment ago.

Mr. BROOKS: I would doubt the feasibility of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to ask the parliamentary assistant a question regarding the control of equipment in camps. At Camp Borden last summer there was a great deal of equipment, and perhaps there is still. One of the men at the camp, without the consent of the commander, took out a motor car and went to Toronto. He was not familiar with the city or the stop signs or the motor by-laws, and yet he was driving along the streets very rapidly. He came to a stop street and ran into some people with whom I am acquainted and smashed up their car, injuring the man and his wife. The department owned that car, but it claimed that this soldier or camp follower had no business taking it out of the camp. He had not consent to take it out and yet he took it out. That would strike me as careless supervision of camp equipment, when any Tom, Dick or Harry could take out motor cars from a camp and drive to Toronto. I brought the case to the attention of the government and they disclaimed responsibility. Surely citizens have some protection. These quiet people were motoring peaceably along the street when they were run into by this car, which should have stopped but did not. That was an infraction of the city by-laws and yet the department disclaimed responsibility. My question is, has the department responsibility for its equipment? Should not someone be responsible for taking cars or any other equipment—it might have been rifles—away from the camp?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can only say that there are strict regulations governing the use of army equipment and particularly motor cars. I recall the case to which my hon. friend refers. As I remember, the culprit, if I may use that term, was himself an army driver and, as such, had a certain access to vehicles in this particular camp. Just as my hon. friend's chauffeur when sent out on duty might decide to make a trip on his own account, that is what happened here. The man was authorized to take out the car to do a certain job, and he kept the car instead of returning it, and proceeded to Toronto where he had an accident. He was not on duty. He had a car without orders, without authority. Consequently the department could not be held responsible any more than my hon. friend could be held responsible if his chauffeur had done the same thing; that is, from the purely legal angle. But I can assure my hon. friend that the greatest care is taken to look after service vehicles; and unless there has been a great relaxation, from my own experience during the time I served in the army it was practically impossible to move a vehicle out of anywhere.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this man still in camp?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. This particular man was, I believe, authorized to go out of the camp on duty, but he did not return to camp. He went to Toronto. That is the case to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is he still in the camp?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He was in the camp.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is he now?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. Following that, the man was, I believe, authorized to go out of friend may know, and was furthermore brought up for discipline, court martialed and found guilty. I think he was eventually discharged from the army.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just a word further. I want to follow up for a moment the matter which was raised last evening by the hon. member for Wentworth, who made an excellent job of what he said about the sea cadets. I, too, am a bit exercised over just what is to be the future of the sea cadets. Is it going to improve? Are more sea cadets to be trained? Just what is the department going to do for them? As one of the presidents of the Navy League of Canada, Ontario division, for many years, I must compliment the department upon the great assistance it has given to the sea cadet movement all during the war. As a matter of fact, the predecessor of the present minister, now the premier of Nova Scotia, was a warm supporter of the sea cadet corps. Every time he came to Toronto he was given a great reception. During the war the sea cadets did great work. In 1945 I believe there were about 15,000 young men in the ninety-one sea cadet corps in Canada, of whom some 6,000 in thirty-eight corps were in Ontario. I have long taken an active interest in sea cadet corps work because, so far as I can ascertain, not one young man trained in the sea cadet corps was ever in the juvenile court or had anything to do with juvenile delinquency. That is a remarkable tribute to the training these young men get in sea cadet work. What the department does in that regard is highly commendable.

I want to say further that those associated with the work, the men and women who give their time voluntarily, and did so during the war, had a marked influence on the prosecution of the war as far as the navy was concerned, for some 10,000 of the sea cadets during the war served in the navy. I believe about 250 in the merchant marine and perhaps fifty in the air force. I should now like to ask what programme the government has in hand to maintain and assist the development of the whole sea cadet corps programme? At the present time I believe there are some fourteen camps in Canada, more or less.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: How many are there?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are eight now.

Mr. MacNICOL: The number has been reduced. There were fourteen, though.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There were at one time.

Mr. MacNICOL: They have now been reduced to eight. Summer camps were effective places for the purpose of getting these young lads off the street and training them. Are the eight camps sufficient to take care of all who are offering themselves for that splendid training?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The programme for this year is to have a strength of 10,000 sea cadets.

The highest strength we have had, as far as I can see, or the peak, was when we used to have an authorized strength of 15,000. At the present time the strength is below 10,000, but the intention is to bring it up to 10,000, which we believe will be easily achieved. The same facilities of training will continue for the sea cadets and they will continue to work under officers of the reserve navy as had been done in the past. With the ceiling at 15,000, there were fourteen sea cadet camps last year with a total attendance of over 5,000. This year there are eight camps for a period of fourteen days; the quota has been set for 4,000, and that is believed to be adequate to provide for about the same proportion. There is usually about the same proportion of the totality of cadets who go to camp. About one-third or slightly over go to camp. With the quota of 4,000 for the camp, it is believed that will serve the purpose we had in mind.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would like to make a suggestion looking to some recognition of the services of such men as David Gibson, who give, not only of their time, but a good deal of financial assistance. Mr. David Gibson of Toronto is dominion president of the Navy League of Canada, and Mr. Gordon C. Leitch of Toronto is president of the Ontario division of it. They and all the men who serve with them give of their time freely. I often wondered if the department had any picture, diploma or certificate which they could send to the headquarters of the navy league—they could hang it in their board rooms—to show the government's appreciation of the services rendered by these men and the officers serving under them during the war.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know of no such thing, although I quite appreciate my hon. friend's point of view. I realize that, especially during the war, everybody who took an active part in the navy league which sponsored these sea cadets did an extraordinary job. But I do not think the matter to which my hon. friend refers has ever been considered. I shall be glad to bring it to the minister's attention.

Mr. MERRITT: Recently I placed on the order paper a question with regard to the pay of the reserve army officers who are instructing at Canadian Officers Training Corps. The question was passed as an order for return, but the return has not yet been brought down although I asked for it on the orders of the day. If the parliamentary assistant has the information now, I will not read the question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have part of the information. The only information which I do not have is the answer to question 3 (a), where the hon. member asked as to how many such days or hours of duty the reserve army personnel were paid for; that is, reserve army personnel who were working with the C.O.T.C. This information has not yet arrived from the various camps and areas.

Mr. MERRITT: Of course I wanted the information for these estimates, but perhaps I can put my question shortly. Were these reserve army officers paid at the rate at which they expected to be paid when the training season began? If not, what change was made in the rates of pay?

Mr. LAPOINTE: These army officers were paid the reserve rate of pay, and I understand that that was what they expected to receive.

Mr. MERRITT: My information is that they expected to receive pay for the number of days they actually performed their duties, which I understand would be around thirty days, but that subsequently, by reason of a departmental regulation, they received pay for only ten days, a smaller number of days than they actually put in at this important work. If that is the case I shall have some comments to make.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the case. I understand that these reserve army officers were paid for the time they were on duty as contingent officers with the C.O.T.C. They were paid for ten days at reserve army rates.

Mr. MERRITT: And did they actually do more than ten days' work?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what one might call the bone of contention. The staff of the army advised that this would be equitable pay for these officers. I believe some of them made representations, and the matter was discussed by the staff and also with university authorities. Following those negotiations, the service set the period of ten days as what they believed to be an equitable period for the service rendered with the C.O.T.C.

Mr. MERRITT: I understood that these officers were told before they undertook their work that they would be paid for the full number of days they were actually instructing, based upon the usual manner of calculating those days. Since the parliamentary assistant has not the final information, I shall not press the particular case at the moment further than to say that I feel any reserve army officer who is called upon to perform duties of that kind, or for that matter any duties, should be paid the full amount to which he is entitled, at the ordinary rates, for the period of time he puts in. There should be set no arbitrary period of ten days. If a man did twelve days or fifteen days he should be paid for that number of days, and there should be no attempt to pay these men off at some set figure. I believe that is an important consideration.

According to some other information that has come to me, things like street car allowances in reserve army units have recently been cut off. I have here a letter from one officer who complains that many expenses which arise normally in the functioning of a reserve army unit are being thrown back where they were before the war, upon the officers of the battalion. He does not give me any details, but from my own service I know the kind of expenses that used to arise and to which an officer was put. With estimates of the size they are now, I trust there will not be any of what I can only call chiseling on the individuals who are actually performing this important service for Canada. I hope the case of the C.O.T.C. officers will be resolved equitably and generously in their favour. I would remind the parliamentary assistant that this C.O.T.C. programme, in which I believe they are carrying the greatest part of the load, is the keystone of the government's own policy for the production of officers for the active and reserve forces. If you are to use reserve army personnel to do the instructing, then they should be treated particularly generously, because they have a particularly heavy responsibility placed upon their shoulders by this government.

I leave that particular point now. I want to say a word about the estimates generally. There is only one part of the integration or consolidation of the armed forces that I do not like. I do not like to have all three services lumped together in the estimates of the department, because one cannot get any idea as to how this money is being spent. You see a large item of $25,000,000, and you do not know how much of that is for ships, how much for tanks, how much for aeroplanes or how much for shoelaces. It is quite impossible to get any picture from the estimates as they are now set up as to how the money is being spent. In future years I hope this particular integration will be done away with and that we shall have a picture of all three services presented in the estimates.

I want to call attention to two items, just to show what large sums of money are being spent without any particular indication of where they are going. There is an amount of $14,348,558 for the acquisition, construction, purchase, maintenance and so on of properties. That amount alone is greater than the entire amount spent on all three services, for all purposes, in 1932. And we have no accounting for that sum, other than the total stated. An even worse case is the last item, which reads:

Sundries, including printing and stationery, telephones, teletype, telegrams, postage, office machinery, special training equipment and films, fees for special courses, maintenance grants, miscellaneous services, and other items not included in above, $10,162,195.

I do not think that is a satisfactory way of bringing the estimates before the house. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to give us some break-down of this item covering sundries. I want to say that I have no objection whatever to the expenditure of considerable sums on our defence forces. I feel that this is money very well spent, that it is good insurance against catastrophe, and I am not particularly complaining about the total amount shown in the estimates. I think, however, that with the amount of money being voted this year, we should see more than the very small number of troops on the ground, ships at sea and aircraft in the air than actually is the case. In the way the estimates are set up I do not see any explanation as to why we need $214 million or $215 million for the armed services this year when, from the figures we are given with respect to the forces being maintained, we see that they are not very much greater in size than they were in 1939. Would the parliamentary assistant make some comment on this point?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member asked as to what was contained in the sundries item. In it are found amounts for printing and stationery, office equipment, business machines, communications services and the like.

Mr. MERRITT: Those are set out in the estimates. I should like to have a break-down in respect of printing, teletypes and other items for the three services.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The break-down is as follows:

	Navy	Army	Air Force
Printing and stationery	$ 273,300	$ 576,505	$ 188,600
Communications services, telephones, teletypes, postage, etc.	310,738	1,093,000	680,000
Office machinery	45,038	nil	nil
Special training equipment and films	46,000	84,000	596,600
Fees for special courses	1,475,000	28,400	164,750
Maintenance grants	38,600	552,558	71,260
Miscellaneous	516,737	2,676,269	474,840
	$2,705,413	$5,010,732	$2,446,050

Mr. LENNARD: I should like to repeat what I said yesterday with respect to sea cadets. The restrictions in respect of training which have been imposed this year have never before been enforced. I know of one instance where a mine sweeper capable of accommodating 100 cadets and officers has been allowed to accommodate forty cadets and two officers. There were sixty-five cadets in the unit who wished to go to camp. Certainly this is a heavy restriction on training facilities. Yesterday I urged the minister to reconsider this matter and, if it is not possible to make any change this year, to arrange in another year so that more boys who have worked hard for the purpose may have the advantage of going to these training camps.

On occasions members supporting the government assert that those of us in the opposition do not offer any economic suggestions. Just about a year ago, as reported at page 5058 of Hansard for August, 19, 1946, I said

> Several weeks ago the minister said that he would welcome any suggestions that would curtail spending either by the government or by the Department of National Defence. I therefore draw his attention to the Canadian inspection board.
> On April 1 of this year the United Kingdom and Canada inspection board ceased to exist, and from then on it carried on as it does now under the name of the Canadian inspection board. From April 1 to July 1 that inspection board cost this country over $600,000. At that rate it will cost Canada this year over $2,500,000.

That establishment was not reduced until March 31 of this year. I readily understand that just because something is drawn to the attention of the government the excess service cannot be wiped out overnight. I say, however, that this represents a gross waste of the taxpayers' money. I know that many of the personnel in the export board did nothing for the six months prior to March 31, 1947. They were on extended leave. They would go to work in the morning, and would be sent home and told to report next day or next week. I know exactly what went on. If there are any other departments which have as little to do as the inspection board had last year, then the sooner they are disbanded or put on a greatly reduced basis, the better.

A return I received a few days ago shows that at present there are 348 civilian personnel on that board. How many of those have had overseas service? Are the three offices in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa in existence, and are they operating on the same scale as they were prior to March 31 of this year? Are the same premises being used in those three cities?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The staff has been cut down to a point where it now numbers 329, which is a further decrease. I cannot now tell the hon. member the percentage of service personnel employed on the inspection board, but I can get that information and I shall let him have it. I know there has been a considerable cut in the office space used, but I cannot say to just what degree in each of the cities the hon. member has mentioned. However I know that the premises occupied by the inspection board in my own city have been cut down to a point where the inspection board building is now occupied by the Quebec division of the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve.

Mr. LENNARD: Is it necessary to have even this reduced amount of office space? I know we have to have an inspection board, but on a much smaller scale than we did during the war. Is it necessary to have these different offices scattered throughout the country? Would it not be better during peace time and with the present state of affairs to have this work centralized in Ottawa in one office and then, if necessary, the inspectors could go out from here?

Mr. LAPOINTE: A committee was set up a short time ago to report to the minister as to the further operations of what is left of the United Kingdom and Canada inspection board.

Mr. WRIGHT: One of the good features of the war was the fact that many young Canadians who joined the armed forces were able to visit many parts of the dominion and thus become acquainted with conditions there. I notice in the break-down on page 275 of the estimates that it is apparently the intention to permit the people in the various forces to do a lot of travelling. I notice the item for travel, transportation, freight and express is $84,102,145.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid that is an error; the correct amount is $14,348,558.

Mr. WRIGHT: That does not appear to be so much out of line as the other item. Could the minister give a break-down of the various items and also as between the two railroads?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid there is not much difference between travel and transportation; they mean the same thing. The break-down is as follows:

Travel and transportation:
Navy	$1,519,400
Army	4,746,428
Air	2,239,080

Freight, express and cartage:
Navy	481,750
Army	2,970,700
Air	2,391,200
Total:
Navy	2,001,150
Army	7,717,128
Air	4,630,280

Mr. WRIGHT: Have you the break-down as between the two railroads? Could you also give some idea as to where the different units are trained? Are they trained in provinces different from the ones in which they are raised? Are they moved as units, or is this item to cover travelling expenses of individuals only?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It would be mostly transportation of troops, or of groups of men being transferred from one camp to another or from a basic training centre to an advanced training centre, groups of officers being sent on courses and so on. I doubt if over the year it would cover any great movement of troops.

Mr. WRIGHT: Would it include the transportation of reserve army men to camps?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It does. It covers departmental administration, active force, reserve force, R.C.A.F. auxiliary service, cadet services, demobilization, Northwest Territories and Yukon radio system, inspection board, dependents allowance board inspectors, Royal Canadian Naval College; it covers practically every operation of the three services.

Mr. WRIGHT: Have you the break-down for the two railroads?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The only figures I have are for the army last year. They are:

	C.N.R.	C.P.R.
Passengers	$4,070,325.83	$2,704,248.99
Meals	441,199.76	410,210.95
Freight	1,094,292.59	909,941.29
Express	73,710.90	42,141.17
Total	5,679,529.08	4,066,542.40
	or 58·27 per cent	or 41·73 per cent

Mr. GREEN: I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was justified in questioning the way in which this item is brought down. The minister and his parliamentary assistant were really tempting Providence when they brought in an estimate of this kind. There is only about $200,000 shown in the ordinary estimates, and then we have an item of $239,741,165 under the demobilization and reconversion vote with no break-down as to the forces. As the parliamentary assistant knows, during the war we had a break-down, even with the war appropriation votes, as between the three services. Is there any reason why this new practice of lumping the whole thing together should be adopted? It is practically impossible to criticize expenditures or to make worth-while suggestions with regard to them. Why has this practice been adopted?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The explanation is that the three branches of national defence have been brought under the one minister, and it was desired to coordinate the services, wherever practicable, in order to avoid the duplication of administrative functions. I think that was the explanation given by the minister when he took over this department and the three services were brought under his jurisdiction. In carrying out the plan it was assumed that one service might possibly take over similar functions in the other services. With that in mind it was thought advisable, in view of the amalgamation, to bring in the estimates of all three services under the one item. Whether that practice will be continued next year I could not say. I appreciate my hon. friend's views and those expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and I believe yesterday by the hon. member for Yale. Possibly another way will be found which will permit hon. members to have a clearer view of the expenditures which are contemplated by the department.

Mr. GREEN: The parliamentary assistant has been handling the estimates in such a pleasant way that it is difficult to go after him with a club, although that is the type of treatment he deserves with regard to this question. However we do give him fair warning that if he tries this again next year he will be in for trouble. We want a much better break-down of this estimate than we have at the present time.

Shortly after Japan struck in December, 1941, there rose up on the Pacific coast by voluntary effort almost spontaneously a group of auxiliaries who became known as the Pacific Coast Militia Rangers. They were men engaged in the logging industry, in fishing and in farming out in the more remote portions of the coast, and in some cases in the suburbs of the cities and the larger settlements. They did a grand job and they built up a wonderful esprit de corps. The defence department supplied them with certain clothing such as slickers for the rain and hats, also rifles and certain other equipment. The force made a great reputation for itself. After the war, many of the men in the Pacific Coast Militia Rangers wanted to carry on that work and they have been carrying on, I believe, as rifle associations. The present Minister of National Defence when he visited the coast at Easter of this year announced that there was to be a new ranger organization formed under the Department of National Defence. I have a dispatch of April 9 in a Vancouver paper, which starts by saying:

Organization of a dominion-wide "people's" defence force made up of trappers, miners, woodsmen and farmers in remote parts of Canada as an addition to the reserve militia was announced here Tuesday by Defence Minister Brooke Claxton at the conclusion of his six-day inspection of west coast defences.

Last night I was amazed to read in the Vancouver Sun, dated July 4, 1947, which came in yesterday, this statement by the chief of staff, Lieutenant-General Charles Foulkes, then visiting in Vancouver. He said:

Formation of a rangers corps to succeed the Pacific Coast Militia Rangers here is being held up only by a technicality which makes it necessary to revise the Militia Act because the force is not a regular army unit.

That report may not be fully accurate. But what is the hitch? We understood from the minister's announcement at Easter that this rangers corps was to be organized under the Department of National Defence. Now apparently for some reason that is not being done. I would point out to the parliamentary assistant that delay in carrying out plans of this type is dangerous. It makes it just that much more difficult to hold the men together, and if the delay is to continue for another year until there can be an amendment to one of the dominion statutes, that is a most discouraging development. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to make a statement tonight in regard to this situation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know of the organization the minister had in mind when he made that statement on the coast, and that is being planned. The technicality referred to is one which has never before been brought to my attention, and I cannot say whether it exists or not. I have not heard of it before. I quite agree that we should try to go ahead with this organization as quickly as possible. The work which the Pacific Coast Militia Rangers did during the war is well known, and I believe they have affiliated themselves into an association which may be perpetuated through this rangers movement becoming part of the reserve militia. I will look into the point raised by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GREEN: May I point out to the parliamentary assistant that some of the officials in the department may not be pleased to see this rangers corps established. There is a certain type of military mind that does not like these irregulars. I hope we have none of that kind on the staff at the present time, but they have been known to be at headquarters, and the minister may find that there is somebody delaying this organization. I would suggest that he personally go into it carefully and see that the rangers are given the proper status without any further delay.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Certainly.

Mr. GREEN: One final question. During the session we have had some discussion in the house concerning Canadian Arsenals Limited, a crown company which has been manufacturing certain weapons of war. It has been difficult to find out who is to be responsible for that crown company. At one time we were told that it was to be the Department of National Defence. I see the Minister of Reconstruction coming into the chamber. I am always a little suspicious that he may be mixed up with Canadian Arsenals Limited.

Mr. HOWE: If there is any question about Canadian Arsenals Limited, it is an important part of the Department of Reconstruction and quite out of order on this vote.

Mr. GREEN: I see the Minister of National Defence coming in. We should be able to get this settled right now. Can we find out whose baby this is? Who is responsible for Canadian Arsenals Limited, and who is to be responsible for it?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Canadian Arsenals Limited with its five or six plants at the present time is under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply thinks he is going to keep it. Is that right?

Mr. CLAXTON: We do not know how long he is going to keep it, but he himself has announced that there will be a change. We have been considering whether or not the change should be in favour of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the associated government agencies there, or the Department of National Defence. There is no decision yet, but the present inclination is in favour of the Department of National Defence. We are envisaging a rather high level committee of representatives of the manufacturers who made munitions during the war and representatives of Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps Association, Canadian Arsenals Limited, Canadian Commercial Corporation, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the senior supply officers of the army, which would constitute a major government committee to advise the minister and the defence committee of the cabinet on matters of industrial organization. That is our inclination. We believe that in that way we shall be able to bring together all the forces which worked so well during the war and which it is necessary to have working together in peace.

Mr. GREEN: On that committee will there be any representatives of industry?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; the majority would be representative of industry.

Mr. GREEN: How would they be chosen?

Mr. CLAXTON: Through the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps Association council.

Mr. GREEN: That is civilians?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HARKNESS: There are two points I wish to make. First, I would call the minister's attention to the peculiar situation that exists in connection with the organization grants for what are looked on as newly formed units in the reserve army. I believe the regulations lay down that this grant can be given to any unit which has been more or less just formed since the war as a result of the new reserve army set-up. However, what has happened in a large number of cases is that units which actually are new organizations have been given names belonging to some former unit which they are supposed to perpetuate. For example, in Calgary the 41st anti-tank regiment is claimed to perpetuate the 41st reserve regiment which existed there during the war and is an entirely war-time creation. Actually the only thing it inherited was the name. It did not get men, equipment or anything else. It simply got the name. Nevertheless, owing to the fact that it has the name, it is cut off from receipt of the organization grant. That has caused a certain amount of difficulty, and also misunderstanding on the part of the reserve army unit commanders. I should like to bring this to the minister's attention and ask him, if possible, to have the matter straightened out in a more equitable way than has been done so far, so that units which are in reality new will be able to draw the grant, notwithstanding the fact that they may have inherited a name and nothing else.

The second point I wish to bring up is in connection with the remarks, mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for York West, which were attributed in the Calgary Herald of Thursday, July 3, to General Foulkes when he was out there. He was speaking in connection with C.O.T.C., and he stated, according to the newspaper:

> Cadets are being trained as officer instructors capable of forming a nucleus around which a swiftly trained army could be formed in the event of an emergency.

[Mr. Claxton.]

I hope that is not the view of the Department of National Defence, because I do not think the fact that officers are turned out by C.O.T.C. corps now in existence will result in an army being formed much more quickly than we were able to form one on the outbreak of the war in 1939. In other words, we shall have only a certain number more of trained officers, and I certainly hope the Department of National Defence does not think that, owing to the institution of the C.O.T.C. training plan, we shall be able to form an army in a hurry in the event of an emergency. I do not think we shall be able to form it more rapidly than in 1939.

In addition to the fallacy, as I see it, in that statement, which I hope is incorrect, or is an incorrect report, I suggest that statements of that kind react disadvantageously as far as recruitment of the reserve army is concerned. If senior officers of the army, in travelling about the country, make statements of that kind, which are highly publicized, the average young man will say, "What is the use of my joining the reserve army? It is not much needed. These C.O.T.C. boys will have all the jobs as officers to begin with, and there will be no chance of my rising in the organization, because apparently that is all they need when war breaks out. They can get an army in a hurry and there is no use in my putting in training at the present time." It is particularly from that point of view that statements of that kind are harmful, and I hope this one was incorrect. Can the minister comment on those two matters?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sure the hon. member would not disagree with the view, which has been so repeatedly expressed, that it is a good thing to have a very large number, as far as we can, of well trained officers.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am very much in favour of it.

Mr. CLAXTON: Everyone is agreed on that. On the other hand, in the event of war there will always be room for others; but in between we hope we shall be able to develop practices whereby promising men having qualities of leadership, education and physique will be given every possible chance of encouragement to qualify as officers. We hope our kind of force—and I mean by force the force of the three services—will be one which will give opportunity for a career for young and promising men either in the active or in the reserve forces.

With regard to the other question raised, the amount provided for grants to units is $375,308, and provision is made for the kind of allowance to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I think that is amply taken care of.

Mr. HARKNESS: Do I understand the minister to say that he will look into the matter of organization grants and have that difficulty straightened out?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. HARKNESS: Thank you very much. There is one other matter I should like to touch upon in these estimates, and I shall have finished. On page 1321 of Hansard, there is a return which was brought down in answer to a question by the hon. member for Wentworth, which reads:

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many military vehicles or weapons were overhauled, repaired or reconditioned at Sorel, Quebec, during the year 1946?
2. What firm or firms did this work?
3. What was the cost?
4. What disposition was made or is to be made of these vehicles or weapons?

Mr. Lapointe:

1. Military vehicles—none; weapons—274 together with spares and ancillaries were modified and overhauled.
2. Sorel Industries Limited, Sorel, Quebec.
3. $514,719.87.
4. These weapons are being issued to active and reserve force units of the Canadian army.

That 274 weapons should have been repaired at a cost of approximately $514,000 means that the cost of repairing was a little less than $2,000 each, and I should like to know what kind of weapons they were and to whom they have been distributed, since the cost of $2,000 apiece for repairing weapons is, on the face of it, excessive, in fact very excessive.

Mr. CLAXTON: The weapons in question were 25-pounder guns which had been manufactured at Sorel Industries and the modifications of which were gradually applied and are still being applied in the armament depots of Canada. These modifications cost a good deal. It would have been much easier to have made the gun with the modifications than to have made the gun, and added the modifications later. It is an expensive proposition, but the modifications were proven to be necessary in consequence of war-time experience. They were necessary in order to bring the weapons up to date. They are the most up-to-date weapons and therefore we feel the expense was justified.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister is aware, I believe, that I know a little about guns, and I should like him to tell us when these guns were completed, lacking in all these modifications. At the end of the war, our guns, many of which were made in 1942 and 1943, carried if I remember correctly, about twenty-seven modifications. Most of these modifications had been put on by our own men in our own unit workshops, and those that had not, had been done in the ordinary army ordnance workshops. When were these guns completed and delivered to the army, and what are the modifications that would run to $2,000 apiece? Unless you practically rebuild the gun I cannot see why it should require that amount of money.

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe the hon. member knows enough about guns and the cost of them to realize that $2,000 does not represent a very large proportion of the cost of a gun. In this case, production was begun, I believe, in 1941 or 1942, and modifications came in from time to time. Then they accumulated, and my colleague the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply was face to face with the problem of production. There is always the question whether you produce with modifications or without, and whether you take the time to produce the modifications or not. I think he was faced with that problem almost from the outset of the war until the end. Almost the greatest delays in the production of war materials, after you get the initial plans, I should think he would agree, were the modifications made in them. Frequently the modifications cost a good deal more than the original weapon. In the case of the 25-pounder gun, we began production in 1941 or 1942. Modifications began at once. Some of them were made in some weapons and some were not. They have gone up, I think, to something of the magnitude of twenty-five or thirty modifications. I have seen armament depots across Canada where there are still many modifications. They are always being made.

Mr. HARKNESS: But were those guns never delivered?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right. Some of the guns were delivered and used in Europe, and brought back. Others were never delivered. We have both. As an illustration of this, I might mention the Mosquito aeroplanes. Throughout the length of the war I think there were some eighteen modifications which accumulated. To make the eighteen modifications with respect to each Mosquito would cost $15,000 today.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HARKNESS: No. I am still not satisfied with regard to modifications in these guns. Instead of the government spending this $500,000 odd, I think the army should have put them in their own ordnance workshops and had the modifications made there, particularly if the guns had been used in Europe, as most of the modifications would have been made. When I was there we modified these guns regularly. Another modification was made practically every two or three weeks. But most of those modifications were things which could be put on by your own unit fitters or your own light aid detachment.

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. HARKNESS: If they could not do it, then it could be done by the ordnance workshop. On the ones which came back from Europe, if they were in use, I would think very few modifications would have to be made. In any event, I think all the modifications should have been made by the army themselves in their ordnance workshops, as a matter of giving practice and experience to the men in them. This particular item of $500,000 odd which was spent in that way is, I think, an appropriate item to be investigated by the public accounts committee, and I hope it will be so investigated in the coming session.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to have it investigated.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry? Carried.

Mr. ADAMSON: No, Mr. Chairman. I have a question concerning the permanent force units. Are the units being broken up? In other words, after the last war, the permanent force units were broken up very much to their detriment in training, morale and usefulness. The P.P.C.L.I., for instance, had one or two companies in Winnipeg and one company in Esquimalt. When the colonel wanted to travel between his headquarters in Winnipeg and his headquarters in Esquimalt, he had to pay his own way. I want to ask the minister specifically with regard to one instance, that of the Royal 22nd Regiment. Where is the headquarters of this unit? Are there two headquarters? Is the unit split up?

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard to the Royal 22nd, I can tell the hon. member for York West that the headquarters is in Quebec, and the regiment will be centred in Quebec; but one or two companies will be located in St. Johns, Quebec, during the winter months. The whole regiment will be brought together in Valcartier, Quebec, during the summer months for some training.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. ADAMSON: Are there any units split up in such a way that it makes difficult their joining together as a complete battalion?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know of any other unit which is being treated in this way.

Mr. ADAMSON: The military establishment of the Royal 22nd Regiment consists of one company and the officers in St. Johns, Quebec?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is not quite fixed whether there will be one or two companies in St. Johns and the remainder in Quebec and what the proportion will be between the two. But it is decided for the time being that, in view of the lack of accommodation, part of the unit will be in Quebec; the regimental headquarters will be in the Citadel in Quebec, and the rest of the unit will be in St. Johns during the winter. The whole unit will be brought together in Valcartier for training in the summer.

Mr. ADAMSON: In modern training with a battalion, you need the whole unit together to do effective training. I would think the policy of splitting up a battalion militates seriously against effective work in the efficient training of the battalion. I should hope that steps would be taken to get all battalions together as units.

Mr. BROOKS: Can the minister say where companies of the Royal Canadian Regiment will be stationed? Will any be stationed in the maritimes?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, that is not contemplated.

Mr. BROOKS: Where are their headquarters, and where will they be stationed?

Mr. CLAXTON: At Brockville and Borden.

Mr. BROOKS: There will be none in Halifax?

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

552. Defence research and development, subject to allocation by the treasury board, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $2,005,000, $13,031,834.

Mr. WRIGHT: This item deals with research. I think it is one of the most important items in the defence estimates, because quite often in the past we have blamed our defence on the basis of the last war we fought, instead of looking ahead to the one which might occur in the future. I do not think our own military men were any worse in this respect than the military authorities of any other country. I believe, however, that we have learned a great deal from the last war with regard to the importance of research. The minister should give us some idea of how our research is being carried on. Is it being carried on in conjunction with the universities in Canada? Are they given certain problems to solve for the department? Is it being carried on through our national research council? What coordination is there between civilian and national defence research? In all research work, when men are seeking the solution of a certain problem, they quite often stumble on other things which are of value but which may not be of any value to them. To what extent are our research people making any information which they obtain and which may not be of interest to them, available to the industry and to the scientists of this country? The minister should give us some explanation.

Mr. CLAXTON: In response to the interest expressed by the hon. member for Melfort, I am indeed glad to make a brief statement on the subject of defence research. The Department of National Defence Act was amended on April 1 of this year to provide for the establishment of a defence research board as a permanent part of the department. The board consists of five ex officio and six appointed members serving under a full-time chairman, Doctor O. M. Solandt. The ex officio members are the chiefs of staff of the three armed forces, the president of the national research council and the deputy minister of national defence. The appointed members are Professor C. H. Best of the university of Toronto; Professor Paul Gagnon of Laval university; Colonel R. D. Harkness of the Northern Electric Company; Professor J. H. L. Johnstone of Dalhousie university; Professor Otto Maass of McGill university and Professor G. M. Shrum of the university of British Columbia. The country is most fortunate in obtaining the advice and guidance of such a distinguished group. Each one of them is not only an outstanding leader in his own field, but has also made an important contribution to the defence of Canada in the past war.

Under the guidance of this board, good progress has been made in setting up a permanent organization for defence research. This organization is already beginning to take its place as an essential part of the defence of Canada. It can be regarded as a fourth service, and there is every reason to believe that it will play an increasingly important part in military affairs in the future.

The organization under the defence research board will consist of a headquarters staff, advisory committees and a few research establishments. The ultimate aim of the whole organization will be to make available to the armed forces of Canada all the scientific resources of Canada and of other countries. The headquarters staff will be the main link with the armed forces, getting from them their research requirements and conveying to them the latest results of scientific research. The advisory committees will serve to make available to the armed forces the best scientific advice that is available in Canadian government, university and industrial research laboratories. They will also help to keep the whole scientific community of the country in touch with the problems of defence to facilitate rapid mobilization in time of need. In order to avoid any unnecessary duplication of research facilities, the research stations of the board will deal only with those problems of the armed forces which have little or no civilian interest. In other fields, such as electronics and aeronautics, it will make use of existing research laboratories, especially those of the national research council. In all its work, the board will give priority to problems in which Canada has some special interests for which our facilities are specially suited. Experience has already shown that well-directed defence research produces many results that are of considerable direct and indirect value to the civilian economy.

In planning this organization, the government has had clearly in mind the vital need for continuity in research. This new organization is no mere temporary addition to our armed forces. It is a fully integrated part of the defences of the country. It must be staffed and equipped to take a long term view of the scientific requirements of defence, and it must continue in being as long as there is a need for defence forces. Further, to ensure that research receives adequate consideration of the highest level, the director general of defence research has been given the status of a chief of staff, is a member of the chiefs of staff committee and defence council and attends meetings of the defence committee of the cabinet.

Coordination with civilian research and industry is effected through a number of committees. I can assure the hon. member that the important problem to which he has directed attention is being given the utmost consideration, and that the organization is already in being to deal with it in a way which I am sure he would approve.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am certainly pleased that the minister has made this statement, and particularly pleased that there is cooperation with industry and our educational institutions in this respect.

There is just one further question. During the war we were able to get much further in our research work through cooperation with the United States and with Great Britain. I am just wondering to what extent we are continuing that cooperation in this line today.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think the best thing I can tell the committee is that we are continuing to work together.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice an item of $25,263,748 for personnel supplies, food supplies, medical and dental stores, clothing and personnel equipment, barrack, camp, hospital equipment and so on. I should like to ask the minister if they are using the supplies left over from the last war. It would seem to me that, as far as clothing, dental stores and supplies for barracks, camps and so on are concerned, there should be sufficient supplies on hand to meet the needs of the armed forces. In that connection also, I should like to ask if uniforms for the soldiers are still being manufactured. I understand that is being done in certain parts of Canada, and it seems to me a ridiculous situation that, with the thousands of uniforms which must have been on hand at the end of the war, we should be still manufacturing uniforms.

Mr. CLAXTON: The situation is that at the end of the war we had very large supplies of various types of uniforms, but we did not have all the sizes to meet all the needs. Since then, we have just purchased what has been necessary. For example, quite a lot of cloth was to be declared surplus to War Assets Corporation by the Reconstruction and Supply pool, and we purchased from that corporation quite a considerable quantity of this cloth for the making of uniforms during the next three or four years. We have endeavoured to economize our resources in every possible way. As far as I know, we have not wasted any money. We have used what we had; but in order to supply a force as large as we now have, with some thirty-four or thirty-five thousand in the three armed services, it has been necessary to supply continuously such things as uniforms of different sizes, and that has been done only to the extent necessary. We have used up every possible piece of equipment we had on hand, and all the clothing we had on hand, and have obtained additional supplies only where necessary.

Mr. BROOKS: Do I understand that the change in size is due to the change in size of the personnel of the army after the war was over? We had sizes for all sizes and shapes of men during the war.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member will appreciate that when one is dealing with forces of the magnitude of 700,000 he does not require such refinements of sizing as are necessary when he gets down to 34,000 or 35,000.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Yesterday the minister agreed to inquire into a point of law which I raised. Can he give that information now?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sorry I cannot give the answer yet. The question was raised for the first time. It has been referred to the judge advocate general and the law officers, and as soon as I get the answer I shall be glad to communicate with the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

190. Grants to military associations and institutes, as detailed in the estimates, $113,350.

Mr. PROBE: I believe the parliamentary assistant has some information for which I asked earlier.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member asked about the age limits at which other ranks and officers must be compulsorily retired. The age group of other ranks in administrative and training staffs is forty-five, and for sergeants and above it is forty-five. In static units of headquarters establishments for the rank and file it is fifty, and for sergeants and up it is fifty-five. The discharge of certain specialists and tradesmen may be deferred for a period not exceeding five years beyond the age limit, but each of these cases has to be decided by army headquarters. All personnel is to be discharged on thirty-five years' active force service or at the age limit, whichever is the earlier. In respect of officers the age limit for brigadiers and above is fifty-five; for colonels, fifty-three; for lieutenant-colonels, fifty-one; for majors, forty-nine; for captains, forty-seven; and for lieutenants, forty-five.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CLAXTON: May I make two brief announcements, one of which has to do with civil service leave, and a matter which is of great concern for the reserves. I am happy to say that order in council P.C. 1/2728 covering leave for civil servants attending camp was adopted today, and I shall place it on the table, expressing the hope that the example set by the federal government in this field will be copied by provincial governments and industries throughout the length and breadth of Canada so as to permit members of the reserve forces to attend camp without monetary loss.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

130. Departmental administration, $183,173.

Mr. CROLL: I should like to take only a few moments to bring to the attention of the committee what I consider is still an important problem, namely that of immigration. I shall not weary the committee tonight with the old arguments which have been used on many occasions before; nor am I going to reiterate the various arguments which are being used in the senate chamber, in the various forums in Canada and in the service clubs.

I am not going to discuss principles tonight, either, not because I believe the principle is not important, but I am convinced that not only are the principles of immigration understood in Canada, but they are accepted throughout the country. What I am concerned about is the matter of administration. I consider it important that the principles we accept should be translated into action. As things stand, we are not doing enough. It is true that over the period of months governments have evolved a policy which is commendable, but at the same time it is not bringing about results. Perhaps that is inevitable where we have a day-to-day policy, and particularly when we realize that the Department of Mines and Resources is a large one and has in it many important agencies.

The blue book indicates that in that department matters pertaining to the Northwest Territories are placed. Indian affairs form part of it, as does the dominion observatory. Indeed the department covers some thirty boards, branches and bureaux. I have nothing but praise for the department in the manner in which it has carried out its various diversified functions, but I think it is impossible under the present arrangement, to do justice to vital problems such as immigration. The first thing we must do is to let the immigration branch stand on its own feet. During the period of great immigration to this country, and in the days of our greatest prosperity the department of colonization and immigration dealt with some 2,835,000 people from 1901 to 1913. When the flow dwindled the department contracted, and was tucked away in the Department of Mines and Resources where it has remained ever since. It is an efficient department, but at the same time entirely circumscribed.

Today's papers indicate that the committee on Indian affairs has asked for the setting up of a separate Indian affairs department. I notice by the press that Senator Crerar, a former minister of mines and resources, is quoted to have said that Canada's natural resources have been neglected to a point that was almost tragic. I think the time has come to put the immigration department on a full-time basis, to reconstitute a separate department. If the government does not see fit to do that, then the least it can do is to appoint a deputy minister of immigration. The Department of National Revenue has two deputies; the Department of National Health and Welfare has two deputies, and the Department of National Defence has one deputy with three associate deputies.

The Northwest Territories in themselves have unlimited horizons, and that in itself provides an inspiring job. There is an empire there which needs developing, and that will take all the energies of a full-time deputy minister. The Indian affairs committee suggested that the department should be unscrambled by having a deputy devote his entire time to Indian affairs. I know it is a bold step, in these days when we hear so much of bureaucracy, to suggest a further enlargement. That sort of thing is looked upon with some disfavour, but I would recall to hon. members that, during the war and its aftermath, when important problems came to the front we did not hesitate to set up departments of government which were answerable to this house. For instance, there were the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, both created to meet pressing needs. When the need had passed, one department was closed down and the minister has told us that some day the department of reconstruction and supply will go out of existence.

Immigration today and for the immediate future constitutes a problem of national significance. It offers a challenge which we must meet boldly. If we temporize; if we allow it to bog down administratively, we are likely not to reap great benefits. Another aspect of immigration is the regulations. Anyone who has made any study of the regulations will realize that to some extent they are not logical. If a nephew is twenty-one years of age, he is admissible under the regulations; if he is over twenty-one years of age, he is not admissible. I could never understand what difference it makes. If a man is in good health, is able to work and has someone here in Canada willing to assume responsibility, what earthly difference does it make whether he is twenty-one or twenty-two years of age, so long as he fits into our economy? I can see where in years to come we shall have a lot of people making affidavits before the old age pensions board to the effect that they are really a little older than they are supposed to be.

I do not like the category method of selection because it smacks too much of the United States system. Like the United States system, it is meant to keep people out, not to let them in. We should admit to Canada anyone who meets our requirements and can conform to our standards. We need hundreds of thousands of people. If the prospective immigrant has a relative here, no matter of what degree, so much the better. If he has not a relative but has a friend who is willing to undertake that he will not become a public charge, then that ought to be good enough.

We have been told that transportation is a difficulty, but recently the premier of Ontario showed us one way of cutting through red tape. The country was much impressed by the action he took in going over to England and arranging for plane transportation for a great number of people. Even today he has two ministers of his government in England arranging various details. I have here a clipping from the Globe and Mail of July 9, datelined London, which reads:

More than 600,000 Britons have made definite plans to migrate, according to the figures given in a man-power survey made by Political and Economic Planning, an independent research organization, and published here today.

We need that kind of people and we ought to make a serious bid for them. If the providing of passage is necessary to lure them to this country, then we ought to make sure that ships are available. I can recall when there was nothing we could do about transportation, but immediately after the premier of Ontario was able to make arrangements to fly people here, we were able to arrange for a ship. It seemed to come out of the thin air, but it will carry some 600 passengers a month. I think we now have transportation for almost 3,000 a month.

Some time ago we were happy to hear the minister announce that 5,000 persons from the displaced persons camps would be admitted to Canada at once. Newspaper reports indicate that the quota has been filled completely, although the people are not yet here. One question one must ask is: What now? From what we know as members, from the letters we get and from the people we see, we know that the surface has not even been scratched so far as people who have someone in Canada willing and able to stand good for them are concerned.

At the present time Britain is admitting 4,000 immigrants a week and has already admitted some 500,000 into that country. This is an urgent problem. We cannot afford to delay. We cannot afford to wait for the international refugee organization, because it may never function. From all indications the British are looking after their own zone; the French are looking after their zone, and the United States are looking after theirs. We in Canada must face the facts. We have pledged ourselves to provide a home for a fair share of Europe's refugee population who have roots in this country, not only of kinship, but of general national origin. This means that sooner or later we shall take a certain number. With our population, our resources and our absorptive capacity, my suggestion is that we do not wait too long. We ought to begin now to admit those who will eventually come here in any event, because delay is causing incalculable harm at the moment. To bring them over now would be, not only in their own best interests, but in our best interests, for other countries are making very much of the opportunities and are taking off the most skilled, the farmers, and the technicians in every calling, and if we delay we shall find ourselves with only the second best. I think it is time for us to make big plans and to make them at once.

One thing we have to be sure of is that no one shall come into this country without the approval of the government. I think we are all agreed that there is no room for private enterprise in that field.
